57. Nilabati Behera v. State of Orissa, AIR 1993 SC 1960 : (1993) 2 SCC 746; Smt. Postsangbam Ningol Thokchom v. General Officer Commanding, AIR 1997 SC 3534 : (1997) 7 SCC 725. Also see, infra, Ch. XXXIII.
58. Inder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1995 SC 312.

lakhs for each of the said seven persons to his legal representatives. The Court took the view that the police force being the arm of the State, it must bear the consequences for its failure to enforce law and order and protect the citizens. The Court also directed initiation of legal action against the guilty policemen. When the guilty policemen were identified, the State should seek to recover from them the amount paid by the State as compensation as this was the tax-payers' money.[59]

A habeas corpus petition was filed by the father of T. It was alleged that T had been kept in illegal custody by the police officers. It was established that T was killed in an encounter with the police. The Court awarded Rs. 5 lac as compensation to the petitioner.[60]

A foreigner who enters India secretly cannot claim freedom of movement, and his detention with a view to expel him from India is not illegal.[61]

The petitioner was convicted by a Court martial for criminal misappropriation of money and was sentenced to a term of imprisonment. Rejecting his petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the High Court stated that habeas corpus was not available to question the correctness of a decision by a legally constituted Court of competent jurisdiction. The High Court can go into questions of jurisdiction of the Court martial, or whether it was properly constituted, or whether there was such an irregularity or illegality as would go to the root of its jurisdiction.[62]

Habeas corpus may also be issued when a person complains of illegal custody or detention by a private person.[63] When conflicting claims are made for the custody of an infant, the Court can enquire into these claims and award the custody to the proper person.[64]

After dismissal of criminal appeal, review petition and curative petition, the petitioner's plea that the Supreme Court allowed his appeal to the extent that his conviction under S. 121 of IPC was set aside, but he was convicted under S. 123 of IPC read with S. 39 Cr. PC though this was not the charge against him, and therefore he was deprived of opportunity to defend himself, the Court held that this aspect had been considered while dismissing review and curative petitions and entertaining a fresh petition under Art. 32 on the same ground would require setting aside the orders passed in review and curative petitions.[65]

(ii) QUO WARRANTO

The writ lies only in respect of a public office of a substantive character.[66] The writ does not therefore lie to question the appointment of a college principal as it is not a public office.[67]

---

59. Inder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1995 SC 1949 : (1995) 3 SCC 702. Also see, Malkiat Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1522.
60. Malkiat Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1522.
61. Anwar v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1971 SC 337.
62. S. Soundarajan v. Union of India, AIR 1970 Del. 29.
63. Madhu Bala v. Narendra Kumar, AIR 1982 SC 938.
64. Gohar Begum v. Suggi, AIR 1960 SC 93 : (1960) 1 SCR 597; Veena Kapoor v. Varinder Kumar, AIR 1982 SC 792 : (1981) 3 SCC 92.
65. Shaukat Hussain Guru v. State (NCT) Delhi, (2008) 6 SCC 776 : AIR 2008 SC 2419.
66. Ram Singh Saini v. H.N. Bhargava, AIR 1975 SC 1852 : (1975) 4 SCC 676; Arun Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Raj 67.
67. Niranjan Kumar v. Univ. of Bihar, AIR 1973 Pat 85. For a clear enunciation as to when such writ is issued see N. Kannadasan v. Ajoy Khose, (2009) 7 SCC 1, 55.

The writ calls upon the holder of a public office to show to the Court under what authority he is holding that office. The Court may oust a person from an office to which he is not entitled. It is issued against the usurper of an office and the appointing authority is not a party. The Court can thus control election or appointment to an office against law, and protect a citizen from being deprived of a public office to which he may be entitled.[68]

If the statute prescribes certain qualifications for holding a public office, it is certainly open to the Court on a petition filed by a citizen to scrutinise the qualifications of the person whose appointment to the public office is called into question.[69]

To file a petition for quo warranto, it is not necessary that the petitioner should have suffered a personal injury himself, or should seek to redress a personal grievance.[70] Petitions for quo warranto have been moved to test the validity of election of a person to a university syndicate, or as the mayor of a municipal corporation,[71] nomination of members to a Legislative Council by the Governor,[72] appointment of the Chief Minister of a State,[73] or the Chief Justice of India,[74] or the Advocate-General in a State,[75] or a public prosecutor,[76] University teachers,[77] presiding officer of a labour Court,[78] etc.

The motives of the appointing officer in making the appointment in question are irrelevant in a quo warranto petition.[79] Also, the Court would not issue the writ if it is futile, e.g., if the person holding the office, on being ousted by quo warranto can be reappointed.[80]

A petition for quo warranto was filed against the Chief Minister of Rajasthan on the ground that he was not validly elected to the House. The Rajasthan High Court rejecting the petition ruled that quo warranto may be issued on the petition of a member of the public if a Chief Minister holds office without lawful authority, and in breach of any constitutional provision. The office of the Chief Minister is one of substantive character created by the Constitution. But membership of an Assembly is not an office for the purposes of quo warranto and it is not a proper remedy to raise questions relating to the election of the Chief Minister to the House. Such a question can be raised properly only through an election petition.[81]

When the Governor of a State appoints as the Chief Minister under Art. 164 of the Constitution a person who is not qualified, or is disqualified, to be a member

---

68. Univ. of Mysore v. Govinda Rao, AIR 1965 SC 491 : (1964) 4 SCR 575; Puranlal v. P.C. Ghosh, AIR 1970 Cal 118.
69. Durga Chand v. Administrator, AIR 1971 Del. 73.
70. Satish Chander v. Rajasthan Univ., AIR 1970 Raj 184. But see, Arun Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Raj 67.
71. Rajendar Singh v. Shejwalkar, AIR 1971 MP 248.
72. Supra, Ch. VI.
73. Supra, Ch. VII.
74. Supra, Ch. IV.
75. Karkare v. Shevde, AIR 1952 Nag 330; see, supra, Ch. VII.
76. Mohambaran v. Jayavelu, AIR 1970 Mad. 63.
77. Supra, footnote 68.
78. State of Haryana v. Haryana Co-op. Transport, AIR 1977 SC 237 : (1977) 1 SCC 271.
79. S.C. Malik v. P.P. Sharma, AIR 1982 Del. 83.
80. P.L. Lakhanpal v. A.N. Ray, AIR 1975 Del. 66; supra, Ch. IV.
81. Purshottam Lal v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1979 Raj 23. Also see, infra, Ch. XIX, under Elections.

of the State Legislature, the appointment is contrary to Art. 164 and is, thus, unconstitutional. Although the discretion of the Governor is not challengeable because of Art. 361, the appointment of the Chief Minister can be quashed by the High Court by issuing quo warranto to him.[82]

No writ of quo warranto is issuable against the Council of Ministers on the ground that it does not command majority support in the House. Under Art. 164, the choice of the Chief Minister by the Governor is not circumscribed by anything in the Constitution in terms of majority or minority party. The only effective check is that the Ministry shall fall if it fails to command a majority in the Assembly. But once installed, so long as the Legislature is not in session, a Ministry may carry on without being sure of such a majority. So long as the Ministry enjoys the pleasure of the Governor, no quo warranto can issue on the ground that it does not command majority support of the Assembly without the Assembly itself deciding that matter on its floor. No one can say that the Ministry does not enjoy the confidence of the Assembly when it is prorogued. Even when the Ministry is defeated on the floor of the House, the Governor may ask it to stay in office until alternative arrangements are made and no quo warranto shall issue during that period.[83]

A quo warranto cannot be issued seeking dismissal of the Chief Minister of a State on the ground of non-performance of a constitutional duty.[84] The Chief Minister holds office during the pleasure of the Governor; the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the State Assembly.[85] Therefore, the matter liesprimarily in the domain of the State Assembly or the Governor's discretion who appoints the Chief Minister. The proper remedy in the situation may be mandamus directing the Chief Minister to discharge his constitutional obligation. In this connection, the A.P. High Court has observed:[86]

> "Ordinarily, no action would lie against a person who holds elected office by virtue of an election and one who is not removable by the elector cannot be removed by issuance of a writ in the nature of quo warranto, unless one has incurred the disqualification to hold the elected office, specifically provided by the Constitution or any statutory law enacted thereunder. Disqualification cannot be read into the Constitution implicitly or by process of reasoning and presumptions, how so ever moralistic, ethical, desirable, high sounding they may be".

The Speaker of the Goa Assembly declared the Chief Minister and his two colleagues in the Cabinet disqualified for membership of the Assembly under the Anti-defection law.[87] The High Court passed an interim stay order. Thereafter, the Assembly removed the Speaker from office and the Deputy Speaker, acting as the Speaker, reviewing the earlier Speaker's order set it aside and thus removed the disqualification of the Chief Minister and his two colleagues.

Nearly after ten months, a writ petition was filed challenging the order passed by the Deputy Speaker. It was argued that the writ petition was not maintainable

---

82. B.R. Kapur v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 2001 SC 3435 : (2001) 7 SCC 231.
83. R.K. Nokulsana Singh v. Rishang Keising, AIR 1981 Gau 48. Also see, supra, Chs. III and VII.
84. Y.S. Rajasekara Reddy v. Nara Chandrababu Naidu, AIR 2000 AP 142.
85. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. A(iii)(c); Sec. B.
86. AIR 2000 AP, at 147.
87. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. F and Ch. VI, Sec. B(iv).

because of laches,[88] but the Supreme Court rejected the contention and held that the petition for quo warranto was maintainable in the instant case for the following reasons : the petitioner was not asserting any personal interest; the persons concerned were holding high public offices inspite of being disqualified for membership of the House, i.e., these persons continued to usurp the office and perpetuate an illegality and it was necessary to prevent the same.[89]

Appointment of a government pleader was quashed because the procedure prescribed in the relevant rules for this purpose had not been followed. The petition was made one year after the appointment. Ignoring the plea of laches, the Court observed that in a matter involving the right to a public office and violation of legal procedure to be adopted in making appointment to a public office, delay should not deter the Court in granting the discretionary relief and rendering justice.[90]

(iii) MANDAMUS

Mandamus is a command issued by a Court commanding a public authority to perform a public duty belonging to its office.[91] Mandamus is issued to enforce performance of public duties by authorities of all kinds. For example, when a tribunal omits to decide a matter which it is bound to decide, it can be commanded to determine the questions which it has left undecided.[92] Although the Court ordinarily is reluctant to assume the functions of the statutory functionaries it will step in by mandamus when the State fails to perform its duty. It shall also step in when the discretion is exercised but the same has not been done legally and validly. And even though existence of an alternative remedy is no bar to exercise jurisdiction under Art. 226, it will not ordinarily do so unless it is found that an order has been passed wholly without jurisdiction or contradictory to the constitutional or statutory provisions or where an order has been passed without complying with the principles of natural justice.[93]

The object of mandamus is to prevent disorder from a failure of justice and is required to be granted in all cases where law has established no specific remedy and where justice despite demanded has not been granted.[94] In the State of Kerala Scheduled Tribes case[95] although the statutory provision required restoration of "equal" extent of land, the Court, perhaps, without reference to the word "equal" issued a mandamus (in cases where restoration was not possible) directing the State to allot not only equal extent of land, but, where restoration was not possible to allot such land by taking recourse to acquisition proceedings with

---

88. On 'Laches', see, supra, Sec. D(h).
89. Kashinath G. Jalmi v. The Speaker, AIR 1993 SC 1873 : (1993) 2 SCC 703.
90. K. Bheema Raju v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1981 AP 24.
91. Guruswami v. Mysore, AIR 1954 SC 592; Mysore v. Chandrasekhara, AIR 1965 SC 532; S.I. Syndicate v. Union of India; AIR 1975 SC 460; Bihar Eastern Gangetic Fishermen Coop. Society v. Sipahi Singh, AIR 1977 SC 2149 : (1977) 4 SCC 145; Chet Ram v. Delhi Municipality, AIR 1981 SC 653; Samir Kumar v. State of Bihar, AIR 1982 Pat. 66; Comptroller & Auditor General v. K.S. Jagannathan, AIR 1987 SC 537 : (1986) 2 SCC 679.
92. Parry & Co. v. Commercial Employees Association, AIR 1952 SC 179 : 1952 SCR 519; K.V.R. Setty v. State of Mysore, AIR 1967 SC 993.
93. Guruvayoor Devaswom Managing Committee v. C.K. Rajan, (2003) 7 SCC 546 : AIR 2004 SC 561.
94. Union of India v. S. B. Vohra, (2004) 2 SCC 150 : AIR 2004 SC 1402.
95. (2009) 8 SCC 46 : (2009) 9 JT 579.

a further direction not to allot hilly or other types of land not suitable for agricultural purposes. These directions are not in consonance with the substantive laws of the country and could be cited to effectively stifle non agricultural projects of national importance or conceived in public interest by vested interests This is what happened to the Tata Motors 'NANO' project when Tata pulled out of West Bengal due to political agitation and siege of the project site by a political party purportedly in the interest of owners of agricultural land acquired by Tata for setting up their plant.

Mandamus can be granted only when a legal duty is imposed on the authority in question and the petitioner has a legal right to compel the performance of this duty. The performance of the duty should be imperative and not discretionary. The existence of a right duty situation is no longer the sole basis for issuing a mandamus. The Courts now recognize promissory estoppel and legitimate expectations as causes of action for invoking the mandamus jurisdiction.[1]

It is not possible to lay down the standard exhaustively as to in what situation a writ of mandamus will issue and in what situation it will not. In other words, exercise of its discretion by the Court will also depend upon the law which governs the field, namely whether it is a fundamental law or an ordinary law. Ordinarily the Court will not exercise the power of the statutory authorities. It will at the first instance allow the statutory authorities to perform their own functions and would not usher the said jurisdiction itself.

The legal right of an individual may be founded upon a contract or a statute or an instrument having the force of law. For a public law remedy enforceable under Article 226 of the Constitution, the actions of the authority need to fall in the realm of public law be it a legislative act of the State, an executive act of the State or an instrumentality or a person or authority imbued with public law element. Thus the Court will not exercise its jurisdiction to entertain a writ application wherein public law element is not involved. In any event, the modern trend also points to judicial restraint in relation to administrative action. It may not be possible to generalize the nature of the action which would come either under public law remedy or private law field nor is it desirable to give exhaustive list of such actions. The question as to whether the judicial review is permissible and to what extent, will vary from case to case and no broad principles can be laid down.[2]

According to the Supreme Court, mandamus is issued, inter alia, "to compel performance of public duties which may be administrative, ministerial or statutory in nature". Usually the use of the word "shall" or "must" indicates a mandatory duty, but this is not conclusive and these words may be interpreted as "may". On the other hand, at times, the word "may" may be interpreted as "shall". Therefore, the Court has further observed: "What is determinative of the nature of duty, whether it is obligatory, mandatory or directory, is the scheme of the statute in which the 'duty' has been set out. Even if the 'duty' is not set out clearly and specifically in the statute, it may be implied as correlative to a 'Right'."[3] For example, mandamus can be issued directing the executive to do its legal duty by implementing the order of a tribunal.[4] Again, since it was the duty of

---

1. See Ramprovesh Singh v. State of Bihar, (2006) 8 SCC 294 : (2006) 9 JT 35.
2. Union of India v. S. B. Vohra, (2004) 2 SCC 150 : AIR 2004 SC 1402.
3. Mansukhlal Vithaldas Chauhan v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1997 SC 3400 at 3405 : (1997) 2 SCC 622.
4. Sharif Ahmad v. R.T.A., Meerut, AIR 1978 SC 209 : (1978) 1 SCC 1.

the police to give necessary protection to properties being interfered with by lawless elements and unauthorized persons it is obliged to give such protection without insisting on payment by the private party seeking such protection.[5]

The scope of mandamus is determined by the nature of the duty to be enforced, rather than the identity of the authority against whom it is sought. However, the courts always retain the discretion to withhold the remedy where it would not be in the interest of justice to grant.[6]

Mandamus is a discretionary remedy and the High Court has full discretion to refuse to issue the writ in unsuitable cases.[7]

The Madhya Pradesh Government made a rule making it a matter of its discretion to grant dearness allowance to its employees. As no right was conferred on government servants to the grant of dearness allowance, and no duty was imposed on the government to grant it, and as the government had merely taken the power to grant the allowance at its own discretion, mandamus could not be issued to compel the government to exercise its discretionary power.[8]

Under Art. 229(2), the Chief Justice of a High Court can make rules prescribing conditions of service of officers and servants of the Court. However, the rules relating to salaries etc. require the approval of the State Executive.[9] It has been held that mandamus cannot be issued against the government directing it to give its approval to the rules made by the Chief Justice regarding salaries etc. of the staff the High Court. There is no obligation on the government to approve these rules. Also, the government's consent under the proviso to Art. 229(2) is not a mere formality.[10]

Article 16(4) of the Constitution confers discretion on the government to reserve posts for backward classes. Art. 16(4) neither imposes any obligation, nor confers power coupled with duty on the government to make reservations. Accordingly, mandamus cannot be issued directing the government to make reservations under Art. 16(4).[11]

The petitioner contended that persons junior to him in service had been appointed by the government but his claims had been ignored. The Supreme Court refused to issue the writ, for the persons appointed were qualified for the posts while the petitioner himself was not so qualified and so he could not be regarded as a person aggrieved for the purpose of the relief claimed.[12]

Mandamus cannot be issued to the State Government directing it to appoint a commission to inquire into changes in climatic cycle, floods in the State etc. be-

---

5. Howrah Mills Co. Ltd. v. Md. Shamin, (2006) 5 SCC 539 : (2006) 6 SCALE 50.
6. Binny Ltd. v. V. Sadasivan, (2005) 6 SCC 657 : AIR 2005 SC 3202.
7. State of Kerala v. K.P.W.S.W.L.C. Coop. Society Ltd., AIR 2001 Ker. 60.
8. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Mandawar, AIR 1954 SC 493 : (1955) 1 SCR 599.
In, Jagdish Prasad v. M.C.D., AIR 1993 SC 1254 : 1993 Supp (2) SCC 221, the Supreme Court refused to issue mandamus to enforce the claim of municipal employees for transfer of ownership of municipal quarters to them because they had no legal right thereto.
Also see, Rajashekhar v. State of Karnataka, AIR 2000 Knt. 221.
9. Supra, this Chapter, Sec. B(u).
10. State of Andhra Pradesh v. T. Gopalakrishnan, AIR 1976 SC 123 : (1976) 2 SCC 883. Also, State of Mysore v. Syed Mahmood, AIR 1968 SC 1113 : (1968) 3 SCR 363; Bihar E.G.F. Coop. Soc. v. Sipahi Singh, AIR 1977 SC 2149 : (1977) 4 SCC 145; State of Bihar v. Sri Chandradip Rai, AIR 1981 SC 2071 : (1982) 2 SCC 272.
11. Ajit Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1999 SC 3471, 3481. Also see, Ch. XXIII, supra.
12. Umakant v. State of Bihar, AIR 1973 SC 964 : (1973) 1 SCC 485.

cause the government's power to appoint a commission is discretionary and optional.[13] Mandamus cannot be issued to the government directing it to bring a statute into force.[14] The writ cannot be issued to the legislature directing it to enact a particular law[15] Mandamus cannot also be issued directing a delegated legislative authority to make rules in furtherance of a statutory provision.[16] A policy decision or a matter of policy is not totally immune from judicial review. Inadequate study of a factor on the basis of which a policy decision is taken and where there is manifest arbitrariness or irrationality, interference by the courts is permissible.[17]

In the exercise of power of judicial review the Court cannot alter the status of a post e.g. directing the University to treat a honorary Visiting Professor a member of teaching post.[18]

In relation to a public interest litigation filed under Article 32 of the Constitution where a CBI investigation had been ordered relating to the protection of the Taj Mahal and it was alleged that the prosecuting Judges would not pursue the matter due to prevailing political situation, it was held that the jurisdiction of the Court was confined to seeing that proper criminal investigation is carried out and the Court cannot take over the function of the Magistrate or interfere with the Magistrate's function.[19] The Court however proceeded to observe that once a final report has been filed in terms of Section 173 of Cr. P.C. , it was the Magistrate alone who could take an appropriate decision in the matter which, however, could be subjected to judicial review.

Mandamus can be issued when the government denies to itself a jurisdiction which it undoubtedly has under the law.[20]

Mandamus is not issued if the right is purely of a private character. A private right, such as arising out of a contract, cannot be enforced through mandamus and the proper course is a civil suit except when the matter falls in the public law domain.[21] For example, in Lotus Hotel,[22] the Court issued a direction under Art.

---

13. Vijay Mehta v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1980 Raj 207.
For a full discussion on this point see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, Ch. XVI; CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN, ADM. LAW, III, Ch. XVII, Sec. B, 2465-2644.

14. Altemesh Rein v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 1768 : (1988) 4 SCC 54.

15. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. A.R. Zakki, AIR 1992 SC 1546 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 548; R.C. Poudyal v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 1804 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 324; Union of India v. Deoki Nanda Aggarwal, AIR 1992 SC 96; R.K. Singh v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Del. 12; Karnataka v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 2001 SC 1560; A.P. Sarpanchs Ass. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 2001 AP 474.

16. A.P. Sarpanchs Ass. v. A.P. supra.

17. Sanjay Singh v. U.P. Public Service commission, Allahabad, (2007) 3 SCC 720 : AIR 2007 SC 950.

18. State of Karnataka v. C. K. Pattamashetty, (2004) 6 SCC 685.

19. M. C. Mehta v. Union of India, (2008) 1 SCC 407 : AIR 2008 SC 180.

20. E.A. Coop. Society v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1966 SC 1149 : (1966) 3 SCR 365.

21. Lekhraj Sathrandas v. Dy. Custodian, AIR 1966 SC 334 : (1966) 1 SCR 120; Har Shankar v. Dy. E.T Commr., AIR 1975 SC 1121 : (1975) 1 SCC 737; D.R. Mills v. Commissioner, Civil Supplies, AIR 1976 SC 2243; Radhakrishna Agarwal v. State of Bihar, AIR 1977 SC 1496; Food Corporation of India v. Sujit Roy, AIR 2000 Gau 61; Divisional Forest Officer v. Bishwanath Tea Co., AIR 1981 SC 1368; LIC v. Escorts Ltd., AIR 1986 SC 1370 : (1986) 1 SCC 264; Namakkal South India Transports v. Kerala S.C.S. Corpn. Ltd., AIR 1997 Ker 56; State of Gujarat v. M.P. Shah Charitable Trust, (1994) 3 SCC 552; Food Corpn. of India v. Jagannath Dutta, AIR 1993 SC 1494; State of Himachal Pradesh v. Raja Mahendra Pal, AIR 1999 SC 1786; State of Kerala v. K.P.W.S.W.L.C. Coop. Soc. Ltd., AIR 2001 Ker. 58; LIC v. Asha Goel, AIR 2001 SC 549 : (2001)

[Footnote 21 Contd.]

226 to enforce a contractual obligation by applying the doctrine of promissory estoppel.[23] Recourse may be had to mandamus if a public authority acts in an arbitrary and unlawful manner even though the source of the right of the petitioner may initially be in a contract.[24] As the Supreme Court has observed: [25]

> "Even though the rights of the citizens, therefore, are in the nature of contractual rights, the manner, the method and motive of a decision of entering or not entering into a contract, are subject to judicial review on the touchstone of relevance and reasonableness, fair play and natural justice, equality and non-discrimination."

Even in contractual matters, public authorities have to act fairly, and if they fail to do so, approach to Art. 226 would always be permissible because that would amount to violation of Art. 14 of the Constitution.[26] The Supreme Court has observed in Mahabir Auto:[27]

> "Even though the rights of the citizens are in the nature of contractual rights the manner, the method and motive of a decision of entering or not entering into a contract, are subject to judicial review on the touchstone of relevance and reasonableness, fair play, natural justice , equality and non-discrimination in the type of the transactions and nature of the dealing as in the present case".

The Supreme Court has emphasized in Tata Cellular v. Union of India[28] that while the Court does not interfere with government's freedom of contract, invitation of tenders and refusal of any tender which pertain to policy matter, the Court can interfere when the state decision or action is vitiated by arbitrariness, unfairness, illegality, irrationality or unreasonableness.

To the same effect is the following observation of the Supreme Court in LIC v. Escorts Ltd.:[29]

> "… If the action of the state is related to contractual obligations or obligations arising out of the tort, the Court may not ordinarily examine it unless the action has some public law character attached to it. Broadly speaking, the Court

---

[Footnote 21 Contd.]

2 SCC 160; Alok Prasad Verma v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Pat. 211; State of Bihar v. Jain Plastics and Chemicals Ltd., AIR 2002 SC 206 : (2002) 1 SCC 216; Supriyo Basu v. W. B. Housing Board, (2005) 6 SCC 289 : AIR 2005 SC 4187.

For a fuller discussion on this topic, see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE, II; CASES & MATERIALS, IV; and Ch. XXXIX, infra.

22. Gujarat State Financial Corporation v. Lotus Hotel, AIR 1983 SC 848 : (1983) 3 SCC 379.

23. For the doctrine of promissory estoppel see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, II; JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON ADM. LAW, IV.

24. D.F.O. v. Ram Sanehi Singh, AIR 1973 SC 205 : (1971) 3 SCC 864.

25. L.I.C. of India v. Consumer Education and Research Centre, AIR 1995 SC 1811, 1821 : (1995) 5 SCC 482.

Also see, R.D. Shetty v. International Airport Authority of India, AIR 1979 SC 1628 : (1979) 3 SCC 489.

26. Shreelekha Vidyarthi v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1991 SC 537 : (1991) 1 SCC 212.

27. Mahabir Auto Stores v. Indian Oil Corp., AIR 1990 SC 1031, 1037 : (1990) 3 SCC 752.

Also see, Radhakrishna Agarwal v. State of Bihar, AIR 1977 SC 1496 : (1977) 3 SCC 457; Sterling Computers Ltd. v. M.N. Publications Ltd., (1993) 1 SCC 445; Union of India v. Graphic Industries Co., (1994) 5 SCC 398 : AIR 1995 SC 409.

For a full discussion on "Government Contracts and Writs", see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE OF ADM. LAW, II, Ch; CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, IV.

28. (1994) 6 SCC 651 : AIR 1996 SC 11.

29. AIR 1986 SC 1370. Also, LIC of India v. Consumer Education & Research Centre, AIR 1995 SC 1811 : (1995) 2 SCC 482.

> will examine actions of state if they pertain to the public law domain and refrain from examining them if they pertain to the private Law field".[30]

Mandamus is not available to enforce a payment of money due to the claimant under a civil liability, as this is a question which is better determined in a civil suit, but an order to pay money may be made against the State to enforce a statutory obligation.[31] But more in keeping with the trend of the law, the Court has held that a consequential monetary claim can be made and given.[32] Mandamus can be issued when tax is collected illegally.[33]

In the case noted below, a cess was collected from the sugar mills under an unconstitutional law. The mills paid the cess under protest and did not pass on the cess to any third party but bore the brunt themselves. In the circumstances, the Court issued mandamus to the taxing authorites to refund the money illegally collected as cess.[34]

Mandamus cannot be issued to the legislature to enact a particular legislation.[35] Similarly, mandamus cannot be issued to the executive to make a particular rule in the exercise of its power of delegated legislation, as the power to frame rules is legislative in nature.[36]

Mandamus cannot be issued to violate law. A writ of mandamus can be issued to a statutory authority to compel it to perform its statutory obligation. But mandamus cannot issue to compel it to pass an order in violation of a statutory provision.[37]

Mandamus cannot be denied on the ground that the duty to be enforced is not imposed by statute. As De Smith has observed:

> "To be enforceable by mandamus a public duty does not necessarily have to be one imposed by statute. It may be sufficient for the duty to have been imposed by charter, common law, custom or even contract".

The Supreme Court has adopted with approval the above statement in the Shri Anadi Mukta Sadguru case with the following observation:[38]

> "The judicial control over the fast expanding maze of bodies affecting the rights of the people should not be put into water-tight compartment. It should

---

30. Also see, infra, Chs. XXXVIII and XXXIX; See also Jagdish Mandal v. State of Orissa, (2007) 14 SCC 517 : (2006) 14 SCALE 224.

31. Burmah Construction v. State of Orissa, AIR 1962 SC 1320 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 242; Hari Raj v. Sanchalak Panchayati Raj, AIR 1968 All. 246.

32. ABL International Ltd. v. Export Credit Guarantee Corpn. of India Ltd., (2004) 3 SCC 553 : (2003) 10 JT 300.

33. Sales Tax Officer v. Kanhaiyalal, AIR 1959 SC 135; Sugammal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1965 SC 1740 : (1965) 56 ITR 84; Shree Baidyanath Ayurved Bhawan Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1996 SC 2829 : (1996) 6 SCC 86.

34. U.P. Pollution Control Board v. Kanoria Industrial Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 787 : (2001) 2 SCC 549.

35. Asif Hameed v. State of J&K, AIR 1989 SC 1899, 1906 : 1989 Supp (2) SCC 364.

36. Supreme Court Employees' Welfare Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 334; State of Jammu & Kashmir v. A.R. Zakki, AIR 1992 SC 1546 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 548; A.P. Sarpanchs Ass. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 2001 AP 474, 484.
Also see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.

37. Santosh Kumar v. State of Bihar, AIR 1997 SC 978; Hope Textiles Ltd. v. Union of India, (1995) Supp (3) SCC 199.

38. AIR 1989 SC 1607, at 1613 : (1989) 2 SCC 691.
For a discussion on "Administrative Duties, see, M.P. JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON ADM. LAW, III, Ch. XIX.

> remain flexible to meet the requirements of variable circumstances. Mandamus is a very wide remedy which must be easily available 'to reach injustice wherever it is found.' Technicalities should not come in the way of granting that relief under Art. 226."

In the modern era, extensive discretionary powers are being conferred on the executive.[39] In such cases, the Court cannot ask an authority to exercise its discretion in a particular manner not expressly required by law, or question its exercise on merits, or substitute its own discretion for that of the authority in which it is vested. The Court can issue mandamus only to direct the authority to exercise discretion according to law.[40]

When a statutory authority is invested with certain powers, it may do all things which are necessary for giving effect to such power. Hence directions given by the Delhi Electricity Regulatory Commission that all existing meters should be replaced by electronic meters in exercise of its power to frame tariff were held to be valid.[41] The Court observed that with the advance in science and technology it should adopt the course of creative interpretation of the provisions of a statute.[42]

The Court does not sit in appeal over the order and is not entitled to consider the propriety or the correctness or the satisfactory character of the reasons given by the government for making the order. But if an authority having discretion is also under a duty to act and exercise its discretion then the courts may enforce this duty and ask the authority to act according to law.[43]

A rule framed under the City of Bombay Police Act, 1902, provided that the Commissioner of Police "shall have power in his absolute discretion at any time to cancel or suspend any licence granted under these rules". Interpreting the rule, the Supreme Court stated that where the Commissioner has before him objections received from the public to the grant of a cinema licence, the Commissioner was obligated to exercise his discretion either to cancel the licence or to reject the objections.[44]

The Syndicate of a University cancelled the examination in a subject and directed re-examination as it was satisfied that there had been leakage of questions. The Supreme Court emphasized that it was not the Court's function to substitute its discretion for that of the University authorities.[45] The Supreme Court has observed recently in State of West Bengal v. Nuruddin Malik:[46]

> "The courts can either direct the statutory authorities, where it is not exercising its discretion, by mandamus to exercise its discretion or when exercised to see whether it has been validly exercised. It would be inappropriate for the Court to substitute itself for the statutory authorities to decide the matter."

---

39. For discussion on "Discretionary Powers" see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Chs. XVII, XVIII & XIX; JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, III, Ch. XVI.

40. U.P. State Road Transport Corpn. v. Mohd. Ismail, AIR 1991 SC 1099 : (1991) 3 SCC 239; State of Haryana v. Naresh Kumar Bali, (1994) 4 SCC 448, 453.

41. Suresh Jindal v. Bses Rajdhani Power Ltd., (2008) 1 SCC 341 : AIR 2008 SC 280.

42. Ibid.

43. Comptroller and Auditor-General v. K.S. Jagannathan, AIR 1987 SC 545 : (1986) 2 SCC 679.

44. Commr. of Police v. Gordhandas, AIR 1952 SC 16 : (1991) 3 SCC 239; Ruttonjee v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1967 Cal. 450.

45. Vice-Chancellor v. S.K. Ghosh, AIR 1954 SC 217 : 1954 SCR 883; State of Mysore v. Chandrasekhar, AIR 1966 SC 532.

46. AIR 1999 SC 1466 at 1471 : (1998) 8 SCC 143.

In case of discretion vested in an authority, the Court would ordinarily quash the order if discretion has been abused, or not been properly exercised, or when the public authority has acted against law or not in accordance with law,[47] or has exceeded the limits of its powers,[48] or has acted mala fide,[49] or has not applied its mind,[50] or has taken into account an irrelevant consideration,[51] or passes an order without there being any material to support the same.[52] Thus, under S. 10(1)(d) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, the government may refer an industrial dispute for adjudication to an industrial tribunal. Once a matter has been so referred, the government has no power to cancel or supersede the reference subsequently, and if the government seeks to do so, mandamus can be issued.[53]

If the bid of a party was rejected erroneously, and he had no knowledge thereof, he can challenge not only the rejection of his bid but also a direction upon the authority for the acceptance of his bid as in such a situation, filing of another writ petition would have been an exercise in futility.[54]

A government decision taken on purely political considerations, without any material, can be quashed by the writ Court.[55]

Under sec. 6 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947, a public servant could not be prosecuted for certain specified offences without the sanction of the concerned government. The Supreme Court has emphasized in the case noted below,[56] that the grant of sanction was a solemn affair and not merely a matter of form. Sanction granted mechanically and without the application of mind by the concerned authority could not be regarded as valid and mandamus could be issued to quash the same. The Court has observed in this connection:[57]

> "In the performance of this duty, if the authority in whom the discretion is vested under the statute, does not act independently and passes an order under the instructions and orders of another authority, the Court would intervene in the matter, quash the order and issue a mandamus to that authority to exercise its own discretion".

---

47. Satwant Singh v. A.P.O., AIR 1967 SC 1836 : (1967) 3 SCR 525; Jaisinghani v. Union of India, AIR 1967 SC 1427 : (1967) 2 SCR 703; Mangudi v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1971 Mad. 275; Krishna Cinema v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1971 Guj. 103.

48. Calcutta Discount Co. v. I.T.O., AIR 1961 SC 372 : (1961) 2 SCR 241.

49. Pratap Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1964 SC 72 : (1964) 4 SCR 733; Rowjee v. State of A.P., AIR 1964 SC 962 : (1964) 6 SCR 330; State of Punjab v. Ramjilal, AIR 1971 SC 1228 : (1970) 3SCC 602; A. Periakaruppan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1971 SC 2303; State of Haryana v. Rajendra, AIR 1972 SC 1004; State of Punjab v. Gurdial Singh, AIR 1980 SC 319 : (1980) 2 SCC 471.

50. State of Punjab v. Hari Kishan, AIR 1966 SC 1081; King-Emperor v. Sibnath Bannerjee, 72 I.A. 241; Kishori Mohan v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1972 SC 1749; Nandlal v. Bar Council, AIR 1981 SC 477.

51. Irani v. State of Madras, AIR 1961 SC 1731; Rohtas Industries v. S.D. Agrawal, AIR 1969 SC 707; Sheo Nath Singh v. App. Asstt. Commr. of I.T., AIR 1971 SC 2451; Manu Bhushan v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1973 SC 295; Asstt. Controller of Estate Duty v. Prayag Dass, AIR 1981 SC 1263 : (1981) 3 SCC 181.

52. Union of India v. Brij Fertilizers Pvt. Ltd., (1993) 3 SCC 564.

53. State of Bihar v. Ganguly, AIR 1958 SC 1018 : 1959 SCR 1191; Mahboob Sherrif v. Mysore State Tr. Authority, AIR 1960 SC 321.

54. Jespar I. Slong v. State of Meghalaya (2004) 11 SCC 485 : AIR 2004 SC 3533.

55. N.V. Rajula Reddy v. Govt. of A.P., AIR 1997 AP 222.

56. Mansukhlal Vithaldas v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1997 SC 3400 : (1997) 7 SCC 622.

57. Ibid, at 3405.

A mere irregularity, however, in an authority exercising its power is not a sufficient ground for issue of the writ.[58] A mandamus can be issued to restrain a public authority from acting under a void law.[59] Ordinarily mandamus would not be issued to enforce administrative directions which do not have the force of law,[60] but in some cases, the courts have enforced the directions.[61]

A mandamus can issue to quash an illegal assessment of a tax and for refund of money illegally realised as tax as a consequential relief.[62] But mandamus would not issue merely for refund of money due from the State on account of its having made an illegal exaction, and for this purpose a suit should be filed in a civil Court.[63]

A party seeking mandamus must first call upon the authority concerned to do justice by performing its legal obligation and show that it has refused or neglected to carry it out within a reasonable time before applying to a Court for mandamus even where the alleged obligation is established.[64]

But, the Patna High Court has disagreed with this approach.[65] The Court has characterised this rule as a "technical requirement of the English Courts" which need not be followed in India. As has been emphasized by the Supreme Court, the law relating to writs in India "has gone far ahead of the technicalities which are associated with the issuance of writ in English courts." If, therefore, in a given situation, the Court finds that the demand for justice would be an idle formality, the Court can issue mandamus.

Where a challenge is thrown to show cause notice against proposed classification of goods under Central Excise Tariff Act, 1985, the Court will follow normal practice of principle non interference at the stage of issuance of show cause notice. However, a show cause notice issued without jurisdiction or in abuse of process of law would certainly be interfered with. Such interference would be rare and in order to invoke such interference, it should be prima facie established that the notice was without jurisdiction or was abuse of process of law. Mere assertion to such effect will not be sufficient. The Supreme Court upheld the High Court quashing the show cause notice on the ground that the same was a mere

---

58. Cooverji v. Excise Commr., AIR 1954 SC 220.

59. Dwarka v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 224.

60. State of Assam v. A.K. Sarma, AIR 1965 SC 1196 : (1965) 1 SCR 890; Fernandez v. State of Mysore, AIR 1967 SC 1753 : (1967) 3 SCR 636; J.R. Raghupaty v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1988 SC 1681 : (1988) 4 SCC 364.

61. Jewat Bai & Sons v. G.C. Batra, AIR 1967 Del 310; Baleshwar Dass v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 41 : (1980) 4 SCC 226; Bishamber Dayal Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 SC 33 : (1982) 1 SCC 39.

For a full discussion on "Directions", see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Ch. VIII; CASES & MATERIALS, I, Ch VII.

62. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bhailal Bhai, AIR 1964 SC 1006 : (1964) 6 SCR 261; A. Match Industries v. Union of India, AIR 1971 AP 69; SAIL v. State of Orissa, AIR 2000 SC 946 : (2000) 3 SCC 200; U.P. Pollution Control Board v. Kanoria Industrial Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 787 : (2001) 2 SCC 549.

63. Suganmal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1965 SC 1740 : (1965) 56 ITR 84.

But see, Food Corporation of India v. Viramgam Nagar Palika, AIR 2000 Guj 91.

64. State of Haryana v. Chaman Mal, AIR 1976 SC 1654; Kamini Kumar Daschoudhary v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1972 SC 2060 : (1972) 2 SCC 42; S.I. Syndicate v. Union of India, AIR 1975 SC 460; Amritlal v. Collector, C.E.C. Revenue, AIR 1975 SC 538 : (1975) 4 SCC 714.

65. Hem Narain Singh v. Ganesh Singh, AIR 1995 Pat. 1.

repetition of earlier show cause notices with slight variations not relatable to any different test.[66]

(iv) CERTIORARI & PROHIBITION

The writs of certiorari and prohibition are issued practically on similar grounds. The only difference between the two is that certiorari is issued to quash a decision after the decision is taken by a lower tribunal while prohibition is issuable before the proceedings are completed.

The object of prohibition is prevention rather than cure. For example, the High Court can issue prohibition to restrain a tribunal from acting under an unconstitutional law. But if the tribunal has already given its decision then certiorari is the proper remedy in such a situation.

It may be that in a proceeding before an inferior body, the High Court may have to issue both prohibition and certiorari; prohibition to prohibit the body from proceeding further, and certiorari to quash what has already been done by it.

In the absence of very cogent or strong reasons, issuance of writs of prohibition is improper. It was pointed out that since under CPC the civil Court had sufficient powers to decide its own jurisdiction the High Court erred in interfering by prohibition and directed the civil Court to decide preliminary issues as to the maintainability of the suit and applicability of the bar of res judicata/estoppel.[67]

The jurisdiction to issue certiorari is a supervisory jurisdiction and the High Court exercising it is not entitled to act as an appellate Court.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that a writ in the nature of certiorari is a wholly inappropriate relief to ask for when the constitutional validity of a legislative measure is being challenged. In such a case, the proper relief to ask for would be a declaration that a particular law is unconstitutional and void. If a consequential relief is thought necessary, than a writ of mandamus may be issued restraining the state from enforcing or giving effect to the provisions of the law in question.[68]

Certiorari can be issued even if the lis is between two private parties. The law has always been, that a writ of certiorari is issued against the acts or proceedings of a judicial or quasi judicial body conferred with power to determine question affecting the rights of subjects and obliged to act judicially. Since the Writ of certiorari is directed against the act, order or proceedings of the subordinate Court, it can issue even if the lis is between two private parties.[69]

These writs go to a body acting in an adjudicatory capacity and according to natural justice or fair procedure and not to one acting in a purely administrative

---

66. Union of India v. Vicco Laboratories, (2007) 13 SCC 270 : (2007) 13 SCALE 481.

67. Thirumala Tirupati Devasthanams v. Thallappaka Ananthacharyulu, (2003) 8 SCC 134 : AIR 2003 SC 3290.

68. Praboth Verma v. Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 167 : (1984) 4 SCC 251; See also Surya v. Ram Chander Rai (2003) 6 SCC 675 : AIR 2003 SC 3044.

69. Surya Dev Rai v. Ram Chander Rai, (2003) 6 SCC 675 : AIR 2003 SC 3044; T. C. Basappa v. T. Nagappa, AIR 1954 SC 440 : (1955) 1 SCR 250; Province of Bombay v. Khushaldas S. Advani, AIR 1950 SC 222 : 1950 SCR 621; Dwarka Nath v. ITO, AIR 1966 SC 81 : (1965) 3 SCR 536 relied on Ganga Saran v. Civil Judge, Hapur, 1991 All LJ 159 : AIR 1991 All 114 (FB).

manner. It is not usual to find an express provision in a statute to indicate whether the body set up by it is to act according to natural justice or otherwise. In most cases, it is to be implied from the statute. A writ of certiorari can be issued in relation to an order passed by a subordinate court.[70]

Over time, courts have been expanding the horizons of natural justice.[71] Thus, certiorari has been issued to: authorities dealing with licensing liquor shops,[72] passing the order of confiscation or imposing penalty under the Sea Customs Act,[73] tax assessment proceedings,[74] cancellation of examination results of a candidate, or expulsion of a student by a University,[75] an enquiry commission under the Commissions of Enquiry Act,[76] industrial tribunals,[77] election tribunals,[78] dismissal from service,[79] or removal from membership of a body,[80] cancellation of a licence,[81] requisitioning of property for a public purpose,[82] or an enquiry committee.[83]

The District Consumer Forum, the State Consumer Forum as well as the National Commission constituted by the Consumer Protection Act, 1986, have adjudicatory powers and also have same "trappings of a Court". These bodies can therefore be regarded as 'tribunals'[84] and, thus, subject to certiorari.

Certiorari can be isued under Art. 226 to a Court-martial. A Court-martial is not subject to High Court's superintendence under Art. 227.[85] In Major A. Hussain[86] the Supreme Court pointed out that Court Martial is to a significant degree a specialized part of overall mechanism by which the military discipline is preserved. It is its special character which justifies adjudication by such courts try offences under the Army Act. The Court Martial discharges judicial functions. Their decisions are reviewable under Art. 226 if the Court martial has failed to follow the prescribed

---

70. Surya Dev Raj v. Ram Chander Rai, 2003 (6) SCC 675 : AIR 2003 SC 3044.

71. Ridge v. Baldwin, (1963) 2 WLR 935; Kraipak v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 150 : (1969) 2 SCC 262; 13 JILI 362 (1971).

For a detailed discussion on the concept of natural justice, see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, Chs. IX-XII; M.P. JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, I, Chs. VIII-XI.

72. Nagendra v. Commr., Hills Division, AIR 1958 SC 398 : 1958 SCR 1240; also infra.

73. Sewpujanrai v. Customs Collector, AIR 1958 SC 845 : 1959 SCR 821; Asstt. Collector Customs v. Malhotra, AIR 1972 SC 2083.

74. K.T. Moopil Nair v. State of Kerala, AIR 1961 SC 552 : (1961) 3 SCR 77; Board of Revenue v. Vidyawati, AIR 1962 SC 1217 : 1962 (Supp) 3 SCR 50; Sovachand Mulchand v. Collector, Central Excise, AIR 1968 Cal. 174.

75. Board of High School v. Ghanshyam, AIR 1962 SC 1110 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 36; Board of High School v. Chitra, AIR 1970 SC 1039 : (1970) 1 SCC 121.

76. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Bakshi Ghulam Mohd., AIR 1967 SC 122.

77. Kirloskar Electric Co. v. Their Workmen, AIR 1973 SC 2119 : (1973) 2 SCC 247.

78. Durga Shankar v. Raghuraj, AIR 1954 SC 520 : (1955) 1 SCR 267.

79. State of Orissa v. Dr. Binapani, AIR 1967 SC 1269 : (1967) 2 SCR 625.

80. State of Punjab v. Bakhtawar Singh, AIR 1972 SC 2083; Bhagat Ram v. State of Punjab, AIR 1972 SC 1571 : 1972 (2) SCC 170.

81. Mahabir Prashad Santosh Kumar v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 1302 : (1970) 1 SCC 764.

82. Madan Gopal v. District Magistrate, AIR 1972 SC 2656 : (1973) 1 SCC 89.

83. Union of India v. M.B. Patnaik, AIR 1981 SC 858 : (1981) 2 SCC 159.

84. Spring Meadows Hospital v. Haroj Ahluwalia, AIR 1998 SC 1801 : (1998) 4 SCC 39.

85. Ranjit Thakur v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 2386 : (1987) 4 SCC 611; Union of India v. Major A. Hssain, AIR 1998 SC 577; Union of India v. R.K. Sharma, AIR 2001 SC 3053.

86. Union of India v. Major A. Hussain, (1998) 1 SCC 537 : AIR 1998 SC 1344.

procedure or act without or in excess of has jurisdiction and the evidence is sufficient for the punishment.[87]

The grounds for the issue of certiorari have been succinctly stated by the Supreme Court in Syed Yakoob v. K.S. Radhakrishnan.[88] The writ of certiorari or prohibition is issued, inter alia on the following grounds:

(1) when the body concerned proceeds to act without, or in excess of, jurisdiction, or
(2) fails to exercise its jurisdiction[89]; or
(3) there is an error of law apparent on the face of the record in the impugned decision of the body; or
(4) the findings of fact reached by the inferiror tribunal are based on no evidence; or
(5) it proceeds to act in violation of the principles of natural justice; or
(6) it proceeds to act under a law which is itself invalid, ultra vires or unconstitutional, or
(7) it proceeds to act in contravention of the Fundamental Rights.[90]

(a) JURISDICTIONAL ERROR

Want of jurisdiction may arise from the nature of the subject-matter so that the inferior body might not have authority to enter on the inquiry.[91] It may also arise from the absence of some essential preliminary, or from the absence of a jurisdictional fact. A plea as to the lack of jurisdiction where it does not involve any question of fact and is a pure question of law can be raised even before the highest Court.[92]

Where the jurisdiction of a body depends upon a preliminary finding of fact in a proceeding for writ of certiorari, the Court may determine whether or not that finding of fact is correct. The reason is that by wrongly deciding such a fact, the body cannot give itself jurisdiction;[93]

In Anisminic,[94] the House of Lords has given a very broad connotation to the concept of "jurisdictional error". It has been laid down in Anisminic that a tribunal exceeds jurisdiction not only at the threshold when it enters into an inquiry which it is not entitled to undertake, but it may enter into an enquiry within its jurisdiction in the first instance and then do some thing which would deprive it of its jurisdiction and render its decision a nullity. In the words of Lord Reid :

> "But there are many cases where, although the tribunal had jurisdiction, to enter on the inquiry, it has done or failed to do something in the course of the inquiry which is of such a nature that its decision is a nullity. It may have given

---

87. Followed in Pradeep Singh v. Union of India, (2007) 11 SCC 612 : (2007) 6 JT 1.
88. AIR 1964 SC 477 : (1964) 5 SCR 64.
89. S.T.O. v. Shiv Ratan, AIR 1966 SC 142 : (1965) 3 SCR 71; C.I.T. v. A. Raman & Co., AIR 1968 SC 49; Chetkar v. Viswanath, AIR 1970 SC 1832 : (1970) 2 SCC 217; Tata Consulting Engineers v. Workmen, AIR 1981 SC 599.
90. U.P. Sales Tax Service Assn. v. Taxation Bar Assn., (1995) 5 SCC 716.
91. Express Newspapers. v. Workers, AIR 1963 SC 569; Mayapati v. State of Haryana, AIR 1973 P&H 356.
92. Pushpa Devi Bhagat v. Rajinder Singh, (2006) 5 SCC 566 : AIR 2006 SC 2628.
93. Raja Brahma Anand v. State of U.P., AIR 1967 SC 1081 : (1967) 1 SCR 373; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Jadav, AIR 1968 SC 1186; Raja Textiles v. I.T.O., Rampur, AIR 1973 SC 1362.
94. Aiminic Ltd. v. Foreign Compensation Commission, [1969] 2 AC 147.

> its decision in bad faith. It may have made a decision which it had not power to make. It may have failed in the course of the inquiry to comply with the requirements of natural justice. It may in perfect good faith have misconstrued the provisions giving it power to act so that it failed to deal with the question remitted to it and decided some question which was not remitted to it. It may have refused to take into account some thing which it was required to take into account. Or it may have based its decision on some matter which, under the provisions setting it up, it had no right to take into account. I do not intend this list to be exhaustive."

The essence of the above observation is that even though a tribunal may have 'threshold jurisdiction' to enter upon an inquiry yet it may later do something which may render its decision invalid. The events amount to jurisdictional errors, mentioned above, are : bad faith, non complying with natural justice, making the formal order without having any power to do so, misconstruing decision-making power so that the decision-maker fails to deal with the question remitted to him but decides some other question not remitted to him for decision, not taking into account relevant considerations, or basing the decision on irrelevant considerations. In any of these circumstances, the decision of a body would be a nullity. This list is not exhaustive but only represents the variety of 'jurisdictional' grounds of attack. Anisminic has thus given a very broad significance to the expression "jurisdictional error". In any of these circumstances, the writ Court can issue certiorari to quash the decision.

(b) ERRORS OF LAW

The writ is also issued for correcting an 'error of law apparent on the face of the record.'[1]

To attract the writ, a mere error of law is not sufficient; it must be one which is manifest or patent on the face of the record; mere formal or technical errors, even of law, are not sufficient'.[2]

This concept is indefinite and cannot be defined precisely or exhaustively, and so it has to be determined judicially on the facts of each case. The concept, according to the Supreme Court, "is comprised of many imponderables: it is not capable of precise definition, as no objective criterion can be laid down, the apparent nature of the error, to a large extent, being dependent upon the subjective element."[3]

A general test to apply however is that no error can be said to be apparent on the face of the record if it is not 'self-evident' or 'manifest', if it requires an examination or argument to establish it, if it has to be established by a long drawn out process of reasoning, or lengthy or complicated arguments, on points where there may conceivably be two opinions.[4] If two opinions on the same material are reasonably possible, the finding arrived at one way or the other cannot be called a patent error.[5] But this test is not articulate and may fail because what might be

---

1. J.D. Jain v. Management, State Bank, AIR 1982 SC 673; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Prescribed Authority Kichhu, AIR 1982 All. 151.
2. Padeananda v. Board of Revenue, AIR 1971 Ass 16.
3. Shanmugam v. S.R.V.S., AIR 1963 SC 1626 : (1964) 1 SCR 809; T. Prem Sagar v. S.V. Oil Co., AIR 1965 SC 111 : (1964) 5 SCR 1030.
4. Satyanarayan v. Mallikarjun, AIR 1960 SC 137 : (1960) 1 SCR 890.
5. Ranjeet Singh v. Ravi Prakash (2004) 3 SCC 682 : AIR 2004 SC 3892.

considered by one Judge as self-evident might not be considered so by another Judge.[6]

The Supreme Court has observed on this point:[7]

> "Where it is manifest or clear that the conclusion of law recorded by an inferiror Court, or tribunal is based on an obvious misinterpretation of the relevant statutory provision, or something in ignornace of it, or may be, even in disregard of it, or is expressly founded on reasons which are wrong in law, the said conclusion can be corrected by a writ of certiorari.

In Ambica Mills v. Bhatt,[8] the construction placed by the Tribunal on two clauses of an agreement between the Ahmedabad Mill-Owners' Association and the Textile Labour Association was held to be patently and manifestly erroneous. "It is not a case where two alternative conclusions are possible; it is a case of plain misreading of the two provisions ignoring altogether the very object with which the two separate provisions were made."

Where the question involved is one of interpreting a statutory provision which is reasonably open to two interpretations, of which the authority concerned adopts one interpretation, certiorari would not be issued merely on the ground that the view taken by the authority appears to be less reasonable than the alternative construction.[9]

Mere formal and technical errors of law are not sufficient to attract the writ. If a quasi-judicial authority ignores relevant considerations, or takes into account irrelevant considerations, it would amount to an error of law.[10]

There is a distinction between an error of law pure and simple, and one of jurisdictional nature. The former can be cured only when patent, but the latter can be cured even if not patent for no authority can be allowed to assume jurisdiction by taking a wrong view of law.[11]

A certiorari or prohibition does not lie when a tribunal disregards executive directions having no statutory force.[12]

When a person obtains an order from a tribunal by fraud, the High Court is bound to exercise its jurisdiction under Art. 226 and quash such an order. Fraud and justice never go together.[13]

---

6. Baldwin and Frances Ltd. v. Patents Appeal Tribunal, (1959) 2 WLR 826, illustrates the difficulties of applying this rule. H.V. Kamath v. Ishaque, AIR 1955 SC 233 : (1955) 1 SCR 1104.

7. Syed Yakoob v. K.S. Rahdakrishnan, AIR 1964 SC 477 : (1964) 5 SCR 64.
Also see, Sohan Modi v. Special Court under A.P. Land Grabbing (Prohibition) Act, AIR 2000 AP 482.

8. AIR 1961 SC 970 : (1961) 3 SCR 220.

9. Syed Yakoob v. Radhakrishnan, AIR 1964 SC 477 : (1964) 5 SCR 64; Principal, Patna College v. Raman, AIR 1966 SC 707; V. V. Iyer v. Jasjit Singh, AIR 1973 SC 194 : (1973) 1 SCC 148.

10. Sri R.V. Service v. Chandrasekharan, AIR 1965 SC 107 : (1964) 5 SCR 869; Murlidhar v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1924 : (1974) 2 SCC 472; Kays Concern v. Union of India, AIR 1976 SC 1525 : (1976) 4 SCC 706; Smt. Ram Piari v. Rallia Ram, AIR 1982 SC 1314 : (1982) 2 SCC 536.

11. Joharimal Saraogi v. Bakhatawar Singh, AIR 1967 Man. 1.

12. Raman & Raman v. State of Madras, AIR 1959 SC 694; Shanmugam v. S.R.V.S., AIR 1963 SC 1626 : (1964) 1 SCR 809.

13. United India Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Rajendra Singh, AIR 2000 SC 1165 : (2000) 3 SCC 581.
The Court of Appeal in England has observed : "No Court in this land will allow a person to keep an advantage which he has obtained by fraud. No judgment of a Court, no order of a Minister can be allowed to stand, if it has been obtained by fraud. Fraud unravels everything."
Lazarus Estates Ltd. v. Beasley, [1956] 1 All ER 341.

(c) FINDINGS OF FACT

Certiorari does not lie to correct mere errors of fact even though these may be apparent on the face of the record. The writ jurisdiction is supervisory and the Court exercising it is not to act as an appellate Court.[14]

The writ Court would not re-appreciate evidence and substitute its own conclusions of fact for that recorded by the adjudicating body below.[15] A finding of fact recorded by the adjudicatory body cannot be challenged in proceedings for certiorari on the ground that the relevant and material evidence adduced before the concerned body was insufficient or inadequate to sustain the impugned finding. The adequacy or sufficiency of evidence led on a point and the inference of fact to be drawn from the said finding are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Tribunal and these points cannot be agitated before the writ Court.[16]

The relevant principle in this connection has been laid down by the Supreme Court as follows:[17]

> "The findings of fact recorded by a fact finding authority duly constituted for the purpose and which ordinarily should be considered to have become final, cannot be disturbed for the mere reason of having been based on materials or evidence not sufficient or credible in the opinion of the writ Court to warrant those findings at any rate, as long as they are based upon some material which are relevant for the purpose or even on the ground that there is yet another view which can be reasonably and possibly under taken".

But findings of fact based on no evidence or purely on surmises and conjectures, or which are perverse, may be challenged through certiorari as such findings may be regarded as an error of law.[18] Interference will be justified if finding of fact is perverse or not based on legal evidence.[19]

---

14. Pioneers Traders v. C.C. Exports & Imports, AIR 1963 SC 734 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 349; S.T.O. v. Shiv Ratan, AIR 1966 SC 142; C.I.T. v. Walchand & Co., AIR 1967 SC 1435; Andhra Scientific Co. v. Seshagiri Rao, AIR 1967 SC 408; Dabur v. Workmen, AIR 1968 SC 17 : (1968) 1 SCR 61; Rukmanand v. State of Bihar, AIR 1971 SC 746.
But see, footnote 93, supra, concerning jurisdictional facts.

15. Joao Andrade e Souza v. K.S. Vediekdir, AIR 1971 Goa 2; Mukund Lal Bhandari v. Union of India, 1993 AIR SCW 2508 : AIR 1993 SC 2127; Union of India v. Mohan Singh, (1996) 10 SCC 35; Union of India v. R.V. Swamy, AIR 1997 SC 2069 : (1997) 9 SCC 446; Maharashtra State Board of Secondary and Higher Secondary Education v. K.S. Gandhi, (1991) 2 SCC 714.

16. Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Ahmad Ishaque, AIR 1955 SC 233 : (1955) 1 SCR 804; Nagendra Nath v. Commissioner of Hills Division, AIR 1958 SC 398 : 1958 SCR 1240; Kaushalya Devi v. Bachittar Singh, AIR 1960 SC 1168; Syed Yakoob v. K.S. Radhakrishnan, AIR 1964 SC 477 : (1964) 5 SCR 64.

17. Indian Overseas Bank v. I.D.B. Staff Canteen Workers' Union, AIR 2000 SC 1508, 1517 : (2000) 4 SCC 245.

18. D.C. Works v. Saurashtra, AIR 1957 SC 264 : 1957 SCR 152; Syed Yakoob v. Radhakrishnan, AIR 1964 SC 477 : (1964) 5 SCR 64; Parry & Co. v. Second Ind. Tr., AIR 1970 SC 1334; Sub-divisional Officer v. Gopal Chandra, AIR 1971 SC 1190; Aziz Wani v. Director, Consolidation, AIR 1971 J&K 67; Swaran Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1976 SC 232; M. Mayandi v. Director, T.N. State Transport Dept., AIR 1981 SC 1707; Mukunda v. Bangsidhar, AIR 1980 SC 1524 : (1980) 4 SCC 336; Gujarat Steel Tubes v. Its Mazdoor Sabha, AIR 1980 SC 1896 : (1980) 2 SCC 593; Bhagat Ram v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 454 : (1983) 2 SCC 442; State of West Bengal v. Atul Krishna Shaw, AIR 1990 SC 2205 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 414; Ahmedabad Municipal Corpn. v. Virendra Kumar J. Patel, AIR 1997 SC 3002 : (1997) 6 SCC 650; Union of India v. Mustafa & Najibhai Trading Co., AIR 1998 SC 2526 : (1998) 6 SCC 79.

19. Madurantakam Coop. Sugar Mills Ltd. v. S. Viswanathan, (2005) 3 SCC 193 : AIR 2005 SC 1954.

The collector of central excise confiscated some foreign and local coins and imposed a fine on the petitioner without there being any evidence to establish that the said coins were imported by the accused. The High Court quashed the order on the ground of no evidence.[20] The rule of 'no' evidence envisages that if there is some evidence to support a finding of fact, the Court will not interfere with it.[21]

The findings of fact may also be questioned if it is shown that in recording them, the adjudicatory body has erroneously refused to admit admissible and material evidence, or has erroneously admitted inadmissible evidence which has influenced the impugned findings.

In Dulal Chandra[22] the High Court quashed the finding by the revenue board on the ground that it was not based on evidence, was even contrary to the evidence on record and was vitiated by non-consideration of relevant materials on record.

The findings of fact are not challengeable merely on the ground that the evidence to sustain them is inadequate or insufficient. Adequacy, reliability or sufficiency of evidence on a point, review or appreciation thereof, and the inference of facts to be drawn therefrom are matters exclusively for the adjudicatory body concerned.[23]

As the Supreme Court has observed : "A finding of fact recorded by the tribunal cannot be challenged on the ground that the relevant and material evidence adduced before the tribunal is insufficient or inadequate to sustain a finding. The adequacy or sufficiency of evidence led on a point and the inference of fact to be drawn from the said finding are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Tribunal."[24] The Supreme Court has observed recently in the case noted below in relation to disciplinary proceedings:[25]

> "… the departmental authority… is the sole judge the facts, if the inquiry has been properly conducted. The settled legal position is that if there is some legal evidence on which the findings can be based, then adequacy or even reliability of that evidence is not a matter for canvassing before the High Court in a writ petition filed under Art. 226 of the Constitution.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that in departmental disciplinary proceedings against employees, the disciplinary authority is the sole judge of facts. Once findings of fact, based on appreciation of evidence are recorded, the High Court in its writ jurisdiction does not normally interfere with those findings unless these findings are based on no evidence, or the findings are wholly perverse and/or legally untenable, or the findings are such which no reasonable person would have reached.[26] The High Court does not concern itself with the adequacy or inadequacy of evidence.

---

20. Amulya Chandra v. Collector, Central Excise, AIR 1971 Tri. 3. Also, Teja Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1971 P&H 96.
21. Shew Bhagwan v. Collector of Customs, AIR 1971 Cal 112.
22. Dulal Chandra v. Assam Board of Revenue, AIR 1971 Ass 123.
23. Shew Bhagwan v. Collector of Customs, supra, footnote 21; Nand Kishore v. State of Bihar, AIR 1978 SC 1277 : (1978) 3 SCC 366.
24. State of Andhra Pradesh v. Chitra Venkata Rao, AIR 1975 SC 2151 : (1975) 2 SCC 557.
25. High Court of Judicature at Bombay v. Shashikant S. Patil, AIR 2000 SC 22 at 26 : (2000) 1 SCC 416.
26. Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A.K. Chopra, AIR 1999 SC 625 : (1999) 1 SCC 759; Kuldeep Singh v. Commissioner of Police, AIR 1999 SC 677 : (1999) 2 SCC 10; Yoginath D. Bagde v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1999 SC 3734 : (1999) 7 SCC 739.

But even in cases where the 'no evidence' rule or perversity is established, the court will not ordinarily substitute finding with its own. It will set aside the erroneous order and remand the matter to the authority concerned.[27]

In the matter of punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority, ordinarily the High Court does not interfere as it is a matter of the discretion of the disciplinary authority. The High Court can interfere only if the punishment is impermissible, or is such that it shocks the conscience of the Court.[28] The punishment awarded has to be reasonable. If it is unreasonable; Art. 14 is infringed.[29] The Court can decide upon the proportionality of the punishment when punishment is shockingly disproportionate. In a recent case,[30] the Supreme Court has observed in this connection:

> "It is only in extreme cases, which on their face show perversity or irrationality that there can be judicial review. Merely on compassionate grounds a Court should not interfere."
>
> The Court would not under Art. 226 or 32 interfere with the punishment "because it considers the punishment disproportionate."

The law regarding judicial review of administrative action through certiorari or prohibition has become complicated and involved in many artificial distinctions, as for example, distinction is drawn between an error of law and one which is 'patent'. There was no compulsive reason for the courts in India to adopt such a distinction from Britain. As already noted, the Indian courts do not have to follow the whole of the English Law in the area of writs and they could have thus taken upon themselves the task of curing errors of law in decisions of quasi-judicial bodies.[31] Similarly, on facts, instead of adopting the restrictive no evidence rule, the Indian courts could have adopted the more broad-based American rule of substantial evidence[32] which would have enabled the courts to better supervise quasi-judicial adjudications than what they do at present and that would have been in accord with the modern enlightened democratic thinking in many countries.

(d) NATURAL JUSTICE

Certiorari or prohibition usually goes to a body which is bound to act fairly or according to natural justice and it fails to do so.[33] In recent days, there is an in-

---

27. For propriety of remand see DCM Limited v. Commissioner of Sales Tax, Delhi, (2009) 4 SCC 231 : (2009) 4 JT 395.

28. B.C. Chaturvedi v. Union of India, (1995) 6 SCC 749; Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A.K. Chopra, (1999) I SCC 759, 770, 771 : AIR 1999 SC 625; Union of India v. Permananda, (1989) 2 SCC 177; B.C. Chaturvedi v. Union of India, (1995) 6 SCC 749; State of Tamil Nadu v. A. Rajapandian, (1995) I SCC 216 : AIR 1995 SC 561.

29. Infra, Ch. XXI.

30. Union of India v. R.K. Sharma, AIR 2001 SC 3052, at 3056 : 2001 (9) SCC 592.

31. Supra.

32. Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B. 340 U.S. 474.
See, BYSE, The Federal Administrative Procedure Act, I JILI, 89 (1958).
On questions of law, S. 706 of the A.P.A. provides that the reviewing Court would decide all relevant questions of law, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions.

33. U.P., Warehousing Corp. v. Vijay Narain, AIR 1980 SC 840; State of Punjab v. Dewan Chuni Lal, AIR 1970 SC 2086 : (1970) 1 SCC 479; Ravi Bhatt v. The Director General, Armed Forces Medical Services, AIR 1997 Mad. 78.

creasing judicial trend of imposing the requirements of natural justice on different types of bodies and different types of administrative action.[34]

If a policy decision is accepted without any demur by the complaining party, it would not be permissible for him to say that the implementation of the policy without giving any hearing was in violation of the principles of natural justice.[35]

Fixation of rent by a market Committee being an executive function, the courts will not interfere except on Wednesbury principles[36]. The Court observed:

> "There is broad separation of powers under the Constitution and ordinarily one organ of the State should not encroach into the domain of another. Montesquieu's theory of separation of powers (XIth Chapter of his book The Spirit of Laws) broadly applies in India too."

These appeals to MONTES QUIRE'S theory in todays Constitutionalism which features overlapping of functions of the different organs of the State of which executive law making (or delegated legislation) is a prime example.

The concept of natural justice is very important in the modern Administrative Law for it provides a basis for judicial control of the procedure followed by adjudicatory bodies, but it is vague, and has no fixed connotation. The concept of natural justice is flexible as its content depends inter alia upon the nature and constitution of the body concerned, the function it is exercising, the stature under which it is acting.

The question whether in a particular case principles of natural justice have been contravened or not is a matter for the courts to decide from case to case.[37] However, even with all its vagueness and flexibility, its two elements have been generally accepted, viz.,

(1) that the body in question should be free from bias, and

(2) that it should hear the person affected before it decides the matter.

That the principles of natural justice requires circumstantial flexibility was considered by the Supreme Court in a case where the Reserve Bank of India issued a requisition to the Registrar, Co-operative Societies to supersede the board and appointed an administrator under section 30(5) of Karnataka Cooperative Societies Act, 1959. The requisition was made in public interest and to prevent the conduct of the affairs of the Cooperative Bank in a manner detrimental to the interest of the depositors and for securing proper management of the bank. Rejecting the complain that no hearing had been given to the management of the bank, the Supreme Court held that on a receipt of a requisition in writing from Reserve Bank of India, the Registrar, cooperative Societies was statutorily bound

---

34. This topic is discussed extensively in JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Chs. IX-XII (1995); CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, I, VIII–XI (1994).

Also see, A.K. Kraipak v. Union of India, 1970 SC 150 : (1969) 2 SCC 262; Mohinder Singh v. Chief Election Commr., AIR 1978 SC 851 : (1978) 1 SCC 405; Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248; S.L. Kapoor v. Jagmohan, AIR 1981 SC 136; Swadeshi Cotton Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 818; Fedco v. Bilgrami, AIR 1960 SC 415; Hira Nath v. Rajendra Medical College, AIR 1973 SC 1260 : (1973) 1 SCC 805; State of Punjab v. Ajudhia Nath, AIR 1981 SC 1374 : (1981) 3 SCC 251; Raj Restaurant v. Municipal Corp., Delhi, AIR 1982 SC 1550 : (1982) 3 SCC 338.

35. Central Power Distribution Company v. Central Electricity Regulatory Commission, (2007) 8 SCC 197 : AIR 2007 SC 2912.

36. Fruit Commission Agents Assn. v. Govt. of A.P., (2007) 8 SCC 511 : AIR 2008 SC 34.

37. A.K. Roy v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC. 709.

to issue an order of supercession of the body of management and at that stage the affected Bank or its Managing Committee had no right of hearing or to raise any objection.[38]

The Supreme Court has observed that the principles of natural justice have undergone a sea change and it is now settled that complainant must show that he has suffered some real prejudice. It is not applied in a vacuum without reference to the relevant facts. It is no unruly horse nor could it be put in a strait jacket formula. A decision will be vitiated where no hearing is given at alland nor where the infringement is technical.[39] This decision like its precursors cited therein and particularly Sharma[40] has caused confusion in the law. S. L. Kapoor[41] which unqualifiedly stated that non observance of the principle of natural justice itself causes prejudice has not been overruled. So long as the view in Kapoor remains it is almost impossible to reconcile the two inconsistent views which subsist in relation to invoking the principles of natural justice.

The subject of Natural Justice is discussed elaborately in the area of Administrative Law rather than under Constitutional Law. Below is given a rather sketchy description of the subject.

RULE AGAINST BIAS

The first principle means that the adjudicator should be disinterested and unbiased; that the prosecutor himself should not be a judge; that the judge should be a neutral and disinterested person; that a person should not be a judge in his own cause; that a person interested in one of the parties to the dispute should not, even formally, take part in the adjudicatory proceedings.

It is often said that justice should not only be done but it should appear to have been done. Justice must be rooted in confidence; and confidence is destroyed when right minded people go away thinking : "The Judge was biased". The logic is equally applicable to governmental action and the Government.[42]

The basis of this principle is that justice should not only be done, but should manifestly and undoubtedly be seen to be done.[43]

Actual existence of bias is not necessary. The test of bias is "real likelihood of bias." "If a reasonable man would think on the basis of the existing circumstnaces that he (i.e. adjudicator) is likely to be prejudiced, that is sufficient to quash the decsion.".[44]

---

38. Reserve Bank of India v. M. Hanumaiah, (2008) 1 SCC 770 : AIR 2008 SC 994.
39. P. D. Agarwal v. State Bank of India, (2006) 8 SCC 776 : AIR 2006 SC 2064 .
40. (1996) 3 SCC 364 : AIR 1996 SC 1669.
41. (1980) 4 SCC 379.
42. Centre for Public Interest Litigation v. Union of India, (2005) 8 SCC 202 : AIR 2005 SC 4413.
43. See, JAIN, A TREATISE, op cit., Ch. XI; Cases, I, op. cit., Ch. X.
44. S. Parthasarathi v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 2701 : (1974) 3 SCC 459.
Also see, Metropolitan Properties Co. Ltd. v. Lannon, [1968] 3 W.L.R 694; Manak Lal v. Prem Chand, AIR 1957 SC 425 : 1957 SCR 575; Blaze and Central (P) Ltd., v. Union of India, AIR 1980 Knt 186; Rattan Lal Sharma v. Managing Committee, Dr. Hari Ram Hr. Sec. School, AIR 1993 SC 2155 : (1993) 4 SCC 10; Tata Cellular v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 11; Kumaon Mandal Vikas Nigam v. Girja Shankar Pant, AIR 2001 SC 24 : (2001) 1 SCC 182; State of Punjab v. V.K. Khanna, AIR 2001 SC 343 : (2001) 2 SCC 330; Amar Nath Chowdhury v. Braithwaite & Co. Ltd., AIR 2002 SC 678 : (2002) 2 SCC 290.

Bias may arise when the adjudicator has some interest in the subject-matter of the proceedings before him. If the interest is pecuniary, disqualification arises howsoever small the interest may be. In case of other interest, it is necessary to consider whether there is a reasonable ground for assuming the likelihood of bias and whether it is likely to produce in the minds of the litigant or the public at large a reasonable doubt about the fairness of the administration of justice.

In a departmental inquiry against N.,[45] the person presiding over the inquiry himself gave evidence against N., and thereafter continued to preside over the inquiry. This clearly evidences a state of biased mind against N.

In Gullapalli I, the hearing held under S. 68(d) of the Motor Vehicles Act by the Secretary of the Transport Department was held to be vitiated because his Department had prepared the scheme against which the hearing had taken place and "it is one of the fundamental principles of judicial procedure that the person or persons who are entrusted with the duty of hearing a case judicially should be those who have no personal bias in the matter."[46]

In Gullapalli II,[47] the Supreme Court held that the hearing given by the Chief Minister was not vitiated because there was an essential distinction between the functions of a Secretary and a Minister; the former was a part of the Department and the latter was only primarily responsible for the disposal of the business pertaining to that department and, therefore, the Minister could not be regarded to suffer from bias like the Secretary.[48]

If a person is hostile to a party whose cause he is called upon to try, that introduces the infirmity of personal bias and would disqualify him from trying the cause.[49] The chairman of a statutory corporation dismissed an employee. The employee preferred an appeal to the board of directors of the corporation. The board at a meeting at which the chairman was present, dismissed the appeal. The board's decision was quashed as there was likelihood of bias because of the presence of the chairman who had dismissed the employee.[50]

The all-important Kraipak case[51] may also be noted here. In a selection board for certain posts, a member was himself a candidate who was selected along with a few others. On a challenge by the candidates not selected, the Supreme Court quashed the list of successful candidates on the ground of bias in so far as a person personally interested in the matter sat on the selection committee. Similarly,

---

45. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Nooh, AIR 1958 SC 86 : 1958 SCR 595.
46. AIR 1959 SC 308 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 319. But see, T.G. Mudaliar v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1973 SC 974 : (1973) 1 SCC 336.
47. AIR 1959 SC 1376.
48. Kondala Rao v. A.P.S.R.T. Corp., AIR 1961 SC 82. But see, T.G. Mudaliar v. State of Tamil Nadu, supra.
49. Mineral Development Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1960 SC 468; Registrar, Cooperative Societies v. Dharam Chand, AIR 1961 SC 1743; State of Andhra Pradesh S.R.T. Corp v. Satyanarayana Transports, AIR 1965 SC 1303.
50. K. Chelliah v. Chairman, I.F. Corp., AIR 1973 Mad 122.
51. AIR 1970 SC 150 : (1969) 2 SCC 262.
For comments on the case, see, 13 JILI 362 (1971).

selection of a candidate was quashed because his son-in-law was a member of the selection committee.[52]

A senior officer expresses appreciation of the work of a junior in the confidential report. It does not amount to bias nor would it disqualify the senior officer from being a part of the departmental promotion committee to consider the junior officer along with others for promotion. The Supreme Court has stated that every preference does not vitiate an action. "If it is rational and unaccompanied by considerations of personal interest, pecuniary or otherwise, it would not vitiate a decision".[53]

FAIR HEARING

Another cardinal principle of natural justice is that the body deciding upon the rights of a party must give a reasonable opportunity to the party concerned to present his case. That no one should be condemned unheard is an important maxim of civilised jurisprudence.[54]

But the Court will not strike down an order merely because the order has been passed against the petitioner in breach of natural justice. It would be justified in refusing to do so if such striking down would result in restoration of another order passed earlier in favour of the petitioner and against the opposite party in violation of principle of natural justice or is otherwise not in accordance with law.[55]

The right to fair hearing does not necessarily include an oral hearing. What is essential is that the party affected should be given sufficient opportunity to meet the case against him and this could be achieved by filing written representations.[56] The party concerned should have adequate notice of the case against him which he has to meet, and that the party affected should be apprised of the evidence on which the case against him is based and be given opportunity to rebut these materials.[57]

Refusal of sufficient time to file a reply to MPs who were charged with incurring disqualification was recognized in principle, but on facts it was held that adequate time was given.[58]

No evidence should be taken behind the back of the party.[59] Though the Indian Evidence Act, as such, does not apply to quasi-judicial bodies, yet the rules of natural justice require that such a body does not act on evidence which has no probative value.[60] A party should have the opportunity of adducing all relevant evidence on which he relies.

---

52. D.K. Khanna v. Union of India, AIR 1973 HP 30. Also see S.P. Kapoor v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 2181 : (1981) 4 SCC 716.
53. G.N. Nayak v. Goa University, (2002) 2 SCC 712 : AIR 2002 SC 790.
54. Board of Education v. Rice, 1911 A.C. 179; Local Govt. Board v. Arlidge, 1915 A.C. 120; North Bihar Agency v. State of Bihar, AIR 1981 SC 1758 : (1981) 3 SCC 131.
55. Raj Kumar Soni v. State of UP, (2007) 10 SCC 635 : (2007) 5 JT 114.
56. M.P. Industries v. Union of India, AIR 1966 SC 671.
57. D.C. Mills v. Commr., Income-tax, AIR 1955 SC 65; Prem Prakash v. Punjab University, AIR 1972 SC 1408 : (1973) 3 SCC 424; U.P. Warehousing Corp. v. Vijay Narayan; supra.
58. Jagjit Singh v. State of Haryana, (2006) 11 SCC 1 : AIR 2007 SC 590.
59. S.C. Paul v. Calcutta University, AIR 1970 Cal . 282; State of Orissa v. Murlidhar, AIR 1963 SC 404; see also Administrator, Unit Trust of India v. B. M. Malani, (2007) 10 SCC 101 : (2007) 12 SCALE 107.
60. Union of India v. Verma, AIR 1957 SC 882; B.E. Supply Co. v. The Workmen, AIR 1972 SC 303.

A person lodging a FIR is entitled to hearing when on the basis of police report Magistrate prefers to drop the proceedings instead of taking cognizance of offence.

If a particular Association was not called to participate in a discussion relating to policy making, such decision making policy would not be hit by the principle of natural justice. Hence the policy regarding integration of employees and other technical matters while considering the merger of Airlines—Vayudoot with Indian airlines, the decision will not be arbitrary, unreasonable or capricious, and particularly so, when lengthy deliberation had taken place in various meetings to arrive at a proper decision. It was reiterated that a policy which did not suffer from any arbitrariness, the courts will not interfere.[61]

In Central Power Distribution Company,[62] it was urged that the order made by the Central Electricity Regulatory Commission fixing Unscheduled Interchanged Charges was made in breach of the principles of natural justice inasmuch as the same was made suo moto and without hearing the parties concerned. The contention was rejected on the ground that it had been passed after hearing of parties including the predecessor (State of Andhra Pradesh) of the Central Power Distribution Company.[63]

Representation by a lawyer is not regarded as a necessary element of natural justice, but there may be circumstances when denial of a lawyer may amount to denial of natural justice, e.g., when one side is represented by a legally trained officer, it will be denial of natural justice to refuse representation by a lawyer to the other side.[64]

It is not necessary to permit cross-examination of witnesses in all cases.[65] However, in disciplinary proceedings against civil servants, this has been held to be essential.[66]

An obligation to give reasons for their decisions has also been imposed on quasi-judicial bodies.[67]

And subsequently the court has emphasized that the necessity of giving reasons is not confined to tribunals, lower courts or administrative bodies but extends to High Courts also.[68]

---

61. Indian Airlines Officerss' Assn. v. Indian Airlines Ltd., (2007) 10 SCC 684 : AIR 2007 SC 2747.

62. Central Power Distribution Company v. Central Electricity Regulatory Commission, (2007) 8 SCC 197.

63. Judgment however is not very clear on facts as to why and how the State of A.P. was the predecessor of the Central Power Distribution Company.

64. Kalindi v. Tata Loco & Eng. Co., AIR 1960 SC 914 : (1960) 3 SCR 407; Zonal Manager, L.I.C. v. City Munsif, Meerut, AIR 1968 All. 270; C.L. Subramanian v. Collector of Customs, AIR 1972 SC 2178; Nandlal v. State of Punjab, AIR 1981 SC 2041 : (1981) 4 SCC 327; Board of Trustees, Port of Bombay v. Dilipkumar, AIR 1983 SC 109 : (1983) 1 SCC 124.

65. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Bakshi Gulam Mohd., AIR 1967 SC 122 : 1966 Supp SCR 401.

66. Channabasappa v. State of Mysore, AIR 1972 SC 32 : (1971) 1 SCC 1. Also see, infra, Ch. XXXI.

67. Travancore-Rayons v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 862 : (1969) 3 SCC 868. See for a comment, 14 JILI, 602 (1972) Also, Siemens Engg. & Mfg Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1976 SC 1785 : (1976) 2 SCC 981; Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd. v. Registrar Trade Marks, AIR 1981 Del. 190; Cycle Equipments (P.) Ltd. v. Municipal Corp. of Delhi, AIR 1983 Del. 94; Alok Prasad Verma v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Pat. 211, at 217.

68. State of Himachal Pradesh v. Sada Ram, (2009) 4 SCC 422 : (2009) 4 JT 165.

Interference by High Court without assigning any reason is unsustainable.[69]

Where the High Court, without recording any error or perversity in appointment process, reverses the Collector's decision which based its judgment on stray facts, the Supreme Court held the reversal was not proper and without jurisdiction.[70]

REASONS

It has been held that an order of affirmation by an appellate authority must also disclose reasons even though not as elaborately as a reversal.[71]

F. INDEPENDENCE OF THE HIGH COURTS

In a democracy governed by law, independence of the judiciary is very essential. Judiciary constantly stands as the sentinel on the qui vive to protect the Fundamental Rights of the people. The judiciary keeps the scales of justice even between the citizens and the state, or between the Centre and the States, or between the States inter se.

Independence of the judiciary is an essential attribute of Rule of Law. Because of these paramount considerations, judicial review, independence of the judiciary, and Rule of Law have been declared as the basic features of the Constitution which cannot be deleted even by a constitutional amendment.[72]

As in the case of the Supreme Court,[73] so in the case of the High Courts, there exist provisions in the Constitution to preserve and safeguard their impartiality, integrity and independence. In the appointment of the High Court Judges, the Chief Justice of India plays a crucial role; they are appointed for a fixed tenure, and the process to remove them from office before the age of retirement is very dilatory and elaborate.[74]

The expenses of a High Court are charged on the State Consolidated Fund [Art. 202(3)(d)].[75] The conduct of a High Court Judge in discharge of his duties cannot be discussed in the State Legislature or Parliament except when a motion for his removal is under consideration.[76] The salaries of the High Court Judges are determined by Parliament by law.[77] The allowances, leave and pension of a High Court Judge are determined by Parliament by law, but these cannot be varied to his disadvantage after his appointment. [Art. 221].[78] It is laid down in Art. 220 that after retirement, a permanent High Court Judge shall not plead or act in a Court or before any authority in India, except the Supreme Court and a High Court other than the High Court in which he has held his office.

---

69. Mohd. Yusuf v. Faij Mohammad, (2009) 3 SCC 513 : (2009) 1 SCALE 71.
70. Mahavir Singh v. Khiali Ram, (2009) 3 SCC 439 : AIR 2009 SC 1761.
71. Chairman, Disciplinary Authority, Rani Lakshmi Bai Kshetriya Gramin Bank v. Jagdish Sharan Varshney, (2009) 4 SCC 240 : (2009) 4 JT 519.
72. See, infra, Ch. XLI.
73. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. K.
74. Supra, this Chapter, Sec. B(r).
75. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. F(iii).
76. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(i)(a); Ch. VI, Sec. H(a).
77. Supra, this Chapter, Part B(l).
78. Ibid.

The jurisdiction of a High Court in so far as it is specified in the Constitution, as for example, Art. 226 cannot be curtailed by the Legislature. In other respects, however, the matter of jurisdiction has been left to Parliament and the State Legislatures.[79] However, as pointed out earlier, if a State law derogates from the constitutional position of the High Court, then the Bill has to be reserved by the Governor for Presidential assent.[80] But the constitution and organisation of the High Courts fall under the legislative sphere of Parliament and, thus, the High Courts have been largely insulated from local influences.[81]

The State Executive does not have much say vis-a-vis the High Court. It is consulted at the time of appointment of the Judges.[82] It also approves the rules made, and the table of the fees prescribed, by the High Court; it also approves the rules made by the Chief Justice of the High Court specifying the salaries etc. of officers and servants of the High Court.[83]

As already stated earlier, Art. 224(1) provides for the appointment of additional judges in the High Courts. Such judges are appointed for a period of two years and may be made permanent Judges thereafter. The institution of additional judges somewhat detracts from the independence of the judiciary. The reason is that an additional Judge may not be able to act fully independently as he may be obsessed with the fear of losing his job after two years. The provision in the Constitution permitting appointment of additional Judges on a temporary tenure is however open to objection, more so as there is no limit on the number of such Judges who can be appointed at one time.[84] The criticism is however diluted to some extent by the fact that the power in this respect lies with the Centre and not with the State Executive and the power is exercisable on the advice of the Chief Justice of India.[85] Lastly, the dangers inherent in the re-employment of retired Judges have already been pointed out and these operate as much in the case of High Courts as in the case of the Supreme Court.[86]

Great emphasis has been laid on the independence of the High Courts by several Judges of the Supreme Court in S.P. Gupta v. Union of India.[87] It has been said that judicial independence is one of the central values inherent in the Constitution; that the judiciary plays a creative role in so far as it keeps government organs within legal limits and protects the citizen against abuse of power by them and so it is essential that the judiciary be free from government pressure or influence.

In the S.C. Advocates-on-Record case,[88] again, the Supreme Court has laid great emphasis on the independence of the Judiciary in a democratic society. "Independence of the judiciary" has been characterised "as a part of the basic structure of the Constitution", "to secure the 'rule of law', essential for the preserva-

---

79. Infra, Sec. H.
80. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. F(i).
81. Infra, Sec. H.
82. Supra, Sec. B(b).
83. *Supra.*Sec. B(t).
84. Supra, Sec. B(h) and (p).
85. Ibid.
86. The question regarding the appointment of additional Judges to the High Courts has been thoroughly discussed by the Supreme Court in S.P. Gupta v. Union of India, supra, Sec. B(c).
87. AIR 1982 SC 149; supra, Sec. B(c).
88. Supra, Sec. B(d).

tion of the democratic society".[89] In Kumar Padma Prasad v. Union of India[90] the Supreme Court has observed: "The independence of judiciary is part of the basic structure of the Constitution."[91]

Emphasizing upon the independence of the judiciary in a democracy, the Supreme Court has observed in Shishir Patil :[92]

> "In a democracy governed by rule of law, under a written constitution, judiciary is the sentinel on the qui vive to protect the fundamental rights and posed to keep even scales of justice between the citizens and the state or the states inter se. Rule of law and judicial review are basic features of the Constitution. As its integral constitutional structure, independence of the judiciary is an essential attribute of rule of law. Judiciary must, therefore, be free from pressure or influence from any quarter. The Constitution has secured to them, the independence".

It has been judicially ruled that the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts are not government servants in the ordinary sense of the term. A Judge of any of these Courts does not hold "a post in the service under the State". He is not under the Government of India as to hold so will militate against the concept of independence of the judiciary which is a basic feature of the Constitution.[93] A Judge holds a constitutional office. In Union of India v. Sankalchand Himatlal Sheth[94], the Supreme Court has described the position of a High Court Judge as follows:

> "... Judges of the High Court owe their appointment to the Constitution and hold a position of privilege under it... They, the Judges of the High Court, are not government servants in the ordinary signification of that expression... In fact a High Court Judge has no employer, he occupies a high constitutional office which is coordinate with the executive and the legislature. The independence of the judiciary is a fighting (sic) faith of our Constitution".

The same is true of the Supreme Court Judges. The Supreme Court has ruled in Union of India v. Pratibha Bonnerjee[95] that Arts. 50, 214, 217, 219 and 231 of the Constitution show that a High Court Judge belongs to the third organ of the State which is independent of the other two organs, the Executive and the Legislature. Therefore, a person belonging to the judicial wing cannot be subordinate to the other two wings of the State. A High Court Judge occupies a unique position under the Constitution. He will not be able to discharge his duty without fear or favour, affection or ill will, unless he is fully independent of the Executive. Hence the relation between the Government and a High Court Judge is not that of master and servant; the Judge does not hold his office under the Government; he cannot be regarded as a gov-

---

89. AIR 1994 SC at 421 : (1993) 4 SCC 441.
Also see, High Court of Judicature of Bombay v. Shirish Kumar R Patil, AIR 1997 SC 2631 : (1997) 6 SCC 339.
For explanation of the concept of "Basic Structure of the Constitution", see, infra, Ch. XLI.

90. AIR 1992 SC 1213, 1232 : (1992) 2 SCC 428, Sec. B(b).

91. For discussion on the doctrine of "Basic Structure of the Constitution", see, infra, Ch. XLI.

92. High Court of Judicature at Bombay v. Shirish Kumar R. Patil, AIR 1997 SC at 2627.

93. Supreme Court Advocates on Record Assn. v. Union of India, (1993) 4 SCC 441.
Also see, infra, Ch. XLI, under Constitutional Amendment, for discussion on this concept.

94. Supra, Sec. B(o).
Also see, All Kerala Poor Aid Legal Ass., Trivandrum v. Chief Justice of Kerala, AIR 1990 Ker 241.

95. (1995) 6 SCC 765 : AIR 1996 SC 693.

ernment servant; he holds a constitutional office and is able to function independently and impartially because not being a government servant he does not take orders from any one.

It is arguable that the increasing control that the Supreme Court has exercised not only in the matter of appointment of High Court judges, their transfers to other High Courts, their appointment as Chief Justices of High Courts and as Judges of the Supreme Court, but also in matters which pertain to the internal administration of the High Court, has led to an unwonted deference by the judges of the High Court to the judges of the Supreme Court. There is a danger consequently of a lack of robust independence in the High Court, although the Supreme Court has justified its interference on the ground of judicial independence.[1]

At times, sitting High Court Judges are appointed to head tribunals or commissions. To preserve the independence of High Court Judges, the Supreme Court has now laid down guidelines for the appointment of these Judges to tribunals, committees or commissions.[2]

G. SUBORDINATE JUDICIARY

In each State there is a system of subordinate courts below the High Court.[3] The Constitution makes a few provisions in Articles 233 to 237 to regulate the organisation of these courts and to ensure independence of the subordinate judges.

The Supreme Court has emphasized again and again on the maintenance of independence and integrity of the subordinate judiciary which is closest to the people.[4] Accordingly, the Court has through its various decisions promoted the independence of these courts from executive control and, to this effect, has expanded the control of the High Courts over the subordinate judiciary, so as to strengthen the independence of the subordinate courts from executive control.

The subordinate judiciary constitutes a very important segment of the judicial system as it is in these courts that the judiciary comes in close contact with the people. It is therefore essential to maintain the independence and integrity of the subordinate judiciary and for this purpose Arts. 233 to 237 have been placed in the Constitution. These Articles have been so interpreted by the Supreme Court as to strengthen the control of the High Courts on the subordinate judiciary. It is thus incumbent on each High Court to maintain and uphold the honour and integrity of the subordinate judiciary in the concerned State.

The Supreme Court through its various pronouncements, which are noted below, has sought to strengthen the position of the subordinate judiciary in several ways, viz.,

(1) The subordinate courts have been freed from executive control and brought under the control of the concerned High Court.

---

1. Tirupati Balaji v. State of Bihar, (20040 5 SCC 1 : AIR 2004 SC 2351.
2. T. Fenn Walter v. Union of India, (2002) 6 SCC 184 : AIR 2002 SC 2679.
3. For a description of the Judicial System in the States, see, Jain, OUTLINES OF INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, Ch. XVIII.
4. See, for example, State of Maharashtra v. Labour Law Practitioners' Association, AIR 1998 SC 1233 : (1988) 2 SCC 688.

(2) The disciplinary control over the subordinate courts vests in the High Court. The Supreme Court has sought to ensure that the High Court exercises this jurisdiction properly and according to the principles of natural justice.

(3) To protect these courts, the Supreme Court has assumed power to punish contempt of these courts. Likewise, a High Court can also do so.

(4) The Supreme Court has directed the High Courts not to make stringent remarks in their decisions against the subordinate judiciary.

(5) Disciplinary action cannot be initiated against a subordinate judge for just delivering a wrong decision on making a wrong order.

A mistake made by a judge can always be corrected on appeal.

(6) The Supreme Court has constantly endeavoured to improve the working conditions of the subordinate courts and to improve the logistic/infrastructrual support to these judges. The Supreme Court has constantly sought to improve the pay scales of these judges and seek for them other necessary facilities.

(a) STRENGTH OF THE SUBORDINATE JUDICIARY

Having regard to the huge backlog of cases and the recommendations of the Law Commission in its 120th Report the Standing Committee of Parliament in its 85th Report and the observations of the Chief Justice of India, in 2002, the Supreme Court in All India Judges' Assn. v. Union of India[5] felt that it was constitutionally obliged to ensure that the disposal of cases was increased because

> "[a]n independent and efficient judicial system is one of the basic structures of our Constitution. If sufficient number of judges are(is) not appointed, justice would not be available to the people, thereby undermining the basic structure".

It therefore directed the filling in of all vacancies within 1 year and the increase in the judge strength from the ratio of 13 judges per 10,00,000 people to 50 judges per 1,00,000 people within 5 years.

(b) APPOINTMENT OF DISTRICT JUDGES

Under Art. 233 (1), appointment, posting and promotion of district judges[6] in a State are made by the Governor in consultation with the High Court. Under Art. 233(2), a person not already in the 'service of the State' is eligible to be appointed as a district judge only if—

(i) he has been for not less than seven years an advocate or a pleader, and (ii) is recommended by the High Court for such appointment.

From the tenor of Art. 233, it appears that there are two sources of recruitment of district judges, viz.;

(i) service of the Union or the State;

(ii) members of the Bar.

---

5. (2002) 4 SCC 247 : AIR 2002 SC 1752.

6. The expression 'district judge' includes judge of a city civil Court, additional district judge, joint district judge, assistant district judge, chief judge of a small cause Court, chief presidency magistrate, additional chief presidency magistrate, sessions judge, additional sessions judge and assistant sessions judge: Art. 236(a).

The judges from the first source are appointed in consultation with the High Court [Art. 233(1)], and those from the second source are appointed on the recommendation of the High Court [Art. 233(2)] No one can be appointed from the Bar until and unless his name is recommended by the High Court.

These constitutional provisions have given rise to several important controversies.

The Governor of Rajasthan made a rule, in consultation with the Rajasthan High Court, laying down the condition that an advocate who had practised in the Rajasthan High Court for 7 years would be eligible to be appointed in the State Higher Judicial Service. The rule thus excluded all advocates practising in other High Courts even from applying for the post in the Rajasthan Higher Judicial Service. The Supreme Court ruled that the rule was unconstitutional being violative of Art. 14. The Court asserted that India is one country from Kashmir to Kanyakumari and there is no "intelligible differentia" distinguishing advocates practising in the Rajasthan High Court from those practising in other High Courts.[7]

Under Art. 233(2), a candidate from the Bar can be appointed as a district judge only on the recommendation of the High Court and not otherwise.[8] In Chandra Mohan v. State of U.P.,[9] the Supreme Court held that the appointment of district judges on the recommendation of a Selection Committee consisting of two High Court Judges and the Judicial Secretary, and not in consultation with the High Court, as a whole, was unconstitutional.

The Supreme Court has emphasized in Bal Mukund Sah[10] that Art. 233 enacts a complete code for the purpose of appointment of district judges and consultation with the High Court is an inevitable essential feature of Art. 233.

The Supreme Court has interpreted the term "advocate" in Art. 233(2)(i), somewhat broadly. If a person on being enrolled as an advocate ceases to practise law and takes up employment, he is not regarded as an "advocate". But, if a person who is on the rolls of any Bar Council, is engaged either by employment or otherwise of the Union or any State, corporate body or person, practices as an advocate before a Court for and on behalf of such government, corporation or authority or person, he is to be regarded as an "advocate". Thus, an assistant government advocate is qualified to be appointed as a district judge.[11]

The Supreme Court has also ruled that the words 'service of the State' mean only 'judicial service'[12] and no other service. Noting that the Constitution lays emphasis on the independence of the judiciary, and on the separation of the ex-

---

7. Ganga Ram Moolchandani v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2001 SC 2616 : (2001) 6 SCC 89. For Art. 14, see, Ch. XXI, infra.

8. A. Panduranga Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1975 SC 1922 : (1975) 4 SCC 709; M.S. Jain v. State of Haryana, AIR 1977 SC 276 : (1977) 1 SCC 486.

9. AIR 1966 SC 1987 : (1967) 1 SCR 77.

10. State of Bihar v. Bal Mukund Sah, AIR 2000 SC 1296, 1321 : (2000) 4 SCC 640. Also see, infra, for further discussion on this case.

11. Sushma Suri v. Govt. of N.C.T. of Delhi, (1999) I SCC 330 : 1999 SCC (L &S) 208.

12. According to Art. 236(b), the expression "judicial service" means "a service consisting exclusively of persons intended to fill the post of district judge and other civil judicial posts inferior to the post of district judge". Also see, Satya Narain Singh v. High Court at Allahabad, AIR 1985 SC 308.

ecutive and the judiciary,[13] the Court has concluded that only persons from 'judicial service' were eligible to be appointed as district judges and not persons from any other service like police, excise etc. The Court has taken the view that appointment of executive officers as district judges would damage the good name of the judiciary. This pronouncement has made a significant contribution to the long term improvement of the quality of the subordinate judiciary by ensuring its separation from the executive.

The appointment to the posts of district judges, and their first posting, are to be made by the Governor in consultation with the High Court. The consultation with the High Court is mandatory.[14] The consultation with the High Court has to be 'meaningful and purposive'. Therefore, the Governor has to consult the High Court in respect of appointment of each person as a district judge or additional district judge[15] and the opinion of the High Court must be given full weight by the Governor, which means the State Executive.[16]

In M.M Gupta v. State of Jammu & Kashmir,[17] appointment of district judges by the Government was quashed because these appointments were made without full and effective consultation with the High Court. The Supreme Court held that, normally, as a rule, the High Court's recommendations for the appointment of a district judge should be accepted by the State Government, and the Governor should act on the same. If, in any particular case, the State Government for good and weighty reasons finds it difficult to accept the High Court's recommendations, it should communicate its views to, and have complete and effective consultation with, the High Court. There is no doubt that if the High Court is convinced that the Government's objections are for good reasons, it will reconsider its earlier recommendation. Efficient and proper judicial administration being the main object, both the High Court and the State Government must necessarily approach the question in a detached manner.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the expression "consultation" does not mean "concurrence", but it does postulate effective consultation which involves exchange of mutual view points of each other and examination of the relative merits of the other point of view. Consultation is not complete or effective before the parties thereto make their respective points of view known to the other or others and discuss and examine the relative merits of their views.

In State of Kerala v. A. Lakshmikutty,[18] the Supreme Court has elaborately discussed the respective roles of the Government and the High Court in the matter of appointment of district judges. This matter is governed by Art. 233 of the Constitution according to which the appointment of district judges is to be made by the State Governor in consultation with the High Court [Art. 233(1)]. A person not being in the service of the State or of the Centre can be appointed only when

---

13. Directive Principle 50; infra, Ch. XXXIV.
14. Prem Nath v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1976 SC 1599 : (1967) 3 SCR 186; State of Assam v. Ranga Mohammad, AIR 1967 SC 903 : (1967) 1 SCR 454; Chandramouleshwar v. Patna High Court, AIR 1970 SC 370 : (1969) 3 SCC 56.
15. Including district sessions judge or additional district or sessions judge.
16. A Panduranga Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1975 SC 1922 : (1975) 4 SCC 709.
17. AIR 1982 SC 1579. Also see, Chandramouleshwar Prasad v. Patna High Court, AIR 1970 SC 370 : (1969) 3 SCC 56.
18. AIR 1987 SC 331 : (1986) 4 SCC 632.

recommended by the High Court [Art. 233(2)]. Some of the salient points which emerge from the Court's opinion in Lakshmikutty are:

1. The power of the State Government to appoint district judges is not absolute and unfettered but is hedged in with restrictions. The power is conditioned by the requirement of "consultation" with the High Court.

2. The power of appointment is an executive function of the Government.

3. The eligibility for appointment as a district judge by direct recruitment depends entirely on the High Court's recommendation. The State Government cannot appoint any one from outside the panel of names forwarded by the High Court.

4. 'Consultation' between the High Court and the State Government, as envisaged by Art. 233(1), must be "real, full and effective". This means that there must be an interchange of views between the High Court and the State Government. On this point, the Court has emphasized thus:

> "If the State Government were simply to give lip service to the principle of consultation and depart from the advice of the High Court in making judicial appointments without referring back to the High Court the difficulties which prevent the Government from accepting its advice, the consultation would not be effective and any appointment of a person as a district judge.....under Art. 233(1) would be invalid."[19]

5. Normally, as a matter of rule, the recommendation of the High Court for appointment as a district judge should be accepted by the State Government. If, in any particular case, the State Government for "good and weighty" reasons finds it difficult to accept the recommendations of the High Court, the Government should communicate its views to the High Court and must have complete and effective consultation with the High Court in the matter.

In the instant case, the High Court forwarded to the State Government, a panel of names for appointment as district judges. For some reasons, the State Government did not want to accept the panel but it did not communicate its views to the High Court in the matter. The Supreme Court ruled that before rejecting the panel forwarded by the High Court, the Government should have conveyed its views to the High Court to elicit its opinion. The Government should have taken the High Court into confidence. Accordingly, a mandamus was issued to the State Government requiring it to communicate its views to the High Court to elicit its opinion.

It becomes clear from the above pronouncements that no recruitment to the post of a district judge can be made by the Governor without recommendations of the High Court.

---

19. Commenting on this provision [Art. 233(1)], AHMADI, J., has observed in S.C. Advocates on Record v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 268, 376 : (1993) 4 SCC 441.

"Consultation would not be complete, meaningful and effective unless there has been an exchange of views and in the event of disagreement the executive has indicated the reasons for its disagreement with the High Court and has disclosed the material on which the disagreement is based.... In order that the requirement of consultation does not end up as an empty formality or is not reduced to a mere mockery it is essential that in the event of difference of opinion there is an effective interchange of view points between the two functionaries so that each is able to appreciate the views of the other and there is a genuine attempt to iron out the creases before a final decision is taken".

While there is no legal bar against the High Court reviewing its earlier decision taken on the administrative side on the question of inter se seniority of recruitees, it can do so only after hearing the parties likely to be affected by the decision, and provided there has been no judicial decision directly deciding the issue inter partes.[20]

If any rules are made (under Art. 309)[21] for regulating recruitment and conditions of service of district judges, the rules have to be in conformity with Art. 233. The rules will be ultra vires if they violate the constitutional mandate of Art. 233.[22]

(c) APPOINTMENT OF SUBORDINATE JUDGES

Below the district judges, there are other subordinate courts. According to Art. 234, appointment of persons, other than district judges, to the State judicial service[23] is made by the Governor in accordance with the rules made by him for the purpose after consultation with the State Public Service Commission and the High Court.

Consultation with the High Court under Art. 234 is mandatory. If rules are made by the State Government without consulting the High Court then such rules would be ultra vires.[24] "Consultation" envisaged by Art. 234 is not a matter of mere formality; it has to be meaningful and effective. Rules made without consultation with the concerned High Court are void and a nullity. The reason underlying Art. 234 is that judicial service must be independent of the executive influence. Therefore, judicial service has been placed on a pedestal different from other services under the State. The constitutional scheme aims at securing an independent judiciary which is the bulwark of democracy.[25]

Certain rules made by the Governor of Gujarat regulating promotion of civil judges to the posts of assistant judges were declared by the Supreme Court as "irrational, arbitrary and unreasonable" as these rules came in conflict with Arts. 14 and 16.[26]

Under Art. 234, the consultation with the High Court is only in respect of making the rules and not for actual selection of the appointees.[27] However, in view of the High Court's ultimate responsibility for judicial administration in the State, the Law Commission has suggested that the Article be suitably amended so as to provide that persons appointed to the subordinate judiciary may be persons recommended by the High Court.[28]

Now, the deficiency in the phraseology of Art. 234 has been removed by the Supreme Court through its ruling in Ashok Kumar Yadav v. State of Haryana.[29]

---

20. D. Ganesh Rao Patnaik v. State of Jharkhand, (2005) 8 SCC 454, 472 : AIR 2005 SC 4321.
21. Infra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. B.
22. Hari Datt v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 1426 : (1980) 3 SCC 189.
23. For definition of "judicial service", see, supra, note 70.
24. A.C. Thalwal v. High Court of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 2000 SC 2732 : (2000) 7 SCC 1.
25. Ibid.
26. Indravadan v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1986 SC 1035 : 1986 Supp SCC 254.
For discussion on Arts. 14 and 16, see, infra, Chs. XXI and XXIII.
27. Farzand v. Mohan Singh, AIR 1968 All. 67; State of West Bengal v. N.N. Bagchi, AIR 1966 SC 447 : (1966) 1 SCR 771.
28. LAW COMM, XIV REPORT, 217-220.
29. AIR 1987 SC 454 : (1985) 4 SCC 417.
The Court has reiterated this view in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Rafiquddin, AIR 1988 SC 162 : 1987 Supp SCC 401.

The Court has laid down a procedure to recruit subordinate judges where the High Court will have a substantial role to play. The Court has insisted that when selection of judges is being made by the State Public Service Commission, a sitting Judge of the High Court, nominated by the Chief Justice, should be invited to participate in the interview as an expert and, ordinarily, his opinion ought to be accepted, except when there are strong and cogent reasons for not accepting his advice. These reasons must be recorded in writing by the chairman and the members of the Commission.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that it is necessary to recruit as judges "competent and able persons possessing a high degree of rectitude and integrity," otherwise, the whole democratic set up in the country will be put in jeopardy. The Court gave this direction to the Public Service Commission in every State because it was anxious that "the finest talent should be recruited in the Judicial Service and that can be secured only by having a real expert whose advise constitutes a determinative factor in the selection process".[30]

The Supreme Court had imposed the qualification of minimum three years' practice for recruitment to the lowest rung of judicial office.[31] Although the Supreme Court reiterated this ruling in the case noted below[32] and stated that while the qualification of a minimum of three years' legal practice is a must for recruitment in the lowest rung of judicial office, it is open to a State to prescribe a higher qualification by way of standing at the Bar, this requirements has subsequently been dispensed with.[33]

The persons presiding over industrial and labour courts constitute a 'Judicial Service' and so these judges ought to be recruited in accordance with Art. 234.[34]

(d) DE FACTO DOCTRINE

When appointment of a district judge was declared invalid because of the breach of Art. 233, the decisions given by him were not affected because of the de facto doctrine.[35]

Again, in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Rafiquddin,[36] appointment of munsiffs suffered from legal infirmity as these were made inconsistent with the relevant rules. Nevertheless, the decisions given by them as munsiffs were protected by applying the de facto doctrine.

The Supreme Court has asserted that the doctrine is founded upon sound principles. These judges could not be regarded as usurpers of office. These persons, though not qualified according to the rules, were, nevertheless, appointed by competent authority to the posts of munsiffs with the concurrence of the High Court. They had been working all these years in the Judicial Service. They had been performing their functions and duties as de facto judicial officers. "A person who is ineligible to judgeship, but who has nevertheless been duly appointed and

---

30. The Court has reiterated this ruling in All India Judges' Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC at 2506, 2507 : (1993) 4 SCC 288.
31. All India Judges' Association v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 2493 : (1993) 4 SCC 288.
32. All India Judges' Association v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 2771 : (1994) 6 SCC 314.
33. All India Judges Association III: (2002).
34. State of Maharashtra v. Labour Law Practitioners' Association, AIR 1998 SC 1233 : (1998) 2 SCC 688.
35. Gokaraju Rangaraju v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 1473 : (1981) 3 SCC 132.
36. AIR 1988 SC 162, 179-180 : 1987 Supp SCC 401.

who exercises the powers and duties of office is a de facto judge, he acts validly until he is properly removed." Judgments and orders made by a de facto judge cannot be challenged on the ground of his ineligibility for appointment.

(e) HIGH COURT'S CONTROL OVER DISTRICT AND SUBORDINATE COURTS

According to Art. 235, the control over district and subordinate courts is vested in the High Court, including the posting and promotion of, and the grant of leave to, persons belonging to the State judicial service, and holding a post inferior to that of a district judge. However, the High Court is not authorised to deal with any such person otherwise than in accordance with the conditions of service prescribed under the law. Art. 235 is not to be construed as taking away from any such person any right of appeal which he may have under the law regulating his conditions of service.

In what came to be known as the "fodder scam", ex-Chief Minister of Bihar, had been charged with large scale defalcation of public funds and falsification of accounts. The High Court's appointment of a particular Additional District Judge as a Special Judge to conduct the trials was subjected to scrutiny by the Supreme Court in Rajiv Ranjan Singh "Lalan" (VI) v. Union of India[37]. The issue had come up before the Supreme Court by way of public interest litigation in which a prayer was made for monitoring the conduct of the trials. On the ground that the question of appointment of a Special Judge was exclusively within the domain of the High Court, the prayer for change of the Special Judge was ultimately rejected.[38]

Article 235 is the pivotal provision. The control vested in the High Court by Art. 235 over the subordinate judiciary is for the purpose of preserving its independence and its protection from executive interference.

The control vested in the High Court by Art. 235 over the judiciary below it complete and comprehends a wide variety of matters and is "exclusive in nature, comprehensive in extent and effective in operation."[39] The High Court is the sole custodian of the control over the judiciary. The word 'control' in Art. 235 is used in a comprehensive sense; it includes general superintendence over the working of the subordinate courts. The expression control in Art. 235 includes "disciplinary control".

Transfers, promotions and confirmations including transfer of district and subordinate judges vest in the High Court. Therefore, a judicial officer who had, with the consent of the High Court, been appointed as an ad-hoc Deputy Secretary in the Legislative Department of the State Government could not be regularized or promoted by the State Government without consultation with the High

---

37. (2006) 1 SCC 356 : (2005) 9 SCALE 332.

38. Rajiv Ranjan Singh "Lalan" (VIII) v. Union of India, (2006) 6 SCC 613 : (2006) 8 JT 328; See also Tirupati Balaji Developers (P.) Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2004) 5 SCC 1 : AIR 2004 SC 2351.

39. Chief Justice, Andhra Pradesh v. L.V.A. Dikshitulu, AIR 1979 SC 193, 201 : (1979) 2 SCC 34. See also Gauhati High Court v. Kuladhar Phukan, (2002)4 SCC 524 : AIR 2002 SC 1589*; High Court of Judicature for Rajasthan v. P.P. Singh*, (2003) 4 SCC 239 : AIR 2003 SC 1029*; D. Ganesh Rao Patnaik v. State of Jharkhand*, (2005) 8 SCC 454 : AIR 2005 SC 4321; Parkash Singh Badal v. State of Punjab, (2007)1 SCC 1 : AIR 2007 SC 1274*; Anil Kumar Vitthal Shete v. State of Maharashtra*, (2006) 12 SCC 148 : AIR 2006 SC 2167.

Court. The Supreme Court cited the doctrine of separation of powers and the need for an independent judiciary to invalidate the regularization and promotion by the State Government.[40]

The power to transfer subordinate judges, including district judges, from one place to another,[41] power to promote persons from one post in the subordinate judiciary to another, and the power to confirm such promotions,[42] vest in the High Court and not the State Government,e.g., power to promote a munsiff to the post of a subordinate judge[43], or promotion of a subordinate judge to the selection grade post of subordinate judge, or his promotion from one post to another in the same judicial service.

Article 235 would not apply when one reaches the stage of giving promotion as a district or additional district sessions judge, and the power to give promotion would vest in the Governor after consultation with the High Court which means on its recommendation. However, giving of further promotion to district judges is the sole right of the High Court.[44]

The power of confirmation of district judges and below lies with the High Court and not the State Government. Accordingly, a rule vesting power of confirmation of district judges in the Governor (in consultation with a High Court) has been declared ultra vires the Constitution, for the power of confirmation vests in the High Court.[45] Under Art. 235, the High Court exercises disciplinary powers over the district and subordinate judges.[46] 'Control' under Art. 235 is control over the conduct and discipline of the judges. The control is vested in the High Court to secure the independence of the subordinate judiciary. Accordingly, the High Court can suspend a judge with a view to hold disciplinary inquiry.

An inquiry into the conduct of a member of the judiciary can be held by the High Court alone and by no other authority.[47]

The High Court can itself impose punishments over judicial officers, short of 'dismissal or removal' or 'reduction in rank'. These major punishments fall within the purview of the Governor under Art 311,[48] but even such an action can be taken only on the recommendation of the High Court made in exercise of the power of control vested in it. The advice of the High Court is binding on the Governor in this matter.[49] The Governor should not consult the Public Service

---

40. Gauhati High Court v. Kuladhar Phukan, (2002) 4 SCC 524 : AIR 2002 SC 1586.
41. State of Assam v. Ranga Mohammad, supra; Chandramouleshwer v. Patna High Court, supra.
42. State of Assam v. Sen, AIR 1972 SC 1028 : (1971) 2 SCC 889; State of Bihar v. Madan Mohan Prasad, AIR 1976 SC 404 : (1976) 1 SCC 529.
43. High Court, Calcutta v. Amal Kumar, AIR 1962 SC 1705 : (1963) 1 SCR 437.
44. Punjab & Haryana High Court v. State of Haryana, supra; State of Assam v. Kuseswar Saikia, AIR 1970 SC 1616 : (1969) 3 SCC 505.
45. Punjab & Haryana H.C. v. State of Haryana, ibid.
46. State of West Bengal v. N.N. Bagchi, supra, footnote 27; Baradakanta v. Registrar, Orissa High Court, AIR 1974 SC 710 : (1974) 1 SCC 374.
47. Punjab & Haryana High Court v. State of Haryana, AIR 1975 SC 613 : (1975) 1 SCC 843.
48. See, infra, Ch. XXXVI.
49. Baldev Raj v. Punjab & Haryana High Court, AIR 1976 SC 2490; B Mishra v. Orissa High Court, AIR 1976 SC 1899 : (1976) 3 SCC 327; State of Haryana v. Inder Prakash, AIR 1976 SC 1841; T. Lakshmi Narasimha Chari v. High Court of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1996 SC 2067 : (1996) 5 SCC 90.

Commission in respect of judicial officers.[50] In State of West Bengal v. Nripendra Nath Bagchi,[51] the Supreme Court set aside an order of dismissal of an officiating district and sessions judge passed by the Governor after consulting the State Public Service Commission but without consulting the High Court.

Compulsory retirement is not dismissal or removal or reduction in rank because the concerned person does not lose the terminal benefits earned by him. The power to recommend compulsory retirement of a district and subordinate judge belongs to the High Court and it is binding on the Governor.[52] Article 235 enables the High Court to assess the performance of any judicial officer at any time with a view to discipline the black sheep or weed out the deadwood. The constitutional power of the High Court cannot be circumscribed by any rule or order.[53]

As the Governor is the appointing authority, so he makes a formal order of compulsory retirement but only in accordance with the recommendation of the High Court. However formal the Governor's power to make such an order may be, such an order is essential for effectuation of the retirement of the concerned person.[54] When the State Government compulsorily retired a subordinate judge against the recommendation of the High Court to revert him, the government order was quashed.[55] The Supreme Court emphasized:

> "The control vested in the High Court is that if the High Court is of the opinion that a particular judicial officer is not fit to be retained in service the High Court will communicate that to the Governor because the Governor is the authority to dismiss, remove, reduce in rank or terminate the appointment. In such cases it is the contemplation in the Constitution that the Governor as the head of the State will act in harmony with the recommendation of the High Court. If the recommendation of the High Court is not held to be binding on the State consequences will be unfortunate. It is in public interest that the State will accept the recommendation of the High Court. The vesting of complete control over the subordinate judiciary in the High Court leads to this that the decision of the High Court in matters within its jurisdiction will bind the State. The Government will act on the recommendation of the High Court. That is the broad basis of Article 235."

While, in form, the High Court's recommendation is advisory, in substance and effect, it is well nigh peremptory. The recommendation of the High Court is binding on the Government. But the High Court cannot pass the order itself; it is only the recommending authority.[56]

In Art. 235, the word 'control' has been used in a comprehensive sense. The High Court exercises administrative, judicial and disciplinary control over the members of the judicial service in the State. It includes general superintendence

---

50. Baldev Raj, ibid.
For Public Service Commission, see, infra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. K.

51. AIR 1966 SC 447 : (1966) 1 SCR 771.

52. High Court of Punjab and Haryana v. State of Haryana, AIR 1967 SC 613 : (1975) 1 SCC 843; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Batuk Deo Pati Tripathi, 1978 Lab. IC 839; Chief Justice, State of Andhra Pradesh v. L.V.A. Dikshitulu, AIR 1979 SC 193 : (1979) 2 SCC 34. Nawal Singh v. State of U.P, (2003) 8 SCC 117 : AIR 2003 SC 4303; Chandra Singhd v. State of Rajasthan, (2003) 6 SCC 545, 562 : AIR 2003 SC 2889.

53. Chandra Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (2003) 6 SCC 545 : AIR 2003 SC 2889.

54. Registrar, High Court of Madras v. R. Rajiah, AIR 1988 SC 1388 : (1988) 3 SCC 211.

55. State of Haryana v. Inder Prakash Anand, (1976) 2 SCC 977 : AIR 1976 SC 1841.

56. Registrar (Adm.), High Court of Orissa v. Sisir Kanta Satapathy, AIR 1999 SC 3265 : (1999) 7 SCC 725.

of the working of subordinate courts, disciplinary control over judges and recommending the imposition of punishment of dismissal, removal, reduction in rank and compulsory retirement. This Constitutional power of the High Court cannot be circumscribed by any rule or order[57] 'Control' would also include suspension of a judge for purposes of holding a disciplinary inquiry and also transfer, confirmation and promotion.[58]

The disciplinary control which the High Court exercises over the subordinate judiciary is a very sensitive and delicate function. The Supreme Court has cautioned that in exercising its disciplinary powers over the subordinate judiciary, the High Court is to act with fairness and in a non-arbitrary manner. While, on the one hand, it is imperative on the High Court to protect honest judges, on the other hand, it cannot ignore any dishonest performance by any subordinate judge. As the Supreme Court has emphasized, judicial service is not merely an employment nor the judges merely employees. "They are holders of public offices of great trust and responsibility." "Dishonest judicial personage is an oxymoron".[59]

There have been several occasions when the Supreme Court has quashed the action taken by the High Courts against subordinate judges because of one infirmity or another.[60] For example, in R.C. Sood,[61] the Supreme Court has characterised the action of the High as lacking in bona fides. The Court has observed: "The High Court acted in the manner which can only be termed as arbitrary and unwarranted, to say the least".[62]

The High Court of Madhya Pradesh recommended compulsory retirement of a sessions judge and the State Government passed the necessary order. But the Supreme Court quashed the High Court's recommendation (as well as the government order) because the High Court had not taken into consideration all the relevant material in reaching its decision.[63]

Similarly, in Madan Mohan Choudhary v. State of Bihar[64] the Supreme Court quashed the recommendation made by the High Court to compulsorily retire a district judge as it was a case where there was no material on the basis of which an opinion could have been reasonably formed that it would be in the public interest to retire the district judge from service prematurely. If there is some material before the High Court against a member of the judicial service, and on the basis of this material the High Court takes the view that he be compulsorily re-

---

57. Chandra Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (2003) 6 SCC 545, 562 : AIR 2003 SC 2889.

58. State of Rajasthan v. Ramesh Chand Paliwal, AIR 1998 SC 1079 : (1998) 3 SCC 72. See also Gauhati High Court v. Kuladhar Phukan, (2002) 4 SCC 524 : AIR 2002 SC 1589.

59. High Court of Judicature at Bombay v. Shashikant S. Patil, AIR 2000 SC 22, at 27 : (2000) 1 SCC 416.

Also, High Court of Judicature at Bombay v. Shirishkumar Rangrao Patil, AIR 1997 SC 2631 : (1997) 6 SCC 339; Ramesh Chandra Singh v. High Court of Allahabad, (2007) 4 SCC 247 : (2007) 4 JT 135.

60. R.C. Sood v. State of Rajashtan, 1995 AIR SCW 198 : 1994 Supp (3) SCC 711; Yoginath D. Bagde v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1999 SC 3734 : (1999) 7 SCC 739; High Court of Judicature at Allahabad v. Sarnam Singh, AIR 2000 SC 2150 : (2000) 2 SCC 339.

61. R.C. Sood v. High Court of Judicature at Rajasthan, AIR 1999 SC 707 : (1998) 5 SCC 493.

62. Ibid., at 716.

63. Brij Behari Lal v. High Court of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 594 : (1981) 1 SCC 490.

64. AIR 1999 SC 1018 : (1999) 3 SCC 396.

tired, "the adequacy or sufficiency of such materials cannot be questioned, unless the materials are absolutely irrelevant for the purpose of compulsory retirement."

An order of compulsory retirement was also quashed in Rajiah[65] as there was no material before the High Court to justify such a decision.

Under Art. 235, the Governor can pass an order of premature retirement only on the recommendation of the High Court. The Supreme Court has emphasized that it is for the High Court, on the basis of assessment of performance and all other aspects germane to the matter, to come to the conclusion whether any particular judge is to be prematurely retired. The conclusion has to be of the High Court since the control vests therein. The recommendation of the High Court should precede the Governor's order.

The initiative to retire a subordinate judge rests with the High Court and not with the government. If the government has any material having a bearing on the conduct of a subordinate judge, it can bring the same to the notice of the High Court, but the ultimate decision in the matter rests with the High Court. The recommendation of the High Court is binding on the government.[66]

In Nripendra,[67] the State Government passed an order dismissing a district judge after consulting the State Public Service Commission but not the High Court. The Supreme Court quashed the order.

As stated above, under Art. 235, "total and absolute" control over subordinate judiciary is vested in the full High Court. All the High Court Judges collectively and individually share that responsibility. But the full Court can pass a resolution and delegate its power to a committee of Judges. If so, the committee can then act on behalf of the Court without making any reference to it. The decision of the committee is then regarded as the decision of the Court itself.[68]

The full Bombay High Court passed a resolution constituting a disciplinary committee of five Judges for taking disciplinary action against subordinate judges. The Supreme Court ruled that the committee was competent to take procedural steps from appointment of enquiry officer, framing of charges and to recommend to the Government imposition of penalty of dismissal. There was no further necessity to refer the matter again to the full Court. The concurrence of the full Court is not necessary in such a situation.[69]

According to the rules made by the Allahabad High Court, the Administrative Committee could act for, and on behalf of, the Court, and, therefore, the Administrative Committee could recommend to the Governor to pass an order of compulsory retirement in respect of a district judge or a subordinate judicial officer. In the instant case,[70] an order was passed by the State Government for premature

---

65. Rajiah, supra, footnote 54.
66. Registrar (Administration), High Court of Orissa, Cuttack v. Sisir Kumar Satapathy, AIR 1999 SC 3265 : (1999) 7 SCC 725.
67. State of West Bengal v. Nripendra Nath Bagchi, AIR 1966 SC 447 : (1966) 1 SCR 771.
68. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Batuk Deo Pati Tripathi, 1978 Lab IC 839: (1978) 2 SCC 102; See also High Court of Judicature for Rajasthan v. P.P. Singh, (2003) 4 SCC 239 : AIR 2003 SC 1029.
69. High Court of Judicature at Bombay v. Shirish Kumar R. Patil, AIR 1997 SC 2631 : (1997) 6 SCC 339; Yoginath D. Bagde v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1999 SC 3734 : (1999) 7 SCC 739.
70. Tej Pal Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1986 SC 1814 : (1986) 3 SCC 604.

retirement of an additional district and sessions judge on the basis of the recommendation of the Administrative Judge. The Administrative Judge gave his opinion in favour of premature retirement of the concerned judge without consulting his other colleagues in the Administrative Committee. The Committee came to know of the order only after it had been passed by the Governor when it approved the recommendation of the Administrative Judge. The Supreme Court quashed the order as null and void on the ground that the government had passed the same without the recommendation of the full Court or its Administrative Committee. The Administrative Judge alone could not have so acted; he had no such power and his own agreement to the proposal of compulsory retirement would be of no consequence. His satisfaction could not be regarded as the satisfaction of the Court for purposes of Art. 235 of the Constitution. The approval was given by the Administrative Committee ex post facto and this did not validate the order. According to the Court : "The deviation in this case is not mere irregularity which can be cured by the ex post facto approval given by the Administrative Committee to the action of the Governor after the order of premature retirement had been passed. The error committed in this case amounts to an incurable defect amounting to an illegality."[71]

The Supreme Court has ruled that the decisions regarding confirmation, promotion, supersession of subordinate judges, ought to be taken at full Court meetings, and not by the Chief Justice alone. Every High Court Judge is expected to contribute to the discussion and participate in the decisions arrived at. This mode of dealing with the confirmation, promotions and supersessions of subordinate Judges is a sure safeguard against arbitrary or motivated decisions. This case is interesting because here the order of the High Court passed on its administrative side was quashed by a Division Bench of the Court. The High Court appealed to the Supreme Court against the decision of the Division Bench. The dispute was regarding the date of confirmation of a civil Judge. The Supreme Court quashed the decision of the Division Bench and restored the decision of the High Court.[72]

The Supreme Court has clarified in the instant case that the decision as to disciplinary action of a subordinate judge is taken by the High Court on the Administrative side of the High Court; this decision can be challenged through a writ petition under Art. 226 on the judicial side of the High Court. The petitioner can make the High Court a party to the writ proceedings as it is the High Court order which is being challenged. If the writ petition is decided by the Division Bench against the High Court, and its administrative order is set aside, it will then be an aggrieved party and, as such, it can appeal to the Supreme Court under Art. 136.

The Supreme Court has emphasized in Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab,[73] that under Art. 235 the High Court is invested with control over the subordinate judiciary. The members of the subordinate judiciary are not only under the control, but also under the care and custody, of the High Court. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has emphasized that enquiries against subordinate judges should be held by the High Court through judicial officers subject to its control and it should not leave this task to the government. To do so will be an act of self-

---

71. Ibid., at 1821.

72. High Court of Madhya Pradesh v. Mahesh Prakash, AIR 1994 SC 2595 : (1995) 1 SCC 203. Also see, Tejpal Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, supra, footnote 70; Yoginath, infra, footnote 75.

73. AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831; see, Ch. III, supra.

abnegation on the part of the High Court. "The members of the subordinate judiciary look up to the High Court not only for discipline but also for dignity".

Any inquiry against a judicial officer must be conducted according to natural justice.[74] An order of the High Court dismissing a subordinate judge was quashed by the Supreme Court because the High Court failed to act according to natural justice. The concerned judge was not given a hearing by the High Court.[75]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that as the appointing authority the Governor has to pass the ultimate order imposing punishment on a member of subordinate judiciary, he cannot take any action without, or contrary to, the recommendation of the High Court. After the High Court comes to the conclusion that some action by way of imposition of punishment needs to be taken against a member of the subordinate judiciary, the Court makes a recommendation to the Governor and he passes the order accordingly.[76] "The test of control is not the passing of the order against a member of the subordinate judicial service, but the decision to take such action".

The Supreme Court has pointed out that disciplinary action against a government employee has two parts—(1) a decision has to be taken if any disciplinary action is to be taken; (ii) this decision is then carried out by a formal order. The control of the High Court over subordinate judiciary relates to the first stage. The second stage comes after the High Court decision to take disciplinary action. The High Court makes a recommendation to the Governor who then issues a formal order in accordance with the High Court recommendation. The recommendation of the High Court is binding on the Governor, but the High Court itself cannot issue the formal order. While the High Court has disciplinary control over the subordinate judiciary, including the power to initiate disciplinary proceedings, suspend them pending inquiries and impose punishments on them, but when it comes to the question of dismissal, removal, reduction in rank or termination of service of a judicial officer on any count whatsoever, the High Court acts as a recommendatory authority and cannot itself pass such an order.

At times, while disposing of appeals from lower courts, the High Court Judges make adverse remarks on the performance of the judges in the lower courts. Such remarks may affect the reputation and career of such judges. In this connection, the Supreme Court has advised caution and restraint on the part of the High Court Judges in making adverse comments on the judges of the lower courts. The aggrieved judge may move the Supreme Court to expunge the adverse remarks against him because he has no other remedy in law to vindicate his position. In quite a few cases, the Supreme Court has expunged such adverse remarks.[77]

---

74. State of Andhra Pradesh v. S.N. Nizamuddin, AIR 1976 SC 1964 : (1976) 4 SCC 745; State of Gujarat v. Ramesh Chandra Mashruwala, AIR 1977 SC 1619 : (1977) 2 SCC 12.

75. Yoginath D. Bagde v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1999 SC 3734, 3477 : (1999) 7 SCC 739.

76. The Registrar, High Court of Madras v. R. Rajiah, AIR 1988 SC 1388 : (1988) 3 SCC 211; Registrar (Admn.), High Court of Orissa v. Sisir Kanta Satapathy, AIR 1999 SC 3265 : (1999) 1 SCC 725.

77. Ishwari Prasad Mishra v. Mohd. Isa, AIR 1963 SC 1728 : (1963) 3 SCR 722; K.P. Tiwari v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1994 SC 1031; Kashi Nath Roy v. State of Bihar, 1996 AIR SCW 2098 : (1996) 4 SCC 539; Brij Kishore Thakur v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 1157; In the matter of : 'K'— a Judicial Officer, AIR 2001 SC 972 : (2001) 3 SCC 54; In the matter of R. v. A Judicial Officer, (2007) 7 SCC 729 : (2007) 9 JT 1.

Posting of judicial officers to administrative posts can be with the consent of the High Court and for such time as it agrees.[78] The practice of appointing judicial officers to administrative posts is not sound as it dilutes the principle of separation of the judiciary from the executive. The fact that a post in the Secretariat is in the line of promotion of a judicial officer may offer temptations from which a judge should be immune. Therefore, the principle that a judicial officer can be seconded to an administrative post only for such time as the High Court may permit is salutary to the extent it goes but the better thing will be to stop this practice altogether so that the judiciary may be immunized from any temptation whatsoever.

In B.S. Yadav v. State of Haryana,[79] the Supreme Court has ruled that the power to make the law regulating conditions of service of the judicial officers of the State vests in the Legislature under Art. 309, and, until it acts, the Governor can make rules for the purpose.[80] The Supreme Court has suggested that the High Court may be consulted while framing or amending the rules though it is not mandatory under Art. 309.

These rules must be of general application and they must not interfere with the powers of the High Court. Thus, while the Governor can formulate the rules of seniority of the district and sessions judges, the application of the rules to individual cases must be left to the High Court. Similarly, though rules can provide for a period of probation, the question whether a particular judicial officer has satisfactorily completed his probation or not is a matter lying exclusively in the domain of the High Court.

In Beena Tiwari v. State of Madhya Pradesh,[81] the Supreme Court has reiterated that the question of confirmation of a member of subordinate Judicial Service is absolutely the concern of the High Court as the matter squarely falls within Art. 235. No rule framed by the State Government can interfere with the control vested in the High Court under Art. 235. Rules made by the Government are to be read subject to, and in harmony with, the control vested in the High Court under Art. 235.[82]

The Supreme Court has suggested that in exercise of its control function, the High Court should devise a proper and uniform system of inspection of the courts subordinate to it. The Supreme Court has emphasized that such inspection is of vital importance as it helps these courts to give the best results. But the inspection should not be casual but both effective and productive.[83]

In K.K. Dhawan's case,[84] the Supreme Court has indicated the basis on which disciplinary action can be initiated against subordinate Judges, viz. :

---

78. State of Orissa v. Sudhansu Sekhar, AIR 1968 SC 647 : (1968) 2 SCR 154.
79. AIR 1981 SC 561 : 1980 Supp SCC 524.
80. For discussion on Art. 309, see, infra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. B.
81. AIR 1988 SC 488 : 1988 Supp SCC 213.
82. The Registrar, High Court of Madras v. R. Rajiah, AIR 1988 SC 1388 : (1988) 3 SCC 211.
83. High Court of Punjab and Haryana v. Ishwarchand Jain, AIR 1999 SC 1677 : (1999) 4 SCC 579.
Also, High Court of Judicature at Allahabad v. Sarnam Singh, AIR 2000 SC 2150 : (2000) 2 SCC 339.
84. Union of India v. K.K. Dhawan, AIR 1993 SC 1478 : (1993) 2 SCC 56.
Also see, Union of India v. A.N. Saxena, AIR 1992 SC 1333; Ishwar Chand Jain v. High Court of Punjab and Haryana, AIR 1988 SC 1395 : (1988) 3 SCC 370.

(1) Where the judicial officer has conducted in a manner as would reflect on his reputation or integrity or good faith or devotion to duty;

(2) that there is prima facie material to show recklessness or misconduct in the discharge of his duty;

(3) that he has acted negligently or that he omitted the prescribed conditions which are essential for the exercise of the statutory powers;

(4) that he had acted to unduly favour a party;

(5) that he had been actuated by corrupt motive.

The Supreme Court has clarified that there is possibility on a given set of facts to arrive at a different conclusion. This cannot be a ground "to indict a judicial officer for taking one view" and to infer misconduct for that reason alone. Merely because the order passed by a judicial officer is wrong or that the action taken could have been different would not warrant initiation of disciplinary proceedings. According to the Supreme Court, unless there are strong grounds to suspect the officer's bonafides and that the order has been actuated by malice, bias or illegality, disciplinary proceedings against the officer would affect the morale of the subordinate judiciary and no officer would be able to exercise power freely and independently.[85]

In P.C. Joshi v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[86] the Supreme Court quashed an order of dismissal passed on a judicial officer by the High Court of Allahabad because there was no material to prove that there was any "mala fide or extraneous reasons" on the part of the judge to pass the order. Merely because some orders passed by the judge are wrong, it does not warrant initiation of disciplinary proceedings against the judge.

The Court has observed in Joshi:[87]

> "If in every case where an order of a subordinate Court is found to be faulty a disciplinary action were to be initiated, the confidence of the subordinate judiciary will be shaken and the officers will be in constant fear of writing a judgment so as not to face a disciplinary enquiry and thus judicial officers cannot act independently or fearlessly."

The "control" under Art. 235 extends to ministerial officers and servants on the establishment of the subordinate courts as well.[88]

(f) CRIMINAL JUDICIARY

Ordinarily the magistracy is under the control of the State Executive and is not covered by the constitutional provisions above-mentioned. However, separation of the judiciary from the executive being an accepted policy objective,[89] Art. 237 gives power to the State Executive to direct, by a public-notification, that any of the above-mentioned constitutional provisions relating to persons in the State Judicial Service [Arts. 233-235] will apply to any class of magistrates in the State with such exceptions and modifications as it may deem fit. This Article thus

---

85. Ramesh Chander Singh v. High Court of Allahabad, (2007) 4 SCC 247 : (2007) 4 JT 135.
86. AIR 2001 SC 2788 : 2001 SCC (L&S) 984.
87. Ibid, at 2789.
88. R.M. Gurjar v.High Court of Gujarat, AIR 1992 SC 2000 : (1992) 4 SCC 10.
89. Directive Principle 50, see, infra, Ch. XXXIV on "Directive Principles".

makes a flexible arrangement and enables a State to take measures progressively to secure the control of the High Court over the magistracy as well.

Explaining the purport of Art. 237, the Supreme Court has observed:[90]

> "Art. 237 enables the Governor to implement the separation of the judiciary from the executive. Under this Article, the Governor may notify that Arts. 233, 234, 235 and 236 of the Constitution will apply to magistrates subject to certain modifications or exceptions, for instance, if the Governor so notifies, the said magistrates will become members of the judicial service; they will have to be appointed in the manner prescribed in Art. 234; they will be under the control of the High Court under Art. 235 and they can be appointed as District Judges by the Governor under Art. 233(1). To state it differently, they will then be integrated in the judicial service... Indeed, Art. 237 emphasizes the fact that till such an integration is brought about, the magistrates are outside the scope of the said provisions. The said view accords with the constitutional theme of independent judiciary..."

Reference may be made to one serious problem existing in the area of criminal justice, viz., delayed justice. It usually takes long to complete a criminal trial.

The Supreme Court has interpreted Art 21 to include the right to a speedy trial.[91] Nevertheless, the Court has refused to set a maximum time-limit within which a criminal trial must be completed. The question is far too complex to impose a rigid maximum time-limit for all criminal trials to complete. Each case needs to be decided on its own facts whether there has been undue delay and the trial needs to be quashed.

The Court has however reminded the State that it is its constitutional obligation to dispense speedy justice, more so in the field of criminal law.[92]

(g) IMPROVEMENT OF SUBORDINATE JUDICIARY

The Supreme Court has constantly endeavoured to secure the betterment of the conditions of service of the members of the subordinate judiciary.

In 1992, in All-India Judges' Association v. Union of India[93] the Supreme Court considered a writ-petition under Art. 32[94] filed by the All-India Judges' Association seeking directions for setting up of an All-India Judicial Service and for bringing about uniform conditions of service for members of the subordinate judiciary throughout the country. The Court referred to what the Law Commission had said in its XIV Report in the year 1958 on the question of setting up of an All-India Judicial Service and observed:

> "There is considerable force and merit in the view expressed by the Law Commission. An All-India Judicial Service essentially for manning the higher services in the subordinate judiciary is very much necessary. The reasons advanced by the Law Commission for recommending the setting up of an All-India Judicial Service appeal to us."

---

90. Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1966 SC 1987 : (1967) 1 SCR 77.
91. See, Ch. XXVI, infra, for discussion on this question.
92. P. Ramachandra Rao v. State of Karnataka, (2002) 4 SCC 578, 604 : AIR 2002 SC 1856. Also see, Ch. XXXIV, on Directive Principles of State Policy.
93. AIR 1992 SC 165 : (1992) 1 SCC 119.
94. For discussion on Art. 32, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A.

The Court has thus directed the Central Government and other authorities concerned to take appropriate steps to set up an All-India Judicial Service, and bring about uniformity in the designation of judicial officers. This requires action being taken under Art. 312.[1]

In addition, the Supreme Court also directed various improvements being effectuated in the conditions of service of the subordinate judiciary, e.g., raising the retirement age to 60 years, examination of the pay structure of judicial officers, provisions of allowance for purchase of law books and journals for a residential library for every judicial officer, provision of residential accommodation, etc.

Justifying the higher retirement age for judicial officers than executive officers, the Court has said that the work of a judge involves more of a mental activity than physical. In case of a judge "experience is an indispensable factor and subject to the basic physical fitness with growing age experience grows".

On the question of pay scales for judiciary, the Court had said that "the judiciary compares unfavourably with the executive branches of the Government". This opinion was subsequently modified.[2]

On the need for a library allowance for subordinate judiciary, the Supreme Court justified it by saying: "Law books, Law reports and legal journals are indispensable to a judicial officer. They are in fact his tools".

The Court also observed: "Provision of an official residence for every judicial officer should be made mandatory".

The Court emphasized that "dispensation of justice is an inevitable feature in any civilized society". The Court also pointed out that income from Court-fees is more than the expenditure on the administration of justice.[3] The Court, therefore, suggested that "what is collected as Court-fees at least be spent on the administration of justice instead of being utilised as a source of general revenue of the State". The Court has also suggested that provision must be made for in-service training of judicial officers.

Petitions for review of the above decision were filed by several State Governments and the Central Government. They raised several objections to the directions given by the Supreme Court in the above case. The main objections on their behalf were—(1) It falls within the exclusive purview of each State to regulate service conditions for subordinate judiciary. When the Supreme Court gives directions for this purpose, it encroaches upon the State power; (2) Implementation of the directions given by the Supreme Court would impose a heavy financial burden on the States.

After considering these objections, the Court rejected the same and reiterated its earlier directions in All-India Judges Association v. Union of India (II).[4] The Court asserted that it made the recommendations to improve the system of justice and thereby to improve the content and quality of justice administered by the courts.

---

1. For this provision, see, Ch. XIII, Sec. G, infra.
2. All India Judges Assn.v. Union of India (III), (2002) 4 SCC 247, 266-267 : AIR 2002 SC 1752. See further infra.
3. For discussion on Court fees, see, infra, Ch. XI, Sec. H.
4. AIR 1993 SC 2493 : (1993) 4 SCC 288.

Commenting on the various objections raised by the various governments to the directions issued by the Court to improve the working conditions for subordinate judiciary, the Court stated that this was because of lack of realization that judicial service is different from executive service. In this connection, the Court has stated:

> "The judicial service is not service in the sense of 'employment'. The judges are not employees. As members of the judiciary they exercise the sovereign judicial power of the state".

The Supreme Court had prescribed the qualification of minimum of three years' legal practice for recruitment in the lowest rung of judicial office,[5] justifying such a qualification, saying:

> "Considering the fact that from the first day of his assuming office, the judge has to decide, among others, questions of life, liberty, property and reputation of the litigants, to induct graduates fresh from the Universities to occupy seats of such vital powers is neither prudent nor desirable".

Nevertheless, this requirement was done away with in the subsequent decision of the Supreme Court in All India Judges' Assocn.(III) in 2002.[6]

The Court also recommended that the service conditions of the judicial officers should be laid and reviewed from time to time by an independent commission exclusively constituted for the purpose. The judiciary should be adequately represented in the composition of the commission.[7]

Pursuant to the directions of the Supreme Court, the Central Government constituted the First National Judicial Pay Commission under the Chairmanship of Justice K.J.Shetty. The Commission submitted its Report in 1999 making various recommendations relating to the betterment of the service conditions of the subordinate judiciary, including a revision of pay scales. This led to the filing of the third writ petition before the Supreme Court by the All India Judges' Association for enforcement of the recommendations.[8] On the basis of the Shetty Report, the Supreme Court revised its earlier views regarding parity of pay scales between the Administrative Service and the Judiciary[9] and the requirement of an advocate to have experience of three years as a criteria for eligibility to enter the judicial service[10]. In addition directions were issued regarding recruitment to the Higher Judicial Service, accommodation and other allowances[11].

The highlight of the Court's pronouncement in the second All India Judges Association case is that the Court has distinguished judicial service from executive service and put the former on a higher pedestal than the latter. The Court has emphasized that "the Judicial service is not service in the sense of 'employment'. "The Judges are not employees. As members of the judiciary, they exercise the sovereign judicial power of the State". The Court has observed further on this point.[12]

---

5. AIR 1993 SC 2493 : (1993) 4 SCC 288.
6. (2002) SCC 247, 272 (Para 32) : AIR 2002 SC 1752; see also infra.
7. Also see, State of Rajasthan v. Rajasthan Judicial Service Officers' Association, (1999) 5 SCC 675 : AIR 1999 SC 1965.
8. All India Judges' Assocn v. Union of India (III), (2002) 4 SCC 247 : AIR 2002 SC 1752.
9. Ibid, p. 267
10. Ibid, p. 272
11. Ibid, pp. 270, 273.
12. AIR 1993 SC at 2502.

> "The Judges, at whatever level they may be, represent the State and its authority unlike the administrative executive or the members of other services. The members of the other services, therefore, cannot be placed on par with the members of the judiciary, either constitutionally or functionally."

The Court has put great emphasis on judicial independence and, in the opinion of the Court, this cannot be secured if the judges are kept in want of their essential accoutrements. The Court has emphasized that judicial independence cannot be secured by making mere solemn proclamations about it. It has to be secured both in substance and in practice. "It is trite to say that those who are in want cannot be free. Self-reliance is the foundation of independence". The society has a stake in ensuring the independence of the judiciary, and "no price is too heavy to secure it."[13]

In All-India Judges Ass. v. Union of India (III),[14] the Supreme Court considered such questions pertaining to district and subordinate judges as pay scales, sufficiency of judicial strength, qualifications and recruitment of judges. The Court gave suitable directions as regards these matters.

The Court has also answered the objection that by making the directions, the Court was encroaching upon the powers of the State conferred by Art. 309.[15] The Court has observed in this connection:[16]

> "But the mere fact that Art. 309 gives power to the executive and the legislature to prescribe the service conditions of the judiciary does not mean that the judiciary should have no say in the matter. It would be against the spirit of the Constitution to deny any role to the judiciary in that behalf, for theoretically it would not be impossible for the executive or the legislature to turn and twist the tail of the judiciary by using the said power. Such a consequence would be against one of the seminal mandates of the Constitution, namely, to maintain the independence of the judiciary".

Because of these reasons, the Supreme Court has reiterated what it said in its 1992 judgment for effectuating various improvements in the service conditions of the district and subordinate judges. The Court has however modified somewhat its direction to raise the age of retirement to 60 years. The benefit of this extension in retiring age would not accrue automatically to all judicial officers irrespective of their past record of service and evidence of their continued utility to the judicial system in future. The benefit would be available only to those whom the High Court thought "have a potential for continued useful service".

In subsequent, pronouncements, the Supreme Court has reiterated some of the abovementioned directions. For example, in All India Judges' Association v. Union of India,[17] the Court has ruled again that the "qualification of legal practice for a minimum three years is a must for recruitment in the lowest rung of judicial office." A State can however make rules prescribing a higher qualification, e.g., five years standing at the Bar.

When a State makes rules enhancing the age of retirement of judicial officers to 60 years, the direction issued by the Court on this point ceases to operate. The

---

13. Ibid.
14. (2002) 4 SCC 247.
15. For Art. 309. see, infra, Ch. XXXVI.
16. AIR 1993 SC at 2503.
17. AIR 1994 SC 2771 : (1994) 6 SCC 314.

enhancement in the age of retirement of judicial officers comes into operation by virtue of the rules. This means that the rider put by the Court concerning review of the work of a judicial officer before extending his age of retirement to 60 years also comes to an end.[18]

In the case noted below,[19] the Supreme Court has called upon the High Courts to furnish a detailed status report of the compliance of its orders made by it in the above two cases.

(h) FAST TRACK COURTS

The Supreme Court has been insisting from time to time that adequate number of judges be appointed in the subordinate courts to cope with the large number of cases filed in these courts. "Justice delayed is justice denied." The Court has emphasized in Judges (iii):[20] "an independent and efficient judicial system is one of the basic structures of our constitution. If sufficient number of Judges are not appointed, justice would not be available to the people, thereby undermining the basic structure."

To deal with the long standing problem of backlog of cases pending for long, the Central Government put into force a scheme of setting up fast track courts in the States. In Brij Mohan Lal v. Union of India,[21] while commending the scheme, the Supreme Court issued certain directions, consistent with Arts. 233 and 234, discussed above, with a view to ensure the independence and efficiency of these courts.

(i) FAMILY COURTS

Family Courts set up under the Family Courts Act, 1984 are subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of the High Court under Article 235. Although the State Government has the power to create and shift a family Court from one place to another, the High Court has a say in the matter and can make its recommendations for the shifting having regard to its control over sub-ordinate courts on its administrative side. In M.P.Gangadharan v. State of Kerala[22] the Supreme Court said that while constituting a family Court the State must provide adequate infrastructure so as to meet the objects for which family courts are established.

(j) RESERVATION OF JUDICIAL POSTS FOR BACKWARD CLASSES

The Supreme Court has made a very momentous pronouncement in State of Bihar v. Bal Mukand Sah[23] settling a very significant problem having an abiding impact on the integrity and independence of the subordinate judiciary.

In Bal Mukand, the Court considered the question: Can a State Legislature enact a law to reserve posts in the subordinate judiciary for Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and other backward classes?

The question arose in the following factual context.

---

18. Rajat Baran Ray v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1999 SC 1661 : (1999) 4 SCC 235.
19. All India Judges Association v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 1555.
20. Ibid.
21. (2002) 5 SCC 1 : AIR 2002 SC 2096.
22. (2006) 6 SCC 162 : AIR 2006 SC 2360.
23. AIR 2000 SC 1296 : (2000) 4 SCC 640.

The Bihar Legislature enacted the Bihar Reservation of Vacancies in Posts and Services (for Schedule Castes, Scheduled Tribes and other Backward Classes Act (1991). The Act reserved 50% posts for Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and other Backward Classes in Government services. The question for the consideration of the Supreme Court in Bal Mukund Sah was whether this Act could be applied to the recruitment of district judges [Art. 233(2)] and to direct recruitment at grass root level of the subordinate judiciary in the State [Art. 234]. The Court answered in the negative.

The Court has argued that Arts. 233-235 make special provisions for appointment to the posts of district and subordinate judges. These Articles constitute a complete code.

First, as to recruitment of district judges. The Court has argued that Art. 233 dealing with appointment of district judges, on its own express terminology, projects a complete scheme regarding appointment of persons to the posts of district judges. Art. 233 is not made subject to any law passed by the State Legislature. So far as direct recruitment to the posts of district judges is concerned, Art. 233(2) leaves no doubt that unless a candidate is recommended by the High Court, the Governor cannot appoint him as a district judge.[24]

As regards the appointment of judicial officers other than district judges, a complete scheme is provided by Art. 234. Under Art. 234, Governor makes rules in consultation with the High Court. Art. 234 is not made subject to the laws made by the State Legislature. This means that the State Legislature cannot make any law regulating the appointment of subordinate judges.[25]

Under Art. 309, rules can be made for regulating conditions of service of these judges. The State Legislature can make a law under Art. 309 for similar purposes. But Art. 309 is expressly made subject to other provisions of the Constitution and rules concerning appointment of the subordinate judiciary can only be made under Art. 234 which is beyond legislative interference. The field of recruitment to the judicial service is carved out of Art. 309 by Art. 234.[26]

Similarly, Art. 245[27] is made subject to other provisions of the Constitution which would include Arts. 233 and 234. As these twin articles cover the entire field regarding recruitment and appointment of district judges and subordinate judges at base level pro tanto, the legislative power of the State Legislature to operate in this field clearly gets excluded by the constitutional scheme itself.

Both Arts. 245 and 309 have to be read subject to Arts. 233 and 234. If any reservation of judicial posts is to be made, it can be done only through rules made under Arts. 233 and 234 after consultation with the High Court. The Legislature cannot by-pass the High Court and enact a law making reservation in judicial appointments for district judges and subordinate judiciary. No law can be made to interfere with the process of recruitment and appointment to the district judiciary without consultation with the High Court.

---

24. For Art. 233, see, this Chapter Sec. G(b), supra.
25. For Art. 234, see, Sec. G(c), supra.
26. For Art. 309, see, infra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. B.
27. See, infra, Ch. X, Secs. A and B.

The Court linked the process of appointment of these judges with independence of the judiciary which is one of the basic features of the Constitution. It is with a view to fructify the independence of judiciary that Arts. 233 and 234 insulate the process of recruitment and appointment of these judges from outside legislative interference. Arts. 233 and 234 constitute a complete code for the purpose.

Referring to Indra Sawhney;[28] the Supreme Court has stated that even if under Art. 16(4),[29] the State proposes to provide reservation on the ground of inadequate representation of certain backward classes in services "if it is considered by the appropriate authority that such reservation will adversely affect the efficiency of the administration, then exercise under Art. 16(4) is not permissible".[30] The matter whether efficiency will be affected in the judicial administration if reservation is made, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the High Court which has to be consulted in this regard.

Therefore, no law can be made under Art. 16(4) concerning judicial service without consultations with the High Court. No law can therefore be made to interfere with the process of recruitment and appointment to the district judiciary without consultation with the High Court as this is essential "for fructifying the constitutional mandate of preserving the independence of judiciary which is its basic structure".[31] The Supreme Court has declared: "Judicial independence is the very essence and basic structure of the Constitution".[32]

The Ex-servicemen (Reservation of Vacancies in the H.P. Judicial Service) Rules, 1981, framed by the Governor, without consultation with the High Court, as required by Art. 234, have been held to be invalid by the Supreme Court in A.C. Thalwal v. High Court of Himachal Pradesh.[33] The Supreme Court has insisted that consultation with the High Court is mandatory and consultation must be effective and meaningful and not merely formal. The constitutional scheme seeks to attain an independent judiciary which is the bulwork of democracy.

(k) CONTEMPT OF SUBORDINATE JUDICIARY

As already stated,[34] a High Court is a Court of record under Art. 215 and has power to punish for its own contempt. Under Art. 227, a High Court has power of superintendence over all courts and tribunals throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction.

Interpreting Ss. 10, 14 and 15 of the Contempt of Courts Act, 1971, the Supreme Court has ruled in S.K. Sarkar, member, Board of Revenue, State of U.P. v. Vinay Chandra[35], that the High Court can take cognizance of criminal contempt of a subordinate Court suo motu on its own motion on the basis of information received by it. The Court has also ruled that the phrase "courts subordinate to it" used in S. 10 is wide enough to include all courts which are judicially

28. Infra, Ch. XXIII
29. Infra, Ch. XXIII.
30. See, infra, Ch. XXXV.
31. For discussion on this doctrine, see, infra, Ch. XLI
32. See, High Court of Orissa, Cuttack v. Sisir Kanta Satapathy, AIR 1999 SC 3265 : (1999) 7 SCC 725.
33. AIR 2000 SC 2732 : (2000) 7 SCC 1.
34. Supra, this Chapter, Sec. C(i).
35. AIR 1981 SC 723.

subordinate to the High Court, even though administrative control over them under Art. 235 does not vest in the High Court. Therefore, the Board of Revenue is a Court subordinate to the High Court within the contemplation of S. 10.

Under Art. 129, the Supreme Court has been declared a Court of record and can punish for its own contempt.[36] The Supreme Court has made a very creative use of Art. 129 to protect the honour and integrity of the lower courts. In Delhi Judicial Service Association v. Gujarat,[37] the Supreme Court has given a broad and liberal interpretation to its contempt power. The Court has ruled that under Art. 129, it has power to punish not for its own contempt but even that of the High Courts and the lower courts.[38] Explaining the reasons for taking such a liberal view of its own contempt power, the Court has observed:

> "The subordinate courts administer justice at the grass roots level. Their protection is necessary to preserve the confidence of people in the efficacy of courts and to ensure unsullied flow of justice at its base level."

The Court has emphasized that as it has the power of judicial superintendence and control over all the courts and tribunals. Correspondingly it has a duty to protect and safeguard the inferior courts so as to keep the flow of justice. The subordinate courts do not have adequate power under the law to protect themselves and, therefore, it is necessary that the Supreme Court should protect them.

In the instant case, police had misbehaved with a magistrate in a State. The Supreme Court took a very serious view of the misbehaviour by the police officers, initiated contempt proceedings against these officers and awarded them suitable punishments.

This is a pronouncement of great significance. This ruling will go a long way towards maintaining the integrity and independence of the subordinate judiciary. The Supreme Court has now taken them all under its own protective umbrella.[39]

The Supreme Court has again reiterated in Re Ajay Kumar Pande[40] that Art. 129 is not restricted or limited by the contempt of Courts Act, 1971. As the highest Court of the land, the Supreme Court has not only the right to protect itself but also has the right, jurisdiction and the authority to protect the High Courts and the subordinate courts from being insulted, abused or denigrated in any other way.

H. LEGISLATIVE POWER REGARDING THE JUDICIARY

The legislative power regarding the High Courts and the subordinate courts are distributed between the Centre and the States.[41]

Article 4 is an independent power not referable to List I Entry 78. There is ample power under Art. 4 to clothe Parliament with power to invest High Courts with the necessary "jurisdiction and powers" of every description.[42]

---

36. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(i)(a).
37. AIR 1991 SC 2176.
38. Also see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(i)(b).
39. Income Tax Appellate Tribunal v. V.K. Agarwal, 1999(1) SCC 16 : AIR 1999 SC 452.
40. (1996) 6 SCC 510 : 1996 SCC (Cri) 1391. See Pallav Seth v. Custodian, (2001) 7 SCC 549, 561-562 : AIR 2001 SC 2763.
41. Part IV, Ch. X, infra.
42. Jamshed N. Guzdar v. State of Maharashtra, (2005) 2 SCC 591 : AIR 2005 SC 862.

Parliament has exclusive power to make laws with respect to: Constitution, organisation, jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court; persons entitled to practise before the Supreme Court (entry 77, List I); Constitution and organisation of the High Courts except provisions as to officers and servants of the High Courts; persons entitled to practise before the High Courts (List I, entry 78); Extension of the jurisdiction of a High Court to, and exclusion of the jurisdiction of a High Court from, any Union Territory (List 1, entry 79); Jurisdiction and powers of all courts except the Supreme Court, with respect to any of the matters in the Union List; admiralty jurisdiction (List 1, entry 95); Allowances, leave of absence and pensions of the High Court Judges [Art. 221(2)].[43] Further, under Art. 247, Parliament has been authorised to establish any additional courts for the better administration of law made by it.

"Administration of justice; constitution and organisation of all courts, except the Supreme Court and the High Courts" has now been transferred from List II to List III (Entry 11A in List III). The topics of "officers and servants of the High Courts; procedure in rent and revenue courts; fees taken in all courts except the Supreme Court (List II, entry 3)"; "Jurisdiction and powers of all Courts, except the Supreme Court, with respect to any matter in the State List (List II, entry 65)" remain exclusively State subjects.

Under List III, entry 46, a concurrent legislative power has been conferred on Parliament and the State Legislatures to make laws with respect to the "jurisdiction and powers of all courts, except the Supreme Court, with respect to any of the matters" in the Concurrent List.

The 'administration of justice' is now a concurrent subject (Entry 11A, List III). Barring affecting the constitution and organisation of the High Courts, a State Legislature can create courts, invest them with power and jurisdiction to try every cause and matter, whether civil or criminal, and define, enlarge, alter, amend and diminish the jurisdiction of courts and define their jurisdiction, in a general manner, except admiralty jurisdiction.[44] The State can create courts of general jurisdiction. Thus, a State Legislature is competent to confer power on village panchayats to try criminal offences.[45]

Entry 65, List II, confers special power on the State Legislature. Therefore, under entry 65, the Legislature while legislating with regard to a matter in List II can make provisions concerning the jurisdiction and powers of the courts with respect to that subject-matter specifically. The Legislature can exclude or bar the jurisdiction of a Court, or confer special jurisdiction on it, with regard to a matter in that List.

Similar is the case with regard to a matter in the Concurrent List. Parliament can, under entry 95, List I, or entry 46 in List III, specifically confer jurisdiction on any Court, or bar its jurisdiction, in relation to any matter in List I or List III, but so long as the jurisdiction is not barred, a Court is entitled to try all cases as authorised under the State legislation even with respect to matters in List I or List III. List III, entry 3, authorises the conferment of general jurisdiction on courts

---

43. Supra, this Chapter.
44. K. Kumaraswani v. Premier Electric Co., AIR 1959 AP 3; Mohindroo v. Bar Council, AIR 1968 SC 888 : (1968) 2 SCR 709.
45. Infra, , Ch. X; entry 5, List II.

while all other entries authorise the creation of special jurisdiction limited to particular matters.

As regards the High Courts, their constitution and organisation is a central subject. Parliament can set up a High Court, constitute and organise it. Thus, a uniformity can be maintained among the various High Courts in the matter of their constitution and organisation. It may however be noted that for the most part the Constitution itself fixes the constitution and organisation of the High Courts and only a few matters have been left to Parliament, e.g., fixing of allowances, leave and pensions of Judges. Parliament has no control over the officers and servants of a High Court who fall within the State sphere.[46]

Recently, however, the Supreme Court has claimed a say in settling the service conditions of the staff of the subordinate courts on the ground that this matter constitutes a significant factor "having relevance in the functioning of the subordinate courts. This question is, therefore directly connected with the administration of justice and thereby with the rule of law". This being so, the Court can examine this matter in a writ petition under Art. 32 of the Constitution. "If necessary, with the aid of Art. 142 of the Constitution of India, this Court can issue necessary directions to the State Governments/Union Territories for due compliance."[47]

As regards the jurisdiction of a High Court, Parliament has power to confer special jurisdiction on a High Court with respect to any matter in List I or List III.[48] Parliament or a State Legislature can confer general jurisdiction on it under its power to legislate for administration of justice (List III, entry 11A). A State Legislature can invest it specifically with any special jurisdiction with respect to any matter in List II or List III. A law enacted by the Madras Legislature establishing courts of sessions to try criminal cases committed within the Presidency Town of Madras and, to that extent, curtailing the original criminal jurisdiction of the Madras High Court, was held valid. It would fall under entries 1, 2, 11-A and 46 of List III, and not under entry 78 of List I.[49]

A State Law establishing a City Civil Court at Calcutta, giving it jurisdiction to try cases up to Rs. 50,000, to enable it to try suits of certain types, and excluding the High Court from trying those types of suits has been held to be valid as falling under entry 11-A, List III.[50] A State law making a change in the number of judges who should hear an appeal in the High Court is a matter pertaining not to the constitution and organisation of the High Court, but to "administration of justice" (entry 11 A, List III) and is, thus, valid.[51] A State law abolishing letters patent appeals in a High Court in matters pertaining to 'land' has been held valid un-

---

46. Art. 229(2): List I, entry 78; List II, entry 3.

47. All India Judges Association v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 1555.
See, Ch. IV, Sec. G, supra, for Art. 142.
See, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A, for Art. 32.

48. Amarendra v. Bikash, AIR 1957 Cal. 534.
For an illustration, see, the Income-tax Act where the High Court has been given an advisory role in income-tax assessments.

49. Ahmed Moideen v. Inspector, D. Div., AIR 1959 Mad. 261.

50. Indu Bhushan De. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1986 SC 1783 : 1980 Supp SCC 343.

51. Panicker v. Panicker, AIR 1953 TC 53; Shivarudrappa v. Kapurchand, AIR 1965 Mys. 76.

der entry 18, List II, which gives power to the State Legislature to legislate in relation to 'land'.[52]

The Bombay City Civil Court Act, 1948, establishing a City Civil Court and excluding the original jurisdiction of the High Court from trying civil cases upto one lakh within the local limits of Bombay was held valid in State of Bombay v. Narottamdas.[53] The Court explained that the terms "administration of Justice" and "constitution and organisation of courts" are "wide enough to include the power and jurisdiction of courts". The power of the State includes "the power of defining, enlarging, altering, amending and diminishing the jurisdiction of the courts and defining their jurisdiction territorially and pecuniarily."[54]

Consequently, legislation by the States effectively denuding the High Court of its original jurisdiction and abolishing Letters Patents Appeals were held to be constitutionally valid.[55]

Parliament has extensive power to re-organise States and to do every thing that is consequential thereto.[56] Therefore, while forming a new State, or reorganising the existing States, Parliament has power not only to constitute and organise a new High Court but even to vest it with general jurisdiction. The legislative power with respect to the Supreme Court is exclusively vested in Parliament.

I. TRIBUNALS

Article 323A and 323B provide for proliferation of the tribunal system in the country.

Article 323A provides that Parliament may by law establish tribunals for adjudication of disputes concerning recruitment and conditions of service of persons appointed to public service under Central, State or any local or other authority, or a corporation owned or controlled by the government. The law made by Parliament for the purpose may specify the jurisdiction and procedure of these tribunals. Under Cl. 2(d), the parliamentary law may exclude the jurisdiction of all courts, except that of the Supreme Court under Art. 136, with respect to the service matters falling within the purview of these tribunals.[57] Under Cl. 3 of Art. 323A, the provisions of Art. 323A override any other provision in the Constitution or in any other law.

Articles 323B(1) and (2) empower the appropriate legislature[58] to provide, by law, for adjudication or trial by tribunals of any disputes and offences with respect to the following matters:

(i) taxation:
(ii) foreign exchange;

---

52. Hakim Singh v. Shiv Sagar, AIR 1973 All. 596.
53. AIR 1951 SC 69 : 1951 SCR 69.
54. AIR 1951 SC 69 : 1951 SCR 69. See also Amarendra Nath Ray Chowdhary v. Bikash Chandra Ghose, AIR 1957 584.
55. Jamshed N.Gazdar v. State of Maharashtra, (2005) 2 SCC 591 : AIR 2005 SC 591.
56. Supra, Ch. V.
57. For discussion on Art. 136, see, supra, Ch. IV, Secs. D and E.
58. "Appropriate Legislature" means Parliament or the State Legislature which may be competent to legislate with respect to the concerned matter in accordance with the scheme of distribution of power under Act. 246 read with Schedule VII. See, infra, Part IV, Ch. X.

(iii) industrial and labour disputes;
(iv) land reforms;
(v) ceiling on urban property;
(vi) elections to Parliament or State Legislature;
(vii) production, procurement, supply and distribution of foodstuffs and other essential goods and control of prices of such goods;
(viii) rent, regulation of tenancy issues including the right, title and interest of landlords and tenants;
(ix) offences against laws with respect to these matters.

Such a law may establish a hierarchy of tribunals [Art. 323B(3)(a)], specify their powers and jurisdiction [Art. 323B(3)(b)], and lay down their procedure [Art. 323B(3)(c)]. Under cl. 3(d) of Art. 323B, the law establishing these tribunals may exclude the jurisdiction of all courts except of the Supreme Court under Art. 136, with respect to all or any of the matters falling within the jurisdiction of these tribunals. Under Art. 323B(4), Art. 323B has effect notwithstanding anything in any other constitutional or legal provision.

The provisions contained in Arts. 323A and 323B are not self-executing provisions. These are enabling provisions. Tribunals can be set up when necessary legislation is enacted for the purpose by the concerned legislature. This means that Arts. 323A and 323B only provide the necessary constitutional authority for such legislation. A law under Art. 323A can be enacted by Parliament alone; a law under Art. 323B can be enacted both by Parliament and the State Legislatures. They do not however, bar the legislature from establishing tribunals not covered thereunder but covered under appropriate legislative entries of Schedule VII (Para 36).[59] Arts. 323A and 323B do not derogate from legislative competence of the Parliament to establish other tribunals like Central or State Commissions under the Consumer Protection Act, 1986.[60]

It was envisaged that these provisions when fully implemented would drastically change the character of the Indian Judicial System. The tribunals established under Art. 323B can be authorised to try certain categories of criminal offences and thus impose penal sanctions. This was an innovation in the Indian legal system for criminal punishments were imposed only by the courts and not by non-judicial bodies. The idea underlying these provisions was to lighten the load of work on the courts. For example, a large number of service cases came before the High Courts through writ petitions. It was also hoped that establishment of these tribunals would make for an effective enforcement of some of the laws for the tribunals can decide cases much more quickly than the courts. In fact, the Tribunals being replications of the Courts have not succeeded in fulfilling either of the objectives. The delays in determination have led to a large pendency of cases. Furthermore since every decision of a tribunal is judicially reviewable, the work of the High Courts has not been reduced. On the other hand where a petitioner could have an issue decided by the High Court directly, which was only subject to appeal by the Supreme Court, at present an additional round of litigation has been added which compels the litigant to approach the tribunal first.

---

59. State of Karnataka v. Vishwabharathi House Building Coop. Society, (2003) 2 SCC 412 : AIR 2003 SC 1043.
60. State of Karnataka v. Vishwabharathi House Building Coop. Society, (2003) 2 SCC 412 : AIR 2003 SC 1043.

The idea underlying Arts. 323A and 323B was that the tribunals established thereunder will practically have the same status as the High Courts as appeals from these tribunals could go to the Supreme Court under Art. 136. Under Cl. 2(d) of Art. 323A and cl. 3(d) of Art. 323B, the relevant law establishing these tribunals could exclude the jurisdiction of the High Courts in relation to the matters falling within the jurisdiction of these tribunals. Thus, the High Courts could be barred from exercising their writ jurisdiction under Art. 226 or their power of superintendence under Art. 227. Even the writ jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under Art. 32 could be excluded.[61] The Supreme Court accepted this position in S.P. Sampath Kumar v. Union of India.[62]

However, the Supreme Court changed its position in L. Chandra Kumar v. Union of India.[63] The Court ruled that since judicial review is a fundamental feature of the Constitution,[64] the jurisdiction conferred on the High Courts under Arts. 226/227 and upon the Supreme Court under Art. 32 of the Constitution cannot be ousted even by a provision in the Constitution. The Court has observed:

> "The jurisdiction conferred upon the High Courts under Arts. 226/227 and upon the Supreme Court under Art. 32 of the Constitution is part of the inviolable basic structure of our Constitution".

In view of the above position, the courts and tribunals "may perform a supplemental role in discharging the powers conferred by Arts. 226/227 and 32 of the Constitution". About the Tribunals created under Arts. 323-A and 323-B, the Court has said that these tribunals—

> "are possessed of the competence to test the constitutional validity of statutory provisions and rules. All decisions of those Tribunals will, however, be subject to scrutiny before a Divisions Bench of the High Court within whose jurisidction the concerned Tribunal falls. The Tribunals will, nevertheless continue to act like courts of first instance in respect of the areas of law for which they have been constituted."

The Court ruled that "all decisions of Tribunals, whether created pursuant to Art. 323 A or Art. 323B, of the Constitution will be subject to the High Court's writ jurisdiction under Articles 226/227 of the Constitution, before a Division Bench of the High Court within whose territorial jurisdiction the particular tribunal falls."[65]

Under the presently prevailing arrangement, direct appeals lie from all tribunals to the Supreme Court under Art. 136. The Court has now ruled that no appeal from the decision of a tribunal will henceforth directly lie to the Supreme Court under Art. 136. The aggrieved party will now be entitled to move the High Court under Arts. 226/227 and from the High Court decision, the aggrieved party could then move the Supreme Court under Art. 136.[66]

The Court has firmly asserted that the jurisdiction conferred upon the High Courts under Arts. 226/227 and upon the Supreme Court under Art. 32 "is part of the invio-

---

61. For a fuller discussion on Art. 32, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII.
62. AIR 1987 SC 386 : (1987) 1 SCC 124. Also, Union of India v. Deep, (1992) 4 SCC 432 : AIR 1993 SC 382.
63. AIR 1997 SC 1125 : (1997) 3 SCC 261.
64. See, infra, Ch. XLI.
65. AIR 1997 SC at 1154 : (1997) 3 SCC 261. See also State of West Bengal v. Ashish Kumar Ray, (2005) 10 SCC 110 : AIR 2005 SC 254.
66. State of H.P. v. Pawan Kumar Rajput, (2006) 9 SCC 161 .

lable basic structure of our Constitution," "an integral and essential feature of the Constitution constituting part of its basic structure".[67] It means that these powers of judicial review cannot be ousted by any constitutional or statutory provision.

Other courts may perform a supplemental role in discharging the powers conferred by Arts. 32, 226 and 227 on the Supreme Court and the High Courts. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has declared Cl. 2(d) of Art. 323A and Cl. 3(d) of Art. 323B unconstitutional to the extent these clauses bar the jurisdiction of the High Courts under Art. 226/227 and that of the Supreme Court under Art. 32. All clauses in the legislation enacted under Arts. 323A and 323B excluding the High Court's, and Supreme Court's writ jurisdiction are unconstitutional.

The supervisory jurisdiction of the High Courts under Art. 227 has also been declared to be part of the basic structure of the Constitution.[68]

In pursuance of Art. 323A, Parliament has enacted the Administrative Tribunals Act, 1985, setting up the Central Administrative Tribunal (CAT) to adjudicate upon service matters pertaining to Central Employees. An appeal from the Tribunal lies to the Supreme Court by special leave under Art. 136.[69]

In these days of tribunalisation, a question has been raised whether Parliament has power to create any other tribunal outside Arts. 323A and 323B. The question has been raised in the context of the Recovery of Debts Due to Banks and Financial Institutions Act, 1993 (RDB Act, 1993) enacted by Parliament with a view to set up the Debt Recovery Tribunal. The tribunal has been set up to hasten the recovery of debts due to the banks. The question has been whether Parliament has power to enact such an Act.

The Supreme Court has ruled in Union of India v. Delhi High Court Bar Association[70] that Parliament has power to enact the law in question. The Court has argued that Arts. 323A and 323B are enabling provisions which specifically authorise the legislatures to enact laws for the establishment of tribunals, in relation to the matters specified therein. The power of Parliament to establish a tribunal for any other matter not covered by Arts. 323A and 323B has not been taken away. Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction to make a law with respect to any entry in List I, as well as in the residuary area—area not covered by List II and III.[71]

The Supreme Court has justified the RBD Act as falling under entry 45, List I—dealing with Banking. Banking operations do include acceptance of loans and deposits and recovery of the debts due to banks.

The tribunals have now become an essential part of the judicial system in India. These bodies, though not courts, yet do perform an effective role in justice delivery system in India.[72]

---

67. AIR 1997 SC 1125 at 1156 : (1997) 3 SCC 261.

68. Also see, Asish Kumar Roy v. Union of India, AIR 1999 Cal 242; Commissioner of Entertainment Tax v. Mitra Cinema, AIR 2000 Cal. 247. For Art. 227, see, supra.

69. For detailed discusson on this Tribunal, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, 563-570. CASES & MATERIALS, II, Ch. XII, Sec. W, 1215-1254.
Also see : Kendriya Vidyalaya Sangathan v. Subhash Sharma, JT 2002 (2) SC 568 : (2002) 4 SCC 145.

70. (2002) 4 SCC 274 : AIR 2002 SC 1479; See also State of Karnataka v. Vishwa Bharti House Building Co-op. Society, (2003) 2 SCC 412 : AIR 2003 SC 1043.

71. See, infra, Chs. XI-XIV.

72. Also see, Ch. XXXIV, infra, under Directive Principles.

CHAPTER IX

UNION TERRITORIES, TRIBAL AREAS AND SPECIAL PROVISIONS CONCERNING SOME STATES

SYNOPSIS

A. UNION TERRITORIES

There exist a few centrally administered units which do not form part of any State but have been kept as separate and distinct entities because of several historical, cultural or political reasons. These administrative units are designated as Union Territories.

There are at present the following 7 Union Territories: (1) Delhi, (2) The Andaman and Nicobar Islands, (3) Lakshadweep, (4) Dadra and Nagar Haveli, (5)

Daman and Diu, (6) Pondicherry (known as Puducherry with effect from 1st October 2006) and (7) Chandigarh.[1]

Before 1956, the present-day Union Territories were characterised as Part C States. The States' Reorganisation Commission in its report submitted in 1955 suggested that the Part C States be converted into centrally administered territories as these States were neither financially viable nor functionally efficient. The States' Reorganisation Act, and the Seventh Constitution Amendment Act[2] abolished the Part C States and created the present day Union Territories.

A Union Territory is administered directly by the Central Executive. A Union Territory is to be administered by the President acting, to such extent as he thinks fit, through an Administrator to be appointed by him with such designation as he may specify.[3] But this does not mean that the Union Territories become merged with the Central Government. Although they are independent entities, they are centrally administered. Any instruction or directive issued by the Central Government or the President[4] is binding on the administration of the Union Territory.[5]

Parliament may by law provide otherwise [Art. 239(1)]. A Governor of a State may also be appointed as the Administrator of a Union Territory adjoining to that State. In that capacity, the Governor is to act independently of his Council of Ministers [Art. 239(2)].

It has been held by the Supreme Court that the Administrator of a Union Territory is not a purely constitutional functionary. His position is somewhat different from that of a State Governor.[6] The Administrator is a delegate of the President. His position is wholly different from that of a State Governor. He cannot thus be equated with a State Governor. After differing with his Council of Ministers, the Administrator may act under orders of the President, which means the Central Government.[7] The Administrator thus is not a purely constitutional functionary.

The Supreme Court has ruled that the Central Government is the appropriate Government under s. 10(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act to make a reference of an industrial dispute in a Union Territory to a tribunal for adjudication.[8]

In several cases, the Supreme Court has declared that the Union Territories, though centrally administered, under the provisions of Art. 239, they

---

1. See, The First Schedule to the Constitution.
2. For the Constitution Amendment Act, See, Ch. XLII, infra.
3. Dilip Chowdhary v. Registrar of Co-op. Societies, A&N Islands, Port Blair, AIR 2000 Cal 228; Andaman Wood Products India Pvt. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Cal 61.
4. S. Pushpa v. Sivachanmugavelu, (2005) 3 SCC 110 : AIR 2005 SC 1038.
5. See infra, Chandigarh Administration v. Surinder Kumar, (2004) 1 SCC 530 : AIR 2004 SC 992.
6. Devji Vallabhbhai v. Administrator, Goa, Daman, Diu, AIR 1982 SC 1029 : (1982) 2 SCC 222.
For the position of a State Governor, see, Ch. VII, Sec. A(i), supra.
7. Goa Sampling Employees' Association v. G.S. Co., AIR 1985 SC 357 : (1985) 1 SCC 206; Express Newspapers v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 872 : (1986) 1 SCC 133; Andaman Wood Products India Pvt. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Cal 61.
8. Goa Association, op. cit.

are not part of the Central Government but are distinct constitutional entities.[9]

The President who is the executive head of a Union Territory does not function as the head of the Central Government, but as the head of the Union Territory under powers specially vested in him under Art. 239 thereby occupying a position analogous to the Governor of a State.[10] But the status of the Union Territories is not akin to that of the States. The Supreme Court has observed in this connection.[11] "Though the Union Territories are centrally administered under the provisions of Article 239 they do not become merged with the Central Government…"

(a) PONDICHERRY

The Constitution makes some special provisions for administration of the Union Territory of Puducherry.

Parliament is empowered to create by law for Puducherry, a Legislature (elected, or partly elected and partly nominated) and/or a Council of Ministers with such constitution, powers and functions, in each case, as may be specified in the law [Art. 239A(1)].[12] Such a law is not to be regarded as an amendment of the Constitution under Art. 368 even though the law in question contains provisions amending the Constitution [Art. 239A(2)].[13]

The Administrator of the Union Territory of Pondicherry can promulgate an ordinance when the Legislature is not in session if he is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action. The ordinance-making power of the Administrator is similar to that of a State Governor, except that:[14]

(i) the Administrator cannot promulgate an ordinance without first seeking instructions from the President in that behalf; and

(ii) he cannot promulgate any ordinance when the Legislature is suspended or dissolved.

The ordinance is to be laid before the Legislature of the Union Territory, and it ceases to have effect after six weeks of the reassembly of the Legislature, or earlier if the Legislature disapproves the same [Art. 239B]. The ordinance has the same effect as an Act of the Legislature.

(b) OTHER UNION TERRITORIES

It will thus be seen that out of the seven Union Territories, it is only in respect of Pondicherry and Delhi[15] that some democratic set-up is envisaged by the Constitution itself. The other Union Territories are governed more directly by the Centre under the provisions of Art. 239 mentioned above.

---

9. Satya Dev Bhushahri v. Padam Dev, AIR 1954 SC 587 : (1955) 1 SCR 549; Vindya Pradesh v. Shri Moula Bux, AIR 1962 SC 145 : (1962) 2 SCR 794; See also Chandigarh Admn v. Surinder Kumar, (2004) 1 SCC 530 : AIR 2004 SC 992.

10. New Delhi Municipal Council v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 2847; Govt. of NCT Delhi v. All India Central Civil Accounts, (2002) 1 SCC 344 : AIR 2001 SC 3090.

11. Govt. of NCT Delhi v. A.I.C.C.A., JAO's Ass., AIR 2001 SC 3090, 3093 : (2002) 1 SCC 344.

12. See, Gobalousamy v. Pondicherry, AIR 1970 Mad. 419.

13. For the process of Amendment of the Constitution, see, infra, Ch. XLI.

14. See, supra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c), for the Governor's ordinance-making power.

15. See below, Sec. (f).

The Union Territories of Andaman and Nicobar, Lakshdweep, Dadar & Nagar Haveli, Daman and Diu and Chandigarh have no legislatures.

(c) LEGISLATION FOR UNION TERRITORIES

Under Art. 246(4), Parliament can make a law for a Union Territory with respect to any matter, even if it is one which is enumerated in the State List.[16] Parliament can also legislate for Union Territories under its residuary powers, viz., Art. 248 and entry 97, List 1.[17] Parliament thus has plenary power to legislate for the Union Territories with regard to any subject.

With regard to the Union Territories, there is no distribution of legislative power.[18] The three Lists have no relevance so far as the Union Territory of Delhi is concerned as Parliament can make a law with respect to any entry in any list.[19] The Supreme Court has stated in Mithan Lal v. Delhi,[20] in this connection:

> "To legislate for Part C States… the power of Parliament is plenary and absolute subject only to such restrictions as are imposed by the Constitution".

Parliament is however a busy body and is always pressed for time and it is not, therefore, possible for it to enact all the legislation in relation to matters falling in Lists II and III, which may be essential and desirable for the governance of a Union Territory. To relieve pressure on Parliament, therefore, certain other provisions have been made.

The President may make Regulations for the peace, progress and good government of the Union Territories of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands, Lakshdweep, Dadar and Nagar Haveli, Daman and Diu and Pondicherry [Art. 240(1)]. The President has no regulation-making power vis-à-vis Chandigarh.

The President shall not make Regulations for Pondicherry if a Legislature, as stated above, is established there. But the President can make Regulations for Pondicherry as well if the legislature there is dissolved or suspended. [Proviso to Art. 240(1)].

A Regulation made by the President has the same force and effect as an Act of Parliament. A Regulation may even repeal or amend an Act of Parliament, or any other law, applicable to the Union Territory concerned [Art. 240(2)].

The Home Minister has however given an assurance in Parliament that the President's Regulations would be placed on the tables of the Houses and the Houses would have full authority to make any modifications therein.

The Regulation-making power of the President is plenary and a Regulation can be made for a Union Territory on all subjects on which Parliament can make

---

16. For distribution of legislative powers between the Centre and the States, see, infra, Ch. X.
Also see, Mithan Lal v. Delhi, AIR 1958 SC 682 : 1959 SCR 445; In re Sea Customs case, AIR 1963 SC 1760 : (1964) 3 SCR 787.

17. Satpal & Co. v. Lt. Governor of Delhi, AIR 1979 SC 1550 : (1979) 4 SCC 232.
For discussion on residuary powers of Parliament, see, infra, Ch. X and XI.

18. Ram Kishore Sen v. Union of India, AIR 1966 SC 644 : (1966) 1 SCR 430; T.M. Kanniyan v. I.T.O., AIR 1968 SC 637 : (1968) 2 SCR 103.

19. Govt. Servant Co.op. House Building Socy. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 2636, 2638 : (1998) 6 SCC 381.

20. AIR 1958 SC 682, 685 : 1959 SCR 445.
Also, N.D.M.C. v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 2847.

laws. Thus, a Regulation can be made for any matter falling in List I, List II or List III.[21]

As regards Parliamentary legislation for Union Territories, the problem arises that these are small territories and Parliament hardly has sufficient time to hold threadbare discussion before legislating for Union Territories. To require Parliament to specifically legislate for these Territories will put a disproportionate pressure on parliamentary time. Therefore, to meet the situation, the following expedient has been adopted.

For all these Union Territories, except Andamans and Lakshadweep, various Acts of Parliament[22] provide that the Central Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, extend with such restrictions and modifications as it thinks fit, to a Union Territory any enactment which is in force in a State at the date of the notification.

Parliament has thus delegated some of its legislative power in relation to the Union Territories to the Central Government with a view to lighten its own burden and save its time. This means that the Central Government can extend, after adaptation, to a Union Territory any law in force in any other area in the country. Such a provision was held valid in the Delhi Laws Act case.[23]

When a law prevalent in a State is extended to a Union Territory under this provision, and if the said law is declared unconstitutional as being beyond the legislative competence of the enacting State under Art. 246, the Act in the Union Territory will not be affected, for there the question is to be judged not with reference to the power of the State Legislature but with reference to that of Parliament. If Parliament can make such a law, it will be valid.[24]

It may be noted that the Regulation-making power of the President with respect to Pondicherry is broader than the power delegated to the Central Government under the Union Territories (Laws) Act in two respects, viz. :

(1) The Regulation-making power extends to the whole of the legislative area (Lists I, II and III), while under the Act, delegation is confined only to matters falling within the State sphere, i.e., Lists II and III.

(2) A Regulation can affect an Act of Parliament, but the same cannot be done under the power delegated under the Act in question.

The President can also issue Ordinances for the Union Territories under his general Ordinance-making power discussed earlier.[25] A presidential ordinance authorising the Delhi Administration to levy a special duty on the import of

---

21. T.M. Kanniyan v. I.T. Officer, Pondicherry, AIR 1968 SC 637 : (1968) 2 SCR 103.

22. The Union Territories (Laws) Act. 1950, S. 2; The Dadra and Nagar Haveli Act, 1961. S. 10; The Daman and Diu (Administration) Act, 1962, S. 6; The Pondicherry (Administration) Act, 1962, S. 8; The Punjab Re-organisation Act, 1966, S. 87.

23. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.
Also, Ramesh Birch v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 560 : (1989) Supp (1) SCC 430.
For clarification of the scope of this power of delegated legislation, See, Smt. Marchi v. Mathu Ram, AIR 1969 Del 267; Faqir Chand v. C.P.W.D. Works, AIR 1972 Del. 135.
For further comments on the Delhi Laws Act case, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, 61-64; CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, I, 39-48.

24. Mithan Lal v. Delhi, AIR 1958 SC 682 : 1959 SCR 445.

25. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(c).

country liquor in Delhi was held valid because the President's ordinance-making power is co-extensive with Parliament's legislative power.[26]

Under Art. 73(1)(a), the executive power of the Union Government is co-extensive with the legislative powers of Parliament.[27] Consequently, the Union Government can validly issue executive directions to the Administrator of a Union Territory. In the absence of conflict between a direction issued by the Union Government, and a Presidential Regulation issued under Art. 240, the Administrator is bound to execute the directions of the Union Government.[28]

(d) HIGH COURT FOR UNION TERRITORIES

Parliament may by law constitute a High Court for a Union Territory or declare any court in any Territory to be a High Court [Art. 241(1)]. The constitutional provisions applicable to the High Courts in the States would apply to the High Courts of the Union Territories as well with such modifications or exceptions as Parliament may by law provide [Art. 241(2)].

Parliament may extend or exclude the jurisdiction of any High Court to, or from any Union Territory [Art. 241(4)]. Thus, Chandigarh falls under the jurisdiction of the Punjab and Haryana High Court and Delhi has a separate High Court of its own. Pondicherry falls under the jurisdiction of the Madras High Court. The Kerala High Court exercises jurisdiction over Lakshadweep, and the Calcutta High Court over the Andamans. By the High Court at Bombay (Extension of Jurisdiction Act), 1981, the High Court of Bombay has been made a common High Court for the States of Maharashtra and Goa and the Union Territory of Daman and Diu.

(e) THE UNION TERRITORIES ACT, 1963

The Parliament has enacted the Union Territories Act 1963, in pursuance of Art. 239A. The object of the Act is to provide for Legislative Assemblies and Council of Ministers for certain Union Territories. In effect, the Act applies only to Pondicherry as Art. 239A is confined only to Pondicherry and does not apply to any other Union Territory . Thus, some form of democracy and parliamentary government has been introduced by this Act in Pondicherry as has been envisaged by Art. 239-A. The status of the Union Territory has not however been fully assimilated to that of the States as it is even now much more directly controlled by the Centre.

Pondicherry has an Assembly which can make laws with respect to matters enumerated in the State[29] and the Concurrent Lists,[30] but Parliament's overall power to pass laws for a Union Territory on any subject is preserved. In case of inconsistency between a law of Parliament and that of the Assembly, the law of Parliament prevails. However, in the area of Concurrent List or the State List, a law made by the Assembly prevails against a parliamentary law if it has received the assent of the President.

---

26. Satpal & Co., supra, footnote 17.
For discussion on this power, see, supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(c).
27. See Ch. VII, supra.
For further discussion on the matter, see, Ch. XII, infra.
28. J. Fernandes & Co. v. Dy. Chief Controller, AIR 1975 SC 1208 : (1975) 1 SCC 716.
29. For State List, see, infra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
30. For the Concurrent List, see, Ch. X, Sec. F, infra.

The position of the Administrator is similar to that of the Governor in the matter of assent to the bills passed by the legislature.

The Territory has a Council of Ministers with the Chief Minister at its head to aid and advise the Administrator in exercise of his functions in relation to the matters with respect to which the Assembly of the Union Territory has power to make laws except in so far as he is required by or under the Act to act in his discretion or by or under any law to exercise any judicial or quasi-judicial functions.

The Administrator and his Council of Ministers function under the general control of the President. They must comply with the directions issued by the President. The Administrator is not bound by the aid and advice of his Ministers when he is acting in his discretion. In case of difference of opinion between the Administrator and the Council of Ministers, the matter is to be referred to the President for decision.

It is needless to say that when President decides the point, it is in effect the Central Government which decides the point. And that decision is binding on the Administrator and also the Ministers. The Chief Minister of the Union Territory is appointed by the President who also makes rules for the conduct of business.

In case of an emergency, when the administration of a Union Territory cannot be carried on in accordance with the Act, or for the proper administration of the Union Territory, the President can suspend the operation of all or any provisions of the Act. In such a case, the Administrator administers the Territory as the agent of the President under the provisions of Art. 239 of the Constitution.

(f) DELHI

As Delhi is the national capital of India, it is maintained as a Union Territory and has not been given the status of a full-fledged State, because it is felt that Delhi must remain under the effective control of the Union Government. At the same time, it is felt that the people of Delhi ought to enjoy some semblance of democracy.

By virtue of the Constitution (Sixty Ninth Amendment) Act, 1991,[31] Delhi has been given a special status.

Under Art. 239AA, introduced by the Constitutional Amendment in 1991, Delhi is now called the National Capital Territory of Delhi [Art. 239-AA(1)]. The Administrator thereof (appointed under Art. 239) is designated as the Lt. Governor.

Delhi has a Legislative Assembly elected directly by the people under the supervision of the Election Commission [Art. 239-AA(2)(a)(b)(c)].[32] The Assembly can make laws with respect to matters enumerated in the State List or the Concurrent List barring certain entries therein[33] [Art. 239AA(3)(a)]. Parliament retains power to make laws with respect to any matter for the Union Territory [Art. 239AA(3)(b)]. In case of repugnancy between a law made by Parliament and a law made by the Legislative Assembly of Delhi, the former prevails over the lat-

---

31. For this Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.
32. For Election Commission, see, Ch. XIX, infra.
33. For these Lists, see, Ch. X. The excepted entries are : 1, 2 and 18 of the State List; entries 64, 65 and 66 of the State List insofar as they relate to entries 1, 2 and 8. These entries relate to public order, police and intoxicating liquors.

ter to the extent of the repugnancy [Art. 239AA(3)(c)]. But the law made by the Assembly can prevail over the Central Law if it is assented to by the President. But Parliament can legislate thereafter with respect to the same subject-matter contrary to the Delhi law.[34]

Provision has been made for a Council of Ministers with the Chief Minister at the head to aid and advise the Lt. Governor except when he is required to act in his discretion by law. [Art. 239AA(4)]. In case of difference of opinion between the Lt. Governor and his Ministers, the matter is to be referred to the President and his decision shall be binding. Pending the decision of the President, if in the opinion of the Lt. Governor the matter is urgent and needs immediate action; he can take such action as he deems necessary.[35]

The Chief Minister is appointed by the President and the other Ministers are appointed by the President on the Chief Minister's advice.[36] They hold office at the pleasure of the President and are collectively responsible to the Assembly.[37]

The Lt. Governor of Delhi has power to promulgate ordinances similar to the Administrator of Pondicherry.[38]

The President has power under Art. 239 AB to take over the administration in case there is breakdown of the constitutional machinery therein, or for the proper administration of the National Capital Territory. The operation of Art. 239 AA may be suspended. The President can make by order such incidental and consequential provisions as may appear to him to be necessary or expedient for administering the NCT in accordance with the provisions of Arts. 239 and 239AA.[39] Parliament has been given power to make law to give effect to these provisions or supplement these provisions [Art. 230AA(7a)]. Such a law is not to be deemed as an amendment of the Constitution for purposes of Art. 368.[40] Accordingly, Parliament has enacted the Government of National Capital Territory of Delhi Act, 1991, to effectuate and supplement the above-mentioned constitutional provisions.

S. 52(b) of the Act provides that all suits and proceedings in connection with the administration of the Capital shall be instituted by or against the Government of India.

In a dispute before a Tribunal, the Central Government and the Government of NCT Delhi were separately impleaded as respondents. The Govt. of NCT Delhi sought to file an appeal to the Supreme Court under Art. 136 against the Tribunal order adversely affecting it. The Central Govt. raised a preliminary objection under S. 52(b) of the Govt. of NCT of Delhi Act. The Supreme Court rejected the objection saying that when the Central Govt. and the Delhi Govt. were separately impleaded as parties, and the Tribunal order went against the Delhi Govt., "it is difficult to conceive as to why that party cannot file an appeal invoking the provisions of Art. 136 of the Constitution which is a proceeding against the orders

---

34. Proviso to Art. 239AA(3)(c)].
35. Proviso to Art. 239AA(4)].
36. Art. 239AA(5).
37. Art. 239AA(6).
38. Art. 239 AA(8) read with Art. 239B.
39. Art. 239 AB.
40. Art. 239AA(7b).
For Art. 368, see Ch. XLI, infra

made by the courts and tribunals. The Court further maintained that "though the Union Territoires are centrally administered under the provisions of Article 239 of the Constitution, they do not become merged with the Central Government and they form part of no state and yet are territories of the Union... Thus, it must be held that the Union Territory does not entirely lose its existence as an entity though large control is exercised by the Union of India."[41]

B. SPECIAL PROVISIONS REGARDING CERTAIN STATES

(a) GUJARAT AND MAHARASHTRA

With the formation of the States of Maharashtra and Gujarat, the President was authorised [Art. 371(2)] to provide for any special responsibility of the Governor for—

(a) the establishment of separate development boards for (i) Vidarbha, Marathawada and the rest of the Maharashtra; (ii) Saurashtra, Kutch and the rest of the Gujarat, with the provision that a report on the working of each of these boards will be placed each year before the State Legislative Assembly;

(b) the equitable allocation of funds for developmental expenditure over the above-mentioned areas subject to the requirements of the State as a whole; and

(c) an equitable arrangement providing adequate facilities for technical education and vocational training and adequate opportunities for employment in services under the control of the State Government, in respect of the said areas, subject to the requirements of the State as a whole.

The object of Art. 371(2) is to enable the President to lay special responsibility on the Governors of Maharashtra and Gujarat for the development of certain areas.

(b) NAGALAND

Article 371A makes a few special provisions for the State of Nagaland, partly because of the disturbed law and order condition there, and partly because of the prevalence of strong feelings regarding their customs etc. among the people of the State, known as the Nagas. For long, the territory comprised in the State, Naga Hills—Tuensang Area, had been administered as a Scheduled Area under the provisions of Schedule VI to the Constitution.

According to Art. 371A, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, no Act of Parliament concerning any of the following matters would apply to Nagaland unless the State Legislative Assembly so decides by a resolution: (i) religious or special practices of the Nagas; (ii) Naga Customary law and procedure; (iii) Administration of civil and criminal justice involving decisions according to Naga customary law; (iv) ownership and transfer of land and its resources [Art. 371A(1)].

So long as there occur internal disturbances in the State, the Governor of Nagaland shall have special responsibility with respect to law and order, and in the discharge of his functions, the Governor, after consulting the Council of Ministers, exercises his individual judgment as to the action to be taken.

---

41. Govt. of NCT Delhi v. All India Central Civil Accounts, (2002) 1 SCC 344, 348 : AIR 2001 SC 3090.

In case a question arises whether any matter falls within the Governor's individual judgment or not, the Governor's decision in his discretion is final. The validity of anything done by the Governor is not to be called in question on the ground that he ought or ought not to have acted in the exercise of his individual judgment. The Governor's special responsibility shall cease when the President makes an order to the effect, on being satisfied, that it is no longer necessary for the Governor to have special responsibility for law and order in the State [Art. 371A(2)].

The Governor is also to see that the money provided by the Central Government for any specific service or purpose is included in the demand for a grant relating to that service or purpose and not in any other demand moved in the State Legislature [Art. 371A(2)(c)].

A regional council is to be established for the Tuensang district of the State. The Governor is to make rules for the composition of the council, manner of choosing its members, their terms of office, salaries etc.; the procedure of the council; appointment of officers of the council and their condition of service; any other matter for the proper functioning of the council.

For a period of ten years, or for such further period as the Governor may specify on the recommendation of the regional council, the following provisions are to operate for this district;

(a) The administration of the Tuensang district is to be carried on by the Governor;

(b) The Governor shall in his discretion arrange for equitable distribution between Tuensang district and the rest of the State of money provided by the Government of India to meet the requirements of the State;

(c) No Act of Nagaland Legislature is to apply to Tuensang district unless the Governor so directs on the recommendations of the regional council; the Governor may also introduce such modifications in the Act as the regional council may recommend;

(d) The Governor may make Regulations for the Tuensang district and any such Regulation may repeal or amend any law (whether an Act of Parliament or any other law) prevailing there;

(e) There shall be a Minister for Tuensang affairs in the Council of Ministers; he is to be appointed by the Governor on the advice of the Chief Minister from amongst the members representing Tuensang in the Legislature.

The Minister for Tuensang Affairs is to deal with all matters relating to the district and have direct access to the Governor for the purpose; but he shall keep the Chief Minister informed about the same. The final decision on all matters relating to Tuensang is to be made by the Governor in his discretion [Arts. 371A(1)(d) and (2)].

Members in the Nagaland Legislative Assembly from Tuensang are not elected directly by the people as in other States but by the regional council; members from the districts of Kohima and Mokokechung (i.e., the rest of the Nagaland) are elected in territorial constituencies.

(c) ASSAM

Article 371B provides for the constitution of a committee of the members of the Assam Legislative Assembly elected from the Tribal Areas mentioned in Part I of the table appended to the Sixth Schedule. The intention is that this committee should consider bills introduced in the Assembly from the point of view of the people in these Areas.[42]

According to Art. 371C, the President may provide for the creation of a committee of the Manipur Legislative Assembly consisting of the members elected from the Hill areas of the State.

The State Governor has been placed under an obligation to make an annual report to the President regarding the administration of the Hill Areas. The Central Government may give directions to the State Government regarding administration of these Areas.

(d) MANIPUR

Arts 371C makes provision for setting up a committee in the Legislative Assembly of Manipur to look after the interests of the Hill Areas in the State. The committee is to consist of the members of the Assembly elected from the Hill Areas of that State.

(e) ANDHRA PRADESH

Arts. 371D and 371E make some special provisions for the State of Andhra Pradesh.[43]

Article 371D is peculiar to Andhra Pradesh due to historical background. It was enacted to give effect to certain safeguards in the matter of employment opportunities for the residents of the Telengana region of Andhra Pradesh.

The primary purpose of Art. 371D appears to be two fold:

(1) to promote speedy development of the backward areas of the State of Andhra Pradesh with a view to secure balance in the development of the State as a whole; and

(2) to provide equitable opportunities to different areas of the State in the matter of education, employment and career prospects in public service.

Under Art. 371D(10), the provisions of Art. 371D, and of any order made by the President thereunder, "shall have effect notwithstanding anything in any other provision of this Constitution or in any other law for the time being in force."[44]

The genesis of these Articles is that, for quite some time, the people of Telengana region in Andhra Pradesh were carrying on an agitation for the creation of a separate Telengana State. These provisions were therefore enacted to meet some of the aspirations of the Telengana people so that they may give up their demand for a separate State.

---

42. See also, Art. 244 A, infra.
43. Added by the Constitution (Thirty-Second Amendment) Act, 1973.
For this Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.
44. See, V. Jagannadha Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 2002 SC 77 : (2001) 10 SCC 401.

According to Art. 371D(1), the President may by order provide, having regard to the requirements of the State as a whole, for equitable opportunities for the people belonging to different parts of the State in the matter of public employment and education and different provisions may be made for different parts of the State. In this regard, the President may require the State Government to organise civil posts in local cadres for different parts of the State and provide for direct recruitment to posts in any local cadre.

According to the Andhra Pradesh High Court, the special provisions under Art. 371D(1) could be made only by a Presidential order and not by any other instrument. "There is no provision that the Presidential powers can be exercised by the State Legislature or any other authority of the State."[45]

Provision has also been made for establishing an Administrative Tribunal in the State for redressing grievances of the people inter alia in such matters as appointment, allotment or promotion to civil posts in the State [Art. 371-D(3)].[46]

According to Art. 371-D(5), the order of the Tribunal finally disposing of any case becomes effective upon its confirmation by the State Government, or, on the expiry of three months from the date on which the order is made whichever is earlier. The State Government is authorised to modify or annul the Tribunal's order before it becomes effective for reasons to be specified. [Proviso to Art. 371D(5)].

The High Court is not to have any powers of superintendence over the Administrative Tribunal. No Court (other than the Supreme Court) is to exercise any jurisdiction, power or authority in respect of any matter subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. [Art. 371D(7)] The officers and servants of the High Court and members of the judicial service including district judges remain outside the purview of Art. 371D.[47]

The Supreme Court has declared Art. 371D(5) invalid in P. Sambhamurthy v. State of Andhra Pradesh[48] on the ground that it violates the basic feature of the Constitution. Executive interference with the order of a tribunal has been held to be against Rule of Law. "The rule of law would cease to have any meaning because then it would be open to the State Government to defy the law and get away with it:". Rule of law is a "basic and essential feature of the Constitution".[49] The Court upheld the validity of the rest of Art. 371D.[50]

Article 371D(3) authorizing setting up of the tribunal has been upheld in that very case.

Article 371E empowers Parliament to establish a university in the State of Andhra Pradesh.

---

45. Govt. of A.P. v. Medwin Educational Society, AIR 2001 AP 148.
46. The Tribunal has been set up by the Andhra Pradesh Administrative Tribunal Order, 1975.
47. Chief Justice, A.P. v. L.V.A. Dikshitulu, AIR 1979 SC 193 : (1979) 2 SCC 34.
48. AIR 1987 SC 663 : (1987) 1 SCC 362. Also see, Cases & Materials on Indian Administrative Law, II, 1382-1385.
49. For discussion on the doctrine of Basic Features of the Constitution, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
50. Also see, C. Surekha v. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 44 : (1988) 4 SCC 526; S. Prakash Rao v. Commr. of Commercial Taxes, AIR 1990 SC 997 : (1990) 2 SCC 259.

C. SCHEDULED AND TRIBAL AREAS

Provisions for the administration of the Scheduled Areas and Scheduled Tribes in any State, other than the States of Assam and Meghalaya, Tripura and Mizoram, are contained in Art. 244(1) and the Fifth Schedule to the Constitution.

The Fifth Schedule to the Constitution can be amended by Parliament. Para 7 of the Schedule empowers Parliament to amend it by way of addition, variation or repeal of any provision thereof.

These areas are treated differently from the other areas in the country because they are inhabited by aboriginals who are socially and economically rather backward, and special efforts need to be made to improve their condition. Therefore, the whole of the normal administrative machinery operating in a State is not extended to the Scheduled Areas, and the Central Government has somewhat greater responsibility for these Areas.

The executive power of a State extends to the Scheduled Areas therein. The Governor annually, or whenever required by the President, makes a report to the President regarding the administration of the Scheduled Areas. The Central Government can give directions to the State regarding the administration of such Areas.

The President may by order declare an area to be a Scheduled Area.[51] Such Areas lie in the States of Bihar, Gujarat, Madhya Pradesh and Tamil Nadu.

Each State having Scheduled Areas has a Tribes Advisory Council consisting of not more than twenty members, three-fourths of whom are to be the representatives of the Scheduled Tribes in the State Legislative Assembly. A similar Council may be created in the State which has Scheduled Tribes, but not Scheduled Areas, if the President so directs.

It will be noted that in the case of Scheduled Areas there is an obligation to create an Advisory Council, but there is no such obligation to create an Advisory Council, in case of Scheduled Tribes and the matter had been left to the discretion of the Central Government.

The Tribes Advisory Council advises on such matters pertaining to the welfare and advancement of the Scheduled Tribes as the Governor may refer to it. The Governor may direct by public notification that a law made by Parliament or the State Legislature shall not apply to a Scheduled Area, or shall apply subject to specified exceptions and modifications. [Cl. 1 of Para 5].

The Governor has power to make Regulations for the peace and good government of a Scheduled Area after consulting the Tribes Advisory Council [Cls. 2 and 5 of Para 5]. A Regulation may amend or repeal an Act of Parliament or of the State Legislature applicable to the area in question [Cl. 3 of Para 5]. A Regulation comes into force only when it is assented to by the President [Cl. 4 of Para 5]. This provision confers the "widest" power to legislate on the Governor.[52]

---

51. Cl. 6 of the V Schedule to the Constitution.
Also See, The Scheduled Areas (Part A States) Order, 1950, and The Scheduled Areas (Part B States) Order, 1950.

52. Ram Kirpal v. State of Bihar, AIR 1970 SC 951 : (1969) 3 SCC 471. For comments on the Fifth Schedule, see, Samatha v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1997 SC 3297 : (1997) 8 SCC 191.

TRIBAL AREAS IN ASSAM AND MEGHALAYA

The conditions in the Tribal Areas of Assam, Meghalaya, Tripura and Mizoram, are very different from those in the other Tribal Areas. These Tribal Areas are divided into fairly large districts inhabited by single tribes or fairly homogeneous groups of tribes with highly democratic and mutually exclusive tribal organisation. The tribes in Assam have not assimilated much the life and ways of the other people in the State.

These areas have hitherto been anthropological specimens. The tribal people in other parts of India have more or less adopted the culture of the majority of the people in whose midst they live. The Assam tribes, on the other hand, have still their roots in their own culture, customs and civilization. These areas are therefore treated differently by the Constitution, and sizeable amount of autonomy has been given to these people for self-governance. The provisions of the Sixth Schedule apply to the administration of these tribal areas.

These areas have been constituted into autonomous districts. If a district has different Scheduled Tribes, autonomous regions may be created therein by the Governor except with regard to the Bodo Land Territorial Areas Districts.[53] Each district has a District Council most of whose members are elected on adult suffrage. Some are nominated by the Governor. Nominated members hold office at the pleasure of the Governor, and are removable at his discretion. The Governor can exercise the discretionary power only according to the advice of the Council of Ministers.[54] An autonomous region has a Regional Council. A separate provision has been made for the Bodo Land Territorial Council.[55] Administration is vested in these bodies for the areas under their jurisdiction. They can make laws for certain matters of proximate interest to the tribal people, e.g., marriage, social customs, inheritance of property, village administration, shifting cultivation, forests, land, use of canal or water-course for agriculture, etc. These laws come into force after being assented to by the Governor.[56] The Autonomous Hill Councils of the Tribal Areas listed in Part I of the Table appended to clause 20 of Schedule VI as well as the Bodo Land Territorial Council have been given additional powers to make laws which are subject to the assent of the President.[57]

Power under para 2 of Schedule VI i.e. the power of the Governor to divide areas occupied by scheduled tribes is to be exercised as envisaged under various provisions of Constitution, especially Art. 163 that is on the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers. Schedule VI is a part of the Constitution.[58]

Administration of justice is carried on by village courts, the District Council or the Regional Council. The Gauhati High Court has such jurisdiction over these areas as the Governor may specify.

There is a District Fund or a Regional Fund to which all moneys received by the District Council or the Regional Council are credited. The District and Regional Councils have powers of taxation.

---

53. Vide Act 44 of 2003 dt. 7-9-2003.
54. Pu Myllai Hlychho v. State of Mizoram. (2005) 2 SCC 92 : AIR 2005 SC 1537.
55. Vide Act 44 of 2003 dt. 7-9-2003.
56. The terms "Governor" and "State Legislature", in this section mean, in case of the Union Territory of Mizoram, the "Administrator" and the Assembly of Mizoram.
57. Vide Act 44 of 2003 dt. 7-9-2003.
58. Pu Myllai Hlychho v. State of Mizoram (2005) 2 SCC 92 : AIR 2005 SC 1537.

An act or resolution of a District or Regional Council may be suspended or annul-led by the Governor if he is satisfied that it is likely to endanger the safety of India. Such an order of the Governor is to be laid before the State Legislature and it remains in force for 12 months unless revoked by the Legislature. The Legislature can pass a resolution to extend the duration of the order further by 12 months at one time.

Acts of the State Legislature dealing with a matter within the purview of the District or Regional Council applies to a district only when the District Council so directs by public notification. The Council can also make amendments in the Act. As regards other Acts of the State Legislature, the Governor is authorised to notify that they do not apply to an autonomous district or region, or that they apply subject to such modifications as the Governor may specify in the notification. In case of the State of Meghalaya, the Acts of the Legislatures prevail over those made by the District or Regional Council. As regards the Acts of Parliament, the power vests in the President to extend them, subject to such modifications as he may specify, to the autonomous districts or regions.

The Governor may appoint a commission to examine and report on any matter relating to the administration of the autonomous districts or regions. The report of the commission, the Governor's recommendations thereon and an explanatory memorandum regarding the action proposed to be taken by the Government are placed before the State Legislature. A District or Regional Council may be dissolved by the Governor on the recommendation of the commission.

It is clear that Governor shall consult the Council of Ministers and consultation with District/Regional Council is optional. On facts, merely because Governor consulted the Council of Ministers for nominating the four members, and the file for nominating the new members was initiated by the Council of Ministers it cannot be assumed that Governor failed to exercise his discretionary powers.[59]

The State Government pays to a District Council an agreed share of the royalties arising each year from licences and leases for prospecting and extraction of minerals from any areas in the district. In case of a dispute regarding the share of royalties, the Governor decides the matter 'in his discretion'. This clause indicates that in all other matters pertaining to the Tribal Areas in the Schedule, the Governor acts on the advice of the Ministers.[60]

The provisions of the Sixth Schedule may be amended from time to time by Parliament by making a law for the purpose. Any changes introduced by Parliamentary legislation in the Sixth Schedule are not to be deemed to amount to an amendment of the Constitution for the purposes of Art. 368.[61]

Provisions have been made under Art. 244A for creation, by a law of Parliament, of an autonomous State within the State of Assam consisting of the Tribal Areas mentioned in Part I of clause 20 of the VI Schedule.[62] Details have

---

59. Pu Myllai Hlychho v. State of Mizoram (2005) 2 SCC 92 : AIR 2005 SC 1537.

60. Cf. See, comments of Hidayatullah, J., in Edwingson v. State of Assam, AIR 1966 SC 1220, 1240 : (1966) 2 SCR 770.

The learned Judge holds that the Governor has special responsibilities in relation to the administration of the Tribal Areas in Assam. Also see (1967) JILI, 237.

61. For Art. 368, see, Ch. XLI, infra.

62. These Areas are: The North Cachar Hills District and The Mikir Hills District.

not been worked out in the constitutional provisions but have been left to Parliament.

The autonomous State may have an elected Legislature and a Council of Ministers. The Act of Parliament will specify the matters enumerated in List II or III with respect to which the Autonomous State Legislature will have power to make laws.

The idea underlying Art. 244A is that "consistent with the need to provide adequate scope for the political aspirations of the hill people, and the well-being of the people inhabiting the other parts of the State of Assam, the over-all unity should be preserved."[63]

The autonomous state of Meghalaya was constituted in exercise of the power under Art. 244A. With effect from January 21, 1972, Meghalaya has been upgraded as a full-fledged State. Later, another State of Mizoram was created in 1987.

A North-Eastern Council has been set up, to provide for a unified and coordinated approach to the development of the entire region. This region comprises the States of Assam, Manipur, Meghalaya, Nagaland, Tripura, Arunachal Pradesh and Mizoram. The Council consists of the Governors and Chief Ministers of the States, and a Union Minister to be nominated by the President. The Council is an advisory body. It may discuss any matter in which some States may be interested and may advise the Central Government and the State Governments as to the action to be taken.[64]

D. SIKKIM

By the Constitution (Thirty-Fifth Amendment) Act, 1974,[65] Sikkim was associated with the Union of India as an "Associated State". This did not satisfy the aspirations of the people of Sikkim as they wanted to be an integral part of India as a full-fledged state. To give effect to the wishes of the people, Parliament passed the Constitution (Thirty-Sixth Amendment) Act, 1975,[66] which on being ratified by eleven State Legislatures became effective on May 16, 1975. Sikkim thus became a State of the Indian Union. The Amendment introduced Art. 371F laying down some special provisions applicable to Sikkim to provide for certain peculiar circumstances prevailing there.

The State of Sikkim has one seat each in the Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha. Under a newly added Article [Art. 371F], Parliament has been given power to provide for the number of seats in the Sikkim Legislative Assembly (which cannot be less than thirty) which may be filled by candidates belonging to different sections of the people of the State. This has been done to protect the rights and interests of the different sections of the State population.

Another provision in this Article confers special responsibility on the Governor of Sikkim for peace and for an equitable arrangement for ensuring the social and economic advancement of different sections of the State population. In dis-

---

63. The proposal was announced in Parliament on September, 11, 1968.
64. For details, see, The North-Eastern Council Act, 1971.
65. See, Ch XLII, infra, for the Constitution Amendment.
66. See, Ch. XLII, infra, for the Amendment.

charge of this responsibility, the Governor is subject to such directions as may be issued by the President from time to time.

Sikkim has a High Court of its own. Clause (k) of Art. 371F guarantees continued operation to earlier Sikkim laws even though they may be inconsistent with the Constitution until these laws are amended or repealed by a competent legislature or any other authority.[67]

Article 371F(f) authorises Parliament to reserve seats in the Sikkim Legislative Assembly for different sections of the population of Sikkim for the purpose of protecting their rights and interests. Accordingly, Parliament has reserved certain seats for ethnic and religious groups. In terms of Art. 371F, Parliament has reserved 12 out of 32 seats for the Sikkimese of "Bhutia-Lepcha" origin and one seat for the "Sangha", the Budhist Lamaic Monastries.

This provision was challenged as unconstitutional. Two questions were brought before the Supreme Court for decision, viz.: (1) whether a seat can be earmarked in the State Legislative for a representative of a group of religious institutions to be elected by them; (2) whether seats can be reserved in favour of a particular tribe far in excess of its population.

It was argued that Art. 371F(f) itself violated the basic features of the Constitution. It was also argued that the statutory provisions for reserving seats, were also unconstitutional as violative of a basic feature of the Constitution, such as, the democratic principle.[68] However, in R.C. Poudyal v. Union of India,[69] the Supreme Court rejected the argument. The reservation in favour of certain groups was held necessary because of the state of development of the newly admitted State of Sikkim. The Court by majority ruled that the principle of "'one person one vote' is in its very nature considerably tolerant of imbalances and departures from a very strict application and enforcement". The court went on to observe : "The provision in the Constitution indicating proportionality of representation is necessarily a broad, general and logical principle but not intended to be expressed with arithmetical precision". Adjustments are possible having regard to the political maturity, awareness and degree of political development in different parts of India.

The inequalities in the case of Sikkim in representation "are an inheritance and compulsion from the past. Historical considerations have justified a differential treatment". The reservation of one seat in favour of Sangha was justified on the ground that though it was a religious institution yet it was closely interwoven with the political and social life of Sikkim.

E. MIZORAM

Article 371G makes some special provisions with regard to the State of Mizoram. It provides, that "notwithstanding anything in the Constitution", no parliamentary law in respect of religious or social practices of the Mizos, Mizo customary law and procedure, administration of civil and criminal justice involving decisions according to Mizo customary law, ownership and transfer of land, shall apply to the State of Mizoram unless the State Legislative Assembly by a resolution so decides.

---

67. Purna Bahadur Subba v. Sabitri Devi Chhetrini, AIR 1982 NOC. 311.
68. For further discussion on this aspect, see, Ch. XLI, infra.
69. AIR 1993 SC 1804 : 1984 Supp (1) SCC 324; see, supra, Ch. V.

F. ARUNACHAL PRADESH

According to Art. 371HF, the Governor of Arunachal Pradesh has been entrusted with special responsibility with respect to law and order in the State. In discharging this function, the Governor after consulting his Council of Ministers, exercise his individual judgment as to the action to be taken.

The President can by an order put an end to this special responsibility of the Governor, if after receiving a report from the Governor or otherwise, the President is satisfied that it is no longer necessary for the Governor to have any such responsibility.

G. TRIPURA

According to Art. 332(3B) added by the 72nd Constitution Amendment, in the Tripura Legislative Assembly, the number of seats reserved for the Scheduled Tribes "shall be such numbers of seats as bears to the total number of seats, a proportion not less than the number, as on the date of coming into force of the Constitution (Seventy-Second Amendment) Act, 1992,[70] of members belonging to the Scheduled Tribes in the Legislative Assembly in existence on the said date bears to the total number of seats in that Assembly."

The provision means that the proportion of seats reserved for S/Ts to the total number of seats in the Assembly will continue to be the same as it existed on the date of enforcement of the 72nd Amendment of the Constitution.

On the relevant date, the S/Ts had 20 seats in the Assembly having a membership of 60. On the basis of the proportion of their population to the total state population, they would be entitled to 17 seats. Thus, the formula contained in the 72nd Amendment gave the S/Ts a few more seats than they would be entitled on a population basis.

This provision was challenged on the ground of being against the 'basic feature' of the Constitution contained in Art. 332(3),[71] viz. that the S/Ts would be entitled to the seats in the State Legislature in proportion to their population. The Supreme Court however rejected the challenge on several grounds,[72] viz., the provision was of a transient nature; referring to Poudyal,[73] the court said that the concept of "one person one vote" could not be enforced with mathematical precision; the provision was justifiable in the context of the factual situation prevailing on the ground in Tripura; the provision promoted the constitutional value—"social, economic and political justice to the people of India".

H. VILLAGE PANCHAYATS

The Constitution (Seventy-Third Amendment) Act, 1992,[74] has been enacted to strengthen the panchayat system in villages in a bid to strengthen democratic institutions at the grass root level. The underlying idea is to make panchayats as vibrant units of self government and local administration in the rural areas so that they can subserve the teeming millions living there. The Amendment is of his-

---

70. For the specific Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.
71. For this constitutional provision, see, Ch. XXXV, infra.
72. Subrata Acharjee v. Union of India, (2002) 2 SCC 725 : AIR 2002 SC 843.
73. Poudyal, see, footnote 69, supra.
74. For the Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.

toric value as it is designed to establish strong, effective and democratic local administration. It is hoped that this will lead to rapid implementation of rural development programmes.

Until the enactment of the 73rd Amendment of the Constitution, the panchayat system was based purely on State laws and the functioning of the system was very sporadic. The Constitutional Amendment seeks to strengthen the system by giving it constitutional protection. A new Part, Part IX, has been added to the Constitution consisting of Arts. 243 to 243-O. A new Schedule, viz., Eleventh Schedule, has also been added to the Constitution.[75]

Following its earlier decision[76] it has been held that Part IX of the Constitution or Article 243 makes no change in the essential feature of the Panchayat Organization. It was pointed out that what was sought to be done by the Seventy-third Amendments which inserted Part IX was to confer Constitutional status on District Panchayat, Taluka Panchayat and Village Panchayats as instruments of local self government.[77]

The notable feature of these constitutional provisions is that these are in the nature of basic provisions which need to be supplemented by law made by the respective State Legislature. The reason is that local government including the self-governing institutions for the rural areas, is exclusively a State subject under entry 5, List II.[78] Parliament does not have legislative power to enact any law relating to village panchayats. However, it is open to the Centre, if statutorily authorised, to extend the provisions of State legislation on panchayats to Union Territories.[79]

Under these Constitutional provisions, panchayats are to be established in every State at the village, intermediate and district levels [Art. 243B]. Art. 243(d) defines "panchayat" as an institution of self-government constituted under Art. 243-B, for the rural areas. There will be direct elections to all these bodies by the electorate from territorial constituencies in the respective panchayat area [Art. 243C(2)]. The detailed provisions are to be made by the State Governments by passing laws subject to the Constitutional provisions contained in Part IX of the Constitution now introduced by the 73rd Constitutional Amendment. [Art. 243C(1)].[80] Where the appropriate Government had failed to create the posts necessary for discharge of duties under the relevant statute, the Court directed the Government to create such posts.[81] According to Art. 243A, a gram sabha exer-

---

75. For comments on these constitutional provisions, see, Velpur Gram Panchayat v. Asstt. Director of Marketing, Guntur, AIR 1998 AP 142.

76. Kishan Singh Tomar v. Municipal Corporation, (2006) 8 SCC 352 : AIR 2007 SC 269.

77. Gujarat Pradesh Panchayat Parishadn v. State of Gujarat, (2007) 7 SCC 718 : (2007) 9 JT 503.

78. For these entries and lists, see, infra, Ch. X.

79. In exercise of powers conferred under section 87 of the Punjab Reorganisation Act, 1966, the Central Government notified that the provisions of the Punjab Panchayati Raj Act, 1994 would be applicable to the Union Territory of Chandigarh. See in this connection UT Chandigarh v. Avtar Singh, (2002) 10 SCC 432.

80. For discussion on Art. 243C, see, Jagdish Prasad Bhunjwa v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1997 MP 184; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Pradhan, Sangh Kshettra Samiti, AIR 1995 SC 1512 : 1995 Supp (2) SCC 305. See also Lalit Mohan Pandey v. Pooran Singh, (2004) 6 SCC 626 : AIR 2004 SC 2303.

81. UT Chandigarh v. Avtar Singh, (2002) 10 SCC 432.

cises such powers and performs such functions at the village level as the State Legislature may by law provide.

Article 243-D(1) mandates that seats be reserved for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes in every panchayat. Art. 243-D(4) also directs that the offices of the chairpersons in the panchayats at the village or any other level shall be reserved for the Scheduled Castes, the Scheduled Tribes and women in such manner as the State Legislature may, by law, provide.[82]

Under 243D(6), a State Legislature may make any provision for reservation of seats in any panchayat or offices of chairpersons in the panchayats at any level in favour of "backward class of citizens". The expression "Backward class" has not been defined. The Patna High Court has ruled that "it is well within the domain of the legislative to determine as to who is the Backward class and the caste can be one of the factors for such determination."[83]

According to Art 243C(5), the chairperson at the intermediate or district level panchayat is to be elected by the elected members thereof. The chairperson of the village panchayat is to be elected in such manner as the State Legislature may provide by law.

Article 243F lays down the disqualifications for membership. Under Art. 243E, the normal tenure of a panchayat is five years unless sooner dissolved under the law made by the State.

Under Art. 243G, the State Legislature may, by law, endow the panchayats with such powers and authority as may be necessary to enable them to function as institutions of self government. Such a law may contain provisions for the devolution of powers and responsibilities upon panchayats with respect to—(a) the preparation of plans for economic development and social justice; (b) the implementation of schemes for economic development and social justice as may be entrusted to them including those in relation to the matters listed in the XI Schedule to the Constitution.[84] A provision making a person having more than two living children ineligible to contest for the post of Panch or Sarpanch has been held to be Constitutional and in keeping with the objective of popularising socio-economic welfare and healthcare of the masses. [85]

Under Art. 243H, the State Legislature may confer power on panchayats to levy and collect specified taxes, duties, tolls and fees. Under Art. 243I, the State Government has to constitute a Finance Commission after every five years to review the financial position of panchayats and suggest ways and means to strengthen their financial position.

Under Art. 243K, elections to panchayats are to be conducted under the supervision of the State Election Commission. This provision ensures that all elections to panchayats are completely free from fear and political interference. Art. 243-O imposes restrictions on calling into question any election to a panchayat

---

82. Vinayakrao Gangaramji Deshmukh v. P.C. Agarwal, AIR 1999 Bom. 142; Jagdish Prasad Bhunjwa v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1997 MP 184.

83. Kirshna Kumar Mishra v. State of Bihar, AIR 1996 Pat 112.
Also see in this connection, discussion under Art. 15(4), infra, Ch. XXII; Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217, infra, Ch. XXIII.

84. See, Mukesh Kumar Ajmera v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1997 Raj 250.

85. Javed v State of Haryana, (2003) 8 SCC 369 : AIR 2003 SC 3057.

except through an election petition before a prescribed authority. Art. 243-O also bars challenge in a court of law to the validity of any law relating to delimitation of constituencies or the allotment of seats to such constituencies made under Art. 243-K. As Art. 243-O is pari passu with Art. 243ZG relating to municipalities the effect of Art. 243-O is discussed later along with Art. 243ZG.[86]

Under Art. 243-I, within one year of the 73rd Constitutional Amendment coming into force, and thereafter every 5 years, the State Government is required to appoint a finance commission to review the financial position of the panchayats.

Arts. 243 to 243-O provide for the constitution of panchayats, the terms of the members of panchayats, reservations to be made in the panchayats. Any law made by a State Legislature which runs counter to the said constitutional provisions, requires to be declared as unconstitutional.[87]

I. MUNICIPAL BODIES

Municipal bodies are units of local administration in urban areas. For legislative purposes, they fall within the domain of State Legislatures under entries 5 and 6, List II.

Although municipal bodies have been in existence in India for long, their functioning, on the whole, has not been satisfactory. As a means of decentralisation of power, Parliament has enacted the Constitution (Seventy-fourth Amendment) Act, 1992 inserting Arts. 243P to 243ZG in the Constitution.[88]

The 74th Amendment seeks to strengthen the institution of municipal bodies so as to make them effective democratic institutions at the grass root level in urban areas. The Amendment seeks to promote greater participation by the people in self-rule. The underlying ideas is to place local self-government in urban areas on a sound effective footing. The Amendment lays down the framework to which the State Legislation concerning municipalities has to conform with.

A Nagar Panchayat is to be established in a place in transition from rural to urban area. [Art. 243Q(1)(a)]. A Municipal Council is to be established for a smaller urban area [Art. 243Q(1)(b)] and a Municipal Corporation for a larger urban area [Art. 243Q(1)(c)]. All these bodies are to be directly elected.[89]

The State Government is to specify "a transitional area", "a smaller urban area", or "a larger urban area", keeping the following factors in view: the population of the area, the density of the population therein, the revenue generated for local administration, the percentage of employment in non-agricultural activities, the economic importance, such other factors as may be deemed fit [Art. 243-Q(2)].

According to Art. 243P (e), "Municipality" means an institution of self-government constituted under Art. 243(Q). Art. 243T provides for reservation of seats in every municipality for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes and also for women. Under Art. 243R, all seats in a Municipality are to be filled

---

86. See, infra, Sec. H.
87. Lakshmappa Kallappa v. State of Karnataka, AIR 2000 Knt. 61.
88. For the Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.
89. Saij Gram Panchayat v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1999 SC 826 : (1999) 2 SCC 366; S. Shekhar v. Commissioner/Returning Officer, Bangalore City Corporation, AIR 1999 Kant 174.

by persons chosen by direct election from the territorial constituencies in the Municipal area. For this purpose, each Municipal area is to be divided into territorial constituencies known as wards.

Article 243-T provides for reservation of seats for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes on the basis of their population and the total population in the municipal area. Of these seats, seats are to be reserved for women belonging to Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. Of the total number of seats to be filled in a municipality by direct election, seats are to be reserved for women including the seats reserved for women of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.

Under Art. 243U, the normal tenure of a municipality is five years unless sooner dissolved under the relevant law. But before its dissolution, the Municipality is to be given a reasonable opportunity of being heard.[90] The requirement to hold an election before the expiry of 5 years is mandatory and may not be deviated from except under very exceptional circumstance such as an Act of God.[91] However in State of Maharashtra v. Jalgaon Municipal Council,[92] more latitude was granted in the case of conversion of a Municipal Council to a Corporation.

Article 243-W authorises the State Legislature to confer such powers and authority as may be necessary to enable the municipalities to function as institutions of self government.[93] The municipalities may be authorised to prepare plans for economic development and social justice. Under 243-X, the State Legislature may by law authorise a Municipality "to levy, collect and appropriate such taxes, duties, tolls and fees" as may be specified in law. This provision makes it clear that even under the new scheme, the municipalities have not been assigned any independent powers of taxation. The concerned State Legislature has to pass a law to confer taxing powers on the municipalities.

Under Art. 243Y, the State Government is to appoint a Finance Commission to review the financial position of the Municipalities and make suitable recommendations to strengthen municipal finances. The commission may recommend distribution of taxing powers between the State and the Municipalities, giving of grants-in-aid by the State to the Municipalities, and other measures needed to improve the financial position of the Municipalities.

Elections to Municipalities are to be supervised by the State Election Commission [Art. 243ZA]. Under Art. 243ZG, no election to a Municipality is to be called in question except through an election petition presented to such authority as may be provided for by law. Art. 243ZG also says that the validity of a law relating to the delimitation of wards or constituencies for a municipality, or the allotment of seats to such constituencies made under Art. 243ZA "shall not be questioned in any court".

---

90. In K. Pramila Patnaik v. State of Orissa, AIR 2001 Ori 190, a government order dissolving a municipality was quashed by the High Court because no hearing had been given to the municipality as required by Art. 243-O.
The High Court has rightly ruled that the provisions of the relevant State Act "should be read in consonance with the provision contained in the Constitution."
Ibid., at 192.

91. PER PASAYAT, J: In re Special Reference 1 of 2002 : (2002) 8 SCC 237 : AIR 2003 SC 87 affirmed in Shanti G. Patel v. State of Maharashtra, (2006) 2 SCC 505 : AIR 2006 SC 1104.

92. (2003) 9 SCC 731 : AIR 2003 SC 1659.

93. Municipal Board, Hapur v. Jassa Singh, AIR 1997 SC 2689 : (1996) 10 SCC 377.

But a delimitation order can be challenged as it does not have the force of law.[1]

Article 243ZE requires constitution of a Metropolitan Planning Committee in every Metropolitan Area. A Metropolitan Area means an area having a population of 10 lakhs or more. The purpose of the Committee is to prepare a development plan for the Metropolitan area as a whole.

It may be noted that Arts. 243 to 243ZG dealing with Panchayats and Municipalities are in the nature of basic provisions which only lay down the outlines of the envisaged system of panchayats and municipalities. These provisions need to be supplemented by legislation in each State defining the details.

The interpretation of Arts. 243-O and 243ZG has caused some dichotomy in judicial opinion. The question for the consideration of the courts has been : how far do these constitutional provision which contain privative clauses and bar judicial review, restrict or limit the jurisdiction of the High Courts under Art. 226.

By and large two different judicial views seem to have emerged on this question. One view arises from a purely literal reading to these provisions. The other view is based on a constitutional fundamental, viz., judicial review is a basic feature of the Constitution[2] which can be limited neither by a statutory provision nor even by a constitutional amendment.

In State of Uttar Pradesh v. Pradhan Sangh Kshettra Samiti,[3] the Supreme Court ruled that neither delimitation of the panchayat area nor of the constituencies in the said areas and the allotment of seats to the constituencies, could be challenged nor could the court entertain such a challenge except on the ground that before the delimitation no objections were invited andno hearing was given. Even such a challenge could not be entertained after the notification for holding elections was issued.

In Jaspal Singh Arora v. State of Madhya Pradesh,[4] the Supreme Court has ruled that in view of the statutory mode provided by the State Act, and also Art. 243-ZG, the election of the President of the municipal council could not be challenged through a writ petition.

In Anugrah Narain Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[5] the Supreme Court has ruled that once a notification for municipal election has been issued, there arises a "complete and absolute bar" in terms of Art. 243ZG in considering "any matter relating to municipal elections on any ground whatever. No election to a municipality can be quashed except by an election petition".

When election is imminent or well under way, the court should not intervene to stop the election process. "If this is allowed to be done, no election will ever take place, because someone or the other will always find some-excuse to move the Court and stall the elections".[6] The Court did accept the proposition that an order of delimitation of municipal areas could be challenged as it is not law and

---

1. Anugrah Narain Singh v. State of U.P., infra, footnote 5.
2. On this question, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
3. AIR 1995 SC 1512 : 1995 Supp (2) SCC 305.
4. (1998) 9 SCC 594.
5. (1996) 6 SCC 303 : (1996) 8 JT 733.
6. Also see, G.K. Durga v. State Election Commissioner, AIR 2001 AP 519.

is, thus, not beyond challenge under Art. 243ZG. It can be challenged on the ground of colourable exercise of power or of any other ground of arbitrariness.

In Shiv Shankar Dubey v. State Election Commission,[7] the High Court has ruled that in view of Art. 243-O(b), the High Court cannot interfere under Art. 226 with an order passed by the State Election Commission recounting of ballots.

In Lal Chand v. State of Haryana,[8] a full Bench of the Punjab and Haryana High Court entertained writ petitions challenging election of members to a gram panchayat and a municipal committee. The High Court argued, and rightly so, that judicial review is a fundamental and basic feature of the Constitution which cannot be taken away even by a constitutional amendment. Therefore, argued the court, Arts. 243-O and 243-ZG would have to be read subject to Arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution. This means that the High Court would have power to entertain a writ petition with regard to challenge to election to any panchayat or municipality in spite of the bar imposed by the two constitutional provisions in question. The High Court may, however, keeping in view the facts and circumstances of the case, relegate the petitioner to the remedy available before the election tribunal.

In Prem Nath Bhatia v. State of Punjab,[9] the High Court has ruled that an order dealing with delimitation of wards is not 'law' and so it is not beyond challenge through a writ petition because of Art. 243ZG. But such a challenge ought to be made before the process of election is put into motion and soon after the final order is passed.

In S. Fakruddin v. Govt. of A.P.,[10] after reviewing several Supreme Court cases declaring judicial review as a basic feature of the Constitution, the High Court has come to the conclusion that the bar contained in Art. 243-O is to "the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts and not to extraordinary jurisdiction under Art. 226 of the Constitution and Art. 136 thereof." Art. 243-O does not take away the power of the High Court under Art. 226 to examine the validity of any law relating to elections. However, in the facts and circumstances of a case, the court may refrain to interfere except on grounds of jurisdictional error if there is available an alternative, effective and independent mechanism.

In V. Kunhabdulla v. State of Kerala,[11] the High Court has asserted that it can interfere under Art. 226, in spite of the privative clauses, with the decision of the State Election Commission delimiting constituencies on the ground of misuse of power and when the election process has not yet started. In such a situation, "absence of judicial review will create a constitutional despot beyond the pale of accountability." Art. 243-O cannot apply in a case where the action of the Election Commission affects the very purity and probity of the election cutting at the very root of the democratic process. "The power of judicial review being a basic structure of the Constitution is very much available to see that the election commission has acted within the contours of the Constitution and the law" inspite of Arts. 243-O and Art. 243ZG.

---

7. AIR 2000 All 336.
8. AIR 1999 P&H 1 (FB).
9. AIR 1997 P&H 309.
10. AIR 1996 AP 33.
11. AIR 2000 Ker 376 at 382.

There are very good reasons for taking the view that the privative clauses contained in Arts. 243-O and 243ZG should not be allowed to curtail judicial review under Arts. 226 and 32. This is because of the constitutional fundamental, accepted by the Supreme Court in a large number of cases,[12] that judicial review is a basic feature of the Constitution which cannot be diluted by any constitutional amendment. In some pronouncements, the analogy of Art. 329 has been brought in to interpret Arts. 243-O and 243ZG. But, on a deeper consideration, this analogy is not correct even though the phraseology of all these provisions is similar. There is a fundamental difference between Art. 329 and the other constitutional provisions.[13]

Article 329 is part and parcel of the original Constitution, and its interpretation became established before the doctrine of 'basic features of the Constitution' emerged. On the other hand, Arts. 243-O and 243ZG were added to the Constitution through constitutional amendments very much after the doctrine of judicial review being a basic feature of the Constitution had become very well established. Further, there are two more crucial reasons for the High Courts to exercise writ jurisdiction under Art. 226 in relation to the electoral process for panchayats and municipalities, viz.:

(1) Unlike the Election Commission established under Art. 324 which is an independent body,[14] the State Election Commissions are established by State laws and these bodies cannot claim the same objectivity and independence as the Election Commission which is a constitutional body. There is always a possibility of the State Commissions misusing their powers as is borne out by Kunhabdulla, cited above;

(2) The election tribunals under the Representation of the People Act are the High Courts. The election tribunals under the State laws are constituted by retired civil servants and/or subordinate courts. Needless to say that these bodies ought to be subject to judicial superintendence of the High Courts under Arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution.[15]

12. See, infra, Ch. XLI.
13. For Art. 329, see, Ch. XIX, infra.
14. Ibid.
15. See, Ch. VIII, supra, for these Articles of the Constitution.

PART IV

THE FEDERAL SYSTEM

A. INTRODUCTION

Federalism constitutes a complex governmental mechanism for governance of a country. It has been evolved to bind into one political union several autonomous, distinct, separate and disparate political entities or administrative units. It seeks to draw a balance between the forces working in favour of concentration of power in the centre and those urging a dispersal of it in a number of units. It thus seeks to reconcile unity with multiplicity, centralisation with decentralisation and nationalism with localism.[1]

The originality of the federal system lies in that power is, at one and the same time, concentrated as well as divided. There is centralisation of administration and legislation in certain respects along with decentralisation in other respects. A federal constitution establishes a dual polity as it comprises two levels of government. At one level, there exists a Central Government having jurisdiction over the whole country and reaching down to the person and property of every individual therein. At the other level, there exist the regional governments, each of which exercises, jurisdiction in one of the regions or administrative units into which the country is divided under the constitution. A citizen of a federal country thus becomes subject to the decrees of two governments—the Central and the regional. The regional governments are called the State Governments as in the U.S.A, Australia or India, or Provincial Governments as in Canada.

The two levels of government divide and share the totality of governmental functions and powers between themselves. The distribution of legislative powers

1. On Federalism generally see: DICEY, LAW OF THE CONSTITUTION, Ch. III, 138 et seq. (1952); Federalism; Problems and Methods, 4 International Bulletin of Social Science, 5 et seq. (1952): BOWIE, PROBLEMS OF FEDERALISM; WHEARE, FEDERAL GOVERNMENT; SCHWARTZ, AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, Chs. II & VI; FRIEDRICH & BOWIE, STUDIES IN FEDERALISM; MCWHINNEY, COMPARATIVE FEDERALISM (1962); SAWER, MODERN FEDERALISM (1969); RIKER, FEDERALISM; ORIGIN, OPERATION, SIGNIFICANCE (1964); LIVINGSTONE, FEDERALISM AND CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE (1956); JAIN, Federal Grants-in-aid in the U.S.A., 1956 VYAVAHARA NIRANAYA, 245; JAIN, Some Aspects of Indian Federalism, 28 JI. of Max-Plank Inst., 301-364 (1968); JAIN, Federalism in India, 6 JILI, 355 (1965); ALICE JACOB, Centre-State Governmental Relations in the Indian Federal System, X JILI., 583 (1968); S.N. JAIN, Freedom of Trade and Commerce and Restraints on the State Power to tax Sale in the course of Inter-State Trade and Commerce, X JILI 547 (1968); M.P. JAIN, Indian Federalism—A Background Paper in I.L.I., Constitutional Developments since Independence, 205-254 (1974); SETALVAD, UNION AND STATE RELATIONS UNDER THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION (1974); JAIN & KASHYAP, THE UNION & THE STATE (1972); REPORT OF THE SARKARIA COMMISSION ON CENTRE-STATE RELATIONS (1988).

between the Centre and the States is the most important characteristic, rather the core, of any federal system. In reality the whole federal system revolves around this basic core of distribution of powers. A federal constitution thus envisages a demarcation or division of governmental functions and powers between the Centre and the regions by the sanction of the Constitution itself which is usually a written document and also a rigid one, i.e., which is not capable of amendment easily. From this follow two necessary consequences—

(1) that any invasion by one level of government on the area assigned to the other level of government is a breach of the constitution; and

(2) that such a breach of the constitution is a justiciable issue to be determined by the courts. Each level of government thus functions within the area assigned to it by the constitution.

The several governments do not, however, function in watertight compartments. They come in contact with each other at many points. Their areas of operation and functioning cross and intersect in several respects thus creating a variety of governmental relations between the Centre and the regions and between the regions inter se. The pattern of intergovernmental relations in a federal country is not static; it is dynamic and is constantly finding a new balance in response to the centripetal and centrifugal forces operating in the country.

As contradistinguished with the federal constitution, there is the unitary constitution in which the Central Government is supreme. There may, and usually do, exist local governments in a unitary state having certain assigned functions to discharge, but these local governments exist, at the sufferance of the Centre, and their area of operation is confined to what the Centre seeks to confer on them which may be curtailed, restricted and modified by the Centre and at its own will.

The local units in a unitary constitution have no higher status than mere administrative agencies of the Central Government. The constitutional status of the constituent units in a federation is comparatively more permanent, more enduring, more immutable and they possess a much larger amount of functional autonomy than what the local governments enjoy in a unitary constitution.

The units in a federation act under the constitution; their functions are governed under it and their area of operation can be changed only by an amendment in the constitutional law, i.e., by a constituent process and it cannot ordinarily be done at the instance solely of the Federal Government. The units in a federation thus have their own identity and personality and have their own separate functions to discharge apart from the Federal Government.

The Constitution of India establishes a dual polity in the country, consisting of the Union Government and the State Governments.[2] The States are the regional administrative units into which the country has been divided and, thus, India has been characterised as the Union of States [Art. 1(1)][3]. The fabric of the Indian federal system stands on three pillars, viz., a strong Central Government, flexible federal system and co-operative federalism.[4] This will be apparent as we go along with the discussion of the details of the Indian federal system in the following pages.

---

2. Supra, Chs. II—VIII.
3. Supra, Ch. V.
4. Infra, Ch. XIV

The strength of the Centre lies in its large legislative[5] and financial[6] powers and in its emergency powers.[7] The flexibility of the Indian Federalism lies in the expedients adopted in the Constitution to mitigate the rigidity of a federal system and to increase temporarily the powers of the Central Government if the contemporary situation so demands.[8] The formal method to amend the federal portion of the Constitution is also not so rigid as is to be found in other federations.[9] The concept of co-operative federalism has been worked out in a number of constitutional provisions as well as strengthened through legislation and administrative practices.[10]

The framers of the Indian Constitution learnt a great deal from the experiences—the problems faced and the solutions attempted—of the Federations of the U.S.A., Canada and Australia. The approach of the framers of the Indian Constitution was conditioned in good measure by the knowledge of the working of these Federations. They have tried to incorporate in the Indian Federal Structure the main developments in those Federations, and have also sought to avoid the difficulties faced therein from time to time. But, still, the Indian Federal System breaks some new ground and the Indian Constitution contains some novel provisions which are not to be found in other Federations.[11]

5. Chapter X, infra.
6. Chapter XI, infra.
7. Infra. Chapter XIII.
8. Chs. X, XI, XII and XIII, infra.
9. Ch. XLI, infra.
10. Infra, Chapter XIV.
11. Supra, Chapter I; also see, infra, Chs. X-XIV .

CHAPTER X

LEGISLATIVE RELATIONS

SYNOPSIS

There is in a federation, a division of functions between the Centre and the regions, known as the State Governments in India. This division of functions is two-fold—from the point of view of :

(i) Territory, and

(ii) The subject-matter.

A. TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION TO LEGISLATE

From the territorial point of view, Parliament may make laws for the whole of India, or a part thereof [Art. 245(1)]. A law made by Parliament is not invalid merely because it has an extra-territorial operation [Art. 245(2)].

As explained by KANIA, C.J., in A.H. Wadia v. Income-tax Commissioner:[1] "In the case of sovereign legislature, questions of extra-territoriality of any enactment can never be raised in the municipal Courts as a ground for challenging its validity. The legislation may offend the rules of international law, may not be recognised by foreign Courts or there may be practical difficulties in enforcing them but these are questions of policy with which the domestic tribunals are not concerned."

Accordingly, the government can proceed under the Hindu Marriage Act against a Hindu who returns to India after marrying a second wife in a foreign country, for the Act applies to all Hindus who are domiciled in India but who may be outside India for the time being.

A State Legislature, on the other hand, may make laws only for the State concerned [Art. 245(1)]. A State Legislature has no legislative competence to make laws having extra-territorial operation. A State can legislate effectively only for its own territory. A State law can affect persons, properties or things within the State and not outside the State. A State law is not immune from challenge in a Court on the ground of extra-territorial operation. A State law having operation outside the State is not valid.

A State law is not valid if it purports to affect men and property outside the State. A State law may apply to persons within its territory, to property—moveable and immovable—situated within the State, or to acts and events which occur within its borders. To decide whether or not a State law has an extra-territorial operation, the doctrine of territorial nexus is invoked.

The doctrine of territorial nexus is applied to find out whether a particular State law has extra-territorial operation. It signifies that the object to which the law applies need not be physically located within the territorial boundaries of the State, but what is necessary is that it should have a sufficient territorial connection with the State. If there is a territorial nexus between the subject-matter of the Act and the State making the law, then the statute in question is not regarded as having extra-territorial operation.

Thus, a State may levy a tax on a person, property, object or transaction not only when it is situated within its territorial limits, but also when it has a sufficient and real territorial connection with it.

The principle of territorial nexus can be illustrated with reference to an old case. A company was incorporated in the United Kingdom and had its control and management exclusively situated there. A member of it carried on business in India. The company made an overall profit of which a major part accrued from India. It was held that India could levy an income-tax on the entire income of the company, and not only on the portion accruing from India, for there was a sufficient territorial nexus between the company and India for this purpose.[2]

---

1. AIR 1949 FC 18, 25.

The Bihar legislature enacted the Bihar Hindu Religious Trusts Act, 1950, for the protection and preservation of properties appertaining to the Hindu religious trusts. The Act applied to all trusts any part of which was situated in the State of Bihar. A question was raised whether the Act would apply to trust properties situated outside the State of Bihar. Applying the doctrine of territorial nexus, the Supreme Court held that the Act could affect the trust property situated outside Bihar, but appertaining to a trust situated in Bihar where the trustees functioned. The Act aims to provide for the better administration of Hindu religious trusts in the State of Bihar. This aim is sought to be achieved by exercising control over the trustees in personam. The trust being situated in Bihar, the State has legislative power over it and also over its trustees. The Act thus has no extra-territorial operation. The fact that the trust is situated in Bihar gives enough territorial connection to enable the Bihar legislature to make a law with regard to such a trust.

What is necessary is that the connection between the trust and the property appertaining thereto is real and not illusory and that the religious institution and the property appertaining thereto form one integrated whole.[3] "It cannot be disputed that if the religious endowment is itself situated in Bihar and the trustees function there, the connection between the religious institution and the property appertaining thereto form one integrated whole and one cannot be dissociated from the other. If, therefore, any liability is imposed on the trustees, such liability must affect the trust property."

In State of Bombay v. RMDC,[4] the respondent, the organiser of a prize competition, was outside the State of Bombay. The paper through which the prize competition was conducted was printed and published outside the State of Bombay but it had a wide circulation within the State of Bombay. Most of the activities which the gambler was expected to undertake took place within the State. A tax levied by the State of Bombay on lotteries and prize competitions was extended to the newspapers published outside the State "in a lump sum having regard to the circulation or distribution of the newspaper" in the State.

The provision was questioned on the ground that it purported to affect men residing and carrying on business outside the State. Nevertheless, it was held valid because the newspapers although printed and published outside Bombay had a wide circulation there; they had collectors in Bombay to collect the entry fee for the competition. The State sought to collect the tax only on the amount received by the newspapers from the State and, therefore, there was sufficient territorial nexus entitling the State of Bombay to impose a tax on the gambling that took place within its boundaries. Therefore, the law could not be struck down on the ground of extra-territoriality.

---

2. Wallace v. Income-tax Commissioner, AIR 1948 P.C. 118.
Also see, Wadia, supra, note 1.

3. State of Bihar v. Charusila Dasi, AIR 1959 SC 1002 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 601; State of Bihar v. Bhabapritananda, AIR 1959 SC 1073.
Also, Ananta Prasad v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1963 SC 853.

4. State of Bombay v. RMD Chamarbaugwala, AIR 1958 SC 699.

A State is entitled to levy a tax on the carriage of goods through its territory although the goods belong to, and the tax is payable by, the people outside the State.[5] Reference may also be made in this connection to the discussion under sales tax.[6]

There is no general formula defining what territorial connection or nexus is sufficient or necessary for application of the law to a particular object. Sufficiency of the territorial connection involves consideration of two elements, viz.:

(a) the connection must be real and not illusory; and

(b) the liability sought to be imposed under the Act must be pertinent or relevant to that connection.[7]

Whether in a given case there is sufficient territorial nexus or not is a question of fact, and it is for the Courts to decide in each case whether "the territorial nexus" being put forward as the basis of the application of the law is "sufficient" or not.

The Bombay State Legislature enacted a law prohibiting a bigamous marriage and made it a criminal offence to enter into such a marriage. Marriages contracted outside the State by people domiciled within the State were also prohibited. The High Court declared the Act ultra vires as there was no territorial nexus between the State and the marriage performed or crime committed outside the State, even when it was done by a person domiciled in the State.[8]

Article 245 does not apply when acting under a Central law [S. 68-D(3) of the Motor Vehicles Act], a State Government gives approval to a scheme for inter-State routes for the State Transport Undertaking.[9] Also, under Art. 298, a State is not confined to carrying on business within its own boundaries. It can carry on business outside its territory as well.[10]

Recently the Supreme Court has stated the principle of territorial nexus as follows:[11]

> "It is by reference to the ambit or limits of territory by which the legislative powers vested in Parliament and the State Legislatures are divided in Art. 245. Generally speaking, a legislation having extraterritorial operation can be enacted only by Parliament and not by any State Legislature; possibly the only exception being one where extra-territorial operation of a State legislation is sustainable on the ground of territorial nexus. Such territorial nexus, when pleaded must be sufficient and real and not illusory."

---

5. Khyerbari Tea Co. v. State of Assam, AIR 1964 SC 925 : (1964) 5 SCR 975; infra, Chapter XV.

6. Infra, next Chapter.

7. Shrikant Bhalchandra Karulkar v. State of Gujarat, (1994) 5 SCC 459.

8. State of Bombay v. Narayandas Mangilal, AIR 1958 Bom. 68.
See, infra, under Citizenship, Chapter XVIII.
In the following cases, State laws have been invalidated because of extra-territoriality:
E.R. Samuel v. State of Punjab, AIR 1966 H.P. 59; K.K. Kochunni v. State of Madras, AIR 1959 SC 725 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 316.

9. Khazan Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 669 : (1974) 1 SCC 295.

10. See, infra, Chapter XII, for Art. 298.

11. State of Andhra Pradesh v. National Thermal Power Corporation Ltd., (2002) 5 SCC 203.

B. DISTRIBUTION OF LEGISLATIVE POWERS

The crux, the pivotal point, of a federal constitution is the division of powers and functions between the Centre and the regions. The distribution of legislative powers between the Centre and the regions is the most important characteristic of a federal constitution. The whole structure of the federal system continues to revolve around this central point.[12]

A study of the federations now extant in the world shows that there is no fixed formula, or a set pattern, for division of powers between the Centre and the regional governments. Usually certain powers are allotted exclusively to the Centre; certain powers are allotted exclusively to the regions, and there may be a common or concurrent area for both to operate simultaneously.

The foundation for a federal set up was laid in the Government of India Act, 1935. Though in every respect the distribution of legislative power between the Union and the States as envisaged in the 1935 Act has not been adopted in the Constitution, but the basic framework is the same.[13]

A basic test applied to decide what subjects should be allotted to the one or the other level of government is that functions of national importance should go to the Centre, and those of local interest should go to the regions. This test is very general, a sort of ad hoc formula, and does not lead to any uniform pattern of allocation of powers and functions between the two tiers of government in all federal countries. The reason for this lack of uniformity is that what is of general or national importance, and what is of local importance, cannot be decided on any a priori basis. Certain subjects like defence, foreign affairs and currency, are regarded as being of national importance everywhere and are thus given to the Centre. But, beyond this, what other subjects should be allotted to the Centre depends on the exigencies of the situation existing in the country, the attitudes of the people and the philosophy prevailing, at the time of constitution-making, and the future role which the Centre is envisaged to play.

The circumstances and considerations governing the scheme of division of powers in a federation vary from place to place and time to time. The pattern of division of functions in any federal country is largely conditioned by the interaction of two contending and conflicting forces—forces favouring centralisation resulting in a federal union and promoting a strong centre, and the forces supporting decentralisation, local or particularistic tendencies born of such factors as ethnic, religious, cultural, linguistic and economic, which manifest in powers being given to regional governments. The scheme which finally emerges in a federation is the resultant of the balance of these conflicting forces at the time of the constitution making.

C. THE THREE LISTS

The Indian Constitution contains a very elaborate scheme of distribution of powers and functions between the Centre and the States. The framers of the Indian Constitution took note of the developments in the area of Federal-State allocation of powers in other federations. They surveyed the area of the functioning of the modern government. They noted the modern scientific and technological developments as well as the contemporary political philosophies. And, keeping all these factors in mind, they apportioned functions between the Centre and the States in a way so as to suit the peculiar circumstances and exigencies of the country.

---

12. In this connection see also Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.
13. Prof. Yashpal v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2005) 5 SCC 420 : AIR 2005 SC 2026.

The obvious tendency of the Indian Constitution is towards centralisation within a federal pattern and framework. The scheme of the Constitution is to secure a constitutionally strong Centre having adequate powers both in extent and nature so that it can maintain and protect the unity and integrity of the country.

The Indian Constitution seeks to create three functional areas:

(i) an exclusive area for the Centre;

(ii) an exclusive area for the States; and

(iii) a common or concurrent area in which both the Centre and the States may operate simultaneously, subject to the overall supremacy of the Centre.

The scheme of Art. 246 is as follows:

(i) Article 246(1) confers on Parliament an 'exclusive power' to make laws with respect to any of the matters in the Union List (List I in the Seventh Schedule). The entries in this List are such as need a uniform law for the whole country. The States are not entitled to make any law in this area. Art. 246(1) opens with the words: "Notwithstanding anything in clauses (2) and (3)."

This means that if any matter is within the exclusive competence of the Centre i.e. List I, it becomes a prohibited field for the States.

(ii) Article 246(3) confers an exclusive power on the States to make laws with respect to the matters enumerated in the State List (List II in the Seventh Schedule). These are matters which admit of local variations and, from an administrative point of view, are best handled at the State level and, therefore, the Centre is debarred from legislating with respect to these matters. Art. 246(3) opens with the words: "subject to clauses (1) and (2)".

Thus, if a particular matter falls within the exclusive competence of the States, i.e. List II, that represents the prohibited field for the Centre.

(iii) A unique feature of the Indian scheme of division of powers is the existence of a large concurrent field for the Centre and the States. Art. 246(2) confers a concurrent power of legislation on both the Centre and the States with respect to the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List (List III in the Seventh Schedule).

Article 246(2) runs as follows "Notwithstanding anything in clause (3), Parliament and, subject to clause (1), the Legislature of any State ... also, have power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in list III in the Seventh Schedule".

Allocation of subjects to the lists is not by way of scientific or logical definition but by way of a mere enumeration of broad categories. The power to tax cannot be deduced from a general legislative entry as an ancillary power.[14]

---

14. State of W. B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.

The general idea underlying the Concurrent List is that there may be subjects on which Parliament may not feel it necessary or expedient to initiate legislation in the first instance because these matters may not have assumed much national importance. A State may, therefore, make necessary legislation with respect to any matter in the Concurrent List. But, if at any time, any of these matters assumes a national importance, and requires to be dealt with on a uniform all-India basis, then the Centre can step in and enact necessary legislation.

When an entry is in general terms in List II and part of that entry is in specific terms in List I, the entry in List I takes effect notwithstanding the entry in List II.[15]

Certain matters, it was felt, could not be allocated exclusively either to the Centre or the States, and though the States might legislate with respect to them, it was also necessary that the Centre should also have a legislative jurisdiction therein in order to enable it, if necessary, to secure uniformity in the law throughout the country, to guide and encourage State effort, and to provide remedies for mischief arising in the State sphere but whose impact may be felt beyond the boundaries of a single State. Instances of the first are provided by the Indian Codes of Civil and Criminal laws. These laws are at the basis of civil and corporate life of the country and have been placed in the Concurrent List so that the necessary uniformity can be preserved therein. Illustrations of the second are provided by such matters as labour legislation, and of the third by legislation for the prevention and control of epidemic diseases.

Further, even when the Centre makes a law for the whole country on a matter in the Concurrent List, a State may also make, if necessary, supplementary laws on that matter to provide for special circumstances within the State.

On the whole, therefore, the Concurrent List makes the scheme of distribution of powers somewhat flexible. The Centre can intervene in the area without any need to amend the Constitution. It permits of diversity along with a unity of approach.

The phraseology of the various clauses of Art. 246 is such as to secure the principle of Union supremacy. The legislative power conferred on the Centre under Arts. 246(1) [Union List] and 246(2) [Concurrent List] predominate over the power conferred on the State Legislature under Art. 246(3) [State List].

Under Art. 246(4), Parliament is given power to make a law on any matter in any List for any territory not included in a State. Obviously, the reference here is to the Union Territories.[16]

In the three lists of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution, a taxation entry in a legislative list may be with respect to an object or an event or may be with respect to both. Art. 246 makes it clear that the exclusive powers conferred on Parliament or the States to legislate on a particular matter includes, the power to legislate with respect to that matter. Hence, where the entry describes an object of tax, all taxable events pertaining to the object are within that field of legislation unless the event is specifically provided for elsewhere under a different legislative head. Whatever the terminology, because there can be no overlapping in the field of

---

15. Prof. Yashpal v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2005) 5 SCC 420 : AIR 2005 SC 2026.
16. For Union Territories see, supra, Chs. V and IX.

taxation, such a tax if specifically provided for under one legislative entry effectively narrows the fields of taxation available under other related entries. It is also natural when considering the ambit of an express power in relation to an unspecified residuary power, to give a broad interpretation to the former at the expense of the latter. For example, the State cannot under the garb of Luxury tax under Entry 62 List II impinge on the exclusive power of the union under Entries 83 and 84 of List I by merely describing an article as a luxury. That the entries on taxable events in the legislative lists are not exhaustive is also recognized and provided for in Article 248 (2) which provides for the power of Parliament to make any law imposing a tax not mentioned in either the Concurrent or State Lists.[17]

In Chanda Devi[18] the Supreme Court expressed too broadly that mala fide cannot be attributed to legislation. Colourable exercise of power or fraud on the Constitution conceptually have the same attributes of mala fide in its true legal sense [e.g. when the concerned legislature ostensibly acting on a field assigned to it enacts a law by entrenching upon the field assigned to another].

D. THE UNION LIST : LIST I

The Union List has 99 entries. Entries 1 to 81, 93 to 95 and 97 deal with general legislative powers, and entries 82 to 92, 96 and 97 deal with power to levy taxes and fees. The general entries are discussed here while the tax entries are discussed in the next Chapter.

The general non-tax entries may be broadly arranged under the following convenient heads.

(a) DEFENCE

Entries 1 to 7 are very broadly worded and give complete jurisdiction to the Centre over all aspects of defence of India.

In other Federations, only one entry is found regarding defence, but in India, as a matter of abundant caution, several entries are found in List I on this subject.

The Centre's capacity to take effective action for the defence of the country is further buttressed by the emergency provisions which are discussed later.[19]

The entries pertaining to defence run as follows:

(1) Defence of India and every part thereof including preparation for defence and all such acts as may be conducive in times of war to its prosecution, and after its termination, to effective demobilisation.

(2) Naval, military and air forces; any other armed forces of the Union.

The last words in the entry refer to armed forces other than the regular army, like the Assam rifles or the Central Reserve Police Force, the Border Security Force, the Central Industrial Security Force etc.[20] The Army Act has been enacted under this entry.[21]

---

17. Godfrey Phillips India Ltd. v. State of U.P., (2005) 2 SCC 515 : AIR 2005 SC 1103.
18. General Manager, North West Railway v. Chanda Devi, (2008) 2 SCC 108 : (2007) 14 SCALE 296.
19. Infra, Chap. XIII.
20. Akhilesh Prashad v. Union Territory of Mizoram, AIR 1981 SC 806 : (1981) 2 SCC 150.
21. Prithi Pal Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 1413 : (1982) 3 SCC 140.

(2A) Deployment of any armed force of the Union or any other force subject to the control of the Union or any contingent or unit thereof in any State in aid of the civil power, powers, jurisdiction, privileges and liabilities of the members of such forces while on such deployment.

Thus, the Centre has power to deploy its armed forces or any other force under its control in aid of the civil power in a State to maintain public order. The words "any other force" in this entry refer to a force other than an armed force.

The words "in aid of the civil power" in this entry indicate that the Central forces can be deployed to help and supplement the efforts of the State forces in restoring public order. The Central forces and the State authorities have to act in unison for this purpose.

The entry does not say that the Centre can deploy its forces in a State only at the request of the State government. It may so happen that the State Government may be unable or unwilling to request the Centre to deploy its forces to meet a serious disturbance of public order. It does not mean that the Centre should continue to look askance at a grave situation in a State and do nothing. It has a duty to intervene and power to deploy suo motu its armed forces if, in its opinion, the public disorder in a State has assumed the magnitude and character on an 'internal disturbance' within the meaning of Art. 355.[22]

(3) Delimitation of cantonment areas, local self-government in such areas, the constitution and powers within such areas of cantonment authorities and the regulation of house accommodation (including the control of rents) in such areas.

Under this entry, Parliament has power to regulate the relationship of landlord and tenant including rent and eviction of tenants in private housing within the cantonments. Parliament has exclusive power to legislate on the subject of relationship between landlord and tenant in respect of housing accommodation situated in the cantonment areas.[23]

(4) Naval, military and air force works.

(5) Arms, firearms, ammunition and explosives.

(6) Atomic energy and mineral resources necessary for its production.

(7) Industries declared by Parliament by law to be necessary for the purpose of defence or for the prosecution of war.

According to this entry, Parliament has to declare by law that the industry is necessary for the purpose of defence or for the prosecution of war. This is an important safeguard as such a declaration cannot be made by the executive alone.

This is a flexible entry. New concepts in defence and prosecution of war emerge all the time. It is a dynamic situation. An industry considered essential today for defence or war may cease to be so tomorrow and vice-versa. This entry can take care of this change in perception from time to time.

(b) PREVENTIVE DETENTION

(9) Preventive Detention for reasons connected with Defence, Foreign Affairs, or the security of India : persons subjected to such detention.

---

22. For discussion on Art. 355, see, infra, Ch. XIII, under "Emergency Provisions".
23. Indu Bhushan v. Rama Sundari, AIR 1970 SC 228 : (1969) 2 SCC 289.

Under this entry, Parliament can make law of preventive detention with respect to three heads mentioned.

Reference may also be made to entry 3 in List III in this connection.[24] The present day National Security Act providing for preventive detention made by Parliament is based on both the Entries, viz., entry 9, List I, and Entry 3, List III.[25]

Under entries 9 and 10, Parliament can enact a law providing for preventive detention of a foreigner with a view to making arrangements for his expulsion from India, as this matter falls under foreign affairs.[26]

(c) FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Entries 10 to 21 confer extensive powers on the Centre to conduct the foreign affairs of the country, to enter into treaties with foreign countries and to enact legislation to implement them. These entries are as follows:

(10) Foreign Affairs; all matters which bring the Union into relation with any foreign country.

The Centre can deal with expulsion, restriction of movements of foreigners in the country, prescribe the places of their residence and the ambit of their movement in the land, because all these matters bring India into relation with foreign countries as a country has a very deep interest in what is done to its citizens in a foreign land.

(11) Diplomatic, consular and trade representation.

(12) United Nations Organisation.

(13) Participation in international conferences, associations and other bodies and implementing of decisions made thereat.

(14) Entering into treaties and agreements with foreign countries, and implementing of treaties, agreements and conventions with foreign countries.

This important entry confers plenary powers on the Centre to enter into treaties and agreements and enact necessary legislation to effectuate the same.

Power of entering into a treaty is an inherent part of the sovereign power of the State. Moreover, the Constitution makes no provision making legislation a condition for entry into a treaty in times either of war or peace.[27]

The power of Parliament under entries 13 and 14 is further re-inforced by Art. 253 which confers an overriding power on Parliament to make any law for the whole or any part of India for implementing any treaty, agreement or convention with any other country or countries or any decision made at any international conference, association or other body. This means that if the Central Government enters into any international obligation, Parliament is fully authorised to enact legislation to implement it even if the subject-matter falls

---

24. Infra, Sec. F.
See Also, infra, Ch. XXVII, Secs. B and C, under Fundamental Rights, for a full-fledged discussion on Preventive Detention.

25. State of Andhra Pradesh v. B. Subbarajamma, AIR 1989 SC 389 : (1989) 1 SCC 193.

26. Hans Muller v. Supdt., Presidency Jail, Calcutta, AIR 1955 SC 367 : (1955) 1 SCR 1284.
See below for entry 10, under "Foreign Affairs".

27. Union of India v. Azadi Bachao Andolan, (2004) 10 SCC 1 : AIR 2004 SC 1107.

within the State List. Thus, the treaty-implementing power in India overrides the normal Federal-State jurisdictional lines. No difficulty can arise in the area of external affairs because of the divided jurisdiction between the Centre and the States to make laws. But the obligations arising under the agreement or treaties are not by their own force binding upon Indian nationals. The power to legislate in respect of treaties lies with Parliament under Entries 10 and 14 of List I of the Seventh Schedule. But making of law under that authority is necessary when the treaty or agreement operated to restrict the rights of citizens or others or modifies the law of the State. If the rights of the citizens or others which are justiciable are not affected, no legislative measure is needed to give effect to the agreement or treaty.[28]

In the absence of such provisions, the Centre's capacity in the international field would have been greatly impaired as it could not then pursue a strong and effective foreign policy. Had it entered into a treaty concerning a subject-matter falling within the State sphere, then either the treaty would have remained a dead letter or could be implemented by the cumbersome procedure of all the State Legislatures passing necessary legislation. These difficulties are now avoided as Parliament itself is authorised to pass legislation to implement not only any treaty but even decisions and non-obligatory recommendations of international organisations and conferences (entry 13). This gives an additional dimension to the Centre's power over 'external affairs' which is much broader than that existing in any other federation.

Entering into a treaty with a foreign country is an executive function of the Central Government. A boundary dispute between India and Pakistan in the Rann of Kutch was referred to an arbitral tribunal. The Central Government proceeded to implement the award without any legislation. It was argued on the authority of the Berubari case[29] that an amendment of the Constitution was called for. The Supreme Court held that while no cession of Indian territory could take place without a constitutional amendment, settlement of a boundary dispute by an arbitral tribunal could not be regarded as cession of territory. The Central Government could implement the award, treating it as an operative treaty, without any law or constitutional amendment.[30]

It is not necessary to enact a law for implementing each and every treaty. Parliament's power to enforce a treaty is not, however, free from other constitutional restrictions, e.g., Fundamental Rights.[31]

Under entries 10 and 14, the Central Government can take power to okay invitations to Indian Citizens by foreign governments.[32] The legislative power in relation to treaties does not affect the executive power of the Central Government to enter into any treaty.[33]

---

28. Union of India v. Azadi Bachao Andolan, (2004) 10 SCC 1 : AIR 2004 SC 1107.
29. In Re Berubari, AIR 1960 SC 845 : (1960) 3 SCR 250; see, supra, Ch. V.
30. Maganbhai Ishwarbhai Patel v. Union of India, AIR 1969 SC 783 : (1970) 3 SCC 400; also, supra, Ch. III.
For discussion on distribution of Administrative Powers between the Centre and the States, see, infra, Ch. XII.
31. See, infra, Chs. XX-XXXIII, for discussion on Fundamental Rights.
32. Lakhanpal v. Union of India, AIR 1973 Del. 178.
33. Union of India v. Manmull Jain, AIR 1954 Cal. 615; supra, Ch. III.

(15) War and peace.

(16) Foreign Jurisdiction.

It is the jurisdiction which a country exercises within another country by virtue of international law, treaty or agreement. Sometimes a country also accords exemption by legislation from its jurisdiction to those persons who have no such privilege under International Law.

Under Art. 260, the Indian Government may, by agreement with the government of any territory which is not a part of India, undertake any executive, legislative or judicial functions vested in that government.[34] However, every such agreement is subject to, and governed by, any law relating to the exercise of foreign jurisdiction in force in India, as for example, the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1947.

(17) Citizenship, naturalisation and aliens.

For discussion on Citizenship.[35]

(18) Extradition

This entry relates to the surrender by one State to another of persons who are fugitives from justice from that State.

(19) Admission into, and emigration and expulsion from, India : passports and visas.

For passports see under Art. 21.[36]

(20) Pilgrimages to places outside India.

(21) Piracies and crimes committed on the high seas or in the air; offences against the law of nations committed on land or the high seas or in the air.

(d) TRANSPORTATION AND COMMUNICATIONS

Means of communication are the lifeline of the nation to maintain unity and economic prosperity in the country. It is vital for the nation that a national communication network be maintained in the country. To obtain this objective, entries 22 to 31 confer on the Centre power over railways, national highways, airways etc. The relevant entries run as follows:

(22) Railways.

(23) Highways declared by or under law made by Parliamnet to be national highways.

This confers a flexible power on the Centre as Parliament can declare any highway as a national highway under a law made by Parliament.

(24) Shipping and navigation on inland waterways, declared by Parliament by law to be national waterways, as regards mechanically propelled vessels; the rule of the road on such waterways.

---

34. For Art. 260, see, infra, Ch. XII.
35. See, infra, Ch. XVIII, Part V.
36. Infra, Ch. XXVI.

Under this entry, only Parliament, and not the executive, can declare by making a law any inland waterways as a national waterway. The scope of this entry is limited to mechanically propelled vessels.

(25) Maritime shipping and navigation, including shipping and navigation on tidal waters; provision of education and training for the mercantile marine and regulation of such education and training provided by the States and other agencies.

Under this entry, States can provide education in mercantile marine subject to regulation by the Centre. The Centre can thus ensure uniformity of syllabi and standards. Also see entry 66 in this list.

(26) Lighthouses, including lightships, beacons and other provision for the safety of shipping and aircraft.

(27) Ports declared by or under law made by Parliament or existing law to be major ports, including their delimitation, and the constitution and powers of port authorities therein.

Under Art. 364(2), a major port is a port declared to be so by or under a Parliamentary law. The Central Government can declare a port as a major port under S. 3(8) of the Indian Ports Act, 1908.

Article 364(1) lays down that the President may by public notification direct that any law made by Parliament or a State Legislature shall not apply to a major port or aerodrome, or shall apply to it subject to the exceptions and modifications mentioned therein. This provision thus makes it possible to apply special provisions to any particular major port or aerodrome necessitated by its special status or importance.

(28) Port quarantine, including hospitals connected therewith; seamen's and marine hospitals.

Also see entry 81 in this List.

(29) Airways; aircraft and air navigation; provision of aerodromes; regulation and organisation of air traffic and of aerodromes; provision for aeronautical education and training and regulation of such education and training provided by States and other agencies.

(30) Carriage of passengers and goods by railway, sea or air, or by national waterways in mechanically propelled vessels.

(31) Posts and telegraphs; telephones, wireless, broadcasting and other like forms of communications.

Amplifiers being instruments of broadcasting and communication fall under this entry.[37] Therefore, manufacture, licensing, ownership, possession, and trade in such apparatus can be regulated by the Centre.

A few modes of communications, not mentioned here, fall within the purview of the States [See State List]. A few entries pertaining to communications are to be found in the Concurrent List as well.[38]

---

37. State of Rajasthan v. Chawla, AIR 1959 SC 544 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 904.
38. Infra, Sec. F.

(e) PROPERTY OF THE UNION

(32) Property of the Union and the revenue therefrom, but as regards property situated in a State, subject to legislation by the State, save in so far as Parliament by law otherwise provides.

The expression "property of the Union" is wide enough to comprehend all kinds of property, essentially funds and buildings. This entry achieves three things at the same time:

(a) It enables, Parliament to legislate exclusively with respect to all property belonging to the Union.

(b) It subjects the Union property situated within a State to any State legislation.

(c) It, nevertheless, authorises Parliament to provide otherwise by law. If Parliament legislates, the Central law will prevail over the State law applicable to the Union property in the State.[39]

Under this entry, Parliament can legislate even with respect to agricultural land belonging to the Union and this power is not affected by entry 18, List II.[40]

Questions have been raised regarding the validity of the Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorized Occupants) Act, 1971, enacted by Parliament. The Act provides for eviction of unauthorized occupants of public premises, i.e. property belonging to the Union Government as well as the public sector statutory corporation, such as, the nationalised banks. The Act provides for the eviction of those persons who have no authority in law to remain in possession of public premises. The unauthorized persons may be squatters, persons having no rights whatsoever, or persons who were in occupation by virtue of any agreement but whose right under the agreement had come to an end.

The Act does not pertain to any matter relating to rights in relation to landlord and tenants for eviction of tenants from lands which have been leased. The Act is concerned with the eviction of those persons who have no authority in law to remain in possession of the land belonging to the Union of India.

So far as the Act relates to the property of the Union Government, it falls under entry 32 List I.[41] Explaining the matter further, the Supreme Court has said:[42]

> "Entry 32 is wide enough to cover all legislations pertaining to the property of the Union of India including the legislation for eviction of unauthorized occupants from the property belonging to the Union of India".

The Act does not fall under entry 18, List III.[43]

A corporation even though wholly owned and controlled by the Union, has a distinct personality of its own and its property cannot be regarded as the property

---

39. See, infra, Sec. G, on "Repugnancy".
Also see, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii)(d), infra.

40. Hari Singh v. Military Estate Officer, AIR 1964 Punj. 304. For entry 18, List II, see, infra, Sec. E.

41. Accountant & Secretarial Services (P.) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 1708 : (1988) 4 SCC 324.

42. Saiyada Mossarat v. Hindustan Steel Ltd., Bhilai, AIR 1989 SC 406, 411 : (1989) 1 SCC 272.

43. See, infra, Sec. E.

of the Union. Therefore, the Act in question in its application to public sector corporate bodies does not fall under entry 32. The reason is that entry 32 relates to the "property of the Union" and, therefore, this entry cannot be construed as including within its scope the property of a government company which is a different and distinct entity from the Union Government.

The question of identifying the Public Premises Act in its application to public corporations with an entry in one of the Lists has caused some problems to the Supreme Court. In Accountant & Secretarial Services,[44] the Court took the view that the Act in relation to properties other than the properties belonging to the Central Government has been enacted under the Concurrent List. Then, in Saiyada Mossarat,[45] the Court took the view that as there is no entry in either List II or List III which would be attracted to the subject matter of speedy eviction of unauthorised occupation from properties belonging to a government company, the matter falls under the residuary power of Parliament.[46] But again in Ashoka Marketing,[47] the Supreme Court has reiterated its earlier view and has held that it falls under the Concurrent List, entries 6, 7, 13. So, finally, the Court's view is that the Public Premises Act insofar as it deals with the premises other than that of the Central Government has been enacted in exercise of the legislative powers in respect of matters enumerated in the Concurrent List.

(f) FINANCIAL POWERS

Items 26 to 40 and 76 confer on the Centre important powers of a financial nature. These entries run as follows:

(35) Public Debt of the Union.

(36) Currency, coinage, and legal tender; foreign exchange.

The entry embraces laws not only relating to the control of foreign exchange but also to its acquisition to better the economic stability of the country. Therefore, Parliament is empowered to make a law for promoting export of sugar to earn foreign exchange.[48]

Ss. 489A to 489D, I.P.C., fall within the exclusive legislative competence of the Centre as they relate to entry 36 read with entry 93 in List I.[49]

(37) Foreign loans.

(38) Reserve Bank of India.

(39) Post Office Savings Bank.

(40) Lotteries organised by the Government of India or the Government of a State.

This entry should be read along with entry 34 of List II.

---

44. Supra, footnote 41.
45. Supra, footnote 42.
46. Infra, Sec. H.
47. Ashoka Marketing Ltd. v. Punjab National Bank, AIR 1991 SC 855, 876 : (1990) 4 SCC 406.
48. The Lord Krishna Sugar Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1959 SC 1124 : (1960) 1 SCR 39. For comments on the case, see, I JILI, 572.
49. G.V. Ramanaiah v. Supdt., Central Jail, AIR 1974 SC 31 : (1974) 3 SCC 531.

Parliament has now passed the Lotteries (Regulation) Act, 1998, under entry 40, to regulate the lotteries run by the States. S. 5 of the Act authorises a State Government within the State, to prohibit the sale of tickets of a lottery organised, conducted or promoted by every other State. The Supreme Court has ruled that even when a lottery is organized by a State under this Act, it still remains res extra commercium, i.e. it does not amount to trade and commerce.[50]

(45) Banking

There are many reasons for allocating banking exclusively to Parliament. Operations of the banks do not remain confined within the territorial limits of one State in which a bank is located, the banking activities have nation-wide implications. Further, banking has deep relationship with currency and interstate trade and commerce.

Parliament has enacted the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, to regulate banks. The over-all supervision over the banks vests in the Reserve Bank of India. S. 21A enacts that a transaction between a banking company and its debtor cannot be reopened by a Court on the ground that the rate of interest charged by the banking company is excessive. This means that the Court cannot reduce the rate of interest which the debtor has agreed to pay.

The Supreme Court has ruled that this provision falls under entry 45, List I. S. 21A applies to all types of loans given by a banking company whether to an agriculturist or to a non-agriculturist. It has nothing to do with entry 30, List II.[51]

The Supreme Court has ruled that Banking falls under item 45, List I, and not under item 30, List II.[52] Banking being included in the Union List does not fall within the purview of entry 30, List II. A bank is not a mere money lender; it performs a much broader spectrum of functions besides money lending. Banks do not fall under the scope of the State Money Lenders Act enacted under entry 30, List II, as Banking is covered by entry 45, List I. Banks do not act merely as money-lenders but perform many functions, such as, borrowing, dealing in bills of exchange, leading and advancing money etc.

The Supreme Court has ruled that banking operations include, inter alia, acceptance of loans and deposits, granting of loans and recovery of debts due to the Bank. Under entry 45, List I, it is Parliament alone which can enact a law regarding conduct of business by the banks. Recovery of dues is an essential function of any banking institution. Parliament can by law provide the mechanism by which money due to the banks can be recovered. Therefore, the Recovery of Debts due to banks and Financial Institutions Act, 1993, enacted by Parliament squarely falls within the ambit of entry 45, List I.[53]

(46) Bills of Exchange, cheques, promissory notes and other like instruments.

(76) Audit of accounts of the Union and of the States.

---

50. B.R. Enterprises v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1867 : (1999) 9 SCC 700.

51. State Bank of India v. Yasanji Venkateswara Rao, AIR 1999 SC 896.
For entry 30, List II, see, Sec. E, infra.

52. Associated Timber Industires v. Central Bank of India, (2000) 7 SCC 93 : AIR 2000 SC 2689.

53. Union of India v. Delhi High Court Bar Association, (2002) 4 SCC 275 : AIR 2002 SC 1479.
Also see, Ch. VIII, Sec. I, supra.

Articles 148 to 151 of the Constitution deal with the office of the Comptroller and Auditor-General. [54]

(g) ECONOMIC POWERS

Entries 41 to 59 and 61 enable the Centre to control and regulate the economic affairs of the country to a very large extent. In reality these entries give to the Central Government a primacy in the economic sphere. These entries run as follows:

(41) Trade and commerce with foreign countries, import and export across customs frontiers; definition of customs frontiers.

The word 'import' in the entry does not include either sale or possession of the article imported into the country by a person residing in the territory in which it is imported.[55]

The power to define customs frontiers for purposes of export and import vests in Parliament under this entry.[56]

Regulation of imports into India falls under this entry and is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Centre.[57]

(42) Inter-State trade and commerce.

The matter has been considered later in full.[58] Also see entry 26, List II[59] and entry 33, List III.[60]

(43) Incorporation, regulation and winding up of trading corporations, including banking, insurance and financial corporations but not including co-operative societies.

A law making provisions for the proper management of a mismanaged company, empowering government to appoint directors, and prohibiting proceedings for winding up the company during the period for which the government appointed directors remain in office, would fall within this entry.[61]

The underlying concept of a 'trading corporation' is buying and selling. The hard core of such a corporation is its commercial character.[62]

(44) Incorporation, regulation and winding up of corporations, whether trading or not, with objects not confined to one State, but not including universities.

Entries 43 and 44 apply to such bodies only as are corporations in the full sense of the term and not to any other legal entity, e.g., a registered society.

Under entries 43 and 44, Parliament can pass a law providing for amalgamation or merger of companies.

---

54. See 'Comptroller and Auditor-General', supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(s).
55. State of Bombay v. Balsara, AIR 1951 SC 318 : 1951 SCR 682.
56. Burmah Shell Oil v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1960 AP 619.
57. Mount Corporation v. Director of Industries, AIR 1965 Mys. 143.
58. Infra, Chap. XV, under Freedom of Trade & Commerce.
59. Infra, Sec. E under "State List".
60. Infra, Sec. F, under "Concurrent List".
61. Charanjit v. Union of India, AIR 1951 SC 41 : 1950 SCR 869.
62. Ramtanu C.H. Society v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1970 SC 1771 : (1970) 3 SCC 323.

Entries 43 and 44 do not authorise regulation of business of the corporations.[63] According to the Supreme Court, "A law relating to the business of a corporation is not a law with respect to regulation of a corporation."[64]

Entries 43, 44 and 45 enable the Centre to set up financial corporations in the States to provide credit to industrial undertakings therein. The entry does not include non-banking trading activities carried on by banks.[65]

(47) Insurance.

(48) Stock exchanges and futures markets.

Parliament has enacted the Forward Contracts (Regulation) Act, 1952 and the Securities Contracts (Regulation) Act, 1956, to prevent speculation in forward contracts and to regulate forward contracts in certain goods.

The inter-relation of Entry 48, List I, and Entry 26, List II, and Entry 7, List III, is discussed later.[66]

The expression "futures markets" does not mean the place or locality where transactions of sale and purchase of goods take place. As the Supreme Court has observed in Waverly:[67]

> "The word 'futures' means 'contracts which consist of a promise to deliver specified quantities of some commodity at a specified future time… Futures are thus a form of security, analogous to a bond or promissory note."

Thus, it means that "futures markets" are commercial activities which are not purely or mainly of local or regional concern. They are essentially interstate in character.

(49) Patents, inventions and designs; copyright, trade-marks and merchandise marks.

The Emblems and Names (Prevention of Improper Use) Act, 1950, has been enacted by Parliament to prevent the improper use of certain emblems and names for professional and commercial purposes. This Act falls under this entry and not under entry 26, List II.[68]

(50) Establishment of standards of weight and measure.

Weights and measure are a State subject (entry 29, List II),[69] but the laying down of their standards is a Central subject.

(51) Establishment of standards of quality of goods to be exported out of India or transported from one State to another.

This entry can be read in the context of Art. 301[70] which envisages free flow of goods across State borders. The idea is to make the whole of India as a single economic unit so that the country can get industrialized as soon as possible. To promote interstate trade and commerce, it is necessary to have uniform standards

---

63. R.C. Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 564 : (1970) 1 SCC 248; K.S.E. Board v. Indian Aluminium Co., AIR 1976 SC 1031 : (1976) 1 SCC 466.
64. S.P. Mittal v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1 : (1983) 1 SCC 51.
65. R.C. Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 564 : (1970) 1 SCC 248.
66. Infra, Sec. G.
67. Waverly Jute Mills Co. Ltd. v. Raman & Co., AIR 1963 SC 90 : (1963) 3 SCR 209.
68. Sable Waghire & Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1975 SC 1172 : (1975) 1 SCC 763.
69. See, infra, Sec. E.
70. For discussion on Art.301, see, infra, Ch. XV, under "Freedom of Trade and Commerce".

throughout the country. To promote exports it is essential to determine standards as to the quality of goods. This helps in building goodwill for the country in the foreign markets.

(52) Industries, the control of which by the Union is declared by Parliament by law to be expedient in the public interest.

The scope of this entry is quite broad. The Centre can take any industry under its control as and when it likes. The entry is flexible as it enables Parliament to determine by law from time to time as to whether the Central control over a particular industry would be expedient in the public interest.

"Public interest' or 'national interest' are not static, but dynamic, concepts. Central control of any industry may be considered expedient to-day in public interest, but this perception may change in course of time. The entry is flexible enough to accommodate such changes in policy by the centre from time to time.

It has been held that the expression 'industry' in entry 52, List I, bears the same meaning as in entry 24, List II.[71] This means that if an industry does not fall within the purview of entry 24 in List II, it will equally not fall within the purview of entry 52 in List I.[72]

If the Centre wants to regulate any industry, Parliament will first have to declare, by law, that it is necessary for the Union to control that industry in national interest. The Centre has made an extensive use of this entry by taking a large number of industries under its control.[73]

See, in this connection, the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act, 1951, which brings a number of industries under the Central control.

Also refer to entries 24 and 27, List II, and entry 33, List III. These entries also deal with some aspects of industry, The question of interrelation of these various entries in the three Lists has been discussed later.[74]

Whatever falls within the scope of entry 33, List III, does not fall under entry 52, List I. This means that entry 52, List I, which deals with industry does not cover trade and commerce in, or production, supply and distribution of, the products of those industries falling under entry 52 of List I. For the industries falling in entry 52, List I, these subjects are carved out and expressly put in entry 33, List III.[75]

Manufacture of gold ornaments by goldsmiths has been held to be an "industry," as the manufacture of gold ornaments by goldsmiths is a "process of systematic production" for trade or manufacture. The Gold Control Act was validly enacted under this entry read with entry 33 of List III. [76]

The declaration in S. 2 of the Tea Act, 1953 in terms of List I Entry 52 empowers the Central Government to levy a duty or cess upon tea or tea leaves for 71. For this entry, see, Sec. E, infra.

---

72. State of Andhra Pradesh v. McDowell & Co., AIR 1996 SC at 1639 : (1996) 3 SCC 709.
73. See, for example. The Tea Act, 1953; The Rubber Act, 1947, etc.
For further discussion on this entry see, infra, Sec. G(iii), Chs. XV; Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.
74. Infra, Sec. G(iii).
75. SIEL Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 3076 : (1998) 7 SCC 26; Belsund Sugar Co. Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 3125 : (1999) 9 SCC 620.
76. Harakchand v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1453 : (1969) 2 SCC 166.

the purpose of that Act and can in no manner deprive the State Legislature of its power to tax the land comprised in a tea estate.[77]

(53) Regulation and development of oilfields and mineral oil resources, petroleum and petroleum products; other liquids and substances declared by Parliament by law to be dangerously inflammable.

Under this entry, the Centre can take under its control the regulation of oil-fields and development of mineral oil resources in the country.[78] Leases integrally connected with the regulation of oil resources, petroleum and its products fall under this entry.[79] The Supreme Court has elucidated the purpose of reservation of this field to parliament. The people of the entire country have a stake in natural gas and its benefit has to be shared by the whole country. There should be just and reasonable use of natural gas for national development. If one State alone is allowed to extract and use natural gas, then other States will be deprived of its equitable share. This position goes on to fortify the stand adopted by the Union and will be a pointer to the conclusion that natural gas is included in Entry 53 of List I. Thus, the legislative history and the definition of petroleum, petroleum products and mineral oil resources contained in various legislations and books and the national interest involved in the equitable distribution of natural gas amongst the States – all these factors lead to the inescapable conclusion that natural gas in raw and liquefied form is petroleum product and part of mineral oil resources, which needs to be regulated by the Union.[80] However, the power to tax may be exercised for the purpose of regulating an industry, commerce or any other activity, but, the power to regulate, develop or control would not include within its ken a power to levy a tax or fee, except when it is only regulatory. Generally speaking, it may be true that power to regulate would not carry with it the power to impose tax but the principle is not of universal application. Imposition of tax by way of regulatory measures is permissible while enacting a regulatory statute. A regulatory licence fee has also been held to be tax.[81]

(54) Regulation of mines and minerals development to the extent to which such regulation and development under the control of the Union is declared by Parliament by law to be expedient in the public interest.

The entry refers to two things, viz.:

(1) regulation of mines; and

(2) minerals development.

Conservation of minerals is vital for the development of mines and minerals.[82]

Mines and minerals furnish an important industrial input for economic development of the country.

This entry is purposive as the power to make a law relating to "regulation of mines and mineral development" is qualified by the latter words of a restrictive nature, viz. "public interest". Therefore, exercise of power under it has to be guided and governed by public interest.

---

77. State of West Bengal v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
78. Babubhai Jashbhai Patel v. Union of India, AIR 1983 Guj. 1.
79. Mustafa Hussain v. Union of India, AIR 1981 AP 283.
80. Special Reference No. 1 of 2001 (2004) 4 SCC 489 : AIR 2004 SC 2647.
81. State of W. B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
82. Tara Prasaad Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 1682 : (1980) 4 SCC 179.

Under Entry 54, control of the Centre can be full or partial. By passing a law, Parliament can impose full Central Control over mines and minerals, leaving no field to the State, under entry 23, List II.

Parliament has enacted the Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Development) Act, 1957, under this entry. This Act contains the following declaration in S. 2 :

> "It is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that the Union should take under its control the regulation of mines and the development of minerals to the extent hereinafter provided."

The Supreme Court has ruled[83] that after passing this Act, the power of the State Legislatures under entry 23, List II[84] has been completely denuded by Parliament.

This declaration and the enactment of the MM (R & D) Act have practically annihilated entries 23 and 50 in List II.[85]

In Kesoram,[86] judgment of a smaller bench to the extent it is contrary to the judgment of an earlier larger Bench said that a power to levy tax or fee cannot be spelt out from the said provisions of the Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Development) Act, 1957 and therefore, the MMRD Act, 1957 has not placed any limitation on the power of states to legislate in the field of taxation on mineral rights. The expression other fees and charges must be assigned such meaning as to include therein only such fees and charges as are meant for regulation or development but also taxes and the States had the power to legislate in relation thereto. Four Judges Bench (S.B. SINHA, J. dissenting) proceeded on a basis directly in conflict with the earlier and a larger Bench judgment of the court in India Cement. The majority view cannot be considered as 'law declared' within Art. 141 of the Constitution.

Raw asbestos has been held to be a mineral.[87]

(55) Regulation of labour and safety in mines and oilfields.

Regulation of labour and safety in mines and oil-fields is closely connected with and incidental to the main topics enumerated in entries 53 and 54, List I.

(56) Regulation and development of inter-State rivers and river valleys to the extent to which such regulation and development under the control of the Union is declared by Parliament by law to be expedient in the public interest.

Reference may be made in this connection to the Supreme Court decision In the matter of Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal.[88]

---

83. Baijnath Kedia v. State of Bihar, AIR 1970 SC 1436 : (1969) 3 SCC 838; State of Orissa v. M.A. Tulloch & Co., AIR 1964 SC 1284 : (1964) 4 SCR 461; India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85 : (1990) 1 SCC 12; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Mahalaxmi Fabric Mills Ltd., AIR 1995 SC 2213 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 642; Quarry Owners Association v. State of Bihar, AIR 2000 SC 2870 : (2000) 8 SCC 655; Saurashtra Cement & Chemical Industries v. Union of India, AIR 2001 SC 8 : (2001) 1 SCC 91.

84. Infra, Sec. E; Ch. XI, Sec. D.

85. Infra, Sec. E; Ch. XI, Sec. D.

86. State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.

87. Hyderabad Industries v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 1847 : (1999) 5 SCC 15.

88. AIR 1992 SC 522 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 96.
See, supra, Ch. IV and infra, Ch. XIV.

The Constitution makes a special provision for resolution of water disputes in Art. 262.[89] Parliament has enacted the Inter-State Water Disputes Act, 1956, under Art. 262 and not under this entry. This entry speaks of regulation and development of inter-State rivers and does not relate to the disputes among riparian States and adjudication thereof. Even assuming the expression "regulation and development" are broadly interpreted so as to include adjudication of disputes arising therefrom, the Act in question does not contain the necessary declaration as envisaged by entry 56.

Water resources of inter-State rivers do not belong just to one State. As an inter-State river flows through many States, its waters belong to all these States. It is, therefore, essential that the Centre has jurisdiction to regulate and develop inter-State rivers and river valleys. Under this entry, Union can take over regulation and development of inter-State rivers and river valley. But before doing so, Parliament has to enact an Act declaring that such regulation and development under the control of the Union is expedient in public interest.

(57) Fishing and fisheries beyond territorial waters.

(58) Manufacture, supply and distribution of salt by Union agencies; regulation and control of manufacture, supply and distribution of salt by other agencies.

(59) Cultivation, manufacture, and sale for export, of opium.

This entry is not exhaustive in regard to opium. Possession, storage and sale of opium within the country are governed by entry 19, List III.

(61) Industrial disputes concerning Union employees.

This entry is an exception to entry 22, List III, which deals with labour disputes in general.[90]

(h) CULTURAL AND EDUCATIONAL FUNCTIONS

The relevant entries under this head are:

(60) Sanctioning of cinematograph films for exhibition.

This entry relates to one particular aspect of cinematograph, viz., the sanctioning of films for exhibition. All other matters relating to cinemas are included in entry 33, List II.[91]

Reference may also be made in this connection to Art. 19(1)(a) which guarantees "Freedom of Speech and Expression".[92]

(62) The institutions known at the commencement of this Constitution as the National Library, the Indian Museum, the Imperial War Museum, the Victoria Memorial and the Indian War Memorial, and any other like institution financed by the Government of India wholly or in part and declared by Parliament by law to be an institution of national importance.

---

89. See, infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. E, under "Inter-State Water Disputes."
90. See, Sec. F, infra.
91. See, Sec. E, infra.
92. See, Ch. XXIV, infra.

This also is a flexible power as Parliament can by law declare any institution as being of national importance. With such a declaration, the institution will fall under the control of the Central Government.

(63) The institution known at the commencement of this Constitution as the Banaras Hindu University, the Aligarh Muslim University and the Delhi University, the University established in pursuance of Art. 371E,[1] and any other institution declared by Parliament by law to be an institution of national importance.

(64) Institutions of scientific or technical education financed by the Government of India wholly or in part and declared by Parliament by law to be institutions of national importance.

(65) Union agencies and institutions for (a) professional, vocational or technical training, including the training of police officers; or (b) the promotion of special studies or research; or (c) scientific or technical assistance in the investigation or detection of crime.

(66) Co-ordination and determination of standards in institutions for higher education or research and scientific and technical institutions.[2]

Education is an area divided between the Centre and the States as is shown by entries 63, 64, 65 and 67, List I, and entry 25, List III.[3] The interrelation between all these entries has been discussed later.[4] After the enactment of National Council for Teacher Education Act, 1993 by Parliament, the field of teacher's education and matters connected therewith stands completely occupied by Parliament and, as such, the State Legislature could not encroach upon that field.[5]

(67) Ancient and historical monuments and records, and archaeological sites and remains, declared by or under law made by Parliament to be of national importance.

Also see entries 12, List II and 40, List III.[6]

Once an institution is declared to be of national importance. Parliament is competent to make any law governing the management, administration and affairs of such an institution.[7]

(68) The Survey of India, the Geological, Zoological and Anthropological Surveys of India; Meteorological Organisations.

(69) Census.

(i) UNION SERVICES

Entries 61, 70 and 71 confer power on the Centre with respect to all aspects of Union Services. The entries are:

---

1. See, supra, Ch. IX.
2. For a detailed discussion on this entry see, infra, this Chapter, Sec. G(c) under "Inter-relation of Lists".
3. See, Sec. F, infra.
4. Infra, Sec. G.
5. State of Maharashtra v. Sant Dnyaneshwar Shikshan Shastra Mahavidyalaya, (2006) 9 SCC 1 : (2006) 4 JT 201.
6. See, Secs. E and F, infra.
7. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.

(61) Industrial disputes concerning Union employees.

(70) Union Public Services; All-India Services; Union Public Service Commission.

Also see, Art. 312.[8]

(71) Union pensions, that is to say, pensions payable by the Government of India out of the Consolidated Fund of India.

Under this entry, the Government of India can institute pensions of a contributory character in which case the burden may not be on the tax proceeds but on the person who has already contributed to a Fund.

The entry may even cover people who are not government servants. Accordingly, this entry covers pensions paid to the ex-members of Parliament.[9]

(j) ELECTIONS, PARLIAMENTARY AFFAIRS, ETC.

Entries 72 to 75 confer powers on the Centre regarding elections to Parliament and State Legislatures, matters connected with Parliament, and emoluments, etc., of some high dignitaries in the country. The entries are as follows:

(72) Elections to Parliament, State Legislature and offices of President and Vice-President; the Election Commission.

The Representation of the People Acts, 1950 and 1951, enacted by Parliament, fall under this entry. The Act of 1951 has been held valid even though it incidentally encroaches on entry 1 of List II.[10]

(73) Salaries and allowances of members of Parliament, the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of Rajya Sabha and the Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the Lok Sabha.

(74) Powers, privileges and immunities of each House of Parliament and of the members and the committees of each House, enforcement of attendance of persons for giving evidence or producing documents before committees of Parliament or commissions appointed by Parliament.

(75) Emoluments, allowances, privileges, and rights in respect of leave of absence, of the President and Governors; Salaries and allowances of the Ministers for the Union; the salaries, allowances, and rights in respect of leave of absence and other conditions of service of the Comptroller and Auditor-General.

Also see under "Elections"[11]

(k) JUDICIAL POWERS

Entries 77-79 and 95 confer power on the Centre to make laws with respect to the Supreme Court and the High Courts. These entries run as follows:

---

8. Infra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. F.
9. S.P. Anand v. Union of India, AIR 2000 MP 137.
10. Rameshwar Mahton v. State of Bihar, AIR 1957 Pat. 252, for entry 1, List II, see, Sec. E, infra.
11. See, Ch. XIX, infra.

(77) Constitution, organisation, jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court (including contempt of such Court), and the fees taken therein; persons entitled to practice before the Supreme Court.[12]

(78) Constitution and organisation [including vacations] of the High Courts except provisions as to officers and servants of High Courts; persons entitled to practice before the High Courts.[13]

(79) Extension of the jurisdiction of a High Court to, and exclusion of the jurisdiction of a High Court from, any Union Territory.[14]

From careful reading of Entries 77 and 78 of List I it is clear that Entry 77 not only deals with the Constitution and organization but also with jurisdiction and powers in respect of the Supreme Court. The conscious omissions of the words jurisdiction and powers in Entry 78 and looking to the said words included in Entry 77, it is clear that the jurisdiction and powers of the High Courts are dealt with as a separate topic under the caption administration of justice under Entry 11A of List III which was in Entry 3 of List II prior to the Forty-second Constitution Amendment Act. The exclusion of jurisdiction and powers from Entry 78 is meaningful and intended to serve a definite purpose in relation to bifurcation or division of legislative powers relating to conferment of general jurisdiction of High Courts.

(91) Having regard to Entry 91 of List I, the Supreme Court has pointed out that "if the instrument falls under the categories mentioned in Entry 91 of List I, the power to prescribe the rate will belong to Parliament, and for all other instruments or documents, the power to prescribe the rate belongs to the State Legislature under Entry 63 of List II. Therefore, the meaning of Entry 44 of List III is that excluding the power to prescribe the rate, the charging provisions of a law relating to stamp duty can be made both by the Union and the State Legislature in the concurrent sphere, subject to Article 254 in case of repugnancy.[15]

(93) Offences against laws with respect to any of the matters in this List.

See entry 36 above.

(95) Jurisdiction and power of all Courts except the Supreme Court, with respect to any of the matters in this List; admiralty jurisdiction.

Entry 95 confers on Parliament plenary powers to vest jurisdiction, territorial or otherwise, on any Court (except the Supreme Court) in relation to any matter included in the Union List.[16] Vesting of jurisdiction in the Supreme Court falls under entry 77 above.

Under Art. 247, Parliament is empowered to establish any Courts for the better administration of a Union law with respect to a matter enumerated in the Union List. It may be noted that under Art. 247, Parliament is not entitled to establish Courts for administration of the Central laws in the concurrent area. Administra-

---

12. For discussion on this entry, see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. K.
13. For discussion on this entry, see, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. H.
14. For Union Territories, see, Ch. IX, supra.
15. V.V.S.Rama Sharma v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2009) 7 SCC 234 : (2009) 6 JT 19.
16. Hanuman Bank v. Munia, AIR 1958 Mad. 279. Also see, infra, under Sec. F, Re The Special Courts Bill, 1978, AIR 1979 SC 471, 499, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. K.

tion of State laws, whether they relate to List II or List III are outside the purview of Art. 247.

See entries 3 and 65 in List II, and 46 in List III. The matter has been discussed earlier.[17]

(l) MISCELLANEOUS ENTRIES

Some of the entries in the Union List defy the above classification and are thus grouped under this omnibus head. These entries are:

(8) Central Bureau of Intelligence and Investigation:

The idea behind the entry is that there may be a bureau to collect information with regard to any kind of crime committed by people throughout India and also investigate whether the information supplied to it is correct or not. The State Governments are thus enabled to exercise their police powers in a much more efficient manner than they might be able to do otherwise in the absence of such information.

(34) Courts of wards for the estates of Rulers of Indian States.

(80) Extension of the powers and jurisdiction of members of a police force belonging to any State to any area outside that State, but not so as to enable the police of one State to exercise powers and jurisdiction in any area outside that State without the consent of the State Government in which such area is situated; extension of the powers and jurisdiction of members of police force belonging to any State to railway areas outside the State.

(81) Inter-State migration; inter-State quarantine.

(94) Inquiries, surveys and statistics for the purpose of any of the matters in this List.

Under this entry, Parliament has exclusive power concerning inquiries for purposes of any matter in List I.

(m) RESIDUARY ENTRY

(97) Any other matter not enumerated in Lists II or III, but not including fees taken in any Court.

This entry refers to the Residuary Powers of the Centre. This entry has to be read along with Art. 248. The question of the ambit and scope of the Residuary Power of the Centre is discussed in detail later.[18]

A law enacted by Parliament to provide for pensions to members of Parliament on expiry of their term falls under this entry.[19]

E. STATE LIST : LIST II

The State List contains 61 entries which may be classified as under.

---

17. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. H.
18. See, infra, Sec. I.
Also see, Ch. XI, Sec. G, under the heading "Residuary Taxes", infra.
19. Common Cause, A Regd. Society v. Union of India, (2002) 1 SCC 88 : AIR 2002 SC 199.

(a) LAW AND ORDER, JUSTICE

Entries 1 to 4 and 64-65 may be placed in this class. Maintenance of law and order is regarded primarily a responsibility of the States. The entries run as follows:

(1) Public order (but not including the use of any naval, military or air force or any other armed force of the Union or of any other force subject to the control of the Union or of any contingent or unit thereof in aid of the civil power).

The term 'public order' is of very wide import and includes an impropriety, affront or insult to the orderliness, such as wilful burning, desecrating or insulting a copy of the Constitution of India.[20] The expression 'public order' signifies that state of tranquillity which prevails among the members of a political society as a result of internal regulations enforced by the government. It may thus be equated with public peace and safety.[21]

It might be of interest to note that while for purposes of legislative entries the term 'public order' is given broad meaning, for purposes of preventive detention, it is interpreted somewhat narrowly. In Ram Manohar Lohia v. State of Bihar, a case on preventive detention, the Supreme Court distinguished between 'public order' and 'law and order', and held the latter to be broader than the former.[22]

The Armed Forces (Special Powers) Act, 1958, has been validly enacted by Parliament as it falls under entry 2A, List I. Under the Act, the Centre can declare an area as 'disturbed area'. Thereafter, the army can exercise certain powers in the concerned area. The Army does not supplant the civil administration but acts in its aid.

The Act thus deals not with "public order"—a matter falling within the competence of the States under Entry I, List II, but with the "use of armed forces in aid of civil power" which falls under the Central legislative sphere vide entry 2A, List I. On the other hand, the Assam Disturbed Areas Act, 1955, falls in its pith and substance[23] under the State sphere vide entry 1, List II, as the Act deals with the maintenance of public order.

The State Legislature is incompetent to enact a law in relation to the Armed Forces of the Union under entry 1, List II.[24]

(2) Police, (including railway and village police) subject to the provisions of entry 2A of List I.

Railways are a Central subject (entry 22, List I), but the policing of railways is a State Subject. In order that protection of railways does not suffer by State inaction, Art. 257(3) empowers the Centre to give directions to the States as to the measures to be taken for the purpose.[25]

---

20. In Re Natarajan, AIR 1965 Mad 11.
21. Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, AIR 1950 SC 124 : 1950 SCR 594; Brij Bhushan v. Delhi, AIR 1950 SC 129 : 1950 SCR 605; Supdt., Central Prison v. Ram Manohar Lohia, AIR 1960 SC 633 : (1960) 2 SCR 821.
22. AIR 1966 SC 740 : (1966) 1 SCR 709.
23. For the doctrine of Pith and Substance, see, infra, Sec. G(d).
24. Naga People's Movement of Human Rights v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 431 : (1998) 2 SCC 109.
25. See 'Administrative Relations', infra, Chapter XII.

The word 'police' in this entry is wide enough to include State armed constabulary created to maintain internal peace and order which is not a combatant force like the army.[26]

The police power of the State in respect of any offence committed in a State comes within the legislative competence of the State. The State may exercise some extraterritorial jurisdiction only if a part of the offence is committed in the State and the other part in another State or some other States. In such an event the State, before an investigation to that part of the offence which has been committed in any (sic other) State, may have to proceed with the consent of the State concerned or must work with the police of the other State. Its jurisdiction over the investigation into a matter is limited. Keeping in view the various entries contained in List I of the Seventh Schedule, there cannot be any doubt whatsoever that in the matter of investigation of the matter (sic offence) committed in a State, the jurisdiction of the Central Government is excluded.[27]

(3) Officers and servants of the High Court; procedure in rent and revenue Courts, fees taken in all Courts except the Supreme Court.

(4) Prisons, reformatories, Borstal institutions and other institutions of a like nature, and persons detained therein; arrangements with other States for the use of prisons and other institutions.

(64) Offences against laws with respect to any of the matters in List II.

Offences created under this entry are excluded from entry 1 of List III.[28]

(65) Jurisdiction and powers of all Courts except the Supreme Court, with respect to any of the matters in this List.

This entry may be read along with entries 77, 78 and 95 in List I and entry 46 in List III.[29]

(b) HEALTH, LOCAL GOVERNMENT, RELIEF OF THE DISABLED, ETC.

Such social welfare activities as health etc., fall within the State purview. The relevant entries are:

(5) Local government, that is to say, the constitution and powers of municipal corporations, improvement trusts, district boards, mining settlement authorities and other local authorities for the purpose of local self-government or village administration.

This entry empowers the States to legislate on any matter relating to local government, e.g., municipal corporations.[30] The State Legislature can confer any of its powers on a local authority, including taxing powers. However, a State Legislature cannot confer upon a local authority which it creates any power larger than what it itself possesses.[31]

---

26. Pooran v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1955 All. 370.
27. Bhavesh Jayanti Lakhani v. State of Maharashtra, (2009) 9 SCC 551.
28. See, infra, Sec. F.
29. For comments on these various entries in List III, see, supra, Ch VIII, Sec. H.
30. Mohd. Maqbool v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1982 Bom. 312.
31. Corpn. of Calcutta v. Liberty Cinema, AIR 1965 SC 1107, 1120, 1134 : (1965) 2 SCR 477; Ram Krishna Ram Nath v. Janpad Sabha, AIR 1962 SC 1073 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 70.

The Village Panchayat Acts which set up criminal Courts for exercising special jurisdiction can be enacted by a State Legislature under this entry read with entries 64 and 65 in this List and entry 1 in List III.[32]

A State law providing for nomination of members to kshetra samitis,[33] or a law to take over management and control of the aided schools run by the local authorities, would fall under this entry.[34]

(6) Public health and sanitation; hospitals and dispensaries.

Public health demands control of the use of such apparatus as produces loud noise by day or by night. A State can thus control the use of a sound amplifier in a public place under entry 6 as it causes detriment to tranquillity, health and comfort of others.[35]

An Act to regulate the keeping of cattle in urban areas promotes public health and sanitation and thus falls under this entry.[36] This entry which speaks inter alia of "public health" is relevant to furnish a ground for prohibiting consumption of intoxicating liquors.

(9) Relief of the disabled and unemployed.

(10) Burials and burial grounds; cremation and cremation grounds.

(c) LIBRARIES

Under entry 12, the States have exclusive control over Libraries, museums and other similar institutions controlled or financed by the State and ancient and historical monuments and records other than those declared by or under law made by Parliament to be of national importance.

(d) COMMUNICATIONS

(13) Communications, that is to say, roads, bridges, ferries, and other means of communication not specified in List I; municipal tramways; roadways; inland waterways and traffic thereon subject to the provisions of List I and List III with regard to such waterways; vehicles other than mechanically propelled vehicles.

The Central List contains several entries relating to communications, viz., 22, 23, 24, 25, 29, 30 and 31. There are entries 31, 32 and 35 in the Concurrent List. The area of communications is thus divided between the Centre and the States.

(e) LAND AND AGRICULTURE

Entries 14 to 21 dealing with land and agriculture run as follows:

(14) Agriculture, including agricultural education and research, protection against pests and prevention of plant diseases.

---

32. State of Mysore v. Gurupadappa, AIR 1961 Mys. 257. Also, Ram Naresh v. State of Bihar, AIR 1979 Pat. 130.
33. Nagendra Nath Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 All 226.
34. Municipal Committee v. State of Punjab, AIR 1966 Punj. 232.
35. State of Rajasthan v. G. Chawla, AIR 1959 SC 544 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 904; infra, under "Rule of Pith and Substance"; supra, see, Entry 31, List I.
Also see under Art. 19(1)(a), "Freedom of Speech and Expression, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.
36. Kala Miah v. S.C. Roy, AIR 1964 Cal. 409.

The term 'agriculture' is very wide and may include even 'forestry', but there is a separate entry, viz. 17A in List III covering forests.

Agriculture is the largest sector of the Indian economy. A large section of the Indian population directly or indirectly depends on agriculture. Agriculture is a multi-faceted activity. See entries 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 26, 27, 28, 30, 32, 45, List II. These are matters ancillary to or directly connected with agriculture.

All these entries relate to agriculture. While 'agriculture' has been placed in entry 14, List II, i.e. within the legislative competence of the States, there are several agriculture-related items to be found in List I and List III. List I has the following entries: 28, 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, 51, 52, 56, 57, 59, 63, 64, 65, 66, 69, 81, 82 and 97. This enables the Centre to make inroads in the sphere of agriculture.

Some entries in the State List relating to agriculutre have been made subject to entries in List I and List III. e.g. entries 17, 24, 26 and 27 in List II. In List III, there are the following entries having a bearing on agriculture: 9, 17, 17A, 17B, 18, 20, 23, 25, 29, 30, 33, 34, 38 and 45.

Under entry 52, List I, certain agro-industries have been taken by the Centre under its control. Under entry 34, List III, the Centre has power over "Price Control". Under entry 33, List III, the Central Parliament has enacted the Essential Commodities Act, 1955. Under it, the Centre can control production, supply, distribution of several agricultural commodities, such as, sugarcane, foodstuffs, edible oil, raw cotton and raw jute.

In so far as agriculutre depends upon water including river water, the State Legislature while enacting legislation with regard to agriculutre may provide for the regulation and development of the water resources including water supplies; irrigation and canals, drainage and embankments, water storage and water power. However, any such legislation insofar as it relates to inter-State river water and its different uses and the manner of listing it would also be subject to the provisions of entry 56, List I.[37]

(15) Preservation, protection and improvement of stock and prevention of animal diseases; veterinary training and practice.

(16) Pounds and the prevention of cattle trespass.

(17) Water, that is to say, water supplies, irrigation and canals, drainage and embankments, water storage and water power subject to the provisions of entry 56 of List I.

Entry 17 is wider than entry 56 of List I.[38] Unless Parliament declares the extent to which the regulation and development of inter-State rivers and river-valleys are to be centrally controlled, the State Legislature has full power to enact all legislation regarding water. A project for preventing floods is within the competence of a State.[39]

Under this entry, a State cannot pass legislation with respect to, or affecting, any aspect of the waters beyond its own territory. The State can make law with

---

37. See, In the matter of Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal, AIR 1992 SC at 545 : 1983 Supp (1) SCC 96, supra, Entry 56, List I.
38. Supra, Sec. D.
39. Prasanna v. State of Orissa, AIR 1956 Ori. 114.

respect to inter-State rivers subject to Parliamentary legislation under entry 54, List I. The Parliamentary law must make the declaration that the control of the regulation and development of inter-state rivers and river valleys is expedient in the public interest. Therefore, if Parliament enacts a law without making the requisite declaration, it will not affect the powers of the State to make legislation under entry 17 in respect of inter-State river water.

(18) Land, that is to say, rights in or over land, land tenures including the relation of landlord and tenant, and the collection of rents; transfer and alienation of agricultural land; land improvement and agricultural loans; colonization.

The term 'land' in entry 18 is of wide amplitude. The term 'land' covers vacant land. This term takes in land of every description, i.e., agricultural land,[40] non-agricultural land, rural land, urban land or land of any other kind.[41] Land in its widest amplitude and signification would include not only the surface of the ground, cultivable, uncultivable or waste land and also every thing on or under it.[42]

The term 'land' covers 'land and buildings'. The words following 'land' only make it clear that the entry takes in not merely the tangible immovable property but also all kinds of intangible rights or interests, in or over land in the broad sense explained above.[43] Tenancy of buildings, house accommodations or leases in respect of non-agricultural property do not fall under Entry 18 of List II.[44]

Classification of land by West Bengal Primary Education Act, 1993 and West Bengal Rural Employment Act, 1976 as amended by 1992 Act into three categories (i) coal bearing land, (ii) mineral bearing land (other than coal bearing land) or quarry, and (iii) land other than (i) and (ii) are well defined classifications by reference to the user or quality and the nature of products which the land is capable of producing.[45]

The cess is levied on the land. The method of quantifying the tax is by reference to the annual value thereof. It is well known that one of the major factors contributing to the value of the land is what it produces or is capable of producing. Merely because the quantum of coal produced and dispatched or the quantum of mineral produced and dispatched from the land is the factor taken into consideration for determining the value of the land, it does not become a tax on coal or minerals, Being a tax on land it is fully covered by Entry 49 in List II. The W.B. Taxation Laws (Amendment) Act, 1992 must be and is held to be intra vires the Constitution.[46] These observation do not take into consideration that there should be uniformity in the matter of levies of tax and fees in relation to coal which is an utilized by major industries of critical importance in different parts of the country including most of the power plants which supply electricity.

---

40. State of Punjab v. Amar Singh, AIR 1974 SC 994 : (1974) 2 SCC 70.
41. Accountant and Secretarial Services (P) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 1708 : (1988) 4 SCC 324.
42. Jagannath Baksh Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1962 SC 1563 : (1963) 1 SCR 220; Jilubhai Nanbhai Khachar v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1995 SC 142 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 596.
43. Accountant and Secretarial Services, supra, footnote 41.
44. Welfare Assn. ARP v. Ranjit P. Gohil, (2003) 9 SCC 358 : AIR 2003 SC 1266.
45. State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
46. State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.

Entry 18 deals with four main topics : land, transfer and alienation of agricultural land, land improvement and agricultural loans and colonisation. The words 'rights in' or "over land" confer very wide power on the State Legislature.[47]

This entry is the source of the legislative power of the States for extensive agrarian reform legislation which has been undertaken in independent India. The words 'collection of rents' empower the State Legislatures to impose any limitation on the power of landlords to collect rents, that it is to say, with respect to the remission of rents.[48] This entry confers plenary powers on the State Legislatures to enact legislation to extinguish, restrict, transfer or convey the rights in lands, or concerning land tenures including the relation of landlord and tenants, or concerning transfer and alienation of agricultural land.

A State Legislature can extinguish or restrict subsisting rights in land, or provide for statutory purchase of land by tenants in occupation, or modify or curtail the rights of landlords in the land and expand the rights of the tenants, or provide for transfer and alienation of agricultural land.[49]

Each of the expressions, 'rights in or over land' and 'land tenures', confers very wide power over land. It is comprehensive enough to take in measures of reforms of land tenures, limiting the extent of land in cultivating possession of the land-owner, and, thus, releasing land for cultivation by the tenants.[50] Therefore, a law limiting the area of land which could be directly held by a proprietor or a land-owner falls within this entry.

Legislation on resumption of jagirs relates to land and land revenue.[51] Legislation for fixing a ceiling on land holdings in the hands of an individual and for acquisition by the State of excess land, would fall under this entry as well as under entry 42 of List III.[52]

An Act to give relief to mortgagors of agricultural land by enabling them to obtain restitution of the mortgaged lands on terms less onerous than the mortgage deed required is valid, for 'rights in land' include such rights as full ownership or lease-hold.

The word "land" in the entry is not confined to agricultural land only but includes every form of land, whether agricultural or not. The expression 'Rights over land' includes general rights like full ownership or leasehold or all such rights. It also includes easements or other collateral rights, whatever form they might take.

"Mortgages" are not specifically mentioned in this entry. Though in certain aspects, mortgage includes elements of transfer of property and of contract, yet they form a "type of transactions which may properly be regarded as sui generis, incidental to land" and so included within item 18, except insofar as they fall un-

---

47. Jagannath Baksh Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, supra, note 20; Jilubhai Nanbhai v. State of Gujarat, supra, footnote 42.

48. United Provinces v. Atiqua Begum, AIR 1941 FC 16, 25.

49. Sri Ram Ram Narain v. State of Bombay, AIR 1959 SC 459; Raghubir Singh v. Ajmer, AIR 1959 SC 475 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 478; Gayatri Salt Works. v. State of A.P., AIR 1975 A.P. 262.

50. Atma Ram v. State of Punjab, AIR 1959 SC 519 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 748; Kunhikonam v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 723; Krishnaraja v. A.O. Land Reforms, AIR 1967 Mad. 352; Mohinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1983 P & H 253.

51. Amarsarjit Singh v. State of Punajb, AIR 1962 SC 1305 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 346. For 'land revenue' see entry 45, infra, Chap. XI.

52. Kannan D.H.P. Co. v. State of Kerala, AIR 1972 SC 2301 : (1972) 2 SCC 218; L. Jagannath v. A.O., L.R., AIR 1972 SC 425.
For entry 42, List III, see, Sec. F, infra.

der entries 6 and 7 of List III, which again contain an express exception in the case of agricultural land.[53] "So far as land at least is concerned, item 18 would include mortgages as an incidental and ancillary subject". Mortgages are properly to be classified not under the head of contracts, but as special transactions ancillary to the entry of "land".

A question has been raised whether a law providing for fixation of fair rent of urban property falls within this entry or not. The Supreme Court has ruled that such legislation would fall more appropriately under entries 6 and 7 of List III[54] and not under this entry. Entry 18 does not encompass within its terms legislation on the relationship of landlord and tenant in regard to houses and buildings.

According to the Supreme Court, the relation of landlord and tenant, as mentioned in this entry, is with reference to land tenures which would not cover appropriately tenancy of buildings, or of house accommodation, and that that expression is only used with reference to relationship between landlord and tenant in respect of vacant lands.[55]

Leases in respect of non-agricultural property are dealt with in the Transfer of Property Act and would more appropriately fall within the scope of entry 6 read with entry 7 of List III. Non-agricultural leases of all kinds, and rights governed by such leases, including the termination of leases and eviction from property leased, would be covered by topics of transfer of property and contracts. Thus, the Tamil Nadu Buildings (Lease and Rent Control) Act, 1960, falls under entries 6 and 7 of List III and not under this entry.[56] The Bombay Town Planning Act, 1955, has been held to be validly enacted by the State Legislature under this entry as well as under entry 20 of List III,[57] as the Act deals with land.

An Act passed by a State Legislature to prohibit unauthorized occupation of vacant lands in urban areas and to provide for summary eviction of persons from such lands falls under entries 18, 64 and 65 of List II.[58] A State Legislature can enact a law under entry 18 to impose a ceiling on land.[59]

This entry cannot support a cess based on the royalty derived from mining lands.[60]

The Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorized Occupants) Act, 1971, passed by Parliament does not fall under this entry and is thus valid.[61]

(21) Fisheries;

Under entry 57, List I, fishing and fisheries beyond territorial waters is a Central subject. The power of the States over fisheries, therefore, extends to fisheries in inland and territorial waters.[62]

---

53. Megh Raj v. Allah Rakhia, AIR 1947 PC 72.
54. For entries 6 and 7 of List III, see, infra, sec. F.
55. Indu Bhushan v. Rama Sundari, AIR 1970 SC 228 : (1969) 2 SCC 289; LS. Nair v. Hindustan Steel Ltd., Bhilai, AIR 1980 M.P. 106; Dhanapal v. Yesodai, AIR 1979 SC 1745 : AIR 1979 SC 1745; Accountant and Secretarial Services (P) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 1708 : (1988) 4 SCC 325.
56. V. Dhanpal Chettiar v. Yesodai Ammal, AIR 1979 SC 1745 : AIR 1979 SC 1745.
57. Maneklal v. Makwana, AIR 1967 SC 1373 : (1967) 3 SCR 65.
58. Maharashtra v. Kamal, AIR 1985 SC 119 : (1985) 1 SCC 334.
59. Gurbax Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1992 SC 163 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 24.
60. See, infra, Ch. XI.
61. Supra, see, under List I, entry 32.
62. A.M.S.S.V. M.O. & Co. v. State of Madras, AIR 1954 Mad. 291.
See A Note on Fishing Rights in Territorial Waters', 1 JILI, 313 (1959).

(f) TRADE, COMMERCE, INDUSTRY

Speaking generally, matters of intrastate trade and commerce fall within the State purview. The relevant entries are:

(23) Regulation of mines and mineral development subject to the provisions of List I with respect to regulation and development under the control of the Union.

This entry is subject to entries 54 and 55 of List I.

When Parliament passes a law making the necessary declaration under entry 54, List I, and laying down its extent, the subject of Legislation to that extent becomes exclusive for Parliament. A State cannot then make a law trenching upon the field disclosed in the declaration. However, the State power is curtailed only to the extent to which regulation and control has been vested in the Centre, and beyond that the State power remains unimpaired.

In this respect, the Supreme Court has observed :[63]

> "Subject to the provisions of List I, the power of the State to enact legislation on the topic of "mines and minerals development" is plenary. To the extent to which the Union Government had taken under "its control" "the regulation and development of minerals" under Entry 54 of List I so much was withdrawn from the ambit of the power of the State Legislature under entry 23 of List II and legislation of the State which had rested on the existence of power under that entry would, to the extent of the "control", be superseded or be rendered ineffective; for here we have a case not of mere repugnancy[64] between the provisions of the two enactments but of denudation or deprivation of State legislative power by the declaration which Parliament is empowered to make under entry 54 of List I and has made."

Parliament has enacted the Mines and Minerals (Regulations and Development) Act, 1957, "to provide for regulation of mines and the development of minerals under the control of the Union" in public interest. It has been held that the MMRD Act covers the entire field of minerals development. The result of Parliament having occupied the entire field is that the State Legislature lacks legislative competence. As a consequence thereof, where a State Law is attributable in pith and substance[65] to entry 23, List II, it would not be valid in as much as Parliament has occupied the entire field.[66]

The jurisdiction of the State Legislature under entry 23 is subject to the limitation imposed by the latter part of entry 52, List I.[67] If Parliament by its law has declared that regulation and development of mines should in public interest be under the control of the Union, to the extent of such declaration the jurisdiction of the State Legislature is excluded.

Levying of cess by several States based on the royalty derived from mining lands could be related to entry 23, List II. But this entry is "subject to the provisions of List I with respect to regulation and development" of mines and minerals

---

63. Hingir Rampur Coal Co. Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1961 SC 459 : (1961) 2 SCR 537. Also see, State of Orissa v. M.A. Tulloch & Co., AIR 1964 SC 1284 : (1964) 4 SCR 461; Orissa Cement Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1991 SC 1676 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 430.
64. On 'Repugnancy', see, infra, Sec. H.
65. For discussion on the Doctrine of Pith and Substance, see, infra, Sec. G(d).
66. Baijnath Kadio v. State of Bihar, AIR 1970 SC 1436 : (1969) 3 SCC 838.
67. For this entry, see, supra, Sec. D.

under the control of the Centre. The Centre has enacted the Mines and Minerals Act, 1957. "It therefore, follows that any State Legislation to the extent it encroaches on the field covered by the M.M.R.D. Act, 1957 will be ultra vires."[68]

A State can charge royalty with respect to minerals under its control as this is a payment made to an owner for the right to exploit his property.[69]

(24) Industries subject to the provisions of entries 7 and 52 of List I.

The expression 'Industry' has been defined to mean the process of manufacture or production. It does not include 'raw materials' used in the industry or distribution of the products of the industry.

The word 'industry' in this entry must bear the same meaning as in entry 52, List I. This is so because the two entries are interconnected. If different meanings are given to 'industry' in different entries, it would snap the relationship between entry 24, List II and entries 7 and 52 of List I.

Ordinarily industry falls in the State sphere because of the present entry, but Parliament can by making an appropriate declaration, take any industry under its control.

This entry is in the nature of general entry. It speaks of industries but the entry is specifically made subject to entries 7 and 52 in List I.

By making a declaration in terms of entry 52 in List I in S. 2 of the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act, the Parliament has taken control of the several industries mentioned in the Schedule to the Act. Thus, the States have been denuded of their power to legislate with respect to those industries on that account.

The term "Industry" in entry 24 does not take within its scope what is contained in entries 26 and 27.[70]

The Supreme Court has ruled in State of Andhra Pradesh v. McDowell[71] that entry 52 in List I overrides only entry 24 in List II and no other entry in List II. Thus, entry 8, List II, is not overridden or overborne by entry 52, List I.

The State can set up a corporation to establish and develop industries within the State.[72] Thus, setting up of an industrial development corporation by a State is valid under this entry as it is a non-trading corporation.[73]

(25) Gas and gas-works.

(26) Trade and commerce within the State subject to the provisions of entry 33 of List III.

Under this entry, the State may regulate the hours, place, date and manner of sale of any particular commodity. The State Legislature can, for example, stipulate that the sale of explosives or other dangerous substances should only be in selected areas, at specified times, or on specified days, when extra precautions for the general safety of the public and those directly concerned could be arranged for. The Legislature could also say that there shall be no sales on a particular day, say a Sunday or a Friday, or on days of religious festivals and so forth.

---

68. Orissa Cement Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1991 SC 1676 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 630.
69. S.M.S. Industries v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1958 Raj. 140. See also next Chapter.
70. Belsund Sugar Co. Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 3125, 3159 : (1999) 9 SCC 620.
71. AIR 1996 SC 1561 : (1996) 3 SCC 709. Also see, infra, see p. 729 under entry 8.
72. Manohar v. State, AIR 1951 SC 315 : 1951 SCR 671. Also see, entry 42, List I.
73. Ramtanu Co-op. Housing v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1970 SC 1771 : (1970) 3 SCC 323.

(27) Production, supply and distribution of goods subject to the provisions of entry 33 of List III.

A State legislation restricting export of goods as anciliary to production and supply of essential commodities within the State would fall within this entry.[74]

(28) Markets and fairs

A law regarding cattle fairs falls under this entry.[75]

(30) Money lending and money lenders; relief of agricultural indebtedness.[76]

(31) Inns and Inn-keepers.

(32) Incorporation, regulation, and winding up of corporations, other than those specified in List I, and universities; unincorporated trading, literary, scientific, religious and other societies and associations; co-operative societies.

The relevant entries in the Central List are 43 and 44. A society registered under the Societies Registration Act is not a corporation and so would fall under this entry and not under entry 44, List I. A corporation whose powers and duties are confined only to one State falls under this entry and not under entries 43 and 44 of List I.[77]

(g) STATE PROPERTY

Entry 35 relates to "Works, lands and buildings vested in or in possession of the State."

(h) INTOXICANTS

Entry 8 relates to intoxicating liquors, that is to say, the production, manufacture, possession, transport, purchase and sale of intoxicating liquors.

In a previous case,[78] the Supreme Court had held that the expression "intoxicating liquors" occurring in this entry included within its compass denatured spirit as well (which is non potable), and, thus, the States would have exclusive privilege to deal in denatured spirit. But a larger Bench of the Court reviewing this ruling came to the conclusion that the expression "intoxicating liquors" means and refers to only "potable liquors"[79].

It has been ruled that though the expression "intoxicating liquors" is not qualified by the words "for human consumption", yet the very word "intoxicating" signifies "for human consumption". All aspects, such as, production, manufacture, possession, fall within the exclusive domain of the States[80]. Also, the States have no legislative power over non-potable liquors under entry 8.

A question of some importance remains undecided sofar viz., does entry 8 include within its scope medicinal preparations having alcohol content beyond a

---

74. Darshan v. State of Punjab, AIR 1953 SC 83 : 1953 SCR 319.
75. Amritsar Municipality v. State of Punjab, AIR 1969 SC 1100.
76. See, infra, Sec. G.
77. Board of Trustees, Tibia College v. Delhi, AIR 1962 SC 458 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 156.
78. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd., AIR 1980 SC 614 : (1980) 2 SCC 441.
79. Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of U.P., AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109.
80. State of Andhra Pradesh v. McDowell, AIR 1996 SC 1561 read along with Bihar Distillery v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 1208, 1213 : (1997) 2 SCC 727.
Also see, supra, under entry 24, List II.

prescribed limit? The Supreme Court answered the question in the affirmative in State of Bombay v. Balsara.[81] But, later the Court doubted the accuracy of the above view and has suggested that the question be reconsidered by a larger bench.[82]

It has also been held that this entry cannot support any tax on liquor.[83] Only regulatory powers can be derived from the entry.[84]

The Supreme Court has declared in the instant case that the States are not authorised to impose any impost (such as vend fees) on industrial alcohol. They are entitled to impose imposts only on potable alcohol. The State can impose a levy on industrial alcohol only when there are circumstances to establish that there is quid pro quo for the fee imposed.[85]

A State Legislature has power to prohibit the possession, use and sale of intoxicating liquors absolutely whether indigenous or foreign. This power includes the power to impose total or partial prohibition in the State.[86]

The words 'intoxicating liquor' include not only those alcoholic liquids which are generally used for beverage purposes and produce intoxication, but also liquids not containing alcohol which can be used as substitutes for intoxicating drinks.[87]

It is under this entry that a State makes provision to grant by public auction the privilege to sell liquor.[88]

Under this entry, a State can enact a law relating to medicinal and toilet preparations containing alcohol. Any law to regulate manufacture, sale and possession of intoxicating liquors and drugs falls under this entry.

The words "intoxicating liquor" in this entry cannot support a tax on industrial liquor. The expression "intoxicating liquors" means liquor which is consumable by human beings as it is.[89]

Reading entries 8 and 24 in List II together, the Supreme Court has concluded in State of Andhra Pradesh v. McDowell & Co.[90] that entry 24 is a general entry relating to industries, while entry 8 is a specific and special entry relating inter alia to industries engaged in production and manufacture of intoxicating liquors. Applying the rule of interpretation that "special excludes the general", the Court has held that the industries engaged in production and manufacture of intoxciating liquors do not fall within entry 24 but do fall within entry 8. The State Leg-

---

81. AIR 1951 SC 318 : 1951 SCR 682.

82. See, Synthetics and Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109; Shri Bileshwar Khand Udyog Khedut Sahakari Mandali Ltd. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1992 SC 872 : (1992) 2 SCC 42; State of Rajasthan v. Vatan Medical & General Store, AIR 2001 SC 1937 : (2001) 4 SCC 692.
The question has not been reheard and decided by the Supreme Court so far.

83. For powers of taxation, see, Ch. XI, infra.

84. Synthetics & Chemicals, supra, footnote 79.

85. Ibid.
For a difference between 'fee' and 'tax', see, next Chapter.

86. N.K. Doongaji v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1975 M.P. 1; Khoday Distilleries Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, (1995) 1 SCC 574; Sunny Markose v. State of Kerala, AIR 1966 Ker. 379.

87. State of Bombay v. Balsara, AIR 1951 SC 318; Benudhar Saikia v. Bhattacharya, AIR 1961 Ass. 16.

88. Nashirwar v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1975 SC 360 : (1975) 1 SCC 29. See infra.

89. Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109.

90. AIR 1996 SC 1627 : (1996) 3 SCC 709.

islature is therefore fully competent to make a law prohibiting the manufacture and production of intoxicating liquors.

Entry 8 is not subject to entry 52, List I. This means that making of a declaration by Parliament as contemplated by entry 52, List I. "does not have the effect of transferring or transplanting... the industries engaged in production and manufacture of intoxicating liquors from the State List to Union List". As a matter of fact, the Parliament cannot take over the control of the industries engaged in the production and manufacture of intoxicating liquors by making a declaration under entry 52 of List I, since the said entry governs only entry 24, List II, but not entry 8 in List II.

It may however be pointed out that the industries based on fermentation and alcohol have been declared by Parliament acting under entry 52, List I, and placed in the First schedule to the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act, 1951.

But control over industries engaged in manufacture or production of potable liquors does not vest in the Centre but falls under the State domain because of entry 8, List II.

(i) ENTERTAINMENTS

The entries falling under this head are as follows:

(33) Theatres and dramatic performances; cinemas subject to the provisions of Entry 60 of List I; sports, 'entertainments and amusements'.

Sanctioning of cinematograph films is excluded from entry 33 as it falls under entry 60, List I.

(34) 'Betting and gambling'.

Prize competitions not requiring a substantial amount of skill have been held to be a gambling transaction falling within entry 34.[91] The Supreme Court has observed in R.M.D.C. : "Thus a prize competition for which a solution was prepared before-hand was clearly a gambling prize competition, for the competitors were only invited to guess what the solution prepared before-hand by the promoters might be…"

The game of rummy has been held to be mainly and preponderantly a game of skill.[92] Any competitions involving substantial degree of skill is not gambling. Horse-racing has been held to be "a game where winning depends substantially and preponderantly on skill". Horse-racing is a sport which primarily depends on the special ability acquired by training".[93]

This entry includes lotteries as these are regarded as a form of gambling. In lotteries, there is an element of chance and absence of skill and, therefore, lotteries fall under gambling.[94] A State Legislature is competent under this entry to

---

91. State of Bombay v. R.M.D.C., AIR 1957 SC 699 : 1957 SCR 874; R.M.D.C. v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 628 : 1957 SCR 930; J.N. Gupta v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1959 Cal 141.
92. State of Andhra Pradesh v. K. Satyanarayana, AIR 1968 SC 825 : (1968) 2 SCR 387.
93. K.R. Lakshmanan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 SC 1153 : (1996) 2 SCC 226.
94. State of Bombay v. RMDC., AIR 1957 SC 699 : 1957 SCR 874; B.R. Enterprises v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1867 : (1999) 9 SCC 700.

legislate in respect of sale or distribution within the State, of tickets of lotteries organised by any agency other than the Government of India, or of a State.[1]

Entry 34 is of a very general nature but because of entry 40, List I, "Lotteries organised by the Government of India or the Government of a State" have been taken out from the State Legislative field comprised in entry 34, List II. No State Legislature can therefore make a law touching lotteries organised by the Government of India, or of a State, even though there may be no Parliamentary law made under entry 40, List I.[2] A State can conduct lotteries subject to the Central law.

Parliament has now enacted the Lotteries (Regulation) Act, 1998, to regulate lotteries conducted by the States. For further discussion on this topic, see under Arts. 298, 301 and 19(1)(g) discussed later in the book.[3]

The State 'organised' lotteries are to be distinguished from the State 'authorised' lotteries. While the former fall under the purview of Parliament under entry 40, list I, the latter fall within the purview of the State Legislature under entry 34, list II.[4]

Prize chits fall under entry 7, List III, and not under entry 34, List II.[5]

(j) ELECTIONS AND LEGISLATIVE PRIVILEGES

Entries pertaining to this head are:

(37) Elections to the Legislature of the State subject to the provisions of any law made by Parliament. Reference may be made to entry 72, List I, for Parliament's power in this respect.

(38) Salaries and allowances of members of the Legislature of the State, of the Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the Legislative Assembly and, if there is a Legislative Council, of the Chairman and Deputy Chairman thereof.

(39) Powers, privileges and immunities of the Legislative Assembly and of the members and the committees thereof, and, if there is a Legislative Council, of that Council and of the members and the committees thereof; enforcement of attendance of persons for giving evidence or producing documents before committees of the Legislature of the State.

(40) Salaries and allowances of Ministers for the State.

(k) STATE PUBLIC SERVICES

(41) State Public Services; State Public Service Commission.[6]

---

1. J.K. Bharati v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1984 SC 1542 : (1984) 3 SCC 704.
2. H. Anraj v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1984 SC 781 : (1984) 2 SCC 292; State of Haryana v. Suman Enterprises, (1994) 4 SCC 217; Iqbal Chand Khurana v. State of Bihar, AIR 1994 Pat. 134; State of Goa v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1997 Kant 161; Girdhari Singh Bapna v. Union of India, 1997 Raj 24.
3. See, Chs. XII, XV and XXIV, infra.
4. State of Haryana v. Suman Enterprises, supra; Govt. of Manipur v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 P&H 28.
5. Srinivasa Enterprises v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 504 : (1980) 4 SCC 507.
6. For discussion on Public Service Commission, see, Ch. XXXVI under 'Services', infra.

Under this entry, the State Legislature has power to abolish and create offices, enhance or reduce emoluments, increase or diminish tenure and prescribe conditions of service for civil services.[7]

An order compulsorily retiring certain government servants was found to be defective and so was invalidated. The State Legislature passed a law to remove the defects in the said order so as to validate it. The law was held valid under entry 41, List II, read with Art. 309.[8]

A State Act providing for reservation of vacancies and posts in public services for socially and educationally backward sections of society is in pith and substance a law in respect of State Public Services and is thus relatable to entry 41, List II.[9]

(42) State pensions, that is to say, pensions payable by the State or out of the Consolidated Fund of the State.

Under entry 42, a State Legislature is entitled to pass a law awarding pensions to ex-members of the Legislature[10]

(l) FINANCE AND TAXATION

Entry 43 relates to the Public debt of the State.

A number of entries, viz., 45 to 63 deal with the taxing powers of the States which are discussed in the next Chapter.

Entry 66 runs as follows : "Fees in respect of any of the matters in this List, but not including fees taken in any Court".

The concept of 'fee' as distinguished from 'tax' is discussed in the next chapter.[11]

(m) MISCELLANEOUS

A few entries which defy the above classification may be noted here.

(7) 'Pilgrimages, other than pilgrimages to places outside India.'

(22) 'Courts of wards subject to the provisions of entry 34 of List I: encumbered and attached estates.'

Entry 44 relates to 'Treasure Trove.'

Entry 64 says : "Offences against laws, with respect to any of the matters in this List.

Entry 65 runs as follows : "Jurisdiction and powers of all Courts, except the Supreme Court, with respect to any of the matters in this List."

For comments on this entry, see, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. F.

(n) COMMENTS

A persual of the entries in List II shows that many of these entries have an inter-face with several entries in List I and III. According to the Sarkaria Commis-

---

7. A.J. Patel v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1965 Guj. 23; Narayan v. State of Mysore, AIR 1968 Mys 73.
8. I.N. Saxena v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1976 SC 2250 : (1976) 4 SCC 750.
9. K. Kumardhan Singh v. Union of India, AIR 2000 Gau 50.
10. Lily Thomas v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1985 Mad 240.
11. see, infra, Ch. XI, Sec. H.

sion, the following different patterns of inter-connection can be discerned in the constitutional scheme.

(1) Certain aspects of a subject being of local concern, have been put in List II, but certain other aspects of the same subject being of national importance have been put in List I. See, for example, entry 13; entry 32, List II read with entry 44, List I.

(2) Some subjects of legislation in List II have been made expressly subject to certain entries in List III.[12] For example, entries 26 and 27 in List II are made subject to entry 33, List III.

(3) Certain entries in List II have been made subject to entries in List I. Thus, entry 2 in List II is subject to entry 2A in List I; entry 33, List II is made subject to entry 60, List I.

(4) Certain entries in List II have been made subject to laws made by Parliament. For example, entry 37, List II is made subject to a law made by Parliament.

(5) Certain matters in List II can become the subject of exclusive Parliamentary legislation when Parliament makes a declaration of "public interest" or "national interest" by law. Thus, entry 17, List II is subject to entry 56, List I; entry 23, List II is subject to entry 54, List I. Entry 24, List II is expressly made subject to entries 7 and 52, List I.

By making appropriate declaration in terms of entries 62, 63, 64 and 67, List I, the Centre can take over wholly or partially the field of such entries as 12 and 32 in List II and entries 25 and 40, List III.[13]

F. CONCURRENT LIST : LIST III

The Concurrent List comprises 52 items. The States are competent to legislate with respect to matters in this List, subject to the rule of repugnancy contained in Art. 254.[14]

The rationale underlying the Concurrent List is that there may be certain matters which are neither of exclusively national interest, nor of purely State or local concern. These matters are such that both the Centre and the States may have common interest therein.

On the one hand, problems and conditions may vary from State to State requiring diverse remedies suited to their local peculiarities. Where diversity is needed, the States know what is best for them. Then, some subject-matters of legislation may be multi-faceted and so they cannot be assigned exclusively either to the Centre or the States. On the other hand, there may be circumstances when a Central law may be needed on a subject in this area.

According to the Sarkaria Commission the need for Central legislation may arise for the following reasons:[15]

---

12. For entries in List III, see, Sec. F. infra.
13. See below.
14. For discussion on Art. 254, see, infra, Sec. H.
15. REPORT OF THE SARKARIA COMMISSION, 65.

(1) Need to secure uniformity in regard to main principles of law throughout the country in the larger interests of the nation.

(2) The subject matter of legislation may have interstate, national and even international, aspects and the 'mischief' emanating in a State may have impact beyond its territorial limits.

(3) It may be important to safeguard a Fundamental Right, or secure implementation of a constitutional directive.

(4) Co-ordination may be necessary between the Union and the States, and among the States, as may be necessary for certain regulatory, preventive or developmental purposes, or to secure certain national objectives.

When Parliament makes a law on a matter in the Concurrent List, there is a corresponding attenuation in the legislative power of the States because a State Law repugnant to a Central Law is invalid. However, subject to any law made by Parliament with respect to any matter in List III, the State Legislature can also make a law in relation to that matter.

(a) BASIC LAWS

The first fourteen entries relate to the basic procedural and substantive laws and administration of justice.

India is a federal country but, unlike other federations, a great amount of uniformity in the basic laws has been achieved over a period of time.[16] These matters have been placed in the Concurrent List so that a uniform texture and framework of laws may be maintained throughout the country, and yet, if necessary, local variations may be taken care of by provisions made by the States. These entries run as follows:

(1) Criminal law including all matters included in the Indian Penal Code at the commencement of the Constitution but excluding offences against laws with respect to any of the matters specified in List I or List II and excluding the use of naval, military or air forces or any other armed forces of the Union in aid of the civil power.

This entry is couched in very broad terms. The words following the expression "Criminal Law" enlarge the scope of the entry to any matter which can validly be considered to be criminal in nature. Use of the expression "including all matters included in the Indian Penal Code" is an unequivocal indication of the comprehensive nature of this entry. The legislature is empowered to make laws not only in respect of the matters covered by the Indian Penal Code but any other matter which could reasonably and justifiably be considered similar in nature.

Any law dealing with crime is criminal law under entry 1. Both the Centre as well as the States can enact criminal law.

Terrorist or disruptive activity is criminal in content, reach and effect. Parliament can enact a law dealing with terrorism under entry I, List III, so long as it does not refer to "public order" falling under entry 1 of List II. "Public Order" in

---

16. For a historical account of the development of law in India, see, JAIN, OUTLINES OF INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, Chs. XXII -XXV (1990).

List II is different from terrorism. Therefore, Parliament is entitled to enact the TADA Act.[17]

According to the Supreme Court, the ambit of "Criminal Law" in this entry has been first enlarged by including the Indian Penal Code and then from this enlarged ambit, all offences against laws with respect to any of the matters specified in List I or List II have been specifically excluded. The reason for inclusion or exclusion is that offences against laws with respect to any matter specified in List I or List II have been given a place in entries 93 of List I and 64 of List II.

A Central law to be valid under this entry must satisfy two conditions:

(1) The law must relate to criminal law;

(2) The offence should not be such as has been, or could be, provided against by laws with respect to any matter specified in List II.

The Indian Penal Code is a compilation of penal laws providing for offences relative to a variety of matters falling under various entries in various Lists. Thus, Ss. 489A to 489D of the I.P.C. deal with offences relating to currency and coinage—a matter falling under entry 36, List I, read with entry 93.[18]

(2) Criminal Procedure, including all matters included in the Code of Criminal Procedure at the commencement of the Constitution.

This entry is abundantly comprehensive to cover legislation making 14 years' imprisonment compulsory for certain categories of offenders.[19]

(3) Preventive Detention for reasons connected with the security of a State, the maintenance of public order, or the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community; persons subjected to such detention.

This entry is complementary to entry 9, List I dealing with "security of India". The term 'security of a State' includes serious and aggravated forms of public disorder, while the term 'public order' includes relatively minor breaches of peace of a local significance.[20]

This entry does not confer any power to put a person in preventive detention for the maintenance of "law and order". Some significant restrictions are imposed on the institution of preventive detention by Arts. 21 and 22.[21] The power of preventive detention is a drastic power. To avoid the power of preventive detention being abused, it is necessary that Parliament should have power to enact a law for the purpose on a uniform basis providing for necessary safeguards.

The Conservation of Foreign Exchange and Prevention of Smuggling Activities Act, 1974 (COFEPOSA) provides for preventive detention for reasons connected with the security of the State as well as the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community.[22] This Act can be justified under this entry. The expression "security of State" has been broadly interpreted so as to include "economic security" as well. According to the Supreme Court, "A State with a

---

17. Kartar Singh v. State of Punjab, (1994) 3 SCC 569, 753-755 : 1994 Cri LJ 3139 (SC).
18. G.V. Ramanaiah v. Supdt., Central Jail, AIR 1974 SC 31 : (1974) 3 SCC 351.
19. Maru Ram v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 2147 : (1981) 1 SCC 107.
20. Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, AIR 1950 SC 124 : 1950 SCR 594; see, supra, Sec. E. For further discussion on this point, see Ch. XXVII, Secs. B and C, infra.
21. See, Chs. XXVI and XXVII, infra.
22. See, Ch. XXVII, Sec. B, infra, for this law.

weak and vulnerable economy cannot guard its security well. It will be an easy prey to economic colonisers." The Court has observed further:

> "In the modern world, the security of a State is ensured not so much by physical might but by economic strength—at any rate, by economic strength as much as by armed might. It is, therefore, idle to contend that COFEPOSA is unrelated to the security of the State."[23]

(4) Removal from one State to another State of prisoners, accused persons and persons subjected to preventive detention for reasons specified in entry 3 of this List.

The subject-matter of this entry has an inter-State aspect, and this aspect can be effectively dealt with on a uniform basis by a law passed by Parliament. The law made by a State Legislature do not have operation beyond the State's territorial limits.[24]

(5) Marriage and divorce; infants and minors; adoption; wills, intestacy and succession; joint family and partition; all matters in respect of which parties in judicial proceedings were immediately before the commencement of the Constitution subject to their personal law.

The Legislature, under this entry, can modify the personal laws, such as, Hindu Law or Muslim Law.[25] Parliament can enact a law, under this entry, to deal with matters of wills, intestacy and succession of agricultural property in spite of its trenching upon entry 18, List II, e.g., S. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act.[26] A different opinion has been expressed by the Rajasthan High Court which has ruled (reading entries 5 and 6 together) that S. 22 of the Hindu Succession Act does not apply to agricultural land as entry 6 takes such land out of the purview of entry 5.[27]

(6) Transfer of Property other than agricultural land; registration of deeds and documents.

The words 'transfer of property' are wider than the meaning given to them in the Transfer of Property Act. Transfer of agricultural land is a State matter and falls under entry 18, List II, and not under the present entry.

(7) Contracts, including partnership, agency, contracts of carriage; and other special forms of contracts, but not including contracts relating to agricultural land.

Along with this may also be read the comments on entry 18, List II.[28]

The present entry excludes contracts relating to agricultural land, but not contracts relating to non-agricultural land. A contract between a landlord and a tenant for payment of rent in respect of agricultural land, irrespective of the form it might take, is a contract relating to agricultural land and is excluded from the scope of this entry.[29]

---

23. Attorney General for India v. Amratlal Prajivandas, AIR 1994 SC 2179 : (1994) 5 SCC 54.
24. See, supra, Sec. A., on Territorial Nexus.
25. Ameerunnissa v. Mehboob, AIR 1953 SC 91 : 1953 SCR 404.
26. Shakuntala v. Beni Madhav, AIR 1964 All. 165; Kashi Nath v. Umapada, AIR 1968 Cal. 83; Hari Dass v. Hukmi, AIR 1965 Punj. 254.
27. Jeewanram v. Lichmadevi, AIR 1981 Raj 16.
28. Supra, Sec. E.
29. Supra, Sec. E.

Prize chits have an element of chance of draw of lot to choose the successful bidder. There is an element of draw of luck in such chits. Nevertheless, a law banning prize chits has been held to fall under this head as dealing with a special species of contracts with sinister features and it does not fall under entry 34, List II.[30] Similarly an Act banning chit funds, in pith and substance, has been held to deal with a special kind of contract and, thus, falls under this entry. Neither prize chits nor chit funds deal with money-lending, the subject-matter of entry 30, List II.[31]

Premises tenancy legislation pertaining to houses and buildings is referrable not to entry 18, List II, but to entries 6, 7, and 13 of List III. The subject of housing accommodation and control thereof falls within these entries. Leases in respect of non-agricultural property are dealt with in the Transfer of Property Act and fall under this entry. Rent control legislation enacted by the State Legislatures falls under entries 6, 7 and 13 of this List.[32]

The Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorized Occupants) Act, 1971, insofar as it applies to the premises of the corporations, falls under entries 6, 7 and 13 of List III and not under entry 18, List II.[33]

(8) Actionable wrongs

In view of entry 1 above, this entry may be regarded as referring to torts. These are civil wrongs as contra-distinguished from criminal wrongs which are the subject-matter of entry 1. It is necessary to have a uniform law on this subject just as there is a uniform criminal law.

(9) Bankruptcy and insolvency.

(10) Trust and Trustees.

An Act to regulate the administration of public religious and charitable trusts would fall within entry 28 read with entry 10.[34] In case the trust is incorporated, it would fall under entries 43 and 44 of List I (if extending to more than one State), or entry 32 of List II if extending to one State only.[35]

An Act to provide for administration of higher secondary educational institutions registered under the Societies Registration Act was held to fall under entry 11 of List II (now entry 25, List III), and not under entries 10 and 28 of List III, even though it incidentally trenches upon or affects a charitable institution, or the powers of trustees of an institution.[36]

(11) Administrators-general and official trustees.

An Administrator-General may have concern with the properties and assets situated in several States, belonging to the same deceased person. Parliament has enacted the Administrators-General Act, 1963.

---

30. Srinivasa Enterprises v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 504 : (1980) 4 SCC 507.
31. Shriram Chits & Investments (P.) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 2063 : 1993 Supp (4) SCC 226.
32. Indu Bhusan Bose v. Rama Sundari Devi, AIR 1970 SC 228 : (1969) 2 SCC 289; Jaisingh Jairam Tyagi v. Mamanchand, AIR 1980 SC 1201 : (1980) 3 SCC 162; Dhanpal Chettiar v. Yesodai Ammal, AIR 1979 SC 1745 : (1979) 4 SCC 214; Accountant and Secretarial Services (P.) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 1708 : (1988) 4 SCC 324.
33. Accountant and Secretarial Services (P) Ltd. v. Union of India, ibid.
Also see under entry 32, List I, supra, Sec. D.
34. Servants of India Society v. Charity Commr, AIR 1962 Bom. 12.
35. The Tibbia College case, AIR 1962 SC 458 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 156; supra, Secs. D and E.
36. Katra Education Society v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1966 SC 1307 : (1966) 3 SCR 328.

(11-A) Administration of justice, constitution and organisation of all Courts, except the Supreme Court and the High Courts.

The power conferred by this entry includes the power of creating new Courts, reorganizing the existing Courts and defining, enlarging, altering, amending and diminishing the jurisdiction of the Courts and diminishing their jurisdiction territorially and pecuniarily.

Entry 11A of List III relating to administration of justice, has a wide meaning and includes administration of civil as well as criminal justice. The expression administration of justice has been used without any qualification or limitation, and is wide enough to include the powers and jurisdiction of all the Courts including the High Courts except the Supreme Court. The semicolon (;) after the words administration of justice in Entry 11A has significance and meaning. The other words in the same entry after administration of justice only speak in relation to Constitution and organization of all the Courts except the Supreme Court and High Courts. It follows that under Entry 11A the State Legislature has no power to constitute and organize the Supreme Court and High Courts. It is an accepted principle of construction of a Constitution that everything necessary for the exercise of powers is included in the grant of power. The State Legislature being an appropriate body to legislate in respect of administration of justice and to invest all Courts within the State, including the High Court, with general jurisdiction and powers in all matters, civil and criminal, it must follow that it can invest the High Court with such general jurisdiction and powers including the territorial and pecuniary jurisdiction and also to take away such jurisdiction and powers from the High Court except those, which are specifically conferred under the Constitution on the High Courts. Hence the City Civil Court with unlimited jurisdiction and taking away the same from the High Court, does not fall within constitution and organization of the High Court under Entry 11A of List III, The State Legislature is empowered to constitute and organize City Civil Court and while constituting such Court the State Legislature is also empowered to confer jurisdiction and powers upon such Courts inasmuch as administration of justice of all the Courts including the High Court is covered by Entry 11A of List III, so long as Parliament does not enact a law in that regard under Entry 11A.[37]

The Bombay Legislature created an additional civil Court for Greater Bombay having jurisdiction to try all suits of a civil nature not exceeding a certain value. The law was challenged on the ground that it conferred jurisdiction on the Court not only in respect of matters upon which the State Legislature was competent to legislate but also in regard to matters in respect of which only Parliament could legislate. But the argument was rejected. The Supreme Court argued that under this entry, the State Legislature has the power of investing the Courts with general jurisdiction.[38]

---

37. Jamshed N. Guzdar v. State of Maharashtra, (2005) 2 SCC 591 : AIR 2005 SC 862.

38. State of Bombay v. Narottamdas Jethabhai, AIR 1951 SC 69 : 1951 SCR 51; Jamshed N. Guzdar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1992 Bom 435; Also see, State of Tamil Nadu v. G.N. Venkataswamy, AIR 1995 SC 21 : (1994) 5 SCC 314; New Laxmi Oil Mills v. Bank of India, AIR 1998 MP 161; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Deepchand, AIR 1980 SC 801 : (1980) 2 SCC 332; see also M. P. Gangadharan v. State of Kerala, (2006) 6 SCC 162 : AIR 2006 SC 2360.

The State can confer additional jurisdiction on revenue Courts to recover public debts as arrears of land revenue. A State Act invested the collector with the power of deciding the controversy between the State and the defaulter and to recover the debt as arrears of land revenue. The collector was characterised as a revenue Court.[39]

From the scope of this broad entry, the area covered by Entry 65, List II, must be excluded, otherwise entry 65 would become otiose.[40] By virtue of this entry, Parliament can secure a measure of uniformity in the administration of justice, and constitution and organisation of Courts subordinate to the High Court, in the States.

The subject-matter of this entry is complementary to the subject-matter of entries 1, 2 and 13 in this List.

Parliament can constitute special Courts under this entry.[41] Parliament can confer appellate powers on the Supreme Court from the special Courts under Art. 138(1) read with Art. 246(1) and entry 77 of List I.[42]

The Debt Recovery Tribunal which has been established by the Recovery of Debts Due to Banks and Financial Institutions Act, 1993, passed by Parliament falls under entry 11A read with entry 46, List II. "Administration of justice" is a term of very wide amplitude and connotation. It cannot be marginalised only to organizing Courts.[43]

(12) Evidence and oaths; recognition of laws, public acts and records, and judicial proceedings.

(13) Civil procedure, including all matters included in the Code of Civil Procedure at the commencement of this Constitution; limitation and arbitration.

Legislation regulating landlord-tenant relationship in houses and buildings, according to some High Courts, falls under items, 6, 7 and 13 of this List and not under entry 18 of List II.[44]

(14) Contempt of Court, but not including contempt of the Supreme Court.

See entry 77 in List I.

Under this entry, Parliament has enacted the Contempt of Courts Act, 1971. Contempt of a High Court may be committed beyond the territorial limits of the State in which the High Court exercises its jurisdiction. Such a situation can be dealt with only under a Central law and not under a State law because of the doctrine of territorial nexus discussed earlier.[45] Contempt of Court has national

---

39. Director of Industries, U.P. v. Deepchand, AIR 1980 SC 801; State of Tamil Nadu v. G.N. Venkataswamy, AIR 1995 SC 21 : (1994) 5 SCC 314; New Laxmi Oil Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1998 MP 161.

40. State of Bombay v. Narottamdas Jethabhai, supra, footnote 38.

41. In Re, The Special Courts Bill, 1968, AIR 1979 SC 478 : (1979) 1 SCC 380.
Also see, Ch. IV, supra, Sec. F(g); entry 95, List I, supra; Sec. D; Ch. XXI, infra; Ch. XXVI, infra.

42. Ibid.

43. Mudit Entertainment Industries Pvt. Ltd. v. The Banaras State Bank Ltd., AIR 2000 All 181.
Also see, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.

44. Milap Chand v. Dwarka Das, AIR 1954 Raj. 252; Kedarnath v. Nagindra Narayana, AIR 1954 Pat. 97; supra, Sec. E.

45. See, supra, Sec. A.

dimensions. S. 11 of the Act provides that a High Court shall have jurisdiction to try a contempt of itself, or of any subordinate Court whether the contempt is committed within the territorial jurisdiction of the High Court or outside it.

Reference may also be made in this connection to the discussion held earlier under Art. 129 and Art. 215 which confer power on the Supreme Court and a High Court to punish for contempt of itself respectively.[46]

(b) PUBLIC WELFARE

Certain public welfare activities, and the inter-State aspects of Public health fall in this List. The relevant entries are:

(15) Vagrancy; nomadic and migratory tribes.

The problems relating to these tribes have national dimensions as these tribes are not confined to a single State but are spread over several states.[47]

(16) Lunacy and mental deficiency including places for the reception or treatment of lunatics and mental deficients.

(17) Prevention of cruelty to animals.

(18) Adulteration of foodstuffs and other foods.

The evil of adulteration has national aspect. Food adulterated in one State may be consumed by the people in some other State. The widespread evil of adulteration can be effectively dealt with only by a national law.

The Prevention of Food Adultertion Act, 1954 has been enacted by Parliament under this entry. The Act has been enacted to curb the widespread evil of food adulteration in the country and avert danger to human life arising out of sale of unwholesome food articles.[48]

(19) Drugs and poisons, subject to the provisions of entry 59 of List I with respect to opium.

Entry 59 of List I, is not exhaustive in regard to opium. Control by licence or otherwise, of the possession, storage and sales of opium falls under the present entry and not under entry 59, List I.[49]

Control of production, trade and use of drugs and poisons is an important component of the subject-matter of this entry. A closely associated aspect of entry 19 is drug-trafficking and drug addiction. This evil has not only local but global dimensions.

(23) Social security and social insurance: employment and unemployment.

The term 'social security' broadly includes insurance against industrial accidents, sickness and the like.

There arises an important question in relation to this entry, viz., when a law is passed to put into effect any welfare scheme for a section of the society, on whom can the liability to contribute for the scheme be placed?

---

46. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(i) and Ch. VIII, Sec. C(a), supra.
47. See, supra, Ch. IX, Sec. C.
48. Gandhi Irwin Salt Manufacturers Ass. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 Mad. 109.
49. Laxminarayan Khemhand v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1961 MP 13.

The Supreme Court has stated that "the burden of the impost may be placed only when there exists the relationship of employer and employee between the contributor and the beneficiary of the provisions of the Act and the Scheme made thereunder." The state cannot in an Act under entry 23, List III, place the burden of an impost by way of contribution for giving effect to the Act and the scheme made thereunder for the social security and social welfare of a section of the society upon a person who is not a member of such section of society nor an employer of a person who is a member of such section of society.

In the instant case,[50] a scheme for the welfare of the fishermen was introduced. Liability to contribute for the scheme was placed on the purchasers/exporters of fish. This was held to fall outside the ambit of entry 23, List III.

(27) Relief and rehabilitation of persons displaced from their original place of residence by reason of the setting up of the Dominions of India and Pakistan.

This entry specifically covers a situation created by partition of the country into India and Pakistan at the time of Independence. In this connection, entry 41 in this List may also be noted.

The West Bengal Land Development and Planning Act falls under this entry as one of its purposes is to resetttle the immigrants from Pakistan.[51]

(28) Charities and charitable institutions, charitable and religious endowments and religious institutions.

The subject-matter of this entry is not of local interest but of nation-wide interest. These institutions may have their properties and beneficiaries scattered in more than one State. Also, their activities may spread over several States. Only a Central law can effectively cope with such a situation.

This entry includes both public and private religious endowments.

(29) Prevention of the extension from one State to another of infectious or contagious diseases or pests affecting men, animals or plants.

(30) Vital statistics including registration of births and deaths.

(c) FORESTS

Forests (entry 17-A) and 'Protection of wild animals and birds' (entry 17-B) have been transferred from List II to List III because of the importance of conservation of forests and wild life and also because the States were not doing enough in this respect. The process of deforestation has been going on apace in India and it needs to be checked.

The term 'forests' in entry 17A includes 'forest produce' in its primary and natural state lying in the forest.[52] Parliament has enacted the Forest (Conservation) Act, 1980, with a view to check indiscriminate diversion of forest land for non-forestry purposes. Through this Act, the Centre has occupied only one aspect of forests, viz., "conservation of forests". Except to the extent covered by this Act, legislative competence with respect to all other aspects of forests remains with the States.

---

50. Koluthara Exports Ltd. v. State of Kerala, (2002) 2 SCC 459 : AIR 2002 SC 973.
51. Benoy v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1966 Cal. 429.
52. J.C. Waghmare v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1978 Bom. 119.

(d) LABOUR

Certain aspects of labour legislation fall within this List. The relevant entries are:

(22) Trade unions; industrial and labour disputes.

(24) Welfare of labour including conditions of work, provident funds, employers' liability, workmen's compensation, invalidity and old age pensions and maternity benefits.

An Act regulating the hours of employment of persons employed in the business of shops or commercial establishments,[53] the Minimum Wages Act,[54] a law to provide for compulsory saving of a part of bonus payable to an industrial worker,[55] a law fixing minimum bonus,[56] fall under entries 22 and 24 of this List.

Sec. 2(f) of the Industrial Disputes Act defines industry "to mean any business, trade, undertaking, manufacture or calling of employers and includes any calling, service, employment, handicraft or industrial occupation or avocation of workmen". In the Niemla case,[57] the Supreme Court rejected the argument that the definition was very broad-based and comprised industrial as well as non-industrial concerns and so fell outside the scope of entry 22. The Court held that the definition was justified under both entries 22 and 24.

A law for bettering conditions of labour engaged in manufacturing beedis and cigars falls under this entry and not under entry 24 in List II, or entries 7 and 52 of list I. It is an Act for labour welfare and not for industries.[58] A law providing for workers' participation in joint management councils of industrial undertakings falls under entries 22 and 24 of List III as it prevents industrial disputes and leads to labour welfare.[59]

The Industrial Disputes Act is enacted as a social security and social insurance measure. The Act relates to entries 22, 23 and 24 of List III.[60]

(e) EDUCATION

This subject has been transferred from List II to List III. There were many reasons for transferring "Education" from the State to the Concurrent List. The desired socio-economic goals can be achieved in the country through education. Parliament can secure uniformity in standards and syllabi of education so very necessary to acheive national integration. Parliament can minimise disparities in the levels and standards of education as between the various States.

Entry 25 now runs as: "Education including technical education, medical education and universities, subject to the provisions of entries 63, 64, 65 and 66 of List I; vocational and technical training of labour.

The use of the expression "subject to" means that out of the general heading "Education", the matters contained in entries 63-66 in List I have been carved

---

53. Manohar v. State, AIR 1951 SC 315 : 1951 SCR 671.
54. Narottam Das v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1964 MP 45.
55. Milkhi Ram v. State of Punjab, AIR 1964 Punj. 513.
56. Jalan Trading Co. v. Mill Mazdoor Sabha, AIR 1967 SC 691 : (1967) 1 SCR 15.
57. Niemla Textile Finishing Mills v. The Second Punjab Tr., AIR 1957 SC 329 : 1957 SCR 335.
58. M.G. Beedi Works v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1832 : (1974) 4 SCC 43.
59. Monogram Mills v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1976 SC 2177 : (1976) 3 SCC 294.
60. CMCH Employees' Union v. CM College, Vellore Ass., AIR 1988 SC 37 : (1987) 4 SCC 691; see also Hindustan Times v. State of U.P. (2003) 1 SCC 591 : AIR 2003 SC 250.

out. It means that if a matter is covered by any of the entries 63-66 in List I, the power to legislate on that matter lies exclusively with Parliament, even though that matter may otherwise fall within the broader field of "education". This means that, entry 66, List I, and entry 25, List III, should be read together.

In the absence of any Parliamentary Act, State still has competence to enact a statute laying down reservation for entry in any courses of study including the medical courses.[61]

Under entry 66, List I, the Centre has power to see that a required standard of higher education in India is maintained.

The question of interrelationship of entry 25, List III with the entries in List I is discussed below.[62]

(f) ECONOMIC POWER AND PLANNING

The entries relating to this head run as follows:

20. Economic and social planning.

This is a very vague phrase and its full implications are not clear. There has not been much case-law on the scope of this entry. This is a conspicuous entry and no parallel entry is to be found in any other federal constitution.

The entry denotes the modern trend of political thought that the state is an instrument to promote the socio-economic welfare of the people. This obligation on the various governments has been emphasized in the Preamble to the Constitution[63] as well as in the Directive Principles of State Policy,[64] e.g., Arts. 38 to 42, 43A, 45 to 48A.

Planning cannot be carried on either by the Centre or by the States in isolation. It has to be an inter governmental co-operative effort.[65] Hence the entry has been placed in the Concurrent List.

There are many entries in the three Lists pertaining to Planning as it is a multi-faceted activity. If this entry is interpreted broadly, then its scope may be so pervasive as to eat up many entries in the State List as, at the present time, economic and social planning dominates the total governmental functioning. If, however, the entry is interpreted narrowly, and all specific State entries are taken out of it, then it may not mean much except perhaps co-ordination of various activities.

Planning has emerged as an important activity of the Central and the State Governments. There is the Planning Commission to formulate five year plans and supervise their implementation by the various governments.[66] This entry provides the juristic basis to the formulation of national plans which comprehend the entrie range of developmental activities cutting across the delimitation of powers between the Centre and the States.

---

61. Saurabh Chaudri v. Union of India, (2003) 11 SCC 146 : AIR 2004 SC 361.
62. See, infra, Sec. G(c).
63. See, supra, Ch. I. Also see, Ch. XXXIV, under "Directive Principles", infra.
64. Infra, Ch. XXXIV, for discussion on Directive Principles.
65. See, Ch. XIV, Sec. G, infra, under Co-operative Federalism.
66. For Planning Commission, see, infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. G.

The entry has been invoked to uphold the Bombay Town Planning Act, 1954, as a measure of social planning.[67]

20-A. Population control and family planning.

21. Commercial and industrial monopolies, combines and Trusts.

The scope of this entry is not curtailed by entry 26, List II.

Monopolies in respect of any commercial or trading venture can be created under this entry in favour of government.[68] Unethical commercial or industrial practices can be effectively regulated by a Central law as such practices have inter-State dimensions, implications and ramifications.

It has been held by the Supreme Court that the Motor Vehicles Act which provides a machinery for the creation of government monopoly in motor transport has been validly enacted by Parliament under entries 21 and 35 of this List.[69]

33. Trade and commerce in, and the production, supply and distribution of:

(a) the products of any industry where the control of such industry by the Union is declared by Parliament by law to be expedient in the public interest, and imported goods of the same kind and such products;

(b) foodstuffs, including edible oilseeds and oils;

(c) cattle fodder, including oilcakes and other concentrates;

(d) raw cotton, whether ginned or unginned, cotton seeds;

(e) raw jute.

Wheat, wheat products, paddy, sugar and sugarcane fall under the term 'foodstuffs'.[70] The term 'foodstuffs' does not mean only the final food product which is consumed but also includes raw food articles which may after processing be used as food by human beings,[71] e.g., turmeric, cashew nuts.

Entry 33 deals with production of "foodstuffs". Seeds are a vital commodity having direct connection with the production of foodstuffs to which it relates. The item of seeds of foodstuffs has direct bearing with the production of foodstuffs. Consequently, it is competent for Parliament as well as the State Legislatures to make laws in relation to seeds of foodstuffs. "Surely seeds of foodcrops and seeds of fruits and vegetables relate to foodstuffs."[72]

This entry is also linked to entries 26 and 27, List II. For a discussion on the inter-relation of this entry with entries 26 and 27 of List II, see later under the 'Pith and Substance' Rule.[73]

There also remains the problem of mutual relationship between entry 33, List III, and entry 14, List II, pertaining to agriculture, as production of foodstuffs

---

67. Maneklal v. Makwana, supra, under entry 18, List II, Sec. E.
68. H.C. Narayanappa v. State of Mysore, AIR 1960 SC 1073 : (1960) 3 SCR 742.
Also, State of Tamil Nadu v. Hind Stone, AIR 1981 SC 711 : (1981) 2 SCC 205.
69. Kondala Rao v. A.P.S.R.T. Corp., AIR 1961 SC 82 : (1961) 1 SCR 642.
This Act has now been replaced by the Motor Vehicles Act, 1989.
70. Nathuni v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1964 Cal. 279; Bijay Kumar Routrai v. State of Orissa, AIR 1976 Ori. 138.
71. K. Janardhan Pillai v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 1485, 1488 : (1981) 2 SCC 45.
72. Raghu Seeds & Farms v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 533 : (1994) 1 SCC 278.
73. Infra, Sec. G(d).

falling under the present entry forms a big slice of agriculture. Agricultural marketing in respect of the agricultural commodities mentioned herein also falls under the present entry. The scope of the entry thus becomes very broad.

A State law providing for a temporary take-over of management of tea units has been held to fall under this entry for in pith and substance,[74] the Act relates to production of tea in the State. The Tea industry has been brought under Central control under entry 52, list I.[75]

Entry 33, List III, provides the Central Government with a mechanism for ensuring that unreasonable restrictions are not imposed on trade, commerce and intercourse thereby adversely affecting the economic unity of the country. The problems regarding production, supply and distribution of essential commodities have national dimension and entry 33 enables the Central Government to efficiently manage essential commodities.[76]

This entry supplements, to some extent, the Central power under entry 52, List I. Under cl. (a), even though control of certain industries may be taken over by the Union under entry 52, List I, yet the trade, commerce, production etc. of such industry fall in the Concurrent area. This means that insofar as the field is not occupied by the laws made by the Union, the States are free to legislate.

As things stand now, the Centre has great economic potentiality. Under entry 52, List I, it can control any industry; under entry 54, List I, it can control mines and minerals to any extent it likes; under entry 33, List III, it can control the products of the controlled industries, imported goods of the like nature, and important raw materials like cotton, jute and foodstuffs. It can regulate inter-State trade and commerce under entry 42, List I, and can exercise price control under entry 34, List III. Besides, there are a number of other important powers with it, like planning, labour, foreign trade, etc.

33A. Weight and measures except establishment of standards.

Fixation of weights and measures directly affects inter-State trade and commerce. Parliament can introduce uniformity in this respect throughout the country.

34. Price Control.

This entry is closely related to entry 33 in this List.

36. Factories.

The Factories Act enacted by Parliament makes provisions for the health, safety and welfare of the workers in factories.

37. Boilers.

The Boilers Act secures uniformity throughout India in all technical matters connected with boilers to prevent accidents.

38. Electricity.

It is necessary to have uniform standards all over India in respect of production, supply and distribution of electricity. Adequate supply of electricity is the key to the rapid industrialisation in the country.

---

74. For discussion on the Rule of Pith and Substances, see, Sec. G(d), infra.
75. Tufanialonga Tea Co. v. State of Tripura, AIR 1999 Gau. 109.
76. Also see in this connection, Ch. XV, infra, entitled "Freedom of Trade and Commerce".

The purpose of Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948, is to rationalise the production and supply of electricity. The provision for incorporation of the electricity board is only incidental to production, supply and distribution of electricity. The Act, therefore, falls under this entry and not under entries 43 and 44 of List I.[77]

(g) COMMUNICATIONS

Some forms of communication like ports, shipping, etc., fall within this List. The relevant entries are:

(31) Ports other than those declared by or under law made by Parliament or existing law to be major ports

Major ports are included in entry 27, List I. All other ports fall under this entry.

(32) Shipping and navigation on inland waterways as regards mechanically propelled vessels, and the rule of the road on such waterways, and the carriage of passengers and goods on inland waterways subject to the provisions of List I with respect to national waterways.

In this connection, reference may be made to entries 24 and 30 in List I. Regulation of shipping and navigation on inland waterways has a very close and substantial connection with shipping and navigation of interstate waterways. Under entry 24, List I, Parliament can declare by law that a particular inland waterway shall be a national waterway. To the extent of such a declaration, the power of the State Legislatures under entry 32 would be superseded.

(35) Mechanically propelled vehicles including the principles on which taxes on such vehicles are to be levied:[78]

Other corresponding entries are 24 and 30 in List I and 13 in List II. 'Principles of taxation' denote rules of guidance in the matter of taxation. See entry 57 in List II.[79]

The main purpose underlying this entry is to enable Parliament to regulate the exercise of the taxation power of the States with respect to mechanically propelled vehicles.[80] If the principles laid down in a parliamentary law enacted under this entry come in conflict with a law made by a State under entry 57 of list II, the State law will be invalid because of the rule of repugnancy contained in Art. 254(1).[81] If Parliament enacts no law under this entry, then the power of the States to tax such vehicles remains unimpaired.

(h) MISCELLANEOUS

The entries defying the above classification are brought together under this heading. These entries run as follows:

(26) Legal, medical and other professions

The Central enactments such as the Indian Medical Council Act, 1956, the Indian Nursing Council Act, 1947, the Dentists Act, 1948, the Chartered Account-

---

77. K.S.E. Board v. Indian Aluminium Co., AIR 1976 SC 1031 : (1976) 1 SCC 466.
78. State of Assam v. Labanya Probha, AIR 1967 SC 1575 : (1967) 3 SCR 611.
79. Sita Ram v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1974 SC 1373 : (1974) 2 SCC 301.
80. For taxing powers of the States, see, Ch. XI, Sec. D, infra.
81. See, infra, Sec. H., for discussion on Art. 254(1).

ants Act, 1949, and the Pharmacy Act, 1948, fall under this entry, or the parallel entry 16 in List III in the Government of India Act, 1935.

(39) Newspapers, books and printing presses.

A law to suppress the printing of objectionable matters in newspapers falls within this entry.[82]

(40) Archaeological sites and remains other than those declared by Parliament by law to be of national importance.

Also see, entry 67, List I, in this connection.

(41) Custody, management and disposal of property (including agricultural land) declared by law to be evacuee property.

The word 'disposal' in the entry is wide enough to cover extinguishment of a mortgage. The term 'management' is broad enough to include allotment and grant of leases, as well as cancelling or varying the terms of leases already effected.[83]

Entry 18, List II, does not control the ambit of the present entry. Evacuee legislation would be valid even if it includes certain provisions relating to relations between landlord and tenant.[84]

(42) Acquisition and Requisitioning of Property.

Before 1956, entries 33, List I and 36, List II, provided for acquisition and requisitioning of property, the former for the purposes of the Union and the latter for the purposes other than those of the Union. Entry 42, List III, provided for "Principles on which compensation for property acquired or requisitioned for the purposes of the Union or of a State, or for any other public purpose, is to be determined, and the form and the manner in which such compensation is to be given".

Legislation in respect of acquisition of property is an independent and separate matter which falls only under Entry 42 of List III and not incidental to any specific head of legislation under any other entry. Property includes an undertaking. Therefore, the argument that acquisition of a sugar undertaking, is beyond the competence of the State Legislature has been rejected. The concept of acquisition of an undertaking is an entirely different matter from the control and regulation of industries.

The further argument that a sugar undertaking is a going concern and cannot constitute property within the meaning of Entry 42 of List III has also been rejected. Power to legislate for acquisition of property in Entry 42 of List III includes the power to legislate for acquisition of an undertaking. The expression "undertaking" means a going concern with all its rights, liabilities and assets as distinct from the various rights and assets which compose it.[85]

These triple entries dealing with the same subject-matter caused problems. To obviate difficulties and simplify constitutional position, the Seventh Amendment was enacted. It deleted entry 33, List I and entry 36 in List II and gave its present

---

82. Shantilal v. State of Bombay, AIR 1954 Bom 508.
Also see, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C, under "Freedom of Speech and Expression".
83. Sardara Singh v. Custodian, AIR 1952 Pepsu 12.
84. Samsudin v. Asst. Custodian, AIR 1953 Sau. 73.
85. Shri Krishan Gyanaday Sugar Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2003) 4 SCC 378 : AIR 2003 SC 3436.

shape to entry 42, List III. The existing position is more flexible insofar as a State Government is competent to acquire property for a Union purpose and vice versa.

A law to acquire an electrical undertaking falls under entry 38, List III, and the present entry.[1]

Under this entry, Parliament can legislate to acquire coal-bearing land belonging to the States to effectuate its power to regulate and develop mines and minerals under entry 54, List I.[2] An Act treating cash grants as property and providing compensation for their discountinuance falls under this entry. The word 'acquisition' in the entry implies not only vesting of title in the property in question in the State but also 'deprivation' of property.[3] The word 'property' in the entry is to be interpreted broadly and it comprises tangibles as well as intangibles.[4] A State law to acquire road transport undertakings,[5] or some sugar mills,[6] fall under this entry.

Entry 42 is an independent power. It is not incidental to the power to legislate under any other topic. Property can be acquired under entry 42 and not as an incident of the power to legislate in respect of a specific head of legislation in any List.[7] The entry is wide enough to empower the Centre to acquire property even belonging to the States.[8]

The Bihar Private Educational Institutions (Taking Over) Act, 1987, has been held valid as an exercise of power by the State under entry 42, List III. The Act deals with nothing but acquisition of property. Entry 66, List I, does not come into the picture. Entry 25, List III, may also be relevant.[9]

(43) Recovery in a State of claims in respect of the taxes and other public demands, including arrears of land revenue and sums recoverable as such arrears, arising outside that State.

The legislative power extends to recovering all claims in respect of taxes and other public demands.[10]

(45) Inquiries and statistics for the purposes of any of the matters specified in List II or List III.

Under this entry, Parliament is authorised to make a law with respect to inquiries for the purpose of a matter in List II, even though it cannot make law with respect to that matter.[11]

Parliamentary legislation covering Central inquiries against State Ministers can be validly enacted under entry 9, List I, and entry 45, List III, and the residu-

---

1. Bharat Hydro Power Corp. Ltd., Guwahati v. State of Assam, AIR 1998 Gau. 49.
2. State of West Bengal v. Union of India, AIR 1963 SC 1241.
3. Ranojirao v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1965 MP 77.
4. N.E. Supply Co. v. State of Madras, AIR 1971 Mad. 351; Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 564 : (1970) 1 SCC 248.
5. Sita Ram v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1974 SC 1373 : (1974) 2 SCC 301.
6. Ishwari Khetan Sugar Mills v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 1955 : (1980) 4 SCC 136.
7. Ibid.
8. Babubhai Jashbhai Patel v. Union of India, AIR 1983 Guj 1.
9. L.N.M. Institute of Economic Development and Social Change v. State of Bihar, AIR 1988 SC 1136 : (1988) 2 SCC 433.
10. M.A. Kamath v. Karnataka State Financial Corp., AIR 1981 Kant. 193.
11. Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Justice Tendolkar, AIR 1958 SC 538 : 1959 SCR 279.

ary power.[12] The language used in entry 45, List III, viz., "any of the matters specified" is broad enough to cover anything reasonably related to any of the enumerated items even if done by holders of Ministerial offices in the States. In the alternative, the Supreme Court has ruled that even if neither entry 94, List I, nor entry 45, List III, would cover inquiries against Ministers in the States relating to acts connected with Ministers' powers, Art. 248, read with entry 97, List I (known as the residuary power), must necessarily cover an inquiry against Ministers on matters of public importance whether the charges include alleged violations of criminal law or not.[13]

Parliament has enacted the Commissions of Inquiry Act, 1952, under this entry.[14]

(46) Jurisdiction and powers of all Courts, except the Supreme Court, with respect to any of the matters in the Concurrent List.

Thus, Parliament as well as a State Legislature may legislate with regard to the jurisdiction and powers of the High Courts in respect of intestacy and succession under this entry read with entry 5.[15]

(i) COMMENTS

From the above enumeration and classification of the entries in the various Lists, it would appear that the Central Government has been vested with vast powers contained in the Union and the Concurrent Lists. In addition, Centre's power has been extended by several devices adopted in the phraseology of the entries.

Firstly, some of the entries in the Union List are so phrased that their scope can be expanded by the Centre itself.[16]

Secondly, some of the entries in the State List are subject to some of the entries in the Union List,[17] or the Concurrent List,[18] or a law made by Parliament.[19]

Thirdly, some entries in the Concurrent List are made subject to the entries in the Union List,[20] or laws made by Parliament.[21]

Thus, the dimensions of several entries in the Union List or the Concurrent List are expansive. Moreover, the residuary power has been left with the Centre.[22]

However, it will be wrong to suppose that the States' powers are insignificant. Like other federal countries, the Constitution of India places the main responsibility for many primary nation-building and social-service activities on the

---

12. For discussion on "Residuary Powers", see, infra, Sec. I.
13. State of Karnataka v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 68 : (1977) 4 SCC 608.
For further discussion on this matter, see, Infra Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
14. For a detailed disussion on this Act, see, M.P. JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, III, 2465-2644 (1999).
15. In Re, G.F. Muirhead, AIR 1959 Mys. 83.
16. Entries 52, 53, 54, 56, 62, 63, 64, and 67 in List I.
17. Entries 11, 13, 17, 22, 23, 24, 32 and 54, List II.
18. Entries 11, 13, 26, 27 amd 57, List II.
19. Entries 12, 37 and 50, List II.
20. Entries 19, 32, List III.
21. Entries 31, 33(a) and 40, List III.
22. See, infra, Sec. I.

States, e.g., public health falls within the State sphere, the Union having only limited powers of an inter-State nature;[23] relief of the disabled and unemployable,[24] housing, agriculture[25] and irrigation are exclusively State functions. Therefore, for many socio-economic services, the Centre has no direct responsibility as these lie within the exclusive legislative sphere of the States. Many matters of social security, social insurance, relief and rehabilitation of displaced persons fall within the Concurrent List,[26] and, therefore, the States share the burden along with the Centre in these areas.

The Centre and the States also share power in some other areas outside the Concurrent List, as for example, communications, economic powers, etc., some aspects of which fall in List I and others in List II. To give an example: Parliament is authorised to legislate with regard to mines and minerals to the extent to which it declares it expedient in public interest to control the area:[27] to the extent there is no such declaration, the matter lies with the States.[28] Similarly with regard to industries, the power is divided between the Centre and the States, although the major responsibility in this area rests with the Centre.

It will also be seen that by the process of interpretation, the Supreme Court has sought to protect State powers from being overridden by the exercise of Central powers.[29]

COMPOSITE LEGISLATION

Many a time, a legislature may enact composite legislation which may be based on more than one legislative entry. There is no bar against Parliament or the State Legislatures enacting a statute, the subject-matter of which calls for exercise of powers under two or more entries in the same List or different Lists.[30] A piece of legislation need not necessarily fall within the scope of one entry alone; more than one entry may overlap to cover the subject-matter of a single piece of legislation.

The Supreme Court has observed in Ujagar Prints v. Union of India:[31] "In deciding the validity of a law questioned on the ground of legislature incompetence the State can always show that the law was supportable under any other entry within the competence of the Legislature. Indeed in supporting a legislation sustenace could be drawn and had from a number of entries. The legislation could be composite legislation drawing upon several entries."

Such a rag-bag legislation is particularly familiar in taxation.[32] For example, the Karnataka Tax of Entry of Goods Act, 1979, was held referable to entry 35, List III and entry 52 of List II.[33]

---

23. List I, entry 28; List II, entry 6; List III, entry 29.
24. List II, entry 9.
25. List II, entry 14.
26. List III, entres 23, 24, and 27.
27. Entry 54, List I.
28. Entry 23, List II.
29. Infra, Sec. G.
30. Harikrishna Bhargava v. Union of India, AIR 1966 SC 619; State of Andhra Pradesh v. NTPC Ltd., (2002) 2 SCC 203 : AIR 2002 SC 404.
31. AIR 1989 SC 516 : (1989) 3 SCC 488.
32. See, infra, next Chapter.
33. Arun Manikchand Shah v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1996 Kant. 386.

G. PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION OF THE LISTS

According to a famous aphorism, federalism connotes a legalistic government. There being a division of powers between the Centre and the States, none of the governments can step out of its assigned field; if it does so, the law passed by it becomes unconstitutional. Questions constantly arise whether a particular matter falls within the ambit of one or the other government. It is for the Courts to decide such matters for it is their function to see that no government exceeds its powers.

The Supreme Court has observed regarding the Centre-State distribution of powers that "the constitutionality of the law becomes essentially a question of power which in a federal constitution... turns upon the construction of the entries in the legislative lists." The ultimate responsibility to interpret the entries lies with the Supreme Court in the scheme of the Indian federal system. Further the Court has reiterated the proposition that "these subjects which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within the power of a particular legislature may in another aspect and for another purpose fall within another legislative power".[34]

If the matter is within the exclusive competence of the State Legislature i.e. List II, then the Union Legislature is prohibited from making any law with regard to the same. Similarly, if any matter is within the exclusive competence of the Union, it becomes a prohibited field for the State Legislatures. The concept of occupied field is relevant in the case of laws made with reference to entries in List III has to be applied only to the entries in that list. The express words employed in an entry would necessarily include incidental and ancillary matters so as to make the legislation effective.[35]

Since the inauguration of the Indian Constitution, a large number of cases involving interpretation of the various entries in the three Lists have come before the Courts. Keeping in view the fact that the Constitution has three elaborate Lists enumerating more than 200 entries, questions regarding interpretation of these entries, and their mutual relationship, are bound to arise from time to time. There have been quite a few significant controversies in this area.

A point which deserves to be noted is that, hitherto, most of the disputes regarding division of powers have been raised by private parties. The matter arises when a person raises a plea in a Court that a particular legislation affecting his rights falls outside the legislative ambit of the Legislature which has enacted it, and, therefore, it is unconstitutional. In other federations, inter-governmental legal controversies are quite frequent, but such has not been the case in India so far. There have been only a few inter-governmental controversies.[36]

The entries in the lists give outline of the subject matter of legislation and should, therefore be given widest amplitude.[37]

---

34. Federation of Hotel & Restaurant v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1637 : (1989) 3 SCC 634.
35. Hindustan Lever v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 9 SCC 438 : AIR 2004 SC 326.
36. State of West Bengal v. Union of India, AIR 1963 SC 1241; see, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii)(d), infra; State of Rajasthan v. Union of India, AIR 1977 SC 1361; see, Ch. XIII, Sec. D, infra; State of Karnataka v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 68 : (1977) 4 SCC 608; see, Ch. XIII, Sec. C, infra; In re, Cauvery Water Dispute Tribunal, AIR 1992 SC 522 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 96 (11) ; see, Ch. XIV, Sec. E, infra.
37. Karnataka Bank Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, (2008) 2 SCC 254 : (2008) 1 SCALE 660.

It needs to be underlined, however, that the judicial interpretative process has been such as to uphold most of the impugned legislation and it is only rarely that Courts declare a law invalid on the ground that the legislature has exceeded its powers. The Courts have developed several norms to interpret the entries in these Lists.

The doctrine of colourable legislation does not involve any question of bona fides or mala fides on the part of the legislature. The whole doctrine resolves itself into the question of the competency of a particular legislature to enact a particular law. If the legislature is competent to pass a particular law, the motives which impelled it to act are really irrelevant. The court reiterated this statement,[38] and has emphatically pointed out that for invoking the doctrine of "colourable legislation" the legislature must be shown to have transgressed the limits of its constitutional power patently, manifestly and directly.[39] The motive of the legislature is irrelevant to castigate as a "colourable legislation",[40] The question of bonafide or malafide is irrelevant and hence not involved in considering the charge of "colourable legislation."[41] On the other hand, if the legislature lacks competency the question of motive does not arise at all. If Parliament has the requisite competence to enact the impugned Act, the enquiry into the motive which persuaded Parliament into passing the Act would be of no relevance.[42]

In the Kerala Scheduled Tribes case,[43] the Supreme Court has expressed that the 'right question' test which has been applied in many cases as a test to find out whether an administrative Agency has validly exercised its power, namely, whether it has posed to itself the right question should be applicable to find out whether the Courts have exercised their jurisdiction properly or not when the validity of a statute is under attack went on to observe what would be the right question in such cases viz. whether the statute has been enacted to achieve the constitutional course set out not only in Part III of the Constitution but also in Parts IV (Directive Principle) and IV-A (Fundamental Duties). If the question is answered in the affirmative in the facts and circumstances of the particular case, then the statute is safe.

(i) EACH ENTRY TO BE INTERPRETED BROADLY

The entries in the three Lists are not always set out with scientific precision or logical definition. It is practically impossible to define each item in a List in such a way as to make it exclusive of every other item in that List.

The framers of the Constitution wished to take a number of comprehensive categories and describe each of them by a word of broad and general import. For

---

38. State of Kerala v. Peoples Union for Civil Liberties, Kerala State Unit, (2009) 8 SCC 46 : (2009) 9 JT 579.
39. Ibid.
40. STO v. Ajit Mills Ltd., (1977) 4 SCC 98.
41. K.C.Gajapati Narayan Deo v. State of Orissa, AIR 1953 SC 375 : 1954 SCR 1.
42. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.
43. State of Kerala v. Peoples Union for Civil Liberties, Kerala State Unit, (2009) 8 SCC 46.

example, in matters like 'Local Government', 'Education', 'Water', 'Agriculture', and 'Land', the respective entry opens with a word of general import, followed by a number of examples or illustrations or words having reference to specific sub-heads or aspects of the subject-matter. The effect of the general word, however, is not curtailed, but rather amplified and explained, by what follows thereafter. The legislative entries are, however, not exhaustive, and do not cover, for example, all taxable events. This is recognized and reflected in the residuary powers of taxation saved under Art. 248(2) and List I Entry 97. For instance, a State cannot under the garb of luxury tax under List II Entry 62 impinge on the exclusive power of the Centre under List I Entries 84 and 83 by merely describing an article as a luxury for the same taxable events as covered under Entries 84 and 83.[44]

An important principle to interpret the entries is that none of them should be read in a narrow, pedantic sense; that the 'widest possible' and 'most liberal' construction be put on each entry, and that each general word in an entry should be held to extend to all ancillary or subsidiary matters which can fairly and reasonably be said to be comprehended in it.[45]

The first principle in relation to the legislative entries is that they should be liberally interpreted, that is, each general word should be held to extend to ancillary or subsidiary matters which can fairly and reasonably be said to be comprehended in it. Second principle is that competing entries must be read harmoniously, that is, to read the entries together and to interpret the language of one by that of the other.[46]

The justification for this approach is that the entries set up a 'machinery of government'; they demarcate the area or 'heads' or 'fields' of legislation within which the respective legislature can operate and do not confer legislative power as such. Legislative power on the Centre and the States is conferred by Art. 246 and not by the entries in the three legislative lists.[47] Therefore, these entries must be given the widest scope of which their meaning is fairly capable.[48] The Supreme Court has enunciated this rule in the following words:[49]

> "It is settled law of interpretation that entries in the Seventh Schedule are not powers but fields of legislation. The legislature derives its power by Art. 246 and other related Articles of the Constitution. Therefore, the power to make the amendment Act is derived not from the respective entries but under

---

44. Godfrey Phillips India Ltd. v. State of U.P., (2005) 2 SCC 515 : AIR 2005 SC 1103.

45. Hans Muller v. Superintendent, Presidency Jail, Calcutta, AIR 1955 SC 367 : (1955) 1 SCR 1284; Navinchandra Mafatlal v. Commr. of Income-tax, Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 58 : (1955) 1 SCR 829; See also Welfare Assn. ARP v. Ranjit P. Gohil, (2003) 9 SCC 358 : AIR 2003 SC 1266.

46. Godfrey Phillips India Ltd. v. State of U.P., (2005) 2 SCC 515 : AIR 2005 SC 1103.

47. Premchand Jain v. Chhabra, AIR 1984 SC 981 : (1984) 2 SCC 302; J.K. Bharati v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1984 SC 1542 : (1984) 3 SCC 704; Goodyear India Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1990 SC 781 : (1990) 2 SCC 71.

48. United Provinces v Atiqua Begum, AIR 1941 FC 16; Calcutta Gas Co. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1962 1044; Waverly Jute Mills v. Raymon and Co., AIR 1963 SC 90; Harakchand Ratanchand Banthia v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1453 : (1969) 2 SCC 166; Synthetics and Chemicals v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1927; Indian Aluminium Co. Ltd. v. Karnataka Electricity Board, (1992) 3 SCC 580, 599; P.N. Krishan Lal v. Govt. of Kerala, (1995) Supp. (2) SCC 187.

49. Jilubhai Nanbhai Khachar v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1995 SC 142, at 148 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 596.

> Art. 246 of the Constitution. The language of the respective entries should be given the widest scope of their meaning, fairly capable to meet the machinery of the government settled by the Constitution. Each general word should extend to all ancillary or subsidiary matters which can fairly and reasonably be comprehended in it. When the vires of an enactment is impugned, there is an initial presumption of its constitutionality and if there is any difficulty in ascertaining the limits of the legislative power, the difficulty must be resolved, as far as possible in favour of the legislature putting the most liberal construction upon the legislative entry so that it may have the widest amplitude."

The entries in the same List are not mutually exclusive and each entry comprises within its scope all matters incidental thereto. The entries demarcate the area over which the concerned legislature operate. In the words of the Supreme Court, the entries "are to be regarded as enumeratio simplex of broad categories" and that "the power to legislate on a topic of legislation carries with it the power to legislate on an ancillary matter which can be said to be reasonably included in the power given."[50] Thus, the main topic in an entry is to be interpreted as comprehending all matters which are necessary, incidental or ancillary to the exercise of power under it.

The Supreme Court has often emphasized that the various entries in the three Lists are not powers but are fields of legislation. The power to legislate is given by Art. 246. The entries demarcate the area over which the concerned legislature can operate, and that the widest import and significance must be given to the language used in these entries. Each general word in an entry should be held to extend to all ancillary or subsidiary matters which can fairly and reasonably be comprehended therein.[51]

The Supreme Court has enunciated this principle of interpretation of the entries as follows:[52]

> "The cardinal rule of interpretation is that the entries in the legislative lists are not to be read in a narrow or restricted sense and that each general word should be held to extend to all ancillary or subsidiary matters which can fairly and reasonably be said to be comprehended in it. The widest possible construction, according to the ordinary meaning of the words in the entry, must be put upon them ... In construing the words in a constitutional document conferring legislative power the most liberal construction should be put upon the words so that the same may have effect in their widest amplitude."

Thus, power to legislate includes power to legislate retrospectively as well as prospectively.[53] If a law passed by a legislature is struck down by the Courts for one infirmity or another, the legislature can cure the infirmity by passing a law,

---

50. State of Rajasthan v. Chawla, AIR 1959 SC 544 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 904.

51. Baldev Singh v. Commr. of Income-tax, AIR 1961 SC 736 : (1961) 1 SCR 482; Balaji v. I.T.O., AIR 1962 SC 123 : (1962) 2 SCR 983; Maru Ram v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 2147 : (1981) 1 SCC 107; India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85, at 91; Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1927, 1951.

52. The Elel Hotels and Investment Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1664, at 1669 : (1989) 3 SCC 698.

53. S.T. Swamiar v. Commr., HRE, AIR 1963 SC 966; Udai Ram v. Union of India, AIR 1968 SC 1138 : (1968) 3 SCR 41; Tirath Ram v. State of U.P., AIR 1970 SC 405; Krishna Chandra v. Union of India, AIR 1975 SC 1389; I.N. Saxena v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1976 SC 2250; Misri Lal Jain v. State of Orissa, AIR 1977 SC 1686 : (1977) 3 SCR 714.

as so to validate the earlier law. Such legislation is necessarily to be regarded as subsidiary or ancillary to the power of legislation on the particular subject.[54]

For example, entry 30, List II, runs as: "Moneylending and money-lenders : relief of agricultural indebtedness". This entry has been broadly interpreted so as to include relief against loans by scaling down, discharging, reducing interest and principal, and staying the realisation of debts. "The whole gamut of moneylending and debt liquidation is thus within the State's legislative competence." Narrowly interpreted, the entry would refer only to agricultural indebtedness. But by giving a broad interpretation, it could include debts by non-agriculturists as well.[55]

The principle has been recently expounded by the Supreme Court as follows:[56]

> "Thus, it is settled principle of interpretation that legislative Entries are required to be interpreted broadly and widely so as to give power to the legislature to enact law with respect to matters enumerated in the legislative entries. Substantive power of the legislature to enact law is under Art. 246 of the Constitution and legislative Entries in the respective Lists 1 to 3 of the Seventh Schedule are of enabling character, designed to define and delimit the respective areas of legislative competence of the respective legislature".

In the same case, the Supreme Court has explained that the widest possible construction must be put upon the words used in a legislative entry. Words should be given their "ordinary, natural and grammatical meaning" subject to the rider that in construing words in a constitutional enactment, conferring legislative power under Art. 246, construction should be put upon the words in the entries in the respective lists so that the same may have effect in their widest amplitude. The rule of widest construction of an entry, however, would not entitle the legislature to make a law relating to a matter which has no rational connection with the subject-matter of the concerned entry.[57]

The reading down of provision to uphold its Constitutionality is applicable in the process of interpretation.[58]

In the context of an entry relating to taxation it has been pointed out that the incidence of tax would be relevant in construing whether a tax is a direct or an indirect one, but irrelevant in determining the subject matter of the tax.[59]

(ii) HARMONIOUS INTERPRETATION OF ENTRIES

The three Lists are very detailed and the constitution-makers have made an attempt to make the entries in one List exclusive of those in other Lists. But, as no drafting can be perfect, at times, some conflict or overlapping between an en-

---

54. Rai Ramkrishna v. State of Bihar, AIR 1963 SC 1667 : (1964) 1 SCR 897; Khyerbari Tea Co. v. State of Assam, AIR 1964 SC 925 : (1964) 5 SCR 975; Misri Lal Jain v. State of Orissa, supra.

55. Fateh Chand Himmat Lal v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1977 SC 1825 : (1977) 2 SCC 670; Pathumma v. State of Kerala, AIR 1978 SC 771 : (1978) 2 SCC 1; Saiyedbhai Kadarbhai v. Saiyed Intajam Hussen, AIR 1981 Guj. 154.

56. R.S. Rehchand Mohota Spg. & Wvg. Mills Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1997 SC 2591, 2596 : (1997) 6 SCC 12.

57. Union of India v. Shah Goverdhan L. Kabra Teachers College, (2002) 7 SCALE 435.

58. P. Tulsi Das v. Government of Andhra Pradesh, (2003) 1 SCC 364 : AIR 2003 SC 43.

59. Godfrey Phillips India Ltd. v. State of U.P., (2005) 2 SCC 515 : AIR 2005 SC 1103.

try in one List and an entry in the other List comes to surface. This gives rise to the question of determining inter-relationship between such entries.

To meet such a situation, the scheme of Art. 246 is to secure the predominance of the Union List over the other two Lists, and that of the Concurrent List over the State List. Thus, in case of overlapping between an entry in the Union List and an entry in the State List, the former prevails to the extent of overlapping; the subject-matter falls exclusively within the Union jurisdiction and the States cannot legislate on it. In case of any overlapping between an entry in the Union List and an entry in the Concurrent List, the former prevails over the latter and the subject-matter again is treated as being exclusively Central, so as to debar the States from legislating on it, to the extent of overlapping. If there is an overlapping between an entry in the Concurrent List and one in the State List, the former prevails and the subject would fall within the Concurrent List, thus, giving both Parliament and the State Legislatures jurisdiction to legislate with respect to it rather than making it exclusively a State matter.

This result is inherent in the wordings of Article 246. Art. 246(1) confers exclusive power on Parliament to legislate relating to matters in List I 'notwithstanding anything in clauses (2) and (3).' This is known as the non-obstante clause and its effect is to make the Union power prevail in case the Union and State powers overlap.

The non-obstante clause has been further stregthened by clauses (2) and (3) of Article 246. According to Clause (2), 'notwithstanding anything in clause (3)', Parliament is entitled to legislate regarding matters in the Concurrent List, and the State legislatures may legislate in the field 'subject to Cl. (1)'. Thus, in case of overlapping between the Union and the Concurrent Lists, the power of the States is subject to the Union List. Further, Cl. (3) of Art. 246 authorises the States to legislate regarding matters in the State List but 'subject to clauses (1) and (2)', which means subject to the Union List and the Concurrent List.

Some of the entries in the different Lists may overlap or may appear to be in direct conflict with each other. In such a situation, the principle of supremacy of the Union List over the State List, as enunciated above, is not to be applied automatically or mechanically as soon as some conflict of legislative jurisdiction becomes apparent. The non-obstante clause is the ultimate rule which is to be invoked only as a last resort, in case of inevitable or irreconcilable conflict between the entries in different Lists.

Before applying the rule, however, the Court should make an attempt to reasonably and practically construe the entries so as to reconcile the conflict and avoid overlapping. This is the rule of harmonious interpretation of the various entries. An effort is to be made by the Court to reconcile all concerned and relevant entries. To harmonise and reconcile conflicting entries in the Lists, it may be necessary to read and interpret the relevant entries together, and, where necessary, restrict the ambit of the broader entry in favour of the narrower entry so that it is not eaten up by the former. It may be necessary to construe a broad entry in a somewhat restricted sense than it is theoretically capable of. If one entry is general, and the other limited or specific, then the former may be restricted to give sense and efficacy to the latter which may be treated as particularised and something in the nature of an exception to the general entry. It has been held that though scope of List II Entry 54 was widened by insertion of Art. 366(29-A) powers of States to levy such tax is subjected to a corresponding restriction as a consequence of Constitutional limits imposed on sales tax under Art. 286(3) and S. 3 and Sch. 2 proviso, ADE Act, 1957.[60]

This principle of interpretation was lucidly explained by LORD SALMOND in Governor-General in Council v. State of Madras,[61] in relation to the Government of India Act, 1935, but which remains as valid to-day as it was at that time. LORD SALMOND observed:

> "..... it is right first to consider whether a fair reconciliation cannot be effected by giving to the language of the Federal legislative List a meaning which, if less wide than it might in another context bear, is yet one that can properly be given to it, and equally giving to the language of the Provincial [now State] Legislative List a meaning which it can properly bear".

In the words of the Supreme Court:[62]

> "It is well established that the widest amplitude should be given to the language of the entries. But some of the entries in the different lists or in the same list may overlap or may appear to be in direct conflict with each other. It is then the duty of this Court to reconcile the entries and bring about a harmonious construction."

It is only when reconciliation between the conflicting entries should prove impossible, then, and only then, the non-obstante clause, in Art. 246, mentioned above, is to be invoked to give primacy to the Federal power over the State or Concurrent power.[63] The non-obstante clause "ought to be regarded as a last resource, a witness to the imperfections of human expression and the fallibility of legal draftsmanship". The rationale of such an approach is that the framers of the Constitution could not have intended that there should exist any conflict among the Lists, and, therefore, it is necessary to adopt a process of construction which would give effect to all entries and not nullify or render otiose any entry.

This rule, it may be appreciated, is favourable to the States because List II is subject to both List I as well as List III. This becomes obvious from the following discussion. In this connection, the Supreme Court has stated that the relevant entry in List I, should not be so construed as to rob the relevant entry in List II or List III of all its content and substance. It is only when it proves not possible to reconcile the entries that the non-obstante clause "notwithstanding anything in clauses (2) and (3)" occurring in Art. 246(1) has to be resorted to.[64]

An entry in one list cannot be so interpreted as to make it cancel or obliterate another entry or make another entry meaningless. In case of apparent conflict, it is the duty of the Court to iron out the crease and avoid conflict by reconciling the conflict. If any entry overlaps or is in apparent conflict with another entry, every attempt shall be made to harmonise the same. Although Parliament cannot legislate on any of the entries in the State List, it may do so incidentally while

---

60. Godfrey Phillips India Ltd. v. State of U.P., (2005) 2 SCC 515 : AIR 2005 SC 1103.
61. AIR 1945 PC 98, at 100.
62. Harakchand Ratanchand Banthia v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1453 : (1969) 2 SCC 166. Also see, Hoechst Pharmaceuticals Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019 : (1983) 4 SCC 45.
63. Waverly Jute Mills v. Rayman Co., AIR 1963 SC 90 : (1963) 3 SCR 209; K.S.E. Board v. Indian Aluminium Co., AIR 1976 SC 1031; The Elel Hotels and Investment Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1664, 1668 : (1989) 3 SCC 698.
64. Ajay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1994) 4 SCC 401.

essentially dealing with the subject coming within the purview of the entry in the Union List. Conversely, the State Legislature also while making legislation may incidentally trench upon the subject covered in the Union List. Such incidental encroachment in either event need not make the legislation ultra vires the Constitution. The doctrine of pith and substance is sometimes invoked to find out the nature and content of the legislation. However, when there is an irreconcilable conflict between the two legislations, the Central legislation shall prevail. But every attempt would be made to reconcile the conflict.[65]

Entry 86 in List I proceeds on the principle of aggregation and tax is imposed on the totality of the value of all the assets. It is quite permissible to separate lands and buildings for the purpose of taxation under Entry 49 in List II. There is no reason for restricting the amplitude of the language used in Entry 49 in List II. The levy of tax, calculated at the rate of a certain per centum of the market value of the urban land has been held to be intra vires the powers of the State Legislature and not trenching upon Entry 86 in List I.[66]

(iii) INTER-RELATION OF ENTRIES

The working of the above rule of harmonious interpretation may be illustrated by referring to some well-known relevant cases.

In re the C.P. and Berar Act[67], the leading case in which the principle of harmonious interpretation of the conflicting entries was propounded for the first time, has been discussed below under the 'Taxing Powers'.[68]

In State of Bombay v. Balsara,[69] a conflict was sought to be made out between entry 41, List I and entry 8, List II. Arguing for a broader view of the Central entry, it was suggested that 'import' of intoxicating liquors would not end with mere landing of goods on the shore but would also imply that the imported goods reach the hands of the importer who should be able to possess them. Therefore, it was said that the State could not prohibit the possession and sale of intoxicating liquors as that would amount to a power to prohibit their import into the country, as one is a necessary consequence of the other.

To reconcile the two entries, the Supreme Court gave a limited meaning to the word 'import' in the Central entry in order to give effect to the State entry. The Court held that 'import' standing by itself, could not include sale or possession of the article imported into the country by a person residing in the territory in which it was imported. The State entry has no reference to import and export but merely deals with production, manufacture, possession, transport, purchase and sale of intoxicating liquors. The State Legislature could, therefore, prohibit the possession, use and sale of intoxicating liquors. Thus, entry 8 (List II) has been given effect by narrowing down the scope of the Central entry which could otherwise nullify the State power if it were to be broadly interpreted.

---

65. Special Reference No. 1 of 2001, In re (2004) 4 SCC 489 : AIR 2004 SC 2647.
66. State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
67. Gwyer, C.J., In re C.P. & Berar Act No. XIV of 1938, AIR 1939 FC 1. Also, Waverly Jute Mills v. Raymond Co., AIR 1963 SC 90 : (1963) 3 SCR 209.
68. Infra, next Chapter.
69. AIR 1951 SC 318 : 1951 SCR 682.

Similarly, it has been held that the power conferred by entry 26, List III, is general and that the power conferred by entry 78, List I, is limited to persons entitled to practise before the High Courts, and so the general power must be read subject to the spcific power. Consequently, a State Legislature cannot enact any legislation with respect to "persons entitled to practise before the High Courts". The legislative power relating to persons entitled to practise before the Supreme Court and the High Courts is carved out of the general power relating to professions in entry 26, List III, and given exclusively to Parliament. On a conjoint reading of Entry 66 of List I and Entry 25 of List III of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution it is clear that although the State has a wide legislative field to cover, the same is subject to Entries 63, 64, 65 and 66 of List I and once it is found that any State legislation does not entrench upon the legislative field set apart by Entry 66 List I, the State Act cannot be faulted.[70]

Apart from the legal practitioners practising before the Supreme Court and the High Courts, the legislative power with respect to other practitioners would fall under entry 26 of List III.[71]

Method of taxing luxury goods invariably has been by subjecting them to the extant fiscal regimes of excise duties, sales tax, customs duties, etc. at heavier rates and not under List II Entry 62 and no distinction is made in Art. 366 or Entries 83 and 84 of list I as to the nature of the goods which may be the subject matter of sale excise or import, even if they are articles of luxury.[72]

(a) INDUSTRY

The inter-relation between entries 52 of List 1, 24 and 27 of List II, and 33 of List III becomes important as all these entries deal with various aspects of industry.

The subject of 'industries' has been enumerated in the general entry 24, List II. This, however, is expressly made subject to entries 7 and 52 in List I. Thus, the States can be denied competence to legislate with respect to industries to the extent Parliament by law makes the requisite declaration under entries 7 and 52 of List I.

Under entry 7, Parliament may by law declare any industry "necessary for the purposes of defence or prosecution of war". Under entry 52, List I, Parliament may by law declare Union control of any industry to be expedient in public interest. When such a declaration is made, Parliament can legislate in respect of that industry to the exclusion of the State Legislatures. The State Legislatures are denuded of their power to legislate under entry 24, List II to the extent Centre assumes control over the concerned industry.[73]

Entry 52, List I deals with industry and does not cover the matters mentioned in Entry 33, List III.

Under entry 52, a declaration in abstract is not enough. Parliament has to pass a law, containing the declaration specifying the industry and indicating the nature

---

70. State of A.P. v. K. Purushotham Reddy, (2003) 9 SCC 564 : AIR 2003 SC 1956.
71. In Re Lily Isabel Thomas, AIR 1964 SC 855 : (1964) 6 SCR 229; O.N. Mohindroo v. Bar Council, AIR 1968 SC 888 : (1968) 2 SCR 709.
72. Godfrey Phillips India Ltd. v. State of U.P., (2005) 2 SCC 515 : AIR 2005 SC 1103.
73. State of Andhra Pradesh v. McDowell & Co., AIR 1996 SC 1627 : (1996) 3 SCC 709.

and extent of the Union control over the concerned industry. If this is done, then to the extent covered by the declaration and the concomitant legislation, the State Legislative competence with respect to that industry is curtailed. This becomes clear from the following observation of the Supreme Court in Ishwari Khaitan[74] "...the State Legislature can be denied legislative power under entry 24 of List II to the extent Parliament makes declaration under entry 52 and by such declaration, Parliament acquires power to legislate only in respect of those industries in respect of which declaration is made and to the extent as manifested by legislation incorporating the declaration and no more."

For this purpose, Parliament has enacted inter alia the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act under which many industries have been taken under Central control.

The pith and substance of the IDR Act is to provide the Central Government with the means of implementing their industrial policy. The Act brings under Central control the development and regulation of number of important industries which affect the country as a whole and whose development is governed by economic factors of all-India import.[75]

Parliament has taken the tobacco industry under its control under entry 52, List I, and has enacted the Tobacco Board Act, 1975. Refusing to give a restricted meaning to the term 'industry' in entry 52, the Court upheld the validity of the Act. Accordingly, the State Legislature was denuded of its power to make any law in relation to growing of tobacco or sale or purchase of raw tobacco as such a provision had already been made in the Tobacco Board Act.[76] But, recently, the Court has changed its view. In a 3 : 2 decision, the Court has overruled the earlier ITC decision. The Court has now ruled that the State Legislature is competent to levy market fee on the sale of tobacco in a market area. The majority has interpreted the word 'industry' in entry 52, List I restrictively as excluding pre-manufacture activity. This means that raw materials for an industry do not fall under entry 52, List I. In arriving at this decision, the majority seeks to serve three objectives, viz. : (1) the powers of the state ought not be whittled down; (2) the concept of federalism should be preserved; (3) Central supremacy should also be upheld.[77]

The responsibility for development of small scale industries rests with the States under entry 24, List II.

The State power to levy 'vend-fee' on denatured spirit under entry 8, List II, is not excluded by Parliamentary legislation under entry 52, List I, with regard to ethyl alcohol. Had there been only entry 52 in List I and entry 24 in List II, Parliament might have had an exclusive power to legislate in respect of industries notified by it because entry 24 is subject to 52. But there are other entries as well, as

---

74. Ishwari Khetan Sugar Mills v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 1955 : (1980) 4 SCC 136; see, footnote 85, infra.
Also see, Viswanathiah & Co. v. State of Karnataka, (1991) 3 SCC 358.
A few other Acts are the Cardomon Act, 1965; The Central Silk Board Act, 1958; The Coffee Act, 1942; The Rubber Act, 1947; The Tea Act, 1953; The Coir Industry Act, 1953; The Coconut Development Board Act, 1979.

75. Khoday Distilleries Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, (1995) 1 SCC 574 : AIR 1996 SC 911.
For the doctrine of pith and substance, see, Sec. G(iv), infra.

76. I.T.C. Ltd. v. Agricultural Produce Market Committee, (1985) Supp SCC 476.

77. I.T.C. Ltd. v. Agricultural Produce Market Committee, AIR 2002 SC 852 : (2002) 1 SCALE 327.

for example, entry 26 in List II and entry 33 in List III, which make it clear that the power to regulate the notified industries is not exclusively with Parliament.[78]

Interpreting entries 24 and 25 of List II harmoniously, the Supreme Court has held that 'gas works' being a specific entry (entry 25) would not fall under the general entry 24. If the word 'industry' in entry 24 were to include 'gas and gas works', then entry 25 would become redundant. Therefore, adopting the principle of harmonious interpretation, from the wide field covered by entry 24, i.e., the field of entire industry, the specific industry, i.e., 'gas and gas works' covered by entry 25, should be excluded. On that interpretation, 'gas industry' would not fall under entry 52 of List I either, for the term 'industry' in entries 52 and 24 should be given a uniform interpretation.[79] This means that 'gas and gas works' fall within the exclusive field allotted to the States.

(b) SUGAR

Sugar has been declared to be a "controlled" industry under entry 52, List I. The State of U.P. enacted an Act to regulate the supply of sugarcane to the sugar factories. The U.P. Act was challenged as being ultra vires the State on the ground that sugar being a 'controlled' industry, sugarcane also fell within the scope of Parliament. The word 'industry', it was contended, has a very wide import and includes not only the process of manufacture but also all things which are necessarily incidental thereto, viz., acquisition of the raw materials of the industry and the disposal of the finished products thereof and so sugarcane, as the raw material of the sugar industry, fell within the Parliamentary sphere.

Applying the principle of reconciling the entries in the various Lists,[80] the Supreme Court held in Tika Ramji v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[81] that the U.P. Act was valid. Entries 52 of List I and 24 of List II indicate that generally industries fall within the exclusive sphere of the States except those industries which are controlled by Parliament. Entries 27 of List II and 33 of List III indicate that the production, supply and distribution of products of the controlled industries fall within the Concurrent jurisdiction under entry 33(a) of List III.

Industry in the wide sense comprises of three different aspects:

(i) raw materials which are an integral part of the industrial process;

(ii) the process of manufacture or production; and

(iii) the distribution of the products of the industry.

But, in the context of the various entries, the word 'industry' actually connotes aspect (ii) mentioned above, i.e., the process of manufacture or production. The raw materials being goods would be comprised in entry 27 of List II and the products of the industry being goods would also fall under the same entry. The products of the controlled industry however would fall under entry 33, List III.

The sugar industry being controlled, legislation with regard to its process of manufacture falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament. Distribution, supply and production of the product of this controlled industry, viz., sugar as a

---

78. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd., AIR 1980 SC 614 : (1980) 2 SCC 441, supra. Also see, State of Haryana v. Jage Ram, AIR 1980 SC 2018 : (1980) 3 SCC 599.
79. Calcutta Gas Co. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1962 SC 1044 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 1.
80. Supra, Sec. G(iii).
81. AIR 1956 SC 676 : 1956 SCR 393.

finished product, falls within entry 33 of List III. Sugarcane, its raw material, being 'goods' falls within entry 27 of List II, but being food-stuff could also fall within entry 33 of List III, and in either case, the State Legislature may legislate with respect to it. It may be interesting to note that under the Sugarcane Control Order, promulgated by the Central Government, the Centre controls the price of sugarcane at which it is supplied to the sugar mills. Obviously, this is possible because sugarcane being food-stuff is a concurrent matter. The U.P. Act and the Central Order can stand together for while the former regulates only the supply and purchase of sugarcane required by the sugar mills, the latter regulates the price of sugarcane and so they did not overlap. The Supreme Court has not defined 'industry' as such or stated exhaustively all its ingredients.

On the basis of the interpretation of the various entries in the Tika Ramji case, the position appears to be as follows. Ordinarily, the States have a comprehensive regulatory power covering all aspects of any industry falling within the State sphere. The States can regulate raw materials for such industries under entry 27, List II, as 'goods', and also the finished products of the same. As regards the Centrally-controlled industries, the process of manufacture falls within the Central domain under entry 52, List I; control over finished products of these industries falls under the Central as well as State jurisdiction under entry 33 in List III. Accordingly, molasses being the product of the sugar industry, which is a controlled industry, falls under entry 33(a) of List III and the State has power to enact a law to regulate the same.[82]

As the raw materials of these industries, power lies mainly with the States under entry 27, List II, except for the commodities specified in entry 33, List III, which the Centre may also regulate. Regulatory power regarding centrally controlled industry would thus appear to be somewhat fragmented insofar as some raw materials pertaining to these industries may fall outside the Central purview which may create problems of Central-State co-ordination. Failure by a State to ensure adequate supply of raw-materials to an industry may hamper the same and the Centre may be unable to take any corrective measures.

The Supreme Court has rejected the argument that Parliament has no competence to enact any law relating to control of sugarcane as that subject falls within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the States; the same being part of agriculture. Under entry 33, List III, the Centre can regulate the cultivation and sale of sugarcane as it is a foodstuff.[83]

The proposition that the goods produced by a 'controlled' industry does not fall under entry 52, List I, but under entry 33, List III, has been reiterated by the Courts in several cases. The Courts have argued that to interpret entry 52, List I, too broadly would render entry 33 in List III otiose and meaningless. This means that in respect of products of a 'controlled' industry, both the States as well as the Centre have competence to enact laws subject to Art. 254.[84]

---

82. Sushant Elhence v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1998 All. 332.

83. A.K. Jain v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 267 : (1969) 2 340.

84. MSCO Pvt. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 76 : (1985) 1 SCC 51; Viswanathan & Co. v. State of Karnataka, (1991) 3 SCC 358; Indian Aluminium Co. Ltd. v. Karnataka Electricity Board, (1992) 3 SCC 580; Sita Ram & Bros. v. State of Rajasthan, JT 1994 (6) SC 629; Shriram Industrial Enterprises Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1996 All. 135; New India Sugar Mills v. State of Bihar, AIR 1996 Pat. 94.
For discussion on Art. 254, see, Sec. H, infra.

In order to solve some serious problems created by the owner of certain mills for cane growers and the labour employed in the mills, and with a view to ameliorate the economic situation in the State of Uttar Pradesh, the State Legislature passed an Act acquiring 12 sugar mills. The constitutional validity of the Act was challenged. In Ishwari Khetan Sugar Mills v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[85] the Supreme Court held that in spite of sugar being a centrally controlled industry under entry 52, List I, the State of Uttar Pradesh can pass legislation acquiring some sugar mills and vesting them in the State Sugar Corporation. The Supreme Court held that a mere declaration under entry 52, List I, unaccompanied by law is incompatible with the entry. A declaration for assuming control of specified industries coupled with law assuming control is a prerequisite for legislative control under entry 52, List I. "Therefore, the erosion of the power of the State Legislature to legislate in respect of the declared industry would not occur merely by declaration but by the enactment consequent on the declaration prescribing the extent and scope of control."

To demarcate the power of the State Legislature, the scope of the legislation made by the Centre ought to be assessed as that will indicate the extent of the control assumed by the Centre. The extent of Central control over sugar is contained in the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act through which the Centre has made the requisite declaration. To the extent the Centre has acquired control over the sugar industry under this Act, the State Legislature is denuded of its power to legislate under entry 24, but not beyond that.

On the question of inter-relation between entry 52, List I, and entry 24, List II, the Supreme Court observed: "..... legislative power of the States under entry 24, List II, is eroded only to the extent control is assumed by the Union pursuant to a declaration made by Parliament in respect of declared industry as spelt out by legislative enactment and the field occupied by such enactment is the measure of erosion. Subject to such erosion, on the remainder, the State Legislature will have power to legislate in respect of declared industry, without in any way trenching upon the occupied field."[86]

As regards the impugned law, the Court held that in pith and substance it was for acquisition of the scheduled undertakings by transfer of ownership to the corporation and, therefore, does not come in conflict with the said Central Act.[87] The impugned State Act refers to entry 42, List III, under which both the Centre and the States can acquire property. The Central Act (IDRA) is not at all concerned with the ownership of the industrial undertakings in declared industries and it does not occupy the field of acquisition and it can apply effectively even to an undertaking acquired by the State.[88]

The power of the State Legislature to acquire an undertaking declared to be a controlled industry in the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act has been confirmed by the Supreme Court in several cases. The State of Nagaland acquired the ownership of a company manufacturing plywood. The Supreme Court ruled following its ruling in Ishwari Khetan that the IDR Act did not prohibit

---

85. AIR 1980 SC 1955 : (1980) 4 SCC 136.
Also, State of Haryana v. Chanan Mal, AIR 1976 SC 1654 : (1977) 1 SCC 340.
86. Ibid., at 1969.
87. For the Rule of Pith and Substance, see, infra.
88. For the Rule of Occupied Field see, infra, under "Repugnancy", Sec. H.

acquisition of ownership of any unit in the controlled industry.[89] The Act to acquire a company falls under entry 42, List III, and not under entry 24, List II. Similarly, a State law acquiring shares of a Cement Corporation was held to fall under entry 42, List III, as it related to the acquisition of property.[90]

The point to note is that by the declaration the whole of the industry does not pass under the Central control totally. The Centre gets competence only to the extent mentioned in the provisions of the Central Act. Beyond that, the States retain control over the declared industry. As the declaration by the Centre trenches upon the State legislative competence, it has to be construed strictly.

In Viswanathiah,[91] the Supreme Court has further explained the mutual relationship of the various entries in the three lists pertaining to industry. "Industry" comprises three steps (i) raw materials; (ii) the process of manufacture or production; and (iii) the distribution of the products of the industry. The Court has ruled in the instant case, that State legislation with regard to "raw materials" is permissible under entry 27 List II, notwithstanding a declaration by Parliament under entry 52, List I. States can legislate upon the process of manufacture or production under entry 24, List II, subject to any declaration under entry 52, List I. As regards the distribution of the products of the industry is concerned, ordinarily the States are competent to legislate under entry 27, List II, but if it is a controlled industry, the matter falls under entry 33, List III, and both can legislate in regard thereto.[92]

(c) FORWARD CONTRACTS

Parliament can validly enact the Forward Contracts (Regulation) Act, 1952, which seeks to prevent speculation in forward contracts, where the intermediate buyer and seller do not pay the actual price, but only the difference, and where no delivery is required to be given.

The words "futures markets" in entry 48, List I, mean not only the "place of business" but also "business", for in modern commerce, more often bargains are concluded through correspondence. Therefore, the law relating to forward contracts is a legislation on "futures markets".

Entry 26, List II, being general and broad, and entry 48, List I, being specific, therefore, the general entry should be interpreted restrictively so that the specific entry is kept alive. The words 'trade and commerce' in entry 26 could not be interpreted so broadly as to make the words 'futures markets' in entry 48 nugatory or futile. Entry 7 of List III, is also general in its terms and cannot prevail as against a specific entry like entry 48 in List I or entry 26 in List II.[93]

(d) EDUCATION

Education is a divided area between the Centre and the States, the relevant entries being List I, entries 63, 64, 65, 66, and List III, entry 25.

---

89. Mahesh Kumar v. Nagaland, AIR 1998 SC 1561 : (1997) 8 SCC 176. Also see, Indian Aluminium Co. v. Karnataka Electricity Board, AIR 1992 SC 2169 : (1992) 3 SCC 580; Dalmia Industries Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1994 SC 2117 : (1994) 2 SCC 583. Somasundaram Corporation (Pvt.) Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1999 Mad. 192.
90. Dalmia Industries Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1994 SC 2117 : (1984) 2 SCC 583.
91. B. Viswanathiah & Co. v. State of Karnataka, (1991) 3 SCC 358.
92. New India Sugar Mills Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1996 Pat. 94.
93. Waverly Jute Mills Ltd. v. Raymond & Co., AIR 1963 SC 90 : (1963) 3 SCR 209.

While considering List II Entry 32 and List III Entry 25 the Supreme Court has emphasized the importance of the University in the educational scheme. A university is a whole body of teachers and scholars engaged at a particular place in giving and receiving instruction in higher branches of learning; and as such persons associated together as a society or corporate body, with definite organisation and acknowledged powers and privileges and forming an institution for promotion of education in higher or more important branches of learning and includes the colleges, building and other property belonging to such body.[94]

The word 'education' in entry 25 is of wide import so as to include "all matters relating to imparting and controlling education". Entry 25 is specifically made subject to entries 63-66 in List I. Thus, out of the broad entry 25, List III, the area entrusted to the Centre under entries 63 to 66 in List I, has been carved out. A State Legislature could, therefore, make laws with respect to all matters relating to education except the matters excluded. Under entry 66, List I, Parliament has power to legislate with respect to "co-ordination and determination of standards in institutions for higher education or research."

Entry 25, List III, and item 66, List I, overlap to some extent and, therefore, should be construed harmoniously. To the extent of overlapping, the Central power under item 66 must prevail over the State power under item 25.

Once an institution is declared by Central Govt. as a deemed university under UGC Act, which is an enactment under Entry 66, entire matter relating to admission of students in such university would be determined by UGC under the said Act and all India common entrance test conducted, and States would not have legislative competence to make law under Entry 25 of List III in respect of that matter.[95]

The power of the Centre to legislate in respect of the medium of instruction arises under items 63 to 65 in List I to the extent it has a direct bearing and impact upon 'co-ordination and determination of standards,' that is, to ensure maintenance or improvement of standards, in institutions of higher education. Under entry 66, the Centre has power to ensure that a required standard of higher education is maintained. Further, it is also the exclusive responsibility of the Centre to coordinate and determine the standards for higher education. Such coordinate action in the field of higher education along with maintenance of proper standards is regarded as being of paramount importance to national progress. Parliament has an overriding legislative power to ensure that the syllabi, courses of study, and the medium selected by a State do not impair standards of education or render the co-ordinantion of such standards either on an all-India or other basis difficult.

Even if the Centre refrains from legislation to the full extent of its powers, the States do not become authorised to legislate in respect of a matter assigned to the Union. Parliament has exclusive power to legislate with respect to matters included in List I. The State has no power over these matters. A State legislation on any matter falling in List I will be void, inoperative and unenforceable. Accordingly, the validity of a State law on university education under entry 25 List II would, therefore, depend on whether it prejudicially affects 'co-ordination' and

94. Prof. Yashpal v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2005) 5 SCC 420 : AIR 2005 SC 2026.
95. Bharati Vidyapeeth v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 11 SCC 755 : AIR 2004 SC 1943.

'determination' of standards, even though the Centre may not have enacted any legislation to achieve that purpose. If there be a Central law in respect of that matter, it would have paramountcy over the State law, but even when the Centre does not exercise its power, a State law trenching upon the exclusive Union field would still be invalid.[1]

The power to 'co-ordinate' is not merely a power to 'evaluate' standards, but to 'harmonise', and the power could be used to legislate for preventing the occurrence, or for removal, of disparities in standards. The exercise of the Central power to co-ordinate is not conditional upon the existence of unequal standards; it must of necessity imply the power to prevent what would make co-ordination difficult. The power is absolute and unconditional. The validity of a State law fixing a regional language or Hindi as an exclusive medium of instruction and examination in the universities, superseding English to that extent, depends on the question whether it would necessarily result in the falling of standards. If it does, then the legislation would necessarily fall within item 66 and would be excluded, to that extent, from the State power under item 25, List III.

The power under entry 66, List I, is thus preventive as well as curative. It prevents the States from doing anything which may adversely affect, or create a disparity of, standards in higher education. Or else, the Centre can take steps when such a disparity comes into existence. It can lay down conditions subject to which only States may adopt regional languages as media of instruction. If the Centre remains inactive and makes no legislation with respect to these matters, the Courts may still adjudge the State law pertaining to university education to see whether or not it would affect standards adversely.

The interplay of Entry 66 List I and Entry 25 List III shows that norms for admission do have a connection with the standards of education and that they are not covered only by Entry 25 of List III. Any lowering of the norms of admission does have an adverse effect on the standards of education in the institutions of higher education.[2]

The Courts can thus act as the sentinel, in the absence of Central legislation, to keep a watch on State action having a tendency to lower standards of higher education. To judge whether prescription of a regional language as an exclusive medium of instruction will result in falling of standards or not, the Court has applied such tests as existence of adequate text-books, journals, etc.; availability of competent instructors in the medium through which instruction is to be imparted ; capacity and ability of the students to receive or imbibe instructions through the medium proposed, etc. A duty has thus been cast on the State seeking to prescribe a regional language as an exclusive medium for higher education to see whether there are adequate text books available, whether there are qualified instructors, whether the students have developed a capacity to comprehend the instruction in that medium. The Court held that the university had no power to prescribe Gujarati or Hindi as the exclusive medium of instruction in higher education.

Thus, in the Gujarat case,[3] an expansive interpretation has been given to the Central entry so as to contain the linguistic chauvinism of the States,[4] Medium of

---

1. State of Tamil Nadu v. Adhiyaman Educational & Research Institute, (1995) 4 SCC 104.
2. Prof. Yashpal v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2005) 5 SCC 420 : AIR 2005 SC 2026.
3. Gujarat University v. Sri Krishna, AIR 1963 SC 707 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 112.

instruction has been held to have an important bearing on the effectiveness of instruction and resultant standards achieved thereby.

It has been held again in D.A.V. College v. State of Punjab[5] that no State has the legislative competence to prescribe any particular medium of instruction in respect of higher education or research and scientific or technical instructions if it interferes with Parliament's power under entry 66, List I, to coordinate and determine the standards in such institutions and also to maintain high standards in university education throughout the country.

The impact of the Gujarat University seems to have been diluted somewhat by Chitralekha v. State of Mysore.[6] The question was whether giving of a weightage to extra-curricular activities as compared to academic record for admission to medical and engineering colleges would affect the Central power in entry 66 in List I. The crux of the Gujarat case was explained to be that if the impact of the State law providing for such standards on entry 66, List I, "is so heavy or devastating as to wipe out or appreciably abridge the Central field, it may be struck down."

Despite incorporation of universities being a legislative head in State List, the whole gamut of the university comes within the purview of List I Entry 66 and Parliament alone is competent therefor. It is the exclusive responsibility of Parliament to determine and maintain standards of higher education or research throughout the country and to ensure uniformity therein, and that the same are not lowerd at hands of any State, as it is of great importance to national progress.[7]

The Court refused to hold that if a State Legislature prescribed a higher percentage of marks for extra-curricular activities in the matter of admission to colleges, it would be directly encroaching on the field covered by entry 66 of List I. Justice SUBBA RAO thus sought to restrict the ratio of the Gujarat University case. In that case, what the Court had said was that any State law would be bad as "prejudicially affecting" the Union power of "co-ordination and maintenance of standards", if it seeks to lower standards in institutions of higher education. Nowhere in the Gujarat University case, has the majority said that a State law would be bad only if it destroyed the Union power. It was rightly pointed out by the minority Judge (Mudholkar J.) in Chitralekha that admission of less qualified students in preference to more qualified ones was bound to impair academic standards.[8]

The opinion of the Supreme Court has varied over time on the question whether laying down of a minimum standard for admission of students to an engineering/medical college relates to entry 66, List I, or entry 25, List III.

---

4. Jain, Constitutional Aspects of the Language Problem in India, (1967-68) Yearbook of the South Asia Institute, Heidelberg University, 116.

5. AIR 1971 SC 1731 : (1971) 2 SCC 261.

6. AIR 1964 SC 1823 : (1964) 6 SCR 368.
The Judgment in Chitralekha was pronounced by SUBBA RAO, J., who had given a dissenting Judgment in the Gujarat University case.
Chitralakha ruling has been followed in several cases, e.g., Rajendran v. State of Madras, AIR 1968 SC 1012 : (1968) 2 SCR 786; State of Andhra Pradesh v. L. Narendra Nath, AIR 1971 SC 2560.
Also see, Ambesh Kumar, footnote 10, infra.

7. Prof. Yashpal v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2005) 5 SCC 420 : AIR 2005 SC 2026.

8. Also see, Nayak, The Central-State Legislative Relationship in Education, 14, J.I.L.I., 562; P.K. Tripathi, Legislative Relations between the Union and the States & Educational Planning, Spotlight on Constitutional Interpretation, 153 (1972).

In State of Madhya Pradesh v. Kumari Nivedita Jain,[9] the Supreme Court dealt with the question of admission of students to the M.B.B.S. Course in the State medical colleges. The Government of Madhya Pradesh framed rules providing for a minimum of 50% as qualifying marks for the students of general category for admission to medical colleges but for the students of Scheduled Castes/Scheduled Tribes, the minimum was zero. Upholding the validity of the rule, the Supreme Court opined that entry 66, List I, did not apply to the selection of candidates for admission to the medical colleges because standards would come in after admission of students. The Court ruled that entry 25, List III was wide enough to include within its ambit the question of selection of candidates to medical colleges and there was nothing in entries 63, 64, 65 and 66, List I to suggest the contrary.

The Government of India has made regulations under the Indian Medical Council Act, 1956, prescribing certain conditions for admission to post-graduate medical courses. This has been done under entry 66, List I. The U.P. Government by an order prescribed 55% as minimum marks for admission to post-graduate medical courses under entry 25, List III.

The question arose whether the State could impose qualifications in addition to those laid down by the Medical Council and the Regulations made by the Central Government in this connection. The U.P. order was held not bad as it was not in conflict with the regulations made by the Central Government. The order of the State Government merely provided an additional eligibility qualification. It did not encroach upon the power of the Centre to make laws in regard to matters provided in entry 66, List I.[10] The Court ruled that any additional qualifications which the State may lay down would not be contrary to entry 66, List I, since the additional qualifications were not in conflict with the Central Regulations but were designed to further the objectives of these Regulations which was to promote proper standards. The State order merely provided for an additional eligibility qualification.

In Ajay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar,[11] the Supreme Court observed:

> "Entry 66 in List I does not take in the selection of candidates or regulation of admission to institutes of higher education. Because standards come into the picture after admissions are made".

Further, the Court opined that since all the students appear and pass the same examination at the end of the course, standards are maintained. Thus, the rules for admission do not have any bearing on standards. The quality is guaranteed at the exit stage. Therefore, even if students of lower merit are admitted in the course, this will not cause any detriment to the standards. Similar observations were made by the Court in Post-Graduate Institute of Medical Education and Research Chandigarh v. K.L. Narasimham.[12]

---

9. AIR 1981 SC 2045 : (1981) 4 SCC 296.
10. Dr. Ambesh Kumar v. Principal, LLRM Medical College, Meerut, AIR 1987 SC 400 : (1986) Supp SCC 543.
11. (1994) 4 SCC 401.
12. AIR 1997 SC 3681 : (1997) 6 SCC 283.

The matter came again before the Supreme Court in Preeti.[13] The impugned rule in the instant case was similar to the one involved in Nivedita.[14] In the State of Madhya Pradesh, a common entrance examination was held for admission to post graduate degree courses. The cut-off point for admission for general category candidates was fixed at 45%, but for reserved category candidates it was fixed at 20%.[15] The Court examined the validity of these rules in Preeti. The most significant point which the Court has now insisted upon in the instant case is that standard of education is affected by admitting students with low qualifying marks.

Reading entries 66, List I, and entry 25, List III, the Supreme Court has ruled definitively that while controlling education under entry 25, a State cannot impinge on standards in institutions of higher learning as this matter lies solely and exclusively within the purview of theCentre under entry 66, List I. The Court has also ruled that it is not correct to say that the norms for admission have no connection with the standard of education. Norms of admission to an institution of higher education have a direct impact on the standards of education.

The Court has rightly argued in Preeti that if the students of low calibre are admitted to a course, the standard of teaching and instruction has to be lowered. But if the calibre of students is high, the level of teaching can also be high. The level of teaching depends on the calibre of the students. Therefore, the rules for admission have relation with the maintenance of standards and, thus, relates to entry 66, List. I. The Centre can, therefore, prescribe the same under entry 66, List I. A State may however impose some additional qualifications for admission, but it can not lower the norms laid down as it can have an adverse effect on the standards of education in the institutes of higher learning. This approach has vindicated the approach of MUDHOLKAR, J., in Chitralekha.[16]

Since medical and university education now falls in the Concurrent List (entry 25, List III), the Centre can legislate on admission criteria and, if it does so, the State cannot legislate in this field except to the extent provided in Art. 254.[17]

The Supreme Court has now overruled Nivedita insofar as it was held there that the question of standard arises only after admission and not at the time of admission. The Court has also overruled the earlier observation made by it in Ajay Kumar Singh that since all students passed the same common examination, standards are not adversely affected even as a result of admission of students of lower merit. The States can prescribe qualifications in addition to those prescribed under entry 66, List I, in order to raise standard of education, but lower-

---

13. Preeti Srivastava (Dr.) v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 2894 : (1999) 7 SCC 120. The Court overruled some observations to the contrary in such cases as State of Madhya Pradesh v. Nivedita Jain, (1981) 4 SCC 296 : AIR 1981 SC 2045 and Ajay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1994) 4 SCC 401.
The ruling in Preeti has been followed by the Supreme Court in Venterinary Council of India v. Indian Council of Agricultural Research, (2000) 1 SCC 750 : AIR 2000 SC 545.

14. Supra, footnote 9.

15. To begin with, the cut-off point for these candidates was zero. But the Supreme Court struck it down in Dr. Sadhana Devi v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1997 SC 1120 : (1997) 3 SCC 90, saying that if no minimum qualification was fixed for reserved category candidates, merit would be sacrificed altogether. Thereafter, the cut off point was fixed for such candidates as well though it was much lower than that for general candidates.

16. Supra, footnote 6.

17. For discussion on Art. 254, see, Sec. H, infra.

ing of norms laid down under entry 66 is not permissible as it has an adverse impact on the standard of education in institutes of higher learning. Any power exercised by a State in the area of education under entry 25, List III, is subject to any existing relevant provisions made in that regard by the Central Government. The States must comply with the minimum standards laid down in a Central Statute while making admissions. However, the States may, in addition, prescribe other additional norms for admission under entry 25, List III.

The Court declared both the provisions made by the States of U.P. and Madhya Pradesh as invalid. The Court ruled that the minimum qualifying marks for passing the entrance examination for admission to post-graduate medical course can be prescribed by the Centre under entry 66, List I. Further, the Court left it to the Medical Council of India, the body created by Parliament, to decide the question whether lower minimum qualifying marks for the reserved category candidates can be prescribed at the post-graduate level of medical education. But even if the minimum qualifying marks can be lowered for the reserved category candidates, there cannot be a wide disparity between the minimum qualifying marks for the reserved category and for those of the general category. The percentage of 20% for the reserved category and 45% for the general category (as was done in U.P.) has been held to be not permissible. Further, at the level of admission to the super speciality courses, no special provisions are permissible, they being contrary to national interest. Merit alone can be the basis of selection at that level.[18]

The Supreme Court has ruled[19] that the expression 'coordination' used in entry 66, List I, does not merely mean 'evaluation'. It means harmonisation with a view to forge a uniform pattern for a concerted action according to a certain design, scheme or plan of development. It, therefore, includes the action not only for removal of disparities in standards but also for prevention of occurrence of such disparities. Therefore, it would also include power to do all things which are necessary to prevent what would make 'co-ordination' either impossible or difficult.

The Court has held further that this power of the Centre is absolute and unconditional and in the absence of any valid compelling reasons, it must be given its full effect according to its plain and express intention. Therefore, to the extent that the State legislation is in conflict with the Central legislation even when the State legislation is enacted under entry 25, List III, the State Legislation cannot prevail. One thing, however, is quite clear from these cases. If the Centre were to lay down an all-India basic standard for admission, examination, etc., for institu-

---

18. This Judgment has been delivered by four Judges.

S. R. MAJMUDAR, J., dissented with the majority view and propagated the view that the State can fix 50% minimum qualifying marks for passing the entrance examination for general category candidates and not less than 25% marks for reserved category of candidates. Basically the dissenting Judge propounded the view that it falls within the domain of the States running the institutions to regulate admissions to them as the matter falls under entry 25, List III.

Reference may also be made in this connection to the discussion on Art. 15(4), see, infra, Ch. XXII.

19. State of Tamil Nadu v. Adhiyaman Educational and Research Institute, 1995 AIR SCW 2179 : (1995) 4 SCC 104.

Also see, Ramswarup Meena v. University of Rajasthan, AIR 1997 Raj 35.

tions of higher education, that law would be good under entry 66, List I, and any State law or practice inconsistent therewith would be invalid.

In Prem Chand Jain v. R.K. Chhabra,[20] the Supreme Court has held that the University Grants Commission Act enacted by Parliament falls under entry 66, List I. The Act establishes the University Grants Commission.

The State of Andhra Pradesh passed an Act establishing the Commissionerate of Higher Education. The provisions of the State Act very much corresponded with the provisions of the University Grants Commission Act. With minor differences here and there, the State Act was in the same terms as the Central Act. The Supreme Court declared the State Act void and inoperative as it encroached upon entry 66, List I. The State Act established a corporate body with powers supreme in regard to all matters pertaining to higher education. The State sought to justify the Act under entry 25, List III, but the Supreme Court held the Act to fall under entry 66, List I. The State Act was in pari materia with the UGC Act as both the Acts dealt with the same subject-matter. Both dealt with the co-ordination and determination of excellence in the standards of teaching and examination in the universities, but this matter belonged exclusively to the Centre under entry 66, List I. Thus, the State had encroached upon entry 66, List I. Any State legislation on a subject falling in List I is void, inoperative and unenforceable.[21]

A State Act taking over a private educational institution falls not under entry 66, List I, but under entry 42, List III.[22]

Parliament has enacted the All India Council for Technical Education Act, 1987, with a view to the proper planning and co-ordinated development of the technical education system in India. The Act has been enacted under entry 66, List I, and entry 25 of List III. It lays down conditions for establishment of private engineering colleges. Accordingly, a State can not make a law on this subject under entry 25, List III inconsistent with the Central Act. Under s. 10(k) of the Central Act, power to grant approval for starting technical institutions vests in the Council. A law requiring approval of a State Government to start such a college will be repugnant to the Central law. The Central Act occupies the field relating to grant of approvals for establishing technical institutions and the provisions of the Central law alone are to be complied with in this respect.[23]

Conditions for establishment of new medical colleges can be laid down, by Parliament/State Legislatures under entry 25, List III. If, however, Parliament enacts a law and evinces an intention to occupy the entire field, then no space is left for the States to enact any law on the subject.[24]

---

20. AIR 1984 SC 981 : (1984) 2 SCC 302.

21. Osmania University Teachers Association v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1987 SC 2034 : (1987) 4 SCC 671.

22. L.N. Mishra Institute of E.D & Social Change v. State of Bihar, AIR 1988 SC 1136.

23. Unnikrishan, J.P. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1993 SC 2178 : (1993) 1 SCC 645; State of Tamil Nadu v. Adhiyaman Educational & Research Institution, (1995) 4 SCC 104; Govt. of A.P. v. J.B. Educational Society Hyderabad, AIR 1998 AP 400; Jaya Gokul Educational Trust v. Commr. & Secy. to Govt. Higher Education Dept., AIR 2000 SC 1614 : (2000) 5 SCC 231; Union of India v. Shah Goverdhan L. Kabra Teachers College, (2002) 7 SCALE 435.

Also see, Thirumuruga Kirupan & Variyar Thavathiru Sundara Swamigal Medical Education & Charitable Trust v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 SC 2384 : (1996) 3 SCC 15; see, infra, Sec. H. "under Repugnancy".

24. For discussion on the Rule of Occupied Field, see, infra, under 'Repugnancy', Sec. H(c).

Section 10A of the Indian Medical Council Act, 1956, enacted by Parliament, establishes the Indian Medical Council to prescribe standards of post-graduate medical education. The Act lays down conditions for establishment of new medical colleges. The Supreme Court has ruled that Parliament has made "a complete and exhaustive" provision concerning establishment of new medical colleges. No scope is thus left for any legislation by a State in this field which is fully covered by the law made by Parliament.[25]

Regulation of admission of students to Medical Colleges falls outside entry 66, List I, and inheres in entry 25, List III. While regulation of admission to medical courses may be incidental to the power under entry 66, List I, it is integral to the power conferred by entry 25, List III.[26]

A State law enabling incorporation of such universities which have off campus centres outside the state has been held to be ultra vires Art. 245(1).[27]

Referring to List II Entry 32, the Supreme Court has pointed out that incorporation of a company is entirely different from incorporation of a university and they are conceptually different. Sections, 3, 3(1)(i), 12, 13, 26, 33 and 34 of the Companies Act relate to incorporation of a company. It need not have a prior business and a mere statement of a lawful purpose in the memorandum of association is enough. If a company is unable to achieve its objective and is unable to carry on business, the shareholders may suffer some financial loss, but there is absolutely no impact on society at large. However, an university once incorporated gets a right to confer degrees. A university having no infrastructure or teaching facility of any kind would still be in a position to confer degrees and thereby create a complete chaos in the matter of coordination and maintenance of standards in higher studies which would be highly detrimental for the whole nation. A university may, therefore, be established by the State in exercise of its sovereign power which would obviously be through a legislative enactment. In the case of a private university it is necessary that it should be a pre-established institution for higher education with all the infrastructural facilities and qualities which may justify its claim for being conferred with the status of a university and only such an institution can be conferred the legal status and a juristic personality of a university. When the Constitution has conferred power on the State to legislate on incorporation of a university, any Act providing for establishment of a university must make such provisions that only an institution in the sense of university as it is generally understood, with all the infrastructural facilities, where teaching and research on a wide range of subjects and of a particular level are actually done, acquires the status of a university.[28]

(e) LIQUOR

The question of control over manufacture, production etc. of rectified spirit has been considered by the Supreme Court in Bihar Distillery v. Union of India[29].

---

25. T.K.V.T.S.S. Medical Educational & Charitable Trust v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 SC 2384 : (1986) 3 SCC 15; Ayurvediya Chikitsa Parishad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1998 All 366.

26. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Kumari Nivedita Jain, AIR 1981 SC 2045 : (1981) 4 SCC 296; Ajay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1994) 4 SCC 401; Nachane Ashwini Shivram v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1998 Bom 1; Dr. Aditya Shrikant Kelkar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1998 Bom. 260.

27. Prof. Yashpal v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2005) 5 SCC 420 : AIR 2005 SC 2026.

28. Prof. Yashpal v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2005) 5 SCC 420 : AIR 2005 SC 2026.

29. AIR 1997 SC 1208 : (1997) 2 SCC 727.

There has been a lot of confusion on this point. A number of judicial pronouncements have been made earlier[30] and the judicial opinion has been shifting from case to case. Now, in Bihar Distillery, the Court has rendered a definitive opinion on the point.

A number of entries become relevant in this connection, viz., entries 7 and 52, List I; entries 8 and 24, List II, and entry 33, List III. There is also the Industries (Development & Regulation) Act, 1951, enacted by Parliament under entry 52, List I, which has taken over fermentation industries under Central control. After a combined reading of all these provisions, the Court has come to the following conclusions.

(a) Rectified spirit is both potable and non-potable. It means that it can be converted into country liquor just by adding water; it is also industrial alcohol as it is used as raw material for many industries. But denatured spirit is non-potable and wholly and exclusively industrial alcohol.

(b) As regards industries manufacturing rectified spirit exclusively for industrial purposes, they fall under the total and exclusive control of the Centre and are governed by the IDR Act. The function of the States is to ensure that rectified spirit is not diverted or misused for potable purposes.[31]

(c) Industries manufacturing rectified spirit exclusively for manufacturing potable liquors are under the total and exclusive control of the States in all respects and at all stages.

(d) The position regarding industries manufacturing rectified spirit for both purposes—potable as well as industrial – is as follows. The power to permit establishment of distillery vests exclusively in the Centre. The States can however take steps to ensure against misuse or diversion of rectified spirit meant for industrial purposes.

The Court has clarified that under entry 8, List II, the power to permit the establishment of any industry engaged in the manufacture of potable liquors (including Indian made foreign liquors), beer, country liquors and other intoxicating drinks is exclusively, vested in the States. The power to prohibit and/or regulate the manufacture, production, sale, transport or consumption of such intoxicating liquors is equally that of the States. It has also been clarified that entry 8, List II, is not overridden by entry 52, List I.[32]

(f) LAW AND ORDER

Parliament has enacted the Armed Forces (Special Powers) Act, 1958, for the suppression of disorder and for restoration and maintenance of public order in the disturbed areas of Assam. The constitutional validity of the Act was challenged before the Supreme Court. To decide the matter, the Supreme Court had to elucidate the relationship between entries 2A of List I and 1 of List II.

---

30. Synthetics & Chemicals v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 614 : (1980) 2 SCC 441 : AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109; State of Andhra Pradesh. v. McDowell, AIR 1996 SC 1561 : (1996) 3 SCC 709.

31. Shri Bileshwarkhana Udyog Khedut Sahakari Mandal Ltd. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1992 SC 872 : (1992) 2 SCC 42.

32. State of Andhra Pradesh v. McDowell, AIR 1996 SC 1561 : (1996) 3 SCC 709, Bihar Distillery v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 1208, 1219 : (1997) 3 SCC 727.

The States have power to legislate with respect to "public order" under entry 1, List II. Out of this entry, the field encompassing the use of armed forces in aid of civil power has been carved out and, thus, legislative power with respect to that field has been excluded from the State purview. The States have no power to legislate with respect to the use of the armed forces of the Union in aid of civil power for the purpose of maintaining public order in the State. The legislative competence with respect to that matter vests exclusively in Parliament under entry 2A of List I.

The expression "in the aid of civil power" in entry 2A postulates that the civil authority continues to exist even after the deployment of armed forces. The Centre cannot enact a law enabling the armed forces of the Union "to supplant or act as a substitute for" the civil power of the State.

The Supreme Court has rejected the contention that in the event of deployment of armed forces of the Union in aid of civil power in a State, the supervision and control over the armed forces has to be with the State civil authorities. According to the Court, "The said forces shall operate in the State concerned in cooperation with the civil administration so that the situation which has necessitated the deployment of the Armed Forces is effectively dealt with and normalcy is restored."[33]

The Court has ruled that the impugned Act is not ultra vires the legislative power of Parliament conferred on it by entry 2A, List I.

(iv) RULE OF PITH AND SUBSTANCE

Parliament or a State Legislature should keep within the domain assigned to it, and not trespass into the domain reserved to the other. A law made by one which trespasses or encroaches upon the field assigned to the other is invalid. If a subject falls exclusively in List II, and in no other List, then the power to legislate exclusively vests in the State Legislature. But if it also falls in List I as well, then the power belongs to the Centre. Similarly if it falls within List III also, then it is deemed to be excluded from List II. The dominant position of Parliament in List I and List III is thus established.

But before the legislation with respect to a subject in one List, and touching also on a subject in an other List, is declared to be bad, the Courts apply the rule of pith and substance.[34] To adjudge whether any particular enactment is within the purview of one legislature or the other, it is the pith and substance of the legislation in question that has to be looked into. This rule envisages that the legislation as a whole be examined to ascertain its 'true nature and character' in order to determine to what entry in which List it relates. In determining whether the impugned Act is a law with respect to a given power, the Court has to consider whether the Act, in its pith and substance, is a law on the subject in question. To examine whether a legislation has impinged on the field of other legislatures, in fact or in substance, or is incidental, keeping in view the true nature of the enactment, the Courts have evolved the doctrine of "pith and substance" for the purpose of determining whether it is legislation with respect to matters in one list or the other. For applying the principle of "pith and substance" regard is to be had (i) to the enactment as a whole, (ii) to its main objects, and (iii) to the scope and effect of its provisions. Where the question for determination is whether a particular law relates to a particular subject mentioned in one list or the other, the Courts look into the substance of the enactment. Thus, if the substance of enactment falls within the Union List then the incidental encroachment by the enactment on the State List would not make it invalid.[35]

---

33. Naga People's Movement of Human Rights v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 431 at 447 : (1998) 2 SCC 109.

34. The rule has been borrowed from Canada. Some Canadian cases on the rule are: Citizens Insurance Company v. Parsons, 7 A.C. 96; Russell v. The Queen, 7 A.C. 829; Att. Gen for Canada v. Att. Gen. for British Columbia, 1930 A.C. 111; Att. Gen. for Saskatchewan v. Att. Gen. for Canada, AIR 1949 P.C. 190.

To ascertain the true character of the legislation in question, one must have regard to it as a whole, to its objects and to the scope and effect of its provisions. If according to its 'true nature and character', the legislation substantially relates to a topic assigned to the Legislature which has enacted it, then it is not invalid 'merely because it incidentally' trenches or encroaches on matters assigned to another Legislature. The fact of incidental encroachment does not affect the vires of the law even as regards the area of encroachment. To put it differently, incidental encroachment is not altogether forbidden.

The Supreme Court has enunciated the principle in Premchand Jain v. R.K. Chhabra[36] as follows:

> "As long as the legislation is within the permissible field in pith and substance, objection would not be entertained merely on the ground that while enacting legislation, provision has been made for a matter which though germane for the purpose for which competent legislation is made, it covers an aspect beyond it. In a series of decisions this Court has opined that if an enactment substantially falls within the powers expressly conferred by the Constitution upon the Legislature enacting it, it cannot be held to be invalid merely because it incidentally encroaches on matters assigned to another legislature."[37]

To ascertain the true character of a law, it must be looked into as an organic whole. It would be a wrong approach to view the statute as a mere collection of sections, to disintegrate it into parts and then to examine under which entry each part would fall and then to determine which part of it is valid and which invalid. Instead, the Act should be taken in one piece and then its true character determined. The name given by the legislature to the legislation is immaterial.[38] It is not enough to examine the object of enactment in question.[39]

Wrong reason in the Statement of Objects and Reasons for imposing the tax would not render the Act invalid.

If the State Legislature was competent to pass the Act, the question of motive with which the tax was imposed is immaterial and there can be no plea of a colourable exercise of power to tax if the Government had the power to impose the tax.[40]

---

35. Bharat Hydro Power Corpn. Ltd. v. State of Assam, (2004) 2 SCC 553 : AIR 2004 SC 3173.
36. AIR 1984 SC 981 : (1984) 2 SCC 302.
37. Also see, State of Rajasthan v. Vatan Medical & General Store, AIR 2001 SC 1937 : (2001) 4 SCC 642.
38. State of W. B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
39. E. V. Chinnaiah v. State A.P., (2005) 1 SCC 394 : AIR 2005 SC 162.
40. State of Gujarat v. Akhil Gujarat Pravasi V.S. Mahamandal, (2004) 5 SCC 155 : AIR 2004 SC 3894.

The doctrine of pith and substance saves the incidental encroachment if only the law in pith and substance falls within an entry within the legislative field of the particular legislature which has enacted it. The validity of legislation is not determined by the degree of invasion into the field assigned to the other legislature though it is a relevant factor to determine its 'pith and substance', as the legislation in question may advance so far into the other sphere as to show that its true nature and character is not concerned with a matter falling within the domain of the enacting legislature, in which case it will not be valid.

Once it is found that in pith and substance a law falls within the permitted field, any incidental encroachment by it on a forbidden field does not affect the competence of the concerned legislature to enact the law. "Effect is not the same thing as subject-matter. If a State Act, otherwise valid, has effect on a matter in List I it does not cease to be a legislation with respect to an entry in List II or III".[41]

The practical working of the rule can be appreciated by referring to a few decided cases.

The Bengal Money Lenders Act passed to scale down debts owed by the agriculturists, was challenged on the ground that being a provincial (State) law, it affected promissory notes, a Central subject (Entry 46, List I). The Privy Council found that in its true nature and character, the legislation dealt with money-lenders and money-lending (Entry 30, List II), and not with promissory notes. The money-lenders commonly take a promissory note as security for a loan. A legislature would not, in any real sense, be able to deal with money-lending if it cannot limit the liability of a borrower in respect of a promissory note given by him. The Act was held valid even though as an ancillary effect it affected the negotiable instruments—a Central subject.[42]

The Supreme Court has enunciated the rule of pith and substance in Balsara[43] as follows:

> "It is well settled that the validity of an Act is not affected if it incidentally trenches on matters outside the authorised field and, therefore, it is necessary to enquire in each case what is the pith and substance of the Act impugned. If the Act, when so viewed, substantially falls within the powers expressly conferred upon the legislature which enacted it then it cannot be held to be invalid merely because it incidentally encroaches on matters which have been assigned to another legislature".

Applying the rule of pith and substance, it has been held that—

---

41. State of Bombay v. Narottamdas, AIR 1951 SC 69, 96 : 1951 SCR 51; Atiabari Tea Co. v. State of Assam, AIR 1961 SC 232 : 1961 (1) SCR 809; Kannan D.H.P. Co. v. State of Kerala, AIR 1972 SC 2301. Also, Sita Ram v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1974 SC 1373; Kerala State Electricity Board v. Indian Aluminium, AIR 1976 SC 1031; State of Karnataka v. Ranganatha Reddy, AIR 1978 SC 251; Southern Pharmaceuticals and Chemicals v. State of Kerala, AIR 1981 SC 1863 : (1981) 4 SCC 391; Hoechst Pharmaceutical Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019 : (1983) 4 SCC 45; Krishan Bhimrao Deshpande v. Land Tribunal, AIR 1993 SC 883; P.N. Krishna Lal v. Govt. of Kerala, (1995) Supp (2) SCC 187; Kartar Singh v. State of Punjab, (1994) 3 SCC 569 : 1994 Cri LJ 3139; Union of India v. Shah Goverdhan L. Kabra Teachers College, (2002) 7 SCALE 435.

42. Prafulla Kumar v. Bank of Commerce, Khulna, 74 I.A. 23. Also Subrahmanyan v. Muttuswami, AIR 1941 FC 47.

43. State of Bombay v. Balsara, AIR 1951 SC 318, at 322. Also see, Atiabari Tea Co. Ltd. v. State of Assam, AIR 1961 SC 232 : (1961) 1 SCR 809.

(i) A State law enforcing prohibition is valid because it prohibits purchase, use, possession, transport and sale of liquor (Entry 8, List II), and it only incidentally encroaches on the Central power on imports (Entry 41, List I).

(ii) A State prohibition law is valid even though it also deals with some aspects of evidence and criminal procedure which fall in the Concurrent List, for the law deals, in substance, with intoxicating liquors and only incidentally with evidence and criminal procedure.[44]

(iii) The Industrial Disputes Act enacted by Parliament, even though it applies to employees of municipalities, is valid as, in substance, it deals with 'industrial and labour disputes' (Entry 22, List III), and not with 'local government' (Entry 5, List II).[45]

(iv) A State law banning use of amplifiers after 10 P.M. is valid as it seeks to control use of amplifiers in the interests of health (Entry 6, List II), and it only incidentally touches upon entry 31, List I.[46]

(v) A State law dealing with co-operative societies engaged in the banking business falls under entry 32, List II, and not under Entry 44 or 45, List I.[47]

(vi) A State Law dealing with chit funds falls under Entry 7, List III, and not under Entries 26 or 30 of List II. It does not fall under Entry 34, List II, as there is no element of gambling in running chits, nor under Entry 45, List I, as the essence of banking is absent in running chits.[48]

(vii) A State law reducing arrears of rent or debts due from agriculturists falls under entries 18 and 30, List II.[49]

(viii) The Central Reserve Police Force Act enacted by Parliament falls under Entry 2, List I, and Entries 1 and 2, List III, and not under Entry 2, List II.[50]

(ix) The object of the Advocates Act, 1961, is to constitute one common Bar for the whole country and to provide machinery for its regulated functioning. Though the Act relates to legal practitioners, in its pith and substance it concerns itself with the qualifications, enrolment and discipline of the persons entitled to practise as advocates before the Supreme Court or the High Courts. The Act thus falls under items 77 and 78 of List I. The power to legislate in regard to such persons is excluded from entry 26 of List III.[51]

(x) In Krishna v. State of Madras,[52] applying the rule of pith and substance, the Supreme Court upheld the Madras Prohibition Act, even though it laid down procedure and principles of evidence for trial of offences under the law in question very different from those contained in the Criminal Procedure Code and the In-

---

44. Krishna v. State of Madras, AIR 1957 SC 297 : 1957 SCR 399.
45. D.N. Banerji v. P.R. Mukherjee, AIR 1953 SC 58 : 1953 SCR 302.
46. State of Rajasthan v. Chawla, AIR 1959 SC 544 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 904.
47. Central Co-op. Bank, Nagpur v. Divisional Jt. Registrar, AIR 1971 Bom. 365; Sultan Singh v. Asstt. Registrar, AIR 1972 All. 159.
48. C.C. Fund v. Union Territory of Pondicherry, AIR 1972 Mad. 99.
49. K.W. Estates v. State of Madras, AIR 1971 SC 161 : (1970) 3 SCC 894.
50. State of West Bengal v. Tarun Kumar, AIR 1975 Cal. 39.
51. O.N. Mohindroo v. Bar Council, AIR 1668 SC 888 : (1968) 2 SCR 709; Bar Council, U.P. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 231 : (1973) 1 SCC 261.
52. AIR 1957 SC 297 : 1957 SCR 399.

dian Evidence Act, both Central Acts in the Concurrent field. In this case, the Court appears to have gone rather too far in upholding the State law.

In Ukha,[53] the Supreme Court had held that provisions in the State law in question concerning criminal procedure and evidence fell under entries 2 and 12 of List III. The only difference in the situations in the two cases appears to be that, while in Ukha the State law had received the Presidential assent, the law involved in Krishna had not been so reserved, and this perhaps explains the dichotomy in the judicial attitudes, for to take the same view in Krishna, as was done in Ukha, would have been to hold the law bad on the ground of repugnancy with a Central law.[54]

The danger in taking the Krishna doctrine too far is that the uniformity achieved in the procedural areas may be destroyed; the Cr.P.C. would become limited to offences under the I.P.C., and the States would be free to lay down their own brand of procedure and evidence for trial of offences created by their own laws under List II.

The doctrine of pith and substance introduces a degree of flexibility into the otherwise rigid scheme of distribution of powers. It gives an additional dimension to the powers of the Centre as well as the States. The reason behind the rule is that if every legislation were to be declared invalid, howsoever, slight or incidental the encroachment by it of the other field, then the power of each legislature will be drastically circumscribed to deal effectively with the subjects entrusted to it for legislation.

Though the rule applies to both, the Centre and the States, and helps both to some extent, yet since Parliament is the more dominant legislature and its powers are more generally and broadly worded, the State Legislatures benefit much more by the rule than Parliament, for the rule enables them to incidentally trespass into the much larger, and comparatively more important, Central Area.

The doctrine gives quite a good deal of maneuverability to the Courts. It furnishes them with a tool to uphold legislation, for it is for them to decide its true nature and character and, thus, they have a number of choices open to them and most often the Courts by putting a favorable interpretation on the legislation in question use their power to support the same.[55]

Legislation made under the power of regulation and control of one legislature, in respect of a particular subject of legislation, does not ipso facto deprive another legislature of the power of taxation in respect of the same subject of legislation. Power to tax or impose a levy for augmenting revenue shall continue to be exercisable by the legislature in whom it vests, in spite of regulation or control having been assumed by another legislature, unless the tax legislation concerned levies a tax in such a manner or of such magnitude as can be demonstrated to be tampering or intermeddling with the other legislature's power of regulation and control. Further it has been held that the primary object and the essential purpose of legislation must be distinguished from its ultimate or incidental results or consequences, for determining the character of the levy. A levy essentially in the

---

53. Ukha Kolhe v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1963 SC 1531 : (1964) 1 SCR 926.
54. See, Sec. H, infra, on this aspect.
55. Also see, Kannan D.H.P. Co. v. State of Kerala, AIR 1972 SC 2301 : (1972) 2 SCC 218; supra, footnote 41.

nature of a tax and within the power of taxation of the legislature concerned cannot be annulled as unconstitutional merely because it may have an effect on the price of the commodity by reason of the incidence of the levy being permitted to be passed on to the buyer.[56]

(v) DOCTRINE OF COLOURABLE LEGISLATION

The doctrine of colourable legislation is based on the maxim that what cannot be done directly cannot also be done indirectly. The doctrine becomes applicable when a legislature seeks to do something in an indirect manner what it cannot do directly. The doctrine thus refers to the question of competency of the legislature to enact a particular law. If the impugned legislation falls within the competence of the legislature, the question of doing something indirectly which cannot be done directly does not arise.

The doctrine of colourable legislation does not involve any question of bona fides or mala fides on the part of the legislature. If the legislature is competent to pass a particular law, the motives which impelled it to act are irrelevant. On the other hand, if the legislature lacks the competency, the question of motive does not arise at all; the legislation will be invalid even if enacted with the best of motives. Whether a statute is constitutional or not is thus a question of power. "Malice or motive is beside the point, and it is not permissible to suggest parliamentary incompetence on the score of mala fides."[57]

The Constitution distributes legislative powers between the State Legislatures and Parliament, and each has to act within its sphere. In respect of a particular legislation, the question may arise whether the legislature has transgressed the limits imposed on it by the Constitution. Such transgression may be patent, manifest or direct, or may be disguised, covert or indirect. It is to the latter class of cases that the expression 'colourable legislation' is applied. The underlying idea is that although, apparently, a legislature in passing a statute purports to act within the limits of its powers, yet, in substance and reality, it has transgressed these limits on its powers by taking resort to a mere pretence or disguise. If that is so, the legislation in question is invalid.

The legislation enacted may be regarded on colourable legislation. It is only when a legislature having no power to legislate frames a legislation so camouflaging the same as to make it appear to fall within its competence, the legislation enacted may be regarded as colourable legislation. The extent of encroachment in the field reserved for the other legislature is an element for determining whether the impugned Act is a colourable piece of legislation.

The essence of the matter is that a legislature having restrictive power cannot seek to do something indirectly which it cannot accomplish directly within the scope of its power. A legislature cannot overstep the field of competency indirectly. It is also characterised as a fraud on the Constitution because no legislature can violate the Constitution by employing an indirect method. The Supreme

---

56. State of W. B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
57. R.S. Joshi v. Ajit Mills, Ahmedabad, AIR 1977 SC 2279 : (1977) 4 SCC 98. Also see, Ch. II, Sec. M, supra.

Court has explained the doctrine of colourable legislation as follows in Gajapati:[58]

> "If the constitution of a State distributes the legislative powers amongst different bodies, which have to act within their respective spheres marked out by specific legislative entries... questions do arise as to whether the legislature in a particular case has or has not, in respect to the subject matter of the statute or in the method of enacting it, transgressed the limits of its constitutional powers. Such transgression may be patent, manifest or direct, but it may also be disguised, covert or indirect, and it is to this latter class of cases that the expression colourable legislation has been applied... The idea conveyed by the expression is that although apparently a legislature in passing a statute purported to act within the limits of its powers, yet, in substance and in reality it transgressed these powers, the transgression being veiled by what appears, on proper examination, to be mere pretence or disguise."

To the same effect is the following observation of the Supreme Court in R.S. Joshi:[59]

> "In the jurisprudence of power, colourable exercise of or fraud on legislative power or, more frightfully, fraud on the Constitution, are expressions which merely mean that the legislature is incompetent to enact a particular law, although the label of competency is stuck on it, and then it is colourable legislation. It is very important to notice that if the legislature is competent to pass the particular law, the motives which impel it to pass the law are really irrelevant…. if a legislation, apparently enacted under one Entry in the List, falls in plain truth and fact, within the content, not of that Entry but of one assigned to another legislature, it can be struck down as colourable even if the motives were most commendable."

To decide whether or not the legislature has transgressed the sphere assigned to it, what is material is the pith and substance; the true nature and character, of the legislation in question and not its outward or formal appearance. If the subject-matter of the legislation, in substance, is beyond the powers of the legislature, the form in which the legislation is clothed would not save it from condemnation.[60] As the Supreme Court has observed in Gajapati: "The legislature cannot violate the constitutional prohibitions by employing an indirect method. In cases like these the inquiry must always be as to the true nature and character of the challenged legislation and it is the result of such investigation and not the form alone that will determine as to whether or not it relates to a subject which is within the power of the legislative authority."[61]

The doctrine of colourable legislation has no application if the legislature concerned has constitutional authority to pass a law in regard to a particular subject, whatever the reasons behind it may be. The whole doctrine resolves itself into the question of competency of the enacting legislature to enact the law in question.

---

58. K.C. Gajapati Narayana Deo v. State of Orissa, AIR 1953 SC 375 : 1954 SCR 1. Also see, Gullapalli Negeswara Rao v. A.P. State R.T.C., AIR 1959 SC 308, 316 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 319; K. Kunhikoman v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 723 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 829; Jayvantsinghji v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1962 SC 821 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 411; Jalan Trading Co v. Mill Mazdoor Sabha, AIR 1967 SC 691 : (1967) 1 SCR 15; Jabalpur Bus Operators' Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1994 MP 62.

59. Supra, footnote 57.

60. Ashok Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1792 : (1991) 3 SCC 498. For the Rule of Pith and Substance, see, supra.

61. Supra, footnote 58.

If the legislature is competent to pass the particular law, the motives which impel it to make the law are irrelevant.[62] As the Supreme Court has stated[63]: "The doctrine of colourable legislation is relevant only in connection with the question of legislative competency". Also, if the legislature is competent to do a thing directly then the mere fact that it is attempting to do it indirectly cannot make the Act invalid.

In a recent case,[64] the Supreme Court rejecting the argument that the Armed Forces (Special Powers) Act, 1958, enacted by Parliament is colourable legislation and a fraud on the Constitution, has observed in this connection:

> "The use of the expression 'colourable legislation' seeks to convey that by enacting the legislation in question the legislature is seeking to do indirectly what it cannot do directly. But ultimately the issue boils down to the question whether the legislature had the competence to enact the legislation because if the impugned legislation falls within the competence of the legislature the question of doing something indirectly which cannot be done directly does not arise".

The real purpose of a legislation may be different from what appears on its face, but it would be colourable legislation only if the real object is not attainable by the Legislature because it lies beyond its ambit. The impugned Act has been held to relate to entry 2 of List I as well as the residuary power of Parliament under Art. 248 read with entry 97 of List I.[65]

The doctrine of colourable legislation has reference to the competence and not to the motives, bona fides or mala fides of the legislature. The motives of a legislature in making a law are irrelevant.

It is not for the Courts to divine and scrutinise the policy which led to the enactment of a law falling within the ambit of the legislature concerned. As the Supreme Court has observed:[66] "The motive of the legislature in passing a statute is beyond the scrutiny of the Courts....The propriety, expediency and necessity of a legislative act are for the determination of the legislative authority and are not for determination by the Courts."[67]

It is rare that a law is declared bad on the ground of colourable legislation. A State law dealing with the abolition of the landlord system, provided for payment of compensation on the basis of income accruing to the landlord by way of rent. Arrears of the rent due to the landlord prior to the date of acquisition were to vest in the State, and half of these arrears were to be given to the landlord as compensation. The provision was held to be a piece of colourable legislation and hence void[68] under entry 42,

---

62. Shankaranarayana, infra, footnote 66.
63. Bhairebendra Narayan v. State of Assam, AIR 1956 SC 503 : 1956 SCR 303.
64. Naga People's Movement for Human Rights v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 431, 451 : (1998) 2 SCC 109. For this Act, see, supra, Sec. E.
65. For Residuary Power of Parliament, see, Sec. I.
66. B.R. Shankaranarayana v. State of Mysore, AIR 1966 SC 1571 : (1967) 2 LLJ 751; T.G. Venkataraman v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 508 : (1969) 2 SCC 299; Laxmi Narayan v. State of Orissa, AIR 1983 Ori. 210; R.S. Joshi v. Ajit Mills, 1977 SC 2279 : (1977) 4 SCC 98.
67. T. Venkata Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 724, 733 : 1985 (3) SCC 198.
68. State of Bihar v. Kameshwar, AIR 1952 SC 252, 289 : 1952 SCR 889.

List III,[69] as "the taking of the whole and returning a half means nothing more or less than taking half without any return and this is naked confiscation, no matter in whatever specious form it may be clothed or disguised. The impugned provision, therefore, in reality does not lay down any principle for determining the compensation to be paid for acquiring the arrears of rent".

If a statute is found to be invalid on the ground of legislative competence, it does not permanently inhibit the legislature from re-enacting the same if the power to do so is properly traced and established. In such a situation, it cannot be said that the subsequent legislation is merely a colourable legislation or a camouflage to re-enact the invalidated previous legislation.[70]

Recently the Supreme Court has further elucidated the doctrine of colourable exercise of power in S.S. Bola v. B.D. Sardana.[71] The question whether it is colourable legislation, and as such void, does not depend on the motive or bona fides of the legislature to pass that particular law. What the Court has to determine in such a case is whether the legislature has purported to act within the limits of the power. There is in reality and substance a transgression of the powers, but the same is veiled by what appears on proper examination to be a mere pretence or disguise. If the legislature enacts a law on the pretext of the exercise of its legislative power, though actually it does not possess such power, the legislation to that extent is void as the legislature makes its Act only in pretence of, and in purported colourable exercise of, its power. It has been held that an university cannot be established only to provide consultancy work to industry and public organizations. Chhattisgarh Adhniyam of 2002 permitting creation of such universities was a colourable piece of legislation.[72]

H. REPUGNANCY BETWEEN A CENTRAL AND STATE LAW

(a) ARTICLE 254(1)

The constitutional provision relevant for solving questions of repugnancy between a Central law and a State law is to be found in Art 254.

According to Art. 254(1), if any provision of a State law is repugnant to a provision in a law made by Parliament which it is competent to enact, or to any existing law with respect to one of the matters in the Concurrent List, then the Parliamentary or the existing law prevails over the State law, and it does not matter whether the Parliamentary law has been enacted before or after the State law. To the extent of repugnancy, the State law is void.

The most common application of this provision arises when both the Central law and the State law happen to be with respect to the same matter in the Concurrent List and there is repugnancy between them. Repugnancy between two statutes—Central and State—arises if there is direct conflict, i.e. these laws are fully inconsistent and have absolutely irreconcilable provisions and if the laws made

---

69. At this time, entry 42, List III, spoke of "principles on which compensation for property acquired or requisitioned for the purpose of the Union or of a State or any other public purpose is to be determined, and the form and the manner in which such compensation is to be given."

The entry has since been substantially modified, supra, Sec. F.

70. S. Sat Pal & Co. v. Lt. Gov. of Delhi, AIR 1979 SC 1550, 1555 : (1979) 4 SCC 232.

71. AIR 1997 SC at 3183, 3190 : (1997) 8 SCC 522.

72. Prof. Yashpal v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2005) 5 SCC 420 : AIR 2005 SC 2026.

by Parliament and the State Legislature occupy the same field.[73] The Supreme Court has said that every effort should be made to reconcile the two enactments and construe both so as to avoid they being repugnant to each other. Repugnancy has to be there in fact and not based on a mere possibility. If the two enactments operate in different fields without encroaching upon each other then there would be no repugnancy.[74]

The repugnancy has to exist in fact and it must be shown clearly and sufficiently that the State law is repugnant to the Union law. There is no such repugnancy between Ss. 13 to 16 of State Act i.e. Maharashtra Control of Organised Crime Act, 1999 and provisions of Central Act i.e., Telegraph Act, 1885, S. 5(2) read with Telegraph Rules, 1951.[75]

Because of Art. 254(1), the power of Parliament to legislate in regard to matters in List III is supreme. Art. 254(1) gives overriding effect to the provisions of a law made by Parliament which Parliament is competent to enact. A law made by the State is void if it is repugnant to the Central law.

The phraseology of the provision on a plain reading suggests that it would apply to all cases of repugnancy between a Central law and a State law. It does not say that the State law and the Central law should belong to the Concurrent List only. The words 'in the Concurrent List' appear to qualify only the 'existing' law which means that an existing law in relation to a matter in the Concurrent List prevails over a State law in that area in case of repugnancy. So far as the post-Constitution laws are concerned, the words used are "which Parliament is competent to enact" which are quite broad and would comprise laws made by the Centre both in the Central as well as the Concurrent Lists. This will mean that if there is repugnancy between a State law falling in the State List and a Central law falling in the Central List, the latter should prevail over the former. But the judicial interpretation of Art. 254(1) has so far been otherwise. The judicial decisions have consistently ruled that repugnancy arises, and Art. 254(1) applies, only when both the laws—Central and the State—pertain to a matter in the Concurrent List, and not otherwise.[76] The Supreme Court has explained the purport of Art. 254(1) as follows in Hoechst:[77]

> "Cl. (1) lays down that if a State law relating to a concurrent subject is 'repugnant' to a Union Law relating to that subject, whether the Union law is prior or later in time, the Union Law will prevail and the State law shall, to the extent of such repugnancy, be void."

If a State makes a law with respect to a matter in the State List, then there is no question of repugnancy between it and a Central law pertaining to a matter in the Central or Concurrent List. This view is based on the rule of pith and substance. If a State law is enacted with respect to a matter in List I, it is void, but if it falls

---

73. Deep Chand v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1959 SC 648 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 8; Vijay Kumar Sharma v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1990 SC 2072, 2080 : (1990) 2 SCC 562. Also see, infra.

74. Bharat Hydro Power Corpn. Ltd. v. State of Assam, (2004) 2 SCC 553 : AIR 2004 SC 3173. See also Central Bank of India v. State of Kerala, (2009) 4 SCC 94 : (2009) 3 JT 216.

75. State of Maharashtra v. Bharat Shanti Lal Shah, (2008) 13 SCC 5 : (2008) 10 JT 77.

76. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. M.S. Farooqi, AIR 1972 SC 1738 : 1972 (1) SCC 872; Bar Council of Uttar Pradesh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 231 : (1973) 1 SCC 261; K.S.E. Board v. Indian Aluminium Co., AIR 1976 SC 1031.

77. Hoechst Pharm. Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019, 1041 : (1983) 4 SCC 45.

within the State List then its incidental encroachment into the Concurrent List will not render it invalid.[78]

A word of comment on this judicial approach to Art. 254(1) is called for at this stage. When an impugned statute appears to touch two different entries in two lists, then the rule of pith and substance helps in characterising the law as belonging to this or that entry. But, under Art. 254(1), questions of a different nature arise. Here the question is not whether a statute falls under this entry or that, but whether a State law comes into conflict with a Central law or not. It has been elucidated by the Supreme Court that for application of this article, firstly, there must be repugnancy between the State law and the law made by the Parliament. Secondly, if there is repugnancy, the State legislation would be void only to the extent of repugnancy. If there is no repugnancy between the two laws, there is no question of application of Article 254(1) and both the Acts would operate. Repugnancy between two statutes may be ascertained by considering whether Parliament intended to lay down an exhaustive code in respect of the subject matter replacing the Act of the State Legislature. Where the paramount legislation does not purport to be exhaustive or unqualified there is no inconsistency and it cannot be said that any qualification or restriction introduced by another law is repugnant to the provision in the main or paramount law. Before coming to the conclusion that there is a repeal by implication, the Court must be satisfied that the two enactments are so inconsistent that it becomes impossible for them to stand together.[79]

It does not appear to be a sound proposition to confine Art. 254(1) only to the situation where the Central-State laws fall in the Concurrent List rather than when they fall in different Lists and yet are inconsistent to some extent. It is true that situations of repugnancy arise most commonly when the two laws fall in the same List, but it is not inconceivable that similar difficulty may arise when the two statutes fall in two different Lists.

The inconvenience which may arise by discarding the broader meaning of Art. 254(1) may be appreciated by the following example under Art. 253. Parliament can legislate even on a State matter to effectuate a treaty. It is quite possible that when Parliament passes such a law, it may come in conflict with an already existing State law on that subject. There appears to be no doubt that in such a situation the Central law would prevail over the State law but this result can be achieved only by invoking the wider meaning of Art. 254(1). In the Kannan case,[80] the Supreme Court envisaged the possibility of repugnancy between a Central Act (List I) and a State law falling under Lists II and III, though, in the instant case, no conflict between the two Acts was found.

Earlier in Hingir Rampur Coal Co. v. State of Orissa,[81] the Court went into the question of repugnancy between the State law (Entry 23, List II) and a Central law (Entry 52, List I) in two different Lists. Without referring to Art. 254, the Court held that there was no repugnancy between the two different Acts as they 78. Krishna v. State of Madras, AIR 1957 SC 297 : 1957 SCR 399; State of Madras v. Dunkerley, AIR 1958 SC 560.

---

79. Kanaka Gruha Nirmana Sahakara Sangha v. Narayanamma, (2003) 1 SCC 228 : AIR 2002 SC 3659.

80. Kannan D.H.P. Co. v. State of Kerala, AIR 1972 SC 2301 : (1972) 2 SCC 218.

81. AIR 1961 SC 459 : (1961) 2 SCR 537.
Also, M. Karunanidhi v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 898 : (1979) 3 SCC 431.

covered different fields. These cases do show that there is a possibility of repugnancy between a Central law and a State law enacted under the entries in Lists I and II.

Reference may also be made in this connection to Srinivasa Raghavachar v. State of Karnataka[82]. The Advocates Act, 1961, has been enacted by Parliament under entries 77 and 78 of List I. A State law prohibited legal practitioners from appearing before the land tribunal. The State law was held invalid as it was repugnant to the Central law. Here there was repugnancy between a Central Law enacted under an entry in List I and a State Law enacted under an entry in List II.

The interpretation put on Art. 254(1) by and large helps the States, and adds an additional dimension to their legislative power in the State List, as they can legislate with respect to a matter in List II without being unduly trammelled by the existence of a Central law in the Concurrent List or even in the Central List. The Indian Medical Council Act, 1956, has been enacted by Parliament under entry 26, List III. S. 27 of the Act provides that every person who is enrolled as a medical practitioner on the Indian Medical Register shall be entitled, according to his qualifications, to practise in any part of the country. A West Bengal Act prohibited members of the State Health Service from carrying on any private practice. The Supreme Court has ruled that the State Act is not repugnant to the Central Act because those who join the service voluntarily give up their right to practise. The State Act does not regulate the rights and privileges of the members of the medical profession in general. The State Act has been enacted under entry 41, List II. There is no conflict between the provisions of the two Acts and hence there is no repugnancy between the two under Art. 254.

The Court distinguished Srinivasa because there the restriction on practice was imposed by law, not undertaken voluntarily. The legal practitioners seeking to appear before the land tribunal were not members of any service and they had not given up their right to practice voluntarily in lieu of accepting the benefits of service. In the instant case, the doctors in question have voluntarily joined the State service and have subjected themselves to its terms and conditions, one of the terms being that they will have no right of private practice.[83]

The question of repugnancy between a Central law and a State law has been elaborately discussed by a three Judge Bench of the Supreme Court in Vijay Kumar Sharma v. State of Karnataka[84]. The State of Karnataka enacted the Karnataka Contract Carriages (Acquisition) Act, 1976, under entry 42, List III, providing for acquisition of contract carriages. Thereafter, Parliament enacted the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988, falling under entry 35 of List III, providing for grant of contract carriage permits. The question was, whether S. 20 of the Karnataka Act was repugnant to Ss. 73, 74 and 80 of the Central Act.

A majority and minority opinions were delivered by the Court in the instant case. The majority opined that, under Art. 254, the question of repugnancy can arise only in the Concurrent field. In Art. 254(1), it is clearly indicated that the competing legislations must be in respect of "one of the matters" enumerated in the Concurrent List. In the instant case, the two legislations did not relate to one common head of legislation in the Concurrent List; the two laws dealt with different matters of legislation and, therefore, Art. 254(1) would not apply in such a situation. In the instant case, "the subject-matters of both the statutes and the object of the two sets of provisions" being different, "both statutes can stand together."

82. AIR 1987 SC 1518 : (1987) 2 SCC 692.
83. Sukumar Mukherjee v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1993 SC 2335 : (1993) 3 SCC 723.
84. AIR 1990 SC 2072 : (1990) 2 SCC 562.

One of the majority Judges (SAWANT, J.) asserted that whenever, the question of repugnancy between the State and Central legislation is raised, the first thing to examine is whether the two Acts in question cover or relate to the same subject-matter and to determine this the rule of pith and substance ought to be applied[85] so as to find out the dominant intention of the two Acts. Both the Acts must be substantially on the same subject to attract Art. 254(1).

On the other hand, the minority Judge (K. RAMASWAMY, J.) found a direct conflict between the two statutes in the same occupied field. According to him, "the two sets of provisions run on collision course... Thereby, there exists the operational incompatibility and irreconcilability of the two sets of provisions". According to him, Art. 254(1) "posits as a rule that in case of repugnancy or inconsistency between the State law and the Union law relating to the same matter in the Concurrent List occupying the same field, the Union law shall prevail...."

He also denied that the rule of pith and substance would have any application when the matter in question is covered by an entry or entries in the Concurrent List and occupied the same field both in the Union and the State laws. It would not matter as to in which entry or entries in the Concurrent List the subject matter falls, or in exercise whereof the provisions therein were made. According to him, the doctrine of pith and substance would apply to questions of legislative competence of the respective legislatures in the federal system under Arts. 246(1) and 246(3) and to resolve the conflict of jurisdiction. The doctrine solves the problem of overlapping of "any two entries of two different lists vis-a-vis the Act".

Accordingly, the majority held the State Act valid, while the minority Judge held this Act to be void. It would appear from the above that the majority approach favoured the States while the minority approach supported the Centre.

But the overwhelming majority of the decided cases insist that the inconsistency must be in relation to the concurrent list and that is also the court's upto-date pronouncement declaring firmly and clearly that when one of the two Acts of Parliament is enacted in a field in List I Entry 66 and the other under List III Entry 25, the question of repugnancy does not arise. Repugnancy needs consideration when one Act is enacted by the Parliament and the other the State and the fields of both must be in relation to List III.[86]

(b) ARTICLE 254(2)

Article 254(1) lays down the general rule while Art. 254(2) is an exception to the general rule laid down in Art. 254(1).[87]

Article 254(2) provides an expedient to save a State law repugnant to a Central law on a matter in the Concurrent List, and, thus, relaxes the rigidity of the rule of repugnancy contained in Art. 254(1) as mentioned above. Ordinarily, under

---

85. See, supra, Sec. G.(iv), for the Rule of Pith and Substance.

86. Annamalai University represented by Registrar v. Secretary to Government, Information and Tourism Department, (2009) 4 SCC 590 : (2009) 4 JT 43.

87. T. Barai v. Henry & Hoe, AIR 1983 SC 150 : (1983) 1 SCC 177.

Art. 254(1), in such a situation, the supremacy is in favour of the Centre, and a State law is void to the extent of repugnancy. There may, however, be some peculiar local circumstances prevailing in a State making some special provision, and not the uniform Central law, desirable on the matter. To introduce an element of flexibility, and to make it possible to have a State law suitable to the local circumstances kept alive in the face of a Central law to the contrary on a matter in the Concurrent List, Art. 254(2) has been incorporated in the Constitution.

Article 254(2) provides that where a State law with respect to a matter in the Concurrent List contains any provision repugnant to the provisions of a previous Central law with respect to that matter, the State law prevails in the State concerned if, having been reserved for the consideration of the President, it has received his assent. The result of obtaining the assent of the President would be that so far as the State Act is concerned, it will prevail in the State and overrule the provisions of the Central Act in its application to that State only. Both laws deal with a Concurrent subject. The Supreme Court has explained the effect of Art. 254(2) thus:[88]

> "In short, the result of obtaining the assent of the President to a State Act which is inconsistent with a previous Union law relating to a concurrent subject would be that the State Act will prevail in that State and override the provisions of the Central Act in their applicability to that State only".

The final say rests with the Centre which decides ultimately whether or not the Central law should give way to the State law. The State law so assented to by the Centre would however prevail in the State to the extent of inconsistency with the Central law; the State law would not override the whole of the Central law.[89]

In Art. 254(2), the words "with respect to that matter" are very relevant. As the Supreme Court has observed in Zaverbhai.:[90]

> "The important thing to consider with reference to this provision is whether the legislation is "in respect of the same matter". If the later legislation deals not with the matters which formed the subject of the earlier legislation but with other and distinct matters though of a cognate and allied character, then Art. 254(2) will have no application".

The Tamil Nadu Legislature passed the Public Men (Criminal Misconduct) Act, 1974, which received the presidential assent under Art. 254(2). Action was initiated under the Act against the ex-Chief Minister of Tamil Nadu, M. Karunanidhi. The Act was then repealed. The question arose whether action could be taken against him under the relevant Central legislation.[91] Argument against this course of action was that, as there was repugnancy between the Central law and the State law, and the State law was kept alive because of the presidential assent under Art. 254(2), the Central law was repealed pro tanto and so when the State law was repealed, the Central laws could not be revived in the State unless re-enacted.

---

88. Hoechst Pharm. Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019 : (1983) 4 SCC 45.
89. Deep Chand v. State of U.P., AIR 1959 SC 648; Ukha Kolhe v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1963 SC 1531 : (1964) 1 SCR 926; V.D.M. Coop. Society v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1977 A.P. 241; T. Barai v. Henry & Hoe, AIR 1983 SC 150 : (1983) 1 SCC 177.
90. Zaverbhai Amaidas v. State of Bombay, AIR 1954 SC 752, at 757 : (1955) 1 SCR 799.
91. Ss. 161, 471 of the Indian Penal Code, 1865, and S. 5(2) read with S. 5(5)(d) of the Prevention of Corruption Act.

Accepting this contention, the Supreme Court said that when a State law inconsistent with a Central law on a matter in the Concurrent List is kept alive under Art. 254(2), the State law would then prevail in the State and the Central law will be overruled in its applicability to that State. The doctrine of eclipse will not apply to the constitutionality of the Central law in such a situation.[1] In the instant case, however, the Court found no inconsistency between the Central and the State laws, as the State law merely created a new and distinct offence with different ingredients which was in its nature and purport essentially different from the offences contemplated under the Central law. The State Act was in effect complimentary to the Central law. Therefore, the Central law was not repealed by the State law in the State and the ex-Chief Minister could be tried under the Central law after the repeal of the State law.[2]

Article 254(2) does not operate when the two Acts operate in different fields, e.g. the Central Act pertains to Insolvency (entry 9, List III) and the State Act relates to Stamp duties (entry 44, List III). Therefore, no stamp fees are payable on the sale deed executed by the Official Assignee.[3]

Article 254(2) has been conceived with a view to save State laws falling in the Concurrent List from being superseded by Central Laws because of the operation of the rule of repugnancy. Art. 254(2) operates when the following two conditions are satisfied:

(a) There is a valid Central law on the same subject-matter occupying the same field in the Concurrent List to which the State law relates;

(b) The State legislation is repugnant to the Central law.

It means that if there is no Central law with respect to the subject-matter in the Concurrent List to which the State law relates, Art. 254(2) does not operate. The State law in such a situation prevails proprio vigore.

A State law made under entry 22, List III, received the assent of the President under Art. 254(2). There already existed a Central law—The Industrial Disputes Act, also passed under the same entry. The question was whether the later State Act would prevail over the earlier Central law. The Court ruled that the State law could prevail over the earlier Central law if there was repugnancy, express or implied, between the two laws. But, in the absence of any such repugnancy between the two laws, both could co-exist.[4]

Article 254(2), it has been held by the Supreme Court, becomes applicable only when the State law is repugnant to an earlier law enacted by Parliament. When a State Act becomes repugnant to a Parliamentary law enacted thereafter, Art. 254(2) does not apply. When repugnancy arises later in point of time than the State Act, Art. 254(2) does not apply, and, in such a situation, Parliamentary

---

1. For discussion on the Doctrine of Eclipse, see, infra, Ch. XX, Sec. C.
2. M. Karunanidhi v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 898 : (1979) 3 SCC 431.
See, Ch. XIII, Sec. C, infra.
3. Official Assignee, Madras v. Inspector General of Registration, AIR 1981 Mad. 54.
Also see, Chandramohan v. Florence Indravathi, AIR 1982 Kant. 242.
4. Krishna Dist. Co-op. Marketing Soc. Ltd. v. N.V.P. Rao, AIR 1987 SC 1960 : (1987) 4 SCC 99.

law would prevail over the State law.[5] The Supreme Court has stated the position in this respect as follows:[6]

> "The fact that the State Act has received the assent of the President would be of no avail because repugnancy is with the Central Act which was enacted by the Parliament after the enactment of the State Act."[7]

When Parliament has already enacted a law earlier than the enactment of the State law, and the State law has received Presidential assent, and thereafter the Parliamentary law is brought into effect, the State law will prevail because the law made by Parliament was the earlier law.[8]

A State law was repugnant to a Central law. Both laws had been enacted under entry 41, List III. The State law had received the President's assent under Arts. 31 and 31A.[9] The Supreme Court refused to treat this Presidential assent as having been given under Art. 254(2) insofar as its repugnancy with the Central Act was concerned.[10] The Court emphasized that the assent of the President under Art. 254(2) is not a matter of idle formality. The President is to be apprised of the reason as to why his assent is sought. When the assent of the President is given for a specific purpose, as in the present case, the efficacy of the assent would be limited to that purpose and cannot be extended beyond it. In the instant case, President's assent was not sought because of the repugnancy between the State and the Central Acts, but for a different specific purpose. Therefore, such assent cannot avail the State under Art. 254(2).

PROVISO TO ART. 254(2)

Similarly, when the State seeks President's assent under Art. 254(2) to a State law specifically because of its repugnancy with a specific central law, the State law is not protected if it is repugnant to any other law. In the instant case, the state reserved the State Rent Act under Art. 254(2) for President's assent, and received it, qua its repugnancy with the Transfer of Property Act, a central law. The Supreme Court ruled that such a President's assent could not save the State Act when it was found to be repugnant to another Central Act, viz., the Public Premises Act, 1977. This aspect was neither brought to the notice of the President nor did the President give any consideration to it. The Court has emphasized that President's assent is not an empty formality. The efficacy of the President's assent would be limited to that purpose only for which it was sought and given.[11]

Again in Grand Kakatiya,[12] it was held that both the Central and the impugned State Act operated in the same field in as much as the phrase "for this compensation" in the State Act was nothing but "gratuity", though called by a different name and was repugnant to the Central Act (The Payment of Gratuity Act) and would be void unless it was shown that while obtaining the Presidential assent

---

5. M.P. Shikshak Congress v. R.P.F. Commissioner, Jabalpur, AIR 1999 SC 443 : (1999) 1 SCC 396.
6. Thirumuruga K.V.T.S., S. Medical & Educational Trust v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 SC 2384.
7. Also see, S.M.C. Students, Parents Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Kant, 457, 465.
8. Pt. Rishikesh v. Salma Begum, (1995) 4 SCC 718.
9. See, infra, Chs. XXXI, Sec. C, and XXXII, Secs. A and B, for Arts. 31 and 31A.
10. Jamalpur Gram Panchayat v. Malwinder Singh, AIR 1985 SC 1394 : (1985) 3 SCC 661.
11. Kaisari Hind v. National Textile Corporation, (2002) 7 SCALE 95.
12. (2009) 5 SCC 342 : AIR 2009 SC 2337.

for the State Act the conflict between the two Acts were specifically brought to the notice of the President before obtaining such assent.[13]

The President's assent to the State law under Art. 254(2), as mentioned above, does not confer irrevocable immunity on the State legislation from the operation of the rule of repugnancy. The proviso to Art. 254(2) somewhat curtails the ambit of Art. 254(2).

Under the proviso to Art. 254(2), Parliament is not prevented from enacting at any time any law with respect to the same matter including a law adding to, amending, varying or repealing the law so made by the State Legislature which relates to a matter in the Concurrent List.

The proviso qualifies the exception contained in Art. 254(2) to Art. 254(1). The proviso thus enlarges the power of Parliament, as acting under the proviso, the Parliament can enact a provision repugnant to the earlier State law. Thus, the Presidential assent to the State law gives protection to it against a Central law only so long as Parliament does not thereafter legislate again with respect to that matter making a provision conflicting with the State law. If it does, the State law would be void to the extent of repugnancy with the later Parliamentary law. The later Parliamentary law should however be on the same matter as the earlier State law. If the two legislations deal with separate and distinct matters, though of a cognate and allied character, then the State law is not abrogated.

A salient feature of this provision is that it not only enables Parliament to make subsequently a provision repugnant to the earlier State law and thus impliedly repeal that State law,[14] but even to declare expressly the earlier State law repealed. Thus, even though the subsequent law made by Parliament does not expressly repeal the earlier State law, yet the State law becomes void as soon as the subsequent law of Parliament creating repugnancy is made on the same matter.[15]

The working of the principle can be illustrated with reference to Zaverbhai v. State of Bombay.[16] The Central Legislature enacted the Essential Supplies Act in 1946 conferring power on the Central Government to issue orders to regulate production, supply and distribution of essential commodities. Under S. 7(1), a contravention of any of the orders was to be punishable with imprisonment up to three years or fine or with both. Considering these punishments inadequate, the Bombay Legislature enacted an Act in 1947 to enhance the punishments provided under the Central law. Both laws were referable to the Concurrent List. As there was avowed repugnancy between the Central and the Bombay laws, the Bombay law received the assent of the Centre and became operative in Bombay. In 1950, Parliament modified its Act of 1946 and enhanced the punishments. The Supreme Court held that the Bombay Act of 1947 and the Central Act of 1950

---

13. Grand Kakatiya Sheraton Hotel and Towers Employees & Workers Union v. Srinivasa Resorts Ltd., (2009) 5 SCC 342 : AIR 2009 SC 2337.

14. T. Barai v. Henry Ah Hoe, AIR 1983 SC 150 : (1983) 1 SCC 177.

15. Thirumurga Kirupananda Variyar Thavathiru Sundara Swamigal Medical Education & Charitable Trust v. State of Tamil Nadu, (1996) 3 SCC 15.

16. AIR 1954 SC 752 : (1955) 1 SCR 799. Also see, Deepchand v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1959 SC 648 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 8; T. Barai v. Henry Ah Hoe, AIR 1983 SC 150 : (1983) 1 SCC 177; Lalbhai Talsibhai Patel, Ahmedabad v. Addl. Special Land Acquisition Officer, Ahmedabad, AIR 1986 Guj. 24; Shakuntalabai v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1986 Bom. 308.

dealt with the same subject of 'enhanced punishment', and that under the proviso to Art. 254(2), the State law became void because it was repugnant to the later Central law.

The Supreme Court stated that under the proviso to Art. 254(2), Parliament can repeal a State law. But where Parliament does not expressly do so, even then, the State law will be void under that provision if it conflicts with a later law "with respect to the same matter" that may be enacted by Parliament.

The Supreme Court has enunciated the principle of implied repeal thus : "If the subject-matter of the later legislation is identical with that of the earlier, so that they cannot both stand together, then the earlier is repealed by the later enactment". This principle is equally applicable to a question under Art. 254(2) whether further legislation by Parliament is in respect of the same matter as that of the State law.[17]

The U.P. Legislature enacted an Act to regulate supply and purchase of sugarcane. Parliament later enacted the Essential Commodities Act, S. 16(1)(b) of which laid down that any law in force in a State would be repealed "in so far as such law controls or authorises the control of the production, supply and distribution of, and trade and commerce in, any essential commodity".

The Supreme Court held in Tika Ramji v. State of Uttar Pradesh[18] that this provision did not repeal the earlier State law, as there was no repugnancy between the two laws, and both could co-exist, although they both related to entry 33(b) in List III.

The proviso to Art. 254(2) confers on Parliament the power to repeal a State law only when—

(1) there was already a Central law on a matter in the Concurrent List;

(2) a State then made a law on the same matter inconsistent with the Central law; and

(3) this State law received the Presidential assent under Art. 254(2).

Such a State law could then be repealed, amended or altered by Parliament by later making a law with respect to the same matter as the State law. If there was no Parliamentary law already in existence prior to the enactment of the State law on the matter, then the later Parliamentary law cannot expressly repeal the earlier State law; though, in case of repugnancy between the two, the Parliamentary law shall prevail to the extent of repugnancy. In the Tika Ramji case, there was no Central law in the field when the State law was enacted, and so S. 16(1)(b) could not operate to repeal the U.P. Act.

The Supreme Court also pointed out that under the proviso to Art. 254(2), power to repeal an earlier law is conferred on Parliament and the same cannot be delegated by it to any executive authority. Tikaramji is a significant pronouncement in the area of Indian Federalism, as it removes the idea that Parliament can specifically repeal any State law in the Concurrent area even if not repugnant to the Central law on the matter. The Supreme Court by literally interpreting the

---

17. Also see, Hoechst Pharmaceuticals v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019 : (1983) 4 SCC 45.
18. AIR 1956 SC 676 : 1956 SCR 393; supra, Sec. H.

proviso to Art. 254(2), ruled that Parliament can repeal a State law only when the conditions above-mentioned are fulfilled.[19]

(c) REPUGNANCY

Repugnancy between two pieces of legislation, generally speaking, means that conflicting results are produced when both the laws are applied to the same facts. Repugnancy arises when the provisions of the two laws are fully inconsistent and are absolutely irreconcilable, and that it is impossible to obey one without disobeying the other, e.g. when one statute says 'do' while the other says 'don't' in the same set of facts.[20] In this case, there is a contradiction in the actual terms of the statutes and this can easily be detected.

Such a situation arose in ITC[21] where the Supreme Court found direct collision between an Act enacted by Parliament and a State Act. The Court ruled that the "question of allowing both of them to operate would not arise." In such a situation, the Central legislation would prevail over the State Law.

The Central Act in question was the Tobacco Board Act enacted under entry 52, List I. The State Act was the Agricultural Produce Markets Act enacted under entry 27, List II. The Court observed:

> "... we hold that the Tobacco Board Act and the Agricultural Produce Markets Act, collide with each other and cannot be operated simultaneously. Necessarily, therefore, the Tobacco Board Act would prevail and the Agricultural Produce Markets Act, so far as it relates to levy of fee for sale and purchase of tobacco within the market area must be held to go out of the purview of the said Act."

But not all cases are so obvious. Contradiction may appear not so much in the phraseology as when they are applied to a given set of facts. When both statutes cover the same field and they produce conflicting legal results in a given set of facts, repugnancy arises between them. For example, when the penalty prescribed for an offence by one Act is altered in degree by the other Act, repugnancy arises. Also, when a statute describes again an offence created by another statute, and imposes a different punishment, or varies the procedure, repugnancy arises between the two.[22]

The U.P. Legislature enacted an Act in 1955 authorizing the government to frame a scheme of nationalization of motor transport. Thereafter, Parliament, with a view to introduce a uniform law, amended the Motor Vehicles Act in 1956. The Supreme Court found in Deep Chand v. State of U.P.,[23] that both the Acts operate in respect of the subject-matter in the same field, and that they differed from each other in many important details, e.g., authority to initiate the scheme, manner of doing it, authority to hear objections, principles regarding payment of compensation etc., and so the U.P. Act would have to give way to the Central Act.

There would be no repugnancy if the provisions made by one law do not exist in the other law; the provisions made by Parliament and the State are mutually

---

19. M.P. JAIN, Justice Bhagwati and Indian Constitutional Law, 2 JILI, 31, 44 (1959-60).
20. Deep Chand v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1959 SC 648 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 8.
21. I.T.C. Ltd. v. Agricultural Produce Market Committee, AIR 2002 SC 852, 894; supra, Sec. G(iii)(a).
22. Zaverbhai v. State of Bombay, supra,
23. AIR 1959 SC 648 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 8, supra, exclusive, do not impinge upon each other and there is no overlapping between them.[24] When the Central Act and the State Act can co-exist and their spheres of operation are different, there is no inconsistency between them. Thus, the Criminal Procedure Code and the Haryana Children Act are not inconsistent. A child accused of murder is to be tried under the Children Act and not the Cr.P. Code.[25] Similarly, in M. Karunanidhi[26] the State law and the Central law although occupying the same field were found to be complimentary and not inconsistent. Both could co-exist without coming into collision with each other.

When repugnancy arises, an effort is made to reconcile the two statutes and to avoid their being repugnant to each other.[27] At times, by interpreting the language of a State law narrowly, it may be possible to remove the incompatibility between the Central and State laws and thus to keep alive the State law.[28]

The repugnancy between two statutes should exist in fact and not depend merely on a possibility.[29] Under Art. 254(1), the State law is void only 'to the extent' of its repugnancy with the Central law. Therefore the whole of the State law need not be declared bad if the repugnant portion may be severed from it. If, however, the invalid portion cannot be severed then the whole Act falls through. The doctrine of severability has been discussed later.[30] Further, the portion of the State law repugnant to the Central law is not dead; it does not become ultra vires in whole or in part; it is eclipsed and if the Central law were to be repealed at any time, it would again become operative.[31]

A more subtle case of repugnancy arises when two statutes pertain to the same subject-matter, but when Parliament intends to make its enactment a complete code and evinces an intention to cover the entire field. This is the rule of occupied field. In such a case, the State law whether passed before or after would be overborne on the ground of repugnancy.[32] As the Supreme Court has observed in a recent case:[33]

> "It cannot, therefore, be said that the test of two legislations containing contradictory provisions is the only criterion of repugnance. Repugnancy may arise between two enactments even though obedience to each of them is possible

---

24. The Tika Ramji case, AIR 1956 SC 676 : 1956 SCR 393; supra,

25. Raghbir v. State of Haryana, AIR 1981 SC 2037. Also, Fatehchand Himmatlal v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1977 SC 1825 : (1977) 2 SCC 670.

26. Supra, footnote 2.

27. Shyamakant v. Rambhajan, AIR 1939 FC 74; Tika Ramji v. State of U.P., supra; A.K. Sabhapathy v. State of Kerala, AIR 1983 Ker 24.

28. Tansukh Rai v. Nilratan, AIR 1966 SC 1780 : (1966) 2 SCR 6.

29. Shyamakant v. Rambhajan, supra, footnote 27.

30. Infra, Ch. XX. Sec. C; R.M.D.C. v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 628, 633; B&G Exchange v. State of Punjab, AIR 1961 SC 268 : (1961) 1 SCR 668.

31. Bhikaji v. State of M.P., AIR 1955 SC 781; Deep Chand v. State of U.P., supra; Dularey v. Dist. Judge, AIR 1984 SC 1260 : (1984) 3 SCC 99.
Also see further on the point of eclipse under Fundamental Rights, Ch. XX. Sec. C.

32. State of Orissa v. M.A. Tulloch & Co., AIR 1964 SC 1284 : (1964) 4 SCR 461; Ratan Lal Adukia v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 104 : (1989) 3 SCC 537, Govt. of A.P. v. J.B. Educational Society, Hyderabad, AIR 1998 AP 400, 412; Kulwant Kaur v. Gurdial Singh Mann, AIR 2001 SC 1273, at 1280 : (2001) 4 SCC 262.

33. Thirumurga Kirupananda Variyar Thavathiru Sundara Swamigal Medical Education & Charitable Trust v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 SC 2384 at 2391 : (1996) 3 SCC 15.
Also see, Jaya Gokul Educational Trust v. Commissioner & Secretary to Govt. Higher Education Dept., Thiruvananthapuram, AIR 2000 SC 1614 : (2000) 5 SCC 231; supra, Sec. G(c), footnote 23 at p. 772.

without disobeying the other if a competent legislature with a superior efficacy expressly or implied evinces by its legislation an intention to cover the whole field."

In the instant case, s. 10A of the Indian Medical Council Act was held to prevail over the Tamil Nadu law dealing with affiliation of medical colleges in the State. Both the Acts were enacted under entry 25 of List III. The Court refused to accept the contention that there was no repugnance between the two Acts as both can be complied with. The Court ruled that Parliament has evinced an intention to occupy the whole field relating to establishment of medical colleges in the country. Parliament has made a "complete and exhaustive provision" covering the entire field for establishing of new medical colleges in the country. No further scope is left for the operation of the State legislation in the said field which is fully covered by the law made by Parliament.

The Orissa Legislature enacted an Act levying a cess on all extracted minerals for the better development of mining areas. Later, Parliament enacted the Mines and Minerals Act, 1957, requiring the Central Government to ensure conservation and development of country's mineral resources. The Supreme Court held that the State Act was superseded as a whole because Parliament had clearly evinced an intention to cover the entire field of minerals.[34]

A Kashmir law concerning infliction of disciplinary punishments on civil servants was held not applicable to the members of the All India Service as Parliament has occupied the field and that the Central enactments give clear indication that this was the only manner in which any disciplinary action can be taken against these persons.[35] In such a case, the inconsistency between the two laws is of such a nature that they come into direct collision with each other and it is impossible to obey the one without disobeying the other.

I. RESIDUARY POWER

The three Lists are drawn very elaborately and presumably all subject-matters identifiable at the time of the constitution-making, and regarding which a government could conceivably be called upon to make laws in modern times, have been assigned to one of the Lists. But it is humanly not possible to foresee every possible activity and assign it to one List or the other.

The framers of the Constitution were conscious of the fact that human knowledge is limited and human perception imperfect and no one could foresee what contingency may arise in future needing legislation. Therefore, the residuary power is intended to take care of such matters as could not be identified at the time of the constitution-making. Further, the framers of the Constitution were

---

34. State of Orissa v. M.A. Tulloch & Co., AIR 1964 SC 1284 : (1964) 4 SCR 461 ; Baijnath Kadia v. State of Bihar, AIR 1970 SC 1436 : (1969) 3 SCC 838.

But see, State of Haryana v. Chaman Lal, AIR 1977 SC 1654. Parliament made certain changes in 1972 in the Mines Act of 1957. The Court now ruled that the State could enact a law for vesting of lands containing mineral deposits in the State. Parliament did not want to encroach on State power under entries 18 in List II and 42 in III. After 1972, the Central Act does not cover ownership of minerals which are part of land. The States have now a sphere of their own powers under the amended Central Act. Also see, Fatehchand v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1977 SC 1825 : (1977) 2 SCC 670.

35. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Farooqi, AIR 1972 SC 1738 : (1972) 1 SCC 872.

designedly devising for a strong Centre. Moreover, the present is an era of fast technological advancement, and no one can visualize future developments and exigencies of government. Something unforeseen may happen and some new matter may arise calling for governmental action. A question may then arise as to which government, Central or State, is entitled to legislate with respect to that matter. To meet this difficulty, the Constitution provides that the residue will belong exclusively to the Centre. This is provided for in Art. 248 read with entry 97, List I. These provisions take care of any unforeseen eventuality.

Entry 97, List I, runs as : "Any other matter not enumerated in List II or List III including any tax not mentioned in either of those Lists."

Article 248(1) says : "Parliament has exclusive power to make any law with respect to any matter not enumerated in the Concurrent List or State List."

Residuary powers have been vested in the Centre so as to make the Centre strong. As was stated in the Constituent Assembly by Jawahar Lal Nehru, Chairman of the Union Powers Committee:

> "We think that residuary powers should remain with the Centre. In view however of the exhaustive nature of the three Lists drawn up by us, the residuary subjects could only relate to matters which, while they may claim recognition in the future, are not at present identifiable and cannot therefore be included now in the Lists."[36]

If the law does not fall in the State List, the Parliament has legislative competence to enact the law by virtue of its residuary power and it would not be necessary to go into the question whether it falls under any entry in the Union List or the Concurrent List.[37] The basic question thus required to be examined is whether the subject-matter of the Central Act falls in any of the entries in the State List. The question of residuary power is discussed further in detail in the next Chapter under the heading "Residuary Taxes".[38]

S. 3 of the Commissions of Inquiry Act has been held to be fully covered by the Centre's residuary power. The Central Government can appoint an inquiry commission to inquire into charges against State Ministers under its residuary power as this subject is not mentioned in any List.[39] Support for such a power can also be found in entry 94, List I, and entry 45, List III. It is an accepted principle that Parliament can supplement any of its powers under any entry in Lists I and III with its residuary power.[40]

A law taking over of management of Auroville by the Centre is covered by the Centre's residuary power. Shree Aurobindo Society established a cultural township where people from different countries could live in harmony as one community and engage in cultural, educational, scientific and other activities seeking to promote human unity. In course of time, serious irregularities in the management of the society and mis-utilisation of funds were detected. Accordingly, Parliament passed an Act taking over the management of Auroville in public interest. It

---

36. Rao, B. Shiva, The Framing of India's Constitution, II, 777.
37. See, Union of India v. H.S. Dhillon, AIR 1972 SC 1061, 1074-75 : (1971) 2 SCC 729; S.P. Mittal v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1 : (1983) 1 SCC 51, 18-19; Kartar Singh v. State of Punjab, (1994) 3 SCC 569, 629-630.
38. Infra, Ch. XI, Sec. G.
39. State of Karnataka v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 68 : (1977) 4 SCC 608.
40. See Dhillon, supra, note 2; infra, Ch. XI, Sec. B.

was held that Parliament had competence to enact such a law under its residuary power.[41]

As regards legislation for the Union Territories, Parliament can rely on Art. 246(4) read with any topic in any of the three Lists or on its residuary power.[42]

The scope of the residuary power is very wide. For example, under entry 3 in List III, Parliament can legislate with respect to preventive detention on grounds mentioned therein.[43] Further, Parliament can legislate with respect to preventive detention under entry 9, List I, on grounds mentioned therein.[44] But these two entries do not exhaust the entire field of preventive detention. Parliament can legislate under its residuary power with respect to preventive detention on any ground not mentioned in these two entries. Preventive detention on certain grounds is covered by these entries, but, on other grounds, Parliament can act under its residuary power. Thus, Parliament has enacted the Conservation of Foreign Exchange and Prevention of Smuggling Act [COFEPOSA] providing for preventive detention in connection with smuggling and foreign exchange racketeering. This Act can find support from entry 36, List I (foreign exchange) and Parliament's residuary power.[45]

In the famous Golak Nath case,[46] a judicial view was expressed by a majority of the Supreme Court that Art. 368 (as it then stood) merely provided for procedure to amend the Constitution and did not by itself confer a substantive power to amend and that such power was to be found in the residuary power of Parliament. In Kesavnanda,[47] the Supreme Court repudiated this view, and read the power to amend the Constitution in Art. 368 itself and not in the residuary power of Parliament. As explained by HEDGE and MUKHERJEA, JJ:[48]

> "Entry 97 in List I was included to meet some unexpected and unforeseen contingencies. It is difficult to believe that our Constitution-makers who were keenly conscious of the importance of the provision relating to the amendment of the Constitution..... would have left the important power hidden in entry 97 of List I leaving to the off chance of the Courts locating that power in that entry."

From the above, a principle was sought to be implied with a view to limit the breadth of the residuary power that if a subject was prominently present to the minds of the constitution-makers, then that matter ought not to be read in the residuary but should be located in one of the entries.[49] But the Supreme Court has refused to accept any such limitation on the residuary power saying that it is not proper to unduly circumscribe, erode or whittle down the residuary by a process of interpretation as new developments may demand new laws not covered by any

---

41. S.P. Mittal v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1 : (1983) 1 SCC 51.
42. Sat Pal & Co. v. Lt. Governor of Delhi, AIR 1979 SC 1550 : (1979) 4 SCC 232. Also see, supra, Ch. IX.
43. Supra, Sec. F.
44. Supra, Sec. D.
45. See, infra, Ch. XXVII, Sec. B, for discussion on Preventive Detention.
46. AIR 1967 SC 1643 : (1967) 2 SCR 762.
For a detailed discussion on this case, See Ch. XLI, infra.
47. AIR 1973 SC 1461 : (1973) 4 SCC 225.
48. Ibid, at 1614.
49. SEERVAI, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF INDIA, 1264 (2nd Ed.)

of the three Lists and these Lists cannot be regarded as exhaustive of governmental action and activity.[50]

Parliament can enact an Act to prevent the improper use of certain emblems and names for professional and commercial purposes either under entry 49, List I, or its residuary power, as the matter does not fall under entry 26, List II.[51] However, recourse could be had to the residuary only if the matter is found to be outside the State purview. As the Supreme Court has emphasized:[52]

> "Before exclusive legislative competence can be claimed for Parliament by resort to the residuary power, the legislative incompetence of the State Legislature must be clearly established....."

Parliament's residuary power is not to be interpreted so expansively as to whittle down the power of the State Legislatures. "Residuary should not be so interpreted as to destroy or belittle State autonomy." It has been emphasized that in a Constitution like ours "where there is a division of legislative subjects but the residuary power is vested in Parliament, such residuary power cannot be so expansively interpreted as to whittle down the power of the State Legislatures". To do so would be to affect the federal principle adversely. If there is competition between an entry in List II and the residuary power of the Centre, the former may be given a broad and plentiful interpretation.[53]

An important question of interpretation of the residuary power has given rise to difference of opinion among the Judges of the Supreme Court. The question is : should the residuary power be invoked when the subject-matter of legislation in question is not found in any of the three Lists, or when it is not found in List II and List III only; List I being irrelevant for the purpose as the residuary power belongs to the Centre?

Prior to Dhillon,[54] the judicial view was that recourse to entry 97, List I, ought to be had only when the impugned legislation did not fall in any of the three Lists. The argument was that if the impugned legislation fell under any entry in List II, residuary power could not be invoked. Further, if the impugned legislation fell under an entry in List I or List III, then recourse to the residuary would be unnecessary.

It was said that entry 97, List I, was not the first step in the discussion of such problems, but the last resort.[55] But Dhillon seems to have changed this position. The Supreme Court has ruled in this case by majority that once it is found that the subject-matter of the impugned legislation does not fall under any entry in List II or III then Parliament can take recourse to the residuary power, or it can be combined with any other entry in List I. This question is fully discussed in the next Chapter under the heading "Residuary Taxes".[56]

In Amratlal Prajivandas,[57] following Dhillon, the Supreme Court has observed that the test to determine the legislative competence of Parliament is this : when-

---

50. Satpal & Co., supra, note, 42, at 1554.
51. Sable Waghire & Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1975 SC 1172 : (1975) 1 SCC 763; supra.
52. International Tourist Corp. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1981 SC 774 , 778 : (1981) 2 SCC 318.
53. Jaora Sugar Mills v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1966 SC 416, 421 : (1966) 1 SCR 523.
54. Union of India v. H.S. Dhillon, AIR 1972 SC 1061 : (1971) 2 SCC 779; supra, footnote 37.
55. Hari Krishna Bhargava v. Union of India, AIR 1966 SC 619 : (1966) 2 SCR 22.
56. See, infra, Ch. XI, Sec. G.
57. Att. Gen. for India v. Amratlal Prajivandas, AIR 1994 SC 2179 : (1994) 5 SCC 54.

ever the competence of Parliament to enact a specific statute is questioned one must look to the entries in List II. If the said statute is not relatable to any of the entries in List II, no further inquiry is necessary as Parliament will be competent to enact the said statute either by virtue of the entries in List I and List III, or by virtue of the residuary power contained in Art. 248 read with entry 97, List I.

The Consumer Protection Act, 1986, creates quasi-judicial bodies to render inexpensive and speedy remedies to consumers. The Act provides an additional forum providing inexpensive and speedy resolution of disputes arising between consumers and suppliers of goods and services. These bodies are not supposed to supplant but supplement the existing judicial system. The agencies created by the Act are in no way parallel hierarchy to the judicial Courts. The Act would fall under the Parliament's residuary power and not under entry 11A, List III.[58]

The Constitutional status of and the competence of Parliament to impose service tax on practising chartered accountants and architects was raised before the Supreme Court by the practioners.[59] The Supreme Court repelled the challenge fundamentally on the view that service tax was tax on service and not a tax on service providers having taken into consideration that services constitute a heterogeneous spectrum of economic activities covering a wide range such as management, banking, insurance, communication, entertainment etc. and that the service sector is now occupying the centre stage of the Indian economy and an "Industry by itself". Since consumption of goods and consumption of services both satisfy the human needs, there is hardly any distinction between the two.[60]

VALIDATION OF INVALID STATE LAWS

When States lack legislative competence with respect to a subject-matter, Parliament will have such competence. At times, when a State law is declared invalid because of the State's legislative incompetence, Parliament may come to the rescue of the State by way of validating the law in question.

Here the principle is that Parliament cannot merely pass an Act saying that such and such State Act is hereby declared as valid. This amounts to delegation of legislative power on the State Legislature on a topic which the Constitution has kept outside the State jurisdiction and this Parliament is not competent to do. As the Supreme Court has explained:

> "Where a topic is not included within the relevant list dealing with the legislative competence of the State Legislatures, Parliament by making a law cannot attempt to confer such legislative competence on the State Legislatures."

It is for the Constitution and not Parliament to confer competence on State Legislatures. Parliament cannot arrogate to itself any omnipotence to redraw legislative Lists so as to confer competence on the State to legislate on a topic which is outside its purview. Instead, since Parliament can legislate on a topic within its power, it can re-enact the invalid State law. As a convenient legislative device, Parliament can, instead of repeating the whole of the State Act, legislate referentially. For example, when a State Act is held invalid, Parliament may enact a law putting the State Act in a schedule and saying that the Act "shall be

---

58. Vishwabharathi House Building Co-op. Soc. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1999 Kant. 210.
59. All India Federation of Tax Practioners v. Union of India, (2007) 7 SCC 527 : (2007) 9 JT 1.
60. Ibid.

deemed always to have been as valid as if the provisions contained therein had been enacted by Parliament."

The Supreme Court has treated this strategy as valid because Parliament has legislated and not merely declared valid an invalid statute. As an abbreviation of drafting, Parliament has borrowed into its statute by reference the words of a State Act not qua State Act but as a "convenient shorthand", "as against a long-hand writing of all the sections into the Central Act." When Parliament has power to legislate on a topic, it can make an Act on the topic by any drafting means including referential legislation.

In Baijnath Kedia v. State of Bihar[61], the Supreme Court held a statutory provision made by a State Legislature unconstitutional on the ground that the State Legislature had no power to enact it and that only Parliament was competent to legislate in that behalf. Thereafter, Parliament enacted a Validation Act. The act was upheld as valid by the Supreme Court.[62] The Court ruled that Parliament could validate retrospectively what a State Legislature had no power to enact.

But the validating act cannot be considered as remedying the defects pointed out by the judicial verdict by making a "cosmetic change" in the original Act.[63]

Most of these validating Acts have been enacted by Parliament under its residuary power. A number of validating Acts have been passed by Parliament to validate judicially invalidated State taxing measures.[64]

In Shree Vinod Kumar v. State of Himachal Pradesh,[65] the Supreme Court invalidated an Act passed by the Himachal Pradesh Assembly on the ground that the Assembly was not validly constituted and, as such, it was incompetent to pass the law in question. Parliament then passed a validating Act validating the constitution and proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of Himachal Pradesh. The Courts were prohibited from questioning the validity of any Act or proceeding of the Assembly on the ground of defect in its constitution. The Supreme Court upheld the competence of Parliament to enact the validating Act under its residuary power.[66]

J. PARLIAMENTARY LEGISLATION IN THE STATE FIELD

Proverbially, federalism has been characterised as a rigid form of government. Constituted as it is of a dual polity, there is a rigid distribution of the functions between the Centre and the States supported by no less a sanction than that of the Constitution. The balance thus drawn between the Centre and the States cannot be disturbed by one of them unilaterally. Neither the Centre nor the States can trench upon the jurisdiction assigned to the other.

---

61. (1969) 3 SCC 838 : AIR 1970 SC 1436.
62. Krishna Chandra Gangopadhyaya v. Union of India, AIR 1975 SC 1389 : (1975) 2 SCC 302. Also see, Shetkari Sahakari Sakhar Karkhana v. Collector of Sangli, AIR 1979 SC 1972 : (1980) 1 SCC 381.
63. Grand Kakatiya Sheraton Hotel and Towers Employees & Workers Union v. Srinivasa Resorts Ltd., (2009) 5 SCC 342, 365 : AIR 2009 SC 2337.
64. See, infra, next Chapter.
65. AIR 1959 SC 223 : (1959) Supp 1 SCR 160.
66. Jadab Singh v. Himachal Pradesh Administration, (1960) 3 SCR 75 : AIR 1960 SC 1008.

A change in the scheme of distribution of powers can be effected only by an amendment of the Constitution which is not always easy to effectuate, as the process of constitutional amendment in a federation is always more rigid than the ordinary legislative process.[67]

There are disadvantages in having a rigid scheme of distribution of functions. A scheme which may be appropriate in the context of the times when the Constitution was adopted, may need re-adjustment when circumstances may have changed. There may arise an emergency in the country when a Central law on a matter in the State List may be a desideratum; and if this cannot be done without amending the Constitution, difficulties may be felt in taking effective steps to meet the situation.

Gradual adjustments may be effected in the balance of power by the process of judicial interpretation, but there may be times when this technique fails to rise to the occasion and make the needed adjustments to meet situations at hand. To some extent, rigidity of federalism has been mitigated by the newly arising concept of co-operative federalism,[68] but even this concept has its own limitations in practice, and it is a product of non-availability of better and more effective methods of effecting the needed adjustments in the Central-State relationship. There have been occasions in other federations when lack of necessary powers in the Centre has been keenly felt as pressing problems have demanded urgent solutions.[69]

The Constitution of India, however, breaks new ground in this respect. It contains several provisions to create a mechanism for effecting temporary adjustments in the frame of the distribution of powers and thus introduce an element of flexibility in an otherwise inherently rigid federal structure, and some of these methods are original insofar as these expedients are not to be found elsewhere. Learning by the difficulties faced in other federations by a too rigid distribution of powers, which often denied power to the Centre to take effective measures to meet a given situation, the framers of the Indian Constitution took adequate care to create a federal structure which could be easily moulded to respond to the needs of the situation, without resorting to the tedious and elaborate procedure of amending the Constitution.

First, the sizeable Concurrent List represents an attempt to break down, to some extent, the unpassable barriers between the Centre and the States which arise when there are two exclusive areas allotted to them. The Concurrent List makes it possible for either the Centre or the States or both to operate on a matter according to the demands of the situation at a given time. A further flexibility has been introduced in this area by providing for an expedient to keep a State law alive in the face of a Central law.[70]

Secondly, a number of constitutional provisions enable Parliament to legislate in the State sphere from time to time. These constitutional provisions are discussed below.

---

67. For the process of Amendment of the Constitution in India, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
68. On Co-operative Federalism in India, see, infra, Ch. XIV.
69. Infra, Sec. L, this Chapter.
70. Supra, Sec. H, this Chapter.

(a) ARTICLE 249

According to Article 249, if the Rajya Sabha declares, by a resolution supported by two thirds of the members present and voting, that it is necessary or expedient in the national interest that Parliament should make laws with respect to a matter in the State List specified in the resolution, it becomes lawful for Parliament to make laws for the whole or any part of India with respect to that matter so long as the resolution stands.

Such a resolution may remain in force for such period as is mentioned therein but not exceeding one year; it can be renewed as many times as may be necessary but not exceeding a year at a time. The law made by Parliament in the State List under this provision would cease to have effect six months after the resolution passed by Rajya Sabha comes to an end.

The procedure is of strictly temporary efficacy as the life of the resolution is limited to one year at a time. If Central power is required to be continued beyond one year, a fresh resolution will have to be passed by the Rajya Sabha for another year and so on.

The function entrusted to the Rajya Sabha under this Article emanates from the theory that this House contains representatives of the States who are elected by the State Legislative Assemblies.[71]

The strategy contained in Art. 249 can be used when national interest so demands and to tide over a temporary situation. For this unique feature of the Indian Constitution, no parallelism is to be found in any other federal constitution.

Article 249 has been used so far very sparingly. For example, in 1950, due to the Korean War, prices of imported goods began to soar. There was great need to effectively control black marketing. No action could be taken to control imported goods under entry 33, List III, as it stood before its amendment in 1955 because it did not then cover imported goods. Therefore, under Art. 249, Rajya Sabha passed a resolution to enable Parliament to make laws for a period of one year with respect to entries 26 and 27 of List II. Parliament then enacted the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Amendment Act, 1950, and the Supply and Prices of Goods Act, 1950, for controlling supply, distribution and price of certain goods.

Again, in 1951, pursuant to another resolution of the Rajya Sabha under Art. 249, Parliament passed the Evacuee Interest (Separation) Act, 1951, applicable to all evacuee property including agricultural land.

Because of the menace of terrorism in Punjab, on August 13, 1986, the Rajya Sabha passed a resolution authorising Parliament to make laws for one year with respect to six entries in the State List, viz. : 1, 2, 4, 64, 65 and 66. However, no law in pursuance of this resolution was ever passed by Parliament.

It may be underlined that there are four in-built safeguards against misuse of power conferred by Art. 249, viz.:

(1) Parliament can assume jurisdiction to legislate only if two-thirds of the members of the Rajya Sabha present and voting pass the necessary resolution;

---

71. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. B.

(2) the resolution must specify the matter enumerated in the State List with respect to which Parliament is being authorised to legislate in the national interest;

(3) the resolution passed by the Rajya Sabha remains in force for one year; and

(4) the law enacted by Parliament in pursuance of this resolution remains in force only for six months after the resolution ceases to remain in force.

The State Legislature continues to enjoy power to make laws which it is empowered to make under the Constitution, even after the Rajya Sabha passes a resolution under Art. 249. This is however subject to the rule of repugnancy. This rule has been specifically laid down in Art. 251, which is mentioned below.

Article 249 provides a simple and quick method to cope with extraordinary situations which temporarily assume national importance. The Article may also be availed of when speed is of the essence of the matter, and it is not considered necessary or expedient to invoke the emergency provisions contained in Arts. 352 and 356.[72]

(b) ARTICLE 250

While a proclamation of emergency is in operation in the country under Art. 352, Parliament is empowered under Art. 250 to legislate with respect to any matter in the State List.[73]

Article 250 does not restrict the power of a State Legislature to make a law which it is entitled to make under the Constitution. However, because of Art. 251, in case of repugnancy between a State law and a Parliamentary law enacted under Art. 250, the latter is to prevail and the State law, to the extent of repugnancy, and so long as the Parliamentary law continues, is to be inoperative.

(c) ARTICLE 252

Article 252(1) provides for delegation of powers by two or more States to Parliament so as to enable it to legislate with respect to a matter in the State List in relation to such States.

If it appears to two or more State Legislatures to be desirable that any matter in the State List should be regulated in such States by Parliament by law, and if resolutions to that effect are passed by the Houses of those State Legislatures, Parliament can then pass an Act for regulating that matter so far as those States are concerned.

Any law so enacted by Parliament can apply to any other State by which it is adopted afterwards by a resolution passed to that effect in its Legislature. While enacting a law under Art. 252(1), Parliament can so structure the law as to be capable of being effectively adopted by any other State later on by passing a resolution to that effect. A State can adopt the Central law, after it has been enacted, under Art. 252(2), even if it had not passed the resolution originally under Art. 252(1).

In the context of Art. 252(1), the term 'State Legislature' means only the House or Houses of the Legislature without including the Governor. Therefore,

---

72. See below under Art. 250.
73. Infra, Chap. XIII, under Emergency Provisions.

Governor's assent is not necessary to the resolution passed by the House or Houses.[74]

When the State Legislature passes a resolution under Art. 252(1), Parliament becomes entitled to legislate, and the State Legislature ceases to share the power to make law, with respect to that matter. The resolution operates as "abdication or surrender" of the State power with respect to that matter which is the subject-matter of the resolution, and it is placed solely in the hands of Parliament which alone can then legislate with respect to it. "It is as if such matter is lifted out of List II and placed in List I of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution."[75] Only so much power is conferred on Parliament as is resolved by the State Legislature to be entrusted to Parliament. By passing a resolution under Art. 252(1), the State Legislature surrendered to Parliament the right to pass legislation imposing a ceiling on the holding of urban immovable property. The Supreme Court ruled that the State had not surrendered the subject of Town planning and development to Parliament.[76]

Under Art. 252, power to legislate is vested in Parliament only when two or more States pass a resolution authorising Parliament to make a law on a matter in List II which is not within the legislative domain of Parliament. The passing of the resolutions by the States is a condition precedent for vesting the Parliament with such power by the State Legislatures.

The effect of Art. 252(1) is that Parliament becomes competent to legislate with respect to a matter for which it has no power to make a law. There are many subjects in the State List such as, public health, agriculture, forests, fisheries etc., which may, at times, demand common legislation for two or more States. Article 252(1) prescribes a method by which Parliament may be enabled to do so. This Article becomes applicable when at least two States join and pass the necessary resolutions invoking the aid of Parliament.

Notionally speaking, the specific subject is out of the legislative domain of the States passing the resolution under Art. 252(1). The Supreme Court has held in RMDC[77] that any Act of the State Legislature will be subject to the rule of repugnancy, though Art. 254, in terms, may not supply.[78] If any State Act relating to the same matter, occupying the same field as the law made by Parliament under cl. (1), is repugnant to the latter, it will be rendered inoperative to the extent of repugnancy.[79]

The Karnataka Legislature resolved to entrust to Parliament the subject-matter of imposing a ceiling on urban immovable property and acquisition of such property in excess of the ceiling. So much subject-matter was thus carved out of entry 18, List II, viz., 'land', but the rest of the legislative area comprised in the entry continued to fall within the State legislative domain.[80]

---

74. Union of India v. Basavaiah Choudhary, AIR 1979 SC 1415 : (1979) 3 SCC 324.
75. Thumati Venkaiah v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 1568 : (1980) 4 SCC 295.
76. H.H.M. Shanti Devi P. Gaikwad v. Sarjibhai H. Patel, AIR 2001 SC 1462 : (2001) 5 SCC 101.
77. R.M.D.C. v. State of Mysore, AIR 1962 SC 594 : (1962) 3 SCR 230.
78. For discussion on Art. 254, see, supra, Sec. H.
79. Also see, on this point : Jamati Rangayya v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1978 AP 106; T. Khande Rao v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1979 Kant. 71; Birajananda Das v. Competent Authority, AIR 1986 Cal. 8.
80. Krishna Bhimrao Deshpande v. Land Tribunal, Dharwad, AIR 1993 SC 883 : (1993) 1 SCC 287.

Article 252 has been used a few times. For example, in order to have a uniform law for the control and regulation of prize competitions, several States passed resolutions authorising Parliament to enact the requisite legislation. The need for a Central law was felt because these competitions were run by out-of-State journals which a State law could not effectively control. Parliament then enacted the Prize Competitions Act, 1955.[81]

The States of Bengal and Bihar have authorised Parliament to legislate for the setting up of the Damodar Valley Corporation to control the Damodar River which constantly ravaged the two States.

Parliament enacted the Urban Land (Ceiling and Regulation) Act, 1976, after resolutions under Art. 252(1) were adopted by eleven State Legislatures.[82]

Article 252(2) provides:

> "Any Act so passed by Parliament may be amended or repealed by an Act of Parliament passed or adopted in like manner but shall not, as respects any State to which it applies, be amended or repealed by an Act of the Legislature of that State."

Because of Art. 252(2), the State Legislatures have no power to repeal or amend an Act passed by Parliament under Art. 252(1). Only Parliament can amend or repeal it in the manner laid down in Art. 252(2). The effect of Art. 252, therefore, is that the State Legislature loses its power to make laws on the subject to the extent its field is covered by the resolution under Art. 252(1) although the matter continues to be remain in List II. For applicability of the repealing Act a State must adopt the repeal by resolution passed by legislature in that behalf. Since the legislature of the State of West Bengal did not do so, the Urban Land (Ceiling and Regulation) Act would not applicable in that State.[83]

The parliamentary law passed under Art. 252(1) may be amended or repealed by an Act of Parliament passed or adopted in like manner and not by the State Legislature.[84] The Speaker of the Lok Sabha has held that the previous permission of the States would be necessary to amend the Central Act because, according to Art. 252(2), amending legislation was to be passed in 'like manner' as the original legislation which meant that authorisation from the States for the amendment was also necessary. The Speaker overruled the Government's view that once the State Legislatures authorised Parliament to legislate on a subject, and a law was passed by Parliament, it was authorised to amend the law without seeking States' authority again. The Speaker held that the jurisdiction vested in Parliament expired when once the Act was passed in pursuance of the State authorisation, and fresh consent of the States would be necessary for amending the original Act. This means that if the State Legislatures do not give the necessary consent to amend or repeal the earlier Act in the same manner laid down in clause (1), neither Parliament nor the State Legislatures have the power to amend or repeal the Act under cl. (2).

---

81. R.M.D.C. v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 628 : 1957 SCR 930; R.M.D.C. v. State of Mysore, AIR 1962 SC 594 : (1962) 3 SCR 230.

82. Other Acts passed by Parliament under Art. 252(1) are : The Estate Duty Act, 1953, in its application to agricultural land; The Seeds Act, 1966; The Water Preservation and Control of Pollution Act, 1974; The National Capital Region Planning Board Act, 1985.

83. State of W.B. v. Pronab Kumar Sur, (2003) 9 SCC 490 : AIR 2003 SC 2313.

84. See, Art. 252(2) given above.

When Parliament passes an Act under Art. 252, it would not be categorized as the State Act. By passing resolutions, the States surrender their legislative power to Parliament. Parliament does not act as a delegate of the States because the initial enacting of the Act as well as its subsequent amending or repealing rests with Parliament alone and not with the States.[85]

Article 252 denotes flexibility woven into the fabric of the Indian federalism. The scheme of distribution of powers under the Indian Constitution becomes somewhat less rigid because of Art. 252. There is, however, one flaw in the phrasesology of Art. 252(2). As it stands now, it menas that after Parliament has passed the law under Art. 252(1), it can amend the law in like manner. This means that the States must again pass resolutions authorising Parliament to amend the law. If the State Legislatures fail to pass such resolutions, Parliament cannot amend the law.

The procedure laid down in Art. 252 has been the subject of a controversy. In Union of India v. Valluri B. Chaudhary,[86] a question was raised about the validity of the Urban Land (Ceiling and Regulation) Act, 1976. The Legislatures of 11 States considered it desirable to have a uniform legislation enacted by Parliament for imposing a ceiling on urban immovable property. Accordingly, these Legislatures passed resolutions under Art. 252(1) authorising Parliament to legislate on this topic. In pursuance of these resolutions, Parliament enacted the Urban Land (Ceiling and Regulation) Act, 1976.

Initially, the Act applied to the eleven States which had originally passed the requisite resolutions, but later it was adopted by resolutions passed by the Legislatures of six more States. The primary object of the Act was to impose a ceiling on vacant land in urban areas. The pith and substance of the Act was with regard to urban vacant lands – a matter falling under entry 18, List II.

The validity of the Act was challenged inter alia on the ground that while the resolutions of the States had authorised Parliament to enact a law to impose a ceiling on urban immovable property, actually the Act as enacted imposed a ceiling on urban vacant land which was a different subject and, thus, contrary to the resolutions. The Supreme Court rejected the contention arguing that since 'urban immovable property' was a wider expression which also included 'land', there was no contradiction between the resolution passed by the States and the legislation enacted by Parliament.

No such provision authorising the States to delegate power to the Centre exists in the U.S.A. The Australian Constitution, however, in sec. 51(xxxviii) authorises the Central Parliament to enact laws with respect to matters referred to it by the Parliament or Parliaments of any State or States, 'so that the law shall extend only to States by whose Parliaments the matter is referred, or which otherwise adopt the law." The Indian provision is a close replica of the Australian model, but the interesting fact is that while it has not been used at all in Australia so far, in India, the provision has been used quite a few times as stated above.

The Canadian Constitution has no such provision. A straight delegation of legislative powers by a Province to the Centre (or vice versa) has been held to be ultra vires on the ground that such a delegation would constitute a breach of the 85. Rajendra Kumar v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1979 MP 108.

86. AIR 1979 SC 1415 : (1979) 3 SCC 324.

"watertight compartments", between the Centre and the Provinces as envisaged in the Canadian Constitution and would permit the Dominion and Provinces to enlarge and contract each other's jurisdiction at will.[87] But, on the other hand, a delegation of power by the Centre to a board functioning under a Provincial law has been upheld.[88] The present position in Canada thus is that a delegation of legislative power by a Province to the Dominion or vice versa is invalid, but delegation of power by one on a body created by the other is valid.[89]

(d) IMPLEMENTATION OF A TREATY

Article 253 confers on Parliament the capacity to legislate, irrespective of the scheme of distribution of powers, to implement a treaty or a decision made at an international conference.[90]

(e) EMERGENCY

Parliament becomes empowered to make laws with respect to any matter in the State List in relation to the State whose administration is taken over by the Centre under Art. 356.[91]

(f) EXPANSIVE NATURE OF SOME UNION ENTRIES

Lastly, it may also be noted that certain entries, viz., 7, 23, 27, 52, 53, 54, 56, 62, 63, 67 in the Union List are so worded as to make their ambit expansive. For example, under entry 52, Parliament can take any industry under Central control by declaring that its control by the Union is 'expedient in the public interest.'[92] This is a flexible provision because an industry can stay in the State sphere until need is felt to bring it under Central control.

K. CENTRAL CONTROL OVER STATE LEGISLATION

There are a few provisions in the Constitution as stated below which prescribe assent of the President, i.e., the Central Executive before a Bill passed by a State Legislature can become legally effective. This mechanism is part of the scheme of checks and balances insofar as the Centre is able to keep under its control certain types of State legislation.

(a) Article 31A(1) provides that a law regarding acquisition of estates will not be invalid even if it is inconsistent with Art. 14 or 19.[93] However, under the first proviso to Art. 31 A(1), the exemptions granted to some categories of acquisitorial law from Arts. 14 and 19 cannot be available unless the relevant State law has been reserved for the consideration of the President and has received his assent. In this way, the Centre can ensure that the States make only justifiable use of their power to deviate from the Fundamental Rights.

---

87. Att. Gen. of Nova Scotia v. Att. Gen. of Canada, (1951) SCR 31.
88. P.E.I. Potato Marketing Board v. Willis, (1952) 4 DLR 146; Coughlin v. Ontario Highway Transport Board, (1968) S.C.R. 569.
89. Scott, Delegation by Parliament to Provincial Legislatures and vice versa, 1948 Can. BR 984.
90. Supra, Sec. D.
91. For a detailed discussion on the Emergency Provisions, see, infra, Ch. XIII.
92. Supra, Sec. D.
93. Infra, Ch XXXII, Sec. B.

The proviso enables the Central Executive to keep some check on State laws falling under Art. 31A(1), so that there is some uniformity among the State laws and that there is no undue curtailment of the Fundamental Rights guaranteed by Arts. 14 and 19.[1] The Centre can also ensure that the State does not use its legislative power for a purpose extraneous or collateral to the purposes mentioned in Art. 31A(1). This is a safeguard against undue, excessive and indiscriminate abridgement of Fundamental Rights by State legislation.

(b) Article 31C gives overriding effect to the Directive Principles over Fundamental Rights granted by Art. 14 or Art. 19, but a State law can claim this effect only if the President gives his assent to it.[2] This is also a safeguard against undue abridgment of Fundamental Rights in the name of implementation of Directive Principles. It may be appreciated that Art. 31C confers very drastic power on State Legislatures and so some safeguard is necessary against unwise or inappropriate laws being enacted and claiming exemption from Fundamental Rights guaranteed by Art. 14 or Art. 19.

(c) Under the Second Proviso to Art. 200, a State Governor has been ordained not to assent to, but to reserve for the consideration of the President, any Bill passed by a State Legislature which, in his opinion, would, if it became law, so derogate from the powers of the High Court as to endanger the position which that Court is by the Constitution designed to fill.[3]

For the proper functioning of a democratic system, governed by Rule of Law, an independent judiciary is an integral and indispensable part of the constitutional system.[4] This provision is intended to preserve the integrity of the High Courts which are designed to be strong instruments of justice. It is a safeguard against a State passing any law which may adversely affect the powers, jurisdiction or status of the High Court. The Centre can intervene in a fit case and preserve the High Court's constitutional status.

(d) Under Art. 288(2), a State law imposing, or authorising imposition of, a tax in respect of any water or electricity stored, generated, consumed, distributed or sold by any authority established by law made by Parliament for regulating or developing any inter-State river or river-valley, has no effect unless it has received the assent of the President.[5]

(e) Article 301 declares that trade, commerce and intercourse shall be free throughout India. However, under Art. 304(b), a State Legislature may impose reasonable restriction in public interest on the freedom of trade, commerce or intercourse with or within the State, but no such Bill is to be moved in the State Legislature without the previous sanction of the President.[6] This proviso is also a safeguard to ensure that State laws do not unduly disrupt the economic unity of the country. The Centre can ensure that States do not make laws to unnecessarily curtail freedom of trade and commerce.

---

1. For discussion on Arts. 14 and 19, see, infra, Chs. XXI and XXIV.
2. See, infra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. D. Also see, Chs. XXXIV, Secs. A and B; XLI, Sec. D, infra.
3. Supra, Chs. VI and VIII.
4. See, on this theme, Ch. IV, Sec. K; Ch. VIII, Sec. F.
5. Infra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii).
6. Infra, Ch. XV, entitled "Freedom of Trade and Commerce".

It may however be mentioned that in the absence of prior sanction of the President, the defect can be cured under Art. 255 by subsequent assent of the President to the State law in question.[7]

(f) Then, there is Art. 254(2) under which repugnancy between a State law and a Central law with respect to a matter in the Concurrent List may be cured by the assent of the President to the State legislation.[8]

(g) When a proclamation of financial emergency is in operation under Art. 360(1), the President, i.e., the Central Executive can direct the States to reserve all Money Bills or Financial Bills for the President's consideration after they are passed by the State Legislature. [Art. 360(4)(a)(ii)].[9]

(h) Besides the above specific situations where State legislation compulsorily needs Central assent for its validity, there is Art. 200 which makes a general provision enabling the State Governor to reserve a Bill passed by the State Legislature for Presidential consideration and assent.[10]

The implications of this provision appear to be that the Governor may also reserve a Bill, in situations other than those mentioned above, but it is not clear in what situations and circumstances the Governor may do so. No norms have been laid down in the Constitution as to when the Governor can exercise this power, or when the President can refuse to give his assent to a State Bill. On its face, it appears to give a blank cheque to the Governor and, as already discussed, he would exercise this power in his discretion.[11]

It needs to be said that the Governor should exercise his discretionary power to reserve a Bill for President's assent not liberally but exceptionally, i.e., only in rare and exceptional cases. The reason for taking this view is that if the Governor interprets his power too liberally, it will result in too many State Bills being reserved for the Centre's assent and this will jeopardise the system of parliamentary democrary in the State.

Some of the situations when the Governor may be justified in reserving a State Bill are :

(i) when the State Bill suffers from patent unconstitutionality;
(ii) when the State Bill derogates from the scheme and framework of the Constitution so as to endanger the soveregnty, unity and integrity of the country;
(iii) when the State Bill ex facie comes in conflict with a Central law;
(iv) when the legitimate interests of another State or its people are being adversely affected.

Mere policy differences between the Governor and the State Government do not justify reservation of the State Bills by the Governor for President's assent. It may also be stated that unconstitutionality can arise in several situations, e.g., the State Legislature may exceed its legislative competence which may happen when the Bill in question relates to a matter in List I and not to List II or List III; when

---

7. For Art. 255, See, footnote 18, infra.
8. Supra, Sec. H.
9. Infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. F.
10. Supra, Chs. VI, Sec. F(i); Ch. VII, Sec. C.
11. Ibid.

the Bill infringes a Fundamental Right or it infringes some other constitutional provision or limitation.[12]

It may also be noted that Arts. 200 and 201[13] provide the necessary mechanism for making operational the various constitutional provisions, noted above, which require certain types of State Bills to be reserved for the President's consideration and assent.[14]

There is the corresponding question that once the State Bill is referred to the President under Art. 200, what are the considerations which the Central Government applies to examine the Bill. The formal powers of the President are laid down in this connection in Art. 201, but what tests should the Central Government apply to assess the State law is not laid down in Art. 201. Prima facie, Art. 201 confers an unrestricted power on the Central Government to examine the reserved State laws. The Central Executive is entitled to examine the State law from all angles, such as, whether or not it is in conformity with the Constitution, or the Central policies; whether it is inconsistent with any Central law etc.

A few illustrations to show the practical working of these provisions may be noted here. Punjab passed the Temporary Tax Bill levying a surcharge of 1 per cent on sales tax and an increased passenger and freight tax. The Centre refused its assent to the Bill as its effect was to levy 8 per cent tax on luxury goods as against the ceiling of 7 per cent fixed by the Chief Ministers' Conference. Another objection was that the Bill levied a tax of 3 per cent on goods declared essential on which only a 2 per cent sales tax was permissible under the Central Sales Tax Act, 1956. The Centre also sought an assurance from Punjab that it would share the enhanced revenue from the passenger tax with the Union Territory of Himachal Pradesh. The Centre signified its assent to the Bill when all these lacunae were removed.

In 1961, the Centre refused to assent to the Madhya Pradesh Panchayat Raj Bill, 1960, because it provided for nominated village panchayats to be set up for a year, and the Centre took the view that the system of nominations was a negation of the concept of panchayats.

The most typical case in this area is In re Kerala Education Bill.[15] The Kerala Legislature passed a Bill in 1957 to provide for the better organisation and development of educational institutions in the State. Its provisions raised a bitter public controversy in the State. The Governor reserved the Bill under Art. 200 for consideration of the President who sought the advisory opinion of the Supreme Court under Art. 143.[16] The Supreme Court held that some of the provisions of the Bill offended Art. 30(1), pertaining to the right of minorities to establish and administer educational institutions.[17] The President returned the Bill to the State for necessary amendments therein in the light of the Supreme Court's opinion. It is clear that the Centre sought the advice of the Supreme Court so as to keep it-

---

12. On Fundamental Rights, see, Chs. XX—XXXIII, infra.

13. According to Art. 201, when a Bill is reserved for the President's consideration, the President may assent or withhold his assent therefrom.
See, Ch. VI, Sec. F(i) and Ch. VII, Sec. C, supra.

14. See, STUDY TEAM, ADMINISTRATIVE REFORMS COMM., REPORT ON CENTRE-STATE RELATIONSHIP, I, 277; Report of the Sarkaria Comm., Ch. V, 143-159.

15. AIR 1958 SC 956 : 1959 SCR 995; supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F(c).

16. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C.

17. Infra, Ch. XXX, Sec. B.

self above the accusation of partisan politics as the Central and State Governments belonged to different political parties.

According to Art. 255, no Act of Parliament or of a State Legislature is to be invalid by reason only that the recommendation or previous sanction of the President required by the Constitution was not given, if assent is given to it by the President subsequently.[18] An interesting case in the area is Jawaharmal v. State of Rajasthan.[19] Rajasthan enacted a law levying a tax. The law needed Presidential assent but it was not secured. Later Rajasthan enacted another law declaring that the earlier law would not be deemed to be invalid by reason of the fact that Presidential assent had not been secured. This later law secured Presidential assent. The Supreme Court held that it could not cure the infirmity of the earlier law. That infirmity could be cured only by Presidential assent and not by any legislative fiat. Even the Presidential assent to the later law cannot cure the defect of the earlier law.

From the above discussion, it is clear that even in the sphere allotted to the States, the Centre exercises appreciable control over their legislation. Every year a large number of State Bills come to the Centre for assent under various provisions of the Constitution mentioned above. According to the Report of the Sarkaria Commission, during the period from 1977 to 1985, 1130 State Bills were reserved for the consideration of the President. Most of these originate under Art. 254(2) so as to validate an inconsistency between a State law and a Central law in the Concurrent List. The President assented to most of these bills; the assent was withheld only in 31 cases.[20] The norms on which the Centre acts in exercising its powers are not clear. However, on the whole, it appears that the Centre is circumspect in exercising its controlling powers over the State legislation. It is only in a very few cases that Presidential assent is refused to State laws. Some of the grounds on which such assent has been refused are: there was already a Central law in existence (in the Concurrent List); the matter lies within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Centre; the Centre is contemplating action itself; exclusion of Union property from State taxation; non-conformity with the policies of the Central Government; unconstitutionality; lack of procedural sagefuards etc.[21]

Commenting on the constitutional scheme of reserving State laws for the President's assent, the Sarkaria Commission has stated that it is "intended to subserve the broad purpose of co-operative federalism in the realm of Union-State legislative relations"; it is "designed to make our system strong, viable, effective and responsive to the challenges of a changing social order;" it is a necessary means and tool for evolving cohesive, integrated policies on basic issues of national significance. But, for the system to be effective, it is necessary that it is used sparingly and only in proper cases.

It may also be appreciated that the constitutional provisions regarding Central control over State legislation existing in India do undoubtedly detract to some extent from State autonomy. There is also inherent in these provisions a seed of

---

18. If the previous sanction needed is that of the Governor, the Act will not be invalid if it has been subsequently assented to by the Governor or the President.

19. AIR 1966 SC 764 : (1966) 1 SCR 890.
For a comment on the case, see, 8 JILI, 637.

20. REPORT, 152.

21. S.N. JAIN, Freedom of Trade & Commerce X J.I.L.I., 558-61 (1968); Alice Jacob, Presidential Assent to State Bills—A Case Study, XII, J.I.L.I. 151 (1970).

Centre-State conflict, for with various political parties in office, there may be a difference of policies amongst the various governments. A party controlling a State may pass a Bill within its competence to effectuate its political and economic ideologies and the political party in control at the Centre may not approve of the approach of the State Government. Thus, a deadlock may ensue between the Centre and the State concerned which can be broken only by a process of discussion and compromise between the two, as the Constitution prescribes no method to override a Central veto over State legislation where Central assent is necessary for effectuation of the State law.

However, the Central control over State legislation is justified in some situations. There are considerations of uniformity of law and uniformity of approach in certain basic matters. If, for instance, a State Government were to embark on a large scale indiscriminate nationalisation, its impact may be felt not merely within the State, but the national economic interests as a whole may be affected; it may drive away foreign investors from the country and so the Cente may not remain a passive spectator for long. Then there are cases of State laws prevailing against Central laws in the Concurrent sphere. This is a matter which the Centre can decide keeping in view the considerations of uniformity as against local exigencies. Centre's assent in certain cases confers an immunity on the State laws from being challenged under the Fundamental Rights.[22] This matter raises questions of individual rights as against social control. On the whole, however, if past practice is any guide, the Centre is wary of controlling State legislation unless it is demonstrably against national interests, or is unconstitutional, or is against well established national policies, and, perhaps, mere difference of approach is not the determining factor.

In the U.S.A. and Australia, the Centre exercises no control over the State legislation. In Canada, however, the Lt. Governor of a Province may reserve a Provincial Bill for the consideration of the Governor-General, a provision analogous to Art. 200 in India. Also, the Centre in Canada has power to disallow a Provincial law (after it has been assented to by the Lt.Governor and has thus come into operation) within a year of its enactment. Intervention through disallowance or reservation is exceptional. The whole trend in Canada has been towards lessening use of this power and that from the very beginning it has been recognised that the power should be used with circumspection and according to some principles. Legally, however, there are no limitations on the use of the device of reservation or disallowance in Canada. There is no power in the Central Government in India to disallow a State Act after it has come into operation as there is in Canada.

L. DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS IN OTHER FEDERATIONS

(i) CANADA

The scheme of distribution of powers in Canada between the Centre and the Provinces makes a threefold enumeration of powers.[23]

---

22. See, Supra.

23. BORA LASKIN, CANADIAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 202-900 (1975). Also see, D.J. Smiley, The Canadian Political Nationality, (1967) : G. Hawkins (ed.), Concepts of Federalism, (1965); Reports of the Rowell-Sirois Commission.

The Centre is empowered by S. 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, to make laws for the 'peace, order, and good government of Canada with respect to subjects not exclusively assigned to the Provinces'; but 'for greater certainty', and not 'so as to restrict the generality' of the foregoing provision, 30 specific heads of powers have been mentioned in the section itself; it is further laid down that whatever falls within this enumeration cannot be regarded as coming within the subjects falling in the Provincial List. Some of these heads are: defence, postal service, currency and coinage, taxation, criminal law, regulation of trade and commerce, unemployment insurance. S. 92 empowers the Provinces to legislate exclusively with respect to sixteen subjects. One of the heads in the Provincial list is 'property and civil rights'. 'Education' is an exclusive Provincial matter. Under s. 95, 'Agriculture' and 'immigration' are concurrent subjects with supremacy in favour of the Centre in case of conflict between a Central and a Provincial law. S. 94A makes 'Old age pension' a concurrent subject, but, curiously enough, in this area the supremacy lies with the Provinces and the Central law is subject to the Provincial law.

The British North America Act was intended to establish a strong Centre, but the constitutional developments in the country belied the hopes of the makers of the BNA Act. The growth of the Canadian Federation has been too much influenced by the existence of bi-racialism and bi-linguism in the country. The English-speaking people, in a majority in the country, want a strong Centre. On the other hand, the French-speaking minority, concentrated in the Province of Quebec, have always desired a weak Centre and strong Provinces so that their language and culture may be preserved. The framers devised the scheme in such a way as to leave matters of a local nature to the Provinces and to transfer matters of 'general' or 'national' concern to the Centre and thus given primacy to it. Literally, Section 91 is so designed as to make the general power—power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada—as the main grant and to make the enumerations therein as the 'illustrations' of the general grant.

This view was substantially upheld by the Privy Council in Russell v. The Queen,[24] where it was held that all federal laws would be valid if they dealt with national or general aspects of any subject-matter even though that subject-matter in its local aspect might appear to come within S. 92. Had this view been applied consistently, the Centre in Canada would have become extremely powerful. But, in course of time, the Privy Council which acted for long as the highest and ultimate interpretative judicial organ from Canada, being influenced with the aspirations of the French minority so interpreted the scheme of distribution of powers as to shift the balance of power in favour of the Provinces at the cost of the Centre. The Central power became confined to the subject matters enumerated in S. 91. The efficacy of the 'general' power was very much diluted as a peace-time power and came to be used by the Centre only in cases of emergency like war and not in normal times.[25] This happened because the exercise of general power

24. 7 A.C. 829.

25. See on this point, Bora Laskin, Peace, Order and Good Government Re-examined, 25 Can. B.R. 1054 (1947); also his note in 35 Can. B.R., 101; Scott, Centralisation And Decentralisation, 29 Can B.R., 1095 (1951): SCOTT, French Canada and Canadian Federalism in EVOLVING CANADIAN FEDERALISM, 54-61; Smiley, The Two Themes of Canadian Federalism, 31 Can. JI. of Eco. & Pol. Sc. 80. Cf. L.P. Pigeon, The Meaning of Provincial Autonomy, 29 Can. B.R. 1126 (1951).

invariably came in conflict with the Provincial power on 'property and civil rights,' and the Privy Council instead of interpreting the latter narrowly, interpreted the Dominion's power narrowly.

Not only this, the Provincial power over "property and civil rights" was interpreted by the Privy Council so broadly as to affect adversely some of the Centre's enumerated powers in s. 91, e.g., the scope of trade and commerce power has been very much curtailed. While the general rule is that in case of conflict between the Dominion's enumerated power in Sec. 91 and the Provincial head in S. 92, the Dominion's power prevails, yet the conflict between 'trade and commerce' and 'property and civil rights' has been an exception to this rule as in such a case the judicial view has invariably leaned in favour of the latter.

The Privy Council took the view that, if taken literally the phrase "trade and commerce" would extend over the whole range of economic life but that such a construction would ignore and render meaningless the Provincial power over property and civil rights.[26] Thus, by excluding "property and civil rights" from "trade and commerce", and interpreting 'property and civil rights' broadly, much of the Dominion Government's power has been neutralized.

This judicial approach can be illustrated by reference to a few decided cases. In 1937 in the Weekly Rest case,[27] the Privy Council held that legislation regarding labour fell under the Provincial power over 'property and civil rights' and that the general power could be used only under 'abnormal' or 'exceptional circumstances'. In peace time, therefore, the 'residue' came to belong to the Provinces instead of the Dominion. 'Property and civil rights' being a term of very general nature comprised so much that little was left as a 'residue' in the peace time.[28]

The Centre has been denied power to regulate the supply and price of necessities of life.[29] In Att. Gen. for British Columbia v. Att. Gen. for Canada,[30] while invalidating the Central agricultural marketing legislation, the Privy Council declared that 'regulation of trade and commerce does not permit the regulation of individual forms of trade or commerce confined to the Province'. In the words of Bora Laskin, "The story of the trade and commerce power ..... is ..... the saddest legacy of Privy Council adjudication."[31] This is the position in normal times. The position however changes in favour of the Dominion in an emergency when 'property and civil rights' is restrictively interpreted; and, consequently, the 'general power' is broadly interpreted.[32] In war-time the general power becomes very potent and the Dominion Parliament can enact many socio-economic laws which it cannot do during peace-time.[33]

---

26. Bank of Toronto v. Lamb, (1887) 12 A.C. 575.
27. Att. Gen. for Canada v. Att. Gen. for Ontario, 1937 A.C. 326.
28. Snider's case, 1925 A.C. 396; MacDonald, Constitution in the Changing World, 1948 Can, B.R. 2; Canadian Federation of Agriculture v. Att. Gen. of Quebec, 1951 A.C. 179.
29. In Re Board of Commerce Act, 1919, 1922 AC 191.
30. 1937 A.C. 377.
31. Also see, Citizens Insurance v. Parsons, 7 A.C. 96; Att. Gen. for Ontario v. Att. Gen. for Canada, [1896] A.C. 348; In Re Dairy Industry Act (1950), [1951] A.C. 179.
32. An application of the emergency doctrine is to be found in the Anti-Inflation Reference (1976) 52. SCR 373. The Anti-Inflation Act was justified on the basis of economic crisis in Canada.
33. Fort Frances Pulp & Paper Co. v. Manitoba Free Press, [1923] A.C. 695.

A limited interpretation has been given to the Centre's spending power. It has been held that spending accompanied by a regulatory scheme would be classified by reference to the latter. In the instant case, the Act was held invalid.[34]

With the disappearance of the Privy Council's jurisdiction over Canada, and the emergence of the Canadian Supreme Court as the final Court of appeal, some judicial efforts have been made to restore the balance in favour of the Centre by reclaiming to some extent the 'general power' as well as the 'trade and commerce' power and to restrict the scope of the Provincial power on 'property and civil rights'.[35]

The Central Government in Canada faces a great difficulty in the area of foreign relations. Under S. 132 of the B.N.A. Act, the Canadian Parliament has 'necessary and proper' power to perform the obligations of Canada, 'as a part of the British Empire', towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the Empire and such foreign countries. In 1876, when the B.N.A. Act was passed, Canada was a British colony with no international status of its own and so S. 132 was sufficient to meet its needs. If Canada enters into a treaty as a part of the British Empire, it can implement it irrespective of the scheme of distribution of powers. But, today, Canada enters into treaties as a sovereign country, and not as a part of the British Empire, and to these treaties S. 132 does not apply. Such treaties can be implemented by Parliament to the extent it is possible to do so within the limits of the subjects assigned to it under S. 91. It cannot encroach upon the Provincial field.[36] If a treaty concerns a matter falling in the provincial sphere, then comparable legislation by the various Provinces may be needed to implement the treaty, and this, at times, may prove to be very difficult. The power of the Central Government is thus very much circumscribed in the international field.[37]

The development of Canadian Federalism has been in striking contrast with that of the American Federalism. In the U.S.A., the Centre designed to have limited powers has grown into a colossus. On the other hand, in Canada, the Centre designed to be strong has turned out to be restricted in dealing with the socio-economic problems of a fast developing economy.

---

34. Re Employment and Social Insurance Act (1937), [1937] A.C. 355.

35. See, for example, Johannesson v. West St. Paul (1952) 1 S.C.R. 292; Munro v. National Capital Commission, (1966) S.C.R. 663; A.G. for Manitoba v. Manitoba Egg & Poultry Association (1971) SCR 689; Bora Laskin, Canadian Constitutional Cases, 122-130 (1975).

36. Att. Gen. for Canada. v. Att. Gen. for Ontario, 1937 AC 326.
According to this judgment, a distinction has to be drawn between the "legislative powers given to the Dominion to perfom obligations imposed upon Canada as part of the empire by an Imperial executive responsible to and controlled by the.. Imperial Parliament, and the legislative power of the Dominion to perform obligations created by the Dominion executive responsible to and controlled by the Dominion Parliament." These latter obligations are not obligations of Canada as part of the British Empire, but of Canada by virtue of her new status as an international person, and do not arise under a treaty between the British Empire and foreign countries." Consequently, they are not covered by S. 132 as given above.

37. Szablowski, Creation and Implementation of Treaties in Canada, 1956 Can. B.R. 28; Hendry, Treaties and Federal Constitutions; Scott, Centralisation and Decentralisation in Canadian Federalism, 1951 Can B.R. 1095; Nettl, 'The Treaty Enforcement Power in Federal Constitutions, 1950 Can B.R. 1051; Matas, Treaty making power in Canada, 1947 Can B.R. 458; McWhinney, Comparative Federalism, 43(1962); Laskin, Some International Legal Aspects of Federalism; The Experience of Canada in Currie (ed.), Federalism and the New Nations of Africa, 389 (1964).

Comparing the Indian and Canadian schemes of distribution of powers, a number of resemblances and contrasts are found to exist. The Centre in Canada has an exclusive field enumerated in S. 91 of the B.N.A. Act. So has the Centre in India although the Union List is more elaborate and detailed than its Canadian counterpart. The Canadian Provinces have an exclusive field. So have the States in India though here again the State List is more detailed. In Canada, there is a small concurrent field consisting of three subjects only; the Concurrent area in India is, however, much larger. In both countries, the residuary belongs to the Centre, but there is not much left by way of residuary in Canada because of the judicial interpretation of the Provincial 'property and civil rights' clause in peace-time.

The emergency view of the Centre's 'general power' in Canada can be compared with the 'emergency' provisions of the Indian Constitution. In Canada, during an emergency, the Centre's general power becomes much more meaningful due to a restrictive interpretation put on the Provincial power over 'property and civil rights'.[38] How much scope the general power would have during an emergency is, however, a matter for the Courts to determine as and when controversies are presented to them for adjudication. In India, on the other hand, when an emergency is declared, the Cenrre becomes entitled to legislate with respect to any matter in the State List. Another very important point of contrast between the two countries is that while the Centre in India has a comprehensive power to give effect to a treaty, and it may legislate even though the subject-matter falls within the State List,[39] in Canada the Centre is restricted to some extent in this area.

(ii) U.S.A.

In the U.S.A., the federation came into existence as a result of the voluntary compact between 13 sovereign States. These States surrendered a part of their sovereign powers to a federal entity and retained with themselves the unsurrendered residue.

The Constitution of the United States of America was brought into being in 1787. It is, therefore, the oldest and the most respected member of the family of modern federal constitutions and is regarded as a precursor of the modern federalism. Experiences derived from its working have profoundly influenced the growth of federalism elsewhere.

The U.S. Constitution adopts a very simple method for Centre-State distribution of powers. It has only one List specifically enumerating the powers of the Centre. A few enumerated and specified powers have thus been allocated to the Centre, and the unenumerated residue of powers have been left to the States.

The powers entrusted to the Federal Government are thus specific and fall under eighteen heads but Central powers have expanded a great deal over time through judicial creativity and activism so much so that, in the words of U.S. Supreme Court as early as 1920, "it is not lightly to be assumed that in matters requiring national action, a power which must belong to and somewhere reside in 38. Fort Frances Pulp and Power Co. v. Manitoba Free Press Co., 1923 A.C. 695. Also, Murphy, The War Power of the Dominion, 30 Can. B.R., 791 (1952).

---

39. Supra, Sec. D(c).

every civilized government is not to be found".[40] Moreover, "even constitutional power may be established by usage".[41] The Congress is given power to make all laws which may be 'necessary and proper' to give effect to its enumerated powers.

The Centre may enter into treaties with foreign countries, which on being confirmed by 2/3rds of the senators present, are placed in the same category as an Act of Congress and override State legislation. A self-executing treaty becomes operative automatically when approved by the Senate, but a non-self-executing treaty can be effectuated only by passing a law. A treaty is self-executing if its framers intended to prescribe a rule which, standing alone, would be enforceable in the Courts.[42] Under its treaty making power, the Centre has full control over foreign affairs and is authorised to give effect to a treaty entered into by it with a foreign country irrespective of the Centre-State division of functions. In an early case[43], the Supreme Court declared : "It is the declared will of the people of the United States that every treaty made by the authority of the United States shall be superior to the constitution and laws of any individual State, and their will alone is to decide'. 'If this were not so', said the Court, 'The will of a small part of the United States may control or defeat the will of the whole." The Supreme Court has even asserted that the Central Government's power over external affairs does not depend upon the affirmative grant of power in the Constitution but is a necessary concomitant of nationality. Without an extensive foregin affairs power, the U.S.A. would not have gained primacy in international sphere.[44]

Most of the powers granted to the Centre are couched in very general language. A liberal interpretation of these powers has made the Centre very powerful, and has helped in the transformation of an agricultural country into the modern industrial giant of today. The commerce power has become the source of the Centre's extensive power to regulate the economic life of the country, to deal with national economic problems, to prevent or restrict disfavoured local activities like gambling, prostitution, etc., and to restrict the States from interfering with the flow of trade and traffic over State boundaries.[45] The commerce power has been interpreted so as to cover almost every aspect of national economy including production as well as distributive activities. Had this not been so, big

---

40. Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416, 433 (1920).

41. Inland Waterways Corp. v. Young, 309 US 517 (1940).
See, for a discussion on the Congress's powers, CORWIN, THE CONSTITUION : WHAT IT MEANS TO-DAY, 32-93.

42. Looper, Limitations on the Treaty Power in the Federal States, 34 N.Y.U.L.R., 1045, 1055: McLaughlin, The Scope of the Treaty Power, 43 Minnesota L.R., 651 (1959): Sutherland, Restricting the Treaty Power, 65 Harv. L.R. 1305 (1952); Heuenstein v. Lynham, 100 U.S. 483.

43. Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. 199.

44. Missouri v. Holland, 262 U.S. 416; U.S. v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, 299 U.S. 304 (1936); Perez v. Brownell, 356 U.S. 44 (1958): Zschering v. Miller, 389 C.S. 429 (1968).

45. N.L.R.B. v. Jones, 301 U.S. 1: U.S. v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100; Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111: N.L.R.B. v. Denver Building & Construction Trades Council, 341 U.S. 675. Stern, The Scope of the Phrase Inter-State Commerce, Selected Essays in Constutional Law, 298 (1963).
Marphy J. said in American Power & Light Co. v. Securities & Exchange Comm., 329 U.S. 60, 104: "The federal commerce power is as broad as the economic needs of the nation."

corporations having operations throughout the country could not have grown and the country could not have industrialized itself in such a phenomenal manner.[46]

Responsibility for defence lies solely on the Centre and its war power is interpreted very broadly during the war crisis. The war power "staggers the imagination by its scope and variety", and "in short, what is necessary to win the war Congress may do."[47] The War power includes not only power to wage war but also power to prevent it as well as to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress.[48]

The Supreme Court has developed the doctrine of "incidental and ancillary powers." The 'necessary and proper' clause has also been liberally interpreted so as to confer a greater dimension to its enumerated powers. Under this power, the Courts have sustained means chosen by Congress which, although not themselves within the granted power', are 'nevertheless deemed appropriate aids to the accomplishment of some purpose within an admitted power of the national government.'[49] Thus, the Congress enjoys a good deal of discretion to decide what means need be adopted to achieve the purposes implicit in its powers. Justice STONE, speaking for the Supreme Court, asserted that Congress's powers under the necessary and proper clause are no more limited by the reserved powers of the States than are its necessary powers.[50] The "necessary and proper" clause which is known as the "co-efficient clause" furnishes each of the "enumerated" powers of Congress with its second dimension, so to speak.[51]

Under its taxing power, the Centre has been enabled to raise vast sums of revenue in peace as well as in war.[52] And, the taxing power has been used not only to raise money but also for regulatory purpose.[53] Its power to spend for general welfare has been interpreted broadly so as to enable the Centre to spend money not only for an activity falling within its constitutional ambit, but even for a purpose which falls under the States' jurisdiction. Congress can spend money on any activity which it identifies as a matter of 'general' welfare.[54]

Congress has come to exercise enormous power with the acquiescence of the Supreme Court. Over time, the Centre has grown into a colossus and has dwarfed the States. Though the States still remain important administrative units performing many useful functions—education, public health, highways, law and order, are some of the activities in the large miscellany of the State functions in the modern times—yet the fact remains that their relative constitutional position

---

46. "The Commerce clause forms the keystone of the arch on which the commercial prosperity of the nation is made to rest." M. RAMASWAMY, THE COMMERCE CLAUSE IN THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, 7.

47. CUSHMAN, CASES IN CONST. LAW, 463 (1968).

48. Yakus v. U.S., 321 U.S. 414: Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U.S. 503: Woods v. Miller, 333 U.S. 138; Corwin, Total War and the Constitution (1947).

49. U.S. v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316; U.S. v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 643.

50. U.S. v. Darby, supra.

51. CORWIN, supra, 33 (1973).

52. Infra, next Chapter.

53. Robert Cushman, The National Police Power under the taxing clause of the Constitution, 4 Minn. L Rev., 247, and Social and Economic Control through Federal Taxation, 18 Minn, L.R., 759; Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238; U.S. v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22.

54. U.S. v. Butler, 291 U.S.I; Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548; Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 619; Cleveland v. U.S., 323 US 329; see, M.P. Jain, Federal Grants-in-Aid in the U.S.A., 1946 Vyavahara Nirnaya, 245: infra, next Chapter.

is inferior to the Central Government whose primacy is an established fact. New areas of national concern have been emerging. National policies have been extending into new fields which were once the preserve of the States. The fact remains that in the U.S.A. which was once regarded as the home of classical federalism, strong centripetal tendencies have emerged in course of time and today the functional reality does not accord with the classical federal theory. In the U.S.A., there has been a continuous expansion of the functions of the Central Government and this has completely altered the federal balance of powers in favour of the Central Government. Correspondingly the residual powers of the State Governments have been attenuated. This transformation has been achieved without any amendment of the Constitution. In this process, the Supreme Court has played a crucial role. Much of the constitutional transformation has taken place through judicial activism. By the process of liberal interpretation of the Constitution, the Court has expanded the scope of many heads of power to cover a variety of legislative fields.

Comparing the scheme of distribution of powers in the U.S.A. with that in India, we find that in America there is only one List while there are three Lists in India. In America only the exclusive powers of the Centre are defined; there is no concurrent field and the residue vests with the States. In India, the exclusive powers of the Centre as well as of the States are defined: there is a large concurrent area and the residue vests in the Centre and not the States. Functions assigned to the Centre in India are much more numerous and broader in ambit than those assigned to the Centre in the U.S.A.

Defence and external affairs are Central subjects in both the countries but the Centre's external affairs power appears to be broader in India than in the U.S.A., for whereas in India it extends to treaty obligations as well as to non-obligatory international conferences,[55] in the U.S.A. it extends only to treaty obligations. All treaties in India need legislation for implementation as, unlike the U.S.A., there is no concept of self-executing treaties. In both places, the Centre is not hindered by the distribution of powers in the implementation of its treaty obligations. The Supreme Court in the U.S.A. has helped in the growth of the Centre as a powerful entity; in India, the Centre has been conceded a powerful status by the Constitution itself which is more pervasive than that of the Centre in the U.S.A.[56] The Supreme Court has further expanded the Centre's powers by its creative interpretation.[57]

(iii) AUSTRALIA

The Commonwealth of Australia joined the family of federations in 1900 when the British Parliament enacted the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act. It follows the American model to the extent of giving only specific powers to the Centre but, in effect, there are some interesting differences between Australia and America in the scheme of distribution of powers between the Centre and the States.

---

55. Supra, sec. D.
56. See CORWIN, THE CONSTITUTION AND WHAT IT MEANS TO-DAY, 38-124(1978); GUNTHER, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW: CASES & MATERIALS 81-372 (1975).
57. On Constitutional Interpretation, see, Ch. XL, infra.

Section 51 of the Commonwealth Act enumerates 40 heads with respect to which the Central Parliament has power to legislate. S. 51 does not make the power of the Centre exclusive and the States are also authorised to legislate in this area concurrently. But some heads either by their nature, or by virtue of other constitutional provisions, are such that only the Central Parliament can make laws with respect to them, as for example, borrowing money on the public credit of the Commonwealth, defence, external affairs, etc. Besides, a few exclusive powers have also been assigned to the Centre.[58] All the rest of the functions, lying beyond the concurrent and the Centre's exclusive fields, fall within the exclusive State jurisdiction. The States thus have to look after such functions as education, health, roads, railways and other various developmental activities.[59] In case of an inconsistency between a Central law and a State law, the Central law prevails and the State law is invalid to the extent of inconsistency.

Though the powers of the Centre are defined and specific, yet they have been couched in such terms as have, on the whole, proved to be capable of expansion by judicial interpretation. The High Court has persistently read Commonwealth powers liberally and generously. The defence power has been interpreted in such a way as to enable the Centre to regulate practically all aspects of people's life during war-time with a view to military preparedness of the nation. This power has been used to support regulation of substantial areas of the national economy to enable a smooth transition from war to peace or in preparation for war.[60] It has been stated by an authority that the defence power in Australia is "so simply and largely conferred that in time of war the Parliament could itself make any laws whatever, unless they could be plainly shown to have no possible bearing on the military preparedness of the nation".[61]

The Centre has full control over external affairs: it can make a law to give effect to a treaty even if its subject-matter falls under the States' jurisdiction.[62] This is potentially important because of the rapid expansion in the scope of international agreements. By signing such an agreement, the Centre can acquire many powers which it may lack otherwise.

The Centre has found in its powers on 'inter-state commerce' and 'arbitration of industrial disputes' a great potential capacity to regulate economic affairs in the country because progressively trade and commerce is becoming more national in character and less confined within the limits of any one State.[63]

---

58. These powers are: (a) the seat of the Central Government (S. 92): (b) places acquired by the Centre for public purposes (S. 52); (c) territory surrendered to the Commonwealth by any State (Ss. 122 and 111); (d) the public services of the Centre (S. 52); (e) duties of customs and excise (S. 90 with S. 52(iii);) (f) naval and military forces (S. 52 and S. 114); (g) bounties in the production or export of goods (Ss. 90 and 91); (h) coinage of money or legal tender (Ss. 51 and 115).

59. SAWER, AUSTRALIAN CONSTITUTIONAL Cases (1982).

60. Farey v. Burvett, 21 CLR 433; Marcus Clark & Co. v. Commonwealth, 87 CLR 177; King v. Foster, 79 CLR 43; Bailey, Fifty Years of Australian Constitution, 25 ALJ 319; Australian Communist Party v. Commonwealth, 83 CLR 1; Cower, 33 JI. Comp. Leg., 83; Else-Mitchell, Essays on the Australian Constitution, 157-191 (1961); COLIN HOWARD, AUSTRALIAN FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 422-441 (1972).

61. K.H. BAILEY, STUDIES IN THE AUSTRALIAN CONSTITUTION, 32 (ed. Portus).

62. R. v. Burgess, ex parte Henry, 55 CLR 608; Airlines of N.S.W. v. State of N.S.W., 113 CLR 54 (1965); New South Wales v. Commonwealth, 135 C.L.R. 337; ELSE-MITCHELL, op. cit., 374; COLIN HOWARD, op. cit., 441-457.

63. Australian National Airways v. The Commonwealth, 71 CLR 29.

The extent of the spending power of the Centre is broad. It is not definitely established yet the Centre can spend for any purpose it likes. In the Pharmaceutical Act case,[64] Commonwealth appropriations for granting pharmaceutical benefits were held invalid suggesting that, unlike the U.S., the Australian Central Government does not have general power to spend its funds on such social services as it pleases. The decision also suggested that a spending scheme connected with public health and having extensive coercive regulation as incidental to the spending is to be treated as a law about public health, and so beyond the Central power. This decision led to amending the Constitution so as to enable the Centre to provide a number of welfare services. However, in Victoria v. Commonwealth & Hayden[65] by a majority, the High Court has sustained the liberal view of the spending power and has ruled that Parliament can appropriate money for such purposes as it may determine.

In spite of the expansion over time in the powers of the Centre, there is a feeling that it lacks adequate power to deal with peace-time socio-economic problems facing the country and efforts made to amend the Constitution to rectify the lacunae therein have not succeded because of an extremely rigid process to amend the Constitution.[66]

There are several interesting points of comparison and contrast between the Australian and Indian schemes of distribution of powers. Both in Australia and India, certain powers have been assigned exclusively to the Centre, though, in India, the enumeration of powers in the Union List is much more exhaustive and much larger than in Australia. Both countries have Concurrent Lists with primacy being vested in the Centre, though in India, unlike Australia, it is possible to keep alive a State law inconsistent with the Central law while there is no such provision in Australia. In Australia, the powers of the States are unenumerated and undefined. In India, it is not so; the powers of the States are enumerated and defined as contained in the State and the Concurrent Lists. In India, the residue vests in the Centre; in Australia, the residue vests in the States. In both countries, the Centre has been clothed with a comprehensive defence power. The Centre's power over external affairs also is comprehensive and broad in both countries.

64. Att. Gen. (Vic.) v. Commonwealth, 71 CLR 237 (1945).
Also see, FAJGENBAUM & HANKS, AUSTRALIAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 629 (1980).

65. (1975) 134 CLR 338.

66. EVATT, POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION AND THE CONSTITUTION; CAMPBELL, POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION IN AUSTRALIA, 238-262.
In 1959, a Jt. Parliamentary Committee suggested some constitutional amendments but nothing came out of it.
For Constitutional Amendment, see, infra, Ch. XLI.

CHAPTER XI

FINANCIAL RELATIONS

SYNOPSIS

A. INTRODUCTORY

Intergovernmental financial relationship in a federation is a vital, or one may say, even a critical matter. It touches the very heart of modern federalism, as the way in which this relationship functions, affects the whole content and working of a federal polity. It is, however, an arduous exercise to create a viable scheme of intergovernmental financial relationship in a federal polity as federalism has its own special and peculiar problems. Finance is an essential pre-requisite of good government.[1]

There being in a federation two sets of governments having functions to discharge, it is essential for the effective working of each government that it be endowed with powers to raise financial resources of its own. This necessitates an apportionment of taxing powers between the Centre and the States. In a federation, therefore, along with division of functions there is also a division of taxing powers between the Central and the State Governments.

But the problems of ordering an inter-governmental financial relationship in a federation does not end with allocating taxing powers between the two levels of government. To enable a government to function effectively, it is not enough that it raises some money to carry on its functions, but what is necessary is that its financial resources match its needs, demands and responsibilities. A balance ought to exist between the financial resources of the government and its allotted responsibilities and functions. If a government is starved of resources necessary to carry out its assigned functions, then its powers and autonomy would be no more than a myth.

---

1. M.P. JAIN, Taxing Powers in Canada, 1955 Vyavahara Nirnaya, 125-167; M.P. JAIN, Federal Grants-in-Aid in the U.S.A., 1956 Vyavahara Nirnaya, 252; M.P. JAIN, Central-State Fiscal Relationship in India (1950-1967): A Study of an aspect of Indian Federalism, Jahrbuch des Offenlichen Rechts Der Gegenwart, 456-511 [Neue Folge/Band 16 (1968), ed., G. LEIBHOLZ, pub. J.C.B. MOHAIR (Tubingen)]; AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION, 217-234 (1966); ASOKA CHANDA, FEDERALISM IN INDIA, 134-259.

A sound federal system would, therefore, envisage that financial resources between the Centre and the States are allocated in such a way that there exists a balance, an equilibrium, between the functions and resources at each governmental level. Absence of balance in the function-resource equation at any governmental level is bound to lead to bad government and create tensions, strains and stresses within the federal polity, make it unstable, and jeopardise its smooth functioning.

A viable scheme of Centre-State financial relationship is the sine qua non for the proper functioning of a federal polity as a whole. But it is a very difficult objective to achieve because of inter alia economic disparities among the several States.

It is the universal experience of working of federations that no scheme of allocation of taxing powers results in creating a finance-function balance at each level. It is extremely difficult to create a balance between needs and resources at each level. Some sort of maladjustment always arises.

Usually, the Centre in spite of its own heavy commitments on defence and other services, does emerge with a much stronger financial capacity than the units which always find their resources inadequate to match their responsibilities. Therefore, it becomes necessary to devise expedients to transfer revenue from the Centre to the units so that a balance is created at that level between resources and responsibilities and they become effective instruments of government. A mosaic of intergovernmental financial relations thus arises in a federation.

The Indian Constitution incorporates a very elaborate scheme of Centre-State financial relations. In drawing this scheme, the framers of the Indian Constitution sought to adopt some of the techniques developed in other federations, but at the same time they tried to avoid some of the pitfalls and difficulties which had developed there. The two most conspicuous features of this scheme are: (i) a complete separation of Central-State taxing powers, and (ii) massive transfer of funds from the Centre to the States.

DOUBLE TAXATION

There is no rule against double taxation, as such, i.e. the same tax being levied twice on the same tax base either under the same name or under different names. If the legislature so wants it can enact necessary legislation for the purpose.[2] The Constitution has no provision prohibiting double taxation. As the Supreme Court has observed:[3]

> "There is nothing in Art. 265 of the Constitution[4] from which one can spin out the constitutional vice called double taxation."[5]

---

2. Jain Bros v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 778 : (1969) 3 SCC 311.
3. Avinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1979 SC 321 : (1979) 1 SCC 137.
4. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(b).
5. Also see, Radhakishan Rathi v. Addl. Collector, Durg, AIR 1995 SC 1540 : (1995) 4 SCC 309; Municipal Council, Kota v. Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co. Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 1060 : (2001) 3 SCC 654. See also Union of India v. Azadi Bachao Andolan, (2004) 10 SCC 1 : AIR 2004 SC 1107.
Reference may also be made in this connection to Art. 14 : Ch. XXI, infra.

B. ALLOCATION OF TAXING POWERS

Taxing powers are divided between the Centre and the States. The Constitution allots separate legislative heads of taxation to the Centre and the States. The taxes enumerated in the Union List [List I] are leviable by the Centre exclusively while those mentioned in the State List [List II] are leviable by the States exclusively. Not many tax entries are contained in the Concurrent List. This has been done to avoid problems of overlapping and multiple taxation between the Centre and the States.

The scheme of allocation of taxing powers between the Centre and the States is based on the broad principle that the taxes of a local nature have been allotted to the States while taxes which having a tax base extending over more than one State, or which should be levied on a uniform basis throughout the country and not vary from State to State, or which can be collected more conveniently by the Centre rather than the States have been allotted to the Centre. A beneficial result of adopting such a methodology of allocation of taxing powers has been to eliminate all problems of multiple and overlapping taxation which have arisen in an acute form in other federations because of concurrent taxing powers of the Centre and the States. This created manifold complications both for the tax-payer and the tax-collector.[6]

The rules which apply to the interpretation of the non-tax entries apply mutatis mutandis to the interpretation of the tax entries as well,[7] e.g., each entry is to be interpreted liberally; in case of any conflict between two or more entries, they should be reconciled; an entry includes all incidental and ancillary matters.

A tax entry, like a non-tax entry, has to be interpreted broadly and liberally.[8] Applying the principle of broad interpretation of the tax entries, it has been held that under a tax-entry, it is possible for a legislature to levy a tax not only prospectively but even retrospectively.[9] The rule of pith and substance is to be applied as and when it becomes necessary to find whether a law is with respect to a given entry. The same rule applies with respect to tax laws. What is relevant is not the consequences of the law on the subject-matter or whether it affects it, but whether, in its pith and substance, it is a law upon the subject-matter in question.[10] If the taxing power is within a particular legislative field, other fields in the legislative lists must be construed to exclude this field so that there is no possibility of legislative trespass.[11]

Since an entry includes all subsidiary or auxiliary matters, therefore, a legislature may make provisions for validating a law declared bad by the courts because of some infirmity, by enacting a validating law by removing the infirmity in question, and making the provisions of the earlier law effective from the date it

---

6. See, infra, Sec. E.
7. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G.
8. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(a).
9. Tata Iron & Steel Co. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1958 SC 452 : 1958 SCR 1355; Chhotabhai Jethabhai Patel v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1006 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 1; Jawaharmal v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1966 SC 764 : 1966 (1) SCR 890; Misri Lal Jain v. State of Orissa, AIR 1977 SC 1686 : (1977) 3 SCC 212.
10. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(d).
Also see, Southern Pharm. & Chem. v. State of Kerala, AIR 1981 SC 1863 : (1981) 4 SCC 391.
11. Godfrey Phillips India Ltd. v. State of U.P., (2005) 2 SCC 515 : AIR 2005 SC 1103.

was passed, and retain the collections made under the original law as being made under the validating law. The most important condition however is that the legislature must have the power to impose the tax, for, if it does not, the action must ever remain ineffective and illegal.[12]

Further, validation of a tax declared illegal may be done only by removing the grounds of illegality or invalidity.[13] However, the Legislature cannot reverse, disobey or disregard a court decision but can remove the basis on which the court decision was based.[14]

While levying a tax, it is competent to the legislature to devise a machinery for effective collection of the tax, to determine procedure for assessing the tax liability and devise and make necessary provisions for preventing its evasion.[15] A provision to seize and confiscate, and levy penalty in respect of, goods carried in a vehicle from one State to another, whether the goods are sold or not, is not incidental to the power to levy sales tax.[16]

When a challenge is made to the levy of a tax, its validity may have to be adjudged mainly by reference to the legislative competence or power to levy the same. In adjudging this issue, the nature and character of the tax has to be determined at the threshold. If the legislature has power to levy the tax, its motive in imposing the same are immaterial and irrelevant. The fact that a wrong reason for exercising the power has been given also would not derogate from the validity of the tax.

When the legislature possesses the competence to levy the tax, the limits of that competence cannot be adjudged further by the form or manner in which that power is exercised. It is not the nomenclature of the tax which is decisive of its nature for the purpose of adjudging its real character or nature to adjudge the competence of the power and authority to legislate or impose the levy. What really has to be seen is the 'pith and substance' or "the real nature and character" of the levy which has to be adjudged with reference to the taxable event and the incidence of the levy.[17] It cannot be argued that a tax under a particular entry must be levied in a particular manner. The legislature is free to adopt such method of levy as it chooses so long as the character of the levy falls within the four corners of the relevant entry.[18]

---

12. M.P. Cement Manufacturers Assocn. v. State of M.P., (2004) 2 SCC 249 : (2005) 11 JT 342.

13. Rai Ram Krishna v. State of Bihar, AIR 1963 SC 1967; Shri Prithvi Cotton Mills v. Broach Municipality, AIR 1970 SC 192 : (1969) 2 SCC 283; Janapada Sabha, Chhindwara v. C.P. Syndicate Ltd., AIR 1971 SC 57 : (1970) 1 SCC 509; Govt. of Andhra Pradesh v. H.M.T., AIR 1975 SC 2037 : (1975) 2 SCC 274; Hindustan Gum & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1985 SC 1683 : (1985) 4 SCC 124; Central Coal Fields v. State of Orissa, AIR 1992 SC 1371 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 133.

14. Ahmedabad Municipality v. New Shrock Spn. & Weav. Co., AIR 1970 SC 1292 : (1970) 2 SCC 280; State of Tamil Nadu v. M. Rayappa, AIR 1971 SC 231 : (1971) 3 SCC 1; Tirath Ram Rajendra Nath v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 405 : (1973) 3 SCC 585.

15. Orient Paper Mills v. State of Orissa, AIR 1961 SC 1438 : (1962) 1 SCR 549 ; Khyerbari Tea Co. v. State of Assam, AIR 1964 SC 925 : (1964) 5 SCR 975; Board of Revenue v. R.S. Jhaver, AIR 1968 SC 59 : (1968) 1 SCR 148.
Also see, infra.

16. C.P. Officer v. K.P. Abdulla, AIR 1971 SC 792 : (1970) 3 SCC 355.

17. Jullunder Rubber Goods Manufacture's Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1589 : (1969) 2 SCC 644; Goodyear India Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1990 SC 781 : (1990) 2 SCC 71; Municipal Council, Kota v. Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co. Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 1060.

18. Goodricke Group Ltd. v. State of West Bengal,, 1995 Supp. (1) SCC 707; Twyford Tea Co. v. State of Kerala,AIR 1970 SC 1133 : (1970) 1 SCC 189.

As the Supreme Court has observed in Ramakrishna:[19]

> "The objects to be taxed so long as they happen to be within the legislative competence of the legislature can be taxed by the legislature according to the exigencies of its needs… The quantum of tax levied by the taxing statute, the conditions subject to which it is levied, the manner in which it is sought to be recovered are all matters within the competence of the legislature…"

Once it is found that there is a nexus between the legislative competence and the subject of taxation, the levy will be justified and valid.[20]

The Constitution does not contain any prohibition against double taxation. A subject can be taxed twice over if the legislature evinces a clear intention to do so. There is nothing in Art. 265 from which one can spin out the constitutional vice called double taxation.[21]

VALIDATION OF AN INVALID TAX LEGISLATION

It has been mentioned earlier that if a law is declared invalid by the court, the concerned legislature, provided it has competence to enact the law, can remove the flaws in the law and revalidate it. The same is the position as regards a tax law as well. When a tax law is invalidated by the court, the legislature can, provided it has the competence to enact the law in question, remove the lacunae in the law as pointed by the court and revalidate the tax law. Courts cannot direct the State Legislature to amend the law nor to direct that such amendment shall not be retrospective. It is the exclusive prerogative of the State Legislatures, particularly in tax matters, to enact validation laws which may be directed to apply retrospectively.[22]

But what the legislature cannot do is to declare that in spite of the court verdict to the contrary, the law will be deemed to be valid. This amounts to overriding the court decision by the Legislature, and in consonance with the doctrine of Separation of Powers, a Legislature cannot directly nullify a court decision.

In Krishna,[23] the High Court specifically ruled that the power to levy under the law in question could be legal only if the concerned authority collecting the tax rendered services to the tax payers and as no services had been rendered, the collection of the tax was illegal. As this finding was not challenged, it became

---

19. Rai Ramakrishna v. State of Bihar, AIR 1963 SC 1667 : 1964 (1) SCR 897.

20. State of Karnataka v. Drive-in Enterprises, AIR 2001 SC 1328.

21. Avinder Singh v. State of Punajb, AIR 1979 SC 321 : (1979) 1 SCC 137; Sri Krishna Das v. Town Area Council, Chirgaon, AIR 1991 SC 2096 : (1990) 3 SCC 645; Radhakishan Rathi v. Addl. Collector, Durg, AIR 1995 SC 1540 : (1995) 4 SCC 309; Municipal Council, Kota v. D.C.M., AIR 2001 SC at 1070.

22. Municipal Committee, Patiala v. Model Town Residents Assn., (2007) 8 SCC 669, at page 683 : AIR 2007 SC 2844; See also National Agricultural Coop. Marketing Federation of India Ltd. v. Union of India, (2003) 5 SCC 23 : AIR 2003 SC 1329; Widia (India) Ltd. State of Karnataka, (2003) 8 SCC 22 : AIR 2003 SC 3095; State of H.P. v. Yash Pal Garg, (2003) 9 SCC 92 : (2003) 4 JT 413; Mycon Construction Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, (2003) 9 SCC 583 : AIR 2002 SC 2089; M.P. Cement Manufacturers' Assn. v. State of M.P., (2004) 2 SCC 249 : (2005) 11 JT 342; Gujarat Ambuja Cements Ltd v. Union of India (2005) 4 SCC 214 : AIR 2005 SC 3020*; R.C Tobacco (P) Ltd v. Union of India*, (2005) 7 SCC 725 : AIR 2005 SC 4203.

23. B. Krishna Bhat v. State of Karnataka, AIR 2001 SC 1885 : (2001) 4 SCC 227; Gujarat Ambuja Cements v. Union of India (2005) 4 SCC 214 : AIR 2005 SC 3020.

Also see, Hindustan Gum & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1985 SC 1683 : (1985) 4 SCC 124.

final. Thereafter, the Legislature passed an amending Act declaring that the tax would be deemed to be valid in spite of the verdict of the High Court. The Supreme Court ruled that the State Legislature could do no such thing. The Legislature had not cured the lacuna pointed out by the High Court. The Legislature had no power to reverse the ruling of the High Court. When the Legislature seeks to validate a tax law declared invalid by a court, the Legislature must remove the cause for its ineffectiveness or invalidity before its validation can take place effectively. It is not sufficient to declare that the court declaration would not be binding. A Legislature has no power to directly overrule a judicial decision.

C. CENTRAL TAXES

Entries 1 to 81 in this List confer general legislative powers on Parliament, while entries 82 to 92B enumerate the taxes which, Parliament is entitled to levy exclusively.

The tax entries mentioned in the Union List are as follows:

82. Taxes on income other than agricultural income

The power to levy income-tax is divided between the Centre and the States. The Centre can levy a tax on non-agricultural income, while tax on agricultural income is assigned to the States (entry 46, List II). Under Article 366(1), the expression "agricultural income", for the purpose of abovementioned entries, means agricultural income as defined for the purposes in enactments relating to Indian income tax. This mechanism has been devised to avoid a conflict with the legislative power of States in respect of agricultural income.[24] Income tax enactments in force from time to time can define the term "agricultural income" in any particular manner and that would be the meaning not only for the tax enactments but also for the Constitution. For example, in the case of income derived from sale of tea grown and manufactured by the seller, 40% thereof would be liable to income tax and only the balance 60% would be deemed to be "agricultural income" which could be subjected to agricultural income tax by the State Legislature.[25]

In accordance with the judicial policy of interpreting the legislative entries broadly and liberally[26], the courts have interpreted the term "income" in entry 82 in a very liberal manner. Thus, the Supreme Court has ruled that the word 'income' in that entry is of elastic import as it is used in a wide and comprehensive connotation.

The word 'income' embraces within it every kind of receipt or gain either of a capital nature or of a revenue nature. The Court has insisted that in understanding the amplitude and scope of the expression 'income' in this entry, any meaning which fails to accord with the plenitude of the concept of 'income' in all its width and comprehensiveness should be avoided. Accordingly, the Court has ruled that a tax on gross receipts of certain categories of hotels does not fall outside entry

---

24. CIT v. Willamson Financial Services, (2008) 2 SCC 202, at page 213 : (2007) 13 JT 581.
25. Commissioner of Income Tax v. Willamson Financial Services, (2008) 2 SCC 202 : (2007) 13 JT 581.
26. See, supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(a).

82, List I, and the Hotel Receipts Tax Act, 1980, has been held as not falling out of the entry and hence valid.[27]

The term, 'income' has been held to embrace any profit or gain which is actually received and, therefore, a tax on capital gains,[28] or pension,[29] is permissible under this entry. Parliament can tax what can rationally be considered as 'income' and thus a loan advanced to a shareholder of a company can be treated as his income and taxed as such.[30] The entry authorises not only the imposition of a tax but also the enactment of a law preventing evasion of the tax imposed.[31] A tax on income includes an excess profits tax.[32] The word 'income' in this entry is to be interpreted in its widest amplitude.

The computation of income of the assessee from any property (even in case of self-occupied house) in the income for purposes of income-tax is valid under this entry and it does not fall under entry 49, List II. The tax is on income from house property and not on property.[33] In case of self-occupied property, income is computed in an artificial way. See also entry 60, List II.[34]

In accordance with the judicial view that the entries are not 'powers' but 'fields of legislation', it has been held that entry 82 does not only authorise the imposition of income-tax but also authorises making of a law to present evasion of the tax imposed. If it were not so, then the power to impose income-tax could be nullified by tax payers adopting ingenious contrivances to evade the tax.[35] Each entry extends to all ancillary and sundry matters which can fairly and reasonably be said to be comprehended in it. Thus, the power to levy surcharge on income tax is traceable to this entry.[36]

The Income Tax Act, 1961, is a law made under this entry.

83. Duties of customs including export duties

The Centre can levy duties on imports into, and exports from, the country. Storage or stocking of imported goods is also covered by this Entry.[37]

84. Duties of excise on tobacco and other goods manufactured or produced in India except—(a) alcoholic liquors for human consumption; (b) opium, Indian hemp and other narcotic drugs and narcotics, but including medicinal and toilet preparations containing alcohol or any substance included in sub-paragraph (b) of this entry

---

27. The Elel Hotels & Investments Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1664, 1668 : (1989) 3 SCC 698.
28. Navinchandra Mafatlal v. Commr. of Income-tax, AIR 1955 SC 58 : (1955) 1 SCR 829.
29. Rajagopalachari v. Corp. of Madras, AIR 1964 SC 1172 : (1964) 6 SCR 962.
30. Navnit Lal v. I.T. Asst. Commr., AIR 1965 SC 1375 : (1965) 1 SCR 909.
31. Baldeo Singh v. I.T.O., AIR 1961 SC 736; Balaji v. I.T.O., AIR 1962 SC 123 : (1962) 2 SCR 983.
32. Art. 366(29).
33. Bhagwan Dass Jain v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 907 : (1981) 2 SCC 135; Chelmsford Club v. C.I.T., (2000) 3 SCC 214 : AIR 2000 SC 1092.
34. Infra, Sec. D.
35. Sardar Baldeo Singh v. CIT, AIR 1961 SC 736 : (1961) 1 SCR 482; Balaji v. Income-tax Officer, Special Investigation Circle, Akola, AIR 1962 SC 123 : 1962 (2) SCR 983; Union of India v. A. Sanyasi Rao, AIR 1996 SC 1219 : (1996) 3 SCC 465; Union of India v. M.V. Valliappan, AIR 1999 SC 2526 : (1999) 6 SCC 259.
36. CIT v. Suresh N. Gupta, (2008) 4 SCC 362 : AIR 2008 SC 572.
37. Godfrey Philips India Ltd v. State of U.P., (2005) 2 SCC 515 at page 546 : AIR 2005 SC 1103.

The term 'goods' in this entry refers to such goods which are capable of being sold to consumers.[38]

The area of excise duties is divided between the Centre and the States. The items excluded from the Central sphere under this entry fall within the State sphere under entry 51, List II.[39] Under this entry, all duties of excise save the ones excepted specifically, are generally within the taxing power of the Centre.

The term 'duties of excise' is of a very general and flexible import and is often used to cover a variety of taxes on commodities. Because the term 'excise' may cover a 'sales tax' also, a question arose as to how to reconcile the entry 'duties of excise' in the Central List with the entry 'sales tax' in the State List.[40]

In In re the Central Provinces and Berar Act No. XIV of 1938,[41] a provincial tax on retail sales of petrol and lubricants was challenged by the Centre on the ground that it was a 'duty of excise' and not a 'sales tax'. The Federal Court negativing the contention held the tax valid. It pointed out that the primary and fundamental meaning of excise is that of a tax on articles produced or manufactured in the country. Taken alone by itself, the Central power to levy excise duties could have been interpreted broadly so as to include sales-tax, but here the question was of reconciling the two entries which should be interpreted together and the language of one modified by that of the other. The general power should be interpreted restrictively so that effect might be given to the narrower power of the Provinces.[42] The term 'excise' has thus come to be restricted to a duty on manufacture or production of goods.

The definition of the word 'manufacture' in this entry has raised some controversy. The taxable event under excise law is 'manufacture' of goods. The Supreme Court has defined 'manufacture' as follows: "The moment there is transformation into a new commodity commercially known as a distinct and separate commodity having its own character, use and name, whether be it the result of one process or several processes, 'manufacture' takes place and liability to excise duty is attracted.

Conversion of raw ground-nut and til oil into refined oil after deodorisation is manufacture. 'Manufacture' is not equal to 'processing'. 'Manufacture' means "bringing into existence a new substance" and does not mean merely "to produce some change in a substance", however minor in consequence the change may be.[43] The "test of irreversibility" is also an important criterion to ascertain as to when a given process amounts to manufacture. So when sandal-wood oil produced from red oil can be reconverted into red oil there is no manufacture.[44]

In Empire Industries Ltd. v. Union of India,[45] the Supreme Court has ruled that bleaching, dyeing, printing and finishing of man-made/cotton fabrics constitute

---

38. Union Carbide India Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 1097 : (1986) 2 SCC 547.
39. See, Sec. D, infra.
40. Infra, Sec. D.
41. AIR 1939 FC 1.
42. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
43. Union of India v. Delhi Cloth & General Mills, AIR 1963 SC 791 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 586. Also see, Union of India v. Ramlal Mansukhrai, AIR 1971 SC 2333 : (1970) 2 SCC 472.
44. Punjab Aromatics v. State of Kerala, (2008) 11 SCC 482.
45. AIR 1986 SC 662. Also see, Ujagar Prints v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 874 : AIR 1989 SC 516.

manufacture as commercially a different article is produced after these processes from the cloth which undergoes these processes. Human skills and materials are used in the processing of fabrics.

Excise duty is levied on the manufacture or production of goods, though for the sake of convenience, it may be collected at the stage of removal of goods from the factory. If no excise duty was leviable at the time of manufacture of goods, it cannot be levied at the stage of removal of the said goods.[46]

A tax on the first sales of his products by a manufacturer is a sales tax and not an excise, because it is a tax levied on him qua seller and not qua manufacturer. There is no bar in a manufacturer or producer being required to pay excise duty to the Centre and sales tax to a State in respect of sale of goods produced by him.[47] An excise can be collected at any stage. It may be collected even from the consumers of goods so long as it remains a tax on its manufacture.[48]

A duty on coal raised at the collieries is a duty of excise. Though coal is a natural product, yet the operations required to bring it up to the surface, and make it usable, are so elaborate and expensive that coal may be regarded as covered by entry 84, as goods produced.[49] 'Mritsanjibini", an ayurvedic medicine, is a medicinal preparation containing alcohol and falls under this entry.[50]

A duty of excise can be imposed on production of rubber.[51] A tax on purchase of raw materials for manufacture of some commodity is not an excise but sales tax as the taxable event is not production but sale.[52]

The Central Excises and Salt Act, 1944, introduces a licensing system for production, manufacture, wholesale purchase or sale of any excisable goods. These provisions were challenged as going beyond entry 84 of List I, and falling under entries 26 and 27 of List II as regulating trade and commerce. The Supreme Court held that the Act 'is a fiscal measure to levy and realise duty on tobacco" and that Parliament's "powers of taxation should not be restricted so as to exclude the raising of revenue by imposing licence fees." The Act thus fell under entry 84 and trenching upon the State field would not affect its validity because of the rule of pith and substance.[53]

Being a tax on goods manufactured or produced, ordinarily excise is computed on the manufacturer's price, i.e., manufacturing cost plus manufacturer's profit. This was the basis adopted until 1973 in India. But in 1973, the Central Excise and Salt Act was amended so as to expand the concept of assessable value of excisable goods by including therein the post-manufacturing expenses as well, such as, expenses incurred on advertisements, publicity, sales organisation, storage, packing, to determine the tax liability of the manufacturer. The Supreme Court has ruled in favour of the broader concept. Thus the Court has augmented

---

46. CCE v. Vazier Sultan Tobacco Co. Ltd., (1996) 3 SCC 434 : AIR 1996 SC 3025.
47. Governor-General-in-Council v. State of Madras, AIR 1945 PC 98.
48. J.R.G. Mfg. Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1589 : (1969) 2 SCC 644.
49. Aluminium Corp. v. Coal Board, AIR 1959 Cal. 222.
50. M.B.S. Oushadhalaya v. Union of India, AIR 1963 SC 622 : 1963 (3) SCR 957.
51. Rubber Chappal Mfg. Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1964 Punj. 465.
52. N.R. Mills v. State of Punjab, AIR 1963 Punj. 549.
53. Chaturbhai v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 424 : (1960) 2 SCR 362; also, Abdul Kadir v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 922 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 741.
See, supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(d).

the tax resources of the Centre which can now collect much larger amount of excise revenue.[54] Thus, it was held that the levy of excise duty on the production of electricity falls within the phrase "other goods manufactured" in Entry 84 of List I and within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament, the State having the competence only to levy tax only on the sale and consumption of electricity.[55]

The term 'excise' has been interpreted very broadly in Australia and the U.S.A. In the U.S.A., the Central Government's power to levy direct taxes is very much restricted and, therefore, it was enabled to levy succession tax, corporate income-tax and even general income-tax, by characterising these taxes as 'excise'[56]. In Australia, the States are debarred from levying 'excises'. By interpreting 'excise' broadly as a tax on goods, many State taxes on sale, use, consumption or production have been characterised as 'excises' and thus placed beyond the State purview.[57]

In Canada, the problem is entirely different. There the Provinces are debarred from levying 'indirect' taxes. The Provinces, however, in order to augment their resources started levying taxes on consumption, the most important of which was the sales tax. The Privy Council held that if a tax was paid by the person on whom it was levied and if its incidence was not passed on to someone else, it would not be an 'indirect' tax. Thus, it became possible for the Provinces to levy sales tax by placing the tax liability on the purchaser and making the seller a tax collector.[58]

In India, on the other hand, courts have refused to interpret entry 84 in the Light of these foreign precedents and have restricted the concept of 'excise' to a tax on production and manufacture.

As far as the levy of excise duties on liquor is concerned, the duties on rectified spirit removed/cleared for supply to industries (other than industries engaged in obtaining or manufacturing potable liquors) can be levied by the Centre and not by the States.[59]

85. Corporation Tax

A 'corporation tax' is a tax on income payable by companies, in case of which the following conditions are fulfilled:—(1) it is not chargeable in respect of agricultural income; (2) the companies paying the tax are not authorised to deduct the same from dividends payable by the companies to individuals; (3) no provision exists for taking

---

54. Union of India v. Bombay Tyre Int. Ltd., AIR 1984 SC 420 : (1983) 4 SCC 210.
The Gujarat High Court had ruled in favour of the broader concept of assessable value of goods in Union of India v. Tata Chemicals, 1983 Tax LR 2837. But the Madras High Court's view was negative: Kanph Labs v. Union of India, 1983 Tax L R 2845.

55. M.P. Cement Manufacturers' Assn. v. State of M.P., (2004) 2 SCC 249, at page 256 : (2005) 11 JT 342.

56. Scholey v. Rew, 23 Wall. 331 (1874): Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U.S. 107; Pacific Insurance Co. v. Soule, 7 Wall 433; Springer v. U.S., 102 U.S. 586.

57. Parton v. Milk Board, 80 CLR 229; Dennis Hotels Pty. Ltd. v. Victoria, 104 CLR 529.

58. Atlantic Smoke Shops Ltd. v. Conlon, 1943 A.C. 550; Cairns Construction Ltd. v. Government of Saskatchewan, 1960 S.C.R. 619; BORA LASKIN, CANADIAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 671 (1975); JAIN, Taxing Powers in Canada, note 1, at 495, supra.

59. Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109; Bihar Distillery v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 1208, 1218 : (1997) 2 SCC 727; State of U.P. v. Vam Organic Chemicals Ltd., (2004) 1 SCC 225 : AIR 2003 SC 4650.

the tax so paid into account in computing for the purposes of income-tax the total income of individuals receiving such dividends or in computing the income-tax payable by or refundable to, such individuals.[60]

86. Taxes on capital values of assets exclusive of agricultural land, of individuals and companies; taxes on the capital of companies

The Centre can levy wealth-tax under this entry. It is a tax on the total capital value of assets (including lands and buildings) minus the debts and liabilities and so falls under this entry.

The Wealth Tax Act enacted by Parliament was challenged on the ground that the expression 'net wealth' in that Act included non-agricultural lands and buildings and so the tax fell within the domain of the State Legislatures under entry 49, List II.

The Supreme Court rejected the contention and ruled that wealth-tax is not levied directly on land and building, it is levied on the total assets of a person of which land building may be a component and so wealth tax does not fall under entry 49, List II which envisages the levy of tax on lands and buildings or both as units. Tax on lands and buildings is directly imposed on lands and buildings and bears a definite relation to it. Entry 49 is more general in nature, while entry 86 is more specific in nature. Therefore, in case of conflict between entry 86, List I, and entry 49, List II, entry 86 prevails. [61]

Applying the rule that an entry must receive wide, and not a narrow or restrictive, interpretation, it has been held that the expression 'individuals' in this entry includes a Hindu undivided family as well.[62]

87. Estate duty in respect of property other than agricultural land

88. Duties in respect of succession of property other than agricultural land

Entries 87 and 88 may be read together. 'Estate duty' means a duty to be assessed with reference to the principal value of all property passing upon death or deemed to pass under the said law [Art. 366(9)]. A common element of succession and estate duties is that the occasion for their levy is the death of a person. The succession duty is levied in respect of succession to property; the estate duty is levied on the property itself, has relevance to its value, and is independent of the question as to who takes it.[63]

In India, the area of succession and estate duties is divided between the Centre and the States according as whether the property is 'non-agricultural' or 'agricultural'. The former falls within the Central sphere, while the latter falls within the State sphere (Entries 47 and 48 in List II).[64]

---

60. Art. 366(6).
61. Sudhir Chandra Nawn v. W.T.O., AIR 1969 SC 59 : 1969 (1) SCR 108; Asst. Commr. of Urban Land Tax v. B & C Co., AIR 1970 SC 169 : (1969) 2 SCC 55; CWT v. Karan Singh, 1993 Supp (4) SCC 500; Lt. Colonel Sawai Bhawani Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (1996) 3 SCC 105.
62. Banarsi Das v. Wealth Tax Officer, Spl. Circle, Meerut, AIR 1965 SC 1387, 1389 : (1965) 2 SCR 355.
63. In re Estate Duty, AIR 1944 FC 73.
64. Infra, Sec. D.

When the question of levying an estate duty was considered, it was felt that it would be inequitable to levy it only in respect of non-agricultural property and leave agricultural land untaxed. There were also problems of aggregation of the assessee's entire property when it might be interspersed over more than one State.

In order to have uniformity in the area it was thought desirable to have recourse to Art. 252.[65] A number of States authorised Parliament to legislate for levying estate duty in respect of agricultural land. In this way it became possible for Parliament to enact the Estate Duty Act applying to all properties.[66]

89. Terminal taxes on goods or passengers carried by railway, sea or air; taxes on railway fares and freights:

The nature of 'terminal tax' has been discussed under entry 52, List II.[67] Also see, entry 56, List II.[68]

90. Taxes other than stamp duties on transactions in stock exchanges and futures markets:

Entry 48, List I, relates to stock exchanges and futures markets.[69] Thus, the whole area of stock exchanges falls to the Centre. This has been done in view of the far reaching effects on public credit and finance of stock exchange transactions.

91. Rates of stamp duty in respect of bills of exchange, cheques, promissory notes, bills of lading, letters of credit, policies of insurance, transfer of shares, debentures, proxies and receipts.

See Entry 63 of List II.

92. Taxes on the sale or purchase of newspapers and on advertisements published therein:

The general sales tax falls in the State List under entries 54 and 55.[70] But sales tax on newspapers has been made a Central subject. This has been done so as to protect newspapers, which have an intimate connection with the fundamental right of speech and expression, from indiscriminate taxation.

92-A. Taxes on the sale or purchase of goods other than newspapers where such sale or purchase takes place in the course of inter-State trade or commerce

See under "Restrictions on the States' Power to levy Sales Tax" discussed later in this Chapter.[71]

---

65. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J.
66. The Estate Duty Act, 1953 was repealed by Act 20 of 2000.
67. Infra, Sec. D.
68. Ibid.
69. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
70. Infra, Sec. D.
71. Infra, Sec. J(i).

92-B Taxes on the consignment of goods (whether the consignment is to the person making it or to any other person) where such consignment takes place in the course of inter-State trade or commerce.

This entry has been added to the Constitution by the Constitution (Forty-Sixth Amendment) Act, 1982.[72] The taxable event is despatch/consignment of goods.

It was held that the mere consignment of goods by a manufacturer to his own branches outside the State does not in any way amount to a sale or disposal of goods as such.[73] Accordingly, the 46th Constitution Amendment was enacted. It was felt that leakage of tax leviable under the Central Sales Tax Act on interstate sales of goods occurred through the device of consignment of goods from one State to another.

Reference may also be made to Art. 269[74] in this connection.

The effect of the various amendments made by the 46th Amendment is to expressly bring within the legislative competence of Parliament the field of taxation on the consignment/despatch of goods in the course of interstate trade or commerce. Under Art. 269(3), Parliament may by law formulate principles for determining when a consignment of goods takes place in the course of inter-state trade and commerce. A State law imposing such a tax was declared to be invalid.[75]

92-C. Taxes on Services

This Entry was introduced in 2003 by a Constitutional Amendment.[76] Previously service tax was levied under Entry 97 having been introduced by Parliament under Chapter V of the Finance Act, 1994. The 1994 Act was amended from time to time by extending the meaning of taxable service. By 2003, there were about 100 taxable services. Apart from the legislative categories, the courts have upheld levies under this entry with relation to other activities.

Thus, a tax on services rendered by mandap-keepers and outdoor caterers was held to be in pith and substance, a tax on services and not a tax on sale of goods or on hire-purchase activities.[77] Service provided to a subscriber by the telegraph authority in relation to a telephone connection with effect from the coming into force of the 1994 Act is also a taxable service.[78]

The ambit of the Entry was succinctly laid down in All-India Federation of Tax Practitioners v. Union of India[79] while upholding Parliament's legislative competence to levy service tax on chartered accountants, cost accountants and architects:

> "Broadly 'services' fall into two categories, namely, property based services and performance based services. Property based services cover service provid-

---

72. Also, see, infra, under Sec. D.
For the 46th Constitution Amendment, see, infra, Ch. XLII.
73. Goodyear India v. State of Haryana, (1983) 53 STC 163. See also Karya Palak Engineer v. Rajasthan Taxation Board, (2004) 7 SCC 195 : AIR 2004 SC 4499.
74. Infra, Sec. K.
75. Goodyear India Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1990 SC 781 : (1990) 2 SCC 71.
76. Constitution (Eighty-eighth Amendment) Act, 2003.
77. T.N. Kalyana Mandapam Assn. v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 632, at page 651 : AIR 2004 SC 3757.
78. Bharat Sanchar Nigam Ltd. v. Union of India,(2006) 3 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 1383.
79. (2007) 7 SCC 527, at page 537 : AIR 2007 SC 2990.

ers such as architects, interior designers, real estate agents, construction services, mandapwalas, etc. Performance based services are services provided by service providers like stockbrokers, practising chartered accountants, practising cost accountants, security agencies, tour operators, event managers, travel agents, etc."

96. Fees in respect of any of the matters in the Union List, but not including fees taken in any court, except the Supreme Court.

Fees taken in the Supreme Court is a Central subject under entry 77, List I.[80] Fees taken in all other courts is a State matter under entry 3, List II.[81] Fees taken elsewhere in respect of all matters in the Union List fall within the Central sphere.

The nature and scope of the term 'fee' have been discussed later.[82]

97. Any other tax not enumerated in Lists II and III

This is known as 'residuary taxes'. This topic is discussed later.[83]

COMMENTS

An examination of the two groups of entries in this list (legislative entries 1-81; taxing entries 82 to 97) indicate that while the main subject of legislation falls in the first group, a tax in relation thereto is separately mentioned in the second group. For example, entry 22 in List I is "Railway", and entry 89 is "Terminal Taxes on goods or passengers carried by railway, sea or air; taxes on railway fares and freights". Such examples can be multiplied, e.g. see entries 41 and 83; entries 43, 44 and 85.

This means that if the general entry were to be interpreted so broadly as to include the taxing power as well, then the taxing entry would become superfluous. Thus, for legislative purposes, a general legislative entry does not comprise taxing powers. Taxation is treated as a separate and distinct matter for purposes of legislative competence.[84]

D. STATE TAXES

Entries 1 to 44 in this List confer general legislative powers on the State Legislatures while entries 45 to 63 confer taxing powers on them. The following taxes are mentioned in the State List and are therefore leviable exclusively by the States.

45. Land revenue including its assessment and collection

This entry may be read along with entry 18 in this List concerning land.[85] Land revenue is a tax and not a rent for land.[86]

---

80. Supra, Sec. H.
81. Supra, Ch. VIII; infra, Sec. H.
82. Infra, Sec. H.
83. Infra, Sec. G.
84. See All India Federation of Tax Practitioness v. Union of India, (2007) 7 SCC 527 : AIR 2007 SC 2990.
85. Supra, Ch X, Sec. E.
86. Sesha Sarma v. State of A.P., AIR 1960 A.P. 461.

A cess based on the royalty derived from mining lands has been held as not falling under this entry as it cannot be regarded as land revenue. In the instant case, no tax was leviable if no mining activities were carried on. Thus, the tax was not related to land as a unit which is the only method of valuation of land under entry 49. The tax was relatable to minerals extracted.[1]

In a very interesting ruling,[2] the Supreme Court has held that a State can levy cess on the use of flowing water in a river under this entry. A factory owner was drawing water for industrial purpose from a river by installing water pumps at its bank. The State Government levied a cess on the use of the river water for industrial purpose under the State Land Revenue Code. The Court came to this conclusion by giving a very broad interpretation to the term 'land' in this entry. The Court pointed out that the code in question clearly included "flowing water, as investing title thereof in the State as integral part of land. The definition of 'land' includes the right to the water flowing therefrom as in the definition in the Transfer of Property Act".

46. Taxes on agricultural income

Taxes on non-agricultural income fall in the Central sphere, entry 82, List I.[3] 'Agricultural income' means agricultural income as defined for the purposes of the enactments relating to the Indian income-tax.[4] Therefore, the definition of agricultural income as given in the Indian Income-tax Act is controlling for the States which cannot extend their own jurisdiction by adopting a wider definition of the term agricultural income."[5]

According to Art. 274(1), a Bill to modify the meaning of agricultural income in the Income-tax Act cannot be moved in Parliament without the President's recommendation. There exists a demarcation between 'agriculture' and 'forestry' for legislative purposes,[6] but the term 'agricultural income' may include, for purposes of taxation, income from forestry.[7]

47. Duties in respect of succession to agricultural land.

48. Estate duty in respect of agricultural land.

These entries refer to passing of property to another on the death of a person and do not apply to transfers inter vivos and, therefore, a gift-tax would not fall within any of these entries. Also see entries 87 and 88 in List I.[8]

49. Taxes on lands and buildings.

This entry contemplates a levy of tax on lands and buildings or both as units. Such tax is directly imposed on lands and buildings and bears a definite relation

---

1. India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85 : (1990) 1 SCC 12; Orissa Cement Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1991 SC 1676 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 430.
2. R.S. Rekchand Mohote Spg. & Wvg. Mills Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra,, AIR 1997 SC 2590 : (1997) 5 SCC 511.
3. Supra, Sec. C.
4. Art. 366(1).
5. Commr. of Income Tax v. Benoy Kumar Sahas Roy, AIR 1957 SC 768 : 1958 SCR 101; CIT v. Williamson Financial Services, (2008) 2 SCC 202 : (2007) 13 JT 581.
6. See, entry 14, List II and entry 17A in List III, supra.
7. CIT v. Benoy Kumar Sahas Roy, AIR 1957 SC 768 : 1958 SCR 101. See also Union of India v. Belgachi Tea Co. Ltd., (2008) 12 SCC 450 : (2008) 7 JT 114.
8. Supra, Sec. C.

to it. The expression 'lands' in this entry is wide enough to include agricultural land as well as non-agricultural land.[9] The word 'land' includes not only the face of the earth, but everything under or over it. Land remains land though it may be subjected to different user. Thus, a cesson mines and quarries, tea estates, and on mineral rights has been held to fall within this entry.[10]

Entry 49 contemplates a levy on land as a unit and the levy must be directly imposed on land and must bear a definite relationship to it. Land means the land on surface and also below the surface.

There is a clear distinction between tax directly on land and tax on income arising from land. [11] Wealth tax has been held to fall under entry 86, List I, and not under this entry.[12]

Gift tax is a tax on the gift of land; it is not a tax imposed directly on land but only on a particular user thereof, namely, transfer of land by way of gift.[13]

There is a difference between the levy on income from house property which is an "income-tax", and levy on house property itself which would be referable to this entry.[14]

An annual tax levied by a State on 'buildings and lands' on their annual value, payable by the owner, the annual value being determined by estimating the expected gross annual rent of the 'lands and buildings' less allowances and deductions for repairs and taxes, falls under this entry. Although the State tax adopts the same basis—'annual value'—for determining income from property, as is done by the Income-tax Act, yet in pith and substance the tax is on 'lands and buildings' and not on 'income.' "The method of arriving at the quantum of tax should not be mixed up with the nature of the tax itself."[15]

The Supreme Court has held that the annual rent actually received by a landlord can be taken as the annual rateable value of the property for the assessment of property tax under entry 49 in respect of a property not subject to rent control.[16] The tax remains property tax and cannot be regarded as a tax on income.

A tax on land or building can be imposed with reference to the income or yield therefrom. The income or yield of the land/building is taken merely as a measure of the tax; it does not change the nature or character of the levy; it still remains a tax on land or building. There is no set pattern of levy of tax on lands or build-

---

9. Raja Jagannath Baksh Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1962 SC 1563 : (1963) 1 SCR 220.

10. State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646. See infra under Entry 50.

11. Raja Jagannath, supra. Also see, Sudhir Chandra Nawn v. W.T.O., AIR 1969 SC 59 : 1969 (1) SCR 108; New Manek Chowk Spinning & Weaving Mills Co. Ltd. v. Municipal Corp., Ahmedabad, AIR 1967 SC 1801 : 1967 (2) SCR 679.

12. See, supra

13. Second Gift Tax Officer v. D.H. Nazareth, AIR 1970 SC 999 : (1970) 1 SCC 749; also see, infra, Sec. under Residuary Taxes.

14. Bhagwan Dass Jain v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 907 : (1981) 2 SCC 135.

15. Ralla Ram v. East Punjab, AIR 1949 FC 81; D. Kasturchandji v. State of Madhya Pradesh,, AIR 1967 MP 268; Bhagwan Dass Jain v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 907; Union of India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85 : (1990) 1 SCC 12.

16. Govt. Servant Co-op. Building Socy. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 2636 : (1998) 6 SCC 381.

ings. In Goodricke,[17] the Supreme Court upheld a cess levied by the State on tea estates, the cess being measured by the quantum of tea leaves produced in the estate. The cess was held as being a tax on land falling under entry 49. The Court observed:

> "A tax imposed on land measured with reference to or on the basis of its yield, is certainly a tax directly on the land. Apart from income, yield or produce, there can perhaps be no other basis for levy… There cannot be uniform levy unrelated to the quality, character or income/yield of the land. Any such levy has been held to be arbitrary and discriminatory".[18]

There is nothing in entry 49 to suggest that the tax on lands and buildings is to be paid only by the occupier and not by the owner. A tax on the use of land as a market falls under entry 49, as the incidence of the tax falls on land and the tax is to be levied only if land is used for particular purpose.[19] A cess was imposed on occupied land, based on its annual rent value. A tax can be levied on land used for extraction of minerals.[20]

This entry is not controlled by entry 54, List I. In case of tax on land held on a mining lease, royalty payable to the government may also be taken into account. It is a tax on 'land' falling within the present entry.[21]

A tax on property is based either on the capital value or on the annual letting value of the land and building and such a tax on the percentage of their capital value is valid.[22] If disregarding this basis, an impost is made merely on the basis of floor area of the building then such a tax may be bad being unequal or discriminatory.[23] No property tax could be levied on plant and machinery under this entry, for the taxing power extends only to lands and buildings.[24]

The word 'land' in the entry is broad enough to include all lands whether agricultural or not.[25] Though entry 49 refers to 'lands and buildings', it may not mean that a tax merely on "land" could not be imposed. The Supreme Court has said that the amplitude of the entry should not be curtailed; it should be construed as 'taxes on land' and 'taxes on buildings' and, therefore, a tax on 'land' alone can be levied.[26] Thus, a tax on a percentage basis of the market value of urban land falls under this entry and not under entry 86, List I .

The Municipal Corporation imposed a rate on vacant land within the municipal limits. The rate was the percentage of the valuation based upon capital. It was argued that this was a tax on capital and not a tax on property and was, therefore, beyond the legislative competence of the State. Holding the tax on land, the court

---

17. Goodricke Group Ltd. v. State of West Bengal,, 1995 AIR SCW 123; State of West Bengal v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
18. See, K.T. Moopil Nair v. State of Kerala, AIR 1961 SC 552 : (1961) 3 SCR 77; see Ch. XXI, infra; Ch. XXIV, infra; Ch. XXXI, Infra.
19. Ajoy v. Local Board, AIR 1965 SC 1561 : (1965) 3 SCR 47.
20. Associated Cement Companies Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1983 AP 234.
21. H.R.S. Murthy v. Collector of Chittoor, AIR 1967 SC 177; Western Coalfields v. Special Area Development Authority, AIR 1982 SC 697 : (1982) 1 SCC 125; Laxmi Narayan v. State of Orissa, AIR 1983 Ori. 210.
22. Sri Prithvi C. Mills v. Broach Municipality, AIR 1970 SC 192 : (1969) 2 SCC 283.
23. State of Kerala v. Haji Kutty, AIR 1969 SC 378 : (1969) 1 SCR 645; infra, Ch. XXI.
24. N.M.C.S. & W. Mills v. Ahmedabad Municipality, AIR 1967 SC 1801 : (1967) 2 SCR 679; Govt. of Andhra Pradesh v. H.M.T., AIR 1975 SC 2037 : (1975) 2 SCC 274.
25. Jagannath v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1962 SC 1563 : 1963 (1) SCR 220.
26. Asst. Commr. v. B & C. Co., AIR 1970 SC 169 : (1969) 2 SCC 55.

emphasized the importance of the distinction between the levy of a tax and the machinery of its calculation including the method of calculation. The subject-matter of the tax was held to be something other than the measure provided to quantify tax by levying the tax on percentage of the capital value of the land taxed.[27]

In D.G. Gouse & Co. v. State of Kerala,[28] a question was raised about the validity of a tax on buildings levied by the State of Kerala. The tax was based on the 'capital value' of a building which was to be measured by its annual value. The argument was that it was 'wealth-tax' and so it could be levied only by the Centre and not the State. The Supreme Court rejected the argument saying that a tax levied on 'all that one owns', or on one's total assets, would fall within the purview of entry 86, List I[29] and so would be outside the purview of a State Legislature.

But a tax directly on one's buildings will be a tax, not under entry 86, List I, but under entry 49, List II. The Court also ruled that the method for determining the capital value of a building on the basis of its annual value cannot be regarded as hypothetical and arbitrary. There is no illegality in capitalising the gross income of the property for the purpose of determining the value of the property. It is not invalid to treat the 'expected gross annual rent' as the 'annual value' of a property. It is not wrong to multiply the annual value of a building by 16 to arrive at its capital value for tax purposes, for the quantum of the tax levied by the taxing statute, and the conditions subject to which it is levied, are matters within the competence of the legislature. So long as a tax is not confiscatory or extortionate, the reasonableness of the tax cannot be questioned in a court.'[30]

A cess based on royalty derived from mining land is not a tax on land within the meaning of entry 49, List II.[31] A tax on royalty could not be said to be a tax directly imposed on land. A tax on income derived from land cannot be regarded as a tax on land.[32] Similarly, wealth tax which is a tax on the capital value of the assets of an individual is not a tax directly on land under entry 49. Wealth tax falls under entry 86, List I, and not under entry 49, List II.[33]

The Supreme Court has explained the scope of entry 49 in Union of India v. H.S. Dhillon[34]. The Court has laid down the following incidents of a tax under entry 49, List II:

(1) It must be a tax on units that is lands and buildings separately as units.

(2) The tax cannot be a tax on totality, i.e. it is not a composite tax on the value of all lands and buildings.

---

27. Patel Gordhandas Hargovindas v. Municipal Commissioner, Ahmedabad, AIR 1963 SC 1742 : (1964) 2 SCR 608.
28. AIR 1980 SC 271 : (1980) 2 SCC 410.
29. Supra, Sec. C.
30. Infra, Arts. 14, 19, Chs. XXI and XXIV.
31. Orissa Cement Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1991 SC 1676 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 430; India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85 : (1990) 1 SCC 12.
Also see, infra, under entry 50, List II.
32. India Cement Ltd., ibid.
33. S.C. Nawn v. W.T.O., AIR 1969 SC 59 : (1969) 1 SCR 108; Lt. Col. Sawai Bhawani Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (1996) 3 SCC 105.
Also see, supra, Sec. C.
34. AIR 1972 SC 106. Also see, infra, Sec. G, under "Residuary Taxes".

(3) The tax is not concerned with the division of interest in the building or land. In other words, the tax is not concerned with the division of interest in the building or land; in other words, the tax is not concerned whether one person owns or occupies it or two or more persons own or occupy it.

In pith and substance, the tax under entry 49 is not a personal tax but it is a tax on property.

A tax on excavation of land and use of forest land for non-forest use, and not on the forest land, as such, is not valid under entry 49. What is sought to be taxed in the instant case is not land but the tax is on absence of land. The forest land which is being used is not subjected to tax. The assessment of tax is on excavation and use of forest land for non-forest purpose. "The tax is levied in effect on the activity of the removal or excavation of land". Such a tax does not fall under entry 49 which envisages the levy of tax directly on land as a unit. "The land has been regarded as meaning the land on surface and also below the surface". Therefore, in order that a tax can be levied under entry 49, "it is essential that 'land' as a unit must exist on which the tax is imposed".[35]

Water charges levied by a municipality as a percentage of annual rateable value of building constitute a tax on lands and buildings falling under entry 49, List II.[36]

50. Taxes on mineral rights subject to any limitations imposed by Parliament by law relating to mineral development.

There has been a difference of opinion amongst the High Courts as regards the nature of royalty payable on minerals extracted from the mines. Some High Courts regard royalty as a tax under this entry,[37] while others treat it not as a tax but as the price paid for the privilege of exercising the right to explore the minerals, or as the payment made for the minerals won from the lands.[38]

The Supreme Court had earlier in India Cement expressed the view that royalty is a tax.[39]

However, in State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd.,[40] it was clarified that royalty is not a tax, having corrected what was perceived as a typographical error in the majority view in India Cement.[41]

Subject to the provision of List I the power of the States to enact legislation on the topic of mines and mineral development is plenary. Legislation by the Union in the field covered by List I, Entries 52 and 54 would not like a magic touch or taboo denude the entire field forming the subject matter of the declarations required to be made under List I, Entries 52 & 54.[42]

---

35. State of Bihar v. Indian Aluminium Company, AIR 1997 SC 3592, 3599 : (1997) 8 SCC 360.
36. Kendriya Nagrik Samiti, Kanpur v. Jal Sansthan, AIR 1982 All. 406.
Also, Raza Buland Sugar Co. v. Rampur Minicipality, AIR 1965 SC 895 : 1965 (1) SCR 970.
37. Laddu Mal v. State of Bihar, AIR 1965 Pat. 491; Laxminarayan Mining Co. v. Taluk Development Board, AIR 1972 Mys. 299.
38. H.R.S. Murthy v. Collector of Chittoor, AIR 1965 SC 177 : (1964) 6 SCR 666; Saurashtra Cement & Chemical Industries Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1976 Guj. 180; Laxmi Narayan v. State, AIR 1983 Ori. 210; Dr Shanti Saroop Sharma v. State of Punjab, AIR 1969 P&H 79.
39. India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85 : (1990) 1 SCC 12; also see, infra.
40. (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
41. (Ibid at p. 297).
42. State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.

A reasonable tax or fee levied by State legislation can not be construed as trenching upon the Union's power and freedom to regulate and control mines and minerals. Moreover, the States power to tax under List II Entries 49 and 50 is not taken away by the residuary power of legislation of the Union in the field of taxation under Art. 248(2) read List I Entry 97.[43]

A tax on mineral rights would be different from tax on minerals extracted, as the latter tax amounts to excise duty. The tax on mineral rights is a tax on the right to extract minerals.[44]

The competence of the State Legislature under this entry is circumscribed by "any limitations imposed by Parliament by law relating to mineral development".

The State of Orissa levied a tax on mineral or coal bearing lands. The tax was based on "average annual income". The Supreme Court ruled in Mahanadi[45] that the tax in question was not a tax on land as it had nothing to do with the surface characteristic of the land and so it did not fall under entry 49, List II. It was, in substance, a tax on minerals and mineral rights and so it fell under entry 50, List II.

The State power to levy a tax under this entry was subject to limitations imposed by Parliament by law relating to mineral development. As Parliament had enacted the Mines and Minerals (Dev. & Reg.) Act under entry 54, List I, making exhaustive provisions covering all kinds of taxation on minerals and mineral rights—tax, royalty, fee, dead rent etc., the State Legislature was deprived or denuded of the power to enact any law imposing any tax or levy under entry 50, List II. Accordingly, the tax in question was held to be beyond the competence of, and ultra vires the legislature.

It was held that by virtue of the Mines and Minerals Regulation and Development Act, enacted by Parliament under entry 54, List I, the State Legislatures are denuded of their power to levy any tax on minerals. Entry 50 had practically become a dead letter.[46]

Mahanadi was overruled by Kesoram which held that a tax or fee on mineral rights which remains in pith and substance a tax for augmenting the revenue resources of the State or a fee for rendering services by the State and does not impinge upon regulation of mines and mineral development or upon control of industry by the Central Government is not unconstitutional.[47]

---

43. State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.

44. WANCHOO, J., in Hingir Rampur Coal Co. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1961 SC 459 : (1961) 2 SCR 537.

45. State of Orissa v. Mahanadi Coalfields Ltd., AIR 1995 SC 1868; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Mahalaxmi Fabric Mills Ltd., AIR 1995 SC 2213 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 642; Saurashtra Cement and Chemical Industries v. Union of India, AIR 2001 SC 8.

46. P. Kannadasan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 SC 2560 : (1996) 5 SCC 670.

47. Ed.: The strained interpretation on the statutes which were the subject matter of challenge in the decision was the outcome of a perception of the majority that the Centre was consuming the lion's share of revenue and therefore in case of conflict, the "flexible" provisions of the Constitution should be interpreted in favour of the States who were the weaker and more needy and that "Any conscious whittling down of the powers of the State can be guarded against by the courts".

This propounds the long since discredited State rights doctrine which has the potential of weakening the federalist structure envisaged in the Indian Constitution. (infra p 741). See also the dissenting view of Sinha J in Kesoram at page 361.

Several States levied a 'cess' based on the royalty payable by a lessee on the extraction of minerals from the mining lands. The question of constitutional validity of the cess came before the Supreme Court in Orissa Cement Ltd. v. State of Orissa.[48] The States argued that in pith and substance the tax was a tax on land. The Court rejected the contention and ruled against the validity of the cess in question.[49]

The Court ruled that the cess could not be regarded as land revenue and thus it would not fall under entry 45, List II. The cess could also not be considered as a tax on mineral rights and would thus not fall under entry 50, List II. The cess could not also be considered as a tax on land within the meaning of entry 49, List II. Royalty is payable on the extraction from land and cess is an additional charge on that royalty. The impact of the cess in question would be on the royalties derived from land and not on land.

Entry 49, List II contemplates a levy on land as a unit and the levy must be directly imposed on land and must bear a definite relationship to it. There is a clear distinction between tax directly on land and tax on income arising from the land.[50] Royalty being indirectly connected with land can not be said to be a tax directly on land. Cess is relatable to minerals extracted from land. Under the State Act in question, no tax could be levied if no mining activities were carried on. "Hence, it is manifest that it is not related to land as a unit which is the only method of valuation of land under Entry 49 of List II, but is relatable to minerals extracted."

The cess could not also be regarded as a fee so as to fall under entry 66, List II.[51] The reason is that the levy could not be correlated to any services rendered by the State to the class of persons from whom the levy was collected. Entry 23 to which the levy of the fee could be related is "subject to the provisions of List I with respect to regulation and development" of mines and minerals under the control of the Centre. The Centre has enacted the Mines and Minerals Development Act, 1957. "It, therefore, follows that any State Legislation to the extent it encroaches on the field covered by the M.M.D. Act, 1957, will be ultra vires".[52] The cess could not also be regarded as covered by entry 18, List II, viz., land.[53]

An outstanding feature of the judgment in Orissa Cement is that after holding the cess in question as unconstitutional, the Court made a ruling that no refund of cess already collected need be made. The cess was being collected since 1964 and a direction to refund all the cess collected would work hardship and injustice. In

---

48. AIR 1991 SC 1676 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 430.

49. Reference was made to the following earlier cases: Hingir Rampur case, AIR 1961 SC 459 : (1961) 2 SCR 537; supra, Tulloch, AIR 1964 SC 1284 : (1964) 4 SCR 461, supra; Murthy case, AIR 1965 SC 177 : (1964) 6 SCR 666; supra, footnote 38.

50. Orissa Cement Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1991 SC 1676 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 430; India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85 : (1990) 1 SCC 12.
Also see, infra.

51. For discussion on 'Fee', see, infra, Sec. H.

52. AIR 1991 SC at 1701. For the various entries mentioned here, see, supra. Also see, India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85 : (1990) 1 SCC 12; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Mahalaxmi Fabric Mills Ltd., AIR 1995 SC 2213 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 642.

53. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.

granting relief, the Court exercises certain amount of discretion. The Court observed on this point:[54]

> "It is a well-settled proposition that it is open to the Court to grant, mould or restrict the relief in a manner most appropriate to the situation before it in such a way as to advance the interests of justice.

In entry 49, the term land may, in certain circumstances, include minerals under the earth. But, as tax on mineral rights is expressly covered by entry 50, if it is brought under entry 49, it would render entry 50 redundant. Entries cannot be interpreted in such a manner so as to render any entry redundant.

51. Duties of excise on the following goods manufactured or produced in the State and countervailing duties at the same or lower rates on similar goods manufactured or produced elsewhere in India: (a) alcoholic liquors for human consumption; (b) opium, Indian hemp, and other narcotic drugs and narcotics, but not including medicinal and toilet preparations containing alcohol or any substance included in sub-paragraph (b) of this entry.

The nature of an 'excise duty' has already been discussed earlier.[55] The area of excise duties has been divided between the Centre and the States.[56] The power of the State Legislatures to levy duties of excise is circumscribed under entry 51, List II. Levying of excise by Parliament under entry 84, List I, on medicinal and toilet preparations containing alcohol, does not debar the States from levying excise under this entry on alcoholic requirements for human consumption.[57]

The Constitution distributes the power to levy excise duties on alcoholic liquors between the Centre and the States. Entry 81, List I, and entry 51, List II, compliment each other. Both provide for levy of excise duties. States have no power to levy excise on alcohol which is not for human consumption. Such a tax can be levied only by the Centre.

The States cannot levy a tax or charge or impost on industrial alcohol, i.e. alcohol used and usable for industrial purposes as the States have no authority to levy duty or tax on alcohol which is not fit for human consumption. Such an impost can only be levied by the Centre under entry 84, List I. Entry 51 has been held to be limited to potable liquors. Thus, duties of excise on rectified spirit cleared/removed for the purposes of obtaining or manufacturing potable liquors is leviable by the State Governments.[58]

Since entry 51 is separate from entry 54, a State Legislature may impose simultaneously an excise tax as well as a sales tax on the same commodity. The word 'countervailing' in this entry is significant as it means that countervailing duties can only be levied on goods entering the State from outside if similar

---

54. AIR 1991 SC at 1717.
Also see, India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85 : (1990) 1 SCC 12.

55. Supra, see, under entry 84, List I, Sec C.

56. See entry 84, List I, supra.

57. Southern Pharmaceuticals & Chemicals v. State of Kerala, AIR 1981 SC 1863 : (1981) 4 SCC 391.

58. Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109; State of UP v. Vam Organic Chemicals Ltd., (2004) 1 SCC 225 : AIR 2003 SC 4650. Mohan Meakin Ltd. v. State of H.P., (2009) 3 SCC 157 : (2009) 1 JT 599; see, supra, under Entry 8, List II; Bihar Distillery v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 727 : AIR 1997 SC 1208.

goods are being manufactured within the State and excise duties are being levied thereon.[59] The underlying idea is to equalize the tax burden on home production and imports so that the local manufacturer is not at a disadvantage.

Under this entry tax is leviable on 'entry' of goods and not on goods being taken out. The tax under this entry has nothing to do with consumption of the commodity brought from outside the State.[60]

It will be seen from the perusal of the various entries in the three Lists that a substance may fall under several entries for various purposes. Thus, for purposes of cultivation and manufacture, opium falls under entry 59 of List I and it is exclusively a Central subject. For purposes of levy of excise, and for such control as may be necessary to collect the duty, opium falls under the present entry. Intoxicating liquor falls under entries 8 and 51 of List II, but may fall under entry 19 of List III if it is a drug.

'Narcotic' is a substance which relieves pain, produces sleep and in large doses brings on stupor, coma, and even death, as opium does. Chloral hydrate being hypnotic and sedative would be a narcotic and so an excise duty may be levied on it under the present entry.[61]

The Opium Act permits the States to levy duty as a condition for granting permission to possess, transport, import, export or sell opium. The Act has been enacted by Parliament. The Supreme Court has ruled in Organon[62] that the Act does not levy an excise duty on opium which can be levied only by a State Legislature and not by Parliament. Parliament can make a law under entry 59, List I, relating to cultivation, manufacture and sale for export of opium, or under entry 19, List III, with respect to opium generally.

Section 5 of the Opium Act enacted by Parliament empowers State Governments to make rules regulating the possession, transport, import, export and sale of opium subject to payment of duty or subject to such other conditions as it may impose. S. 5 is not a taxing provision. What S. 5 does is to authorise the State collect "amount" as a condition for granting the permission to possess, transport, import or sell opium. It does not amount to levying an excise duty on opium. S. 5 is, thus, constitutionally valid.

The Kerala General Sales Tax Act authorised the levy of turnover tax on the amounts of excise duty paid by the Kerala State Beverages Corporation on the distillers The duty on liquor was imposed under Section 17 of the Abkari Act in which it was described as a "duty of excise". The Supreme Court in State of Kerala v. Maharashtra Distilleries Ltd.,[63] held that the levy was not related to the manufacture of goods and could not be characterised as levy of excise duty even though it is so described in the Act but was relatable to Entry 8 of List II.

---

59. Kalyani Stores v. State of Orissa, AIR 1966 SC 1686 : (1966) 1 SCR 865; M.M. Breweries v. E.T. Commr. Chandigarh, AIR 1976 SC 2020; State of Orissa v. Niranjan Sen (2004) 13 SCC 712; also see, infra, Ch. XV.
60. M.M. Breweries, supra, footnote 59.
61. Indian C & P. Works v. State of Andhra, AIR 1966 SC 713 : 1966 (2) SCR 110.
62. Organon (India) Ltd. v. Collector of Excise, AIR 1991 SC 2489.
63. (2005) 11 SCC 1 : AIR 2005 SC 2594.

A cess on shop-rent payable by the toddy-sellers to the State is not an excise as it has nothing to do with the production or manufacture of toddy.[64] The licence-fee stipulated to be paid to the State by licensed liquor vendors is neither a fee, nor a tax nor excise. This duty represents nothing but contractual sums payable to the State as the price or consideration or rental for the State parting with its privilege. This is on the theory that the State has exclusive right to manufacture and sell liquor and sell the said right to raise revenue. It is consideration for the privilege granted by the government for manufacturing or vending liquor.[65]

In Sheopat Rai,[66] the factual situation was as follows: the Excise Commissioner could grant a licence to a person for exclusive privilege of selling foreign liquor in retail in a locality against payment of fee for grant of the licence. The licence fee could be decided through an auction, the licence to be granted to the highest bidder. The Supreme Court ruled that the licence-fee is not a 'fee' and does not fall under entry 66, List II. It can also not be regarded as a tax and so it does not fall under entries 51 or 62, List II. The licence fee in the instant case connotes the idea of payment of a sum by a person to the grantor of a licence as consideration for conferring on him, by licence, the exclusive privilege or right to carry on certain activities in respect of foreign liquor, the carrying of which activities would have been otherwise the exclusive privilege or right of the grantor, viz., the government. It is the consideration receivable by the State Government for parting with its exclusive privilege of vending foreign liquor in favour of a private party under a licence. It falls under entry 8, List II. The concepts of licence fee and excise duty are also entirely different.[67] No one has a Fundamental Right to carry on trade in any noxious and dangerous goods.[68]

52. Taxes on the entry of goods into a local area for consumption, use or sale therein

This duty is sometimes known as octroi duty. For this tax to become leviable, mere physical entry of the goods into the octroi area is not sufficient. The goods must not only enter the local area, but it must be "for the purpose of consumption, sale or use therein." The words 'consumption' and 'use' in the entry do not mean that the commodity must be destroyed or used up in the process, as a motor car. But when the commodity is converted into a different commercial commodity by subjecting it to some processing, it amounts to use and consumption of the commodity.[69] A municipal tax on wheat imported into the municipal limits by flour mills for converting it into flour by grinding, falls under this entry as conversion into flour involves user of wheat.

Even if the goods are sold within the local area, it must be for the purposes of consumption or use within that local area to be a sale for the purpose of entry

---

64. State of Mysore v. D. Cawasji & Co., AIR 1971 SC 152 : (1971) 2 SCR 799 : (1970) 3 SCC 710.

65. Har Shankar v. Dy. Excise & Taxation Commr., AIR 1975 SC 1121 : (1975) 1 SCC 737; State of Punjab v. Balbir Singh, AIR 1977 SC 1717; State of Punjab v. Ajudhia Nath, AIR 1981 SC 1374 : (1981) 3 SCC 251.

66. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Sheopat Rai, AIR 1994 SC 813 : (1994) Supp (1) SCC 8; State of Punjab v. Devans Breweries, (2004) 11 SCC 26 : (2003) 10 JT 485.

67. State of M.P. v. Lalit Jaggi, (2008) 10 SCC 607 : (2008) 10 JT 510.

68. Infra, Art. 19(1)(g); Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.

69. Travancore-Cochin v. Shanmugha Vilas Cashew Nut Factory, AIR 1953 SC 333 : 1954 SCR 53; HMM Ltd. v. Administrator, I Bangalore City Corp., AIR 1990 SC 47 : (1989) 4 SCC 595; Mafatlal Industries Ltd. v. Nadiad Nagar Palika, AIR 2000 SC 1223 : (2000) 3 SCC 1.

52.[70] If goods are sold within a local area for being taken out, and are actually taken out of that local area, such sale is not covered by entry 52.[71]

As the Supreme Court has explained, the levy of tax under entry 52 is "upon the entry of goods into a local area; i.e. upon entry of goods for the purpose of consumption, use or sale therein. Neither mere entry of goods is enough to attract the levy nor the mere sale thereof within the local area. What attracts the levy under entry 52 is the entry of goods into a local area for consumption or for use or for sale within that local area for the purpose of consumption or use within that local area."[72] The Supreme Court has observed in Burmah Shell:[73]

> "That concept (of octroi) included the bringing in of goods in a local area so that the goods comes to a repose there".

If the goods are not consumed, used or sold within the local area, no tax can be levied under this entry. Thus, where the goods merely pass through a local area to a destination beyond, no tax can be levied thereon. But, where goods are brought into a local area, stored or kept there for a sufficient length of time, and then re-exported, questions of identity and quantity of goods may arise.

A rule saying that if goods are not re-exported within six months, no refund will be allowed even if the goods are exported as a fact, has been held valid in Telco[74]. The Supreme Court observed : "The export cannot be put in perpetual doubt and the goods may be considered to have come to a repose if they were not exported within a particular period provided in the rules".

The State of Rajasthan imposed an entry tax on motor vehicles, purchased outside the State and brought into the State for use or sale. The tax has been held valid as falling under entry 52, List I, as the taxation event is the entry of the vehicle into a local area. The basis of the levy of the tax may be the purchase value of the vehicle, but it is not a tax on purchase of goods. The State is divided into local areas, i.e. municipalities/panchayats and, therefore, if the vehicle is brought within the local limits of any local area, the tax can be levied on such vehicle.[75]

A terminal tax leviable by Parliament under entry 89, List 1,[76] must be: (a) terminal, (b) confined to goods and passengers carried by railway, sea or air, (c) chargeable at a rail, sea or air terminus and be referable to services (whether of carriage or otherwise) rendered by some rail, sea or air transport organisation. On the other hand, the essential features of octroi duties under entry 52, List II, are—(a) the entry of goods into a definite local area, and (b) the requirement that the goods should enter for the purposes of consumption, use or sale therein.

---

70. Tata Engineering & Locomotive Co. v. Municipal Corporation, Thane, AIR 1992 SC 645 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 361.

71. Entry Tax Officer v. Chandanmal Champalal & Co., (1994) 4 SCC 463; Hindustan Petroleum Corp. Ltd. v. Okha Gram Panchayat, (1994) Supp (1) SCC 296, 300 : AIR 1954 SC 916.

72. State of Bihar v. Bihar Chamber of Commerce, AIR 1996 SC 2344, at 2354 : (1996) 9 SCC 136 (overruled on another point in Jindal Stainless Ltd. (2) v. State of Haryana, (2006) 7 SCC 241 : AIR 2006 SC 2550).

73. Infra, footnote 79.

74. Supra, footnote 70.

75. Rashid Mohd. v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1994 Raj 167.
Also see, Jaika Automobile Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra,, AIR 1993 Bom. 124.

76. Supra, Sec. C.

A terminal tax and octroi have several common features. Both are interlinked—(i) destination of the goods; (ii) the user in the local area on arrival of goods. Where the goods merely pass through a local area without being consumed therein, none of these taxes may be levied. There is only a very little margin of difference between octroi and terminal tax. In case of terminal tax, the goods reach their final destination and their entry into the area of destination immediately attracts payment of terminal tax irrespective of their user. Octroi is levied on goods for their use and consumption. Cotton was being brought within the municipal limits not for sale but for processing into yarn. It was held that octroi was leviable on cotton as used by the mill.[77]

Under entry 52, tax is not leviable on entry of goods for any purpose other than consumption, use or sale.[78] No octroi can be levied on goods received in a local area if they are exported out.[79] Terminal tax, on the other hand, signifies that there must be terminus for the journey of the goods. Thus, where goods enter into a local area which is also the destination of the goods either temporarily or otherwise, the terminal tax would be leviable. When goods pass through a local area without being consumed there, to a destination beyond, the mere fact that the transport carrying the goods halts within the local area for transhipment or allied purposes would not justify the levy of octroi. It is necessary, however, that the goods leave for their destination within a reasonable time.[80]

Octroi refers to goods and not to passengers; it can be imposed only at the point of entry of goods; there is no limitation on the manner by which the goods enter whether by rail, air, road or waterway. Octroi cannot be collected at the point of exit of goods.[81] The terminal tax may be imposed both on entry or exit, and may refer to both passengers or goods.[82] Rail-borne goods may be subject to a terminal tax under entry 89, List I, and to an octroi under this entry.

What is the significance of the expression 'local area' in the present entry. The State of U.P. declared each sugar factory in the State as a 'local area' and imposed a cess on entry of sugarcane for consumption therein. The Supreme Court held in Diamond Sugar Mills v. State of Uttar Pradesh[83] that the cess was not validly levied under this entry as the term 'local area' signifies "an area administered by a local body like a municipality, a district board, a local board, a union board, a panchayat or some body constituted under the law for the governance of the local affairs of any part of the State. The premises of a factory can not regarded as a 'local area'.

A municipality can levy octroi duty on tobacco imported for manufacturing bidis. It does not matter if the Centre levies excise duty on tobacco, for these are two independent imposts arising from different sets of circumstances imposed by

---

77. Bhaskar Textile Mills v. Jharsuguda Municipality, AIR 1984 SC 583 : (1984) 2 SCC 25.
78. Jothi Timber Mart v. Calicut Municipality, AIR 1970 SC 264; Kunwar Ram Nath v. M.B., Pilibhit, AIR 1983 SC 930 : (1983) 3 SCC 357.
79. Burmah Shell v. Belgaum Municipality, AIR 1963 SC 906 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 216; Hiralal Thakerlal Dalal v. Broach Municipality, AIR 1976 SC 1446; Indian Oil Corporation v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Goa 26.
80. Man Mohan Tuli v. Municipal Corp., Delhi, AIR 1981 SC 991 : (1981) 2 SCC 467; State of Karnataka v. Hansa Corporation, AIR 1981 SC 463 : (1980) 4 SCC 697.
81. Puri Fish Merchants Association v. Puri Municipal Council, AIR 1988 Ori. 207.
82. Punjab Flour Mills v. Lahore Corp., AIR 1947 FC 14; Emperess Mills v. Municipal Committee, AIR 1958 SC 341 : 1958 SCR 1102.
83. AIR 1961 SC 652 : (1961) 3 SCR 242; infra.

two governments.[84] Octroi can be levied on the commodity 'sold' for it can be regarded as 'consumed', although the purchaser may not consume the whole of it within the municipal limits but consume a part of it outside.

The Burmah Shell Company used to bring petrol within Belgaum municipal limits, consume a part of it, sell a part of it to consumers within the municipal limits for consumption outside, and export the rest outside the municipal limits. The Supreme Court held in Burmah Shell v. Belgaum Municipality[85] that except for the petrol exported, all petrol brought into the municipal limits was subject to the octroi tax. So long as the goods are brought inside the area for sale within the area to an ultimate consumer, it makes no difference that the consumer does not consume them in the area but takes them out for consumption elsewhere. All the act of consumption need not take place within the area of the municipality. "It is sufficient if the goods are brought inside the area to be delivered to the ultimate consumer in that area because the taxable event is the entry of goods which are meant to reach an ultimate user or consumer in the area"[86]

A municipal corporation levied an octroi duty on goods imported within its limits, but refunded only 90 per cent of the duty when goods were exported out within a specified period. It was held that the 10 per cent deduction amounted to a tax on octroi refund and such a tax could not be imposed under any entry in the State List.[87]

A municipality deriving its power to tax from the State Legislature obviously cannot have any authority more extensive than the authority of the State Legislature. Accordingly, a municipality cannot levy a tax in respect of goods brought into the local area for purposes other than consumption, use or sale.[88]

Under entry 52, List II, a State Legislature can levy a tax on the entry of goods for 'consumption, use or sale' into a local area.[89] Under entry 52, List II, not only a municipality or a local body can impose an octroi duty but even the State can impose a tax on goods entering a local area.

Both octroi and entry tax can be levied simultaneously as there is no constitutional bar against double taxation. Upon the same object and person separate taxes can be levied for different purposes by the same authority or different authorities.[90]

53. Taxes on the consumption or sale of electricity.

Under this entry, a State Legislature is competent to tax 'consumption' of electricity, whether produced by the consumer himself, or purchased from somebody else.[91] A levy of duty upon consumption of electrical energy is not a duty

---

84. Ram Krishna v. Municipal Committee, Kamptee, AIR 1950 SC 11 : 1950 SCR 15.
85. AIR 1963 SC 906 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 216.
86. Ibid, at 912.
87. Poona Municipality v. Dattatraya, AIR 1965 SC 555 : (1964) 8 SCR 178.
88. Indian Oil Corporation v. Municipal Corporation, Jullundhar, AIR 1993 SC 844 : (1993) 1 SCC 333.
89. See, Associated Cement Companies Ltd. v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1996 MP 116.
90. Jaika Automobiles Pvt. Ltd., Nagpur v. State of Maharashtra,, AIR 1993 Bom 124.
91. Jiyajeerao Cotton Mills v. State of Madhya Pradesh,, AIR 1963 SC 414 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 282.

of excise falling in entry 84, List I, because excise is a duty on 'production' and not 'consumption'.[1]

Electricity is goods which can be sold. As electricity cannot be stored, it can only be sold for consumption. Therefore, the word 'sale' in entry 53, List II must be read as 'sale for consumption' of electricity. Taxes on the consumption or sale for consumption of electricity within the meaning of entry 53 must be consumption within the State and not beyond its territory.[2]

According to a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court because electricity is goods, it is covered in Entry 54 also. Therefore, Entries 53 and 54 must be read together and to the extent of sale of electricity for consumption is outside the State, the sale is subject to provisions of Entry 92-A of List I.[3]

Restrictions have been placed on the levy of this tax by Arts. 287 and 288. Art. 287 lays down that except in so far as Parliament may by law otherwise provide, a State cannot impose a tax on the consumption by, or sale of electricity (whether produced by a government or other persons) to, the Government of India; or electricity consumed in the construction, maintenance or operation of a railway by, or electricity sold for the purpose to, the Government of India or a railway company.

Even when Parliament authorises the imposition of such a tax, the law imposing or authorising it 'shall secure' that the price of electricity sold to the Government of India for consumption by it, or to railway company, is less by the amount of the tax than the price charged to other consumers of a substantial quantity of electricity. In other words, the incidence of the tax is to be on the producer of the electricity and not on the Government of India or the railway company.

The tenor of Art. 288 is that a State may by law impose a tax in respect of any water or electricity stored, generated, consumed, distributed or sold by any authority established by a law of Parliament for regulating or developing any inter-State river or river valley. Such a law to be effective should be reserved for the President's consideration and receive his assent. If the State law provides for the fixation of the rates and other incidents of such tax by means of rules or orders to be made under the law by any authority, the law must make provision for the previous consent of the President being obtained to the making of any such rule or order.

The purpose of the provision evidently is to protect the public utility services like railways and river valley projects from indiscriminate State taxation as these services have a national importance. Art. 288 does not stipulate Presidential assent for imposition of a fee for supply or use of water.

---

1. See, supra, Sec. C.

2. State of Andhra Pradesh v. NTPC Ltd., (2002) 5 SCC 203, 222 : AIR 2002 SC 1895; State of A.P. v. National Thermal Power Corpn. Ltd., (2002) 5 SCC 203 : AIR 2002 SC 1895; M.P. Cement Manufacturers Assocn. v. State of MP, (2004) 2 SCC 249 : (2005) 11 JT 342. Observations to the contrary in Southern Petrochemical Industries Co. Ltd. v. Electricity Inspector & ETIO, (2007) 5 SCC 447 : AIR 2007 SC 1984 and Karnataka Power Transmission Corpn. v. Ashok Iron Works (P) Ltd., (2009) 3 SCC 240 : AIR 2009 SC 1905 appear to be incorrect.

3. State of A.P. v. National Thermal Power Corpn. Ltd., (2002) 5 SCC 203 : AIR 2002 SC 1895.

Article 288 is a corollary of the doctrine of "intergovernmental tax immunities", which is discussed later in this Chapter.[4] The subject of taxation under this clause is a matter of interstate utility and hence of national concern. The Presidential assent ensures that the State legislation does not injure interstate interests by imposing unduly high taxation on generation, storage etc. of electricity. The Presidential assent is a condition precedent for the validity of the State legislation imposing tax under Art. 288. It serves a very beneficial interest by way of protection of intergovernmental interests.

54. Taxes on the sale or purchase of goods other than newspapers, subject to the provisions of entry 92A of list I

The power of the States to levy sales tax under entry 54 is subject to two limitations. One arises out of the entry itself, viz., the entry itself is subject to entry 92A of List I. Under entry 92-A, taxation of inter-State sales are subject to Central Laws. The other limitation flows from the restrictions embodied in Article 286.[5]

The power of the States to levy sales tax under entry 54 has generated massive case law.

Under entry 92, List I, only Parliament, and not a State Legislature, can levy a tax on "sale or purchase of newspapers". A newspaper is a paper containing a report of recent events. A paper which mainly gives astrological and numerological predictions is not a newspaper even though it may contain a stray news item, and, therefore, its sale can be taxed under the present entry.[6]

The term 'goods' for the purposes of this entry has been given a very wide connotation. According to Art. 366(12), "goods" includes "all materials, commodities, and articles." In H. Anraj v. Govt. of Tamil Nadu,[7] levy of sales tax on the sale of lottery tickets has been held to be valid. A lottery ticket has been held to be "goods". Electricity is goods. Tax on the sale and consumption of electricity falls both within entries 53 and 54. This means that tax on sale for consumption of electricity outside the taxing State would be subject to entry 92A, List I.[8]

In Vikas Sales Corporation v. Commissioner, Commercial Taxes,[9] REP licences have been held to be goods and transfer of such a licence by its holder to another person constitutes a sale of goods and sales tax can be levied thereon. REP licences are import licences issued to the exporters to enable them to import the necessary inputs required for the manufacture of products exported. REP licences have an inherent value of their own and are bought and sold as such. In the commercial world, these licences are treated and dealt with as merchandise.

The expression 'sale of goods' in the entry has been given the same meaning as in the Sale of Goods Act. Therefore, an attempt by a State Legislature to im-

---

4. Infra, Sec. J(ii), under Immunity of Instrumentalities.
5. For discussion on Art. 286, see, infra, Sec. J(i).
Also see, 20th Century Finance Corp. Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra,, AIR 2000 SC 2436 : (2000) 6 SCC 1.
6. Commissioner of Sales Tax v. Express Printing Press M/s, AIR 1983 Bom 190.
7. AIR 1986 SC 63 : (1986) 1 SCC 414.
8. State of Andhra Pradesh v. NTPC Ltd., (2002) 5 SCC 203 : AIR 2002 SC 1895.
9. AIR 1996 SC 2082 : (1996) 4 SCC 433.

pose tax on a transaction which was not a sale according to this Act was held to be unconstitutional.[10]

To constitute a sale, therefore, (a) there should be an agreement between the parties for transferring title to goods, (b) supported by money consideration, and as a result of the transaction, (c) property must actually pass in the goods. There can be no sale without all these three ingredients being present.

There is a well defined distinction between 'sale' and an "agreement to sell". It was held in the instant case [Dunkerley] that in a building contract which was one, entire and indivisible, there was no sale of goods and was not within the competence of the State Legislatures under entry 54. A sale by auction is a 'sale' and sales tax can be imposed on auctioneers.[11] Forward contracts are not subject to taxation under this entry as no property in goods passes under such an agreement and, therefore, it is merely an agreement to sell and not a completed sale.[12]

The term 'goods' in this entry means all kinds of movable property. Electricity is 'goods' and thus can be subjected to sales tax.[13] Sales tax on petroleum and petroleum goods falls under this entry and not under entry 53 of List I.[14] It had been initially held in State of U.P. v. Union of India'[15] that providing telephone service by the Department of Telecommunications which comprises allotment of number, installation of an instrument/apparatus and other appliances at the premises of a subscriber, which are connected with a telephone line to the area exchange for access to the whole system, to dial and to receive calls, in effect falls within the meaning of the extended definition of "sale" for the purpose of imposition of a State tax under this Entry. The view was overruled in Bharat Sanchar Nigam Ltd. v. Union of India,[16] which dealt with taxation of mobile phone connections. The sale of handsets and SIM cards were disaggregated and the argument that the "goods" element in telecommunication was theelectromagnetic waves by which data generated by the subscriber was transmitted to the desired destination, was negatived.

A State tax on purchase of sugarcane at a rate regulated by weight and not value falls under this entry.[17] It is a pragmatic novelty in the sales tax pattern. It is not an excise (which falls under entry 84, List I)[18] as the tax is levied on the purchase of cane and not on its conversion into sugar. Although, usually, purchase tax is levied with reference to the price of goods, the legislature can levy such a tax with reference to the weight of the goods purchased.

The sugar industry is a 'controlled' industry (entry 52, List I),[19] and a tax on raw materials for sugar may be a tax with respect to that industry, yet such a tax does not fall outside the purview of the State Legislature[20] under entry 54, List II. It was held that the subject matter of sales tax covered by entry 54, List II, cannot

---

10. State of Madras v. Gannon Dunkerley, AIR 1958 SC 560 : 1959 SCR 379.
11. C.S. Bureau v. I.T. Commr., AIR 1973 SC 376 : (1973) 1 SCC 46.
12. Sales Tax Officer v. Budh Prakash, AIR 1954 SC 459 : (1955) 1 SCR 243.
13. S.T. Commr., Indore v. M.P.E. Board, AIR 1970 SC 732 : (1969) 1 SCC 200.
14. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
15. (2003) 3 SCC 239 : AIR 2003 SC 1147.
16. (2006) 3 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 1383; See also supra under Central Taxes: Entry 92-C.
17. Ganga Sugar Corporation v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 286 : (1980) 1 SCC 223.
18. Supra, Sec. C.
19. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
20. See, Tikaramji, supra; Kannan Devan, supra.

be included in entry 52, List I, as entry 54, List II, is a "separate and independent field."[21]

A State levy at the point of first purchase of alcohol has been held to be valid under this entry.[22] 'Industry' as a legislative topic is of large and liberal import, but "what peripherally affects cannot be confused with what goes to the heart". Sales tax on raw materials may affect costing process of manufacture but it is not legislation on industrial process or allied matters.[23] This calls for application of the rule of pith and substance.[24]

Entry 54 uses two terms 'sale' and 'purchase'. Both are two sides of the same coin. Sale and purchase are merely two sides of the same transaction. From the point of view of the seller, the transaction is a 'sale'; looked at from the point of view of the buyer, the same transaction is a purchase. Under entry 54, the State Legislature may levy both—'sales tax' as well as 'purchase tax'. A tax on the purchase of bamboo is valid under this entry.[25]

The characteristics of a 'sale' have been mentioned above. Before 1982, a number of transactions were held as not being 'sale' and, thus, not subject to sales tax under this entry. A contract of sale of goods was distinguished from a contract for works and labour. In the former case, the main object is transfer of property; in the latter, the main object is not transfer of property but to provide work and labour. For instance—

(a) Supply of materials in execution of works contract was held to be not sale of goods by the contractor as a building contract was held to be one entire and indivisible contract.[26]

(b) Supply of steam by the electricity board to Nepa Mills on actual cost basis was held to be more akin to a labour contract than to sale.[27]

(c) When the assessee redried raw tobacco, packed it in waterproof packing material, and charged one inclusive rate for drying and packing, there was no sale of packing material in such a case as the material was used in execution of a work contract and thus the packing material could not be subjected to sales tax.[28]

(d) When a hotel made one consolidated charge for residence, services and food, without separating charges for food from charges for service, it was held that there was no sale of food, but it was a service rendered to the guests and so no sales tax could be levied on the food supplied.[29]

(e) Supply of refreshments to its members by a club on a no-profit basis was held to be not a sale and hence not subject to sales-tax.[30]

---

21. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Synthetics and Chemicals Ltd., (1991) 4 SCC 139.
22. Ibid.
23. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
24. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(d).
25. State of Orissa v. Titaghur Paper Mills Co. Ltd., AIR 1985 SC 1394 : (1985) 3 SCC 661.
26. State of Madras v. Dunkerley, supra, note 72; Banarsi v. State of Madhya Pradesh,, AIR 1958 SC 909 : 1959 SCR 427.
27. S.T. Commr. v. M.P.E. Board, AIR 1970 SC 732 : (1969) 1 SCC 200.
28. State of Andhra Pradesh v. Guntur Tobaccos, AIR 1965 SC 1396 : (1965) 2 SCR 167.
29. Associated Hotels v. Excise & Tax Officer, AIR 1966 Punj. 449.
30. J.C. Tax Officer, Madras v. Y.M.A., Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1212 : (1970) 1 SCC 462.
This ruling went contrary to an earlier ruling in which sales tax was held leviable on supply of refreshments by a co-operative society to its members on a no-profit basis: Dy C.T.O. v. Enfield India, AIR 1968 SC 838 : (1968) 2 SCR 421.

A tax was levied on the purchase of sugarcane required for "use, consumption or sale in a factory." It was argued that the tax was not on every purchase of sugarcane but only "on the purchase of cane required for use, consumption or sale in a factory", the tax was not a purchase tax falling under entry 54, II, but a 'use' tax. It was also argued that since the tax was levied on the entry of cane into a factory for being used and consumed in the manufacture of sugar, the tax was, in the nature of an 'entry' tax but since the factory was not a 'local area' within the meaning of entry 52, List II, the levy was incompetent. But the Supreme Court rejected these arguments and held that the taxable event in the instant case was 'purchase of cane' and neither on "use or enjoyment of what is purchased" nor on "entry of cane into a factory", and, therefore it fell under entry 54, List II.[31]

Levy of a tax by a State on the purchaser in respect of the last sale of the goods in question, if otherwise the sale of the goods had not borne the tax earlier, has been held valid as being a tax on "purchase, pure and simple" and, as such, falling under entry 54, List II, as interpreted in "the widest possible manner". The Court refused to accept the argument that the tax was levied on "consumption, production or consignment".[32]

Despatch of sugar by the assessee to the authorised agent of a State under direction issued by the Sugar Controller under the Sugar and Sugar Products Control Order, 1946, was held not subject to sales tax as there was no sale since the contractual element was lacking in the transaction.[33] But there was some change in this judicial view later for in a similar situation the transaction was held subject to sales tax as, on facts, the Court found that the contractual element was not completely absent.[34]

Again, it was held that supply of wheat to the Food Controller under the Levy order was not a sale as there was no contract but only a legal obligation. There was not enough volition left to the parties to make the transaction contractual.[35] But this view has now undergone a change.[36] The view is now propounded that so long as mutual assent, express or implied, is not totally excluded, the transaction would amount to sale. The latest case in the series is Food Corporation of India v. State of Kerala[37] where levy procurement by the FCI under orders issued under the Essential Commodities Act have been held to be sale for purposes of entry 54 as some area of consensual arrangement and some field for volition is still left untouched by the law. "The disputed transactions are sales, may be, under the compulsion of a statute. Nevertheless, they are sales exigible to tax."[38]

Under the State law, the Cane Commissioner could declare any area as the factory zone for supply of sugarcane to a sugar mill. The factory was bound to purchase all sugarcane offered to it from the zone and the sugarcane producers in

---

31. Andhra Sugars v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 599 : (1968) 1 SCR 705.
32. Hotel Balaji v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1993 SC 1048, overruling Goodyear Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1990 SC 781 : (1990) 2 SCC 71.
33. New India Sugar Mills v. S.T. Commr., AIR 1963 SC 1207 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 459.
34. I.S.W. Products v. State of Madras, AIR 1968 SC 478 : (1968) 1 SCR 479.
35. Chitter Mal v. S.T. Commr., AIR 1970 SC 2000 : (1970) 3 SCC 809.
36. Vishnu Agencies (Pvt.) Ltd. v. Commercial Tax Officer, AIR 1978 SC 449 : (1978) 1 SCC 520; State of Punjab v. Dewan's Modern Breweries, AIR 1979 SC 1158 : (1979) 2 SCC 210; Coffee Board, Bangalore v. Commr. of Commercial Taxes, Karnataka, AIR 1988 SC 1487 : (1988) 3 SCC 263.
37. AIR1997 SC 1252 : (1997) 3 SCC 410.
38. Ibid at 1263.

the zone could not sell sugarcane to any other factory. The purchase of sugarcane by the factory was held liable to sales tax on the ground that the sugarcane producer enjoyed some freedom of contract as he was free to sell or not to sell his sugarcane to the concerned mill, although the mill was bound to purchase all the sugarcane offered to it.[39]

A hire-purchase agreement, it was held, was not an agreement of sale and so could not be subject to sales tax. No transaction in which no property passes from the seller to the buyer could be subject to sales tax. Only when such an agreement ripens into a sale it could be liable to sales tax.[40]

THE CONSTITUTION (FORTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT) ACT, 1982

Thus, various interpretations of the entry very much restricted the scope of the State taxing power. Sales tax constitutes a major source of revenue for the States. With a view to enhance their taxing capacity under this entry, the Constitution (Forty-Sixth Amendment) Act, 1982, has been enacted.[41] Cl. 29A has been added to Art. 366 so as to clarify the position in certain respects, to remove certain judicially imposed restrictions and to include the following transactions within the expression "a tax on the sale or purchase of goods":

(a) a tax on the transfer, otherwise than in pursuance of a contract, of property in any goods for cash, deferred payment or other valuable consideration;[42]

(b) a tax on the transfer of property in goods (whether as goods or in some other form) involved in the execution of a works contract;[43]

(c) a tax on the delivery of goods on hire-purchase or any system of payment by instalments;[44]

(d) a tax on the transfer of the right to use any goods for any purpose (whether or not for a specified period) for cash, deferred payment or other valuable consideration;

(e) a tax on the supply of goods by any unincorporated association or body of persons to a member thereof for cash, deferred payment or other valuable consideration;

(f) a tax on the supply, by way of or as part of any service or in any other manner whatsoever, of goods, being food or any other article for human consumption or any drink (whether or not intoxicating), where such supply or service, is for cash, deferred payment or other valuable consideration.[45]

Any of the above-mentioned supply, transfer or delivery of any goods is to be deemed to be a sale of those goods by the person making the transfer, delivery or

---

39. Andhra Sugars Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 599 : (1968) 1 SCR 705.
40. K.L. Johar & Co. v. Dy. C.T.O., AIR 1965 SC 1082 : (1965) 2 SCR 112.
41. See, infra, Ch. XLII, for this Amendment.
42. This overrides New India Sugar Mills' ruling, supra, footnote 33.
The Supreme Court had itself overridden this ruling in Oil & Natural Gas Commission v. Bihar, AIR 1976 SC 2478 : (1977) 1 SCR 354 and Vishnu Agencies v. Commercial Tax Officer, AIR 1978 SC 449 : (1978) 1 SCC 520.
43. This limits the ruling in Dunkerley, supra, notes 72 and 1. See Bharat Sanchar Nigam Ltd. v. Union of India (2006) 3 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 1383.
44. This overrides the Johar ruling, supra, footnote 40.
45. This overrides the ruling in Associated Hotels case, supra.

supply and a purchase of those goods by the person to whom such transfer, delivery or supply is made.

Cl. 29A of Art. 366 defines expansively the expression "tax on the sale or purchase" so as to include inter alia non-contractual transfer of property for valuable consideration, transfer of property in goods in execution of a works contract; delivery of goods on hire-purchase; and transfer of the right to use any goods for consideration. The purpose of these amendments is to augment the State revenue through sales taxation. The State Legislatures have thus become competent to levy sales tax on 'deemed sales' as envisaged in the above clauses from (a) to (f) even though such transactions were not sales within the meaning of 'sale' as contained in the Sale of Goods Act.[46] But the power of the States to tax sales mentioned in sub Cls. (b), (c) and (d) of Art. 366 (29A), mentioned above, is not unrestricted. According to Art. 286 (3)(b), a law of a State imposing tax on such sales is to be subject to such restrictions and conditions in regard to the system of levy, rates and other incidents of the tax as Parliament may by law specify. The Supreme Court has also ruled that all transfers of goods mentioned in Cls. (a) to (b) above are subject to the restrictions contained in Art. 286.[47]

As regards Cl. (d), mentioned above, a question has arisen whether a State can levy sales tax on the transfer of the right to use any goods on the premise that the goods put to use are located there irrespective of the place where the agreement of such transfer of the right to use such goods is made. The Court has ruled that where a party enters into a formal contract and the goods are available for delivery irrespective of the place where the goods are located, the situs of such sale would be where the property in the goods passes, namely, where the contract is entered into. The Court has formulated the proposition as follows:[48]

> "Where the goods are in existence, the taxable event on the transfer of the right to use goods occurs when a contract is executed between the lessor and the lessee and situs of sale of such a deemed sale would be the place where the contract in respect thereof is executed".

EVASION OF SALES TAX

Provision to check evasion of sales tax are within the legislative competence of the States under entry 54, List II. This being so, the provisions to make imposition of tax efficacious, or to prevent evasion of tax, are within the legislative competence of the State Legislature.[49]

Another problem which the legislature has been called upon to tackle in this area is that of unauthorised collection of sales tax by the dealers. When sales tax had been assessed and paid, but in pursuance of the United Motors case,[50] a part of it became refundable by the State as no tax could be levied on goods despatched for consumption outside the State, the legislature laid down that the refund could be claimed from the government by the purchaser from whom the dealer had actually collected the tax. This provision, therefore, deprived the as-

---

46. For further discussion see Bharat Sanchar Nigam Ltd v. Union of India (supra)
47. Builders Association of India v. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 1370 : (1989) 3 SCC 98.
48. 20th Century Finance Corp. Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 2000 SC 2436 : (2000) 6 SCC 12; Goa Carbon Ltd. v. CTT, (2008) 11 SCC 176 : (2008) 3 JT 316.
49. State of Rajasthan v. D.P. Metals, AIR 2001 SC 3076 : (2002) 1 SCC 279.
50. Infra, Sec. J(i).

sessees of the common law right to claim refund of the amounts paid as tax under an error of law.

This was a strategy adopted by the State to refund as little as possible as small consumers could hardly be expected to claim small amounts paid by them as sales tax. The State refused to refund the money to the dealers from whom it had collected. Nevertheless, the law was held valid as being covered by the incidental and ancillary power[51] relating to the levy and collection of sales tax.[52]

According to the Supreme Court, the various entries denote diverse heads of legislation demarcating the periphery of legislative competence and include all matters which are ancillary or subsidiary to the primary head.[53] The State Legislature is therefore competent to exercise power in respect of the subsidiary or ancillary matter of granting refund of tax improperly or illegally collected. This view was reiterated by the Court in Burmah Construction.[54]

A State law authorised the government to recover from any person any amount collected by him as sales tax otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of the relevant law. In substance, the provision meant that whatever had been collected by a dealer as sales tax, even though it was not exigible as tax under the law, had to be paid over to the government. The provision provided for recovery of the amount collected as sales tax even though the amount was not due as tax under the law.

The law was held to be not valid as the State could levy sales tax, but any other collection without the authority of law could not be regarded as sales tax and the State could not recover the same. Such a law did not fall within the 'incidental or ancillary' powers as these can be exercised only in aid of the main topic of legislation i.e. sales tax. The Supreme Court observed that there must be a limit to the incidental or ancillary power flowing from the legislative entries in the various lists. The Court refused to accept that "the ambit of ancillary or incidental power goes to the extent of permitting the legislature to provide that though the amount collected—may be wrongly—by way of tax is not exigible under the law as made under the relevant taxing entry, it shall still be paid over to Government, as if it were a tax".

The Court distinguished the provision from that held valid in Orient Paper.[55] That provision dealt with the matter of refund of what had already been deposited with the government and the question of refund of a tax collected "is always covered by incidental and ancillary powers relating to levy and collection of tax". But the provision in the instant case required payment to the government of something collected by way of tax, though not really due as a tax under the law enacted under entry 54, List II.[56]

Later, in Ashoka Marketing,[57] the Supreme Court declared invalid a provision similar to the one involved in Abdul Quadir but which was coupled with a provi-

---

51. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(a).
52. Orient Paper Mills v. State of Orissa, AIR 1961 SC 1438 : (1962) 1 SCR 549.
53. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(a).
54. Burmah Const. Co. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1962 SC 1320 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 242.
Also see, Tripura Goods Transport Association v. Commr. of Taxes, AIR 1999 SC 719.
55. Supra, footnote 52.
56. Abdul Quader & Co. v. S.T. Officer, AIR 1964 SC 922 at 922, 923 : (1964) 6 SCR 867.
57. Ashoka Marketing v. State of Bihar, AIR 1971 SC 946 : (1970) 1 SCC 354.

sion to refund the amount actually to the person from whom the dealer had collected the amount as tax. The Court observed: "the State has no power to legislate for recovering amount which is collected by the taxpayer in order to recoup himself for payment of tax which under the law he is not bound to pay".

But then to meet the problems, the State changed its strategy. A law was enacted prohibiting collection of sales tax by any one on sale of goods on which no such tax was payable under the law. Unauthorised collection was made punishable with fine and imprisonment and, above all, any unauthorised collection was to be forfeited to the State. The Supreme Court now validated the forfeiture clause in R.S. Joshi v. Ajit Mills[58] as imposing a penalty for breach of law and thus falling under entry 54, List II. The earlier cases were distinguished on the ground that there the Legislature had sought to grab the tax money even though not exigible under the law while here a penalty was imposed for infringing the sales tax. As a "punitive measure to protect public interest in the enforcement of the fiscal legislation, it falls squarely within the area of implied power."

The problem presented by Joshi was that a dealer had collected tax outside the law and that he should not stand to benefit thereby. The best solution to the problem was to return the amount to those who paid it, but it was not practical to return small amounts to numerous people. The next best solution could be to make the State as the beneficiary, but the State could not collect any tax without the authority of law as was held in the earlier cases. Now a way was found to achieve the same result, viz., to forfeit the money which was conceptually a penal sanction for enforcement of law and was different from collecting tax money. To impose a sanction for enforcement of the sales tax law fell within the scope of entry 54, List II, as an ancillary matter.[59] Thus, a change in phraseology and concept enabled the State to achieve the same result which it had failed to achieve in the earlier cases.

The Orissa Legislature passed a law requiring a dealer collecting sales tax to deposit the same with the government "notwithstanding that the dealer is not liable to pay such amount as tax.' The Government would hold the amount so deposited in trust and would return the same on application. The Act was held valid in State of Orissa v. Orissa Cement[60] following Joshi 'and overruling Ashoka Marketing.[61] The Orissa ruling has been reiterated in Kasturi Lal Harlal v. State of Uttar Pradesh.[62] The Court ruled that the taking over of sums collected by dealers from the public under guise of tax solely with a view to return the same to the buyers so deprived "is necessarily incidental to 'tax on the sale and purchase of goods'. The Court has further observed:[63]

> "It is now well settled that an entry in a legislative List must be read in its widest amplitude and the legislature must be held to have power not only to legislate with respect to the subject-matter of the entry but also to make ancillary or incidental provision in aid of the main topic of legislation."

Usually, sales tax is passed on by the seller to the buyer. But it is not an essential characteristic of this tax. It is a matter of policy for the legislature whether the

58. AIR 1977 SC 2279 : (1977) 4 SCC 98.
59. Supra, Sec. B.
60. State of Orissa v. Orissa Cement, AIR 1986 SC 178 : 1985 Supp SCC 608.
61. Supra, footnote 57.
62. AIR 1987 SC 27 : (1986) 4 SCC 704.
63. Ibid, at 28.

law should provide for passing on the sales tax to the consumer. When a State levied a surcharge of 10% on the sales tax payable by the dealers, and prohibited the surcharge from being passed on to the purchasers, it was held to be valid under this entry.[64]

CONSIGNMENT TAX

In Goodyear India Ltd. v. State of Haryana,[65] the Supreme Court declared invalid what is known as the consignment tax. The Company purchased some raw materials in the State (without paying any sales tax), used the same in the manufacture of tyres and despatched a good portion of the manufactured goods to its several depots outside the State (otherwise than by way of sale) while retaining both title and possession thereof. Under the State law, the purchase of raw materials then became subject to the purchase tax. The Court ruled that in such a situation, the liability to pay tax arises only when the goods are despatched or consigned out of the State and, thus, the tax event was not 'purchase' but 'despatch' of goods outside the State in the course of interstate trade and commerce and such a tax would lie outside the State power to tax.[66] The mere consignment of goods by a manufacturer to his own branches outside the State does not in any way amount to a sale of goods. The Court emphasized that the nomenclature of the tax is not conclusive. To determine the true character and nature of a particular tax, with reference to the legislative competence of a particular legislature, the court looks to its pith and substance. The power to levy consignment tax vests in Parliament in view of Art. 269[67] and Entry 92B, List I.[68]

A tax on "expenditure" has been held to be not a tax on "sale". The expenditure tax does not thus fall under this entry.[69]

55. Taxes on advertisements other than those published in the newspapers.

This would include for example taxes on hoardings. A tax on advertisements published in the newspapers falls under entry 92, List I.[70]

56. Taxes on goods and passengers carried by road or on inland waterways:

See entry 89, List I.[71] This tax is known as terminal tax. A tax on the transport of kendu leaves can be validly levied under this entry as it is a tax on the transport of goods by road.[72]

A tax payable by operators in respect of passengers carried and goods transported by motor vehicles, the tax being measured by the value of fare and freight charged, falls under this entry, as it is a tax on passengers and goods and not on fares and freights although it is measured by fares and freights. It is only on such

---

64. Kodar v. State of Kerala, AIR 1974 SC 2272 : (1974) 4 SCC 422; Hoechst Pharmaceuticals v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019, 1047 : (1983) 4 SCC 45.
65. AIR 1990 SC 781. Also see, Hotel Balaji v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1993 SC 1048.
66. See, infra. Ch. XV.
Also, entry 92A, List I, Sec. C. supra.
67. See, infra, Sec. K(a).
68. Supra, Sec. C.
69. Federation of Hotel and Restaurant v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1637 : (1990) 3 SCC 619.
70. Supra, Sec. C.
71. Supra, Sec. C.
72. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Mohanlal Hargovind Das, (2000) 10 SCC 356.

goods and passengers as are carried by road or on inland waterways that a tax can be levied under this entry. The Court ruled that the incidence of the tax is upon passengers and goods, though the amount of the tax is measured by fares and freights.[73] A levy of service tax on carriage of goods by transport operators is a levy distinct from the levy envisaged under Entry 56.[74] Though incidence of tax is on goods and passengers but law can be enacted to recover the tax from the owners of operators of the vehicle.[75]

The Allahabad High Court has ruled[76] that a tax on passengers under entry 56 must be a tax directly imposed on passengers, though it need not be directly collected by the State from the passengers. In other words, the impact of the tax must be on the passengers. A levy to be valid under this entry is a tax paid by the passengers although it is collected by the State through the agency of the operators who collect the tax as well as the fare from the passengers.[77] The Allahabad High Court has explained the nature of the tax on passengers in these words:

> "A tax on passengers must be a tax directly imposed on passengers, though it need not be directly collected by the State from the passengers. In other words, the impact of the tax must be on passengers."[78]

A tax on goods which enter or leave the municipal limits but having no relation to their transport cannot fall under this entry.[79] Keeping in view the theory that the legislative entries should be interpreted broadly, it has been held that a State can validly levy a tax on goods carried and make it payable by the producer of goods instead of the carrier.[80] The competence of the States to tax goods carried is not affected whether the goods are carried for a long or short distance. It is the physical carriage of goods through a State which is the taxing event.

Levy of terminal tax on goods meant for destination beyond Delhi but passing through Delhi is not invalid. In the instant case,[81] there were two separate transactions, one by which the goods were meant for Delhi, and the other by which after having reached and having been unloaded at Delhi, the goods were rebooked and reloaded for some other destination and this, therefore, was a fresh and different transaction. In such a case, terminal tax would be leviable at the entry point in the territory of Delhi. The Delhi Municipal Corporation levied a terminal tax on goods and animals carried by road which were imported into, or exported from, the municipal limits. The tax was held valid under entry 56, List II.[82]

---

73. Sainik Motors v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1961 SC 1480; A.S. Karthikeyan v. State of Kerala, AIR 1974 SC 436 : (1974) 1 SCC 258. See also State of H.P. v. Yash Pal Garg, (2003) 9 SCC 92 : (2003) 4 JT 413; State of Gujarat v. Akhil Gujarat Pravasi V.S. Mahamandal, (2004) 5 SCC 155 : AIR 2004 SC 3894.

74. Gujarat Ambuja Cements Ltd. v. Union of India, (2005) 4 SCC 214, at page 228.

75. State of Gujarat v. Akhil Gujarat Pravasi (2004) 5 SCC 155 : AIR 2004 SC 3894.

76. Jagdish Prasad v. Passenger Tax Officer, Mathura, AIR 2000 All 205 (FB).

77. Also see, A.S. Karthikeyan v. State of Kerala, AIR 1974 SC 436 : (1974) 1 SCC 258.

78. Jagdish Prasad, supra, footnote 76, at. 208.
Also see, A.S. Karthikeyan v. State of Kerala, AIR 1974 SC 436 : (1974) 1 SCC 258.

79. Achalpur Municipality v. Nandkishore, AIR 1967 Bom 413.

80. Khyerbari Tea Co. v. Assam, AIR 1964 SC 925 : (1964) 5 SCR 975.
See also, infra, under Freedom of Trade, Commerce and Intercourse, Ch. XV.

81. Man Mohan Tuli v. Delhi Municipal Corp., AIR 1981 SC 991.

82. Monju Kalyanji v. State of M.P., AIR 1988 MP 220; Meera Khandelwal v. State of Madhya Pradesh,, AIR 1997 MP 163.

Under entry 56, List II, a State can levy a tax on passengers and goods carried on national highways.[83] This entry does not exclude national highways and national waterways.[84] Entry 56 uses the terms 'road' and 'inland waterways'. So "national highways and "national waterways" (so declared under entries 23 and 27, List I) are not exempted from the scope of entry 56. Thus, taxes on passengers and goods carried on national highways fall directly and squarely within entry 56.[85]

However, under this entry, a State could only impose a tax of a 'compensatory' and 'regulatory' nature.[86] A State incurs considerable expenditure in connection with national highways (though the primary responsibility for them rests on the Centre) not directly by constructing or maintaining them but by facilitating the transport of goods and passengers along them in various ways such as lighting, traffic control, amenities for passengers, halting places for buses and trucks, etc.[87] This constitutes sufficient nexus between the tax and the passengers and goods carried on the national highways to justify the State imposition of tax thereon.[88]

57. Taxes on Vehicles, whether mechanically propelled or not, suitable for use on roads, including tramcars subject to the provisions of entry 35, List III[89]

This entry empowers legislation in respect of taxes on vehicles, whether mechanically propelled or not. The Supreme Court has stated in Bolani[90] that the power exercisable under this entry "is the power to impose taxes which are in the nature of regulatory and compensatory measures".[91]

In Jayaram,[92] the Supreme Court has observed: "By virtue of the power given to them by entries 56 and 57 of List II every one of the States has the right to make its own legislation to compensate it for the services, benefits and facilities provided by it for motor vehicles operating within the territory of the State. Taxes resulting from such legislative activity are by their very nature and nativity, cast and character, regulatory and compensatory and are, therefore, not within the vista of Art. 301, unless…. the tax is a mere pretext designed to injure the freedom of inter-state trade, commerce and intercourse".

The regulatory and compensatory nature of the tax is that the taxing power should be exercised to impose taxes on motor vehicles which use the roads in the State, or are kept for use thereon either throughout the whole area or parts

---

83. Under the National Highways Act, 1956, certain highways have been declared as national except such parts thereof as lie within any municipal area. See entry 23, List I, supra.
84. Entry 24, List I, supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
85. International Tourist Corporation v. State of Haryana, AIR 1981 SC 774 : (1981) 2 SCC 318.
86. For discussion on the concept of a "compensatory" or "regulatory" tax, see, infra, Ch. XV.
87. International Tourist Corporation v. State of Haryana, AIR 1981 SC 774; Manmohan Vig v. State of Haryana, AIR 1981 SC 1035 : (1981) 2 SCC 334.
88. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. A.
89. Infra, Sec. E.
90. Bolani Ores Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1975 SC 17 : (1974) 2 SCC 777.
91. Ibid, 22. For discussion on the expression "regulatory and compensatory" taxes, see, infra, Ch. XV.
92. B.A. Jayaram v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1005.

thereof and are sufficient to make and maintain such roads.[1] The power of taxation under this entry "cannot exceed the compensatory nature which must have some nexus with the vehicles using the roads, viz., public roads". This means that if vehicles do not use the roads notwithstanding that they are registered, they cannot be taxed.[2] The condition that a tax under this entry should be 'regulatory and compensatory' in nature comes in from Art. 301, discussed later.[3]

The power to impose penalty was upheld as being incidental to the main purpose of regulation in State of U.P. v. Sukhpal Singh Bal.[4]

For purposes of taxation, the vehicles in question must be "suitable for use on the roads"; No tax can be levied on vehicles which are not suitable for use on the roads. This means that entry 57 only refers to vehicles "which are reasonably suitable for the road in the sense that an average man could think that plying of the vehicles on the road would be one of the normal uses of the vehicles".[5] Dumpers, rockers and tractors are suitable for use on the roads.[6] Truck chassis, two wheeler scooters, motorcycles, or a three wheeler autorickshaw are all adapted for use on roads. In fact, these vehicles are really meant for use upon roads. Hence all these vehicles are taxable under this entry.[7]

On the question of interpretation of the words "suitable for use on roads" in the entry, the Supreme Court has observed in the Automobile Transport case:[8]

> "The words "suitable for use on roads" describe the kinds of vehicle and not their condition. They exclude from the Entry, farm machinery, aeroplanes, railways etc. which though mechanically propelled are not suitable for use on roads.".

Bihar levied a tax at an annual rate on a manufacturer or a dealer in motor vehicles in respect of motor vehicles in his possession as such manufacture or dealer. Telco manufactured chassis and kept them within the factory premises. Telco argued that the tax did not fall within entry 57. The High Court ruled the tax to be valid. The chassis were suitable for use on roads. They were, in fact, manufactured for use on roads. Since the vehicles were meant to be used on roads maintained by the State at its cost, the tax did have a compensatory character.[9]

A tax on motor vehicles on the basis of their seating capacities has been held valid under this entry.[10]

---

1. The Automobile Transport (Rajasthan) Ltd. v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1962 SC 1406 : 1963 (1) SCR 491.
2. Bolani, supra, footnote 90 at 28.
   Also, G.K. Krishnan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1975 SC 583 : (1975) 1 SCC 375; State of Karnataka v. K. Gopalakrishna Shenoy, AIR 1987 SC 1911 : (1987) 3 SCC 655; Kaushikbhai K. Patel v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1999 Guj. 84. See also Southern Petrochemical Industries Co. Ltd. v. Electricity Inspector & ETIO, (2007) 5 SCC 447 : AIR 2007 SC 1984.
3. Infra, Ch. XV.
4. (2005) 7 SCC 615, at page 622 : AIR 2005 SC 3324.
5. Bolani, supra, at 23.
6. Ibid at 26.
   Also, Central Coal Fields Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1992 SC 1371 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 133.
7. Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co. Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 Pat. 62.
8. Supra, footnote 1, at 1438.
9. Supra, footnote 52.
10. Malwa Bus Service (Pvt.) Ltd. v. State of Punjab, AIR 1983 SC 634 : (1983) 3 SCC 237; East Bihar Regional Bus Union v. State of Bihar, AIR 1998 Pat. 152.

A "lifetime tax" leviable in lump sum in advance for the lifetime of a motor vehicle (four-wheeler) on the basis of the index of "weight-cum-value" has also been held to be valid.[11]

There was a difference of opinion among the High Courts on one aspect of taxation under entry 57. According to Patna High Court tax could be levied on vehicles which are suitable tobe used on the road whether or not it is actually used on the road. The expression "suitable for use on the roads" establishes the nexus between the motor vehicles and the roads which are maintained by the State.[12] On the other hand, the Gujarat High Court took a narrower view of the matter. The court ruled that the tax is not levied on ownership or possession of the motor vehicle. If the vehicle is not used, its owner can claim refund of that tax paid by him in advance. Taxation on motor vehicles can be compensatory only. This means that the State cannot impose tax on vehicles for the purpose of raising revenue. The liability to pay tax cannot exceed the compensatory nature. The tax must have correlation with the use of the road by the vehicle. If a vehicle does not use the road, whatever the reason, it cannot be taxed.[13] The view of Gujarat High Court must be taken to be overruled by the Supreme Court which held in State of Gujarat v. Akhil Gujarat Pravasi V.S. Mahamandal,[14] that a tax under this entry is a tax and not a fee and that the actual use of the public roads of the State cannot be insisted upon for incurring the liability.

A State tax was levied on all motor vehicles 'used or kept for use in the State'. The Supreme Court interpreting this as 'used or kept for use on the public roads of the State' held it valid under this entry as it authorises levy on vehicles suitable for use on roads.

58. Taxes on animals and boats

A State tax on mechanically propelled barges has been upheld as falling under this entry. The State can tax all kinds of boats. Under this entry, barges belong to the family of boats and not ships. There is no reason to confine the term "boats" in this entry to boats which are exclusively propelled by oars.[15]

Entries 24, 25 and 27 in List I,[16] and entries 31 and 32 in List III[17], operate in their own fields and do not entrench upon the subject covered by entry 58, List II.

59. Tolls

Toll is a payment realised for some service, amenity, advantage or benefit, e.g., for the use of a market or bridge or a road.[18]

A State Government is authorised to levy toll under s. 2 of the Indian Tolls Act, 1851. Toll may be levied upon any road or bridge made or repaired at the expense of the Central or the State Government. "For advantage obtained by the

---

11. State of T.N. v. M. Krishnappan, (2005) 4 SCC 53 : AIR 2005 SC 2168.
12. Tata Engineering, supra, AIR 1999 Pat. 62.
13. Kaushikbhai K. Patel v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1999 Guj. 84.
14. (2004) 5 SCC 155, at page 166 : AIR 2004 SC 3894. See also Jai Prakash v. State of U.P., (2004) 13 SCC 390, 398.
15. Panduronga Timblo Industries v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 1194 : (1992) 2 SCC 635.
16. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
17. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
18. P.L. & Lime Stone Co. v. Cantt. Board, AIR 1967 All. 15.

public by the construction of the roads or bridges, the State Government is entitled to reimburse itself for providing the service". The rate of toll must bear a reasonable relationship to the providing of the benefit.[19]

60. Taxes on professions, trades, callings and employment

A tax under the present entry may be imposed on professions, employments including service, and on trades or callings.[20] A tax on pension is a tax on income and not on profession as being a pensioner is not a profession or employment, and so falls outside entry 60.[21]

A tax may be imposed on the subject-matter of the trade, e.g., on each bale of ginned cotton,[22] or on the income arising from trade or profession.[23] But Entry 60 which refers to professions cannot be extended to include services which are taxable exclusively by Parliament.[24] It may be levied on a corporation, company, an artificial person or a natural person. The tax may be in the nature of a licence fee for a trade, or may be determined by the total business turnover even though there is no income.[25]

Taxes on professions, trades, calling and employments flow from Entry 60. Art. 276(1) only clarifies that levy on such tax is not invalid on the ground that it would relates to tax on income. Such power includes power to determine persons who are liable and rate at which tax is to be paid.[26]

The tax may even be of a graduated type, being measured by income derived from a profession and payable only if there is income. Such a tax is very similar to a tax on income which falls in the Union List. The Constitution recognises this overlapping and, to preserve the State power, Art. 276(1) declares that a tax on professions, etc., shall not be invalid on the ground that it relates to a tax on income. Conversely, Art. 276(3) makes it clear that the State power to impose taxes on professions, etc., does not limit in any way the power of Parliament to make laws with respect to taxes on income accruing from or arising out of professions, trades, callings and employments.

The idea underlying Arts. 276(1) and (2) is that the State power to levy tax on professions etc. is not invalid on the ground that it is a tax on income leviable by Parliament; nor is Parliament's power to levy income tax limited by States' power to levy a profession tax. However, to mitigate the evils arising from an overlapping of Central-State taxes on income, Art. 276(2) lays down that the total amount payable by one person to the State or to any one municipality in the State by way of taxes on professions, etc. "shall not exceed two thousand and five hundred rupees per annum".

---

19. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Devi Dayal Singh, (2000) 3 SCC 5 : AIR 2000 SC 961.
20. Shivananjundappa v. State of Karnataka, (1993) 2 MPWN 222; High Court of M.P. Employees' Union v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1997 MP 155.
21. Rajgopalachari v. Corporation of Madras, AIR 1964 SC 1174.
22. Bharat Kala Bhandar v. Dhamangaon Municipality, AIR 1966 SC 249 : (1965) 3 SCR 499; B.M. Lakhani v. Malkapur Municipality, AIR 1970 SC 1005.
23. W.U.P. Electric Power Co. v. Town Area, AIR 1957 All. 433.
24. All-India Federation of Tax Practitioners v. Union of India, (2007) 7 SCC 527, at page 535 : AIR 2007 SC 2990.
25. Hira Lal Ram Kumar v. S.A. Panchayat, AIR 1964 Cal. 590.
26. Karnataka Bank Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, (2008) 2 SCC 254 : (2008) 1 SCALE 660.

It is a condition for the validity of this tax that the imposition does not exceed the maximum amount of Rs. 2500.[27] The Supreme Court has held in Kamta Prasad v. Executive Officer[28] that under Art. 276(2), the State as well as a municipality can separately levy a profession tax up to the maximum amount each on a person. The word 'or' between the 'State' and 'any municipality' is used disjunctively and not 'conjunctively'.

The State can validly levy profession tax on a person running a nursing home or a hospital.[29]

The validity of the 'circumstances and property tax' levied by a district board in Uttar Pradesh was challenged on several grounds, e.g., it was a tax on professions, trades, callings and employments and, therefore, levied under Art. 276(2); that the tax was income-tax, and so belonged to Parliament. The Supreme Court rejected these arguments in R.R. Engineering Co. v. Zila Parishad, Bareilly.[30] The tax was upheld as a tax not on income but on a man's financial position, his status as a whole, depending on his income from trade or business. The tax was referable to entries 49 and 60 in List II,[31] as well as to entry 58.[32] The tax was a composite one, one of its components being the assessee's circumstances by which it meant his financial position, his status as a whole, which depends, inter alia, on his income from his lands and buildings and from his trade or calling. The Court observed in this connection:

> "The fact that the tax on circumstances and property is often levied on calling or property is not conclusive of the nature of the tax; it is only as a matter of convenience that income is adopted as a yardstick or measure for assessing the tax. The measure of the tax is not a true test of the nature of the tax. Considering the pith and substance of the tax, if falls in the category of a tax on a man's financial position, his status taken as a whole and includes what may not be properly comprised under the term 'property' and at the same time ought not to escape assessment".

The Court, however, warned that one of the components of the tax, namely, 'circumstances' itself had components referable to other entries in addition to entry 60, and it should not be construed as conferring an unlimited power on the local authorities to impose disproportionately excessive levies on the assessees. An excessive levy on 'circumstances' would tend to blur the distinction between a tax on 'income' and a tax on 'circumstances'. "Income will then cease to be a mere measure or yardstick of the tax and will become the very subject-matter of the tax."

The Court emphasized that one must have regard to the substance of the matter and not to the form or label. This pronouncement made it possible for the States to by-pass the limit imposed by Art. 276(2) on tax leviable under entry 60. However, a recent pronouncement of the law on the subject in Karnataka Bank Ltd. v.

---

27. Bharat Kala Bhandar v. Municipal Committee, AIR 1966 SC 249 : (1965) 3 SCR 499; Lakhani v. Malkapur Municipality, AIR 1970 SC 1002; Akot Municipality v. Manilal, AIR 1967 SC 1201 : (1967) 2 SCR 100. Karnataka Bank Ltd. v. State of A.P., (2008) 2 SCC 254 : (2008) 1 SCALE 660

28. AIR 1974 SC 685. Also see, Agra Municipality v. A.B.K.O. Association, AIR 1976 SC 160.

29. Dr. Sathurs Sushrushalaya Nursing Home v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1992 Kant. 274.

30. AIR 1980 SC 1088 : (1980) 3 SCC 330.

31. Supra.

32. Supra.

State of A.P.,[33] would appear to indicate a reversion to the law as earlier propounded that a State Legislature is precluded by Art. 276 from making laws enabling the authorities to impose tax on professions, trades, callings, etc. in excess of the amount prescribed by Parliament.

61. Capitation Tax:

It is a tax levied on each head or person.

62. Taxes on luxuries including taxes on entertainments, amusements, betting and gambling

The view that this entry contemplates luxuries, entertainments and amusements as objects on which the tax is to be imposed has been discarded.[34] In Godfrey Phillips India Ltd. v. State of U.P.,[35] it was held that the word "luxuries" in Entry 62 of List II means the activity of enjoyment of or indulgence in that which is costly or which is generally recognised as being beyond the necessary requirements of an average member of society and not articles of luxury including tobacco.

A tax levied by a State on cinema shows is a tax under this entry and not under entry 60. An entertainment tax is dependent upon whether there would or would not be a show in a cinema house. If there is no show, there is no tax. It cannot be regarded as a tax on profession or calling as profession tax does not depend on the exercise of one's profession but only concerns itself with the right to practice.

The words 'entertainments' and 'amusements' are wide enough to include theatres, dramatic performances, cinemas, sports and the like.[36] The entry envisages a tax on the act of entertaining and it may be levied on the giver or the receiver of an entertainment or on both. A tax levied on each show in a cinema house falls under this entry.[37] A tax levied on cinema shows at prescribed rates in a rising scale according to the seating accommodation and the cities where the shows are held has been held to be valid.[38]

A tax was levied on the basis of the percentage of the gross collection capacity per show. Different percentages were prescribed depending on the type of the theatre and the nature of the local area where it was situated. The tax was held valid under this entry.[39] The Supreme Court has ruled that tax on entertainment can be levied by either of the two modes, viz., per payment of admission or gross collection capacity per show and it is for the legislature to decide which mode to adopt.

A person wishing to see a film in a drive-in cinema sitting in his car was required to pay Rs. 2/- more in addition to a tax on his admission to the cinema.

---

33. (2008) 2 SCC 254, at page 266 : (2008) 1 SCALE 660.
34. Western India Theatres v. Cantonment Board, AIR 1959 SC 582 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 63.
35. (2005) 2 SCC 515, at page 540 : AIR 2005 SC 1103; See also State of W.B. v. Purvi Communication (P.) Ltd., (2005) 3 SCC 711 : AIR 2005 SC 1849; Ghodawat Pan Masala Products (I) Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, (2005) 4 SCC 415 : AIR 2005 SC 2909.
36. Corporation of Calcutta v. Liberty Cinema, AIR 1965 SC 1107 : (1965) 2 SCR 477.
37. Western India Theatres v. Cantonment Board, AIR 1959 SC 582 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 63; Delite Talkies v. Jabalpur Corporation, AIR 1966 MP 299.
38. Y.V. Srinivasamurthy v. State of Mysore, AIR 1959 SC 894 : 1957 SCR 874.
39. Venkateshwara Theatre v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1993 SC 1947.

The tax was held valid by the Supreme Court. Applying the principle of pith and substance, the Court ruled that the impugned tax was not a tax on car but on entertainment falling under entry 62, List II. The incidence of the tax was entertainment. Since entertainment necessarily implies the persons entertained, therefore, the incidence of the tax falls on persons entertained. The levy in question was not on the car but on the person being entertained sitting in his car. The word 'entertainment' in entry 62 is wide enough to comprehend within itself the luxury or comfort with which a person entertains himself.[40]

A tax levied on a percentage basis on sums received by way of entry fees by the promoters of a lottery or prize competition of a gambling nature is a tax on betting and gambling under this entry and not a tax on trade or profession under entry 60.[41]

A tax on a wagering contract may fall within this entry. When two parties enter into a contract for sale or purchase of goods at a given price, and for their delivery at a given time, and if they intend not an actual transfer of goods but only to receive the difference according as the market price should vary from the contract price, then it is a wager on the rise or fall of the market which comes within the connotation of gambling.

A tax on forward contracts without reference to the intention of the parties not to take delivery of goods at all would not fall under this entry.[42] A luxury tax can be imposed on tobacco as an item of luxury. Such a tax is not invalid even though an excise tax is levied on tobacco by the Centre.[43]

An expenditure tax levied ad valorem on "chargeable expenditure" incurred in hotels where the room tariff for a unit of residential accommodation was Rs. 400/- per person per day has been held to be not a tax on "luxuries". It is a tax on 'chargeable expenditure' incurred by a person in such hotels. Such a tax does not fall under this entry, as it is a tax on "expenditure" and not on "luxuries".[44]

A State tax on lodging charges in hotels has been held to be valid as a tax on "luxuries". In accordance with the principle that each entry should be given its "fullest meaning and widest scope",[45] the expression "luxuries" in this entry has been broadly interpreted. The Supreme Court has ruled: "The concept of a tax on 'luxuries' in entry 62, List II cannot be limited merely to tax things tangible and corporeal in their aspect as 'luxuries'. "The entry encompasses all the manifestations or emanations, the notion of 'luxuries' can fairly and reasonably be said to comprehend" and that "the element of extravagance or indulgence that differentiates "luxury" from "necessity" cannot be confined to goods and articles. There can be elements of extravagance or indulgence in the quality of services and activities."[46]

---

40. State of Karnataka v. Drive-in-Enterprises, AIR 2001 SC 1328 : (2001) 4 SCC 60.
41. State of Bombay v. R.M.D. Chamarbaugwala, AIR 1957 SC 699 : 1957 SCR 874.
42. Bullion & Grain Exchange Ltd. v. State of Punjab, AIR 1961 SC 268 : (1961) 1 SCR 668.
43. Kaitha Kutta v. Board of Revenue, AIR 1966 Ker 46.
44. Federation of Hotel & Restaurant v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1637 : (1989) 3 SCC 634.
45. See, supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(a); Ch. XI, Sec. B, supra.
46. Express Hotels Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1989 SC 1949 : (1989) 3 SCC 677.
Also see, Western India Theatres Ltd. v. Cantonment Board, Poona Cantonment, AIR 1959 SC 582 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 63; A B Abdul Kadir v. State of Kerala, AIR 1976 SC 182 : (1976) 3 SCC 219; Ramanshree Shopping Arcade Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, AIR 2000 Kant 33.

63. Rates of stamp duty in respect of documents other than those specified in the provisions of List I with regard to rates of stamp duty :

See entry 91 of List I.[47]

The State Legislature may provide for the rates of stamp duty in respect of documents other than those specified in provisions of List I under this entry. Thus the levy and prescription of rates of stamp duty under the Bombay Stamp Act, 1958 on an order of amalgamation passed under Section 394 of the Companies Act, 1956 is constitutional.[48] A provision for pre-deposit pending determination of the market value of property and the proper duty payable, is traceable to this Entry read with Entry 44 of List III as such provisions are for plugging loopholes and for quick realisation of the stamp duty.[49]

66. Fees in respect of any of the matters in this List, but not including fees taken in any court.

Court-fees fall under entry 3 of the List[50] as also market fees in respect of sale and purchase of tobacco within the market area.[51] In State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd it was held that cesses levied on coal-bearing land and on tea plantation land could be upheld by reference to Entry 66 read with Entry 5 of List II.[52]

E. CONCURRENT TAXES

The Concurrent List has only a few tax entries, viz.—

35. Principles on which taxes on mechanically propelled vehicles are to be levied

Under this entry, Parliament as well as the State Legislatures can legislate to lay down principles of taxation in respect of only the mechanically propelled vehicles. Legislation under this entry cannot be made in respect of vehicles which are not mechanically propelled. On the other hand, under entry 57, List II,[53] the States can impose tax on all kinds of vehicles—mechanically propelled or not.

The two entries, viz., 57 in List II and 35 in List III, deal with two different matters though allied ones—one with taxes on vehicles and the other with the principles subject to which such taxes are to be levied. "Taxes on vehicles in their ordinary meaning connote the liability to pay taxes at the rates at which the taxes are to be levied." On the other hand, the expression 'principles of taxation' denotes the rules of guidance in the matter of taxation.

Explaining the relation between entry 57, List II, and entry 35, List III, the Supreme Court has observed in Jayaram[54] that the power to levy taxes on vehicles

---

47. See, supra, Sec. C.
48. Hindustan Lever v. State of Maharashtra ,(2004) 9 SCC 438 : AIR 2004 SC 326.
49. Govt. of A.P. v. P. Laxmi Devi, (2008) 4 SCC 720 : AIR 2008 SC 1640.
50. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E; see, infra, Sec. H.
51. ITC Ltd. v. Agricultural Produce Market Committee, (2002) 9 SCC 232 : AIR 2002 SC 852, overruling ITC Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, 1985 Supp (1) SCR 145
52. (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646; See also Vijayalashmi Rice Mill v. CTO, (2006) 6 SCC 763, at page 767 : AIR 2006 SC 2897.
53. Supra, Sec. D.
54. B.A. Jayaram v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1005 : (1984) 1 SCC 168.

vests solely in the State Legislature, but Parliament may lay down the principles on which taxes may be levied on mechanically propelled vehicles.[55] "In other words, Parliament may lay down the guidelines for the levy of taxes on mechanically propelled vehicles but the right to levy such taxes vests solely in the State Legislature."

Thus, under this entry, only 'principles' for taxation can be laid down; no tax, as such, can be levied. Entry 35, List III, does not confer power to tax but only connotes rules of guidance in the matter of taxation. It is open to Parliament to lay down the principles on which taxes may be levied on mechanically propelled vehicles. So far Parliament has not enacted any law regulating the principles of taxation, or the rules for the guidance of taxation on motor vehicles. The Motor Vehicles Act is only a regulatory measure and does not in any way affect or control the power of the States under entry 57, List II.[56]

The States can levy taxes on mechanically propelled vehicles under entry 57, List II.[57] Thus, each State has the right to make its own law to compensate it for the services, benefits and facilities provided by it for motor vehicles operating within its territory. These taxes have, however, to be regulatory and compensatory in nature.[58]

There are 28 States and 7 Union Territories. As each of them has a right to levy tax on motor vehicles, there may be great difficulties in the way of evolving All-India permits. If a bus has to pay a tax to each State through which it passes, it will impose a heavy burden on inter-State tourist traffic. To overcome such difficulties, and to introduce uniformity of taxation throughout the country, the Centre has been authorised, under entry 35, List III, to lay down principles on which taxes on mechanically propelled vehicles may be levied by the States under entry 57, List II.

44. Stamp duties other than duties or fees collected by means of judicial stamps, but not including rates of stamp duty:

Rates of stamp duties are fixed by Parliament under entry 91, List I[59] on such documents as bills of exchange cheques and debentures etc. Stamp duties in respect of documents not specified in entry 91, List I, are to be fixed by the State Legislatures under entry 63, List II.[60]

A State Legislature can levy stamp duty on the certificate of enrolment of an advocate under this entry read with entry 63 of List II.[61]

---

55. State of Assam v. Labanya Probha Debi, AIR 1967 SC 1575 : (1967) 3 SCR 611.
56. Indian Telephone Industries Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1985 Kant 186; Sharma Transport v. Govt. of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 2002 SC 322 : (2002) 2 SCC 188. The view expressed in M.P. AIT Permit Owners Assn. v. State of M.P., (2004) 1 SCC 320, at page 327 : AIR 2004 SC 981 that the State cannot provide for additional punishment for the same offence arising under Section 66 read with Section 192-A of the MV Act was differed from in Hardev Motor Transport v. State of M.P., (2006) 8 SCC 613 : AIR 2007 SC 839.
57. Supra, Sec. D.
58. Infra, Ch. XV; supra, Sec. D.
59. Supra, Sec. C.
60. Supra, Sec. D.
61. Bar Council, U.P. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 231 : (1973) 1 SCC 261; Hindustan Lever v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 9 SCC 438, at page 446 : AIR 2004 SC 326 supra, Sec. D.

47. Fees in respect of any of the matters in this List, but not including fees taken in any court

In T.N. Godavarman Thirumulpad (87) v. Union of India,[62] a "Compensatory Afforestation Fund" created by notification of the Ministry of Environment and Forests was held to be referable to this Entry read with Entry 20 of List III.

For discussion on the concept of fee, as distinguished from a tax, see, Sec. H, infra.

CONTINUANCE OF STATE TAXING POWER

Article 277 permits continuance of a tax being levied by a State, or a local body, at the commencement of the Constitution in spite of the fact that such a tax falls in the Union List.

The tax may be levied and applied to the same purposes till Parliament makes a law to the contrary. Only the existing range of the taxes is protected and not the expansion of the range of taxation by subjecting new items to it, or by increasing the rates of the tax, or altering is incidence.[63]

The provision seeks to protect the finances of the States and the municipalities from being dislocated by a sudden discontinuance of those taxes which they had been levying earlier, but could no longer levy after the Constitution because these have been allotted to the Centre.

F. NO TAX OUTSIDE THE TAX ENTRIES

Entries 1 to 81 in List I mention the several matters on which Parliament could legislate and entries 82 to 92A, List I enumerate the taxes which Parliament could impose.[64] While the main subject of legislation is included in the first group (1-81), a tax in relation thereto is separately mentioned in the second group (81-92A). Thus, entry 22 in List I deals with Railways, while entry 89 deals with terminal taxes on goods or passengers carried by Railways; entry 41 deals with import and export, and entry 83 with duties of customs; entries 43 and 44 deal with the incorporation and regulation of companies while entry 85 deals separately with corporation tax.

Similarly in List II, entries 1 to 44, form a group comprising the subjects on which States can legislate; entries 45 to 63 deal with taxes. For example, entry 18 is 'land' while entry 45 is 'land revenue'.

From the above, it is clear that taxation is not included in the main subject in which it might, on an extended construction, be regarded as included, but is treated as a distinct matter for purposes of legislative competence. A tax cannot, therefore, be levied outside the specific tax entries enumerated in the three Lists. A tax can be levied only under a 'tax' entry and not under a 'non-tax' entry as an

---

62. (2006) 1 SCC 1, at page 14 : AIR 2005 SC 4256.
63. Amraoti Municipality v. Ramchandra, AIR 1964 SC 1166 : (1964) 6 SCR 947; Firm Surajmal Bansidhar v. Ganganagar Municipality, AIR 1979 SC 246 : (1979) 1 SCC 303.
64. See, supra, Sec. C.

ancillary or incidental matter.[65] Therefore, Parliament's power in respect of inter-State trade and commerce under entry 42, List I, could not be read as including tax on inter-State sales.[66] Similarly, though entry 18, List II, mentions the subject of transfer and alienation of land, it does not include taxation on transfers and alienation of land.[67]

The Mysore Legislature passed a resolution under Art. 252 conferring on Parliament the power to make law in regard to control and regulation of prize puzzle competitions[68] and all matters incidental thereto. Later the Legislature levied a tax on prize competitions. The tax was challenged on the ground that the Legislature had surrendered all its legislative power in regard to prize competitions including the power to tax.

The Supreme Court held that the subject of 'betting and gambling' (entry 34)[69] and the taxes thereon (entry 62)[70] are separate powers, and when control of prize competitions was surrendered to Parliament by the resolution, the power to tax was not surrendered.[71]

As stated earlier,[72] a general legislative entry does not support levy of a tax. For purposes of State taxation, reference is to be made to taxing entries (entries 45 to 63) and not to entries 1 to 44, List II, which support general legislation of a non-taxing nature.[73]

In Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[74] the Supreme Court has decided another significant question, viz.: can the States levy vend fee or duties in respect of industrial alcohol not fit for human consumption? The States have power to regulate the use of alcohol under entry 8, List II. But the Supreme Court has ruled that in the garb of regulation, a State cannot enact a law which is, in pith and substance,[75] fee or levy which has no connection with the cost of expenses for administering the regulation. The levies in question in the instant case were held as not constituting a part of the regulatory measures.

The Supreme Court has further held that under entry 84, List I, all duties of excise save the ones excepted specifically in entry 84, List I, are generally within the taxing power of Parliament. The power of the State Legislatures to levy duties of excise is circumscribed under entry 51, List II. Entry 8, List II, cannot support a tax. Thus, a State law levying a tax or charge or impost on industrial alcohol, i.e., alcohol used and usable for industrial purposes, is unconstitutional.

The State Legislature has no authority to levy duty or tax on alcohol which is not fit for human consumption as that could only be levied by the Centre. This

---

65. Abdul Quader & Co. v. S.T.O., AIR 1964 SC 922 : (1964) 6 SCR 867; Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109. See also Shree Digvijay Cement Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, (2003) 2 SCC 614 : AIR 2003 SC 767.
66. M.P.V. Sundaramier & Co. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1958 SC 468 : 1958 SCR 1422.
67. Gaindi v. Union of India, AIR 1965 Punj. 65.
68. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J.
69. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
70. Supra, Sec. D.
71. R.M.D.C. v. State of Mysore, AIR 1962 SC 594 : (1962) 3 SCR 230; supra, Sec. J.
72. Supra.
73. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
74. AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109.
75. For discussion on the Rule of 'Pith and Substance', see, supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(d).

decision overrules the earlier decision by the Court in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd.[76]

G. RESIDUARY TAXES

Entry 97 in the Union List runs thus:

> "Any other matter not enumerated in List II or List III including any tax not mentioned in either of those Lists."

This entry is further reinforced by Art. 248 which vests in Parliament "exclusive power to make any law with respect to any matter not enumerated in the Concurrent List or the State List." This includes the power to levy residuary taxes along with residuary powers of legislation.

Several taxes have been enacted by Parliament under the residuary entry. The annual deposit scheme has been held to fall under this head. The scheme envisages borrowing of money by the Central Government from the tax-payers in higher income group which is then repaid to them in instalments.[77]

Gift tax falls under the residuary entry. It is not a tax on lands and buildings as units of taxation and so it does not fall under entry 49, List II.[78] What is taxed is the transmission of title by gift, and the value of the land and building is only the measure of the value of the gift. As entry 49 of List II contemplates "a tax directly levied by reason of the general ownership of lands and buildings, it cannot include the gift tax as levied by Parliament". There being no other entry covering a gift tax, it could be levied under the residuary powers of Parliament.[79] An interesting aspect of this case is the formulation of the scope of the residuary entry in the following words:

> "If, however, no entry in any of the three lists covers it, then it must be regarded as a matter not enumerated in any of the three lists. Then it belongs exclusively to Parliament under Entry 97 of the Union List as a topic of legislation."

The expenditure tax also falls in the residuary entry as there is no entry in any List under which it can fall.[80]

In the Diamond Sugar Mills case[81] levy of cess on sugarcane by the States was held invalid by the Supreme Court as not falling under Entry 52, List II. [82] As a consequence, the States were faced with the prospect of refunding huge amounts of money collected by them as such cess. To protect the States from refunding the amount collected through the cess, Parliament enacted an Act levying the cess retrospectively and authorising the States to collect the same on its behalf.

In Jaora Sugar Mills v. State of Madhya Pradesh,[83] the Central Act was held to be a valid exercise of the residuary power. The Supreme Court observed that

---

76. Supra. See also State of UP v. Van Organic Chemicals Ltd., (2004) 1 SCC 225 at page 241 : AIR 2003 SC 4650.
77. Hari Krishna v. Union of India, AIR 1966 SC 619 : (1966) 2 SCR 22.
78. Supra, Sec. D.
79. Second Gift Tax Officer v. D.H. Nazareth, AIR 1970 SC 999 : (1971) 1 SCR 195.
80. Azam Jah v. I.T. Officer, Hyderabad, AIR 1972 SC 2319 : (1971) 3 SCC 621.
81. Diamond Sugar Mills Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1961 SC 652 : (1961) 3 SCR 242.
82. Supra, Sec. D.
83. AIR 1966 SC 416 : (1966) 1 SCR 523.

what Parliament had done in the instant case was not merely to validate the invalid State statutes, but "to make a law concerning the cess covered by the said statutes and to provide that the said law shall come into operation retrospectively". Since the sugarcane cess does not fall within the competence of the States, it must inevitably lie within the Central sphere under the residuary entry. The ratio of this decision was later reiterated by the Court in the decision noted below.[84]

The most significant judicial pronouncement on the scope of residuary power of Parliament is Union of India v. H.S. Dhillon.[85] In this case, a Bench of seven Judges decided questions of far reaching significance as to the taxing powers of Parliament and the State Legislatures.

The question involved in Dhillon was whether the Centre could levy wealth-tax on the assets of a person including agricultural land. Wealth-tax does not fall within the ambit of Entry 49, List II,[86] and so the States could not levy it. Entry 86, List I, has the words "exclusive of agricultural land", and, therefore, that component of the Central law which refers to agricultural land could not come within that entry.[87] The main question, therefore, was whether the tax could be levied under the Centre's residuary power.

The antagonists of the tax argued that the words 'exclusive of agricultural land' in Entry 86, were words of prohibition which meant that Parliament was prohibited from including capital value of agricultural land in any law levying tax on capital value of assets. It was argued that when Parliament was specifically excluded under an entry to make a law on a subject, it could not do so under its residuary power. Another argument was that a matter would fall within Parliament's residuary power only if it is not mentioned in any of the three Lists, and since the subject of wealth-tax has been included in Entry 86, List I, it could not then fall within the residuary, and Parliament must legislate within the scope of entry 86 and could not go beyond the scope of that entry.

This argument found support from the Court's ruling in Nazareth[88] where the Court had taken the view that Parliament could invoke its residuary power only when the subject-matter of the impugned legislation fell under no entry in the three Lists. This meant that what was contained in entry 86, List I, must be excluded from the residuary power. This would mean that since the subject of Wealth Tax was included in entry 86, List I, the residuary power could not be invoked to support the Wealth Tax Act which must be supported only by reference to entry 86, List I. And as this entry excluded agricultural land from the scope of the Wealth Tax, in Dhillon, the Nazareth ruling was challenged.

The three Judges (Minority) on the Bench took the view that the residuary power contained in Art. 248 and Entry 97, List I, means power in respect of matters not enumerated in any of the three Lists. "Such a residuary power cannot,

---

84. Shetkari Sahakari Sakhar Karkhana v. Collector, Sangli, AIR 1979 SC 1972 : (1980) 1 SCC 381.
Also see : In the matters of : District Mining Officer v. Tata Iron & Steel Co., JT 2001(6) SC 183 : (2001) 7 SCC 358.
85. AIR 1972 SC 1061 : (1971) 2 SCC 779.
86. Supra, Sec. D.
87. Supra, Sec. C.
88. Supra, footnote 79.

therefore, be ordinarily claimed in respect of a matter already dealt with under an Article or an entry in any of the three Lists." Once a topic or field of legislation has been enumerated and dealt with in any one of the entries in one of the Lists, there is no question of the residuary provision being resorted to. As the subject of wealth-tax falls within entry 86, List I, it is, therefore, taken out of the residuary field. Parliament cannot levy tax on the capital value of agricultural property either under Entry 86 or under its residuary power. In this view, the Judges drew support from the observations made by the Court in the Nazareth case cited above.

The other four Judges (majority) took a more expansive view of the residuary power of the Centre. These Judges dissented from the Nazareth ruling and took the view that Art. 248 was framed in the "widest possible terms" and so the scope of residuary power was vast. A matter not included in List II or in List III falls within the residuary field. No question need be asked whether the matter falls under List I or not. If the subject-matter does not fall in List II or List III, Parliament has power to legislate on it.

As SIKRI, C.J. observed : "... any matter, including tax, which has not been allotted exclusively to the State Legislatures under List II or concurrently with Parliament under List III, falls within List I, including entry 97 of that List read with Art. 248".

The impugned wealth-tax, therefore, has been justified under entry 97, List I, either exclusively, or read with entry 86, List I. The Court has also ruled that Parliament could supplement its power under an entry in List I with the residuary power to enact a law.[89] By a majority, the Supreme Court upheld the validity of the Wealth Tax Act.

This broad interpretation of the Centre's residuary power has given a new dimension to the powers of the Centre. Whatever is contained in List II and List III is excluded from the residuary power of the Centre. List I and the residuary are supplementary to each other. What is included in List I is not excluded from the residuary power of Parliament. Rather, the Centre can make a law seeking support from both.

Such an interpretation is justifiable so as to avoid any vacuum in the area of legislative powers as would have happened had the restrictive view of the residuary power been adopted by the Court. Undoubtedly, under the Constitution, the totality of the powers distributed between the Centre and the States cover the whole area of self-government within the territory of India. As the Court has observed in Dhillon:

> "It seems to us unthinkable that the constitution-makers, while creating a sovereign democratic republic, withheld certain matters or taxes beyond the legislative competency of the legislatures in this country either legislating singly or jointly."

Service tax levied on services rendered by mandap-keepers was held not to be a tax on land under Entry 49 of List II nor a tax on sale and purchase of goods

---

89. For comments on Dhillon's case see, Alice Jacob, Residuary Power & Wealth Tax on Agricultural Property, 14 J.I.L.I., 80 (1972); I.L.I. Annual Survey of Indian Law (1972), 431. SEERVAI, CONST. LAW OF INDIA, 1265-66 (1976); ANIRUDHA PRASAD, CENTRE & STATE POWERS UNDER INDIAN FEDERALISM 145-53 (1981).

under Entry 54 of List II read with Article 366(29-A)(f) but a tax imposed by Parliament under its residuary powers.[90] The use of electromagnetic waves in giving mobile phone connections was held not to be a sale for the purposes of Entry 54 of List II but part of a service in respect of which only Parliament could levy tax under Entry 97.[91]

The Rubber Act, 1947 (as amended in 1960) imposed new excise duty either on the manufacturers or on the owners of the estates. The constitutional validity of the duty was challenged on the ground that it was imposed on the use of rubber. It was argued that under entry 84, List I, excise duty could be levied only on the actual producers and manufacturers of rubber and not on the consumers or users of that commodity. Holding the levy to be valid, the Court ruled that what was called 'excise duty' on the use of rubber could not fall within entry 84, List I, but it was "a kind of non-descript tax which has been given the nomenclature of the duty of excise" which Parliament has undoubted competence to levy under its residuary power.[92] The Court asserted that under its residuary power, Parliament would have legislative competence even with regard to the imposition of a tax which does not fall within entry 84.

Underlying the significance of the Parliament's residuary power in the context of Indian Federalism, the Supreme Court has observed in Satpal :[93]

> "Complex modern governmental administration in a federal set-up providing distribution of legislative powers coupled with power of judicial review may raise such situations that a subject of legislation may not squarely fall in any specific Entry in List I or List III. Simultaneously, on correct appraisal it may not be covered by any entry in List II, though on a superficial view it may be covered by an Entry in List II. In such a situation, Parliament would have power to legislate on the subject in the exercise of residuary power under Entry 97, List I, and it would not be proper to unduly circumscribe, corrode or whittle down this power by saying that the subject of legislation was present to the mind of framers of the constitution because apparently it falls in one of the entries in List II, and thereby deny power to legislate under Entry 97."

To protect the State taxing powers from being unduly curtailed, the Supreme Court has cautioned in International Tourist Corpn. v. State of Haryana,[94] that before exclusive competence is claimed for Parliament to levy a tax under its residuary power, the legislative incompetence of the State Legislature must be clearly established. Parliament's residuary power is not to be interpreted so expansively as to whittle down the power of the State Legislatures. If there is a competing entry in List II vis-a-vis entry 97 in List I, the entry in the State List must be given a broad and plentiful interpretation. In this case, the Court rejected the argument that a tax on passengers and goods carried on national highways would fall under Parliament's residuary power. The Court ruled that such a tax falls under entry 56, List. II.[95]

---

90. T.N. Kalyana Mandapam Assn. v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 632 : AIR 2004 SC 3757; See also Gujarat Ambuja Cements Ltd. v. Union of India, (2005) 4 SCC 214 : AIR 2005 SC 3020. See also supra under Service Tax

91. Bharat Sanchar Nigam Ltd. v. Union of India, (2006) 3 SCC 1, at page 30 : AIR 2006 SC 1383.

92. Jullundur Rubber Goods Manufacturers' Association v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1589 : (1969) 2 SCC 644.

93. Satpal & Co. v. Lt. Governor of Delhi, AIR 1979 SC 1950.

94. AIR 1981 SC 774 : (1981) 2 SCC 318.

95. Supra, Sec. D.

Similarly, in The State of West Bengal v. Kesoram Industries Ltd.,[1] education cess assessed and computed on the basis of value of coal produced from coal-bearing land and rural employment cess on the basis of dispatches from tea estates by the State of West Bengal were held to be legislatively competent under Entry 49 of List II which provides for taxes on land and buildings and not within the residuary power of legislation in the field of taxation under Entry 97 List I.

Parliament enacted the Expenditure Tax Act, 1987, to levy an expenditure tax at 10% ad valorem on "chargeable expenditure" incurred in hotels where the room tariff for a unit of residential accommodation was Rs. 400/- per day per person. The tax was payable by the person incurring the chargeable expenditure in such hotels. The constitutional validity of the tax was challenged on the ground that it was either a tax on 'luxuries' falling under entry 62, List II, or on 'sale or purchase of goods' falling under entry 54, List II and, thus, fell outside the Parliament's legislative sphere. On the other hand, the Centre supported the tax under its residuary power.

The Supreme Court upheld the tax in Federation of Hotel & Restaurant v. Union of India.[2] The Supreme Court ruled that the tax in question fell under the residuary power of Parliament as it was a tax on 'expenditure' and not on 'luxuries'. During the course of its judgment, the Court said regarding the Centre-State distribution of powers that "the constitutionality of the law becomes essentially a question of power which in a federal Constitution ..... turns upon the construction of the entries in the legislative lists".[3] The responsibility to interpret the entries lies with the Supreme Court in the scheme of the Indian federal system. Further, the Court has also reiterated the proposition that 'these subjects which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within the power of a particular legislature may in another aspect and for another purpose fall within another legislative power".

At times, the Centre has used its residuary power to enable the States to levy and collect such taxes as are found to be beyond their legislative competence. One such example has already been mentioned above, e.g. Parliament has used its residuary power to validate State levy of sugarcane cess.[4] A cess on the water consumed by any local authority and every person carrying on any specified industry levied by Parliament through the Water (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Cess Act, 1977, has been held to be valid as a residuary tax.[5]

Reference may be made in this connection to P. Kannadasan v. State of Tamil Nadu[6] Some State Legislatures enacted provisions laying cesses/taxes on minerals under entry 50, List II. This tax was held invalid by the Supreme Court in India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu[7] on the ground that the States were incompetent to levy the tax in view of the passage by Parliament of the Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Development) Act made in terms of entry 54, List I.[8]

---

1. (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646 (see supra under Entry 49 List II).
2. AIR 1990 SC 1637 : (1989) 3 SCC 634.
3. AIR 1990 SC at 1647.
4. Supra, see, Jaora Sugar Mills, footnote 83.
5. Municipal Corp., Jullundur City v. Union of India, AIR 1981 P&H 287.
6. AIR 1996 SC 2560 : (1996) 5 SCC 670.
7. (1990) 1 SCC 12 : AIR 1990 SC 85.
8. This view has been substantially upset in State of West Bengal v. Kesoram Industries (supra). For details, see, supra, Sec. D.

The financial position of the States would have become precarious if they had to refund the money collected over the years. Therefore, Parliament which had the power to levy the tax in question came to the rescue of the States. Parliament passed a validation Act saying that the invalidated provisions in the State laws would be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament and would remain in force till the date the Central Act was enacted. The Supreme Court upheld the validity of the Central Act in Kamadasan, mentioned above. The effect of the Act was that the relevant provisions of the State laws were "individually and specifically enacted by Parliament'.

COMMENTS

The scheme of allocation of taxing powers in India has been drawn with the following considerations in view:

(a) the Centre should have adequate resources at its command so as to be able to meet its high functions of defence, etc.

(b) The convenience of tax collection: which agency—Centre or State—may levy and collect what tax from the point of view of administrative convenience, efficiency and effectiveness. Therefore, taxes having a localized base have been entrusted to the States and taxes having a national base have been entrusted to the Centre.

(c) Taxes where it is desirable to maintain uniformity of incidence throughout the country have been allotted to the Centre, e.g., stamp duties on negotiable instruments, taxes on transactions in stock exchanges.

(d) Taxes of which the tax-base, or incidence is not localised but extends beyond the confines of one State, or where aggregation may be necessary for purposes of levy of tax on a progressive basis, have been given to the Centre, for example income-tax can be collected easily on an all-India basis because a person may carry on business in several States and derive income therefrom. Similarly, customs duties may be collected most effectively by the Centre at the ports; the estate duty may be levied effectively by the Centre as a person may die leaving behind property in several States.

(e) Keeping economic development of the country in view, those taxes which have a close relationship with national economy, and which, if allotted to the States may create clogs on economic development, or may interfere with the movement of inter-State trade or commerce or development of a common market in India, have been allotted to the Centre, e.g., excise duties or tax on inter-State sales. Thus, only taxes of a local nature have gone to the States.

A merit of the Indian scheme is that it seeks to avoid the complexities of overlapping and multiple taxation such as have arisen in other federations. Most of these problems arise because the Centre and the States have a large concurrent taxing area and simultaneously levy many taxes of the same kind on the same tax-base.

The key-note of the Indian Constitution is to secure an almost complete separation between Centre-State taxing powers so that a tax leviable by the Centre is not leviable by the States. The two cannot simultaneously levy a similar tax on the same tax-base. This has avoided the conflicts between the Centre and the States resulting in overlapping taxation. Also, taxes having as their tax-base, transactions or interests which are not localised in one State but may have nexus with more than one State, like income-tax on non-agricultural income, or corporation tax, or succession duty on non-agricultural property, have been given to the Centre and this has avoided multiple taxation of the same base by several governments.

One specific example may be cited to clarify the position. Railways are a Central undertaking and the responsibility to fix passenger fares rests on the Central Government. Tax on railway fares directly affects the railway fares and, therefore, it is desirable to have some co-ordination between the fares charged and the tax levied on them.

This consideration alone suggests that such a tax should be with the Central Government. But other factors also make this necessary. Suppose it is given to the States, then the rates of taxation might vary from State to State. There would also arise problems of allocation and collection. If a person travels over a long distance involving a journey through several States, then each State would seek to levy a tax on the portion of journey through it which would make calculations difficult. Then, which State would collect the tax—the one in which a journey originates or the one in which it ends; if one State collects, then it will have to apportion the same among other States through which the journey passes. To avoid these complications the levy of the tax is given to the Centre.

Such an allocation of taxing powers between the Centre and the States has largely succeeded in avoiding in India the inter-State and Centre-State competition for taxation and conflicts of jurisdiction which other federal countries are faced with. It was a wise step on the part of the Constitution-makers, for the underdeveloped economy of the country could ill-afford the luxury of inter-governmental conflicts for taxation as the taxing capacity of the people is extremely limited, and they form the least potential tax paying community in the world.

With the resources of the country being low and limited, and its needs relatively high, it was necessary to avoid inter-governmental competition in the tax field which, apart from causing inconvenience to tax-payers, would have seriously diminished the productivity of the taxes, which the country could ill afford. Multiple taxation places unduly high burdens on private enterprise and creates a lack of uniformity and efficiency in the tax burdens from State to State. Inter-State competition for revenue leads to litigation and administrative difficulties, raising costs of tax compliance and tax collection. The possibility of inter-State migration of wealth and industry comes into existence. The framers of the Indian Constitution have avoided most of these problems by judiciously distributing the taxing powers between the Centre and the States.

A criticism against the rigid scheme of Centre-State separation of taxing powers can be that in an emergency like war, the Centre might feel handicapped in raising the revenue it might require for its needs are bound to be higher in war-time than in peace-time, and the enumeration of Central taxing powers would hardly leave to it any manoeuverability in emergencies. The Indian Constitution, however, makes adequate provisions for meeting such a contingency. A two-thirds majority resolution by the Council of States enables the Centre to legislate for a year on any State subject-matter.[9] In serious situations, declaration of an emergency by the Centre enables it to levy any tax for the duration of the emergency.[10] In this way, if need be, the Centre can even levy those taxes which in normal times fall to the State sphere.

Although the scheme drawn by the framers of the Constitution for the division of the Centre-State taxing powers has several merits, viz., it makes for economic tax collection, avoids harassment to the tax-payers by avoiding multiple and overlapping taxation and conflicts of Centre-State jurisdiction, and keeps the interests of national economy in view, still the framers could not take these principles to their logical end in drawing the scheme and had to make a few compromises which militate, to some extent, against these principles and give rise to several anomalies. A few examples may be given here.

(a) The power to levy estate duty and succession duty has been divided between the Centre and the States according as the property is non-agricultural or agricultural.[11]

This constitutional division of taxing authority between the Centre and the States cannot result in having a comprehensive system of death taxation. However, the inconvenience and irrationality of this aspect of the matter has been sought to be corrected by other arrangements.[12]

(b) Similarly, income-tax has been divided between the Centre and the States according to the taxable income being non-agricultural or agricultural.[13]

It is an anomaly that a subject of taxation, which on the basis of the principle of progression and aggregation should have been one integral whole, has been so divided. It would be inequitable to tax merely the non-agricultural income leaving agricultural income untaxed or taxed lightly by the States. The inequity could be illustrated by means of an example. Suppose X's net income in a year is Rs. 10,000 all non-agricultural, while Y's net income is the same but wholly agricultural, and Z's income of Rs. 10,000 may be partly agricultural (Rs. 5,000) and partly non-agricultural (Rs. 5,000). X is subject to a Central income-tax. Z's Rs. 5000 would be subject to a Central tax but the progression of rate applicable to him is bound to be lower than that applicable to X, and Z's agricultural income of Rs. 5,000 may either go wholly untaxed, or be taxed by the State at a much lower figure than his non-agricultural income. In any case, even if both the Centre and the State levy the income-tax, the total liability of Z may still be less than that of X, for while X's income is being taxed as one unit, Z's income will be bifurcated into two parts, and the rate applicable to each of the parts would be less than the rate applicable to the whole income taken as one unit. Y may go completely untaxed if the State is not levying the income-tax. Even if he is taxed, the rate applicable may not be as steep as is applied by the Centre to non-agricultural income.

The best thing would have been to give to the Centre the entire power of levying death duties and income taxation, but that would have appreciably re-

---

9. Art. 249, Ch. X, Sec. J, supra.
10. Art. 250, Ch. X, Sec. J, and Art. 352, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
11. Supra, see entries 87 and 88, List I and entries 47 and 48, List II; Secs. C and D, supra.
12. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J.; Also see, supra, Sec. G.
13. Supra. Entry 82, List I and entry 46, List II, supra, Secs. C and D.

duced the powers of the States. But since both the Central taxes are shared taxes, as is explained below,[14] there should not have been much of an objection to centralization of this field. While the area of death duties has been co-ordinated and the problems of divided jurisdiction solved,[15] similar problems in the area of income-tax remain.

The levying of an agricultural income-tax is a politically loaded question for the States, as the majority of voters live in the country-side and that is why the States are reluctant to cultivate this field. However, in view of the present-day political complexion of the country, any adjustments in taxing powers, which will reduce States' power, is not feasible. Some of the anomalies can be solved by more and more States levying agricultural income-tax at rates parallel to those levied by the Centre. It may also be better to have some provision of aggregation of income with a possibility of credit by one government for the tax paid to the other government. To achieve this, Centre-State co-ordinated effort is needed.

(c) Another anomaly is the allocation of 'excise' to the Centre and 'sales tax' to the States. Both are taxes on consumption and tend to push up prices of consumer goods on which they are levied.

It is felt that some steps should be taken to co-ordinate the two taxes. Some limited steps have been taken in this respect in case of a few commodities, but the major problem still remains.[16]

The problem is becoming serious as both these taxes are being levied progressively at higher levels. The Fourth Finance Commission was asked to suggest if a ceiling could be prescribed on State sales taxes. But the Commission failed to evolve any formula and suggested mutual agreement between the Centre and the States.[17]

(d) The States' powers to levy sales tax or tax on carriage of goods, etc., also create problems in the way of flow of trade and commerce.[18] The fact is that the Indian economy tends to be national and, thus, local taxation thereof creates problems. Businessmen resent sales tax because of the problems of inter-State sales taxation.

(e) Similarly, taxation of motor vehicles by the States hampers the evolution of an All-India transportation system.

If prohibition policy is seriously implemented, States would lose excise revenue which is sizeable at present. States have successfully used their power to tax land to raise revenue by taxing mineral bearing lands.[19] The Supreme Court has, on the whole, so far sought to give a liberal interpretation to the taxing powers of the States.

H. FEES

There is no generic difference between a 'tax' and a 'fee', but the Indian Constitution distinguishes between the two concepts for legislative purposes.

---

14. Infra, Sec. K(i).
15. See under entry 88, List I, supra, Sec. C.
16. Infra, Sec. K.
17. Report, 38-45 (1965).
18. Infra, Ch. XV.
19. See Supra Sec. D.

Each List has a number of tax entries, but at the end also has an entry authorising levy of fees in respect of any of the matters included in the List. For example, entry 96, List I, reads : "Fees taken in respect of any of the matters within this List but not including fees taken in any court."[20] Similarly, entry 66, List II, runs: "Fees in respect of any of the matters in this List, but not including fees taken in any court".[21] Entry 47, List III, is also couched in similar terms as the other two entries mentioned above.[22]

The expression "any of the matters in this list" necessarily includes also the entries relating to taxation. This means that a fee may be levied even under an enactment relating to the imposition of a tax. For example, under entry 54, List II, a tax can be levied on the sale or purchase of goods. But licences are issued to dealers for permitting them to carry on business of buying and selling goods, and a licence-fee may be charged for the purpose.

It would appear from the above that the scope for levying fees is much broader than that for levy of taxes. Whereas a tax is to be confined to the few specific tax entries in each List,[23] a fee can be levied in respect of all the entries—tax or non-tax—in the three Lists by the concerned Legislature. The first important incident of the difference between 'tax' and 'fee' is that whereas no tax can be levied outside the tax entries, fees can be levied in respect of a non-tax entry as well. As for example, a State levy on public trusts is invalid as a 'tax' as there is no such tax entry, but it is valid as a 'fee' under entry 47 of List III. A fee may be levied even under a law relating to the imposition of a tax, e.g., licence fee charged from dealers under the Sales Tax Acts.

Another significant difference between "fee" and "tax" is that Arts. 110(2) and 199(2) which deal with 'Money Bills' lay down expressly that a Bill will not be deemed to be a 'Money Bill' by reason only that it provides for the imposition of fines, or the demand or 'payment of fees' for licences, or 'fees for services rendered,' whereas a Bill dealing with imposition or regulation of a tax will always be regarded as a Money Bill.[24] These provisions should, however, be read as excluding from the category of Money Bills not every 'licence fee' but only such as does not amount to a 'tax'. In some situations, a tax can be collected in the form of a licence fee and this could not be exempted from the definition of a Money Bill. The use of the term 'licence fee' in a statute is not decisive of the nature of the levy in question.

This, therefore, raises the question as to how to distinguish between a 'tax' and 'fee'. Over a period of time, as the following discussion will show, there has occurred a sea change in the approach of the Supreme Court towards identifying a levy as 'fee'.

To begin with, the Court adopted a restrictive view of 'fee' and promoted the theory of quid pro quo between the 'fee' charged and the 'service' rendered in lieu thereof. This was followed by a period when the Court by and large shed this restrictive approach and more or less gave up the quid pro quo theory adopting the approach of regulatory nature of a 'fee'. This gave a far greater leeway to the

---

20. Supra, Sec. C.
21. Supra, Sec. D.
22. Supra, Sec. E.
23. Supra, Sec. F.
24. See, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(c) and Ch. VI, Sec. F(ii), supra.

legislatures in the matter of levying fees for various purposes. Of late, the Courts have reverted more to the earlier view without insisting on an exact proof of quid pro quo.

(a) Theory of quid pro quo

To begin with, the Supreme Court propounded the view that a tax is a compulsory exaction of money by a public authority for public purposes, to meet the general expenses of the State without reference to any special benefit to be conferred upon the tax-payers. The taxes collected are merged in the general revenue and applied for general public purposes. Fees, on the other hand, are payments for some special service rendered, or some work done, for the benefit of those from whom payments are demanded. Thus, in fees, there is always an element of quid pro quo which is absent in a tax. The Court treats quid pro quo i.e., some service rendered to the payer of the fee, as an essential element of the concept of fee.

A payment would be a fee if it fulfils the following two elements :

(1) it must be levied in consideration of certain services rendered to the individuals by some governmental agency; and

(2) payments demanded for rendering such services should be kept apart, or specifically appropriated for that purpose, and not merged in the general revenue to be spent for general purposes.

If the funds are kept separate from the general funds, then they can be used for the service for which they have been collected. If any balance is left in a year, then it can be spent later on the same service. But if the fee receipts are mixed up with the general funds, then the surplus may get lost and the fee collected for specific service may not be fully utilised for that service. In Swamiar[25], the Supreme Court observed in this connection:

> "... in a fee it is some special benefit accruing to the individual which is the reason for payment in the case of fees; in the case of a tax, the particular advantage if it exists at all is an incidental result of state action. As fee is a sort of return or consideration for services rendered, it is absolutely necessary that the levy of fees should, on the face of the legislative provision, be correlated to the expenses incurred by Government in rendering the services..."

In the instant case, a levy on religious institutions was held to be a 'tax' and not 'fee' because the money raised was not earmarked for defraying the expenses in performing the services. The collections went to the State Consolidated Fund out of which were met the expenses of the Commissioner. There was no correlation between the expenses incurred by the Government and the contributions raised, and, thus, the theory of return or quid pro quo did not apply. In the instant case, the percentage of contribution leviable was graded according to the income derived by the institution. The levy being a tax was held unconstitutional as it did not fall under any tax-entry in List II.

It is to be seen that the most restrictive view of 'fee' was propounded by the Supreme Court in the Swamiar case. Thereafter, the Court gradually relaxed its approach as is evident from the following discussion.

---

25. Commr., H.R.E. v. L.T. Swamiar, AIR 1954 SC 282 : 1954 SCR 1005.

An Orissa Act laid down that every temple having income exceeding Rs. 250 should make an annual contribution, on a percentage basis of the income, for meeting the expenses of the Commissioner of Hindu Religious Endowments and his staff—the machinery set up for the due administration of the affairs of religious institutions. The collections were to form a separate fund and were in consideration of the service rendered by the Commissioner, viz., to ensure proper application of the endowment funds. The levy was held to be 'fee'.[26]

A levy on lessees of coal mines to meet the expenditure for providing amenities like communication, water supply and electricity for the better development of the mining area, and to meet the welfare of the labour employed, has been held to be a 'fee'.[27] The money raised was kept in a separate fund out of which the amenities were to be provided. The Court asserted that in case of fee, there must always be correlation between the fee collected and the service to be rendered.

To make a levy a fee, the services rendered for it must benefit, confer advantage on, the person who pays the levy. A mere control exercised on the activities of the person paying the levy, so as to make these activities more onerous, is not such a service rendered to him as to make the levy a 'fee'.[28] A mere inspection of cinema houses twice a year with a view to ensure that the terms of the license were observed does not amount to rendering service to the owners of cinemas and so the levy for the purpose cannot be regarded as a 'fee' as there was no correlation between the amount of levy with the costs of any service. The Supreme Court ruled that fees for licence and fees for services rendered were envisaged to be different kinds of levy. Thus, the Court distinguished between fees for services rendered and those for regulatory purposes.[29]

In Indian Mica & Micanite Industries v. State of Bihar,[30] the Supreme Court laid emphasis on three elements: (i) to be a fee, the State should render some service to those from whom the fee is charged; (ii) a mere regulation of trade in public interest is no service to the person required to pay the levy; (iii) the fee charged is to have a reasonable correlation with the expenses incurred in rendering the service, i.e., the levy must be a quid pro quo for the service rendered.

But in such matters. it is not possible to have an exact correlationship. The correlation may, however, be of a 'general character' and not of 'arithmetical exactitude'. The correlationship between the services rendered and the levy of fee is essentially a question of fact. It is for the State to place materials before the court to show what service is being rendered to the person required to pay the levy, what is the probable cost being incurred thereon and how much amount is being realised by way of fees. Where the State supervision is meant only to see that tax is not evaded, the State renders no service to the concerned person but serves its own interest. In this case, the Court emphasized that generally speaking by granting a licence, the State does not confer any privilege or benefit on any one. All that it does is to regulate a trade, business and profession in public inter-

---

26. Jagannath v. State of Orissa, AIR 1954 SC 400 : 1954 SCR 1046.
Also see, Ratilal v. State of Bombay, AIR 1954 SC 388 : 1954 SCR 1055; S.T. Swamiar v. Commr., H.R.E., AIR 1963 SC 966 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 302.

27. Hingir-Rampur Coal Co. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1961 SC 459 : (1961) 2 SCR 537.

28. Cooverji B. Bharucha v. Excise Commr., AIR 1954 SC 220 : 1954 SCR 873.

29. Corporation of Calcutta v. Liberty Cinema, AIR 1965 SC 1107 : (1965) 2 SCR 477.
Also see, infra, footnote 49.

30. AIR 1971 SC 1182 : (1971) 2 SCC 236.

est. It will thus be seen that the Court did not envisage that a 'fee' could be levied merely for regulatory purposes.

Under a State law, a fee was payable by sugar mills to the Cane Development Council which was to perform certain services to the mills. The Supreme Court held that no fee was payable by the mills for the period when the council was not in existence as no service was rendered to the mills.[31]

Water charges levied by a municipality as a percentage of annual rateable value of building constitute a tax on lands and buildings, falling under entry 49 of List II,[32] but amount to 'fee' when levied according to the quantity of the water consumed.[33]

In Nagar Mahapalika, Varanasi v. Durga Das,[34] a licence fee on owners and drivers of rickshaws was held invalid, for the amount collected thereby was much larger than the expenses incurred by the Board to render services to the rickshaw owners and drivers. Here the concept of quid pro quo was applied very strictly. An interesting feature of the case is that the amount spent by the Mahapalika on discharging its statutory duties was not taken into consideration for, as the Court said, "Licence fee cannot be imposed for reimbursing the cost of ordinary municipal services which the Municipal Board was bound under the statute to provide to the general public."

The same principle was applied in Govt. of Andhra Pradesh v. H.M.T.[35] The Supreme Court ruled that the totality of statutory functions of a gram panchayat could not justify a fee. There should be services rendered individually to the person on whom the fee is imposed.

The fee payable by a factory owner under the Factories Act has been held to be a 'fee' as the inspection carried on by the inspectors confers benefit on the factory owners as well. A large number of provisions in the Act, particularly those dealing with safety, involve a good deal of technical knowledge. During the course of discharging their duties, the inspectors give proper advice and guidance which avoid many accidents. The bulk of the licence fees realised is actually spent on services rendered to the factory owners.[36]

In State of Maharashtra v. Salvation Army,[37] the Court again emphasized upon the correlation between the fee charged and the service rendered. The Court observed:[38]

> "As a fee is regarded as a sort of return or consideration for services rendered, it is necessary that the levy of fees should be correlated to the expenses incurred by the agency in rendering the services".

The Court insisted that two elements were essential for a levy to be regarded as a fee: (1) it is levied in consideration of certain services which the individuals accept either willingly or unwillingly; (2) it must not go to the general revenue of

---

31. Jaora Sugar Mills v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1966 SC 416 : 1966 (1) SCR 523.
32. Kendriya Nagrik Samiti, Kanpur v. Jal Sansthan, AIR 1982 All. 406; supra, Sec. D.
33. Nizam S. Factory v. Bodhan Municipality, AIR 1965 AP. 91.
34. AIR 1968 SC 1119 : (1968) 3 SCR 374.
35. AIR 1975 SC 2037 : (1975) 2 SCC 274.
36. Delhi Cloth & General Mills v. Chief Commn., Delhi, AIR 1971 SC 344 : (1970) 2 SCC 172.
37. AIR 1975 SC 846 : (1975) 1 SCC 509.
38. Ibid, at 851.

the State but be earmarked to meet the expenses on the service rendered. The Court insisted that the "fee must, as far practically as possible, be commensurate with the service rendered". In this case, a 2% charge being levied on charities to meet the expenses of the charity commissioner was held to be ultra vires since 1970 as there was a surplus of 54 lakh rupees. The Court ruled that in fixing the fee regard must be had to the surplus.

The concept of quid pro quo was very strictly applied by the Supreme Court in State of Andhra Pradesh v. Hindustan Machine Tools Ltd.:[39] The Court observed:

> "One cannot take into account the sum total of the activities of a public body like a gram panchayat to seek justification for the fees imposed by it. The expenses incurred by a Gram Panchayat or a municipality in discharging its obligatory functions are usually met by the imposition of a variety of taxes. For justifying the imposition of fees the public authority has to show what services are rendered or intended to be rendered individually to the particular persons on whom the fee is imposed."

In the Chief Commissioner, Delhi v. Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co. Ltd.,[40] a registration fee charged on the percentage basis on the registration of debentures was held bad. The Court found that the registration fee realised had no correlation with the expenditure incurred on maintenance, registration, organisation, etc., and also that the fees realised formed part of the general revenues of the State.

In Kewal Krishan v. State of Punjab,[41] while the Supreme Court held that market fee could be levied on an ad valorem basis on the agricultural produce bought or sold by the licensees in the notified market area, it did emphasize that a substantial portion of the fee realized must be spent for rendering services to the licensees in the notified market area in relation to the transaction of purchase or sale of the agricultural produce. Utilisation of the fund for an ulterior purpose, howsoever benevolent or charitable, cannot be permitted, otherwise the whole concept of 'fee' would collapse. There is the principle of quid pro quo between the payer of the fee and the authority charging it, for the validity of the fee charged. But this principle cannot be satisfied by rendering some remote service. The special service rendered must be to the payer of the fee. Though it may not be an exact equivalent of the fee with a mathematical precision, yet it must be established broadly and reasonably by the fee charging authorities that the amount is being spent for rendering services to those on whom falls the burden of the fee.

In the instant case, the Court found some of the purposes mentioned in the Act for which the fee collected could be spent to be impermissible, such as, propaganda in favour of agricultural improvements and thrift; production and betterment of agricultural produce or imparting education in agriculture, etc. Also, taking a reasonable and practicable view on the basis of facts and figures placed before the Court, it ruled that a rate of 2% rather than 3% was sustainable on the basis of legal expenditure in relation to the market fee income.[42]

---

39. AIR 1975 SC 2037, 2044 : (1975) 2 SCC 274.
40. AIR 1978 SC 1181 : (1978) 2 SCC 367.
41. AIR 1980 SC 1008 : (1980) 1 SCC 416.
42. In Ram Chandra Kailash Kumar & Co. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 1124 : 1980 Supp SCC 27, a market fee of 1% on the price of agricultural produce sold was held valid subject to rendering adequate service by market committees.
Also, Sajjan Mills Ltd. v. Krishi Upaj Mandi Samiti, Ratlam, AIR 1981 MP 30; M.N. Aggarwal v. Krishi Upaj Mandi Samiti, Itarsi, AIR 1983 MP 126.

In the case noted below,[43] the Supreme Court has again distinguished between a 'fee' and a 'tax'. The 'fee' is levied under entry 66, List II, by a State. The power to levy fee is co-extensive with its powers to legislate with respect to substantive matters and fee is levied with respect to the services which would be rendered by a State under such a law. A fee is payment levied by an authority in respect of services performed by it for the benefit of the payer. On the other hand, a tax is payable for the common benefits conferred by the Authority on all tax payers. "A fee is a payment made for some special payment made for some special benefit enjoyed by the payer and the payment is proportional to such benefit. Money raised by fee is appropriated for the performance of the service and does not merge in the general revenue."

The Court has observed further: "While there is no quid pro quo between a taxpayer and the authority in case of a tax, there is a necessary correlation between fee collected and the service intended to be rendered. Of course the quid pro quo need not be understood in mathematical equivalence but only in a fair correspondence between the two. A broad correlationship is all that is necessary."[44] In the instant case, the levy in question was held to be a tax as there was no quid pro quo.

In course of time, the Supreme Court started taking a more flexible and extended view of the concept of 'fee'. For example, it was said that it is not an essential element of a fee that it should be credited to a separate account and not to the Consolidated Fund. In this connection, attention has been drawn to Art. 266 and so it has been observed that if services rendered are not by a separate body like the Charity Commissioner, but by a government department, the character of the imposition would not change even if credited to the Consolidated Fund.[45]

In Shri Admar Mutt v. Commr., H.R. & C.E.,[46] the Court upheld a fee varying from 3 to 5% of the annual income of a religious institution payable to the Commissioner of Religious Endowments because the total collections were just equal to the department's total expenditure. The Supreme Court, however, observed that a levy would not become a tax merely because of the absence of uniformity in its incidence, or because of compulsion in its collection, or because some contributors do not obtain the same degree of services as others may. A mathematical equivalence between fees paid and service rendered is not required. This was a case where fees were chargeable according to the paying capacity and not according to the service rendered to each individual institution as there were many institutions which received the service but had very little paying capacity. The judicial opinion in this case does indicate some flexibility in the theory of nexus between the service rendered and the fee charged.

In Southern Pharmaceuticals v. State of Kerala,[47] a levy on the supply of rectified spirit to the manufacturers of toilet and medicinal preparations was justified

---

43. Sri Krishna Das v. Town Area Committee, Chirgaon, AIR 1991 SC 2096 : (1990) 3 SCC 645.
44. Ibid, at 2104.
45. State of Rajasthan v. Sajjanlal, AIR 1975 SC 706; Sreenivasa General Traders v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 1246 : (1983) 4 SCC 353.
46. AIR 1980 SC 1 : (1979) 4 SCC 642.
47. AIR 1981 SC 1863 : (1981) 4 SCC 391.

as a fee. 'Fee' can be payable 'as a condition of a right to carry on a business.' No one has a fundamental right to the supply of rectified spirit which is an intoxicating liquor. Its supply is regulated by the State from a distillery or a spirit ware-house.[48] A fee may be charged for the privilege or benefit conferred, or service rendered, or to meet the expenses connected therewith. "It is in consideration for the privilege, licence or service". A manufacturer of preparations using alcohol may have to bear the cost of establishment. The government may deploy supervisory staff in a bonded manufactory for its own protection to prevent the leakage of revenue, but the licensee also receives a service in return. The Court clarified that merely because the collections are taken to the Consolidated Fund of the State and are not the separately apropriated towards the expenditure for rendering the service is not by itself decisive of the nature of the levy.

The Court also observed in the instant case that the element of quid pro quo stricto sensu was not always a sine qua non of a fee. This statement does indicate a new approach, a break from the past, somewhat liberalization of the judicial approach towards the concept of fee.

A good example of the liberal judicial view of the concept of fee is furnished by the Supreme Court pronouncement in Delhi Municipality v. Mohd. Yasin[49] where the concept of 'service rendered' for a 'fee' was very much diluted. The municipality enhanced 8 times the fee chargeable for slaughtering animals at its slaughter houses. The expenditure shown in the municipal budget under the item slaughter houses was much less than the anticipated collection from the enhanced fees. The municipality, however, argued that the budget only showed the items incurred directly and exclusively on slaughter houses but, in addition, there were several other items in the budget which included expenditure incurred in connection with them. The Delhi High Court held the enhancement in fees as invalid but the Supreme Court, on appeal, held the same to be valid.

According to the Supreme Court, fee is a payment for services rendered, benefit provided or privilege conferred. The relation between the fee and services rendered or advantages conferred need not be direct, "a mere causal relation may be enough". Neither the incidence of the fee nor the service rendered need be uniform. That others, besides those who pay the fees are benefited, does not detract from the character of the fee. "The special benefit or advantage to the payers of the fees may even be 'secondary' as compared with the primary motive of regulation in the public interest." "Quid pro quo in the strict sense is not the one and only true index of a fee; nor is it necessarily absent in a tax." Expenditure need not be incurred "directly or even primarily in connection with the special benefit or advantage conferred". If others than those who pay the fee are benefited, it does not detract from the character of the fee. Further, the Court is not to assume the role of a cost-accountant. The Court is not to weigh "too meticulously" the cost of services rendered as against the amount of fee collected so as to evenly balance the two. "A broad correlationship is all that is necessary." "There need not be any fastidious balancing of the cost of the services rendered with the fees collected". That the money collected from the fees goes not in a separate fund but in the Consolidated Fund does not also necessarily make a fee a tax.

---

48. On this point, see, infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.
49. AIR 1983 SC 617 : (1983) 3 SCC 229.

In Sreenivasa General Traders v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[50] the Supreme Court further liberalized the concept of fee and made it even more flexible. The rate of market fee levied by market committees was increased by the State Government from 1/2% to 1% of the aggregate amount for which notified products were purchased or sold at notified market areas. This increase was challenged on the ground that there was no quid pro quo, i.e., there was no correlation between the increase in the rate of market fee and the service rendered.

Rejecting the contention and upholding the increase in fee, the Court emphasized that it was not always possible to work out with mathematical precision the amount of fee required for the services rendered and to collect only so much as would be just sufficient to meet the expenses in one year. It would be wrong to take only one year or a few years into account to decide whether fee was commensurate with the service rendered. An overall picture must be taken while dealing with the question whether there was correlation between the increase in fee and services rendered. In the instant case, the Court was satisfied that the income would not be sufficient even after the increase to meet the expenditure of the market committees.

So far, the Court said nothing new and only reiterated what it had said in earlier cases. But then the Court went on to emphasize that the word 'fee' need not be given a rigid technical meaning. While the power to levy fee "is conditioned by the fact that it must be 'by and large' a quid pro quo for the services rendered", such a correlationship is of 'general character and not of mathematical exactitude'. All that is necessary is that there should be a 'reasonable relationship' between the levy of the fee and the services rendered. Fee need not have direct relation to the actual service rendered by the authority to each individual who obtains the benefit of the service. The element of "quid pro quo in the strict sense is not always a sine qua non for a fee."

In the instant case, all the purposes mentioned in the relevant law for which collections from fee were to be spent were extremely beneficial to the growers and the traders. The phrase 'payer of the fee' represents "collectively the class of persons to whom the benefit is directly intended by the establishment of a regulated market" and not the actual individual who belongs to that class, i.e. the trader. Thus service does not mean service to each individual payer of fee but to the users of the market, i.e., growers and traders of notified agricultural produce. The Court expressly dissented from some of the observations made by it earlier in the Kewal Krishan case.[51]

It will thus be seen that in Srinivasa, the Supreme Court diluted the concept of fee at least in two respects : (1) while accepting the proposition that fee is collected for the services rendered, the Court held that the whole of the benefit need not be conferred on the payers of the fee; and (2) element of quid pro quo need not be established with arithmetical exactitude; it is enough if a good and substantial portion of the amount collected by way of fees is spent on rendering

50. AIR 1983 SC 1246 : (1983) 4 SCC 353.
51. Supra, footnote 41.

services. In fact, the Court went to the extent of saying that the element of quid pro quo in the strict sense is not always sine qua non for a fee.[52]

In Om Prakash Agarwal v. Giri Raj Kishore,[53] a cess was imposed on ad valorem basis at the rate 1% of the sale proceeds of the agricultural produce brought or sold in a market area. The money thus collected was to be spent on rural development. The levy was held invalid. In spending money collected through the cess, the interest of the dealers was not at all kept in view. There existed no correlation between the amount paid by way of cess and the services rendered to a person from who it was collected.

The case of City Corporation of Calicut v. Thachambalath Sadasivan[54] reflects the change which occurred in judicial thinking as to the nature of fee. The Supreme Court ruled that the traditional concept of quid pro quo in a fee has been undergoing transformation. Though the fee must have relation to the services rendered, or the advantage conferred, it is not necessary to establish that those who pay the fee must receive direct or special benefit or advantage of the services rendered for which the fee is being paid. The Court held that if one who is liable to pay receives general benefit from the authority levying the fee, the element of service required for collecting fee is satisfied.

In District Council of Jowai Autonomous District v. Divet Singh,[55] the Supreme Court again fell back upon the concept of quid pro quo to support levy of a fee. The district council levied royalty on timber coming from private forests. The Supreme Court invalidated the levy. The Court ruled that the levy could not be regarded as royalty as the forests did not belong to the district council. It could also not be justified as tax on land. In pith and substance, it was a tax on forest produce grown on private lands. The levy could be justified as fee, but it could be imposed only as quid pro quo for services rendered by the district council to the forest owners and contractors, but there was no evidence to show the expenses incurred by the district council towards such services and the total amount of royalty collected by it.

In Sirsilk,[56] the Supreme Court ruled that when the entire proceeds of the fee are utilised in financing the various projects undertaken by the Textiles Committee, it cannot be said that there is no reasonable and sufficient correlation between the levy of fee and the services rendered by the Textiles Committee. The Court ruled further that when the levy of the fee is for the entire textile industry, there is sufficient quid pro quo between the levy recovered and the services rendered to the industry as a whole.

In Krishi Upaj Mandi Samiti v. Orient Paper & Industries Ltd.,[57] a levy on the sale of bamboo by the Forest Department to the mill, payable to the market committee was upheld as a 'fee'. The Court rejected the argument of the mill that the committee performed no service to the mill which paid the levy. The Court 52. This view has been reiterated by the Supreme Court in Om Prakash v. State of Punjab, AIR 1985 SC 218 : (1985) 1 SCC 345; City Corpn. v. T. Sadasivan, AIR 1985 SC 756 : (1985) 2 SCC 112.

---

53. AIR 1986 SC 726 : (1986) 1 SCC 722.
54. AIR 1985 SC 756 : (1985) 2 SCC 112.
55. AIR 1986 SC 1930 : (1986) 4 SCC 38.
56. Sirsilk Ltd. v. Textiles Committee, AIR 1989 SC 317 : 1989 Supp (1) SCC 168.
57. (1995) 1 SCC 655 : (1994) 7 JT 414.

ruled that the market committee spent the money on the improvement of the infrastructure to further the object of the Act. The fact that the mill was not the direct beneficiary of the facilities provided by the committee does not absolve it from payment of the market fees. The facilities were meant for the benefit of all the buyers and sellers of all the agricultural produce within the market area.

The Court now stated the proposition: "It is enough if there is a broad, reasonable and general correlationship between the levy and the resultant benefit to the class of people on which the fee is levied, though no single payer of the fee receives direct or personal benefit from those services. It is immaterial that the general public may also be benefited from some of the services if the primary service intended is for the payers of the fees." [58] It will be seen that the emphasis has shifted from provision of services to the individual who pays the fee to the payers of the fee as a class.[59] It is enough that there is a "broad, reasonable and general correlationship" between the levy and the resultant benefit to the "class of people" who are required to pay the fee though no single fee payer receives direct or personal benefit from those services.[60]

(a) REGULATORY FEE

In course of time, the traditional concept of quid pro quo started undergoing a transformation as the concept of fee based on benefit to the payers of fee was found to be too restrictive a concept. Accordingly, the Supreme Court started emphasizing that the element of quid pro quo stricto sensu is not always a sine qua non of a fee. The reason for this change in judicial stance was that most of the present-day state activities are regulatory in nature, and, for this purpose, licensing is regarded as an effective administrative technique.

The idea underlying regulation is more of public interest rather than an individual benefit. In most of the cases, licence fees are levied to meet the expenses of regulation. In this context, the idea of 'benefit' to the licensee is too narrow a concept. It will be more in accord with the present-day realities to accept the minority view in the Liberty Cinema case[61] that imposition of charges for supervision, inspection and control of private activity may be regarded as 'fee'.

Articles 110(2) and 199(2) recognise the two concepts viz., "fees for licences" and "fees for services rendered". This indicates that there are these two types of fees.[62]

There may however arise the question of correlation between the fee charged and the cost of regulation. In the Liberty Cinema case, the cinema owner was required to pay annually a sum of Rs. 6000 and it was no body's case that this sum was required only to effect inspection of the cinema twice a year. Here, licensing was being used clearly as a technique of raising revenue for the corporation and so the so-called 'licence fee'could justifiably be regarded as a tax. The

---

58. Ibid, at 674.
59. Krishi Utpadan Mandi Samiti v. Ashok Kumar Dinesh Chandra, (1996) 10 SCC 100 : 1996) 7 JT 545; Etikoppaka Coop. Agricultural Industrial Society v. Secretary, Agricultural Market Committee, AIR 1999 AP 114; Belsund Sugar Co. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 3125 : (1999) 9 SCC 620.
60. (1995) 1 SCC 659.
61. See, supra, footnote 29.
62. See, Chs. II, Sec. J(ii)(c), and VI, Sec. F(ii), supra.

view propounded by the minority in Liberty Cinema has now come to be accepted by the Supreme Court.

Through a series of recent cases, distinction between 'compensatory fee' and 'regulatory fee' has now become established. The expression "licence fee" does not necessarily mean a fee in lieu of services and that no quid pro quo need be established in such a case.[63] Licence fee can be regulatory when the activities for which a licence is given require to be regulated or controlled.

The State of Tamil Nadu passed an Act to regulate chit funds in which middle class and the poor participate in large numbers. An organisation with the Registrar of Chit Funds was established to supervise and regulate chit funds. A fee graduated according to the value, and the number of subscribers of the chit fund, was levied for registration of bye-laws with the Registrar of Chit Funds. The Supreme Court upheld the validity of the licence fee. The Court observed that the object of the Act was to protect the interests of the subscribers of chit funds and more their number, more the burden on the authorities and, consequently, more fee is needed to meat the expenditure.[64]

In Vam Organic Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[65] the Supreme Court avowedly accepted the notion of fees charged for licences, i.e. regulatory fees. The Court now distinguished between "regulatory fees" and "compensatory fees" i.e. fees for services rendered. In case of regulatory fee, like the licence fee, where the activities for which licence is given require to be regulated or controlled, existence of quid pro quo is not necessary although the fee imposed must not be in the circumstances of the case, excessive, keeping in view the quantum and nature of the work involved in the required supervision. In the instant case, a licensing system for denaturation of spirit and a fee at the rate of 7 paise per litre was imposed. Keeping in view the quantum and nature of the work involved in supervising the process of denaturation and the consequent expenses incurred by the State, the fee imposed was held to be reasonable and proper.

The Hyderabad Municipal Corporation levied a licence fee on eating houses, lodging houses, restaurants etc. This levy was challenged on the ground of lack of quid pro quo between the fees charged by the municipality and the service rendered to the licensees. In the case noted below,[66] the Supreme Court upheld the levy as a fee on the ground that the municipality performed regulatory and supervisory functions.

The Court again emphasized that a licence fee may be either regulatory or compensatory. The licence is issued to a restaurant subject to several conditions being fulfilled by the licensee. The Corporation inspects the licensed premises so as to ensure that these conditions are fulfilled. In addition, the municipality performs the general duty of lifting garbage and keeping the city clean. The hotels and restaurants impose an additional burden on the municipality in this respect by

---

63. State of Tripura v. Sudhir Ranjan Nath, (1997) 3 SCC 665, 673 : AIR 1997 SC 1168.
Also see, P. Kannadasan v. State of Tamil Nadu, (1996) 5 SCC 670; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Sitapur Packingwood Suppliers, (2002) 4 SCC 566 : AIR 2003 SC 2165.

64. Commissioner & Secretary to Govt., Commercial Taxes and Religious Endowment Dept. v. Sree Murugam Financing Corp., AIR 1992 SC 1383 : (1992) 3 SCC 488.

65. (1997) 2 SCC 715 : (1997) 1 JT 625.

66. Secunderabad Hyderabad Hotel Owners' Ass. v. Hyderabad Mun. Corp., AIR 1999 SC 635 : (1999) 2 SCC 274.

reason of the nature of their occupation. The fees in question was part of the general fund but it was earmarked for the purpose it was collected. Fees can be levied on a graded basis, it does not have to be a lump sum levy. But it ought not to be excessive. In the facts of the instant case, the Court found that the licence fees collected formed only a very small part of the total expenditure incurred by the municipal corporation and, hence, the fee imposed was not excessive.

The power to levy a tax or duty on industrial alcohol vests in the Centre. A State Government is not competent to levy a tax or duty on industrial alcohol. Nevertheless, the State is competent to levy a charge on manufacturers of alcohol to meet the cost of maintenance of excise staff to supervise manufacture, storage etc. of industrial alcohol so as to ensure that non-potable alcohol is not diverted and misused as a substitute for potable alcohol. Such a provision can be traced to the regulatory power of the State under entry 33, List III.[67]

The Supreme Court has considered the concepts of regulatory/compensatory fees recently in B.S.E. Brokers Forum v. SEBI.[68] SEBI is primarily a regulatory body as it is charged with the function of regulating the business in stock exchanges and other securities markets. Under the relevant statutory provisions, SEBI is authorised to levy a fee "for carrying out the purposes of the SEBI Act, and also for registration of stock brokers etc.

On the concept of regulatory fee, the Supreme Court has stated in B.S.E.:

> "… so far as the regulatory fee is concerned, the service to be rendered is not a condition precedent and the same does not lose the character of fee provided the fee so charged is not excessive. It is also not necessary that the services to be rendered by the collecting authority should be confined to the contributories alone….. if the levy is for the benefit of the entire industry, there is sufficient quid pro quo between the levy recovered and the services rendered to the industry as a whole."

The Court said further:

> "Once we come to the conclusion that the fee in question is primarily a regulatory fee then the argument that the service rendered by the Board should be confined to the contributories alone, cannot be accepted…. Once the levy is in public interest and connected with the larger trade in which the contributories are involved then confining the services only to the contributories does not arise."

In the instant case, the Court accepted the Board's contention that it can levy a composite fee comprising both, viz., fee for carrying out its purposes, and fee for registration. The Court also found that the fee is not excessive keeping in view the multifarious regulatory functions of SEBI. On this point, the Court has observed :[69]

> "While examining the reasonableness of the quantum of levy, the same will not be done with a view to find out whether there is a correlationable quid pro quo to the quantum of levy, because… the quid pro quo is not a condition precedent for the levy of a regulatory fee. Such examination will have to be made in the context of the levy being either excessive or unreasonable for the requirement of the authority for fulfilling its statutory obligation."

---

67. Bileshwar Khand Udyog K.S. Mandali Ltd. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1992 SC 872 : (1992) 2 SCC 42. See, supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
68. AIR 2001 SC 1010 : (2001) 3 SCC 482.
69. Ibid, at 1022.

The Court also noted that all fees collected would be credited to a separate fund and the amount is utilised solely towards the expenses incurred by the Board in performance of its duties mandated under the parent Act. Fee can be levied on the brokers making their annual turn-over as the basis to measure the levy. Because of this, the fee cannot be characterised as income-tax, or a turn-over tax, or even a fee on income, or a fee on turnover.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

The requirement of a 'broad co-relation' between the benefit conferred and fee imposed was too widely interpreted in some cases, and since all State revenues are presumably expended or at least are expendable only for the welfare of the nation or the State as a whole, this led to a blurring of distinction with the characteristics of a tax. The decision in State of H.P. v. Shivalik Agro Poly Products[70] illustrates this approach.

For execution of a mortgage deed, the plaintiffs were required to pay stamp duty and registration fees amounting in accordance with a notification issued under Sections 78 and 79 of the Registration Act by the State of Himachal Pradesh.They challenged the Notification issued by the State Government. The Trial Court, the District Judge and the High Court declared the notification dated 14-4-1969 issued by the State Government prescribing the registration fee to be null and void decreed the suit. The main ground on which the plaintiffs' suit was decreed was that there is a distinction between tax and fee, that the State had not led any evidence to show that the amount realised by way of registration fee was deposited under a separate head or that it was exclusively utilised for the maintenance of the Registration Department. Placing reliance upon the Shirur Mutt case the Courts below correctly concluded that the levy was a tax and not a fee and consequently the impugned notification was ultra vires the Registration Act.

The Supreme Court, contrary to earlier decisions, placed the onus on the plaintiffs to show that the overall amount received by the Government by way of fee from the Registration Department far exceeded the overall expenditure incurred in maintaining the said department.[71] More importantly the Court, overlooking Article 266(2) and Article 283 both of which speak of public funds other than the Consolidated Fund, held that in view of Article 226, "any amount realised by way of fee by the Central Government or State Government has to be credited to the Consolidated Fund of India or of the State concerned, as the case may be, and will thus necessarily get merged in the public revenues and cannot be set apart".[72] On these erroneous bases the Court set aside the decrees passed by the Courts below and said :

> "the view taken in Shirur Mutt case has undergone a considerable change by subsequent decisions of this Court. Moreover, having regard to the express language used in Article 266 of the Constitution, it is not possible for the State Government to keep the fee realised in a separate fund other than the Consoli-

---

70. (2004) 8 SCC 556, at page 560 : AIR 2004 SC 4393.
71. (Ibid at p. 568).
72. (Ibid at p. 565). This view was differed from In T.N. Godavarman Thirumulpad (87) v. Union of India, (2006) 1 SCC 1 at page 12 : AIR 2005 SC 4256, the Court upheld the constitutionality of a fund generated to protect ecology and provide for regeneration of forests saying that such a fund "cannot in the constitutional scheme of things be considered and treated as a fund under Article 266 or Article 283 or Article 284 of the Constitution" and that "neither Article 110 nor Article 199 and/or Article 294 or 195 would have any application" to such fund.

> dated Fund of the State. In view of the subsequent decisions of this Court, the views taken in the decisions relied upon by learned counsel for the plaintiff-respondents cannot be considered to be good law and they are hereby overruled".

This view was reiterated in a number of decisions.[73] Consequently State legislatures are able to raise revenues by way of fees without any of the fiscal discipline applicable to the imposition of taxes.[74] However, at the same time in another series of decisions the principles in Shirur Mutt were relied on and reaffirmed.[75]

The disparity in approaches was resolved by the Constitutional Bench in Jindal Stainless Ltd. (2) v. State of Haryana,[76] which held that:

> "When the tax is imposed as a part of regulation or as a part of regulatory measure, its basis shifts from the concept of "burden" to the concept of measurable/quantifiable benefit and then it becomes "a compensatory tax" and its payment is then not for revenue but as reimbursement/recompense to the service/facility provider. It is then a tax on recompense. Compensatory tax is by nature hybrid but it is more closer to fees than to tax as both fees and compensatory taxes are based on the principle of equivalence and on the basis of reimbursement/recompense."

Therefore, as the law stands if the regulatory measure is statutorily imposed, the enactment must broadly indicate proportionality between the compensatory tax sought to be levied to the quantifiable benefit. If the Act does not so indicate the burden will be on the State as a service/facility provider to show by placing the material before the Court, that the payment of compensatory tax is a reimbursement/recompense for the quantifiable/measurable benefit provided or to be provided to its payer(s).

(b) VEND FEE

The term 'fee' is at times used for the amount charged by the State (through a licence or auction) for vending narcotics, opium or liquor. In this context, the term 'fee' is not used in the technical sense of a charge for some service rendered. Here the term 'fee' is used for the price of consideration which the government charges from the licensees for parting with its privileges, and granting them to the dealers.

As the State can carry on the business in question itself, such a charge is the normal incident of business trading.[77]

---

73. See State of Gujarat v. Akhil Gujarat Pravasi V.S. Mahamandal, (2004) 5 SCC 155 at page 166 : AIR 2004 SC 3894; Sona Chandi Oal Committee v. State of Maharashtra, (2005) 2 SCC 345 : AIR 2005 SC 635; Vijayalashmi Rice Mill v. CTO, (2006) 6 SCC 763 : AIR 2006 SC 2897.

74. See infra under Section J.

75. Jindal Stripe Ltd. v. State of Haryana, (2003) 8 SCC 60 : (2003) 8 JT 62; CCE v. Chhata Sugar Co. Ltd., (2004) 3 SCC 466 at page 483 : AIR 2004 SC 3005; State of U.P. v. Vam Organic Chemicals Ltd., (2004) 1 SCC 225 : AIR 2003 SC 4650; Calcutta Municipal Corpn. v. Shrey Mercantile (P) Ltd., (2005) 4 SCC 245 : AIR 2005 SC 1879; Hardev Motor Transport v. State of M.P., (2006) 8 SCC 613 : AIR 2007 SC 839.

76. (2006) 7 SCC 241, at page 268 : AIR 2006 SC 2550; Gupta Modern Breweries v. State of J&K, (2007) 6 SCC 317 : (2007) 5 JT 619; Mohan Meakin Ltd. v. State of H.P., (2009) 3 SCC 157 : (2009) 1 JT 599.

77. Harshankar v. Dy. Excise and Taxation Commr., AIR 1975 SC 1121 : (1975) 1 SCC 737; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Sheopat Rai, AIR 1994 SC 813; supra; Organon (India) Ltd. v. Collector of Excise, AIR 1994 SC 2489 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 53; supra.

(c) COURT FEES

In State of Madras v. Zenith Lamps,[78] considering the validity of levying court-fees, under entry 3, List II,[79] the Supreme Court ruled that court fees could be levied not for increasing general revenues but to meet the cost of administration of civil justice. The fees must have relation to the administration of civil justice. The State should not make any profit out of court-fees and that "there must be a broad correlationship with the fees collected and the cost of administration of civil justice."

The Court observed in Zenith: "But one thing the legislature is not competent to do, and that is to make litigants contribute to the increase of general public revenue. In other words, it cannot tax litigation, and make litigants pay, say, for road building or education or other beneficial schemes that a State may have. There must be a broad correlation with the fees collected and the cost of administration of civil justice".

The Court stated that the ad valorem principle though not an ideal basis for distribution of a fee, was yet not so irrational as to incur constitutional invalidity.

In this case, an increase in court fees by the State of Madras was challenged. As enough material was not on record to show how much money was spent on civil justice in the State, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the High Court to decide whether the impugned court-fees amounted to 'fees' or 'tax' on litigation and litigants. The Court also ruled that the fact that collections went to the Consolidated Fund was not in itself conclusive because under Art. 266 all revenue raised by the State has to form part of the Consolidated Fund of the State.[80]

In P.M. Ashwathanarayaana Setty v. State of Maharashtra,[81] the Supreme Court considered the question of constitutional validity of court-fees levied on an ad valorem basis. The main question involved was whether the ad valorem court-fee could be regarded as a 'fee' or a 'tax', inasmuch as the correlation between fee and the value of the services rendered by way of quid pro quo was not established. Another question was whether or not such a fee was hit by Art. 14 as being arbitrary.[82]

The distinction between 'fee' and 'tax' has been elaborated by the Supreme Court in many cases.[83] Describing the nature of fee, the Supreme Court said in the instant case:[84]

> "A fee is.....a charge for the special service rendered to a class of citizens by Government or Governmental agencies and is generally based on the expenses incurred in rendering the services."

The Court referred in this connection to what it had said in the earlier decision in Zenith Lamps,[85] viz.: that "there must be a broad correlationship with the fees

---

78. AIR 1973 SC 724 : (1973) 1 SCC 162.
79. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
80. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. F(iii).
81. AIR 1989 SC 100 : 1989 Supp (1) SCC 696.
82. Infra, Ch. XXI, Secs. B and C.
83. See, Supra.
84. AIR 1989 SC at 110.
85. State of Madras v. Zenith Lamps, AIR 1973 SC 724 : (1973) 1 SCC 162.

collected and the cost of administration of civil justice". After looking into the statements of receipts and expenses on the administration of justice, the Court concluded that the requisite correlationship between receipts from court-fees and expenses on the administration of civil justice was established.

The Court rejected the argument that there should be a ceiling on the payment of court-fees in a case otherwise there may be a case where a person may have to pay a very high amount of court-fees without consequently deriving an equivalent service. Rejecting the argument, the Court observed:[86]

> "The test of the correlation is not in the context of individual contributors. The test is on the comprehensive level of the value of the totality of the services, set-off against the totality of the receipts. If the character of the 'fees' is thus established, the vagaries in its distribution amongst the class, do not detract from the concept of a 'fee' as such, though a wholly arbitrary distribution of the burden might violate other constitutional limitation."

Thus, the Court ruled that the test of correlation is at the "aggregate" level and not at the "individual" level. The Court observed in this connection:

> "... when a broad and general correlation between the totality of the fee on the one hand and the totality of the expenses of the services on the other is established, the levy will not fail in its essential character of a fee on the ground alone that the measure of its distribution on the persons of incidence is disproportionate to the actual services obtainable by them".[87]

The Court also refused to accept the argument that the ad valorem principle of charging court-fees is violative of Art. 14. It may not be an ideal basis for distribution of the fee but at the same time it cannot be said to be so irrational as to incur any constitutional infirmity. "The presumption of constitutionality of laws requires that any doubt as to the constitutionality of a law has to be resolved in favour of constitutionality".

The State is in theory entitled to raise the totality of the expenses by way of fee. Any interference with the present yardstick for sharing the burden might in turn produce a yardstick less advantageous to litigants at lower levels. The Court however criticised levy of court fees at a stiff rate which operates harshly and almost "tends to price justice out of the reach of many distressed litigants."

While court-fees could not be used for general purposes there is no bar against using general revenues on administration of civil justice. While the Court did not strike down the law levying court fees, it did, however, direct the State to take steps to rationalize the court fee structure and gave suggestions for the purpose. One suggestion inter alia was to levy a nominal fee—not over 2-2½% on small claims.

In Maharashtra, while there existed a ceiling of Rs. 15,000/- on court-fees payable by a civil litigant, no such ceiling existed for court-fees payable on proceedings for grant of probate and letters of administration where ad valorem fees were required to be paid. The Supreme Court found this to be discriminatory vis-a-vis Art. 14.

---

86. AIR 1989 SC at 117.
87. Ibid, at 116.

In Tamil Nadu, an ad valorem duty of 7½% on the total claim was chargeable on an appeal from the civil judge to the High Court on the question of increasing of the amount of compensation on the land of the appellant being acquired by the State. The provision was held valid as levying a fee and not a tax.[88]

In the instant case, the Court reiterated certain propositions which it had already expounded earlier in several cases. If the essential character of the levy is that some special service is intended as quid pro quo to the class of citizens which is intended to be benefited by the service, and a broad and general correlation between the amount so collected and the expenses incurred in providing the services is found to exist, then such levy would partake the character of a 'fee', irrespective of the fact that such special services for which the amount by levy of fee is collected incidentally and indirectly benefit the general public also. In order to establish the correlation between the amount recovered by way of 'fee' and the expenses incurred in providing the service they should not be examined so minutely or be weighed in golden scale to discern any difference between the two.

It is not necessary to ascertain the same with any mathematical exactitude for finding the correlation but the test would be satisfied if a broad and general correlation is found to exist and once such a broad correlation between the totality of the expenses on the services rendered as a whole, on the one hand, and the totality of the amount so raised by way of the fee, on the other, is established, it would be no part of the legitimate exercise in the examination of the constitutionality of the concept of the impost to embark upon its effect in the individual cases. If the aforesaid relation is found to exist in the levy of the fee, the levy cannot be said to be wanting in its essential character of a fee on the ground that the measure of its distribution on the persons or incidence is disproportionate to the actual services made available to them. The Court clarified that the correlation is not in the context of individual contributors. The test is to ascertain on a comprehensive basis keeping in view the value of the totality of the service, qua the totality of the receipts.

It is not necessary that the collection made through the levy of court-fees should exactly tally or correspond to the expenditure incurred on the administration of civil justice. The amount raised through court fee and the expenses incurred in administration of civil justice is not to be examined with exactitutde with a view to ascertain any accurate and arithmetical equivalence. The test is satisfied if a broad and general correlation is found to exist. Even if the collections are somewhat more than the expenditure on the service, the levy would not fail on that account because once it is established that the primary and essential purpose is the rendering of the specific service to the specified class, it is immaterial that the State has earned certain benefits out of it indirectly.

The Court however exhorted the State that it was under an obligation to render administration of justice to its subjects. Accordingly, the amount raised from the suitors should not normally exceed the cost of administration of justice. The State should not seek to enrich itself and levy court fees with a view to collect revenue for general administration. The total receipts from court fees should be such as by and large can cover the cost of administration of justice.

---

88. Secretary to Govt. of Madras v. P.R. Sriramulu, AIR 1996 SC 767 : (1996) 1 SCC 345.

I. A COMPARATIVE VIEW OF TAXING POWERS IN OTHER FEDERATIONS

In the Federations of the U.S.A., Canada and Australia, no elaborate distribution of taxing powers has been attempted. The general pattern is that the Central Government in each country is authorised, subject to some restrictions, to levy any tax. On the other hand, powers of the constituent units are somewhat restricted. In the U.S.A., the States can levy any tax except duties of imports and exports. In Canada, the Provinces are debarred from levying an indirect tax, while in Australia the States cannot levy duties of customs and excises.

The following gives a comparative view as to how the power to levy some of the major taxes is divided between the Centre and the constituent units in the U.S.A., Canada, Australia and India.

Customs: In all these countries, customs duties are levied by the Centre. In the U.S.A., however, no export duty can be levied by any government.

Income Taxes: In the U.S.A., Canada and Australia, income tax can be levied concurrently by the Centre and the States. In India, the power to levy the tax is divided between the Centre and the States according as the income is non-agricultural or agricultural.

Sales Tax: In Australia only the Centre, while in the U.S.A. and Canada, both levels of government, can levy this tax. In India, States levy sales tax except on an inter-State sale which falls within the Centre's taxing purview.

Excise Duties: In the U.S.A. and Canada, the Centre as well as the units can levy this tax, although in Canada, the provincial taxing statute has to be framed in such a manner that the courts do not hold it as an indirect tax which the Provinces cannot levy. In Australia, the Centre and not the States may levy this tax.[89] In India, the field has been demarcated between the Centre and the States according to the commodity taxed; alcohol and narcotics fall to the States, and all other commodities fall within the exclusive Central competence.

Succession and Estate Duties: In the U.S.A., Canada and Australia, power to levy these duties rests with both, the Centre as well as the units. In India, the field is divided: agricultural property falls within the State purview, while the non-agricultural property falls within the exclusive Central sphere.

Land Revenue or Land Tax: In the U.S.A., the Centre may levy this tax subject to the proviso that it must be apportioned among the several States in the proportion of the population. This condition has in practice nullified the Centre's power to levy land tax and has reserved the power to levy the tax to the States. In Australia and Canada, both tiers of government may levy such a tax. In India, however, it belongs exclusively to the States.

In the U.S.A., Canada and Australia, there is no rigid separation of taxing powers between the Centre and the States and both may levy many similar taxes simultaneously on the same tax base. This has given rise to many acute problems of overlapping and multiple taxation in these countries.

---

89. On excise duties see entry 84, List I and entry 51, List II, supra; and also, infra, Ch. XV.

Overlapping taxation arises when Central and State taxes operate simultaneously on the same tax base. Multiple taxation arises when several States levy similar taxes on one and the same tax base. The former is the result of vertical competition between the Centre and the States; the latter, the result of horizontal competition among the several taxing States. Accordingly, in the three Federations, in the areas of income-tax and succession duties, both the Centre and the States operate simultaneously creating problems of overlapping taxation so that a person has to pay a Central as well as a State tax on the same income or property.

Further, many States can simultaneously levy these taxes on the same base on the ground of nexus. For example, a resident of Connecticut (U.S.A) conducts business in New York. The State of New York can tax his income because it originates there; the State of Connecticut can tax the same income because its recipient resides there.[90] Such problems make tax administration costly and inconvenient for the tax-payers and many legal issues arise constantly. In fact, the situation was so complicated in Australia and Canada that during the period of the second world war, income-tax and estate duty were centralised, and the regional governments were compensated with grants.[91]

J. RESTRICTIONS ON TAXING POWERS

If any power to tax is clearly mentioned in List II, the same would not be available to be exercised by Parliament based on the assumption of residuary power, for, under the constitutional scheme, the power to legislate in respect of a matter including a residuary matter does not carry with it a power to impose a tax.[92]

The Constitution imposes few restrictions on the taxing powers of the Centre and the States. As already stated, States' power to levy taxes on profession and trade is restricted by Art. 276,[93] and their power to levy taxes on electricity is restricted by Arts. 287 and 288.[94] Besides, some restrictions have been imposed on the States' power to levy sales taxes.

A limited application of the doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities or intergovernmental immunity, the constitutional provisions guaranteeing freedom of trade and commerce,[95] and a few fundamental rights[96] control the taxing powers of the Centre and the States.

(i) RESTRICTIONS ON THE STATES' POWER TO LEVY SALES TAX

The States' power to levy sales tax[97] has been subjected to a few restrictions with a view to keep inter-State and international trade and commerce, and trade in the goods of special importance, free from haphazard State taxation.

---

90. Guarantee Trust Co. v. Virginia, 304 US 19; International Harvester Co. v. Evatt, 399 US 416 (1946).
91. South Australia v. The Commonwealth, 65 CLR 373; Victoria v. The Commonwealth, 99 CLR 575.
92. State of W. B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
93. Supra, Entry 60, List II; supra, Sec. D.
94. Supra, Entry 53, List II; supra, Sec. D.
95. Infra, Ch. XV, headed as "Freedom of Trade and Commerce".
96. Infra, Chs. XXI—XXXIII.
97. Entry 54, List II, supra, Sec. D.

First, a State is debarred from levying a tax on inter-state sale or purchase.

Secondly, no State can tax a sale or purchase taking place outside the State.

Thirdly, a State is debarred from levying a tax on sale or purchase taking place in the course of import and export.[1]

Fourthly, Parliament is empowered to impose restrictions on State taxation of sale or purchase of goods of special importance.

Each of these restrictions may be discussed here.

(a) TAX ON SALE OR PURCHASE OF GOODS OUTSIDE A STATE AND IN INTER-STATE TRADE AND COMMERCE:

A federation, although divided into several constituent units, nevertheless, constantly strives to promote freedom of trade and commerce within the country in order to weld it into one economic unit. It therefore becomes necessary to regulate taxation of inter-State sale or purchase lest an indiscriminate State taxation may hamper free flow of trade and commerce from one State to another and thus jeopardise the economic unity of the country. The Indian Constitution seeks to regulate taxation of inter-State sale or purchase in two ways: negatively, by prohibiting a State from levying, and, positively, by empowering the Centre to levy, a tax on such sale or purchase.

A sale (or purchase) is composed of many ingredients, e.g., existence of goods forming the subject-matter of a sale; agreement to sell; passing of the title or transfer of ownership in the goods; delivery of goods; payment of the price, etc. Each of these ingredients is essential to complete a sale. When all these ingredients take place within one State, the sale is completely intra-state and the State concerned has plenary power to tax the same. On the other hand, when all these ingredients take place outside a State, the sale is completely outside the State and it cannot levy any tax on it.

Difficulties, however, arise when these ingredients take place not in one but several States. Applying the doctrine of territorial nexus[2] in such a situation, each of these States may levy a tax on the sale making the ingredient happening there as the taxable event. For example, Tatas manufacture steel in Bihar but sell it in all other States. Bihar can tax the sale by the Tatas taking advantage of the fact of manufacture within its borders of the goods sold, while other States can tax the sales taking place within their jurisdiction. In this way, a sale whose ingredients touch several States could be subjected to multiple tax burden.

This is what actually happened in India before 1956. Acting on the principle of territorial nexus, the States picked out one or more ingredients constituting a sale and made it or them the basis of imposing liability for sales tax. This led to imposition of multiple taxation on a single interstate transaction by different States. As this situation was bound to adversely affect interstate trade and commerce, it became necessary to take some ameliorative steps, and devise some suitable formulae, to mitigate such a situation.

---

1. These sales are not taxable by a State but they may be taken into account to compute the gross turnover of dealers requiring them to register themselves for purposes of payment of surcharge over the sales tax payable by them.
Hoechst Pharmaceuticals Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019 : (1983) 4 SCC 45.
Also see, infra, footnote 22.

2. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. A.

Before 1956, Art. 286 had sought to avoid multiple taxation of sales by stipulating that a State could not tax a sale taking place outside the State or in the course of inter-State trade and commerce. A sale was regarded as falling within the State in which goods under it were delivered for consumption. Explanation to Art. 286(1) enacted that a sale was regarded as falling in the State where goods under it were delivered for consumption. Art. 286 was subject of judicial interpretation in State of Bombay v. United Motors Ltd.[3] The question related to the validity of a legal provision made by the State of Bombay, taxing a sale under which goods from outside were delivered in Bombay for consumption therein, though property in the goods passed outside Bombay.

The Supreme Court adopted the 'outside consumption' test and held that the exporting State could not tax a sale under which goods went to another State, and that it could be taxed only by the State in which the goods were actually delivered for consumption.[4] The word 'consumption' was interpreted broadly so as to envisage not only consumption by the actual purchaser himself but also distribution for eventual consumption within the State. No other State, except that of consumption, could tax a sale touching several States and, thus, multiple taxation of such a sale was avoided.

The delivery for consumption within the State was considered to be a point at which the tax could be levied on interstate sale. This meant that a sale under which a trader in State A got goods from a trader in State B could be taxed only by state A and not by State B if the goods were delivered in State A for consumption. If, however, goods were not delivered in a State for consumption, e.g., when the goods were re-exported to another State, then the sale concerned could be taxed by the State in which property in the goods passed under it.[5]

This judicial view while avoiding multiple taxation of inter-State sales, nevertheless, created difficulties for the trading community. States resorted to the practice of taxing inter-State sales under which goods came to them for consumption, but placed the liability to pay the tax on out-of-the State dealers. This was done because of convenience of tax collection, but it was very inconvenient to a trader sending goods to several States as he could be taxed by all the States. He had, therefore, to acquaint himself with the taxing laws of all the States, produce his account books and file returns before all the taxing jurisdictions. Consequently, the matter was reagitated in Bengal Immunity Co. v. State of Bihar.[6]

A company in Calcutta, manufacturing drugs there, accepted orders there and then sent goods to Bihar. Bihar sought to make the company liable to its sales tax with respect to its sales to Bihar dealers, but the company objected to it. The Supreme Court overruling its view in the United Motors case now held that it was an interstate sale which could not be taxed by any State, not even by the State of consumption, because of the bar imposed by Art. 286 on taxation of a sale in the course of inter-State trade and commerce. Inter-State sale thus became immune from all State taxation. The Court adopted this view as it felt it to be necessary to ensure a free flow of trade and commerce and to protect the traders from undue harassment.

---

3. AIR 1953 SC 252 : 1953 SCR 1069.
4. M.P. JAIN, JUSTICE BHAGWATI AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 2 JILI, 31.
5. Malayalam Plantations v. Dy. Commr, A.I.T. AIR 1965 SC 161 : (1964) 7 SCC 391.
6. AIR 1955 SC 661 : (1955) 2 SCR 603.

A privileged position was thus created for inter-State trade and commerce at the cost of local trade because people could make purchases from other States and avoid local taxation. The financial position of the States was adversely affected. The matter was considered by the Taxation Enquiry Commission.

The recommendations of the Commission were as follows: while sales tax must continue to be a State source, the power and responsibility of the States must come to an end, and that of the Union should begin, when the sales tax of one State impinges administratively on the dealers and fiscally on the consumers of another State. Therefore, interstate sales tax should be the concern of the Union, but the revenue should devolve on the States.

Accordingly, to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission and to ensure that the interstate trade and commerce does not go absolutely tax-free and pays tax at least once, the Constitution (Sixth Amendment) Act, 1956, was enacted. The Amending Act made the following changes:

(1) It made taxation of interstate sales a Union matter by introducing entry 92A in List I.

(2) Entry 54 in List II, regarding sales taxation by the States was subjected to entry 92A of List I.[7]

(3) There was difficulty in identifying what was a sale 'outside' a State, or 'in the course of import and export', so as to debar a State from taxing any such sale. Therefore, Art. 286 was modified by addition of cl. (2) so as to enable Parliament to define these concepts.[8]

(4) The Sixth Amendment also amended Art. 269 by adding clause (g) to Art. 269(1) so as to assign the revenue arising from Central taxation of interstate sales to the States.[9]

(5) Cl. (3) was added to Art. 269 so as to authorise Parliament to formulate for determining when a sale or purchase of goods takes place in the course of interstate trade or commerce.[10]

The effect of the above-mentioned modifications is that the power to tax inter-State sale (or purchase) now belongs to the Centre and not to the States which are also debarred from taxing an 'outside' sale, [Art. 286(1)(a)], and what is an 'outside' sale or 'inter-State' sale are matters for Parliament to define under Arts. 286(2) and 269 (3) respectively.

(b) OUTSIDE SALE/INTER-STATE SALE

Accordingly, Parliament levied a tax on interstate sale or purchase by the Central Sales Tax Act, 1956. The object of the Act is to formulate principles for determining when a sale or purchase of goods takes place in the course of inter-State trade or commerce or outside a State.[11]

A sale or purchase of goods is deemed to take place in the course of inter-State trade or commerce if the sale or purchase—(a) occasions the movement of goods

---

7. Supra, Sec. C.
8. See, infra Secs. (b) and (c) below.
9. See, infra, Sec. K(i).
10. For Art. 269(3), see, infra, Sec. K(i), under "Tax Sharing".
11. Ashok Leyland Ltd v. State of TN (2004) 3 SCC 1 : AIR 2004 SC 2836.

from one State to another;[12] or (b) is effected by a transfer of documents of title to the goods during their movement from one State to another.

The tax is levied by the Centre but the power to assess and collect the same has been delegated to the exporting State which retains the proceeds for its own use.[13] The purpose of the Central Act is thus not to collect revenue for the Centre but to regulate the rate, assessment and collection of tax on inter-State transactions of sale or purchase. By giving power of assessment to the exporting State, the difficulties created by the United Motors case are avoided as dealers exporting goods to other States can be assessed by their own State.

The Central Act also lays down the test to determine what is an 'outside' sale. It defines a sale inside a State and characterises the same as being outside all other States. Only an inside sale can be taxed by a State and not an outside sale. The test to ascertain an inside sale is the existence of goods within the State.[14] In this way, a sale or purchase the different ingredients of which occur in different States, is now located, by a fiction of law, in one State only—the State where the goods exist—and thus multiple taxation of such a sale is avoided.

By the Central Sales Tax (Amendment) Act, 2001 which came into force from 11-5-2002. Section 2(g) of the The Central Sales Tax Act, 1956 has been substituted by a new sub-section by which the definition of 'sale' has been widened to include the deemed sales defined by Article 366(29-A) of the Constitution. Consequently, Central sales tax may be levied on transactions involving transfer of property in the goods involved in the execution of works contract or transfer of the right to use the goods. Such transactions are also open to levy by two different States either as inter-State transactions or intra-State transactions.

The problem of multiple taxation of interstate sale or purchase does not arise in Australia as only the Centre and not the States can levy sales tax. In Canada, the Provinces can levy a sales tax payable by the ultimate consumer and the problem of multiple taxation does not arise.[15] The problem is rather acute in the U.S.A. The judiciary has made some attempts to avoid multiple taxation of inter-State commerce by invoking the commerce clause[16] and the due process clause[17]

---

12. If delivery of the goods is given to the buyer and title passes to him within the State, subsequent export by him from the State does not make the sale inter-State as the sale was already completed before the movement of goods began.

Cement Marketing Co. v. State of Mysore, AIR 1963 SC 980 : (1963) 3 SCR 1; STC v. State of Mysore, AIR 1967 SC 585.

A sale is inter-State if there is a contract of sale preceding the movement of goods from one State to another and the movement is the result of covenant in the contract of sale, or is an incident of that contract; in order that a sale may be regarded as an inter-State sale, it is immaterial whether the property in the goods passes in one State or another.

Ballabhadas Hulaschand v. State of Orissa, AIR 1976 SC 1016 : (1976) 2 SCC 44; Union of India v. K.G. Khosla & Co., AIR 1979 SC 1160 : (1972) 2 SCC 242; Indian Oil Corpn. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 446, 449 : 1980 Supp SCC 426. See also State of Orissa v. K.B. Saha and Sons Industries (P) Ltd., (2007) 9 SCC 97 : (2007) 6 SCALE 284.

13. Infra, Sec. K(i), under Tax-sharing.

14. Sec. 4 of the Central Sales Tax Act. Also ILI, Inter-State Trade Barriers & Sales Tax Laws in India (1962).

15. Atlantic Smoke Shops Ltd. v. Conlon, 1943 AC 550: See, M.P. Jain, Taxing Powers in Canada, 1955 Vyavahara Nirnaya, 125; supra.

16. This clause has been used to invalidate State taxation, as unreasonable impediment to inter-State commerce, when it subjects such commerce to the possibility of multiple burden.

of the Constitution, but the problem is too complicated to be solved only by the Judiciary. In India, however, a systematic attempt has been made to solve the problem as is clear from the above.

(c) EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Foreign trade being of great importance to the national economy, it becomes necessary to protect it from indiscriminate taxation. Consequently, Art. 286(1)(b) bars a State from imposing a tax on sale or purchase of goods which takes place in the course of import of goods into, or export of goods out of, the territory of India.

Under Art. 286(2), Parliament may by law formulate the principles for determining when a sale or purchase of goods takes place in the course of import or export. Accordingly, under S. 5 of the Central Sales Tax Act, 1956, a sale or purchase is in the course of export or import if it occasions the export or import of goods out of, or into, India,[18] or the sale is effectuated by a transfer of documents of title to the goods,—(i) in case of export, after the goods cross, and (ii) in case of import, before the goods cross, the customs frontiers of India.

Purchases in a State by an exporter for the purpose of export, as well as sales in the State by an importer after the goods have crossed the customs barrier, are not within the exemption. But sale in the State by an exporter or importer by transfer of shipping documents while the goods are beyond the customs barrier are within the exemption. Thus, if an exporter A purchases goods from C, and then exports them to B, the sale between A and B which occasions the export is exempt from sales tax but not the one between A and C. Similarly, if an importer A purchases goods from a foreign supplier B, and then sells them to C, when the goods have crossed the customs barrier, the sale between A and B is exempt from tax but not that between A and C.

Whether a sale has occasioned the export or not is a question of fact to be decided in the context of each case. No single test can be laid down as decisive for determining the question. Generally speaking, "Where the export is the direct result of sale, the export being inextricably linked up with the sale so that the bond cannot be disassociated without a breach of the obligation arising by statute, contract or mutual understanding between the parties arising from the nature of the transaction, the sale is in the course of export."[19]

It is not within the scope of this book to discuss this matter in detail.[20] A few examples will suffice here:

(a) Pursuant to an agreement between the Governments of India and Pakistan, a company loaded coal in wagons consigned to East Pakistan. Bills were drawn in respect of the coal supplied in the name of the Deputy Coal Commissioner,

---

17. This provision has been used to invalidate State attempts to tax an object outside the State borders.

18. Travancore-Cochin v. Bombay Co. Ltd., AIR 1952 SC 366 : 1952 SCR 5552: Travancore-Cochin v. SVC Factory, AIR 1953 SC 333; State of Mysore v. Mysore Spinning Co., AIR 1958 SC 1003 : (1975) 2 SCC 47; East India Tobacco Co. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1962 SC 1733 : (1963) 1 SCR 747; Mohd. Serazuddin v. State of Orissa, AIR 1975 SC 1564.

19. B.G.N. Plantations v. S.T.O., AIR 1964 SC 1752 : (1964) 7 SCR 706.

20. For details see, I.L.I., Annual Survey of Indian Law, under Sales Tax.

Calcutta, who was to realise the price of coal supplied to Pakistan. It was held that no sales tax could be levied as the sale of coal was in the course of export.[21]

(b) Sale of coffee by the Coffee Board to the registered exporters who were under an obligation to export the same was a sale for export but not in 'the course of export' and so was not exempt from sales taxation.[22]

(c) An importer supplied copper to the Central Government. For this purpose, he imported copper under import licences granted by the Government. The Supreme Court held that the movement of goods in the course of import was not occasioned by the contract of sale and it was not exempt from sales tax.[23]

(d) The State of Bihar levied a surcharge on sales tax payable by dealers whose gross turn-over in a year was 5 lac rupees or over. For this purpose, the turn-over of inter-State sale or purchase was also to be counted though the surcharge was payable only on the sales tax levied on intra-State sale and not on inter-State sale.

The Supreme Court held that the provision was not invalid under Art. 286. A State Legislature could for purposes of registration of a dealer and submission of returns of sales tax, include the transactions covered by Art. 286. The provision is not assailable so long as tax is levied on intra-state sales only.[24]

(d) GOODS OF SPECIAL IMPORTANCE

Article 286(3) lays down that a State law imposing a tax on the sale or purchase of goods declared by Parliament by law to be of special importance in inter-State trade or commerce, is to be subject to such restrictions and conditions in regard to tax so levied as Parliament may specify.[25]

A list of such goods is contained in S. 14 of the Central Sales Tax Act. The restrictions on taxation of sales of such goods as imposed in S. 15 of the Act are: a tax shall be levied only on the last sale or purchase inside the State; it shall be levied only at one stage, and at a maximum rate of 4% of the sale price of the commodity.

This clause was added to enable Parliament to restrict States' power to tax important raw materials. This was done on the recommendation of the Taxation Enquiry Commission which had suggested that some restrictions be placed to tax intra-state sales of raw materials produced therein, otherwise, the cost of the manufactured articles whether manufactured in the State producing the raw materials, or in another State, would increase. The manufactured goods are consumed mostly outside the State producing the raw materials, an increase in their cost due to the State taxation is of direct concern to the consumers in other States. Therefore, the Commission felt that it was necessary that such interstate sales be brought under the Central control.

---

21. N.A. Coal Co. v. C.I.T., AIR 1966 Cal. 629.
22. Coffee Board v. Jt. C.T.O., AIR 1971 SC 870 : (1969) 3 SCC 349.
23. Binani Bros. v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1510 : (1974) 1 SCC 459. But see, K.G. Khosla & Co. v. Dy. Commr., AIR 1966 SC 1216 : 1966 (5) SCR 352; Dy. Commr. v. Kotak & Co., AIR 1973 SC 2491 : (1974) 3 SCC 148.
24. Hoechst Pharmaceuticals Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019, 1021, 1050 : (1983) 4 SCC 5.
25. Satnam Overseas (Export) v. State of Haryana, (2003) 1 SCC 561 : AIR 2003 SC 66.

(ii) INTER-GOVERNMENT TAX IMMUNITIES

As two tiers of governments having autonomous functions and taxing powers operate side by side in a federation, their operations are bound to cross and intersect at several points. A government at one level may exercise its powers in such a manner as to interfere with the working of the government at the other level. The doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities or inter-governmental immunity seeks to ensure that government at one level in a federation operates without unduly restricting the operations and instrumentalities of the government at the other level. Though the doctrine has general application, yet its most significant application is in the area of taxation. The doctrine of immunity restricts, to some extent, the taxing powers of the governments in a federation.[26]

(a) U.S.A.

The doctrine of immunity originated, as did the modern federalism, in the United States. It is not mentioned explicitly in the Constitution but is the result of judicial interpretation.

The doctrine rests on the postulate that in a federal polity, there ought to be inter governmental tax immunities between the Centre and the States. The U.S. Congress enacted a law incorporating a Bank and a State levied a tax on the Bank's operations. Holding the State law to be unconstitutional in McCulloch v. Maryland,[27] the Supreme Court expounded the doctrine laying down that the States had no power, by taxation or otherwise, to "retard, impede, burden or in any manner control, the operations of the constitutional law enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the general government."

At this early stage in the constitutional development of the U.S.A, the purpose of the doctrine was to protect the Centre against the onslaughts on it by the States. The Centre was at the time in its formative stage and needed to be protected against hostile State action against it or its immunities. But, a few years later, applying the same principle on a reciprocal basis to protect the State instrumentalities from Central taxation, the Supreme Court held in Collector v. Day[28] that the Central Government could not tax the income of a State judicial official.

The doctrine of immunity was thus evolved to protect the autonomy of the National and the State Governments within their respective spheres from being encroached upon by each other. In the beginning, a very broad concept of immunity held sway. The judicial tendency was to carry the doctrine of exemption to rather extreme lengths so much so that not only the governmental instrumentalities as such, but even private persons in their dealings with a government in various capacities, such as, suppliers, contractors or creditors, were held immune from being taxed by the other government.[29] For example, a manufacturer of motorcycles was held not subject to the Federal excise tax on sales thereof with respect to sales to a municipality.[30]

---

26. M.P. JAIN and S.N. JAIN, Inter-governmental Tax Immunities in India, 2 JILI 101. (1959-60).
27. 4 Wheat. 316 (1819).
28. 11 Wall. 113 (1870).
29. CORWIN, THE CONSTITUTION AND WHAT IT MEANS TO-DAY, 39 (1978).
30. Indian Motor Cycle Co. v. U.S., 283 U.S. 570 (1931).

Eventually, however, the courts realised that the doctrine in such broad terms benefited private individuals more than the governments, that it unduly restricted governments' taxing powers and that it was creating a tax-free privileged class of people. Consequently, the courts re-examined the doctrine and curtailed its broad canvas. Without going into details, the present position of the immunity doctrine in the U.S.A. may be summarized as follows:

A discriminatory tax by one government on the activities of the other is invalid. A federal non-discriminatory levy imposing a substantial burden on the States, or interfering with the performance of their 'essential' or 'sovereign' functions is also bad.

A State function is not immunized from Central taxation if the burden will be absorbed by private persons.[31] Thus, State employees can be subjected to Central income-tax.[32]

Business activities carried on by the States can also be subjected to Central taxes. The reason being that motives of profit may lead the States into many business enterprises and to immunize these from federal taxation would seriously cripple its revenue raising capacity.[33]

The immunity to the States has thus come to be confined to functions of a governmental character.

As regards the Central instrumentalities, the immunity granted in their favour from State taxation is somewhat broader. The Congress can always confer immunity on any of its instrumentalities from State taxation under the 'necessary and proper' clause.[34]

Even if the Congress is silent, States cannot tax activities or the agencies of the Centre,[35] but burdens which are not 'substantial' are not barred. The States can therefore, tax the salaries of the Central Government employees as it only means an indirect burden on the government.[36] Similarly, a tax on persons dealing with government, like contractors, is not bad even though they pass on the economic burden to the government.[37]

(b) CANADA

In Canada, the courts have refused to apply the American doctrine of immunity.[38] Thus, immunity has been refused to the income of officials of one government from being taxed by another government.[39] But discriminatory taxes by one government against another cannot be levied, and a Province cannot destroy

---

31. Wilmette Park District v. Campbell, 338 U.S. 411.
32. Helvering v. Gerhardt, 304 U.S. 405; Graves v. New York, 306 US 466.
33. South Carolina v. U.S., 199 U.S. 437; New York v. U.S., 326 U.S. 572.
34. Carson v. Roane Anderson Co., 342 U.S. 232; CORWIN, op. cit., 92, 277; supra, Ch. X, Sec. L.
35. Cleveland v. U.S., 323 U.S. 329; Mayo v. U.S., 319 U.S. 441., United States v. Sales Tax Comm. of the State of Mississipi, 421 U.S. 599 (1975).
36. Graves v. New York, 306 U.S. 466.
37. Alabama v. King & Boozer, 314 U.S. 1; U.S . & Borg-Warner Corp. v. City of Detroit, 355 U.S. 466 (1958); Grover, Tax Immunities on Federal Property, 1959 Wisconsin L.R. 167; Pierce, "Tax Immunity Should Not Mean Tax Inequity., ibid., 173; Van Cleve Jr., "State Rights and Federal Solvency", Ibid., 190.
38. Bank of Toronto v. Lambe, 12 A.C. 575 (1878).
39. Forbes v. Att. Gen. for Manitoba, (1937) A.C. 260.

or sterilise the status and powers of a Dominion company, e.g., a company incorporated under the Dominion law cannot be required to take out a licence from a Province to do business therein.[40]

Section 125 of the British North America Act expressly incorporates, to a limited extent, the principle of inter-governmental immunity insofar as it prohibits taxation of lands or property of one government by the other. This provision, it has been held, does not immunize Provincial imports of goods from Central customs duties.[41] A tax may also be levied on an owner of land leased to the Crown, or on a tenant of government land.[42] No tax can, however, be levied on a corporate body for occupying land when it is a servant or an agent to the Crown.[43]

(c) AUSTRALIA

To start with, the American doctrine of Immunity of Instrumentalities was held applicable in full vigour in Australia. Thus, a Central Government servant was held immune from State tax in respect of his salary.[44] State instrumentalities, like State railways, were held immune from Federal taxation.[45] This phase, however, came to an end with the Engineers case in 1920.[46]

The State of Western Australia claimed immunity from a Central law in respect of trading concerns owned and controlled by it. The High Court rejected the doctrine as it thought that otherwise the States could without limit encroach on the Commonwealth power simply by creating a governmental instrumentality. A pay-roll tax on all wages payable by an employer (including the States) was held valid in Victoria v. Commonwealth.[47] It, however, appears that the Commonwealth enjoys immunity from State legislation.[48] Discriminatory laws cannot, however, be made by one government against the other.[49]

Section 114 of the Commonwealth of Australia Act, 1900, restricts the Commonwealth and the States from levying taxes on the property of each other. This provision, it has been held, does not immunize State imports from the Central customs duty. The constitutional provision was held to apply to State property within the Commonwealth but the customs duty was levied on the act of import and not on property itself and so did not fall under Section 114.[50] The Commonwealth could not, as occupier of private property, become liable to a municipal tax laid on an occupier of land.[51]

---

40. John Deere Plow Co. v. Wharton, (1915) A.C. 330; Caron v. The King, [1921] 2 AC 91; Bora Laskin, Canadian Constitutional Law, 742-747.
41. Att. Gen. for Br. Col. v. Att. Gen. for Canada, (1924) A.C. 222.
42. Spooner Oil Ltd. & Spooner v. Turner Valley Gas Conservation Board, (1933) S.C.R. 629; City of Montreal v. Attorney-General for Canada, (1923) AC 136.
43. Regina Industries Ltd. v. Regina, (1947) S.C.R . 345; Bora Laskin op. cit., 742.
44. D'Emden v. Pedder, I CLR 19; Deakin v. Webb, 1 CLR 585; Baxter v. Commissioner of Taxation, 4 CLR 1087 (1906).
45. The Railway Servants' case. 4 CLR 488 (1906).
46. Amalgamated Society of Engineers v. The Adelaide Steamship Co. Ltd., 28 CLR 129.
47. (1971) 122 C.L.R. 353.
48. Commonwealth v. Cigamatic Pty. Ltd., (1962) 108 CLR 372.
49. West v. Commissioner of Taxation, 56 CLR 657; Essendon Corporation v. Criterion Theatres Ltd., 74 CLR 1; Melbourne Corporation v. The Commonwealth (The State Banking case). 74 CLR 31.
50. Att. Gen. of N.S.W. v. Collector of Customs, 5 CLR 818.
51. The Essendon Corp. case, supra, footnote 49.

(d) POSITION IN INDIA

The scope of the Inter-governmental tax immunities in India is very restricted. Such immunities are dealt with mainly in Articles 285, 287, 288 and 289. The Indian Constitution does not import the broad and general doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities as understood in the United States beyond what can be derived from these constitutional provisions. Arts. 285 and 289 are discussed below. Arts. 287 and 288 have been discussed earlier.[52]

Article 285 : Exemption of Union Property from State Taxation

Article 285 debars a State from taxing Union property.[53] Art. 285(1) provides that the property of the Union shall be exempt from all taxes imposed by a State, or by any authority within the State, except to the extent Parliament may otherwise provide by law. It is clear from the expression "any authority within the State" used in Art. 285(1) that the Union property is exempt not only from "State taxation", but also from tax imposed by any other authority like a municipality. A municipality being a creature of the State cannot enjoy any larger power than the State itself.

Article 285 imposes a ban on State taxation of Central Government property, and there is no way in which a State Legislature can impose a tax on the property of the Central Government. Only Parliament can relax this ban to the extent it likes by making a law.

The word "property" has been used in Art. 285(1) in a "perfectly general sense" without any qualification and includes lands, buildings, chattels, shares, debts, everything that has a money value, and every kind of property—moveable, or immoveable, tangible or intangible.[54] Also, no distinction is made between the Union property devoted to commercial purposes or that used for governmental functions. Thus, the States cannot tax any property of the Union whatever the use it is being put to.

Article 298 which provides that the Central executive power to acquire, hold and dispose of property for any purpose falling outside the Parliamentary legislative sphere, shall be subject to the laws of a State, does not override Art. 285 because what is subjected to State laws is only the Central "executive power" and not "property".[55]

---

52. Supra, Sec. D.

53. In the Constituent Assembly. a strong plea was made to subject Union property, especially the railway property, to taxation by the local government, on the ground that it renders such services to the property as sanitation, hygiene, conservancy, roads, lighting, fire-brigade, etc., and that the financial position of the local bodies was not happy.

Objection was, however, taken to the proposal on several grounds, viz: (1) theoretically, it was objectionable to conceive property of a person, who was not represented in an organisation, to be taxed by that organisation ad infinitium, (2) The taxing power of the local government depended on the statute passed by the State and it was not known what kind of taxes, and to what extent would a State empower the local government to levy.

The rigours of the exemption have been mitigated, however, by permitting the status quo to continue, and empowering Parliament to allow taxation of the Union property by passing a law to that effect, IX CAD, 1147-1160.

54. Governor-General in Council v. Corporation of Calcutta, AIR 1948 Cal. 116. Also, The Corporation of Calcutta v. The Governor of St. Thomas School, AIR 1949 FC 121.

55. Infra, Ch. XII; supra, Ch. III.

Parliament has enacted the Railways (Local Authorities Taxation) Act, 1941, under which the Central Government may by a notification make railway property liable to pay tax in aid of the funds of any local authority. This Act has been enacted in pursuance of Art. 285(1).[56] The proscription relates to tax and does not affect the liability of the Railways to pay fees levied by the local authorities for supply of water and maintaining sewerage systems.[57]

The immunity from State taxation applies to the Central Government and its departments, and not to incorporated companies in which that government has a controlling interest.[58] Now a days many public corporations and government companies have come into existence. The Government uses these bodies as tools to conduct commercial functions. Government has, generally speaking, controlling interest in such bodies. These bodies enjoy a sort of intermediate position between independence and complete accountability through a Minister to Parliament. Since each of these bodies is incorporated under the relevant law, such a body is regarded as a separate and distinct legal entity and not as a part of the government like a department. Thus, the government companies like the Hindustan Steel Private Ltd., and the Sindri Fertilizers and Chemicals Ltd., or public corporations, would not be immune from State taxation.

Even when the entire share capital of a company is subscribed by the Central Government, it does not mean that the company is owned by the government. Jurisprudentially a company incorporated under the Companies Act has a separate corporate personality of its own, distinct from that of the government, and is not identified with it. Therefore, it would not be immune from State or municipal taxes. A municipality can levy tax on lands and buildings owned by such a company.

Certain government companies incorporated under the Companies Act, the entire share capital of which was held/owned by the Government of India, claimed exemption from the State taxation under Art. 285(1). The Supreme Court rejected the plea holding that merely because the entire share capital is held or owned by the Government of India, it cannot be held that the companies themselves are owned by the Government of India. It was observed that the companies which are incorporated under the Companies Act have a corporate personality of their own, distinct from that of the Government of India and that the lands and buildings are vested in and owned by the companies whereas the Government of India only owns the share capital.[59]

Similar is the position of statutory corporations set up by or under statutes enacted by Parliament. Such a body is not regarded as a department of the Central Government. It has a separate personality. It is regarded as an instrumentality of 56. Union of India v. Sahibganj Municipality, AIR 1973 SC 1185 : (1973) 1 SCC 676. Also see, Union of India v. Purna Municipal Council, AIR 1992 SC 1597 : (1992) 1 SCC 100.

---

57. Union of India v. State of U.P., (2007) 11 SCC 324.

58. JAIN & JAIN. PRINCIPLES OF ADMIN. LAW, Ch. XXV (1986).

59. Western Coalfields Ltd. v. Spl. Area Development Authority, AIR 1982 SC 697, 705 : (1982) 1 SCC 125. Also see, Electronics Corp. of India v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1983 A.P. 239; Electronics Corp. of India v. Secretary, Revenue Deptt., Govt. of A.P., AIR 1999 SC 1734 : (1999) 4 SCC 458; Bhilai Steel Plant, Bhilai v. Special Area Development Authority, Bhilai, AIR 1991 MP 332; Mahanadi Coalfields Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1994 Ori. 258.

the Central Government. The property owned by such bodies is not exempt from State taxation.[60]

The Board of Visakhapatnam Port Trust is constituted under the Major Port Trusts Act, 1963. It is a body corporate with perpetual succession. It can acquire, hold or dispose of property. The Central Government can supersede the Board. In that case, all properties vested in the Board would vest in the Central Government until a new board is reconstituted. It was argued that the board is not an absolute owner of the properties, only the management of the properties vest in the board and as the properties belong to the Central Government, and so they were exempt from State taxation under Art. 285. Rejecting the argument, the Court ruled that the properties vest in the Board and not in the Government. The board is not a department of the Government but is distinct from the Central Government and it cannot, therefore, claim exemption from State taxation under Art. 285.[61]

Similarly, it has been ruled that the International Airport Authority of India constituted by the International Airports Authority Act, 1971, is a distinct juristic entity having its own properties, fund and employees. It is a statutory corporation distinct from the Central Government. Accordingly, the property vested in the Authority are subject to municipal taxation. The Authority cannot invoke the immunity created by Art. 285(1) of the Constitution.[62]

The Union property has been immunized from all taxes "imposed by a State, or by any other authority within a State" if the following two requisites are fulfilled:

(1) the State tax is levied directly on property:[63] and

(2) such property is vested in the Central Government.

Under these principles there is no scope for considering the incidence of tax—whether falling on the government or the private individual—in adjudicating the validity of a State taxing statute. A State tax would not be invalid, even though it ultimately falls on the Central Government, if the above two conditions are not satisfied. Conversely, a tax would not be valid merely because its incidence falls on a private individual. What is material is to ascertain the object "on" which the tax is levied irrespective of its incidence and, for this purpose, the charging section in the taxing statute is to be looked into.[64]

A municipality or a municipal corporation is an 'authority within a State'. Therefore, the municipality is not competent to levy any taxes upon the proper-

---

60. Food Corporation of India v. Municipal Committee, AIR 1999 SC 2573 : (1999) 6 SCC 74; Central Warehousing Corp. v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1995 Raj 180; Municipal Commissioner of Dum Dum Municipality v. Indian Tourism Development Corp., (1995) 5 SCC 251 : (1995) 5 JT 610; Hotel Corporation of India v. State of J&K, AIR 2001 J&K 36.

61. Board of Trustees for the Visakhapatnam Port Trust v. State of Andhra Pradesh, (1999) 6 SCC 78 : AIR 1999 SC 2532. Also see, Paradip Port Trust v. Notified Area Council, Paradip, AIR 1990 Ori. 145.

62. International Airport Authority v. Municipal Corp. of Delhi, AIR 1991 Del. 302; Municipal Commr. of Dum Dum Municipality v. India Tourism Development Corpn., (1995) 5 CC 251 : (1995) 5 JT 610.
Similar is the position of the Indian Tourism Development Corporation.

63. Director, Maintenance, Dept. of Telecom., Bangalore v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1998 Kant 335.

64. Corp. of Calcutta v. Governor of St. Thomas School, supra, footnote 54.

ties of the Union of India. The Calcutta Maidan belonging to the Government of India was leased to the petitioners. A tax imposed by the Calcutta Corporation was held bad because the tax was imposed on the property of the owner, i.e.; the Government of India, and not on the interest of the occupier, though part of the tax was realised from him.[65]

No tax can be levied by a municipality on the property belonging to the Central Government even if it is being used for residential or commercial purposes. If the property belongs to the Union, no tax could be levied thereon by the State or municipality irrespective of its use. Art. 285 does not provide for the concept of use.[66]

A State tax can be levied on the interest of the lessee of Central Government property. A municipality cannot levy octroi on goods imported by railway for consumption by it within the municipal limits.[67] A State cannot levy road tax on the vehicles owned by the Central Government, or the railway which is only a department of the Central Government.[68]

But the Karnataka High Court has differed from this approach. The High Court has ruled that the levy of tax on motor vehicles belonging to the Central Government is not invalid as the tax is not levied directly on property but indirectly on the use of the vehicles. The High Court has emphasized that Art. 285 bars State tax levied directly on property of the Central Government. Thus, Art. 285 does not bar levy of excise duty as the taxable event in this case is not goods but manufacture thereof. A State can levy sales tax on goods sold to the Central Government as the taxable event in this case is not goods but the sale thereof.[69] This view can be said to have been affirmed by the Supreme Court[70] which has held that the States can levy sales tax on the supply of materials by the Union of India to its contractors.

Under Art. 285(1), it is open to Parliament to enact a law to abrogate the exemption of its property from State taxation. No such law has however been enacted so far. However, the Centre has issued a circular that service charges in respect of its properties shall be paid by it to local authorities and that it shall be treated not as a tax but as compensation. This circular has been held to be legally enforceable.[71] It is only a State tax on Union property which is bad. A State may levy a tax on the employees of the Central Government.

Under Art. 285 (2), status quo has, however, been maintained as regards taxes levied on the Central property immediately prior to the commencement of the Constitution by any authority within the State until Parliament provides otherwise. Art. 285(2) enacts that until Parliament by law provides otherwise, Art. 285(1) would prevent any authority within a State from levying any tax on any Union property to which such property was immediately before the commence-

---

65. Turf Properties v. Corp. of Calcutta, AIR 1957 Cal 431.
66. Union of India v. City Municipal Council, AIR 2000 Kant 104.
67. Union of India v. Bhusaval Municipal Council, AIR 1982 Bom 512
68. Union of India v. State of Punjab, AIR 1990 P&H 183; Union of India v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1991 Raj 96.
69. Director, Maintenance, Dept. of Telecom, Bangalore v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1998 Kant. 335.
70. Karya Palak Engineer, CPWF v. Rajasthan Taxation Board, (2004) 7 SCC 195 : AIR 2004 SC 4499.
71. Food Corporation of India v. Alleppey Municipality, AIR 1996 Ker. 241.

ment of this Constitution liable so long that tax continues to be levied in that State. Art. 285(2) does not permit levy of any tax by a State; it benefits an 'authority' within the State, such as, a municipal body.

The authority can reap the benefit of Art. 285(2) if two conditions are fulfilled, viz.:

(1) That it is 'that tax' which is being continued to be levied and no other;

(2) That the local authority in 'that State' is claiming to continue the levy of the tax.

"In other words, the nature, type and the property on which the tax was being levied prior to the commencement of the Constitution must be the same as also the local authority must be the local authority of the same State to which it belonged before the commencement of the Constitution".

Thus, according to Art. 285(2), the local authority in the same State should continue to levy the tax. When the local authority in one State was levying the tax on railway property before the Constitution, but that authority was then transferred to another State after the Constitution, it could not claim the benefit of Art. 285(2).[72]

Some railway property had been subject to house tax and water tax long before the commencement of the Constitution. In March, 1953, as a result of a fresh assessment, the amount of the tax was enhanced. Holding the enhancement to be valid, the Supreme Court stated that a variation in the quantum of tax based on an increase in the value of the property would be covered by the constitutional provision.[73]

Certain properties belonging to the Telephone Corporation, a private body, were being taxed by the Calcutta Corporation. In 1943, the Corporation was taken over by the Central Government, but the tax on properties continued to be paid. In 1951, the Union disputed its liability to pay the tax on the ground that the assessment of the tax on its properties during 1943-51 was illegal. It was held that even if the pre-Constitution assessment was unlawful, the Union was, nevertheless, liable to pay the tax after the commencement of the Constitution, for the tax was being paid in fact immediately before the Constitution, commenced.[74]

It is open to Parliament to enact a law and abrogate the right of the local authority to continue to levy the tax under Art. 285(2).

Article 289: Property and Income of the States and the Union Taxing Powers:

Article 289(1) limits the taxing power of the Union by exempting from its purview State property and income. Art. 289(1) declares that the "property and income of a State shall be exempt from Union Taxation". Thus, ordinarily, the income derived by a State both from governmental and non-governmental or commercial activities would be immune from Central taxation. The term Central taxation means all taxes which the Centre is empowered to impose.

---

72. Union of India v. Bellary Municipality, AIR 1978 SC 1803 : (1979) 2 SCC 1. Also see, Union of India v. State of Punjab, AIR 1990 P&H 183.
73. Union of India v. Municipal Board, Lucknow, AIR 1957 All 452.
74. Corp. of Calcutta v. Union of India, AIR 1957 Cal. 548. Also see, Union of India v. Municipal Commr., Bhagalpur, AIR 1959 Pat. 216.

However, under Art. 289(2), the business operations of a State, State property used or occupied for trade or business, or income accruing therefrom, may be taxed if Parliament so provides.[75]

The scheme of Art. 289 is that, ordinarily, the income derived by a State both from governmental or non-governmental or commercial activities is immune from Union taxation, provided the income is the income of the State. This general proposition flows from Art. 289(1), Then, Art. 289(2) provides an exception to Art. 289(1). The Centre is authorised to impose a tax in respect of the income derived by a State government from trade or business carried on by it, or on its behalf. This can be done by Parliament making a law.

In the U.S.A., great difficulty was felt in drawing a line between governmental and commercial functions of the State Governments.[76] Therefore, in India, instead of leaving this matter to the courts, power has been given to Parliament to draw such a distinction by legislation. Parliament can specify the trading activities of the State Governments making them liable to Union taxation.

The Supreme Court in New Delhi Municipal Committee v. State of Punjab[77] has taken the view that under Art. 289(2), removal of exemption is not automatic; it comes about only when the Parliament makes a law imposing taxes in respect of any trade or business carried on by a State Government and all activities connected therewith, or any property used or occupied for the purposes of such business as also the income derived therefrom. If any property—whether movable or immovable—is used or occupied for the purpose of any such trade or business, it can be denied exemption provided by Art. 289(1), but this denial can be only by way of a law made by Parliament.

The Court has also ruled that unless an activity in the nature of trade and business is carried on with a profit motive, it would not be a trade or business contemplated by Art. 289(2). Only where a trade or business is carried on with a profit motive, or any property is used or occupied for the purpose of carrying on such trade or business, that Art. 289(2) would be attracted.

Under Art. 289(3), Parliament has power to declare by law any class of trade or business as incidental to the ordinary functions of government, and it would then be immune from Union taxation. Art. 289(3) means that whatever trade or business is declared to be incidental to the ordinary functions of government, would cease to be governed by Art. 289(2) and would then be exempt from Union Taxation.

Article 289(3) is an exception to Art. 289(2). When a trade or business is declared by Parliament to be incidental to the ordinary governmental functions, it

---

75. In the Constituent Assembly, objection was taken to the Centre taxing a State enterprise on the ground that it would place a heavy financial burden on the States which might retard country's industrialisation. But several arguments were adduced in favour of Central taxation, e.g., Centre had heavy responsibilities and so it should be able to raise sufficient revenue; States might start a number of industries which though not financially successful might yet kill private enterprise: Parliament could exempt any specific State industry from taxation and so the arrangement was flexible, etc.

On behalf of the Centre, assurances were given that it would not tax any State-run public utility industry and that it would tax equally a State-owned industry and a similar Central industry, if any: IX CAD, 1161-71.

76. See, New Yark v. United States, 326 US 572 (1946).

77. AIR 1997 SC 2847 at 2900, 2901 : (1997) 7 SCC 339.

would cease to be governed by Art. 289(2) and it would then be exempt from Union Taxation. This provision derives support from the principles developed in America according to which State commercial operations have been held not to be immune from Central taxation.[78] In the U.S.A., however, it has proved difficult to determine which function is incidental to the ordinary functions of government as it has to be determined judicially. In India, this difficulty has been got over by giving to Parliament the power to declare any trade or business to be incidental to the ordinary functions of government.

The principles underlying Art. 285(1) also apply mutatis mutandis to the taxation of State property by the Union, subject to one difference, viz., whereas Union property devoted to commercial functions is exempt from State taxation, such State property is not so exempt from Union taxation ipso facto, and Parliament can pass a law to impose tax on such property.

The Supreme Court has held by a majority, in an advisory opinion, that the Centre can levy customs duty on goods imported or exported, or an excise duty on goods produced or manufactured, by a State Government irrespective of whether or not it is used for purposes of trade or business.[79] The exemption under Art. 289 in favour of the State property from Union taxation does not extend to the levy of customs duty on State imports and exports. Similarly, the exemption does not extend to levy of excise duty on production of goods by the States.

The Supreme Court has opined that to exempt the exports or imports made by the States from customs duty would seriously impair the power of Parliament to regulate foreign trade by using its taxing powers. Similary, exempting manufacture or production of goods by States from Central taxation would adversely affect the Central power to regulate interstate commerce. Art. 289(1), the Court has held, bars Central taxes directly on property or income of the States and not those taxes which may indirectly affect, or are in respect of, income or property. The customs duty is a tax on 'import or export', and excise on 'production or manufacture' and none of these taxes is levied on property or income as such, and, therefore, none of these taxes fall within the purview of Art. 289(1).[80]

The majority opinion is in line with the views held in other federations.[81] Another factor which the Court has invoked in favour of its view is that as the Centre is under an obligation to share its revenue with the States,[82] its revenue raising capacity should not be impaired by interpreting the exemption in favour of the States broadly.

The Centre can impose a tax on income or property of State-owned companies or corporations because they have an entity separate from its shareholders and, accordingly, their property and income cannot be regarded as that of the concerned State. Exemption from Central taxation under Art. 289(1) extends only to

---

78. Supra.
79. The issue was decided by the Bench of the Supreme Court by a majority of 5 : 4.
80. In re Sea Customs Act, S. 20(2), AIR 1963 SC 1760. This was a reference made by the President to the Supreme Court under Art. 143, see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C. Also see, Director, Maintenance Deptt. of Telecom, Bangalore v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1998 Kant. 335.
81. Supra.
82. Infra, Sec. K(i).

the States and not to their instrumentalities. An instrumentality of a State is a different entity from the State itself.[83]

Further, companies are normally incorporated to carry on commercial functions and, under Art. 289(2), Parliament has power to tax the commercial undertakings of the States. It may be realized that granting tax exemption to State enterprises not only places them in a favoured position vis-a-vis private enterprise which is heavily taxed, but also adversely affects the tax raising capacity of the Centre.

In the case noted below,[84] the Supreme Court has ruled that income of a corporation is not the income of the State since the former is an independent legal entity and, hence, Art. 289(1) does not apply. In this case, the Andhra Pradesh State Road Transport Corporation was constituted under the Road Transport Corporations Act, 1950. Prior to the Act, road transport was a department of the Andhra Pradesh Government and was being run by it and, thus, the income from road transport was exempt from tax as income of the State Government. But, after the formation of the corporation, income-tax was levied on its income.

The corporation argued against the levy on the ground that under the Act, the net income of the corporation was to go to the State of Andhra Pradesh, and, therefore the income of the corporation was really the income of the State Government. The Supreme Court rejected this contention holding that the corporation has a personality of its own as it has a separate fund of its own; it can borrow funds from any source, can enter into contracts and own property. The Court held that the fact that the corporation is owned by the State Government, or that in all material particulars, the corporation's activities are controlled by the State, are of no consequence.[85]

The Supreme Court has given a broad interpretation to the term "Union taxation" in Art. 289(1). It embraces all taxes leviable by Parliament including levy of taxes under Art. 246(4) in the Union Territories. In New Delhi Municipal Committee v. State of Punjab,[86] the question was raised whether the property of the States situated in the Union Territory of Delhi would be exempt from taxation by the New Delhi Municipality because of Art. 289(1). A nine Judges Bench of the Supreme Court has ruled in the affirmative. The term "Union Taxation" in Art. 289(1) has been held to include taxation by the New Delhi Municipality. The Court has argued that so far as a Union Territory is concerned, Parliament is the only law-making body,[87] or a legislature created by it. There is distribution of legislative powers between Parliament and the State Legislatures but there is no such distribution with respect to the Union Territories. Therefore, the phrase "Union Taxation" in Art. 289(1) encompasses municipal taxes levied by municipalities in the Union Territories.

---

83. Andhra Pradesh State Civil Supplies Corpn. Ltd. v. I.T. Commr., Hyd., 1983 Tax L.R. 1564. For the concept of an instrumentality, see., infra, Ch. XX, Sec. C.

84. A.P. State R.T. Corp. v. I.T.O., AIR 1964 SC 1486 : (1964) 7 SCR 17.
Also, M.P. JAIN AND S.N. JAIN, Inter-governmental Tax Immunities in India, 2 JILI, 101 (1960).

85. See Adityapur Industrial Development Authority v. Union of India, (2006) 5 SCC 100 : AIR 2006 SC 2375.

86. AIR 1997 SC 2847 at 2892-2894 : (1997) 7 SCC 339.

87. For "Union Territories", see, supra, Ch. IX.

The Court has ruled that the term "Union Taxation" "can and should be given the widest amplitude, allowing it to encompass all taxes that are levied by the authority of Parliamentary laws". The Court refused to limit it to those matters falling within Arts. 246(1). The Court saw "no reason why such a limiting principle must be read into the definition of the phrase 'Union Taxation'". Therefore, levy of taxes under Art. 246(4) ought to be covered by the term "Union Taxation". This means that the State property situated in the Union Territories would be exempt from taxes on property leviable by the Union or municipalities therein created by the Centre.

The Supreme Court has refused to apply the general doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities beyond the area laid down in Articles 285, 287, 288, 289. The most significant pronouncement on the subject is State of West Bengal v. Union of India.[88] The State of West Bengal challenged the competence of Parliament to enact S. 47 of the Coal Bearing Areas (Acquisition and Development) Act, 1957, which sought to empower the Centre to acquire State-owned coal bearing lands and rights over them. The main argument invoked against the Act was that the States had within their allotted field "full attributes of sovereignty" and, therefore, "exercise of authority by the Union agencies" which "trenches upon that sovereignty is void."

The Court held the Act to be valid by a majority. Referring to the historical processes, the Court pointed out that during the British period, India's administration was highly centralised and the Provinces were never treated as sovereign. Under the present Constitution, sovereignty vests in the people of India. Examining the structure of the Constitution, the Court declared that Parliament was not incompetent, on account of "some assumption as to absolute sovereignty of the States", to acquire State property by legislation for government purposes.

The Court also refused to apply the general doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities.[89] The Supreme Court specifically rejected the American doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities. SINHA, C.J., speaking for the majority ruled that the Privy Council had rejected the doctrine and held it inapplicable to the Canadian and Australian constitutions. The doctrine was equally inapplicable to India. Referring to entries in List I (22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 30, 32, 52, 53, 54, 56, 57), under which Parliament can directly legislate in respect of property in the States, the Court held that to deny to Parliament, while granting the extensive powers of legislation, power to legislate in respect of property situated within a State, and even of the State, would render the constitutional machinery practically unworkable. In the ultimate analysis, the matter is of legislative competence. The power under entry 42, List III,[90] which may be exercised by Parliament in respect of all property—private as well as State-owned and is meant for the effectuation of the entries in the Central List, is not incapable of being exercised in respect of property of the States, as there is no constitutional interdict against it. Power to legislate for the regulation and development of mines and minerals under the control of the Union (entry 54 List I)[91] would, by necessary implication, include the power to acquire mines and minerals.

---

88. AIR 1963 SC 1241 : 1964 (1) SCR 371.
89. Supra.
90. Supra.
91. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.

SUBBA RAO, J., however, dissented from the majority view and enunciated a broader doctrine of immunity. He insisted that "the Indian Constitution accepts the federal concept and distributes the sovereign powers between the co-ordinate constitutional entities, namely, the Union and the States". "This concept implies that one cannot encroach upon the governmental functions or instrumentalities of the other, unless the Constitution expressly provides for such interference", and, in the instant case, "there is no provision which enables one unit to take away the property of another except by agreement". But this argument did not prevail with the majority.

This is a momentous pronouncement by the Supreme Court and strengthens the viability of the Indian federalism. The doctrine of State rights stands discredited even in the older federations where the States had enjoyed a much greater autonomy before the creation of the federation than the State rights in India. The State rights doctrine, if accepted, would have weakened the Central Government as the States in future could have claimed more and more rights and immunities as against the Central Government and, thus, weaken the constitutional fabric.

The extension of the doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities beyond what is envisaged by the Constitution was rightly rejected by the Court as the doctrine is running into heavy weather even in the country of its origin and has been rejected in other countries like Canada and Australia.[92] The Indian Constitution seeks to provide a federal structure with a strong bias towards the Centre.[93] This position should not be corroded by any process—whether of judicial interpretation or otherwise.

K. EXPEDIENTS TO CREATE FINANCIAL EQUILIBRIUM AT THE STATE LEVEL

The scheme of allocation of Centre-State taxing powers, though designed with many considerations in view—convenience, simplicity, economy and uniformity, yet fails to create an equilibrium between responsibilities and resources at the State level. Most of the expansive and lucrative sources of taxation lie with the Centre, e.g., income-tax, corporation tax, customs and excises. Moreover, the Centre has the whole country to tap and can tax the taxing capacity existing anywhere in India. On the other hand, while the fiscal needs of the States are huge, because of their responsibility to provide for development, welfare and social service activities like education, housing, health, agriculture, etc., for which there is an insatiable demand in the country, their revenue raising capacity is cabined due to many reasons, some of which are:

(1) the economic conditions prevailing within their boundaries;

(2) the fact that they have to share their taxing powers with the local governments; and,

(3) by their taxing powers being somewhat inelastic.

Land revenue constitutes an important tax for the States and gives sizeable revenue to them at present, but its capacity for further exploitation is limited because a large number of holdings are small and uneconomic. Also, if agricultural income-tax is to be used increasingly, the land revenue would have to go down in relative importance. Agricultural income-tax would be meaningful only if a State has large agricultural income which means a high level of agriculture, and not all States can raise appreciable revenue from this source.

92. Supra.
93. See, infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. H.

Further, political and populist considerations also deter the States from fully utilising the taxable capacity of the agricultural economy. Excises on alcoholic liquors could give to the States sizeable revenue but because of the policy of prohibition this is not being exploited by them fully as a source of revenue. The States, are, therefore, left with only sales tax as the only flexible source of revenue which can be cultivated by them in depth.

The framers of the Constitution had themselves realised that the States' taxing powers would not enable them to raise adequate revenue to meet their needs. They also appreciated that in spite of its expansive and expensive responsibilities, Centre's taxing powers were flexible and it could rise sizeable revenue, and after meeting its own requirements could spare some funds for the States.[1] The framers, therefore, sought to augment the resources of the States and create an equivalence between their functions and resources by making elaborate provisions in the Constitution for transfer of a part of the Central Funds to the States. Two expedients, tax-sharing and grants-in-aid, have been devised for this purpose.

Before discussing the Indian scene, it may be worthwhile to have some idea of the developments in other Federations in area of fiscal relationship between the Centre and the regional governments.

In the U.S.A., the Constitution makes no provision for transfer of revenue from the Centre to the States. Nevertheless, under the force of circumstances, a pervasive system of conditional grants has arisen under which the Centre financially supports many State activities.[2]

In Canada, the system of grants to the Provinces is in vogue and with the centralisation of income-tax during the war, a kind of tax-sharing has also come to be adopted.

In Australia, Central revenue goes to the States in several ways, e.g., through conditional grants, sharing of income-tax, fiscal need grants through the Commonwealth Grants Commission, and loans.

These three Constitutions were drafted in the laissez faire era. Gradually laissez faire gave way to the concept of social welfare which generated public demand for social services and this led to the emergence of the system of Central grants to the States to enable them to meet these demands.

There is another value which is now sought to be promoted to some extent in each federation, viz., removal of regional disparities arising out of differences in economic and natural resources. While the taxing capacity of the people in a poor State is low, their needs are rather high and, therefore, to leave such a State to its own resources to provide services to the people would be to condemn the people

---

1. REPORT OF THE EXPERT COMMITTEE ON FINANCIAL PROVISIONS, VII CAD, 59. Also, IX CAD, 203-343.

2. JAIN, Federal Grants-in-aid in the U.S.A., supra, note 53, on 823.

to remain in a backward situation. To avoid this, the Central Government seeks to transfer funds to the States in such a way that even a poor State is able to provide social services to its own people at a level comparable with the rich States. Not to do so would generate disaffection among the various States which may generate tensions in the country. While this process of equalization is at work in some way in all federations, it has been taken farthest in Australia through the operation of the Commonwealth Grants Commission[3] and giving of grants to the States as their share of the income-tax revenue.

(i) TAX-SHARING

The Indian Constitution provides for a scheme of Centre-State tax sharing on a big scale. This envisages that the Centre shares some of the taxes levied and collected by it with the States. All revenue accruing to the States from their taxes is used by them, but all taxes leviable by the Centre are not meant for its exclusive use. The Centre is required to share some of its taxes with the States.

The powers of taxation assigned to the Union are based mostly on considerations of convenience of imposition and collection and not with a view to allocate them solely to the Union. The constitution-framers did not intend that all taxes assigned to the Centre should be solely spent by the Centre for its own purposes. They desired that a part of the Central revenue arising from taxation be used for subsidising the State activities.

(a) SCHEME EXISTING BEFORE 2000[4]

From the point of view of tax-sharing, all Central taxes were arranged in the following five categories.

1. Taxes levied and collected by the Centre, and used by it as a whole.

These taxes were: customs, corporation tax, capital gains tax, surcharges on taxes mentioned in categories (2) and (4) below [Art. 271], and residuary taxes.[5]

2. Taxes levied and collected by the Centre, but the net proceeds[6] of which had to be compulsorily shared by it with the States. [Art. 270].

The tax on non-agricultural income (excluding corporation tax) fell in this category. The Centre had to hand over a part of the revenue accruing to it from the levy of income tax to the States.

Such percentage, as 'may be prescribed', of the net proceeds of this tax in a financial year, except the proceeds attributable to the Union Territories, or to taxes payable in respect of Union emoluments,[7] was to be distributed among the States in such manner as was to be 'prescribed'. This divisible pool of the income-tax did not even form part of the Consolidated Fund of India.[8]

---

3. Also see, infra, Sec. L.
4. For the new scheme of tax-sharing after the year 2000, see, infra, (b).
5. Supra, Secs. C and G.
6. The term 'net proceeds' means the proceeds of a tax minus the cost of collection. The net proceeds of a tax are to be ascertained and certified by the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India, whose certificate is final: Art. 279.
7. 'Union emoluments' include all emoluments and pensions payable out of the Consolidated Fund of India on which income-tax is charged: Art. 270(4)(c).
8. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(g).

The word 'prescribed' here meant prescribed by the President by order after considering the recommendations of the Finance Commission.[9] Parliament need not pass a law for the purpose. This technique had been adopted as it was feared that there might be a good deal of wrangling in Parliament if the matter were to be discussed there and there might be undue political pressures for favouring one State at the cost of another State, and the big States having a large number of representatives in Parliament might combine to do injustice to the smaller States.[10]

Under Art. 271, the Centre could levy a surcharge on income-tax on non-agricultural income for its exclusive use without sharing it with the States [see category I above].

3. Taxes levied and collected by the Centre but a portion of the net proceeds of which 'may be assigned' by it to the States by its own law [Art. 272].

The Central excises (other than on medicinal and toilet preparations) fell in this category. Unlike the income-tax which must be shared, Centre-State tax-sharing in this area was not compulsory but optional for the Centre. The revenue accruing from the Central excises formed part of the Consolidated Fund of India out of which payments were to be made to the States when Parliament passed a law for this purpose.

4. Taxes levied and collected by the Centre, but the whole proceeds of which belonged to the States [Art. 269(1)].

The taxes falling in this category were:

(a) duties of succession on property other than agricultural land;

(b) estate duty in respect of non-agricultural property;

(c) terminal taxes on goods or passengers carried by rail, sea or air;

(d) taxes on railway fares and freights;

(e) taxes other than stamp duties on transactions in stock exchanges and futures markets;

(f) taxes on the sale or purchase of newspapers and on advertisements published therein;

(g) taxes on the sale or purchase of goods other than newspapers in the course of inter-State trade or commerce [see entry 92A List I];

(h) taxes on the consignment of goods (whether the consignment into the person making it or to any other person), where it takes place in the course of inter-State trade or commerce, (entry 92B, List I).

The net proceeds in a financial year of these taxes, except the proceeds attributable to the Union Territories, did not form part of the Consolidated Fund of India, but were distributed among the States in accordance with the principles formulated by law by Parliament [Art. 269(2)]. No part of the revenue arising from the taxes mentioned in this category was to be kept by the Centre.

As already noted above, the Centre could levy a surcharge on any of these taxes for its own purposes, which was not divisible among the States [Art. 271].

---

9. For Finance Commission, see, infra, Sec. L.

10. IX CAD 212.

With reference to (g) and (h) above, Art. 269(3) of the Constitution authorised Parliament by law to formulate principles for determining when a sale or purchase of, or consignment of, goods took place in the course of inter-State trade or commerce. In exercise of this power, Parliament enacted s. 3. of the Central Sales Tax Act, 1956, laying down the principles todetermine when a sale or purchase of goods took place in the course of inter-State trade or commerce so as to be liable to the Central sales tax imposed under Art. 269(1)(g).[11]

It had been held that a State possessed no competence to impose a tax on mere despatch of goods by a manufacturer to his own branch outside the State. It was held that this could not be regarded as a sale or disposal of goods and, therefore, it would not fall within the ambit of entry 54 of List II. Such a tax would fall within the Parliamentary field of legislation in the residuary field by virtue of Art. 248 and the residuary entry No. 97 of List I. Now, under Art. 269(1)(h) along with entry 92B, such a tax fell exclusively within Parliamentary field and a State Legislature could not intrude into the Parliamentary field.[12]

5. Taxes levied by the Centre but collected and utilised by the States [Art. 268].

Taxes like stamp duties and duties of excise on medicinal and toilet preparations fall in this category. Proceeds from these duties, except those collected by the Government of India for the Union Territories, do not form part of the Consolidated Fund. The States themselves collect the duties, though under a Central law, and appropriate them for their own purposes.

These taxes have been placed within the Central sphere merely for legislative purposes so that there may be uniformity in the rates of taxation throughout the country, and also that the Centre may co-ordinate these excises with its own wider scheme of excises on other commodities.

Under the Central Sales Tax Act, the tax on the sales in the course of inter-State trade and commerce is levied by the Centre but is assessed, collected and used by the exporting State.

(b) COMMENTS

The above scheme appreciably augmented the tax resources of the States and correspondingly curtailed those of the Centre. The exclusive Central tax resources were:

(a) taxes levied, collected and appropriated by the Centre (category I above); and

(b) taxes levied and collected by the Centre but shared with the States either compulsorily or voluntarily (categories 2 and 3 above).

However, the Centre had power to levy surcharges on some of the taxes (see 2 and 4 above) for its own purposes and not share them with the States although the basic tax revenue had to be shared. During an emergency, the Centre can further augment its tax resources.[13]

---

11. See, supra, Sec. J(i)(b).

12. Goodyear India Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1990 SC 781 : (1990) 2 SCC 71.
Art. 269(1)(h) and entry 92B have been added by the Constitution (Forty-Sixth Amendment) Act, 1982. For the Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.

13. Infra, Ch. XIII.

The State tax resources were:

(a) taxes levied and collected by them (all taxes enumerated in List II);

(b) taxes levied by the Centre but collected by them (category 5 above);

(c) taxes levied and collected by the Centre, the whole of the proceeds of which belonged to the States (category 4 above);

(d) taxes levied and collected by the Centre but voluntarily shared with them (category 3 above) and

(e) taxes levied and collected by the Centre but compulsorily shared by it with the States (category 2 above).

The Constitution had devised a flexible and elaborate scheme of tax-sharing.

Article 274 lays down that none of the following Bills or amendments is to be introduced or moved in a House of Parliament except on the President's recommendation:

(1) a Bill imposing or varying a tax in which the States are interested, i.e., a tax from the proceeds of which the States get a share;

(2) a Bill varying the meaning of the expression 'agricultural income' as defined for purposes of the Indian income tax law;[14]

(3) a Bill affecting the principles on which, under the provisions of the Constitution (Arts. 268-273), moneys may be distributable to the States; and

(4) a Bill imposing a surcharge on a tax for Central purposes.

As noted above, Parliament has power, under Art. 271, to levy a surcharge on taxes mentioned in Arts. 269 and 270. Revenues arising from surcharges are not shared by the States. The effect of Art. 274, therefore, is that a Bill of the type mentioned therein can be moved only by or with the consent of the Central Government. The advantage of this is that when once an allocation of funds has been made to the States, it cannot be disturbed by a private member bringing in a Bill for the purpose.

NEW SCHEME OF TAX-SHARING AFTER 2000

There was a major reconstruction of the scheme of tax-sharing between the Centre and the States in the year 2000.

Till the year 2000, only a few Central taxes were shareable between the Centre and the States. The Tenth Finance Commission suggested that the present system be replaced by a new scheme in which the States shared in the total tax revenue of the Centre. The Commission also suggested that the share of the States in the gross receipts of Central taxes be fixed at 26% and that this ratio be reviewed after 15 years.

The Commission saw many advantages in the new proposed scheme, as for example : the States can share in the aggregate buoyancy of Central taxes; the Central Government can pursue tax reforms without the need to consider whether a tax is shareable with the States or not; the impact of fluctuations in Central tax revenue would be felt alike by the Central and State Governments.[15] At present, if the Centre needs more revenue for its own needs, it has to take recourse to non-shareable taxes which distorts the pattern of Central taxation. This distortion will be avoided by the proposed scheme. But, inevitably, to introduce the proposed scheme, the Constitution would have to be amended.

14. Supra.

Consequent upon the suggestion made by the Tenth Finance Commission, as stated above, to orient the system of tax-sharing between the Centre and the States Parliament has enacted the Constitution (Eightieth Amendment) Act, 2000. This Amendment has altered in a fundamental manner the pattern of sharing of Central taxes with the States which had been prevailing hitherto and which has been described above.[16]

In 2003 Article 268-A was introduced in the Constitution by the Constitution (Eighty-eighth Amendment) Act, 2003, which provides that taxes on services shall be charged by the Union of India and shall be appropriated by the Union of India and the States.

A new Art. 270 has been substituted for the old one. The new Article [(270(1)] provides that the net proceeds of all taxes and duties referred to in the Union List, except the following, levied and collected by the Centre shall be distributed between the Centre and the States. The exceptions to this are:

(1) Duties and taxes referred to in Arts. 268, 268-A and 269 respectively;

(2) Surcharge on Taxes and duties referred to in Art. 271;

(3) Any cess levied for specific purposes under a law made by Parliament.

The new Article 270 does not fix the percentage of the net proceeds of the Central taxes which must be distributed among the States. Art. 270(2) merely says "such percentage as may be prescribed". In practice, the prescription of the distributable percentage of the Central taxes has been left to be settled to the Finance Commission.

The Eleventh Finance Commission has fixed this percentage at 29.5%. Thus, 29.5% of the Central Tax revenue has to be transferred to the States. The Commission has also worked out the scheme of inter se distribution of this tax revenue among the various States keeping in view a number of considerations, such as, population, collection, State budgetary deficits, State effort to improve its resource base, economy in State administration, fiscal discipline.

The 12th Finance Commission Report (2005-2010) raised the share of States in shareable Central taxes from 29.5 per cent to 30.5 per cent, the total transfers recommended being higher by 73.8 per cent over those recommended by the Eleventh Finance Commission.[17]

Article 269 has also been recast by the 80th Amendment. The new Article includes two taxes now, viz., taxes on the sale or purchase of goods in the course of inter-state trade or commerce; taxes on consignment of goods in the course of

---

15. REPORT OF THE TENTH FINANCE COMMISSION, 59-61 (1994).
16. For this Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.
17. On November 14, 2007 the Thirteenth Finance Commission was constituted under Article 280(1) of the Constitution. Its recommendations will cover the period of five years from Ist April, 2010 to 31st March 2015 to be submitted by 2009.

inter-State trade or commerce. These two taxes are levied by the Centre but are assigned as a whole to the States. Art. 272 has been repealed.

The new scheme of tax sharing is simple as all, and not a select few, Central taxes are shared between the Centre and the States. The scheme is designed to enable the states to share the aggregate buoyancy of the Central taxes. It will also enable the Centre to pursue its programme of tax reforms without being bothered as to whether a tax is sharable or not with the States.

The revenue transferred to the States by way of tax-sharing is unconditional which they use as they like. Thus, the major burden of taxation falls on the Centre while the States enjoy a part of the fruits of its efforts. Politically and economically, the Centre is in a much stronger position to tax than the States are. From the State point of view, the disadvantage of the scheme may be that they do not have control over the level of taxation, and they do not enjoy flexibility of varying the rates of taxation to suit their needs, as they could have done had the taxes been in their own legislative domain. But, as the situation exists today, the rates at which the Centre is levying these taxes are pretty high and it is very doubtful if the States could have collected as much revenue themselves from these taxes as they secure now as their share from the Central levy. Besides, many advantages which arise out of separating the Centre-State taxing powers have already been noted earlier.[18]

The fact however remains that in spite of the higher devolution of funds from the Centre, the financial position of the States is none-too-happy. Practically all States run deficit budgets and indulge in huge borrowing.

Although the Constitution devises an elaborate and flexible scheme of Centre-State financial relationship, and also that larger and larger Central funds have been devolving on the States over time, the fact remains that the present day financial health of the States is none too happy. Several factors have contributed to this situation, such as, the States do not make adequate tax effort; their tax collection machinery is weak; the demands of planning have cast a shadow over their resources. The States indulge in populist, but economically unsound, schemes which increase their budget deficit. For example, they do not charge economic rates from some favoured sections of consumers for the services provided by them. For example, in spite of huge investments made in generation of electricity, the States incur heavy losses instead of getting any return from their investment.

The Tenth Finance Commission has observed in this connection:[19]

> "We are painfully conscious of the fact that most States have preferred the softer option of letting services deteriorate rather than improving their spread and quality by realising economic returns on the investment in these areas and deploying the additional resources for this purpose."

Certain fiscal improvements have been sought to be evolved by enactment of fiscal responsibility legislations by the Centre and 26 State Governments. The Fiscal Responsibility and Budget Management Act was enacted by the Central Government in 2003 to reduce revenue and fiscal deficit. All the State Governments, barring West Bengal and Sikkim, have enacted Fiscal Responsibility Acts

---

18. Supra.
19. REPORT OF THE TENTH FINANCE COMMISSION, 9

to phase out their revenue deficits and bring down their fiscal deficits to 3 per cent of GSDP by 2008-09.[20]

(ii) GRANTS-IN-AID

Apart from the scheme of tax-sharing as mentioned above, another expedient used to effect transfer of revenue from the Centre to the States is the system of grants-in-aid. The Constitution envisages and provides for several forms of grants.

(a) FISCAL NEED GRANTS

Article 275 makes provision for 'fiscal need' grants. Parliament is authorised to provide by law as grants-in-aid to the revenues of such States as Parliament determines to be in need of assistance; and different sums may be fixed for different States.

These grants are fixed by Parliament every five years on the basis of recommendations of the Finance Commission.[21] These grants are given not to each State but only to such States as may be in need of assistance. The amount of money payable to the States by way of fiscal need grants is also unconditional and the recipient States can use this money as they like.

(b) SPECIFIC PURPOSE GRANTS

In common with other Federations, a system of grants oriented to promoting specific State activities and programmes, is also in operation in the country. These grants are known as 'conditional grants' or "specific purpose grants". These grants are given at the discretion of the Centre for supporting such activities as the Centre may wish to promote to achieve the desired national goals.

A few such grants are prescribed by the Constitution itself, viz., Art. 275(1) requires the Centre to make grants to a State to enable it to meet costs of schemes of development undertaken by it with the approval of the Central Government, for promoting the welfare of the Scheduled Tribes, or for raising the level of administration of the Scheduled Areas in the State.[22]

A Central grant is payable to Assam equal to the average excess of expenditure over the revenues during the two years preceding the commencement of the Constitution in respect of the administration of Tribal Areas in that State,[23] and the cost of such schemes of development as may be undertaken by the State with the approval of the Centre for raising the level of administration of these areas.[24]

The most important provision for conditional grants, however, is Art. 282 which has been discussed later.[25]

---

20. Report submitted to the Prime Minister on July 30, 2008 by the Economic Advisory Council to the Prime Minister: II.2.
21. Infra, Sec. L.
22. Supra, Ch. IX, C; infra, Ch. XXXV.
23. Ibid.
24. Proviso to Art. 275(1).
25. Infra, Sec. M.

L. FINANCE COMMISSION

After providing for the taxes which the Centre shall or may share with the States, and for fiscal need grants from the Centre to the States, the Constitution desists from laying down any rigid formula to determine the specific amounts payable to the States by the Centre under each head.

The Constitution-framers realised that a 'permanent' or immutable formula would hardly meet the situation for all time to come as changes in socio-economic conditions in the country would demand constant adjustment in the basis of transfer of revenue from the Centre to the States. They, therefore, devised a flexible scheme for transfer of Central revenue to the States, a scheme adjustable in the light of experience, contemporary economic situation, and financial position of the Centre and the States; and reviewable periodically, and which should work automatically without causing any inter-governmental friction. In this approach, they were fortified by the experiences of Canada and Australia where the formula laid down in the respective constitution for Central grants to the units soon proved to be inadequate and new bases had to be evolved from time to time for the purpose.

The above mentioned objectives were achieved by making provisions in the Constitution for a periodic appointment of a Finance Commission, a 'non-political' body, and by leaving it the task of making inter-governmental financial adjustments from time to time.

Article 280(1) provides for the appointment by the President of a Finance Commission every five years, or earlier, if he considers it necessary. The Commission is to consist of a Chairman and four other members appointed by the President. Under Art. 280(2), Parliament is empowered to determine by law the requisite qualifications for appointment as members of the Commission.

Accordingly, the Finance Commission (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1951, has been enacted by Parliament. The Chairman of the Finance Commission is to be a person having experience in public affairs. Its other four members are to be selected from among persons qualified to be appointed as the High Court Judges, having special knowledge of government finances and accounts, having wide experience in financial matters and administration, or having special knowledge of economics.

A person is disqualified to be appointed as a member of the Commission if he is of unsound mind, is an undischarged insolvent, has been convicted of an offence involving moral turpitude, or has financial or other interests prejudicially affecting his functions as a member of the Commission.

Article 281 lays down that the President shall cause every recommendation made by the Finance Commission together with an explanatory memorandum as to the action taken thereon, to be laid before each House of Parliament.

The functions of the Commission, as prescribed by Art. 280(3), are to make recommendations to the President with regard to the following matters:

(a) The distribution between the Union and the States of the net proceeds of the taxes which are to be, or may be, divided between them and the allocation of the respective shares of such proceeds;

(b) The principles to govern the grants-in-aid of the revenues of the States out of the Consolidated Fund of India;

(c) The measures needed to augment the State Consolidated Fund to supplement the resources of the panchayats in the State on the basis of the recommendations made by the State Finance Commission;

(d) The measures needed to augment the State Consolidated Fund to supplement the resources of the municipalities in the State on the basis of the recommendations made by the State Finance Commission;

(e) Any other matter referred to it by the President in the interest of sound finance.

According to Art. 280(4), the Commission is to determine its procedure and is to have such powers as Parliament may by law confer on it. According to the Finance Commission Act, it has all the powers of a civil court for summoning the witnesses, requiring production of any document, requiring any person to furnish information on any point which the Commission regards as useful or relevant to any matter under its consideration. The Finance Commission can be characterised as the balance wheel of the Indian federal financial relationship between the Centre and the States.

The idea of the Finance Commission has been adopted from the model of the Commonwealth Grants Commission of Australia, but there are many interesting points of departure between the two bodies. The Indian Commission is a constitutional body and is not a continuing body, but sits only once in five years. The Australian Commission, on the other hand, is a statutory body, is a continuing body and recommends grants to the deficit States every year. While in Australia, members are appointed for three years at a stretch, in India they are appointed for nearly a year, and the Commission becomes functus officio after completing its assigned work. No continuity is provided for in India in the Commission's work.

Further, the Indian Commission has much wider functions to discharge than its Australian counterpart. The latter recommends annual grants to the claimant States, and has nothing to do with the sharing of income-tax which is negotiated between the Centre and the States from time to time. On the other hand, the Indian Commission makes recommendations not only for tax-sharing, but also for 'fiscal-need' grants.

As regards tax-sharing, the scope of the Commission's work has been increasing over time as will be seen below. The Commission not only considers the bases of sharing the taxes which must be shared, or which accrue fully to the States, but also recommends what other taxes the Centre may share with the States. As regards 'fiscal need' grants, it is for the Commission to decide which States need such grants and in what amounts. Besides, other questions of intergovernmental financial relationship are also referred to the Commission for advice from time to time.

The Indian Commission thus plays a significant and pivotal role in adjusting inter-governmental financial relationship. As finance is the sine qua non of good government, it will not be an exaggeration to say that the constitution-makers envisaged the Commission as the balance-wheel of the Indian Federalism. By endeavouring to create an equilibrium between the resources and demands at each governmental level, the Commission is designed to ensure that the Indian federal structure continues to function without avoidable stresses and strains. The framers of the Constitution envisaged an expert body functioning on a non-political basis and, thus, the task of devolution of resources from the Centre to the States has been removed from the arena of political bargaining.

The Commission during the course of its work holds discussion, receives memoranda and hears evidence not only from the Central Government and the various State Governments, but even from private individuals and bodies who might be interested in placing their views before it on the questions under its review. It visits all State capitals to hold discussions with the representatives of the State Governments before finalising its report.

Thirteen Finance Commissions have been appointed so far since the commencement of the Constitution, and a review of their work throws a flood of light not only on the evolution of the Central-State financial relations during the last sixty years, but also on the changing panorama of the Indian Federalism.[26] One significant fact is that with each Commission, progressively the amount of Central funds transferred to the States has been increasing.

The Finance Commission envisaged by the Indian Constitution is a unique body. It is an expert body of a non-political character. Thus, the question of devolution of resources from the Centre to the States has been taken out of the arena of political bargaining and entrusted to an objective body and the matter is to be settled on merits and not on the basis of political horse-trading. The Commission, in theory, is an advisory body and its recommendations are not binding on the Central Government.

The Constitution accords to Parliament the supreme authority to oversee the implementation of the Commission's recommendations. This has been ensured by Art. 281 which requires the Central Government to place before both Houses of Parliament recommendations made by the Finance Commission alongwith an explanatory memorandum as to the action taken thereon. However, a convention has developed over time under which the Central Government invariably accepts the recommendations of the Commission as regards the funds to be transferred to the States under the various heads.

In the area of tax-sharing between the Centre and the States prior to the year 2000, the position was as follows:

(a) INCOME TAX

This was a compulsorily shareable tax between the Centre and the States [Art. 270]. The role of the Finance Commission in this area was twofold: viz., first, to determine the proportion of the net income-tax revenue which the Centre should give to the States, and, secondly, to fix the ratios in which the States should share in the divisible pool.

The States' share in the income-tax revenue was gradually increased from 50 per cent, on the eve of the commencement of the Constitution to 85 per cent by the Seventh Finance Commission. The Eighth and the Ninth Commission let it remain at 85%, but the Tenth Commission reduced it to 77.5% as it thought that the centre ought to retain adequate interest in Income-tax.[27]

26. For a detailed review see M.P. Jain, Central-State Fiscal Relationship, footnote 1 on 823.

The most significant task of the Finance Commission in this area, however, was to evolve the basis on which the States should inter se share in the divisible pool. A peculiar circumstance in India is that nearly three-fourths of the income-tax revenue is collected in the two States of Maharashtra and West Bengal, which together have only one-fifth of the country's population. Even in these States, nearly three-fourths of the collection is made within the two cities of Bombay and Calcutta, the two big financial and industrial Centres of India. To these States, the basis of 'collection' suits most for sharing in the divisible pool. On the other hand, the other States, which are less industrialised but more populous, put forward 'population' as the sole basis for the purpose.

The Finance Commissions refused to accept 'collection' as the sole basis of distribution of the income-tax revenue among the States and gave a much larger weightage (90 per cent) to 'population'. The reasons for this approach are that the income arising in an industrialised State is not wholly created there; the underdeveloped regions of the country also contribute to the same by offering vast markets for the sale of industrial production and also by supplying raw materials.

A federal economy is regionally interdependent; no region is self-sufficient by itself and the bases of income are far more diversified and widely spread over the whole country than the figures of income-tax collection would appear to suggest. Industrialisation of a region is promoted not solely by the genius or enterprise of its residents, but also, in a substantial manner, by national policies, geographical factors, etc. Therefore, national considerations should influence the sharing of the proceeds of such enterprises.

A federation being a compromise between economic integration and political autonomy, the existing regional economic inequalities would be further accentuated if proper correctives are not applied and, therefore, emphasis should be placed on 'equalization' rather than on 'collection'. It is almost impossible to establish precisely the contribution made by different regions to a common tax pool in an industrially and commercially complex national economy. Lastly, distribution based on 'collection' might fail to create a balance between resources and demands of social services at the State level.

A proper scheme of distribution of Central revenue among the States should aim at enabling each State to meet its expanding responsibilities concerning people's welfare. Thus, by giving weightage to 'population' and allowing 'collection' only a small (10 per cent) role to play in the formula for distributing income-tax revenue among the States, the Finance Commissions adopted an avowedly egalitarian approach and sought to remedy the regional imbalances by giving larger amounts to populous but economically backward States as compared to the economically advanced States. The latter can mobilise larger resources through the use of other levies (e.g., sales tax, entertainment and motor vehicles taxes, electricity duties, etc.) than the former, and so there is not much justification for giving larger share of income-tax revenue to them.[28]

---

27. REPORT OF THE TENTH FINANCE COMMISSION, 22 (1994).

28. Before 2000, the corporation tax was non-shareable. The States had been urging the Finance Commissions to make this tax shareable. The Seventh Finance Commission expressed its inability to do so in view of the existing constitutional provisions. See, REPORT, 65-66.

The Tenth Commission dropped 'collection' as an element in the formula for distribution of income tax revenue among the States. The formula now comprised inter alia of two elements, viz., population and the distance of per capita income of a State from the highest per capita income: Other elements used were: area, infrastructure and tax effort made by a State.[29]

The three main considerations in the selection of criteria for determining inter se shares of states of the Eleventh Finance Commission were (1) resource deficiency, (2) higher cost of providing services, and (3) fiscal discipline. The Twelfth Commission basis for revenue sharing were population, income distance, area, tax effort and fiscal discipline.

(b) UNION DUTIES OF EXCISES

Central excises were not compulsorily shareable between the Centre and the States. These duties could be shared if Parliament so provided by law [Art. 272]. Nevertheless, to bolster up State finances, the Finance Commissions had recommended sharing of this tax as well.

To begin with, the First Finance Commission recommended 40% revenue accruing from three commodities, viz., tobacco, matches and vegetable products to be given to the States. Since then, the State share in Union excise duties has been progressively increased by the successive Finance Commissions. The Tenth Finance Commission recommended that the share of the States in the net proceeds of the Union excise duties be fixed at 47.5%.[30] Again, in order to strengthen the resources of the poor States, the formula to divide the distributable portion of the excise revenue is devised keeping in view the same factors as in case of distribution of income-tax among the States.

Sharing of Central excise duties with the States augmented their financial resources as these duties constitute an expanding source of revenue because of rapid industrialisation of India.

(c) ADDITIONAL EXCISE DUTIES

To co-ordinate the incidence of Centrally levied excise duties and the State-levied sales taxes, and for convenience of tax collection, a scheme has been put into force, with the consent of the States, under which the States have surrendered sales taxes on four commodities, viz., factory-made textiles, sugar, tobacco and silk fabrics, and the Centre has started levying an 'additional' excise duty on these commodities over and above its normal levy. The entire revenue accruing from the 'additional' levy was distributed among the States as compensation for their losing the sales tax revenue on these commodities. The formula to distribute this revenue among the States was designed so as to enable each State to get the equivalent of what it would have secured had it not surrendered its power to levy sales tax on these commodities.

---

29. REPORT, 24.
The Eighth Finance Commission which presented its report in 1984 maintained the share of the States at 85% in the net proceeds of the income tax. The Commission emphasized upon the relative economic backwardness of the States in the scheme of allocation of tax resources among them. The weightage given to the population was reduced. The basis of State contribution was maintained at the same level as before i.e., at 10%.

30. REPORT, 22.

The Ninth Finance Commission adopted the basis of consumption of the concerned articles in the different States for dividing this revenue among them. This Commission maintained the view that since the additional excise duties were levied in lieu of sales tax which itself is a tax on consumption. The Tenth Commission evolved a formula for the purpose based on three elements, viz., population, State domestic product, and collection of State sales tax.[31]

The replacement of sales tax with the additional excise duty has many advantages. It results in a uniform rate of tax throughout the country instead of variable rates of sales tax from State to State and this helps in the free flow of commodities in the country; with the levy of the tax at the stage of production, chances of evasion of the revenue are minimised; traders are spared from much inconvenience involved in rendering accounts for sales tax assessment from State to State.

Because of its advantages, the traders plead that the scheme be expanded further so as to cover more commodities of mass consumption. The traders regard the working of sales tax laws as vexatious and believe that amalgamation will be beneficial to trade and commerce as well as to the States because administrative expenses will be much less and there will be little scope for evasion. The States are not, however, enthusiastic about this. In the sales tax, the States have an expansive and flexible source of revenue and they can adjust the rates of taxation from time to time to suit their budgetary needs. By forgoing this right to levy sales tax, they would compromise their own freedom and autonomy and come to depend for funds on the Centre.[32]

(d) OTHER TAXES

The Finance Commission would also go into the question of distributing among the States of estate duty, grant in lieu of tax on railway passenger fares and wealth tax on agricultural property.

The whole of the revenue accruing from estate duty used to go to the States, but this tax has now been abolished.

The revenue accruing from tax on railway fares would also go to the States.[33] The Centre levied such a tax in 1957 but repealed it in 1961 and merged it with railway fares and started giving a fixed grant to the States in lieu of the tax on the recommendation of the Finance Commission.

The wealth tax on agricultural property was a residuary tax levied by the Centre since 1970.[34] Although under the Constitution it was not a shareable tax, the Centre suo motu decided that the net proceeds accruing from this tax would be passed on to the States as grants-in-aid. The Commission used to lay down the bases on which the States would share this revenue. This tax has now been abolished.

To begin with, revenue realized by way of service tax under Entry 97 of List I was shareable with the states. The position changed after the Constitution (Eighty-eighth Amendment) Act, 2003 which has inserted Article 268-A and Entry 92-C. Revenues from taxation of services that are taxed by the centre under

---

31. REPORT, 28 (1994).
32. FICCI, SALES TAX—A PLEA FOR SIMPLIFICATION (1969).
33. Supra.
34. Supra, sec. G.

Article 268A rather than under Article 270 were excluded from the purview of the finance commission. The Twelfth Commission however recommended that "any legislation that enacted in respect of service tax must ensure that the revenue accruing to a state under the legislation should not be less than the share that would accrue to it, had the entire service tax proceeds been part of the shareable pool".

(e) FISCAL NEED GRANTS

Under Art. 275, the Centre is to give grants to the States in need of assistance.[35] This provision lays down no criteria for judging whether a State is in need of assistance, and if so, to what extent. These matters are left to the Finance Commission for consideration and recommendation. Under Art 280(3)(b), the Finance Commission is to recommend the principles to govern the grants-in-aid of the revenue of the States. Over the years, the revenue flowing to the States under this head has been increasing.

The idea of fiscal need has been borrowed from Australia. As early as 1936, the Commonwealth Grants Commission[36] expounded the idea thus: "Special grants are justified when a State through financial stress from any cause is unable efficiently to discharge its functions as a member of the federation and should be determined by the amount of help found necessary to make it possible for that State by reasonable effort to function at a standard not appreciably below that of the other States". Every year, therefore, the Commission seeks to assess the sums necessary to bring the claimant States to the level of that of the non-claimant States, necessary adjustments being made for the relative tax effort of the States and differences in standards of social services so that these may be brought to a corresponding level. In this process of adjustment, be it noted, the element of self-help is an important constituent, the basic idea of which is that within its taxable capacity a claimant State makes the same relative tax effort as a non-claimant State.[37]

The First Finance Commission in India adopting a somewhat similar approach laid down a few guiding norms for assessing these grants, for example, budgetary needs and the extent of tax-effort made by a State. Failure of a State to maximise tax effort should be taken note of so that no premium is placed on lack of self-help, and no penalty is levied on those States which seek to raise adequate resources. To discourge extravagance, the States' endeavour to secure reasonable economies in expenditure should be taken into consideration. Grants should help in equalising standards of basic social services and, therefore, a State having a significantly lower standard of social services than others should qualify for assistance. Two other matters mentioned by the Commission for the purpose are: State susceptibility to famine, floods, etc; burdens of national concern though falling within the State sphere yet beyond its control. These principles have been applied by the various Finance Commissions with some change of emphasis here and there to assess the fiscal need grants.[38]

---

35. Supra.
36. Supra, p. 928.
37. COMM. GRANTS COMM., THIRD REP., 1-25 (1936); THIRTY-SECOND REPORT, 1-15, (1965).
38. REPORT OF THE FIRST FINANCE COMMISSION, 90-104 (1952).

The underlying idea of these grants is to transfer resources from the rich to the poor States. This concept has now come to be accepted in all federations. However, the methodology adopted by the Commissions in India to compute these grants does not take the process very far. The Commissions have gone too much by the budgetary deficits in assessing grants for the States. The Tenth Commission also recommended grants to several States to cover their budgetary deficits.

This approach has a weakness, viz., a State which shows large deficit by increasing its expenditure and keeping its taxation low, gets larger fiscal need grants from the Centre as compared with the State which keeps its expenditure low or its taxation high. Another notable lacuna in this connection is that there prevails a lack of uniformity in the levels of social services in the several States. For example, in the field of education, the per capita expenditure varies from State to State.

Commenting on the system of fiscal need grants in India in 1970, this author had remarked: "Such an approach on the part of the Finance Commission would further accentuate regional imbalances and create tensions and stresses in the body politic. It is, therefore, necessary for the Finance Commission to evolve some standard of comparison of social services among the States inter se, as is done by the Australian Commission, and then apply the necessary correctives so as to bring the services in all the States on a comparable level".[39]

The Sixth Finance Commission explicitly accepted the proposition that the social services in backward States should be improved and assessed funds with a view to progressive equalization of social services within a definite time-period.[40]

Another lacuna in the method of assessment of these grants is that not enough importance has been accorded so far to tax-effort made by the States. In Australia, the aspect has been given a good deal of significance; a State making more than its due effort is rewarded, and the State making less than its due is penalised while assessing the grants. In India, the States do not make adequate tax-effort according to the capacity of the people to pay, and continuously pressurize the Centre for larger allocations.

For a robust federal system, it is necessary that the States do not merely look towards the Centre for money but also indulge in self-help which is essential for them to maintain their autonomy. The Finance Commission should, therefore, give due weight to relative tax severity among the States while assessing fiscal-need grants. Thus, a two-fold process of adjustment appears to be necessary in assessing these grants: (1) bringing State expenditure on social services on a comparable level; (2) taking into account the relative State tax effort. The Seventh Finance Commission also accepted the validity of these principles.

(f) OTHER GRANTS

The drawback pointed out above in the computation of fiscal need grants is being taken care of to some extent by the Finance Commission recommending grants for several purposes, viz., modernisation of administration; upgrading the

---

39. Indian Cons. Law, 376 (1970).
Also see, M.P. JAIN, Anomalies in the Scheme of Fiscal-Need Grants in India, in THE UNION AND THE STATES, 265-280.

40. REPORT OF THE SIXTH FINANCE COMM., 8, 9, 51, 68 (1973).

standards in non-developmental sectors and services, Education, grants for local bodies.

From the Sixth Finance Commission onwards, upgradation of State administration emerged as a matter of concern for which grants began to be given to the States. The effort being made is to upgrade the administration in 'backward' States to the level of the more advanced States. The items considered for the purpose are police, fire services, jails, record rooms, treasuries and accounts at the district level.

In the field of education, items considered for grant are : promotion of girls' education; facilities for primary schools, providing drinking water in primary schools.

Panchayats/municipalities have recently been formally made an integral part of our federal democratic structure. These institutions are sought to be strenghened by the 73rd and 74th Amendments of the Constitution.[41] Their action or inaction will directly impinge on the welfare of the people.

These bodies will be ineffective if they lack adequate financial resources to discharge their duties.

Under Art. 280(3)(bb), the Commission has been charged with the specific duty of recommending "the measures needed to augment the Consolidated Fund of a state to supplement the resources of *panchayats/*municipalities in the State. The implication of the provisions is that the Centre would help the States financially so that they may transfer adequate resources to the panchayats / municipalities. Accordingly, the Tenth Commission has recommended Central grants to the States for the purpose of augmenting the resources of the panchayats/municipalities.[42] It would have been much more effective if a way could be found to give Central grants directly to the panchayats/local bodies instead of through the medium of the States. There is no assurance that whatever money the Centre gives to the States for helping the panchayats/local bodies will be passed on by the States to these bodies.

The Tenth Finance Commission also recommended specific grants to several States for enabling them to meet their special problems.

(g) CALAMITY RELIEF FUND

On the recommendation of the Ninth Finance Commission, a Calamity Relief Fund (CRF) has been established in each State to which the Centre contributes 75% of the amount. The amount of this Fund for each State is settled by the Finance Commission. This scheme has been continued by the Tenth Finance Commission.

In addition, the Tenth Commission suggested setting up the National Fund for Calamity Relief (NFCR) to deal with a calamity of rare severity. From time to time, calamities of such a severity may occur in one State or other which the concerned State may not be able to cope with its own CRF. In such a situation, the Centre must be in a position to come to the rescue of the troubled State and organise relief therein on a national scale.

---

41. Supra, Ch. IX.
42. REPORT, 46-48.

To The NFCR, both the States and the Centre subscribe. The size of the fund and the amount of Centre and State contributions thereto (in the ratio of 75: 25) have been settled by the Finance Commission. This fund puts on a formal basis the urge for national solidarity in a moment of distress.

The Twelfth Finance Commission made an innovative departure from the approach of the earlier Commissions by providing for Rs 1,000 crore for maintenance of forests and Rs 625 crore for heritage conservation.[43]

(h) COMMENTS

From the above discussion, it is clear that over the years, the trend has been towards augmenting the flow of funds from the Centre to the States both by way of tax-sharing as well as through fiscal need grants. Each Finance Commission has helped and strengthened this trend. The underlying reason for this has been the inadequate resources but expanding responsibilities of the States.

Over the years, the Finance Commissions have strengthened the resources of the poor States much more than those of the rich States. Thus, an effort is made to reduce regional disparities to some extent. This approach concretises the new concept of co-operative federalism that the federal country is one and indivisible economic unit and that every citizen should be able to get a national minimum of social services irrespective of the fact whether he resides in a poor or a rich State.[44]

It is also worth-while to note that the Central Government has at times used the mechanism of the Finance Commission for a broad consideration of the Centre-State financial relations, and has many a time referred to it, under Art. 280(3), such questions as it could have settled by itself. For example, the Tenth Finance Commission was required to assess the debt position of the States. The Finance Commission plays an important role as resource sharing between the Centre and the States is a critical element in the federal system. In this way, the Centre-State relations are sought to be adjusted on a non-political basis.

The tendency is to treat the Commission as a mechanism of arbitration to decide on the conflicting claims and contentions of the States as well as of the Centre. Although the recommendations of the Commission are not binding on the Centre, and the Constitution merely assigns to it an advisory role, yet the convention has grown under which the Centre invariably accepts Commission's recommendations regarding tax-sharing and grants. There is a practical reason for such an approach. It is realised that if once any change is made in the quantum of grant or share in the Central tax recommended by the Commission for one State, then there would be no end to pressurization by other States for modifications in their favour. On the whole, it can be said that the mechanism of the Finance Commission is fulfilling a significant role in evolving a viable system of Centre-State relationship in India.

M. SPECIFIC PURPOSE GRANTS

Along with tax-sharing and fiscal need grants,[45] Central assistance also flows to the States through grants under Art. 282, which provides that the Union or a 43. See in this connection T.N. Godavarman Thirumulpad (87) v. Union of India, (2006) 1 SCC 1, at page 40 : AIR 2005 SC 4256.

44. Co-operative Federalism, see, infra, Ch. XIV.
45. Supra, Sec. K(ii).

State may make grants for any public purpose notwithstanding that the purpose is not one with respect to which Parliament or the State Legislature, as the case may be, may make laws.

This provision vests in the Centre a very broad power to give grants to the States for any specific public purpose. What is "public purpose"? The attitude of the courts is not to interfere in this matter and leave it to the judgment of the Central Government. The proper place to criticise any grant by the government is the legislature and not the courts.[46]

The grants given under Art. 282 are also known as discretionary grants, the reason being that the Centre is under no obligation to give these grants to any State; the Centre may give such a grant to one State and not to another, and the matter lies solely within the Centre's discretion. The use of the word 'may' in Art. 282 signifies the discretionary nature of these grants. Unlike the 'fiscal need' grants under Art. 275, these grants lie outside the purview of the Finance Commission.

While the funds flowing to the States through the Finance Commission are unconditional, and may even be regarded as coming to the States as a matter of right, the grants under Art. 282 may be conditional and tied to specific purposes.

The technique for grants under Art. 282 is used for a number of purposes. There are programmes which fall within the State sphere for purposes of legislation and administration, but being of an all-India significance, the Centre is also interested in their implementation. Therefore, to promote State action in such areas, the Centre may give grants as incentive to the States. In this way, the financial resources of the Centre, and the legislative and administrative resources of the States are pooled together with a view to achieve certain preferred national goals.

Though the Centre has limited legislative powers, it is not so circumscribed in the matter of giving grants and no question can arise regarding the legality of a Central grant to a State on the ground that the purpose for which the grant is being given lies outside the Central sphere. The grants under Art. 282 are also used to help a State tide over an unforeseen crisis such as famine, drought, floods, etc. Though the fiscal need grants recommended by the Finance Commission make provision for expenditure on such calamities, yet in times of acute distress, the Centre may have to give additional funds to a State to tide over the crisis. Many programmes fall within the Concurrent or the Union List and can thus be implemented by the Centre itself. But keeping in view administrative convenience, these may be left to the States for execution, and the Centre makes grants to the States for meeting the expenditure on these programmes. These schemes continue to proliferate every day as the Centre becomes interested in pursuing many varied social programmes of national importance.

Under Art. 257, the Centre can direct the States to construct and maintain roads of national or military importance, and make grants to the States under Art. 282 to meet expenditure on programmes undertaken by them under the Central directive.[47] The grants under Art. 282 are thus given to meet multifarious situations and, accordingly, in terms of money and variety of programmes, such grants play a very significant role in the present-day pattern of Centre-State fiscal relationship. These grants have enabled the States to launch or expand activities in various fields.

---

46. K.N. Subba Reddy v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1993 Kant 66; Brij Kishore Mohanty v. State of Orissa, AIR 1975 Ori. 8.

47. For Art. 257, Sec. E, see, Ch. XII,infra.

The most significant use of these grants is being made in the area of planning.[48] Because of the exigencies of the Five Year Plans, the plan grants under Art. 282 have assumed a dominant position in the scheme of Centre-State fiscal relations. Grants under Art. 282 have increased manifold under the impact of planning and have dwarfed the fiscal need grants being given through the Finance Commission. 'Economic and social planning' is a Concurrent subject.[49] Many plan programmes fall within the State sphere for which the Centre has no direct constitutional responsibility but, as the State resources are inadequate, the Centre makes grants to the States under Art. 282.

These grants have a twofold purpose: to help the States financially to fulfil plan targets and to give some leverage to the Centre to influence and co-ordinate State action to effectuate the national plan. The Centre can use the grants to persuade, encourage and pressurize the States to keep within the plan targets. Because of the gigantic nature of the plan grants, Art. 282 has assumed a unique importance in the present-day Indian Federalism. Art. 282 grants are much larger in dimension than the fiscal need grants made to the States through the Finance Commission, and, therefore, Art. 282 has emerged as the most significant constitutional provision for transfer of funds from the Centre to the States. And since most of the Art. 282 funds are given on the advice of the Planning Commission,[50] in effect, it has assumed a very significant role in the area of Centre-State financial relationship as compared to the Finance Commission.

The State Planning sector consists of the Central-aided schemes and non-aided schemes. The Central sector comprises of Central schemes, and the Central-sponsored schemes which fall for administration within the State sphere, but are counted not in the State but the Central sector, and for which the Centre gives aid to the States. In effect, therefore, the State sector consists of not only the State sector as such but also the Central-sponsored schemes.

Allocation of Central money to the States under Art. 282 has raised a few controversies. The States constantly pressurize the Centre for larger funds and accuse it of partisanship, favouritism or prejudice in favour of, or against, some States. To allay such an apprehension, it is necessary that the basis of allocation of Central funds among the States is clearly laid down so that the indices and criteria adopted for the purpose are well known. Usually, Art. 282 grants are given on a matching basis, i.e., States themselves have to find a part of the money to earn the Central funds for a particular programme. This raises the question whether there should be a uniform matching basis for all States, or that it should favour the poor States. A uniform matching basis may be inequitable as it may favour the rich States as against the poor States, for the former are in a better position than the latter to find the countervailing funds and avail of the Central grants.

---

48. See, infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. G.; Entry 20, List III, Ch. X, Sec. F.
49. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
50. Infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. G, under Co-operative Federalism.

In the U.S.A., where a very elaborate system of conditional grants is in operation, it has come to be accepted that such grants should serve an equalitarian purpose and, therefore, the same should happen in India as well. Further, in the U.S.A., the Centre exercises supervision in order to ensure that the States utilise the money for the purposes for which it is given.

No effective supervisory apparatus has been created in India so far and the States enjoy freedom to utilise Central funds to some extent. On the whole, the States do not very much like the system of conditional grants for several reasons. First, being tied to specific purposes, the States are not free to use the money for any other purpose. Secondly, because of the matching requirement, the States must find their share before they can utilise the Central money and they find this restriction irksome. The evolution of a proper system of Art. 282 grants is very much tied up with plan methodology, but the above objections do not have much substance. The justification underlying the matching condition is that it is primarily a State activity which the Centre seeks to finance and it should, therefore, ensure that the State concerned itself takes an abiding interest in the programme. The matching requirement spurs the States into activity and makes them find money for their share through taxation, economy or reappropriations.

It is also necessary to make the grants programme-oriented, otherwise the targets which the Centre wants to achieve may never be fulfilled. In India, large amounts of unconditional revenue are given to the States by the Centre through the Finance Commission, and the States should not have a cause for grievance if matching grants are also instituted, especially when the activities thus sought to be promoted fall within their constitutional sphere and not that of the Centre. It also should be noted that the burden of matching funds by the States will sooner or later be passed on to the Centre, for this part of the State expenditure will also be taken into consideration by the Finance Commission for assessing the fiscal-need grants. Therefore, the responsibility of the States to find matching funds exists only till the next Finance Commission considers the question of fiscal-need grants, and this period can in no case be more than five years.

From time to time, efforts have been made to persuade the Centre to give plan grants not under Art. 282, but as fiscal need grants through the Finance Commission. The Central Government has not accepted this idea for several reasons. It will lose whatever leverage it has to ensure that the States keep themselves within the framework of the plan. If money is given to the States without being tied to specific purposes, then the States may spend the same on purposes outside the plan structure and the plan targets may thus go awry.

In the U.S.A., it is only the system of conditional grants on a matching basis that is operative at present. The Centre gives no unconditional revenue. In Canada and Australia, the position is somewhat akin to India as both conditional and unconditional funds are given by the Centre to the units. The conditional grants have done much good in the U.S.A. as they have helped in stimulating the States to launch and expand many welfare activities, and have also greatly improved the State administration. The system has proved useful and it is expanding all the time as more and more activities are brought within its purview. There is no reason why conditional grants should not play a similar role in India.

N. BORROWING POWER

The Central Government can borrow within such limits, if any, as may be fixed by Parliament by law. Under Art. 292, the executive power of the Union extends to borrowing upon the security of the Consolidated Fund of India within such limits, if any, as may from time to time be fixed by Parliament by law and to the giving of guarantees within such limits, if any, as may be so fixed.

Similarly, under Art. 293(1), the executive power of a State extends to borrowing within India upon the security of its Consolidated Fund within such limits, if any, as may from time to time be fixed by the State Legislature by law and to the giving of guarantees, within such limits, if any, as the State Legislature may fix by law.

No quantitative restriction on loans has yet been fixed either by Parliament or by any State Legislature.

Under Art. 293(2), the Central Government may, subject to the conditions as may be laid down by a law of Parliament, make loans to any State, or give guarantees for loans raised by a State, within the amounts fixed by Parliament, if any. Any sums required for making of such loans are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India.

Under Art. 293(3), a State may not raise any loan without the Centre's consent if there is still outstanding any part of a loan made by the Centre to the State, or in respect of which the Centre has given any guarantee. The Central Government may, however, give its consent to a State to raise a loan subject to such conditions as it may think proper to impose [Art. 293(4)]. As all the States owe money to the Centre, in effect, today no State can raise loan without the Centre's consent. The States are also debarred from raising any loan out of India. Foreign loans can be raised exclusively by the Centre [see, Entry 37, List I].[51]

Since the inauguration of the era of planning, Central loans to the States have been increasing by leaps and bounds. The States now complain that much of their annual taxation is consumed by payments made to the Centre towards loans and interest thereon.

The question of State indebtedness to the Centre has become a complicated matter because of several factors, viz., the number of loans is large; terms of repayment and rates of interest vary from loan to loan; while the bulk of the loans have been given for developmental and productive purposes, some part of the same has also been spent on unproductive purposes.

The Second Finance Commission recommended that "it will simplify matters and save a great deal of labour and accounting if these loans are consolidated and the rates of interest and terms of repayment rationalised".[52] The question of State indebtedness to the Centre has been considered since then by several Finance Commissions.[53]

The Seventh Finance Commission recommended a write off of over Rs. 942 crores of Central loans to the States. The Commission also evolved a new con-

---

51. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
52. REPORT OF THE SECOND FINANCE COMM., 53 (1957).
53. REPORT OF THE SIXTH FINANCE COMM., Chap. XVII (1973).

cept—'loans in prepetuity'. Over Rs. 3000 crores advanced to the States out of small savings have been converted into such loans. Besides, relief in debt-repayment amounting to over Rs. 2155 crores within a five year period (ending 1983-84) was also recommended by the Commission.

The Tenth Finance Commission has estimated that the total debt of the State Governments would be Rs. 2,09,159 crores as on 31st March, 1995. Loans advanced by the Centre to assist financing of State plans constitute the bulk of the total State debt. The debt liability has placed a huge burden of debt servicing on the States. The Commission has made some proposals for debt relief.[54]

The Commission has drawn attention to three disturbing features of the debt profile of the States, viz.:

(1) debt funds are being used for meeting revenue expenditure;

(2) loan funds are being used in unproductive enterprises; and

(3) in respect of government owned assets, no provision is being made for depreciation or amortisation of funds. This leads to repayment of loans out of fresh borrowings.

The Eleventh Finance Commission has observed in connection with the borrowing power of the Centre and the States:[55]

> "A time has come when, as a part of the overall thrust towards fiscal responsibility, concrete steps are taken under the provisions of articles 292 and 293. In particular, Parliament and respective State Legislatures may consider fixing limits on total borrowing as well as on guarantees to be given by them."

The Twelfth Commission recommended that each state must enact a fiscal responsibility legislation prescribing specific annual targets with a view to eliminating the revenue deficit by 2008-09 and reducing fiscal deficits based on the basis of reduction of borrowings and guarantees. Enacting the fiscal responsibility legislation on the lines indicated in its Report would be a pre-condition for availing of debt relief. It was also said that "States, like the centre, must decide their annual borrowing programme, within the framework of their respective fiscal responsibility legislations". Other major steps recommended were the need to let the states access the market directly for their borrowing requirements and the fixing and supervision of the overall limit to states' annual borrowing from all sources by an independent body like a Loan Council. [56]

54. REPORT OF THE TENTH FINANCE COMM., Ch. XII (1994).
55. REPORT OF THE ELEVENTH FINANCE COMM., 107 (2000).
56. REPORT OF THE TWELFTH FINANCE COMM. (Ch XV) (2004),

CHAPTER XII

ADMINISTRATIVE RELATIONS

SYNOPSIS

A. DISTRIBUTION OF EXECUTIVE POWER

In the modern administrative age, administration plays a very significant role by way of enforcing the law and promoting socio-economic welfare of the people. The pattern of administrative relationship between the Centre and the States, therefore, assumes a great significance in a developing country like India.

The Indian Constitution contains more elaborate provisions regarding administrative relations between the Centre and the States than are to be found in any of the three Federations of the U.S.A., Canada and Australia. The Constitution lays down a flexible and permissive, and not a rigid, scheme of allocation of administrative responsibilities between the Centre and the States. The scheme is so designed as to permit all kinds of co-operative administrative arrangements between the two levels of government.

Along with the distribution of legislative and taxing powers,[1] the executive power has also been divided between the Centre and the States. Subject to a few exceptions, the general principle followed in this connection is that the executive power is coextensive with legislative power. The scope and extent of the executive power of the Centre extends—

1. Supra, Chs. X and XI.

(1) to the exercise of rights, authority and jurisdiction available to the Government of India under a treaty or agreement; and

(2) to the matters with respect to which Parliament has power to make laws, subject to this exception, however, that it does not extend in a State with respect to matters regarding which the State Legislature also has power to make laws save when expressly provided in the Constitution or a law made by Parliament [Art. 73].[2]

This means that the executive power with respect to the matters in the Concurrent List ordinarily remains with the States unless the Constitution or Parliament by law expressly provides otherwise.

The executive power of a State extends to matters with respect to which the State Legislature has power to make laws, provided that in a matter with respect to which both Parliament and State Legislature have power to make laws, the executive power of a State is subject to, and limited by, the executive power expressly conferred by the Constitution, or by any law made by Parliament, upon the Union or its authorities [Art. 162].[3] The proviso refers to the Concurrent area.

From the above constitutional provisions, the following propositions emerge:

(1) The executive power of the Centre extends to the whole of India in respect of matters in List I.[4]

(2) However, the Centre is not obligated to administer by itself all matters in its exclusive domain. It can, if it so desires, entrust administrative responsibility in any matter to the States [Art.154(2)(b)].[5]

(3) A State's executive power extends to its territory in respect of matters in List II.[6]

(4) In respect of matters in which both the Centre and the States have legislative powers (which means List III and List II in cases falling under Arts. 249, 250, 252, 353 and 356), ordinarily, the executive power rests with the States except when either the Constitution, or a law of Parliament, expressly[7] confers it on the Centre.

In this area, therefore, there are several alternatives available. If the Centre makes no law, the executive power rests with the States. When the Centre makes a law, it can adopt any of the following alternatives regarding executive power under that law—

(a) it can leave it with the States, or

(b) it may take over the entire administrative power itself by making an express provision in the law to this effect; or

---

2. Supra, Ch. III.
3. Supra, Ch. VII.
4. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D; Ch. XI, Sec. C.
5. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(iii).
6. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E; Ch. XI, Sec. D.
7. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J; Sec. I; also, infra, Ch. XIII.

(c) it may create a concurrent area by taking a part of the executive power itself and leaving the rest to the States.

In the Concurrent field, therefore, ordinarily the authority to execute laws rests with the States even when the law is passed by the Centre. In exceptional cases, however, Parliament may prescribe that the execution of a Central law shall be with the Centre alone, or with both the Centre and the States. In this field, even after the Centre assumes executive power under its law, the residuary executive power under the entry may still rest with the States.[8] In this field, even after the centre assumes executive power under its law, the residuary execution power under the entry may still rest with the States.

All these patterns may be seen working in actual practice. Under the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1956, enacted by Parliament under entry 38, List III,[9] administrative powers have been left wholly with the State Governments. Under the Industrial Disputes Act, enacted by Parliament under entry 22, List III,[10] administrative powers rest with both the Centre and the States. Under the Essential Commodities Act, enacted by Parliament under entry 33, List III,[11] the whole of the power is vested in the Central Government which, however, delegate power to the States to any extent it deems desirable. In actual practice, Centre has delegated a good deal of power under this Act to the States. Under the Forest (Conservation) Act, 1980, the Centre has assumed the entire responsibility for administration of the Act.

While there may be centralization in the sphere of legislation, there is lot of decentralisation in the area of administration. This is because the Centre has not established a separate machinery of its own to execute most of its laws. Only a few subjects in the Union list, such as, defence, foreign affairs, foreign exchange, posts and telegraphs, All India Radio and Television airways, railways, currency, customs, union excises, income-tax, etc. are administered by the Centre directly through its own machinery. Administration of a number of matters in the Union list and most of the matters relating to them, is secured through the machinery of the States.

As has already been pointed out, the executive power of a modern government is not capable of any precise definition. Art. 73 or 162 does not contain any definition as to what the executive function is, or gives an exhaustive enumeration of the activities which could legitimately come within its scope.[12] A government in exercise of its executive powers is charged with the duty and the responsibility of framing policies and carrying on the general administration. So long as it does not go against any constitutional provision or any law, the width and amplitude of its executive power cannot be circumscribed.

If there is no enactment covering a particular aspect, the government can carry on the administration by issuing administrative instructions until the legislature chooses to make a law in that behalf.[13] Thus, a State Government can establish a

---

8. Bishamber Dayal Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 SC 33 : (1982) 1 SCC 39.
9. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
10. Ibid.
11. Ibid.
12. Supra, Chs. III and VII.
13. Ram Jawaya, supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(iii); Bishamber Dayal Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, supra, footnote 8.

bureau of investigation for investigation of cases of tax evasion,[14] or create a new district,[15] or prescribe syllabi or text books for schools,[16] in the exercise of its executive power.

However, a government cannot in exercise of its executive power infringe the rights of the people. If any governmental action is to operate to the prejudice of any person, it must be supported by law.[17]

B. CENTRAL-STATE ADMINISTRATIVE CO-ORDINATION

(a) INTER-GOVERNMENTAL DELEGATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE POWER

To mitigate rigidity which might arise from Centre-State division of administrative power, the Indian Constitution makes provisions for inter-governmental delegation of administrative power.

The Indian constitutional system does not envisage that there should be separate, parallel administrative agencies for the Centre and the States for carrying into effect their respective laws. Most Union laws, especially those enacted in the Concurrent List, are executed through the State administrative machinery. Therefore, the Constitution devises certain provisions to obviate the necessity of creating Central administrative machinery for executing every Central law. It is possible to use the state machinery for implementing Central laws. Such an arrangement is not only economical but also promotes cooperative federalism as well as national integration.[18]

Inter-governmental delegation may happen either under an agreement between the governments or by legislation. While the Centre can use both the methods to delegate administrative power to the States, a State can use only the first method to delegate administrative power to the Centre.

(b) CENTRE CONFERRING POWERS ON THE STATES UNDER THE CONSTITUTION

Article 258(1) provides that "notwithstanding anything in the Constitution", the President may, with the consent of the State Government, entrust either conditionally or unconditionally, to the State Government, or its officers, any function in relation to a matter to which the Centre's executive power extends. This provision authorises entrustment to a State Government, with its consent, of any function of the Central Government.

It is entirely for the Centre to determine if the entrustment to be made to a State should be conditional or unconditional; and if conditional, what conditions are to be imposed on the State concerned. Art. 258(1) provides a tool which, if used liberally, can substantially promote the concept of cooperative federalism.

---

14. A.S. Narayana v. State of West Bengal, 78 C.W.N. 295.
15. R. Sultan v. State of Andhra Pradesh, ILR 1970 AP 1075; Madhusoodanan Nair v. State of Kerala, 1983 KLT 43.
16. Ram Jawaya, supra; Naraindas Indurkhya v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1232 : (1974) 4 SCC 788.
17. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bharat Singh, AIR 1967 SC 1170 : (1967) 2 SCR 454*; Satwant Singh v. A.P.O., AIR 1967 SC 1836 : (1967) 3 SCR 525; Bennett Coleman Co. v. Union of India*, AIR 1973 SC 106 : (1972) 2 SCC 788.
18. For Co-operative Federalism, see, infra, Ch. XIV.

Usually, while making delegation under Art. 258(1), the Central Government reserves to itself power to issue directions to the State Governments for the exercise of delegated power. It also usually reserves to itself a concurrent power to continue to exercise, along with the State Governments, the functions being delegated to them.

Delegation may be specific or general, to one State or many States, of any function whether within the Union or the Concurrent List. The necessary notification under Art. 258(1) is issued in the name of the President and the consent of the State Governments to the arrangement is necessary.[19]

A few important features of Art. 258(1) may be underlined.

(a) Entrustment of a Central function to a State is to take place only with the consent of the State.

(b) The function which may be entrusted should relate to a matter with respect to which the executive power of the Union extends.

(c) This constitutional provision does not authorise the President to delegate those powers and functions with which he is, by the express provisions of the Constitution, invested as the President.

Commenting on Art. 258(1), the Supreme Court has observed in Jayantilal[20] that "the effect of Art. 258(1) is merely to make a blanket provision enabling the President by notification to exercise the power which the Legislature could exercise by legislation, to entrust functions to the officers to be specified in that behalf by the President and subject to the conditions prescribed thereby."

This constitutional provision is used extensively to delegate Central functions to the State Governments when a statute confers functions on the Centre, but makes no provision for delegation of the same to the States. But, even when a statute contains a provision authorising the Central Government to delegate its power to the States, Art. 258(1) can still be invoked for the purpose instead of the statutory provision. If, however, the nature of the power involved is such as cannot be delegated under Art. 258(1), then the statutory provision will be necessary for the purpose.

To take a few examples of delegation under Art. 258(1), functions of the Central Government have been entrusted to various State Governments under the Registration of Foreigners Rules, 1939, the Foreigners Act, 1946, and the Foreigners Order, 1948, vide a notification issued under Art. 258(1),[21] subject to two conditions:

(1) in exercising these functions, the State Governments are to comply with such general or special directions as the Central Government may issue from time to time;

(2) notwithstanding the entrustment, the Central Government may itself exercise any of these functions should it deem fit to do so in any case.

---

19. A.H. Magermans v. S.K. Ghosh, AIR 1966 Cal. 552; Kamal Agency v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1971 Bom. 332; L.B. Paradise Lottery Centre v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1975 AP 50.

20. Jayantilal Amratlal v. F.N. Rana, AIR 1964 SC 648 : (1964) 5 SCR 294.

21. Notification issued under S.O. 590, dated 19-4-1958 of the Ministry of Home Affairs, Govt. of India.

The Government of J&K made an order of deportation on the petitioner under the Foreigners Act, 1946. The petitioner challenged the order on the ground that it could be made only by the Central Government. The Supreme Court rejected the contention saying that the President had under Art. 258(1) lawfully entrusted inter alia to the Government of Jammu & Kashmir the function of the Central Government under the Foreigners Act.[22]

Under S. 7 of the Explosives Substances Act, 1908, no court can try any person for any offence under the Act without the consent of the Central Government. The Centre has entrusted this function to the State Governments.[23] Atomic Energy is item 6 of List I.[24] The Centre has delegated to the State Governments, with their consent, the functions of the Central Government under cls. 4 and 5 of the Atomic Energy (Control of Production and Use) Order, 1953, subject to the usual conditions of the State Governments complying with the Central directions and of the Centre itself being able to exercise its function should it deem fit to do so in a case.

Under S. 10(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act, the Central Government has jurisdiction to refer a labour dispute to a tribunal in respect of certain industries, e.g., mines, major ports, etc., but it can delegate this power to a State Government under Art. 258(1).[25] The Minimum Wages Act enacted by Parliament under entries 22, 23, and 24 of the Concurrent List,[26] provides for fixation of minimum wages in industries. Certain industries are reserved for the Centre while others fall within the State sphere. Under the Act, the Centre can issue directions to the States as to the execution of the Act in the States. If thought necessary, the Central Government can confer its power on a State Government with respect to any specific industry under Art. 258(1).[27] Similarly, power to acquire land under the Land Acquisition Act for the purpose of the Union can be entrusted by the Central Government to a State Government under this constitutional provision.[28]

The most important case on Art. 258(1), however, is Jayantilal Amrat Lal v. F.N. Rana.[29] Under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, the Central Government is competent to acquire land for the purposes of the Union. The Central Government by a notification under Art. 258(1) entrusted this power to the Commissioners in the State of Bombay who were to exercise the power subject to the control of the State Government. Thereafter, the State of Gujarat was carved out of the Bombay State, and a Commissioner in Gujarat, acting under the original entrustment of power, took proceedings to acquire certain land for the Union purposes. S. 87 of the States Re-organisation Act kept alive all laws prevailing in the State before re-organisation. When the Commissioner's power to acquire land was challenged, the Supreme Court by a majority developed the view that the Presidential notification under Art. 258(1) had the force of law and so was kept alive by S. 87. The Commissioner in Gujarat could thus exercise the functions of the

---

22. Anwar v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1971 SC 337 : (1971) 3 SCC 104.
23. In re K.C. Ranga Reddi, AIR 1962 AP 322; State of U.P. v. Rampal, AIR 1965 All. 15; Supdt. and Remembrancer of LegaI Affairs, State of West Bengal v. Nesaruddin Shaikh, AIR 1963 Cal. 508.
24. Supra, Ch. X Sec. D.
25. Bararee Coke Plant v. Their Workmen, AIR 1968 Pat. 133.
26. Supra.
27. N.K. Jain v. Labour Commissioner, AIR 1957 Raj 35.
28. Zubeda Begum v. Union of India, AIR 1971 All 452.
29. AIR 1964 SC 648 : (1964) 5 SCR 294.

Central Government under the Land Acquisition Act without a fresh notification having been issued.

Two interesting points mentioned in the Court's opinion may be noted. First, a distinction has been drawn between—

(i) functions vested in the Union and exercisable by the President on behalf of the Union, and

(ii) functions entrusted to the President by express provisions of the Constitution.

Only the former functions, but not the latter, can be entrusted to the States under Art. 258(1).

In the latter category fall such functions as the power to promulgate ordinances (Art. 123);[30] to suspend the provisions of Arts. 268-279 during an emergency (Art. 354); to declare an emergency under Art. 352; to declare failure of the constitutional machinery of the States under Art. 356; to declare financial emergency under Arts. 360;[31] to make rules for recruitment to and conditions of service of persons appointed to posts and services in Central services (Art. 309);[32] to appoint judges (Arts. 124 and 217);[33] to appoint a commission for Backward Classes (Art. 340);[34] to appoint a Special Officer for the 'Scheduled Castes etc. (Art. 338),[35] and President's pleasure regarding Union servants (Art. 310).[36] These powers cannot be delegated to the States as these are not powers of the Central Government, but are vested in the President, as such, by the Constitution.

Secondly, what can be delegated under Art. 258(1) is a function to which the 'executive' power of the Union extends. A question, therefore, arises whether under Art. 258(1) only an executive function can be entrusted to the States or even what is characterised as 'quasi-judicial' or 'delegated legislation' as well. The balance of judicial opinion so far is that only executive, and not other functions, can be delegated under Art. 258(1).[37] The majority in the Rana case left the question open as the function involved in the case was only administrative. It could thus mean that powers of delegated legislation, and of a quasi-judicial nature, can be delegated by the Centre to the States only if there is a statutory provision warranting the same and not under Art. 258(1).

Under s. 7 of the Explosive Substances Act, 1908, the consent of the Central Government is requisite for prosecution under the Act. The Central Government entrusted this power to the District Magistrates in the States. The State of Madhya Pradesh issued a notification conferring the powers of DM "under the Criminal Procedure Code or under any other law" on the Additional District Magistrate. The question arose whether the ADM could exercise the power of the DM under s. 7 of the Explosives Act.

---

30. Supra, Ch. III.
31. Infra, Ch. XIII.
32. Infra, Ch. XVI.
33. Supra, Chs. IV and VIII.
34. Infra, Ch. XXXV.
35. Ibid.
36. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.
37. N.K. Jain v. Labour Commr., supra; the Minority view in the Rana case, supra, footnote 29; Supdt. & Legal Remembrancer v. Nesaruddin, AIR 1963 Cal 508; supra, footnote 23.

The Supreme Court answered in the negative ruling that the power of granting consent under s. 7 rests with the Central Government. The Central Government has delegated the power to the DM. It is therefore not competent for the State Government to delegate to the ADM a power of the Central Government which it has delegated to the DM.[38]

(c) DELEGATION BY CENTRE TO THE STATES BY LAW

Delegation of power by the Centre to the States through legislation is made possible by Art. 154(2)(b) according to which Parliament is not prevented from conferring by law functions on any authority subordinate to the Governor.[39] Also, according to Art. 258(2), a law made by Parliament, even if it relates to a matter in the Union List, with respect to which the State has no power to legislate, may confer power and impose duties, or authorise the conferring of powers and the imposition of duties, upon a State, its officers and authorities. Therefore, a Central law, whether pertaining to a matter in List I or List III, may confer powers and impose duties on the States, their officers and authorities.

Article 258(2) thus covers a situation where under a law made by Parliament, powers can be conferred and duties imposed on a State Government, or its officers even though the State Legislature has no power to make a law with respect to the subject-matter of the Union law.

Unlike Art. 258(1), under Art. 258(2), the conferment is made by Parliament by law and no consent of the State Government is required for the purpose. Whenever, Parliament needs State assistance to enforce a law made by it, necessary provisions are introduced therein for the exercise of the requisite powers and duties by the State administration or, in the alternative, it can empower the Central Government to entrust such powers and duties to the States.

When such a provision is not included in the statute, the Central Government can invoke Art. 258(1) to delegate administrative functions to the States. However, under Art. 258(2), Parliament has to act only within its own competence. Under this clause, Parliament can delegate quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative powers for effective execution of a Union-law as such powers are regarded as a part of the Central executive power.

Arts. 258(1) and 258(2) largely overlap in so far as matters with respect to which the Central executive functions can be delegated on the State administration. However, the power of Parliament under Art. 258(2) is sui generis and uncontrolled by Art. 258(1). Art. 258(2) covers a situation where without the consent of the concerned State, powers can be conferred and duties imposed on it by a Central law enacted by Parliament within the area of its competence, even if the State legislature has no competence to make a law with respect to the subject-matter of the Union law.

The rationale underlying Art. 258 is that it makes it possible to enforce Central laws through the State administrative machinery instead of having two separate and parallel agencies of the Centre and States. Art. 258 provides for two alternative courses for the Centre for the implementation of its laws and policies, viz.:

---

38. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bhupendra Singh, (2000) 1 SCC 555 : AIR 2000 SC 679.
Also see, Hari Chand Agarwal v. Batala Engineering Co. Ltd., AIR 1969 SC 483 : (1969) 2 SCR 201.

39. Supra, Ch. VII.

(1) Entrustment of functions by the Central Executive to the State Executive with the consent of the State concerned.

(2) Parliament may confer functions on the State administration by law.

The second course does not need State consent as Parliament has power to determine the appropriate instrumentalities, whether belonging to the Centre or the States, for enforcing the law enacted by it.

Whenever Parliament needs the assistance of the States for enforcing its law, the law itself may provide for the exercise of the necessary powers and duties by the State administration, or, it may provide for delegation of powers by the Centre to the States. However, there may be a law not making any such provision but which may entrust powers and functions to the Centre. There may also be government policies which are not backed by any law. In such cases, the Centre may take recourse to Art. 258(1).

A few examples of conferment of administrative powers by Parliament on the State agencies may be cited here. The Central Sales Tax Act, enacted by Parliament under entry 92A, List I,[40] the task of assessment and collection of sales tax on inter-State sales confers on the State sales tax authorities. Under MISA, the power of passing an order of preventive detention has been conferred on all district magistrates.[41]

Under the Mines and Minerals (Development and Regulation) Act, 1957, the Centre has taken under its control the regulation of mines and development of all minerals and then has left to the States the task of regulating minor minerals by making rules. The rule-making power conferred on the States by the Centre under the Mines and Minerals (Development and Regulation) Act has been held to be valid by the Supreme Court.[42]

An interesting point to note here is that reading entries 54 in List I, and entry 23 in List II, a mineral not centrally controlled lies within the State purview.[43] Therefore, the Centre could have taken under its control only the major minerals and the minor minerals could then have been regulated by the States under their own constitutional powers. But, instead, the States now regulate the minor minerals as delegates of the Centre. Further, an interesting administrative pattern has been created under the Mining Concession Rules, 1949, promulgated under the Mines and Minerals Act. The initial power to grant a mining licence for a major mineral rests with the States, but then an appeal can be taken to the Central Government against an order of the State Government. The State power is thus ultimately subject to the Central power.

Census is another example.[44] Census takes place once in ten years. It is not practicable for the Centre to create an entirely new machinery for the purpose every ten years and then to disband the same after the census is over. Therefore, the Centre has to depend on the co-operation of the States for purposes of census.

---

40. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. C.
41. Infra, Ch. XXVII, Secs. B, C and D.
42. D.K. Trivedi & Sons v. State of Gujarat, (1986) Supp SCC 20 : AIR 1986 SC 1323; Quarry Owners' Association v. State of Bihar, (2000) 8 SCC 655 : AIR 2000 SC 2870. Also see, Ch. X, Sec. D and Sec. G(iii)(a).
43. Supra, Ch. X, Secs. D, E.
44. Ibid.

In some Central statutes, provision exists to enable the Central Government to delegate any of its powers under the Act to the State Governments 'in relation to such matters and subject to such conditions, if any, as may be specified'.[45]

In some cases, powers left with the States are made exercisable by them subject to the concurrence of the Central Government. Such a provision is made when the Central Government feels it necessary to satisfy itself that a State does not use the delegated power in a manner detrimental to the interests of the neighbouring States, or of the country as a whole, or of individuals. Not infrequently, Parliamentary laws confer power on the Central Government to delegate its powers directly on the officers and authorities of the State Governments.

The Essential Commodities Act, 1955, enacted by Parliament under entry 33, List III, confers powers on the Central Government to regulate various aspects of supply, production, storage, etc., of essential commodities (S. 3). The Act provides for an extensive mechanism of delegation of powers from the Centre to the States or their officers/authorities.

The Act authorises the Central Government to confer power on the State Government or its officers and authorities. The States thus act as delegates of the Centre, within the scope of authority conferred on them, and subject to the conditions imposed, and directions given, by the Centre regarding the exercise of delegated power. The Centre can thus delegate legislative, administrative or quasi-judicial powers on the State Governments and their agencies and maintain supervisory control over them.[46]

Under the Act, powers are conferred on the States and their officers in several ways, namely:

(1) The Act empowers the Central Government to direct that the power to make an order under S. 3, in relation to such matters and subject to such conditions as may be specified in the order, shall be exercised also by—(a) an officer/authority subordinate to the Union Government, or (b) a State Government or officer/authority subordinate to that Government (S. 5).

A condition usually imposed by the Centre that before making an order, the State Government shall seek the prior consent of the Central Government.

An example of such delegation can be found in the case noted below.[47] Under S. 5, Essential Commodities Act, the Central Government conferred power under S. 3(1) of the Act on State Government under the following two conditions:

(1) The State Government shall exercise the power subject to any directions issued by the Central Government.

(2) Before issuing any order, the State Government shall obtain prior concurrence of the Central Government.

(3) Another device adopted by the EC Act for delegating power is that an order made by the Central Government under S. 3 may confer powers and impose

---

45. The Rice-Milling Industry (Regulation) Act, 1958, S. 19; S. 14 of the Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorised Occupants) Act, 1958; The Industries (Development and Regulation) Act, 1951.

46. See, Afzal Ullah v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1964 SC 264 : (1964) 4 SCR 991; Sujan Singh Matu Ram v. State of Haryana, AIR 1968 P&H 363; Foremost Dairies Ltd. v. State, AIR 1986 Raj 116.

47. Saurashtra Oil Mills Assn. v. State of Gujarat, (2002) 3 SCC 202 : AIR 2002 SC 1130.

duties upon the State Government, or any of its officers or authorities. The order may also contain directions as to how the powers are to be exercised and the duties to be discharged (S. 4).

(4) The third pattern of delegation of powers under the Act is that certain sections of the Act straightway empower either a State Government or an officer under it to exercise/perform certain powers/functions.

(5) In other cases, the Central Government delegates power on the State Governments which can further delegate them on their officers and authority.[48]

There may be occasions when the Centre may impose its administrative control over the States even in an area belonging to them. At the time of general re-organisation of States in 1956, S. 115(1) of the States Re-organisation Act, 1956, stipulated that a civil servant in any State would continue to serve in the successor State. Proviso to Sec. 115(7), however, stipulated that the successor State could not vary the conditions of service of such a civil servant to his disadvantage without the previous approval of the Central Government. A kind of protection was thus given to civil servants against being prejudicially affected from State action.

Then, S. 117 of the same Act authorised the Central Government to give directions to a State Government for the purpose of giving effect to these provisions, and the State Government was obligated to comply with such directions.

In a number of cases, rules made by the States adversely affecting service conditions of the civil servants coming to them after re-organisation have been held to be inoperative in the absence of approval of the Central Government.[49] A State action ignoring the Central directive issued under S. 117 has also been held to be invalid.[50]

An instructive case dealing with the exercise of delegated power is Mount Corp. v. Director of Industries.[51] Imports fall within the exclusive Central jurisdiction and are regulated under the Imports and Exports (Control) Act, 1947. The Steel Controller was authorised to issue import licences for stainless steel when the Director of Industries of the State concerned issued an essentiality certificate. The petitioner's application was rejected by the Director of Industries. It transpired that the State had constituted a committee with a Deputy Minister as Chairman and the Director as a member to deal with the distribution of raw materials in the State, and that the application had been rejected by this committee.

Quashing the action of the committee, the High Court held that the power to grant the essentiality certificate had been vested in the Director under the Central Act and orders made thereunder. Instead of leaving him free to exercise this power in his discretion, the State Government sought to usurp the same by appointing a committee. The Court emphasized that when a State official functioned as a delegate under a Central law, he really discharged the functions of the 48. S. 22 of the Supply and Prices of Goods Act, 1950; The Industries (Development and Regulation) Act, 1951.

---

49. C.K. Appanna v. State of Mysore, AIR 1965 Mys. 19; T.S. Mankad v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1970 SC 143 : (1969) 2 SCC 120; Raghvendra Rao v. Dy. Commr., AIR 1965 SC 136 : (1964) 7 SCR 549.

50. Roshanlal v. Union of India, AIR 1968 Punj 47.

51. AIR 1965 Mys. 144.

Central Government and not of the State Government. The scheme of federation would be a myth if the State Government, by a clever device, could direct the actions of its officers when they discharge statutory powers on behalf of the Central Government. An authority having power under a law must exercise its own individual judgment and not adopt the decision of any other body as his own.

(d) CENTRE TO DEFRAY COST

Under Art. 258(3), where powers and duties are entrusted by the Centre to the States or their officers, the Centre is to recoup the States in respect of any extra costs of administration incurred by the States in connection with those powers and duties. The Centre and the States may agree as to the sums payable in this connection, or, in default of agreement, the amount may be determined by an arbitrator appointed by the Chief Justice of India.

What payment is to be made by the Centre to the State in this connection is entirely a matter between the two governments and no third person can challenge the entrustment or delegation of powers and duties on the ground of absence of such payment. An agreement as to such payments is not a pre-requisite for entrustment of powers by the Centre to the States.[52]

(e) ENTRUSTMENT OF STATE FUNCTIONS TO THE CENTRE

According to Art. 258A, a State Government may, with the consent of the Government of India, entrust either conditionally or unconditionally to the Central Government or to its officers, functions in relation to any matter to which the executive power of the State extends.

This Article was inserted in the Constitution in 1956 by the Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, as a corresponding provision to Art. 258(1). The lack of a provision enabling a State to entrust its functions to the Centre was found to be of practical consequence in connection with the execution of certain development works in the States.

The complicated arrangements existing between the Government of India and the Orissa Government in respect of the Hirakud Dam, a State enterprise, can be seen from the details given in N.B. Singh v. Duryodhan.[53] The High Court has ruled that the relationship arising by virtue of Art. 258A between the Central and the State Governments is not that of the principal and agent.

C. POWER TO CARRY ON TRADE

Article 298 also has a bearing on the inter-relation of the Central executive power with that of a State and vice versa. Under this provision, the executive power of the Union, or of the State, extends to the carrying by it of any "trade or business" whether or not it is related to a matter within its legislative competence and also to hold, acquire or dispose of property and make contracts for any purpose.

This constitutional provision extends executive power of the Centre, or of the State. However, it is subject to one condition. According to provisos (a) and (b),

52. Mulchand v. State of Bihar, AIR 1974 Pat. 380
53. AIR 1959 Ori. 48, 65.

if an activity falls outside the legislative domain of the government which carries it, then it would be subject to the laws made by the other government having the necessary legislative power. Thus, if the trade or business carried on by the Centre does not fall within the legislative domain of the Centre, then its executive power to carry on that trade or business is subject in each State to the legislation by the concerned State. It is the only case of its kind when the Central executive power has been made subject to the State legislative power. Similarly, if the trade or business carried on by a State does not fall within its legislative domain, then the executive power of the State to carry on that trade or business is subject to legislation by Parliament.

Article 298 enlarges the scope of the executive power of the Centre as well as the States by adding various matters in respect of which these governments may exercise their executive power. It has been held in Khazan Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh[54] that Art. 298 envisages carrying on of trade and business by a State without any territorial limitations and the restriction, if any, on the executive power of the State is contained in proviso (b) to Art. 298. The Court has further ruled that there is nothing in Art. 298 to say that the trade or business to be carried on by a State must be restricted to the area within its territorial limits. The carrying on of business by one State within the territory of another State does not entail an encroachment upon the executive power of the latter State. If a State has power to carry on trade in its own State it can carry on the same in every part of India.

A State could organize its own lotteries by virtue of its executive power under Art. 298, until law is made by Parliament for the purpose under entry 40, List I.[55]

It may be interesting to note that the Supreme Court has distinguished between Art. 301 and Art. 298. The Court has ruled that the words "trade or business" used in Art. 298 are wider in scope than the words "trade, commerce and intercourse" used in Art. 301.[56] This means that while a State can conduct lotteries under Art. 298, lotteries being 'gambling' and not 'commerce' cannot claim the protection of Art. 301.[57]

The words 'for any purpose' in Art. 298 indicate that the executive power of the Centre or the States to acquire, hold and dispose of property, or make contracts, is not limited by the division of Centre-State legislative powers. In this way, the width and amplitude of the executive power of the Centre and the States have been expanded. This means that the executive power of the Centre [or the States] is apart from the executive power granted under Art. 73 [or Art. 162].[58] Under this provision, a State Government has power to reserve a mining area for exploitation in the public sector even when it cannot do so under Art. 162, but this will be subject to the Central legislation.[59]

---

54. AIR 1974 SC 669 : (1974) 1 SCC 295.
55. H. Anraj v. State of Maharashtra (I), AIR 1984 SC 781 : (1984) 2 SCC 292; for entry 40, List I, see, supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
56. For discussion on Art. 301, see, infra, Ch. XV.
57. B.R. Enterprises v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1867 at 1903 : (1999) 9 SCC 700. For discussion on Art. 301, see, infra, Ch. XV.
58. For Art. 73, see, supra, Ch. III, For Art. 162, see, supra, Ch. VII.
59. Amritlal v. Union of India, AIR 1973 Guj. 117; Lal & Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1975 Pat. 44.

D. STATES NOT TO IMPEDE THE CENTRE

The Constitution places certain restrictions and obligations on the States in order to ensure that the Centre can exercise its powers unimpeded by them. It is necessary to ensure that no State by its action or inaction interferes with the legislative and administrative policies of the Centre.

Article 256 imposes a general obligation on the States to so exercise their executive power as to ensure compliance with the laws made by Parliament. This lays down the general constitutional duty of every State.

Article 256 further enacts that the executive power of the Centre extends to the giving of such directions to a State as may appear to the Centre to be necessary for the purpose.

It is clear from the phraseology of Art. 256 that the existence of a law made by Parliament is a condition precedent which must be satisfied for the issuance of a direction under it. No direction can be issued under Art. 256 where no enforcement of a law made by Parliament is involved.[60]

Article 256 comes into operation if the Government of India feels that the executive power of the State is being exercised in a manner which may amount to impediment to enforcement of the Central laws.

The State of West Bengal issued a circular to police officers not to intervene in case of gherao of industrial establishments by its workers. A writ petition was filed in the Calcutta High Court to challenge the circular. The Court declared that the provisions of Art. 256 were mandatory which must be complied with by the States. Accordingly, the directive issued by the State Government to its officers not to enforce certain sections of the Criminal Procedure Code (a Central law) was struck down as being in violation of Art. 256.[61]

The Calcutta High Court observed in this connection:[62] "The authority and the jurisdiction of the State Government to issue administrative directions are limited, firstly by the Constitution and secondly, by the laws of the land. There is no law which authorises the State Government to issue directives to officers in charge of maintenance of law and order not to enforce the law of the land upon certain conditions being fulfilled and complied with. The provisions in Article 256 of the Constitution…. are mandatory in nature".

Under Art. 257(1), the executive power of a State is to be so exercised as not to impede or prejudice the exercise of the Centre's executive power. The Centre can give such directions to a State as may appear to the Central Government to be necessary for that purpose.

The words "for that purpose" in Art. 257(1) indicate that the power of the Centre to give directions is limited to such situations only where some State executive action impedes or prejudices the valid exercise of the Central executive power. This means that the Centre is not entitled to give directions about the exercise of the State executive power in any field reserved for the State executive which does not impede or collide with, or prejudice the exercise of, the Union's

---

60. Sharma Transport v. Govt. of A.P., AIR 2002 SC 322 : (2002) 2 SCC 188.
61. Jay Engineering Works v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1968 Cal 407.
62. Ibid, at 488.

executive power. Such a direction would be invalid. Art. 257(1) primarily emphasizes the principle of federal supremacy.

It is obligatory on the part of the State Government to comply with the directions issued by the Central Government under Arts. 256 and 257(1). The sanction to enforce the directions is enshrined in Art. 356.[63]

CHANDRACHUD, J., has observed in A.D.M., Jabalpur v. Shukla,[64] as regards Art. 256 that it "does not seem to confer any right on any individual. That Article appears in Part XI which deals with relations between the Union and the States. A failure to comply with Art. 256 may attract serious consequences but no court is likely to entertain a grievance at the instance of a private party that Art. 256 has not been complied with by a State Government."[65]

This seems to be a casual, not a well considered and definitive, statement. This was the view expressed only by one Judge in a Bench of five Judges and is only an obiter dicta. It is not clear how can it be argued that any State action inconsistent with a law is not challengeable in a court. On the other hand, there are High Court cases where persons whose interests are adversely affected by the failure of the State Government to comply with Art. 256, have been permitted to seek judicial relief against the State Government asking it to exercise its executive power to ensure compliance with Art. 256. This is illustrated by Jay Engineering.[66] A circular issued by the West Bengal Government interfering with the implementation of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code was quashed by the Calcutta High Court on a writ petition being filed by a company. It was ruled that the provisions of Art. 256 are mandatory in nature and must be complied with by the Council of Ministers. "If the command of the Constitution in Art. 256 of the Constitution is violated and disregarded by the Council of Ministers, by issuing instructions contrary to the mandate of that Article, it must be held that the Council of Ministers had no authority to issue such directives or administrative instructions." Accordingly, the circular was struck down by the Court.[67]

Under S. 20 of the Urban Land (Ceiling and Regulation) Act, 1976—a Central Act—the State Government is authorised to grant exemption to the vacant land of a person from the operation of the Act. Under S. 36, the Central Government may issue directions to any State Government for effective execution of any of the provisions of the Act. The Central Government issued certain directions to the State Governments as regards exercise of their power under S. 20. Instead of following these directions, the Andhra Pradesh Government decided to reject all applications for grant of exemption under S. 20. The Andhra Pradesh High Court ruled, on a writ petition filed by a cooperative society, that it was obligatory under Arts. 256 and 257 on the part of the State Government to ensure compliance with the law made by Parliament and the directions given by the Central Government for the implementation of the Act. The sanction to enforce these directions is contained in Art. 365.[68] The court declared the order of the State Gov-

---

63. See, K. Co-op. Building Society Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 AP 242.
For discussion on Art. 356, see, infra, Ch. XIII.

64. AIR 1976 SC 1207, 1338 : (1976) 2 SCC 521.
For a detailed discussion on this case, see, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.

65. For Art. 256, see, Sec. D, supra.

66. Jay Engineering Works v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1968 Cal 407.

67. Ibid., at 488.

68. See, Sec. E, below.

ernment invalid as it impeded or prejudiced the compliance with the guidelines issued by the Central Government.[69]

E. CENTRE'S DIRECTIVES TO THE STATES

Apart from Arts. 256 and 257(1), a few other constitutional provisions authorise the Centre to issue directives to the States in several matters falling under their purview.

'Communications' is a State subject.[70] However, under Art. 257(2), the Centre may give directions to a State as to the construction and maintenance of means of communication declared in the direction to be of national or military importance. This, however, does not restrict the power of Parliament to declare highways or waterways to be national; nor is the Centre's power restricted with respect to the national highways or waterways nor its power to construct and maintain means of communication as part of its functions with respect to naval, military and air force works.[71]

Article 257(3) empowers the Centre to give directions to a State as to the measures to be taken for the protection of the railways within the State. 'Railways' is a Central subject[72] but 'Police' is a State subject[73] and, consequently, the protection of railway property lies within the field of the State Government. It may be that in a particular situation the Centre may desire that the railway property be protected by taking special measurers by the State and for that purpose the Centre has power to give directions to the States.

Explaining the rationale of Arts. 257(2) and 257(3)[74] the Sarkaria Commission has observed:[75]

> "Even though clause (1) of Article 257 gives the Union full control over the exercise of the executive power of every State to ensure that it does not impede or prejudice the exercise of the executive power of the Union, the Constitution-makers, nevertheless, considered it necessary to make separate provisions in clauses (2) and (3) regarding means of communication and protection of railways…..Clause (2), ……. is intended to lay stress on the overall importance of well-coordinated effective executive action in regard to means of communications and railways which are so vital for the defence of the country, inter-State social intercourse, travel, trade and commerce, and incidentally are conducive to national integration. Further, as the States have exclusive legislative and executive power in respect of 'land' (vide entry 18 in the 'State List' read with Art. 162), the Constitution-framers appropriately found it necessary in the national interest, for the Union to have control over the State executive to ensure availability of 'land' for purposes of communication and protection of railways."

Provision has been made in Art. 257(4) for the Centre to pay sums to the States in respect of the extra costs incurred by the States due to the directions

---

69. Katya Coop. Building Society Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 AP 242; Muppavarapu Siva Ramakrishnaiah v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 AP 376.
70. Entry 13, List II, see, supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
71. Entries 4, 23, 24, List I. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
72. Entry 22, List I.
73. Entry 2, List II, Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
74. IX CAD 1186.
75. REPORT, 103.

issued under Cls. (2) and (3) of the Article. This constitutional provision recognises the fact that in complying with any Central directions given to a State under Arts. 257(2) and (3), it may incur extra costs. The Centre is thus placed under an obligation to pay to the State sums to meet the extra costs so incurred by the State.

The Sarkaria Commission has justified the existence of Arts. 256 and 257 in the Constitution in the following words:

> "In a two-tier-system of Government, with a single judiciary, where the administration of Union law is largely secured through the machinery of the States, differences are bound to arise between the Union and the States in regard to the manner of implementation of Union laws and the exercise of the Union's executive powers, specially if they conflict with the exercise of the executive powers of the State. Articles like 256 and 257 are essential to ensure harmonious exercise of the executive power by the Union and by the States, in keeping with the principle of Union supremacy and to enforce this principle, by giving appropriate directions, in the event of irreconcilable differences on vital issues".[76]

OTHER CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

Apart from Arts. 256 and 257, there are several other provisions in the Constitution authorising the Union to give directions to the States.

In certain matters pertaining to the Minorities, the Central Government has power to issue directives to the States. Art. 339(2) entitles the Centre to give directions to a State as to the drawing up and execution of schemes specified in the direction to be essential for the welfare of Scheduled Tribes in the State.[77]

Under Art. 350A, a State is obligated to provide facilities for instruction in the mother-tongue at the primary stage of children belonging to a linguistic minority and the President has been empowered to issue such directions to any State as he considers necessary.[78]

Under Art. 344(6), the President may issue directions in regard to the official language of the Union, and under Art. 347 with regard to the recognition in a State of the language spoken by a substantial proportion of the State population.[79]

Besides, a number of administrative functions have been entrusted to the Centre in the area of minority affairs which are detailed later.[80]

During an emergency under Art. 352, the Centre gets some overriding powers vis-a-vis the States. It can give directions to the States as to the way they should exercise their executive power [Art. 353(a)]. During a financial emergency, the Centre can give directions to a State [Art. 360(3)], and, under Art. 356, the Centre can take over a State Government when it cannot be carried on in accordance with the Constitution.[81]

Under Art. 371C(2), the President can issue directions to the Governor of Manipur as to the administration of hilly area therein.[82]

---

76. Report, 106.
77. See, infra, Ch. XXXV.
78. See, infra, Chs. XVI and XXXV.
79. Infra, Ch. XVI.
80. Infra, Part V. Ch. XXXV.
81. For discussion on these Emergency Provisions, see, infra, Ch. XIII.
82. Supra, Ch. IX.

Lastly, there is the all important constitutional provision, Art. 365, which lays down the sanction behind the Central directives to the States. In case of failure of a State to comply with, or give effect to, the Central directions, given under any Constitutional provision, the President may hold that a situation has arisen in which the State Government cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. Thereafter, the Centre can take over the administration of the State as provided for in Art. 356.[83]

The rationale underlying Art. 365 is that the constitutional provisions authorising the Centre to issue directions to the States would be rendered futile if any direction issued thereunder can be ignored or disobeyed by a State with impunity. Any direction issued by the Centre under a constitutional provision is meant to be complied with and not ignored by the concerned State. Without Art. 365, there would have been no sanction to ensure enforcement of Central directions issued to the States under any constitutional provision in exercise of its executive power. However, taking recourse to Art. 365 is a measure of last resort. So far, there has been no occasion for the Centre to invoke Art. 365.

Article 365 can be validly invoked only if the following two conditions are satisfied:

(1) A direction is issued by the Centre in the valid exercise of its executive power under a constitutional provision,

(2) The State concerned has not complied with, or given effect to, such direction.

If any of the above conditions is not satisfied, Art. 365 cannot be invoked. Thus, the power conferred by Art. 365 is conditional and not absolute; its exercise may thus become subject to judicial review. If a Central direction does not fulfil the pre-conditions prescribed in the specific constitutional provision under which it is purportedly issued, or has been given for a purpose extraneous to the one for which the power has been conferred by that provision, it would be invalid and open to challenge on that ground in the court.

F. STATUTORY PROVISIONS

Along with the above constitutional provisions, several statutory provisions confer power on the Central Government to give directions to the States. For example, S. 23 of the Supply and Prices of Goods Act, 1950, (enacted under Art. 249),[84] empowered the Central Government to give directions to any State Government as to the carrying into execution of any of the provisions of the Act, or of any order or direction made thereunder.

Under the Plantation Labour Act, 1951, the executive power is left with the States but the Central Government has power under S. 41 to give directions to a State Government as to the carrying into execution of the provisions of the Act.

Many more such examples can be collected from the statute book. Usually, whenever administrative power is delegated to the States under a Central law, a reservation is made enabling the Centre to give directions to the States as to the carrying into effect the functions so delegated to them.

83. Infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
84. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J.

G. ALL-INDIA SERVICES

Article 312 introduces an important feature into the Constitution, namely, that besides separate services for the Union and the States, the Centre can create certain services common to both.[85]

If the Rajya Sabha declares by resolution supported by not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting that it is necessary or expedient in the national interest so to do, Parliament may by law provide for the creation of one or more All-India Services (including an all-India Judicial Service) and regulate recruitment and conditions of service for it.[86] The all-India Judicial Service is not to include any post inferior to that of a district judge.

These services give cohesion to the federal structure and help in achieving greater efficiency in the administration of the Union and the States. The all-India basis of recruitment attracts the best available talent in the country to these services. The two main All-India Services are the Indian Administrative Service and the Indian Police Service. The raison d'eter of creating All-India Services is that officers on whom the brunt of the responsibility for administration will inevitably fall, may develop a wide and all-India outlook.[87]

With a view to correcting particularistic trends, and also to secure greater inter-State co-ordination for efficient implementation of all-India policies, efforts have been undertaken towards creation of a few more All-India Services, especially for technical departments, for "the Central and State Governments have to work in very close co-operation in executing important development projects, which necessitates that technical personnel should be trained and recruited on a common basis".[88] Consequently, in 1961, the Chief Ministers' Conference accepted in principle the creation of three new All-India Services in the field of engineering, forestry and medicine and public health. After the adoption of a resolution under Art. 312(1) by the Rajya Sabha, these services were created by amending the All-India Services Act, 1951 in 1963.

The State Governments had also agreed to the creation of two more All-India Services, viz., the Indian Educational Service and the Indian Agricultural Service. The necessary resolution under Art. 312(1) was also adopted by the Rajya Sabha. After the fourth general elections, a few State Governments modified their stand and refused to participate in these two services and, consequently, the matter was deferred.[89]

H. GENERAL OBSERVATIONS

Some of the provisions made in the Constitution are unique insofar as these are not to be found in the Federations of U.S.A., Canada and Australia. The basic

---

85. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.
86. See, D.S. Garewal v. State of Punjab, AIR 1959 SC 512 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 792.
87. STATES REORGANIZATION COMMISSION REPORT, 232 (1955).
88. Ibid, 231. Also, A.K. CHANDA, FEDERALISM IN INDIA, 106 (1965).
89. ANNUAL REPORT, MINISTRY OF HOME AFFAIRS, 2 (1968-69).

pattern of administration in these countries is that central legislation is by and large implemented through the federal executive. In India, it is not so.

In India, the Constitution is so devised as to leave most of the administration to the States. The Centre directly administers through its own agencies only a few functions in its exclusive List, e.g., defence, foreign affairs, railways, collection of taxes, regulation of foreign trade, foreign exchange and currency, centrally controlled industries, etc. Quite a number of its exclusive functions are administered through the States, e.g., till recently passports were issued by the States, but this task has now been centralised; policing of some of the international borders still rests with the States though the Centre has now created the Border Security Force for the purpose.

Many functions in the Central List are delegated to the States under Art. 258(1), or under legislation, and in some areas co-operation of State agencies is sought informally. On the other hand, the States have responsibility to administer all the functions falling in List II. In addition, the administration of functions in the Concurrent List also belongs to them unless Parliament by passing a law confers power of administration in a particular matter on the Centre. Further, the States also administer such functions in List I as are delegated to them.

Even when the Centre assumes power under a law enacted by it in the Concurrent area, it delegates most of these on the States. Thus, under the Essential Commodities Act, 1955, while the power to regulate essential commodities has been centralised, it exercises the power through its own agencies only in respect of a few commodities like iron and steel, jute, etc., and leaves quite a big slice of administration under the Act to the States subject to its over-all control. The Constitution thus envisages a good deal of administrative cooperation between the Centre and the States.

A mosaic of Central-State relationship has thus come into existence in the country. The law enforcement machinery, like the police, etc., wholly belongs to the States and, therefore, even if a Central law makes an activity penal, the efficacy of the law, by and large, depends almost wholly on the zeal with which the States seek to enforce it. It is not uncommon to see that many Central laws are diluted and remain mere paper legislation because of weak and indifferent administration by the States.

Most of the administration at the grass-roots vests in the States. The States carry out their own exclusive functions along with a number of functions as delegates of the Central Government.

A large sector of five-year plans falls to the States for implementation because many nation-building activities fall within their legislative purview. The plans deal with many matters in the State and Concurrent Lists and, therefore, the successful implementation of the plans, and of many national policies of development, depends mostly on State initiative and enterprise and on the effectiveness with which the States administer them.

The modern era has been characterised as the administrative age in which much depends on an effective administration. It is much more so in India where successful planning depends on sustained administrative effort, initiative and enterprise as plan programmes are to be completed within a fixed time.

Opinions have been expressed from time to time that too much dependence by the Centre on the States for purposes of administration is the weak link of the present-day Indian Federalism. It is well known that, on the whole, State administration is rather weak and this means that the administration of plan projects and other Central programmes and functions is not as vigorous as it should be.

Appleby has pointedly commented on this aspect of the matter thus: "The Nation is crucially dependent on the States for actual achievement of the chief programmatic objectives of the Nation". "Because of the Constitutional arrangments, in many fields of pre-eminently national importance, the Centre's hopes for success are dependent on its capacity for influencing and co-ordinating administration actually in the States' systems and not on directing or controlling the States or holding them strictly and specifically accountable. The Centre holds conferences, makes studies and plans, issues pronouncements, and is fundamentally lacking in administrative authority," and that "the new national government of India is given less basic resource in power than any other large and important nation, while at the same time having rather more sense of need and determination to establish programmes dealing with matters important to the national interest." The Centre does not have effective power of enforcing on the States any coordinative decision when there is, instead, the diluted and incomplete task of coordination not involving exercise of a real, formal and continuing power of control.

Appleby went on to say further: "Even when the Centre has power to issue directives to the States, matters do not improve very much for, in the very nature of things, such a power cannot be exercised too frequently. Even in the area of conditional grants-in-aid made under Art. 282, no effective mechanism to supervise use of funds by the States has been worked out so far.[90] When the Centre provides grants to the States on conditions to help the State activities, the Central inspection and control being lax, the States accepting grants do not fully discharge the obligations willingly undertaken by them. In consequence, national programmes tend to lag behind". Thus, APPLEBY concludes:[91]

> "No other large and important national government, I believe, is so dependent as India on theoretically subordinate but actually rather distinct units responsible to a different political control for so much of the administration of what are recognised as national programmes of great importance to the nation."

In spite of the detailed provisions in the Constitution regulating the Centre-State administrative relationship, there is not always smooth sailing. Stresses and strains arise between the Centre and the States at times. For example, the Constitution squarely rests the responsibility to protect the means of communication on the States, but such protection is not always forthcoming in adequate measure.

In November 1967, the Central Government addressed a general letter to all State Governments drawing their attention to their obligations under Arts. 256 and 257 and cautioning them that such a failure on their part was against the Constitution which clearly placed on them the responsibility to ensure proper functioning of the Central agencies and protection of Central property. The Central Government hoped that occasions would not arise necessitating resort by it to powers under Arts. 256 and 257. The Centre advised the States to seek Central

---

90. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. M.
91. PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION, supra, at 17.

assistance if they ever felt that they could not on their own prevent interference with the working of Union agencies and services in their respective jurisdiction.

Embarrassment is caused to the Centre when a State Government of a political complexion different from that of the Central Government, in spite of the constitutional obligation to do so, does not give its full co-operation to the Centre in implementing its laws even in its exclusive area. One example of this may be mentioned here. The employees of the Central Government threatened to go on a token strike for a day. In anticipation of the strike, the Central Government promulgated the Essential Services Maintenance Ordinance, 1968, declaring the strike illegal and sent directives to the States as to how to deal with the threatened strike. The State Governments were requested to issue appropriate instructions to district authorities to take suitable action, including arrest of, and institution of cases against, the offenders. The Kerala Government publicly declared that it would not implement the Central directive but follow its own policies in the matter. The Centre then drew the attention of the State Government to Art. 256.[92]

The State Government then informed the Centre that it would take all action necessary and found suitable, keeping in view the provisions of Art. 256. Later, the State Government withdrew all the criminal cases against those Central employees who had been arrested on charges of violence under the Central law and, though this caused embarrassment to the Centre, yet it could do nothing as the law enforcement machinery belongs to the States. The situation was saved by the Kerala High Court which held that the withdrawal of cases by the State was bad in law and directed that the accused persons be tried and not acquitted.[93]

The intransigence of the Kerala Government to implement a Central law came in for a lot of criticism in the Lok Sabha.[94] The Central Government took the view that no State has a right to place its own interpretation on a Central law, or have its own policy on how it should be enforced. Under the Constitutional provisions, if a State fails to honour its obligation to enforce a Central law, the Centre can, under Art. 256, issue a directive to the defaulting State. If this is not heeded by the State Government, the Central Government can invoke Art. 356 as authorised by Art. 365.[95] But it is not feasible always to resort to such a drastic step.

As regards the relationship between Arts. 356 and 365, it may be pointed out that Art. 365 merely sets out one instance in which the President (i.e., the Central Government) may hold that the State Government cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. Art. 356 is however much wider in scope than Art. 365. Art. 365 is not exhaustive of the situations where the President may form the said satisfaction under Art. 356.

Article 365 merely says that in case of failure to comply with the directions given, "it shall be lawful" for the President to hold that the requisite type of situation (as contemplated in Art. 356(1)) has arisen. It is not that each and every failure to observe a Central direction ipso facto results in the failure of the State Government.

---

92. Supra, Sec. D.
93. Deputy Accountant-General v. State of Kerala, AIR 1970 Ker 158.
94. LOK SABHA DEB., Nov. 19, 1968.
95. Supra, Sec. E.

Two conditions are pre-requisite for taking action under Art. 365, viz., (i) the directions given by the Centre must be lawful; and (ii) their disobedience must give rise to a situation contemplated in Art. 356(1). The President has to judge in each specific case whether such a situation has arisen or not. Art. 365 says it is permissible for the President to say so in case of failure of the State Government to observe a Central direction. This implies that there is 'discretion' which has to be applied fairly.[1]

For example, in Rajasthan v. Union of India, the question was raised whether the Centre can issue a direction to a State to dissolve its legislative assembly and hold fresh elections for theHouse. There seems to be a difference of opinion amongst the Supreme Court Judges on this issue. For example, BEG, C.J., observed after referring to Arts. 256 and 257:

> "It could, therefore, be argued that, although the Constitution itself does not lay down specifically when the power of dissolution should be exercised by the Governor on the advice of a Council of Ministers in the State, yet if a direction on that matter was properly given by the Union Government to a State Government, there is a duty to carry it out. The time for the dissolution of a State Assembly is not covered by any specific provision of the Constitution or any law made on the subject. It is possible, however, for the Union Government, in exercise of its residuary executive power to consider it a fit subject for the issue of an appropriate direction when it considers that the political situation in the country is such that a fresh election is necessary in the interest of political stability or to establish the confidence of the people in the Government of a State".[2]

But FAZL ALI, J., disagreed with the above view. Taking phraseology of Arts. 256 and 257 into consideration, he expressed the view that no such direction could be issued. He observed on this point:

> "The Chief Minister, as the head of the Council of Ministers in the State, has the undoubted discretion to advise the Governor to dissolve the Assembly if a particular situation demands such a step. The Chief Minister is the best judge to assess the circumstances under which such an advice should be given to the Governor. The Central Government cannot interfere with this executive power of the State Government by giving directions under Art. 256 or Art. 257 of the Constitution because the dissolution of the Assembly by the Governor is purely a matter concerning the State and does not fall within the four corners of either Art. 256 or Art. 257 of the Constitution".[3]

FAZL ALI, J.'S opinion is more rational and consistent with the wordings of Art. 256 and 257 and with the federal concept.

Whenever there is a general strike, agitation or demonstration in a State, the State generally fails to give adequate protection to the Central Government's agencies so that these may keep on functioning normally, nor is adequate protection given to the Central property in the States against destruction by the agitators, although there is a specific constitutional obligation to do so.[4] The result is that Central services like railways, posts and telegraph, etc., have to be suspended now and then in one State or the other. The Centre has drawn the attention of the

---

1. For further discussion on Arts. 356 and 365, see, next Chapter.
2. AIR 1977 SC at 1384.
Also, see, infra, Ch. XIII.
3. Ibid, at 1434.
4. LOK SABHA DEB., Feb. 13, 1968.

States to their obligations under Arts. 256 and 257 and has cautioned them that such a failure on their part is against the Constitution which clearly places on them the responsibility to ensure proper functioning of the Central agencies and protection of the Centre's properties, installations and institutions within the States' boundaries.

In anticipation of the Central Government employees' strike in 1968, the Centre deployed the Central Reserve Police in Kerala to protect Central Government offices and installations. The State objected to this on the ground that the Centre should have consulted it before doing so. The Centre, however, took the view that it was not obligatory for it to consult the State Government to deploy the Central Reserve Police to protect its own institutions in the State.

The Central Reserve Police has been created by an Act of Parliament under entry 2 of List I, pertaining to "any other armed forces of the Union".[5] Though 'public order' is a State matter being entry 1 in List II,[6] yet, "armed forces of the Union" have been specifically excluded from the scope of the entry.

Reference is also to be made to the Centre's obligation under Art. 355.[7] The Centre, therefore, argued that if a State fails to protect its property, it could not stand by helplessly and let its property be destroyed or its agencies prevented from proper functioning. It must take necessary action to deal with any eventuality, particularly when, as it happened in Kerala, the State Government had declared that it would ignore the Central law preventing strike by Central employees and would not activise the local law and order apparatus for the purpose. The issues remain unresolved so far.

A similar controversy arose between the Centre and West Bengal on the deployment of the units of the Reserve Police to protect Central Government's property within the State without seeking its concurrence. Another angle of the controversy was that on April 10, 1969, there was statewide strike as a protest against firing by the guards of the Central Defence Ordinance Factory. The State Government failed to give protection against obstruction in the functioning of the Central Services within the State as a result of which these services had to be suspended for the day. The Central Government took a serious view of such an attitude on the part of some of the States.[8]

Although, for the present, the phase of tension between the Centre and the States has passed over, there is no knowing as to when a similar phase may re-emerge. The political complexion of the Central and State Governments has much to do with the stresses and strains in their relationship. What happened in the past is only a symptom of a much more serious constitutional crisis that could arise if a State decides to ignore the Central laws and fails to implement them. It is, therefore, necessary to re-orient Centre-State administrative relationship. A greater federalization of the important Central functions is necessary so that the Centre depends less on the States, and more on its own instrumentalities to enforce its laws.

---

5. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
6. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
7. Infra, next Chapter.
8. LOK SABHA DEB., April 11 & 14, 1969.

Before 1956, the entire administration of the Company Law was left to the States. The administration of the law by them was perfunctory and ineffective and most of the regulatory provisions remained unenforced. When, keeping in view the new economic developments in the country, thoughts began to be given to modify the Company law, it appeared inevitable that there should be a strong and competent administrative machinery to enforce the same and, therefore, the Centre established its own administrative agencies under the Companies Act, 1956.

The Centre has enacted the Industrial Security Force Act, 1969, with a view to ensure better protection and security of installations and industrial undertakings belonging to the Centre all over the country.[9] Such a development viz., federalization of Central administration, will be in line with the practices already in vogue in other federations.

It is also necessary to develop a Central mechanism for a close and effective Central supervision and inspection over an effective aided State activities. The performance of the States ought to be audited and watched closely by federal officers before releasing further grants to the States. In the U.S.A., this mechanism is extensively adopted. At the same time, in view of the known inadequacies and deficiencies in the State administration, it is also necessary to strengthen the same so as to make it more efficient. It is necessary to do so because a lot of administration falls in the State sector, particularly with regard to the multifarious programmes of social-economic well-being of the people. The States have to play a meaningful role as administrative entities because they are the nearest to the people, and much of the well-being of the people depends on effective State administration.

Tensions are bound to arise if there is a lack of balance between the responsibilities of the States and their administrative capacity. It is, therefore, necessary, even crucial, to devise ways and means to improve the effectiveness of administration at the State level. It is extremely necessary for the future well-being of the Nation that the States be in a position to discharge their role as robust administrative units.

The Finance Commission now recommends Central grants to the States for improvement of their essential administrative services.[10] The Seventh Finance Commission suggested improvement in the pay scales of the State personnel and took into account the increased expenditure on this head in the revenue expenditure forecasts of the concerned States.

The Commission felt concerned that in many States "the level of emoluments is unduly depressed compared not only to the Centre but also to other States". The Commission also proposed Central grants to the States for up-gradation of standards of administration. The heads selected for the purpose were: fiscal services, judicial administration, district administration, police and jail administration.[11]

---

9. RAJYA SABHA DEB., Feb. 28, 1969;
ANNUAL REPORT OF THE MINISTRY OF HOME AFFAIRS, 49 (1968-69).
10. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. L.
11. REPORT, Ch. XI, Sec. L.

The Tenth Finance Commission has also recommended grants for the purpose of improvement in the State administration. The Eleventh Finance Commission has provided for Central Grants to the States for improvement of State administration in several fields, e.g., district administration, police administration, prisons administration, judicial administration, fiscal administration etc.[12] But the crucial question remains: do the States effectively use the money given to them by the Centre for the purposes for which the money is given? Is there any mechanism to ensure that the funds given to the States for the purpose of improving administration is being used for the specified purpose?

12. REPORT OF THE ELEVENTH FINANCE COMMISSION, 62-63 (2000).

CHAPTER XIII

EMERGENCY PROVISIONS

SYNOPSIS

A. INTRODUCTORY

A notable feature of the Indian Constitution is the way in which the normal peace-time federalism can be adapted to an emergency situation. The framers of the Constitution felt that, in an emergency, the Centre should have overriding powers to control and direct all aspects of administration and legislation throughout the country.

The Constitution envisages three types of emergencies:

(i) emergency arising from a threat to the security of India;

(ii) breakdown of constitutional machinery in a State;

(iii) financial emergency. Each of these emergencies is discussed below.

Proclamation of an emergency is a very serious matter as it disturbs the normal fabric of the Constitution and adversely affects the rights of the people. Such a proclamation should, therefore, be issued only in exceptional circumstances and not merely to keep an unpopular government in office as happened in June 1975 when an emergency was declared on the ground of internal disturbance without there being adequate justification for the same.

As a consequence thereof, the emergency provisions (especially Arts. 352 and 356) have been extensively amended by the Constitution (Forty-fourth Amendment) Act, with a view to introduce a number of safeguards against abuse of power by the executive in the name of emergency. Amendments have thus been made by the Forty-fourth Amendment to the emergency provisions of the Constitution to make repetition of the 1975 situation extremely difficult, if not impossible.[1]

B. PROCLAMATION OF EMERGENCY

Under Art. 352(1), if the President is 'satisfied' that a grave emergency exists whereby the security of India or any part thereof is threatened, whether by war, or external aggression, or armed rebellion, he may, by proclamation, make a declaration to that effect. Such a proclamation may be made in respect of the whole of India, or such part of the Indian territory as may be specified in the proclamation.

Article 352(1) thus means that the proclamation need not extend to the whole of India. It may be restricted to a part of the Indian territory.

A proclamation of emergency under Art. 352(1) may be made before the actual occurrence of war, external aggression or armed rebellion.[2]

Before 1978, an emergency could be declared because of war, external aggression or 'internal disturbance'. The expression 'internal disturbance' was too vague and broad. The 44th Constitutional Amendment substituted the words 'armed rebellion' for 'internal disturbance' with a view to exclude the possibility of an emergency being proclaimed on the ground of 'internal disturbance' only not involving armed rebellion, as happened in 1975. This change has somewhat restricted the scope of what may be called as internal emergency.

As the Supreme Court has explained in the following case,[3] the expression "internal disturbance" has a wider connotation than "armed rebellion" in the sense that "armed rebellion" is likely to pose a threat to the security of the country, or a part thereof, while "internal disturbance", though serious in nature, would not pose a threat to the security of the country, or a part thereof.

The intention underlying the substitution of the words 'internal disturbance' by the words "armed rebellion" is to limit the invocation of Art. 352 only to more serious situations where there is a threat to the security of the country, or a part thereof. The reason underlying restricting the scope of Art. 352 is that a proclamation of emergency under Art. 352 has a very serious impact on the powers of the States as well as the Fundamental Rights of the people.[4]

---

1. Also see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F; Ch. XLII.
2. Expls. to Art. 352(1).
3. Naga People's Movement of Human Rights v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 431 : (1998) 2 SCC 109.
4. For discussion on this aspect, see infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.

A proclamation issued under Art. 352(1) may be varied or revoked by a subsequent proclamation [Art. 352(2)].

The 44th Amendment has introduced a clause, viz., Art. 352(3), to the effect that the President shall not issue a proclamation of emergency [under Art. 352(1)], or a proclamation varying the same, unless the decision of the Union Cabinet (that is to say, the Council consisting of the Prime Minister and other Ministers of Cabinet rank appointed under Art. 75) that such a proclamation may be issued has been communicated to him in writing. This means that the decision to issue such a proclamation has to be arrived at collectively by the Cabinet and not by the Prime Minister alone without consulting the Cabinet. It so happened in 1975 that the President proclaimed emergency on the advice of the Prime Minister alone and the Council of Ministers was later presented with a fait accompli. It is to avoid any such situation in future that Art. 352(3) has been introduced in the Constitution.

Every proclamation issued under Art. 352(1) is to be laid before each House of Parliament [Art. 352(4)]. It ceases to operate (except when it is a proclamation revoking the previous proclamation) at the expiration of one month unless, in the meantime, it has been approved by resolutions of both Houses of Parliament [Art. 352(4)]. Thus, the purport of Art. 352(1) is that Parliament must be convened within a month to consider the proclamation of emergency.

A proclamation will automatically cease after one month if not approved by Parliament in the meantime. Formerly, the period allowed for parliamentary approval of the proclamation was two months. The 44th Amendment has reduced it to one month.

If, however, at the time of the issue of the proclamation or thereafter, Lok Sabha is dissolved without approving the proclamation, and the Rajya Sabha approves it, then the proclamation ceases to operate 30 days after the Lok Sabha sits again after fresh elections, unless in the meantime the new Lok Sabha passes a resolution approving the proclamation [Proviso to Art. 352(4)].

Another significant safeguard introduced by the 44th Amendment is to lay down that a resolution approving the proclamation of emergency (or one varying it) has to be passed by each House by a majority of the total membership of each House and not less than two-thirds of the majority of the members present and voting in each House [Art. 352(6)].

Before the 44th Amendment, passage of such a resolution by a simple majority in each House was sufficient. Art. 352(6) introduces a very wholesome safeguard. Since a proclamation of emergency virtually results in amending the Constitution for the period of the emergency (Fundamental Rights are suspended[5] and, from the legislative point of view, it becomes practically unitary)[6], it is desirable that the proclamation of emergency be approved by the same majority in Parliament as is required for amendment of the Constitution.[7]

Once approved by Parliament, the proclamation remains in force, unless revoked earlier, only for six months from the date of the passing of the later of the

---

5. Ibid.

6. See, infra, under "Consequences of a Proclamation of Emergency".
Also see, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F, infra.

7. For the Amendment of the Constitution see infra, Ch. XLI.

resolutions [Art. 352(5)]. For continuance of the emergency beyond that period, parliamentary approval is needed again. Thus, each time Parliament approves the proclamation, its life is extended for six months [Proviso to Art. 352(5)]. In this way, the question whether the emergency should continue in force or not must periodically come before both Houses of Parliament.

This provision has also been added by the 44th Amendment. Previously, once approved by the two Houses, the proclamation could remain in force as long as the executive desired. There was no provision for periodical parliamentary review of the need for continuance of the emergency. This is a very wholesome provision. Each resolution of approval is to be passed by Parliament by the special majority mentioned above [Art. 352(6)]. It may however be noted that the Central Executive can revoke the proclamation at any time it likes.

Another safeguard introduced by the 44th Amendment is that the President is obliged to revoke a proclamation of emergency issued under Art. 352(1) (or one varying the same) if the House of People passes a resolution disapproving the same [Art. 352(7)]. This resolution is to be passed by a simple majority of the members of the House present and voting. Formerly the power to revoke the proclamation vested in the executive and the House had no say in the matter. Now, the executive has to withdraw the emergency if the Lok Sabha so desires.

The Forty-fourth Amendment introduced another innovation: where a notice in writing, signed by not less than 1/10th of the total members of the Lok Sabha has been given, of their intention to move a resolution disapproving the proclamation of emergency, to the Speaker if the House is in session, or to the President, if the House is not in session, a special sitting of the House is to be held within 14 days from the date on which such notice is received by the Speaker or the President, as the case may be, for the purpose of considering such resolution [Art. 352(8)]. Thus, it does not lie within the power of the government to convene or not a session of the House to consider the resolution in question.

According to Art. 352(9), the President has power to issue different proclamations on different grounds, "being war or external aggression, armed rebellion or imminent danger of war or external aggression or armed rebellion whether or not there is a Proclamation already issued by the President under clause (1) and such Proclamation is in operation."

This provision was introduced in 1975 by the 38th Amendment after the proclamation was issued on the ground of internal disturbance. There was already in existence at the time a proclamation of emergency (issued in 1971)[8] on the ground of external aggression. The provision was to ensure that there might be no legal hurdle in the way of having two proclamations of emergency on two different grounds operating at one and the same time. The 44th Amendment has continued this provision.

(a) JUSTICIABILITY OF PRESIDENT'S DISCRETION

According to Art. 352(1), the President may make a proclamation of emergency only when he is satisfied as to the existence of a threat to the security of India, or a part thereof. Thus, the question whether the security of India is threatened or not lies within the subjective satisfaction of the President acting on the advice of the Cabinet. The question has arisen from time to time whether this satisfaction of the President is justiciable or not.

8. Infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.

In Bhut Nath v. State of West Bengal,[9] the Supreme Court refusing to hold the continuance of the emergency under Art. 352 'void' stated that the question is "a political, not justiciable issue and the appeal should be to the polls and not to the courts."

Nevertheless, to put the matter beyond any shadow of doubt, the Constitution (Thirty-eighth Amendment) Act, 1975[10] amended the Constitution by adding clause 5 to Art. 352 which declared that the "satisfaction" of the President mentioned in Art. 352(1) and (3) "shall be final and conclusive" and "shall not be questioned in any court on any ground." It was further declared that "neither the Supreme Court nor any other court shall have jurisdiction to entertain any question, on any ground, regarding the validity of—(i) a declaration made by proclamation by the President to the effect stated in clause (1); or (ii) the continued operation of such proclamation." The 'satisfaction' of the President in declaring the emergency, and, thus, the proclamation of emergency under Art. 352, were thus sought to be placed beyond the ken of judicial scrutiny.

In Bhut Nath, that was the view taken by the Supreme Court when it said that the proclamation of emergency was not a justiciable issue but was essentially a political matter in substance. The amendment sought to put this judicial view in the form of a constitutional provision lest the court might change its opinion at some future date. Now, the Forty-fourth Amendment of the Constitution has repealed Art. 352(5).[11] The position has thus been restored to what it was before the 38th Amendment. It is therefore for the Supreme Court to decide whether it will treat the 'satisfaction' of the President to issue a proclamation of emergency, or to vary it or to continue it, as 'final' and 'non-justiciable', or as being subject to judicial review on some grounds.

Since the passage of the Forty-fourth Amendment of the Constitution, the question of judicial review of the discretion of the President to declare or not to declare an emergency has not arisen as no emergency has been declared after 1975. In Minerva Mills,[12] however, BHAGWATI, J., did express the view that whether the President in proclaiming the emergency under Art. 352 had applied his mind, or whether he acted outside his powers, or acted mala fide in proclaiming the, emergency could not be excluded from the scope of judicial review.[13]

BHAGWATI, J., also observed that the 38th Amendment which barred the satisfaction of the President from being called into question in a court could be declared unconstitutional as being violative of the basic structure of the Constitution.[14] Judicial review has now come to be regarded as a basic feature of the Constitution.[15] Further after the Supreme Court decision in Bommai,[16] in which the

---

9. AIR 1974 SC 806 : (1974) 1 SCC 645.
10. See, Ch. XLII, infra, for 38th Amendment.
11. See, Ch. XLII, infra, for 44th Amendment.
12. AIR 1980 SC 1789 : (1980) 2 SCC 591.
For discussion on the case, see, infra, Ch. XLI "Amendment of the Constitution".
13. AIR 1980 SC, at 1840.
14. Ibid., at 1838.
15. For discussion on this doctrine, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
16. Infra, Sec. D.

Supreme Court did go into the validity of a proclamation issued by the President under Art. 356, it can now be safely asserted that a proclamation of emergency under Art. 352 is reviewable by the Court on the grounds mentioned by BHAGWATI, J., in Minerva Mills.

The Constitution seeks to control the exercise of power to proclaim an emergency in two ways:

(i) The President must act on the advice of the Central Cabinet and not in his own subjective satisfaction and also not on the advice of the Prime Minister alone. Thus, the effective power to declare an emergency lies with the Cabinet.

(ii) The democratic control over the executive power in respect of proclaiming an emergency has been strengthened in so far as parliamentary approval is necessary for the proclamation immediately after it is made and, then, after every six months.

But these safeguards may prove tenuous in practice because the government of the day enjoys support of the majority party, and the Cabinet functions on the principle of collective responsibility.[17] A strong willed Prime Minister may have his way as he may dominate his Cabinet as well as the party and, thus, mobilise support for the emergency even though, in effect, there may be no need for the same. A pliant Parliament may support the Government making any parliamentary control of the emergency fictitious. It therefore appears to be essential that a limited judicial review of the exercise of the power to proclaim emergency remains available. This extra-Parliamentary check is extremely important for safeguarding democracy in the country.

(b) CONSEQUENCES OF A PROCLAMATION OF EMERGENCY

The following drastic consequences follow from the issue of the proclamation of emergency under Art. 352(1).

(a) There is a transformation in the behaviour of the Indian federalism. The normal fabric of the Centre-State relations undergoes a fundamental change. Parliament becomes empowered to make a law with respect to any matter in the State List, and such a law operates till six months after the proclamation ceases to operate [Art. 250].[18]

It thus means that the normal peace-time distribution of legislative powers is practically suspended so far as Parliament is concerned. The State Legislatures continue to function as usual and may make any law in their assigned area, viz., Lists II and III, but Parliament becomes empowered to legislate even in the exclusive State sphere (List II) as a result of the Proclamation of emergency.

Parliament can meet the emergency by passing any law that it may regard necessary without being trammelled by the scheme of distribution of powers [Art. 250(1)], and a Central law would override a State law even with respect to a matter in the State List [Art. 251].[19] Article 359 provides for suspension of the enforcement of the rights conferred by Part III during emergencies. However, by the Constitution (Forty-fourth Amendment) Act, 1978, it has been provided that

---

17. See, Ch. III, Sec. B(d), supra.
18. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
19. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J.

even during emergencies, the enforcement of the rights under Articles 20 and 21 cannot be suspended.[20]

The life of a law made by Parliament which it would not be competent to enact, but for the issue of a proclamation of emergency, comes to an end to the extent of the emergency on the expiry of 6 months after the proclamation of emergency cases to operate, except for things done or omitted to be done before the expiry of this period [Art. 250(2)].

This provision means that a law enacted by Parliament during an emergency in the exclusive State sphere ceases to exist six months after the emergency comes to end. This means that six months after the ending of the emergency, the normal scheme of distribution of legislative powers is fully restored.

(b) Further, the Centre becomes entitled to give directions to a State as to the manner in which it is to exercise its executive power [Art. 353(a)]. Since Parliament can make a law even in the exclusive State field, it means that the Centre can give directions even in the area normally allotted to the States.[21] Parliament may confer powers and impose duties upon the Centre or its officers and authorities even though the law pertains to a matter not in the Union List [Art. 353(b)].

(c) When emergency is declared not in the whole of India but only in a part of India, the executive power of the Centre to give directions, and the power of Parliament to make laws as mentioned above, extend not only to the State in which the territory under emergency lies, but also to any other State "if and so far as the security of India or any part of the territory thereof is threatened by activities in or in relation to the part of the territory of India in which the Proclamation of Emergency is in operation" [Proviso to Art. 353].

This provision means that in such a case, directions may be issued by the Centre to the States which are not included in the Proclamation of Emergency. This provision has been inserted in the Constitution in order to make emergency effective in the area where it has been imposed, by restricting undesirable activities in the adjoining areas. Miscreants could not be allowed to take advantage of the fact that the Proclamation does not relate to the particular spot where such activities are, for the time being, being carried on.

(d) While the proclamation of emergency is in operation, the President may by order direct that any provision (Arts. 268 to 279) relating to the distribution of revenue between the Centre and the States,[22] shall take effect subject to such exceptions or modifications as he thinks fit [Art. 354(1)].

This provision frees the Centre from its obligation to transfer revenue to the States so that its own financial capacity remains unimpaired to deal with the emergency.

An order suspending distribution of revenue is to be laid before both Houses of Parliament, [Art. 354(2)] and it would not remain in force beyond the end of the financial year in which the proclamation of emergency ceases to operate [Art. 354(1)].

---

20. See infra. See also I.R. Coelho v. State of T.N., (2007) 2 SCC 1, at page 109 : AIR 2007 SC 861.
21. See, Supra, Ch. XII, for these provisions.
22. See, Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. K, for these provisions.

(e) During an emergency, Parliament can also levy any tax which ordinarily falls in the State List [Art. 250].[23]

Thus, although the State Governments continue to operate, the Central Government becomes omnipotent and the normal distribution of legislative, executive and taxing powers, and the scheme of distribution of revenue between the Centre and the States, all are undone so far as the Centre is concerned. The reason is that during an emergency, the Central financial needs become greater than its peace-time commitments and, therefore, the normal financial arrangements between the Centre and the States cannot continue to function. The war-time experiences of Canada and Australia will bear out the wisdom of these provisions. In both these countries, the Centre had to exclude the States from the field of Income-tax.[24]

(f) As has already been pointed out, during the operation of the proclamation of emergency, the life of the Lok Sabha may be extended beyond its normal five year period by Parliament by law for a year each time, up to a period not extending beyond six months after the proclamation of emergency ceases to operate.[25]

Parliament continues to function normally during the emergency. However, to avoid any confusion which might arise from holding fresh elections during the period of the emergency, if the life of Lok Sabha comes to an end, this provision enables the same to be extended for the period of emergency.

(g) Parliament may by law extend the life of the State Legislatures by one year each time during an emergency, subject to a maximum period of six months after the emergency ceases to operate [Proviso to Art. 172].[26]

(h) The proclamation of emergency also affects the operation of the Fundamental Rights. The matter has been discussed in detail in another part of the book.[27]

(c) EMERGENCY PROVISIONS IN OTHER CONSTITUTIONS

The kind of emergency provisions as exist in the Indian Constitution are not to be found in the U.S.A., Canada and Australia, and at first sight may even appear to be drastic and out of place in a democratic and federal country. But it is not entirely so if the matter is probed into somewhat deeply and is viewed in the light of adjustments and developments which come about in other federations under the impact of an emergency like war when these federations undergo a kind of a silent metamorphosis.

Federalism, says DICEY, is a weak government because of the distribution of powers between the Centre and the units, but the war-time experiences of the U.S.A., Canada and Australia have shown that this is not necessarily so and that a federation can very well stand the test of time. As CORWIN has asserted, "Federalism as a system of counterpoise is no longer viable in the field of war-making," and that there is "incompatibility between the requirements of total war and principles thus far deemed to be fundamental to government under the Constitution".[28]

---

23. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J; Ch. XI, Secs. C, D, E.
24. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. I.
25. Proviso to Art. 83(2); supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(c).
26. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(ii).
27. Infra Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.
28. TOTAL WAR AND THE CONSTITUTION, 70, 130.

These federations have faced the emergency of two world wars [1911-14 and 1939-45]. In the U.S.A. and Australia, the emergency was met by the courts giving an expansive and liberal interpretation to the 'war' or the 'defence' power of the Centre and, thus, giving it a greater area of operation than its peace-time ambit so as to enable it to do all those things which are necessary for the safety of the country, or the effective prosecution of war.[29]

In Canada, the 'general power' of the Centre was interpreted by the courts broadly and so the Centre became more powerful during the war-time than it would be in the peace-time.[30]

During the war crisis, the Constitutions of the U.S.A., Canada and Australia functioned very differently from their normal peace-time behaviour. As WHEARE points out:[31]

> "While it is the essence of federalism to be pluralistic, it is the essence of the war power to be unitary, to be centralised and regimented, to be, in the modern word, 'totalitarian'. There is an immediate contrast between the multiplicity of federalism with its divisions of authority, and the unity necessary if war is to be conducted efficiently."

And, further, he observes:[32]

> "War leads to the transformation of a federal government into a unified state, with its plurality and multiplicity of jurisdictions co-ordinated for the unitary and totalitarian process of war."

The Indian Constitution seeks to achieve the same result in the area of federalism but in a different way. In the three foreign constitutions, the final word rests with the courts to decide whether a particular act of the Centre is justifiable under the 'war', 'defence' or 'emergency' power. Thus, necessary adjustments in the Centre-State power balance in response to the emergency are effectuated through the process of judicial interpretation. This, however, is a somewhat uncertain process as one cannot be sure which way a judicial decision may go in a particular disputed fact-situation, and the area of operation of the Centre depends on the view the courts take at the time. In India, on the other hand, the method provided to meet an emergency is more overt, more direct, and simpler because it depends on the Central executive issuing the necessary proclamation, and the incidents flowing therefrom are settled by the Constitution itself without making them dependent on the judicial attitude or inter-pretation.

A reason underlying the Indian approach may be that owing to the elaborate nature of the distribution of powers, there was not much room left for the judiciary to make necessary adjustments in emergency situations. Moreover, the Indian Constitution envisages certain emergency situations which are not to be found in the three federal constitutions, e.g., a financial emergency. But it needs to be underlined that the powers of the Centre in the three other federations do not extend to such an extent as they do in India whereas peace-time federalism undergoes a drastic change.

---

29. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. L.
30. Ibid. Also see, MURPHY, The War Power of the Dominion, 30 Can B.R. 791, 798 (1952).
31. FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, 197, (1953).
32. Ibid., at 220.

Also, in the other federations, the powers of the Centre during emergency extend on sufferance of the judiciary. The courts have to agree to what extent the Centre can expand its powers. This is, therefore, a built-in control mechanism. In India, the control mechanism over the executive and the Parliament is rather weak during an emergency, as it rests, primarily, with Parliament and, secondarily, with the judiciary.

(d) INVOCATION OF ART. 352

Article 352 has been invoked three times so far.

A proclamation of emergency was issued under Art. 352, for the first time, on October 26, 1962, in the wake of conflict with China. It remained in force during the Indo-Pakistan conflict in 1965, and was revoked only in January, 1968.

Emergency was proclaimed again in December, 1971, as a result of the Indo-Pakistan dispute, on the ground of external aggression.

While the 1971 proclamation was still effective, another proclamation was issued on June 26, 1975. This time the proclamation was issued on the ground of "Internal disturbance" threatening the security of India. Both these proclamations were revoked in March, 1977. Thus, from June 26, 1975 to March, 1977, two emergency proclamations were in force simultaneously.

The proclamation of 1975 on the ground of internal disturbance proved to be the most controversial. There was violation of the Fundamental Rights of the people on a large scale; drastic press censorship was imposed. A large number of persons were put in preventive detention.[33] The reasons for imposing the emergency were explained by the Central Government in a White Paper, dated July 21, 1975, and the two Houses of Parliament approved the proclamation on the same day. The general public perception was that issuing of this proclamation amounted to misuse of power on the part of the Central Government of the day insofar as there was no real emergency. The public reaction to the proclamation was so intense that when elections were held in 1977 for the Lok Sabha after the proclamation ceased to exist, the Congress Party, which was responsible for the proclamation, lost its majority and the Janata Government came to power.

The Janata Government appointed the Shah Commission to probe into the circumstances which led to the declaration of the emergency in 1975. This Commission in its report held that there was no evidence of any circumstances which could warrant the declaration of the emergency in 1975. There was no unusual event, or even a tendency in that direction, to justify the imposition of the emergency. There was no threat at all to the well-being of the nation from external or internal sources.

One of the direct results of the proclamation of the emergency in 1975 was the amendment of Art. 352 by the 44th Constitutional Amendment so as to introduce some more safeguards therein against any unwarranted declaration of emergency in future.[34] The idea underlying the 44th Constitutional Amendment is that it ought to be ensured that what happened in 1975 is not repeated in future.

---

33. For discussion on this aspect, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.

34. For provisions of this Constitutional Amendment, see infra Ch. XLII; also see, supra, Sec. B.

C. CENTRE'S DUTY TO PROTECT THE STATES

Article 355 imposes a twofold duty on the Centre:—

(i) to protect every State against external aggression and internal disturbance, and

(ii) to ensure that the government of every State is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.

The two limbs of Art. 355 are not interdependent as constitutional break-down can take place in a State even without there being a situation of 'external agression" or "internal disturbance".

A provision of this type is to be found in other federal constitutions as well. The American Constitution places a duty on the Central Government to guarantee to every State a Republican form of government and to protect a State against invasion, and, on application of the State Legislature, or, of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence.[35] A vast potential is rooted in this clause. This clause does not mention the manner in which the guarantee as regards the Republican form of Government may be enforced in a State.

S. 119 of the Australian Constitution provides in express terms that the Centre shall protect every State against invasion, and, on application of the State Executive, against domestic violence.

An important distinction between the Australian and the American provisions, on the one hand, and the Indian provision, on the other, is that while, in the former, application by the State to the Centre is necessary for protection against domestic violence, no such condition is laid down in India.

The first limb of Art. 355, that of protecting the States, does not stipulate that a State should request the Centre before it could send its forces into a State to counter the breakdown of law and order therein. On the other hand, the parallel provisions, as stated above, in other federations, do stipulate that request from the State is necessary to protect it against domestic violence.

The U.S. Supreme Court has, however, held that if internal disturbance in any State interfered with the operation of the National Government itself, or with the movement of inter-State commerce, the Centre can send force on its own initiative, without waiting for the application of the State authorities.[36] As the Court said, "the entire strength of the Nation may be used to enforce in any part of the land, the full and free exercise of all national powers and security of all rights entrusted by the Constitution to its care." After this ruling the requirement of an application by the affected State for aid for suppression of internal violence has lost its importance. In 1963, the Central Government in the U.S.A. did not hesitate to deploy the national militia in Little Rock to quell racial disturbances, and to enforce the decisions of the Supreme Court on racial integration. This was done very much against the wishes of the State concerned.[37]

---

35. Art. IV, Sec. 4.
36. In Re Debs., 158 US 564 (1895).
37. KELLY & HARBINSON, THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION, 864.

Under Art. 355, mentioned above, the obligation of the Centre to protect a State arises in the following three situations:

(i) external aggression;

(ii) internal disturbance, and

(iii) when the State Government cannot be carried on in accordance with the Constitution.

The word "aggression" has been construed to be a word of very wide import not limited only to war but as comprising many other acts which cannot be termed as war. A "bloodless aggression from a vast and incessant flow of millions of human beings forced to flee into another State" could constitute aggression under Article 355. Thus, it was found that the State of Assam is facing "external aggression and internal disturbance" on account of large-scale illegal migration of Bangladeshi nationals[38]

Article 355 uses the term "internal disturbance", while Art. 352 uses the term "armed rebellion". The term "armed rebellion" is narrower in scope than "internal disturbance" which is certainly broader. This means that a mere "internal disturbance" short of armed rebellion cannot justify a proclamation under Art. 352. Further, Art. 356 only talks of "breakdown of constitutional government in the State. This means that mere "internal disturbance" does not justify a proclamation under Art. 356 unless it results in the constitutional breakdown in the State.[39]

In India, law and order is a State subject[40] and, therefore, Central intervention under Art. 355 would be justifiable only in case of aggravated form of disturbance, which a State finds beyond its means to control. Although not laid down in the Constitution, a convention has arisen that ordinarily the Centre sends help to a State on request by the State Government. In view of the specific constitutional obligation placed on the Centre, it will be unjustifiable for the Centre to refuse to help a State when requested by it. It cannot, however, be asserted that the Centre shall never intervene in a State suo motu without its request, though it may be a difficult question to decide when it would do so. The final decision appears to rest with the Centre. The controversy between the Centre and some of the States regarding deployment of the Central Reserve Police to protect Central Government property in these States without consulting them has already been referred to.[41]

To get over these problems, the 42nd Amendment of the Constitution added a new provision, Art. 257A, into the Constitution enabling the Centre to deploy any armed forces of the Union, or any other force under its control, for dealing with any grave situation of law and order in any State. Any such force had to act subject to the control and directions of the Centre and not of the concerned State Government.

Under Art. 257A, the Centre could act without the concurrence of the concerned State Government. However, the Law Minister gave an assurance on the

---

38. Sarbananda Sonowal v. Union of India, (2005) 5 SCC 665, at page 709 : AIR 2005 SC 2920.
39. For Art. 356, see, infra, Sec. D.
40. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
41. Supra, Ch. XII.

floor of Parliament that the power under Art. 257A would be used only in exceptional situations and in consultation with the concerned State Government. To give full effect to Art. 257A, some changes were made in the legislative entries in the three Lists. A new entry, 2A, was added to List I to the following effect:

> "2A: Deployment of any armed force of the Union or any other force subject to the control of the Union or any contingent or unit thereof in any State in aid of the civil power; powers, jurisdiction, privileges and liabilities of the members of such forces while on such deployment."

Consequent changes were made in entries 1 and 2 of List II to exclude any such force from the purview of the States.[42]

Article 257A raised a good deal of controversy and was vehemently criticised. The States regarded it as causing diminution in their autonomy. The 44th Amendment, therefore, repealed Art. 257A, but entry 2A still remains a part of List I, giving legislative and executive power to take necessary action to deploy armed forces in a State in aid of civil power. This power vested in the Centre can be justified with reference to Art. 355.

Also, the fact that Art. 352 permits declaration of emergency in a part of the country because of armed rebellion means that the Centre has to take all possible steps necessary to maintain law and order in any part of the country if there is a serious breakdown thereof. It appears that even under entry 2A, List I, the Centre is entitled to deploy forces suo motu in a State to put down internal disturbance in a State and restore peace therein.

The words "in aid of the civil power" in entry 2A mean in aid of State instrumentalities responsible for maintenance of law and order. Thus, the Centre uses its forces to help the law enforcing authorites in the State. But the above-mentioned words do not necessarily imply that the Centre cannot introduce its forces, if need be there, without the request of the State. If there is serious breakdown of law and order in a State, the Centre will be justified to send its forces to meet the situation without receiving any State request for the purpose. This result emerges by reading entry 2A, List I, along with Art. 355.

Article 355 also imposes a duty on the Centre "to ensure that the government of every State is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution". The exact significance of this provision is not clear. It is in fulfilment of this obligation that the Centre takes over the Government of a State (Art. 356) in case of breakdown of the constitutional machinery therein.[43]

Recently, in the notable decision in Sarbananda Sonowal, the Supreme Court held that since the State of Assam is facing "external aggression and internal disturbance" on account of large-scale illegal migration of Bangladeshi nationals, it was the duty of the Union of India to take all measures for protection of the State of Assam from such external aggression and internal disturbance as enjoined in Article 355 of the Constitution. The Illegal Migrants (Determination by Tribunals) Act, 1983 (Act 39 of 1983) was held to be ineffective in comparison to the Foreigners Act, 1946 in dealing with the influx of illegal immigration from Bangladesh. Therefore, the Court struck down the Illegal Migrants (Determination by Tribunals) Act, 1983 (Act 39 of 1983) as being ultra vires the Constitution as it "clearly negated the constitutional mandate contained in Article 355".[44]

---

42. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D and E .
43. See, Sec. D, infra.

A parallel to this provision is to be found in the American Constitution which places the Centre under a duty to maintain the republican form of the government in each State,[45] or in the provision in the Australian Constitution which provides that the central executive power extends to the execution and maintenance of the Constitution.[46] There is, however, no specific provision in any of the three federal constitutions enabling the Centre to take over the Government of a State in case of breakdown of the constitutional machinery therein. The Indian provision stipulates, in essence, that the form of the government prescribed in the Constitution must be maintained in the States.

INQUIRY INTO COMPLAINTS AGAINST STATE CHIEF MINISTERS

An interesting and significant question arising out of the obligation of the Centre to ensure that a State Government is carried on in accordance with the Constitution is whether the Centre can take cognisance of complaints made from time to time regarding the deeds of omission or commission, bordering on corruption, against State Chief Ministers.

It has been a common feature of the Indian political life that such complaints are usually made to the Centre against State Chief Ministers. Whether the Centre should take cognisance of these charges, or leave the matter to the State Government concerned?

The difficulty in following the second course is that justice is not seen to have been done when charges against the Chief Minister are referred to the very Chief Minister against whom they have been made. If no action is taken then people are bound to lose faith in the democratic system of government based on rule of law. On the other hand, if the Centre intervenes, it may be accused of interfering too much in State matters and its bona fides may become suspect if the parties controlling the State and the Centre happen to be of different political complexion.

On several occasions, the Centre has moved against the State Chief Ministers. It appointed a commission of enquiry to go into certain charges against the Chief Minister of Punjab who later resigned because of an adverse report by the commission.[47] Then, the Chief Minister of Orissa resigned when a committee of the Central Cabinet held that he had been guilty of administrative impropriety. In these cases, matters were somewhat easy because all belonged to one and the same party, viz., the Congress Party. But things may be very difficult when the Central and the State Governments belong to different political parties. The Centre can easily be accused of political motives in such a situation.

In 1973, a centrally appointed commission, consisting of a Judge of the Supreme Court, was appointed to enquire into some complaints against the members of the Karunanidhi Ministry in Tamil Nadu which was dismissed earlier by the President under Art. 356.[48] The Chief Minister had earlier asserted on the 44. Supra at p. 716; See further Sarbananda Sonowal (II) v. Union of India, (2007) 1 SCC 174 : (2006) 13 SCALE 33.

---

45. Art. IV, Sec. 4.
46. Sec. 61.
47. A.K. CHANDA, Federalism in India, 127-33.
48. For Art. 356, see below, Sec. D.
Also see, infra, pp. 993-994.

floor of the State Legislature that, under the Constitution, the Centre had no right to interfere in the powers conferred on the State under List II. The State cabinet was responsible only to the State Assembly which was supreme in so far as the affairs of the State were concerned.[49] These arguments did not, however, prevail with the Centre. Later the legality and constitutionality of the appointment of the commission was challenged in the Supreme Court but the Court upheld the same.[50]

On the question of ministerial corruption, it may be worthwhile to take note of the following:

(1) On several occasions, the State governments have appointed enquiry commissions to probe into allegations of corruption and misuse of power against their ex-ministers and ex-chief ministers. The legality and constitutionality of appointing such commissions has been judicially upheld in several cases.[51] But nothing concrete appears to have been achieved by such an exercise as no conviction has ever resulted as a result of the reports of these commissions.

(2) For the first time, in 1984, a State minister was dismissed from office in Andhra Pradesh on the charge of corruption.[52]

(3) A very significant chapter has been added to the legal and constitutional history of India by the criminal prosecution of A.R. Antulay, ex-Chief Minister of Maharashtra, under the Prevention of Corruption Act on a private complaint. The Supreme Court ruled that a private citizen can launch a prosecution against the ex-Chief Minister on charges of corruption.[53]

Earlier, the Governor of Maharashtra had given permission to launch the prosecution. But a crucial question was raised during the trial: whether an M.L.A. was a public servant and whether the permission of the legislature concerned would be necessary to prosecute him? The Supreme Court had ruled that an M.L.A. was not a public servant under S. 21 of the I.P.C., and, therefore, the question which authority must give sanction to prosecute him was merely an academic one.[54] But the Court has now changed its view on this question.[55]

In 1977, the Central Government appointed a commission of inquiry under S. 3 of the Commission of Inquiry Act to probe into certain allegations of corruption, favouritism and nepotism against the Chief Minister and a few Ministers of the State of Karnataka.[56] The State filed a suit in the Supreme Court under Art.

---

49. The Times of India, 16-12-1972.

50. M. Karunanidhi v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 898 : (1979) 3 SCC 431; supra, Ch. X. Sec. H.

51. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Bakshi Gulam Mohamed, AIR 1967 SC 122 : 1966 Supp SCR 401; Krishna Ballabh Sahay v. Commission of Inquiry, AIR 1969 SC 258 : (1969) 1 SCR 385; P.V. Jagannath Rao v. State of Orissa, AIR 1969 SC 215 : (1968) 3 SCR 789.
Also see, BHARATIYA, Central Inquiry of State Ministers' Accountability, (1976) 18 JILI 56.
For the text of some of these cases, and author's comments thereon, see, JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, III.

52. The Overseas Hindustan Times, dated 3-3-1984.

53. A.R. Antulay v. R.S. Nayak, AIR 1984 SC 718 : (1984) 2 SCC 500.

54. R.S. Nayak v. A.R. Antulay, AIR 1984 SC 684 : (1984) 2 SCC 183.

55. P. V. Narasimha Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1998 SC 2120 : (1998) 4 SCC 626.
Also, supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(i)(a).

56. The Central Government belonged to the Janata Party while the Congress Party was in power in the State. The Chief Minister at the time was Devraj Urs.

131 of the Constitution[57] for a declaration that the appointment of such an inquiry commission was illegal and ultra vires. An important question raised was whether the Centre could appoint a commission of inquiry to probe into the allegations of corruption and misuse of power by the State Ministers, and whether S. 3 of the Commissions of Inquiry Act was constitutional?

The Supreme Court ruled in Karnataka v. Union of India[58] (6 : 1) that the appointment of the inquiry commission was valid and that S. 3 of the Inquiry Commission Act under which the commission was appointed was constitutional. The Court argued that the commission of inquiry is a fact-finding body having no power to pronounce a binding or definitive judgment. Its function is to ascertain facts, or to establish responsibility of Ministers for particular decisions. Therefore, the appointment of an inquiry commission to probe into allegations of corruption, etc., against the State Ministers does not constitute interference with the executive functions of the State Government. Such an inquiry commission does not raise directly or indirectly the subject of Centre-State relationship. When the Centre takes some action on the commission's report, then will be the time to assess the constitutional validity of what the Centre proposes to do.

Parliament has power to enact the Commission of Inquiry Act under entries 94 of List I and 45 of List III, read with entry 97 of List I,[59] and the Central Government has the executive power to appoint a commission to inquire into matters relating to the entries in List II. A justification for appointment of such an inquiry commission can be found in Art. 356. Whether a State Government or its Chief Minister is or is not carrying out the trust placed in their hands so as to determine whether use of power under Art. 356 is called for or not is certainly a matter lying within the Centre's power and is also a matter of public importance as envisaged by S. 3 of the Act in question.

The Indian Federalism has a "strong unitary bias" and the Central Government has powers to 'supervise', and even to supersede, in certain circumstances, a State Government temporarily to restore normalcy or to inject honesty and integrity into the State administration where these essentials of good government may be lacking.

Over a period of time, the Courts have, in a sense, facilitated this "unitary bias" as far as allegations of corruption against Chief Ministers of a State are concerned. In M.C. Mehta v. Union of India,[60] the CBI was directed to take appropriate steps for holding an investigation against the Chief Minister of Uttar Pradesh, Ms Mayawati. The CBI was also directed upon conclusion of the inquiry to submit a self-contained note to the Chief Secretary to the Government of Uttar Pradesh as well as to the Cabinet Secretary, Union Government. Again in Vishwanath Chaturvedi (3) v. Union of India[61], the Court directed an enquiry by the CBI into alleged acquisition of wealth by Mulayam Singh Yadav, Chief Minister of Uttar Pradesh and to submit a report to the Union of India. On receipt of such report, the Union of India was permitted to take further steps depending upon the outcome of the preliminary enquiry.

---

57. Supra, Ch IV, Sec. C(iii)(b).
58. AIR 1978 SC 68 : (1977) 4 SCC 608.
59. Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Justice Tendolkar, AIR 1958 SC 538 : 1959 SCR 279; supra, Ch. X, Sec. D, Jain, Cases, Vol. III.
60. (2003) 8 SCC 696, at page 703 : AIR 2004 SC 800.
61. (2007) 4 SCC 380, at page 394 : (2007) 4 JT 144.

The doctrine of 'implied prohibitions' has been rejected by the Supreme Court and is not applicable in India.[62]

The doctrine of collective responsibility of the State Ministers to the State Legislature does not give them any immunity from such an inquiry.[63] Collective responsibility represents ministerial accountability to the legislature. If a minister uses his office as a cloak for corruption, nepotism, or favouritism the entire council of ministers could not be held collectively responsible to the legislature. Appointment of the commission does not make ministers less answerable to the legislature. Maintenance of honesty and integrity in the State administration is democratic and not anti-democratic.

KAILASAM, J., alone ruled against the inquiry on the ground that it would impinge on the right of the State to function in its limited sphere allowed to it by the Constitution. According to his ruling: "As there is no specific Article in the Constitution enabling the Union Government to cause an inquiry into the governmental functions of the State the power cannot be assumed by ordinary legislation but resort must be had to a constitutional amendment." He also stated that the word 'inquiries' in entry 45, List III,[64] should not be given a wide meaning as conferring on the Union and the State Governments powers to enact a provision to embark on an enquiry as to the misuse of governmental powers by the other.

One interesting development in this matter was that anticipating the appointment of an inquiry commission by the Centre, the State Government had itself appointed an inquiry commission of its own. Thus, two commissions, one Central and one State, came into existence to probe into the conduct of the State Ministers. Under S. 3(b) of the Commissions of Inquiry Act, the Centre could not appoint a commission of inquiry into a matter which was already the subject of inquiry by a State-appointed commission. Thus, the question was whether the Central Commission could function after the State Commission had been appointed. The Supreme Court concluded that both the Commissions could continue to function as they were to inquire into different matters.

Although the Supreme Court referred to Art. 356 as a justification for appointing the said commission by the Centre, it appears to be more appropriate to relate such an inquiry commission to Art. 355 which obligates the Centre to ensure that State Governments are carried on in accordance with the constitutional provisions. Certainly a corrupt State Government cannot be regarded as a government being carried on in accordance with the Constitution. In the opinion of the author, even Art. 356 emanates from Art. 355, and not vice versa.

D. FAILURE OF CONSTITUTIONAL MACHINERY IN A STATE

Articles 356 and 357 provide for meeting a situation arising from the failure of the constitutional machinery in a State.[65]

---

62. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii).
63. Supra, Ch VII, Sec. B.
64. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
65. SHETTY, President's Power under Art. 356 of the Constitution—Theory and Practice, in ILI, CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENTS SINCE INDEPENDENCE, 335 (1975), ILI, PRESIDENT'S RULE IN THE STATES; REPORT OF THE SARKARIA COMMISSION.

If the President, on receipt of a report from the Governor of a State or otherwise, is 'satisfied' that a situation has arisen in which the Government of the State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, the President may by proclamation—

(a) assume to himself all or any of the functions of the State Government, or the powers of the Governor, or any body or authority in the State other than the State Legislature;

(b) declare that the powers of the State Legislature are to be exercised by Parliament;

(c) make such incidental provisions as may appear to him to be necessary or desirable for giving effect to the provisions of the proclamation; the President may even suspend in whole or in part the provisions of the Constitution relating to any body or authority in the State [Art. 356(1)].

The President is not, however, authorised to assume the powers of the High Court, or to suspend any constitutional provision pertaining to it [Proviso to Art. 356(1)]. Such a proclamation may be revoked or varied by a subsequent proclamation [Art. 356(2)].

Every proclamation under Art. 356(1) is to be laid before each House of Parliament, and it ceases to operate (except the one which revokes the earlier one), after two months, unless in the meantime, it has been approved by resolutions of both Houses of Parliament [Art. 356(3)]. Parliament can thus discuss at this time whether the proclamation should or should not have been made by the Central Government.[66]

If at the time of issuing the proclamation (other than revoking an earlier proclamation), or thereafter, the Lok Sabha is dissolved without approving it, and if the Rajya Sabha approves the proclamation, then it ceases to operate thirty days after the date on which the Lok Sabha first sits after the general elections unless a resolution approving the proclamation is passed by it before that period.[67]

The normal operative period for the proclamation is six months from the last of the days on which the Houses pass resolutions approving the same. The life of the proclamation may be extended by six months each time by both Houses passing resolutions approving its continuance. In this way, each time Parliament ratifies the proclamation, its life is extended for another six months.[68]

In case Lok Sabha is dissolved within any period of six months, the proclamation remains in force for thirty days from the date the Lok Sabha first sits after its reconstitution within which period it can pass the necessary resolution. The Rajya Sabha should, however, pass the necessary resolution within the stipulated period.[69]

The idea behind periodic parliamentary ratification of continuance of the proclamation under Art. 356 is to afford an opportunity to Parliament to review

---

66. But the power under Article 356 is not legislative in character. See Rameshwar Prasad (VI) v. Union of India, (2006) 2 SCC 1, at page 123 : AIR 2006 SC 980.

67. Proviso to Art. 356(3).

68. The 42nd Amendment had raised the period of six months to one year. Thus, once approved by the two Houses, the proclamation could remain in force for one year. The Forty-fourth Amendment again reduced this period to six months : See, infra, Ch. XLII.

69. Second Proviso to Art. 356(4).

for itself the situation prevailing in the concerned State so that the Central Executive does not feel free to keep the proclamation in force longer than what may be absolutely necessary. The Central Government is responsible and accountable for all its actions to Parliament. A safeguard against any misuse of power by the Executive is that the ultimate authority to decide whether a proclamation under Art. 356 is to be continued or not lies in Parliament.

The maximum period for which a proclamation can remain in force in a State is three years.[70] Thereafter, the President's rule must come to an end, and the normal constitutional machinery restored in the State.

The Forty-fourth Amendment has introduced a new provision to put restraint on the power of Parliament to extend a proclamation issued under Art. 356 beyond one year. No House of Parliament is to pass a resolution approving continuance of such a proclamation beyond one year unless the following two conditions are satisfied:

(i) there is a proclamation of emergency (under Art. 352) in operation at the time of passing of such a resolution in the whole of India, or the concerned State, or a part of the State; and

(ii) the Election Commission certifies that the continuance in force of the proclamation under Art. 356 during the period specified in such resolution is necessary on account of difficulties in holding general elections to the concerned State Legislative Assembly.[71]

The effect of the clause is that normally a proclamation under Art. 356 remains in force in a State for one year at the most, but, under special circumstances mentioned above, it can remain in force up to three years which is the absolute maximum ceiling.

From the above discussion, it appears that a proclamation issued under Art. 356(1) expires in any of the following modes:

(a) After two months of its making if it is not presented for approval before both Houses of Parliament [Art. 356(3)].

(b) Even before two months, if the proclamation on presentation to the Houses of Parliament fails to get approval from any House [Art. 356(3)].

(c) After 6 months from the date of the proclamation, in case no further resolution is passed by the House of Parliament after the passage of the initial resolution approving the said proclamation [Art. 356(4)].

(d) After the expiry of 6 months from the passage of the last resolution of approval passed by the two Houses of Parliament subject to an overall maximum limit of 3 years from the date of the proclamation. Continuance of the proclamation beyond one year is subject to the fulfilment of the conditions laid down in Art. 356(5), and mentioned above.

(e) The date on which the President issues a proclamation of revocation [Art. 356(2)].

---

70. First Proviso to Art. 356(4).

71. Art. 356(5).

For the 44th Amendment of the Constitution, see, Ch. XLII, infra.

Under Art. 356(1), the President acts on a report of the Governor, or on information received otherwise. In view of the fact that Art. 355 imposes an obligation upon the Centre to ensure that each State Government is carried on in accordance with the Constitution, and Art. 356 is designed to strengthen the hands of the Centre to discharge this obligation and to protect a State, the framers of the Constitution felt it necessary not to bind the Centre to act under Art. 356 merely on the Governor's report. A situation may develop in a State when, though the Governor may not make a report, the Centre may yet feel that its intervention has become necessary. The Centre thus has freedom to act even without the Governor's report when, on the basis of the facts within its knowledge, it thinks that it ought to act in fulfilment of its constitutional obligation.

The Governor makes his report under Art. 356(1) in his discretion. On the face of it, it may seem to be somewhat incongruous that the Governor, who as the constitutional head of the State, acts on the aid and advice of his Ministers, also reports against them to the President. This is a case of the Governor reporting against his own government. But, under the Constitution, the Governor has a dual capacity—he is the constitutional head as well as the Centre's representative in the State. He is appointed by the President and he takes the oath prescribed by Art. 159, to preserve, protect and defend the Constitution. It is this obligation which requires him to report to the President the acts of omission or commission of his Ministers which, in his opinion, have created the situation when the State Government cannot be carried on in accordance with the constitutional provisions and which, as the constitutional head, he is not able to check. Thus, the Governor acts as the head of the State as well as the holder of an independent constitutional office under oath to protect and preserve the Constitution.

(a) LEGISLATION FOR THE STATE

When a proclamation under Art. 356(1) declares that the powers of the State Legislature are to be exercised by or under the authority of Parliament, Parliament can then confer on the President the power of the State Legislature to make laws. The President may also be authorised by Parliament to delegate the power so conferred on him, to any other authority specified by him subject to such conditions as he may impose [Art. 357(1)(a)].

The President may authorise, when the Lok Sabha is not in session, expenditure from the State Consolidated Fund pending its sanction by Parliament [Art. 357(1)(c)].

A law made under these provisions by Parliament or the President, or the authority in which the power to make laws is vested under Art. 357(1)(a), may confer powers and impose duties upon the Union officers or authorities [Art. 357(1)(b)]. Such a law continues to have effect, to the extent it could not have been made but for the issue of the proclamation under Art. 356(1), even after the proclamation ceases. Such a law may, however, be altered, repealed or amended by the State Legislature [Art. 357(2)].

It is thus clear from the above that the life of a law made by Parliament or the President during the operation of Art. 356 proclamation is not co-terminus with the subsistence of the proclamation. The law does not come to an end automatically as soon as the proclamation is revoked. This provision means that though the power of the Union to make laws for the State concerned on the subject within the State List ceases as soon as the proclamation under Art. 356(1) comes to end, the laws made during the existence of the proclamation continue to remain in force until they are altered or repealed by the State Legislature. In other words, an action by the State Legislature is necessary to change these laws.

(b) ART. 356 V. ART. 352

Article 352 differs from Art. 356 in several material respects.

While Art. 352 restricts Central intervention to a situation of war, external aggression, or armed rebellion, Art. 356 applies to a situation of failure of constitutional machinery in a State. Art. 352 gives no authority to suspend the Constitution in a State. The State Governments and Legislatures continue to function normally and exercise the powers assigned to them under the Constitution. All that happens under Art. 352 is that the Centre gets concurrent powers of legislation in State matters and thus it can make the States follow a uniform all-India policy. On the other hand, under Art. 356, the State Legislature ceases to function as it is either dissolved or kept in suspended animation. Laws for the State are made by Parliament and the Governor administers the State on behalf of the President. Further, while Art. 352 affects Fundamental Rights,[72] Art. 356 does not.

Under Art. 352, the relationship of all the States with the Centre undergoes a change, but under Art. 356, the relationship of only one State (where the action is taken) with the Centre is affected.

The powers of the Centre under Art. 356 as well as under Art. 352 are rigorously controlled by the Constitution. The proclamation under Art. 356 is to be approved by Parliament first within two months, and thereafter every six months, and the maximum period for which it can remain in force is three years. On the other hand, a proclamation under Art. 352 has to be approved by Parliament within a month and thereafter every six months, but there is no maximum duration prescribed for the operation of such a proclamation.

Though the scope and purpose of Arts. 352 and 356 are very different, yet there may be a situation when Art. 356 may have to be invoked to effectuate Art. 352, e.g., when a State Government does not co-operate with the Centre in defence, or in quelling internal disturbance, or when it encourages the same.

(c) CONSEQUENCES OF INVOKING ART. 356

Article 356(1) has been invoked a number of times since the advent of the Constitution.[73] Reading Art. 356 along with Art. 357 a pattern has thus come into existence, whenever the Centre takes over a State Government. Hitherto, the Centre has acted only when the Governor has reported failure of the Constitutional machinery in the State and in no case has the Centre acted 'otherwise'. The Governor makes his report to the President in his discretion and he is under no constitutional obligation to act in this matter on the advice of the Council of Ministers.[74]

---

72. Infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.

73. President's rule has been imposed over a hundred times till 2000. See further Gopal Subramanium : Emergency Provisions Under the Constitution : Supreme but not infallible; Oxford.

74. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. C.

The proclamation issued by the President under Art. 356(1) is placed before Parliament. If it is expected to remain in force only for two months, then no further action is necessary. But if it is proposed to keep it in force for a longer period, it is to be ratified by both Houses when a discussion is held on the circumstances leading to the issue of the proclamation and on the advisability or otherwise of the Central intervention.

Under Art. 356(1)(a), the President can assume to himself the powers of the Governor. One of the Governor's powers is to dissolve the Legislative Assembly.[75] Consequently, when the President issues a proclamation and assumes the Governor's powers, the power to dissolve the Assembly and hold fresh elections is automatically transferred to the President. Therefore, the Presidential proclamation may dissolve the State Legislature and arrangements for holding fresh elections are set afoot. But it is not inevitable to dissolve the State Legislature whenever a proclamation is issued. Several times, the State Legislature has been kept in suspended animation rather than dissolved.

In the meantime, Parliament becomes entitled to exercise the authority and the powers of the State Legislature whether it is suspended or dissolved. Parliament being a busy body finds it extremely burdensome to itself exercise the legislative power for the concerned State, and pass all the legislative measures needed for the State concerned. Necessary time would not be available to Parliament for the purpose and measures of all-India importance would be held up. Therefore, under Art. 357(1)(a), Parliament passes an Act and delegates the legislative power for the State concerned for the duration of the emergency to the President, i.e., the Central Executive. The President can then enact President's Acts for the State concerned whether Parliament is in session or not.

Each President's Act is laid before Parliament which may direct any modifications to be effected therein and the President would carry out the same by enacting an amending Act. Provision is usually made in the delegating Act for appointment of a Parliamentary Committee for consultation in the legislative work.[76] All members in Parliament, from the State concerned are appointed members of this committee.

As mentioned above, under Art. 356(1)(a), the President may assume to himself all or any function of the Sate Government and all or any of the powers exercisable by the Governor. Usually, the President, after assumption of the powers of the State Government, exercises these powers through the State Governor. The administration of the State, under the proclamation under Art. 356(1), is carried on by the State Governor as a delegate of the Centre. In effect, the Governor acts on the advice of the Union Ministry and not the State Ministry. The Governor becomes responsible to the Central Government which is responsible to Parliament.[77] The Council of Ministers in the State does not remain in office. It usually resigns suo motu in anticipation of the Centre's action. If it does not do so, it can be dismissed from office.

---

75. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. E; Ch. VII, Sec. C.

76. Non-consultation with the Committee before enacting the President's Act does not render the Act invalid. The words of the statute usually are: The President may 'whenever he considers it practicable' consult the Committee before enacting an Act for the concerned State.
Saiyedbhai Kaderbhai v. Saiyed Intajam Hussen, AIR 1981 Guj 154.

77. Badrinath v. Govt. of Tamil Nadu, (2000) 8 SCC 395, 413 : AIR 2000 SC 3243.

(d) WHEN IS ART. 356 INVOKED?

The sweep of the phrase, "the government of the State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution" in Art. 356(1) has indefinite connotations. Failure of the constitutional machinery in a State may arise because of various factors; these factors are diverse and imponderable. Nevertheless, some situations of the breakdown of the constitutional machinery may be as follows:

(1) No party in the Assembly has a majority in the State Legislative Assembly to be able to form the government.

(2) A government in office loses its majority due to defections and no alternative government can be formed.

(3) A government may have majority support in the House, but it may function in a manner subversive of the Constitution. As for example, it may promote fissiparous tendencies in the State.

(4) The State Government does not comply with the directions issued by the Central Government under various constitutional provisions.[78]

(5) Security of the State may be threatened by a widespread breakdown of law and order in the State.

(6) It may be debatable whether Art. 356(1) can be invoked when there are serious allegations of corruption against the Chief Minister and the Ministers in a State.

Reading Arts. 355 and 356 together, it can be argued plausibly that the constitutional machinery breaks down in the State when the government indulges in corruption.

Article 356 has been invoked in the State of Uttar Pradesh because it did not appear to be feasible to form a stable government. In the general elections held for the State Legislature, the public gave a fragmented verdict with no party having a majority in the House; and no party wanted to support any other party to form the government. The leader of the Samajwadi Party staked his claim as the single largest party to form the government. He claimed that he would prove his majority on the floor of the House. Implicit in the statement was the fact that being in power, it would be easier for him to engineer defections from the other parties. The Governor was not satisfied with his claim. On the recommendation of the State Governor, the Central Government imposed the President's rule in the State on March 9, 2002. This is an instance of President's rule being invoked in a State because it was not possible to form a viable government in the State due to the politically fragmented legislature.

In a number of cases, Central intervention has taken place in the States because of the instability of the State Governments. When the existing Ministry either resigns, or is defeated on the floor of the Legislature, and no viable alternative Ministry is in sight, the Centre takes over the State administration and carries it through the Governor. Accordingly, Art. 356(1) was invoked in 1951 in Punjab, in 1953 in Pepsu, in 1954 in Andhra, in 1956 in Travancore-Cochin and in 1961 in Orissa.

---

78. Supra, Ch. XII, Sec. E.

In 1966, consequent upon the Centre's decision to bifurcate the State of Punjab into the States of Punjab and Haryana, to smoothen the process of partition, the Ministry resigned and President's rule was imposed. The Legislature was not dissolved but suspended, for it was thought desirable that the Legislature of the composite State be broken into two parts so as to constitute the Legislatures of Punjab and Haryana till new Legislatures could be elected.

During the period 1967-69, Art. 356(1) had to be invoked rather frequently. The reason was that, in the wake of the fourth general election, there was a proliferation of political parties in the State Legislatures, and stable governments became very difficult. Parties with disparate programmes came together to form coalition governments but they could not stay in office for long because of internal tensions. In 1967, because of the difficulties in Ministry-making in Rajasthan, the State Legislature was suspended and Presidential rule imposed under Art. 356. After some time, normal machinery was restored when it became possible to instal a Ministry in office.

In 1968, due to instability of coalition Ministries, the Uttar Pradesh Legislature was first suspended and later dissolved. In 1968, the Bihar and Punjab Legislatures were dissolved under Art. 356 owing to Ministerial crisises.[79] In the same year, West Bengal Legislature had to be dissolved because its functioning became impossible due to the intransigent attitude of the Speaker.[80] In 1973, the Congress Ministry of Andhra Pradesh resigned on the advice of the Congress High Command, and Presidential rule imposed, so that the situation arising out of a public agitation for creation of a separate Telengana State could be adequately handled. The State Legislature was not dissolved but kept in suspended animation. It was revived when the Centre was able to find a political solution to the demand being raised.

In 1974, the Gujarat Assembly was dissolved following the resignation of the Ministry. Though the Ministry was in a majority in the Legislature, yet it left office because there was a wide spread public agitation against it. In November, 1975, Art. 356 was invoked in Uttar Pradesh when Bahuguna Ministry resigned. A new Ministry was installed in January, 1976. Gujarat was placed under the President's rule in March, 1976, when the Patel Ministry resigned after being defeated in the House on a budget demand. Such instances may be multiplied.

Invocation of Art. 356(1), in a situation mentioned above, becomes necessary, and at times, even inevitable. But use of Art. 356 becomes very controversial and questionable when a Ministry in a State having majority support in the State Legislature is dismissed from office for certain reasons. For the first time, such a situation arose in Kerala in 1959. In 1957, a Communist Ministry commanding a majority of two in the State Assembly of 127 members took office. Within two years, there was wide spread discontent and mass upsurge in the State against the policies of the Ministry. Law and order situation in the State practically broke down and there was every indication that the agitation might take a violent turn.

Accusations were made that the State Government was subverting the Constitution by transplanting party cells in police, administration and co-operatives in the State. The financial position of the State very much deteriorated. The Prime

---

79. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. C.
80. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. C; Ch. VII, Sec. B.

Minister advised the State Ministry to resign and dissolve the House so that fresh elections could be held, but the Ministry did not heed this advice. In the circumstances, on receipt of the Governor's report, the Centre invoked Art. 356, dismissed the State Ministry and dissolved the Legislature. After fresh elections were held to the State Legislature, a new State Government took office in early 1960. The proclamation thus remained in force for nearly six months.

The Kerala episode brought into sharp focus the question of the scope of Art. 356 and the circumstances under which it could be invoked. What is the significance of the words "in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution" in Arts. 355 and 356? Do these words mean merely the letter of the Constitution or include as well the democratic spirit, conventions and fundamental assumptions on which the Constitution is based?

On the one hand, it could be argued that since in Kerala there was a government in office enjoying the confidence of the majority in the Legislature, theoretically, the administration was being carried on in accordance with the 'provisions' of the Constitution. On the other hand, it could be argued that the words 'provisions, of the Constitution' should be interpreted not in a narrow literal sense to signify only the formal written words in the Constitution but also comprising the conventions, usages and the democratic spirit underlying the Constitution. If forms of the Constitution are used to subvert its spirit, then the Constitution can be regarded as having broken down in the State. As the Preamble to the Constitution declares India as a Sovereign Democratic Republic, subversion of democracy in any State may be regarded as being against the 'provisions' of the Constitution and action may be taken on that basis.[81]

The Communist Party characterized the Central Government's action as political intolerance on the part of the Congress Government at the Centre towards a Communist Government in a State. The Central Government justified its action on the ground that law and order had broken down, that Rule of Law and the Constitution had been subverted in the State, and that the action was inevitable if democratic institutions were to be protected from being destroyed. The Presidential proclamation was approved by Parliament by a huge majority.[82] In the context, therefore, Central intervention could not be characterised as unwarranted or unjustified.

It would be difficult to argue that the Centre should remain a passive spectator when the entire constitutional fabric is being subverted in a State. This would amount to a violation of Art. 355 on the part of the Central Government. Kerala, it may be noted, was a chronic case for some time as it fell under the President's rule several times. On September 10, 1964, again the President assumed the governance of the State, consequent upon the resignation of the Ministry. A general election held in March, 1965, again resulted in a fragmented House, with no prospect of a stable government. After consulting the party leaders, the Governor reported to the President that it was not possible to form the Council of Ministers in the State. The State Legislature was dissolved again and President's rule imposed. A writ petition challenging the Central action on the ground that the State Legislature could not have been dissolved without its meeting at all, was rejected by the Kerala High Court. The Court also rejected the contention that the action of the President was mala fide.[83]

81. See, Ch. I, supra.
82. See, REPORTS OF THE LOK SABHA DEBATES, Aug. 18-21, 1959.

Again in Haryana, in 1967, the Ministry in office was dismissed and the State Legislature dissolved because of large scale defections of members of the Assembly from one party to another. Defections reached to such a farcical level that about 20 members had defected 20 times, 6 members twice, 2 members thrice and 2 members four times.

The Governor in his report to the President pointed out that defections "had made a mockery of the Constitution and had brought democracy to ridicule," and that the State administration had been totally paralysed by frequent defections and change of loyalties by the legislators. The Ministry had sought to maintain itself precariously in power by creating too many Ministers to reward defectors which was "an abuse of constitutional power." In an Assembly of 79, thirty-seven members had defected one way or the other, some three or four times. With such large scale and frequent defections, it was impossible to find out whether the will of the majority in the legislature represented the will of the people. Central interference in these circumstances appears to be justifiable as it may be regarded as an attempt to discourage opportunistic politicians oscillating across the floor of the House without any principle but only for self-aggrandisement. The Ministry was seeking to maintain its majority in the House by dubious means, and it could not, therefore, be maintained that the State Government was being carried on in accordance with the Constitution.[84]

Another case of this type occurred in 1976, when the D.M.K. Ministry in Tamil Nadu was dismissed, the State Legislature dissolved, and President's rule imposed. The D.M.K. Ministry enjoyed a majority in the Assembly, but the Governor in his report charged the Ministry with corruption, maladministration, misuse of power for partisan ends, and misuse of emergency powers. The Governor also recommended the appointment of a high powered commission to enquire into the several serious allegations against the Ministry and the Ministers involved. The Central Government accordingly invoked Art. 356 and appointed an enquiry commission.[85]

A very dramatic invocation of Art. 356 occurred in 1977. In the general elections held for Lok Sabha in 1977, after the revocation of the emergency imposed in 1975, people gave vent to their anger against the imposition of the emergency. This led to a landslide victory of the Janata Party which formed the Central Government. The Congress Party was badly routed. There were at the time 9 Congress Party-ruled States. The Janata Government at the Centre invoked Art. 356 in April, 1977, and dismissed the 9 State Governments, dissolved the State Assemblies and held fresh elections thereto.

History repeated itself in 1980. Fresh elections were held for the Lok Sabha in 1980. As a result of the general elections held in that year, the Congress Party again secured majority in Lok Sabha. The Congress Party which had been routed in 1977 elections was victorious this time and formed its government at the Centre with Indira Gandhi as the Prime Minister. The Congress Government dismissed under Art. 356 the Janata Governments in nine States where there were 83. K.K. Aboo v. Union of India, AIR 1965 Ker 229.

84. This episode gave rise to a court case; see, footnote 11, Sec. E, infra.
85. Supra, Sec. C.

non-congress governments in office. These government were installed in office in 1977. The nine States were: Uttar Pradesh, Bihar, Tamil Nadu, Rajasthan, Madhya Pradesh, Maharashtra, Punjab, Orissa and Gujarat. These States were subjected to direct Central rule pending fresh elections. Now, the Congress Government at the Centre took the plea that the existing State Governments did no longer reflect the wishes of the electorate. It had the 1977 precedent to fall back upon to support its action.[86]

The propriety of the wholesale use of Art. 356 first in 1977, and again in 1980, has been widely questioned. These proclamations were not based on any report from the Governors of the States concerned. Commenting on the use of Art. 356(1) in a wholesale manner in these 18 cases, the Sarkaria Commission has observed:[87]

> "In our opinion, these 18 cases are typical instances of wholesale misuse of Art. 356 for political purposes, extraneous to the one for which the power has been conferred by the Constitution".

The fact is that the defeat of the party in power in a State in the election to the Lok Sabha cannot amount to the breakdown of constitutional machinery in the concerned State. The federal structure in India clearly envisages the situation of different political parties being in power in different States and at the Centre. Upto the year 2000, Art. 356 has been invoked as many as 100 times.

In April, 1992, the Governor of Nagaland dissolved the State Legislative Assembly on the advice of the then Chief Minister retaining him as the Chief Minister till fresh elections were held.

The Governor had done so in exercise of his power under Art. 174(2)(b) without consulting the Centre before taking such an action.[88] The Central Government did not approve of this action of the Governor. Accordingly, the Centre imposed the President's rule in the State under Art. 356 on April 2, and dismissed the Governor soon thereafter. The Centre's justification for taking the action was that the Chief Minister had already lost his majority in the Legislature when he advised the Governor to dissolve the House. The Opposition parties in Parliament described Centre's action as an attack on the federal character of the Constitution.

This episode does bring to the forefront two issues of crucial importance to the Indian federalism: (1) Is the Governor a constitutional authority in his own right or is he bound to seek the consent of the Centre before exercising the powers vested in him by the Constitution? (2) Use of Art. 356 in a State.

On the first question, theoretically speaking, as per the constitutional provisions, the Governor should be entitled to decide in his own judgment whether the powers vested in him by the Constitution should be exercised or not at a particular moment. Theoretically speaking, it should not be necessary for him to seek the Centre's consent to his proposed exercise of any such power. Therefore, in theory, in the instant case, the Governor may not have done anything wrong or improper in exercising his power under Art. 174 and dissolving the House. But, then, hitherto, the practice has developed in a different manner. Governors rarely

---

86. For comments on this case see: ILI, PRESIDENT'S RULE IN THE STATES, supra, Ch. III.
87. REPORT, 175.
88. See, Chs. VI, Sec. E and VII, Sec. C, supra.

act in their own judgment independently of the Centre's views. They usually act either at the behest of, or with the consent, express or implied, of the Centre.

On question No. 2, the Opposition parties criticised the use of Art. 356 in the State in the instant case. Presidential rule had been imposed by the Centre suo motu without any such recommendation having been made by the Governor. The State Government dismissed from office was a non-Congress Government and, therefore, use of Art. 356 in the instant case became a controversial matter. Centre's ostensible justification for imposing the President's rule was that it was no longer possible to carry on the administration in the State in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution as there was political instability in the State. An unsavoury aspect of the Nagaland party system has been that 40 MLAs out of the 60 member Assembly had changed their party affiliations some time or the other.

On December 6, 1992, the Ram Janmabhoomi—Babri Masjid disputed structure was demolished by the volunteers of the B.J.P. and its sister organisations. Consequently, the BJP Government in the State of U.P. resigned. The Central Government invoked Art. 356 and also dismissed the B.J.P. Governments in Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan and Himachal Pradesh, dissolved the Assemblies therein and issued proclamation under Art. 356(1) in respect of these States. This step taken by the Centre was supported by all the opposition parties in Parliament except the B.J.P. of course.[89]

The various episodes, mentioned above, show that the Centre takes a broad view of Art. 356 and feels justified in intervening in a State in case of constitutional breakdown, gross mismanagement of affairs or abuse of powers or perversion of democracy by a State government, and, at times, to promote the political interests of the political party in power at the Centre.

Theoretically, invocation of Art. 356 can be justified on the ground that temporarily a bigger democracy, viz., the Central Government takes over a smaller democracy, viz. the State Government. Parliament is a representative body elected on adult suffrage on an All India basis, in which the particular State in which Art. 356 is applied is also represented. Thus, in a way, under Art. 356, the whole of India becomes responsible for the good administration of one of its constituent parts. The State administration is run subject to the supervision of the Central Cabinet which is responsible to Parliament. Nevertheless, there is no gainsaying the fact that the power placed by Art. 356 in the hands of the Central Government is very significant and places a great responsibility on it, and inherent therein are the seeds of conflict between the Centre and the States, particularly, when the Central Government seeks to dismiss a State Ministry belonging to a different political party.

It may be that, at times, the Centre is motivated by political, rather than mere constitutional, considerations in using its power under Art. 356(1). The way the power is used is bound to have an abiding effect on the growth of the Indian Federalism, which envisages co-existence of governments of different political complexion. It is, therefore, extremely necessary that the power under Art. 356 is used with circumspection and in a non-partisan manner. Art. 356 is meant to be invoked not lightly to serve political ends, or to get rid of an inconvenient State

---

89. For further discussion on this episode see, the Bommai case, infra, Sec. E(b).

Government, but only in an extreme case of demonstrable breakdown of the Constitution in a State.

While it is not possible to exhaustively catalogue all the various situations when the constitutional provision can be justifiably invoked, some of these, however, appear to be: political breakdown in a State with no possibility of a stable Ministry taking office; breakdown of the law and order situation; gross mismanagement of affairs by a State Government; corruption or abuse of its powers; danger to national security; non-compliance of Central directives (Art. 365);[1] subversion of the Constitution, or of the democratic social fabric.[2] However, the ground of maladministration by a State Government enjoying majority is not available for invoking power under Article 356.[3] Restraints on the Centre to act under Art. 356 are the enlightened public opinion both within and outside Parliament, political realities of the situation, prudence and sagacity of the Central Government, the effectiveness of the Parliamentary control, and, ultimately, judicial review of the proclamation under Art. 356.[4]

There has been frequent criticism of the use of Art. 356. The purport of the criticism has been that, more often than not, Art. 356 has been misused by the political party in power at the Centre to promote its own political interests in the State rather than to meet the situation arising out of the breakdown of the constitutional machinery therein. It needs to be emphasized that in exercising this power, the Centre ought to be very careful otherwise an injury may be caused to the federal fabric which envisages different political parties being in power at the Centre and the States.

An alternative expedient to deal with the situation arising in a State from the Ministry losing confidence of the House is to invoke the Governor's power to dissolve the House, hold fresh elections and keep the Ministry in office in the meantime as a caretaker government.[5] This is the method which will have to be followed at the Centre, in case of a ministerial crisis because there is no constitutional provision for Presidential rule at the Centre such as there is for the States.[6] But, somehow, at the State level, political parties find it more acceptable to invoke Art. 356, rather than to take recourse to the other method, for the reason that no political party likes to see another political party in office when elections are being held in the State.

It may be pointed out that since the day Art. 356 was used for the first time by the Nehru Government in 1959 against the Communist Ministry in Kerala, use of Art. 356 has been a very controversial matter in India. The question of invocation of Art. 356 was looked into by the Sarkaria Commission which said in its report:[7]

> "Art. 356 should be used very sparingly, in extreme cases, as a measure of last resort, when all available alternatives fail to prevent or rectify a breakdown of constitutional machinery in the State. All attempts should be made to resolve

---

1. Supra, Ch. XII, Sec. E.
2. Because of the deteriorating law and order situation, President's rule was imposed in Punjab on Oct. 6, 1983. Through a constitutional amendment, the government was empowered to extend the President's rule in Punjab for one more year: supra.
Also see, Ch. XLII, infra.
3. Rameshwar Prasad (VI) v. Union of India ,(2006) 2 SCC 1, at page 129 : AIR 2006 SC 980.
4. See, Sec. E, infra on this point.
5. Supra, Ch. VI, E.
6. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A.
7. Report, 178.

the crisis at the State level before taking recourse to the provisions of Art. 356….."

Alternatives may be "dispensed with in a case of extreme urgency, where failure on the part of the Union to take immediate action under Art. 356 may lead to disastrous consequences."

The purpose of Art. 356 is that the Centre can take remedial action to put the State Government back in its place so that it can function according to the Constitution. Any misuse or abuse of power by the Central Government will damage the fabric of federalism.

In the present day political configuration at the Centre, it seems that the invocation of Art. 356(1) by the Centre in a State has become very difficult. The reason is that while the ruling alliance at the Centre (NDA) enjoys a majority support in the Lok Sabha, it does not enjoy a majority in the Rajya Sabha. This means that it is not possible for the Central Government to have the proclamation approved in the Rajya Sabha unless there is national consensus in its favour. This happened recently in case of Bihar. In 1999, the Central Government invoked Art. 356(1) in Bihar because of serious breakdown of law and order in the State. The State Government was dismissed but the State Legislature was suspended and not dissolved. The Proclamation was approved by the Lok Sabha. But the Government was not in a position to have it approved in the Rajya Sabha because of the opposition by the Congress Party. Consequently, the Government revoked the proclamation and restored the State Government.

E. JUSTICIABILITY OF THE PROCLAMATION UNDER ART. 356

From time to time, attempts have been made to bring the matter of invocation of Art. 356(1) before the courts for scrutiny but such attempts have not succeeded.

In 1968, the ex-Chief Minister of Haryana challenged the action of the Centre through a writ petition, but the High Court dismissed the same for the following reasons:[8]

(1) The court cannot go into the validity or legality or propriety of the proclamation because the President had issued the same in pursuance of his constitutional powers under Art. 356(1) which is not an executive action of the Union, and the President himself is not amenable to the jurisdiction of the court in view of Art. 361(1).[9]

(2) The consideration of the proclamation has been specifically vested by the Constitution in Parliament and this excludes the jurisdiction of the courts.

(3) Regarding the argument of mala fides against the Home Minister, the Court held that it could not enquire into the advice given by him to the President in view of Art. 74(2).[10]

(4) The conclusions reached by the Governor in his report to the President cannot be questioned in the court as those are matters for the consideration of the

---

8. See, supra, Sec. D(d), for the circumstances in which Art. 356 was invoked in the State.
9. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A.
10. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(iii)(a).

President and Parliament. The court has no jurisdiction to require disclosure of material forming the basis of the President's satisfaction.[11]

In Jyotirmoy Bose v. Union of India,[12] the Calcutta High Court rejected a writ petition challenging the President's proclamation issued on March 19, 1970, under Art. 356. It was argued inter alia that in making the proclamation, the President should have acted in his discretion and not on ministerial advice. Rejecting this plea, the Court emphasised that in the matter of making a proclamation under Art. 356, the President acts as a constitutional head and must act as advised by the Council of Ministers. "To say that the power given under Art. 356 is a discretionary power to the President is ..... wholly misconceived."

Bijayanand v. President of India,[13] is a highly instructive decision rendered by the Orissa High Court in relation to Art. 356. The Government of Nandini Satpathy fell in 1973 because of defections from the Congress Party. At that time, Bijayanand Patnaik, the leader of the Pragti Party, commanded a strength of 70 in a House of 140 (139 excluding the Speaker). The Governor did not invite Bijayanand to form the government. He took the view that political defection in the State had become common and had adversely affected the political life of the State. Defection was harmful to democracy. The Governor thought that the government formed by Bijayanand would not remain in office for long and be stable. He, therefore, recommended to the Centre that the President's rule be imposed in the State under Art. 356. The President, accordingly, issued the proclamation.

Bijayanand and his colleagues in the Pragti Party challenged the President's proclamation in the Orissa High Court. The High Court rejected the challenge but in the process enunciated certain very important propositions in relation to Art. 356. The Court ruled that in sending his report to the President under Art. 356, the Governor is to act directly and not with the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers.[14] Whether the Governor's report is mala fide or based on any extraneous facts cannot be questioned in a court of law. It is not justiciable as against the Governor because of the protection and immunity under Art. 361(1).[15]

In exercising powers under Art. 356, the President is to act with the aid and advice of his Council of Ministers.[16] Under Art. 356, the source of information on which the President would reach his 'satisfaction' is very wide. He may act on the Governor's report or any other information. The amplitude and undefined character of the information on which the President acts, and is to be satisfied, "indicates that the satisfaction and the source thereof are not justiciable."

The satisfaction of the President under Art. 356 and the basis thereof "are subjective and are not subject to objective tests by judicial review. The question involves high executive and administrative policy and the court will find out no standard for resolving it judicially."

The Andhra High Court also asserted that the satisfaction of the President under Art. 356 was not a justiciable matter. The President can act under this Article in a number of situations. The Constitution does not enumerate these circum-

---

11. Rao Birinder Singh v. India, AIR 1968 Punj 441.
12. AIR 1971 Cal 122.
13. AIR 1974 Ori 52.
14. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. C.
15. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i); Ch. VII, Sec. A(i).
16. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(a).

stances. There is no satisfactory criteria for a judicial determination of what are relevant considerations and this makes the question of satisfaction an intrinsically a political one and beyond the reach of the court.[17]

These cases settled the point that it was practically impossible to question President's or Governor's or Central Government's action under Art. 356. The only control over the exercise of this power lies in Parliament as noted above. The matter was placed beyond any shadow of doubt when the Constitution (Thirty-Eighth Amendment) Act, 1975, declared that the 'satisfaction' of the President mentioned in Art. 356(1) "shall be final and conclusive and shall not be questioned in any court on any ground." But this clause has now been withdrawn by the Forty-fourth Amendment of the Constitution.

In Bijayanand,[18] the Orissa High Court criticised the conduct of the Governor in so far as he recommended President's rule in the State without first calling upon Bijayanand to form the government. After taking note of the conventions of the British Constitution, the Court observed that by not calling upon the leader of the Opposition to form the government after the resignation of the Satpathy Government, the Governor failed to honour the conventions prevalent in Great Britain. What the Court suggested was that, on the fall of the Ministry, the Governor should automatically ask the leader of the opposition to form the government and that the Governor should not be concerned whether the government formed by him would be stable or not. It was for the leader of the opposition to decide whether he should form the government or not and, ultimately, it was for the House to decide whether his government would remain in office or not. In saying so, however, the Court failed to give due weight to the vice of defections prevailing in the body polity. Even in the instant case, defections were the order of the day. It thus stands to reason whether the British conventions, if followed automatically in India, would not encourage defections from one side to another and whether that will be a happy situation. The situation has not been redeemed much in this regard even by the Anti-Defection Law, for while this law illegalises defection by a single member, defection of a group of members of the Assembly is still possible.[19]

The British conventions have evolved in the context of a well-established two party system where defection of a member of one party to the other is indeed a rarity. In India, the party system is as yet fluid and has not yet stabilised. There is a danger that if the members know that, as soon as they leave the ruling party and join the opposition, the leader of the opposition would be called upon to form the government, defections from the ruling party would be promoted. There is no such provision as Art. 356 in England and there a Council of Ministers must always remain in office. That convention will be applicable at the Central level. But different considerations arise under Art. 356 and it is difficult to accept the theory that the British conventions should apply automatically under Art. 356.

---

17. In re A. Sreeramulu, AIR 1974 AP 106. For detailed comments on these cases see, ILI, PRESIDENT'S RULE IN THE STATES, 128-53.

18. Supra, footnote 13.

19. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. F and VI, Sec. B(iv). The view of the learned author has not found favour with the Supreme Court which has said that: "The remedy for corruption or similar ills and evils lies elsewhere and not in Article 356(1)". Rameshwar Prasad (VI) v. Union of India, (2006) 2 SCC 1, at page 129 : AIR 2006 SC 980.

Further, in England, a Prime Minister who had a majority, can claim dissolution of the House on being defeated in the House.[20] In the instant case, the Chief Minister, Nandini Satpathy, on defections from her party, while tendering resignation of her office, advised dissolution of the House. According to the British conventions, she could have sought dissolution of the House and remained in office till the new House was elected. If instead of that, the Governor dissolved the House under Art. 356, as suggested by the out-going Chief Minister, no objection could possibly be taken to that course.

In 1975, the Thirty Eighth Constitutional Amendment introduced cl. 5 in Art. 356 barring judicial review of a Proclamation under Art. 356(1) on any ground. The clause made presidential 'satisfaction' to issue a Proclamation under Art. 356(1) as 'final and conclusive' which "shall not be questioned in any court on any ground'. This clause was however withdrawn by the Constitution (44th Amendment) Act, 1978.

(a) RAJASTHAN V. INDIA

A constitutional controversy of great significance vis-a-vis Art. 356 was raised in State of Rajasthan v. Union of India.[21]

When the general elections for Lok Sabha were held in the country in 1977, after the lifting of the emergency of 1975, the Congress Party was badly routed in several States by the Janata Party which won a large number of seats in the Lok Sabha and, thus, formed the government at the Centre. In these States, Congress Ministries were functioning at the time and they still had some more time to run out for completion of the full term.

The Central Home Minister, Charan Singh, wrote a letter to each of the Chief Ministers of these States suggesting that he should seek dissolution of the State Legislature from the Governor and obtain fresh mandate from the electorate. The State of Rajasthan (along with several other States) filed an original suit in the Supreme Court against the Union of India under Art. 131 praying the Court to declare this 'directive' of the Home Minister as unconstitutional and illegal. It was argued that the letter in question was a prelude to the invocation of Art. 356 in these States and that the dissolution of the State Legislatures on the ground mentioned in the said letter was prima facie outside the purview of Art. 356. In substance, the suit was designed to forestall the invocation of Art. 356 in the several States.

The Supreme Court, however, dismissed the suit unanimously. The broad position adopted by the Court was that it could not interfere with the Centre's exercise of power under Art. 356 merely on the ground that it embraced 'political and executive policy and expediency unless some constitutional provision was being infringed.' Art. 74(2) disables the Court from inquiring into "the very existence or nature or contents" of ministerial advice to the President.[22] Art. 356(5) makes it impossible for the Court to question the President's satisfac-

---

20. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. I; Ch. VI, Sec. E; Ch. VII, Sec. C.

21. AIR 1977 SC 1361 : (1977) 2 SCC 592.
Also see, DHAVAN & JACOB, The Dissolution case: Politics at the Bar of the Supreme Court, (1977) 19 JILI 355-91; ILI, PRESIDENT'S RULE, supra, Ch. III.
Also see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(iii)(b), supra, Sec. D(d).

22. See, Ch. III, Sec. A(iii)(a) supra.

tion on any ground unless and until resort to Art. 356 in a particular situation is shown to be so "grossly perverse and unreasonable" as to constitute "patent misuse of this provision or an excess of power on admitted facts".[23]

The second limb of Art. 355 would seem to cover all steps which are enough to ensure that the State Government is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. In the words of BEG, C.J., the sweep of Art. 355 "seems quite wide. It is evident that it is this part of the duty of the Union towards each State which is sought to be covered by a proclamation under Art. 356..... It is a proclamation intended either to safeguard against the failure of the constitutional machinery in a State or to repair the effects of a breakdown. It may be either a preventive or a curative action."[24]

Article 356 can be used by the Centre for securing compliance with democratic norms by the States. The language of Art. 356 is quite wide and loose. As BHAGWATI, J., emphasized the satisfaction of the President under Art. 356 "is a subjective one and cannot be tested by reference to any objective tests", or by "judicially discoverable and manageable standards."[25] The court cannot go into the question of "correctness or adequacy" of the facts and circumstances on which the satisfaction of the Central Government is based. In the instant case, the possibility of the State Governments having lost the confidence of the people could not be ruled out. To continue these governments in office would be "purely undemocratic in character."

FAZL ALI, J., emphasized: "As our Constitution is wedded to the democratic pattern of government, if a particular State Government ceases to be democratic or acts in an undemocrate fashion, it cannot be said that the government of the State is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution." In the circumstances, "the second part mentioned in Art. 355 appears to have been prima facie satisfied."

As regards the privative clause contained in Art. 356(5),[26] BHAGWATI, J., asserted that this clause could not preclude the Court from examining extraneous grounds or whether it was based on no satisfaction at all. BHAGWATI, J., expressed himself on this point as follows:

> "The satisfaction of the President is a condition precedent to the exercise of power under Art. 356, Cl. (1) and if it can be shown that there is no satisfaction of the President at all, the exercise of the power would be constitutionally invalid. Of course by reason of Cl. (5) of Art. 356, the satisfaction of the President is final and conclusive and cannot be assailed on any ground, but this immunity from attack cannot apply where the challenge is not that the satisfaction is improper, or unjustified, but that there is no satisfaction at all. On such a case it is not the satisfaction arrived at by the President which is challenged, but the existence of the satisfaction itself."

The highlight of the decision, however, lies in the assertion by almost all the Judges that in spite of the broad ambit of the power under Art. 356, a presidential

---

23. At this time Art. 356(5) declared the 'satisfaction' of the President as "final and conclusive". This clause was added by the 38th Constitution Amendment. But this clause has now been withdrawn by the 44 Amendment.
See, supra.

24. AIR 1977 SC at 1380 : (1977) 3 SCC 592.

25. Ibid, at 1414.

26. For this clause, see, supra, footnote 24.

proclamation could be challenged if power was exercised mala fide, or on "constitutionally or legally prohibited" grounds, or for "extraneous or collateral purposes." As BHAGWATI, J., stressed:

> "But one thing is certain that if the satisfaction is mala fide or is based on wholly extraneous and irrelevant grounds, the Court would have jurisdiction to examine it, because in that case there would be no satisfaction of the President in regard to the matter in which he is required to be satisfied."[27]

And if there is no satisfaction of the President, there could be no proclamation under Art. 356 as 'satisfaction' of the President is a condition precedent to the exercise of power under this constitutional provision.

It was also held that maintenance of democratic norms could not be regarded as a perverse or irrelevant ground for the exercise of power under Art. 356. The letter of the Home Minister was characterised as not being a directive but only advisory in nature. The grounds given in the letter were not mala fide or extraneous or irrelevant.

On the question of interpretation of Art. 356, the Court ruled that the State Legislative Assemblies could be dissolved without the President's proclamation having been approved by the Parliament. The proclamation comes into immediate effect and remains in force for two months without parliamentary approval.

(B) BOMMAI

The Supreme Court then rendered a landmark decision on Art. 356(1) in S.R. Bommai v. India.[28] The case arose in the context of the followings facts.

In 1989, the Janata Dal Ministry headed by Shri S.R. Bommai was in office in Karnataka. A number of members defected from the party and there arose a question mark on the majority support in the House for the Bommai's Ministry. The Chief Minister proposed to the Governor that the Assembly session be called to test the strength of the Ministry on the floor of the House. But the Governor ignored this suggestion. He also did not explore the possibility of an alternative government but reported to the President that as Shri Bommai had lost the majority support in the House, and as no other party was in a position to form the government, action be taken under Art. 356(1). Accordingly, the President issued the proclamation in April, 1989.

Bommai challenged the validity of the proclamation before the Karnataka High Court through a writ petition on various grounds. The High Court ruled that the proclamation issued under Art. 356(1) is not wholly outside the pole of judicial scrutiny; the satisfaction of the President under Art. 356(1) which is a condition present for issue of the proclamation ought to be real and genuine satisfaction based on relevant facts and circumstances. The scope of judicial scrutiny is therefore confined to an examination whether the disclosed reasons bear any rational nexus to the action proposed or proclamation issued. The courts may examine as to whether the proclamation was based on a satisfaction which was mala fide for any reason, or based on wholly extraneous and irrelevant grounds. In such a situation, the stated satisfaction of the President would not be a satisfaction in the constitutional sense under Art. 356. In the end, however, the High

---

27. Ibid., Also, UNTWALIA, J., at 1422; FAZL ALI, J., at 1441.
28. AIR 1994 SC 1918 : (1994) 3 SCC 1.

Court dismissed the petition holding that the facts stated in the Governor's report could not be held to be irrelevant, Governor's bona fides were not questioned and his satisfaction was based upon reasonable assessment of all facts. The Court also ruled that recourse to floor test was neither compulsory nor obligatory and was not a pre-requisite to the sending of the report to the President. Bommai appealed to the Supreme Court against the High Court decision.

Besides the Karnataka proclamation, the Supreme Court was also called upon to decide the validity of similar proclamations under Art. 356(1) in the States of Meghalaya and Nagaland.

Besides, there were three more proclamations before the Supreme Court for review—those made in Madhya Pradesh, Himachal Pradesh and Rajasthan in 1992 in the wake of the demolition of the disputed Babri structure in Ayodhya. The governments in these States belonged to the B.J.P. which was sympathetic to the organisations responsible for the demolition.[29] The M.P. High Court had held the Madhya Pradesh proclamation to be "invalid and beyond the scope of Art. 356". The Court had ruled that from the material placed before it no inference could be drawn that the State Government had disrespected or disobeyed any Central direction nor was there any specification of any alleged deeds or misdeeds on the part of the State Government in meeting the law and order situation. Merely because there was some worsening of the law and order situation in the State in the wake of Ayodhya incidents, no inference could be drawn that the State Government could not be carried on in accordance with the Constitution, or that the constitutional machinery had broken down in the State.

Needless to say that this was an unprecedented ruling as never before any proclamation issued under Art. 356(1) had been invalidated by any court. Accordingly, the Central Government appealed to the Supreme Court against the High Court verdict. There were also writ petitions pending in the respective High Courts challenging the proclamations under Art. 356, as mentioned above. All these writ petitions were transferred to the Supreme Court for a hearing. The great significance of Bommai can be gauged from the fact that the Supreme Court had to adjudged the constitutional validity of six proclamations issued under Art. 356(1) in six different States during 1989 to 1992.

It may be mentioned that by the time the Bommai case came before the Supreme Court, Art. 356(5) putting a ban on judicial review of Art. 356 proclamations had been repealed.[30]

The Supreme Court in its judgment by majority declared the Karnataka, Meghalaya and Nagaland proclamations as unconstitutional but the proclamations in Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan and Himachal Pradesh as valid. Thus, both the High Court decisions mentioned above were overruled.

A Bench of nine Judges was constituted in Bommai to consider the various issues arising in the several cases, and seven opinions were delivered. While some of the Judges (AHMADI, VERMA, RAMASWAMY, JJ.) adopted a passive attitude towards judicial review of the presidential proclamation under Art. 356(1), others adopted somewhat activist stance. On the basis of consensus among the Judges,

---

29. See, supra, Sec. C.
30. Supra, footnote 24.

the following propositions can be enunciated in relation to Art. 356(1) and the scope of judicial review thereunder:

1. The President exercises his power under Art. 356(1) on the advice of the Council of Ministers to which, in effect, the power really belongs though it may be formally vested in the President.
2. The question whether the incumbent State Chief Minister has lost his majority support in the Assembly has to be decided not in the Governor's Chamber but on the floor of the House. There should be test of strength between the government and others on the floor of the House before recommending imposition of the President's rule in the State.

   The Court ruled that the Karnataka High Court was wrong in holding that floor test was neither compulsory nor obligatory nor a pre-requisite to sending the report to the President recommending action under Art. 356(1).
3. The Governor should explore the possibility of installing an alternative Ministry, when the erstwhile Ministry loses support in the House.
4. The validity of the proclamation issued under Art. 356(1), is justiciable on such grounds as : whether it was issued on the basis of any material at all, or whether the material was relevant, or whether the proclamation was issued in the mala fide exercise of the power, or was based wholly on extraneous and/or irrelevant grounds.
5. There should be material before the President indicating that the Government of the State cannot be carried on in accordance with the Constitution. The material in question before the President should be such as would induce a reasonable man to come to the conclusion in question.

   Once such material is shown to exist, 'the satisfaction' of the President based on such material will not be open to question. But if no such material exists, or if the material before the President cannot reasonably suggest that the State Government cannot be carried on in accordance with the Constitution, the proclamation made by the President is open to challenge.

   According to JEEVAN REDDY, J., Art. 356 confers upon the President conditioned power. "It is not an absolute power. The existence of material which may comprise of or include the report of the Governor—is a pre-condition. The President's satisfaction must be formed on relevant material."
6. When a prima facie case is made out against the validity of the proclamation, it is for the Central Government to prove that the relevant material did in fact exist. Such material may be the report of the Governor or any other material.
7. The dissolution of the Legislative Assembly in the State is not an automatic consequence of the issuance of the proclamation. The dissolution of the Assembly is also not a must in every case. It should be done only when it is found to be necessary for achieving the purposes of the proclamation.

8. The provisions in Art. 356(3) are intended to be a check on the powers of the President under Art. 356(1). If the proclamation is not approved within two months by the two Houses of Parliament, it automatically lapses. This means that the President ought not to take any irreversible action till the proclamation is approved by the Houses of Parliament. Therefore, the State Assembly ought not to be dissolved.

   The dissolution of the Assembly prior to the approval of the proclamation by the Parliament under Art. 356(3) will be per se invalid.[31] The State Legislative Assembly should be kept in suspended animation in the meantime. Once the Parliament has put its seal of approval on the proclamation, the State Assembly can then be dissolved. The Assembly which was suspended will revive and get reactivated if the proclamation is not approved by Parliament.

   Here a word of explanation is necessary. A view was expressed in Rajasthan v. Union of India,[32] that the proclamation is valid when issued under Art. 356(1), and the State Legislature can be dissolved by the Centre without waiting for its approval by the Houses of Parliament.[33] But, in Bommai, the Court has disagreed with this view and for a very good reason. If the proclamation is not approved by Parliament, it automatically lapses after two months. How is the State Government to run thereafter? It would be inevitable that the dissolved assembly be revived for no fresh elections can be held for the House within the short period of two months. Bommai view avoids any such embarrassment to the Central Government.

   Some time back, when in February, 1999, a proclamation under Art. 356(1) was issued in respect of Bihar, the State Government and the State Legislature were suspended. The proclamation was approved by the Lok Sabha on February 26, 99. But when it became clear that the Rajya Sabha would not approve it, because of the opposition by the opposition parties which were in a majority in that House, the Government revoked the proclamation on March 8, 99, in exercise of the powers under Art. 356(2). The State Government was installed in office and the State Legislature which had been suspended was then revived.

9. Once the proclamation is approved by Parliament, and then it lapses at the end of six months, or it is revoked earlier, neither the dismissed State Government, nor the dissolved legislature will revive.

---

31. When in October, 1995, President's rule was imposed in the State of U.P., the State Assembly was first suspended and then dissolved ahead of the ratification of the proclamation by Parliament.

There was a Congress Government headed by P.V. Narasimha Rao at the Centre. The ostensible reason given for the step was that there was a possibility of "horse trading" of M.L.As in case of a suspended Assembly. The real reason, however, was that the Congress Government at the Centre wanted to kill the possibility of emergence of a B.J.P. Government in the State. The decision to dissolve the Assembly was purely a political decision which was not in consonance with the Bommai ruling.

32. Supra.

33. BEG, C.J., AIR 1977 SC at 1391; CHANDRACHUD, J, ibid. at 1398, BHAGWATI, J., ibid, at 1410.

10. If the Court invalidates the proclamation, even if approved by the Parliament, the action of the President becomes invalid. The State Government, if dismissed, is revived and the State Assembly, if dissolved, will be restored.

11. Art. 74(2) bars an inquiry into the question whether any or what advice was tendered by the Council of Ministers to the President.[34] Art. 74(2) "does not bar the Court from calling upon the Union Council of Ministers to disclose to the court the material upon which the President had formed the requisite satisfaction. The material on the basis of which advice was tendered does not become part of the advice. Even if the material is looked into by or shown to the President, it does not partake the character of advice".

    According to JEEVEN REDDY, J., when called upon, the Union Government has to produce the material on the basis of which action was taken. It cannot refuse to do so, if it seeks to defend the action. The Court will not go into the correctness of the material or its adequacy. Its enquiry is limited to see whether the material was relevant to the action taken. Even if some material was irrelevant, the court will not interfere so long as there was some material which was relevant to the action taken.[35]

Applying these principles, the Karnataka, Meghalaya and Nagaland proclamations were invalidated. In case of Karnataka, the Court ruled that the question of lack of majority support for the Ministry was not tested on the floor of the House. A duly constituted Ministry was dismissed on the ipse dixit of the Governor who made no effort to instal in office an alternative ministry. The Governor's report thus was faulty and clearly smacked of *mala fide*s. The proclamation based on such a report also suffered from mala fides and was liable to be struck down.

In case of Meghalaya, after reviewing the circumstances leading to the issue of the proclamation, the Court ruled that prima facie, the material before the President was not only irrational but motivated by factual and legal mala fides".

In case of Nagaland, there was defection in the ruling Congress Party as 1/3rd of its members formed a new party. The Chief Minister resigned. The leader of the breakaway group claimed majority support but instead of allowing him to test his strength on the floor of the House, on the report of the Governor, the President issued the proclamation under Art. 356(1). The Court ruled that in the circumstances, the proclamation was unconstitutional. The Court emphasized that the Anti-Defection Law did not prohibit the formation of a new political party if it was backed by at least 1/3rd members of an existing legislature party.[36] The leader of the new party ought to have been given an opportunity to prove his majority on the floor of the House.

The case of the proclamations issued in case of Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan and Himachal Pradesh fell in a different category. None of the State Governments had lost its majority. These proclamations were issued in the wake of the

---

34. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(iii)(a).
35. Also see, A.K. Kaul v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1403, at 1411 : (1995) 4 SCC 73.
36. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. F; VI, Sec. B(iv).

incidents at Ayodhya on December 6, 1992. But here the crucial question involved was that of upholding the basic constitutional value of secularism.[37]

The Court emphasized that the various constitutional provisions by implication prohibit the establishment of a theocratic State and prevent the State from either identifying itself with, or favouring any particular religion or religious sect or denomination. The state is enjoined to accord equal treatment to all religions and sects. Religion cannot be mixed with any secular activity of the state. In the words of RATNAVEL PANDIAN, J.: "In matters of State, religion has no place. No political party can simultaneously be a religious party and politics and religion cannot be mixed".

Secularism is a part of the basic structure of the Constitution.[38] If any State Government acts in a manner which is calculated to subvert or sabotage secularism, it can lawfully be regarded that a situation has arisen in which the State Government cannot be carried on in accordance with the constitutional provisions. The three proclamations were thus held valid on this ground. The decision of Madhya Pradesh High Court, mentioned above, was reversed.

In Bommai, the Supreme Court seeks to promote several basic and wholesome constitutional values, such as, parliamentary system, federalism, control over the executive and secularism. Bommai is a very fine example of judicial creativity.[39]

To promote parliamentary government, the Court has insisted that the question whether the incumbent State Chief Minister has lost majority support or not, must be decided on the floor of the House and not by the Governor himself. Further, the Governor ought to explore the possibility of installing an alternate Ministry before reporting failure of the constitutional machinery in the State to the President under Art. 356(1).[40]

Federalism has been designated as a basic value in the Indian Constitution.[41] Dismissal of a duly elected State Assembly by the Central Government is really a negalation of the federal concept. The power under Art. 356(1) has thus to be exercised sparingly, scrupulously and with circumspection. Abuse or misuse of this power will damage the federal fabric and disturb the federal balance.

The Court has emphasized that the President exercises the power under Art. 356(1) on the advice of the Central Ministry which is a political body. In a pluralistic democracy and federal structure, the parties in power at the Centre and the States may not be the same. Hence it is necessary to confine the exercise of power under Art. 356(1) strictly to the situation mentioned therein which is a condition precedent to its exercise.[42]

In this connection, the fact situation in the Rajasthan case may be referred to.[43] There the question was whether the nine Congress State Governments could be dismissed under Art. 356(1) in the wake of the Congress defeat in the recently held election for the Lok Sabha and installation of the Janata Government at the

---

37. For discussion on the concept of "Secularism", see, supra, Ch. I; infra, Ch. XXIX, Sec. A.
38. For discussion on this concept, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
39. On judicial creativity, see, infra, Ch. XL.
40. AIR 1994 SC at 1986, 2100 : (1994) 3 SCC 1.
41. See, infra, Ch. XLI.
42. Ibid, at 1970.
43. Supra.

Centre. The Judges had expressed views supporting such a step. But in Bommai, several Judges expressed disapproval of what had happened, first in 1977 and, then in 1980. The Court has now firmly stated that so long as a State Government is functioning within the discipline of the Constitution and pursues an ideology consistent with the constitutional philosophy, its dismissal under Art. 356(1) solely on the ground that a different political party has come to power at the Centre is unwarranted and unjustified.

India has consciously adopted a pluralist democratic system which implies that different political parties may be in power in the various States and the Centre. "The mosaic of variegated pattern of political life is potentially inherent in a pluralist multi-party democracy like ours".[44] Accordingly, several Judges have expressed disapproval of the view that if the ruling party in the States suffers an overwhelming defeat in the election to Lok Sabha—however complete the defeat may be—it can be a ground for the issue of the proclamation under Art. 356(1). Simply because a political party had overwhelming majority at the Centre, it could not on that ground alone advise the President under Art. 356 of the Constitution to dissolve the State Assemblies of the opposition-ruled States. As SAWANT, J., has observed[25] in this connection:

> "So far the power under the provision has been used on more than 90 occasions and in almost all cases against governments run by political parties in opposition. If the fabric of pluralism and pluralist democracy and the unity and integrity of the country are to be preserved, judiciary in the circumstances is the only institution which can act as the saviour of the system and of the nation."[45]

Absolute power cannot be conceded to the Executive under Art. 356(1). The reason is that in the past the power has been used at times on "irrelevant, objectionable and unsound" grounds.[46]

Finally, the Court has laid a good deal of emphasis on secularism.[47] It is a part of the basic structure of the Constitution.[48] If any State Government acts in a manner which is calculated to subvert or sabotage secularism, it can lawfully be regarded that a situation has arisen in which the State Government cannot be carried on in accordance with the Constitution. A State Government may enjoy majority support in the Assembly, but if it subverts the basic value of secularism, it can be dismissed under Art. 356(1). Such a government may be regarded as not functioning in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.[49]

Breakdown of the constitutional machinery in the State is the sine qua non for invoking Art. 356. What is the significance of the phrase "breakdown of the constitutional machinery." K. RAMASWAMY, J., in Bommai has elucidated the matter as follows:

> "The exercise of the power under Art. 356 is an extraordinary one and needs to be used sparingly when the situation contemplated by Art. 356 warrants to maintain democratic form of government and to prevent paralysing of the political process. Single or individual act or acts of violation of the Constitution for good, bad or indifferent administration does not necessarily constitute fail-

44. SAWANT, J., ibid, at 1980.
45. Ibid.
46. SAWANT, J., Ibid. at 1980.
47. For a detailed discussion on Secularism, see, infra, Ch. XXIX, Sec. A.
48. See, infra, Ch. XLI, for discussion on this doctrine.
49. AIR 1994 SC at 2000, 2113.

ure of the constitutional machinery or characterises that a situation has arisen in which the government of the state can not be carried on in accordance with the Constitution."

(C) AFTER BOMMAI

It has become very difficult to invoke Art. 356 after the Bommai decision. The following incidents prove the point.

On Oct. 21, 1997, the Chief Minister of Uttar Pradesh obtained a vote of confidence on the floor of the House amidst pandemonium. This vote was sought by him as a result of the Supreme Court ruling to that effect.[50] Thereafter, the Governor in his report recommended imposition of the President's rule in the State under Art. 356(1) on the ground of breakdown of the constitutional machinery in the State. Accepting the Governor's report, the Central Cabinet recommended to the President the invocation of Art. 356, in the State, but under Art. 74(1), the President returned the recommendation for reconsideration of the Cabinet.[51] The President expressed a doubt about the constitutional correctness of the Governor reporting breakdown of constitutional government in the State immediately after the Chief Minister had seemingly won the vote of confidence in the House. Better sense prevailed with the Central Government which then withdrew its recommendation to the President to invoke Art. 356(1) in Uttar Pradesh. The matter came to an end at the Central level leaving Kalyan Singh Ministry intact in the State.

Again, in October, 1998, the Central Government recommended to the President invocation of Art. 356 in the State of Bihar. The Central Government had done so on the basis of the Governor's report in which had been listed a series of acts of commission and omission on the part of the State Government as constituting a breakdown of the constitutional machinery in the State—a sine qua non for the exercise of power under Art. 356(1). The main allegation against the State Government was the worsening of the law and order situation in the State. At this time, the State Government undoubtedly enjoyed the majority support in the Assembly.

The President considered the Governor's report and the recommendation of the Central Cabinet and then decided to refer back the matter to the Cabinet for reconsideration under Art. 74(1). The President took the view that the acts complained of did not constitute a breakdown of the constitutional machinery in the State so as to justify the use of his extraordinary power under Art. 356. Obviously, taking his cue from Bommai, the President distinguished between bad government and breakdown of constitutional machinery. The President's stand was in accordance with the letter and substance of the Supreme Court decision in Bommai.

For sometime, the Central Cabinet deferred the decision, but somewhat later it again revived its recommendation. The President cannot refer back the matter twice under Art. 74(1)[52] and, therefore, he fell in line with the Cabinet. The requisite proclamation under Art. 356(1) was issued. The State Government was dismissed and the State Legislature was suspended. The proclamation was approved by the Lok Sabha but the Government had to revoke it when it found that,

---

50. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. A(ii)(a).
51. Ibid.
52. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(a).

because of the hostility of the Congress Party, it would not be approved by the Rajya Sabha.[53]

After the revocation of the proclamation, the Governor invited the earlier Chief Minister Rabri Devi to form the government. The Governor, however, imposed a condition that the government must prove its majority on the floor of the House within ten days. This condition was challenged as unconstitutional. The Patna High Court however upheld the same saying that the Governor can impose such a condition in his discretion where there is doubt about the majority support enjoyed by the government in the House. The principle of collective responsibility means that the government must enyoy majority support in the House and how that majority support is to be ascertained is a matter left to the discretion of the Governor.[54]

In 2005, Legislative Assembly elections were held in the State of Bihar. Since no political party was in a position to form a Government, a notification was issued on 7th March, 2005 under Article 356 of the Constitution imposing President's Rule over the State of Bihar and the Assembly was kept in suspended animation. The object of the proclamation imposing President's Rule was to give time and space to the political process to explore the possibility of forming a majority Government in the State through a process of political realignment.

Before even the first meeting of the Legislative Assembly, its dissolution was ordered on 23rd May, 2005 under Article 356 on the basis of the report of the Governor that attempts were being made to cobble a majority by illegal means and lay claim to form the Government in the State of Bihar. The Governor's report was in turn based on information gathered from the media, meeting with various political functionaries, as also intelligence reports. The Presidential notification formally dissolving the Bihar Assembly was challenged directly before the Supreme Court under Article 32.[55] The court followed the reasoning in Bommai saying that "the narrow minimal area of judicial review as advocated in State of Rajasthan case is no longer the law of the land in view of its extension in Bommai case".[56]

The notification was held to be unconstitutional on the ground that the drastic and extreme action under Article 356 cannot be justified "on mere ipse dixit, suspicion, whims and fancies of the Governor" without any verification of the authenticity of the information.

> "There was no material, let alone relevant, with the Governor to assume that there was no legitimate realignment of political parties and there was blatant distortion of democracy by induced defections through unfair, illegal, unethical and unconstitutional means".[57]

F. FINANCIAL EMERGENCY

Article 360 makes provisions concerning financial emergency. If the President is satisfied that a situation has arisen whereby the financial stability or credit of India, or any part thereof, is threatened, he may by a proclamation make a declaration to that effect [Art. 360(1)].

---

53. Supra.
54. Sapru Jayakar Motilal C.R. Das v. Union of India, AIR 1999 Pat. 221.
55. Rameshwar Prasad (VI) v. Union of India, (2006) 2 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 980.
56. Ibid paragraph 54.
57. Ibid at page 119.

When such a proclamation is in operation, the Centre can give directions to any State to observe such canons of financial propriety as may be specified in the directions. It may also give such other directions as the President may deem necessary and adequate for the purpose [Art. 360(3)]. Any such directions may provide for the reduction of salaries and allowances of all or any class of persons serving in the State [Art. 360(4)(a)(i)].

The Centre may require that all money bills, or financial bills or those which involve expenditure from the State Consolidated Fund, shall be reserved for the President's consideration after being passed by the State Legislature [Art. 360(4)(a)(ii)].

The President may also issue directions for reducing the salaries and allowances of persons serving the Union including the Supreme Court and the High Court Judges [Art. 360(4)(b)].

A proclamation issued under Art. 360(1) may be revoked or varied by a subsequent proclamation [Art. 360(2)(a)], and has to be laid before each House of Parliament [Art. 360(2)(b)]. The proclamation ceases to have effect after two months unless in the meantime it is approved by resolutions of both Houses of Parliament [Art. 360(2)(e)]. If at the time, the proclamation under Art. 360(1) is issued, Lok Sabha is dissolved it may be approved by the Rajya Sabha, and then approved by the Lok Sabha after elections within thirty days from its first sitting. If not so approved, the proclamation ceases to exist.[58]

The proclamation of financial emergency increases the supervision of the Centre on the States in financial matters. Perhaps, the framers of the Constitution adopted the idea underlying Art. 360 from the experiences of the federations of the U.S.A., Canada and Australia during the depression of the 1930's when the Central Government found itself very much handicapped in taking effective action to meet the situation. In fact, the argument given in the Constituent Assembly to support this constitutional provision was that during the depression, the U.S. Congress had passed the National Industrial Recovery Act which was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court,[59] and that the Central Government in India should face no such difficulty in coping with emergency economic problems.[60] The Government of India can take effective action under Art. 360 whenever an occasion arises for the same. There has not been any occasion so far for invoking Art. 360.

By the Thirty-Eighth Amendment of the Constitution, the Presidential 'satisfaction' in Art. 360(1) was declared to be 'final and conclusive' and not questionable in any court on any ground. No court was to have jurisdiction to entertain any question, on any ground, regarding the validity of—(i) a declaration made by proclamation by the President to the effect stated in Art. 360(1); or (ii) the continued operation of such Proclamation. This provision has now been deleted by the Forty-Fourth Amendment of the Constitution.[61]

---

58. Proviso to Art. 360(2)(c).

59. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 US 495.
The Act in question was declared invalid in Schechter on the ground of involving an improper delegation of legislative power by the Congress to the President.

60. XCAD, 361-72.
Also, AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONST., 209-16.

61. See, Ch. XLI, infra.

CHAPTER XIV

CO-OPERATIVE FEDERALISM

SYNOPSIS

A. FROM COMPETITIVE TO CO-OPERATIVE FEDERALISM

Though there is division of functions between the Centre and the units in a federation, and the respective areas of competence of each is earmarked, yet it would not be correct to assume that the various governments act in water-tight compartments. As these governments act side by side in the same country, inevitably many types of relations arise amongst them and many instrumentalities to promote intergovernmental co-operation come into existence.

In the three older Federations of the U.S.A., Canada and Australia, in the formative stages of development, the dominant operative concept was that of 'competitive federalism' which denoted a spirit of competition and rivalry between the Centre and the States. The formative stages were, therefore, marked by intergovernmental disputes; the units were very conscious of their powers and rights and, thus, resented the growth of the Centre's powers and any encroachment by it on their domain.[1]

With the passage of time, however, the concept of 'competitive federalism' slowly gave way to 'co-operative federalism'. This trend has been promoted by three powerful factors:

1. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii), under "Intergovernmental Tax Immunities".

(1) the exigencies of war when for national survival, national effort takes precedence over fine points of Centre-State division of powers;

(2) technological advances means making of communication faster;

(3) the emergence of the concept of a social welfare state in response to public demand for various social services involving huge outlays which the governments of the units could not meet by themselves out of their own resources.

The concept of 'co-operative federalism' helps the federal system, with its divided jurisdiction, to act in unison. It minimises friction and promotes co-operation among the various constituent governments of the federal union so that they can pool their resources to achieve certain desired national goals.[2]

It has come to be realised that the various governments in a federation are interdependent and that they should act, not at cross-purposes, but in co-ordination so as to promote and maximise the public welfare. Money has been one of the strongest motive forces in the emergence of this concept. The Centre with its vast financial capacity is always in a position to help the units which always need it to meet the expanding demands on them for social services falling in their legislative sphere, and this brings the two levels of government closer. Thus, in the U.S.A., intergovernmental co-operation has been built mostly around the system of conditional central grants to the States for centrally-sponsored schemes.[3]

In Australia, financial difficulties of the States have led to the establishment not only of the Commonwealth Grants Commission,[4] but also of another unique institution, the Australian Loan Council, which was created in 1927 to co-ordinate the borrowing programmes of the various governments. The Council meets once a year and consists of the Prime Ministers of the Centre and the States. Each State has one vote, but the Centre has two and a casting votes. All loans are arranged by the Centre and then distributed among the various governments in accordance with an agreed formula. This arrangement has reduced competition among the governments for funds and thus loans can now be arranged on more advantageous terms than was possible before. Besides, expedients like conditional grants, loans by the Centre to the States, income-tax sharing between the Centre and the States with an accent on State financial needs, have also come to be adopted to promote inter-governmental co-operation.

Canada has also developed some co-operative techniques, such as Central Grants to the Provinces, delegation of power by the Centre and Provinces simultaneously to some subordinate agencies created by one or the other government,[5] referential legislation, etc.

---

2. CORWIN defines co-operative federalism thus: "The States and National Governments are regarded as mutually complementary parts of a single governmental mechanism all the whose powers are intended to realise the current purposes of government according to their applicability to the problems in hand." THE CONST. OF THE U.S.A., SENATE DOC., 14 (1953).

3. Supra.

Ch. XI, Sec. M; See People of the State of New York v. O'Neill, 359 US 1 (1959) for judicial support to the development of co-operative federalism in the U.S.A.

Also, CLARK, Joint Activity between Federal and State Officials, 51 Pol. Sc. Q., 230 (1936); FRANKFURTER AND LANDIS, The Compact Clause, 34 Yale LJ 685, 688-691.

4. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. L.

5. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. M; Ch. XII, Sec. B(c).

It may be remembered that these three Constitutions were drafted in an era when laissez faire was the dominant political philosophy. The process of adjustment from laissez faire to the contemporary era of social welfare state could not be consummated without a corresponding adjustment in the constitutional norms as well. The process of constitutional amendment in each of these countries is extremely rigid. Though the courts have helped the process of adjustment by giving an extended significance to the Central powers, yet this by itself could not have sufficed to satisfy the needs of the changing panorama. The concept of 'co-operative federalism' has, therefore, provided the necessary flexibility and resiliency to an otherwise rigid constitutional framework so as to enable it to cope with the newly emerging demands and challenges.[6]

The twentieth century federalism has come to be understood as a dynamic process of co-operation and shared action between the two levels of Government, with increasing inter-dependence and centrist trends. The antiquated concept of dual federalism is nowhere a functional reality in the modern world not even in the so-called classical federal model of the U.S.A.

The framers of the Indian Constitution took due note of the emerging trend of co-operative federalism in the older federations. They realised that governments in a federation were arranged not hierarchically or vertically but horizontally, that no line of command runs from the Centre to the States, and that common policies among the various governments can be promoted not by dictation but by a process of discussion, agreement and compromise.

The States of India have a large field of administration and decision-making and it becomes essential, therefore, to create agencies to co-ordinate intergovernmental action in those fields at least where the repercussions of a State action would not be confined merely to its own boundaries but would be felt outside the State as well, or where national interests demand a uniform approach. Also, when a number of governments with divided jurisdiction function in the same territory, inter-governmental disputes and differences are bound to arise and it is essential that mechanisms be evolved to resolve and reconcile these differences amongst the various governments so that all of them may pool their resources towards the realization of the social and economic objectives for the welfare of the people. Accordingly, the framers incorporated into the Constitution, an infrastructure to promote co-operation and coordination, and minimise tensions, among the various governments. Several features and provisions of the Constitution have been deliberately designed to institutionalise the concept of Centre-State co-operation.

The provisions for enabling Parliament to legislate in the State area on the request of two or more States,[7] the scheme of financial relations between the Centre and the States,[8] grants-in-aid under Art. 282,[9] the scheme of Centre-State administrative relationship along with provision for all-India services,[10] are some of the instruments designed to promote inter-governmental co-operation and introduce the necessary flexibility in an otherwise rigid federal system.

---

6. SAWER, MODERN FEDERALISM, 70-8, 92, 100, 102-5, 122-5, 152 (1969).
7. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J(c).
8. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. K.
9. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. M.
10. Supra, Ch. XII, Secs. B and G.

In addition, the Constitution provides for the creation of many agencies with the same purpose in view, e.g., Art. 307.[11] But, even outside the Constitution, a number of bodies have been established either by statutes or by administrative decisions with a view to facilitate inter-governmental co-operation. A notable example of Centre-State co-operation is furnished by the fact-situation in the Jaora Sugar case where Parliament used its own legislative power to validate the State tax on entry of sugarcane into the premises of sugar mills, which had been declared invalid by the Supreme Court.[12]

Besides the above specific examples of co-operative federalism in India, a few more are discussed below.

B. FULL FAITH AND CREDIT

The several States in the U.S.A., before the creation of the Federation, were sovereign entities and each was thus free to ignore obligations created under the laws, or by the judicial proceedings of the other. It was, therefore, necessary to evolve a mechanism by which rights legally established in one State could be given nation-wide application, and so there is the Full Faith and Credit clause in the U.S. Constitution.[13] On the same model, the Indian Constitution has Art. 261. Since under Art. 245(1),[14] the jurisdiction of each State is confined to its own territory, it could possibly have been argued that the acts and records of one State could not be recognised in another State. Art. 261 removes any such difficulty. Art. 261(1) lays down that "full faith and credit" is to be given throughout the territory of India to 'public acts', records and judicial proceedings of the Union and the States.[15]

Article 261 is prospective and not retrospective. This provision does not apply to decrees passed before the coming into force of the Constitution. The term 'public acts' in this Article refers not only to statutes but to all other executive and legislative acts. The clause, however, does not envisage that a greater effect be given to the public act of one State in another State than it is entitled to in the 'home' State itself. Hence, an ultra vires or unconstitutional statute need not be recognised in any other State. Similarly, the issue of a permit to ply a motor vehicle on a public route, which is void on account of the grant being ultra vires the grantor, cannot be regarded as 'an act' within the meaning of this clause. The permit never had any value or life as a permit, i.e., it never came into existence, and so need not be recognised in any other State.[16] Art. 261(1) does not bar an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court by which a judgment was rendered or passed.[17]

According to Art. 261(2), the manner in which, and the conditions under which, the acts, records and proceedings referred to in Art. 261(1) are to be

---

11. Next Chapter.
12. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. B.
13. Art. IV, Sec. 1; CORWIN, WHAT THE CONST. MEANS TO-DAY, 199 (1973); JACKSON, Full Faith and Credit—Lawyer's Clause of the Const., 45 Col. LR 1 (1945). Also, Secs. 118 and 51 (XXV) of the Australian Const.
14. Supra, X, Sec. A.
15. S. Mohd. Ibrahim Hadhee v. State of Madras, 21 STC 378 (1968).
16. R. Venkitaraman v. Central Road Traffic Board, AIR 1953 TC 392.
17. Yousoof v. State of Mysore, AIR 1969 Mys 203.

proved, and the effect thereof determined shall be 'as provided by law made by Parliament'. Art. 261(2) thus empowers Parliament to lay down by law:

(a) the mode of proof, as well as,

(b) the effect of acts and proceedings of one State in another State.

Under entry 12, List III, 'recognition of laws, public acts and records and judicial proceedings' is a concurrent subject.[18] Therefore, the States are also entitled to legislate on this matter but subject to the exclusive power conferred on Parliament under Art. 261(2).[19]

Under Art. 261(3), a final judgment or order delivered or passed by a civil court in any part of India is capable of execution anywhere within India according to law. This is a constitutional provision which enjoins that a decree shall be executable in any part of the territory of India according to law. The words 'final judgment' in this clause include 'decrees' also. The clause applies to civil and not to criminal courts. A decree passed by a civil court in any other State is executable in any other State 'according to law' and the word 'law' here means 'procedural' law relating to the execution of the decrees, e.g., the law of limitation. It does not refer to the merits of the decision which cannot be re-opened in another court.[20]

The Bombay High Court passed a decree on June 29, 1960. Goa became a part of India and was made a Union Territory in 1962.[21] The Code of Civil Procedure was made applicable to Goa in 1965. The Supreme Court ruled that as the decree was passed by the Bombay High Court after the Constitution came into force, Art. 261(3) would apply to the decree in question. Further, this Article would also apply to Goa because at the time of its execution, Goa had become a part of India. The decree would be executed according to the C.P.C. which became applicable at the time of the execution of the decree.[22]

C. INTER-STATE COUNCIL

Article 263 provides that the President may by order appoint an Inter-State Council if it appears to him that public interest would be served by its establishment. The President may define the organisation, procedure and duties of the Council. Generally, it may be charged with the duty of:

(a) inquiring into and advising upon disputes which may have arisen between States;

(b) investigating and discussing subjects in which some or all of the States, or the Union and one or more of the States, have a common interest;

(c) making recommendations upon any subject and, in particular, recommendations for the better co-ordination of policy and action with respect to that subject.

---

18. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
19. See The Indian Evidence Act, Ss. 37, 57 and 81; also, The Civil Procedure Code.
20. Narsing v. Shankar, AIR 1958 All 775.
Also, Panna Lal Umediram v. Narhari S. Narvekar, AIR 1968 Goa 1; Moloji Nar Singh Rao v. Shankar Saran, AIR 1962 SC 1737 : (1963) 2 SCR 577; Narhari v. Pannalal, AIR 1977 SC 164 : (1976) 3 SCC 203.
21. See, Ch. V; Ch. IX, Sec. A, supra, for "Union Territories".
22. Narhari, ibid, at 169-170.

It appears from the above that the Council is envisaged to be an advisory body having no authority to give a binding decision. The Council's function to inquire and advise upon Inter-State disputes is complimentary to the Supreme Court's jurisdiction under Art. 131 to decide a legal controversy between the governments.[23]

The Council can deal with any controversy whether legal or not, but its function is advisory unlike that of the Court which gives a binding decision. The Council is envisaged to be a mechanism of intergovernmental consultation. The Supreme Court can decide intergovernmental disputes of a legal nature. But there may arise inter governmental disputes of a non-legal character and the Council can play a role in settling such disputes.

The Council can play a role in promoting vertical (Centre-State) and horizontal (Inter-State) Intergovernmental cooperation and co-ordination.

The Council may be appointed either on a permanent basis or from time to time on an ad hoc basis. It is also possible to appoint not only one but any number of such bodies to deal with various matters as Art. 263 is of a general nature. Such a Council could deal with any matter whether of a legal or a non-legal character in which the States themselves or the Centre and the States may be interested. The function of the Council to inquire and advise upon interstate disputes might be regarded as complimentary to Art. 131 under which the Supreme Court can decide a legal controversy among the governments.[24]

The main idea underlying the provision is to enable the creation of a regular and recognised machinery of inter-governmental consultation so that coordination may be maintained amongst the various governments in such matters as agriculture, forestry, irrigation, education, etc.

Not much use has been made of Art. 263 so far and only a few bodies of minor importance have been created under it. The Central Council of Health, created by a Presidential Order under Art. 263, consists of the Central Health Minister as the Chairman, and the State Health Ministers as members. The Council is an advisory body. Its function is to consider and recommend broad lines of policy in regard to all matters concerning health; to make proposals for legislation in this area; to examine the whole field of possible co-operation in regard to inter-State quarantine during festivals and outbreaks of epidemics; to recommend to the Central Government the method of distribution of grants-in-aid for health purposes to the States; to review the work accomplished with the help of these grants, and to establish organisations invested with appropriate functions to maintain and promote co-operation between the Central and State Health Administrations. All questions are decided by a majority of members present at a meeting.

Another similar body is the Central Council of Local Self-Government which consists of the Union Minister of Health as Chairman, and the State Ministers for Local Self-Government as members. It is an advisory body and performs the following duties: to consider and recommend broad lines of policy in regard to matters concerning local self-government; to make proposals for legislation in the area of local self-government; laying down the pattern of development for India as a whole; to examine the whole field of possible co-operation in regard to local self-government matters and to draw up a common programme of action; to recommend to the Central Government allocation of available financial assistance to local bodies including village panchayats, and to review periodically the work accomplished in the area with the Central assistance. It meets once a year and takes decisions by a majority vote.

23. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. B.
24. For discussion on Supreme Court's jurisdiction under Art. 131, see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(iii)(b).

Under Art. 263, four regional councils have been set up for making recommendations for the better co-ordination of policy and action with respect to sales tax, a State subject.[25] A regional council has been established in each of the four zones—Northern, Eastern, Western and Southern. Each regional council is to consist of the Secretary in charge of sales tax, and the Commissioner of Sales tax in each of the States and Union Territories concerned; the Deputy Secretary to the Government of India in charge of sales tax and the Deputy Secretary to the Government of India, in the Ministry of Home Affairs, in charge of the Union Territories concerned. The Under Secretary to the Government of India, in the Ministry of Finance, in charge of sales tax is to function as the Secretary of each regional council and convene its meetings. All administrative work relating to the regional councils is to be attended to by the Sales-tax Branch of the Ministry of Finance of the Government of India.

A decision taken at a meeting of a council is recommendatory in nature and is to be forwarded to the Governments concerned for implementation. If a recommendation made by a council is not implemented by a State or a Union Territory, and if the council thinks that its non-implementation would adversely affect the interests of any other State or Union Territory, the council may recommend that the matter may be discussed at a meeting of the Ministers in charge of sales tax in the States and the Union Territories comprised in the zone to be presided over by the Union Minister of State in the Ministry of Finance. A council considers matters relating to the levy of sales-tax (including Central sales-tax)[26] in any State or Union Territory in the zone.

A council is to meet at least once in six months. All questions are to be decided by a majority of votes of the members. Joint meetings of two or more regional councils can also be held if necessary. The main purpose in establishing these councils is to secure a measure of uniformity in the rates of sales tax and other matters pertaining thereto in respect of the States in each zone. Sales tax has a very close relationship with, and an indiscriminate exercise of power to levy sales tax may injure, movement of commodities in inter-State trade and commerce and hence the great need for co-ordinating the State sales taxation to the extent possible.[27]

A study team of the Administrative Reforms Commission suggested the establishment of an Inter-State Council under Art. 263 with a view to strengthen co-operation and co-ordination, and evolution of common policies, among the Central and State Governments in many areas where the measures taken by these

---

25. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. D.
26. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. D; Ch. XI, Sec. J(i).
27. S.N. JAIN, Freedom of Trade and Commerce, and Restraints on the State Power to Tax Sale in the course of Inter-State Trade and Commerce, 10 JILI, 547, 582, (1968).
For the order of the Government of India setting up the councils see Gazette of India, Extraordinary, Pt. II, Sec. 3(1), dated Feb. 1, 68, p. 43.

governments from time to time are mutually interactive.[28] The economy of the country being indivisible, it exerts constant pressure towards administrative unity. This process of co-operation among the governments can be strengthened by evolving a proper apparatus for mutual consultation.

Consultation among the Central and State Governments goes on even at present, but most of the time it is carried on through ad hoc bodies like the conferences of the Central and State Ministers dealing with various subjects. These conferences meet at irregular intervals, without much preparatory work, and often with a heavy agenda to transact within a short period. Then, there is no instrument to pursue the follow-up action on the decisions taken at these conferences. The study team, therefore, suggested that the present-day numerous ad hoc bodies should be replaced by one standing body to which issues of national importance can be referred and which can advise on them authoritatively after taking all aspects of the problem into account. A single body can look at various problems in the perspective of the whole.

The proposed council should consist of the Prime Minister, a few Central Ministers, State Chief Ministers or their nominees, and others who may be co-opted, or invited to its meetings. All issues of national importance in which States are interested can be placed before this forum except the inter-State boundary disputes, and the appointment of federal officers like the State Governors, the Chief Justice of India, the Chief Election Commissioner, etc.

The Commission endorsed the suggestion of establishing the Inter-State Council so that the inter-State or Centre-State differences may be settled by mutual discussion.[29] The Commission did not work out the details of the types of functions which such a council can discharge. It only made a general statement that "the establishment of an Inter-State Council would be conducive to better understanding."

There has been a demand for the setting up of such a council by some State Chief Ministers so that federal problems may be discussed on a formal basis. The Central Government, however, remains cool to the idea and is diffident about the advisability of creating such a body. Presumably, its misgivings are that once such a body is appointed, the States will seek to use it to intrude into those matters which fall within the decision-making area of the Central Cabinet, e.g., appointment of State Governors, application of Art. 356, etc., matters on which Centre-State controversies arise now and then.

Because of its apprehensions that some States may seek to use the council to undermine its position, the Central Government prefers to keep the processes of consultation more or less ad hoc and makes use of the provisions of Art. 263 to set up only such bodies as have well-defined and narrow terms of reference. For consultation in regard to economic matters there is the National Development Council. Nevertheless, there appears to be a good case for appointment of a non-political, advisory body under Art. 263 to keep the intergovernmental relationship under constant review, study problems in that area on an objective and dispassionate basis and project solutions of major issues. Being free of politics, its recommendations may receive a greater acceptability.[30]

---

28. REPORT OF THE STUDY TEAM, A.R.C., ON CENTRE-STATE RELATIONSHIPS, I, 294-305 (1967).
29. A.R.C., REPORT ON CENTRE-STATE RELATIONSHIPS, 32-35 (1969).
30. Such an attitude is reflected in the Report of the Rajmannar Committee appointed by the Tamil Nadu Government in 1971 to review Centre-State Relationship, Report, 24.

A model for the purpose is furnished by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations set up in the U.S.A. in 1959 with the following purposes and functions: to bring together representatives of various governments to consider common problems; to provide a forum for discussion of the administration and co-ordination of federal grant programmes requiring intergovernmental co-operation; to give critical attention to controls involved with administration of federal grant programmes; to make available technical assistance to the executive and legislative branches of the federal government in the review of proposed legislation to determine its over-all effect on the federal system; to encourage discussion and study of emerging public problems likely to require inter-governmental co-operation; to recommend within the framework of the Constitution, the most desirable allocation of governmental functions, responsibilities and revenues among several levels of government; to recommend methods for co-ordinating and simplifying tax laws and administrative practices to achieve a more orderly and less competitive fiscal relationship between the governments. The commission functions in an advisory capacity and its main task is to increase the effectiveness of the federal system by debating various alternatives. A similar body to suggest and study various alternative solutions to the issues causing friction in the inter-governmental relationship is called for in India as well.[31]

The Sarkaria Commission has again recommended the setting up of an all-embracing Inter-State Council under Art. 263. Since 1967, parties or coalition of parties other than the one running the Central Government, have come in power in the States. These State Governments of diverse hues have different views on regional and inter-State problems. In such a situation, the setting up of a standing Inter-State Council with a comprehensive charter under Art. 263 has become an imperative necessity. The council is to consist of the Prime Minister as the Chairman, all State Chief Ministers and all Union Cabinet Ministers dealing with subjects of common interest to the Union and the States as members.

The Council is to be a recommendatory body. It should be charged with duties in broad terms embracing the entire gamut of clauses (b) and (c) of Art. 263. The Council should have such investigative, deliberative and recommendatory functions as would fall within the ambit of cls. (b) and (c) of Art. 263.[32]

In 1990, in Dabur India Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[33] the Supreme Court suggested the setting up of a Council under Art. 263 to discuss and sort out problems of Central-State taxation.

D. ZONAL COUNCILS

In between the Centre and the States, Zonal Councils have been introduced in India by the States Re-organisation Act, 1956. Great heat and passion was generated in the country at the time of re-organisation of the States on the linguistic basis which imperilled the unity of the country. Therefore, Zonal Councils were created as instruments of intergovernmental consultation and co-operation mainly

---

31. WRIGHT, Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, Public Adm. Review, 193 (1965).
32. Report, 237-241.
33. AIR 1990 SC 1814 : (1990) 4 SCC 113.

in socio-economic fields and also to arrest the growth of controversies and particularistic tendencies among the various States.[34]

There exist the following five Zonal Councils:

(1) Northern—comprising the States of Punjab, Haryana, Himachal Pradesh, Rajasthan, Jammu and Kashmir, and the Union Territories of Delhi and Chandigarh.

(2) Eastern—comprising the States of Bihar, West Bengal, Orissa and Sikkim.

(3) Western—comprising the States of Gujarat, Maharashtra, Goa and the Union Territories of Daman and Diu and Dadra and Nagar Haveli;

(4) Central—comprising the States of Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh;

(5) Southern—comprising the States of Andhra Pradesh, Tamil Nadu, Karnataka and Kerala and the Union Territory of Pondicherry.

A Zonal Council consists of a Union Minister to be nominated by the Central Government, and the Chief Minister and two other Ministers from each State to be nominated by the State Government. A Union Territory in the Zone has only two members (and not three as in the case of a State) to be nominated by the Central Executive.

The Union Minister is to be the Chairman of the Zonal Council. A Chief Minister of a member-State acts as its Vice-Chairman for a year by rotation. A Zonal Council has the following advisers to assist it in the performance of its duties: a person nominated by the Planning Commission; the Chief Secretary to the Government of each State in the Zone; the Development Commissioner or any other officer nominated by the Government of each State in the Zone. An adviser is entitled to participate without the right of vote in the discussions of the Council.

A Zonal Council meets in each State in the Zone by rotation. All questions at a meeting of the Zonal Council are decided by a majority of the members present. The presiding officer has a casting vote in case of an equality of votes. Proceedings of every meeting of a Zonal Council are to be forwarded to the Central Government and also to each member-State. A Zonal Council may have a secretariat of its own. The office of the Secretary of the Council is to be held by a Chief Secretary of a member-State, by rotation, for a year at a time. The office of the Zonal Council is to be located within a member-State as determined by the Council. The administrative expenses of each Council's office are to be borne by the Central Exchequer.

A Zonal Council has rule-making power conferred on it by various sections of the Act. It may lay down rules of procedure, with the approval of the Central Government, transact business at its meetings. A Zonal Council may discuss any matter in which some State represented in it, or the Union and one or more of such States, have a common interest. It may advise the Centre and the member-States as to the action to be taken on any such matter. More particularly, a Zonal Council may discuss the following matters and make recommendations—(a) a matter of common interest in the field of economic and social planning; (b) a matter concerning water disputes, linguistic minorities or inter-State transport; (c) a matter connected with, or arising out of, the re-organisation of the States under the States Re-organisation Act.

34. LOK SABHA DEBATES, December 23, 1955, Vol. I, 880.

Joint meetings of several Zonal Councils may be held to discuss matters of common interest to the States included therein. The Central Government may make rules for regulating the procedure at joint meetings of the Zonal Councils.

Adequate provisions have been made for providing a liaison between the Centre and the Zonal Councils. The techniques adopted with this end in view are: (1) appointment of a Central Minister as the Chairman of the Council; (2) submission of the proceedings of a meeting of a Zonal Council to the Central Government; (3) appointment of the Joint Secretary of a Zonal Council by the Chairman, i.e., the Central Minister; (4) approval of the Central Government being made compulsory for the framing of the rules of procedure by a Zonal Council for its own meetings as well as those of its committees. An important feature of the present-day arrangements is that the Central Home Minister is the Chairman of all the Five Councils. This helps in fostering a uniformity of approach to common problems on the Central-Zonal and inter-Zonal basis.

Each State included in a Zonal Council enjoys a complete equality of status, as is evident from the following provisions: (1) each State has an equality of representation in the Council; (2) each Chief Minister is to act as the Vice-Chairman of the Council in rotation for a year; (3) meetings of the Council are to be held in each member State by rotation; (4) The Chief Secretary of a member State is to act as the Secretary of the Council in rotation for one year.

A significant point to note is that voting at the Council meetings is held member-wise and not State-wise, i.e., a State does not vote as a unit, but each member from a State has a right to vote. It is thus possible that representatives of a State in the Council may vote differently on a question instead of following a common line. In practice, however, this may not mean much and all members from a State would often vote the same way, because the members are the Ministers, and all Ministers should have a common approach to problems facing their State owing to the principle of collective responsibility of the Cabinet.[35]

A Zonal Council is an advisory body and has no executive or legislative function to discharge. But, perhaps, its advisory character is its strong point for, otherwise, the States might have felt that the Zonal Council was being designed to reduce their autonomy. The way the Zonal Councils have been designed does not derogate from the State autonomy in any manner. It does not impinge on the legislative or executive authority either of the Centre or of the States.

The sole aim of a Zonal Council is to promote interstate co-operation and consultation by bringing together the States in a region so that they may discuss their common problems and take co-operative action to solve them and pool their resources for the common good. The association of a Central Minister with each Council helps in promoting co-operation and consultation between the Centre and the States and evolution of common policies for the common good of the nation as a whole.

---

35. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.

However, in practice, so far the Councils do not have many spectacular achievements to their credit. Nevertheless, they have helped in developing some common approach to some regional problems. For example, the Southern Council has generally agreed on the question of safeguards for linguistic minorities in the States in the Zone. The Northern Council has been devoting its attention to the development of the crucial hilly areas in the region, to introducing uniform rates of sales tax and to promote inter-State trade and commerce within the Zone. The Eastern Zonal Council has agreed to form a common reserve police and set up a standing committee to review implementation of minority safeguards.

These bodies provide forums for development of a community of interests transcending differences and rivalries amongst the neighbouring States, especially when governments of different political complexion are in power in different States. It is perhaps possible to activate these bodies, and use them for promoting much more fruitful regional co-operation and in toning down causes of friction among the States than has been possible so far.

Reference may also be made here to the North-Eastern Council, discussed earlier, which has been set-up by Parliament under the North Eastern Council Act, 1971. This Council consists of Assam, Manipur, Meghalaya Nagaland, Tripura, Arunachal Pradesh and Mizoram. It has its own secretariat. The underlying idea is to promote co-operation among the various units in Eastern India.[36]

The Sarkaria Commission has expressed the view that the Zonal Councils have not been able to fulfil their aims and objections. The Commission has recommended that these Councils should be reactivated. The Commission has suggested that these Councils be appointed under Art. 263 so that they get the status of constitutional bodies functioning in their own right. The meetings of the Zonal Councils should be held in camera and at regular intervals, in any case not less twice a year.[37]

E. RIVER WATER DISPUTES

India has a number of inter-State rivers and river valleys. The Constitution makers anticipated that with the accent on development of irrigation and power resources, some inter-State disputes would arise regarding sharing of river-waters. The waters of an inter-State river pass through several States. Such waters cannot be regarded as belonging to any single riparian State. The waters are in a state of flow and, therefore, no State can claim exclusive ownership of such waters. No State can legislate for the use of such waters since no State can claim legislative power beyond its territory.[38] Accordingly, the Constitution confers legislative power over such rivers to Parliament. The Constitution makes special provisions for creating a suitable machinery for resolving such disputes.

Article 262(1) empowers Parliament to provide by law for adjudication of any dispute or complaint with respect to the use, distribution or control of the waters of any inter-State river or river valley.[39] This provision confers an exclusive leg-

---

36. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. C.
37. Report, 240-243.
38. In re Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal, AIR 1992 SC 522, 550 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 96(II); supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F(h).
39. See under entry 56, List I, supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.

islative power on Parliament to enact a law providing for the adjudication of disputes relating to use, distribution or control of waters of any inter-State river or river valley. The words "use, distribution and control" are of wide import and may include regulation and development of the said water. "The provisions clearly indicate the amplitude of the scope of adjudication was much as it would take within its sweep the determination of the extent, and the manner, of the use of the said waters, and the power to give directions in respect of the same.

Under Art. 262(2), Parliament may also provide that, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, neither the Supreme Court nor any other court shall exercise jurisdiction in respect of any such dispute or complaint. Art. 131 provides for the decision of inter-State disputes by the Supreme Court,[40] but Art. 262 provides that the class of disputes mentioned therein may be excluded by Parliament from the purview of the Supreme Court.

The River Boards Act, 1956, enacted by Parliament under entry 56, List I, provides for the establishment of river boards for the purpose of regulation and development of inter-State rivers and river valleys. Water is a State subject.[41] Therefore, the initiative and responsibility for development of inter-State rivers and river-valleys should primarily rest on State Governments. But, in practice, river valley projects were considerably hampered by conflict of interests among the concerned State Governments. The Act was enacted to meet this situation.

A river board may be established by the Central Government for advising the governments interested in relation to matters concerning the regulation or governance of an inter-State river or river valley. A board is appointed, however, only after consulting interested governments regarding the proposal to establish the board, the persons to be appointed as its members and the functions which it may be empowered to discharge. Persons having special knowledge and experience of irrigation, electrical engineering, flood control, navigation, water conservation, soil conservation, administration and finance are to be appointed members of a river board.

The powers and functions of such a board may be: (a) to advise the governments interested on any matter concerning the regulation or development of a specified river or river valley; (b) to advise them to resolve their conflicts by coordination of their activities; (c) to prepare schemes for regulating or developing the inter-State river or river valley; (d) to allocate among the governments the costs of executing any such scheme; (e) to watch the progress of the measures undertaken by the governments interested; (f) any other matter supplementary to the above.

The Inter-State Water Disputes Act, 1956, which has been enacted under Art. 262, provides for adjudication of disputes relating to the use, distribution or control of waters of inter-State rivers and river valleys among the concerned State Governments. When such a dispute arises, a State Government may request the Central Government to refer it to a tribunal for adjudication [S. 3] and if the Central Government is of opinion that it cannot be settled by negotiations, it would constitute a tribunal for the purposes [S. 4]. Thus, S. 4 while vesting

40. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. B.
41. Entry 17, List II, Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.

power in the Central Government for setting up a Tribunal has made it conditional upon the forming of the requisite opinion by the Central Government.

The tribunal is to consist of a chairman and two other members nominated by the Chief Justice of India from amongst those who are Judges of the Supreme Court or the High Courts. The tribunal may appoint two or more assessors to advise it. The tribunal submits its report to the Central Government which on publication becomes binding on the parties concerned. A matter referable to a river board is not to be referred to the tribunal. Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law, neither the Supreme Court nor any other court shall have any jurisdiction in respect of an inter-State water dispute which may be referred to a Tribunal [S. 11]. This provision read with Art. 262 bars the jurisdiction of all courts including the Supreme Court, to entertain adjudication of disputes which are referable to a tribunal under S. 3.

The Act also prohibits a State, within whose limits any works for the conservation, regulation or utilisation of water resources of any inter-State river have been constructed, from levying additional rate or fee in respect of the use of such water by any other State or inhabitants thereof.[42]

A lacuna in the scheme of Inter-State Water Disputes Act is that it lays down no principles or guidelines to be followed by the tribunal. The reason to take these disputes out of the purview of the courts and appoint tribunals to solve them is that rules of law based on the analogy of private proprietary interests in water do not afford a satisfactory basis for settling these disputes where the interests of the public at large in the proper use of water supplies are involved.

In spite of these statutory provisions, several disputes concerning inter-State rivers have remained pending for long among the various States, and surprisingly the machinery provided by these Acts has not been used effectively. The Central Government took the view that it was preferable to decide matters by an amicable settlement among the various Goverments and that arbitration should be invoked only as a last resort. But when this approach did not succeed, the Government of India appointed several tribunals for adjudication of inter-State disputes regarding the sharing of the waters of Krishna, Godavari and Narmada Rivers.[43]

The Centre has recently created two more bodies to promote river water development. The National Water Development Agency is a non-statutory body with all State irrigation ministers as its members. The function of the Agency is to carry out surveys, investigations and studies for the peninsular rivers development component of the national water plan. The Agency is to promote optimum utilisation of the country's water resources. This envisages the use of surplus waters of all rivers in the country. The other body is the Water Resources Development Council with Prime Minister as the chairman and all State Chief Ministers as members. The Agency will submit its reports to the Council for clearance.[44]

In the matter of Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal[45] constitutes an important judicial pronouncement in the area of Indian Federalism. The matter came before

---

42. Also see, Art. 288; supra, Ch. X, Secs. E and K; Ch. XI, Sec. D.
43. JAIN & JACOB, Centre-State Relations in Water Resources Development, XII JILI, 1 (1970); ILI., Inter-State Water Disputes in India (1971).
44. The Hindu Int'l, December 25, 1982.
45. AIR 1992 SC 522 : (1993) Supp (1) SCC 96(II).

the Supreme Court for an advisory opinion by way of reference by the President under Art. 143 of the Constitution.[46]

There has been a long standing dispute between the States of Tamil Nadu and Karnataka (Pondicherry as well) for the distribution of waters of the Cauvery River. In 1990, on a writ petition being filed by the Tamil Nadu Ryots Association, the Supreme Court taking into consideration the course of negotiations between the various States, and the length of time which had passed, held that the negotiations between the two States had failed and, therefore, directed the Central Government to constitute a tribunal under S. 4 of the Inter-State Water Disputes Act, 1956.[47]

Accordingly, the Central Government constituted a tribunal, known as the Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal, and referred the interstate water disputes to it for adjudication. The Tribunal made an interim award as regards distribution of Cauvery waters between the concerned States.

This award was not acceptable to Karnataka. With a view to make it ineffective, Karnataka issued an ordinance (which was later converted into an Act) charging the State Government with the duty to abstract every year such quantity of water as it may deem requisite from Cauvery notwithstanding anything contained in any order or decision of a tribunal. The purpose of the Act was to override the decision of the Tribunal and its implementation. The Act thus sought to defy and nullify the interim order of the Tribunal set up under an Act of Parliament. The Act also had the effect of reserving to Karnataka exclusively the right to appropriate as much water from Cauvery as it deemed necessary pending the final adjudication by the Tribunal.

It was the question of constitutional validity of this Act which was raised before the Supreme Court in the present reference. After referring to entry 56 in the Union List[48] and entry 17 in the State List[49] and several other entries in the three Lists, the Court concluded that no entry in either of the Lists refers specifically to the adjudication of interstate water disputes. Entry 56 speaks of regulation and development of inter-State rivers and river valleys and does not relate to the disputes between the riparian States with regard to the same and adjudication thereof. It is Art. 262 which gives an exclusive power to Parliament to enact a law providing for adjudication of such disputes. The provisions of Art. 262 are of wide amplitude. In the words of the Court:[50]

> "The provisions clearly indicate the amplitude of the scope of adjudication inasmuch as it would take within its sweep the determination of the extent, and the manner, of the use of the said waters, and the power to give directions in respect of the same."

Article 262 authorises Parliament by law to exclude the jurisdiction of any court including the Supreme Court in respect of any dispute or complaint for the adjudication of which provision is made in such law. The Interstate Water Dis-

---

46. See, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F(h).
47. Tamil Nadu Cauvery Neerppasana Vilaiporulgal V.N. UP Sangam v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1316 : (1990) 3 SCC 440.
Also see, 1991 AIR SCW 1286.
48. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
49. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
50. Reference was made to Entry 14, List II and Entry 97, List I: AIR 1992 SC at 547.

putes Act, ruled the Court, has been enacted only under Art. 262 and not under entry 56, List I.

The Court held the Karnataka Act as unconstitutional as it affected the jurisdiction of the Tribunal appointed under the Central Act. By enacting the said Act, Karnataka arrogated to itself the power to decide unilaterally whether the Tribunal had jurisdiction to pass the interim order or not and whether the order was binding on it or not. A Legislature cannot set aside an individual decision inter partes and affect their rights and liabilities alone. As the Act in question sought to interfere directly with the Tribunal Order, it was ultra vires the Constitution.

The State of Karnataka also presumed that until the Tribunal passes a final order, it could appropriate Cauvery waters to itself without caring for the consequences of such action on the lower riparian States. Karnataka presumed that the lower riparian States had no equitable rights and that it was the sole judge as to the share of other riparian States in the Cauvery waters. "What is further, the State of Karnataka has assumed the role of a judge in its own cause."

The Act also had an extra-territorial operation inasmuch as it interfered with the equitable rights of Tamil Nadu and Pondicherry to the Cauvery waters. The Supreme Court criticised the Karnataka Act as being against the "basic tenets of the rule of law" inasmuch as, in the words of the Court:[51]

> "The State of Karnataka by issuing the ordinance has sought to take law in its own hand and to be above the law. Such an act is an invitation to lawlessness and anarchy, inasmuch as the ordinance is a manifestation of a desire on the part of the State to defy the decisions of the judicial authorities. The action forebodes evil consequences to the federal structure under the Constitution and open doors for each State to act in the way it desires disregarding not only the rights of other States, the orders passed by instrumentalities constituted under an Act of Parliament but also the provisions of the Constitution. If the power of a State to issue such an ordinance is upheld it will lead to the breakdown of the constitutional mechanism and affect the unity and integrity of the nation."

The Court also ruled that the Tribunal could grant interim relief when the question of granting interim relief forms part of the reference. The Tribunal could pass interim orders on such material as according to it was appropriate to the nature of the interim order. On being published by the Central Government under S. 6 of the Act, such an order would become effective and binding on the parties.

There was an agreement between the States of Punjab and Haryana to share the water of River Sutlej. The Punjab Government was to construct the Sutlej-Yamuna Link canal to carry this water to the State of Haryana but it defaulted in doing so. The State of Haryana filed a suit against the State of Punjab under Art. 131[52] of the Constitution to pass a decree directing the Punjab Government to construct the canal. The Punjab Government objected to the suit pleading that it was barred by the Inter-State Water Disputes Act. The Supreme Court negatived the contention arguing that there was no water-dispute between the States as they had already agreed to share the water. The question was regarding the obligation of the Punjab Government to construct the canal as part of the agreement between the two States. The Court directed the Punjab Government to fulfil its obligation by completing the canal within a year.[53]

51. AIR 1992 SC at 552.
52. On Art. 131, see, supra, Ch. IV. Sec. C(iii)(b).

F. OTHER STATUTORY BODIES

A number of statutory bodies have been set up for promoting Centre-State co-operation and co-ordination. A few of these are mentioned here.

(a) UNIVERSITY GRANTS COMMISSION

A body of great importance in the field of university education is the University Grants Commission. According to the Constitution, university education is a concurrent subject, but co-ordination and maintenance of standards in this area is a Central charge,[54] and it is to fulfil this function that Parliament has created the Commission under the University Grants Commission Act, 1956.

The functioning of this body is of great significance in the context of Indian Federalism. The Commission functions in the area of university education and cuts across Central and State lines. It gives grants to the State Universities and thus seeks to influence their working to some extent.

Generally, the Commission is charged with the duty to take all such steps as it may think fit for promotion and co-ordination of university education and for determination and maintenance of standards of teaching, examination and research in the universities. It can enquire into financial needs of the universities, allocate grants to the Central and the State universities, recommend measures to improve university education and advise a university upon action to be taken for this purpose, advise the Central or State Governments on allocation of any grant to universities for any general or specified purpose out of the Central or State funds, advise on estabishing a new university, collect information regarding university education in India and abroad, require a university to furnish it with information regarding its financial position, standards of teaching, examination and courses of study, and perform other functions to advance the cause of higher education.

The funds of the Commission come entirely from the Centre. A distinction is drawn for purposes of grants between the Central and the State universities; for the former, the Commission grants funds both for maintenance and development, but for the latter it can do so only for development, maintenance being a charge on the concerned State Government. The Commission is an autonomous body, and ensures maintenance of minimum standards by each university.

The Commission plays the role of co-ordination and maintenance of standards in the area of university education. Its working is of interest to a student of Indian Federalism because of fragmentation of authority in the Constitution to control university education. It is also an instrument through which the Centre can supplement the financial resources of the State universities.

In the ultimate analysis, the sanction behind the Commission is financial as it can give money to a university, or withhold grants from a defaulting university, and, therefore, the efficacy of the Commission depends on the funds at its disposal. Paucity of funds has been a limiting factor on the Commission. Further, its efficacy has also been compromised somewhat by the requirement that it can give funds to the State universities only for development. These universities have, therefore, to look to the State Governments for sizeable funds, and even the Commission's grants can be frustrated by a State not matching the grants which is usually a condition attached by the Commission to its grants to the State universities. The influence of the Commission in the area of university education can be strengthened if these constraints on its functioning are removed.

53. State of Haryana v. State of Punjab, AIR 2002 SC 685 : (2002) 2 SCC 507.
54. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iii).

(b) OTHER BODIES TO CO-ORDINATE HIGHER EDUCATION

Under entry 66, List I, maintenance of standards in institutions of higher education falls exclusively within the preserve of the Central Government and no State can impinge in this area. Besides, the University Grants Commission, mentioned above, a few more bodies have been established by Parliament to maintain standards in higher education.

Parliament has enacted the Indian Medical Council Act, 1956, to set up the Medical Council of India which seeks to maintain standards in the area of medical education.[55]

For maintenance of standards in the area of technical education, Parliament has enacted the All India Council for Technical Education Act, 1987, setting up the All India Council for Technical Education. The Council grants permission to establish new technical institutions and approves starting of new technical institutions and approves starting of new courses or programmes in the country. No State Government can have a policy of its own outside the AICTE Act. If the Council grants permission to set up a technical institution, no state Government can then refuse permission for setting up that institution.[56]

(c) DAMODAR VALLEY CORPORATION

The Damodar Valley Corporation, a joint enterprise of the Centre and the two States of Bihar and West Bengal, has been established under a Central law enacted under Art. 252, to develop the inter-State valley of the Damodar River for irrigation, power and flood control.[57] The corporation consists of three members appointed by the Central Government in consultation with the two State Governments. In discharing its functions, the corporation is to be guided by instructions issued by the Centre on questions of policy. The corporation's annual reports are laid before Parliament and the concerned State Legislatures.

(d) DRUGS CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE

S. 7 of the Drugs Act, 1940, empowers the Central Government to constitute the Drugs Consultative Committee to advise the Central and State Governments on any matter tending to secure uniformity throughout India in the administration of the Act. The committee consists of two representatives of the Central Government and one representative of each of the State Governments.

---

55. Preeti Srivastava (Dr.) v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 2894 : (1999) 7 SCC 120; supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iii).
56. Jaya Gokul Educaional Trust v. Commr. & Secy. to Govt. Higher Education Deptt., AIR 2000 SC 1614 : (2000) 5 SCC 231.
57. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J(c).

This is only an illustrative, and not an exhaustive, list of statutory bodies set up to promote inter-governmental co-operation.

G. PLANNING

Since Independence, planning has been a major occupation of the Central and State Governments, and this has made a deep impact on the evolution of the Indian Federalism.

India is economically an under-developed country. With the resources being low, and demands for development being practically insatiable, it becomes incumbent that a planned effort be made to use the available resources to achieve the maximum effect. This, therefore, leads to planning and formulation of five year plans.

Planning makes intergovernmental co-operation very necessary, for in a federal structure, the governments are not arranged hierarchically. There is no line of command, but decisions have to be arrived at through discussion, agreement and compromise amongst the Centre and the States.

Planning was in the air at the time of Constitution-making and some provisions have been incorporated for the purpose in the Constitution. The Indian Constitution lays down no articulate economic philosophy, but its main thrust, as is evidenced by some of the Directive Principles[58], is towards economic democracy, economic empowerment of the weaker sections of the society, and a welfare state without which political democracy does not have much meaning for large segments of the poor people in the country. The Directive Principles obligate the Central and State Governments to play a creative role to promote socio-economic welfare of the people.

In List III, there is entry 20 which runs as: "Economic and Social Planning".[59] Planning being a matter of common interest to the Union and the States, the entry has been appropriately placed in the Concurrent List. The Constitution lays emphasis on planning. For example, the preamble to the Constitution lays emphasis on securing to all citizens "Justice, social, economic and political".[60] Then there are several Directive Principles spelling out directions and principles for the state to secure a social order for the promotion of welfare of the people, such as, Arts. 38 to 42, 43A, 45 to 48A.[61]

One of the Directive Principles lays down that the State shall strive to promote the welfare of the people by securing and protecting, as effectively as it may, a social order in which justice, social, economic and political, shall inform all the institutions of national life.

The three Lists have a number of subjects having relevance to planning. Planning being a multi-faceted subject, it spans or touches upon the socio-economic aspects of several matters in the three Lists.[62] A few items like railways, airways, defence industries, posts, telegraph and telephones, atomic energy, industries de-

---

58. Infra, Chap. XXXIV.
59. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
60. Supra, Ch. I.
61. See, infra, Ch. XXXIV.
62. For these Lists, see, Ch. X, supra.

clared to be centrally controlled and a few commodities like tea, coffee and coir, etc. fall in the exclusive Central sphere. Then, there are a number of matters in the exclusive State sphere—public health, relief of the disabled and unemployable education, agriculture, land, etc. A few items fall in the Concurrent List, e.g., labour, social security and social insurance relief, rehabilitation of the displaced persons.

In 1950, the Government of India set up the Planning Commission with the Prime Minister as its Chairman. The following functions have been assigned to the Planning Commission: (1) to make an assessment of material, capital and human resources of the country and investigate the possibilities of augmenting such of these resources as are found to be deficient in relation to the nation's requirements; (2) to formulate a plan for the most effective and balanced utilisation of the country's resources; (3) on a determination of priorities, to define the stages in which the plan should be carried out and propose the allocation of resources for the due completion of each stage; (4) to indicate the factors which are tending to retard economic development and determine the conditions which in view of the current social and political situation, should be established for the successful execution of the plan; (5) to determine the nature of the machinery which will be necessary for securing the successful implementation of each stage of the plan in all its aspects; (6) to appraise from time to time the progress achieved in the execution of each stage of the plan and recommend the adjustments of policy and measures that such appraisal might show to be necessary; and (7) to make such interim and ancillary recommendations as might on a consideration of the prevailing economic conditions, current policies, measures and development programmes, or on an examination of such specific problems as may be referred to it for advice by the Central or State Governments.

The Planning Commission has a Vice-President and a few Central Ministers and a few non-official experts as members. There is no State representative as such on the Commission which can thus be regarded as a purely Central organ. The role of the Commission is advisory. It makes recommendations to the Central Government and the National Development Council. The responsibility for taking final decisions rests with these bodies and the implementation of the plan rests with the Central and the State Governments.

There exists a close co-operation between the Commission and the Central Government because of the fact that the Prime Minister heads both these organs. Other Central Ministers are invited to the Commissioner's meetings from time to time when matters concerning their departments are being discussed. Conversely, members of the Commission may attend meetings of the Central Cabinet when economic matters are discussed there. Important economic proposals of the Central Ministries are considered by the Commission as well before these are discussed by the Cabinet. The Commission prepares the draft five years plans. The Commission is not a statutory body and has been set up by an executive order of the Government of India.

Planning in India has been unified and comprehensive in so far as the plans deal with both the Central and the State subjects. Planning by its very nature postulates a cooperative and coordinated approach between the Centre and the States. The States in India have a large field of decision-making and action, as many matters of socio-economic planning fall within their legislative sphere and implementation of most of the plan programmes fall within their administrative sphere. It therefore becomes necessary to have some mechanism to give a sense of participation to the States as well in the planning processes. With this end in view, in 1952, the National Development Council (NDC) was established.

NDC consists of the Prime Minister, the State Chief Ministers, representatives of the Union Territories, and members of the Planning Commission. In October, 1967, the membership of the NDC was enlarged by addition of all Ministers of the Union Cabinet and the Chief Ministers of the Union Territories. The functions of the Council are "to strengthen and mobilise the efforts and resources of the nation in support of the plans; to promote common economic policies in all vital spheres and to ensure the balanced and rapid development of all parts of the country."

The Council reviews the working of the plan from time to time, considers important questions of social and economic policy affecting national development, and recommends measures for the achievement of the aims and targets set out in the national plan. At times, other State Ministers whose presence may be considered necessary may also be invited to the Council's meetings. The Council is envisaged to be the supreme body in regard to planning and development; it promotes mutual consultation between the Centre and the States; it plays a significant role in reconciling the views of the Central and State Governments and in securing full co-operation and co-ordination between them in planning matters and thus ensure development of a uniform approach and outlook towards the working of the national plan.

Although the NDC is not a statutory body, its very composition gives it a unique character. It imparts a national character to the entire process of planning. It has assumed, in a way, the role of a super-decision-making body in planning matters in the entire Indian Federation.

Taking an over-all view of planning, undoubtedly, it has to be a cooperative effort between the Centre and the States right from the formulation to the stage of implementation of plans. The implementation of the five year plans is largely the responsibility of the States in regard to matters falling in Lists II and III. As regards the matters falling exclusively in List I, plans may be carried into execution either wholly by the Central agencies or through cooperative action of the Union and the State agencies. Even in regard to the matters falling within the exclusive executive jurisdiction of the Centre, executive functions can be delegated by the Centre to the States via Arts. 258(1) and 258A, discussed earlier.[63]

A very significant feature of the planning processes in India is that the Planning Commission and the National Development Council are based not on any law but on administrative decisions of the Central Government. Though there is in the Concurrent List the entry 'social and economic planning,'[64] no legislation has so far been enacted under it to set up the planning machinery. The Commission has not been given a statutory basis because of the fear that that would reduce flexibility and close relationship between the Commission and the Central Government—the two requisites necessary for successful planning.

---

63. Supra, Ch. XII, Sec. B.
64. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.

The Planning Commission, though envisaged to be only advisory, has, in course of time, become much more than that and has been characterised as the 'super economic cabinet of the country'.[65] It exercises a decisive influence on economic decisions taken by the various governments. The Planning Commission is the major agency for achieving economic and social reconstruction of the Indian society and, though not based on any statutory provision, yet profoundly influences inter-governmental relations. The State Governments get Central grants on the Commission's advice.[66] The emergence of the Commission into such a powerful body has been made possible because of the association with it of the Prime Minister and a few Central Ministers.

Because of the centralised planning, the role hitherto played by the Centre in this area has been much more significant than that of the States. Even the National Development Council, which is supposed to be the supreme body in planning matters, has not been able to pull much weight and has invariably followed the lead given by the Central Government and the Planning Commission. The Centre, on the other hand, has been able to exert influence even in the area reserved to the States under the Constitution. In some of the matters falling in this area, e.g., education, health, agriculture, co-operation, housing, etc., there are not only State programmes, but even Centrally-sponsored programmes. Then, the Centre gives large sums of money to the States in the form of grants under Art. 282[67] and loans,[68] and this helps in extending the influence of the Central Government.

The planning mechanism worked for long on an informal basis because of the co-ordinating influence exercised through one and the same political party controlling the Central and State Governments. But, with a change in the political situation, and various political parties assuming power in the States and at the Centre, certain adjustments have taken place in the planning process. The States claim a more active participation in the formulation of the plans and the laying down of priorities for themselves. This has led to some decentralisation of planning in certain areas, and an activisation of the National Development Council so that its discussions become more meaningful. Suggestions have in fact been made to give to the NDC a statutory or a constitutional basis under Art. 263.[69]

The Sarkaria Commission has suggested that the NDC be renamed as National Economic and Development Council (NEDC) and it be constituted under Art. 263. The NEDC will then have adequate flexibility and a measure of authority as it will have the constitutional sanction.

The States want more, and not less, of the Central assistance but with less strings attached. The States' insistence against Centrally-sponsored programmes had led to some shrinkage therein, but the Centre is not willing to shed these programmes completely, for in its view these are so important, like family planning, that if not nourished by it, they would languish and national interests would suffer.

---

65. A.K. CHANDRA, INDIAN ADMINISTRATION*;* The Estimates Committee of the Lok Sabha, XXI REPORT, 4 (1957-58); ADMINISTRATIVE REFORMS COMMISSION, MACHINERY FOR PLANNING, 1, 2, (1968).
66. See, supra, Ch. XI, Sec. M, under "Specific Purpose Grants".
67. Ibid.
68. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. N.
69. Supra, Sec. C, this Chapter.

The areas of stresses and strains in the planning process can be identified as follows. Each State demands a big plan for itself; no State is willing to make a tax-effort commensurate with the needs of the envisaged plan and, therefore, each State wants more and more Central assistance; no State is happy that Central assistance should be on a matching basis or tied to particular programmes; each State wants freedom to spend the Central money according to its own needs and ideas; backward States want the Centre to give them much larger funds so that their comparative backwardness may be removed at an early date; on what basis should Central funds be distributed among the States is a question on which States have divergent views, each putting forward a basis which suits it most. On the other hand, complaints are made that the State administration is weak, that there is laxity at the State end in implementing plan programmes and that Central funds are not properly utilised by the States.

Although, there is scope for greater State initiative and participation in the planning processes, it is inevitable, if the country is to make rapid strides, that the various problems are attacked from a national, rather than a regional angle, that there exists close Centre-State co-operation and co-ordination, and that the Centre's role necessarily remains dominant. This is in line with the developments in other federations as has been discussed above. It, however, needs to be emphasized that so far there is no historical parallel in federal planning on such a scale as is being attempted in India. In this respect, India's experiment is unique and it has to adjust its federal system to the demands and pressures of socio-economic planning.[70] The country has embarked on a stupendous programme of economic and social reconstruction with a view to ameliorate the conditions of the masses and create a social order based on social justice. This has neessitated a complete mobilisation of the country's resources. Indian five year plans cover practically all aspects of national life.

CO-ORDINATION BETWEEN FINANCE AND PLANNING COMMISSIONS

A problem arises in the present-day Indian Federalism because of the Planning Commission exercising some overlapping functions in the area of Centre-State fiscal relationship which makes it necessary to find ways to co-ordinate their activities. A substantial amount of money flows from the Centre to the States for execution of the Five Year Plan on the recommendation of the Finance Commission. This is done in the form of grants under Art. 282 and loans under Art. 293. Because of the exigencies of the Five Year Plans, the plan grants under Art. 282 have assumed a dominant position in the scheme of Central-State fiscal relations. This has consequently enhanced the status of the Planning Commission as well.

The Finance Commission is created by the Constitution while the Planning Commission has been established by an executive decision of the Central Government.[71] Nevertheless, since the Planning Commission is a continuous body and deals with large sums of money by way of grants under Art. 282 and loans to the States for planning purposes, while the Finance Commission comes on the scene once in five years, is an ad hoc body, and deals only with tax-sharing and 70. On Planning, see, REPORT OF THE SARKARIA COMMISSION, 361-388.

71. Supra,Ch. XI, Sec. L.

fiscal need grants,[72] the Planning Commission has come to exert a much more profound impact on the Indian Federalism than the Finance Commission.

The present-day position is that the Finance Commission does not take into account the Centre-State fiscal relationship under the plan. After the Finance Commission has made its recommendations regarding tax-sharing and grants, the Planning Commission takes over, assesses the needs and resources of the States and the Centre and plan programmes and then decides how much money should be given to each State by way of loan and grants under Art. 282.[73] The funds flowing to the States through the Planning Commission are more massive than the grants being given to the States through the Finance Commission. This development has given a new orientation to the constitutional provisions. Whereas the Constitution envisages the Finance Commission as the balance wheel of the Indian Federalism, the emergence of the Planning Commission has somewhat reduced the importance of that body.

A few suggestions have been made from time to time to co-ordinate the roles of the two bodies. It is not feasible to enlarge the functions of the Finance Commission so as to bring within its ambit the plan grants as well, because it will have serious repercussions on the planning processes. Allocation of plan assistance is intimately connected with the formulation of the plan and Planning Commission must take an active part in this process. Then, plan grants to the States are assessed annually while the Finance Commission sits once in five years. If the achievements of the plan targets by the States were to be assessed by the Finance Commission once in five years, that will leave the States free to spend the money as they like for five years and, thus, the whole planning process will go awry. Nor is it possible to entrust the functions of the Finance Commission to the Planning Commission, for the Planning Commission has no statutory or constitutional basis and the Government does not want to formalize this body otherwise the flexibility in planning processes may be lost. Also, its composition has a political element in so far as the Prime Minister is its chairman, and a few Central Ministers are amongst its members, while the Finance Commission is envisaged to be a non-political body, and the States may not like this arrangement.

It is also not feasible to restrict the Finance Commission to tax-sharing, and give the question of fixing the grants—both under the fiscal need and Art. 282—to the Planning Commission, for it is not possible to consider tax-sharing in isolation from fiscal need grants and vice versa. The common purpose of both is to close the ordinary revenue gap of the States. On the whole, therefore, it appears that the present arrangement of the Finance Commission not interesting itself in the plan grants and leaving that to the Planning Commission would have to continue.[74] The Sarkaria Commission has also come to the conclusion that the two bodies be maintained as they are. The Commission has observed:[75]

> "We are of the view that the present division of responsibilities between the two bodies, which has come to be evolved with mutual understanding of their

---

72. Ibid.
73. Supra, Ch. XI, Secs. M and N.
74. A.R.C., MACHINERY FOR PLANNING, op. cit., 31; JAIN, JAHRBUCH, note 1, on 823, at pp. 505-510.
75. REPORT, 284.

comparative advantage in dealing with various matters in their respective spheres, should continue".

Some co-ordination between the two Commissions has however been achieved. The five-year period for which the Finance Commission makes its recommendations now coincides with the period of the five-year plan and so it is easy for the Planning Commission to make necessary adjustments in the plan grants in the light of the recommendations of the Finance Commission. Further, a member of the Planning Commission is now nominated to the Finance Commission.

H. CAN THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION BE CHARACTERISED AS FEDERAL?

An academic question raised time and again is whether the Indian Constitution can be characterised as federal. Some scholars hesitate to consider the Indian Constitution as 'truly' federal and they use such epithets for it as 'quasi-federal', 'unitary with federal features' or 'federal with unitary features.'[76] According to WHEARE, the Constitution of India is 'quasi-federal,' and not 'strictly federal'.[77] WHEARE'S view is that federalism involves that the general and regional governments should each, within a sphere, be 'co-ordinate' and 'independent.'[78] JENNINGS has characterised it as a 'federation with a strong centralizing tendency.'[79] A few scholars, however, accept it as a federal constitution.[80] Austin describes it as a co-operative federation.[81]

How has the judiciary characterised the Constitution? The attitude of the Supreme Court towards the federal portion of the Constitution has been rather twofold. In contests between a government and an individual (and most of the cases have been of this type), the Court has invariably given an expansive interpretation to the government's legislative power (whether of the Central or the State Government) and has upheld the law.[82] On the other hand, in contests between the Centre and a State, the court has shown its strong predilection for a strong Centre and has, consequently, underplayed the federal aspects of the Constitution.

The Court adopted this strategy to counter the exaggerated claims of the States regarding their position, status and powers vis-a-vis the Centre. For instance, in West Bengal v. India,[83] the Supreme Court projected the traditional view of federalism and characterised the Indian Constitution as not being "true to any traditional pattern of federation." The Court said so to counter the State claim for sovereignty and applying the doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities to the fullest

---

76. Supra, Ch 1, Sec. E(l).
Also see, P.K. TRIPATHI, FEDERALISM, THE REALITY AND THE MYTH, (1974) Jl. Bar Council of India, 251.
77. WHEARE, FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, 27-8 (1964); 48 All LJ 21.
78. WHEARE, ibid., 10, 33. WHEARE, MODERN GOVERNMENT, 18 (1971).
79. SOME CHARACTERISTICS OF THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION, 1.
80. NICHOLAS, The Constitution of India, 23 Australian LJ 639; ALEXANDROWICZ, CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENTS IN INDIA, 155-70; GLEDHILL, REPUBLIC OF INDIA, COMM. SERIES, 74 (1964).
81. THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION—CORNERSTONE OF A NATION, 187.
82. Supra, Ch X, Sec. G(i).
83. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii)(d).

extent in their favour and against the Centre. The Court could have possibly reached the same result, e.g., upholding the validity of the impugned Central Act by taking the prevailing balanced view of federalism as explained below. On the other hand, SUBBA RAO, J., in his bid to bolster the position of the States against the Centre, took recourse to the extreme view of competitive and dual federalism which has long been discarded in the older federations.

In State of Rajasthan v. Union of India,[84] BEG, C.J., sought to judge the Indian federalism by the yardstick propounded by WHEARE (which is not generally accepted now) and characterised the Constitution as "more unitary than federal," and having the 'appearances' of a federal structure. He also went on to say:[85]

> "In a sense, therefore, the Indian Union is federal. But, the extent of federalism in it is largely watered down by the needs of progress and development of a country which has to be nationally integrated, politically and economically co-ordinated, and socially, intellectually, and spiritually uplifted."

These observations were made to justify the exercise of Central powers under Art. 356. And, again, in Karnataka v. Union of India,[86] BEG, C.J., said: "Our Constitution has, despite whatever federalism may be found in its structure, so strongly unitary features also in it...." This argument was adopted to counter the State argument that instituting inquiries by the Centre into the conduct of State ministers violated the federal principle.

In Bommai,[87] several Judges have characterised the Indian Federalism in different ways. The case concerned the exercise of the power of the Central Government under Art. 356. AHMADI, J., described the Indian Constitution, following K.C. WHEARE, as "quasi-federal" because "it is a mixture of the federal and unitary elements, leaning more towards the latter".[88] But other Judges have expressed a more balanced view. Thus, SAWANT, J., has observed:[89]

> "Democracy and federalism are essential features of our Constitution and are part of its basic structure."

JEEVAN REDDY, J., has observed:[90]

> "The fact that under the scheme of our Constitution, greater power is conferred upon the Centre vis-a-vis the States do not mean that States are mere appendages of the Centre. Within the sphere allotted to them, States are supreme. The Centre cannot tamper with their powers. More particularly, the courts should not adopt an approach, an interpretation, which has the effect of or tends to have the effect of whittling down the power reserved to the States."

Federalism in India 'is not a matter of administrative convenience, but one of principle'.

Accordingly, as already discussed earlier, in Bommai, the Supreme Court has developed a more balanced approach to Art. 356.[91]

---

84. Supra, Ch. XIII, Secs. C & D.
Also see, Ch. IV, Sec. C(iii)(b).
85. AIR 1977 SC at 1382 : (1997) 3 SCC 592.
86. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. C.
87. S.R. Bommai v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 1918 : (1994) 3 SCC 1.
88. Ibid., 1951.
89. Ibid, 1977.
90. Ibid., 2053.
91. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. D.

It is, therefore, worthwhile to consider the nature of the Indian Constitution vis-a-vis the other federal constitutions and to see how far the views expressed above are justified.

The U.S. Constitution has been regarded as the epitome of the classical federalism. America started on its federal career with a weak Centre and an accent on States' rights. The reason was that the U.S. Constitution came into being as a result of a voluntary compact among the pre-existing States which conceded rather limited powers to the Centre. Naturally, the Centre born of such a historical process could only get limited powers. A similar process occurred in Australia. Also, the U.S. Constitution was the product of the laissez faire era which signified minimum government and maximum private enterprise. In course of time, however, things have changed. The powers of the Centre have expanded phenomenally since 1787 and correspondingly the powers of the States have shrunk. This has been achieved without any explicit amendment of the Constitution but through ingenious legislative devices and judicial tolerance thereof and also through judicial activism.

The courts have interpreted the constitutional provisions liberally in favour of the Centre. The judicial activism in the USA has played a sterling role in the expansion of the Centre's powers over time. The courts through their liberal interpretation of the Constitution have helped in substantial extension of the legislative power into fields which were originally regarded as belonging to the States. The courts have played the significant role as the balance wheel for harmonious adjustment of Centre-State relations.

The Centre's vast financial resources have led to the emergence of the system of grants-in-aid; centripetal forces have been generated and the Centre has become very powerful.[92] Today it can not plausibly be asserted that the States in the U.S.A. are co-ordinate with the Central Government as their position is definitely weaker vis-a-vis the Centre. The process has been aided by such factors as tense international situation, wars, vast economic and technological developments, replacement of the laissez faire by the social welfare era, etc.

This trend may be strikingly illustrated by referring to an interesting case. As a result of the Depression during the 30's, the U.S. Government desired to introduce a scheme of unemployment compensation. The U.S. Constitution confers no legislative power on the Centre for the purpose. What the Centre, therefore, did was to impose a tax on the pay rolls of the employers, granting a credit up to 90% if a State imposed a similar tax; provision was also made for grants to the States for assisting them to administer the scheme of unemployment compensation. The fund to be collected by the States was to be used for affording unemployment compensation. The Centre, thus, placed enormous economic pressure on the States to adopt the scheme.[93]

The truth is that overtime there has been a continuous expansion of the functional role of the Federal Government. This has completely altered the balance of powers in favour of the Central Government. No longer can it be asserted that the States have a coordinate status with the Centre. It is the Central Government which play a dominant role in the governance of the country so much so that a

92. Supra, Ch. XI, Secs. K(b); M.
93. Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 US 548 (1937); Also, Helvering v. Davis, 301 US 619 (1937).

constitutional scholar has suggested that the "surge" in the USA is towards 'organic federalism' "similar to the surge towards cooperative federalism" of the late 1930s". He characterises 'organic federalism' as "federalism in which the Centre has such extensive powers, and gives such a strong lead to Regions in the most important areas of their individual as well as their cooperative activities, that the political taxonomist may hesitate to describe the result as federal at all."[1]

The Canadian Constitution, to start with, definitely laid an accent on the Centre. In course of time, however, the Privy Council, by its process of interpretation weakened the Centre and exalted the Provinces.[2] This was the result of the assertion of bilinguism and bi-culturism by Quebec—a French majority Province. The Central power to veto provincial legislation has also come to be used sparingly as a result of growth of conventions. On the whole, therefore, the Provinces in Canada have greater freedom of action than the units in other Federations, and this has at times been inconvenient and embarrassing to the Centre, primarily in the area of foreign relations and economic matters.

During the war, however, the Centre acquires vast powers as a result of a liberal interpretation of the general clause. A system of conditional grants-in-aid is now emerging and other expedients of Central-Provincial collaboration are being created. Frequent Central-Provincial Conferences are held to discuss issues pertaining to their relations inter se. In the wake of the demise of the laissez faire era, the powers of the Central Government have been strengthened. By a constitutional amendment in 1940, the Centre was given power to provide unemployment insurance; and, in 1950, old age pension was made a subject of concurrent jurisdiction.

The Australian Constitution although characterised judicially as a true federation, as in the beginning the Centre's powers were limited and the accent was on the States, has, in course of time, undergone a significant metamorphosis and has moved towards centralization. The Centre has become very powerful as a result of the process of judicial interpretation of its powers,[3] conditional grants-in-aid, fiscal need grants to the deficit States on the recommendation of the Grants Commission,[4] emergence of the financial agreement amongst the Centre and the States under which the Centre has assumed extensive financial powers. Borrowing powers of the States are controlled through the Loan Council.[5]

The enormous Central power was manifested in 1942 when the Centre unilaterally excluded the States, without their consent, from the field of income-tax. Under the Constitution, both can levy the tax.[6] During the war, the Centre desired the States to vacate the field in lieu ofgrants. The States did not agree. Thereupon, the Centre passed a number of statutes imposing a very high rate of income-tax (18 s. in the £); Central tax dues were given a priority over State taxes; grants were to be given to those States which desisted from levying the income-tax; and the Centre requisitioned the State income-tax staff. The States found it impossible to levy the tax and so they had to vacate the field.[7] The war-time

1. SAWER, MODERN FEDERALISM, 125-126.
2. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. L.
3. Ibid.
4. Supra, Ch. XI, Secs. M; K(b).
5. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. N.
6. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. I.
7. South Australia v. The Commonwealth, 65 CLR 373 (1942).

scheme has now become a permanent feature in Austraila and has been judicially sanctioned in peace-time.[8] After the demise of laisser faire era, the powers of the Centre increased because of the needs to provide social welfare to the people. For example, in the Pharmaceutical Benefits case,[9] a Central scheme to provide free pharmaceutical benefits to the people was judicially invalidated. This led to the amendment of the Constitution empowering Parliament to provide a number of social services to the people.

From the above brief description of the developments in the three federations, it becomes clear that the classical concept of a federation envisaging two parallel governments of coordinate jurisdiction, operating in water-tight compartments is nowhere a functional reality now. There is no fixed, static or immutable format of a federal constitution. Each country adapts and moulds the federal idea to its peculiar circumstances, conditions and needs.

It is thus clear from the above discussion that all the older federations have also exhibited centralising and centripetal tendencies and the constituent units do not enjoy a co-equal status with the Centre. In each of these federations, in course of time, the Centre has assumed a very dominant position. During the last several decades, an inevitable trend the world over has been the strengthening of the Central Government.

Undoubtedly the accent of the Indian Constitution is on the Centre which has been made more powerful vis-a-vis the States. This has been done for some very good indigenous reasons.

First, there is the historical background. In India, the historical process to create the federal system was different from what happened in the other federations as stated above. For long, before 1935, British-India had been administered on a unitary basis. There existed a unitary system. In 1935, the unitary system was replaced by a federal system. The present federal system was built on the foundation of the 1935 system. It was therefore inevitable that because of its lineage the federal system had a unitary bias.

The Indian federalism was not a result of a compact between several sovereign units but a result of conversion of a unitary system into a federal system. Here the movement has been from unity to union, from unitarism to federalism, unlike other countries where the historical process has been for separate units to come together to form the federal union.[10] In India, it was rather the reverse process, viz. to convert a unitary Constitution into a federal Constitution. In West Bengal v. Union of India, the Supreme Court took note of this process and rejected the claim of the States that they shared sovereignty with the Centre.[11]

Secondly, the past history of India conclusively establishes that in the absence of a strong Central Government, the country soon disintegrates. This belief was

---

8. Victoria and New South Wales v. The Commonwealth, 99 CL R 575 (1957).
9. Attorney General for Victoria v. The Commonwealth, 71 CLR 223.
10. Until the passage of the Government of India Act, 1935, British India formed a completely unitary government and the Provinces derived their powers from the Central Government. The Act of 1935 then provided for a federal structure, but this part of the Act did never really function. Because of the Second World War, India was governed more as a unitary State rather than a federal State. So far as the pre-Constitution princely States are concerned, the process has been one of integration by agreement: Supra, Ch 1.
11. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii)(d).

strengthened by the recent partition of the country. Therefore, adequate precautions have to be taken against any such future contingency by making the Centre strong. Owing to its vastness of territory and variety of people, India could not be governed efficiently as a unitary state and so a unitary Constitution was out of question. The second best alternative, therefore, before the framers of the Constitution was to adopt the federal principle with a strong Centre. Their approach was not theoretical or that of constitutional puritanism but pragmatic and was conditioned by considerations of unity and welfare of the country as the guiding objectives. India had already undergone one partition on the eve of the Constitution-making and its memories were very fresh in their minds and, therefore, they put a great stress on promoting unity in the country so as to ensure that fissiparous tendencies were kept in check.

In this connection, the following observation of the Sarkaria Commission may be taken note of:[12]

> "The primary lesson of India's history is that, in this vast country, only that polity or system can endure and protect its unity, integrity and sovereignty against external aggression and internal disruption, which ensures a strong Centre with paramount powers, accommodating, at the same time, its traditional diversities. This lesson of history did not go unnoticed by the framers of the Constitution. Being aware that, notwithstanding the common cultural heritage without political cohesion, the country would disintegrate under the pressure of fissiparous forces they accorded the highest priority to the ensurance of the unity and integrity of the country".

Thirdly, being an underdeveloped country, India had to force the pace of economic development in order to compress into decades the progress of the centuries. This could be achieved by mobilising and judiciously using the national resources and this could be done best only under Central direction and leadership.

Lastly, a common feature of all the modern federations is an accent on the Centre. As discussed above, such countries as Australia and America, which started on their federal career with an emphasis on the States, with the Centre having been assigned a limited role, have seen the transformation of the Centre becoming very powerful and the States having relatively gone down. Need has been felt in these federations for a strong Centre so that the defence, and complex socio-economic problems of an industrialised society, may be tackled effectively. Each of the three federations, in varying degrees, has exhibited this tendency, and this provides a justification to make the Centre strong in India.

There has been a continuous expansion of the functional role of the Central Government. Such expansion has completely altered the federal balance of powers in favour of the national government. The framers of the Indian Constitution took due note of these changing concepts and functional realities in other federations. They consciously designed the federal portion of the Indian Constitution with a strong Centre partly because of the experiences of the other federal systems and partly because of the needs of the country, viz., security and development.

The framers did not adopt a doctrinaire approach based on the out-moded concept of classical federalism but adopted a functional approach and devised a system in tune with the peculiar needs, traditions and aspirations of the Indian people. Indian federalism is a sui generis system. In devising the federal system, the framers of the Constitution sought to ensure its vitality as well as its adaptability to the changing needs of a dynamic society.

---

12. REPORT, 7.

Merely because the Centre enjoys predominance over the States to some extent, the Indian Constitution does not cease to be federal. Federal form of government has no fixed connotation. No two federal constitutions are alike. Each federal government has its own distinct character. Each is the culmination of certain historical processes. One basic feature of each federation however is that there is a division of powers between the Centre and the regional units by the Constitution itself. If the essence of federalism is the existence of units and a Centre, with a division of functions between them by the sanction of the Constitution, then these elements are present in India. In normal times, the States in India have a large amount of autonomy and independence of action. The Indian federal scheme seeks to reconcile the imperatives of a strong Centre with the need for State autonomy.

The States have substantial legislative powers and have control over most of the nation-building activities.[13] They have a full-fledged parliamentary form of government.[14] At no time are they regarded as delegates or agents of the Centre. They subsist not at the sufferance of the Centre but derive their sanction and powers from the same Constitution from which the Centre draws its sanction and powers. In course of time, many conventions have been evolved making the States more autonomous in practice than what it looks to be in theory. An independent judiciary acts as an umpire between the Centre and the States. The process of amending the Constitution is not unilateral so far as the federal portion is concerned, and at least half the States must agree before a proposed amendment can become effective.[15]

Within the sphere assigned to the States by the Constitution, the State Legislatures have plenary power. No fetter or limitation can be read on the legislative power of a State Legislature outside the Constitution.[16] The States have independent and substantial sources of revenue;[17] they have executive power in the exclusive field (List II) and in the Concurrent field.[18] On the whole, the Indian Union is never so closely knit as a unitary polity, nor, it is so loose as a confederation.

What are the provisions in the Constitution which are supposed to go against the principle of federalism? Parliament has power to re-organise the States but here also the States are to be consulted and, further, India being a Union of States, the States have to exist as component units.[19] The existence of several inter-State boundary disputes for long, as between Mysore and Maharashtra, or Punjab and Haryana, prove that Parliament does not act unilaterally in such matters but only after consensus has been reached between the contending parties

---

13. Supra, Ch. X, Secs. E and F.
14. Supra, Chs. VI and VII.
15. Infra, Ch. XLI.
16. The State Legislature's competence to legislate on an entry in List II is plenary and it cannot be circumscribed by any assurances given by the government: Umeg v. Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 540 : (1955) 2 SCR 164; State of Kerala v. Gwalior Rayon Silk Mfg. Co., AIR 1973 SC 2734 : (1973) 2 SCC 713; supra, Ch II, Sec. M.
17. Supra, Ch, XI, Sec. D.
18. Supra, Ch. XII, Sec. A.
19. Supra, Ch. V.

themselves. In actual practice, today, the power to re-organise the States is proving to be a source of embarrassment rather than of strength to the Central Government. Then, there is the provision relating to the appointment of the Governor by the Centre. But here a convention has grown to consult the State Chief Minister.[20]

There are the provisions in the Constitution requiring in some cases Central assent to State legislation. But whatever the letter of the Constitution, in practice, by and large, Central assent is accorded to State legislation as a formality and there are not many instances of the Centre vetoing the State legislation. The one conspicuous example of this has been that of the Kerala Education Bill, over which public sentiment in the State ran high, but here also the Centre obtained the advisory opinion of the Supreme Court before remitting it back to the State Legislature for suitable amendments in the light of the Court's opinion.[21]

The Central financial support to the States, as already pointed out, is provided largely under the Constitution and through the Finance Commission, an independent body, and this does not compromise State autonomy.[22] The aid given by the Centre to the States for fulfilment of the plans is on the advice of the Planning Commission, and the National Development Council in which all the States are represented.[23] Further, provision of Federal grants-in-aid to the units is now a common feature of every federation and India is no exception to this trend.[24]

The emergency provisions of the Constitution have at times been held as constituting a major deviation from pure federalism.[25] These provisions are designed for temporary use only; by their very nature they cannot be of normal occurrence. Art. 352 is to be invoked only when its need is demonstrable,[26] and this is much more so now after the 44th Amendment. Further, in an emergency, the behaviour of each federal Constitution is very different from that in peace-time.[27]

Article 356, as has already been discussed,[28] is meant to be used only when constitutional machinery is not functioning properly in a State, and that is an exceptional, not a normal, situation. It may be hoped that with the passage of time people will get the necessary training, outlook and discipline to work democratic institutions, and then the States will have stable Ministries and the provision will fall into desuetude. In Bommai,[29] the Supreme Court has now spelled out a few restrictions on the invocation of Art. 356. Further, the composition of the two Houses presently is such, that it is not possible to invoke Art. 356 in relation to a State unless there is national consensus to do so.[30] On the whole, the Central power has weakened in this respect.

Under Art. 252, which introduces a kind of flexibility in the distribution of powers, the States come into picture as the Centre cannot take over the State

---

20. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. A(i).
21. AIR 1958 SC 956 : 1959 SCR 995; Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F(c).
22. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. L.
23. Supra, Sec. G, this Chapter.
24. Supra, Ch, XI, Secs. K(i) and (ii); M.
25. Supra, Ch. XIII, Secs. A and B.
26. Ibid.
27. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. L.
28. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. D.
29. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. E(b).
30. Supra, Ch. II.

matter without their co-operation and initiative.[31] Only under Art. 249, the Centre acts unilaterally, but it is for an extremely short period and in national interest,[32] and if the theory that the Rajya Sabha represents the States is tenable,[33] then even in this case it can be said that the States' consent is there, if not directly at least indirectly. In any case, so far, this provision has been used very sparingly.

The States Re-organisation Commission has put the matter in the right perspective. "These special provisions", observes the Commission, "however, are primarily remedial in character and are meant to prevent a breakdown in the States and to safeguard the powers of the Union within its own sphere. They do not detract from the fact that under the Constitution the States constitute cornerstones of the political and administrative structure of the country with a real measure of autonomy."[34]

As regards the Centre-State administrative relationship, it has already been pointed out that the Centre depends too much on the States for administrative purposes.[35]

The Constitution introduces mechanism for intergovernmental cooperation. Many more bodies have emerged for this purpose through legislation and administrative orders and practices.

It may also not be out of place to mention here that a good deal of what is explicitly stated in the Indian Constitution in the area of the Centre-State relations is found to be implicit in other federal constitutions. For example, the mechanism of conditional grants mentioned in Art. 282 has come into vogue in all federations although not stated explicitly in the constitutions. In the U.S.A. and Australia, the system is based on the Centre's spending power.[36] The concept of emergency is expressly mentioned in the Indian Constitution in Art. 352. By and large, the same effect is achieved in the USA and Australia under their war power and in Canada under the general power."[37] Art. 355 has its parallel in the USA in Art. IV, Sec. IV.[38]

Thus, considering the whole of the constitutional process—not only the letter of the Constitution but the practices and conventions that have grown thereunder—the Indian Constitution can justifiably be called federal. It is not necessary to use such an inarticulate term as 'quasi-federal' to characterise it. The term 'quasi-federal' is extremely vague as it does not denote how powerful the Centre is, how much deviation there is from the pure federal model, or what kind of special position a particular quasi-federation occupies between a unitary State and a federation proper?

The fundamental principle of federalism is that the legislative and executive authority is partitioned between the Centre and the States not by means of an ordinary law passed by the Centre, but by something more enduring, viz., the Con-

---

31. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J(c).
32. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. J(a).
33. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. B.
34. REPORT, 42.
35. Supra, Ch. XII.
36. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. M.
37. Supra, Chs. X, Sec. L and XIII, Sec. A.
38. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. C.

stitution.[39] That is what the Indian Constitution does. The States do not depend upon the Centre, for in normal times, the Centre cannot intrude in their domain. It may be that the Centre has been assigned a larger role than the States, but that by itself does not detract from the federal nature of the Constitution, for it is not the essence of federalism to say that only so much, and no more, power is to be given to the Centre. There is also no immutable line of demarcation in any other federation between the Centre and the States, and the balance of power has always been shifting in favour of the Centre as has been pointed out above.

The concept of 'dual federalism', viz., that, in a federation, the general and regional governments are 'co-ordinate and independent' and competitors for power, is based on a reading of the 18th century version of the U.S. Constitution. In its operation today, this Constitution is very different from what it was in the past. Similar is the case in Australia. The truth is that the old orthodox theory of 'dual federalism', as propounded by WHEARE, does not accord with contemporary realities and is no longer tenable or viable.[40] It is extremely difficult to sustain the argument, in the light of the evolution of the so-called true federal constitutions, that federalism must necessarily accord with a fixed, standard or immutable mould.

There is nothing static about the federal concept. Today there is no country which may be said to have 'pure' federalism in the sense of there being a complete dichotomy of functions, or a complete equality of status, between the Centre and the States.[41] In fact, in all federations, as pointed out above, the modern accent is on 'co-operation' between the Centre and the States, rather than on 'independence' of the States.[42] And for successful working of a 'co-operative federalism', it is necessary that the Central Government be in a position to provide leadership to the regional governments, to co-ordinate their activities, to guide them, to help them and, perhaps, on occasions to pressurize them to act in a particular direction if the national interest so demands.

An appraisal of the whole constitutional process including the latest developments in the field of Federal-State financial relations in the U.S.A., Australia and Canada, will make it clear that each of these countries is Centre-oriented today, and the centre of gravity has definitely moved in favour of the Centre. So is the

---

39. SAWER, MODERN FEDERALISM, 127, suggests that the most important feature of federalism "is the creation of an area of guaranteed autonomy of each unit of the system. Since the secular trend is towards the increase of authority of the Centre, the question of federalism or no federalism becomes in practice whether the area of autonomy is sufficient to be worth considering and whether the guarantee is sufficiently effective."

40. WHEARE, MODERN GOVERNMENT, 18 (1971).

As SCHWARTZ points out, the doctrine of dual federalism was based upon the notion of two mutually exclusive, reciprocally limiting, fields of power, the governmental occupants of which confronted each other as absolute equals: AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 42; also, 163, 184-185 (1955).

41. According to FRIEDRICH, federalism should not be seen 'only as a static pattern or design, but defined in 'dynamic' terms. "Federal relations are fluctuating relations in the very nature of things." Federalism is a "process, an evolving pattern of changing relationships rather than a static design regulated by firm and unalterable rules." He maintains that 'dual federalism' is no longer "a realistic description of the actual working of American federalism in which co-operation has replaced competition to a considerable extent." "More and more, the States appear as administrative subdivisions of the nation, government survivals of another day which must be supported by grants-in-aid, supervised and co-ordinated by growing federal bureaucracy."

CARL J. FRIEDRICH, TRENDS OF FEDERALISM IN THEORY AND PRACTICE, 7, 24, 173, (1968).

42. Supra, Sec. A, this Chapter.

case in India. Although the accent on the Centre appears to be more pronounced, yet this is mainly because, being the latest member of the federal family, much of what happens elsewhere underneath the surface of the Constitution, has been explicitly incorporated in its fabric. It may, however, be noted that the centralising trends in other federations have not yet ceased or been contained; they continue to operate and are bound to change the constitutional complexion further in course of time.

In India itself, apart from the constitutional provisions the centralising tendencies were also accentuated by the fact that one national party held sway both at the Centre and in the States. But now the State Governments belong to different political parties. The monopoly of power by the Congress Party was broken in 1967 and this has become accentuated since then. This development has thrown an apple of discord in the Central-State relationship.

Within the last few years, a significant change has occurred in the complexion of the Central Government itself. The Central Government to-day is not constituted by a single all India political party; it is now a coalition of several political parties-national as well as regional parties. Accordingly, the policies evolved by the Central Government is the product of the balance of national and regional aspirations and perceptions.

Demands have been raised from time to time for re-ordering of the Indian federalism. This trend became pronounced as various political parties came on the scene and the Centre and the States fell under the sway of several political parties rather than remain under a single party. It is inevitable, therefore, that in course of time, the States gain in stature and improve their bargaining position vis-a-vis the Centre.

It is interesting to note in this connection that the Government of Tamil Nadu, dissatisfied with the Constitution, appointed a Committee in 1969, known as the Rajamannar Committee, "to examine the entire question regarding the relationship that should subsist between the Centre and the States in a federal set up, with reference to the provisions of the Constitution of India, and to suggest suitable amendments to the Constitution so as to secure to the States the utmost autonomy."

The Committee in its report issued in 1971 criticised certain aspects of the Indian Constitution because they were not reconcilable, in the opinion of the Committee, with the standard set by it, viz., co-ordinate and dual federalism.[43] But the Committee accepted the position that the power vested in the Centre "does not reduce the status of the States to that of administrative units in a unitary government as in the days of the British Rule."[44] The Committee suggested some modifications in the Constitutional provisions relating to the distribution of legislative and taxing powers, emergency, etc.

While no harm is done by raising a public debate on the issues involved, and by making necessary adjustments in the Constitution, if found necessary, the point remains that the theoretical, a priori, criticism of the Constitution by in-

---

43. Report, 16.

44. M.C.J. KAGZI, A Critique of the Rajamannar Committee Report, in I.L.I., CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENTS SINCE INDEPENDENCE, 255 (1975).
Also, M.P. JAIN, Background Paper, supra, note 1 on 690.

voking the orthodox concept of 'dual federalism' is not tenable as that concept is no longer valid in modern federalism. Amendments in the Constitution can only be justified if they better serve, and promote, public interest and welfare, and not merely because of any theoretical considerations. It will be necessary to evaluate any proposed amendment from the point of view of its impact on other States as well. The proposals made by the Rajamannar Committee suffer from an extreme over-statement of the case for State autonomy. These proposals did not evoke much public enthusiasm and were endorsed neither by any State Government nor by any All India political party, and the report became a dead letter.

The matrix of Centre-State relationship was also considered by the Administrative Reforms Commission. In its report issued in 1969, the Commission came to the conclusion that "the basic Constitutional fabric of ours is quite sound and must remain intact." Further, in the opinion of the Commission: "No constitutional amendment is necessary for ensuring proper and harmonious relations between the Centre and the States, inasmuch as the provisions of the Constitution governing Centre-State relations are adequate for the purpose of meeting any situation or resolving any problems that may arise in this field." The Commission rightly observed that the Constitution was flexible enough to ensure its successful working irrespective of whichever party may be in power, provided that those who are in power mean to work it and not wreck it.[45] The Government of India agreed with this view of the Commission.[46]

These exercises did not give a quietus to the demand for revising the Central-State relationship. The demand for the same has been made from time to time.[47] The demand became more voiceferous with the emergence of several State governments (Tamil Nadu, Karnataka, Andhra Pradesh, West Bengal and Jammu and Kashmir) belonging to the regional political parties other than the national political party in power at the Centre.

In 1983, in response to an insistent demand to review the Centre-State relations, the Central Government appointed the Sarkaria Commission under the Chairmanship of Justice R.S. SARKARIA, a retired Judge of the Supreme Court, with the following terms of reference: to examine and review the working of the existing arrangements between the Union and States in regard to powers, functions and responsibilities in all spheres and recommend such changes or other measures as may be appropriate keeping in view "the social and economic developments that have taken place over the years and have due regard to the scheme and framework of the Constitution which the founding fathers have so sedulously designed to protect the independence and ensure the unity and integrity of the country which is of paramount importance for promoting the welfare of the people." Thus, the terms of reference for the Commission specifically laid emphasis that the Commission would in making its recommendations give due regard to the need for maintaining the unity and integrity of the country.

The Commission presented its report in 1988. In its report while the Commission suggested some adjustment in the Centre-State relationship in several ways,

---

45. ARC Rep 7. Also see, SETALVAD, Union-State Relations, 226-236 (1974).
46. THE TIMES OF INDIA, dated April 18, 1975.
47. See, ALICE JACOB, New Pressures on Indian Federalism: Demand for State Autonomy in ILI, INDIAN CONSTITUTION: TRENDS & ISSUES, 370.

it did not make any suggestion for any fundamental change in the structure of the constitutional provisions relating to federalism.

Several problems have become apparent in the practical working of the Indian Federalism over the years. The crucial fact that has emerged is that there is an imbalance between the functions and resources at the State level. Their tax resources have proved to be inelastic while all the money-consuming social services fall within their purview. It is also true that not all States utilize their taxing powers fully because of political pressures. Economic conditions vary from State to State. While the tax raising capacity of the poor States is low, their fiscal needs are very high. There exist vast differences in the scale of social services from State to State. In some States, the expenditure on social services is pitifully low. Then there occur national calamities like famines and floods from time to time taxing the resources of the States. The States are being kept solvent because of the massive transfer of funds from the Centre by way of tax-sharing, grants and loans. The fact also remains that most of the States do not use their financial resources prudently.

Some of the opposition-ruled States want more powers and more autonomy. They want more legislative powers. One drastic suggestion made in this connection is that the Centre should confine itself only to four subjects, viz., defence, external affairs, communications and currency, and leave all the rest of the functions (including the residuary) to the States. The States are clamouring for more taxing powers and more central assistance. They want funds to flow to them through the Finance Commission instead of the Planning Commission because the former funds are non-discretionary and untied and the latter funds are discretionary and tied to specific purposes, and some States have a feeling that there is discrimination against them in allocation of such funds. They want a share in the corporation tax which is non-sharable at present; they want full autonomy to use the power to levy sales tax and do not like the scheme of levying additional excise in lieu of sales tax on selected commodities.[48] It is being suggested that the Finance Commission be made a permanent body instead of being appointed, as at present, after five years. Another suggestion is that the role of the Finance Commission be enlarged so as to enable it to deal both with the plan and the non-plan expenditure as well as with total central assistance to the States. It is being argued that the States should get the bulk of funds from the Centre under Art. 275 and that Art. 282 should only play a residuary role unlike the present situation when bulk of the funds for planning purposes pass to the States from the Centre under Art. 282.[49]

Some States want greater economic freedom to develop the States faster and criticise the expansive use made by the Centre of its power under entry 52, List I. They would like the Centre to confine itself only to such industries as may be vital to national development.

The opposition-ruled States have a grievance that the ruling party at the Centre misuses the institution of Governor to further its own political interests in the States.[50] No healthy precedents have been set so far as to how the Governor

48. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. L.
49. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. L.
50. Supra, Ch. VII, Secs. A and C.

should conduct himself in different situations.[51] It is being suggested that the position of the Governor should not be different from that of the President.

The States do not like Art. 356 which hangs on their heads as the democle's sword. It is being said that the Central government uses Art. 356 at times to further its own political interests by removing governments of different political complexion from office.[52]

It is also being claimed that over the years, the Planning Commission has just become an appendage of the Central government and to introduce objectivity in planning, it should be made an autonomous body, that the State planning machinery be strengthened and that an inter-State Council consisting of the Prime Minister and the Chief Ministers be established under Art. 263.[53]

It is true that during the last fifty years, strong centralising tendencies emerged in India. To a great extent, this was due to the fact that for long one political party, the Congress Party, was in power at the Centre as well as in all the States. The dominance of one political party for long did inevitably generate centralising trends. But now things have changed. The Congress Party has lost its pre-eminent position; it has lost its monopoly of power. Many political parties having regional, rather than national, perspective have emerged having different political ideologies and some of them have assumed power in some of the States. Further, even the Central Government is composed of a coalition of several political parties. This political development has checked the generation of centripetal forces.

The States to-day are in a much stronger position to assert themselves, to exert pressure on, and to bargain with, the Centre. This is resulting in the emergence of a more balanced federal system in India. The Supreme Court has also helped this process through its decision in Bommai by putting some restraints upon the exercise of its power under Art. 356.[54] The Court has declared federalism as the basic feature of the Constitution.[55] Thus, whatever the constitutional provisions, the evolution of the Indian federalism for some time now has been towards a more balanced system with accent on State autonomy.

While there may be a case for some re-adjustment in the Central-State relationship in India, a drastic re-orientation of the Indian federalism is neither feasible, nor desirable, nor called for. There are many practical reasons militating against too much devolution of power on the States, against too much decentralisation.

For one, the economic conditions of all the States is not uniform. Whatever the scheme of division of taxing powers may be, while some States may benefit, others may lose and they will not be able to raise enough resources for themselves. The need for Central help to the States will thus continue. This is the experience of all other federations. This means that the Centre's financial capacity cannot be too much impaired.

---

51. See the White Paper on The office of the Governor issued by the Karnataka Government, THE HINDU INT'L, Oct. 1, 83.
52. See, ILI, PRESIDENT'S RULE IN THE STATES, 176-81.
53. Supra, Sec. C, this Chapter.
54. For Bommai, see, supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. E(b) and (c).
55. For discussion on this doctrine, see, Ch. XLI, infra.

Two, national calamities will continue to arise from time to time needing massive funds which only the Centre can manage. Three, the administrative infrastructure in the States is weak and is not capable of carrying a greater load unless there is a wholesale effort made to improve it. As already pointed out, the Finance Commission makes provision in its scheme of devolution of Central grants for funds to improve the State administrative machinery. Then, there are the demands of industry, trade and commerce which have national and not local dimensions. State taxing powers such as sales tax, octroi, tax on roads and motor vehicles come in the way of free flow of national trade and traffic and the businessmen constantly make demands for abolition of octroi, integration of sales tax with excise and so on.[56] The States oppose these demands because it will reduce their capacity to raise revenue. Sales tax is the main source of revenue for the States.

It may be of interest to note that over the years, efforts have been made to improve the financial capacity of the states in several ways. First, as already noted, the Finance Commissions have been progressively suggesting larger devolution of Central funds to the States. Two, the courts have progressively interpreted State taxing powers liberally. Three, the Centre has itself by amending the Constitution enhanced the State taxing powers, e.g., in the area of sales tax. Fourthly, devolution of large funds takes place from the Centre to the States through the medium of the Planning Commission.

Many claims and demands have been made from time to time to re-orient Indian Federalism, but most of them have been exaggerated and unrealistic. Many of these demands are politically-motivated rather than based on pragmatic considerations. The Sarkaria Commission has rejected many of the claims made by the States in their favour for reordering the federal system. The inherent soundness of the constitutional provisions concerning Centre-State relations has been vindicated by the Sarkaria Commission's report as no major amendment of any of these provisions has been suggested. Some of the major recommendations of the Commission are:

(1) The Commission has rejected the suggestion that residuary powers be transferred from the Centre to the States.[57]

(2) The Commission has emphasized that the rule of federal supremacy is indispensable for the successful functioning of any federal system. "It is the kingpin of the federal system."[58]

(3) The Commission has rejected the demand for repeal of the most contentious provision in the Constitution, viz., Art. 356. The Commission has however suggested that Art. 356 should be used very sparingly.[59]

(4) The Commission has rejected the demand for the merger of the Finance Commission and the Planning Commission.[60]

---

56. See S.N. JAIN & ALICE JACOB, Tax Rental Agreement: Replacement of Sales Tax by Additional Duties of Excise in I.L.I., INDIAN CONSTITUTION: TRENDS & ISSUES, 379 (1978).
57. REPORT, 31.
58. Ibid., 28.
59. Ibid, 177.
60. Ibid, 284.

(5) The Commission has maintained that it is necessary to retain Art. 365 though it should be used with great caution and invoked only in extreme cases.[61]

(6) The Commission has recommended the creation of the Intergovernmental Council under Art. 263.[62]

The only touch-stone for any re-orientation of Central-State relationship can be the provision of better services to the people, improvement of socio-economic conditions and promotion of national unity, stability and integrity. No a priori, dogmatic or doctrinaire approach, no approach based on the old and discarded view of competitive federalism, can serve the purpose in the modern context.

As has already been stated, such a view prevails in no modern federalism now. A strong Centre and strong States are not incompatible with each other. A strong Centre does not imply that the States must necessarily be weak. Both ought to be strong within the constitutional framework. Both are inter-dependent and the Centre could not be strong without strong States and vice versa.

There is a lot which the States can do to help themselves and improve their strength and position. They can, for instance, improve their administrative infrastructure and make it more efficient; they can improve their financial position by improving their tax collecting machinery; the condition of such social services as education and health is pitiable in some of the States and they have to make up a lot of leeway in this area; they can improve the working of their electricity boards, road transport services, public enterprises and irrigation projects. The way these bodies are functioning at present in the States does not inspire confidence that things will be much better if more powers were to devolve on the States.[63]

It is very necessary to ensure that neither the federal set-up becomes unitary nor that it becomes too loose and weak affecting the unity of India.

Federalism is not a static but a dynamic concept. It is always in the process of evolution and constant adjustments from time to time in the light of the contemporary needs and the demands being made on it. Constant discussions and negotiations between, the Centre and the States in various fora can help in removing the frictions and difficulties in the area of inter-governmental co-operation and for sorting out these differences with a view to making the Indian Federalism a more robust and viable system so that India may successfully meet the great challenges of defence, external and internal security and socio-economic development.

61. Ibid, 107.
62. Ibid, 237-240.
63. See the REPORT of the SEVENTH FINANCE COMMISSION.

CHAPTER XV

TRADE, COMMERCE AND INTERCOURSE

SYNOPSIS

A. INTRODUCTORY

Trade, commerce and intercourse may be domestic or foreign or international. Arts. 301-305, discussed in this Chapter, deal with domestic trade and commerce, i.e., within the territory of India. Such commerce may be of two types—(i) intra-State, i.e., commerce which is confined within the territory of a State; (ii) inter-State, i.e., trade and commerce which overflows the boundary of one State and which extends to two or more States.

No federal country has an even economy. Some of its constituent units may be agricultural while others may be industrial. Some States may produce raw materials while the processing and manufacturing industries may be located in other States because of several favourable factors, like availability of cheap labour or electric energy. This circumstance creates the possibility that the constituent units which have legislative powers of their own may, to serve their own narrow and parochial interests, seek to create trade barriers by restricting the flow of commodities either from outside or to other units.

Creation of such regional trade barriers may prejudicially affect national interests as it may hamper the economic growth of the country as a whole, and this would be disadvantageous to all the units in the long run. Besides, the resources and industries of the units may be complimentary to each other. Free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse within a federal country having a two-tier polity is a pre-requisite for promoting economic unity of the country. An attempt has, therefore, been made in all federations, through adopting of suitable constitutional formulae, to create and preserve a national economic fabric, transcending State boundaries, to minimise the possibility of emergence of local economic barriers, to remove impediments in the way of inter-State trade and commerce and thus help in welding the whole country into one single economic unit so that the economic resources of all the various regions may be exploited, harnessed and pooled to the common advantage and prosperity of the country as a whole.[1]

Federalism, therefore, has come to connote one big common internal market and an economic area irrespective of the State boundaries. This preferred national goal has provided the motive force, in part, for the creation of the federations of the U.S.A. Canada and Australia.[2]

B. POSITION IN OTHER COUNTRIES

The most significant provision in the U.S.A., for this purpose, is the Commerce Clause,[3] which provides inter alia that the Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States. The clause does not in terms restrict State protectionism, but by a process of judicial interpretation, it has come to have a restrictive effect on the States in those matters in which the Supreme Court considers that uniformity is necessary for national economic well being, and, thus, the capacity of the States to interfere with inter-State commerce has been very much restricted.[4] The Commerce Clause has also bestowed on the Central Government necessary power to regulate the country's economy. The Courts have interpreted the words 'inter-State commerce' in a broad sense, and have held that the Congress can regulate not only inter State commerce but even those intra-State activities which so affect inter-State commerce as to make their regulation appropriate.[5]

In Canada, the Provinces have been deprived of the power to levy indirect taxes so that they may not be able to create interprovincial trade barriers.[6] This

---

1. Bowie, Studies in Federalism, 296-357 (1954).
2. Also see, supra, Ch. X, Sec. L; Ch. XI, Sec. I; Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii).
3. Art. 1, Sec. 8, Cl. 3 of the U.S. Constitution.
4. Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How 299; Southern Pacific Co v. Arizona, 325 US 761 (1945); Bibb v. Navajo Freight Lines, 359 US 520.
5. Supra, Ch. X.
6. Royal Comm., Report, 30 (1939).
Also, supra, Ch. XI, Sec. I.

has been further strengthened by making "regulation of trade and commerce" a Central matter, but as already seen, this Central power has not played much meaningful role so far.[7] Then, Sec. 121 of the BNA Act, which provides that "articles of growth, produce or manufacture of any province shall be admitted free into each of the other provinces", also curtails the provincial power to put restrictions on entry of goods from other provinces.

In Australia, with a view to promoting the economic unity of the country, and discouraging the States from raising trade barriers, the States have been debarred from levying excises.[8] The crucial provision, however, for the purpose in the Australian Constitution is Section 92 according to which trade, commerce, and intercourse among the States shall be absolutely free. The clause applies only to inter-State and not to intra-State commerce, and restricts both the States and the Centre from interfering with trade and commerce.[9]

Literally, the scope of Section 92 is unlimited and unqualified, but, as no freedom can be absolute, Courts have evolved some limitations on this freedom as well. It has therefore been laid down that some regulation of inter-State trade, commerce and intercourse is compatible with its absolute freedom, and that Section 92 is violated only when a legislative or executive act operates to restrict inter-State trade, commerce and intercourse directly and immediately and not when it creates "some indirect or inconsequential impediment which may fairly be regarded as remote."[10] Thus, laws to ensure public health and honesty and fairness in commercial dealings are not voided by the concept of freedom of inter-State trade and commerce.[11] But such a law should not have an impact which is "reasonably unnecessary" upon the activities of the individual in inter-State trade and commerce. Legislation of a regulatory nature has generally been upheld, but not prohibitory legislation. Thus, a State law requiring a person operating in inter-State commerce to apply for a licence, but conferring on the concerned officer an uncontrolled discretion to grant or refuse the licence has been held to be bad, as giving uncontrolled discretion to the licensing authority is prohibitory and not regulatory.[12]

The same approach is seen in the judicial attitude towards nationalization. The Central Government's attempt to create a monopoly for the government airline by prohibiting private airlines from operating inter-State,[13] the prohibition on private banking from engaging in inter-State commerce,[14] have been held to be bad. Section 92 guarantees the freedom of the individuals. The Courts have rejected the argument that the test of 'volume of trade' flowing from State to State should be adopted to adjudge whether a restriction is bad under Section 92, or that it protects only the passage of goods, or that it would apply only when the freedom is impaired at the frontier. A restriction applied not at the State borders

---

7. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. L.
8. Ibid.
9. Jindal Stainless Ltd. (2) v. State of Haryana, (2006) 7 SCC 241, at page 263 : AIR 2006 SC 2550.
10. Commonwealth of Australia v. Bank of New South Wales, 1950 AC 235.
Also, Permewan Wright Consolidated Pty. Ltd. v. Trewhitt, 27 ALR 182.
11. S.O.S. (Mowbray) Pty. Ltd. v. Mead, (1972) 124 CLR 529; Clark King v. Australian Wheat Board, (1978) 21 ALR 1.
12. Hughes and Vale Proprietary Ltd. v. New South Wales, 1955 AC 241.
13. Australian National Airways v. The Commonwealth, 71 CLR 29.
14. Supra, footnote 10.

but at a prior or subsequent stage of inter-State trade, commerce or intercourse, can also offend against Section 92.

The test of 'directness' of restraints applied in earlier cases[15] in Australia was rephrased in some later cases, viz., a law which imposes a restriction, burden or liability by reference to, or in consequence of, a fact or an event or a thing itself forming part of inter-State trade, commerce, or intercourse, or forming an essential attribute of that concept, essential in the sense that without it you cannot bring into being the particular example of inter-State trade, commerce or intercourse, contravenes Section 92 if it creates a real prejudice or impediment to inter-State transactions. For applying the test, it is necessary to distinguish an 'essential' of inter-State trade, commerce, or intercourse from a 'non-essential' or a mere incident. This is a technical distinction and at times it may be very difficult to distinguish between the 'essential' and the 'incidental'. The test however is somewhat flexible and vague for such terms as 'essential', 'incidental', 'real prejudice' have a variable and not a fixed connotation and are difficult to apply in specific situations.[16]

In a later case,[17] the High Court of Australia reverted to the test laid down in Bank of New South Wales[18] and held that economic consequences of a law operative upon inter-State trade and commerce cannot be ignored. The proposition that the economic result produced by an Act is not within its direct operation is not valid. Economic results produced by an Act cannot be held to be irrelevant in determining whether the Act leaves trade and commerce free. The Courts have also propounded the thesis that inter-State commerce must pay for the facilities it uses, such as bridges, aerodromes, highways etc. But a distinction is drawn between a charge for the facility provided and one which would be a deterrent to trade. The charge levied should be a 'fair' recompense for the actual use made of the facility. For example, in case of highways, the charge can be levied only for their maintenance, and not to meet the capital cost of their construction, and the charge should be computed with reference to such factors as mileage for which the highway is used, and the weight and load-capacity of the vehicle.[19]

C. POSITION IN INDIA

The Constitution-makers desired to promote free flow of trade and commerce in India as they fully realized that economic unity and integration of the country provided the main sustaining force for the stability and progress of the political and cultural unity of the federal polity, and that the country should function as one single economic unit without barriers on internal trade.

Economic unity of India is one of the constitutional aspirations and safeguarding its attainment and maintenance of that unity are objectives of the Indian

---

15. As for example, the Bank Nationalization case, note 9, supra.

16. See, Hospital Prov. Fund v. Victoria, 87 CLR 1 (1953); Hughes and Vale case, (II), 93 CLR 127 (1955); Russell v. Walters, 96 CLR 177 (1957); Ross Anderson, Freedom of Interstate Trade: Essence, Incidence and Device under S. 92 of the Constitution, 33 Australian LJ 294 (1959); Sawer, Cases on the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia, 232-423 (1982); Coper, Freedom of Interstate Trade under the Australian Constitution (1983).

17. North Eastern Dairy Co. v. Dairy Industry Authority, 50 ALJR 121, 129 (1976).

18. Supra, footnote 10.

19. Commonwealth Freighters v. Sneddon, 102 CLR 280; Armstrong v. State of Victoria, 99 CLR 28.

Constitution. In order to ensure that the State Legislatures subjected to local and regional pulls do not create trade barriers in future, Arts. 301-305 have been incorporated into the Constitution. These provisions deal with trade, commerce and intercourse within the territory of India—whether intra-State or inter-State. The main provision is Art. 301.

The Supreme Court has explained in detail the motivations and aspirations of the framers of the Constitution in drafting Arts. 301-305 in Atiabari[20] in the following words:

> "In drafting the relevant Articles [Arts. 301-305] the makers of the Constitution were fully conscious that economic unity was absolutely essential for the stability and progress of the federal polity which had been adopted by the Constitution for the governance of the country. Political freedom had been won, and political unity which had been accomplished by the Constitution, had to be sustained and strengthened by the bond of economic unity. It was realised that in course of time different political parties believing in different economic theories or ideologies may come in power in the several constituent units of the Union and that may conceivably give rise to local and regional pulls and pressures in economic matters. Local or regional fears or apprehensions raised by local or regional problems may persuade the State legislatures to adopt remedial measures intended solely for the protection of regional interests without due regard to their effect on the economy of the nation as a whole. The object of [Arts. 301-305] was to avoid such a possibility. Free movement and exchange of goods throughout the territory of India is essential for the economy of the nation and for sustaining and improving living standards of the country."

The Court has again dilated on this theme in Automobile Transport:[21]

> "There were differences of language, religion, etc. Some of the Provinces were economically more developed than the others. Even inside the same province there were under-developed, developed and highly developed areas from the point of view of industries, communications, etc. The problem of economic integration with which the Constitution-makers were faced was a problem with many facets. Two questions, however, stood out. One question was how to achieve a federal, economic and fiscal integration, so that economic policies affecting the interests of India as a whole could be carried out without putting an ever increasing strain on the unity of India, particularly in the context of a developing economy. The second question was how to foster the development of areas, which were under-developed without creating too many preferential or discriminative barriers."

The scheme of Arts. 301-305 is somewhat complex. There is a mix up of exceptions upon exceptions in these provisions. Therefore, to have an idea of the extent of freedom granted to trade and commerce, and the limitations imposed thereon, all these constitutional provisions must be considered together. According to the Supreme Court,[22] in evolving these provisions, the framers of the Constitution seem to have kept three main considerations in their view. One, in the larger interests of the country, there must be free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse, both inter-State and intra-State. Two, the regional interests must not be ignored altogether. Three, the Centre should have power of intervention in any

---

20. Atiabari Tea Co. Ltd. v. State of Assam, AIR 1961 SC 232, 247 : (1961) SCR 809.
21. Automobile Transport (Rajasthan) Ltd. v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1962 SC 1406 : 1963 (1) SCR 491.
22. Ibid., at 1416.

case of crisis to deal with particular problems which may arise at times in any part of India.

According to Art. 301, "trade, commerce and intercourse throughout the territory of India shall be free."[23] This constitutional provision imposes a general limitation on the exercise of legislative power, whether of the Centre or of the States, to secure unhampered free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse from one part of the territory to another. The purpose underlying Art. 301 is to promote economic unity of India and that there should not be any regional or territorial economic barriers.

The origins of Art. 301 may be traced directly to Section 92 of the Austalian Constitution, but there are some significant differences between the two provisions.

(1) Section 92 of the Australian Constitution immunizes inter-State trade only as the words used therein are "among the States". On the other hand, Art. 301 uses the words "throughout the territory of India". This means that Art. 301 covers both inter-State and intra-State trade. Therefore, the coverage of Art. 301 is broader than that of Section 92.

A reason to include both 'inter-State' and 'intra-State' commerce within Art. 301 may be that at times it becomes difficult to draw a line of demarcation between the two as these may be so inextricably mixed up that control of one may result in the control of the other as well.[24]

(2) Section 92 makes freedom of trade 'absolutely' free, whereas Art. 301 omits the word 'absolutely'. This is for a good reason viz. that no freedom can be absolute. Even in Australia, the freedom is not 'absolute' but 'regulated' and 'relative'.

(3) Section 92 is worded generally and contains no exceptions. It has been for the Courts to spell out the restrictions on it. In India, on the other hand, the exceptions to Art. 301 have been laid down in Arts. 302-305. The total impact of these exceptions is to make the position in India quite different from that in Australia in the area of freedom of trade and commerce.

(4) In Australia, the restriction applies both to the Centre as well as the States. In India, on the other hand, while the restraint applies formally both to the Centre and the States, the scheme of the constitutional provisions (Arts. 302-304) is

---

23. See, generally, Derham, Some Constitutional Problems arising under Part XIII of the Indian Constitution, 1 JILI, 523, 551; A note in the same journal at 190; Rice, Division of Powers to control Commerce, 1 JILI, 151 (1959); Ramaswami, Indian Constitutional Prov. against Barriers to Trade and Commerce, 2 JILI, 320 (1960); VII CAD, 800-803; X CAD, 348; IX CAD, 1126 et seq.; Ebb, Interstate Barriers in India and American Constitutional Experience, 11 Stan, LR., 37 (1958-59); S.N. Jain, Freedom of Trade and Commerce and Restraints on the State Power to tax Sale in the course of Interstate Trade and Commerce, 10 JILI, 547 (1968); M.P. Singh, Prohibition against preference on Discrimination in Trade and Commerce, 3, JI. Bar Council of India, 278 (1974); D.K. Singh, Trade, Commerce, and Intercourse in India; A Reappraisal of Constitutional Problems, 14 JILI, 39 (1972). See further Jindal Stainless Ltd. (2) v. State of Haryana (supra), at page 263 "Article 301 is inspired by Section 92 of the Australian Constitution when it refers to freedom of trade and commerce, however, Article 301 is subject to limitations and conditions in Articles 302, 303 and 304 which are borrowed from the commerce clause under Article 1 of the US Constitution".

24. Supra, pp. 1052-53.

such that, in effect, the Centre can dilute the restraint by its own legislative action but the States remain subject to the control of the Centre in this respect.

In Australia, the commerce clause has hampered the governments in pursuing many economic programmes so very essential in a modern country for promotion and expansion of economy. India steers clear of such difficulties, as the scope of the freedom of trade and commerce can by and large be adjusted by legislative action.

Besides Art. 301, the concept of economic unity is also strengthened by the scheme of allocation of powers between the Centre and the States.[25] The Centre has been given broad powers in the economic field. Inter-State trade and commerce is an exclusive Central matter and the States have power only on intra-State trade and commerce which again is subject to entry 33, List III.[26] Further, inter-State sales tax belongs to the Centre and the States' power is confined to levying tax only on intra-State sales.[27] The excise duties can also be levied largely by the Centre and not the States.[28]

INTER-RELATION BETWEEN ARTS. 19(1)(G) AND 301

Article 19(1)(g), a fundamental right, confers on the citizens the right to practise any profession or carry on any occupation, trade or business subject to reasonable restrictions in public interest.[29] The question of inter-relationship between Arts. 19(1)(g) and 301 is somewhat uncertain.

One view is that while Art. 19(1)(g) deals with the right of the individuals, Art. 301 provides safeguards for the carrying on trade as a whole distinguished from an individual's right to do the same.[30] This view, however, is hardly tenable. Art. 301 is based on Section 92 of the Australian Constitution which has been held to comprise rights of individuals as well,[31] and the same should be the position in India. In actual practice, this view has never been enforced and individuals have challenged legislation on the ground of its effect on their right to carry on trade and commerce. The Supreme Court has denounced the theory that Art. 301 guarantees freedom "in the abstract and not of the individuals."[32]

Another way of projecting the same idea is to say that Art. 301 aims at preventing restrictions on the volume of trade flowing and, therefore, the effect of a law on individuals is irrelevant. Under this view, if ample provision is made for carrying on trade, and the volume of the trade remains as before, the mere fact that certain individuals have been prohibited from taking part therein would not contravene Art. 301.

But this view creates many difficulties. To ascertain the volume of trade before and after the impugned statute, it would be necessary to refer to various

---

25. Supra, Ch. X.
26. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
27. Supra, Ch. XI, Secs. D and J(i).
28. Supra, Ch. XI, Secs. C and D.
29. Infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.
30. Reference has been made to this view, without finally deciding, by Mukherjea, J., in Saghir Ahmad v. State of U.P., AIR 1954 SC 728, 742 : 1955 (1) SCR 707; Das, CJ., in State of Bombay v. Chamarbaugwalia, AIR 1958 SC 699; Wanchoo, C.J., in Automobile Transport v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1958 Raj 114.
31. Commonwealth of Australia v. Bank of New South Wales, 1950 AC 235.
32. Dist. Collector, Hyderabad v. Ibrahim, AIR 1970 SC 1275 : (1970) 1 SCC 386.

complicated socio-economic factors, data and statistics, and the Courts avoid such questions as they are hardly the proper forum to go into these matters. The test of total volume has been criticised in Australia as "unreal and unpractical", for it is "unpredictable whether by interference with the individual flow the total volume will be affected, and it is incalculable, what might have been the total volume but for the individual interference."[33] Therefore, the volume of trade theory is also untenable.

A difference between Arts. 19(1)(g) and 301, it has been said, is that Art. 301 could be invoked only when an individual is prevented from sending his goods across the State, or from one point to another in the same State, while Art. 19(1)(g) can be invoked when the complaint is with regard to the right of an individual to carry on business unrelated to, or irrespective of, the movement of goods,[34] i.e., while Art. 301 contemplates the right of trade in motion, Art. 19(1)(g) secures the right at rest.[35]

It is true that the 'movement' aspect of commerce is of great importance, and that one of the dominant purposes underlying Art. 301 is to keep inter-State movement of goods and persons free and unhampered. It is also true that the Supreme Court has placed emphasis on the movement aspect.[36] Nevertheless, it is difficult to accept the theory that Art. 301 is limited only to movement and not to trade at rest. The concept of 'trade at rest' has been countered by the Statement that "there is no rest for the businessmen; the essence of intercourse is coursing not sitting....."[37] There have been quite a few cases in which Courts have scrutinised under Art. 301 such aspects of trade, commerce and intercourse which may be regarded as "commerce at rest" and not "in motion".[38]

There thus appears to be no satisfactory way to explain the relation of the two Articles. A restriction on trade and commerce can be challenged under both these constitutional provisions. However, Art. 301 covers many interferences with trade and commerce which may not ordinarily come within Art. 19(1)(g), as for instance, levy of octroi. Freedom of trade and commerce is a wider concept than that of an individual's freedom to trade guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(g).

Article 19(1)(g) can be taken advantage of by a citizen, while Art. 301 can be invoked by a citizen as well as a non-citizen. Also, while Art. 19(1)(g) is not available to a corporate person, Art. 301 may be invoked by a corporation and even by a State on complaints of discrimination or preference which are outlawed by Art. 303, discussed below. In emergency,[39] Art. 19(1)(g) is suspended and so Courts may take recourse to Art. 301 to adjudge the validity of a restriction on commerce. In certain situations, only one of the two may be relevant, as for example, when there is no direct burden on a trade but it may be a restriction in terms of Art. 19(1)(g) read with Art. 19(6).

---

33. Supra, footnote 30 above.
34. Bapubhai v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1956 Bom 21; Usman v. State, AIR 1958 MP 33.
35. Motilal v. State of U.P., AIR 1951 All 257. Also, Saghir v. State of U.P., AIR 1954 All 257 and AIR 1954 SC 728 : (1955) 1 SCR 707; Hotel Association of India v. Union of India (UOI). In The High Court of Delhi (Writ Petition (Civil) No. 4692/1999 -decided On: 12.01.2006).
36. Atiabari Tea Co. v. State of Assam, AIR 1961 SC 232 : (1961) 1 SCR 809; Hansa Corp., infra.
37. Rice, footnote 23, supra.
38. See, Sec. D., infra, under "Trade, Commerce and Intercourse."
39. Supra, Ch. XIII, Secs. A and B.

In some other situations, both provisions may become applicable and it may be possible to invoke them both. Economic situations and conditions being unpredictable, it is not necessary to evolve any conceptualistic differentiation between the two Articles. Art. 301 is a mandatory provision and a law contravening the same is ultra vires, but it is not a Fundamental Right and hence is not enforceable under Art. 32.[40] But if the right under Art. 19(1)(g) is also infringed, then Art. 32 petition may lie.

There are three alternative situations:

(i) A provision may be valid under Arts. 301 to 304, but may be invalid under Art. 19(1)(g); or

(ii) it may be invalid under Arts. 301 to 304 as well; or

(iii) it may be invalid under Arts. 301-304, but not under Art. 19(1)(g) situations.

Article 32 petition will lie in situations (i) and (ii), but not in situation (iii).[41]

D. CONTENT OF ART. 301

Commenting on Art. 301, the Supreme Court has observed in Atiabari[42] that Art. 301 "is not a declaration of a mere platitude, or the expression of a pious hope of a declaratory character; it is not also a mere Statement of a Directive Principle of State Policy;[43] it embodies and enshrines a principle of paramount importance that the economic unity of the country will provide the main sustaining force for the stability and progress of the political and cultural unity of the country….."

The makers of the Constitution were fully conscious that it was absolutely essential to promote economic unity for the stability and progress of the federal polity in India.

The framers of the Constitution realized that in course of time different political parties having different economic programmes may come in power in different States. This may generate local and regional pulls and pressures in economic matters. The State Legislatures may be swayed, in response to local pressures, to take measures to take care of regional interests without any regard to their impact on the national economy as a whole. The object of Art. 301 is to obviate any such possibility and to ensure free movement of goods throughout the Indian territory which is essential for developing a national economy.

The scope and content of Art. 301 depends on the interpretation of three expressions used therein, viz., 'trade, commerce and intercourse', 'free' and 'throughout the territory of India'.

(a) TRADE, COMMERCE AND INTERCOURSE

Explaining the word 'commerce' in the Commerce Clause of the U.S. Constitution, MARSHALL, C.J., Stated as early as 1824 in Gibbons v. Ogden[44] that

---

40. Ram Chandra Palai v. State of Orissa, AIR 1956 SC 298 : 1956 SCR 28.
41. S. Ahmad v. State of Mysore, AIR 1975 SC 1443 : (1975) 2 SCC 131.
42. Atiabari Tea Co. Ltd. v. State of Assam, AIR 1961 SC 232 : 1961 (1) SCR 809.
43. See, infra, Ch. XXXIV, for discussion on Directive Principles of State Policy.
44. 5 Wheat, 1 (1824).

"commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic but it is something more; it is intercourse". The framers of the Indian Constitution, instead of leaving the idea of 'intercourse' to be implied by the process of judicial interpretation, expressly incorporated the same in Art. 301.

The words trade and commerce have been broadly interpreted. In most of the cases, the accent has been on the movement aspect. For example, in the Atiabari case, the Court emphasized: "Whatever else it (Art. 301) may or may not include, it certainly includes movement of trade which is of the very essence of all trade and is its integral part," and, further, that "primarily it is the movement part of the trade" which Art. 301 has in mind, that "the movement or the transport part of trade must be free," and that "it is the free movement or the transport of goods from one part of the country to the other that is intended to be saved."

Again, in Madras v. Nataraja Mudaliar,[45] the Court Stated that "all restrictions which directly and immediately affect the movement of trade are declared by Art. 301 to be ineffective." Nevertheless, cases are not wanting where movement has not been involved but other aspects of trade and commerce have been involved.

The view now appears to be well settled that the sweep of the concept 'trade, commerce and intercourse' is very wide and that the word trade alone, even in its narrow sense, would include all activities in relation to buying and selling, or the interchange or exchange of commodities and that movement from place to place is the very soul of such trading activities. In Koteswar v. K.R.B. & Co.,[46] the Supreme Court has held that a power conferred on the State Government to make an order providing for regulating or prohibiting any class of commercial or financial transactions relating to any essential article, clearly permits imposition of restrictions on freedom of trade and commerce and, therefore, its validity has to be assessed with reference to Art. 304(b).[47] In this case, a restriction on forward contracts was held to be violative of Art. 301. In District Collector v. Ibrahim,[48] the Supreme Court has invalidated under Art. 301 an attempt by a State to create by an administrative order a monopoly to deal in sugar in favour of co-operative societies. The order was issued while the proclamation of emergency was operative and so Art. 19(1)(g) could not be invoked.[49] The Court therefore took recourse to Art. 301. Price-control of a commodity may also amount to restriction on trade.[50]

Certain activities may not be regarded as trade, commerce or business although the usual forms and instruments are employed therein, as for example, gambling, and thus an Act restricting betting and gambling is not bad under Art. 301.[51] In this case, the Supreme Court held that the protection afforded by Art. 301 is confined to such activities as may be regarded as lawful trading activities and does not extend to activity which is res extra commercium and cannot be said to be trade.

---

45. AIR 1969 SC 147 : (1968) 3 SCR 829.
46. AIR 1969 SC 504 : (1969) 1 SCC 255.
47. Infra, 1091 et seq.
48. AIR 1970 SC 1275 : (1970) 1 SCC 386.
49. Supra, Ch XIII, Sec. B; infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F; infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.
50. Shree Meenakshi Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 366 : (1974) 1 SCC 468.
51. State of Bombay v. R.M.D.C., AIR 1957 SC 699 : 1957 SCR 874; supra, Chs. X and XII.

The question raised in this case was concerned with the validity of a State law regulating lotteries vis-a-vis Art. 301. In this case, the Court expressed some sentiments suggesting that unlawful activities opposed to public morality and safety would not be regarded as trade and commerce. But the Court then resiled from this broad proposition saying that the wide proposition that a dealing against morals would not be business, involves the position that the meaning of the expression 'trade or business' would depend upon, and vary with, the general standards of morality accepted at a particular point of time in the country. Such an approach would lead to incoherence in thought and expression. The standards of morality can afford guidance to impose restrictions, but cannot limit the scope of the right.[52]

But again the Court has gone back to the proposition that no one has a right to trade in intoxicating liquors.[53]

Regulation by imposition of levies has recently been held liable to be imposed on the liquor trade more than any other activity since the former is considered inherently noxious, pernicious and res extra commercium. The Court went as far as saying that such levy was "necessary to regulate, by keeping out and excluding persons entering the liquor trade.[54] The Supreme Court has again asserted recently that lotteries contain an element of chance and not skill, and, thus, are of gambling nature. Accordingly, sale of lottery tickets cannot be regarded as 'Trade and Commerce' under Art. 301 so as to claim it as a 'free' trade like any other trade, even when it has the authority of law. "The authorisation under the Act [The Lotteries (Regulation) Act, 1998 enacted by the Centre] is solely for the purpose for the States to earn revenue."[55] The Court has observed:

> "….. we have no hesitation to hold that sale of lottery tickets organised by the State could not be construed to be trade and commerce and even if it could be construed to be so, it cannot be raised to the status of 'trade and commerce' as understood at common parlance or 'trade and commerce" as used under Art. 301."[56]

This means if restrictions are imposed on carrying of lotteries, no breach of Arts. 301 to 304 takes place.

In Fatehchand v. State of Maharashtra,[57] the Supreme Court considered the question whether the Maharashtra Debt Relief Act, 1976, was constitutionally valid vis-a-vis Art. 301. This depended on the further question whether money-lending to poor villagers which was sought to be prohibited by the Act could be regarded as trade, commerce and intercourse. The Court answered in the negative although it recognised that money-lending amongst the commercial community is integral to trade and is, therefore, trade. In relation to village people, the Court took into consideration the 'anti-social, usurious, unscrupulous' nature of money-lending. The Court thus Stated:

---

52. Krishna Kumar v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1967 SC 1368 : (1967) 3 SCR 50.
53. P.N. Kaushal v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 1457 : (1978) 3 SCC 558; Khoday Distilleries Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1996 SC 911 : (1996) 10 SCC 304; State of Punjab v. Devans Modern Breweries Ltd., (2004) 11 SCC 26, at page 83 : (2003) 10 JT 485.
54. State of Punjab v. Devans Modern Breweries Ltd., (2004) 11 SCC 26, at page 105 : (2003) 10 JT 485.
55. B.R. Enterprises v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1867 : (1999) 9 SCC 700.
56. Ibid., at 1903.
57. AIR 1977 SC 1825 : (1977) 2 SCC 670.

> "In short, State action defending the weaker sections from social injustice and all forms of exploitation and raising the standard of living of the people, necessarily imply that economic activities, attired as trade or business or commerce, can be de-recognised as trade or business."

The Court refused to accept the thesis that for purposes of Art. 301, the element of 'movement' was essential. The Court ruled that "dealings of banks and similar institutions having some nexus with trade, actual or potential, may itself be trade or intercourse."

(b) 'FREE'

The Supreme Court emphasized in Atiabari[58] that Art. 301 provides that the flow of trade shall run smooth and unhampered by any restriction either at the boundaries of the State, or at any other point inside the States themselves. The majority judgment emphasized that free movement and exchange of goods throughout the territory of India is essential for sustaining the economy and living standards of the country. Art. 301 guaranteeing freedom of trade and commerce and intercourse embodies and enshrines a principle of paramount importance that the economic unity of the country would provide the main sustaining force for the stability and progress of the political and cultural unity of the country.

The Court also ruled that Art. 301 includes freedom from tax laws as well. The Court emphasized that though the power to levy tax is essentially for the existence of the government, its exercise must inevitably be controlled by constitutional provisions and the taxing power is not outside the purview of any constitutional limitations. As the Supreme Court has observed in India Cement v. State of Andhra Pradesh:[59] "There can be no dispute that taxation is a deterrent against free flow. As a result of favourable or unfavourable treatment by way of taxation, the course of flow of trade gets regulated either favourably or adversely." Tax laws are not excluded from the scope of Art. 301. A tax which directly and immediately restricts trade will fall within the purview of Art. 301.

The word 'free' in Art. 301 cannot mean absolute freedom or that each and every restriction on trade and commerce is invalid. The Supreme Court has held in Atiabari that freedom of trade and commerce guaranteed by Art. 301 is freedom from such restrictions as directly and immediately restrict or impede the free flow or movement of trade.[60] Thus, a restriction which is indirect or inconsequential impediment on trade, commerce, or intercourse is not hit by Art. 301.

The test of direct and immediate restriction has been taken from Australia.[61] Therefore, Art. 301 would not be attracted if a law creates an indirect or inconsequential impediment on trade, commerce and intercourse which may be regarded as remote. In the words of GAJENDRAGADKAR, J., "…. it would be reasonable and proper to hold that restrictions to freedom from which is guaranteed by Art. 301, would be such restrictions as directly and immediately restrict or impede the free flow or movement of trade. Taxes may and do amount to restrictions; but it

---

58. AIR 1961 SC 232 : (1961) 1 SCR 809; see, infra, note 58.
59. AIR 1988 SC 567 : (1988) 1 SCC 743, at 574.
60. Atiabari, supra, footnote 42.
61. The Bank Nationalization case, supra, footnote 9.

is only such taxes as directly and immediately restrict trade that would fall within the purview of Art. 301".[62]

The Supreme Court rejected the broad argument that all taxes should be governed by Art. 301 whether or not their impact on trade was mediate or immediate, direct or remote. The Court characterised the argument as "extreme". The Court emphasized that a "rational and workable" test to apply under Art. 301 would be: "Does the impugned restriction operate directly or immediately on trade or its movement?"

One of the arguments raised in Automobile Transport was that Arts. 301 and 303 must be read together. Art. 303 uses the words "by virtue of any entry relating to trade and commerce etc." It was argued that these words must be read into Art. 301. This would mean that Art. 301 should be construed as a fetter on the commerce power, i.e., the power given to the Legislature to make laws under entries relating to trade and commerce only. This would mean that Art. 301 would not include taxing powers. The argument was that the freedom guaranteed by Art. 301 would not mean freedom from taxation. The Supreme Court rejected the contention that Arts. 301-305 applied only to legislation in respect of entries relating to trade and commerce and ruled that taxation was included therein.

The State of Karnataka enacted an Act to acquire transport carriages. The Act was challenged on the ground that it impugned on the subject of inter-State trade and commerce as it provided also for acquisition of transport carriages running on inter-State routes. The Supreme Court rejected the contention in State of Karnataka v. Ranganatha Reddy[63] saying that the incidental encroachment on the topic of inter-State trade and commerce, even assuming there is some, cannot invalidate the Act. The Supreme Court has emphasized that Art. 301 guarantees freedom from such restrictions as "directly and immediately" restrict or impede free flow of or movement of trade. A rule banned award of leases for quarrying black granite in favour of private parties. The rule was held not violative of Art. 301 as it did not "directly and immediately" restrict or impede "the free flow or movement of trade."[64] A provision would be bad if it imposes a restriction "directly and immediately" on the trade or commerce movement.

Tax laws are not excluded from the scope of Art. 301. A tax which directly and immediately restricts trade would fall within the purview of Art. 301.[65] As was observed by the Supreme Court in Kalyani Stores v. State of Orissa,[66] imposition of a duty or tax in every case does not tantamount per se to any infringement of Art. 301 of the Constitution. Only such restrictions or impediments which directly or immediately impede free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse fall within the prohibition imposed by Art. 301. A tax in certain cases may directly and immediately restrict or hamper the flow of trade, but every imposition of tax does not do so. Every case must be judged on its own facts and its own setting of time and circumstances.

The State of West Bengal levied a tax on despatches of tea from the State. The Supreme Court declared the tax to be invalid on constituting "a direct and imme-

---

62. AIR 1961 SC 232 at 253-54 : (1961) 1 SCR 809.
63. AIR 1978 SC 215 : (1977) 4 SCC 471.
64. State of Tamil Nadu v. Hind Stone, AIR 1981 SC 711 : (1981) 2 SCC 205.
65. Atiabari, supra; Khyerbari, infra.
66. AIR 1966 SC 1686 : (1966) 1 SCR 865.

diate restriction on flow of trade and commerce in tea throughout the territory of India". The tax thus violated Art. 301 and could have been levied in accordance with the provisions of Art. 304(b). The Court also ruled that there was no entry in Lists II or III under which the State could have levied the tax in question. Further, the Court also ruled that the Centre had taken the tea industry under its control under the Tea Act, 1953. The Centre had also imposed a cess on tea produced in India. Therefore, the impugned State Legislation would be bad as it fell in a covered field.[67]

Commenting on Art. 301, the Supreme Court has observed in a recent case:[68]

> "Suffice it to say that it is only when the intra-State or inter-State movement of the persons or goods are impeded directly and immediately as distinct from creating some indirect or consequential impediment, by any legislative or executive action, infringement of the freedom envisaged by Art. 301 can arise. Without anything more, a tax law, per se, may not impair the said freedom. At the same time, it should be Stated that a fiscal measure is not outside the purview of Art. 301 of the Constitution."

From the trend of the case-law it appears that there is a greater readiness on the part of the Courts to characterise an impediment on movement of commerce as 'direct' and so hold it bad under Art. 301,[69] than the one not on movement which is usually held to be indirect or remote and so valid, e.g., octroi,[70] sales tax,[71] purchase tax,[72] etc.

The Supreme Court has ruled that the imposition of sales tax on goods sold within the State cannot be considered as contravening Art. 301.[73] A question was raised whether levy of tax on sale or purchase of tendu leaves in the State of Madhya Pradesh at a higher rate than in the neighbouring States violated Art. 301 as it impeded free trade and commerce in tendu leaves throughout India. The Supreme Court rejected the contention with the remark that "an increase in rate of tax on a particular commodity cannot per se be said to impede free trade and commerce in that commodity." A tax may in certain cases directly and immediately restrict or hamper the flow of trade, but every imposition of tax does not do so. Each case has to be judged on its own facts and in its own setting of time and circumstances. In the instant case, no material was placed before the Court to show that the sales tax on tendu leaves had caused any decline in sales or purchase of tendu leaves.

---

67. Automobile Transport Ltd. v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1962 SC at 1424.
68. Amrit Banaspati Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1340, 1343 : (1995) 3 SCC 335.
69. Khyerbari Tea Co. v. State of Assam, AIR 1964 SC 925 : (1964) 5 SCR 975.
70. Transport Corp. of India v. Municipal Corp., AIR 1963 MP 253; Orissa Ceramic Industries v. Jharsuguda Municipality, AIR 1963 Ori 171; City Municipality v. Mahado, AIR 1967 AP 363.
Octroi is levied mostly by municipalities and it has been criticised on the ground that it creates trade barriers: Financial Resources of Urban Local Bodies, 48 (1965). Rajasthan High Court held octroi invalid in Gauri Shanker v. Municipal Board, AIR 1958 Raj 198.
Also see, Ch. XI, Sec. D.
71. Andhra Sugars Ltd. v. Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 599 : (1968) 1 SCR 705.
Cf. Derham, supra, n. 22; also, G.K. Krishnan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1975 SC 583, 590 : (1975) 1 SCC 375.
72. Walker Anjaria v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1969 Raj 162.
73. Sodhi Transport Co. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1986 SC 1099 : (1986) 2 SCC 486.

But sales tax discriminating between goods of one State from those of another, may affect the free flow of trade and so offend Art. 301.[74] A tax levied by Parliament on inter-State sale would have offended Art. 301 as such a tax, in its essence, encumbers movement of trade or commerce because by its very definition an inter-State sale is one which occasions movement of goods from one State to another. Nevertheless, it was held valid because of Art. 302.[75]

Imposition of luxury tax on charges for accommodation provided in hotel or a lodging house does not infringe Art. 301. The tax in question was neither discriminatory nor it had any direct and immediate effect of impeding the freedom of intercourse. Only such taxes are hit by Art. 301 as have a direct and immediate effect of restricting the free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse. Not all taxes have such an effect. Art. 301 is against the creation of economic barriers and/or pockets which would stand against the free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse.[76]

It is well settled by a catena of decisions that trade in liquor is not a Fundamental Right. It is a privilege of the State. The State parts with this privilege for revenue consideration. The freedom guaranteed by Article 301 is not available to liquor because it is a noxious substance injurious to public health, order and morality. Therefore regulation in the interest of public health and order takes the case out of Art. 301; regulation for the purpose of Arti. 301 is not confined to such regulations which alone will facilitate the trade.[77]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the freedom envisaged by Art. 301 can be infringed only when the intra-State or inter-State movement of persons or goods are impeded directly and immediately as distinct from creating some indirect or inconsequential impediment, by any legislative or executive action. Without any thing more, a tax law, per se, may not impair the freedom of trade. At the same time, it is to be noted that a fiscal measure is not outside the purview of Art. 301. A tax may, in certain cases, directly and immediately impede the movement or flow of trade, but the imposition of a tax does not do so in every case. It depends on the context and circumstances. Measures impeding the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse may be legislative or executive and may be fiscal or non-fiscal. Freedom may be impeded by impediments on the individuals carrying on trade or business, on the business itself, or on the vehicles, carriers, instruments and labour used in trade and commerce.

Any one aggrieved by infringement of Art. 301 can seek his remedy from the Court against the offending legislative or executive action.

(c) THROUGHOUT THE TERRITORY OF INDIA

The view is definitely held now that Art. 301 applies not only to inter-State, but also to intra-State, trade and commerce as well, i.e., trade within a State.[78]

---

74. Mehtab Majid & Co. v. State of Madras, AIR 1963 SC 928; see, Sec. G(ii), infra; A. Hajee Abdul Shukoor & Co. v. State of Madras, AIR 1964 SC 1729 : (1964) 8 SCR 217.
75. State of Madras v. Nataraja Mudaliar, AIR 1969 SC 147 : (1968) 3 SCR 829; Infra, for Art. 302, Sec. G(i).
76. Express Hotels (P.) Ltd. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1989 SC 1949 : (1989) 3 SCC 677.
77. State of Punjab v. Devans Modern Breweries Ltd., (2004) 11 SCC 26 : (2003) 10 JT 485.
78. Shah, J., in State of Madras v. Nataraja Mudaliar, AIR 1969 SC 147 at 154 : (1968) 3 SCC 829.

This view is also supported by the wordings of Arts. 302 and 304 as is discussed below.[79]

The words "territory of India" in Art. 301 removes all inter-State or intra-State barriers, and bring out the idea that for the purpose of the freedom of trade and commerce, the whole country is one unit. Trade cannot be free throughout India if barriers exist in any part of India, be it inter-State or intra-State.

E. REGULATORY AND COMPENSATORY TAX

It has been Stated that Art. 301 does not confer absolute freedom from taxation in respect of trade, commerce and intercourse. A number of entries in the three Lists, e.g., entries 89 and 92A in List I, entries 52, 54, 56 to 60 in List II and entry 35 in List III, confer taxing powers on the Centre and the States in relation to different aspects of trade, commerce and intercourse.[80] But taxation should not be used to erect barriers, tariff walls or impede free flow of trade and commerce. To reconcile the freedom of trade and commerce and the power of taxation, the Supreme Court has evolved the concept of regulatory and compensatory tax. This means that a regulatory or compensatory tax is not hit by Art. 301.

To smoothen the movement of inter-State trade and commerce, the State has to provide many facilities by way of roads etc. The concept of regulatory and compensatory taxation has been evolved with a view to reconcile the freedom of trade and commerce guaranteed by Art. 301 with the need to tax such trade at least to the extent of making it pay for the facilities provided to it by the State, e.g., a road net-work and other infrastructural facilities.

The concept of regulatory and compensatory taxation has been applied by the Indian Courts to the State taxation under entries 56 and 57 of List II. Measures which impose compensatory taxes, or, are purely regulatory, do not fall with the purview of restrictions contemplated in Art. 301. The reason is that they facilitate, rather than hamper, the flow of trade and commerce.

In Atiabari,[81] a tax was levied by the State of Assam on the carriage of tea by road or inland waterways under entry 56, List II.[82] The Supreme Court held the tax bad for "the transport or movement of goods is taxed solely on the basis that the goods are thus carried or transported," and, thus, "directly affects the freedom of trade as contemplated by Art. 301." The purpose and object of the State Act in question was "to collect taxes on goods solely on the ground that they are carried by road or by inland waterways within the area of the State. That being so the restriction placed by the Act on the free movement of the goods is writ large on its face".[83]

The Supreme Court by majority took the view that the freedom guaranteed by Art. 301 would become illusory if the movement, transport, or the carrying of 79. State of Bombay v. R.M.D.C., AIR 1957 SC 699 : 1957 SCR 874; Atiabari Tea Co. v. State of Assam, supra; State of Madras v. Nataraja Mudaliar, supra; Koteswar v. K.R.B.Co., supra.

---

80. For these various entries, see, supra, Ch. X.

81. AIR 1961 SC 232 : (1961) 1 SCR 809.

82. See, supra, Ch. XI, Sec. D.

83. AIR 1961 SC at 254.

goods were allowed to be impeded, obstructed or hampered by the taxation without satisfying the requirements of Art. 302 to 304.[84] The Court did not take into consideration the quantum of the tax burden which by no means was excessive. Simply because the tax was levied on 'movement' of goods, from one place to another, it was held to offend Art. 301. The State could have passed the Act in question by following the procedure laid down in Art. 304(b).

The view propounded in Atiabari was bound to have great adverse effect upon the financial autonomy of the States. It would have rendered their taxing power under entries 56 and 57, List II, otiose. Accordingly, the matter came to be reconsidered by the Supreme Court in Automobile Transport v. State of Rajasthan.[85]

The State of Rajasthan levied a tax on motor vehicles (Rs. 60 on a motor car and Rs. 2,000 on a goods vehicle per year) used within the State in any public place, or kept for use in the State. The validity of the tax was challenged on the ground that it constituted a direct and immediate restriction on the movement of trade and commerce with and within Rajasthan as the tax placed a pecuniary burden on commercial activity, and so was hit by Art. 301.

The Supreme Court ruled by majority that the tax was not hit by Art. 301 as it was a compensatory tax having been levied for use of the roads provided for and maintained by the State. Taking the view that freedom of trade and commerce under Art. 301 should not unduly cripple State autonomy, and that it should be consistent with an orderly society, the Supreme Court now ruled that regulatory measures or compensatory taxes for the use of trading facilities were not hit by Art. 301 as these did not hamper, but rather facilitated, trade, commerce and intercourse. The Court observed that "regulatory measures or measures imposing compensatory taxes for the use of trading facilities do not come within the purview of restrictions contemplated by Art. 301…."

The Court emphasized that without compensatory taxes, the State cannot effectively maintain roads, waterways and airways, and the freedom declared by Art. 301 may then turn out to be an empty one. Similarly, regulations enabling free movement of traffic cannot be described as restrictions impeding the freedom.

A working test to decide whether a tax is compensatory or not would be to enquire whether the trades people are having the use of certain facilities for the better conduct of their business and paying not patently much more than what is required for providing the facilities. A tax does not cease to be compensatory because the precise or specific amount collected is not actually used in providing facilities.[86]

It is not necessary to put the money collected from the tax into a separate fund so long as the facilities for the trades people who pay the tax are provided and the expenses incurred in providing them are borne by the State out of whatever source it may be. Thus, to this extent, the majority view in Atiabari was now overruled by Automobile.

The concept of compensatory tax evolved in this case was something new as in Atiabari, the Court had dismissed the argument that the money realised

---

84. See below.
85. AIR 1962 SC 1406 : (1963) 1 SCR 491.
86. Sharma Transport v. Government of A.P., AIR 2002 SC 322 : (2002) 2 SCC 188.

through the tax would be used to improve roads and waterways rather curtly by saying that there were other ways, apart from the tax in question, to raise the money, and that if the said object was intended to be achieved by levying a tax on the carriage of goods, the same could be done only by satisfying Art. 304(b). Had the concept of compensatory tax been applied in Atiabari, it was possible that the tax might have been held valid.[87] Had the concept of direct restriction evolved in Atiabari been applied in Automobile, the tax in question would have been held invalid as there is no difference between a tax on carriage of goods as such and one on the instrumentalities used for the carriage of goods and passengers.

Since then the concept of regulatory and compensatory taxes has become established in India. This concept has been applied in several cases[88] and progressively the Courts have liberalised the concept so as to permit State taxation at a higher level. According to Bolani,[89] a compensatory tax is levied to raise revenue to meet the expenditure for making roads, maintaining them and for facilitating the movement and regulation of traffic.[90] Taxation on motor vehicles under entry 57, List II,[91] cannot exceed the compensatory nature which must have some nexus with the vehicles using the roads. The Courts have emphasized again and again that under this entry, tax on motor vehicles has to be compensatory in nature for the purpose of raising revenue to meet expenditure for making roads and maintaining them so as to facilitate movement of traffic.[92]

The regulatory and compensatory nature of the tax is that taxing power should be used to impose taxes on motor vehicles which use the roads in the State or are kept for use thereon. Thus, vehicles which do not use the roads (such as tractors, dumpers and rockers), or in any way form part of the flow of traffic on the roads which is required to be regulated cannot be taxed so long as they are working solely within the premises of their owners. Registration of such vehicles under the Motor Vehicles Act is not decisive for the purpose of levy of tax.

The State of Tamil Nadu increased the motor vehicles tax from Rs. 30 to 100 per seat per quarter and this was challenged as being violative of Art. 301. But the Supreme Court upheld the tax in G.K. Krishnan v. State of Tamil Nadu.[93] The Court Stated that "a compensatory tax is not a restriction upon the movement part of trade and commerce." The tax should not however go beyond "a proper recompense to the State for the actual use made of the physical facilities provided in the shape of a road".

The State of Gujarat imposed a tax on omnibuses used or kept for use in the State. If the vehicle in respect of which the tax had been paid in advance was not used for some time for reasons "beyond the control of the owner", the tax was to

---

87. See S.N. Jain, supra, footnote 23.
88. See, State of Assam v. Labanya Probha, AIR 1967 SC 1575 : (1967) 3 SCR 611 and other cases mentioned here.
89. Bolani Iron Ores v. State of Orissa, AIR 1975 SC 17 : (1974) 2 SCC 777.
90. Hardev Motor Transport v. State of M.P., (2006) 8 SCC 613, at page 621 : AIR 2007 SC 839.
91. See, supra, Ch. XI, Sec. D.
92. Travancore Tea Co. Ltd. v. State of Kerala, AIR 1980 SC 1547 : (1980) 3 SCC 619; State of Karnataka v. K. Gopalakrishna Shenoy, AIR 1987 SC 1911 : (1987) 3 SCC 655; Kaushikbhai K. Patel v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1999 Guj 84.
93. G.K. Krishnan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1975 SC 583 : (1975) 1 SCC 375.

be refunded on a proportionate basis. The High Court clarified that the tax on motor vehicles is a compensatory tax levied for use of the road and it is not a tax on ownership or possession of the motor vehicle. This means that the State cannot impose tax on motor vehicles for the purpose of raising revenue. The liability to pay tax cannot exceed the compensatory nature. The tax must have correlation with the use of the road by the vehicle. If a vehicle does not use the road, whatever the reason, it cannot be taxed. If the vehicle is not used, its owner can claim refund of tax paid by him in advance. An omnibus owner who pays the tax in advance is entitled to get refund of the tax for the period during which the vehicle was not put on the road. "The owner need not show that the non-user was on account of reason beyond his control. The insistence on proof of reasons beyond the control of the registered owner….. is beyond the legislative competence of the State".[1]

If a charge is imposed not for the purpose of obtaining a proper contribution to the maintenance and upkeep of the road, but for the purpose of adversely affecting trade or commerce, then it would amount to a restriction on the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse. A meticulous equivalence between the facilities enjoyed by trade and the levy thereon is not necessary so long as the trade enjoys facilities for the better conduct of their business and they are paying not patently much more "nor is it necessary that there should be a separate fund or express allocation of money for the maintenance of roads to prove the compensatory purpose when such purpose is proved by alternative evidence."

In the instant case, the tax collections amounted to over Rs. 16 crores while the expenditure for the year amounted to Rs. 19.51 crores and this amount did not include the grants to local governments for the repair and maintenance of roads within their jurisdiction. The tax was thus held to be compensatory and hence valid.

An interesting point referred to by the Court in Krishnan was that, strictly speaking, a compensatory tax ought to be based on the nature and extent of the use made of the roads, e.g., a mileage or a ton-mileage charge. But the Court did not insist on this approach because of the practical administrative difficulties in imposing a tax at a rate per mile. It is difficult to evolve a formula which will in all cases ensure exact compensation for the use of the road by vehicles having regard to their type, weight and mileage. "Rough approximation, rather than mathematical accuracy, is all that is required."[2] Validity of a tax must be determined not by way of a formula but rather by the result.

The Supreme Court somewhat liberalised the concept of a compensatory tax by upholding a State tax on passengers and goods carried on national highways. Haryana levied a tax on transporters plying motor vehicles between Delhi and Jammu and Kashmir. These vehicles use national highways which are maintained by the Centre, pass through Haryana without picking up or setting down any passenger in the State. The responsibility for constructing and maintaining of national highways rests on the Centre. It was therefore argued by the transporters that the tax levied by the State could hardly be regarded as compensatory. But the Court rejected the contention.[3]

---

1. Kaushikbhai K. Patel v. State of Gujarat, supra, footnote 92.
2. This is also the approach adopted in the U.S.A.: see, Howard Marf. v. Bingaman, (1935) 298 US 407; Aero Mayflower Transit Co. v. Board of R.R. Commrs., (1947) 332 US 497.
3. International Tourist Corporation v. State of Haryana, AIR 1981 SC 774 : (1981) 2 SCC 318. Also, Manmohan Viz. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1981 SC 1035 : (1981) 2 SCC 334.

The Court ruled that a State incurs considerable expenditure for maintenance of roads and providing facilities for transport of goods and passengers. Even in connection with national highways, a State incurs considerable expenditure not directly by constructing or maintaining them but by facilitating the transport of goods and passengers along with them in various ways such as lighting, traffic control, amenities for passengers, halting places for buses and trucks. That part of a national highway which lies within municipal limits is to be developed and maintained by the State. The Court thus found sufficient nexus between the tax and the passengers and goods carried on the national highways to justify the imposition.

However, the Court went on to state that to say that a tax is compensatory and regulatory is not to say that "the measure of the tax should be proportionate to the expenditure incurred on the regulation provided and the services rendered." If the tax were to be proportionate to the expenditure on regulation and service it would not be a tax but fee.[4] While fee is leviable according to the benefits received and the expenditure incurred, in case of a regulatory and compensatory tax it is practically impossible "to identify and measure, with any exactitude, the benefits received and the expenditure incurred and levy the tax according to the benefits received and the expenditure incurred.". What is necessary to uphold a regulatory and compensatory tax is "the existence of a specific, identifiable object behind the levy" and a 'nexus' between the 'subject and the object of the levy.' If that be so, then it is enough; it is not necessary to put the money realised from such a tax into a separate fund or that the levy be proportionate to the expenditure. There can be no bar to an intermingling of the revenue realised from regulatory and compensatory taxes and from other taxes of a general nature. There can be no objection to "more or less expenditure being incurred on the object behind the compensatory and regulatory levy than the realisation from the levy.[5]"

Again, the Supreme Court has asserted in the case noted below:[6] "The concept of 'regulatory and compensatory" tax does not imply mathematical precision of quid pro quo." The Court has thus relaxed the connection between the revenue raised from the tax and money spent on the activity.

In Malwa Bus Service v. State of Punjab,[7] the Supreme Court has further relaxed the concept of compensatory tax. In this case, in the year 1981, the State of Punjab substantially increased the rate of tax on every stage carriage plying for hire and transport of passengers. The rates adopted were Rs. 500 per seat per year subject to a maximum of Rs. 35,000 per bus irrespective of the distance over which it operated daily. According to the budget figures for 1981-82, the revenue receipts of the government from motor vehicles tax was Rs. 50 crores as against the expenditure of Rs. 34 crores. The tax was challenged on the ground that it

---

4. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. H.

5. However in Jindal Stainless Ltd. (2) v. State of Haryana, (2006) 7 SCC 241, at page 264 : AIR 2006 SC 2550.

Compensatory tax was described as a sub-class of fees (infra).

6. State of Maharashtra v. Madhukar Balkrishna Badiya, AIR 1988 SC 2062 : (1988) 4 SCC 290.

7. AIR 1983 SC 634 : (1983) 3 SCC 237.

In Ambala Bus Syndicate (Pvt.) Ltd. v. State of Punjab, AIR 1983 P&H 220, the High Court upheld the same tax.

Also see, B.A. Jayaram v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1005 : (1984) 1 SCC 168; K. Mahadevappa v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1982 Kant 113.

was not compensatory as the government was using it for augmenting its general revenues. But the Supreme Court upheld the tax as compensatory. A charge which is compensatory in nature is not inconsistent with the concept of freedom of trade and commerce.

Describing the principle underlying such a tax, the Court said: "What is essential is that the burden should not disproportionately exceed the cost of the facilities provided by the State." An exact correlation between tax receipts and expenditure incurred on providing facilities for smooth transport service cannot be insisted upon because "such exact correlation is in the very nature of things impossible to attain." There may be in some cases a little excess recovery by way of taxes. "That by itself should not result in the nullification of the law imposing the tax if the extent of such excess is marginal having regard to the total cost involved."

In the instant case, however, the budget expenditure on the roads and bridges did not include the expenditure incurred by the State on other heads connected with road transport, such as, the directorate of transport, transport authorities, provision for bus stands, lighting, traffic police, grants to local authorities. Taking all this expenditure into account, it became clear that a substantial part of the levy on motor vehicles was being spent annually on providing facilities to motor vehicles operators. The Court also pointed out that in later years, the government expenditure on roads and bridges had substantially increased. It also said that the figures of income and expenditure for only one year might present a distorted picture. In this case, cumulative figures of receipts and expenditure for nine years (1973-1982) presented a truer picture. Ultimately, the Court asserted that it has "the ultimate power to decide" whether in truth and substance a tax is compensatory in nature or not.

A further dimension has been given to the concept of compensatory tax by the Supreme Court in Meenakshi v. State of Karnataka.[8] Karnataka enhanced tax on passenger vehicles and it was challenged under Art. 301 on the ground that the underlying purpose behind the enhancement was to make good the loss in general revenue suffered as a result of the abolition of octroi and not to collect more revenue for facilitating trade, commerce and intercourse. The Supreme Court rejected the contention arguing that abolition of octroi facilitates movement of goods and passengers and gives a fillip to trade, commerce and intercourse. Abolition of octroi was welcome in trade and business circles. Therefore, the enhanced tax not only 'does not lose the character of being compensatory on the ground that it was enhanced to compensate the loss suffered by the State in its revenues on account of abolition of octroi but as a matter of fact on this very ground it acquires the character of being compensatory." Thus, abolition of octroi was in itself regarded as a facility granted by the State for free flow of inter-State and intra-State trade, commerce and intercourse.

The Bombay Motor Vehicles Tax Act, 1958, levied one time tax at 15 times the annual rate on all motor cycles used or kept for use in the State. Provision was made for refund of the tax in cases where (a) the vehicle was removed outside the State, and (b) the registration of vehicle is cancelled due to scrapping of the vehicle, or for a similar reason. The Supreme Court held the tax to be valid as being "the regulatory and compensatory" in nature. The Court emphasized that the concept of "regulatory and compensatory" tax "does not imply mathematical precision of quid pro quo".[9]

8. AIR 1983 SC 1283 : 1984 Supp SCC 326.

A tax was levied in Gujarat on all omnibuses which were exclusively used or kept for use in the State as contract carriages. The Supreme Court upheld the tax as being compensatory in nature. The Supreme Court has explained in Maharaja Tourist Service v. State of Gujarat[10] that to uphold a tax on the basis of its being compensatory, existence of nexus between the subject and object of the levy is necessary. However, it is not necessary to show that the whole or a substantial part of the tax collected is utilised. The State is free to determine the rate of tax keeping in view the guideline that the tax is compensatory or regulatory.

The above judicial pronouncements do however show that, in practice, it is very difficult to successfully challenge a levy on motor vehicles. The Supreme Court will invalidate such a levy only when the tax receipts are far in excess of the permissible expenditure. The nature of the tax has also changed. To begin with, the tax was justified on the ground of being a fair recompense for the use of facilities provided by the State. Now anything which smoothens inter-State trade and commerce falls within the compass of 'compensatory' tax. The States have thus secured a good deal of freedom to impose taxation on motor vehicles under entries 56 and 57 of List II.[11]

It may be of interest to know that in Australia, the cost of road-construction is not to be met from a compensatory tax.[12] This is to keep the incidence of taxation on inter-State commerce very low. But the same is permissible in the U.S.A.[13] In India, such capital cost has been included in the concept of a compensatory tax. Also, in India, so far no argument of excessive taxation on trade and commerce has been successful with the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court progressively liberalized the concept of a "compensatory and regulatory" tax in course of time in Bhagatram,[14] the Court has observed "The concept of compensatory nature of tax has been widened and if there is substantial or even some link between the tax and the facilities extended to such dealers, directly, or indirectly the levy cannot be impugned as invalid."

The Supreme Court further liberalized the concept in its pronouncement in State of Bihar v. Bihar Chamber of Commerce.[15] The Bihar Legislature levied a tax on entry of goods into a local area for consumption, use or sale therein at a rate, not exceeding 5%, as may be specified by the State Government. The tax fell under Entry 52, List II. The question was whether the tax was hit by Art. 301. As the tax was levied upon the entry of goods into a local area, it was a tax on the movement of goods so the question was raised whether the tax was compensatory in nature. The Supreme Court held the tax valid as being compensatory in nature.

The significant point to note is that nowhere such a nexus between the levy and the provisions of such facilities was mentioned. The State produced no mate-

---

9. State of Maharashtra v. Madhukar Balkrishna Badiya, AIR 1988 SC 2062 : (1988) 4 SCC 290.
10. AIR 1991 SC 1650 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 489.
11. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. D.
12. Hughes & Vale Pty. Ltd. v. New South Wales, (1955) 93 C LR 127.
13. Capital Greyhound Lines v. Brice, 339 US 542 (1950); Interstate Transit Inc. v. Dick Lindsay, 283 US 183 (1930).
14. Bhagatram Rajeev Kumar v. Commr. of Sales Tax, (1995) 96 STC 645.
15. AIR 1996 SC 2344 : (1996) 9 SCC 136.

rial to establish that the levy was of a compensatory and regulatory in nature. But the Court held this circumstance as being of "no consequence" for the reason that the Court can take "notice" of the fact that the State does provide several facilities to the trade including laying and maintenance of roads, water-ways and markets, etc. The Court observed in this connection:

> "As a matter of fact, since the levy is by the State, we must also look to the facilities provided by the State for ascertaining whether the State has established the compensatory character of the tax. On this basis it must be held that the State has established that the impugned tax is compensatory in nature."[16]

The Court also ruled:

> "It is not and it cannot be stipulated that for the purpose of establishing the compensatory character of the tax it is necessary to establish that every rupee collected on account of the entry tax should be shown to be spent on providing the trading facilities. It is enough if some connection is established between the tax and the trading facilities provided. The connection can be a direct one or an indirect one…"[17]

The Court further maintained that judicial notice can be taken of the fact that the State does provide general facilities to the trade including laying and maintenance of roads, waterways and markets, etc.

On this basis, it became difficult to challenge any tax as being invalid under Art. 301 as the Court can assume that there exists, an "indirect" "nexus" between the tax and the facilities provided by the State to trade and commerce.

The concept of 'compensatory tax' has been borrowed from Australia where it has been evolved to dilute somewhat the rigours of Section 92.[18] Now there is one basic difference between the Indian and the foreign models. In Australia, Section 92 admits of no exception; if a law imposes a restriction on trade, it is just unconstitutional. In this context, the Courts have evolved the test of compensatory tax to loosen the rigours of Section 92. Similarly, in the U.S.A., the States have conceded some power to tax inter-State commerce as against the constitutional protection given to such commerce to help them to raise some funds to maintain roads, etc. Therefore, the concept of compensatory tax has been adopted to make inter-State commerce pay its way.[19]

In India, on the other hand, Art. 301 is not absolute in the sense that Arts. 302 to 304 provide exceptions to it. A State wishing to restrict freedom of trade has only to follow the conditions laid down in Art. 304(b). The question, therefore, arises: when the Constitution itself provides a mechanism to impose restrictions on freedom of trade, is it necessary to adopt other concepts for the same purpose from foreign systems which operate in a very different context? The basic reason for propounding the theory of compensatory taxes appears to be to free the States, to some extent, from the restraints of Art. 304(b). One of these requirements is to have Central consent to their laws restricting trade and commerce.

---

16. Ibid, at 2349.
17. Ibid. See also State of H.P. v. Yash Pal Garg, (2003) 9 SCC 92 : (2003) 4 JT 413; Widia (India) Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, (2003) 8 SCC 22 : AIR 2003 SC 3095; Geo Miller & Co. (P) Ltd. v. State of M.P., (2004) 5 SCC 209 : AIR 2004 SC 3552; State of Bihar v. Shree Baidyanath Ayurved Bhawan (P) Ltd., (2005) 2 SCC 762 : AIR 2005 SC 932.
18. Freightlines ad Construction Holding Ltd. v. New South Wales, (1968) AC 625.
19. Aero Mayflower Transit Co. v. Board of R.R. Commrs., 33 2 US 497 (1947).

This has been done on the ground that otherwise State autonomy would be greatly compromised. This is, therefore, a judicial attempt to make the Indian Constitution more federal than what its framers had envisaged it to be.

In the Krishnan case,[20] the Court raised the question whether a non-discriminatory tax levied by a State should be regarded as a restriction on trade and commerce because of the feeling that this would curtail State autonomy to levy taxes falling in the State legislative sphere. In the last edition of this book, it was stated:[21]

> "The danger however is that the States may be tempted to impose high taxes on inter-State commerce under regional pressures thus injuring the national economic fabric. The Courts may find it difficult to police the area of State taxation of trade and commerce. The way for a high level of taxation on road transport will be cleared if, in assessing whether a tax is compensatory or not, it relates the revenue accrued to the total expenses on construction and maintenance of roads. Nevertheless, the danger of high taxation on road transport looms large on the horizon. Requirement of Presidential assent would have contained this danger to some extent as the Centre at the time of assenting to State bills could consider whether the road transport could bear the proposed tax or not. It could have also secured a co-ordination in the State taxation by using this power. As it is, the Centre can now achieve any desired results in the area of taxation of road transport not under Art. 304(b) but only by enacting a law under entry 35, List III."[22]

This danger turned out to be true as the above cases show. Road transport was heavily taxed in some of the States.

Since the concept of compensatory tax has been judicially evolved as an exception to the provisions of Article 301 and as the parameters of this judicial concept had become blurred, particularly by reason of the decisions in Bhagatram and Bihar Chamber of Commerce, the Constitution Bench in Jindal Stainless Ltd. (2) v. State of Haryana[23] clarified the differences between exercise of taxing and regulatory Power and between "a tax", "a fee" and "a compensatory tax", and held that the test of "some connection" as propounded in Bhagatram case is not applicable to the concept of compensatory tax and accordingly, overruled the judgments of this Court in Bhagatram Rajeevkumar v. CST and State of Bihar v. Bihar Chamber of Commerce to that extent. The decision lays down the parameters of the concept of compensatory tax vis-a-vis Article 301 as follows:

(i) Compensatory tax is a compulsory contribution levied broadly in proportion to the special benefits derived to defray the costs of regulation or to meet the outlay incurred for some special advantage to trade, commerce and intercourse.[24]

(ii) The quantifiable benefit is represented by the costs incurred in procuring the facility/services, which costs in turn become the basis of reimbursement/ recompense for the provider of the services/facilities…It is a sub-class of "a fee".

---

20. G.K. Krishnan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1975 SC 583 : (1975) 1 SCC 375.
21. III ed. (1978) at 361.
22. For entry 35, List III, see, supra, Ch. XI, Sec. E.
23. (2006) 7 SCC 241 : AIR 2006 SC 2550.
24. (Ibid) at page 268.

(iii) The impugned enactment must facially or patently indicate quantifiable data on the basis of which the compensatory tax is sought to be levied and indicate the benefit which is quantifiable or measurable. If it does not, the burden will be on the State as a service/facility provider to show by placing the material before the Court, that the payment of compensatory tax is reimbursement/ recompense for the quantifiable/measurable benefit provided or to be provided to its payer(s).[25]

F. REGULATORY MEASURES

Regulatory measures are not regarded as violative of the freedom guaranteed by Art. 301. The word 'free' in Art. 301 does not mean freedom from such regulation as is necessary for an orderly society. Regulatory measures do not fall within the purview of the restrictions contemplated by Art. 301. As the Supreme Court has observed: "There is a clear distinction between laws interfering with freedom to carry out the activities constituting trade and laws imposing on those engaged therein rules of proper conduct or other restraints directed to the due and orderly manner of carryingout the activities".[26]

As regards regulatory measures, these may be of diverse nature or of various kinds such as traffic regulations, filing of returns, making of declarations, regulation of hours equipment, weight, size of load, lights, traffic laws, etc. These are some examples of regulatory laws which are not hit by Art. 301.[27] Regulations like rules of traffic facilitate exercise of freedom of trade and commerce whereas restrictions impede that freedom. It is for the Court to decide whether a provision purporting to regulate trade and commerce is in fact regulatory or restrictive of the freedom guaranteed under Art. 301. Similarly, regulation in the interest of public health and order takes the case out of Article 301, and regulation for the purpose of Article 301 is not confined to such regulations alone which will facilitate the trade.[28] Such measures cannot be challenged unless they are shown to be of a colourable nature designed to restrict the free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse.

In the case noted below,[29] the State of Bihar made a law introducing a system of declarations to be made by transporters of goods through the State. This was done to prevent evasion of sales tax. The Supreme Court ruled that the measure was merely of a regulatory nature and does not prohibit or impede transportation

---

25. (Ibid), at page 268. See also Hardev Motor Transport v. State of M.P., (2006) 8 SCC 613 : AIR 2006 SC 839; Opportunity was given to the States to bring relevant material on record to justify the levy, Jindal Stainless Ltd. (3) v. State of Haryana, (2006) 7 SCC 271 : AIR 2006 SC 3127*; K.A. Jose v. R.T.O.*, 2008(1) KLJ 128; Bharat Earth Movers Ltd. v. The State of Karnataka, 2007(3) MPHT 69.

26. G.K. Krishnan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1975 SC 583, 587 : (1975) 1 SCC 375.
Also, Automobile Transport v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1962 SC 1406 : (1963) 1 SCR 491; Assam v. Labanya Probha, AIR 1967 SC 1575 : (1967) 3 SCR 611; S. Ahmed v. State of Mysore, AIR 1975 SC 1443 : (1975) 2 SCC 131. See also Jindal Stainless Ltd. (2) v. State of Haryana, (2006) 7 SCC 241 : AIR 2006 SC 2550.

27. G.K. Krishnan, supra.

28. State of Punjab v. Devans Modern Breweries Ltd., (2004) 11 SCC 26, at page 103 : (2003) 10 JT 485.

29. State of Bihar v. Harihar Prasad, AIR 1989 SC 1119 : (1989) 2 SCC 192.

of goods. On the other hand, it was designed to facilitate the movement of goods throughout the State.[30]

The word "regulation" does not have any fixed or inflexible meaning. It is difficult to define this word as it has no precise meaning. It is a word of broad import, having a broad meaning and is very comprehensive in scope. Every case has to be judged on its own facts and in its own setting of time and circumstances. It may be that in some situations even a 'prohibition' may be regarded as being regulatory in nature and not hit by Art. 301.

A rule banning movement of forest produce within the State between 10 p.m. and sunrise was held to be void under Art. 301 as it was held to be "restrictive" and not "regulatory" in time.[31]

In a number of cases, prohibitions imposed under the Essential Commodities Act, 1955, on the movement of "essential commodities" from the State to any place outside have been validated by being characterised as "regulatory" in nature. In Ramanathan,[32] a total ban imposed on the movement of paddy from a few districts in Tamil Nadu to any place outside was held to be "regulatory" in nature and so it was not hit by Art. 301. The Court justified the ban as follows:

> "The placing of such ban on export of food stuffs across the State or from one part of the State to another with a view to prevent outflow of food stuffs from a State which is a surplus State prevents the spiral rise in prices of such foodstuffs by artificial creation of shortage by unscrupulous traders."

In Bishamber Dayal,[33] the Supreme Court held that complete prohibition on movement of wheat from one State to another under S. 3(2)(d) of the Essential Commodities Act, 1955, was regulatory in character and did not amount to restriction within Arts. 301 or 304 of the Constitution.[34]

The State of Tamil Nadu declared timber as an "essential" commodity and prohibited its movement from the State to any place outside under the Essential Commodities Act. Characterising the prohibition as regulatory in nature and not restrictive so as to attract Arts. 301 or 304 of the Constitution, the Supreme Court observed:[35]

> "According to us, the expression 'free trade' cannot be interpreted in an unqualified manner. Any prohibition on movement of any article from one State to another has to be examined with reference to the facts and circumstances of that particular case—whether it amounts to regulation only, taking into consideration the local conditions prevailing, the necessity for such prohibition and what public interest is sought to be served by imposition thereof."

Under the Essential Commodities Act, imposition of complete prohibition on the movement of the essential commodities from one State to another in some

---

30. Also see, Sodhi Transport Co. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1986 SC 1099 : (1986) 2 SCC 486.

31. State of Mysore v. Sanjeeviah, AIR 1967 SC 1189 : (1967) 2 SCR 361. However it is doubtful whether this decision is still good law. See State of Tripura v. Sudhir Ranjan Nath, (1997) 3 SCC 665, at page 677 : AIR 1997 SC 1168.

32. K. Ramanathan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1985 SC 660 : (1985) 2 SCC 116.

33. Bishaber Dayal Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 SC 33 : (1982) 1 SCC 39.

34. Also see, Krishan Lal Praveen Kumar v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1982 SC 29 : (1981) 4 SCC 550.

35. State of Tamil Nadu v. Sanjeetha Trading Co., AIR 1993 SC 237, 243 : (1993) 1 SCC 236.

circumstances may be treated as regulation and not restriction for "the situations prevailing in any particular State may require complete prohibition on the movement of any essential article or commodity outside the State".

The matter may however be different when a total prohibition is imposed on the movement of goods or articles from one State to another which have not been declared to be essential commodities. In such a case, the State imposing the ban "has to satisfy the Court that in spite of total prohibition it amounts only to regulation of the trade in such articles or even if it was restriction it was reasonable within the meaning of Art. 304(b) of the Constitution and has been imposed by law as required by Art. 304(b)."

Protection of regional interests for political end and not in public interest is not permissible. In Sanjeetha,[21] the prohibition was imposed for arranging the supply of timber at fair price and for equitable distribution thereof.

G. EXCEPTIONS TO FREEDOM OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

No freedom can be absolute as absolute freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse may lead to economic confusion and it may degenerate into a self-defeating licentiousness in trade and commerce. The framers of the Constitution realised that under some circumstances freedom of trade and commerce may have to be curbed or curtailed. Therefore, the wide amplitude of the freedom granted by Art. 301 is expressly limited by Arts. 302 to 305. The exceptions to Art. 301 are:

(1) Parliament is given power to regulate trade and commerce in public interest under Art. 302 subject to Art. 303.

(2) The State Legislatures are given power to regulate trade and commerce under Art. 304 subject to Art. 303.

(3) Art. 305 protects existing laws from the operation of Arts. 301 and 303.

(4) Art. 305 also saves nationalization laws from the operation of Art. 301.

The purport of these provisions is two-fold. One, Parliament is entitled by itself to impose restrictions on trade and commerce. Two, the power of the States to do so is restricted. The Centre can prevent a State from imposing a restriction if it is against national interest.

Before, however, Arts. 302 to 304 come into play, the Court has to decide whether the 'restriction' imposed is of a 'regulatory' nature or not. As Stated above, if it is of a regulatory nature, its validity need not be assessed with respect to any of the constitutional provisions contained in Arts. 302 to 304.

(i) PARLIAMENTARY POWER TO REGULATE TRADE AND COMMERCE

(a) ARTICLE 302

Article 302 empowers Parliament to impose by law such restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse between one State and another, or within any part of the territory of India, as may be required in the public interest.

By virtue of Art. 302, Parliament is, notwithstanding the protection conferred by Art. 301, authorised to impose restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse in the public interest. Thus, Art. 302 relaxes the restriction imposed by Art. 301 in favour of Parliament.

The reference in Art. 302 to restriction on the freedom of trade within any part of the territory of India as distinct from freedom of trade between one State and another clearly indicates that the freedom granted by Art. 301 covers both intra-State as well as: inter-State commerce and trade, as Art. 302 is in the nature of an exception to Art. 301.

As the Supreme Court has observed in Nataraja Mudaliar: "Art. 301 does not merely protect inter-State trade or operate against inter-State barriers: all trade is protected whether it is inter-State or intra-State by the prohibition imposed by Art. 301". Accordingly, under Art. 302, Parliament can impose restrictions on both inter-State as well as intra-State commerce. Inter-State and intra-State trading activities often have intimate inter-relationship.

A question has been raised whether Parliament should have power to regulate intra-State commerce and whether or not this matter should belong exclusively to the States. The Sarkaria Commission has justified the present position in the following words:[36]

> "The need for empowering Parliament to place restrictions on trade and commerce even within a State is obvious. Ours is a vast country with varying economic potentiality and considerable differences in regard to existing levels of development. The Union's responsibility in respect of certain matters may, therefore, entail regulating trade and commerce even within a State for achieving national objectives. For example, there is the need to protect the interests of the weaker sections of our community like the tribal people etc. Indiscriminate exploitation of natural resources in one State, for example, denudation of forests, may have far reaching implications for other States which may be affected by floods, silting up of reservoirs, etc. Such situations may require imposition of restrictions on trade even within the State. The importance of Parliamentary control over intra-State trade is also significant where centres of production of certain commodities are situated entirely within a State but the centres of consumption are located outside the State."

The requirement of 'public interest' in Art. 302 would not present any serious problem in the way of Parliament regulating trade and commerce because of the strong presumption in favour of Parliamentary legislation being in public interest. The majority judgment in Atiabari[37] even suggested that prima facie the question of public interest underlying a Parliamentary law imposing restrictions on the freedom of trade 'may not be justiciable'. If this be the correct approach, then Parliament's power to decide what restrictions need be imposed under Art. 302 may be said to be practically unlimited. But the correctness of this view was doubted later by the Supreme Court in Khyerbari.[38] In case of Art. 19(1)(g),[39] the concept of public interest is justiciable and there appears to be no reason why Art. 302 should be treated differently. From a practical point of view, however, to hold 'public interest' as justiciable may not mean much for it is rare for a

---

36. Sarkaria Commission Report, 502 (1988).
37. Atiabari Tea Co. v. State of Assam, AIR 1961 SC 232 : (1961) 1 SCR 809; supra.
38. Khyerbari Tea Co. v. State of Assam¸AIR 1964 SC 925 : (1964) 5 SCR 975; supra.
39. Infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.

Court to hold that a legislation lacks public interest. A person challenging the law will have to show to the Court why it is not required in the public interest, and this, indeed, is a difficult task except in the rare case where the law is seen on its face to have been passed for a private purpose.[40]

In Nataraja[41], the Supreme Court has asserted that "there can be no doubt that exercise of the power to tax may normally be presumed to be in the public interest." It thus means that the presumption can be rebutted by a person challenging a particular tax but the onus is indeed extremely difficult to discharge. In Nataraja, the Court said that the presumption was that the imposition of the tax was in public interest. This had not been offset by any contra material in the instant case.

Under the Central Sales Tax Act, an inter-State sale to an unregistered dealer is to be taxed at 10 per cent, or at the rate applicable in the concerned State to intra-State sales whichever is higher. This was challenged under Art. 301. It was argued in State of Madras v. Nataraja Mudaliar[42] that the provision in the Central Sales Tax Act authorised the imposition of varying rates of taxation in different States on similar inter-State transactions; this resulted in inequality in tax burden which impeded inter-State trade, commerce and intercourse, and, therefore, it infringed Art. 301. The Supreme Court rejected the argument and observed:

> "The Central Sales tax though levied for and collected in the name of the Central Government is a part of the sales tax levy imposed for the benefit of the States. By leaving it to the States to levy sales tax in respect of a commodity on inter-State transactions no discrimination is practised: and by authorising the State from which the movement of goods commences to levy on transactions of sale Central Sales Tax, at rates prevailing in the State…. no discrimination can be deemed to be practised."

Again, the validity of S. 8(2)(b) of the Central law was challenged which authorises levy of 10% or at the rate prevailing in the State. The challenge was mounted under Arts. 301 and 303.

But the Central Sales Tax Act was justified under Art. 302 under which "the Parliament is, notwithstanding the protection conferred by Art. 301, authorised to impose restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce or intercourse in the public interest."

The Supreme Court again rejected the challenge in State of Tamil Nadu v. Sitalakshmi Mills[43] saying that the provision was made to prevent evasion of tax and so it was "a measure in the public interest," and, therefore, Parliament was competent to make it under Art. 302, even if it imposed restrictions on inter-State commerce. Even if it be assumed that the tax at the higher rate levied by Parliament imposed restrictions on freedom of trade and commerce as Parliament was competent to impose restrictions on that freedom in public interest, and "as the imposition of a tax is normally presumed in the public interest," the provision was not bad as violating Art. 301.

---

40. Derham, Problems in Part XIII of the Const., 1 JILI, 523, 526.
Also see, infra, Sec. G(ii), under Art. 304.
41. State of Madras v. Nataraja, AIR 1969 SC 147 : (1968) 3 SCR 829; supra.
42. AIR 1969 SC 147 : (1968) 3 SCR 829.
43. AIR 1974 SC 1505, 1509 : (1974) 4 SCC 408.

The Essential Commodities Act has been held to impose reasonable restrictions on the right to carry on trade and commerce as guaranteed by Arts. 19(1)(g) and 301.[44] Payment of statutory minimum bonus even when the management has sustained a loss has been held to be reasonable and in public interest within Art. 19(6) and Art. 302. Directive Principles of State Policy are fundamental to the governance of the country and, therefore, what is ordained as State policy cannot be regarded as unreasonable or contrary to public policy. Payment of bonus being in implementation of Arts. 39 and 43 is reasonable.[45]

Article 302 does not speak of 'reasonable' restrictions, yet it has been observed by the Supreme Court in Prag Ice Mills[46]: "Although Article 302 does not speak of reasonable restrictions yet it is evident that the restrictions contemplated by it must bear a reasonable nexus with the need to serve public interest."

In several cases,[47] where the constitutional validity of a law imposing restrictions under Art. 302 has been challenged, the Supreme Court has applied the test of reasonableness to uphold the validity of those restrictions. Therefore, the concept of reasonableness has been impliedly introduced into Art. 302. Further, whenever a restriction is challenged, an additional ground raised is that it is inconsistent with Art. 19(1)(g).[48] This inevitably brings in the question of reasonableness of the restriction.

Acting under rule 8C of the Tamil Nadu Minor Mineral Concessions Rules, 1959, formulated under the Mines and Mineral (Regulation and Development) Act, 1957, a parliamentary law, the Tamil Nadu Government banned leases for quarrying black granite in favour of private persons. The Central Act and the Concession Rules were challenged under Art. 301 as violating the freedom of trade and commerce. In State of Tamil Nadu v. Hind Store,[49] the Supreme Court upheld both. The Act being a regulatory measure for the conservation and discriminate exploitation of the mineral resources of the country and so was outside the purview of Art. 301. Even otherwise, under Art. 302, Parliament is enabled to impose restrictions on freedom of trade and commerce necessary in the public interest and the impugned Act was a law enacted in the public interest. The rule in question was made by the State Government under the said Act and so became its 'part and parcel'. Consequently, said the Court, "statutory rules made pursuant to the power entrusted by Parliament are law made by Parliament within the meaning of Article 302."[50]

Parliament enacted the Municipal Corporation Act, 1957, and empowered the Corporation to levy terminal tax on all goods carried by railway or road in the Union Territory of Delhi from any place outside thereof. The Supreme Court declared the levy valid on two alternative grounds, viz.,

---

44. Bishamber Dayal Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, supra. Similarly a law prohibiting the manufacture of and trade in electrical items without conforming to specified standards is not violative of Articles 302 and 303.See Sri Balaji Industries v. Union of India (UOI), AIR 2007 Kant 118.
45. Jalan Trading Co. (P) Ltd. v. D.M. Aney, AIR 1979 SC 233 : (1979) 3 SCC 220.
46. Prag Rice & Oil Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 1296, 1302 : (1978) 3 SCC 459.
47. Manick Chand Paul v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1249 : (1984) 3 SCC 65.
48. For discussion on Art. 19(1)(g), see, infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.
49. AIR 1981 SC 711 : (1981) 2 SCC 205.
50. Ibid, at 720.

(1) It does not impose any direct and immediate impediment on the inter-State movement of goods and so was not hit by Art. 301 which only hits direct and immediate impediments on intra-State or inter-State movement of goods or persons. "It is true that a tax may in certain cases, directly and immediately impede the movement or flow of trade, but the imposition of a tax does not do so in every case."

(2) Even if the Act "directly and immediately" impedes the movement of the goods, the statutory provision is saved by Art. 302. There is a presumption that the imposition of the tax is in public interest.[51]

The Court has stated that only when the intra-State or inter-State movement of the persons or goods are impeded "directly and immediately as distinct from creating some indirect or inconsequential impediment by any legislative or executive action, infringement of the freedom envisaged by Art. 301 can arise, "without anything more, a tax law, without anything more, may not impair the said freedom. At the same time, it should be Stated that a fiscal measure is not outside the purview of Art. 301 of the Constitution."

(b) ARTICLE 303

Article 303(1), is in terms an exception to Art. 302. It restricts the power of Parliament to impose restrictions on trade and commerce under Art. 302. Art. 303(1) lays down that notwithstanding anything in Art. 302, Parliament shall not pass any law giving any preference to any one State over another, or discriminate between the States "by virtue of any entry relating to trade and commerce" in any of the three Lists.[52]

But, then, Art. 303(2) engrafts an exception to the restriction placed by Art. 303(1) on the powers of Parliament. Art. 303(2) says that nothing in Art. 303(1) shall prevent Parliament from making any law, or authorising the giving of, any preference or making, or authorising the making of, any discrimination if it is declared by such law if it is necessary to do so for the purpose of dealing with a situation arising from scarcity of goods in any part of the territory of India. This exception applies only to Parliament and not to the State Legislatures.

Article 303(1) expressly forbids discrimination relating to trade and commerce. The words in italics in Art. 303(1) give rise to difficulties of interpretation. One possible view may be that this expression refers to such entries only as 41 and 42 in List I, 26 and 27 in List II and 33 in List III, and not to other general entries affecting trade and commerce, or to tax entries.[53] A broader view would include within the expression all those entries in the various Lists which "deal with the power to legislate directly or indirectly in respect of activities in the nature of trade and commerce."[54] In the former case, discrimination among the States will not be barred by Parliamentary tax legislation; in the latter case, it will be, as a tax operating on trade and commerce would be covered by Art. 303(1). Obviously, the latter view is the better of the two, for it bars preferential treat-

---

51. Amrit Banaspati Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1340, 1343 : (1995) 3 SCC 335. Also see, Meera Khandelwal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1997 MP 163.

52. Supra, Ch. X.

53. Dissent of Sinha, C.J., in the Atiabari case. For tax entries, see, Ch. XI, supra.

54. SHAH. J., in the Atiabari case, at 262; Subba Rao, J., in the Automobile case, at 1434. Also, infra, 839, under the State's power to regulate trade and commerce.

ment of a State through any legislation affecting trade and commerce, and many a time the effect of a tax measure may be much more pervasive on the economy than that of a non-tax legislation.

In Automobile,[55] the Supreme Court did not express any conclusive opinion on this question arguing that the limitation introduced in Art. 303(1) cannot circumscribe the scope of Art. 301. In State of Madras v. Nataraja Mudaliar,[56] the Supreme Court again refused to express an opinion on this general question, or even on the limited question whether, for purposes of Art. 303, entries relating to tax on sale of goods (entry 92A, List I or entry 54 of List II) are entries relating to trade and commerce.

The rigours of the limitation imposed on Parliament by Art. 303(1) are relaxed somewhat by Art. 303(2). Under Art. 303(2), Parliament may prefer one State over another, or discriminate between the States, if it is declared by law made by Parliament that it is necessary so to do for the purpose of dealing with a situation arising from scarcity of goods in any part of India. In other words, when Parliament is faced with the task of meeting an emergency created by the scarcity of goods in any particular part of India, Parliament may enact a law making discrimination, or giving preference, in favour of the part thus affected. Such a declaration by Parliament would be conclusive and not justiciable.

The words 'preference to one State over another' and 'discrimination between one State and another' in Art. 303 occur as well in Ss. 51(ii) and 99 of the Australian Constitution. The Australian cases have held that not all differences in treatment amount to preferences and discriminations between the States.[57] The prohibition is attracted when the preference and discrimination is in relation to localities considered as States, or by virtue of their character as States. Further, at times, a law applied uniformly may in effect result in differential treatment of the States owing to economic conditions prevailing therein but this is not prohibited.

Under the Central Sales Tax Act, Parliament has levied a tax on inter-State sales. The tax payable by a dealer is to be assessed by the Sales-tax authorities of each State. The Act does not even fix a uniform rate of tax; in case of a sale to an unregistered dealer, the tax is to be levied at the rate of 7%, or at the rate applicable to the sale of such goods in the State concerned, whichever is higher. It thus happens that the rates of Central sales tax vary from State to State according as the rates of sales tax vary. The tax under the Act is collected by each State and retained by it for its own use.

It was argued in State of Madras v. Nataraja Mudaliar[58] that as it hampered trade and commerce by giving preference to one State over another, or by making discrimination between one State and another, Arts. 301 and 303(1) were infringed. The Court rejected the argument holding that an Act enacted for the "purpose of imposing tax which is to be collected and retained by the State" does not amount to a law giving any preference to one State over another, or making

---

55. Automobile Transport v. State of Rajasthan, supra.

56. AIR 1969 SC 147 : (1968) 3 SCR 829; supra.

57. Elliott v. The Commonwealth, 54 CLR 657; Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Irving, 1906 AC 360.

58. Footnote 57, supra.

Also, M.L. Agrawal & Sons v. Asstt. Commrs., AIR 1971 All 1; State of Tamil Nadu v. Sitalakshmi Mills, AIR 1974 SC 1505 : (1974) 4 SCC 408.

any discrimination between one State and another, merely because of varying rates of tax prevailing in different States. Several reasons were adduced in support of this view.

First, the flow of trade does not necessarily depend upon the rates of sales tax and various other factors also are relevant.

Secondly, referring to the Australian cases,[59] the Court derived the principle applicable in the present case, viz., "where differentiation is based on considerations not dependent upon natural or business factors which operate with more or less force in different localities that the Parliament is prohibited from making a discrimination."[60]

Thirdly, by leaving it to the State from which the movement of goods commences to levy Central sales tax on sale, at rates prevailing in the State, no discrimination can be deemed to be practised. "It is clear that the legislature has contemplated that elasticity of rates consistent with economic forces is clearly intended to be maintained."

The approach of the Court in Nataraja appears to have been influenced by the fact that the Central sales tax is to be levied by the State of export; that it is in the interest of such a State to fix such rates of sales tax as may not discourage prospective buyers, and this would discourage the State from imposing an unduly high rate of sales tax. The question of a State of import is, however, specifically covered by Art. 304(a).[61]

Though the scheme of the Central Act was held valid in the Nataraja case, nevertheless, there appears to be little doubt that if the Central Act had itself levied differential rates of sales tax (and not left it to the States to fix the rate) then it would have been invalid because of Art. 303. As the Act itself did not do anything like this, and merely left the matter to the States, it could be argued that the Centre was not indulging into any discrimination between State and State. And by equating intra-State and inter-State commerce as to the rates of taxation, even a State could not be said to be discriminating against inter-State commerce.[62]

In Kannadasan,[63] the Supreme Court has envisaged the possibility of Parliament imposing different rates of taxation in different States provided there is justification for the same, and that such a distinction does not amount to discrimination and that it is reasonable in the circumstances and has a purpose behind. When the Supreme Court declared invalid the cess imposed on minerals by vari-

---

59. King v. Barger, 6 CLR 41; W.R. Moran v. Dy. Fed. Commr. of Tax, 63 CLR 338.
In Australia, the Centre cannot levy a tax so as to discriminate among the several States. How can this restriction be by-passed in practice is illustrated by the fact-situation in the Moran case. The Centre imposed a flour tax and out of the money so collected, payments were made to the wheat-growers. This was done to ensure a reasonable price to wheat-growers. Tasmania being deficit in, and importer of wheat, had no use for the scheme. To compensate the State for the flour tax paid by its residents, the Centre agreed to pay back to Tasmania all that was collected through the tax. The scheme was judicially upheld. It illustrates an effort at achieving not a geographical, but intrinsic, uniformity.

60. Infra.

61. AIR 1969 SC at 157.

62. Also see, Rattan Lal & Co. v. Assessing Authority, AIR 1970 SC 1742 : 1969 (2) SCR 544; Associated Tanneries v. Commercial Tax Officer, AIR 1987 SC 1922 : (1986) 2 SCC 479.

63. P.Kannadasan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 SC 2560 : (1996) 5 SCC 670; see, supra.

ous States, Parliament enacted a law validating the State levies. This Act was challenged inter alia on the ground that Parliament had thus levied the cess at different rates in the various States. But the Supreme Court rejected the contention and upheld the Central Law on the ground of "historical justification". "It is really not a case where the Parliamentary enactment is creating the distinction or different treatment." Differential treatment was already there for long as the States levied the cess at different rates on the same mineral. In such a situation, there was no other way in which Parliament could have validated the State cess.

It has been plausibly argued that Arts. 301 and 303 should be read as independent provisions, and that a law infringing Art. 303 may or may not infringe Art. 301.

Article 302 thus authorises Parliament to mitigate the effect of Art. 301, and Art. 303 does not cut into Art. 302 much. In the end result, Parliament is left with an abundant capacity to regulate trade and commerce and it is more akin to the American Congress in this respect than to the Australian Parliament. Art. 301 is worded on the model of S. 92 of the Australian Constitution, and both provisions restrict Parliament, but then Art. 302, to a very large extent, frees the Indian Parliament from the restraints of Art. 301.

(ii) STATES' POWER TO REGULATE TRADE AND COMMERCE

(a) ARTICLE 303(1)

Like Parliament, Art. 303(1) prohibits the State Legislatures as well from passing any law giving, or authorising the giving of, any preference to one State over another, or making, or authorising the making of, any discrimination between one State and another, "by virtue of any entry relating to trade and commerce in any of the Lists in the Seventh Schedule."[64]

(b) ARTICLE 304

Article 304, consists of two clauses, and each clause operates as a proviso to Arts. 301 and 303.

Article 304 empowers the States, notwithstanding anything in Arts. 301 and 303, to make laws to regulate and restrict the freedom of trade and commerce to some extent. A restriction imposed by a State law on freedom of trade and commerce declared by Art. 301 cannot be valid unless it falls within Art. 304.

(c) ARTICLE 304(A)

Article 304(a) imposes no ban, but lifts the ban imposed by Arts. 301 and 303, subject to one condition. Art. 304(a) is thus enabling and prospective. According to Art. 304(a), a State Legislature may by law impose on goods imported from other States any tax to which similar goods manufactured or produced within that State are subject, so, however, as not to discriminate between goods so imported and goods so manufactured or produced.

This provision is limited to one subject-matter only, viz., tax on goods imported in a State from outside. This clause permits the levy on goods from sister States any tax which similar goods manufactured or produced in that State are subject to. In other words, goods imported from sister States are placed on par with similar goods manufactured or produced inside the State in regard to State taxation within the State allocated field. A State cannot treat imported goods worse than it treats its own goods. This is the demand of the concept of economic unity of India.

64. For these entries, see, Ch. X, supra.

A State is debarred from treating goods of other States any the worse than it treats its own goods. Art. 304(a) does not prevent levy of tax on goods; what is prohibited is such levy of tax on goods as would result in discrimination between goods imported from other States and similar goods manufactured or produced within the State. The object is to prevent imported goods being discriminated against by imposing a higher tax thereon than on local goods.

What Art. 304(a) demands is that the rate of taxation on local as well as imported goods must be the same. This is designed to discourage the States from creating "tax barriers" or "fiscal barriers" at the boundaries.[65] Economic unity of India demands that no State levies a discriminatory tax on goods imported from other States: at the same time, imported goods have not been completely immunized from local taxation, for that would have placed the comparable local goods at a disadvantage.

What Art. 304(a) thus ensures is that a State may not impose on goods imported from sister-States a tax higher than what is levied on similar goods manufactured or produced in the State itself so that there is no discrimination against inter-State commerce in favour of intra-State commerce. Art. 304(a) is satisfied if the rate of tax is the same on goods imported and similar goods locally manufactured.[66] Art. 304(a) thus places goods imported from sister-States on a par with similar goods manufactured or produced inside the State in regard to State taxation within the allocated field.

Madhya Pradesh imposed a sales tax on sale of tobacco sold in the State by an importer. Import of tobacoo by itself was not subject to tax, and if the imported tobacco was not sold in the State, no tax was payable. Still the Supreme Court held that the tax in question directly impeded trade and commerce between Madhya Pradesh and other States. The tax was not saved by Art. 304(a) because tobacco manufactured or produced within Madhya Pradesh was not subject to any tax, and so that tax was unconstitutional.[67]

Madras imposed sales tax on tanned hides or skins imported from the other States on their sale price, while the tax on hides or skins tanned within the State was payable on the price of purchase in the raw condition which was substantially lower than their sale price in the tanned form. Similarly, on the hides and skins purchased in the raw form from outside the State, and then tanned within the State, the tax was on the sale price of the tanned hides or skins. But on hides or skins purchased in raw form and tanned within the State, the tax was on the sale price of the raw hides or skins. The result of this provision was to subject tanned hides and skins imported from outside the State to a higher rate of tax than the tax imposed on hides and skins tanned and sold within the State. The Supreme Court declared the rule bad as discriminatory of inter-State trade and

---

65. Shree Mahavir Oil Mills v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, (1996) II SCC 39.

66. State of Madras v. Nataraja Mudaliar, supra; Rattan Lal & Co. v. Assessing Authority, AIR 1970 SC 1742 : (1969) 2 SCC 544.
Also, Laxmi Cotton Traders v. State of Punjab, AIR 1969 Punj 12.

67. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bhailal Bhai, AIR 1964 SC 1006 : (1964) 6 SCR 261.

commerce as compared to intra-State trade and commerce.[68] The effect of the sales tax on tanned hides or skins imported from the other States was higher than the tax on the local product, and so the tax was discriminatory.

The Court stated that sales tax which has the effect of discriminating between goods of one State and goods of another, may affect the free flow of trade and it will then offend against Art. 301 and will be valid only if it comes within the terms of Art. 304(a). The Court also rejected the contention that Art. 304(a) would be attracted only when the import was at the border, i.e., when the goods entered the State on crossing the border of the State. Art. 304(a) which allows a State Legislature to impose taxes on goods imported from other States, does not support the contention that the imposition must be at the point of entry only.

The discrimination in the instant case was not visible on the surface, but could be detected only by a study and analysis of the legal provisions and their effect. It is one of those few cases where the utility of constitutional provisions regarding freedom of trade and commerce becomes vivid. The situation dealt with in the instant case proves the wisdom of the constitutional provisions in Articles 301-304. In the absence of such provisions, the States could have raised all kinds of barriers against the free flow and movement of goods across State boundaries.

Raw hides and skins purchased locally in the State were subjected to a sales tax of 3 per cent at the point of last purchase in the State. No tax was to be levied when sold after tanning. As against this, hides and skins imported from other States in raw form and then sold after tanning as dressed hides and skins, were subjected to a tax of 1½% at the point of first sale in the State. This scheme was challenged as discriminatory but the Supreme Court answered in the negative in Guruviah.[69] The Court argued that the lower rate of tax on dressed hides and skins would offset the difference between the higher price of dressed hides and skins and the lower price of raw hides and skins. Art. 304(a) prevents discrimination against imported goods. The levy of 1½% on dressed hides and skins was not discriminatory as it took into account the higher price of dressed hides and skins.

The Court explained the purport of Art. 304(a) as follows:

> "Art. 304(a) does not prevent levy of tax on goods; what it prohibits is such levy of tax on goods as would result in discrimination between goods imported from other States and similar goods manufactured or produced within the State. The object is to prevent discrimination against imported goods by imposing tax on such goods at a rate higher than that borne by local goods since the difference between the two rates would constitute a tariff wall or fiscal barrier and thus impede the free flow of inter State trade and commerce. The question as to when the levy of tax would constitute discrimination would depend upon a variety of factors including rate of tax and the item of goods in respect of the sale of which it is levied."[70]

In India Cement,[71] to meet the situation arising from surplus production of cement, the Government of Andhra Pradesh issued a notification reducing the

---

68. A.T.B. Mehtab Majid & Co. v. State of Madras, AIR 1963 SC 928 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 435. Also, A. Hajee Abdul Shakoor & Co. v. State of Madras, AIR 1964 SC 1729 : (1964) 8 SCR 217.

69. V. Guruviah Naidu & Sons v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1977 SC 548 : (1977) 1 SCC 234.

70. Ibid., at 551.

71. India Cement v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1988 SC 567 : (1988) 1 SCC 743.

rate of sales tax on sale of locally produced cement to bulk consumers to 4%. As against this, the sales tax imposed on sale of cement imported from other States was levied at 13.75%. Thus, under the Andhra notification in regard to the local tax, the indigenous cement producers had a benefit of 9.75%. This was designed to benefit local cement manufacturers. The Supreme Court held the notification invalid as it was hit by Art. 304(a). The Court also ruled that the restriction imposed by Art. 301 can be limited, within the constitutional ambit, only by a law made by Parliament or the State Legislature. "No power is vested in the executive authority to act in any manner which affects or hinders the very essence and thesis contained in the scheme of Part XIII (Arts. 301-305) of the Constitution."

The State of Orissa levied a duty on foreign liquor. No such liquor was produced within the State and the whole of it was imported from other States. The Supreme Court ruled in Kalyani[72] that if the goods of a particular description were not produced within a State, the power to legislate under Art. 304(a) would not be available to it. In the instant case, as no liquor was produced within the State, the State could not use its legislative power under Art. 304(a).

But in State of Kerala v. Abdul Kadir,[73] the Supreme Court seems to have diluted the impact of Kalyani. The State of Kerala imposed a tax on tobacco which was imported into the State from outside. No tobacco was produced within the State. The question was : when no tobacco was produced within the State, could the State tax imported tobacco? Could Art. 304(a) apply in such a situation? The Court now ruled that unless there was infringement of Art. 301, the further question whether it was saved under Art. 304(a) could not arise. Explaining the Kalyani ruling, the Court said that ruling was based on the assumption that the enhanced duty on foreign liquor infringed the guarantee under Art. 301 and it could be saved only if it fell within Art. 304(a). This means that before invoking Art. 304(a), the first question to be decided is whether the tax in question directly and immediately hampers free flow of trade and, thus, falls within the prohibition of Art. 301.

In State of Karnataka v. Hansa Corporation,[74] the Supreme Court said that a tax levied within the constraints of Art. 304(a) would not be violative of Art. 301. "If a State tax law accords identical treatment in the matter of levy and collection of tax on the goods manufactured within the State and identical goods imported from outside the State, Art. 304(a) will be complied with." The effect of Art. 304(a) is to treat imported goods on the same basis as goods manufactured or produced in a State. The State tax was held valid in the instant case under Art. 304(a) as it was levied both on manufactured goods and similar goods imported from outside in a local area.[75]

The appellant purchased iron scrap from local registered dealers as well as from dealers outside the State. He manufactured ingots and sold them mostly within the State. The sale of ingots manufactured from locally purchased was not subjected to any tax, but sale of ingots manufactured out of scrap purchased from

---

72. Kalyani Stores v. State of Orissa, AIR 1966 SC 1686 : (1966) 1 SCR 865. See also The Pondicherry Generators Manufacturers' Association v.Union of India, (2007) 6 MLJ 927.
Also see, supra, under entry 51, List II, Ch. XI, Sec. D.

73. AIR 1970 SC 1912 : (1969) 2 SCC 363.

74. AIR 1981 SC 463 : (1980) 4 SCC 697.

75. Eagle Corporation Pvt. Ltd. v State of Gujarat, (2007) 1 GLR 213; In Re, Reliance Industries Limited, 2008 (I) OLR 620 : Decided On 18-02-2008.

outside the State was subjected to sales tax. Applying the ratio of Mehtab's case,[76] the Supreme Court ruled the provision ultra vires in the instant case.[77]

The State of Gujarat imposed sales tax at 15% on all electronic goods whether locally manufactured or imported from outside. No distinction was made between the goods produced within the State, or imported from outside. But then, the State reduced the tax to 10% on goods imported from outside and to 1% on locally manufactured goods with a view to give incentive to encourage local manufacturing units. In Weston Electronics v. State of Gujarat,[78] the Supreme Court declared that an exception to the mandate declared in Art. 301 and the prohibition contained in Art. 303(1) can be sustained on the basis of Art. 304(a) if the conditions contained therein are fulfilled. In the instant case, the Court declared "the discrimination effected by applying different rates of tax between goods imported into the State of Gujarat and goods manufactured within that State must be struck down."

Accordingly, the Court quashed the notification imposing lower rate of sales tax on locally manufactured electronic goods. While a State Legislature may enact a law imposing tax on goods imported from other States as is levied on similar goods manufactured within that State, the imposition must not be such as to discriminate between goods so imported and goods so manufactured. The Court was of the view that the reduction in the sales tax in the case of goods manufactured locally in order to provide an incentive for encouraging local manufacturing units cannot be sustained if it adversely affects the free flow of inter-State trade and commerce.

In H. Anraj v. State of Tamil Nadu,[79] sale of lottery tickets in the State was subjected to a tax of 20% but the sale of Tamil Nadu lottery tickets was exempt. This was challenged in the Supreme Court. The Court ruled that lottery tickets could be treated as "goods" and could thus be subjected to sales tax under entry 54 List II. But, in the instant case, there was discriminatory taxation on "imported goods", i.e., lottery tickets from other States whereas the "indigenous goods" i.e., local lottery tickets were tax exempt. This hampered free flow of trade and commerce and was thus hit by Art. 304(a). It may be noted that in the RMDC case,[80] the Supreme Court had ruled that sale in lottery tickets did not amount to trade and commerce. In Anraj no reference was made to the ruling in the RMDC case.[81] This shows the judicial tendency to seek to uphold, as far as possible, the legislation impugned.

Over the years, the Supreme Court has softened its approach regarding application of Art. 304(a) to State taxation.

A very significant pronouncement has been made by the Supreme Court on the scope of Art. 304(a) in Video Electronics Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Punjab,[82] The U.P.

---

76. Supra, 890, footnote 69.
77. Andhra Steel Corporation v. Commissioner of Commercial Taxes, Karnataka, AIR 1990 SC 1912 : 1990 Supp SCC 617.
78. AIR 1988 SC 2038 : (1988) 2 SCC 568.
79. AIR 1986 SC 63 : (1986) 1 SCC 414. Overruled on another point in Sunrise Associates v. Govt. of NCT of Delhi, (2006) 5 SCC 603 : AIR 2006 SC 1908.
80. State of Maharashtra v. RMDC, AIR 1957 SC 699 : 1957 SCR 874; supra.
Also see, infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.
81. Also see, B.R. Enterprises v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1867; see, supra, Sec. C, under Art. 301.
82. AIR 1990 SC 820 : (1990) 3 SCC 87.

Government issued a notification exempting goods manufactured by a new industrial unit starting production between October 1, 1992, and March 31, 1990, from the levy of sales tax. The notification was challenged under Arts. 304 and 304(a) on the ground that the goods imported into Uttar Pradesh from out of the State thus became subject to a higher tax than goods produced locally.

The Supreme Court rejected the contention. The Court pointed out that the taxes which do not directly or immediately restrict or interfere with trade, commerce and intercourse throughout the territory of India are excluded from the ambit of Art. 301. Sales tax has only an indirect effect on trade and commerce. Normally a tax on sale of goods does not directly impede the free flow of goods.[83] Free flow of trade between the two States does not necessarily or generally depend on the rate of tax alone. Many factors including the cost of goods play an important part in the movement of goods from one State to another. Art. 304 is an exception to Art. 301. The need to take recourse to the exception will arise only if the tax impugned is hit by Arts. 301 and 303. If it is not then Art. 304 does not come into the picture at all.

Commenting on Art. 304(a), the Court has observed that its object is to prevent discrimination against the imported goods at a rate higher than that borne by local goods. "Every differentiation is not discrimination". In the instant cases, the general rate applicable to the goods locally made and on those imported from other States is the same. The question is whether the power to grant exemption to specified class of manufacturers for a limited period on certain conditions is violative of Art. 304(a). Replying in the negative, the Court has observed:

> "In a federal polity, all the States having powers to grant exemption to specified class for limited period, such granting of exemption cannot be held to be contrary to the concept of economic unity."[84]

The Court distinguished Weston Electronics by saying that that was a case of differential rates whereas in the instant case, rates of tax are the same for goods imported or produced within the State; what has been done in the instant case is only to give exemption from sales tax for the purpose of ensuring economic development of the State. This shows that the Court satisfied itself by looking at formal equality and ignored the discrimination in effect between imported and locally produced goods. It can hardly be denied that by giving exemption from sales tax, the tax burden was in effect reduced on locally produced goods as burden compared to the imported goods.

The Punjab Government issued a notification levying sales tax on electronic goods at 12% but an electronic manufacturing unit existing in Punjab was to pay only 1% sales tax. The Court upheld this differentiation on the ground that it was necessary to boost the local industry and to stop it from shifting to the neighbouring States.

Commenting on such cases as Indian Cement,[85] Weston Electronics[86] and West Bengal Hosiery,[87] the Court said that there was "naked blanket preference in fa-

---

83. See, Andhra Sugar Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 599 : (1968) 1 SCR 705; State of Madras v. N.K. Nataraja Mudaliar, AIR 1969 SC 147 : (1968) 3 SCR 829.
84. AIR 1990 SC at 833.
85. Note 57 on 891.
86. Note 63 on 892.
87. West Bengal Hosiery Assn. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1988 SC 1814 : (1988) 4 SCC 134.

vour of locally manufactured goods as against goods coming from outside the State". In these cases exemption was granted without any reason or concession in favour of indigenous manufactured goods which was not available in respect of the goods imported into that State. This therefore amounted to hostile discrimination. But, in the instant case, there was valid, justifiable and rational reason for differentiation.

This judicial approach reduces the efficacy of Art. 304(a). If a State proposes to support local industries, it should take recourse to other expedients, rather than adopt a discriminatory tax regime Art. 304(a) bars discrimination, as such. It does not permit discrimination against imported goods to promote local industry.

(d) ART. 304(B)

Notwithstanding anything in Arts. 301 or 303, Art. 304(b) authorises a State Legislature to impose by law such reasonable restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce or intercourse with or within that State as may be required in public interest. The proviso to Art. 304(b) says that no bill or amendment for this purpose shall be introduced in the State Legislature without the previous sanction of the President.

Though Art. 304(b) requires prior Presidential assent before the bill is introduced in the legislature yet, due to Art. 255, if prior assent is not secured, the infirmity can be cured by subsequent assent of the President after the bill has been passed by the Legislature.[88]

Art. 304(b), therefore, means that if a State Legislature enacts a law which imposes such reasonable restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse with or within that State as may be required in public interest, and if the Bill has been introduced in the State Legislature with the previous sanction of the President, then the State Act would not offend Art. 301. A restriction on the freedom of trade and commerce which is guaranteed by Art. 301 cannot be justified unless the procedure prescribed in Art. 304(b) has been followed.

For application of Art. 304(b) to a tax on trade, three conditions need to be fulfilled:

(a) The Bill has to be introduced or moved in the State Legislature with the prior sanction of the President, or that the Bill has been assented to by the President.

(b) The tax in question constitutes a reasonable restriction.

(c) The tax has been levied in public interest.

The requirement of Presidential assent ensures that a State legislation enacted under pressure of regional economic interests is duly examined by the Centre from the point of view of national economy.[89] This mechanism draws a balance between national and regional economic interests and it makes the Central Government, rather than the Courts, the arbiter of what restrictions the States may be allowed to impose on trade and commerce. This would thus avoid the emergence

---

88. State of Karnataka v. Hansa Corp., supra, footnote 75 on 1088.

89. Only a letter from the Government of India stating that the Government of India have no objection to the introduction of the levy under Article 304(b) of the Constitution is not the assent or previous sanction of the President. K. A. Jose v. RTO, (2008) 1 KLJ 128.

of confusing case-law which has been the feature of the U.S.A. and, to some extent, of Australia.

In Automobile Transport,[1] the Supreme Court has compared Art. 304(b) with Art. 302 in the following words :

> "This provision [Art. 304(b)] appears to the State analogue to the Union Parliament's authority defined by Article 302. Leaving aside the pre-requisite of previous Presidential sanction for the validity of State legislation under cl. (b) provided in the proviso thereto, there are two important differences between Article 302 and Article 304(b)... The first is that while the power of Parliament under Article 302 is subject to the prohibition of preferences and discriminations decreed by Article 303(1) unless Parliament makes the declaration contained in Article 303(2), the State's power contained in Art. 304(b) is made expressly free from the prohibition contained in Art. 303(1), because the opening words of Article 304 contain a non-obstante clause both to Article 301 and Article 303. The second difference springs from the fact that while Parliament's power to impose restrictions upon Article 302 upon freedom of commerce in the public interest is not subject to the requirement of reasonableness, the power of the States to impose restrictions on the freedom of commerce in the public interest under Article 304 is subject to the condition that they are reasonable."

In Atiabari, a State law imposing a tax on movement of goods in inter-State commerce was held invalid because of lack of Presidential assent. Since Art. 301 covers both inter-State and intra-State commerce, Presidential assent under Art. 304(b) is needed even when a State imposes a restriction only on intra-State commerce, although intra-State commerce falls within the exclusive State legislative domain.

The Supreme Court has ruled that unless the Court first comes to the finding on the available material whether or not there is an infringement of the guarantee under Art. 301, the further question as to whether the statute is saved under Art. 304(b) does not arise.[2]

A State tax levied on dispatches of tea is hit by Art. 301 as it constitutes a direct and immediate restriction on the flow of trade and commerce through the country. As the State Act had not been enacted in accordance with the requirement laid down in Art. 304(b), the Act was held to be invalid.[3]

Article 304 opens with the words "notwithstanding anything in Art. 301 and Art. 303." Art. 304 therefore constitutes an exception not only to Art. 301 but also to Art. 303. Now, Art. 303(1), considered above, prohibits a State (along with Parliament) from discriminating between the States, or from giving preference to one State over another by making laws by virtue of "any entry relating to trade and commerce."[4] Therefore, it appears that a State may discriminate against

---

1. AIR 1962 SC 1406 : (1963) 1 SCR 491.
2. Kalyani Stores v. State of Orissa, AIR 1966 SC 1686 : (1966) 1 SCR 865.
3. Buxa Doars Tea Co. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1989 SC 2015 : (1989) 3 SCC 211.
4. Supra, 889.
Reference has already been made to the conflict of judicial opinion regarding the exact significance of the words 'any entry relating to trade and commerce'. In Fernandez v. State, AIR 1955 TC 126, a tax on sale or purchase was held non-challengeable under Art. 303(1) as it fell under entry 54, List II, and not 26, List II. However, in Bherulal v. Rajasthan, AIR 1956 Raj 161, it was held that the State could levy an export duty on the export of commodities to other States while exempting from duty commodities meant for local consumption as it was not prohibited by Art. 303.

other States under Art. 304(b) if all the above stated conditions, viz., Presidential assent, reasonableness and public interest are fulfilled.[5] But it remains doubtful whether a discriminatory law can be regarded as reasonable or valid vis-a-vis Art. 14.[6]

The requirements of Art. 304(b) apply to all State laws which impose restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse irrespective of the legislative entries under which they fall.[7] The Supreme Court taking recourse to the words 'Legislature of a State' in Art.304 has Stated that Art. 304 would protect laws made by a State Legislature but not the rules made by the executive government in exercise of delegated legislation.[8] If an Act has already received Presidential assent then an amendment thereof, which does not impose any additional restriction, does not need fresh Presidential assent. The Supreme Court has expressed doubt whether increase in punishment by the amending Act already existing under the original law could really be looked upon as additional restriction upon freedom of trade and commerce.[9]

Tax laws fall within the inhibition of Art. 301. A tax law having a direct and immediate impact on trade and commerce would be barred by Art. 301 unless it satisfies the requirements of Art. 304(b).[10] As the Supreme Court explained in Abdul Kadir,[11] not all taxes would be tantamount per se to an infringement of Art. 301. Some may be. Only such taxes as directly or immediately impede the free flow of trade, commerce or intercourse fall within the prohibition of Art. 301.[12] If so, the question will then be whether such a tax is saved by Art. 304(b). Thus, a tax on entry of goods in a local area infringes Art. 301 as it has a direct and immediate impact on movement of goods.[13] Payment of a luxury tax on storage and vending of tobacco in the shape of a licence-fee as a condition precedent to bringing the goods in the State would constitute a direct impediment on the free flow of goods and therefore on trade and is thus hit by Art. 301. In this case, licensees were required to pay the licence fee in advance before they could bring tobacco within the State.

The State of Rajasthan issued a notification under the Central Sales Tax Act reducing sales tax from 16% to 4% on the inter-State sale of cement. A cement manufacturer in Gujarat which imposed sales tax at 16% challenged the Rajasthan notification on the ground that it created artificial barriers and gave preference in the matter of inter-State trade and commerce to the manufacturers and dealers of cement in Rajasthan over the manufacturers and dealers of cement in Gujarat.

It was established as a fact that the despatches of cement from Rajasthan to Gujarat increased considerably and that the cement produced in Gujarat was placed in a disadvantageous position. The Rajasthan notification had the effect of

---

5. See on this, S.N. Jain, supra, footnote 23 on 1057 and references cited therein.
6. See, infra, Ch. XXI, Sec. B, for discussion on Art. 14.
7. State of Maharashtra v. Chamarbaugwala, AIR 1956 Bom 1.
8. State of Mysore v. H. Sanjeeviah, AIR 1967 SC 1189 : (1967) 2 SCR 361; supra.
9. Ahmed v. State of Mysore, AIR 1975 SC 1443 : (1975) 2 SCC 131.
10. State of Karnataka v. Hansa Corp., AIR 1981 SC 463 : (1980) 4 SCC 697.
11. State of Kerala v. Abdul Kadir, AIR 1970 SC 1912 : (1969) 2 SCC 363; Abdul Kadir v. State of Kerala, AIR 1976 SC 182 : (1976) 3 SCC 219.
12. State of Bihar v. Bihar Chamber of Commerce, AIR 1996 SC 2344 : (1996) 9 SCC 136.
13. Hansa Corp., supra, footnote 10.

creating a preference to cement manufactured and sold in Rajasthan to the disadvantage of sale of cement manufactured and sold in Gujarat and thus had direct and immediate adverse effect on the free flow of trade. The notification was held to be void. The Supreme Court pointed out that every differentiation is not discrimination but if differentiation is made without a valid reason, i.e., if there are not justifiable and reasonable reasons for differentiation, then that would amount to hostile discrimination.[14] In the instant case, the Court found no valid reason to issue the notification.

This case has now been overruled by the Supreme Court in Digvijay (II).[15] The Court has now ruled that lowering of tax by the State of Rajasthan has had the direct effect of increasing the flow of trade. The mere fact that the local sale of cement in Gujarat has been adversely affected cannot result in the impugned notification being regarded as affecting the free flow of trade and being violative of Art. 301. This provision is concerned with the movement of goods from one State to another and, as far as the present case goes, with the lowering of tax, the movement has increased rather than diminishing.

It was suggested to the Sarkaria Commission that the proviso to Art. 304(b) imposing Central control over State laws may be deleted. The Commission rejected the suggestion with the following remarks:[16]

> "State laws though purporting to regulate intra-State trade may have implications for inter-State trade and commerce. They may impose discriminatory taxes or reasonable restrictions, impeding the freedom of inter-State trade and commerce. If clause (b) of Art. 304 is deleted the commercial and economic unity of the country may be broken up by State laws setting up barriers to free flow of trade and intercourse through parochial or discriminatory use of their powers."

The Commission pointed out that the suggestion arose from the "antiquated and obsolete" theory of federalism which prevailed no longer.[17]

The scheme of Arts. 301 to 304 is well-balanced. "It reconciles the imperative of economic unity of the Nation with interests of State autonomy by carrying out in clauses (a) and (b) of Art. 304, two exceptions in favour of State legislatures to the freedom guaranteed under Art. 301."[18]

(e) JUSTICIABILITY OF REASONABLENESS AND PUBLIC INTEREST

The power of the States to regulate freedom of trade and commerce under Art. 304, when compared with the parallel power of Parliament under Art. 302, would appear to be circumscribed by three additional restrictions, viz., Presidential assent; reasonableness of restrictions; and in the public interest. The requirement of public interest is a common element in both the provisions.

The question arises whether the element of 'public interest' is justiciable. The majority opinion suggested in the Atiabari case that the requirement of 'public interest' may be deemed to be non-justiciable as it may be said to be satisfied by

---

14. Shri Digvijay Cement Co. (I) v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1997 SC 2609 : (1997) 5 SCC 406.
15. Shri Digvijay Cement Co. (II) v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2000 SC 680 : (2000) 1 SCC 688.
16. Report, 502.
17. Supra, Ch. XIV.
18. Report of the Sarkaria Commission, 503.

the Presidential assent. But in Khyerbari,[19] the Court called the view as not an expression of a definite opinion that the requirement of "public interest" does not become the subject-matter of adjudication in Court-proceedings when the validity of a law passed under Art. 304(b) is questioned. So, the element of "public interest" appears to be justiciable.[20]

The test of "public interest", however, appears to be the same as in Art. 19(1)(g)[21].

A State may validly impose restrictions under Art. 304(b) which seek to protect public health, safety, morals and property within the State.[22] Thus, a tax on liquor is in public interest as it seeks to protect the health and morals of the people. Similarly, a levy of luxury tax relating to tobacco may be regarded in public interest as consumption of tobacco involves a health hazard.[23] In this case, no tobacco was grown within the State. All tobacco was imported from outside the State. In such a case, taxing imported tobacco could not be regarded as discriminatory between tobacco brought from outside and locally grown tobacco.

Octroi has many defects and there have been constant demands from traders that it be abolished. Therefore, the Supreme Court ruled in Hansa[24] that a State tax on entry of goods into local areas for consumption, use or sale therein levied to augment municipal resources which suffered a dent as a result of abolition of octroi was in public interest as it was levied to replace octroi duty which had many obnoxious features. The levy was very modest and was imposed to compensate the loss suffered by abolition of Octroi. The Court went on to observe:

> "…..the taxes generally are imposed for raising public revenue for better governance of the country and for carrying out welfare activities of our welfare State envisaged in the Constitution and, therefore, even if a tax to some extent imposes an economic impediment to the activity taxed, that by itself is not sufficient either to stigmatise the levy as unreasonable or not in public interest."

The question is: does the above Statement mean that every tax is to be presumed to be in public interest, or whether the State should produce some material to show that the tax was levied in public interest.

As regards unreasonableness, the test is the same as is applied to determine reasonableness under Art. 19(6).[25] The test of reasonableness prescribed by Art. 304(b) is justiciable.[26] It may be noted that in Art. 302 the word "reasonable" does not precede the word "restriction" but it does in Art. 304(b).

The levy in Hansa was also regarded as not imposing an unreasonable restriction on the freedom of inter-State trade, commerce and intercourse.

---

19. AIR 1964 SC 925 : (1964) 5 SCR 975; supra.
20. Also see, Rai Ramakrishna v. State of Bihar, AIR 1963 SC 1667 : (1964) 1 SCR 897.
21. Tika Ramji v. State of U.P., AIR 1956 SC 676 : 1956 SCR 393; Vrajlal & Co. v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 129 : (1969) 2 SCC 248.
Also, supra, Sec. C this Chapter; infra, Ch XXIV, Sec. H.
22. Kalyani Stores v. State of Orissa, AIR 1966 SC 1686 : (1966) 1 SCR 865. Also see, supra, 891, footnote 2.
23. Abdul Kadir v. State of Kerala, supra, 1093, footnote 11.
24. State of Karnataka v. Hansa Corporation, supra, 1092, footnote 2.
25. Infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H: Khyerbari Tea Co., supra; Abdul Kadir, supra, footnote 11.
26. Rai Ramkrishna v. State of Bihar, AIR 1963 SC 1667 : (1964) 1 SCR 897.

Some examples of unreasonable taxes are: discriminatory tax; confiscatory tax; where no machinery is provided for assessment and levy of the tax. If the burden imposed by a tax on trade and commerce is too onerous, then it can be held to be unreasonable.

In the Khyerbari case, the Supreme Court held the Assam tax on the movement of tea as being both reasonable and in public interest. In holding the tax in public interest, a factor considered relevant by the Court was that the tax was levied not merely to raise general revenue for the State, which itself was a public purpose, but that it was to be utilised also for keeping the waterways and roads in good condition in the State. The tax was sought to be justified not on the ground of being compensatory, but that it was used to maintain roads and waterways and, therefore, it was in public interest. On a review of the provisions of the Act in question, the Court found the tax to be reasonable as well. The Court even went to the extent of saying that a tax levied by the State must be presumed to be a reasonable restriction inasmuch as taxes are levied to raise money in order to carry on the governmental functions and manifold activities. The Court also suggested that when the President gives his asset it can be presumed that the Central Government has applied its mind and come to the conclusion that the proposed tax constitutes a reasonable restriction and is required to be imposed in public interest. These are however only presumptions.

Reference has already been made to State of Bihar v. Bihar Chamber of Commerce.[27] There the Court ruled the entry tax as compensatory. On the assumption that the tax was not compensatory, the Supreme Court also ruled the levy to be valid under Art. 304(5). The Bill had received the prior assent of the President. The levy was held to be reasonable as it imposed a very modest burden on the taxpayer. Also, it would not impede trade and commerce in the taxed services in the State. The levy was held in public interest as the revenue was needed to compensate the loss arising out of the invalidations of a State tax and the revenue arising from the tax was to be spent on public welfare.

The Court rejected the contention in Khyerbari that under Art. 304(b), a law could not impose a tax with retrospective effect. A statute may be passed under Art. 304(b) retrospectively, though the fact that it has retrospective effect may be an element in considering whether it is reasonable or not. In Atiabari, the Orissa Taxation (on Goods carried by Road or Inland Waterways) Act was held invalid because of lack of previous sanction of the President as required by Art. 304(b). The Orissa Legislature re-enacted the Act in 1968 after securing the previous sanction of the President making it retrospective in operation. The Supreme Court in Misrilal Jain v. State of Orissa[28] held the Act valid saying that the laws passed under Art. 304(b) need not always be prospective. Power to legislate carries with it the power to legislate retrospectively as well as prospectively. The power to pass a validating Act is essentially subsidiary to the legislative competence to pass a law under an appropriate entry of the relevant list.[29]

The Presidential assent cannot be regarded as affording a tax immunity from such a challenge for it is only one of the three conditions which must be fulfilled for a law to be valid under Art. 304(b).

---

27. AIR 1996 SC 2344 : (1996) 9 SCC 136; supra, footnote 12.
28. AIR 1977 SC 1686 : (1977) 3 SCC 212.
29. Also see, Rai Ramkrishna v. State of Bihar, AIR 1963 SC 1667 : (1964) 1 SCR 897.

The guarantee under Art. 301 cannot be taken away by mere executive action. When power of legislation is restricted by Art. 301, but within limits provided by Arts. 302 to 305, it would be impossible to hold that the State by an executive order can do something which it is incompetent to do by legislation.[30]

H. SAVING OF EXISTING LAWS

Article 305 saves the laws enacted before the commencement of the Constitution from the operation of Arts. 301 to 303, except in so far as the President may by order otherwise direct.[31]

The rules made after the commencement of the Constitution under a pre-Constitution Act, cannot be deemed to be 'existing law'. The mere fact that there was authority in the State under a pre-Constitution Act to make rules which may impose restrictions on trade and commerce, but which power was not exercised, will not render the rule made in exercise of the authority after the Constitution an "existing law."[32]

The existing laws are saved until the President by order otherwise directs. Therefore, so long as the President does not act in this matter, burdens on trade and commerce that were existing on the eve of the Constitution would continue to operate. From this it is also clear that the conditions laid down in Art. 304 apply only to those State laws which are enacted after the Constitution.

I. NATIONALIZATION LAWS SAVED

In Saghir Ahmad v. State of U.P.,[33] the Supreme Court left undecided the question whether a state monopoly would conflict with Art. 301. As a matter of caution, so that the laws creating state monopolies may not be declared invalid as infringing Art. 301, both retrospectively and prospectively, by reference to Art. 19(6)(ii),[34] Art. 305 was amended by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955.[35]

Article 305 saves from Art. 301, all state monopolistic laws which provide for "the carrying on by the state, or by a corporation owned or controlled by the state, of any trade, business, industry or service, whether to the exclusion, complete or partial, of citizens or otherwise."

The term 'state' includes the Centre as well the States. Thus, a State or the Centre can now run any business on a monopolistic basis without infringing Art. 301.

A law providing for acquisition of banks by the government is protected under Art. 305 and so cannot be challenged under Art. 301.[36]

Article 305 protects a law and not a mere executive action unsupported by law. A monopoly in favour of the State or the Centre cannot be created by a mere

---

30. Dist. Collector v. Ibrahim, AIR 1970 SC 1275 : (1970) 1 SCC 386.
31. Bangalore W.C. & S. Mills Co. v. Bangalore Corp., AIR 1 962 SC 562 : (1961) 3 SCR 707.
32. State of Mysore v. H. Sanjeeviah, AIR 1967 SC 1189 : (1967) 2 SCR 361; supra, footnote 8.
33. AIR 1954 SC 728, 742 : (1955) 1 SCR 707.
34. Infra, Ch XXIV, Sec. H.
35. Infra, Ch. XLII.
36. R.C. Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 564 : (1970) 1 SCC 248.

administrative order. Also, Art. 305 does not protect creation of monopoly in favour of a corporation which the state neither owns nor controls.[37]

J. AUTHORITY TO CARRY OUT THE PURPOSES OF ARTICLES 301 TO 304

Problems concerning trade and commerce are more economic in content than legal. A body consisting of economist, businessmen, and lawyers may be able to do a much better job in this area than a Court having merely legal expertise. It is with this idea that Art. 307 has been incorporated in the Constitution.

Article 307 authories Parliament to appoint by law such authority as it considers appropriate for carrying out the purposes of Arts. 301, 302, 303 and 304, and confer on such authority such powers and duties as it thinks necessary.[38]

The origins of the idea contained in Art. 307 can be traced to Ss. 101-104 of the Australian Constitution which contemplate the establishment of an Inter-State Commission "with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament deems necessary for the execution and maintenance within the Commonwealth, of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce, and of all laws thereunder." The establishment of such a Commission was directly suggested by the creation of the Inter-State Commerce Commission in the U.S.A. in 1877. A commission was actually established in Australia in 1912 by the Inter-State Commission Act, 1912, but the High Court held that no judicial power could be conferred on it in view of the strict separation of judicial from non-judicial power envisaged by the Australian Constitution. As the Commission could not play any effective role in the absence of judicial power, it was allowed to lapse.[39]

No body as envisaged in Art. 307 has been set up so far. The Sarkaria Commission reporting in 1988 strongly recommended the setting up of an expert body under Art. 307. The Commission argued in favour of such a body as follows:[40]

> "The whole field of freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse bristles with complex questions not only in regard to constitutional aspects but also in respect of the working arrangements on account of impact of legislation of the Union on the powers of the States and the effect of legislation of both the Union and the States on free conduct of trade, commerce and intercourse. Trade, commerce and intercourse cover a multitude of activities. Actions of the Union and State Governments have wide-ranging impact on them. Legislative and executive actions in the field of licensing, tariffs, taxation, marketing regulations, price controls, procurement of essential goods, channelisation of trade, and controls over supply and distribution, all have a direct and immediate bearing on trade and commerce. Innumerable laws and executive orders occupy the field today. This has led to an immensely complex structure. Many issues of conflict of interests arise everyday."

Such a body being free from the pressures of day to day administration would be able to formulate objective views, taking into account the long term perspec-

---

37. Dist. Collector, Hyderabad v. Ibrahim, AIR 1970 SC 1275 : (1970) 1 SCC 386.
38. Also see, supra.
39. New South Wales v. Commonwealth, 20 CLR 54 (1915). Collin Howard, Australian Federal Constitutional Law, 107-8 (1968).
40. Report, 503.

tive, in regard to various intricate problems relating to trade, commerce and intercourse. Being an expert constitutional body it would also inspire confidence among the various States and other interests. Such an expert body would be eminently suited to strike a proper balance between freedom of trade and the need for restrictions in order to foster development with social justice. The ambit of Art. 307 is wide enough to bring all matters relevant to freedom and regulation of trade, commerce and intercourse within the purview of such an authority.

In independent India, inter-State differences have usually arisen on issue of permits for inter-State transport. To sort out these difficulties. Parliament has provided for the creation of an Inter-State Transport Commission under Ss. 63A(1) & (2) of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1939, in pursuance of Art. 307.[41] The Commission consists of a chairman and two members. Its functions are to develop, co-ordinate and regulate the operation of transport vehicles in an inter-State area or route; to prepare schemes for the purpose; to settle disputes and to grant, revoke and suspend permits for an inter-State route or area and to issue directions to the interested State Transport Authorities for the purpose. The Central Government may confer any other functions on the Commission. The Commission can associate with itself a representative of each of the States interested in an area or route.

The Commission thus acts as an instrumentality to promote, and seeks to deal with the problems arising in the way of, co-ordination of the policies of the States in respect of transport on inter-State routes.

It has been decided to introduce the system of national transport permits.[42] Such a permit will enable a public carrier to operate throughout India and will result in better co-ordination of inter-State road transport. Before this, a scheme of zonal permits had been introduced. Gradually, therefore, road transport is being given an inter-State character and is being freed from the restrictions of State boundaries.

The Motor Vehicles Act, 1988, has now abolished the Commission. Under s. 88 of the Act, a State authority has power to issue inter-State transport permits subject to agreement among the States.

41. Also see, Road Transport Re-organization Committee Report, 50 (1959).
42. This scheme has received a set back. The circumstances are narrated by the Supreme Court in B.A. Jayaram v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1005 : (1984) 1 SCC 168.

CHAPTER XVI

OFFICIAL LANGUAGE

SYNOPSIS

A. THE ISSUES

India is a multilingual country having numerous languages. This creates various problems and tensions in the country. Federalism in India is subjected to a unique challenge, the like of which it has not been faced by any other country, for here it has to bind together a much larger number of linguistic and cultural groups than are to be found in any other federation. In the U.S.A. and Australia, there is lingual homogeneity, as English is the language of administration and education in these countries. Though in Canada racial and linguistic problems arise, yet even here there are only two language groups and both English and French languages are recognised as the official languages.

In Switzerland, there is polyglot population, and three official languages—German, French and Italian—but it is a small country both in territory and population as compared to India, economically very highly developed and the number of languages is much smaller than those prevailing in India.

The USSR has a multilingual population and has nearly 200 languages and dialects, but the Russian language enjoys a primacy over all other languages as it is the mother-tongue of nearly 100 million people, and has always been used as the only official language for politics, education and administration throughout the country since the Czarist period.

India thus faces a sui generis language problem as the situation here does not approximate to any other federal model mentioned above. India cannot, therefore, adopt any readymade solutions from outside for its linguistic problem but has to hammer out its own solutions consistent with the national perspective and regional pressures.

India has two major linguistic families:[1] Indo-Aryan[2] and Dravidian.[3] The Indo-Aryan languages, eleven in number, are derived from Sanskrit, are spoken by nearly 75 per cent people, of whom Hindi is spoken by nearly 42 per cent people. The Dravidian languages, spoken by nearly 24 per cent people, prevail in the South of India and of these, Telugu is spoken by the largest group. Some of the Indian languages are very old and have a rich cultural and literary heritage. All these languages are prevalent in fairly compact areas.

The languages in both the groups have, in spite of their separate origins, a good deal in common in so far as one family is derived from Sanskrit while the other has been influenced by it. None of these languages occupied any important place during the British rule as English had been accepted as the language of administration, instruction and examination for the whole country. It was the sole medium of communication among the elite on the all-India level. The indigenous languages could not thus properly develop and prosper. Consequently, all the indigenous languages are presently deficient to serve as an adequate linguistic tool to fulfil the requirements of modern administration. But in spite of the pre-eminent position given to the English language in the past, it could never become the mass language in India.

The over-all literacy in the country itself being only about 8 to 10 per cent during the British period, the English language could be spoken fluently only by a microscopic minority of the people. Therefore, when India became independent and adopted the democratic form of government based on adult suffrage, retention of the English Language for purposes of administration appeared to be incongruous and anachronistic. A language which the vast majority of people do not understand could not be the language of administration in a democratic society, as it will cut off the masses from any real participation in the affairs of the country and thus denude democracy of much of its content. Only one of the Indian languages could be adopted as the language of the administration at the Centre.

At the time of the constitution-making, the language controversy came to the forefront. The debates of the Constituent Assembly reveal that there was a substantial amount of consensus on two basic points: (1) at some stage, the English language should be displaced from its pre-eminent position; and (2) its place should be taken by Hindi.

The major bone of contention, however, was regarding the time-limit within which this process should be culminated. There were many difficulties in the way

---

1. There are two minor families as well, Austro-Asiatic and Tibeto-Chinese, spoken respectively by 1.5 per cent and 0.75 per cent people in the country.

2. The following languages fall in this group: Assamese (1.39 per cent), Bengali (7.03 per cent), Gujarati (4.5 per cent), Hindi (42 per cent), Marathi (7.5 per cent), Oriya (3.68 per cent), Punjabi (1 per cent), Sanskrit, Urdu, Kashmiri and Sindhi (all 8 per cent nearly).

3. This family consists of 4 languages, viz., Telugu (9.2 per cent), Tamil (7 per cent), Malayalam (3.7 per cent) and Kannada (4 per cent).

of adopting Hindi immediately. It was not so well developed as to replace English as the language of the administration and so it needed time to develop properly; the country's intelligentsia felt a genuine difficulty in taking to Hindi at once, accustomed as it was to thinking and speaking in the English-language for a long time; the non-Hindi-speaking people apprehended that adoption of Hindi would give to the Hindi-speaking people an edge over them in the administration and the Central services. How long should the period for the change-over be? This thus became a controversial question in the Constituent Assembly.[4]

B. CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

The Constitution contains detailed provisions regarding the language problem. These provisions represent a compromise between the conflicting views held by the Hindi enthusiasts and others. The Constitutional formula has a number of inter-related elements, viz.:

(1) English would continue as the official language for 15 years;

(2) Hindi is to take its place thereafter;

(3) steps are to be taken to promote the growth of Hindi in the meantime;

(4) any State may adopt any other language as its official language.

According to Art. 343(1), Hindi written in Devanagari script is to be the 'official' language of the Union. The reason for designating Hindi as the 'official', and not the 'national', language is that not only Hindi but all regional languages are regarded as the national, and not foreign, languages. Art. 343(1) lays down the ultimate goal to be reached in course of time.

As the Constitution makers did not want to institute Hindi immediately, but only after a period of transition, the Constitution specified a period of 15 years for this purpose. It was thus envisaged that from January 26, 1965, Hindi would be installed as the official language at the Centre and that, in the meantime, the English language would continue to be used for that purpose. Therefore, Art. 343(2), inter alia, provides for the continued use of English for all official purposes of the Union for a period of 15 years from the commencement of the Constitution.

The Constitution does not, however, regard the 15 year period as an absolute deadline; some flexibility has been introduced in the arrangement. Thus, Art. 343(3)(a) authorises Parliament to provide by law for the continued use of the English language for such purposes as may be specified in the law even after that period. Parliament could thus permit the use of the English language beyond the 15 year period for some or all official purposes of the Union.

Commenting on Art. 343(3), the Supreme Court has observed in Murasoli Maran:[5]

> "Art. 343(3) provides merely for extension of time for the use of English language after the period of 15 years. The progressive use of the Hindi language is thereby not to be impaired. Extending the time for the use of the English language does not amount to abandonment of progress in the use of Hindi as the official language of the Union."

4. For discussion on the language problem in the Constituent Assembly, see, AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION, 265-307 (1966).

5. See, infra, footnote 22.

In respect of numerals again, the Constitution adopts a compromise formula. For the first fifteen years after the commencement of the Constitution, the international form of numerals are to be used for official purposes of the Union. But, thereafter, Art. 343(3)(b) authorises Parliament by law to provide for specific purposes for use of Devanagari form of numerals.

The adoption of the Hindi as the distant goal, and the period of transition of 15 years, raised two related questions for the Constitution framers to solve: (1) the use of Hindi during the period of transition, and (2) smoothening the process of change-over from the English to the Hindi language.

If Hindi were not encouraged and promoted during the transition period, then it could not be ready to replace English on the appointed date. Recognising the logic of the argument, the Constitution provided for a limited and optional use of Hindi during the transition period. According to the proviso to Art. 343(2), during the initial period of 15 years, the President could, by order, authorise the use of Hindi, in addition to the English language, and Devanagari form of numerals in addition to the international form, for any of the official purposes of the Union. Here the words 'in addition to' are significant as these clearly indicate that during the period of transition, Hindi would be used in addition to, and not in substitution of, the English language.

The scheme of the Constitution would thus appear to be that while Hindi was to be used in addition to the English language during the period of transition, English may be used in addition to Hindi thereafter. In this way, a reconciliation between the Hindi and non-Hindi views was sought to be established.

An interesting point to note in this connection is that while the use of English, after the transitory period, has been left to Parliament, prescribing the use of Hindi in the interim period in addition to the English language has been left to the executive. This indicates that greater significance was attached to the extension of the 15 year time-limit for continued use of English than to using Hindi during the interim period. Another explanation for this is that the Constitution has made a provision for the appointment of an Official Language Commission and on its advice the Central executive could decide the purposes for which Hindi should be used additionally to the English language during the 15 year limit.

(a) OFFICIAL LANGUAGE COMMISSION

Art. 344(1) provides for the appointment by the President of a Commission on Official Language after five years from the commencement of the Constitution, and thereafter at the expiry of ten years from such commencement. The Commission is to consist of a Chairman and such other members representing the various regional languages mentioned in the VIII Schedule to the Constitution as the President may appoint. According to Art. 344(2), the duty of the Commission is to make recommendations as to—

(a) the progressive use of the Hindi language for the official purpose of the Union;

(b) restrictions on the use of the English language for all or any of the Union official purposes;

(c) the language to be used for proceedings in the Supreme Court and the High Courts, for Central and State legislation and delegated legislation made thereunder etc.;

(d) form of numerals to be used for the official purposes of the Union;

(e) any other matter which the President may refer to it regarding the official language of the Union and the language of communication between the Union and a State, or between one State and another.

In making its recommendations, according to Art. 344(3), the Commission is to keep in view the industrial, cultural and scientific advancement of India, and the just claims and the interests of the non-Hindi speaking people in regard to public services.

The constitutional provision shows plainly that the Commission was envisaged to facilitate the use of Hindi during the transition period in addition to English so that the process of change-over from English to Hindi on the appointed day could be smooth. A good deal of say was given to the non-Hindi speaking people in deciding upon the pace of progressive transition from the English to the Hindi language, because they were to be in a majority in the Commission. The directive to the Commission to keep in view the industrial and cultural advancement of the country and to recognise the claims of the non-Hindi speaking people in the services would rule out any hasty change-over from English to Hindi.

The Commission's recommendations were to be screened by a Parliamentary committee consisting of 20 members from the Lok Sabha and ten members from the Rajya Sabha elected by the system of proportional representation by means of a single transferable vote [Art. 344(1)]. This meant that all linguistic groups in Parliament would get representation on the committee. After examining the Commission's recommendations, the committee would make its report to the President [Art. 344(5)]. The President could then issue directions in accordance with the whole or any part of the committee's report, notwithstanding anything in Art. 343 i.e., to restrict the use of English and to promote the use of Hindi during the 15 year period [Art. 344(6)].

There were so many built-in safeguards in favour of the non-Hindi speaking people that no precipitate action towards introducing Hindi during the interim period in addition to the English language could be taken. It may be seen that Arts. 343 and 344 deal with the process of transition. The ultimate aim is laid down in Art. 351. Art. 344(6) takes into account the objective laid down in Art. 351, and seeks to determine the pace of progress and to achieve the same.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that Art. 344(6) is not exhausted by using it once; the President can use it on more than one occasion. The Presidential order issued under Art. 344(6) is supreme because of the non-obstante provisions in Art. 344(6).

(b) DEVELOPMENT OF HINDI

At the time of the Constitution-making, an argument used for having a long transitory period for change-over from the English to the Hindi language was that it was an underdeveloped language and that it needs to be developed before it could be ready to take the place of the English language. Therefore, Art. 351 places the Central Government under an obligation to take steps to promote the spread and development of Hindi.

Art. 351 also lays down the future form which Hindi should take, viz., Hindi should be developed so that it may serve as a medium of expression for all elements of the composite culture of India and to secure its enrichment by assimilating, without interfering with its genius, the forms, style and expressions used in Hindustani and in the other languages mentioned in the VIII Schedule to the Constitution, and by drawing for its vocabulary, wherever necessary or desirable, primarily on Sanskrit and secondarily on other languages.

This provision contains too many compromises and seeks to draw a balance between the purists and the liberalists as regards the development and enrichment of Hindi. The purists desire to draw upon Sanskrit, and Sanskrit alone, for new words necessary to develop Hindi as a language of administration and education, while the liberalists want to use all regional languages and Hindustani for the purpose.

There is no doubt however that Hindi developed on the lines laid down in Art. 351 would be very different from its present form. The idea of assimilating terms from regional languages into Hindi is expedient as it would allay apprehensions and misgivings of those linguistic groups whose languages do not have a Sanskrit base.

(c) REGIONAL LANGUAGES

The framers of the Constitution were also faced with the important question regarding the future role of the regional languages. They took the view that these languages should be promoted and developed so as to be able to play a meaningful role in the future set-up in the country. Articles 350A and 350B were inserted by the Constitution (7th Amendment) Act 1956 to ensure the protection of linguistic minorities.[6] To achieve these objectives, the Constitution lists in the VIIIth Schedule twenty-two regional languages, viz., Assamese, Bengali, Bodo, Dogri, Gujarati, Hindi, Kannada, Kashmiri, Konkani, Maithili, Malayalam, Manipuri, Marathi, Nepali, Oriya, Punjabi, Sanskrit, Santhali, Sindhi, Tamil, Telugu and Urdu.

There appears to be two purposes underlying this enumeration of the regional languages:

(1) These are the languages to be represented on the Official Language Commission to be appointed under Art. 344(1); and

(2) From these languages, words are to be drawn for developing Hindi as envisaged in Art. 351.

An unstated idea underlying the VIII Schedule may be that the languages named therein need to be developed. The mention of these languages in the Constitution however gives a psychological and emotional satisfaction to the proponents of these languages.[7]

---

6. See further under Ch.XXXV (infra).

Further, Art. 345 authorises a State to adopt, by making a law, any regional language or languages in use in the State, or Hindi, for its official purposes. The choice of the State is not limited to the languages mentioned in the VIII Schedule. Till such a law is made, the English language is to continue to be the official language of the State.

Art. 345 is permissive. It does not say that, after adoption of Hindi or any other language by a State, use of the English language would be barred altogether so as to render void an order made, or any other official proceedings done, in the English language. That can happen only if the State Legislature makes a specific provision barring the use of the English language altogether.[8]

(d) INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMUNICATION

Another problem, peculiarly a federal problem, faced by the Constitution-makers was to devise a formula concerning the language to be used in inter-governmental communications. This became necessary in view of the possibility of different States adopting different official languages.

Art. 345 therefore lays down that for purposes of communication between two States, or between the Centre and a State, the official language of the Centre should be used, although two or more States may agree to use Hindi for the purpose.

(e) LANGUAGE OF LAW & COURTS

Difficult problems arise when the question of language is considered in the context of law and the courts. The English common law is the basis of the Indian legal system and, to this end, the English language has been a very useful medium of thought and expression. India has a unified judicial system; there exists a basic unity in the laws prevailing in the country, and decisions of one High Court are freely cited in the other High Courts. The problem of the language of the law thus assumes a special significance. If a High Court adopts the local language, then it would be difficult to cite precedents from this Court in other High Courts. Difficulties would also arise in the functioning of the Supreme Court if the High Courts were to adopt different languages.[9]

---

7. The rights of linguistic minorities assumed special significance and the coercive imposition of Hindi as a 'unifying language' led not to unity but to an assertion of differences. States were formed on linguistic bases showing the apparent paradox that allowing for and protecting differences leads to unity and integrity and enforced assimilation may lead to disaffection and unrest.

8. Dayabhai v. Natwarlal, AIR 1957 MP 1; Harihar Pd. v. District Magistrate, AIR 1961 All 365.

9. Quoted with approval in Shri Satish Dattatray Nadgauda v. The State of Maharashtra, 2007(109) Bom LR1089. This extract is taken from Usha Mehta v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 6 SCC 264, at page 274.

A policy decision made by the Maharashtra State Government whereby Marathi language study was made compulsory throughout the schools in that State. As a result, the English-medium schools run by Gujarati linguistic minorities were compelled to teach four languages (Hindi, English, Marathi and mother tongue Gujarati) as against the accepted "three-language formula".

Similar problems arise in regard to the language of legislation. How would the law enacted in one State in its own official language be known in other parts of the country, and how would the Supreme Court interpret the same? The compulsions of the situation therefore demand that so far as possible there exists a basic unity in the language of the law and the courts throughout the country. Accordingly, the Constitution makes special provisions concerning the language problem in the areas of judicial and legislative processes, the idea implicit therein being that the question of the courts' language should take its own time to settle.

As regards the language of the courts, Art. 348(1) lays down that until Parliament otherwise provides, proceedings in the Supreme Court and in a High Court are to be in the English language.[10]

As an exception to the above-mentioned general rule, however, Art. 348(2) provides that the Governor of a State, with the previous consent of the President, may authorise the use of Hindi, or any other official language of the State, in proceedings in the High Court, but not with respect to the judgements, decrees and orders passed by it, which shall be in the English language as required by Art. 348(1).[11]

The effect of Art. 348(2) has been explained by the Supreme Court in Vijay Laxmi Sadho v. Jagdish.[12] The M.P. High Court rules required that the election petition to be filed in the Court should be drawn up in the English language. Accordingly, the High Court dismissed an election petition drawn up in Hindi. The Supreme Court has ruled that the High Court could not do so. The High Court rules are only of a procedural nature and do not constitute "substantive law". The rules have to be read subject to Art. 348(2).

Under Art. 348(2), the State Governor, with the previous consent of the President, may authorise the High Court to use Hindi or any other language in its proceedings, save that any judgment, decree or order passed or made by the High Court shall be in the English language as required by Art. 348(1). Under Art. 348(2), the State Governor by a notification has authorised the use of the Hindi language in all proceedings of the High Court except for drawing up decrees, orders and judgments. Accordingly, under the said notification, appeals, petitions etc. could be presented in the High Court in the Hindi language. The High Court rules could not override Art. 348(2). The High Court rules must be read along with the notification issued by the Governor. When so construed, it follows that an election petition may be filed in Hindi.

The rules framed by the High Court in exercise of powers[13] under Art. 225 are only rules of procedure and do not constitute substantive law. These rules cannot effect the import of constitutional provisions contained in Art. 348(2). Therefore, as an election petition in Hindi could be presented in the M.P. High Court, it

---

10. In Madhu Limaye v. Ved Murti, AIR 1971 SC 2608 : (1970) 3 SCC 738, the Supreme Court asserted that the language of the Court is English.
11. For language in Parliament and a State Legislature, see, supra, Chs. II and VI.
12. AIR 2001 SC 600 : (2001) 2 SCC 247.
13. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. C(b).

could not be dismissed by the Court at the threshold on the ground of non-compliance of the High Court rules.[14]

The important point to note in this connection is that the time-limit of 15 years for change-over from the English to the Hindi language in case of the Union official language was not to apply to the proceedings in the Supreme Court and the High Courts. The matter is to be regulated by Parliamentary legislation. Parliament can make a law prescribing the language of the Supreme Court and the High Courts.

The Constitution adopts a cautious approach as regards the language of the Supreme Court and the High Courts. Even if Hindi were to become the official language of the Centre after January 26, 1965, it would not become the language of the Supreme Court and the High Courts ipso facto. To effectuate such a change-over, Parliament would have to make a law, otherwise, English would continue to be the language of these courts till such time as Parliament sees it fit to change the status quo.

As regards the language of legislation, Art. 348(1)(b) provides that until Parliament by law provides otherwise, the authoritative texts of all Bills introduced and all Acts passed by Parliament, or a State Legislature, and of all ordinances promulgated by the President, or a State Governor, and all rules made thereunder, shall be in the English language. The main purpose of this provision is to prescribe an authoritative text of the law.

Art. 348(3) provides an exception to Art. 348(1)(b). Art. 348(3) provides that a State Legislature can prescribe use of any language, other than English, for purposes of legislation—Bills, Acts, Ordinances and delegated legislation, but a translation of the same in the English language is to be published in the official gazette under the authority of the State Governor and that would be the authoritative text in English.

The idea of having English translations of Acts enacted in Hindi, or the regional languages, by the States, and to treat their English versions as authoritative, is a sound one. India is a federal country; there is a diversity of languages but there is unity of law; for quite sometime English is to remain as the language of the Supreme Court and the High Courts and, therefore, it is necessary to keep one language of the law even when the State Legislatures opt for various official languages. Therefore, in a non-English State, legislation will be made in a regional language but its English translation is the authoritative one. This means that there are two versions of the same law. The Courts have held that though they can use both versions, and even use one to remove ambiguities in the other, 14. It is difficult to understand how Rules framed by a State under Article 348(2) could override the provisions of Article 348(1). The reasoning of the Bombay High Court on the issue in Shri Satish Dattatray Nadgauda v. The State of Maharashtra, 2007 (109) Bom. L.R.1089 is unexceptionable.

yet in case of conflict between the two versions, the English version must prevail over the other.[15]

Reading Arts. 348(1) and 348(3), it becomes clear that, as regards the language of legislation, a State Legislature is free to adopt a language other than English. A few problems have arisen out of the interpretation of Arts. 348(1) and 348(3). Art. 348(1), it has been ruled, means that the authoritative text of a law enacted by a State Legislature has to be in English unless Parliament by law otherwise provides. "The power to declare that the authoritative text of any bill, Act or ordinance of a State Legislature shall be in a language other than the English language has been vested exclusively in Parliament." But it does not mean that a State Legislature cannot adopt any language other than English without a parliamentary law. Under Art. 348(3), a State Legislature is entitled to prescribe any language other than English as the language of legislation though the authoritative text of the law will be in English.[16]

The Bihar Legislature has prescribed Hindi in Devanagari Script as the language of legislation as provided in Art. 348(3). An ordinance was issued in Hindi but no English translation thereof was published. It was argued that in the absence of the English translation of the ordinance, there was no authoritative text and so the Hindi version must be deemed to be non est. But the High Court rejected this extreme contention. The Court ruled that the ordinance made in Hindi was a valid piece of legislation even without the English translation.[17] The Court observed:

> "Under the scheme of Article 348 of the Constitution, all ordinances made in Hindi where the Legislature has so authorised will be a valid piece of legislation even without its English translation and where an English translation has been published as laid down therein, the said translation shall also be considered to be a valid piece of legislation and both can be looked into as the authorised versions of the Ordinance".

Again, in Bihar, the Hindi version of an ordinance was published on 5-12-75. Action under the Ordinance was initiated on 8-12-75, and the English translation of the Ordinance was published only on 22-12-75. The argument was that the Ordinance could not be deemed to have come into force until its English version

---

15. Sagir Ahmed v. State of U.P., AIR 1954 All 257; Jaswant Sugar Mills v. Presiding Officer, I.T., AIR 1962 All 240; Govindram Ramprasad v. Assessing Authority, AIR 1958 MP 16; J.K. Jute Mills Co. v. State of U.P., AIR 1961 SC 1534; Ram Rati v. Gram Samaj, AIR 1974 All 106. This extract is taken from Usha Mehta v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 6 SCC 264, at page 280:

Policy decision is not violative of the linguistic minority rights guaranteed under Articles 29 and 30 or any other provisions of the Constitution. Nityanand Sharma v. State of Bihar, 1996 3 SCC 576 ; Prabhat Kumar Sharma v. U.P.S.C., (2006)10 SCC 587 : (2006) 10 JT 587.

Difficulties often arise as a result of discrepancies (due to clerical mistakes or for any other reason) between Hindi and English versions. In Medical Officer of Health v. Gulzari, AIR 1965 All 170, the English version was followed. In Asghar Ali v. State of U.P., AIR 1959 All 792, the English version of a notification was ignored in favour of the Hindi version because it was published under the authority of the Collector. These cases show that some confusion in the law and even in the administration is bound to arise when a State adopts Hindi, or a regional language, because of the Constitutional provision making the English version of the law as authoritative.

16. Raichand Amichand v. Sanchalak Gramodhar, AIR 1957 MB 26.

17. Mathura Prasad Singh v. State of Bihar, AIR 1975 Pat 295.

was published and, therefore, no proceedings thereunder could be instituted before 22-12-75. But the High Court rejected the argument holding that the Ordinance came into force on 5-12-75.[18]

Reading Arts. 345, 348(1) and (3) together, the High Court argued that a State has discretion to adopt by law Hindi as the language to be used for all or any of the purposes of the State. If that is done, it becomes the official language of the State. It cannot be argued that the publication of the English translation is a condition precedent for the enforcement of any Act or ordinance made in the State language. The High Court clarified the implications of Arts. 348(1) and (3) as follows:[19]

> "The only consequence of the absence of an English translation will be that there will be no authoritative text, but on that account it cannot be held that in the absence of the publication of the authoritative translation, the ordinance itself will not be effective…. It is, no doubt, true that if the English translation is published, then in case of any conflict between the State language and the English translation, the latter will prevail, and if the English translation is published, it will be considered as a valid piece of legislation and both the Hindi and the English publication can be looked into. In my judgment, what is meant by clause (1) of Article 348 in making a law by Parliament is that unless the Parliament by law otherwise provides, the authoritative texts of all Bills, Acts or Ordinances of a State Legislature cannot be in a language other than the English language. The power to declare that the authoritative text of any bill, Act or ordinance of a State Legislature shall be in a language other than the English language has been vested exclusively in Parliament but it does not mean that the authority of a State Legislature to adopt any language other than the English language can be given only by a law made by the Parliament."

It will also be clear from the above that the Constitution seeks to give a place of importance to the regional languages in several ways, viz.:

(1) The States can adopt these languages as their official languages as well as for purposes of legislation;

(2) These languages can also be used in the High Courts;

(3) Representatives of the regional languages are to sit on the Official Language Commission[20] to decide the pace of change-over from the English to the Hindi language at the Central level; and (4) these languages are to be used for purposes of assimilation of their words and phrases in the Hindi of the future.

C. FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS

The Constitutional provisions, mentioned above, failed to solve the language problem once and for all, and controversies have arisen from time to time in this regard.

The Official Language Commission, as envisaged by Art. 344(1) of the Constitution, was duly appointed on June 7, 1955. The Commission reported in 1957. The Commission emphasized that English could not remain as the official language of the Union for very long as that would be against national self-respect

---

18. Alok Kumar v. State of Bihar, AIR 1976 Pat 392.
19. Ibid., 394.
20. Supra.

and that only through an Indian language could there be a massive resurgence of the national life. The main thrust of its recommendations was that effective steps should be taken forthwith to ensure a change-over to Hindi on the appointed day, i.e., January 26, 1965.

The Commission was of the opinion that if experience showed that no adequate results were forthcoming under the arrangements made by the Government of India for training of its employees on a voluntary basis in Hindi, then necessary steps should be taken by the Government making it obligatory on government servants to qualify themselves in Hindi within the requisite period, to the extent requisite for the discharge of their duties.

The recommendations of the Commission were placed before a Parliamentary Committee as envisaged by Art. 344(4), mentioned above.[21] The Committee was of the opinion that the Government should prescribe obligatory requirements on the Government servants to qualify themselves in the Hindi language.

After considering the report of the Committee, the President issued an order on April 27, 1960.[22]

The report of the Commission raised a controversy in the non-Hindi speaking area. To assuage the feelings of these people, Prime Minister Nehru gave an assurance that the English language would continue to be the "associate" official or link language of the Union for as long as they wanted.

(a) THE OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT, 1963

The recommendations of the Commission, after being examined by a Parliamentary Committee, led to the enactment by Parliament of the Official Languages Act, 1963, in exercise of the powers conferred on the Parliament by Art. 343(3).

The Act enacts that the English language may continue to be used, in addition to Hindi, even after Jan. 26, 1965, i.e., after the 15-year deadline, for all official purposes of the Union for which it was being used before, and for transaction of business in Parliament.

Two points need be noted with respect to this crucial provision. First is the use of the word "may", and the second is that the English language is to be used 'in addition to' Hindi. These words denote that English is to enjoy the status of an "associate" official language. The Act therefore makes a very clear change in emphasis. While before 1965, Hindi could be used in addition to English, now English is to be used in addition to Hindi.

To reconsider the language problem at a future date, the Act provides for the appointment of a Parliamentary committee on official language after Jan. 26, 1975, on a resolution to that effect being moved in either House of Parliament with the previous sanction of the President and passed by both Houses. The committee consisting of 20 members from the Lok Sabha and 10 members from the Rajya Sabha is to be elected on the basis of proportional representation by means of single transferable vote by the two Houses of Parliament. After re-

---

21. Supra.

22. The Order was challenged in Union of India v. Murasoli Maran, AIR 1977 SC 225 : (1977) 2 SCC 416, see, infra, Sec. D.

viewing the progress made in the use of Hindi for the official purposes of the Union, it will submit its report to the President who, with his recommendations, would cause it to be laid before each House of Parliament and to be sent to all State Governments. After considering the views of the State Governments on the report, the President would issue directions in accordance with the whole or any part of the report.

The Act also makes provisions for the language of the law. It provides for making of Hindi translation of laws enacted in English, and English translation of laws enacted in the regional languages. A Hindi translation published in the official gazette, under the authority of the President, of any Central Act, by-law, rule etc., is to be regarded as the authoritative Hindi text thereof. The authoritative text in the English language of all Bills to be introduced in Parliament should be accompanied by a Hindi translation authorised in such manner as may be prescribed by rules made under the Act. This provision is to come into force from a day to be fixed for the purpose by the Central Government. This provision in the Act is to be read along with Art. 348 which lays down that authoritative texts of Central legislation are to continue to be in the English language unless Parliament provides otherwise.

Parliament has not said unequivocally in the Act that all legislation in Parliament is to be in Hindi, or the authoritative texts of all Central Acts are to be in Hindi. There is a lot of built-in vagueness and difficulty of interpretation in this provision as it uses the term 'authoritative text' both in relation to the Hindi version, as well as the English version. Perhaps, what is implicitly envisaged is a three stage process of change-over as follows.

First, for the time being, legislation is to continue at the Centre in English and the English texts of laws are to be treated as the authoritative texts.

Second, at some later stage, steps will be taken to have both English as well as Hindi versions of all Bills, but legislation and authoritative texts of laws would still continue to be in English.

Lastly, from a date in the distant future, the authoritative text would be the 'Hindi' version of the law even though legislation in Parliament may continue to be in English or Hindi.

India has now reached the second stage.

Coming to the State Legislation, the Act says that where a State has prescribed a language, other than Hindi, for purposes of legislation, translations of the Acts in Hindi as well as in the English languages, as envisaged in Art. 348(3), may be published in the State Gazette under the authority of the Governor and the Hindi version would be deemed to be the authoritative Hindi text of the law.

It still is not made clear whether in case of discrepancies, which of the texts—English, Hindi or regional language—are the Courts to go by. This is bound to create difficulties in interpreting the law. For, the lower courts, in practice, would take into consideration the text in the regional language, while the Supreme Court would go by the English (or the Hindi) version of that law, and the differences in language may result in differences of interpretation of the same law creating a good deal of confusion and generating a good deal of litigation.

As regards the language of the courts, the Act provides for the use of Hindi, the State official language, and English at the High Court level. Art. 348(1)(a) read with Art. 348(2) provides for the language of the High Courts to be English; change to any other language for proceedings of the High Court may be effected by the Governor with the consent of the President; the judgments of a High Court may be delivered in any language other than English only when Parliament so provides by law. So, the Official Language Act provides that the Governor of a State, with the previous sanction of the President, may authorise the use of Hindi, or the State official language, in addition to English, for purposes of judgments etc., delivered by the High Court. A judgment delivered by a High Court in a language other than English, is to be accompanied by an English translation issued under the High Court's authority.

This provision again raises the conundrum that in case of a disparity, which of the versions of the judgment—English, Hindi or the State language—would be recognised by the Supreme Court. As the English version is only a translation, perhaps, the basic judgment will be treated as the one in the State language or in Hindi, as the case may be. The Centre is to decide finally whether or not a change-over from English to Hindi or a State language is to be permitted in a particular High Court. The Act effects no change regarding the Supreme Court where the English language would continue.

All the provisions of the Official Languages Act, 1963, were not to come into force at once. Only Section 3 which permits use of the English language even after the 26th January, 1965, became operative immediately and other provisions would be effective as and when the Central Government notifies. This means that the change-over in the language of law and courts would take place sometime in future and not immediately.

Even the effects of Section 3 have not been visible so far and the work of the Government of India proceeds much in the same way as before, i.e., primarily in the English language. The key-note of the Official Languages Act, 1963, is caution. Its basic provision (S. 3) may be said to be favourable to the non-Hindi speaking people in so far as it provides for the continuous use of the English language for an indefinite period after January 26, 1965. It does, however, set the distant goal of promoting Hindi along with English at the Central level and gradually replacing English by the regional languages or Hindi at the State level.

(b) THE OFFICIAL LANGUAGES (AMENDMENT) ACT, 1967

As January 26, 1965, drew near, a controversy erupted again centring around the issue whether the Act of 1963 was categorical enough regarding the continued use of the English language for an indefinite period as Nehru had assured. The use of the word 'may' in S. 3 appeared to be too weak, and it did not specify as to how long would the English language continue to be used at the Centre.

A demand was, therefore, made that Nehru's assurance regarding the continued use of English as an 'associate' language at the Centre should be given a specific and unequivocal statutory recognition, or rather a constitutional guarantee by amending the Constitution. To meet this demand, Parliament passed the Official Languages (Amendment) Act, 1967, to give statutory recognition to the assurance held out in 1963. The Amendment Act enacts as follows:

(1) The English language may continue to be used after January 26, 1965, in addition to Hindi, for all official purposes of the Union for which it was being used immediately before this date and also for the transaction of business in Parliament;

(2) The English language is to be used for the purpose of communication between the Centre and a non-Hindi State;

(3) If Hindi is used for communication between a Hindi and a non-Hindi State then an English translation of the communication is to accompany the Hindi version;

(4) A non-Hindi State is not prevented from using Hindi for purposes of communication with the Centre or a Hindi State, or by agreement with any other State, and in such a case, the English language need not be used;

(5) Where Hindi or the English language is used for purposes of interdepart-mental communication at the Centre, a translation of the communication in the other language is to be provided;

(6) Both Hindi and the English languages are to be used for:

(a) resolutions, general orders, rules, notifications, administrative or other reports or press communiques issued by the Central Government;

(b) administrative and other reports and official papers laid before Parliament;

(c) contracts and agreements executed, licences, permits, notices, etc., issued, by the Central Government or by a corporation or a company owned or controlled by the Central Government;

(7) Without prejudice to the foregoing, the Central Government can frame rules to provide for the language or languages to be used for the official purposes of the Centre.

In framing the rules, due consideration is to be given to the quick and efficient disposal of business and interests of the general public and the rules have to ensure that the Central Government servants having proficiency either in Hindi or in the English language may function effectively and are not placed at a disadvantage because of their lack of proficiency in both the languages;

(8) The foregoing provisions would remain in force until resolutions for the discontinuance of the use of the English language have been passed by all the non-Hindi State Legislatures and also by the two Houses of Parliament.

The last provision is of the greatest significance, as it furnishes a statutory guarantee for the continuance of the English language at the Central level as an 'associate' language so long as the non-Hindi States desire. The decision to continue English has now been left not to the legislatures of the Hindi-speaking States but to the legislatures of other States which have not adopted Hindi as their official language.

The Act also seeks to make use of the English language obligatory for certain purposes in addition to Hindi so as to protect the interests of the non-Hindi or non-English speaking servants of the Central Government and it ensures smooth communication between the Centre, the Hindi and the non-Hindi States.

Detailed provisions for intergovernmental communication became necessary because the Centre was adopting two official languages, Hindi and English; under Art. 346, any of them could be used for intergovernmental communication, but while the non-Hindi States were apathetic to using Hindi, the Hindi States did not want to use English for that purpose. A careful reading of these provisions shows that they are weighted in favour of the non-Hindi States which can correspond in English, but a Hindi State has also to send an English translation of a Hindi communication.

A resolution passed by the two Houses of Parliament along with the Official Languages (Amendment) Act, 1967, requires the Government of India to accelerate the spread and development of the Hindi language, as well as of the regional languages mentioned in the VIII Schedule, to implement the three languages formula so as to teach one of the Southern languages to the Hindi-speaking students and Hindi to the non-Hindi Speaking students along with the English language.

The resolution also says that compulsory knowledge of Hindi would not be required at the stage of selection to the Central Services, and that all the VIII Schedule-languages along with English would serve as the media for the competitive examinations for the Central Services.

On the basis of a review of the compliance of the section 3(3) of the Official Languages Act, the Committee submitted the eighth part of its Report to the President on 16-8-2005 making several recommendations. One of the recommendations was that Art. 348 of the Constitution may be amended to enable the Legislative Department to undertake the original drafting in Hindi. After the amendment of Art. 348 of the Constitution, High Courts/Supreme Court should be asked to start delivering their judgments, decrees etc in Hindi. This recommendation was accepted by a Presidential Order with the modification that the Department of Official Language may take appropriate decision after consulting the Legislative Department and the 18th Law Commission of India. The Centre then passed a resolution on 2 July, 2008 communicating this to inter alia the Supreme Court. The matter is now pending consideration before the Law Commission.

(c) MEDIUM OF EDUCATION

A difficult question arises regarding the medium of education at various levels. The Constitution prescribes no policy or principle, and makes no provision, in this regard.

To begin with, the matter was left to the legislative power of the States as 'Education' was a State subject. The States enjoyed full right to prescribe the media of instruction at the primary and the high school levels. But, their right to prescribe the media of instruction at the university level was not unrestricted, as has been discussed earlier.[23]

Education is now a concurrent subject.[24] However, in the prevailing atmosphere in the country, it is doubtful if the Centre would lay down conditions to be fulfilled before a switch-over to the regional languages takes place at the university level. In fact, the Centre is itself encouraging the switch-over, and a policy

23. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iii).
24. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.

decision has been taken that regional languages should replace English at all levels of education.

This change-over to, and too much stress on, regional languages as media of instruction may create a kind of isolationism in the country and weaken the channels of communication between the various language groups. To mitigate this difficulty, a three language formula has been evolved according to which each student has to study three languages—the regional language, Hindi and an international language, i.e., English, and the students whose mother-tongue is Hindi should study some other regional language.

The language problem may be contained a great deal if the three language formula is implemented sincerely but there remains a question mark whether all the States will act in the right spirit. Some State Governments devalue the English language by declaring that failure therein in the examination would not affect their results; some devalue Hindi while others devalue other regional languages by promoting Sanskrit.

Sometime back, the University Education Commission has gone into all facets of the university education including the question of media of instruction and has supported the three language formula.

In a controversial decision,[25] the Supreme Court upheld a policy decision made by the Maharashtra State Government making the study of Marathi compulsory in all schools in that State. As a result, the English-medium schools run by Gujarati linguistic minorities were compelled to teach four languages (Hindi, English, Marathi and mother tongue Gujarati) as against the accepted "three-language formula".

It may also be pointed out that the prescription of medium of instruction at the university level also raises the question of "maintenance of standards"—a matter which falls under entry 66, List I, and is thus a matter for exclusively Parliamentary legislation.[26]

D. JUDICIAL RESPONSE

The Government of Tamil Nadu granted pension to anti-Hindi agitators. In R.R. Dalavai v. State of Tamil Nadu,[27] the Supreme Court held the scheme unconstitutional as it contained "the vice of disintegration and fomenting fissiparous tendencies." If any State engages in exciting emotions against Hindi, or any other language, "such provocation has to be nipped in the bud because these are anti-national and anti-democratic tendencies." The State had set aside the fund to meet the pension scheme through an executive order without any legislative sanction. The Court ruled that the government could not authorise payment of pension by an executive order.

---

25. Usha Mehta v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 6 SCC 264, at page 280 : (2004) 5 SCALE 800. See supra. See also Associated Managements of Primary and Secondary Schools in Karnataka v. The State of Karnataka, ILR 2008 KAR 2895; 2008 (4) KarLJ 593 which holds that the Government policy compelling children studying in non-aided Government recognized schools to have primary education only in the mother tongue or the regional language is violative of Article 19(1)(g), 26 and 30(1) of the Constitution of India.

26. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iii).

27. AIR 1976 SC 1559 : (1976) 3 SCC 748.

A Presidential order made training in Hindi compulsory for employees of the Central Government below the age of 45 years. The order emanated from the recommendations of the Parliamentary Committee (Art. 344)[28] appointed to consider the recommendations of the Official Language Commission. The constitutional validity of the order was challenged, on the ground that it was inconsistent with Section 3 of the Official Languages Act, 1963, as amended in 1968, in as much as the order placed the non-Hindi speaking people at a disadvantage.

The Central Government supported the order on the ground that it was aimed at promoting the policy of the constitutional provisions making Hindi as the official language of the Union, and that the order placed no one at a disadvantage even if one failed to qualify in Hindi because no penalty was attached thereto. On the other hand, those who completed the training were given incentives.

The Supreme Court upheld the order in Union of India v. Murasoli Maran.[29] The order had been issued on the recommendation of the Parliamentary Committee appointed under Art. 344(4) and it kept in view the ultimate object to make Hindi as the official language, and also took into account the circumstances prevailing in the country and, therefore, sought to provide for a gradual change. The order was not inconsistent with the Official Languages Act, 1963, which merely continues the use of the English language in addition to Hindi. The Act places no limitation on the power of the President to issue directions under Art. 344(6).[30]

The Act and the order operate in different fields and have different purposes. The Act continues the use of the English language after the expiry of 15 years and, thus, extends the transitional period of 15 years. The Presidential order provides for the progressive use of the Hindi language. It keeps in view the steps to replace the use of the English Language.

The Court also pointed out that the training in Hindi was being provided free of cost and during office time and no penalty was attached for failing to complete the training and so it placed no one at a disadvantage.

E. VIII SCHEDULE TO THE CONSTITUTION

Reference has been made to the VIII Schedule in Arts. 344(1) and 351.[31]

At present, the following 18 languages are mentioned in this Schedule viz.: Assamese, Bengali, Gujarati, Hindi, Kannada, Kashmiri, Konkani, Malayalam, Manipuri, Marathi, Nepali, Oriya, Punjabi, Sanskrit, Sindhi, Tamil, Telugu and Urdu.

Sindhi was added to the VIII Schedule by the Constitution Twenty-first Amendment Act, 1967.[32]

Konkani, Manipuri and Nepali languages were added by the Constitution Seventy-first Amendment in 1992.[33]

---

28. Supra.
29. AIR 1977 SC 225 : (1977) 2 SCC 416.
30. Supra.
31. See, supra.
32. Infra, Ch. XLII.
33. Infra, Ch. XLII.

Bodo, Dogri, Maithili and Santhali were introduced by the Constitution (Ninety-second Amendment) Act, 2003.

The Supreme Court has ruled in Kanhaiya Lal Sethia v. Union of India[34] that to include or not to include a particular language in the VIII Schedule is a policy matter of the Central Government and the Court cannot interfere in the matter. Further no one has any Fundamental Right to compel the Centre to include any particular language in the Schedule.

F. HINDI TRANSLATION OF THE CONSTITUTION

The Constitution (Fifty eight Amendment) Act, 1987 has made provisions for publishing a Hindi Translation of the Constitution.[35]

34. AIR 1998 SC 365 : (1997) 6 SCC 573.
35. For provisions of the Amendment Act, see, infra, Ch. XLII, at pp. 1987-1988.

CHAPTER XVII

CONSTITUTIONAL POSITION OF JAMMU AND KASHMIR

SYNOPSIS

A. ART. 370 OF THE CONSTITUTION

Jammu and Kashmir is a constituent State of the Indian Union, but its constitutional position, and its relation with the Central Government, somewhat differ from that of the other States.

The instrument of accession signed by the Ruler of Jammu and Kashmir was accepted by the Governor-General of India on 27-10-1947. Under this instrument, only three subjects—external affairs, defence and communications—were surrendered by the State to the Dominion.

The two characteristic features of the special relationship are:

(1) the State has a much greater measure of autonomy and power than enjoyed by the other States; and

(2) the Centre's jurisdiction within the State is more limited than what it has with respect to the other States.

Due to these special features not all the provisions of the Indian Constitution apply to the State; some of the provisions apply, some do not apply at all, while others apply in a modified form.

The constitutional position of the State has not remained static since it became a constituent unit of the Indian Union. It has been growing with time towards a closer affinity of the State with the Indian Union,[1] and more and more provisions of the Constitution have been applied to it in course of time.

---

1. See, JAGOTA, Development of Constitutional Relations between Jammu and Kashmir and India : 1950-1960, 2 JILI, 519 (1960); A.S. ANAND, THE CONSTITUTION OF JAMMU & KASHMIR, (III Ed., 1998).
Also, Md. Maqbool v. State of J.K., AIR 1972 SC 963 : (1972) 1 SCC 536.

In 1950, when the Indian Constitution was on the anvil, the future picture of the relationship between India and the State was not very clear due to many complications existing at the time. Therefore, the Constitution contains Art. 370 which enables the constitutional position of the State vis-a-vis the Indian Union to be defined from time to time without much difficulty.[2]

Art. 370 makes "temporary provisions" with respect to the State. Art. 370 clearly recognises the special position of the State of Jammu and Kashmir. Art. 370 makes Art. 1 of the Constitution which defines the territory of the Union, and Art. 370 itself, applicable to the State at once.

Art. 370(1)(b) limits the power of Parliament to make laws for the State to the following:—

(i) Those matters in the Union List[3] and the Concurrent List,[4] as correspond to the subjects specified in the State's Instrument of Accession.

The elaboration of these subjects in terms of the entries in the two Lists is to be done by the President by order in consultation with the State Government.

In the Instrument of Accession three major heads have been mentioned, viz., defence, foreign affairs and communications. Each of these broad heads has a number of items which are also listed in the Instrument.

Besides the three major heads, a number of ancillary matters have also been mentioned in the Instrument of Accession, e.g., election of the President. It was necessary to identify those items in the Union and Concurrent Lists and this task was left to the President to be performed by him in consultation with the State Government.

(ii) Such other subjects in the Union or Concurrent Lists as the President may by order specify with the concurrence of the State Government.

This clause means that subjects other than those mentioned in the Instrument of Accession [as envisaged in (i) above] can be brought within the purview of Parliament. But while in (i) above, only consultation with the State Government is required, in (ii), the concurrence of the State Government has been stipulated.

Art. 370(1)(d) lays down that other provisions of the Constitution, besides the above, can be applied to the State with or without modifications by order of the President. Such an Order is not to be issued by the President—

(1) without consulting the State Government if matters to be specified in the Order relate to those mentioned in the Instrument of Accession;

(2) without the concurrence of the State Government if the matters to be specified in the Order relate to matters other than those mentioned in the Instrument.

Art. 370(2) further provided that if the State Government gave its concurrence, as mentioned above, before the convening of the State Constituent Assembly, "it shall be placed before such Assembly for such decision as it may take on". As the Constituent Assembly exists no more, Art. 370(2) has exhausted itself.

---

2. For comments on Art. 370, see, S.M.S. Naqishbandi v. ITO, Salary Circle, AIR 1971 J & K 120.
3. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
4. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.

In a way, Art. 370 empowers the President to define the constitutional relationship of the State in terms of the provisions of the Indian Constitution, subject to the stipulation that he can do so with reference to the matters in the Instrument of Accession in consultation with, and with reference to other matters with the concurrence of, the State Government.

The word 'modification' in Art. 370 is to be given the widest amplitude. Thus, the President has power to vary, amend or modify a constitutional provision, in any way he deems necessary, while applying it to the State. The power to 'modify' is co-extensive with the power to amend and is not confined to minor alterations only.

Art. 370 is a special provision for amending the Constitution in its application to the State of Jammu and Kashmir. Art. 368[5] does not curtail the power of the President under Art. 370. Even a radical alteration can be made in a constitutional provision in its application to the State.

The Supreme Court has refused to interpret the word 'modification' as used in Art. 370(1) in any "narrow or pedantic sense". The Supreme Court has observed on this point:[6]

> "We are therefore of opinion that in the context of the Constitution we must give the widest effect to the meaning of the word "modification" used in Art. 370(1) and in that sense it includes an amendment. There is no reason to limit the word "modifications" as used in Art. 370(1) only to such modifications as do not make any "radical transformation".

Further, Art. 370 authorises the President to modify a constitutional provision not only when it is applied to the State for the first time, but even subsequently after it has been applied.[7]

An amendment made to the Constitution does not automatically apply to the State of Jammu and Kashmir. It can apply only with the concurrence of the State Government, and when the President issues an order under Art. 370.[8]

Thus, Art. 370 empowers the President to adapt the constitutional provisions applied or to be applied to the State of Jammu and Kashmir in the light of the situation existing in the State from time to time. This is a flexible arrangement under which the constitutional position of the State can be defined from time to time.

B. THE CONSTITUTION (APPLICATION TO JAMMU & KASHMIR) ORDER, 1954

Under Art. 370(1)(b)(ii), the Constitution (Application to Jammu and Kashmir) Order, 1950, was promulgated by the President of India in consultation with the Government of Jammu and Kashmir. The Order specified the matters with respect to which the Union Parliament was to be competent to make laws for the State.

The Order of 1950 was then replaced by an Order with the same title in 1954. This is the basic Order which, as amended and modified from time to time, regulates the constitutional status of the State.

---

5. For discussion on Art. 368, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
6. Puranlal Lakhanpal v. Union of India, AIR 1961 SC 1519, 1521 : (1962) 1 SCR 688.
7. Sampat Prakash v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1970 SC 1118 : (1969) 1 SCC 562.
8. Ibid., at 1124.

Today not only those provisions of the Indian Constitution which pertain to the matters mentioned in the Instrument of Accession, but many other provisions relating to several matters not specified in the Instrument, apply to the State. Briefly, the essentials of the constitutional position of the State are as follows.

(a) Provisions of the Constitution relating to the Central Government apply to the State with a few modifications. The State has six members in the Lok Sabha elected directly by the people of the State.

(b) The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court extends over the State except for Arts. 135[9] and 139.[10]

(c) The State is governed under a Constitution of its own drafted by its Constituent Assembly. This Constitution came into force on January 26, 1957, and it is patterned closely on the model of the Indian Constitution. Therefore, the provisions of the Indian Constitution relating to the State Governments (Legislature, Executive and High Court) do not apply to the State except for the following provisions concerning the High Court Judges:

(i) The Judges of the State High Court can be removed from office in the same manner as the Judges of any other High Court.[11]

(ii) Restriction on retired High Court Judges to plead and act before any Court or authority except the Supreme Court and other High Courts apply to the Judges of the State High Court.[12]

(iii) A Judge may be transferred to or from the State High Court after consultation with the Governor.[13]

(iv) The State High Court has been given power along with the Supreme Court of India to issue writs for the enforcement of the Fundamental Rights.[14] This power is in pari materia with the power of other High Courts under Art. 226 with this difference, however, that the State High Court can issue writs only for the enforcement of the Fundamental Rights and not 'for any other purpose.'[15]

(d) In the field of the Centre-State relationship, the legislative power of Parliament vis-a-vis the State extends to the matters specified in List I excluding entries 8, 9, 34, 60, 79, 97.[16] In a few other entries, such as (3, 67, 81), some modifications have been made in their application to the State.

Parliament has no residuary power vis-a-vis the State.[17]

---

9. Art. 135 refers to the Federal Court : supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I(b).
10. Art. 139 refers to conferment to writ jurisdiction on the Supreme Court in addition to Art. 32 : supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I(i).
11. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. A
12. Ibid.
13. Ibid.
14. Art. 32(2A).
15. Supra, Ch. VIII.
16. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
17. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. I.

Originally List III was also made not applicable to the State under the Order of 1954.[18] But, subsequently, through amendments of the 1954 order,[19] the Concurrent List has been made applicable to the State to some extent.[20]

Parliament can legislate for the State in the Concurrent List except for entries 2, 3, 5 to 10, 12 to 15, 17, 20, 21, 27, 28, 29, 31, 32, 37, 38, 40, 44. In entries 1, 30 and 45, slight modifications have been effected.[21]

The State List has been dropped in the State.[22]

It means that Parliament can legislate with reference to the entries in List I and List III (except those excluded) and all the rest of the legislative power vests in the State Legislature.

Parliament's power to legislate to enforce a treaty is subject to the limitation that no decision affecting the disposition of the State is to be made by the Government of India without the consent of the State Government.

(e) A Proclamation of Emergency under Art. 352(1) cannot have any effect in relation to the State (except in regard to the distribution of revenue) unless it has been made at the request or with the concurrence of the State Government.[23]

A Proclamation can be made by the President under Art. 356 if he is satisfied that the Government of the State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of India, or the Constitution of the State. When a Proclamation under Art. 356 is in operation, Parliament becomes entitled to legislate for matters not enumerated in the Union List.[24]

No Proclamation under Art. 360 applies to the State.[25]

(f) The power of Parliament to re-organise the boundaries, etc., of the State is conditioned by the restriction that no Bill for such a purpose is to be introduced in Parliament without the consent of the State Legislature.[26]

(g) The executive power of the Centre vis-a-vis the State extends to the matters within the Parliamentary legislative field.[27]

The State is to exercise its executive power so as to ensure compliance with the laws made by Parliament and as not to impede or prejudice the exercise of the executive power of the Union.

(h) Art. 365 does not apply to the State.[28]

(i) The State is also bound to acquire or requisition property for the Union if required.

(j) Within the ambit of its administrative power, Centre can do all those things in the State which it can do in relation to the other States.

---

18. Supra.
19. The Constitution (Application to Jammu and Kashmir) Amendment Order, 1963; The Constitution (Application to Jammu and Kashmir) Amendment Orders issued subsequently from time to time.
For the text of these Orders, see, App. IX to ANAND, A.S., THE CONST. OF J & K, 472-508.
20. ANAND, A.S., THE CONSTITUTION OF J&K 145.
21. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
22. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
23. Supra, Ch. XIII.
24. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
25. Supra, Ch. XIII.
26. Supra, Ch. V.
27. Supra, Ch. XII, Sec. A.
28. Supra, Ch. XII., Sec. E.

(k) As regards the sharing of revenue between the Centre and the State, the general scheme applies.[29]

(l) Provisions relating to freedom of trade and commerce,[30] services[31] and citizenship[32] apply to the State.

(m) The Election Commission has jurisdiction over elections held in the State under its Constitution.[33] Like the rest of India, election petitions in the State are heard by the High Court from where an appeal lies to the Supreme Court.

(n) No provisions regarding Minorities apply to the State except those for the Scheduled Castes and Backward Classes; seats are to be reserved in the Lok Sabha for the Scheduled Castes.[34]

(o) Provisions of the Constitution relating to the Official Language apply to the State only in so far as they relate to—(i) the Official Language of the Union; (ii) the Official Language of inter-State and Central-State communication; and (iii) the language of the Supreme Court proceedings.[35]

(p) An amendment made to the Constitution under Art. 368 does not take effect in the State unless applied by a Presidential order under Art. 370(1).[36]

(q) Directive Principles of State Policy do not operate in the State.[37]

(r) Fundamental Rights operate in the State with slight modifications,[38] some of the important ones being:

(i) the power of legislation regarding preventive detention vests in the State Legislature alone and not in Parliament, and Art. 22 stands modified to this extent.[39]

(ii) The State Legislature, notwithstanding any Fundamental Right, has power to define persons who may be permanent residents of the State and to confer on them any special rights, or impose on others any restrictions, as respects employment under the State Government, acquisition of property within the State, settlement in the State and right to scholarships provided by the State.

It will be apparent from the above that from time to time through Presidential orders passed under Art. 370, a large number of the provisions of the Constitution have already become applicable to the State of Jammu and Kashmir. The only condition precedent for the exercise of this power by the President is the concurrence of the State Government. There is no limitation on the exercise of the power by the President in relation to one or more of the remaining provisions of the Constitution. The process of extending the various provisions of the Constitution to the State has been gradual and as a result of consensus between the

---

29. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. K.
30. Supra, Ch. XV.
31. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.
32. Infra, Ch. XVIII
33. Infra, Ch. XIX.
34. Infra, Ch. XXXV.
35. Supra, Ch. XVI.
36. Infra, Ch. XLI.
37. Infra, Ch. XXXIV.
38. Infra, Chs. XX-XXXIII.
39. Infra, Ch. XXVII, Sec. B.

Government of India and the State as dictated by experience and mutual advantage of both.

On February 24, 1975, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi made a Statement on the future relationship between the State and the Indian Union.[40] The highlight of the Statement is that this constitutional relationship will continue as hitherto, and that the extension of further provisions of the Constitution to the State will continue to be governed by the procedure prescribed in Art. 370.

C. STATUS OF ART. 370

Art. 370 has been characterised in the Constitution as being of a temporary nature. Art. 370(3) says that the President, by public notification, may declare that Art. 370 shall cease to be operative, or shall be operative only with such exceptions, and modifications, and from such date as he may specify. But before the President can issue any such notification, the recommendation of the Constituent Assembly of the "shall be necessary".

Since the Constituent Assembly of the State exists no more, Art. 370(3) is no longer operative. Therefore, if any modification is to be made to Art. 370, recourse will have to be had to Art. 368 regarding amendment of the Constitution.

But, a moot point is whether any amendment made to Art. 370 under Art. 368, without the concurrence of, or consultation with, the State Government will be effective. The Constitution (Application to J & K) Order, 1950, lays down that any amendment to the Constitution does not apply to the State unless it is extended there- to by a Presidential Order under Art. 370(1) which again involves "concurrence of", or "consultation with", the State Government.

40. THE TIMES OF INDIA, Feb. 25, 1975, p. 7.

PART V

POLITICAL AND CIVIL RIGHTS

CHAPTER XVIII

CITIZENSHIP

SYNOPSIS

A. CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

Though India is a Federation having two levels of government,[1] Centre and the States—there is only single citizenship, viz., the Indian citizenship, and no separate State citizenship.

1. Supra, Chs. X—XVII.

Articles 5 to 11 in the Constitution lay down as to who are the citizens of India at the commencement of the Constitution, i.e., on January 26, 1950. These citizens have been classified into:

(1) citizens by domicile;
(2) citizens by migration, and
(3) citizens by registration,[2]

(a) CITIZENS BY DOMICILE

Under Art. 5, every person having domicile in India at the commencement of the Constitution, and fulfilling any of the following conditions, is a citizen of India, viz,:

(a) he was born in India;
(b) either of whose parents was born in India;
(c) who has been ordinarily resident in India for not less than five years immediately preceding the commencement of the Constitution.

Conditions (a), (b) and (c) are not cumulative but alternative and, therefore, any one of them needs to be fulfilled by a person having domicile in India to be an Indian citizen.[3]

The term 'domicile' is not defined in the Constitution. Domicile is a complex legal concept in the area of the Conflict of Laws.[4] Art. 5 draws a distinction between 'domicile' and 'residence', for neither 'domicile' nor mere 'residence' is sufficient to make a person an Indian citizen. Domicile and five years' residence are necessary to make a person a citizen.

The basic idea of 'domicile' is permanent home. A person's domicile is the country which is considered by law to be his permanent home. Residence in the country, and the intention to make it his home are necessary to constitute a domicile. The residence in a place by itself is not sufficient to constitute it his domicile. It must be accompanied by the intention to make it his permanent home.

As the Supreme Court has observed in Central Bank of India v. Ram Narain,[5] an intention to reside for ever in a country where one has taken up his residence is an essential constituent element for the existence of domicile in that counrty. The Supreme Court has expounded this theme in Louis De Raedt v. Union of India[6] as follows:

> "For the acquisition of a domicile of choice, it must be shown that the person concerned had a certain state of mind, the animus manendi. If he claims that he acquired a new domicile at a particular time, he must prove that he had formed

---

2. On this topic see, R.B. Sethi, The Law of Foreigners and Citizenship (1981). See also, Izhar Ahmed Khan v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1052 : 1962 Supp 3 SCR 235.
3. Abdul Sattar v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1965 SC 810 : (1965) 1 CriLJ 759.
4. The Indian Succession Act, 1925, lays down some rules on this topic for the purposes of the Act. The courts may seek guidance therefrom to determine the question of 'domicile' under Art. 5.
On domicile, see generally, Graveson, The Conflict of Laws, 145 et seq. (1965).
For a discussion on domicile in India see, Joshi v. Madhya Bharat, AIR 1955 SC 334; Central Bank of India v. Ram Narain, AIR 1955 SC 36 : (1955) 1 SCR 697; Mohd. Reza Debstani v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1966 SC 1436 : (1966) 3 SCR 441.
5. AIR 1955 SC 36.
6. AIR 1991 SC 1886, 1889 : (1991) 3 SCC 554. Also see, Kedar Pandey v. Narain Bikram Sah, AIR 1966 SC 160 : (1965) 3 SCR 793.

> the intention of making his permanent home in the country of residence and of continuing to reside there permanently. Residence alone, unaccompanied by this state of mind, is insufficient."

An Indian who lived for thirty years in England and died there was held to have retained his domicile in India as he had expressed a desire to come back to India in some of his letters.[7] But, on appeal, the Supreme Court held that he had no definite intention to return to India and he died domiciled in England.[8]

In Louis De Raedt,[9] a foreigner had been living in India since 1937 and for more than five years immediately preceding the Constitution. He claimed Indian citizenship under Art. 5(e). But the Supreme Court rejected his claim. The Court held that, on facts, it could not said that he had his domicile in India for more than five years at the commencement of the Constitution. Mere residence is not enough.

The question was whether the petitioner had an intention of staying here permanently. The burden to prove such an intention lay on the petitioner. Louis was staying in India on the basis of a foreign passport with the permission of the Indian authorities. There was nothing to even remotely suggest that he had formed any intention of permanently residing in India.

A minor takes the domicile of his father.[10] A married woman takes the domicile of her husband.[11]

As stated above, India has one citizenship only and no separate State citizenship. A question has, however, arisen whether the same is true of domicile; whether there is one Indian domicile only or there can be a separate State domicile as well.

In Joshi v. Madhya Bharat,[12] a majority of the Supreme Court expressed the view that it was theoretically possible to have a separate State domicile, because domicile has reference to the system of law by which a person is governed. Domicile and citizenship are two different concepts. Art. 5 makes this clear because under it domicile alone is not sufficient to confer citizenship on a person. "When we speak of a person as having a domicile of a particular country, we mean that in certain matters such as succession, minority and marriage he is governed by the law of that country." If, therefore, in one country different laws relating to succession and marriage prevail in different places and areas, then each area having a distinct set of laws can itself be regarded as a country for the purpose of domicile.

The Representation of the Peoples Act, 1951 initially required "domicile" in the State concerned for getting elected to the Council of States. This was deleted in 2003.[13]

Under the Indian Constitution, the power to legislate on succession, marriage and minority has been conferred on both the Union and the State Legislatures,[14]

---

7. Sankaran Govindan v. Lakshmi Bharathi, AIR 1964 Ker 244. Also, Abdus Samad v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1972 SC 505 : (1973) 1 SCC 451.
8. Sankaran v. Lakshmi, AIR 1974 SC 1764 : (1975) 3 SCC 351.
9. Supra, footnote 6.
10. Dawood Mohd. v. Union of India, AIR 1969 Guj 79; Malkiat Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1969 Punj 250; Sharafat v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1960 All 637; Vishal Nilesh Mandlewala v. Justice R.J. Shah (Retd.), 2007 (2) GLR 1764.
11. Karinum Nisa v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1955 Nag 6.
12. Supra, footnote 4.
13. Kuldip Nayar v. Union of India, (2006) 7 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 3127.
14. Entry 5, List III; supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.

and so it is quite conceivable that until the Centre intervenes and enacts a uniform code for the whole of India, each State may have its own laws on these subjects, and, thus, there could be different domiciles for different States.

JAGANNADHADAS, J., dissenting from the majority, however, pointed out that since the personal laws in India are mostly on religious affiliations, that statutory modifications introduced therein have been almost entirely of an all-India character and not on a regional basis, that there is very little State legislation on any matter of personal laws and that, too, within an extremely small compass, there is not much scope in India for the growth of any concept of State domicile as distinct from the Indian domicile.

In Pradeep Jain v. Union of India,[15] the Supreme Court has repudiated the notion of State domicile. The Court has asserted that there is only one domicile, namely domicile in India. Art. 5 recognises only one domicile, namely, "domicile in the territory of India". The Court has now emphasized that the Indian Federation has not emerged as a result of a compact of sovereign States and so it is "not a federal State in the traditional sense of that term".[16] India has one single indivisible system with a single unified justicing system having the Supreme Court at the apex of the hierarchy.[17]

(b) CITIZENS BY MIGRATION

The Independence of India was accompanied by a large scale migration of people from Pakistan. As these people belonged to the territory which ceased to be a part of India after the Independence, they could not be regarded as Indian citizens under Art. 5 and, therefore, special provisions had to be made for them in the Constitution.

Under Art. 6, an immigrant from Pakistan became a citizen of India if he, or either of his parents, or any of his grandparents, was born in India (as it was prior to the Independence), and, in addition, fulfilled either of the following two conditions:

(1) in case he migrated to India before July 19, 1948,[18] he had been ordinarily resident in India since the date of his migration; or

(2) in case he migrated on or after July 19, 1948, he had been registered as a citizen of India.

A person could be so registered only if he had been resident in India for at least six months preceding the date of his application for registration.

The migration envisaged in Art. 6 only means coming to India from outside[19] and it must have taken place before, and not after, the commencement of the Constitution.[20]

---

15. AIR 1984 SC 1420 : (1984) 3 SCC 654.
16. See Ch. XIV, Sec. H, supra.
17. In State of Bombay v. Narayandas, AIR 1958 Bom 68, the Bombay High Court held that a Sate Legislature could not claim jurisdiction on marriages performed outside the States on the ground that these were performed by those domiciled within the State as there was no State domicile as such in India apart from the Indian domicile.
18. On this date, the Influx from Pakistan (Control) Ordinance introduced a permit system to control the admission into India of persons from West Pakistan.
19. Union of India v. Karam Ali, AIR 1970 A. & N. 1416.
20. Shanno Devi v. Mangal Sain, AIR 1961 SC 58 : (1961) 1 SCR 576.

(c) CITIZENS BY REGISTRATION

According to Art. 8, a person who, or either of whose parents, or any of whose grandparents, was born in India (before independence) but who is ordinarily residing in any country outside India and Pakistan, may register himself as a citizen of India with the diplomatic or consular representative of India in the country of residence.

This provision confers Indian citizenship on a person who prima facie has no domicile in India and it seeks to cover the overseas Indians who may want to acquire Indian citizenship.

(d) TERMINATION OF CITIZENSHIP

Under Art. 7, a citizen of India by domicile (Art. 5), or by migration (Art. 6), ceases to be citizen if he has migrated to Pakistan after March 1, 1947. If, however, after migration to Pakistan, he has returned to India under a permit of resettlement, or permanent return, he can register himself as a citizen of India in the same manner as a person migrating from Pakistan after July 19, 1948.

Article 7 thus overrides Arts. 5 and 6. Art. 7 envisages only those persons who migrated to Pakistan between March 1, 1947, and January 26, 1950.[21] These persons lost their Indian citizenship. The question of citizenship of persons migrating to Pakistan after January 26, 1950, has to be decided under the provisions of the Indian Citizenship Act.[22]

A woman born and domiciled in India, going to Pakistan after March 1, 1947, would lose her Indian citizenship under Art. 7, even though her husband remained in India, as the rule of Private International Law that her domicile was the same as that of her husband, viz., India, could not render Art. 7 nugatory as she did in fact migrate to Pakistan. Art. 7 is pre-emptory in its scope and makes no exception in favour of a wife who migrates to Pakistan leaving her husband in India.[23] The concept of domicile is contained in Art. 5, but as both Arts. 6 and 7 have been made operative 'notwithstanding Art. 5,' the concept of 'domicile' has been excluded from the scope of Arts. 6 and 7.

The word 'migration' has been used in the sense of people going from one territory to the other, whether or not with the intention of permanent residence there. In Shanno,[24] a narrow view of the word 'migration' used in Art. 6 was adopted by the Supreme Court. 'Migration' was envisaged to mean coming to India with the intention of residing there permanently. But the Court dissented from this view in Kulathil[25] and interpreted 'migration' (used in Arts. 6 and 7) in a broad sense and not in a narrow sense as meaning going or coming from one territory to another without bringing in the concept of domicile. The Court pointed out that Arts. 6 and 7 make special provisions for dealing with an abnormal situation created by large movement of population between India and Pakistan.

These Articles lay down special criteria of their own, in one case to decide who shall be deemed to be citizens of India (Art. 6), and in the other case who

---

21. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Peer Mohd., AIR 1963 SC 645 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 429.
22. See, infra, Sec. B.
23. State of Bihar v. Amar Singh, AIR 1955 SC 282 : (1955) 1 SCR 1259.
24. Supra.
25. Kulathil Mamma v. State of Kerala, AIR 1966 SC 1614 : (1966) 3 SCR 706.

shall not be deemed to be such citizens (Art. 7). The Constitution-makers did not intend that "the concept of domicile should be brought into Articles 6 and 7."

But the movement should be voluntary and should not have been for a specific purpose and for a short and limited period. Therefore, a boy of 12 years' age who left for Pakistan in 1948, leaving behind his parents in India, came back to India on a Pakistani passport in 1954, again left for Pakistan and came back to India in 1956, was held to have lost his Indian citizenship because of migration.

(e) DUAL CITIZENSHIP

Under Art. 9, no person can be a citizen of India under Arts. 5, 6 and 8, if he has voluntarily acquired the citizenship of a foreign country. This provision thus recognises the principle that no Indian citizen can claim a dual or plural citizenship. However, this is subject to Parliament's power under Art. 11 to provide for inter alia, the acquisition of citizenship.

Article 9 thus applies only to those cases where foreign citizenship had been acquired before, and not after, the commencement of the Constitution. The latter type of situation has been dealt with under the provisions of the Indian Citizenship Act, 1955.[26]

B. THE CITIZENSHIP ACT, 1955

The above-mentioned provisions of the Constitution regarding citizenship are not exhaustive but fragmentary and skeletal. These provisions are confined mainly to defining who are citizens of India at the commencement of the Constitution but do not deal with the problem of acquisition of citizenship subsequent to that date. Nor is there any provision in the Constitution to deal with such matters as termination of citizenship (other than Arts. 7 and 9), or other matters concerning citizenship. Art. 11 expressly empowers Parliament to make a law to provide for such matters and, accordingly, Parliament has enacted the Citizenship Act, 1955, to provide for the acquisition and determination of Indian citizenship.

In this connection, reference may be made to entry 17, List I[27] which runs as "citizenship, naturalisation and aliens". Thus, Parliament has exclusive power to legislate with respect to "citizenship". Also, Art. 10 says that a person who is a citizen of India under Arts. 5 to 8 shall, subject to any law made by Parliament, continue to be such citizen. This means that the law enacted by Parliament can make changes even in Arts. 5 to 8.

The Act provides for acquisition of Indian citizenship after the commencement of the Constitution, makes necessary provisions for termination and deprivation of citizenship in certain circumstances and seeks to recognise formally the concept of Commonwealth citizenship. The Act does not apply to a company, association or body of individuals whether incorporated or not.

The Act provides for five ways for acquiring Indian citizenship, viz.,

(a) birth;

---

26. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Peer Mohd., AIR 1963 SC 645 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 429; Kulathil v. State of Kerala, op. cit.; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Shah Mohammad, AIR 1969 SC 1234; State of Assam v. Jilkadar Ali, AIR 1972 SC 2166 : (1972) 3 SCC 320.

27. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.

(b) descent;

(c) registration;

(d) naturalisation and

(e) incorporation of some territory into India.

(a) CITIZENSHIP BY BIRTH

According to section 3, a person born in India on or after the 26th January, 1950, but before the commencement of the Citizenship (Amendment) Act, 1986, and those born in India on or after such commencement and either of whose parents is a citizen of India at the time of his birth is a citizen of India by birth except when—(1) his father possesses diplomatic immunity and is not an Indian citizen; or (2) his father is an enemy alien and his birth occurs at a place under enemy occupation.

(b) CITIZENSHIP BY DESCENT

S. 4 provides for citizenship by descent. A person born outside India on or after January 26, 1950, but before the commencement of the Citizenship (Amendment) Act, 1992, is a citizen of India by descent if at the time of his birth his father is an Indian citizen, or a person born outside India on or after such commencement shall be a citizen of India by descent if either of his parents is a citizen of India at the time of his birth provided that in the later case if either of the parents of such a person was a citizen of India by descent only, that person shall not be an Indian citizen by virtue of this provision unless his birth is registered at an Indian consulate, or either of his parents is, at the time of his birth, in service under Government in India.

(c) CITIZENSHIP BY REGISTRATION

S. 5 deals with citizenship by registration. The following categories of persons, if not already citizens of India, can be registered as Indian citizens, after taking an oath of allegiance:

(a) persons of Indian origin ordinarily resident in India and residing there for six months immediately preceding the application for registration;

(b) persons of Indian origin who are ordinarily resident outside undivided India;

(c) women married to the Indian citizens;

(d) minor children of Indian citizens;

(e) persons of full age and capacity who are citizens of a Commonwealth country.

Category (a), mentioned above, covers migrants from Pakistan who could not become Indian citizens under the provisions of the Constitution.

In prescribing conditions and restrictions subject to which citizens of a Commonwealth country may be registered as Indian citizens under head (e), mentioned above, the Central Government is to keep due regard to the conditions subject to which the Indian citizens may become citizens of that country by registration.

Cls. (a) and (e) of this section are mutually exclusive and a person of Indian origin who is a citizen of a Commonwealth country falls under (e) and not (a).[28]

Since 2003, citizenship can be granted to an overseas citizen of India right in accordance with the provisions of Sections 7A and 7B.[29]

The Citizenship Act does not have any provision providing for cancellation of a certificate of registration issued under s. 5.[30]

In spite of a certificate of registration under Section 5(1)(c) of the Citizenship Act, 1955 having been granted to a person and in spite of his having been enrolled in the voters' list, the question whether he is a citizen of India and hence qualified for, or disqualified from, contesting an election can be raised before and tried by the High Court hearing an election petition.[31]

The registration granted to an overseas citizen under Section 7A can be withdrawn/cancelled in terms of Section 7D by the Central Government.[32]

(d) CITIZENSHIP BY NATURALIZATION

S. 6 deals with citizenship by naturalisation. A person of full age and capacity who is a citizen of a non-Commonwealth country may become a citizen by naturalisation, if the Central Government is satisfied that he fulfils the conditions laid down in the Act. These conditions are:

(1) he is not a subject or citizen of a country where Indian citizens are prevented from becoming citizens by naturalisation;

(2) he renounces his citizenship of the other country;

(3) he has resided and/or been in government service for 12 months immediately preceeding the date of application;

(4) during 7 years prior to these 12 months, he has resided and/or been in government service for not less than four years;

(5) he is of good character;

(6) he has an adequate knowledge of a language recognised by the Constitution;

(7) after naturalisation he intends to reside in India, or enter into service with government international organisation, or a society or company in India.

If the Central Government is of the opinion that the applicant has rendered distinguished service to the cause of science, philosophy, art, literature, world peace or human progress generally, it may waive the conditions for naturalisation in his case. The applicant for citizenship must be communicated the grounds for refusing the grant and allowed to make a representation against the order.[33]

S. 6A was enacted in 1985 to give effect to the Assam accord.

---

28. Ghaurul Hasan v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1958 Raj 173.
29. See infra under "Dual Citizenship".
30. Hari Shankar Jain v. Sonia Gandhi, (2001) 8 SCC 233 : AIR 2001 SC 3689.
31. Hari Shanker Jain v. Sonia Gandhi, (2001) 8 SCC 233 at page 250 : AIR 2001 SC 3689.
32. Satish Nambiar v. Union of India, AIR 2008 Bom 158.
33. Hasan Ali Raihany v. Union of India, (2006) 3 SCC 705 at page 707 : AIR 2006 SC 1714. See also K. Krishna M.A. Raihany v. Union of India, (2007) 5 SCC 533 at page 534 : (2007) 7 JT 258.

(e) CITIZENSHIP BY INCORPORATION OF TERRITORY

S. 7 provides for citizenship by incorporation of territory. On any territory becoming a part of India, the Central Government may notify the persons who shall be citizens of India by reason of their connection with that territory.

(f) COMMONWEALTH CITIZEN

A citizen of a Commonwealth country has the status of a Commonwealth citizen in India. The Central Government may, by an order notified in the official gazette, make provisions, on a basis of reciprocity, for the conferment of all or any of the rights of an Indian citizen of a Commonwealth country.

(g) DUAL CITIZENSHIP

The Citizenship Act was twice amended to provide for dual citizenship. By the amending Act of 2003[34] provision was made for acquisition of overseas citizenship of India by persons of indian origin of 16 specified countries other than Pakistan and Bangladesh. The 2003 amendment provides for the manner and methods by which a person could acquire a citizenship of India and its revocation. In 2005, the Act was further amended[35] to (i) expand the scope of grant of overseas citizenship of India to persons of indian origin of all countries except Pakistan and Bangladesh; and (ii) reduce the period of residence in India from two years to one year for persons registered as overseas citizens of India to acquire Indian citizenship. However, this concept is distinct from Indian Citizenship, not only with regard to the procedure for grant of citizenship and the privileges consequent upon registration but also with regard to the cancellation of the citizenship.[36]

Section 8 provides that an Indian citizen of full age and capacity, who is also a citizen or national of another country, can renounce his Indian citizenship by making a declaration to that effect and having it registered. Registration of such a declaration is withheld when made during a war in which India may be engaged.

When a male person renounces his citizenship, every minor child of his also ceases to be an Indian citizen though such a child, within a year of his attaining full age, may resume Indian citizenship by making a declaration to that effect.

(h) CESSATION OF CITIZENSHIP

Section 9 provides for termination of Indian citizenship upon acquisition of citizenship of another country which event entails cessation of citizenship of India.[37]

According to S. 9, a citizen of India ceases to be so on his voluntarily acquiring citizenship of another country by naturalization, registration or otherwise. This provision does not apply during a war in which India may be engaged. If any question arises as to whether, when or how any person has acquired the citi-

---

34. Citizenship (Amendment) Act, 2003 (6 of 2004).
35. Citizenship (Amendment) Ordinance, 2005 subsequently replace by Act 32 of 2005.
36. Satish Nambiar v. Union of India, AIR 2008 Bom 158; Mr. Criag Maxwell Sterry v. Ministry of Home Affairs; High Court of Bombay at Goa: Writ Petition No. 513/2009: Judgement dated 11-09-2009.
37. Ibid.

zenship of another country, it is to be determined by such authority and in such manner as may be prescribed by the rules.

Under Rule 30 of the Citizenship Rules, this authority is the Central Government which acts in a quasi-judicial capacity while discharging this function.[38] Voluntarily obtaining the passport of a foreign country is, according to the Citizenship Rules, conclusive proof of an Indian citizen having voluntarily acquired citizenship of that country.[39]

There is no automatic loss of Indian citizenship by acquisition of a foreign passport. Whether a person has lost his Indian citizenship or not is to be decided by the Central Government and it is only after such a decision that he can be dealt with as a foreigner.[40]

The child of Sri Lankan parents who were found guilty of assassinating the former Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, was held to be an Indian citizen since she was born while her mother was in an Indian prison. She did not cease to be an Indian citizen and was entitled to enter and live in this country till the status of her citizenship was determined by the Central Government under section 9(2), although soon after her parents were awarded the death penalty, her grandmother took her to Sri Lanka on a Sri Lankan passport and she had resided there ever since.[41]

The rule-making power conferred by the Act, and Rule 30 along with the rule of evidence, have been held to be valid as these provisions are based on the accepted principle that an Indian citizen cannot acquire a dual citizenship and the rule-making power covers cases of voluntary acquisition of foreign citizenship otherwise than by registration or naturalisation.[42]

These provisions become relevant only when the person concerned is, to start with, a citizen of India and has lost this citizenship thereafter.[43] The Supreme Court has observed that "the question whether a person is a foreigner is a question of fact which would require careful scrutiny of evidence since the inquiry is quasi-judicial in character. This question has to be determined by the Central Government".

In Lal Babu Hussain,[44] the name of a person entered in an electoral roll was deleted on the ground of his citizenship being suspect. The Supreme Court quashed the order on the ground that the procedure followed by the electoral registration officer was flawed. The Supreme Court emphasized that a person must be a citizen of India for his name to be included in the electoral roll. A non-38. Ayub Khan v. Commr. of Police, AIR 1965 SC 1623 : (1965) 2 SCR 884; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Shah Mohammad, AIR 1969 SC 1234; State of Gujarat v. Ibrahim, AIR 1974 SC 645 : (1974) 1 SCC 283.

---

39. Izhar Ahmad Khan v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1052 : 1962 Supp 3 SCR 235; S.K. Moinuddin v. Govt. of India, AIR 1967 SC 1143 : (1967) 2 SCR 401; Bhanwaroo Khan v. Union of India, (2002) 4 SCC 346 at page 349 : AIR 2002 SC 1614.

40. State of Andhra Pradesh v. Mohd. Khan, AIR 1962 SC 1778; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Rahmatullah, AIR 1971 SC 1382; Dipali Katia Chadha v. Union of India, (1996) 7 SCC 432.

41. S. Nalini Srikaran v. Union of India, AIR 2007 Mad 187 : (2007) 2 MLJ 831.

42. Izhar Ahmad v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1052 : (1962) Supp (3) SCR 295.
Also see, Bhanwaroo Khan v. Union of India, AIR 2002 SC 1614 : (2002) 4 SCC 346.

43. Ibrahim v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1965 SC 618 : (1964) 7 SCR 441.

44. Lal Babu Hussein v. Electoral Registration Officer, AIR 1995 SC 1189 at 1194 : (1995) 3 SCC 100.

citizen cannot be registered in an electoral roll. When the name of a person is already entered in the electoral roll, his name can be removed only after giving him a reasonable opportunity of being heard.

(i) DEPRIVATION OF CITIZENSHIP

Under S. 10, citizens of India by naturalisation, marriage, registration, domicile and residence may be deprived of citizenship by an order of the Central Government, if it is satisfied that—

(a) the registration or naturalisation was obtained by means of fraud, false representation or concealment of any material fact,[45] or,

(b) he has shown himself by act or speech, to be disloyal or disaffected towards the Indian Constitution; or,

(c) during a war in which India may be engaged he has unlawfully traded or communicated with the enemy; or,

(d) within five years of his registration or naturalisation, he has been sentenced to imprisonment for not less than two years; or,

(e) he has been ordinarily resident out of India for seven years continuously.

This provision does not apply if he is a student abroad, or is in the service of a government in India, or an international organisation of which India is a member, or has registered annually at an Indian consulate his intention to retain his Indian citizenship.

Before making an order depriving a person of his citizenship, the Central Government is to give to the person concerned, a written notice containing the ground on which the order is proposed to be made. The person concerned may have his case referred to a committee of inquiry if the ground is not (e). The Central Government is bound to refer the case to a committee consisting of a chairman (a person who has held a judicial office for at least ten years) and two other members appointed by the Government. The committee holds the inquiry and the Central Government is to be ordinarily guided by its report in making the order.

(j) EXPULSION OF A FOREIGNER

The Supreme Court has asserted that the power of the Government to expel a foreigner is absolute and unlimited. There is no provision in the Constitution fettering this discretion of the Government.

The Government has an unrestricted power to expel a foreigner without assigning any reasons. A foreigner has no right to claim Indian citizenship. No foreigner can claim to stay in India as a matter of right. The Government has an unrestricted right to expel a foreigner.[46] A foreigner can claim the protection to his

---

45. Ghaurul Hasan v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1967 SC 107.

46. Hans Muller of Nuremberg v. Superintendent, Presidency Jail, Calcutta, AIR 1955 SC 367 : (1955) 1 SCR 1284; Louis De Raedt v. Union of India, Supra; Gilles Preiffer v. Union of India, 1996 Writ LR 386; David John Hopkins v. Union of India, AIR 1997 Mad 366; Sarbananda Sonowal v. Union of India, (2005) 5 SCC 665 at page 693 : AIR 2005 SC 2920.

life and liberty under Art. 21,[47] but the right to reside and settle in India as conferred by Art. 19(1)(d) is available only to the citizens of India and not to non-citizens.[48]

C. CORPORATION NOT A CITIZEN

There are certain Fundamental Rights conferred by the Indian Constitution on 'persons', and certain on 'citizens'. For example, the right to freedom of speech under Art. 19(1)(a) is conferred only on the citizens of India.[49] In this connection, a question of great interest has arisen, viz., whether a statutory corporation, or a company registered under the Indian Companies Act, can be treated as a citizen and given the benefit of the Fundamental Rights which are available only to the citizens.

Till 1960, the Supreme Court, without specifically deciding this question, entertained a number of writ petitions[50] from companies and corporations under Art. 32[51] claiming Fundamental Rights under Arts. 19(1)(f) and 19(1)(g).[52] The question was left open whether an Indian Company could have the rights of a citizen under Art. 19.[53] But the Supreme Court gave a definitive opinion on this point in State Trading Corporation v. Commercial Tax Officer.[54] The question was whether the State Trading Corporation could claim the benefit of Art. 19(1)(g), viz., right to carry on any trade or business.[55]

The Corporation is a government company registered under the Indian Companies Act and consists only of the President of India and the Secretary of the Ministry of Commerce as its shareholders. Its status is that of a private limited company. The Corporation moved the Supreme Court under Art. 32 to quash sales tax proceedings against it by a State on the ground that the imposition of the sales tax was illegal and infringed its Fundamental Right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(g).[56]

The basic question which arose was whether the 'Corporation' was a 'citizen', for the freedom under Art. 19(1)(g) is available only to a citizen and to none else.

The Supreme Court answered the question in the negative. The Court argued that the Indian Constitution does not define citizenship. Arts. 5 to 9 of the Constitution deal with citizenship in certain circumstances only, but the tenor of these Articles is such that they cannot apply to a juristic person. The Citizenship Act specifically excludes a company, association, body or individuals, whether incor-

---

47. See, Ch. XXVI, infra.
48. See, Ch. XXIV, Sec. F, infra.
49. See, for example, Art. 19, Infra, Ch. XXIV. Secs. C to H.
50. See, for example, The Bengal Immunity case, AIR 1955 SC 661 : (1955) 2 SCR 603; The Sholapur Mills case, AIR 1951 SC 41; Express Newspaper Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 578 : 1959 SCR 12; Lord Krishna Sugar Mills Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1959 SC 1124 : (1960) 1 SCR 39.
In Hamdard Dawakhana v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 554 : (1960) 2 SCR 671, a petition by a Muslim wakf was entertained by the Supreme Court and some relief was given under Art. 19(1)(a) : see, infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.
51. For Art. 32, see, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A.
52. Infra, Ch. XXIV, Section H.
53. Sewpujanrai v. Customs Collector, AIR 1958 SC 845 : 1959 SCR 821.
54. AIR 1963 SC 1811 : (1964) 4 SCR 99.
55. For a detailed discussion on Art. 19(1)(g), see, infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.
56. For a detailed discussion on Art. 32, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A porated or not, from the concept of a person under the Act, and so from the concept of the Indian citizenship.

Thus, under the Constitution, or the Citizenship Act, only a natural person can be a citizen. Drawing a distinction between citizenship and nationality, the Court stated that while all citizens are nationals of a State, the reverse is not always true because nationality is a concept of international law while citizenship is a concept of municipal law. Therefore, while a company might have 'nationality', which ordinarily is determined by the place of its incorporation, it does not have 'citizenship'. Refusing to hold the State Trading Corporation as a citizen, the Court rejected its petition under Art. 32.[57]

The case could, however, have been decided on another ground, viz., the State Trading Corporation is a government instrumentality composed of government officials; all its capital comes from the government. As a government body, it could not claim to enforce Fundamental Rights which are meant for the protection of private parties against the government or its instrumentalities.[58] If such a body could claim to enforce a Fundamental Right against a State, then, on a parity of reasoning, it could claim a similar right against the Centre. Suppose the Parliament passes a law to regulate trade carried on by the State Trading Corporation. Can it challenge the Act claiming that its rights under Art. 19(1)(g) have been infringed? The answer appears to be in the negative. And if it cannot enforce a Fundamental Right against the Centre, it cannot enforce the same against a State.

The State Trading Corporation case was concerned with a government company, whereas in the Tata case,[59] a public limited company having a majority of Indian citizens as shareholders was involved. The Court also denied to such a company the Fundamental Right claimed.

In the Tata case, along with the company, two shareholders had also joined in making the petition. The shareholders argued that the corporate veil of the Tata Company should be pierced and its substantial character determined without reference to the technical doctrine of the corporation's separate entity. The Court in a majority decision refused to accept this argument saying that piercing of the corporate veil has been done only in a very few cases and that this is an exception rather than the rule. The Court held that a company has a legal entity of its own which is entirely separate from that of its shareholders and to accept the plea of the shareholders would amount to enforcing indirectly what the company could not claim directly. Thus, even individual shareholders cannot claim a Fundamental Right so as to benefit the company.

These cases, in effect, withdraw the safeguard of Art. 19 from the corporate sector. Even if a corporation is Indian in every sense, e.g., it is registered in India, has Indian capital and all of its shareholders and directors are Indians, it can

---

57. The minority view in the instant case was that the word 'citizen' in Art. 19 included a corporation of which all the members were citizens of India and that the State Trading Corporation could claim Fundamental Rights.

58. For the concept of state instrumentality, see, Ch. XX, infra.

59. Tata Engineering v. State of Bihar, AIR 1965 SC 40 : (1964) 6 SCR 885.
For a comment on the case see, 7 JILI, 568-9; also, S.S. Nigam, Companies and the Fundamental Rights to Property, 3 Benaras LJ 1 (1967); State of Gujarat v. Sri Ambica Mills, AIR 1974 SC 1300 : (1974) 4 SCC 656.

claim no right under Art. 19. So long as individuals carry on a business, they enjoy the freedoms under Art. 19(1)(g) but they lose this protection as soon as they are incorporated. The position is anomalous. The Court could have avoided the anomaly by resorting to the doctrine of piercing the corporate veil which has already been invoked in several situations.

The denial of the Fundamental Right to the shareholders does not appear to be justified since the shareholders have a direct interest in the property and business of the company. If the company's career is jeopardised, the value of their shares in the company is prejudicially affected. Thus, there was justification for piercing the corporate veil and for granting relief on the petition of the shareholders who were citizens of India.

The concept of separate entity of a company from its shareholders is a fiction of law evolved to protect the shareholders from liabilities beyond those which they had assumed by being shareholders. This doctrine has made the company a popular instrument to carry on vast commercial enterprises. The fiction of separate entity of the company, in course of time, has been subjected to a few exceptions by the evolution of the doctrine of piercing the corporate veil. The Supreme Court has taken the fiction of separate entity too far and what was once a shield has now become a handicap so far as Art. 19 is concerned.

It remains doubtful whether the framers of the Indian Constitution ever envisaged that the Fundamental Rights under Art. 19(1)(g) should not be available to a corporation which is Indian in every sense. The Court adopted a dogmatic view. If each one of the shareholders of a company carries on the business himself, he would be protected by Art. 19(1)(g). Could it be that as soon as these individuals incorporate, they lose the protection of Art. 19(1)(g)? As it was a case of enforcement of a Fundamental Right, the Court ought to have looked behind the corporate veil and taken notice of the fact that all shareholders of the corporation are citizens and thus bring the corporation within Art. 19(1)(g).

If a Fundamental Right, by its nature, is not one which must be confined to natural persons, then that must legitimately be extended to a corporate or a company having a majority of Indian shareholders. It may be noted that the minority view was that the word 'citizen' in Art. 19 includes a corporation of which all the members were citizens of India and that the State Trading Corporation could claim Fundamental Rights. This seems to be a rational view to take.

In course of time, the rigours of the above pronouncements have been diluted by resorting to the strategy of joining a natural person along with a company in the writ petition challenging violation of Art. 19(1)(g). Thus, in Sakal Papers v. Union of India,[60] a company and a reader of the newspaper filed writ petitions challenging the Daily Newspapers (Price & Page) Order, 1960, under Art. 19(1)(a). In the Bank Nationalisation case,[61] a Central law acquiring banks was challenged in writ petitions under Art. 32 by the concerned banking companies, a shareholder, a director and a holder of a current account in a bank. The argument was that the law in question infringed Arts. 19(1)(f) and 31(2). The Supreme Court held the petitions maintainable on the ground that the rights of the companies as well as the shareholders were involved, and "the Court will not, concentrating merely upon the technical operation of the action, deny itself jurisdiction to grant relief."

60. AIR 1962 SC 305 : (1962) 3 SCR 842.
Also infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.

61. Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 564 : (1970) 1 SCC 248; infra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C.

Then, in the Bennett Coleman case,[62] the Newsprint Control Order was challenged under Arts. 19(1)(a) and 14 in writ petitions filed by several newspaper companies and several readers, newspaper editors and shareholders. The petitions were held maintainable as the rights not only of the newspapers companies but also of the editors, readers and shareholders were also involved. These individuals exercised their right of freedom of speech through "their newspapers through which they speak."

In the Statesman v. Fact Finding Committee,[63] the Government of India appointed a fact finding committee to enquire into the economics of the newspaper industry. This was sought to be challenged through writ petitions filed by the Statesman, a company, and a shareholder of the company. The High Court held that though the company, as such, had no Fundamental Right, the shareholder had and so the petitions were maintainable. "The press reaches the public through the newspapers. The shareholders speak through their editors."[64] The fact that the company was the petitioner did not prevent the High Court from giving relief to the shareholder.

When an electric company was sought to be nationalised by the State Government, writ petitions to challenge the same were filed by the company and a shareholder. The shareholder's petition was held maintainable under Arts. 19(1)(f) and (g), as his right to carry on the business through the company, and his right to a divisible share in future of the property of the company, were being diminished by the take-over of the company.[65]

The Government of India issued an order fixing wage structure for working journalists. A petition by a shareholder of a company was held maintainable to challenge this order under Art. 19(1)(f). If a heavy burden is placed on the resources of the company, it will affect the shareholders also, and their rights will be infringed. A shareholder can thus validly challenge the order under Art. 19.[66]

The result of the above judicial pronouncements is that it is now an established practice to file writ petitions by the company concerned as well as by a shareholder to challenge the state action against the company, and, thus, invoke the Fundamental Rights granted only to the citizens. An effective method has thus been found to get over the disability otherwise imposed on the companies by judicial dicta.

In D.C. & G.M. v. Union of India,[67] the Supreme Court has stated that the law with regard to a company challenging the violation of its Fundamental Rights under Art. 19 is in a "nebulous state". The Court has gone on to say: "Thus apart from the law being in a nebulous state, the trend is in the direction of holding that in the matter of fundamental freedoms guaranteed by Art. 19, the rights of a shareholder and the company which the share-holders have formed are rather

---

62. Bennett Coleman & Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1973 SC 106 : (1972) 2 SCC 788; infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.
63. AIR 1975 Cal 14; infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.
64. Ibid., 38.
65. Godhra Electric Co. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1975 SC 32 : (1975) 1 SCC 199.
66. The P.T.I. v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1044; infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.
67. AIR 1983 SC 937. See also Star India P. Ltd. v. The Telecom Regulatory Authority of India, 146 (2008) DLT 455.

co-extensive and the denial to one of the fundamental freedom would be denial to the other. It is time to put an end to this controversy....."

This statement could perhaps be read as implying that the Court was willing to concede to a company itself the right to challenge under Art. 19 the governmental action affecting its rights rather than adopting the fiction of a shareholder filing the writ petition.[68] But nothing seems to have happened since then and the old practice continues still.

To avoid confusion, the better thing to do may be to add an explanation to Art. 19 saying that the term 'citizen' will include a company registered in India and having a majority of the Indian shareholders.

A writ petition can be filed by a firm for enforcement of a Fundamental Right available to a citizen. Unlike a corporation which has a legal identity of its own separate from the shareholders, a firm stands for all the partners collectively and, therefore, the petition is deemed to have been filed by all the partners who are citizens of India.[69]

A municipal committee is not regarded as a citizen within the meaning of Art. 19.[70]

68. In Divisional Forest Officer v. Bishwanath Tea Co. Ltd., AIR 1982 SC 1368 : (1981) 3 SCC 238, the company was the sole petitioner. The Supreme Court ruled that a company cannot complain of breach of a Fundamental Right under Art. 19(1)(g).

69. A.I. Works v. Chief Controller of Imports, AIR 1973 SC 1539 : (1974) 2 SCC 348.

70. Amritsar Municipality v. State of Punjab, AIR 1969 AC 1100.

CHAPTER XIX

ELECTIONS

SYNOPSIS

A. INTRODUCTORY

The Preamble to the Constitution declares India to be a Democratic Republic. Democracy is the basic feature of the Indian Constitution.[1]

Democracy is sustained by free and fair elections. Only free and fair elections to the various legislative bodies in the country can guarantee the growth of a democratic polity. It is the cherished privilege of a citizen to participate in the electoral processes which place persons in the seats of power.

India has been characterised as the biggest democracy in the world because of the colossal nature of the elections held in the country. At a general election, an electorate of millions goes to the polls to elect members for the Lok Sabha,[2] State Legislative Assemblies,[3] and the Legislatures of the Union Territories.[4] Free and fair election has been held to be a basic feature of the Constitution.[5]

B. FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF ELECTIONS

A few fundamental principles underlie elections to the Lok Sabha and the State Legislative Assemblies. These principles are stated as follows:

---

1. Supra, Ch. I, Sec. E.
Also see, infra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. A.
2. Supra, Ch. II.
3. Supra, Ch. VI.
4. Supra, Ch. IX.
5. For discussion on this Doctrine, see, infra, Ch. XLI.

(1) There is one general electoral roll for every territorial constituency [Art. 325].

The Constitution abolishes separate electorates and communal representation which divided the Indian people and retarded the growth of Indian nationalism in the pre-Constitution era.

(2) No person is ineligible for inclusion in the electoral roll on the grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex or any of them [Art. 325].

Equality has thus been accorded to each citizen in the matter of franchise and the electoral roll is prepared on a secular basis.[6]

(3) No person can claim to be included in any special electoral roll for any constituency on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex or any of them [Art. 325].

The principle underlying this provision is further fortified by Art. 15 which bans discrimination against any citizen on grounds of religion, sex, etc. in political as well as other Rights.[7]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that Art. 325 is of crucial significance insofar as it seeks to promote the secular character of the Constitution by outlawing any claim to vote, or denial to vote, on the ground of religion. Secularism is a basic feature of the Constitution.[8]

(4) Elections are held on the basis of adult suffrage, that is to say, every person who is (i) a citizen of India, (ii) not less than 18 years of age on a date prescribed by the Legislature, and (iii) not otherwise disqualified under the Constitution, or any law made by the Legislature, on the ground of non-residence, unsoundness of mind, crime, corrupt or illegal practice, is entitled to be registered as a voter at any such election [Art. 326][9].

Under this constitutional provision, Parliament has laid down a few conditions which a person has to fulfil to be enrolled as a voter, such as, a person is disqualified for registration in the electoral roll of a constituency for Assembly or the Lok Sabha if—(i) he is not a citizen of India, or (ii) has been declared to be of unsound mind by a competent court. or (iii) is disqualified from voting under a law relating to corrupt and illegal practices and other offences in connection with elections.

It is clear from these provisions that only a citizen of India can be enrolled as a voter. When the name of a person is to be entered in the electoral roll, he may be required to satisfy the Electoral Registration that he is a citizen of India. But, if the name of a person has already been entered in the electoral roll, his name cannot be removed from the roll on the ground that he is not a citizen of India unless the concerned officer has given him a reasonable opportunity of being heard according to the principles of natural justice.[10]

---

6. V.V. Giri v. D.S. Dora, AIR 1959 SC 1318 : (1960) 1 SCR 426. Also see, Art. 14, infra, Ch. XXI.
7. For discussion on Art. 15, see, infra, Ch. XXII.
8. For discussion on the concept of secularism see, infra, Ch. XXIX, Sec. A; Ch. XIII, Sec. E(b), supra.
9. Also see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. D; Ch. VI, Sec. B(iii).
10. Lal Babu Hussein v. Electoral Registration Officer, AIR 1995 SC 1189, 1194 : (1995) 3 SCC 100.

No person is entitled to be registered in the electoral roll for more than one constituency, or of any constituency more than once. Further, any person convicted of any of the specified offences punishable with imprisonment, or who upon the trial of an election petition is found guilty of any corrupt practice, is disqualified for voting at any election for 6 years. This qualification may, however, be removed by the Election Commission for reasons to be recorded by it in writing. Subject to these conditions, every citizen of India, who is not less than 18 years of age, and is ordinarily resident in a constituency, is entitled to be registered in the electoral roll for that constituency.

(5) No reservation of seats has been made in any House for any community, section, or religious group of the Indian population except for the Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and Anglo-Indians.[11]

C. NATURE OF THE RIGHT TO VOTE OR CONTEST AN ELECTION

In Ponnuswami,[12] the Supreme Court has declared:

> "The right to vote or stand as a candidate for election is not a civil right but is a creature of statute or special law and must be subject to the limitations imposed by it."

In Jamuna Prasad Mukhariya v. Lachhi Ram[13], the Supreme Court has observed:

> "…..The right to stand as a candidate and contest an election is not a common law right. It is a special right created by statute and can only be exercised on the conditions laid down by the statute. The Fundamental Rights Chapter has no bearing on a right like this created by statute….."

Again, in Jyoti Basu v. Debi Ghosal[14], the Supreme Court has observed:

> "A right to elect, fundamental though it is to democracy, is, anomalously enough, neither a Fundamental right nor a common law right. It is pure and simple, a statutory right. So is the right to be elected. So is the right to dispute an election. Outside of statute, there is no right to elect, creations they are, and therefore, subject to statutory limitation".

The Supreme Court has observed in Nalla Thampy:[15]

> "Outside of statute, there is no right to elect, no right to be elected. Statutory creations they are, and, therefore, subject to statutory limitations".

S. 62(5) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, debars a person from voting at an election if he is confined in a prison under a sentence of imprisonment, or is in the lawful police custody, but not if he is in preventive detention. In Anukul Chandra Pradhan v. Union of India,[16] the Supreme Court upheld the va-

---

11. See under 'Safeguards to the Minorities,' infra, Ch. XXXV.
12. N.P. Ponnuswami v. Returning Officer, Namakkal Constituency, AIR 1952 SC 64 at 71 : 1952 SCR 218.
13. AIR 1954 SC 686 at 688 : (1955) 1 SCR 608.
14. AIR 1982 SC 983, at 986 : (1982) 1 SCC 691.
15. P. Nalla Thampy Thera v. B.L. Shankar, AIR 1984 SC 135 : 1984 Supp SCC 631.
16. AIR 1997 SC 2814 : (1997) 6 SCC 1.

lidity of the provision on two grounds. First, it was not hit by Art. 14.[17] Secondly, the Court ruled:[18]

> "….. the right to vote is subject to the limitations imposed by the statute which can be exercised only in the manner provided by the statute; and that the challenge to any provision in the statute prescribing the nature of right to elect cannot be made with reference to a Fundamental Right in the Constitution. The very basis of challenge to the validity of sub-sec. (5) of Section 62 of the Act is, therefore, not available and this petition must fail."

This author begs to differ from some of the assertions made by the Supreme Court in the above observations. It appears to the author that the Supreme Court has not given due regard to the provisions of Arts. 325 and 326. It may be true to say that the right to vote is neither a common law right nor a Fundamental Right. But it is also not purely a statutory right but much more substantive than that. The right to vote is not the gift of the Legislature but flows from the Constitution. In the first place, free and fair election has been declared to be a basic feature of the Constitution which means that no statute can completely negate the right to vote.[19]

Secondly, under Art. 326, the right to vote is a constitutional right. A person who has reached the age of 18 is "entitled" to vote. A person may be disqualified to vote by a statute but only on such grounds as "non-residence, unsoundness of mind, crime or corrupt or illegal practice." No statute can disqualify a voter on any other ground. Under Art. 325, no voter can be debarred from voting "on grounds only of religion, race, caste or sex". Further this means that, any statute passed by a legislature to regulate the right to vote has to fall within the parameters set out by Arts. 325 and 326. Any law infringing these parameters will be void. Therefore, the right to vote is not purely a gift of a statute. The right to vote has also a constitutional basis. Suppose, for the sake of argument, through a Constitutional amendment, Parliament is made a nominated, instead of an elected body. Will not such an amendment be held unconstitutional as it seeks to nullify two basic structures of the Constitution, viz., democracy and free and fair elections—the two crucial Constitutional values.

In the third place, it is difficult to appreciate as to why the electoral law should be immune from being challenged under Fundamental Rights. A law may make discriminatory provisions. Can such a law be held immune from a challenge under Art. 14? The law of elections cannot be left completely to the sweet will of the legislature. It is necessary to ensure that the legislature does not make irrational or unreasonable provisions to curtail the right to vote as "free and fair election" and 'democracy' are the basic features of the Constitution.[20]

In the fourth place, the right to stand for an election is conferred by Arts. 84(b) and 173(b).[21] The basic qualifications that a person who has reached the age of 25 years can contest for a seat in the Lok Sabha or the State Assembly cannot be taken away by any law. What a statute can do is to lay down qualifications and disqualifications for a candidate [Arts. 102(e) and 190(e)], and also make procedural provisions regarding filing of nomination paper, etc. But no statute can

---

17. For discussion on Art. 14, see, Chapter XXI.
18. AIR 1997 SC 2814 at 2817 : (1997) 6 SCC 1.
19. See, Ch. XLI, infra.
20. For discussion on the Doctrine of 'Basic Features of the Constitution", see, infra, Ch. XLI.
21. See, supra, Chs. III and VI.

completely negate or tamper with the right conferred by Arts. 84 and 173 to contest an election for Lok Sabha or a State Legislative Assembly.

In the fifth place, the right to challenge an election through an election petition is conferred by Art. 329(b) and is, thus, a constitutional right. What remains for the legislature to do is to prescribe the forum and the procedure for deciding the election petitions. No legislature can refuse to set up any machinery for deciding election petitions.

Finally, while it may be correct to say that voting or contesting for an election is not a Fundamental Right, it does not necessarily follow therefrom that an election law is immune from being challenged vis-à-vis a Fundamental Right. There is no valid reason why such a law be treated outside the parameter of Art. 13(2).[22]

Right to vote being a constitutional right, what happens if a legislature imposes an unreasonable and irrational condition thereon? Suppose a legislature were to enact a law debarring handicapped persons from voting or contesting an election, or a law were to debar women from contesting elections, then can it be said that such a law is non-challengeable under Art. 14 as such a law cannot be challenged under Art. 325? It is thus clear that the right to vote and to contest an election are not purely statutory rights and do not depend solely on the sweet will of the Legislature. These Rights have a constitutional base as well and are subject to constitutional provisions as mentioned above.

D. ELECTION COMMISSION

In order to ensure free, fair and impartial elections, the Constitution establishes the Election Commission, a body autonomous in character and insulated from political pressures or executive influence. Care has been taken to ensure that the Commission functions as an independent agency free from external pressures from the party in power, or the executive of the day.

The Commission is set up as a permanent body under Art. 324(1). It is an all-India body having jurisdiction over elections to Parliament, State Legislatures, offices of the President and Vice-President.[23]

The reason for having an all-India body to supervise and conduct elections, rather than separate bodies to organise elections in each State, is that some States have a mixed population, as there are the native people as well as others who are racially, linguistically or culturally different from the native people. A State Government could discriminate against outsiders by so managing things as to exclude them from the electoral rolls and thus deprive them of their franchise which is the most basic right in democracy. In order to prevent injustice being done to any section of the people, it was thought best to have one central body which would be free from local influences and have control over the entire election machinery in the country.[24]

According to Art. 324(1), "the superintendence, direction and control of the preparation of the electoral rolls for, and the conduct of, all elections to Parliament and to the Legislature of every State and of elections to the offices of President and Vice-President held under this Constitution"—have been vested in the Election Commission.

22. See, next Chapter.
23. Supra, Chs. II, III, VI.
24. See DR. AMBEDKAR'S speech, VIII CAD, 905-7.

The Election Commission consists of the Chief Election Commissioner [CEC] and such number of Election Commissioners [ECs], if any, as the President may fix from time to time [Art. 324(2)]. All these Commissioners are appointed by the President subject to the provisions of any law enacted by Parliament for the purpose [Art. 325(2)].

The Chief Election Commissioner acts as the Chairman of the Election Commission in case any other Election Commissioner besides him is appointed [Art. 324(3)].

It is clear from these constitutional provisions that the Election Commission consists of the ECE and the ECs as and when appointed by the President. The office of the CEC is envisaged to be a permanent fixure, but that cannot be said for the ECs, as their appointment is optional with the Central Executive. There cannot be an Election Commission without the CEC, but same is not the case with the ECs. Their number can vary from time to time. Art. 324(2) contemplates a statute to define the conditions of service of the CEC and the ECs.

The President may appoint, after consultation with the Election Commission, such Regional Commissioners as the President may consider necessary to assist the Election Commission in the discharge of its functions. The Regional Commissioners may be appointed before each general election to the Lok Sabha and the State Legislative Assemblies, and also before the biennial election to the State Legislative Councils [Art. 324(4)].

As the Regional Commissioners [RCs] are appointed by the President in consultation with the Commission to assist it to perform its functions, the ECs are placed on a higher pedestal than the RCs. While the ECs are members of the Election Commission, the RCs are not its members.

The President may make rules to determine the conditions of service and tenure of office of the Election Commissioners and the Regional Commissioners. This, however, is subject to any law made by Parliament [Art. 324(5)].

The tenure of the Chief Election Commissioner is independent of the executive discretion, for he cannot be removed from his office except in the like manner and on the like grounds as a Judge of the Supreme Court [Proviso to Art. 324(5)].[25] Further, the conditions of service of the Chief Election Commissioner cannot be varied to his disadvantage after his appointment [Proviso to Art. 324(5)]. No such safeguard is provided to the ECs.

These provisions of the Constitution thus concede a security of tenure to the Chief Election Commissioner similar to a Judge of the Supreme Court. He can, therefore, discharge his functions without fear, favour or pressure from the executive or the party in power. The tenure of other Election Commissioners and the Regional Commissioners is also free of the executive control in so far as none of them can be removed from office except on the recommendation of the Chief Election Commissioner [Proviso to Art. 324(5)].

---

25. See, Ch. IV, supra.

An obligation has been placed on the Central as well as the State Governments to make available to the Election Commission, or to a Regional Commissioner, when requested by the Election Commission, such staff as may be necessary for the Election Commission to discharge its functions [Art. 324(6)].

As elections are held at intervals, therefore, the Election Commission does not employ a large staff on permanent basis. Accordingly, the Election Commission has been given the power to requisition staff as and when it needs from the Central and State Governments.

Art. 324(6) refers to such staff only as falls under the disciplinary control of these governments. Therefore, on a request of the Election Commission, the services of such government servants as are appointed to public services and posts under the Central and State Governments are to be made available for election purposes. This means that the services of the employees of the State Bank of India, which is a statutory body, cannot be requisitioned for election purposes.[26]

(a) COMMISSION—A MULTI-MEMBER BODY

In S.S. Dhanoa v. Union of India[27], the Supreme Court has laid down an important proposition regarding the composition of the Election Commission.

Until 1989, the Election Commission consisted of only the Chief Election Commissioner. In 1989, the Central Government changed tracks and sought to appoint Election Commissioners. The underlying purpose of this move seems to be to curb the powers of the CEC who was single handedly exercising the powers of the Election Commission. In 1989, by a notification issued under Art. 324(2), the number of Election Commissioners (besides the Chief Election Commissioner) was fixed at two. By another notification, the President appointed the petitioner and one other person as Election Commissioners as such. The rules made by the President under Art. 324(5) fixed the tenure of these Commissioners at 5 years, or until reaching the age of 65 years, whichever was earlier.

Hitherto, the Election Commission had consisted of only one member, viz., the Chief Election Commissioner. With the addition of two more members, the smooth working of the Commission was adversely affected. Accordingly, on 1st January, 1990, the President issued two notifications under Art. 324(2) rescinding the 1989 notifications creating the two posts of Election Commissioners and appointing two persons to these posts. In this way, from 1990, the Election Commission again reverted to a one-man body. The question arose whether these notifications were constitutionally valid.

The Apex Court did however observe that when an institution like the Election Commission is entrusted with vital functions and is armed with exclusive and uncontrolled powers to execute them, it is both necessary and desirable that the powers are not exercised by one individual, however wise he may be. "It ill-conforms to the tenets of democratic rule." When vast powers are exercised by an institution which is accountable to none, it is politic to entrust its affairs to more hands than one. It helps to assure judiciousness and want of arbitrariness.

---

26. Election Commission of India v. State Bank of India, Staff Assn., AIR 1995 SC 1078 : 1995 Supp (2) SCC 13.
27. AIR 1991 SC 1745 : (1991) 3 SCC 567.

After an analysis of the provisions of Art. 324, and review of the debates held in the Constituent Assembly on the matter at issue, the Court laid down the proposition that under Art. 324(1), the status of Election Commissioners is not pari passu with that of the Chief Election Commissioner. The Chief Election Commissioner has been given protection in that his conditions of service cannot be varied to his disadvantage after his appointment, and he cannot be removed from his office except in like manner and on like grounds as a Judge of the Supreme Court. These protections are not available to the Election Commissioners. Their conditions of service can be varied even to their disadvantage after their appointment and they can be removed on the recommendation of the Chief Election Commissioner. These provisions indicate that the Chief Election Commissioner is not primus inter partes, i.e., first among the equals, but is intended to be placed in a distinctly higher position than the Election Commissioners.

In this context, the Court held both the 1990 notifications as valid. Art. 324(2) leaves it to the President to fix and appoint such number of Election Commissioners as he may from time to time determine. The power to create the posts is unfettered. So also is the power to reduce or abolish them. If the President decided to abolish both the posts of the Election Commissioners either because there was no work for them, or that the Election Commission could not function, there could be nothing wrong with it. The Court stated:

> "The power to create the posts is unfettered. So also is the power to reduce or abolish them."

In the instant case, there was the case not of premature termination of service, but that of abolition of posts and termination of service was a consequence thereof.

From the tenor of the Dhanoa decision, it is clear that the Supreme Court has shown preference for a multi-member Election Commission rather than a single member body. The Court has also suggested that rules be made to lay down the procedure to transact the business of the Commission. The Election Commission is not merely an advisory body but an executive body as well.

Parliament has enacted the Chief Election Commissioner and other Election Commissioners (Conditions of Service) Act, 1991. The Act has been amended in 1993. The main feature of the Act is to lay down that the tenure of the CEC and the ECs is for six years subject to the retiring age of 65 years. This means that if they attain the age of 65 years before completing their tenure of six years, they would have to vacate the office. Each of them receives salary equal to that of a Judge of the Supreme Court.

The Act provides that all business of the Election Commission "shall, as far as possible, be transacted unanimously", but, in case of difference of opinion between the CEC and the other ECs, the matter "shall be decided according to the opinion of the majority". Further, it is provided that the Election Commission may, "by unanimous decision, regulate the procedure for transaction of the business as also allocation of the business amongst the CEC and other ECs".

The Act thus places the CEC and the ECs on par in matters of tenure, salaries, etc. However, the position of the CEC does differ from that of the ECs in two respects:

(1) According to the proviso to Art. 324(4), the CEC is not to be removed from his office except in like manner and on the like grounds as a Supreme Court Judge.

(2) The conditions of service of the CEC are not to be varied to his disadvantage after his appointment.

These two limitations on the power of Parliament are designed to protect the independence of the CEC from political and executive interference.

On the other hand, an EC [proviso to Art. 324(5)], is not to be removed from office except on the recommendation of the CEC. This provision also ensures the independence of the ECs. As the Supreme Court has observed in T.N. Seshan v. Union of India,[28] "the recommendation for removal must be based on intelligible, and cogent considerations which would have relation to efficient functioning of the Election Commission." This is so because the power is conferred on the CEC to ensure the independence of the ECs from political and executive bosses of the day. This is to ensure the independence of not only these functionaries but the Election Commission as a body.

Having insulated the CEC from external political and executive pressures, confidence was reposed in this independent functionary to safeguard the independence of his ECs by enjoining that they cannot be removed except on the CEC's recommendation. They have been placed under the protective umbrella of the independent CEC. If, therefore, the CEC were to exercise his power "as per his whim and caprice", he would become an instrument of oppression and this would destroy the independence of the Election Commission if the ECs "are required to function under the threat of the CEC recommending their removal". "It is, therefore, needless to emphasize that the CEC must exercise this power only when there exist valid reasons which are conducive to efficient functioning of the Election Commission.[29]

In 1993, the Central Government again decided to convert the Election Commission into a multi-member body. Accordingly, two notifications were issued on 1/10/93. According to one, the number of ECs was fixed at two. According to the other, two persons were appointed as the ECs. Thereupon, the incumbent CEC, T.N. Seshan, challenged the notifications as well as the changes made in the above-mentioned Act in 1993 as unconstitutional. The gist of his argument was that either there should not be a multi-member Election Commission, or that he as the CEC should have the sole decision-making power and that the other ECs should act merely as advisers. The CEC claimed that he was the sole repository of all power exercisable by the Commission falling within the scope of his activity.

In T.N. Seshan v. Union of India,[30] the Supreme Court rejected the arguments of the CEC and upheld the appointment of the ECs as well as of the provision in the Act requiring a unanimous decision, failing which a majority decision by the Commission on all matters coming before it.

The Court has maintained that the scheme of Art. 324 clearly envisages a multi-member body comprising the CEC and ECs. "The concept of plurality is

28. (1995) 4 SCC 611 at 625 : (1995) 5 JT 337.
29. Ibid.
30. Supra, footnote, 28.

writ large on the face of Art. 324(2)" which "clearly envisages a multi-member Election Commission comprising the CEC and one or more ECs". The Court has argued that if a multi-member body was not envisaged by the Constitution, then where was the need for providing in Art. 324(3) for the CEC to act as its chairman? Therefore, the notifications appointing the two ECs could not be faulted on this ground.

The Court also referred to what was said in Dhanoa emphasizing upon the desirability of having a multi-member body instead of leaving all power in the hands of a single person, viz., the CEC who was accountable to none.

The Court has also rejected the argument of the CEC that a multi-member body would be unworkable. The Constitution-makers felt the need to provide for a multi-member body. To accept the argument that a multi-member body is unworkable would tantamount to destroying or nullifying Arts. 324(2) and (3). On this point, the Court has observed:[31]

> "We cannot overlook the fact that when the Constitution-makers provided for a multi-member Election Commission they were not oblivious of the fact that there may not be agreement on all points, but they must have expected such high-ranking functionaries to resolve their differences in a dignified manner. It is the constitutional duty of all those who are required to carry out certain constitutional functions to ensure the smooth functioning of the machinery without the clash of egos."

The Court has also rejected the argument that the CEC ought to have the sole decision-making power. The Court has pointed out that under Art. 324(3), the CEC acts as the Chairman of the multi-member body. As such, he presides over the meetings of the Commission. This does not mean that he has the sole decision-making power and the other ECs are merely advisers. It is the common practice of multi-member bodies to reach their decisions either unanimously or by majority vote. This is what is sought to be laid down in the Act mentioned above. To concede the final word to the CEC on all matters would render the ECs to the status of mere advisers and this does not emerge from the scheme of Art. 324.

The Election Commission is now a multi-member body having one CEC and 2 CEs. There are however several differences between the CEC, on the one hand, and the CEs, on the other. First, the CEC is the Chairman of the Commission. Two, he cannot be removed from office except in the same manner and on the same grounds as a Supreme Court Judge. Three, his conditions of service cannot be varied to his disadvantage. Four, the Election Commission cannot exist without the CEC while it is not compulsory to have ECs.

An EC, on the other hand, cannot be removed except on the recommendation of the CEC, and the terms and conditions of his service can be changed to his disadvantage during his term unlike the CEC. Thus, while the Constitution protects the independence of the CEC, it leaves it to him to protect the independence of the ECs and, thus, of the entire Commission. In all other matters, because of the Act, mentioned above, the ECs and the CEC stand pari passu, and some constitutional differentiation between the CEC and the ECs does not confer a superior status on the CEC to the ECs.

---

31. (1995) 4 SCC 611 at 627 : (1995) 5 JT 337.

The reason for the constitutional differentiation between the positions of the CEC and the ECs is that while the constitution-makers wanted to institute a permanent Election Commission, they took the view that it was not necessary to have a large body all the time because elections would be held once in five years. The membership of the Commission could be increased by adding the CEs when the volume of work increased at the election time. Thus, the constitution-makers envisaged only the CEC, and not the CEs, as permanent incumbents. Things have changed now. Elections have now become a continuous feature of the Indian Polity, and, therefore, a multi-member body has become a necessity.

The Supreme Court has however clarified that only because the procedure and grounds for the removal of the CEC are the same as for a Supreme Court Judge, it does not equate the CEC to a Supreme Court Judge.[32]

It is suggested that since a multi-member Election Commission has now become the order of the day, it seems to be necessary to amend Art. 324 as regards the composition of the Commission. Provision should be made for the appointment of a three member body, all members ranking pari passu, the Chief Election Commissioner being designated as the Chairman of the body. In all other respects, all the members should enjoy the same status.

As stated above, the Supreme Court in Dhanoa has laid emphasis on the Election Commission being a multi-member, rather than a single member, body. The reasons is simple: it is safer to entrust power to a multi-member, rather than a single member, body.

(b) POWERS AND FUNCTIONS OF THE ELECTION COMMISSION

The Election Commission plays a pivotal role in the electoral mechanism of the country. The Election Commission primarily exercises administrative functions but it also has some adjudicative and legislative functions as well.

Art. 324(1) assigns the following functions to the Election Commission:

(1) The superintendence, direction and control of the preparation of the electoral rolls for all elections to Parliament, State Legislatures, offices of the President and Vice-President;

(2) Conduct of all these elections.

The powers of the Commission flow from Art. 324. The superintendence, direction and control of the entire electoral process in the country is vested in the Election Commission. The words "superintendence, direction and control" are of wide amplitude. These words are enough to include all powers necessary for the smooth and effective conduct of elections so that the will of the people may be expressed.[33]

The term 'election' in Art. 324 has been used in a wide sense so as to include the entire process of election which consists of several stages and it embraces many steps, some of which may have an important bearing on the result of the process. However, the general powers of superintendence, direction and control of the elections vested in the Election Commission under Art. 324(1) are subject

---

32. See Seshan, (1995) 4 SCC 611 at 639 : (1995) 5 JT 337.

33. Election Commission of India v. Ashok Kumar, (2000) 8 SCC 216 : AIR 2000 SC 2979; Lalji Shukla v. Election Commission, AIR 2002 All 73.

to any law made either by Parliament under Art. 327, or by the State Legislatures under Art. 328 of the Constitution.[34]

Art. 324(1) is a plenary provision vesting the whole responsibility in the Election Commission for National and State elections. The Constitution contemplates free and fair elections and for this purpose vests responsibilities, directions and control of the conduct of elections in the Election Commission. This responsibility confers powers, duties and functions of many sorts, administrative or others, depending on the circumstances.

The Supreme Court has however cautioned that under Art. 324(1), the Commission does not exercise untrammelled powers otherwise it will become an imperium in imperio which no one is under the Indian Constitution. Ultimately, it is for the courts to decide what powers can be read into Art. 324(1).

If the law makes no provision to meet a situation, Art. 324 enables the Commission to act to push forward a free and fair election with expedition. Art. 324 makes comprehensive provision to take care of surprise situations. The Commission can order a re-poll for the whole constituency under compulsion of circumstances. Art. 324 confers on the Election Commission necessary powers to conduct the elections including the power to countermand the poll in a constituency and ordering a fresh poll therein because of hooliganism and breakdown of law and order at the time of polling or counting of votes. The Commission is subject to Rule of Law; it must act bona fide and be amenable to the norms of natural justice in so far as enforcement of such canons can reasonably and realistically be required of it as fair-play-in-action in the most important area of constitutional law, viz., election.

The Supreme Court has ruled in Mohinder Singh v. Chief Election Commissioner[35] that the Commission should exercise its power of cancelling a poll according to the principles of natural justice.

The Election Commission has power to review its decision as to the expediency of holding the poll on a particular date.[36]

The Supreme Court has ruled in Digvijay Mote v. Union of India,[37] that the conduct of election is in the hands of the Election Commission which has the power of superintendence, direction and control of elections vested in it as per Art. 324 of the Constitution. Consequently, if the Election Commission is of the opinion that having regard to the disturbed conditions in a State, or a part thereof, free and fair elections cannot be held, it may postpone the same. However, this power is not uncontrolled. It is subject to judicial review as it is a statutory body exercising its functions affecting public law Rights. The judicial review will depend on the facts and circumstances of each case. The Court emphasized that the power conferred on the Election Commission by Art. 324 has to be exercised not mindlessly nor mala fide nor arbitrarily nor with partiality but in keeping with the

---

34. See, infra, Sec. E.
35. AIR 1978 SC 851 : (1978) 1 SCC 405.
36. Mohd. Yunus Saleem v. Shiv Kumar Shastri, AIR 1974 SC 1218 : (1974) 4 SCC 854.
Also, Election Commission v. State of Haryana, AIR 1984 SC 1406 : 1984 Supp SCC 104.
37. (1993) 4 SCC 175.
Also, Election Commission v. State Bank of India, AIR 1995 SC 1078 : 1995 Supp (2) SCC 13.

guidelines of the Rule of Law and not stultifying the presidential notification nor existing legislation.

The Election Commission issued an order limiting the hours for using loud-speakers for electioneering purposes between 8 A.M. to 7 P.M. The order was made to avoid noise pollution and disturbance of peace and tranquility of the public in general. The order was challenged by a political party through a writ petition in the High Court. The High Court took the view that there was no nexus between the restrictions imposed and the power under Art. 324.

The Election Commission appealed to the Supreme Court. The Court without deciding the question whether the Commission has any such power to make such an order under Art. 324(1) in view of the pendency of the writ petition in the High Court, set aside the interim order passed by the High Court because "the prima facie position and the balance of inconvenience seem to be in favour of the aspect of public good in a matter which cannot be said to be unrelated to the area of the powers of the Election Commission under Art. 324". But, then, "granting prima facie, the existence of the power of the Election Commission", the Court held the impugned order too restrictive and, accordingly, banned the use of the loud-speakers during 10 P.M. and 6 A.M. and modified the order issued by the Election Commission accordingly.[38]

In May, 1982, during the elections for the Kerala State Legislative Assembly, electronic voting system was introduced at some polling booths in one constituency. This was done under the directions of the Election Commission issued under Art. 324. After the completion of the election, the validity of the electronic voting system was challenged through an election petition. In Jose[39], the Supreme Court setting aside the election of the successful candidate, ordered re-poll in such polling booths where the machines had been used.

The Court ruled that the order of the Commission directing the casting of ballots by machines was without jurisdiction. The Election Commission could not change the voting system as this matter fell within the domain of Parliament. The Court interpreted the word 'ballot' used in the Representation of the People Act as not including the casting of votes by any mechanical process. The Court construed Art. 324 as conferring only executive, but not legislative, powers on the Election Commission. Legislative powers in respect of elections to Parliament and the State Legislatures vest in Parliament and no other body and the Election Commission would come into picture only if no provision has been made by Parliament in regard to these elections.

The Court disagreed with the contention that the Constitution gives complete power to the Commission under Art. 324 for the conduct of elections. The Constitution could never have intended to make the Commission as an apex body in respect of matters relating to the elections and conferring on it legislative powers ignoring Parliament altogether. The Supreme Court laid down the following propositions as regards the power of the Commission under Art. 324:

(1) When there is no law or rule made under the law, the Commission may pass any order in respect of the conduct of elections.

---

38. Election Commission of India v. All India Anna Dravida Munetra Kazahagam, 1994 Supp (2) SCC 689.

39. A.C. Jose v. Sivan Pillai, AIR 1984 SC 921 : (1984) 2 SCC 656.

(2) When there is an Act and rules made thereunder, it is not open to the Commission to override the same and pass orders in direct disobedience to the mandate contained in the rules or the Act.

This means that the powers of the Commission are meant to supplement, rather than supplant, the law and the rules in the matter of superintendence, direction and control provided by Art. 324.

(3) Where the law or the rules are silent, the Commission no doubt has plenary powers under Art. 324 to give any direction in respect of the conduct of elections.

(4) In the absence of any specific provision to meet a contingency, the Election Commission can invoke its plenary power under Art. 324.[40]

But when the Commission submits a particular direction to the Government for approval (as required by the rules), it is not open to the Commission to go ahead with the implementation of that direction at "its own sweet will", even though government approval is not given.

Rule 5(1) of the Rules made by the Central Government under the Representation of the People Act, 1951 (RPA), empowers the Election Commission to specify the symbols which candidates for election may specify. Other rules make provisions for allotment of symbols to the candidates. The Election Commission has issued the Symbols Order, 1968, under Art. 324 read with these Rules. The validity of this order has been challenged from time to time on the ground inter alia that the Order being legislative in character is ultra vires the Commission because the Commission has executive, but not legislative power under Art. 324. The Supreme Court has always upheld the validity of the Order.[41]

The Court has explained that in India, allotment of symbols to the candidates becomes necessary so that an illiterate voter may identify the candidate of his choice and cast his vote in his favour. The Symbols Order makes provisions for the reservation, choice and allotment of symbols and the recognition of political parties in connection therewith. The power to allot symbols has been conferred on the Election Commission by the Rules made under the RP Act. The power to issue the Symbols Order is comprehended within the power of "superintendence, direction and control' of elections vested in the Election Commission.

The Court has upheld the Order without characterising it as 'legislative' but treating it as "a compendium of directions in the shape of general provisions to meet the various kinds of situations appertaining to elections with particular reference to symbols", and the Election Commission has power to make such an order in its own right under Art. 324. The Supreme Court has observed in APHLC:[42] "The power to make these directions 'whether it is a legislative activity or not', flows from Art. 324, as well as from Rules 5 and 10".

The Court has reiterated in Roop Lal Sathi v. Nachhattar Singh,[43] that the Symbols Order is "in the nature of general directions issued by the Election

---

40. N. Krishnappa v. Chief Election Commissioner, AIR 1995 AP 212.
41. Sadiq Ali v. Election Comm., AIR 1972 SC 187 : (1972) 4 SCC 664; APHLC Shillong v. M.A. Sangma, AIR 1977 SC 2155 : (1977) 4 SCC 161; Kanhaiya Lal Omar v. R.K. Trivedi, AIR 1986 SC 111 : (1985) 4 SCC 628; Jagannath Mohanta v. Election Commission of India, AIR 2000 Ori 44; Krishna Mohan Sharma v. Jai Bhadra Singh, AIR 2001 All 175.
42. APHLC, supra, footnote 41, at 2164.
43. AIR 1982 SC 1559 : (1982) 3 SCC 487.

Commission to regulate the mode of allotment of symbols to the contesting candidates." But the Supreme Court giving a wider scope to Art. 324 has observed in Kanhaiya Lal:[44]

> " Even if for any reason, it is held that any of the provisions contained in the Symbols Order are not traceable to the Act or the Rules, the power of the Commission under Art. 324(1) of the Constitution which is plenary in character can compass all such provisions. Art. 324 of the Constitution operates in areas left unoccupied by legislation and the words 'superintendence', 'direction' and 'control' as well as 'conduct of all elections' are the broadest terms which would include the power to make all such provisions".

The Court has also stated further—

> "Any part of the Symbols Order which cannot be traced to Rules 5 and 10 of the Rules can easily be traced in this case to the reservoir of power under Art. 324(1) which empowers the Commission to issue all directions necessary for the purpose of conducting smooth, free and fair elections".

The Court has emphasized that "the source of power in this case is the Constitution, the highest law of the land, which is the repository and source of all legal powers and any power granted by the Constitution for a specific purpose should be construed liberally so that the object for which it is granted is effectively achieved".

The tenor of these cases is that the Election Commission has power under Art. 324(1) to issue directions with respect to such matters pertaining to elections as are not covered by any law. In Administrative Law, 'directions' are regarded as "administrative" and not "legislative" in nature.[45]

In Mohinder Singh Gill v. Chief Election Commissioner,[46] the Supreme Court has lucidly explained the scope of Art. 324. This is a plenary provision vesting the whole responsibility for national and state elections and, therefore, the necessary powers to discharge that function. Art. 324 has however to be read in the light of the constitutional scheme and the Representation of the People Acts, 1950 and 1951.

If competent legislation is enacted, as visualized by Art. 327, the Commission is bound by it. The Commission must act in conformity with, not in violation of the enacted law concerning elections. The Supreme Court has emphasized that no one is an imperium in imperio in our constitutional order. The Commission cannot claim to exercise any power under Art. 324 which may be in conflict with the enacted law. When, however, any situation arises for which the law does not provide for, the Commission can exercise power under Art. 324. In the words of the Court:

> "Art. 324, in our view, operates in areas left unoccupied by legislation and the words "superintendence, direction and control' as well as 'conduct of all elections', are the broadest terms".

Thus, when law is silent, "Art. 324 is a reservoir of power to act for the avowed purpose of, not divorced from, pushing forward a free and fair election with expedition.

---

44. Supra, footnote 41, at 118.
45. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, Vol. I, Ch. VIII.
46. (1978) 1 SCC 405. : AIR 1978 SC 851

In Common Cause—A Registered Society v. Union of India,[47] the question about the election expenses incurred by political parties, it was argued that elections in India are fought with money power and so the people should know the sources of the expenditure incurred by the political parties and the candidates in the process of election. The court ruled that purity of election is fundamental to democracy and the commission can ask the candidates about the expenditure incurred by the candidates and by a political party for this purpose. In a democracy where rule of law prevails "this type of naked display of black money, by violating the mandatory provisions of law, cannot be permitted." The court, therefore, ruled that under Art. 324, the commission can issue suitable directions to maintain the purity of election and to bring transparency in the process of election. The commission has power to issue directions requiring the political parties to submit to the election commission, for its scrutiny, the details of the expenditure incurred or authorised by the parties in connection with the election of their respective candidates. The court further observed that "the Constitution has made comprehensive provision under Art. 324 to take care of surprise situations and it operates in areas left unoccupied by legislation."

Finally, in Union of India v. Ass. for Democratic Reforms[48] the Supreme Court directed the election commission to issue certain directions to candidates to file an affidavit detailing information about themselves under certain specific heads. This was done to stop criminalisation of politics.[49] People have a right to know about the candidate for whom they are being urged to vote. The right to know flows from Art. 19(1)(a). When law is silent "Art. 324 is a reservoir of power to act for the avowed purpose of having free and fair elections. The court has further observed in the instant case:[50]

> "The constitution has taken care of leaving scope for exercise of residuary power by the commission in its own right as a creature of the constitution in the infinite variety of situations that may emerge from time to time in a large democracy, as every contingency could not be foreseen or anticipated by the enacted laws or the rules by issuing necessary directions, the commission can fill the vacuum till there is legislation on the subject".

Art. 324 is geared to the accomplishment of free and fair elections expeditiously. However, the Commission needs to exercise its powers with fairness and not arbitrarily. "Unchecked power is alien to our system". The Court has emphasized that the discretion vested in the Commission is to be exercised "properly, not perversely"; "not mindlessly nor mala fide, nor arbitrarily, nor with partiality but in keeping with the guidelines of the Rule of Law and not stultifying the Presidential notification nor existing legislation." The Court has observed further:

> "No body will deny that the Election Commissioner in our democratic scheme is a central figure and a high functionary. Direction vested in him will ordinarily be used wisely, not rashly…."

Howsoever wide the scope of Art. 324 may be, the Election Commission has to exercise its power in accordance with the existing law and not in derogation thereof.

---

47. (1996) 2 SCC 752 : AIR 1996 SC 3081.
48. (2002) 5 SCC 294 : AIR 2002 SC 2112.
Also see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. D(e).
49. See, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C, infra.
50. (2002) 5 SCC 294 at 320 : AIR 2002 SC 2112.

And, ultimately, there are the courts to strike down any misuse of power by the Commission.[51]

Once the election results are declared, the Commission has no jurisdiction with respect to the election. Thereafter, the validity of the election of a candidate can be challenged through an election petition.[52] The Commission itself has no power to decide the legality and validity of an election which is alleged to have been held contrary to any legal provisions. The function of the Commission ends with the declaration of the election resulf.[53]

The Commission also has the function of advising the President or the Governor on the question of disqualification of any member of Parliament [Art. 103(2)],[54] or a member of the State Legislature [Art. 192(2)][55], as the case may be. While the Election Commission itself decides the question of supervening disqualification arising in case of a sitting member of Parliament or of a State Legislature, the power to decide on doubts and disputes arising out of elections as such is not vested in the Election Commission, and arrangements for the same have been made under legislation.[56]

While deciding the question of disqualification of a member of a House of Parliament, or of a State Legislature, the Election Commission functions in a quasi-judicial capacity and, therefore, it has to follow the principles of natural justice. One of these principles is the rule against bias.[57]

While deciding the question of disqualification against Ms. Jayalalitha, a member of the Legislative Assembly of Tamil Nadu, there was suspicion of bias against Shree Seshan who was the CEC and the Chairman of the Election Commission. The lawyer wife of the complainant (Dr. Swamy) was professionally engaged as the counsel in a case filed by Shri Seshan. Therefore, the Supreme Court directed in Election Commission of India v. Subramanian Swamy,[58] that the CEC should recuse himself from participating in the decision in the first instance and let the two Election Commissioners decide the matter. In case they differ, then the CEC should express his opinion on the ground of necessity.[59]

An important function conferred on the Election Commission by law is the removal of disqualification arising out of conviction for a specified offence, for purposes of voting or standing as a candidate at an election. The Election Commission is required to record the reasons in writing while deciding any such matter.[60]

In case of disqualification arising out of commission of a corrupt practice at an election, it is for the President to determine whether such person shall be disqualified

---

51. Kunwar Raghuraj Pratap Singh v. Chief Election Commissioner of India, AIR 1999 All 98.
52. See, infra, Sec. F.
53. Chandan Kumar Sarkar v. Chief Election Commr., AIR 1995 Gau 61.
54. Supra, Ch. II.
55. Supra, Ch. VI.
56. Infra, Sec. F.
57. On Natural Justice and Bias, see, Ch. VIII, Sec. E, supra.
58. AIR 1996 SC 1810 : (1996) 4 SCC 104.
59. For detailed discussion on the concept of bias, see, Jain, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I. Ch. Jain, CASES AND MATERIALS, I, Ch.
60. See Ss. 11 and 11A of the R.P. Act, 1951. Also see, Chs. II and VI, supra.

and for what period. In this situation, the President has to act according to the opinion of the Election Commission.[61]

(c) ELECTION COMMISSION A TRIBUNAL FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES

Under Art. 324, read with the Election Symbols (Reservation and Allotment) Order, 1968, the Election Commission has power to allot symbols for purposes of elections to political parties and to adjudicate upon disputes with regard to recognition of political parties and rival claims to a particular symbol for purposes of elections.

What is the character of the Commission while adjudicating upon the dispute with regard to the recognition of a political party? Is the Election Commission a 'tribunal' under Art. 136 while adjudicating upon such a dispute and can the Supreme Court hear an appeal from the Commission's decision?

In several cases before 1974, the Supreme Court had heard appeals from the Election Commission without however deciding the question whether the Election Commission could be regarded as a 'tribunal' for purposes of Art. 136 in so far as it discharged adjudicatory functions. The Supreme Court had left this question open in these cases.[62] However in A.P.H.L Conference, Shillong, v. W.A. Sangma,[63] the Supreme Court held that the Commission is a tribunal for purposes of Art. 136 while deciding such a controversy. "The power to decide this particular dispute is a part of the State's judicial power and that power is conferred on the Election Commission by Art. 324 of the Constitution as also by R. 5 of the Rules."

Cancellation of an allotted symbol to a political party is a quasi-judicial matter and the affected party must be given a hearing before making any such order.[64]

Similarly, while deciding the question of supervening disqualification of a sitting member of a House of Parliament, or of a State Legislature, the Commission acts in a quasi-judicial capacity.[65]

The Election Commission has various administrative functions, but that does not mean that, while adjudicating a dispute, it does not exercise the judicial power conferred on it by the state. The Commission is created by the Constitution and is invested under the law with not only administrative powers, but also with certain judicial powers however fractional the same may be.

(d) GUJARAT ASSEMBLY ELECTION MATTER[66]

The Gujarat Legislative Assembly was dissolved prematurely, before the expiry of its normal tenure of five years, on 19-7-2002. The last sitting of the dissolved Assembly was held on 3-4-2002. According to Art. 174(1),[67] six months shall not intervene between the last sitting of one session and the date appointed

---

61. S. 8A of the R.P. Act, 1951 as amended by the Election Laws (Amendment) Act, 1975. Also see, Chs. II an VI, supra.

62. Sadiq Ali v. Election Commission, AIR 1972 SC 187 : (1972) 4 SCC 664; Ramashankar Kaushik v. Election Commission, AIR 1974 SC 445 : (1974) 1 SCC 271.

63. AIR 1977 SC 2155 : (1977) 4 SCC 161.

64. Uma Ballav Rath v. Maheshwar Mohanty, AIR 1999 SC 1322 : (1999) 3 SCC 357.

65. See, supra, footnote 58.

66. (2002) 8 SCC 237 : (2002) 8 JT 389.

67. Supra, Ch. VI.

for the first meeting of the next meeting. It was argued that election to the Assembly must take place before 3-10-2002, i.e. within six months of the last sitting of the House. On the other hand, the Election Commission was of the view that since the law and order situation in the state was delicate, election could not be held before 3-10-2002 and it would take a few more months thereafter to hold the election. It was this dichotomy of views which became the subject-matter of the reference to the Supreme Court. The main question involved therein related to the interpretation of Art. 174(1) and Art. 324 and the inter-relation between the two provisions, if any, was the Election Commission bound by Art. 174(1) and was bound to hold election to the Gujarat Assembly before 3-10-2002.

The Presidential reference under Art. 143(1) of the Constitution,[68] was heard by a Bench of five learned Judges and three concurring judgments were delivered. The main propositions which emerged from the several judgments are as follows:

(1) Democracy is a part of the basic structure of the Constitution and free and fair elections at regular prescribed intervals are essential to the democratic system. Holding periodic, free and fair elections by the Election Commission are part of the basic structure of the Constitution.[69]

(2) Art. 174(1) relates to an existing, live and functional Assembly. It regulates the frequencies of sessions of existing Houses. Art. 174(1) is mandatory so far as the time period between two sessions of a living and functional House is concerned. But Art. 174(1) does not relate to a dissolved House. Accordingly, Art. 174(1) does not provide for any period for holding election for constituting fresh legislative Assembly.

Arts. 174 and 324 operate in different fields are not subject to one another.

3. Election Commission is a constitutional body which is an independent and impartial body free from any executive interference. But the powers of the commission are subject to a law made by Parliament or a State Legislature so long as the same does not encroach upon the plenary powers of the Election Commission. The legislative power is subject to the provisions of the constitution.

Conducting of elections is the sole responsibility of the Election Commission. "As a matter of law, the plenary powers of the Election Commission cannot be taken away by law framed by Parliament. If Parliament makes any such law, it would be repugnant to Art. 324."

Thus, Art. 324 "operates in the area left unoccupied by legislation and the words 'superintendence, control, direction' as well as 'conduct of all elections' are the broadest of the terms.'

4. From the various constitutional and statutory provisions, it can be inferred that on premature dissolution of a House, election ought to be held within six months from the date of dissolution of the Assembly.

5. On the premature dissolution of the Assembly, the Election Commission is required to initiate immediate steps for holding election for constituting legisla-

---

68. Supra, Ch. IV.
69. Indira Nehru Gandhi v. Raj Narain, supra; T.N. Seshan v. Union of India, (1995) 5 JT 337 : (1995) 4 SCC 61.

ture assembly on the first occasion and in any case within six months from the date of premature dissolution of the assembly.

Effort should be to hold the election and not to defer holding the election. Only when there is an 'act of God' can the election be postponed beyond six months. But man-made obstructions in the way of elections should be sternly dealt with and should not allowed to defer the election.

6. As regards framing of the schedule for holding the election, the matter lies within the exclusive domain of the Election Commission. This is not subject to any law passed by Parliament.

According to BALAKRISHNAN, J., in a separate concurring opinion, any decision of the Election Commission which is intended to defeat the avowed object of forming an elected Government at the earliest, can be challenged before the Court. If the decision taken by the Commission is perverse, unreasonable or for extraneous reasons and if the decision of the Election Commission is vitiated by any of these grounds, the court can give appropriate direction for the conduct of the election.

The above propositions would apply mutatis mutandis to election to Lok Sabha and Art. 85. The Supreme Court's judgement gives some flexibility to frame the time-table to hold election to a prematurely dissolved house. But the over-all time frame for the purpose is six months from the date of dissolution. The Court has emphasized that free and fair elections are the sine qua non of democracy which is a basic feature of the Constitution.

E. LEGISLATIVE POWER REGARDING ELECTIONS

Several Articles in the Constitution specifically confer legislative power on Parliament with respect to election matters. Thus, Parliament is empowered to determine by law the manner in which, and the authority by which, each State is to be divided into territorial constituencies after each census for purposes of election to the Lok Sabha [Art. 82],[70] and the State Legislative Assembly [Art. 170(3)].[71]

Parliament may by law regulate any matter relating to the election of the President and the Vice-President subject to the Constitution [Art. 71(3)].[72]

In addition to the above, Parliament may make provisions by law, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, with respect to all matters relating to, or in connection with, elections to either House of Parliament or to the State Legislatures including the preparation of electoral rolls, the delimitation of constituencies, and all other matters necessary for securing the due Constitution of the several Houses [Art. 327]. This provision is reinforced by entry 72 in List I[73] with respect to all matters relating to the elections to either House of Parliament, or to the House or either House of the Legislature of a State subject to the provisions of the Constitution.

---

70. Supra, Ch. II.
71. Supra, Ch. VI.
72. Supra, Ch. III.
73. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.

The supreme legislative power in relation to various elections is thus vested in Parliament but this power is subject to the provisions of the Constitution. Further, subject to the constitutional provisions, and in so far as provision has not been made by Parliament with respect to a matter under Art. 328, a State Legislature may make provision by law with respect to all matters in relation to, or in connection with, the elections to either of its Houses including the preparation of electoral rolls and all matters necessary for securing the due Constitution of such House or Houses. This provision is reinforced by entry 37 in List II.[74]

In pursuance of these constitutional provisions, Parliament has enacted several laws. The Delimitation Commission Act, 1952, provides for the appointment of the Delimitation Commission for making adjustment of seats in, and division of States into territorial constituencies for election to Lok Sabha and State Legislative Assemblies after each census.[75] The Commission is appointed by the Central Government and consists of three members—two sitting or retired Judges of the Supreme Court or High Courts, and the Chief Election Commissioner ex-officio. In performance of its duties, the Commission is to be assisted by two to seven associate members for each State drawn from amongst the members of the Lok Sabha representing the State, and the State Legislative Assembly. Every final order of the Commission, after publication in the Gazette of India, becomes final and cannot be called in question in any court.

The Representation of the People Act, 1950, provides for allocation of seats in, and the delimitation of constituencies for the purpose of elections to the Lok Sabha and the State Legislature, the qualifications of voters at such elections, the preparation of electoral rolls, etc.

The Representation of the People Act, 1951, provides for the actual conduct of elections to the Houses of Parliament and to the State Legislatures; the qualifications and disqualifications for membership of those Houses, the corrupt and illegal practices and other election offences and the decision of election disputes. The Act makes detailed provisions in regard to all matters and all stages connected with elections to the various legislatures in the country. The Act is a self-contained enactment so far as elections are concerned, and, therefore, to ascertain the true position in regard to any matter connected with elections, the Act and the rules made thereunder need to be looked into.[76] The Act empowers the Central Government to promulgate rules, after consultation with the Commission, for carrying out the purposes of the Act.

The Presidential and Vice-Presidential Elections Act, 1952, regulates certain matters relating to or connected with elections to the offices of the President and Vice-President of India.[77]

As stated above, the Election Commission has no legislative power, as such, in relation to elections. The Commission can issue directions. In Lakshmi Charan Sen v. A.K.M. Hussain Ujjaman,[78] the Supreme Court has observed that the directions issued by the Election Commission to the electoral officers are binding upon such officers but such directions have no force of law so as to create rights

---

74. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
75. Supra, Chs. II and VI.
76. Ponnuswami N.P. v. Returning Officer, AIR 1952 SC 64; supra, footnote 12.
77. Supra, Ch. III.
78. AIR 1985 SC 1233 : (1985) 4 SCC 689.

and liabilities between the contestants of election. The Court has explained the position as follows: There is no provision in any statute which would justify the proposition that the directions given by the Election Commission have the force of law. Election laws are self-contained codes. One must look to them for identifying the rights and obligations of the parties. In the absence of a statutory provision, the directions issued by the Election Commission cannot be equated with law.

The Election Commission is entitled to act ex debito justitiae, in the sense that, it can take steps or direct that steps be taken over and above those which it is obligated to take under the law. It can, therefore, issue directions to the Chief Electoral Officers. These directions are binding on those officers, but their violation cannot create rights and obligations unknown to the Election law. "We are of the opinion", said the Court, "that the directions issued by the Election Commission, though binding upon the Chief Electoral Officers, cannot be treated as if they are law, the violation of which could result in the invalidation of the election,[79] either generally, or specifically in the case of an individual."

In Kanhaiya Prasad Sinha v. Union of India,[80] the petitioner, a sub-divisional officer, was transferred by the State Government ignoring the direction of the Election Commission. The Patna High Court considering the legal effect of the direction ruled that directions issued by the Election Commission under Art. 324 may be directory or mandatory in nature, but even then they cannot be ignored. The State Government should respect them and implement them. In case the government fails to respect the directions, then the Court may examine the matter and pass appropriate orders.

The Commission has evolved the Model Code of Conduct laying down norms regulating the conduct of political parties, candidates and the various governments during the period of election. But, this code has no legal binding. The code has only moral value although the Commission does point out infractions of the code as and when they occur.

F. ELECTION DISPUTES

Art. 329(a) lays down that notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, the validity of any law relating to the delimitation of constituencies, or the allotment of seats to such constituencies, made or purporting to be made under Article 327 or 328 'shall not be called in question in any court.' This provision thus immunizes the law pertaining to the matters mentioned from being questioned in a court on any ground whatsoever.

The words 'notwithstanding anything in the Constitution', make it clear that this clause overrides everything else in the Constitution. Because of Art. 329(a), the orders made by the Delimitation Commission regarding delimitation of constituencies and published in the official gazette, could not be agitated in a court of law.[81]

Art. 329(b) provides that "notwithstanding anything in the Constitution", no election to either House of Parliament or to a House of a State Legislature "shall be called in question except by an election petition presented to such authority and in

---

79. Ibid., at 1242-1243.
80. AIR 1990 Pat 189.
81. Meghraj Kothari v. Delimitation Commission, AIR 1967 SC 669 : (1967) 1 SCR 400.

such manner as may be provided for by or under any law made by the appropriate legislature."

This means that a suit or a writ petition would not lie to set aside an election.[82] As the Supreme Court observed in Durga Shankar:[83] "The non-obstante clause with which Art. 329 of the Constitution begins…. debars us, as it debars any other court in the land, to entertain a suit or a proceeding calling in question any election to the Parliament or the State Legislature."

The policy underlying Art. 329(b) is that having regard to the important function discharged by the legislature in a democratic country, all disputes arising out of any election should be postponed till the election is over so as not to dislocate the time schedule for completion of the election and all election disputes should be raised only after the election is over. The term "election" used in Art. 329(b) has a broad connotation. The election process starts with the issue of a notification under the Representation of People Act, 1951, upto the declaration of the result. In between, Art. 329(b) bars any interference by the courts.[84]

The Representation of the People Act. 1951, as it stood before 1956, provided for a system of election tribunals to decide upon disputed elections. That Act did not provide for any judicial review of the decisions of the election tribunals. Parliament endeavoured to clothe the decisions of the election tribunals with the character of non-challengeability. Sec. 105 of the said Act enacted: "Every order of the Tribunal made under this Act shall be final and conclusive." The general approach at this time was to keep the courts out of the area of election disputes. This, it was hoped, would result in expeditious decision of election disputes. But things did not turn out as desired. In course of time, the courts succeeded in extending their supervision over the election tribunals.

The landmark case on the interpretation of Art. 329(b) is Ponnuswami[85] which bars 'judicial intervention' with the election process. The appellant filed his nomination paper from a constituency for election to the State Assembly. The returning officer rejected his nomination paper on certain grounds. The question was whether the candidate could challenge the decision of the returning officer through a writ petition under Art. 226.[86] The Supreme Court answered in the negative. Keeping in view the phraseology of Art. 329(b), the Supreme Court declared that the courts were barred from dealing with any matter arising while the elections were in progress, and till an election petition was disposed of by an election tribunal but not thereafter. The courts would not interfere with the process of election, i.e., from the time the notification is issued till the election petition is disposed of. Any irregularity committed during the course of election could be challenged through an election petition after the election was over.[87]

---

82. Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Ahmad, AIR 1955 SC 233 : (1955) 1 SCR 1104; Jagan Nath v. Jaswant, AIR 1954 SC 210 : 1954 SCR 892; Krishna Ballabh Prasad Singh v. Sub-Div. Officer Hilsa, AIR 1985 SC 1746 : (1985) 4 SCC 194.

83. Durga Shankar Mehta v. Raghuraj Singh, AIR 1954 SC 520 : (1955) 1 SCR 267.

84. Election Commission of India v. Ashok Kumar, (2000) 8 SCC 216 : AIR 2000 SC 2979.

85. Supra, footnote 76.

86. For Art. 226, see, Ch. VIII, supra.

87. Also, Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Syed Ahmed Ishaque, AIR 1955 SC 233 : (1955) 1 SCR 1104; S.K. Dhara v. Election Comm. of India, AIR 1973 Cal 184; Mohinder Singh Gill v. The Chief Election Commissioner, AIR 1978 SC 851 : (1978) 1 SCC 405; T.D. Rajalakshmi v. District Election Officer, AIR 1999 Ker 140.

Art. 329(b) is primarily intended to exclude the jurisdiction of all courts in regard to election matters and to lay down the only mode through which an election can be challenged. Any matter which has the effect of vitiating an election should be brought up only at the appropriate stage in an appropriate manner before the election tribunal and should not be brought up at an intermediate stage before any court.

Even if there is any ground relating to the non-compliance with the provisions of the Act and the Constitution on which the validity of any election process could be questioned, the person interested in questioning the election has to wait till the election is over and file an election petition thereafter questioning the election of the successful candidate. In Ponnuswami, the Court explained the reason for adopting this stance as follows:

> "It does not require much argument to show that in a country with a democratic Constitution in which the legislatures have to play a very important role, it will lead to serious consequences if the elections are unduly protracted or obstructed".

A legislature in a democratic country performs very important functions. It is, therefore, a matter of first importance that elections should 'be concluded as early as possible according to the time-schedule. It is therefore necessary to postpone all controversies and disputes arising out of the election till after the elections are over so that the election proceedings are not unduly retarded or protracted.[88]

The Supreme Court has laid stress on the Ponnuswami proposition, as stated above, from time to time. For example, the Court has observed in Lakshmi Charan Sen v. A.K.M. Hassan Uzzaman.[89]

> "… though the High Court did not lack the jurisdiction to entertain the writ petition and to issue appropriate directions therein, no High Court in the exercise of its power under Art. 226 of the Constitution should pass any orders, interim or otherwise which had the tendency or effect of postponing an election, which is reasonably imminent and in relation to which the writ jurisdiction is invoked. The High Courts must observe a self-imposed limitation on their power to act under Article 226, by refusing to pass orders or give directions which will inevitably result in an indefinite postponement of elections to legislative bodies, which are the very essence of the democratic foundation and functioning of our Constitution".

Non-interference with the process of election is a matter of judicial policy, a matter of self-imposed discipline, and not a matter of judicial powers.

But when once proceedings are instituted in accordance with Art. 329(b) by presentation of an election petition, and the election tribunal has decided the matter, the requirements of that Article are fully satisfied. Thereafter when the election petition has been disposed of by the election tribunal, its decision is open to attack in the same manner as the decision of any other tribunal.

The scope of Art. 329(b) is limited to initiation of proceedings for setting aside an election and not to any stage after the decision of the tribunal.[90] Beyond the decision of the election tribunal, the ban of Art. 329(b) does not bind. Once the 88. Ponnuswami, AIR 1952 SC 64 at 70; supra, footnotes 12, 76 and 85.

---

89. AIR 1985 SC 1233 : (1985) 4 SCC 689.
90. Also see, Hari Vishnu Kamath, supra, footnote 87, at 238-239.

election tribunal has decided, the prohibition under Art. 329(b) is extinguished and the Supreme Court's overall power to interfere under Art. 136 springs into action.[91] Similarly, a High Court could issue a writ to an election tribunal under Art. 226,[92] as in the case of any other tribunal. This means that, the jurisdiction of the High Courts and that of the Supreme Court starts where the jurisdiction of the election tribunals end, that is, the jurisdiction of the courts starts after an election tribunal has given its decision on the election petition. So long as the poll process is on for election to Parliament or State Assembly, the courts cannot interfere. The only remedy open to the aggrieved party is through an election petition as envisaged by Art. 329(b) after the election is over.

The pattern which thus emerged in course of time after the commencement of the Constitution was that an election petition would first be decided by a tribunal; the matter would then invariably come before the High Court through a writ petition, and, lastly, it would come before the Supreme Court by way of appeal under Art. 136.

In effect, a three tier set-up came into being to deal with election matters. This position was recognised in 1956 when the Representation of the People Act, 1951, was amended so as to provide for a regular appeal from an election tribunal to the High Court. An appeal could go thereafter to the Supreme Court under Arts. 132, 133 and 136.[93]

This three tier system usually took a long time to finally decide election disputes. Therefore, the Election Commission recommended that election tribunals be abolished and trial of election petitions be handed over to the High Courts. This was expected to expedite disposal of election disputes as one step would be cut down. Accordingly, in 1966, the jurisdiction to hear and decide an election petition was transferred to the High Court by amending the Representation of the People Act, 1971. The High Court now sits as a statutory tribunal to decide election disputes with appeal to the Supreme Court.

The position now is that there exists a two tier system to decide election disputes. Election Tribunals are no longer appointed now. The election petitions are heard directly by the High Courts[94] from which an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court under Arts. 132, 133 and 136.

A High Court cannot entertain a writ petition on behalf of a candidate whose nomination paper has been rejected by the returning officer as this is a part of the election process and is covered by Art. 329(b). The proper remedy for him is to file an election petition after the completion of the election.[95]

The question of the Election Commission cancelling the poll in a constituency and ordering re-poll therein falls within the process of election. Therefore, a writ petition challenging the decision of the Election Commission is barred by Art. 329(b).[96]

---

91. Supra, Ch. IV.
92. Supra, Ch. VIII.
93. Supra, Ch. IV.
94. For a commentary on the jurisdiction of the High Courts in trying election petitions see, H.M. Trivedi v. V.B. Raju, AIR 1973 SC 2602 : (1974) 3 SCC 415.
Also see, A.C. Sobhan kuar v. Union of India, AIR 1984 AP 347.
95. Ponnuswami, supra. Also, In the matter of: Sri Subrata Chatterji, AIR 1983 Cal. 436.
96. Mohinder Singh Gill v. Election Comm., AIR 1978 SC 851 : (1978) 1 SCC 405.

When a person who is incapable of being chosen as a member of the legislature under the Constitution (e.g., he is below the age of 25 years) is elected, his election can be quashed through an election petition.[1] When a person is not qualified to be elected a member, there can be no doubt that the Election Tribunal has got to declare his election to be void. But, suppose, no election petition is filed to challenge his election, can the election be then challenged through a writ petition under Art. 226 ? Such a situation arose in K. Venkatachalam v. A. Swamickan.[2]

The appellant was not an elector in the electoral roll for an Assembly constituency for general election. He filed his nomination paper on affidavit impersonating himself as another person of the same name in the electoral roll. Undoubtedly, had an election petition been filed challenging his election, it would have been set aside. But this was not done. An election petition could be filed within the period of limitation set by the relevant statue which was over in the instant case. The Supreme Court was faced with the question whether in these circumstances no remedy was open to the respondent. To refuse a remedy would have meant that a disqualified person would continue to remain a member of the legislature. Art. 193 provides for penalty for sitting and voting when a person is not qualified to be a member of the Assembly.[3] The Supreme Court ruled that, in such a situation, the High Court could, under Art. 226, make a declaration that the appellant is not qualified to be a member of the Assembly. If he is allowed to continue to sit and vote in the Assembly, his action would be a fraud on the Constitution.

The Supreme Court has pointed out in Venkatachalam that Art. 226 "is couched in the widest possible term" and unless there is a clear bar to the High Court's jurisdiction under Art. 226, it can be exercised "when there is any act which is against any provision of law or violative of constitutional provisions and when recourse cannot be had to the provisions of the Act for the appropriate relief. "Art. 329(b) will not come into play when the case falls under Arts. 191 and 193 and the whole of the election process is over."[4]

Suppose a non-citizen is elected to a House. "Would the Court allow a foreign citizen to sit and vote in the legislative Assembly and not exercise jurisdiction under Art. 226 of the Constitution ?"[5]

Preparation of electoral rolls is anterior to, and not a part of, the election process, and the same may be challenged through a writ petition if provisions of the Constitution or the relevant Act are not complied with.[6]

The Supreme Court has held that, in a suitable case, a challenge to the electoral roll can be mounted on the ground of not complying with the requirements of law subject to the Ponnuswami ruling. Preparation and revision of electoral rolls, as such, is not regarded as a part of the process of election within the meaning of Art. 329(b). Preparation and revision of electoral rolls is a continuous

---

1. Durga Shankar v. Raghuraj, AIR 1954 SC 520 : (1955) 1 SCR 267.
2. AIR 1999 SC 1723 : (1999) 4 SCC 526.
3. Supra, Ch. VI.
4. Venkatachalam, supra, footnote 2, at 1734.
5. Ibid.
6. Roop Lal v. Dhan Singh, AIR 1968 Punj. 1; S.J. Jhala v. Chief Election Officer, AIR 1969 Guj. 292; A.K. Nair v. Elec. Commr., AIR 1972 Ker. 5.

process not connected with any particular election. This process goes on, whether there is an election or no election.

But this does not put the existing electoral roll in the cold storage. Election law abhors a vacuum. There is never a moment in the life of a political community when some electoral roll is not in force. When an election is to be held, the electoral roll which exists at the time when election is notified would form the foundation for holding such election. The election of a candidate is not open to challenge on the ground of the electoral roll being defective.[7] The fact that certain claims for inclusion of names in electoral rolls have not finally been disposed of cannot arrest the process of election. The reason is that the holding of elections to the legislature is a matter of paramount importance. On the one hand, it is the statutory right of an individual to vote, but, on the other hand, there is a constitutional obligation to hold election to the legislature.

Art. 329(b) bars any challenge to the elections through a writ petition on the ground that the electoral roll on the basis of which the impugned election was held was invalid. Once the final electoral rolls were published and elections held on the basis of such rolls, no one can challenge an election from any constituency on the ground that the electoral rolls were defective.[8]

The Election Commission issued a notification fixing the calendar of events for the purpose of holding the elections to the Legislative Council of Maharashtra. On a writ petition, the High Court issued an interim order staying the holding of the election. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled in Shivaji[9] that, because of the non-obstante clause contained in Art. 329(b), the power of the High Court to entertain a petition questioning an election on whatever grounds under Art. 226 is taken away. The word "election" cannotes "the entire process culminating in a candidate being declared elected".

The Supreme Court emphasized that it was not the concern of the High Court under Art. 226 "to rectify any error even if there was an error committed in the process of election at any stage prior to the declaration of the result of the election notwithstanding the fact that the error in question related to a mandatory provision of the statute relating to the conduct of the election." If there was any such error committed in the course of the election process, the Election Commission has the authority to set it right by virtue of the power vested in it under Art. 324. The word 'election' in Art. 329(b) has been used in the wide sense as connoting the entire process culminating in a candidate being declared elected.

An order of the Election Commission cancelling poll, and ordering re-poll, in some polling booths is immune from being challenged through a writ petition because of Art. 329(b). It is a step in the election and such a petition amounts to calling in question a step in 'election' and is, therefore, barred by Art. 329(b). "..... Immunity is conferred only if the act impeached is done for the apparent object of furthering a free and fair election and the protective armour drops down

---

7. Lakshmi Charan Sen v. A.K.M. Hassan Uzzaman, AIR 1985 SC 1233 : (1985) 4 SCC 689; Indrajit-Barua v. Election Comm. of India, AIR 1986 SC 103 : (1985) 4 SCC 722.

8. Kabul Singh v. Kundan Singh, AIR 1970 SC 340 : (1969) 2 SCC 452; Indrajit Barua v. Election Comm. of India, AIR 1986 SC 103 : (1985) 4 SCC 722.

9. Election Comm. v. Shivaji, AIR 1988 SC 61 : (1988) 1 SCC 277.
Also see, T.D. Rajalakshmi v. District Election Officer, AIR 1999 Ker 140; Mullapally Ramachandran v. District Collector, Kannaur, AIR 2000 Ker 15.

if the act challenged is either unrelated to or thwarts or taints the course of the election."[10]

In February, 1982, on a writ petition being filed under Art. 226, the Calcutta High Court issued an interim injunction on the Election Commission restraining it from declaring a date for holding State Assembly elections in West Bengal. The petition pointed out certain irregularities in the preparation of the electoral rolls and sought a stay of their publication. Certain questions about the vires of the laws of election were also raised. This created a sort of crisis for the term of the legislature was due to expire on June 24, 1982, and the Left Front Government in power wanted to complete the elections in March itself.

In an unprecedented move, the Supreme Court agreed to hear an appeal under Art. 136 and transfer the petition to itself for disposal on merits. Dismissing the petition, the Court agreed that in spite of Art. 329(b), the vires of the laws of election could be challenged through a writ petition. But the Court emphasized that no High Court in the exercise of its powers under Art. 226 should pass any order, interim or otherwise, which has the tendency or effect of postponing an election which is reasonably imminent and in relation to which its writ jurisdiction is invoked. The more imminent an election, the greater ought to be the reluctance of the High Court to take any step which will postpone the electoral process.[11]

The Election Commission in exercise of its powers under Art. 324 issued a direction relating to the employment of the electronic machines for the recording of votes in some polling booths in a constituency in Kerala. A candidate challenged this system of recording votes through a writ petition, but in K.C.Mathew v. Election Commissioner,[12] the Kerala High Court rejected the petition on the ground that it was barred by Art. 329(b).

This decision does not appear to be sound. It is stretching Art. 329(b) a little too much. It should also not be forgotten that judicial review has been declared to be a basic feature of the Constitution and that Art. 329(b) needs to be interpreted in the light of this declaration.[13] The question raised here concerned the legal validity of an order made by the Election Commission. Whether the order in question was within or without the authority of the Commission? Such a challenge ought not to be held barred by Art. 329. At present, no clause excluding jurisdiction of the courts is ever interpreted so as to bar a challenge to an order of an authority on the ground of ultra vires or jurisdictional error.[14]

But after the election, the matter was agitated again, and the Supreme Court quashed the order of the Election Commission as well as the election held through electronic machines[15]

---

10. Mohinder Singh, supra, footnote 96, at 868.
11. A.K.M. Hassan Uzzaman v. Union of India, (1982) 2 SCC 218.
Also, Election Commission v. State of Haryana, AIR 1984 SC 1406 : 1984 Supp SCC 104.
12. AIR 1982 Ker 265.
Also, supra,
13. See, infra, Ch. XLI.
14. Anisminic Ltd. Foreign Compensation Comm., (1967) 3 WLR 382.
For full discussion on this point, see, Jain, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, Vol. II.
15. Jose v. Sivam, supra, footnote 39.

The Supreme Court has restated its somewhat modified view on the maintenance of writ petitions. In Election Commission of India v. Ashok Kumar,[16] the Supreme Court has stated:

> "Any thing done towards completing or in furtherance of the election proceedings cannot be described as questioning the election…
>
> "Without interrupting, obstruction or delaying the progress of the election proceedings, judicial intervention is available if assistance of the court has been sought merely to correct or smoothen the progress of the election proceedings, to remove the obstacles therein, to preserve a vital piece of evidence if the same would be lost or destroyed or rendered irretrievable by the time the results are declared and stage is set for invoking the jurisdiction of the court…."

In the instant case, an order passed by the Election Commission regarding the manner of counting of votes was challenged as mala fide. The High Court passed an interim order staying the order of the Election Commission. On appeal, the Supreme Court stayed the High Court order and thus counting of votes took place as per the order of the Election commission. Clarifying the position, the Supreme Court stated that although the High Court order did not have the effect of "retarding, protracting, delaying or stalling the counting of votes or the progress of the election proceedings", yet the order ought not to have been made by the High Court because in the petition there was merely "a bald assertion of mala fides," "a mere ipse dixit" of the petitioner. "From such bald assertion an inference as to mala fides could not have been drawn even prima facie".

The lesson from the above case is that the Supreme Court has not faulted the High Court on the ground that it ought not to have made the order because of Art. 329(b). What the Supreme Court has said is that on merits, the order of the High Court was wrong.

Art. 329(b) by its terms does not bar writ petitions under Art. 226 to challenge elections to bodies other than Parliament and State Legislatures, as for example, municipal elections. But there is Art. 243-O which is similar to 329(b).[17] The remedy under Art. 226 cannot be taken away by any law. However, the remedy under Art. 226 is discretionary with the High Court and it may refuse to entertain a writ petition if an alternative, efficacious remedy is provided by law,[18] or if the effect thereof would be to delay elections.[19]

G. PARTY SYSTEM

Originally, the Constitution made no reference to the party system, as such. In course of time, however, the party system has come to be recognised formally as being essential for the running of the Parliamentary democratic system.

The Supreme Court has dilated upon the significance of the party system in several cases. For example, in Rama Kant Pandey v. Union of India,[20] the Court

---

16. (2000) 8 SCC 216, at 232 : AIR 2000 SC 2979.

17. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. H.
Also see, State Election Commissioner v. State of Bihar, AIR 2001 Pat 192.

18. Mahaveer Singh v. Raghunath, AIR 1983 NOC 220 (Raj); Navuba Gokalji v. Returning Officer, AIR 1982 Guj. 281; Aminchand v. State of Punjab, AIR 1983 P&H 90.

19. Anugrah Narain Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1996) 6 SCC 303 : (1996) 8 JT 733; Boddula Krishnaish v. State Election Commissioner, (1996) 3 SCC 416 at 418-422 : AIR 1996 SC 1595.

20. AIR 1993 SC 1766, 1768 : (1993) 2 SCC 438.

has pointed out that the Cabinet system adopted in India is based on the British pattern.[21] For a strong vibrant democratic government, it is necessary to have a parliamentary system which involves a majority as well as a minority so that there may be a full-fledged debate on controversial issues on the floor of the House. This is best achieved through the party system. "To abolish or ignore the party system would be to permit a chorus of discordant notes to replace an organised discussion." "It is, therefore, idle to suggest that for establishing a true democratic society, the party system should be ignored".[22]

In the instant case, the Court upheld a provision providing for countermanding of an election if any party candidate died but not when an independent candidate died. The Court ruled that the differential treatment accorded by law to party candidates does not fall foul of Art. 14.[23] The Court rejected the contention that the candidates set up by political parties should not receive any special treatment. The Court ruled that the candidates set up by political parties constitute a class by themselves.

Earlier in Thampy,[24] the Supreme Court had upheld a provision according to which a political party can spend, can incur expenses, without any limit, in support of a candidate as not being inconsistent with Art. 14. The Court stated in this connection:

> "It is the political parties which sponsor candidates, that are in a position to incur large election expenses…We do not consider that preferring political parties for exclusion from the sweep of monetary limits on election expenses, is so unreasonable, or arbitrary as to justify the preference being struck down upon that ground."

The Court explained the role of political parties thus: in any democratic system of government, political parties occupy a distinct and unique place. It is through them that the generality of people attempt to voice and ventilate their grievances. "Considering also, the power which they wield in the administration of government affairs, a special conferment of benefits on them in the matter of modalities governing the election process cannot be regarded as unreasonable or arbitrary".[25]

In Agarwal,[26] the Supreme Court has taken note of, and emphasized upon, the vital role played by the political parties in a parliamentary system in the following words:

> "In Parliamentary form of democracy political parties play vital role and occasionally they sponsor candidates of the election".

To strengthen the party system, the Court has even suggested the need for discouraging independent candidates from contesting elections because it causes unnecessary confusion to the voters.

The Election Symbols (Reservation & Allotment) Order, 1968, is also a step in the direction of recognising the party system.[27] While upholding the validity of the symbols order, the Court observed in Kanhaiya Lal Omar v. R.K. Trivedi,[28]

---

21. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(c).
22. AIR 1993 SC at 1769.
23. See, infra, Ch. XXI.
24. P. Nalla Thampy v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 1133 : 1985 Supp SCC 189.
25. Ibid., at 1140.
26. Dhartipakar Madan Lal Agarwal v. Rajiv Gandhi, AIR 1987 SC 1577 : 1987 Supp SCC 93.
27. Supra.

> "It is true that till recently, the Constitution did not expressly refer to the existence of political parties. But their existence is implicit in the nature of democratic form of government which our country has adopted…..The political parties have to be there if the present system of government is to succeed."

The Anti-Defection Law introduced in 1985 through the X Schedule to the Constitution is also an attempt to strengthen the party by discouraging defections from one party to another.[29]

The Constitution thus formally recognises the party system as an essential limb of the constitutional process in the country.

The Representation of the People (Amendment) Ordinance, 2000.

Reference has been made earlier to criminalisation of politics[30] and the ruling of the Supreme Court in Union of India v. Association for Democratic Reforms.[31] To dilute the impact of the court order, the Central Government has now promulgated the above ordinance making certain amendments to the Representation of the People Act, 1951.

A candidate for election to a House of Parliament/State legislature is now required to furnish information on the following two points:

(i) whether he is accused of any offence punishable with imprisonment for two years or more in a pending case in which a charge has been framed by the court of competent jurisdiction;

(ii) he has been convicted of an offence and sentenced to imprisonment for one year or more.

The candidate is not required to give any other information as was desired by the Supreme Court.

As regards declaration of assets and liabilities, same is to be made by an elected member to the presiding officer of the concerned House.

The ordinance then adds the following section as S. 33B to the RPA:

> "Notwithstanding anything contained in any judgment, decree or order of any court or any direction, order or any other instruction issued by the Election Commission, no candidate shall be liable to disclose or furnish any such information, in respect of his election, which is not required to be disclosed or furnished under this Act or the rules made thereunder".

While the ordinance takes a small step towards decriminalisation of politics, it is a flawed piece of legislation on more than one ground. It is an example as to how politicians of different shades and hues who shout hoarse day in, day out

---

28. AIR 1986 SC 111, 116 : (1985) 4 SCC 628.

29. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. F.

30. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(d).

31. In a commendable statement, the President of the Congress Party strongly condemned the Government's move "to wilfully pass an ordinance that defies (1) the will of a vast majority of the people, (2) the letter and spirit of the order of the Supreme Court and (3) the basic tenet of transparency and accountability in politics.

The Congress has expressed concurrence with the orders of the Supreme Court that candidates must disclose information regarding convictions and charges for offences, assets and bank balances and liabilities and overdues. Such information must be disclosed by all candidates at the time of filing nomination and prior to an election.

The Times of India, dated Aug. 28, 2002, p. 13.

condemning criminalisation of politics, come together forgetting all their ideological differences to protect their turf. The Supreme Court had not made any radical suggestion but even these suggestions are not acceptable to the politicians. This shows that there exists a wide gulf between preaching and practice in to-days political arena. The ordinance seeks to draw a veil of secrecy over the acts of the politicians and thus it lacks transparency.

It is also anti-democratic as it directly strikes at the people's right to know—a democratic right. The newly added S. 33B seeks to deny to the people the right to be informed about the credentials of the candidates for whom they are prompted to vote. Can it be said that it promotes free and fair elections in the country?

Above all the constitutional validity of S. 33B is extremely suspect. The Supreme Court has spelt out the right to know from the freedom of speech and expression couched in Art. 19(1)(a) which is a Fundamental Right. Therefore, right to information is itself a Fundamental Right. S. 33B directly seeks to nullify this right. It is like saying that no one has freedom of speech outside the statute. Therefore, it is hard to hold S. 33B as valid. No law, not falling within the parameters of Art. 19(2) can deny in any way the right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a). By no stretch of imagination S. 33B falls within the scope of Art. 19(2).

The ordinance has to be approved by Parliament, but it is doubtful if it will be approved in its present form because the Congress Party, which has a majority in the Rajya Sabha has expressed reservation about the Ordinance in its present form.[32]

32. In a commendable statement, the President of the Congress Party strongly condemned the Government's move "to wilfully pass an ordinance that defies (1) the will of a vast majority of the people, (2) the letter and spirit of the order of the Supreme Court and (3) the basic tenet of transparency and accountability in politics.

The Congress has expressed concurrence with the orders of the Supreme Court that candidates must disclose information regarding convictions and charges for offences, assets and bank balances and liabilities and overdues. Such information must be disclosed by all candidates at the time of filing nomination and prior to an election.

The Times of India, dated Aug. 28, 2002, p. 13.

CHAPTER XX

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS (1)

SYNOPSIS

A. CONCEPT OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

Since the 17th century, if not earlier, human thinking has been veering round to the theory that man has certain essential, basic, natural and inalienable rights or freedoms and it is the function of the state, in order that human liberty may be preserved, human personality developed, and an effective social and democratic life promoted, to recognise these rights and freedoms and allow them a free play.

The concept of human rights can be traced to the natural law philosophers, such as, Locke and Rousseau. The natural law philosophers philosophized over such inherent human rights and sought to preserve these rights by propounding the theory of "social compact".[1]

According to LOCKE, man is born "with a title to perfect freedom and an uncontrolled enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of the Law of Nature" and he has by nature a power "to preserve his property—that is, his life, liberty, and estate, against the injuries and attempts of other men."[2]

The Declaration of the French Revolution, 1789, which may be regarded as a concrete political statement on Human Rights and which was inspired by the LOCKEIAN philosophy declared:

---

1. See, LLOYD, INTRODUCTION TO JURISPRUDENCE, 117-123, 159 (1985).
2. Extracts from LOCKE, TWO TREATISES OF GOVERNMENT.

> "The aim of all political association is the conservation of the natural and inalienable rights of man".

The concept of human rights protects individuals against the excesses of the state. The concept of human rights represents an attempt to protect the individual from oppression and injustice. In modern times, it is widely accepted that the right to liberty is the very essence of a free society and it must be safeguarded at all times. The idea of guaranteeing certain rights is to ensure that a person may have a minimum guaranteed freedom.

The underlying idea in entrenching certain basic and Fundamental Rights is to take them out of the reach of transient political majorities. It has, therefore, come to be regarded as essential that these rights be entrenched in such a way that they may not be violated, tampered or interfered with by an oppressive government. With this end in view, some written constitutions guarantee a few rights to the people and forbid governmental organs from interfering with the same. In that case, a guaranteed right can be limited or taken away only by the elaborate and formal process of constitutional amendment rather than by ordinary legislation. These rights are characterised as Fundamental Rights.

The entrenched Fundamental Rights have a dual aspect. From one point of view, they confer justiciable rights on the people which can be enforced through the courts against the government. From another point of view, the Fundamental Rights constitute restrictions and limitations on government action, whether it is taken by the Centre, or a State or a local government. The government cannot take any action, administrative or legislative, by which a Fundamental Right is infringed.

Entrenchment means that the guaranteed rights cannot be taken away by an ordinary law. A law curtailing or infringing an entrenched right would be declared to be unconstitutional. If ever it is deemed necessary to curtail an entrenched right, that can only be done by the elaborate and more formal procedure by way of a constitutional amendment. As the Supreme Court has observed,[3] the purpose of enumerating Fundamental Rights in the Constitution "is to safeguard the basic human rights from the vicissitudes of political controversy and to place them beyond the reach of the political parties who, by virtue of their majority, may come to form the government at the centre or in the State".

The modern trend of guaranteeing Fundamental Rights to the people may be traced to the Constitution of the U.S.A. drafted in 1787. The U.S. Constitution was the first modern Constitution to give concrete shape to the concept of human Rights by putting them in to the Constitution and making them justiciable and enforceable through the instrumentality of the courts.

The original U.S. Constitution did not contain any Fundamental Rights. There was trenchant criticism of the Constitution on this score. Consequently, the Bill of Rights came to be incorporated in the Constitution in 1791 in the form of ten amendments which embody the LOCKEIAN ideas about the protection of life, liberty and property.[4]

The nature of the Fundamental Rights in the U.S.A. has been described thus: "The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the

---

3. Chairman, Rly. Board v. Chandrima Das, AIR 2000 SC 988, 997 : (2000) 2 SCC 465.
4. B. BAILYN, IDEOLOGICAL ORIGINS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION, (1967).

vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials, to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly and other Fundamental Rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections."[5]

In modern times, the concept of the people's basic rights has been given a more concrete and universal texture by the Charter of Human Rights enacted by the United Nations Organization (U.N.O.),[6] and the European Convention on Human Rights.[7] The Preamble to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights inter alia declares:

> "Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world".

The concept of Fundamental Rights thus represents a trend in the modern democratic thinking.[8] The enforcement of human rights is a matter of major significance to modern constitutional jurisprudence. The incorporation of Fundamental Rights as enforceable rights in the modern constitutional documents as well as the internationally recognised Charter of Human Rights emanate from the doctrine of natural law and natural rights.

For sometime now a new trend is visible in India, viz., to relate the Fundamental Rights in India to the International Human Rights. While interpreting the Fundamental Rights provisions in the Indian Constitution, the Supreme Court has drawn from the International Declarations on Human Rights.[9] The Supreme

---

5. JUSTICE JACKSON in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624.

6. IAN BROWNLIE, BASIC DOCUMENTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS (1971); (1998) 40 JILI, 1-327.

The General Assembly of the United Nations Organisation adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on Dec. 10, 1948. This document has proved to be a mere declaration without any teeth. The Charter has so far remained merely a formal document without any measures having been taken to facilitate the realization of the basic freedoms and the human rights which the document contains.

7. For trends in the present-day Africa in the area of human rights, see, D.O. Ahic, Neo-Nigerian Human Rights in Zambia: A Comparative Study with some countries in Africa and West Indies, 12 J.I.L.I. 609 (1970).

8. In Europe, the Council of Europe adopted the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms on Nov. 4, 1950. The Convention has set up both a Commission and a Court of Human Rights to investigate and adjudicate upon claims made by individuals.

9. As will be apparent from the following discussion on specific Fundamental Rights, and the judicial interpretation thereof, the Supreme Court of India has frequently drawn from the Declaration of Human Rights to define the scope and content of the Fundamental Rights in India: see, for example: Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 597; M.H. Hoskot v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1978 SC 1548 : (1978) 3 SCC 544; Randhir Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 879; D.K. Basu v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 610; Vishaka v. State of Rajasthan, (1997) AIR SCW 3043 : (1997) 6 SCC 241; People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (1997) 1 SCC 301; Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A.K. Chopra, AIR 1999 SC 6251 : (1999) 1 SCC 759; Chairman, Rly. Board v. Chandrima Das, AIR 2000 SC 988 : (2000) 2 SCC 465. All these cases are discussed in the text which follows.

In Madhu Kishwar v. State of Bihar, AIR 1996 SC 1864 at 1869 : (1996) 5 SCC 125, the Supreme Court referred to the Declarations on "The Right to Development" adopted by the UN General Assembly on December 4, 1986, and also to Vienna Conventions on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against women (CEDAW) ratified by the UNO on Dec. 18, 1979.

Also see, People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 568, 575 : (1997) 1 SCC 301.

Court, for example, has made copious references to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, and observed:

> "The applicability of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and principles thereof may have to be read, if need be, into the domestic jurisprudence".[10]

There is no formal declaration of people's Fundamental Rights in Britain. The orthodox doctrine of the Sovereignty of Parliament prevailing there does not envisage a legal check on the power of Parliament which is, as a matter of legal theory, free to make any law even though it abridges, modifies or abolishes any basic civic right and liberty of the people.[11] The power of the executive is however limited in the sense that it cannot interfere with the rights of the people without the sanction of law.[12]

There prevails in Britain the concept of Rule of Law which represents, in short, the thesis that the executive is answerable to the courts for any action which is contrary to the law of the land. Rule of law constitutes no legal restraint on the legislative power of Parliament and, thus, cannot be equated to the concept of Fundamental Rights.

Until 1998, the protection of individual freedom in Britain, therefore, rested not on any constitutional guarantees but on public opinion, good sense of the people, strong common law traditions favouring individual liberty and the Parliamentary form of government. British lawyers often questioned the very basis of the theory of declaring basic civil rights in a constitutional document.

The British model could not be duplicated elsewhere. The fact remains that Britain is a small and homogeneous nation, having deep-rooted democratic traditions. But these conditions do not prevail in other countries which are composed of diverse elements, having no deep-rooted traditions of individual liberty, and which, therefore, face very different problems from those of Britain.

Even in Britain, there was an ever growing realisation that guaranteed civil rights do serve a useful purpose and that Britain should also have a written Bill of Rights.[13] Britain had accepted the European Charter on Human Rights.[14] But this was not good enough because the Charter did not bind Parliament but could be used only to interpret the local law. The feeling was that law made by Parliament was in essence law made by the House of Commons. This, in practice, meant that a government having support of a majority in the House (though it had the support only of a minority of electorate), could often force through whatever legisla-

---

10. Chairman, Railway Board v. Chandrima Das, AIR 2000 SC 988 at 997 : (2000) 2 SCC 465.

11. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. M.
Also, Lord Wright in Liversidge v. Anderson, 1942 A.C. 206.

12. LORD ATKIN in Eshugbayi v. Govt. of Nigeria, 1931 A.C. 662.

13. HOOD PHILLIPS, CONST. AND ADM. LAW, 40, 438 (1978); also, REFORM OF THE CONSTITUTION (1970); DE SMITH, CONST. AND ADM. LAW, 439 (1977); SCARMAN, ENGLISH LAW—THE NEW DIMENSION; ANDERSON, ON LIBERTY, LAW AND JUSTICE (1978).
On July 7, 75, a resolution was moved in the House of Commons demanding that England should have a Bill of Rights. There is some opposition as well in academic circles to having a Bill of Rights; See, YARDLEY, Modern Constitutional Developments: Some Reflections. 1975 Pub. Law 197; LLOYD, Do We Need A Bill of Rights? M.L.R. 121 (1976); H.W.R. WADE, CONSTITUTIONAL FUNDAMENTALS, 24-40 (1980).
See also, REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE ON A BILL OF RIGHTS (HOUSE OF LORDS, 1978).

14. There have been some cases in Britain in this area: Waddington v. Miah, (1974) 1 W.LR. 613; R. v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p. Bhajan Singh, (1975) 2 All ER 1081; Bulmer Ltd. v. Bollinger, S.A., (1974) 2 All ER 1226.

tion it desired. What was, therefore, necessary was a Bill of Rights which could curb parliamentary legislative power. As SCARMAN observed:[15]

> "Without a Bill of Rights protected from repeal, amendment, or suspension by the ordinary processes of a bare Parliamentary majority controlled by the government of the day, human Rights will be at risk."[16]

Ultimately, the British Parliament enacted the Human Rights Act, 1998. The purpose of the Act is to give effect to the rights and freedoms guaranteed under the European Convention on Human Rights. The Act is a significant constitutional innovation.

The Act incorporates the Convention in Schedule I. These are the rights to which the Act gives effect. All legislation, so far as possible, is to be read and given effect to in a way which is compatible with convention rights [s. 3(1)(a)]. S. 2(1)(a) requires a Court determining a question regarding a convention right, to take into account any "judgment, decision, declaration or a advisory opinion of the European Court of Human Rights, so far as the same is relevant to the proceedings in question."

Under s. 4(1), the Court may make a declaration that a legal provision is incompatible with a convention right. In such a case, under s. 10(1)(b), the Minister may by order make such amendments to the legislation as he considers necessary to remove the incompatibility. Thus, the Minister is empowered to make "remedial orders" to remove incompatibilities between primary legislation (as passed by Parliament) and the Convention. But a draft of the order has to be approved by both Houses of Parliament.

The British Act falls short of a declaration of Fundamental Rights in the Constitution (such as is the case in India) in several respects; viz.:

(1) In India, if a law is incompatible with a Fundamental Right, the law is void.[17] Not so in Britain. The Human Rights Act does not provide the courts with the power to strike down legislation which is inconsistent with the Convention rights. A judicial declaration of incompatibility does not make the legislation void. In fact, such a declaration does not affect the validity of the law at all.

(2) The incompatibility may be removed by the Minister with the approval of Parliament. If the Minister does not seek to remove the incompatibility, the law in question continues to exist. This means that Parliament is free, if it so chooses, to enact and maintain in force legislation that is incompatible with the Convention rights. Not so in India where a void law is regarded as non-est.[18]

(3) The British Act is only an Act passed by Parliament. Parliament can repeal or amend the same by passing another Act. The Act is not entrenched against repeal but can be repealed in the ordinary way. On the other hand, a declaration of Fundamental Rights in the Constitution is of a more enduring and abiding nature than a mere statutory declaration of rights because to make any change in the Fundamental Rights, the Constitution needs to be amended which is a much more arduous and elaborate procedure than passing or amending an ordinary law.[19]

---

15. Supra, footnote 13.
16. Ibid, 69.
17. See, infra, Sec. C.
18. Ibid.
19. See, Ch. XLI, infra.

The Australian Constitution, following the traditions of Britain, does not have a Bill of Rights but guarantees only a few rights, e.g., freedom of religion.[20]

In a federal country, the problem becomes more complicated as there may be attacks on individual liberty and freedom not only at the Central level, but even at the state level.

In the modern era, it has become almost a matter of course to prescribe formally the rights and liberties of the people which are deemed worthy of protection from government interference. The wide acceptance of the notion that a formal Bill of Rights is a near necessity in the effective constitutional government arises, to some extent, from a feeling that mere custom or tradition alone cannot provide to the Fundamental Rights the same protection as their importance deserves. "The unique English situation is not simply exportable, and other nations have generally felt that their governments need the constant reminder which a bill of rights provides, while their people need the reassurance which it can supply."[21]

An outstanding example of this trend is Canada. To begin with, the Canadian Constitution had only a few guaranteed Rights.[22] Then, the Canadian Parliament enacted a law laying down basic Rights of the people.[23] Being only a law made by Parliament, it did not constitute any restriction on Parliament itself. The matter has now been taken further. The Canadian Constitution has been amended and a Charter of Rights has been formally incorporated therein in 1982.[24]

B. FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS IN INDIA

Coming to India, a few good reasons made the enunciation of the Fundamental Rights in the Constitution rather inevitable. For one thing, the main political party, the Congress, had for long been demanding these Rights against the British rule. During the British rule in India, human rights were violated by the rulers on a very wide scale. Therefore, the framers of the Constitution, many of whom had suffered long incarceration during the British regime, had a very positive attitude towards these rights.

Secondly, the Indian society is fragmented into many religious, cultural and linguistic groups, and it was necessary to declare Fundamental Rights to give to the people a sense of security and confidence. Then, it was thought necessary that people should have some Rights which may be enforced against the government which may become arbitary at times. Though democracy was being introduced in India, yet democratic traditions were lacking, and there was a danger that the majority in the legislature may enact laws which may be oppressive to individuals or minority groups, and such a danger could be minimised by having a Bill of Rights in the Constitution.

The need to have the Fundamental Rights was so very well accepted on all hands that in the Constituent Assembly, the point was not even considered

---

20. S. 116 of the Australian Constitution.
21. BOWIE, STUDIES IN FEDERALISM, 567, 601.
22. Ss. 93 and 133 of the British North America Act.
23. See the various articles on the subject in 37 Can. B.R. 1-217 (1959). Also AUBURN, Canadian Bill of Rights and Discriminatory Statutes, 86 LQR 306 (1970); WALTER S. TRANOPOLSKY, The Canadian Bill of Rights (1975).
24. See (1983) 61 Can. B.R. 1-442.

whether or not to incorporate such Rights in the Constitution. In fact, the fight all along was against the restrictions being imposed on them and the effort all along was to have the Fundamental Rights on as broad and pervasive a basis as possible.[25]

The Fundamental Rights are a necessary consequence of the declaration in the Preamble to the Constitution that the people of India have solemnly resolved to constitute India into a sovereign democratic republic and to secure to all its citizens justice, social, economic, and political; liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship; equality of status and opportunity.[26]

Part III of the Constitution protects substantive as well as procedural rights.[27]

The Fundamental Rights in India, apart from guaranteeing certain basic civil Rights and freedoms to all, also fulfil the important function of giving a few safeguards to minorities, outlawing discrimination and protecting religious freedom and cultural rights. During emergency, however, some curtailment of the Fundamental Rights does take place.[28] But all these curtailments of Fundamental Rights are of a temporary nature.

Fundamental Rights must not be read in isolation but along with directive principles and fundamental duties.[29]

The Indian Constitution guarantees essential human rights in the form of Fundamental Rights under Part III and also directive principles of State policy in Part IV which are fundamental in the governance of the country. Freedoms granted under Part III have been liberally construed by various pronouncements of the Supreme Court in the last half a century, keeping in view the International Covenants to which India is a party. The object has been to place citizens at a centre stage and make the State accountable.[30]

Articles 12 to 35 of the Constitution pertain to Fundamental Rights of the people. These Rights are reminiscent of some of the provisions of the Bill of Rights in the U.S. Constitution but the former cover a much wider ground than the latter. Also, the U.S. Constitution declares the Fundamental Rights in broad and general terms. But as no right is absolute, the courts have, in course of time, spelled out some restrictions and limitations on these Rights. The Indian Constitution, however, adopts a different approach in so far as some Rights are worded generally; in respect of some Fundamental Rights, the exceptions and qualifications have been formulated and expressed in a compendious form in the Constitution itself, while in respect of some other Rights, the Constitution confers power on the Legislature to impose limitations. The result of this strategy has been that the constitutional provisions pertaining to Fundamental Rights have become rather detailed and complex.

The framers of the Indian Constitution, learning from the experiences of the U.S.A., visualized a great many difficulties in enunciating the Fundamental

---

25. For an analysis of discussion on Fundamental Rights in the Constituent Assembly; see, GRANVILLE AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION OF A NATION, 50-113 (1966).
26. See, Ch. I, supra.
27. Pratap Singh v. State of Jharkhand, (2005) 3 SCC 551 : AIR 2005 SC 273.
28. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B(b).
Also, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.
29. Javed v. State of Haryana, (2003) 8 SCC 369 : AIR 2003 SC 3057.
30. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (2005) 2 SCC 436 : (2005) 1 JT 283.

Rights in general terms and in leaving it to the courts to enforce them, viz., the Legislature not being in a position to know what view the courts would take of a particular enactment, the process of legislation becomes difficult; there arises a vast mass of litigation about the validity of the laws and the judicial opinion is often changing so that law becomes uncertain; the judges are irremovable and are not elected; they are, therefore, not so sensitive to public needs in the social or economic sphere as the elected legislators and so a complete and unqualified veto over legislation could not be left in judicial hands.[31] Even then, certain rights especially economic Rights, have had to be amended from time to time to save some economic programmes.[32]

The Fundamental Rights in the Indian Constitution have been grouped under seven heads as follows:

(i) Right to Equality comprising Articles 14 to 18, of which Article 14 is the most important.[33]

(ii) Right to Freedom comprising Articles 19 to 22 which guarantee several freedoms, the most important of which is the freedom of speech.[34]

(iii) Right against Exploitation consists of Articles 23 and 24.[35]

(iv) Right to Freedom of Religion is guaranteed by Articles 25 to 28.[36]

(v) Cultural and Educational Rights are guaranteed by Articles 29 and 30.[37]

(vi) Right to Property is now very much diluted and is secured to some extent by Arts. 30-A, 31-A, 31-B and 31-C.[38]

(vii) Right to Constitutional Remedies is secured by Articles 32 to 35.

These Articles provide the remedies to enforce the Fundamental Rights, and of these the most important is Art. 32.[39]

As the Fundamental Rights constitute by and large a limitation on the government, the most important problem which the courts have been faced with while interpreting these rights has been to achieve a proper balance between the rights of the individual and those of the state or the society as a whole, between individual liberty and social control. This is a very difficult as well as a delicate task indeed in these days of development of the country into a social welfare state. On the whole, however, one could say that in the area of non-economic matters, like freedom of speech or the right to life, the line has been shifting in favour of the individual, while in the area of economic matters, the line has been constantly shifting in favour of social control. This has been achieved both by judicial interpretation as well as constitutional amendments as the discussion in the following pages will amply depict.

---

31. B.N. RAU, INDIA'S CONSTITUTION IN THE MAKING, 245.
32. See, infra, Chs. XXIV, Sec. H; Chs. XXXI, XXXII; XLI and XLII.
33. See, Chs. XXI, XXII and XXIII, infra.
34. See, Chs. XXIV, XXV, XXVI and XXVII, infra.
35. See, Ch. XXVIII, infra.
36. See, Ch. XXIX, infra.
37. See, Ch. XXX, infra.
38. See, Chs. XXXI, XXXII, infra.
39. See, Ch. XXXIII, infra.

The Fundamental Rights guarantee certain economic rights. Too much emphasis on these rights might have led to the emergence of a laissez faire economy in India which is now an out of date concept. Accordingly, partly by judicial interpretation, and partly by constitutional amendment process, emphasis has come to be laid on social control in economic matters leading to the emergence of a regulated economy.

The right to property also has had a chequered history. Originally it was secured by Arts. 19(1)(f) and 31, and the courts were prone to give these provisions a broad perspective thus giving to property rights a better protection. But now the Fundamental Right to property has been very much diluted. This development has been discussed fully later.[40]

But, on the other hand, in the post 1977era, the most notable development has been that great emphasis has come to be laid on the right to life and personal liberty, i.e., the freedom of the person guaranteed by Art. 21. Art. 21 has been given a new dimension by judicial interpretation.[41] In Maneka Gandhi,[42] the landmark case which initiated the process of expansion of the scope of Art. 21, the Court has observed:

> "The attempt of the Court should be to expand the reach and ambit of the Fundamental Rights rather than to attenuate their meaning and content by a process of judicial construction."

The great metamorphosis that has occurred in the judicial view as regards Art. 21 can be appreciated if the restrictive view adopted by the Supreme Court in Gopalan[43] is set against the expansive interpretation of Art. 21 in a series of cases beginning Maneka Gandhi in 1977.

In a nutshell, it may be said that, on the whole, the Supreme Court has displayed judicial creativity of a high order in interpreting the Fundamental Rights, especially during the last two decades. Reference may be made in this connection inter alia to such landmark Supreme Court cases as Maneka Gandhi, Indra Sawhney,[44] Asiad cases.[45] In Ajay Hasia,[46] BHAGWATI, J., has observed:

> "It must be remembered that the Fundamental Rights are constitutional guarantees given to the people of India and are not merely paper hopes or fleeting promises and so long as they find a place in the Constitution, they should not be allowed to be emasculated in their application by a narrow and constricted judicial interpretation".

The Supreme Court has even enunciated the doctrine of implied Fundamental Rights. The Court has asserted that in order to treat a right as Fundamental Right it is not necessary that it should be expressly stated in the Constitution as a Fundamental Right. Political, social and economic changes occurring in the country

---

40. Infra, Chs. XXIV, Sec. G; Chs. XXXI and XXXII, infra.
41. Infra, Ch. XXVI.
42. AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248; infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. D.
43. Infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. B.
44. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 477; infra, Ch. XXIII.
45. People's Union for Democratic Rights v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 1473 : (1982) 3 SCC 235; infra, Ch. XXVIII.
46. Ajay Hasia v. Khalid Mujib, AIR 1981 SC 487 at 493 : (1981) 1 SCC 722.

may entail the recognition of new rights and the law in its eternal youth grows to meet social demands.[47]

There is no rule that unless a right is expressly stated as a Fundamental Right it cannot be treated as one. Over time, the Supreme Court has been able to imply by its interpretative process, several Fundamental Rights, such as, freedom of press, right to privacy, out of the expressly stated Fundamental Rights.

By and large, barring some exceptions, the Supreme Court has, on the whole, interpreted the Fundamental Rights in a liberal manner. The Court has laid emphasis on this aspect from time to time. For instance, in Pathumma,[48] the Court has stated that in interpreting the Constitution, "the judicial approach should be dynamic rather than static, pragmatic and not pedantic and elastic rather than rigid." But the award of a sentence by the order of a Court cannot amount to violation of any of the Fundamental Rights.[49] On the whole, the Supreme Court has displayed a liberal and creative attitude in interpretation of Fundamental Rights and this has had a profound influence on the development and delineation of the Fundamental Rights in course of time. This will become clear from the following discussion.

The Fundamental Rights are not all distinct and mutually exclusive Rights. Each freedom has different dimensions and a law may have to meet the challenge under various Fundamental Rights. Thus, a law depriving a person of his personal liberty may have to stand the test of Arts. 14, 19 and 21 to be valid. Formerly, however, the courts had applied the doctrine of exclusivity of Fundamental Rights and treated each right as a distinct and separate entity,[50] but this view has now undergone a change,[51] thus, providing to the courts a better leverage to test the validity of laws affecting Fundamental Rights.

The Supreme Court plays a very significant role in relation to the Fundamental Rights. In the first place, the Court acts as the protector and the guardian of these rights. In the second place, the Court acts as the interpreter of the Fundamental Rights. The Supreme Court acts as the "sentinel on the qui vive" in relation to the Fundamental Rights. Commenting on its role entrusted to it under the Constitution to protect Fundamental Rights, the Supreme Court has observed in Daryao[52]:

> "The Fundamental Rights are intended not only to protect individual's rights but they are based on high public policy. Liberty of the individual and the protection of his Fundamental Rights are the very essence of the democratic way of life adopted by the Constitution, and it is the privilege and the duty of this Court to uphold those rights. This Court would naturally refuse to circumscribe them or to curtail them except as provided by the Constitution itself."

---

47. Unni Krishnan, J.P. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1993 SC 2178 : (1993) 1 SCC 645; infra, Ch. XXVI, for fuller discussion on this aspect.
48. Pathumma v. State of Kerala, AIR 1978 SC 771 : (1978) 2 SCC 1.
49. Lalita Jalan v. Bombay Gas Co. Ltd., (2003) 6 SCC 107 : AIR 2003 SC 3157.
50. Chs. XXVI and XXVII, infra.
51. Cooper (Bank Nationalisation case), infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. C; Maneka Gandhi, infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. D.
52. Daryao v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1961 SC 1457, at 1461 : (1962) 1 SCR 574. See, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A.

The Fundamental Rights play a noteworthy role in the area of the Indian Administrative Law. A phenomenon generally discernible today in practically every democracy is the vast growth in the functions, powers and activities of the Administration under the impact of the modern philosophy of 'welfare state'. A large amount of discretion is left in the hands of administrative authorities. An important problem of modern Administrative Law is to seek to strengthen the techniques to control the administration in the exercise of its various powers. Some of the Fundamental Rights like Arts. 14, 19, 22 and 31 have been used for this purpose.

In a large number of cases, validity of laws conferring discretion on the Administration has been scrutinised with reference to the Fundamental Rights. For this purpose, both substantive as well as procedural parts of the law are taken into consideration.[53] On the substantive side, the courts have taken objection in many cases to bestowal of arbitrary and unregulated discretion on the Administration. On the procedural side, laws conferring discretion without necessary procedural safeguards have been invalidated. In some cases, objection has been taken to the exercise of administrative discretion on the ground of its being discriminatory, or having been exercised without due procedure. The discussion in the following pages amply illustrates the several points mentioned here.[54]

C. JUSTICIABILITY OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

ART. 13 : LAWS INCONSISTENT WITH FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

Art. 13 is the key provision as it gives teeth to the Fundamental Rights and makes them justiciable. The effect of Art. 13 is that the Fundamental Rights cannot be infringed by the government either by enacting a law or through administrative action.

Article 13(1) declares that all pre-Constitution laws shall be void to the extent of their inconsistency with the Fundamental Rights. Art. 13(1) deals with the pre-Constitution laws; if any such law is inconsistent with a Fundamental Right, it becomes void from 26-1-50, the date on which the Constitution of India came into force.

According to Art. 13(2), the State 'shall not make any law' which takes away or abridges the Fundamental Rights; and a law contravening a Fundamental Right is, to the extent of the contravention, void.

Article 13(2) is the crucial constitutional provision which deals with the post-Constitution laws. If any such law violates any Fundamental Right it becomes void ab initio, i.e., from its inception. The effect of Art. 13(2) thus is that no Fundamental Right can be infringed by the state either by legislative or administrative action.

---

53. N.B. Khare v. Delhi, AIR 1950 SC 211 : 1950 SCR 519.

54. For a detailed discussion on this aspect of Administrative Law, see : M.P. JAIN, Administrative Discretion and Fundamental Rights, 1 JILI, 223 (1959); M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, Ch. XVIII, 765-835; JAIN, THE EVOLVING INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, Ch. VI (1983); JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADMN. LAW, II, Ch. XV, 1565-1911.

Article 13 makes the judiciary, and especially the Apex Court, as the guardian, protector and the interpreter of the Fundamental Rights.[55] It is the function of the courts to assess individual laws vis-à-vis the Fundamental Rights so as to ensure that no law infringes a Fundamental Right. The courts perform the arduous task of declaring a law unconstitutional if it infringes a Fundamental Right. It is the function of the courts to ensure that no statute violates a Fundamental Right. This is the exercise of its protective role by the judiciary, i.e., protecting the Fundamental Rights from being violated by a statute. A statute is declared unconstitutional and void if it comes in conflict with a Fundamental Right.

Article 13 confers a power as well as imposes an obligation on the courts to declare a law void if it is inconsistent with a Fundamental Right. This is a power of great consequence for the courts. The Supreme Court has figuratively characterised this role of the courts as that of a "sentinel on the qui vive.[56] It may however be underlined that the courts do not lightly declare a statue unconstitutional because they are conscious of their responsibility in declaring a law made by a democratic legislature void. On the whole, not many statutes have been hit by Fundamental Rights. However, judicial review of administrative action is some what more pervasive than that of legislative action. The expansive purview of Art. 21 and other Articles, as stated above, affects administrative action very deeply as will be clear by the later discussion. The principles of Judicial Review of legislation and interpretation of the Constitution are fully discussed in a later Chapter.[57]

The Supreme Court has further bolstered its protective role under Art. 13(2) by laying down the proposition that judicial review is the 'basic' feature of the Constitution.[58] This means that the power of judicial review cannot be curtailed or evaded by any future Constitutional amendment. Protection of the institution of judicial review is crucially interconnected with the protection of Fundamental Rights, for depriving the Supreme Court and other Courts of their power of judicial review would mean that the Fundamental Rights become non-enforceable, "a mere adornment", as they will become rights without remedy.

This idea has been conveyed by CHANDRACHUD, C.J., as follows in Minerva Mills:[59]

> "It is the function of the Judges, nay their duty, to pronounce upon the validity of laws. If courts are totally deprived of that power, the fundamental rights conferred on the people will become a mere adornment because rights conferred on the people will become a mere adornment because rights without remedies are as writ in water. A controlled constitution will then become uncontrolled."

As KHANNA, J., has emphasized in Kesavananda:[60]

---

55. See, Sec. B, supra.
56. State of Madras v. V.G. Row, AIR 1952 SC 196 : 1952 SCR 597.
57. On Judicial Review of Legislation, see, infra, Ch. XL.
58. For discussion on the Doctrine of 'Basic Features' of the Constitution, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
59. Minerva Mills Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC. 1789 : (1980) 2 SCC 591.
Also see, Waman Rao v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 271 : (1981) 2 SCC 362.
60. Kesavananda v. State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC 1461 : (1973) 4 SCC 225.
For a detailed discussion on this case, see, infra, Ch. XLI.

> "As long as some Fundamental Rights exist and are a part of the Constitution, the power of judicial review has also to be exercised with a view to see that the guarantees afforded by those rights are not contravened…Judicial review has thus become an integral part of our constitutional system".

AHMADI, C.J., speaking on behalf of a bench of seven Judges in L. Chandra Kumar v. India,[61] has observed:

> "The Judges of the Superior Court have been entrusted with the task of upholding the Constitution and to this end, have been conferred the power to interpret it. It is they who have to ensure that the balance of power envisaged by the Constitution is maintained and that the legislature and the executive do not, in the discharge of their functions, transgress constitutional limitations…..We, therefore, hold that the power of judicial review over legislative action vested in the High Courts under Art. 226[62] and in this Court under Art. 32[63] of the Constitution is an integral and essential feature of the Constitution, constituting part of its basic structure. Ordinarily, therefore, the power of the High Courts and the Supreme Court to test the constitutional validity of legislation can never be ousted or excluded."

Accordingly, in the instant case, the Supreme Court has declared unconstitutional clause 2(d) of Art. 323A and clause 3(d) of Art. 323B, to the extent they sought to exclude jurisdiction of the High Courts and the Supreme Court conferred under Arts. 226, 227 and 32. The Court has observed in this connection:

> "The jurisdiction conferred on the High Courts under Arts. 226/227 and upon the Supreme Court under Art. 32 of the Constitution is part of the inviolable basic structure of our Constitution. While this jurisdiction cannot be ousted, other Courts and Tribunals may perform a supplemental role in discharging the powers conferred by Articles 226/227 and 32 of the Constitution."[64]

It may be appreciated that declaration of Fundamental Rights in the Constitution cannot be of much avail if no machinery is provided for their enforcement. The Constitution confers this protective role on the Supreme Court and the High Courts. These Courts can issue various writs, orders and directions for the enforcement of these Fundamental Rights by virtue of Arts. 32 and 226.[65]

It may be interesting to know that the U.S. Constitution does not specifically provide for judicial review. But, as early as 1803, in the famous case of Marbury v. Madison,[66] the Supreme Court asserted that it would review the constitutionality of the Congressional Acts. MARSHALL, C.J., expounded the theory of judicial review of the constitutionality of Acts of Congress as follows:

> "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the Courts must decide on the operation of each. So if a law be in opposition to the Constitution; if both the law and the Constitution apply to a particular case, so that

---

61. AIR 1997 SC 1125, at 1130 : (1997) 3 SCC 261.
For discussion on this case, see, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.
62. For discussion on Art. 226, see, supra, Ch. VIII, Secs. C and D.
63. For discussion on Art. 32, see, infra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. A.
64. See, Chandra Kumar, supra, footnote 61, at 1156.
65. For discussion on Art. 32, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII; for Art. 226, see, supra, Ch. VIII.
66. 1 Cranch 137.
Also see, infra, Ch. XL.

the Court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the constitution; or conformably to the constitution, disregarding the law, the Court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty."

Article 13 deals with statute law and not with the law declared by the courts, or with the directions or orders made by the Supreme Court under Art. 142.[67]

D. STATE

Most of the Fundamental Rights are claimed against the state and its instrumentalities and not against private bodies.[68] Art. 13(2), as stated above, bars the 'state' from making any 'law' infringing a Fundamental Right.

The two important concepts used in this provision, are : 'state' and 'law'. These concepts need some elucidation.

Fundamental Rights are claimed mostly against the 'state'.

Article 12 gives an extended significance to the term 'state'. Art. 12 clarifies that the term 'state' occurring in Art. 13(2), or any other provision concerning Fundamental Rights, has an expansive meaning.

According to Art. 12, the term 'state' includes—

(i) the Government and Parliament of India:

(ii) the Government and the Legislature of a State;

(iii) all local authorities; and

(iv) other authorities within the territory of India, or under the control of the Central Government.

The actions of any of the bodies comprised within the term 'state' as defined in Art. 12 can be challenged before the courts under Art. 13(2) on the ground of violating Fundamental Rights.

The most significant expression used in Art. 12 is "other authorities". [See (iv) above]. This expression is not defined in the Constitution. It is, therefore, for the Supreme Court, as the Apex Court, to define this term. It is obvious that wider the meaning attributed to the term "other authorities" in Art. 12, wider will be the coverage of the Fundamental Rights, i.e., more and more bodies can be brought within the discipline of the Fundamental Rights.

(a) OTHER AUTHORITIES

The interpretation of the term 'other authorities' in Art. 12 has caused a good deal of difficulty, and judicial opinion has undergone changes over time. Today's government performs a large number of functions because of the prevailing phi-

---

67. Ashok Kumar Gupta v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1997) 5 SCC 201, at 248 : 1997 SCC (L&S) 1299.
For discussion on Art. 142, see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. G.

68. Shamdasani v. Central Bank of India, AIR 1952 SC 59; Vidya Verma v. Shivnarain, AIR 1956 SC 108 : (1955) 2 SCR 983.
But see, Arts. 17 and 23, infra, Chs. XXIII, Sec. H and XXVIII, Sec. A.

losophy of a social welfare state.[69] The government acts through natural persons as well as juridical persons. Some functions are discharged through the traditional governmental departments and officials while some functions are discharged through autonomous bodies existing outside the departmental structure, such as, companies, corporations etc.

While the government acting departmentally, or through officials, undoubtedly, falls within the definition of 'state' under Art. 12,[70] doubts have been cast as regards the character of autonomous bodies. Whether they could be regarded as 'authorities' under Art. 12 and, thus, be subject to Fundamental Rights?

An autonomous body may be a statutory body, i.e., a body set up directly by a statute, or it may be a non-statutory body, i.e., a body registered under a general law, such as, the Companies Act, the Societies Registration Act, or a State Co-operative Societies Act, etc. Questions have been raised whether such bodies may be included within the coverage of Art. 12.

For this purpose, the Supreme Court has developed the concept of an "instrumentality" of the state. Any body which can be regarded as an "instrumentality" of the state falls under Art. 12. The reason for adopting such a broad view of Art. 12 is that the Constitution should, whenever possible, "be so construed as to apply to arbitrary application of power against individuals by centres of power. The emerging principle appears to be that a public corporation being a creation of the state is subject to the Constitutional limitation as the state itself".[71] Further that "the governing power wherever located must be subject to the fundamental constitutional limitations".[72]

In Rajasthan State Electricity Board v. Mohanlal,[73] the Supreme Court ruled that a State electricity board, set up by a statute, having some commercial functions to discharge, would be an 'authority' under Art. 12. The Court emphasized that it is not material that some of the powers conferred on the concerned authority are of commercial nature. This is because under Art. 298,[74] the government is empowered to carry on any trade or commerce. Thus, the Court observed: "The circumstance that the Board under the Electricity Supply Act is required to carry on some activities of the nature of trade or commerce does not, therefore give any indication that the 'Board' must be excluded from the scope of the word 'state' is used in Art. 12."

In Sukhdev v. Bhagatram,[75] three statutory bodies, viz., Life Insurance Corporation, Oil and Natural Gas Commission and the Finance Corporation, were held to be "authorities" and, thus, fall within the term 'state' in Art. 12. These corporations do have independent personalities in the eyes of the law, but that does not

---

69. For further discussion on this concept see Ch. XXXIV, infra, under Directive Principles.
70. K.A. Karim & Sons v. I.T.O., 1983 Tax. L.R. 1168; Hujee Mohd. Ibrahim v. Gift Tax Officer, 1983 Tax. L.R. 1160; Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd. v. Registrar of Trade Marks, AIR 1981 Del. 190.
71. MATHEW, J., in Sukhdev v. Bhagatram, AIR 1975 SC 1331 : (1975) 1 SCC 421.
72. AIR 1975 SC, at 1352.
73. AIR 1967 SC 1857 : (1967) 3 SCR 377.
74. See, supra, Ch. XII, Sec. C; infra, Chs. XXIV, XXX and XXXIX.
75. AIR 1975 SC 1331 : (1975) 1 SCC 421.
For a detailed comment on this case see, M.P. JAIN, The Legal Status of Public Corporations and their Employees, 18 JILI 1 (1976).

mean that "they are not subject to the control of the government or that they are not instrumentalities of the government".[76]

The question was considered more thoroughly in Ramanna D. Shetty v. International Airport Authority,[77] The International Airport Authority, a statutory body, was held to be an 'authority'. The Supreme Court also developed the general proposition that an 'instrumentality' or 'agency' of the government would be regarded as an 'authority' or 'State' within Art. 12 and laid down some tests to determine whether a body could be regarded as an instrumentality or not. Where a corporation is an instrumentality or agency of the government, it would be subject to the same constitutional or public law limitation as the government itself. In this case, the Court was enforcing the mandate of Art. 14 against the Corporation.[78]

By now though the question of statutory bodies had been settled, as stated above, yet that of the non-statutory bodies, still continued to cause confusion and difficulty.

In several cases hitherto, a government company incorporated under the Indian Companies Act had been held to be not an 'authority' under Art. 12.[79] In Sabhaji Tewary v. India,[80] a case decided after Sukhdev, the Supreme Court ruled that the Indian Council of Scientific Research, a body registered under the Societies Registration Act (thus a non-statutory body), but under a good deal of governmental control and funding, was not a 'state'.

There were judicial observations in Sukhdev to the effect that even a non-statutory body could be treated as an 'authority' if it could be regarded as an instrumentality or agency of the government. But these observations did not affect the judicial thinking in Sabhajit.[81] Again, the Supreme Court made observations in Raman suggesting that a non-statutory body could be regarded as an 'authority' if it could be regarded as an instrumentality of the government, but the actual body involved there was statutory in nature.

Burmah Shell was nationalised and vested in the Government itself under the Burmah Shell (Acquisition of Undertakings in India) Act, 1976. The Act provided that the undertaking would be vested in a government company. Accordingly, the undertaking was taken over by the Bharat Petroleum Corporation, a government company registered under the Indian Companies Act. The question was whether Bharat Petroleum—which was neither a government department nor

---

76. Ibid., at 1356.

77. AIR 1979 SC 1628 : (1979) 3 SCC 489.
For detailed comments on this case, see M.P. JAIN, JUSTICE BHAGWATI and Indian Adminsitrative Law, (1980) Ban. L.J. 1, 38-45.

78. For further discussion on Ramanna, see, Ch. XXXIX, infra; for Art. 14, see, Ch. XXI, infra.

79. See, R.D. Singe v. Secretary, B.S.S.I. Corp., AIR 1974 Pat. 212; M.L. Nohria v. Gen. Ins. Corp. of India, AIR 1979 P&H 183; Abdul Ahmad v. Govt. Woollen Mill, AIR 1979 J&K 57.

80. AIR 1975 SC 1329 : (1975) 1 SCC 485.
This case has now been overruled : see, infra, 1197.

81. See JAIN, supra, footnote 80.

a statutory body but merely a company—could be regarded as an "authority" and so "state" under Art. 12.

In Som Prakash v. Union of India,[82] the company was held to fall under Art. 12. The Court emphasized that the true test for the purpose whether a body was an 'authority' or not was not whether it was formed by a statute, or under a statute, but it was "functional". In the instant case, the key factor was "the brooding presence of the state behind the operations of the body, statutory or other". In this case, the body was semi-statutory and semi-non-statutory. It was non-statutory in origin (as it was registered); it also was recognised by the Act in question and, thus, had some "statutory flavour" in its operations and functions. In this case, there was a formal transfer of the undertaking from the Government to a government company. The company was thus regarded as the "alter ego" of the Central Government. The control by the Government over the corporation was writ large in the Act and in the factum of being a government company. Agency of a State would mean a body which exercises public functions.[83]

The question regarding the status of a non-statutory body was finally clinched in Ajay Hasia,[84] where a society registered under the Societies Registration Act running the regional engineering college, sponsored, supervised and financially supported by the Government, was held to be an 'authority'. Money to run the college was provided by the State and Central Governments. The State Government could review the functioning of the college and issue suitable instructions if considered necessary. Nominees of the State and Central Governments were members of the society including its Chairman. The Supreme Court ruled that where a corporation is an instrumentality or agency of the government, it must be held to be an authority under Art. 12. "The concept of instrumentality or agency of the government is not limited to a corporation created by a statute but is equally applicable to a company or society…." Thus, a registered society was held to be an 'authority' for the purposes of Art. 12. Ajay Hasia has initiated a new judicial trend, viz., that of expanding the significance of the term "authority".

In Ajay Hasia, The Supreme Court laid down the following tests to adjudge whether a body is an instrumentality of the government or not:

(1) If the entire share capital of the body is held by the government, it goes a long way towards indicating that the body is an instrumentality of the government.

(2) Where the financial assistance given by the government is so large as to meet almost entire expenditure of the body, it may indicate that the body is impregnated with governmental character.

(3) It is a relevant factor if the body enjoys monopoly status which is conferred or protected by the state.

---

82. AIR 1981 SC 212 : (1981) 1 SCC 449.

83. Deewan Singh v. Rajendra Prosad Ardevi, (2007) 10 SCC 528, 542 : AIR 2007 SC 767, it is difficult to extract precisely the principle on which the judgment proceeded.

84. Ajay Hasia v. Khalid Mujib, AIR 1981 SC 487 : (1981) 1 SCC 722.

(4) Existence of deep and pervasive state control may afford an indication that the body is a state instrumentality.

(5) If the functions performed by the body are of public importance and closely related to governmental functions, it is a relevant factor to treat the body as an instrumentality of the government.

The important question is not how the juristic person is born, but why has it been brought into existence? It does not matter what is the structure of the body in question: it may be statutory or non-statutory; it may be set up by, or under, an Act of the Legislature or even administratively. It does not matter whether the body in question has been set up initially by the government or by private enterprise. It does not matter what functions does the body discharge; it may be governmental, semi-governmental, educational, commercial, banking, social service. The Supreme Court has pointed out that even if it may be assumed that one or the other test as provided in the case of Ajay Hasia may be attracted, that by itself would not be sufficient to hold that it is an agency of the State or a company carrying on the functions of public nature.[85] In view of the several views and tests suggested by Supreme Court it is not possible to make a close ended category of bodies which would be considered to be a state within the meaning of Art.12. The question in each case will have to be considered on the basis of facts available as to whether in the light of the cumulative facts as established, the body is financially, functionally, administratively dominated, by, or under the control of the Government. Such control must be particular to the body in question and must be pervasive.

Mere regulatory control whether under statute or otherwise would not serve to make a body a part of the State. Hence when the facts revealed :

(1) The Board of Control of Cricket in India was not created by a statute;

(2) No part of the share capital of the Board was held by the Government;

(3) Practically no financial assistance was given by the Government to meet the whole or entire expenditure of the Board;

(4) The Board did enjoy a monopoly status in the field of cricket but such status is not State conferred or State protected.

(5) There was no existence of a deep and pervasive State control and the control, if any, is only regulatory in nature as applicable to other similar bodies.

(6) The Board was not created by transfer of a government owned corporation and was an autonomous body.

The Court noted that the Union of India has been exercising certain control over the activities of the Board in regard to organizing cricket matches and travel of the Indian team abroad as also granting of permission to allow the foreign teams to come to India. The Court also assumed that even if there was some element of public duty involved in the discharge of the Board's functions the Board would not be an authority for the purpose of Article 12.

85. Federal Bank Ltd. v. Sagar Thomas, (2003) 10 SCC 733 : AIR 2003 SC 4325.

In the absence of any authorization, if a private body chooses to discharge any functions or duties which amount to public duties or State functions which is not prohibited by law then it may be considered to be an instrumentality of the State.[86]

In S. C. Chandra[87] the Supreme Court came dangerously close to creating a confusion in relation to the concepts of instrumentality of the State. The judgment in this case was a common one and involved, amongst others Bharat Coking Coal Limited. Without any discussion whatsoever the Court appears to have approved the view taken by Division Bench of the Jharkhand High Court that BCCL was "not an instrumentality of the State as per Section 617 of the Companies Act as its dominant function was to raise coal and sale and imparting education was not its dominant function.".

The question which arose for decision was whether the teachers of a school not owned by BCCL and was run by a Managing Committee and whose teachers were never appointed by BCCL, although BCCL used to release non-recurring grants subject to certain conditions would result in such teachers to be considered as the employees of BCCL and entitled to all benefits available to the regular employees of BCCL.

In this factual background it is not understandable as to how the question of BCCL being an instrumentality of the State could be of any relevance either before the Division Bench of the High Court or the Supreme Court. Since the school was not owned or managed by BCCL and not even entirely dependent upon financial aid from BCCL it could not have been considered to be an instrumentality of the State. "Dominant function" test was applied in a situation where there was no function which the BCCL was obliged to discharge. This case cannot be an authority for the proposition that BCCL is not an instrumentality of the state.

The Courts have been led to take such an expansive view of Art. 12 because of the feeling that if instrumentalities of the government are not subjected to the same legal discipline as the government itself because of the plea that they were distinct and autonomous legal entities, then the government would be tempted to adopt the stratagem of setting up such administrative structures on a big scale in order to evade the discipline and constraints of the Fundamental Rights thus eroding and negating their efficacy to a very large extent. In this process, judicial control over these bodies would be very much weakened.[88]

---

86. Zee Telefilms Ltd. v. Union of India, (2005) 4 SCC 649 : AIR 2005 SC 2677.
87. S.C.Chandra v. State of Jharkhand, (2007) 8 SCC 279 : AIR 2007 SC 3021.
88. Steel Authority of India Ltd. v. National Union Water Front Workers, AIR 2001 SC 3527, 3540-3542 : (2001) 7 SCC 1.

The law appears to be now settled in view of the judgment of a seven Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court in Pradeep Kumar Biswas[89] where, after considering the authorities it concluded that the tests formulated in Ajay Hasia[90] were not a rigid set of principles so that if a body falls within any of those tests, ex hypothesi, it must be considered to be a State within the meaning of Article 12. The Court suggested a general guideline observing:

> "The question in each case would be whether in the light of the cumulative facts as established, the body is financially, functionally and administratively dominated by or under the control of the Government. Such control must be particular to the body in question and must be pervasive. If this is found then the body is a State within Article 12. On the other hand, when the control is merely regulatory whether under statute or otherwise, it would not serve to make the body a State."

The main tests which the courts apply to determine whether a body is an instrumentality of the government or not are: funding and control. Is the entire share capital or a major part of it held by the government? Is the body in question effectively controlled by the government not only in the making of its policy but also in carrying out its functions? Does the government foot a substantial part of the bill for running the operations of the concerned body? Is the administration of the body in the hands of the government-appointed directors and are they subject to government control in the discharge of their functions? Does the state exercise deep and pervasive control over the body in question? Whether the operation of the corporation is an important public function closely related to governmental functions? Does the body enjoy monopoly status conferred or protected by the state? The above tests are not exhaustive but only indicative or illustrative. It is for the courts to decide in each case whether the body in question falls within the purview of Art. 12.

A company enjoying the monopoly of carrying on a business under an Act of Legislature has the "trappings" of "state" and is an "authority" under Art. 12.[91]

Once a body is characterised as an 'authority' under Art. 12, several significant incidents invariably follow, viz.:

(1) The body becomes subject to the discipline of the Fundamental Rights which means that its actions and decisions can be challenged with reference to the Fundamental Rights.

(2) The body also becomes subject to the discipline of Administrative Law.

(3) The body becomes subject to the writ jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under Art. 32 and that of the High Courts under Art. 226.

---

89. Pradeep Kumar Biswas v. Indian Institute of Chemical Biology, (2002) 5 SCC 111 : (2002) 4 JT 146. See also Steel Authority of India Limited v. Madhusudan Das, (2008) 15 SCC 560. See also State of U.P. v. Radhey Shyam Rai, (2009) 5 SCC 577 : (2009) 3 JT 393.

90. Ajay Hasia v. Khalid Mujib Sehravardi, (1981) 1 SCC 722 : AIR 1981 SC 487.

91. Biman Kishore Bose v. United India Insurance Co. Ltd., (2001) 6 SCC 477 : (2001) 6 JT 125.

In course of time, the Supreme Court has been expanding the horizon of the term "other authority" in Art. 12. A large number of bodies, statutory[1] and non-statutory,[2] have been held to be 'authorities' for purposes of Art. 12. For example, the Supreme Court has held the Statistical Institute as an authority. It is a registered society but is governed by the Indian Statistical Institute Act, 1959. The composition of the body is dominated by the representatives appointed by the Central Government. The money required for running the Institute is provided entirely by the Central Government. It has to comply with all the directions issued by the Central Government. "The control of the Central Government is deep and pervasive and, therefore, to all intents and purposes, it is an instrumentality of the Central Government and as such is an 'authority' within the meaning of Art. 12 of the Constitution".[3]

The Indian Council of Agricultural Research came into existence as a department of the government, continued to be an attached office of the government even though it was registered as a society, it was wholly financed by the government. The ICAR was accordingly held to be an 'authority' under Art. 12 as it was a society set up by the state.[4] A cooperative society is not a State within Art. 12 unless the tests indicated in Ajay Hasia,[5] are satisfied.[6] Cooperative societies cannot be, without examination of relevant factual aspects, equated with public sector undertakings.[7]

In Central Inland Water Transport Corporation v. Brojo Nath,[8] the corporation, a government company incorporated under the Companies Act, has been held to be an authority, and so the 'state' within the meaning of Art. 12. The Supreme Court has laid down the following significant principle in this regard:

> "If there is an instrumentality or agency of the state which has assumed the garb of a government company as defined in S. 617 of the Companies Act, it does not follow that it thereby ceases to be an instrumentality or agency of the

---

1. Statutory bodies held to fall under Art. 12—Food Corporation: Punjab v. Raja Ram, AIR 1981 SC 1694 : (1981) 2 SCR 712; State Bank of India: State Bank of India v. Kalpaka Transport Co., AIR 1979 Bom. 250; Utter Pradesh Warehousing Corporation: U.P. Warehousing Corporation v. Vijay Narain, AIR 1980 SC 840. Gujarat State Financial Corporation: Guj. State Fin. Corp. v. Lotus Hotels (P) Ltd., AIR 1983 SC 848; University: Gadadhar v. Calcutta University, AIR 1981 Cal. 216; Electricity Board: Omega Advertising Agency v. State Electricity Board, AIR 1982 Gau. 37 : DCM Ltd. v. Assistant Engineer, Rajasthan State Electricity Board, Kota, AIR 1988 Raj 64; Oil and Natural Gas Commission: Oil and Natural Gas Commission v. Association of N.G.C. Industries of Gujarat, AIR 1990 SC 1851; Nationalised Banks: Hyderabad Commercials v. Indian Bank, AIR 1991 SC 247; Life Corporation of India: LIC of India v. Consumer Education & Research Centre, AIR 1995 SC 1811; Harshad J. Shah v. LIC, AIR 1997 SC 2459 : (1997) 5 SCC 64; see also Bank of India v. O.P. Swarnakar, (2003) 2 SCC 721 : AIR 2003 SC 838, Nationalised Banks held covered.

2. Non-statutory bodies—Andhra Pradesh State Irrigation Development Corporation (a body registered under the Indian Companies Act): B. Satyanarayana v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1981 AP 125; Delhi Transport Corporation v. D.T.C. Mazdoor Congress, AIR 1991 SC 101 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 600. Also see, infra, footnotes 21, 22.

3. B.S. Minhas v. Indian Statistical Institute, AIR 1984 SC 363, 369 : (1983) 4 SCC 582.

4. P.K. Ramachandra Iyer v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 541 : (1984) 2 SCC 141.

5. (1981) 1 SCC 722.

6. Zoroastrian Coop. Housing Society Ltd. v. District Registrar, Co-op. Societies (Urban), (2005) 5 SCC 632 : AIR 2005 SC 2306, held to be not 'state'.

7. UPSEB v. Sant Kabir Sahakari Katai Mills Ltd., (2005) 7 SCC 576 : (2005) 8 JT 399. See also State of Assam v. Barak Upatyaka D.U. Karmachari Sanstha, (2009) 5 SCC 694 : AIR 2009 SC 2249, mere provision of financial assistance for several years is not conclusive.

8. AIR 1986 SC 1571 : (1986) 3 SCC 156.

state. For the purposes of Art. 12, one must necessarily see through the corporate veil to ascertain whether behind that veil is the face of an instrumentality or agency of the state".

Mysore Paper Mills, a government company, has been held to be an instrumentality of the State Government and, hence, an authority under Art. 12.[9] More than 97% of the share capital of the company has been contributed by the State Government and the financial institutions of the Central Government, Out of 12 directors, 5 are government nominees and the rest are approved by the Government; the company has been entrusted with important public duties and the Government exercises various other forms of supervision over the company. The company is an instrumentality of the Government and its physical form of a company "is merely a cloak or cover for the Government." Any doubt as to whether a writ petition under Art. 226 would lie against state corporation has been set at rest by the declaration of the Supreme Court.[10]

Not only a body sponsored or created by the government may be treated as an 'authority', but even a private body (one sponsored and formed by private persons) may be so treated if—(i) it is supported by extraordinary assistance given by the state, or (ii) if the state funding is not very large, state financial support coupled with an unusual degree of control over its management and policies may lead to the same result. The various tests laid down in Ajay Hasia case would have to be applied and considered cumulatively.[11] Applying Ajay Hasia tests (i) to (iv) it has been held that the appellant Mill was neither an instrumentality nor an agency of the Government and was not an "other authority".

The Cochin Refineries Ltd. incorporated under the Companies Act has been held to be not an 'authority' because only 53 per cent of its share capital has been subscribed by the Central Government; 26 per cent share is held by a private foreign company which also nominates two directors on the board of directors; government control over the company is not large; government's financial assistance is not unusual.[12] And a general regulation under a statute does not render activities of the body so regulated as subject to such control of the State as to bring it within the meaning of State under Art. 12.[13]

Some non-statutory bodies which have been held to be 'authorities' within the meaning of Art. 12 are:

1. The Council for the Indian School Certificate Examinations—a society registered under the Societies Registration Act, and imparting education and holding examinations.[14]

---

9. Mysore Paper Mills Ltd. v. The Mysore Paper Mills Officers' Association, (2002) 2 SCC 167 : AIR 2002 SC 609.

10. Virendra Kumar Srivastava v. U.P. Rajya Karmachari Kalyan Nigam, (2005) 1 SCC 149 : AIR 2005 SC 411.

11. GM, Kisan Sahkari Chini Mills Ltd. v. Satrughan Nishad, (2003) 8 SCC 639 : AIR 2003 SC 4531.

12. R.M. Thomas v. Cochin Refineries Ltd., AIR 1982 Ker. 248.
Also see, Pritam Singh v. State of P&H, AIR 1982 P&H 228.
The Bengal Chamber of Commerce registered under the Companies Act is not an authority: In re: M.L. Shaw, AIR 1984 Cal 22.

13. S.S.Rana v. Registrar Coop. Societies, (2006) 11 SCC 634 : (2006) 5 JT 186.

14. Vibhu Kapoor v. Council of I.S.C. Examination, AIR 1985 Del 142.

2. An aided school receiving 95% of its expenses by way of government grant and subject to regulations made by the department of education though managed by a registered body.[15]
3. The Indian Council of Agricultural Research, a society registered under the Societies Registration Act.[16]
4. Even if the entire share capital of a company is subscribed by the government, it cannot yet be treated as a government department. The company has its own corporate personality distinct from the government. Such a government company can still be treated as an authority under Art. 12.[17] Government companies, such as, Bharat Earth Movers Ltd., Indian Telephone Industries Ltd., in which the Government holds 51% share capital, and which are subject to pervasive government control, have been held to be "other authorities" under Art. 12.[18]
5. The regional rural banks set up in pursuance of the power given by a statute. A regional bank is wholly funded by a nationalised bank, Central Government and the State Government. It is sponsored by a nationalised bank; it is under the pervasive control of the Central Government and it discharges functions analogous to those discharged by a welfare state.[19]
6. The Sainik School Society registered under the Societies Registration Act. The society establishes and manages Sainik schools. A Sainik school is fully funded by the Central and State Governments and the Central Government exercises over-all control over the society.[20]
7. The State Financial Corporation constituted under the State Financial Corporation Act, 1951 has been held to be state within the meaning of Article 12 of the Constitution and was required to act fairly, reasonably in accordance with the statutory and constitutional scheme including Article 14.[21]
8. The Children's Aid Society, a registered body under the Societies Registration Act, having the Chief Minister of Maharashtra as the ex-officio President and the Minister of Social Welfare as its Vice-President.[22]
9. National Agricultural Cooperative Federation of India (NAFED).[23]

---

15. Manmohan Singh v. Commr., U.T., Chandigarh, AIR 1985 SC 364 : 1984 Supp SCC 540.
16. P.K. Ramachandra Iyer v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 541 : (1984) 2 SCC 141.
17. Dr. S.L. Agarwal v. The Gen. Manager, Hindustan Steel Ltd., AIR 1970 SC 1150; Western Coalfields Ltd.v. Special Area Dev. Authority, AIR 1982 SC 697 : (1982) 1 SCC 125; Steel Authority of India Ltd. v. Shri Ambica Mills Ltd., AIR 1998 SC 418 : (1998) 1 SCC 465; Hindustan Steel Works Construction Ltd. v. State of Kerala, AIR 1997 SC 2275; Balbir Kaur v. Steel Authority of India, AIR 2000 SC 1596 : (2000) 6 SCC 493. See also State of Uttaranchal v. Alok Sharma, Subsidiaries of Kumaon Mandal Vikas Nigam Ltd. (though wound up) were 'State', (2009) 7 SCC 647 : (2009) 6 JT 463.
18. M. Kumar v. Earth Movers Ltd., AIR 1999 Kant 343.
19. Chairman, Prathama Bank Moradabad v. Vijay Kumar, AIR 1989 SC 1977 : (1989) 4 SCC 441.
20. All India Sainik Schools Employees Ass. v. Defence Minister-cum-Chairman, Board of Governors, Sainik School Society, AIR 1989 SC 88 : 1989 Supp (1) SCC 205.
21. Everest Wools Pvt. Ltd. v. U.P. Financial Corporation, (2008) 1 SCC 643 : (2008) 1 JT 140.
22. Sheela Barse v. Secretary, Children Aid Society, AIR 1987 SC 656 : (1987) 3 SCC 50.
23. Ajoomal v. Lilaram, AIR 1983 SC 278 : (1983) 1 SCC 119.

10. Delhi Stock Exchange is covered by definition of State under Art. 12 and amenable to writ jurisdiction of High Court.[24]
11. Projects and Equipment Corp. of India, a subsidiary owned by the State Trading Corporation which is also a non-statutory body.[25]
12. U.P. State Co-operative Land Development Bank Ltd. is a cooperative society but it is under pervasive control of the State Government and is an extended arm of the Government. It is thus an instrumentality of the State.[26]

In Sabhajit Tewary,[27] the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research (CSIR) was held to be not an "authority" under Art. 12. Now, the Supreme Court has overruled Tewary holding it to be erroneous. CSIR has now been held to be an "authority" under Art. 12.[28]

Punjab Water Supply & Sewerage Board is an autonomous body and the statute which incorporates it provides that any direction issued by the State shall be binding on it and brings it within the concept of State in Art. 12 and are bound to comply with the Constitutional scheme of equality enshrined in Articles 14 and 16 of the Constitution of India.[29]

In this expansive trend, there have been some discordant notes as well. One such example is furnished by Tekraj v. Union of India,[30] where the Supreme Court has held the Institute of Constitutional and Parliamentary Studies as not being an 'authority' under Art. 12. The Institute is a registered society receiving grants from the Central Government and having the President of India, Vice-President and the Prime Minister among its honorary members. The Central Government exercises a good deal of control over the Institute. In spite of Government funding and control, the Court has refused to hold it as an authority with the remark:

> "…… ICPS is a case of its type—typical in many ways and the normal tests may perhaps not properly apply to test its character."

On the same basis, National Council of Educational Research and Training has been held to be outside the scope of Art. 12. NCERT is a society registered under the Societies Registration Act. It is largely an autonomous body; its activities are not wholly related to governmental functions; government control is confined mostly to ensuring that its funds are property utilised; its funding is not entirely from government sources.[31]

A private educational institution, even if it is recognised by, or affiliated to, a university, cannot be regarded as an instrumentality of the government for pur-

---

24. K. C. Sharma v. Delhi Stock Exchange, (2005) 4 SCC 4 : AIR 2005 SC 2884.
25. A.L. Kalra v. P & E Corp. of India, AIR 1984 SC 1361.
26. U.P. State Coop. Land Development Bank Ltd. v. Chandra Bhan Dubey, AIR 1999 SC 753 : (1999) 1 SCC 741.
27. Supra, note 73.
28. Pradeep Kumar Biswas v. Indian Institute of Chemical Biology, 2002 5 SCC 111 : (2002) 4 JT 146.
29. Punjab Water Supply and Sewerage Board v. Ranjodh Singh, (2007) 2 SCC 491 : AIR 2007 SC 1082.
30. AIR 1988 SC 469 : (1988) 1 SCC 236.
31. Chander Mohan Khanna v. National Council of Educational Research and Training, (1991) 4 SCC 578 : AIR 1992 SC 76.

poses of Art. 12. Recognition is only for the purposes of conforming to the standards laid down by the State. Affiliation is with regard to the syllabi and the courses of study.[32]

The expanding connotation being given to the term 'authority' in Art. 12 is an instance of judicial creativity. The courts have adopted this stance to bring as many bodies as possible within the discipline of Fundamental Rights. Wider the concept of 'other authority' wider the coverage of Fundamental Rights.

The courts have been able to bring within the sweep of Fundamental Rights every instrumentality or agency through which the government acts. Almost all government activities have been subjected to the obligation of Fundamental Rights. BHAGWATI, J., in his opinion in Ajay Hasia[33] provided the rationale for expansively interpreting the term "authority" in Art. 12. A modern government functions, under the impulse of the philosophy of a welfare state, on a very broad scale: it undertakes a multitude of socio-economic functions.[34] For the sake of convenience, the government not always departmentally but also through various types of bodies, such as, a company, co-operative society, corporation etc., "but this contrivance of carrying on such activities through a corporation cannot exonerate the government from implicit obedience to the Fundamental Rights." BHAGWATI, J., went on to observe:

> "To use the corporate methodology is not to liberate the government from its basic obligation to respect the Fundamental Rights and not to override them. The mantle of a corporation may be adopted in order to free the Government from the inevitable constraints of red-tapism and slow motion but by doing so, the Government cannot be allowed to play truant with the basic human rights. Otherwise it would be the easiest thing for the Government to assign to a plurality of corporations almost every state business, such as, Post and Telegraph, T.V. and Radio, Rail Road and Telephones—in short every economic activity and thereby cheat the people of India out of the Fundamental Rights guaranteed to them."[35]

BHAGWATI, J., maintained:

> "The courts should be anxious to enlarge the scope and width of the Fundamental Rights by bringing within their sweep every authority which is an instrumentality or agency of the government or through the corporate personality of which the government is acting…"

Thus, in giving an expansive interpretation to the term "other authority" in Art. 12, the Supreme Court is discharging its protective role, i.e., to protect the Fundamental Rights from being annihilated by the Government resorting to the expedient of setting up various bodies, outside government departments, to discharge its manifold functions.

A Fundamental Right can be enforced against an authority when it is within the Indian territory, or it is under the control of the Government of India though outside the Indian territory. In the latter case, a writ would be issued to the Gov-

---

32. Unni Krishnan, J.P. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1993 SC 2178, at 2206 : (1993) 1 SCC 645.
33. AIR 1981 SC 487 : (1981) 1 SCC 722; supra, footnote 90.
34. For discussion on this aspect, see, under "Directive Principles", Ch. XXXIV, infra.
35. AIR 1981 SC 487, at 493 : (1981) 1 SCC 722.

ernment of India which can have it executed by the concerned authority by exercising its power of control over it.

A quasi-judicial authority is not subject to the control of the government in the functional sense, and, therefore, no order can be passed against the government for enforcement of a Fundamental Right by a quasi-judicial body functioning outside India.[36] As the Supreme Court has stated, the mere fact that the authority is appointed and is subject to the disciplinary action by the government, is not determinative of the question of control.

What is necessary is a control of functions of the authority; the government should be in a position to give directions to the authority "to function in a particular manner with respect to such function". The government can exercise such control over an administrative or executive body but not on a quasi-judicial body. The government could not direct a quasi-judicial body to act in a particular matter before it in a particular manner. It therefore resolves to this that no Fundamental Right can be claimed against a quasi-judicial body functioning outside the Indian territory.

Another example of the expansive interpretation of the expression "other authorities" in Art. 12 is furnished by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Pradeep Kumar Biswas v. Indian Institute of Chemical Biology.[37] In this case, the Supreme Court has overruled Sabhajit Tewary[38] and has held that the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research (CSIR) is an authority under Art. 12 and was bound by Art. 14.[39] The Court has ruled that "the control of the Government in CSIR is ubiquitous". The Court has now laid down the following proposition for identification of "authorities" within Art. 12:

> "The question in each case would be—whether in the light of the cumulative facts as established, the body is financially, functionally and administratively dominated by or under the control of the government. Such control must be particular to the body in question and must be pervasive. If this is found then the body is a state within Art. 12. On the other hand, when the control is merely regulatory whether under statute or otherwise, it would not serve to make the body a state".[40]

Even though a body, entity or corporation is held to be "State" within the definition of Article 12 of the Constitution, what relief is to be granted to the aggrieved person or employee of such a body or entity is a subject matter in each case for the Court to determine on the basis of the structure of that society and also its financial capability and viability.[41]

Bombay Port Trust is an instrumentality of the State and hence an "authority" within the meaning of Article 12 and amenable to writ jurisdiction of the Court.[42]

---

36. K.S. Rama Murthy v. Chief Commissioner, Pondicherry, AIR 1963 SC 1464 : (1964) 1 SCR 656. For a comment on the case, see, 5 JILI, 522.
37. (2002) 5 SCC 111 : (2002) 4 JT 146.
38. Supra, note.
39. Infra, Ch. XXI.
40. (2002) 5 SCC at 134.
41. Virendra Kumar Srivastava v. U.P. Rajya Karmachari Kalyan Nigam, (2005) 1 SCC 149 : AIR 2005 SC 411.
42. Jamshed Hormusji Wadia v. Board of Trustees, Port of Mumbai, (2004) 3 SCC 214 : AIR 2004 SC 1815.

The multiple test as laid down by the majority view in Pradip Biswas is to be applied for ascertaining whether a body is a State within the meaning of Art. 12.[43]

(b) LOCAL AUTHORITY

The expression 'local authority' in Art. 12 refers to a unit of local self-government like a municipal committee or a village panchayat.[44]

The Delhi Development Authority, a statutory body, has been held to be a 'local authority' because it is constituted for the specific purpose of development of Delhi according to plan which is ordinarily a municipal function.[45] The activities of the D.D.A. are limited to Delhi. It has some element of popular representation in its composition and enjoys a considerable degree of autonomy.

In the instant case, reference was made to the definition of "local authority" given in S. 3(31) of the General Clauses Act which runs as follows:

> "'Local authority' shall mean a municipal committee, district board, body of port commissioners or other authority legally entitled to, or entrusted by the Government with, the control or management of a municipal or local fund."

The Supreme Court has ruled that to be characterised as a 'local authority', the authority concerned must have separate legal existence as a corporate body, it must not be a mere government agency but must be legally an independent entity; it must function in a defined area and must ordinarily, wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, be elected by the inhabitants of the area. It must also enjoy a certain degree of autonomy either complete or partial, must be entrusted by statute with such governmental functions and duties as are usually entrusted to municipal bodies such as those connected with providing amenities to the inhabitants of the locality like health and education, water and sewerage, town planning and development roads, markets, transportation, social welfare services, etc. Finally, such a body must have the power to raise funds for furtherance of its activities and fulfillment of its objectives by levying taxes, rates, charges or fees.

In Calcutta State Transport Corporation v. Commr. of Income-tax, West Bengal,[46] the Supreme Court refused to characterise the Corporation as a 'local authority'. The corporation is meant only for the purpose of providing road transport services and has no element of popular representation in its constitution. Its powers and functions bear no relation to the powers and functions of a municipal committee. It is more in the nature of a trading corporation.

A Fundamental Right is not infringed by a judicial order and no action, therefore, lies against a Court or judge on the ground of breach of a Fundamental

---

43. Virendra Kumar Srivastava v. U.P. Rajya Karmachari Kalyan Nigam, (2005) 1 SCC 149 : AIR 2005 SC 411.

44. Ajit Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1967 SC 856 : (1967) 2 SCR 143; State of Gujarat v. Shantilal Mangaldas, AIR 1969 SC 634 : (1969) 1 SCC 509; J. Hiralal v. Bangalore Municipality, AIR 1982 Knt. 137.
See, Supra, Ch. IX, Secs. H and I.

45. Union of India v. R.C. Jain, AIR 1981 SC 951 : (1981) 2 SCC 308.
Also, Premji Bhai Parmar v. Delhi Development Authority, AIR 1980 SC 738 : (1980) 2 SCC 129.

46. AIR 1996 SC 1316 : (1996) 8 SCC 758.

Right,[47] the reason being that what a judicial decision purports to do is to decide the controversy between the parties brought before the court.

Even a quasi-judicial body acting within its jurisdiction under a valid law does not infringe a Fundamental Right merely by misinterpreting a law.[48] But if a quasi-judicial body acts under an ultra vires law, or outside its jurisdiction, or ignores mandatory rules of procedure prescribed in the relevant law, or infringes principles of natural justice, and thereby affects a Fundamental right then its action can be quashed by the courts.[49]

IBA and Banks which were created under respective Parliamentary Acts or nationalized in terms of the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Acts, 1970 and 1980 were "State" within meaning of Art. 12.[50]

Without expressing any opinion on the question as to whether a cooperative society is a "State" within the meaning of Article 12 of the Constitution, the Supreme Court has held that a writ petition will be maintainable when the action of the cooperative society is violative of mandatory statutory provisions by which it is governed.[51]

E. LAW

Another term used in Art. 13(2) is 'law'.[52]

The basic norm contained in Art. 13(2) is that any 'law' inconsistent with a Fundamental Right is void.

The term 'law' in Art. 13 has been given a wide connotation so as to include any ordinance, order, bye-law, rule, regulation, notification, custom or usage having in the territory of India the force of law [Art. 13(3)(a)]. This means that, not only a piece of legislation, but any of the things mentioned here can be challenged as infringing a Fundamental Right. Accordingly, inter alia the following have been held to be 'law' under Art. 13, the validity of which can be tested on the touchstone of Fundamental Rights:

(i) a resolution passed by a State Government under Fundamental Rule 44 of the State;[53]

(ii) a government notification under the Commissions of Inquiry Act setting up a commission of inquiry;[54]

(iii) a notification[55] or an order[56] under a statute;

---

47. Naresh v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1967 SC 1 : (1966) 3 SCR 744.
48. Ujjam Bai v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1962 SC 1621 : (1963) 1 SCR 778; Pioneer Traders v. C.C., Imports and Exports, AIR 1963 SC 734 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 349.
For a comment on the Ujjam Bai case, see, 4 JILI, 452.
49. Kamala Mills v. Bombay, AIR 1965 SC 1942 : 1966 (1) SCR 64.
See, under 'Certiorari', Ch. VIII, Sec. E(iv), supra.
50. Indian Banks' Association, Bombay v. Devkala Consultancy Service, (2004) 11 SCC 1 : AIR 2004 SC 2615.
51. A. Umarani v. Registrar, Coop. Societies (2004) 7 SCC 112 : AIR 2004 SC 4504 Quere – why it should not be applicable limited companies or registered bodies etc.
52. Supra.
53. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Mandawar, AIR 1954 SC 493 : (1955) 1 SCR 599.
54. Dalmia v. Justice Tendolkar, AIR 1958 SC 538 : 1959 SCR 279.
55. Madhubhai Amathalal Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1961 SC 21 : (1961) 1 SCR 191.
56. Pannalal Binjraj v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 397 : 1957 SCR 233.

(iv) an administrative order;[57] but administrative instruction is not law within the meaning of Article 13.[58]

(v) a custom or usage;[59]

(vi) bye-laws of a municipal or a statutory body;[60]

(vii) regulations made by a statutory corporation like the Life Insurance Corporation.[61]

The validity of the above can be questioned under the Fundamental Rights.

The bye-laws of a co-operative society framed under the Co-operative Societies Act do not fall within the purview of Art. 13.[62]

Parliament, while making an Act cannot be deemed to have taken into consideration an earlier law found to be in contravention of Art. 13.[63]

Though a law as such may not be invalid, yet an order made under it can still be challenged as being inconsistent with a Fundamental Right because no law can be presumed to authorise anything unconstitutional.[64]

A question of great importance which has been debated in India from time to time is whether the term 'law' in Art. 13(1) would include an Act passed by Parliament to amend the Constitution. The question has been discussed fully at a later stage in this book.[65]

One point needs to be emphasized. A restriction on a Fundamental Right can be imposed only through a statute, statutory rule or statutory regulation. A Fundamental Right cannot be put under restraint merely by an administrative direction not having the force of law.[66]

(a) PERSONAL LAWS

There prevail in India several personal laws, such as, Hindu Law, Muslim Law, Parsi Law, Christan Law of marriage and divorce. These are by and large non-statutory, traditional systems of law having some affinity with the concerned religion. Being ancient systems of law, there are several aspects of these systems of laws which are out of time with the modern thinking and may even be incompatible with some Fundamental Rights.

From time to time, several features of these laws have been challenged before the courts on the ground of their incompatibility with the Fundamental Rights. By and large, in such cases, the courts have adopted an equivocal attitude. The 57. Balaji v. State of Mysore, AIR 1963 SC 649 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 439.

---

58. Punit Rai v. Dinesh Chaudhary, (2003) 8 SCC 204 : AIR 2003 SC 4355.
59. Sant Ram v. Labh Singh, AIR 1965 SC 314 : (1964) 7 SCR 756.
60. Tahir v. District Board, AIR 1954 SC 630.
61. Bhagatram, supra; Hirendra Nath Bakshi v. Life Insurance Corp., AIR 1976 Cal. 88.
62. Co-op. Credit Bank v. Industrial Tribunal, AIR 1970 SC 245.
63. Rakesh Vij v. Raminder Pal Singh Sethi, (2005) 8 SCC 504 : AIR 2005 SC 3593.
64. Narendra Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 430 : (1960) 2 SCR 375; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bharat Singh, AIR 1967 SC 1170 : (1967) 2 SCR 454.
65. Infra, Ch. XLI.
66. Bishan Dass v. State of Punjab, AIR 1961 SC 1570 : (1962) 2 SCR 69; Kharak Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1963 SC 1295 : (1964) 1 SCR 332; Satwant Singh v. A.P.O., AIR 1967 SC 1836 : (1967) 3 SCR 525.

courts have adopted the policy of non-interference keeping in view the susceptibilities of the groups to which these laws apply.

For this purpose, the courts have adopted two strategies. One, in some cases the courts have ruled that the challenged features of personal laws are not incompatible with the Fundamental Rights. Reference to this aspect is made in the course of the following discussion on specific Fundamental Rights, especially, under Arts. 14, 15, 25 and 26. Two, the courts have denied that the personal laws fall within the coverage of Art. 13 and, thus, these laws cannot be challenged under the Fundamental Rights. For instance, GAJENDRAGADKAR, J., observed in State of Bombay v. Narasu Appa Mali:[67]

> "……. the framers of the Constitution wanted to leave the personal laws outside the ambit of Part III of the Constitution (viz., Fundamental Rights). They must have been aware that these personal laws needed to the reformed in many material particulars and in fact they wanted to abolish these different personal laws and to evolve one common code. Yet they did not wish that the provisions of the personal laws should be challenged by reason of the Fundamental Rights …. and so they did not intend to include these personal laws within the definition of the expression "laws in force".

The view expressed by the Bombay High Court in Narasu has been reiterated in several cases by the High Courts[68] and the Supreme Court.[69] For example, in Ahmedabad Women Action Group v. Union of India,[70] a public interest litigation was filed through a writ petition to declare the Muslim Personal Law which allows polygamy as void as offending Arts. 14 and 15.[71] The Supreme Court refused to take congnisance of the matter. The Court observed that the issues raised involve questions of state policy with which the Court does not ordinarily have any concern. The remedy lies somewhere else (meaning the Legislature) rather than the courts.

In P.E. Mathew v. Union of India,[72] s. 17 of the Indian Divorce Act, a Central pre-Constitutional Law, was challenged as arbitrary, discriminatory and violative of Art. 14. But the Kerala High Court adopted the ratio of the Supreme Court cases, cited above, that the personal Christian Law, lay outside the scope of Fundamental Rights. Though the Court did agree that s. 17 was unjustified and discriminatory yet it did not say so. The Court left the matter to the Legislature to amend the law adopting the plea that personal laws do not fall under the purview of the Fundamental Rights. The Court ruled that personal laws are outside the scope of Art. 13(1) as they are not laws as defined in Art. 13(3)(b).

A word of comment on the line of decisions mentioned above may be in order at this stage.

After the commencement of the Constitution, several Acts have been passed by Parliament and the State Legislatures modifying several aspects of these personal laws. Prima facie, it is difficult to argue that these statutes do not fall within the scope of Art. 13(3)(a). But because of the sensitivities of the people

---

67. AIR 1952 Bom 84.
68. Srinivasa Aiyar v. Saraswati Ammal, AIR 1952 Mad 193; Ram Prasad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1957 All 411.
69. Krishna Singh v. Mathura Ahir, AIR 1980 SC 707 : (1981) 3 SCC 689.
70. AIR 1997 SC 3614 : (1997) 3 SCC 573.
71. For discussion on Arts. 14 and 15(1), see, Chapters XXI and XXII, infra.
72. AIR 1999 Ker 345.

and the delicate nature of the issues involved, the Courts have thought it prudent not to interfere with these laws on the touchstone of Fundamental Rights and leave it to the Legislature to reform these laws so as to bring them in conformity with the Fundamental Rights.

Article 13(1) says that all "laws in force" in India when the Constitution comes in force shall be void if inconsistent with a Fundamental Right. According to Art. 13(3)(b), the expression "laws in force" includes laws passed or made by a Legislature or other competent authority." This is an inclusive definition. It is clear, that Art. 13(3)(b) does not exclude other forms of law besides the pre-Constitution legislative enactments. But the Court has rejected the argument that Art. 13(1)(b) is only inclusive and not exhaustive. Even if we accept the literal, technical and narrow interpretation of Art. 13(3)(b) that it refers only to pre-Constitution legislation and does not include uncodified judge-made amorphous personal laws, there is no reasons or logic in excluding from the scope of Fundamental Rights legislative Acts enacted in the area of personal laws before and after the commencement of the Constitution, such as, the Indian Divorce Act. The only explanation for this judicial stance can be that as a matter of judicial policy the courts do not wish to get involved in the delicate task of adjudging these Acts vis-à-vis Fundamental Rights.[73]

(b) CUSTOM

What is the position of customs extant in India before the commencement of the Constitution and continued thereafter. In Gazula Dasaratha Rama Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[74] the Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court expressed the view that Art. 13(1) which says that laws in force in India before the commencement of the Constitution shall be void if inconsistent with Fundamental Rights "includes custom or usage having the force of law". The Court observed:

> "Therefore, even if there was a custom which has been recognized by law… that custom must yield to a Fundamental Right".

In Sant Ram v. Labh Singh,[75] the Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court ruled that a customary right of pre-emption by vicinage was void under Art. 19(1)(f).[76] The Court referred to Art. 13(1)(a) which says that 'law' includes 'custom'. The Court also ruled that the definition of 'laws in force' contained in Art. 13(1)(b) "does not in any way restrict the ambit of the word 'law' in Art. 13(1)(a).[77]

In Madhu Kishwar v. State of Bihar,[78] RAMASWAMI, J., expressed the view that customs of tribals, though elevated to the status of law by Art. 13(1)(a), "yet it is essential that the customs inconsistent with or repugnant to constitutional Scheme must always yield place to Fundamental Rights."

RAMASWAMI, J., adopting an activist attitude ruled that tribal women would succeed to the estate of their male relations. The majority generally agreed with

---

73. This topic has further been discussed later. See, Chs. XXI, XXII, XXIX and XXXIV, infra.
74. AIR 1961 SC 564, 570 : (1961) 2 SCR 931.
75. AIR 1965 SC 314 : (1964) 7 SCR 756.
76. For discussion on Art. 19(1)(f), see Ch. XXXI, Sec. D.
77. Ibid., at 316.
78. AIR 1996 SC 1864, 1871 : (1996) 5 SCC 125.

this approach though it adopted a conservative approach in the specific situation and desisted from declaring a tribal custom as inconsistent with Art. 14 saying that to do so "would bring about a chaos in the existing state of law."[79] The majority made male succession subject to the right of livelihood of the female dependent.

This discussion reveals a dichotomy in the judicial attitudes as expressed in Madhu Kishwar[80] and Narasu Appa Mali[81] If the Supreme Court holds customs pre-existing the constitution to be subject to Fundamental Rights, then there seems to be no reason as to why personal laws ought not to be held subject to Fundamental Rights.

In the view of the author, the Supreme Court has adopted the correct approach in the cases concerning customs. In cases concerning personal laws, the courts have adopted a policy approach, rather than a legalistic approach.

F. UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF A STATUTE

Article 13(1) refers to pre-Constitution laws while Art. 13(2) refers to post-Constitution laws. A law is void if inconsistent with a Fundamental Right.

A void statute is unenforceable, non-est, and devoid of any legal force: courts take no notice of such a statute, and it is taken to be notionally obliterated for all purposes.

In Behram v. State of Bombay,[82] the Supreme Court has observed on this point:

> "Where a statute is adjudged to be unconstitutional, it is as if it had never been. Rights cannot be built up under it, contracts which depend upon it for their consideration are void, it constitutes a protection to no one who has acted under it and no one can be punished for having refused obedience to it before the decision was made. And what is true of an Act void in toto is true also as to any part of an Act which is found to be unconstitutional and which consequently has to be regarded as having never at any time been possessed of any legal force…."

Any law made in contravention of Part III is dead from the very beginning and cannot at all be taken notice of or read for any purpose whatsoever.[83]

The above proposition is not however universally or absolutely true in all situations. It is subject to a few exceptions as follows:

(1) Some Fundamental Rights apply to all persons, citizens as well as non-citizens, e.g., Arts. 14, 21, while some of these Rights, such as Art. 19, apply only to citizens.[84]

---

79. Ibid., at 1885.
80. Supra, footnote 78.
81. Supra, footnote 67; also, supra, footnote 70.
82. Behram v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 123 : (1955) 1 SCR 613.
Also see, VENKATARAMAN, The Status of an Unconstitutional Statute, 2 JILI, 401 (1960).
For further discussion on this topic see, Ch. XL, Sec. F, infra.
83. Rakesh Vij v. Raminder Pal Singh Sethi, (2005) 8 SCC 504 : AIR 2005 SC 3593.
84. Chairman Rly. Board v. Chandrima Das, AIR 2000 SC 988 : (2000) 2 SCC 465.
Also see, infra, under Arts. 14, 19 & 21.

A law inconsistent with a Fundamental Right of the former type is ineffective qua all persons. On the other hand, a law inconsistent with a Fundamental Right available to citizens only, is non-est only qua citizens but not qua non-citizens who cannot claim the benefit of the Fundamental Right in question.[85]

(2) Art. 13(1) is prospective and not retrospective.[86] Therefore, a pre-Constitution law inconsistent with a Fundamental Right becomes void only after the commencement of the Constitution. Any substantive rights and liabilities accruing under it prior to the enforcement of the Constitution are not nullified. It is ineffective only with respect to the enforcement of rights and liabilities in the post-Constitution period.

A person was being prosecuted under a law before the Constitution came into force. After the Constitution came into force, the law became void under Art. 19(1)(a).[87] It was held that Art. 13(1) could not apply to him as the offence had been committed before the enforcement of the Constitution and, therefore, the proceedings against him were not affected.[88]

But the procedure through which rights and liabilities were being enforced in the pre-Constitution era is a different matter. A discriminatory procedure becomes void after the commencement of the Constitution and so it cannot operate even to enforce the pre-Constitution rights and liabilities.[89] A law inconsistent with a Fundamental Right is not void as a whole. It is void only to the extent of inconsistency. This means that the doctrine of severability has to be applied and the offending portion of the law has to be severed from the valid portion thereof.[90]

G. DOCTRINE OF ECLIPSE

The prospective nature of Art. 13(1) has given rise to the doctrine of eclipse.

A legal provision enacted in 1948, authorising the State Government to exclude all private motor transport business, became inconsistent with Art. 19(1)(g) when the Constitution came into force in 1950.[91] In 1951, Art. 19(1)(g) was amended so as to permit the State Government to monopolise any business.[92] What was the effect of the constitutional amendment of 1951 on the law of 1948? Whether the law having become void was dead once for all and so could not be revitalised by a subsequent constitutional amendment without being re-enacted, or whether it was revived automatically? It was to solve this problem that the Supreme Court enunciated the doctrine of eclipse in Bhikaji v. State of Madhya Pradesh.[93]

---

85. State of Gujarat v. Shri Ambica Mills, AIR 1974 SC 1300 : (1974) 4 SCC 656.

86. Art. 13(1) runs as follows:
"All laws in force in the territory of India immediately before the commencement of this Constitution, in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Part, shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void."

87. For Art. 19(1)(a), see, infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.

88. Keshavan Madhava Menon v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1951 SC 128 : 1951 SCR 228.
Also, Rabindra Nath v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 470 : (1970) 1 SCC 84.

89. Lachmandas v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1952 SC 235 : 1952 SCR 710.

90. See Sub-Inspector Rooplal v. Lt. Governor, (2000) I SCC 644 : AIR 2000 SC 594.
For the Doctrine of Severability, see, infra, Sec. H; also, Ch. XL, infra.

91. For discussion on Art. 19(1)(g), see, infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.

92. Ibid.

93. AIR 1955 SC 781 : (1955) 2 SCR 589.

The doctrine of eclipse envisages that a pre-Constitution law inconsistent with a Fundamental Right was not wiped out altogether from the statute book after the commencement of the Constitution as it continued to exist in respect of rights and liabilities which had accrued before the date of the Constitution.[1] Therefore, the law in question will be regarded as having been 'eclipsed' for the time being by the relevant Fundamental Right. It was in a dormant or moribund condition for the time being. Such a law was not dead for all purposes. If the relevant Fundamental Right is amended then the effect would be "to remove the shadow and to make the impugned Act free from all blemish or infirmity". The law would then cease to be unconstitutional and become revivified and enforceable.[2]

The doctrine of eclipse has been held to apply only to the pre-Constitution and not to the post-Constitution laws. The reason is that while a pre-Constitution law was valid when enacted and, therefore, was not void ab initio, but its voidity supervened when the Constitution came into force, a post-Constitution law infringing a Fundamental Right is unconstitutional and a nullity from its very inception. Therefore, it cannot be vitalised by a subsequent amendment of the Constitution removing the infirmity in the way of passing the law.[3] The Supreme Court has distinguished between Arts. 13(1) and 13(2), as the phraseology of the two is different from each other.

Article 13(2) which applies to the post-Constitution laws prohibits the making of a law abridging Fundamental Rights, while Art. 13(1) which applies to the pre-Constitution laws contains no such prohibition. Under Art. 13(1), the operation of the pre-Constitution law remains unaffected until 26-1-1950, even if it becomes inoperative after the commencement of the Constitution. Under Art. 13(2), the words "the State shall not make any law" indicate that after the commencement of the Constitution, no law can be made so as to contravene a Fundamental Right. Such a law is void ab initio. Therefore, the doctrine of eclipse cannot apply to such a law and it cannot revive even if the relevant Fundamental Right is amended later to remove the hurdle in the way of such a law.[4]

In case the law contravenes a Fundamental Right limited to the citizens only, it will operate with respect to the non-citizens,[5] but it will not be revived qua-citizens merely by the amendment of the Fundamental Right involved.[6] Because Art. 13(2) affects the competence of the legislature to enact it with respect to the citizens, the law will have to be re-enacted after the constitutional amendment if it is desired to make it operative qua the citizens as well.

---

1. The Keshavan Madhava Menon case, supra, footnote 88.
2. Also, Purshottam v. Desai, AIR 1956 SC 20 : (1955) 2 SCR 887.
3. The Privy Council has also held that an invalid statute is non-existent and a later constitutional amendment will not automatically revive it: Akar v. A.G. of Sierra Leone, (1969) 3 All ER 384, 392.
Also see, Dularey Lodh v. IIIrd. Addl. Dist. Judge, Kanpur, AIR 1984 SC 1260 : (1984) 3 SCC 99.
4. Saghir v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 728 : (1955) 1 SCR 707; Deep Chand v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1959 SC 648; Muhammadbhai v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1962 SC 1517; Abu Khan v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1301 : (1984) 1 SCC 88.
5. State of Gujarat v. Shri Ambika Mills Ltd., AIR 1974 SC 1300 : (1974) 4 SCC 656.
6. Mahendralal Jain v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1963 SC 1019 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 912. Also supra, Ch. XVIII, Sec. C.

An Act declared unconstitutional under Arts. 14, 19 and 31(2), is revived when it is put in the Ninth Schedule.[7] The express words of Art. 31B cure the defect in such an Act with retrospective operation from the date it was put on the statute book. Such an Act even though inoperative when enacted because of its inconsistency with a Fundamental right, assumes full force and vigour retrospectively as soon as it is included in the IX Schedule. It is not necessary to re-enact such an Act.[8]

From this arises another question. When a post-Constitution law is held inconsistent with a Fundamental Right, can it be revived by amending the Act in question so as to remove the blemish, or will it have to be re-enacted as a whole? The Delhi High Court has held by a majority that the Act will have to be re-enacted and it cannot be revived by its mere amendment.[9] This view appears to emanate logically from the position adopted by the Supreme Court in treating such a law void ab-initio and not applying the doctrine of eclipse to the post-Constitution laws as discussed above.

There is no direct Supreme Court case on the specific point. The nearest authority on the point is the Shama Rao case.[10] An Act was challenged on the ground of excessive delegation.[11] Pending the decision, the Legislature passed an amending Act seeking to remove the defect. The Supreme Court ruled by a majority that when an Act is bad on the ground of excessive delegation, it is still-born and void ab initio, and it cannot be revived by an amending Act seeking to remove the vice. The whole Act should be re-enacted in the modified form.

This ruling supports the proposition that an Act held invalid under Art. 13(2) could not be revived merely by amending it but will have to be re-enacted. The same proposition will apply when an Act infringes a Fundamental Right applicable to the citizens only. Such a law will be regarded as 'still-born' vis-à-vis the citizens even though it may be operative qua the non-citizens, and so it will have to be re-enacted if it is desired to make it valid qua the citizens.[12]

A reference may be made here to Hari Singh v. Military Estate Officer, Delhi.[13] The Punjab Public Premises Act was declared void by the Supreme Court as being inconsistent with Art. 14.[14] There was a corresponding law made by Parliament enacted in 1958. Consequent upon the Supreme Court decision on the Punjab Act, Parliament re-enacted its own law in 1971, seeking to remove the blemish pointed out by the Supreme Court, and made it operative retrospectively

---

7. See, infra, Chs. XXXI and XXXII.
8. L. Jagannath v. Authorised Officer, AIR 1972 SC 425 : (1971) 2 SCC 893. Infra, Ch. XXVII for Art. 31B.
9. P.L. Mehra v. D.R. Khanna, AIR 1971 Del. 1.
10. AIR 1967 SC 1480 : (1967) 2 SCR 650.
11. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.
12. State of Gujarat v. Shri Ambica Mills, supra, note 51.
JUSTICE DESHPANDE has argued cogently against this rule. He favours application of the doctrine of eclipse to the post-Constitution laws as well. He pleads that mere amendment of the law should be sufficient to revivify it in case it conflicted with the Fundamental Right. See his dissenting judgement in the Mehra case, supra, note 55. Also, DESHPANDE, Judicial Review of Legislation, 9, 177, 185, 198, 220.
For a review of the book by the author see, 16 JILI, 727, 736.
Also see, VENKATARAMA AIYAR J. in Sundararamier's case, AIR 1958 SC 468.
13. AIR 1972 SC 2205 : (1972) 2 SCC 239.
14. Infra, Ch. XXI.

with effect from the date of commencement of the original Act. A new clause was also added saying that all orders made under the old law would be deemed to be valid and effective as if they were made under the new law. This clause was challenged, the argument being that the 1958 Act being unconstitutional, there could not be validation of anything done under an unconstitutional Act. Holding the clause to be valid, the Supreme Court called it a fallacious argument for it overlooked the crucial point that the 1971 Act was made effective retrospectively from the date of the 1958 Act and the action done under the 1958 Act was deemed to have been done under the 1971 Act, and the new Act was valid under Art. 14.[15]

H. DOCTRINE OF SEVERABILITY

According to Art. 13, a law is void only "to the extent of the inconsistency or contravention" with the relevant Fundamental Right. The above provision means that an Act may not be void as a whole; only a part of it may be void and if that part is severable from the rest which is valid, then the rest may continue to stand and remain operative. The Act will then be read as if the invalid portion was not there. If, however, it is not possible to separate the valid from the invalid portion, then the whole of the statute will have to go.[16]

The Supreme Court has explained the doctrine as follows in RMDC:[17]

> "When a legislature whose authority is subject to limitations aforesaid enacts a law which is wholly in excess of its powers, it is entirely void and must be completely ignored. But when the legislation falls in part within the area allotted to it and in part outside it, it is undoubtedly void as to the latter; but does it on that become necessarily void in its entirety? The answer to this question must depend on whether what is valid could be separated from what is invalid, and that is a question which has to be decided by the Court on a consideration of the provisions of the Act"

The Supreme Court has laid down the following propositions as regards the doctrine of severability:[18]

(1) The intention of the Legislature is the determining factor in determining whether the valid parts of a statute are separable from the invalid parts. The test is whether the Legislature would have enacted the valid parts had it known that the rest of the statute was invalid.[19] "The test of severability requires the Court to ascertain whether the legislature would at all have enacted the law if severed part was not the part of the law".[20]

---

15. Similar clauses have been held valid in West Ramnad Electric Distribution Co v. State of Madras, AIR 1962 SC 1753 : (1963) 2 SCR 747; State of Mysore v. D. Achiah Chetty, AIR 1969 SC 477 : (1969) 1 SCC 248.

16. Kameshwar Pd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1962 SC 1166 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 369; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Ranojirao Shinde, AIR 1968 SC 1053 : (1968) 3 SCR 489.

17. R.M.D.C. v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 628, at 633; Kihota Hollohon v. Zachilhu, AIR 1993 SC 412 at 440 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651.

18. See, RMDC, Ibid; Motor General Traders v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1984 SC 121 : (1984) 1 SCC 222.

19. Harakchand v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1453 : (1969) 2 SCC 166.
Also, Att. Gen. for Alberta v. Att. Gen. for Canada, (1947) AC 503, 518.

20. Kihota Hollohon, supra, Ch. II, Sec. F(a).

In determining the legislative intent on the question of severability, it will be legitimate to take into account the history of the legislation, its object, the title and the preamble to it.

(2) If the valid and invalid provisions are so inextricably mixed up that they cannot be separated from one another, then the invalidity of a portion must result in the invalidity of the Act in its entirety.

(3) On the other hand, if they are so distinct and separate that after striking out what is invalid, what survives can stand independently and is workable—the portion which remains is in itself a complete code independent of the rest, then it will be upheld notwithstanding that the rest had become unenforceable.

If the nature or the object or the structure of the legislation is not changed by the omission of the void portion, the latter is severable from the rest.[21]

(4) Even when the valid provisions are distinct and separate from the invalid provisions, but if they all form part of a single scheme which is intended to operate as a whole, then the invalidity of a part will result in the failure of the whole.

(5) Likewise, though the valid and invalid parts of a statute are independent and may not form part of a scheme, but what is left after omitting the invalid portion is so thin and truncated as to be in substance different from what it was when it emerged out of the legislature, then also it will be rejected in its entirety.

(6) If after the invalid portion is expunged from the statute, what remains cannot be enforced without making alterations and modifications therein, then the whole of it must be struck down as void. The reason is that a Court cannot make alterations or modifications in the law in order to enforce what remains of it after expunging its invalid portion; otherwise it would amount to judicial legislation.[22]

(7) The severability of the valid and invalid provisions of a statute does not depend on whether the provisions are enacted in the same section or different sections; it is not the form, but the substance of the matter that is material, and that has to be ascertained on an examination of the Act as a whole and of the setting of the relevant provision therein.

In the R.M.D.C. case was involved the Prize Competitions Act which was broad enough to include competitions of a gambling nature as well as those involving skill. Under Art. 19(1)(g),[23] Parliament could restrict prize competitions only of a gambling nature but not those involving skill. Holding that the application of the Act could be restricted to the former, the Court stated that Parliament would have still enacted the law to regulate competitions of gambling nature; nor did restricting the Act to this kind of competitions affect its texture or colour. The provisions of the Act were thus held severable in their application to competi-

---

21. Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR 1950 SC 27, 46 : 1950 SCR 88; Kihota Hollohon, supra, Ch. II Sec. F(a).

In Hinds v. R., (1976) 1 All ER 355, invalid portion of the statute was severed from the rest because what was left was a sensible legislative scheme or a grammatical piece of legislation requiring no addition or amendment.

Also see, Laxmi Khandsari v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 873, 891 : (1981) 2 SCC 600.

22. Sewpujanrai v. Customs Collector, AIR 1958 SC 845 : 1959 SCR 821.

23. For Art. 19(1)(g), see, infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.

tions in which success did not depend to any substantial extent on skill. This illustrates proposition (1) mentioned above.

To some extent, there exists an inconsistency between the Thappar[24] and the R.M.D.C. case. When an offending provision is couched in a language wide enough to cover restrictions within and without the constitutionally permissible limits, according to the Thappar case it cannot be split up if there is a possibility of its being applied for purposes not sanctioned by the Constitution,[25] but according to the R.M.D.C. case, such a provision is valid if it is severable in its application to an object which is clearly demarcated from other objects falling outside the constitutionally permissible legislation. The Supreme Court has itself pointed out this aspect of the matter in Supdt. Central Prison v. Dr. Lohia,[26] but left open the question. The Court, however, stated that in the R.M.D.C. case, the difference between the two classes of competitions, namely, those that are gambling in nature and those in which success depends on skill, was clear cut and had long been recognised in legislative practice. But when the difference between what is permissible and what is not permissible is not very precise, the whole provision is to be held void, whether the view taken in the Romesh Thappar or the R.M.D.C case is followed.

It appears that it is difficult to evolve a clear cut principle as much depends on the facts of each case, the determining factor being whether, on the provision being sustained to the extent it falls within the permissible limits, is there any danger of its being misused for the purpose not permitted? If the Court has the ultimate control to decide whether a particular application of the law goes beyond the permissible limits, then there may not be any danger of misuse of the provision. If, however, the matter has been left to the subjective satisfaction of the Executive, and the Court cannot scrutinise the basis of such satisfaction to see whether the law has been applied to a purpose not permitted, then it will be safer to declare the whole provision bad.

I. WAIVER OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

Can a person waive any of his Fundamental Rights?

To begin with, VANKATARAMA AIYAR, J., in Behram v. State of Maharashtra,[27] divided the Fundamental Rights into two broad categories:

(i) Rights conferring benefits on the individuals, and

(ii) those rights conferring benefits on the general public.

The learned Judge opined that a law would not be a nullity but merely unenforceable if it was repugnant with a Fundamental Right in the former category, and that the affected individual could waive such an unconstitutionality, in which case the law would apply to him. For example, the right guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(f) was for the benefit of properly-owners and when a law was found to in-

---

24. Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, AIR 1950 SC 124 : 1950 SCR 594.
Also see, infra, under Art. 19(1)(a), Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.

25. Also see, Chintamanrao v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1951 SC 118 : 1950 SCR 759.

26. AIR 1960 SC 633 : (1960) 2 SCR 821.
Also see, under Art. 19(1)(a) infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.

27. AIR 1955 SC 123 : (1955) 1 SCR 123.

fringe Art. 19(1)(f), it was open to any person whose right had been infringed to waive his Fundamental Right.[28] In case of such a waiver, the law in question could be enforced against the individual concerned.

The majority on the bench, however, was not convinced with this argument and repudiated the doctrine of waiver saying that the Fundamental Rights were not put in the Constitution merely for individual benefit. These Rights were there as a matter of public policy and, therefore, the doctrine of waiver could have no application in case of Fundamental Rights. A citizen cannot invite discrimination by telling the state 'You can discriminate', or get convicted by waiving the protection given to him under Arts. 20 and 21.[29]

The question of waiver of a Fundamental Right has been discussed more fully by the Supreme Court in Basheshar Nath v. I.T. Commissioner.[30] The petitioner's case was referred to the Income-tax Investigation Commission under S. 5(1) of the relevant Act. After the Commission had decided upon the amount of concealed income, the petitioner on May 19, 1954, agreed as a settlement to pay in monthly instalments over Rs. 3 lacs by way of tax and penalty. In 1955, the Supreme Court declared S. 5(1) ultra vires Art. 14.[31] The petitioner thereupon challenged the settlement between him and the Commission, but the plea of waiver was raised against him. The Supreme Court however upheld his contention.

In their judgments, the learned Judges expounded several views regarding waiver of Fundamental Rights, viz.:

(1) Art. 14 cannot be waived for it is an admonition to the state as a matter of public policy with a view to implement its object of ensuring equality. No person can, therefore, by any act or conduct, relieve the state of the solemn obligation imposed on it by the Constitution.

(2) A view, somewhat broader than the first, was that none of the Fundamental Rights can be waived by a person. The Fundamental Rights are mandatory on the state and no citizen can by his act or conduct relieve the state of the solemn obligation imposed on it.

The constitution makes no distinction between Fundamental Rights enacted for the benefit of an individual and those enacted in public interest or on grounds of public policy.

A large majority of the people in India are economically poor, educationally backward and politically not yet conscious of their rights. Individually or even collectively, they cannot be pitted against the state, and, therefore, it is the duty of the judiciary to protect their Rights against themselves.

(3) The minority judges took the view that an individual could waive a Fundamental right which was for his benefit, but he could not waive a Right which was for the benefit of the general public. This was reiteration of the view expressed by VENKATARAMAN, J., in Behram, as stated above.

---

28. For discussion on Art. 19(1)(f), see, infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. G; Ch. XXXI, Sec. B.
29. For comments on Arts. 20 and 21, see, infra, Chs. XXV and XXVI.
30. AIR 1959 SC 149 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 528.
31. For a discussion on Art. 14, see, infra, next Chapter.

In view of the majority decision in Basheshar, it is now an established proposition that an individual cannot waive any of his Fundamental Rights.[32] This proposition has been applied in a number of cases.

According to the Bombay High Court:[33] "The state cannot arrogate to itself a right to commit breach of the Fundamental Rights of any person by resorting to principles of waiver or estoppel or other similar principles." Similarly, the Gauhati High Court has explained that the Fundamental Rights have been embodied in the Constitution not merely for the benefit of a particular individual but also as a matter of constitutional policy and for public good, and, therefore, the doctrine of waiver or acquiescence cannot be applied thereto. "A citizen cannot voluntarily get discrimination or waive his Fundamental Right against discrimination" as the right of not being discriminated against is enshrined in Art. 14 and is a Fundamental Right.[34]

In Olga Tellis,[35] the Court asserted that "the high purpose which 'the constitution seeks to achieve by conferment of fundamental rights is not only to benefit the individual but to secure the larger interests of the community.' Therefore, even if a person says, either under mistake of law or otherwise, that he would not enforce any particular Fundamental Right, it cannot create an estoppel against him. "Such a concession, if enforced, would defeat the purpose of the Constitution. Were the argument of estoppel valid, an all-powerful state could easily tempt an individual to forgo his precious personal freedoms on promise of transitory, immediate benefits."

In Olga Tellis, in a writ proceeding in the High Court, the pavement dwellers gave an undertaking that they would not claim any Fundamental Right to put up huts on pavements or public roads and that they would not obstruct the demolition of the huts after a certain date. Later, when the huts were sought to be demolished after the specified date, the pavement dwellers put up the plea that they were protected by Art. 21. It was argued in the Supreme Court that they could not raise any such plea in view of their previous undertaking. The Court overruled the objection saying that Fundamental Rights could not be waived. There can be no estoppel against the Constitution which is the paramount law of the land. The constitution has conferred Fundamental Rights not only to benefit individuals but to secure the larger interests of the community. The Court observed : "No individual can barter away the freedoms conferred on him by the Constitution".

Therefore, in spite of their earlier undertaking in the High Court, the pavement dwellers are entitled to raise the plea of Art. 21 of the Constitution in their favour.[36]

Recently, in Nar Singh Pal v. Union of India,[37] the Supreme Court has asserted:

> "Fundamental Rights under the Constitution cannot be bartered away. They cannot be compromised nor can there be any estoppel against the exercise of Fundamental Rights available under the Constitution".

---

32. N.L. NATHANSON, Waiver of Constitutional Rights in Indian and American Constitutional Law, 4 JILI, 157 (1962).
33. Yousuf Ali Abdulla Fazalbhoy v. M.S. Kasbekar, AIR 1982 Bom. 135 at 143.
34. Omega Advertising Agency v. State Electricity Board, AIR 1982 Gau. 37.
35. Olga Tellis v. Bombay Municipal Corporation, AIR 1986 SC 180, at 192-193 : (1985) 3 SCC 545.
36. For discussion on Art. 21, see, infra, Ch. XXVI.
37. (2000) 3 SCC 589, 594 : AIR 2000 SC 1401.

In the instant case, a casual labourer with the Telecom Department had worked continuously for 10 years and had thus acquired the "temporary" status. He was prosecuted for a criminal offence but was ultimately acquitted. In the meantime, his service was terminated. He questioned the order of termination but also accepted retrenchment benefit. The Supreme Court ruled that his service could not have been terminated without a departmental inquiry and without giving him a hearing. Acceptance of retrenchment benefit by him did not mean that he had surrendered all his constitutional rights. Accordingly, the order of termination was quashed by the Supreme Court and he was reinstated in service.

The doctrine of non-waiver developed by the Supreme Court of India denotes manifestation of its role of protector of the Fundamental Rights.

It may be of interest to know that in the U.S.A., a Fundamental Right can be waived.[38]

38. Pierce Oil Corporation v. Phoenix Refining Co., 259 US 125 (1922); Boykin v. Alabama, 395 US 238 (1969); NATHANSON, supra, footnote 32, 4 JILI, 157 (1962).

CHAPTER XXI

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS (2)
RIGHT TO EQUALITY (i)

SYNOPSIS

A. INTRODUCTORY

The Constitution of India guarantees the Right to Equality through Articles 14 to 18. "Equality is one of the magnificent corner-stones of Indian democracy."[1]

The doctrine of equality before law is a necessary corollary of Rule of Law which pervades the Indian Constitution.[2]

Article 14 outlaws discrimination in a general way and guarantees equality before law to all persons. In view of a certain amount of indefiniteness attached to the general principle of equality enunciated in Article 14, separate provisions to cover specific discriminatory situations have been made by subsequent Articles. Thus, Art. 15 prohibits discrimination against citizens on such specific grounds as religion, race, caste, sex or place of birth. Art. 16 guarantees to the citizens of India equality of opportunity in matters of public employment. Art. 17 abolishes untouchability, and Art. 18 abolishes titles, other than a military or academic distinction. Thus, the Supreme Court has said that the Constitution lays down provisions both for protective discrimination as also affirmative action.[3]

In this series of constitutional provisions, Art. 14 is the most significant. It has been given a highly activist magnitude in recent years by the courts and, thus, it generates a large number of court cases. In recent days, Art. 16 has also assumed great significance because of the problems of reservation in public services. Art. 14 is the genus while Arts. 15 and 16 are the species. Arts. 14, 15 and 16 are constituents of a single code of constitutional guarantees supplementing each other.

Article 14 of the Constitution embodies the principle of "non-discrimination". However, it is not a free standing provision. It has to be read in conjunction with rights conferred by other articles like Art. 21 of the Constitution. Article 21 refers to "right to life" and embodies several aspects of life. It includes "opportunity", Articles 21 and 14 are the heart of the chapter on Fundamental Rights. They cover myriad features of life.[4]

In situations not covered by Arts. 15 to 18, the general principle of equality embodied in Art. 14 is attracted whenever discrimination is alleged. The goal set out in the Preamble to the Constitution regarding status and opportunity is embodied and concretised in Arts. 14 to 18.[5]

It may be worthwhile to note that Art. 7 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, declares that all are equal before the law and are entitled with-

---

1. THOMMEN, J., in Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 212.
For full discussion on this case, see, infra.
2. Ashutosh Gupta v. State of Rajasthan, (2002) 4 SCC 34 : AIR 2002 SC 1533.
3. Andhra Pradesh Public Service Commission v. Baloji Badhavath, (2009) 5 SCC 1 : (2009) 5 JT 563.
4. Reliance Energy Ltd. v. Maharashtra State Road Development Corpn. Ltd., (2007) 8 SCC 1 : (2007) 11 JT 1.
5. For Preamble to the Constitution see, Ch. I, supra, and Ch. XXXIV, infra.

out any discrimination to the equal protection of laws. By and large the same concept of equality inheres in Art. 14 of the Indian Constitution.

It may be noted that the right to equality has been declared by the Supreme Court as a basic feature of the Constitution. The Constitution is wedded to the concept of equality. The Preamble to the Constitution emphasizes upon the principle of equality as basic to the Constitution. This means that even a constitutional amendment offending the right to equality will be declared invalid.[6] Neither Parliament nor any State Legislature can transgress the principle of equality.[7] This principle has been recently reiterated by the Supreme Court in Badappanavar[8] in the following words:

> "Equality is a basic feature of the Constitution of India and any treatment of equals unequally or unequals as equals will be violation of basic structure of the Constitution of India."

B. EQUALITY BEFORE LAW : ART. 14

A constitution bench of the Supreme Court has declared in no uncertain terms that equality is a basic feature of the constitution and although the emphasis in the earlier decisions evolved around discrimination and classification, the content of Article 14 got expanded conceptually and has recognized the principles to comprehend the doctrine of promissory estoppel non arbitrariness, compliance with rules of natural justice eschewing irrationality etc.[9]

If there is no affectation of a vested right, the question of applicability of Art. 14 would not arise.[10] Such an absolute proposition is inconsistent with the recognition by the Supreme Court in or in many of its earlier judgments in relation to promissory estoppel and legitimate expectation which are not only much short of indefeasible right but were evolved to protect a person from unfair or arbitrary exercise of power.[11] Moreover Article 14 itself confers a 'vested' Fundamental Right and it is difficult to appreciate the logic behind the enunciation.

Article 14 bars discrimination and prohibits discriminatory laws. Art. 14 is now proving as a bulwark against any arbitrary or discriminatory state action. The horizons of equality as embodied in Art. 14 have been expanding as a result of the judicial pronouncements and Art. 14 has now come to have a "highly activist magnitude".

Articles 14 and 15 read in the light of the preamble to the Constitution reflect the thinking of our Constitution makers and prevent any discrimination based on religion or origin in the matter of equal treatment or employment and to apply the same even in respect of a cooperative society.[12]

---

6. For discussion on the "Basic Features of the Constitution", see, Ch. XLI, infra.
7. Kesavananda Bharati v. State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC 1461 : (1973) 4 SCC 225; Indra Sawhney v. Union of India (II), AIR 2000 SC 498 : (2000) 1 SCC 168; see, infra.
8. M.G. Badappanavar v. State of Karnataka, AIR 2001 SC 260, at 264 : (2001) 2 SCC 666.
9. M. Nagaraj v. Union of India, (2006) 8 SCC 212 : AIR 2007 SC 71.
10. State of Kerala v. Peoples Union for Civil Liberties, Kerala State Unit, (2009) 8 SCC 46 at page 90 : (2009) 9 JT 579.
11. Food Corporation of India v. Kamdhenu Cattle Feed Industries, AIR 1993 SC 1601 : (1993) 1 SCC 71.
12. Zoroastrian Coop. Housing Society Ltd. v. District Registrar, Coop. Societies (Urban), (2005) 5 SCC 632 : AIR 2005 SC 2306.

All persons in similar circumstances shall be treated alike both in privileges and liabilities imposed.[13]

But equality cannot be applied when it arises out of illegality e.g. when Art. 14 is sought to be involved in aid of compassionate appointment wrongly made earlier.[14]

It has been held that non application of mind is a facet of arbitrary exercise of power.[15]

It is now firmly established that Art. 14 strikes at arbitrary state action, both administrative and legislative. There has been a significant shift towards equating arbitrary or unreasonableness as the yardstick by which administrative as well as legislative actions are to be judged. A basic and obvious test to be applied in cases where administrative action is attacked as arbitrary is to see whether there is any discernible principle emerging from the impugned action and if so, does it really satisfy the test of reasonableness.[16] It is now considered that non-compliance with the rules of natural justice amounts to arbitrariness violating Art. 14.[17]

The Supreme Court has quoted with approval the following observations of Bharucha J sitting in the Bombay High Court.[18]

> "….the government company or corporation must act reasonably not only when terminating the authority of an occupant of public premises …… to occupy the same but also when, thereafter, it seeks his eviction therefrom". This approval, therefore means that the landlord State's act in initiating proceedings must be not only substantively but also procedurally reasonable.[19]

For propagating this reasonable and fairness principle the court relied upon its earlier judgments in relation to Rent Acts.[20]

There is no discrimination merely because a state policy had not been introduced simultaneously at different levels.[21] The Court explained that when policies are made which have far reaching implications and are dynamic in nature, their implementation in a phased manner is welcome because it receives gradual willing acceptance and invites lesser resistance.[22]

Art. 14 runs as follows : "The State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India." This provision corresponds to the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution which declares: "No State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Two concepts are involved in Art. 14, viz., 'equality before law' and 'equal protection of laws'.

---

13. John Vallamattom v. Union of India, (2003) 6 SCC 611 : AIR 2003 SC 2902.
14. General Manager, Uttaranchal Jal Sansthan v. Laxmi Devi, (2009) 7 SCC 205 : AIR 2005 SC 3121.
15. Onkar Lal Bajaj v. Union of India, (2003) 2 SCC 673 : AIR 2003 SC 2562.
16. Union of India v. International Trading Co., (2003) 5 SCC 437 : AIR 2003 SC 3983.
17. Rajasthan State Road Transport Corpn. v. Bal Mukund Bairwa (2), (2009) 4 SCC 299, 317 : (2009) 2 JT 423.
18. Minoo Framroze Balsara v. Union of India, AIR 1992 Bom 375.
19. New India Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Nusli Neville Wadia, (2008) 3 SCC 279.
20. Dwarkadas Marfatia and Sons v. Board of Trustees of the Port of Bombay, (1989) 3 SCC 293; Ashoka Marketing Ltd. v. Punjab National Bank, (1990) 4 SCC 406.
21. Javed v. State of Haryana, (2003) 8 SCC 369 : AIR 2003 SC 3057.
22. Ibid.

The first is a negative concept which ensures that there is no special privilege in favour of any one, that all are equally subject to the ordinary law of the land and that no person, whatever be his rank or condition, is above the law. This is equivalent to the second corollary of the DICEAN concept of the Rule of Law in Britain.[23] This, however, is not an absolute rule and there are a number of exceptions to it, e.g., foreign diplomats enjoy immunity from the country's judicial process; Art. 361 extends immunity to the President of India and the State Governors;[24] public officers and judges also enjoy some protection, and some special groups and interests, like the trade unions, have been accorded special privileges by law.

The second concept, 'equal protection of laws', is positive in content. It does not mean that identically the same law should apply to all persons, or that every law must have a universal application within the country irrespective of differences of circumstances. Equal Protection of the laws does not postulate equal treatment of all persons without distinction. What it postulates is the application of the same laws alike and without discrimination to all persons similarly situated. It denotes equality of treatment in equal circumstances. It implies that among equals the law should be equal and equally administered, that the like should be treated alike without distinction of race, religion, wealth, social status or political influence.[25]

Where a particular mode is prescribed for doing an act and there is no impediment in adopting the procedure, the deviation to act in different manner which does not disclose any discernible principle which is reasonable in itself shall be labelled as arbitrary. Every State action must be informed by reason and it follows that an act uninformed by reason is per se arbitrary.[26]

The Supreme Court has explained in Sri Srinivasa Theatre v. Govt. of Tamil Nadu,[27] that the two expressions 'equality before law' and 'equal protection of law' do not mean the same thing even if there may be much in common between them. "Equality before law" is a dynamic concept having many facets. One facet is that there shall be no privileged person or class and that none shall be above law. Another facet is "the obligation upon the State to bring about, through the machinery of law, a more equal society…..For, equality before law can be predicated meaningfully only in an equal society…."

Article 14 provides positive and not negative equality. Hence any action or order contrary to law does not confer any right upon any person for similar treatment. Thus unauthorized additional construction and change of user of land cannot be claimed on the basis that the same had been granted in other cases in contravention of law.[28]

Article 14 prescribes equality before law. But the fact remains that all persons are not equal by nature, attainment or circumstances, and, therefore, a mechanical equality before the law may result in injustice. Thus, the guarantee against the denial of equal protection of the law does not mean that identically the same rules of law should be made applicable to all persons in spite of difference in circum-

---

23. WADE & PHILLIPS, CONST. & ADM. LAW, 87 (1977).
24. Supra, Chs. III and VII.
25. Jagannath Prasad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1961 SC 1245 : (1962) 1 SCR 151; Mohd. Shaheb Mahboob v. Dy. Custodian, AIR 1961 SC 1657 : (1962) 2 SCR 371.
26. Bannari Amman Sugars Ltd. v. CTO, (2005) 1 SCC 625 : 2004 JT 500.
27. AIR 1992 SC, at 1004.
28. Vishal Properties (P) Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2007) 11 SCC 172 : AIR 2007 SC 2924. See also State of Uttaranchal v. Alok Sharma, (2009) 7 SCC 647 : (2009) 6 JT 463.

stances or conditions.[29] The varying needs of different classes or sections of people require differential and separate treatment. The Legislature is required to deal with diverse problems arising out of an infinite variety of human relations. It must, therefore, necessarily have the power of making laws to attain particular objects and, for that purpose, of distinguishing, selecting and classifying persons and things upon which its laws are to operate.

The principle of equality of law thus means not that the same law should apply to everyone but that a law should deal alike with all in one class; that there should be an equality of treatment under equal circumstances. It means "that equals should not be treated unlike and unlikes should not be treated alike. Likes should be treated alike".[30]

But when charge of discrimination was made for treating diploma holders and degree holders in the same category, the Supreme Court suddenly said that Art.14 cannot be stretched too far as it will paralyse the administration and repelled the challenge.[31]

Art. 14 thus means that 'equals should be treated alike'; it does not mean that 'unequals ought to be treated equally'. Persons who are in the like circumstances should be treated equally. On the other hand, where persons or groups of persons are not situated equally, to treat them as equals would itself be violative of Art. 14 as this would itself result in inequality. As all persons are not equal by nature or circumstances, the varying needs of different classes or sections of people require differential treatment. This leads to classification among different groups of persons and differentiation between such classes. Accordingly, to apply the principle of equality in a practical manner, the courts have evolved the principle that if the law in question is based on rational classification it is not regarded as discriminatory.[32] The clubbing of those dealers against whom there was no allegation with the handful of those against whom there were allegations of political connection and patronage, results in treating unequals as equals.[33]

Equality of opportunity embraces two different and distinct concepts. There is a conceptual distinction between a non discrimination principle and affirmative action under which the State is obliged to provide a level playing field to the oppressed classes. Affirmative action in the above sense seeks to move beyond the concept of non discrimination towards equalising results with respect to various groups. Both the conceptions constitute 'equality of opportunity'.[34]

