A Legislature is entitled to make reasonable classification for purposes of legislation and treat all in one class on an equal footing. The Supreme Court has underlined this principle thus: "Art. 14 of the Constitution ensures equality among equals: its aim is to protect persons similarly placed against discriminatory treatment. It does not however operate against rational classification. A person setting up a grievance of denial of equal treatment by law must establish that between persons similarly circumstanced, some were treated to their prejudice and the differential treatment had no reasonable relation to the object sought to

---

29. Chiranjeet Lal v. Union of India, AIR 1951 SC 41 : 1950 SCR 869.
30. Gauri Shankar v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 55, at 58 : (1994) 6 SCC 349.
31. Dilip Kumar Garg v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2009) 4 SCC 753 : (2009) 3 JT 202.
32. Ashutosh Gupta v. State of Rajasthan, (2002) 4 SCC 34.
33. Onkar Lal Bajaj v. Union of India, (2003) 2 SCC 673 : AIR 2003 SC 2562.
34. M. Nagaraj v. Union of India, (2006) 8 SCC 212 : AIR 2007 SC 71.

be achieved by the law."[35] In the context of Karnataka Industrial Areas Development Act, 1966 and the Regulations framed thereunder it has been held that fixation of price at a higher rate for small and fully developed plots and at a lower rate for a large plot not entirely developed and provided with peripheral infrastructural facilities only, was not arbitrary.[36]

Appointment on compassionate ground is never considered a right of a person. In fact, such appointment is violative of rule of equality enshrined and guaranteed under Article 14 of the Constitution. When any appointment is to be made in Government or semi government or in public office, cases of all eligible candidates must be considered alike. This is the mandate of Article 14. Normally, therefore, the State or its instrumentality making any appointment to public office, cannot ignore such mandate. At the same time, however, in certain circumstances, appointment on compassionate ground of dependants of the deceased employee is considered inevitable so that the family of the deceased employee may not starve. The primary object of such scheme is to save the bereaved family from sudden financial crisis occurring due to death of the sole bread earner. It is thus an exception to the general rule of equality and not another independent and parallel source of employment.[37] The court has distinguished employment based on descent and compassionate appointment as the latter is based on an additional factor, namely, death or medical invalidation of a serving employee leaving the family in distress and such a factor may constitute a valid basis of classification.[38]

Article 14 forbids class legislation; it does not forbid reasonable classification of persons, objects and transactions by the Legislature for the purpose of achieving specific ends. Classification to be reasonable should fulfil the following two tests:

(1) It should not be arbitrary, artificial or evasive. It should be based on an intelligible differentia, some real and substantial distinction, which distinguishes persons or things grouped together in the class from others left out of it.

(2) The differentia adopted as the basis of classification must have a rational or reasonable nexus with the object sought to be achieved by the statute in question.[39]

Hostile discrimination is obvious where some allottees despite having complied with all conditions, including payment of full amount due, were not given possession, whereas others were granted possession even before payment or after depositing a small proportion of the total dues.[40]

What is however necessary is that there must be a substantial basis for making the classification and that there should be a nexus between the basis of classification and the object of the statute under consideration. In other words, there must be some rational nexus between the basis of classification and the object intended

---

35. Western U.P. Electric Power and Supply Co. Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 21, 24 : (1969) 1 SCC 817. Also see, R.K. Garg v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 2138 : (1981) 4 SCC 676; Re: Special Courts Bill, AIR 1979 SC 478 : (1979) 1 SCC 380; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Kamla Palace, AIR 2000 SC 617 : (2000) 1 SCC 557.

36. Chairman & MD, BPL Ltd. v. S.P. Gurarajа, (2003) 8 SCC 567 : AIR 2003 SC 4536.

37. General Manager, State Bank of India v. Anju Jain (2008) 8 SCC 475.

38. V. Sivamurthy v. State of A.P., (2008) 13 SCC 730 : (2008) 11 SCALE 294.

39. Laxmi Khandsari v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 873, 891 : (1981) 2 SCC 600. Test for valid classification restated. State of Haryana v. Jai Singh, (2003) 9 SCC 114 : AIR 2003 SC 1696; Welfare Asson. ARP v. Ranjit P. Gohil, (2003) 9 SCC 358; See also (2004) 1 SCC 369 : AIR 2003 SC 3057; See also Javed v. State of Haryana, (2003) 8 SCC 369 : AIR 2003 SC 3057.

40. Government of A.P. v. Maharshi Publishers Pvt. Ltd., (2003) 1 SCC 95 : AIR 2003 SC 296.

to be achieved. Therefore, mere differentiation or inequality of treatment does not per se amount to discrimination within the inhibition of the equal protection clause. To attract Art. 14, it is necessary to show that the selection or differentiation is unreasonable or arbitrary; that it does not rest on any rational basis having regard to the object which the Legislature has in view in making the law in question.[41] As the Supreme Court has explained: "The differentia which is the basis of the classification and the Act are distinct things and what is necessary is that there must be a nexus between them."[42] As the Supreme Court has observed recently in Thimmappa:[43]

> "When a law is challenged to be discriminatory essentially on the ground that it denies equal treatment or protection, the question for determination by the Court is not whether it has resulted in inequality but whether there is some difference which bears a just and reasonable relation to the object of legislation. Mere differentiation does not per se amount to discrimination within the inhibition of the equal protection clause. To attract the operation of the clause it is necessary to show that the selection or differentiation is unreasonable or arbitrary, that it does not rest on any rational basis having regard to the object which the legislature has in view".

Again, the Supreme Court has observed:[44]

> "It is settled law that differentiation is not always discriminatory. If there is a rational nexus on the basis of which differentiation has been made with the object sought to be achieved by particular provision, then such differentiation is not discriminatory and does not violate the principles of Article 14 of the Constitution".

The Supreme Court has however warned against over-emphasis on classification. The Court has explained that 'the doctrine of classification is only a subsidiary rule evolved by the courts to give practical content to the doctrine of equality, over-emphasis on the doctrine of classification or anxious or sustained attempt to discover some basis for classification may gradually and imperceptibly erode the profound potency of the glorious content of equity enshrined in Art. 14 of the Constitution. The over-emphasis on classification would inevitably result in substitution of the doctrine of classification for the doctrine of equality… Lest, the classification would deny equality to the larger segments of the society'.[45]

Marginal over inclusiveness or under inclusiveness, will not vitiative the classification.[46]

Whether a classification adopted by a law is reasonable or not is a matter for the courts to decide. Caterpillar[47] is another example of under classification and 41. Jaila Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1975 SC 1436 : (1976) 1 SCC 682. But when charge of discrimination was made for treating diploma holders and degree holders in the same category, the Supreme Court held that Art. 14 cannot be stretched too far as it will paralyze the administration and repelled in challenge. Dilip Kumar Garg v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2009) 4 SCC 753 : (2009) 3 JT 202.

---

42. In re Special Courts Bill, 1978, AIR 1979 SC 478 : (1979) 1 SCC 380.

43. K. Thimmappa v. Chairman, Central Board of Directors, AIR 2001 SC 467 : (2001) 2 SCC 259.

44. Union of India v. M.V. Valliappan, (1999) 6 SCC 259, 269 : AIR 1999 SC 2526.

45. L.I.C. of India v. Consumer Education and Research Centre, AIR 1995 SC 1811, 1822 : (1995) 5 SCC 482, Also see, infra. Instance of over classification E. V. Chinnaiah v. State of A.P., (2005) 1 SCC 394 : AIR 2005 SC 162, true character of the statute to be examined and not merely the preamble.

46. Basheer alias N. P. Basheer v. State of Kerala, (2004) 3 SCC 609 : AIR 2004 SC 2757.

47. Caterpillar India (P) Ltd. v. Western Coalfields Ltd., (2007) 11 SCC 32 : AIR 2007 SC 2971.

Article 14. Here a preference policy was adopted by which the Government granted price preference to Public Sector Enterprises (PSEs) to the effect that the price quoted by them which was less than 10% of the lowest price would be reckoned while taking a decision on finalizing the tender. The Supreme Court found that the policy suffered from under classification and since an uniform policy of protection without considering whether such protection was necessary or not was arbitrary. The question of reasonableness of classification has arisen in innumerable cases. The twin tests applied for the purpose are, however, quite flexible. The courts, however, show a good deal of deference to legislative judgment and do not lightly hold a classification unreasonable. A study of the cases will show that many different classifications have been upheld as constitutional.[48] There is no closed category of classification; the extent, range and kind of classification depend on the subject-matter of the legislation, the conditions of the country, the economic, social and political factors at work at a particular time. The differential treatment must have a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved. Constitutional interpretation being a difficult task, its concept varies from statute to statute, fact to fact, situation to situation and subject matter to subject matter.[49] There is no discrimination when a financial benefit is made available for those who had been invalidated out of service because of their tenure of service was reduced due to invalidment on account of disability or war injury and those who retired in the normal course.[50] And merely because in the past two categories of employees had been treated differently does not mean that they cannot be equated subsequently.[51]

It is not necessary that for a classification to be valid, its basis must always appear on the face of the law. To find out the reasons and the justification for the classification, the court may refer to relevant material, e.g. objects and reasons appended to a Bill, parliamentary debates, affidavits of the parties, matters of common knowledge, the background circumstances leading to the passage of the Act, etc.[52]

The concept of equality allows differential treatment but it prevents distinctions that are not properly justified. Justification needs each case to be decided on a case to case basis.[53] For example, there is no discrimination by reason of non-alteration of allotment price for a plot of land in 1993 paid by a person for a larger plot exchanged in 1996 whereas another person whose allotment was made in 1996 at 1996 price since the price paid by the former for the exchanged land had been held constant only for the acreage allotted in 1993 and for the excess acreage allotted in 1996, the former had also been charged at the 1996 price.[54]

When a person seeks to impeach the validity of a law on the ground that it offends Art. 14, the onus is on him to plead and prove the infirmity. If a person complains of unequal treatment, the burden lies on him to place before the court sufficient material from which it can be inferred that there is unequal treatment.

---

48. Swaroop Vegetables Products Industries v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1984 SC 20 : (1983) 4 SCC 24.
49. Chhattisgarh Rural Agriculture Extension Officers Assn. v. State of M.P., (2004) 4 SCC 646 : AIR 2004 SC 2020.
50. P. K. Kapur v. Union of India, (2007) 9 SCC 425, 430 : (2007) 3 JT 98.
51. Dilip Kumar Garg v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2009) 4 SCC 753 : (2009) 3 JT 202.
52. Jagdish Pandey v. Chancellor, Bihar University, AIR 1968 SC 353 : (1968) 1 SCR 231; State of Jammu & Kashmir v. T.N. Khosa, AIR 1974 SC 1 : (1974) 1 SCC 19.
53. M. Nagaraj v. Union of India , (2006) 8 SCC 212 : AIR 2007 SC 71.
54. NOIDA v. Arvind Sonekar, (2008) 11 SCC 31 : AIR 2008 SC 1983.

A mere plea that he has been treated differentially is not enough. He must produce necessary facts and figures to establish, that he has not only been treated differently from others, but that he has been so treated from persons similarly situated and circumstanced without any reasonable basis and that such differential treatment has been made unjustifiably. The initial presumption is in favour of the validity of the law, and if the person fails to adduce sufficient evidence in support of his challenge to the law in question, his plea of the provision in question being violative of Art. 14 cannot be entertained. The state can lean on the initial presumption of validity of the law.[55] The Supreme Court has recently explained the principle of initial presumption of validity as follows in Ashutosh Gupta v. State of Rajasthan :[56]

> "There is always a presumption in favour of the constitutionality of enactment and the burden is upon him who attacks it to show that there has been a clear transgression of the constitutional principles. The presumption of constitutionality stems from the wide power of classification which the legislature must, of necessity possess in making laws operating differently as regards different groups of persons in order to give effect to policies. It must be presumed that the legislature understands and correctly appreciates the need of its own people."

The Supreme Court has explained the rationale underlying this rule as follows: many a time, the challenge is based on the allegation that the impugned provision is discriminatory as it singles out the petitioner for hostile treatment, from amongst persons who, being situated similarly, belong to the same class as the petitioner. Whether there are other persons who are situated similarly as the petitioner is a question of fact. And whether the petitioner is subjected to hostile discrimination is also a question of fact. That is why the burden to establish the existence of these facts rests on the petitioner. "To cast the burden of proof in such cases on the state is really to ask it to prove the negative that no other persons are situated similarly as the petitioner and that the treatment meted out to the petitioner is not hostile."[57] Hostile discrimination can only arise as between persons who are similarly situated. Hence, it was not possible for the candidate for Deputy Manager's post to claim that he had been discriminated against because a Joint Manager had been appointed since there was nothing common between the two posts. It was perfectly valid for the employer to fill up one category of posts and decline to do so for other categories of posts for business reasons.[58]

Thus, in Nachane,[59] when the employees of the Life Insurance Corporation were exempted from the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act (IDA) by a law of Parliament, and these employees challenged the law as discriminatory, the Supreme Court stated that the burden of establishing hostile discrimination was on the petitioners (L.I.C. employees); it was for them to show that they and the employees of other establishments to whom the provisions of the IDA applied were similarly circumstanced to justify the contention that by excluding the LIC employees from the purview of the IDA they had been discriminated against. No materials had been produced before the Court for the purpose. There cannot be

---

55. G.K. Krishnan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1975 SC 583 : (1975) 1 SCC 375.
Also see Ashutosh Gupta v. State of Rajasthan, (2002) 4 SCC 34 at 41 : AIR 2002 SC 1533.
56. (2002) 4 SCC 34 at 41 : AIR 2002 SC 1533.
57. Deena v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1154, 1167 : (1984) 1 SCC 29.
58. Food Corporation of India v. Bhanu Lodh, (2005) 3 SCC 618 : AIR 2005 SC 2775.
59. A.V. Nachane v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 1126, 1132 : (1982) 1 SCC 205.

perfect equality in any matter on an absolute scientific basis and certain inequities here and there would not offend Art. 14.[60] Again exclusion of prisoners convicted of crimes against women from scheme of remission to prevent crimes against women cannot be said to violate any reasonable principle or concept of law.[61] It has been held that IMNS is a distinct and separate class by itself, even though it is a part of the Indian Army.[62] In other words permissible classification would include a class even though it is a part of a larger class.

A statute carries with it a presumption of Constitutionality. Such a presumption extends also in relation to a law which has been enacted for imposing reasonable restrictions on the Fundamental Rights. A further presumption may also be drawn that the statutory authority would not exercise the power arbitrarily.[63]

On the other hand, if discrimination is writ large on the face of the legislation, the onus may shift to the state to sustain the validity of the legislation in question.[64]

In Deepak Sibal v. Punjab University,[65] the Supreme Court has pointed out that a classification need not be made with "mathematical precision". But, if there is little or no difference between the persons or things which have been grouped together and those left out of the group, then classification cannot be regarded as reasonable. The Court has also pointed out that to consider reasonableness of classification it is necessary to take into account the objective for such classification. "If the objective be illogical, unfair and unjust, necessarily the classification will have to be held as unreasonable." Also, surrounding circumstances may be taken into consideration in support of the constitutionality of a law which may otherwise be hostile or discriminatory in nature. "But the circumstances must be such as to justify the discriminatory treatment or the classification subserving the object sought to be achieved."

At times, even administrative necessity or convenience has been upheld as a basis of classification.[66] This is especially so in matters of taxation and economic regulation, because of the complexities involved in these areas, e.g., a bewildering conflict of expert opinion exists on economic matters.[67]

Considering the totality of circumstances and the financial climate world over, if it was thought as a matter of policy to have speedier legal method to recover dues over and above statutes already in existence providing for speedy recovery, such a policy decision cannot be faulted nor is it a matter to be gone into by the Courts, to test the legitimacy of such a measure relating to financial policy.[68]

---

60. H. P. Gupta v. Union of India, (2002) 10 SCC 658 : (2001) 9 JT 78.
61. Sanaboina Satyamarayana v. Govt. of AP., (2003) 10 SCC 78 : AIR 2003 SC 3074.
62. Jasbir Kaur v. Union of India, (2003) 8 SCC 720 : AIR 2004 SC 293.
63. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (2004) 2 SCC 476 : AIR 2004 SC 1442.
64. Dalmia v. Tendolkar, AIR 1958 SC 538 : 1959 SCR 279; Jagdish Pandey v. Chancellor, Bihar University, supra, footnote 52; State of Jammu & Kashmir v. T.N. Khosa, supra, footnote 52; also, infra.
65. AIR 1989 SC 903 : (1989) 2 SCC 145; Need not be scientifically perfect or logically complete Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.
66. Supdt. & Remembrancer of Legal Affairs v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1975 SC 1030 : (1975) 4 SCC 754.
67. State of Gujarat v. Ambica Mills, AIR 1974 SC 1300 : (1974) 4 SCC 656; San Antonio School District v. Rodrigues, (1973) 411 U.S. 1; infra.
68. Mardia Chemicals Ltd. v. Union of India, (2004) 4 SCC 311 : (2004) 4 JT 308.

The effect of these various principles is to enable the courts to uphold legislation in most of the cases and give the benefit of doubt as to the purpose of classification to the legislature. On the whole, the courts show reluctance to void legislation on the ground of its incompatibility with Art. 14. This judicial self-limitation has been taken to such length that, at times, voices of protest have been raised from the bench itself against too much judicial anxiety "to discover some basis for classification". A warning has been sounded that such an approach would substitute the doctrine of classification for the doctrine of equality and deprive it of much of its content. The Supreme Court has stated: "Over emphasis on the doctrine of classification or an anxious and sustained attempt to discover some basis for classification may gradually and imperceptibly deprive the guarantee of equality of its spacious content."[69] But the fact remains that many a time the Supreme Court itself has ignored this warning and upheld legislation, as stated above, by finding some policy within the law.

Article 14 will apply even if the laws emanate from the Parliament and a State legislature. As such since the compensation payable under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 to the landowner would be more than what is payable under the Land Acquisition and Requisition, U.P. Avas Evam Vikas Parishad Adhiniyam, 1965 (1 of 1966), Sections 29 and 32 of the Adhiniyam were violative of Article 14 and the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act are to be read into the provisions of the Adhiniyam.[70]

Article 14 does not mandate that a person should be granted illegal and unjustified relief similar to those granted to others earlier.[71]

The Supreme Court has reiterated that the Courts cannot act as an Appellate Authority and examine the correctness, suitability and appropriateness of a policy nor are courts advisors to the executive on matters of policy which the executive is entitled to formulate. Judicial review in this area is confined to the examination as to whether any Fundamental Rights have been violated or it is opposed to the provisions of the Constitution or any statutory provision or is manifestly arbitrary. It is through this "manifestly arbitrary door" that challenges are likely to be made to formulation of policies and in such a case the Court must necessarily examine the provisions of the policy to come to the conclusion as to whether it is manifestly arbitrary or not. In effect the Court to a certain extent will act as an appellate authority although the court says that the courts cannot act as such an appellate authority.[72] The Court rejected the challenge to the granting of national film awards by saying that the object was to select the best of Indian films made for public exhibition in various categories and give them national awards. The precise question which arose was as to whether the Government could impose a condition that the entry of films for the awards will be restricted to only those

---

69. Mohd. Shujat Ali v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1631, 1653 : (1975) 3 SCC 76.
Also, SUBBA RAO, J., in Lachhman Dass v. State of Punjab, AIR 1963 SC 222 : (1963) 2 SCR 190; see also Commissioner of Police v. Acharya Jagadishwarananda Avadhuta, (2004) 12 SCC 770 : AIR 2004 SC 2984 – different basis of classification.

70. Savitri Cairae v. U. P. Avas Evam Vikas Parishad, (2003) 6 SCC 255 : AIR 2003 SC 2725, the contrary view expressed in the earlier editions of the book has to this extent must be considered to be not tenable. However the question of laws emanating from two state legislature being tested by comparison may not apply because of limits of territorial operation.

71. Anand Buttons Ltd. v. State of Haryana, (2005) 9 SCC 164 : AIR 2005 SC 565.

72. Directorate of Film Festivals v. Gaurav Ashwin Jain, (2007) 4 SCC 737 : AIR 2007 SC 1640.

which posses a certificate issued by the Censor Board under Section 5A of the Act. These matters were considered by the Court to be matters of policy and judicial review is concerned with the legality of the policy and not the wisdom or soundness of the policy. It emphasizes that there was nothing illogical or unreasonable or arbitrary about a policy to select only the best from among films certified for public exhibition.

Arbitrariness on the possibility that a power may be abused, despite the guidelines, in the provisions providing for such power cannot be held to be arbitrary and unreasonable.[73]

When a statute is impugned under Art. 14, it is the function of the court to decide whether the statute is so arbitrary or unreasonable that it has to be struck down. At best, a statute upon a similar subject deriving its authority from another source can be referred to, if its provisions have been held to be unreasonable, or have stood the test of time, only for the purpose of indicating what may be said to be reasonable in the context,[74] and the extent to which it is not unconstitutional.[75]

Perpetuation of hostile discrimination is not contemplated within Art. 14.[76]

But the court has held that even if a law cannot be declared ultra vires on the ground of hardship, it can be so declared on the ground of total unreasonableness applying the Wednesbury "unreasonableness".[77]

The benefit of "equality before law" and "equal protection of law" accrues to every person in India whether a citizen or not. As the Supreme Court has observed on this point:

> "We are a country governed by the Rule of Law. Our Constitution confers certain rights on every human-being and certain other rights on citizens. Every person is entitled to equality before the law and the equal protection of the laws."[78]

C. ILLUSTRATIONS

The question of reasonableness of classification vis-a-vis Art. 14 in the light of the principles stated above has arisen before the courts in a large number of cases. Some of these cases are noted below.

(a) MISCELLANEOUS SITUATIONS

Heirs of landowners sought restoration of their acquired lands in terms of Standing Order 28 framed by State Government read with para 493 of Land Ad-

---

73. Commissioner of Central Excise Jamshedpur v. Dabur (India) Ltd., (2005) 3 SCC 646 : (2005) 5 JT 582.

74. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Mandavar, AIR 1955 SC 493 : (1955) 2 SCR 186; Bar Council, Uttar Pradesh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 231 : (1973) 1 SCC 261; Sant Lal Bharti v. State of Punjab, AIR 1988 SC 485 : (1988) 1 SCC 366; State of Tamil Nadu v. Ananthi Ammal, AIR 1995 SC 2114 : (1955) 1 SCC 519.

75. Javed v. State of Haryana, (2003) 8 SCC 369 : AIR 2003 SC 3057.

76. See also State of Kerala v. K. Prasad, (2007) 7 SCC 140 : AIR 2007 SC 2701.

77. Grand Kakatiya Sheraton Hotel and Towers Employees & Workers Union v. Srinivasa Resorts Ltd., (2009) 5 SCC 342 : AIR 2009 SC 2337.

78. Faridabad CT. Scan Centre v. D.G. Health Services, AIR 1997 SC 3801 : (1997) 7 SCC 752.
Also, Chairman, Railway Board v. Chandrima Das, AIR 2000 SC 988, 997 : (2000) 2 SCC 465.

ministration Manual providing for return of the agricultural lands to landowners or their heirs when the lands were no longer required for the purposes for which those were acquired. While acting on the said policy decision, the government released lands in favour of some other persons, but respondents' claim for restoration of their lands was denied without showing why the policy could not be applied in favour of respondents also. Though Standing Order 28 and para 493 did not create any right in favour of any person to get back possession of the land, but while acting under such standing order or manual the government cannot discriminate between persons similarly situated.[79]

It is valid to exempt military and naval messes and canteens from restrictions on use or consumption of liquor, for military has its own traditions and mode of life and, therefore, there is an understandable basis for classification. The differentiation made by the prohibition law between Indians and foreigners staying in India for a short time is also valid.[80] For admission to a medical college of a State non-residents were required to pay capitation fee but residents in the State were exempt from the same. This classification, based on residence within the State, is valid.[81]

In relation to S.18 of the Atomic Energy Act, 1962 which confers power on the Central Government to make orders restricting the disclosure of certain specified information, has been held to be valid. The Supreme Court noted the sensitivity of the subject matter of the Act and pointed out that it could not be said the section employed words which provided for no criteria nor could it be said that no standard had been laid down by Parliament the exercise of the power. It is furthermore not a case where principles on which the power of the Central Government is to be exercised have not been disclosed or essential legislative functions have been delegated.[82]

A State law passed with a view to preserve and improve livestock permitted the killing of buffaloes, sheep and goats, but totally banned the killing of cows, bulls and calves. Cows and their calves, bulls and bullocks are important for the agricultural economy of the country; female buffaloes are milch cattle; bullocks are more useful as draught animals than male buffaloes; sheep and goat have not much utility as draught or milch animals. The different categories of animals being thus susceptible of classification into separate groups on the basis of their usefulness to society, the butchers killing each category may also be placed in distinct classes according to the effect their occupations produce on society, and, accordingly, the Act was held valid.[83]

Difference between Indian and European prisoners in the matter of treatment and diet violates Art. 14.[84]

Where some allottees despite having complied with all conditions, including payment of full amount due, were not given possession, whereas others were even before making payment or after depositing a small proportion of the total

---

79. State of Haryana v. Gurcharan Singh (2004) 12 SCC 540.
80. State of Bombay v. Balsara, AIR 1951 SC 318 : 1951 SCR 682.
81. Joshi v. Madhya Bharat, AIR 1955 SC 334 : (1955) 1 SCR 1215.
82. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (2004) 2 SCC 476 : AIR 2004 SC 1442.
83. Quareshi v. State of Bihar, AIR 1958 SC 731 : 1959 SCR 333.
84. Madhu Limaye v. Supdt., Tihar Jail, Delhi, AIR 1975 SC 1505 : (1975) 1 SCC 525.
Also see, Pannalal Binjraj, infra.

due, it was indicative of hostile discrimination against the allottees who have paid up and that undue favour had been shown to the others.[85]

In Ram Sarup v. Munshi[86], the Supreme Court has held that the right of pre-emption based on consanguinity did not infringe Art. 19(1)(f). But, later, in Ram Prakash v. State of Haryana,[87] the Court ruled that such a right is inconsistent with Art. 14 characterising it as "a relic of the feudal past" and "inconsistent with modern ideas". Right of pre-emption in favour of co-sharers or tenants has however been held to be valid.

Failure to implement a scheme within a reasonable time may amount to unreasonableness infringing Art.14.[88]

The Bihar Hindu Religious Trusts Act excludes the Sikhs from its purview and provides for separate trust boards for Hindus and Jains. This is valid because there are some differences between Hindus, Sikhs and Jains in essential details of their faiths, religious practices and organisation of their trusts; it cannot be said that Sikhs, Hindus and Jains are situated alike in the matter of religious trusts in Bihar.[89]

Under the Land Acquisition Act, the government can acquire land for a government company or a public company but not for a private company or an individual. This is a valid classification. The intention of the legislature clearly is that private companies should not have the advantage of acquiring land inasmuch as the profit of their venture goes to a few hands.[90]

In-service employees and retirees form different classes and, as such, there was no violation of Article 14 if they are treated differently, namely, where full and free medical facilities is provided to in-service defence personnel but not to retired defence employees.[91]

A legal provision providing for compulsory transfer of land by a landowner to the municipal committee for a public purpose without payment of compensation has been held to be violative of Art. 14.[92]

The imposition of the condition of prohibition on transfer of land granted to a backward class for a particular period does not constitute any unreasonable restriction.[93]

Special provisions can be made by a Legislature to protect and preserve the economic interests of persons belonging to the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes and to prevent their exploitation.[94]

---

85. Govt. of A. P. v. Maharshi Publishers (P) Ltd. (2003) 1 SCC 95 : AIR 2003 SC 296.
86. See, infra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. B, under Art. 19(1)(f).
Also see, Bhau Ram v. Baijnath Singh, infra; Sant Ram v. Labh Singh, AIR 1965 SC 314 : (1964) 7 SCR 756.
87. AIR 1986 SC 859 : (1986) 2 SCC 249.
88. Pramila Suman Singh v. State of Maharashtra, (2009) 2 SCC 729 : (2009) 1 JT 665.
89. Moti Das v. Sahi, AIR 1959 SC 942 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 563.
90. R.L. Arora v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1964 SC 1230 : (1964) 6 SCR 784.
91. Confederation of Ex-servicemen Association v. Union of India, (2006) 8 SCC 399 : AIR 2006 SC 2945.
92. Yogendra Pal v. Municipality, Bhatinda, AIR 1994 SC 2550 : (1994) 5 SCC 709.
93. Bhadrappa v. Tolacha Naik, (2008) 2 SCC 104 : AIR 2008 SC 1080.
94. Manchegowda v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1984 SC 1151 : (1984) 3 SCC 301. Also see, Ch. XXII, infra.

When a statute provides for consultation but procedure for holding such consultation, the competent authority can evolve its own procedure and such a provision cannot be held to be arbitrary.[95]

The Kerala Agrarian Relations Act, 1961, fixing the maximum land-ceiling in the State was declared to be discriminatory under Art. 14 on three grounds: (i) it fixed a ceiling on tea, coffee and rubber plantations but not on those of areca and pepper and there appeared to be no reason for making such a distinction; (ii) by giving an artificial definition to the term 'family' which did not conform to any type of families in the State, discrimination arose in the matter of land-holding; (iii) for land in excess of the ceiling, different cuts were made if the amount of compensation was over Rs. 15,000 and this was discriminatory as there was no reason why two persons should be paid at different rates when they were deprived of property of the same kind but only different in extent.[96]

The provisions of the Public Premises Eviction Acts and the Rules are required to be construed in the light of the tests as envisaged under Article 14 of the Constitution and with a view to give effect thereto, the doctrine of purposive construction may have to be taken recourse to.[97]

Whenever an Act is amended, there is bound to be some difference in treatment between transactions completed before the amendment and those which are to take place in future, but this is not discriminatory under Art. 14.[98]

Mere absence of provision for representation/appeal, would not render a discretionary power arbitrary or discriminatory when such power was exercised by the highest authority and for specified reason.[99]

A rule of the Rajasthan High Court required that for appointment to the Rajasthan Higher Judicial Service, an advocate must have practised for 7 years in the High Court of Rajasthan, or the courts subordinate thereto. In Moolchandani,[99a] the Supreme Court declared the rule as being inconsistent with Art. 14 as the classification made by the rule was not founded on any intelligible differentia having a reasonable nexus with the object sought to be achieved.

(b) UNGUIDED DISCRETION

Discretion exercisable according to a policy or for a purpose clearly stated in the statute, is not unrestricted discretion.[99b] and, as such, the statute cannot be considered as conferring arbitrary power.

(c) CUT-OFF DATES

The Government issued an office memorandum announcing a liberalised pension scheme for retired government servants but made it applicable to those who

---

95. Chairman & MD BPL Ltd. v. S. P. Gururaja, (2003) 8 SCC 567 : AIR 2003 SC 4536.
96. K. Kunhikonam v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 723 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 829.
Also, Krishnaswami v. State of Madras, AIR 1964 SC 1515 : (1964) 7 SCR 82.
97. New India Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Nusli Neville Wadia, (2008) 3 SCC 279 : AIR 2008 SC 876.
98. Udai Ram v. Union of India, AIR 1968 SC 1138; Jain Bros. v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 778 : (1969) 3 SCC 311.
99. Indian Airlines Ltd. v. Prabha D. Kanan, (2006) 11 SCC 67 : AIR 2007 SC 548.
99a. Ganga Ram Moolchandani v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2001 SC 2616 : (2001) 6 SCC 89.
99b. Federation of Rly. Officers Assn. v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 289 : AIR 2003 SC 1344.

had retired after March 31, 1979. The Supreme Court in Nakara[1] held the fixing of the cut-off date to be discriminatory as violating Art. 14. The Court argued that all pensioners retiring either before the cut-off date or thereafter formed one class. The division of pensioners into two classes on the basis of the date of retirement was not based on any rational principle because a difference of two days in the matter of retirement could have a traumatic effect on the pensioner. Such a classification was held to be arbitrary and unprincipled as there was no acceptable or persuasive reason in its favour. The said classification had no rational nexus with the object sought to be achieved. But the Court has recognised that whenever a cut off date is fixed, a question may arise as to why a person would suffer only because he comes within the wrong side of the cut-off date. But the fact that some persons or a section of society would face hardship, by itself, cannot be a ground for holding that the cut-off date so fixed is ultra vires Article 14.[2]

The Nakara ruling was considered by the Supreme Court in Krishna Kumar v. Union of India.[3] The Supreme Court ruled in this case that the option given to the employees covered by the Provident Fund Scheme to switch over to the pension scheme with effect from the specified cut-off date would not be violative of Art. 14. The Court argued that Nakara never required that all retirees formed a class and that no further classification could be possible. Pension-retirees and provident-fund-retirees do not form one homogeneous class and different rules apply to the two groups. It would not therefore be reasonable to argue that whatever applies to the pension-retirees must also be equally applicable to the provident-fund-retirees. The rights of each provident fund retirees crystallise on his retirement and no continuing obligation remains thereafter. But in case of a pension retiree, the obligation continues till his death.

Financial constraint is a valid ground for fixation of cut-off date for grant of benefit of increased quantum of death-cum-retirement gratuity. The action of Government in limiting the said benefit to government employees who died or retired on or after 1-4-1995 i.e. the cut-off date was not arbitrary, irrational or violative of Art. 14.[4]

When the army personnel claimed on the basis of Nakara the same pension rights irrespective of their date of retirement, the Supreme Court negatived the contention in Indian Ex-Service League v. Union of India"[5]

According to an office memorandum issued in 1979, a portion of the dearness allowance was to be treated as pay for the purpose of retirement benefits in respect of government servants who retired on or after the 30th September, 1977. The government servants who had retired before 30th September, 1977, claimed citing Nakara that the benefit ought to have been extended to all retired govern-

---

1. D.S. Nakara v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 130 : (1983) 1 SCC 305.
Also see, M.C. Dhingra v. Union of India, (1996) 7 SCC 564 : AIR 1996 SC 2963.

2. Ramrao v. All India Backward Class Bank Employees Welfare Assn., (2004) 2 SCC 76 : AIR 2004 SC 1459.

3. AIR 1990 SC 1782 : (1990) 4 SCC 207.
Also see, All India Reserve Bank Retired Officers Ass. v. Union of India, (1992) Suppl. (1) SCC 664 : AIR 1952 SC 767. Further see R. P. Bhardwaj v. Union of India, (2005) 10 SCC 244, relating to cut off dates; See also Achhaibar Maurya v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2008) 2 SCC 639 : (2007) 14 Scale 425.

4. State of Punjab v. Amar Nath Goyal, (2005) 6 SCC 754 : AIR 2006 SC 171.

5. (1991) 2 SCC 104 : AIR 1991 SC 1182.

ment servants irrespective of their date of retirement. The Supreme Court rejected this contention and upheld the validity of the memorandum in Union of India v. B.P.N. Menon,[6] thus, adopting a stance at variance with Nakara.

The Court now took the position that any revised scheme in respect of post-retirement benefits can be implemented from a cut-off date which can be regarded as reasonable and rational in the light of Art. 14. The Court now maintained that whenever a revision takes place, a cut-off date becomes imperative because the benefit has to be allowed within the financial resources available with the government. Due to many constraints, it is not always possible to confer the same benefits to one and all irrespective of the dates of their retirements. The memorandum in the instant case was the result of an agreement between the government and the staff union. It was based on the recommendation of the Third Pay Commission. The date fixed as the cut-off date was held to be as not arbitrary as the price index level on this date had reached 272. The Court observed: "Not only in matters of revising the pensionary benefits but even in respect of revision of scales of pay, a cut-off date on some rational or reasonable basis has to be fixed for extending the benefits."

The respondent, a commissioned officer retired on May 18, 1982. According to the rules prevailing at the time, he was held not entitled to any pension. On January 1, 1986, the rules were amended and persons in his position now became entitled to pensionary benefits. He now laid a claim for grant of pension pleading the Nakara ruling in his support. But the Court rejected his claim holding that the ratio of Nakara had no application to the factual situation in the instant case.[7] Nakara prohibited discrimination between pensioners forming a single class and bound by the same rules. The cut-off date chosen in that case was held to be arbitrary. In the instant case the respondent was not eligible for pension under the rules prevalent then. The new rules were not given any retrospective effect and, therefore, the respondent cannot claim any pension because of the new rule "This is not a case where a discrimination is being made among pensioners who were similarly situated".

The Supreme Court has observed in the case noted below:[8]

> "It is open to the State or to the Centre, as the case may be, to change the conditions of service unilaterally. Terminal benefits as well as pensionary benefits constitute conditions of service. The employer has the undoubted power to revise the salaries and/or the pay scales as also terminal benefits/pensionary benefits. The power to specify a date from which the revisions of pay scales or terminal benefits/pensionary benefits, as the case may be, shall take effect is a concomitant of the said power. So long as such date is specified in a reasonable manner, i.e., without bringing about a discrimination between similarly situated persons, no interference is called for by the court in that behalf… The only question is whether the prescription of the date is unreasonable or discriminatory…"[9]

---

6. AIR 1994 SC 2221 (1994) 4 SCC 68.
7. Commander Head Quarter, Calcutta v. Biplabendra Chanda, AIR 1997 SC 2607 : (1997) 1 SCC 208.
8. State of West Bengal v. Rattan Behari Dey, (1993) 4 SCC 62 : 1993 (2) LLJ 741.
9. Also see, Union of India v. Lieut. (Mrs.) E. Iacats, (1997) 7 SCC 334 : 1997 (2) LLJ 830.

In Hari Ram Gupta v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[10] the State Government refused to give the benefit of pension to those who had retired prior to the coming into force of the new rules. Refusing to apply the Nakara ruling to the instant factual situation, the Court pointed out that in Nakara all pensioners formed a class as a whole and the Court refused to micro-classify them by an arbitrary, unprincipled and unreasonable eligibility criteria.

In the case noted below,[11] the employees were governed by the contributory Provident Fund Scheme. With effect from 1-7-1986, a scheme was introduced. The question which arose was whether the pension scheme ought to be applied to those who had already retired before the introduction of the pension scheme, i.e. 1-7-1986. The Supreme Court rejected the claim. As per the rules prevalent at the time, the retirees had received all their retiral benefits. If the pension scheme were made applicable to all past retirees, the resulting financial burden would amount to Rs. 200 crores which would be beyond the capacity of the employer. The reasons given for introducing the scheme from 1-7-1986 inter alia was financial constraint—a valid ground. The Court ruled that the "retired" employees and those who were in employment on 1-7-1986, "cannot be treated alike as they do not belong to one class. The workmen, who had retired after receiving all the benefits available under the Contributory Provident Fund Scheme, cease to be employees of the appellant Board w.e.f. the date of their retirement. They form a separate class." Thus, there was no illegality in introducing the pension scheme prospectively from 1-7-1986, and not making it applicable retrospectively to those who had retired before that date.

A regulation providing for termination of service of an air hostess in Air India International on her first pregnancy has been held to be arbitrary and abhorrent to the notions of a civilized society.[12] Exclusion from the Minimum Wages Act of the workmen employed by government on famine relief work, and payment to them of wages lower than the minimum wages, violates Art. 14, "The rights of all the workers will be the same whether they are drawn from an area affected by drought and scarcity conditions or come from elsewhere."[13]

Stipends payable by the State Government to the post-graduate students of Agricultural university as well as of medical colleges, were enhanced but from different dates. The Court declared it to be discriminatory as the State Government failed to show that there was any reasonable basis or intelligible differential for fixing different dates for paying increased stipends to the two streams of students, especially when the Government had been maintaining parity all along among these students.[14]

---

10. AIR 1998 SC 2483 : (1998) 6 SCC 328.
Also see, All India Reserve Bank Retired Officers Assn. v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 767 : (1992) 2 SCC 55; All India PNB Retired Officers Assn. v. Union of India, dated 17-11-1998.

11. Tamil Nadu Electricity Board v. R. Veerasamy, AIR 1999 SC 1768 : (1999) 3 SCC 414; see also cut-off date/ point, State Bank of India v. L. Kannaiah, (2003) 10 SCC 499 : AIR 2003 SC 3860.

12. Air India v. Nergesh Meerza, AIR 1981 SC 1829, 1853 : (1981) 4 SCC 335.

13. Sanjit Roy. v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1983 SC 328 : (1983) 1 SCC 525.

14. State of Andhra Pradesh v. G. Ramakishan, AIR 2001 SC 324 : (2001) 1 SCC 323. See also State of Himachal Pradesh v. Anjana Devi, (2009) 5 SCC 108 : AIR 2009 SC 2229. See also State of Bihar v. Upendra Narayan Singh, (2009) 5 SCC 65 : (2009) 4 JT 577. See also State of Himachal Pradesh v. Anjana Devi, (2009) 5 SCC 108 : AIR 2009 SC 2229.

(d) LANDLORD-TENANT RELATIONSHIP

The position of law is settled that the State and its authorities including instrumentalities of States have to be just, fair and reasonable in all their activities including those in the field of contracts. Thus even while playing the role of a landlord or a tenant, the State and its authorities remain so and cannot be heard or seen causing displeasure or discomfort to Article 14. The State and its instrumentalities, as landlords have the liberty of revising the rates of rent so as to compensate themselves against loss caused by inflationary tendencies. They can and rather must also save themselves from negative balances caused by the cost of maintenance, payment of taxes and costs of administration. The State, as the landlord, need not necessarily be a benevolent and good charitable Samaritan. However, the State cannot be seen to be indulging in rack renting, profiteering and indulging in whimsical or unreasonable evictions or bargains. Having been exempted from the operation of rent control legislation, the courts cannot hold them tied to the same shackles from which the State and its instrumentalities have been freed by the legislature in its wisdom and thereby requiring them to be ruled indirectly or by analogy by the same law from which they are exempt.

At the same time the liberty given to the State and its instrumentalities by the statute enacted under the Constitution does not exempt them from honouring the Constitution itself. They continue to be ruled by Article 14. The validity of their actions in the field of landlord tenant relationship is available to be tested not only under the rent control legislation but under the Constitution.[15]

The Supreme Court has struck down as discriminatory and unconstitutional a provision in the Andhra Pradesh Buildings (Lease, Rent and Eviction) Control Act, 1960, exempting all buildings constructed on or after August 26, 1957, from the operation of the Act. The Court said that the impugned provision was violative of Art. 14 of the Constitution (equality before law) as the "continuance of this provision in the statute book will imply the creation of a privileged class of landlords without any rational basis." The Court said that "the incentive to build which provided a reasonable classification for such class of landlords (when the Act was made in 1960) no longer exists by lapse of time in the case of the majority of such landlords." "There is no reason why after all these years they (landlords who built their houses on or after August 26, 1957) should not be brought at par with other landlords who are subject to the restrictions imposed by the Act in the matter of eviction of tenants and control of rents."

Exemption can however be granted to "newly constructed buildings" for a limited period of time. In this connection, the Court has said:…. "what was once a non-discriminatory piece of legislation may in course of time become discriminatory."

The incentive to build provides a rational basis for classification of landlords under Art. 14 of the Constitution and "it is necessary in the national interest that there should be freedom from restrictions for a limited period of time." Hence the State legislature may provide incentive to persons who want to build new houses as it serves a definite social purpose and to mitigate rigours to landlords who may have recently built houses for a limited period.[16] In Mohinder Kumar v. State of

---

15. Jamshed Hormusji Wadia v. Board of Trustees, Port of Mumbai, (2004) 3 SCC 214 : AIR 2004 SC 1815.

16. Motor General Traders v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1984 SC 121 : (1984) 1 SCC 222. Also, Punjab Tin Supply Co., Chandigarh v. Central Government, AIR 1984 SC 87 : (1984) 1 SCC 206.

Haryana,[17] the Supreme Court has held valid exemption of new buildings from rent control for ten years.

The Tamil Nadu Rent Control Act was made inapplicable to tenants of residential buildings paying more than Rs. 400 per months as rent. Holding the provision bad under Art. 14, the Supreme Court has held that while tenants in non-residential buildings paying rent of more than Rs. 400 were protected, similar tenants in residential buildings were not. The Court saw no justification for such a classification.[18]

But, on the other hand, in several cases, the Supreme Court has justified greater protection being given to the tenants of commercial premises than those of residential premises.[19] The reason is that commercial tenancy is much more valuable than a residential tenancy. A commercial tenancy has got distinct features and characteristics of its own different from that of a residential tenancy. Accordingly, all the grounds of eviction of a tenant of a residential premises may not be available for eviction of a tenant of commercial premises.[20] For example, while bona fide necessity of the landlord may be a good ground to evict a tenant of a residential premises, the same ground may not be available under the relevant law for the eviction of a tenant from commercial premises. Similarly, the heirs of the statutory tenants of commercial premises may be better protected than those of residential premises.

On the other hand, in Harbilas Rai Bansal v. State of Punjab,[21] the Supreme Court has expressed a different view. The Punjab Rent Act provided, to begin with, that a landlord could evict a tenant from commercial/residential property on the ground of his own bona fide personal need. But, then, the law was amended so that while a landlord could evict a tenant in residential property on the ground of his own bona fide need but not if the property was non-residential. The Supreme Court ruled that this differentiation between tenants of residential and non-residential properties was violative of Art.14. A tenant in a non-residential property could continue in possession for life and after his death his heirs could continue the tenancy. The Court ruled that any classification between tenants of residential and non-residential properties had no nexus with the object sought to be achieved by the Act in question. "Tenants of both kinds of buildings need equal and same protection of the beneficial provisions of the Act. Neither from the objects and reasons of the Act nor from the provisions of the Act it is possible to discern any basis for the classification created by the Amendment."

(e) FOREIGNERS

The power of the Government of India to expel foreigners is absolute and unlimited and there is no provision in the Constitution fettering its discretion and the executive government has unrestricted right to expel a foreigner. So far as right to be heard is concerned, there cannot be any hard and fast rule about the manner in which a person concerned has to be given an opportunity to place his

---

17. AIR 1986 SC 244 : (1985) 4 SCC 221.
18. Rattan Arya v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1986 SC 1444 : (1986) 3 SCC 385.
19. Gauri Shankar v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 55 : (1994) 6 SCC 349.
20. Gian Devi Anand v. Jeevan Kumar, AIR 1985 SC 796 : (1985) 2 SCC 683.
21. AIR 1996 SC 857 : (1996) 1 SCC 1.

case. The deportation proceedings are not proceedings for prosecution where a man may be convicted or sentenced. The procedure under the foreigners Act and the Foreigners (Tribunals) Order 1964 is just, fair and reasonable and does not offend any Constitutional provision.[22]

It is open to the state to make a classification for conferring benefit on a specified class of employees e.g. pension Rules not being made applicable to casual employees.[23]

(f) CIVIL SERVICES

In Mohan Kumar Singhania v. Union of India,[24] the Supreme Court has ruled that each of the various civil services, namely, I.A.S., I.F.S., I.P.S., Group A Services and Group B Services, is a 'separate and determinate' service forming a distinct cadre and that each of the Services is founded on intelligible differentia which on rational grounds distinguishes persons grouped together from those left out and that the differences are "real and substantial" having a "rational and reasonable nexus" to the "objects sought to be achieved".

(g) LIFE INSURANCE

The Life Insurance Corporation, a statutory body, introduced a scheme of life insurance, which was open only to persons in government or semi-government service or of reputed commercial firms. This scheme was declared unconstitutional as being violative of Art. 14. LIC argued that this salaried group of lives formed a class with a view to identify health conditions. But the Supreme Court rejected the argument observing, "The classification based on employment in government, semi-government and reputed commercial firms has the insidious and inevitable effect of excluding lives in vast rural and urban areas engaged in unorganised or self-employed sectors to have life insurance offending Art. 14 of the Constitution and socio-economic justice."[25]

(h) MISTAKE NOT TO BE REPEATED

The Supreme Court has stated in Gursharan Singh[26] that the guarantee of 'equality before law' is a positive concept. It cannot be enforced by a person in a negative manner. Therefore, if an illegality or irregularity is committed by the state in favour of a person or a group of persons, others cannot claim that the same irregularity or illegality be also committed in their favour on the principle of equality before law.

Benefits extended to some persons in an irregular or illegal manner cannot be claimed by a citizen on the plea of equality as enshrined in Art. 14. If such claims are enforced, it will amount to continuance and perpetuation of an illegal proce-

---

22. Sarbananda Sonowal v. Union of India, (2005) 5 SCC 665 : AIR 2005 SC 2920.
23. General Manager, North West Railway v. Chanda Devi, (2008) 2 SCC 108.
24. AIR 1992 SC 1 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 594.
25. LIC of India v. Consumer Education & Research Centre, AIR 1995 SC 1811, 1822 : (1995) 5 SCC 482.
26. Gursharan Singh v. New Delhi Municipal Commissioner, AIR 1996 SC 1174, 1179 : (1996) 2 SCC 459.
Also see, Secretary, Jaipur Development Authority, Jaipur v. Daulat Nal Jain, (1997) 1 SCC 35; State of Haryana v. Ram Kumar Mann, (1997) 3 SCC 321; Jalandhar Improvement Trust v. Sampuran Singh, AIR 1999 SC 1347 : (1999) 3 SCC 494; C.S.I.R. v. Ajay Kumar Jain (Dr.), AIR 2000 SC 2710 : (2000) 4 SCC 186.

dure or order for extending similar benefits to others. To base a claim on the concept of equality, the petitioner has to establish that his claim being just and legal, has been denied to him, while it has been extended to others and in this process there has been a discrimination.

In the following case,[27] the Supreme Court has observed:

> "We fail to see how Art. 14 can be attracted in cases where wrong orders are issued in favour of others. Wrong orders cannot be perpetuated with the help of Art. 14 on the basis that such wrong orders were earlier passed in favour of some other persons and, therefore, there will be discrimination against others if correct orders are passed against them."

The principle of equality enshrined in Art. 14 does not apply when the order relied upon is unsustainable in law and is illegal.[28]

In Chandigarh Administration v. Jagjit Singh,[29] the Supreme Court has stated:

> "Generally speaking, the mere fact that the respondent authority has passed a particular order in the case of another person similarly situated can never be the ground for issuing a writ in favour of the petitioner on the plea of discrimination. The order in favour of the other person might be legal and valid or it might not be. That has to be investigated first before it can be directed to be followed in the case of the petitioner. If the order in favour of the other person is found to be contrary to law or not warranted in the facts and circumstances of his case, it is obvious that such illegal or unwarranted order cannot be made the basis of issuing a writ compelling the respondent authority to respect the illegality or to pass another unwarranted order."

Merely because the concerned authority has passed one illegal/unwarranted order in favour of one person, it does not entitle the High Court to issue a writ compelling the authority to repeat that illegality over and over again. By refusing to direct the authority to repeat the illegality, the court is not condoning the earlier illegal act/order nor can such illegal order constitute the basis for a legitimate complaint of discrimination.[30] Art. 14 does not countenance repetition of a wrong action to bring both wrongs at a par.[31]

A wrong judgment passed by a High Court under Art. 226 in favour of one person does not entitle another person to claim a similar benefit by invoking the doctrine of equality in his favour. Two wrongs do not make a right.[32]

---

27. Faridabad CT Scan Centre v. D.G. Health Services, AIR 1997 SC 3801 : (1997) 5 SCC 752; See also Vice Chancellor, M. D. University Rohtak v. Jahan Singh, (2007) 5 SCC 77 : (2007) 4 SCALE 226.

28. Union of India (Railway Board) v. J.V. Subhaiah, (1996) 2 SCC 258.

29. (1995) 1 SCC 745 : AIR 1995 SC 705.

30. Also see, Style (Dress Land) v. Union Territory, Chandigarh, (1999) 7 SCC 89, 103 : AIR 1999 SC 3678; Union of India v. Rakesh Kumar, AIR 2001 SC 1877 : (2001) 4 SCC 309.

31. Union of India v. International Trading Co., (2003) 5 SCC 437 : AIR 2003 SC 3983. See also State of Bihar v. Upendra Narayan Singh, (2009) 5 SCC 65 : (2009) 4 JT 577. See also State of Uttaranchal v. Alok Sharma, (2009) 7 SCC 647 : (2009) 6 JT 463.

32. State of Bihar v. Kameshwar Prasad Singh, AIR 2000 SC 2306 : (2000) 9 SCC 94.

(i) HARDSHIP

Mere hardship is no ground to strike down a valid legislation.[33] But the court has held that even if a law cannot be declared ultra vires on the ground of hardship, it can be so declared on the ground of total unreasonableness applying the Wednesbury "unreasonableness".[34]

(j) RECOVERY OF LOANS

A special machinery can be established for expeditious recovery of the loans advanced by the State or the State Financial Corporation. These loans are advanced to assist people financially to set up industries in the State so as to advance the well being of the people. If these loans are recovered expeditiously, fresh loans may be advanced to other persons for a similar purpose. These loans thus differ from the ordinary loans which are advanced for earning interest.[35]

(k) PERPETUATION OF ILLEGALITY

It would be constitutionally immoral to perpetuate inequality among majority people of the country in the guise of protecting the Constitutional Rights of minorities and the backward and downtrodden.[36]

(l) PUBLIC SECTOR UNDERTAKING

Favourable treatment shown to a public sector undertaking is not discriminatory. These undertakings stand in a different class altogether and the classification made between these enterprises and others is a valid one.[37] As the Supreme Court has observed: "….. preference shown to …….. public sector undertakings being in public interest, will not be construed as arbitrary so as to give rise to a contention of violation of Article 14 of the Constitution."[38]

Similarly it has been held that preference shown by the State to cooperative societies does not violate Art. 14 as these societies play a positive and progressive role in the economy of our country.[39]

(m) DISCRIMINATION BY THE STATE IN ITS OWN FAVOUR

Art. 14 does not outlaw discrimination between the state and a private individual because the two are not placed on the same footing. Thus, creation of a monopoly by the state in its favour will not be bad under Art. 14.[40]

---

33. Prafulla Kumar Das v. State of Orissa, (2003) 11 SCC 614 : AIR 2003 SC 4506.

34. Grand Kakatiya Sheraton Hotel and Towers Employees & Workers Union v. Srinivasa Resorts Ltd., (2009) 5 SCC 342 : AIR 2009 SC 2337.

35. State of Kerala v. V.R. Kalyanikutty, AIR 1999 SC 1305 : (1999) 3 SCC 657.

36. Islamic Academy of Education v. State of Karnataka, (2003) 6 SCC 697 : AIR 2003 SC 3724.

37. Hindusthan Paper Corporation Ltd. v. Govt. of Kerala, AIR 1986 SC 1541 : (1986) 3 SCC 398.

38. Indian Drugs & Pharmaceutical Ltd. v. Punjab Drugs Manufacturers Association, AIR 1999 SC 1626 : (1999) 6 SCC 247.

Also, Oil & Natural Gas Commission v. Association of Natural Gas Consuming Industries of Gujarat, AIR 1990 SC 1851.

39. Sarkari Sasta Anaj Vikreta Sangh, Tahsil Bemetra v. Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 2030 : (1981) 4 SCC 471; Krishna Kakkanath v. Govt. of Kerala, (1997) 9 SCC 495.

40. Saghir Ahmad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 728 : (1955) 1 SCR 707; Kondal Rao v. A.P.S.R.T. Corpn, AIR 1961 SC 82; Orissa Minor Oil (P) Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1983 Ori. 265.

Exemption granted to lands and buildings of the government, or a local authority, or a government sponsored housing board, from the Rent Control Act has been held valid as none of these has a profit motive and would not evict its tenants merely to unduly raise rents as private landlords usually do and thus their tenants are not similarly situated as those of the private individuals.[41]

Under the Limitation Act, government claims are barred after 60 years, whereas private claims are barred in a much shorter period. This distinction has been held valid because in the former case the loss falls on the community at large and also because government machinery works much slower than a private individual.[42] Money due to the state in respect of its trading activities can be made recoverable as a public demand. It is not against Art. 14 to distinguish between the government as a banker and other bankers for purposes of recovery of money, for government dues are the dues of the entire community and, therefore, a law providing special facility to recover the same cannot be said to offend Art. 14.[43]

Government debts can be given priority over individual debts;[44] special procedures can be laid down for eviction of unauthorised occupants of government premises as government property forms a class by itself;[45] special provisions can be made for recovering debts due to the government or to a bank established with public funds as disinguished from private banks.[46] Exemption granted to the State from payment of court-fees has been held valid because, in any case, the State has to bear the expense of the administration of civil justice.[47]

(n) TAXING STATUTES

Art. 14 covers tax legislation as well. Tax laws do not fall outside the scope of Art. 14, and such laws must also pass the test of Art. 14. However, taxing statutes enjoy more judicial indulgence because picking and choosing within limits is inevitable in taxation. The principle of classification is applied somewhat liberally in case of a taxing statute. The legislature enjoys a great deal of latitude in the matter of classification of objects and purposes of taxation. The courts adopt a more tolerant attitude towards a tax law.

The courts assert that in view of the intrinsic complexity of fiscal adjustments of diverse elements, a legislature ought to be permitted a larger discretion and latitude in the matter of classification for taxing purposes.[48] The rate of tax and objects to be taxed are to be determined by the Legislature and unless it is found

---

41. Baburao Shantaram v. Bombay Housing Board, AIR 1954 SC 153 : 1954 SCR 572.
42. Nav Rattan Mal v. State, AIR 1961 SC 1704 : (1962) 2 SCR 324.
43. Manna Lal v. Collector of Jhalawar, AIR 1961 SC 828 : (1961) 2 SCR 962.
44. Builders Supply Corpn. v. Union of India, AIR 1965 SC 1061 : (1965) 2 SCR 289.
45. M. Chhagan Lal v. Greater Bombay Municipality, AIR 1974 SC 2009; State of Gujarat v. Patel Bava Karsan, AIR 1980 SC 1144 : 1980 Supp SCC 7.
46. Lachman Das v. State of Punjab, AIR 1963 SC 222. Also, Director of Industries, State of U.P. v. Deep Chand, AIR 1980 SC 801; G.S . Agarwal v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 1224 : 1984 Supp SCC 607.
47. P.C. Sukhani v. State of Sikkim, AIR 1982 Sikkim 1.
48. State of Maharashtra v. M.B. Badiya, AIR 1988 SC 2062 : (1988) 4 SCC 290; State of Karnataka v. D.P. Sharma, AIR 1975 SC 594; Anant Mills v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1975 SC 1234; I.T.O., Shillong v. N.T.R. Rymbai, AIR 1976 SC 670; Ganga Sugar Corp. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 286; State of Karnataka v. Hansa Corp., AIR 1981 SC 463 : (1980) 4 SCC 697; Laxmi Narain v. State of Orissa, AIR 1983 Ori. 229; State of Bihar v. S.K. Sinha, AIR 1995 SC 885: (1995) 3 SCC 86.

to be so unreasonable, the court does not interfere with the latitude enjoyed by the Legislature in this behalf.[49] On this point, the Supreme Court has observed in Khandige:[50]

> "…. The courts, in view of the inherent complexity of fiscal adjustment of diverse elements, permit a larger discretion to the Legislature in the matter of classification, so long it adheres to the fundamental principles underlying the said doctrine. The power of the Legislature to classify is of "wide range and flexibility" so that it can adjust its system of taxation in all proper and reasonable ways."

Again the Court has observed in Hoechst:[51]

> "When the power to tax exists, the extent of the burden is a matter for discretion of the law-makers. It is not the function of the court to consider the propriety or justness of the tax, or enter upon the realm of legislative policy. If the evident intent and general operation of the tax legislation is to adjust the burden with a fair and reasonable degree of equality, the constitutional requirements is satisfied."

The reason for greater judicial tolerance shown towards a tax law is that taxation is not merely a source of raising money to defray government expenses but it is also a tool to reduce inequalities in society. Accordingly, while applying the doctrine of classification, the legislature is allowed much more freedom of choice in the matter of taxation vis-à-vis other types of laws. As no scheme of taxation is free of all discriminatory impact, a tax measure is struck down on the ground of discrimination under Art. 14 only on the ground of palpable arbitrariness applied in the context of the felt needs of the times and societal exigencies informed by experience. The tests of the vice of discrimination in a tax law are thus less rigorous.[52]

Parliament imposed expenditure tax on hotels where room charges were Rs. 400 or over per day for a unit of residential accommodation. Holding the Act valid against a challenge under Art. 14, the Supreme Court emphasized that having regard to the wide variety of diverse economic criteria that go into the formulation of a fiscal policy, the legislature enjoys a wide latitude in the matter of selection of persons, subject-matter, events, etc. for purposes of taxation.[53]

---

49. Meenakshi v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1983 SC 1283, 1289.

50. Khandige Sham Bhai v. Agri. Income-tax Officer, AIR 1963 SC 591 at 594-95 : (1963) 3 SCR 809. Also see, Khyerbari Tea Co. v. State of Assam, AIR 1964 SC 925, 941 : (1964) 5 SCR 975.

51. Hoechst Pharmaceuticals Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019 : (1983) 4 SCC 45.
Also see, State of Kerala v. Aravind Ramakant Modawadakar, (1999) 7 SCC 400, at 406 : AIR 1999 SC 2970.

52. Kerala Hotel and Restaurant Association v. State of Kerala, AIR 1990 SC 913 : (1990) 2 SCC 502, Khadi & Village Soap Industries Association v. State of Haryana, AIR 1994 SC 2479 : 1994 Supp (3) SCC 218; Spences Hotels Pvt. Ltd. v. State of West Bengal, (1991) 2 SCC 154; Gannon Dunkerley & Co. v. State of Rajasthan, (1993) 1 SCC 364 at 397; I.T.O. v. N. Takim Roy Rymbai, AIR 1976 SC 670; G.K. Krishna v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1975 SC 583; State of Gujarat v. Sri Ambica Mills, AIR 1974 SC 1300; Hiralal v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 1034; Jaipur Hosiery Mills v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1971 SC 1330 : (1970) 2 SCC 26.

53. Elel Hotels and Investments Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1664 : (1989) 3 SCC 698; see also R. C. Tobacco (P) Ltd. v. Union of India, (2005) 7 SCC 725 : AIR 2005 SC 4203. Wide discretion conferred on legislature in tax and economic matters; See also Gujarat Ambuja Cements Ltd. v. Union of India, (2005) 4 SCC 214 : AIR 2005 SC 3020.

In the field of taxation, the Supreme Court has permitted the legislature to exercise an extremely wide discretion in classifying items for tax purposes, so long as it refrains from clear and hostile discrimination against particular persons or classes. A tax on purchasers of hides and skins only, and not on purchasers of other commodities, was held valid as there was 'no material on the record' to suggest that the purchasers of other commodities were similarly situated as those of hides and skins.[54]

A sales tax imposed on sales of virginia tobacco but not of country tobacco is not bad under Art. 14, for the former has certain features which distinguish it from the latter.[55] A higher show tax on cinema houses with large seating accommodation and situated in fashionable, busy or rich localities than on small cinema houses containing less accommodation and situated in poor localities, is valid.[56] Classification for purposes of income-tax with reference to the sources of income is valid.[57] Differential rates of tax can be imposed on stage carriages and goods vehicles as the two belong to distinct categories.[58] Levy of a higher grazing rate for animals belonging to the outsiders than on those belonging to the residents of the State is discriminatory as there is no rational basis for making such a distinction.[59]

Parliament enacted a law imposing expenditure tax at 10% ad valorem on 'chargeable expenses' incurred in hotels wherein room charges were Rs. 400 or over per day for a unit of residential accommodation. The Act was challenged under Art. 14. The argument was that there was no basis or intelligible differentia for discriminating between the levy of the tax on expenditure over food or drink provided by a hotel and the food and drink provided by a restaurant or eating house not situated in a hotel even though the cost of food or beverage could be higher than that on similar items in a taxed hotel. The Court held the tax valid arguing that "the bases of classification cannot be said to be arbitrary or unintelligible nor as without a rational nexus with the object of the law." People with economic superiority would enjoy the services of a hotel having accommodation priced at Rs. 400/- or more per day. This basis of classification could not be condemned as irrational. The Court emphasized the point that having regard to the wide variety of diverse economic criteria that go into the formulation of a fiscal policy legislature enjoys a wide latitude in the matter of selection of persons, subject-matter, events, etc. for purposes of taxation. The tests of the vice of discrimination in a taxing law are, accordingly, less rigorous.[60]

An entertainment tax was levied by the Tamil Nadu Government on admission to cinema theatres. Different rates were prescribed depending on the locality where the cinema was situated and also on the amenities provided therein. The 54. V.M. Syed v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 314 : 1954 SCr 1117.

---

55. East India Tobacco Co. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1962 SC 1733 : (1963) 1 SCR 404.
56. Western India Theatres v. Cantonment Board, AIR 1959 SC 582 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 63.
57. I.T.O., Shillong v. N.T.R. Rymbai, AIR 1976 SC 670 : (1976) 1 SCC 916.
58. Ambala Bus Syndicate (Pvt.) Ltd. v. State of Punjab, AIR 1983 P&H. 213.
59. Lakshman v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 656 : (1983) 3 SCC 275.
60. Federation of Hotel and Restaurant v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1637 : (1989) 3 SCC 634.

tax was levied at a particular percentage of the rate of admission. This percentage varied from locality to locality. The tax was challenged under Art. 14, but the Supreme Court ruled that the classification made between the theatres was not an unreasonable one. The Court emphasized that the concept of "Equality before law" contained in Art. 14 envisages an "obligation upon the State to bring about, through the machinery of law, a more equal society envisaged by the Preamble and Part IV of our Constitution.[61] For, equality before law can be predicated meaningfully only in an equal society."[62]

In Andhra Pradesh, for levying a similar tax, the Legislature prescribed different rates of tax by classifying theatres into different classes, namely, air conditioned, air-cooled, ordinary, permanent, semi permanent, touring and temporary. The theatres were further categorised on the basis of the type of the local area in which they were situated. The levy was held valid as the legislature had sought to classify the cinema theatres taking into consideration the differentiating circumstances for the purpose of imposing the tax. The Court rejected the argument of the theatre owners that the classification was not perfect and that there should have been further classification amongst the theatres falling in the same class on the basis of the location of the theatre in each local area.[63]

To find out discrimination, what is decisive is not the phraseology of a statute but the impact and effect of the law. A law ex facie non-discriminatory may in effect operate unevenly on persons or property not similarly situated and thus offend the equality clause. Conversely, a law appearing to be discriminatory may not be so in actual operation.[64] Just as a difference in the treatment of persons similarly situate leads to discrimination so also discrimination can arise if persons who are unequals, i.e., differently placed, are treated similarly. A law providing for equal treatment of unequal objects, transactions or persons would be condemned as discriminatory if there is absence of rational relation to the object intended to be achieved by the law.

This proposition is illustrated by K.T. Moopil Nair v. State of Kerala,[65] A land tax at a flat rate of Rs. 2 per acre was declared discriminatory as it made no reference to income, either actual or potential, from the land taxed. A flat rate of tax was imposed whether or not there was any income from the property. The Act in question did not have any regard to the quality of the land or its productive capacity and so levy of the tax at a flat rate was invalid. Lack of classification by the Act therefore created inequality. This was evident from the facts of the instant case, where the petitioner was required to pay a tax of Rs. 54,000 per year while the income from the land taxed came to Rs. 3,100 only. The tax was therefore characterised as discriminatory and confiscatory and hence bad under Art. 14.

---

61. Part IV of the Constitution pertains to "Directive Principles of State Policy"; see, infra, Ch. XXXIV.
62. Sri Srinivasa Theatre v. Govt. of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1992 SC 999, 1004 : (1992) 2 SCC 643.
63. Venkateshwara Theatre v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1993 SC 1947 : (1993) 3 SCC 677.
64. Khandige Sham Bhat v. Agricultural, I.T.O., AIR 1963 SC 591 : (1963) 3 SCR 809.
65. AIR 1961 SC 552 : (1961) 3 SCR 77.

Following the Moopil Nair case, the Supreme Court in State of Andhra Pradesh v. Raja Reddy,[66] declared void land revenue imposed at a flat rate on land without taking into account the quality or productivity of the soil. Moreover, the Act laid down no procedure to assess land revenue, and however, grievous the mistake made in the assessment, there was no way for the aggrieved party to get it corrected. No notice was prescribed and no opportunity was given to the assessee to question the assessment on his land. The Court emphasized that Art. 14 can be offenderd both when a statutory provision finds differences where there are none, or makes no difference where there is one. Even a tax law cannot introduce unreasonable discrimination between persons or property either by classification or lack of it.

A tax on buildings on the 'floorage' basis (the rate of tax being determined by the floor area) on a sliding scale, whether the building be situated in a large industrial town or in an insignificant village, was held discriminatory under Art. 14 as the rate of tax did not depend upon the purpose for which the building was used, the nature of the structure, the town and locality in which the building was situated, the economic rent obtainable from the building, its cost and other related circumstances which might appropriately be taken into consideration in any rational system of taxation of buildings. No attempt was made at any rational classification in imposing the tax in question. Imposing a uniform tax on objects, persons or transactions essentially dissimilar may result in discrimination.[67]

A tax on urban land was held invalid because of lack of classification which resulted in inequality and hostile discrimination.[68]

Kerala levied a tax at the rate of Rs. 50 per hectare on seven types of plantations. The tax was challenged on the ground of lack of classification. By a majority of 3 : 2, the Supreme Court upheld the tax. The majority found that the law sought to equalise the different plantations for purposes of taxability. HIDAYATULLAH, C.J., speaking for the majority observed: "….. the burden of proving discrimination is always heavy and heavier still when a taxing statute is under attack….The burden is on a person complaining of discrimination. The burden is proving not possible 'inequality' but hostile 'unequal' treatment. This is more so when uniform taxes are levied."

On the other hand, the minority held that tax was discriminatory as it was not related to productivity of land. For example, the average yields of the lands varied from 350 kgs to 1850 kgs of tea and so a uniform tax must result in inequality among tea-growers who formed one class.[69] The minority view appears to be more rational in this case.

Whenever power is delegated by the legislature for the purpose of levying taxes on a particular commodity or exempting some other commodity from taxation, a sort of classification is to be made. Such classification cannot be a product

---

66. AIR 1967 SC 1458 : (1967) 3 SCR 28.
Also see, Samarendra Nath v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1981 Cal. 58.
67. State of Kerala v. Haji Kutty, AIR 1969 SC 378 : (1969) 1 SCR 645.
68. Parshava Properties Ltd. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1982 Cal 202.
69. Twyford Tea Co. v. State of Kerala, AIR 1970 SC 1133 : (1970) 1 SCC 189.

of blind approach by the administrative authorities on which the responsibility of delegated legislations is vested by the Constitution. A notification issued by a Taxing Department of a State which lacks a sense of reasonability because it is not able to strike a rational balance of classification between the items of the same category would be ultra vires Art. 14.[70]

The reasonableness of classification must be examined on the basis, that when the object of the taxing provision is not to tax the sale of certain chemical fertilizers included in the list which clearly points out that all the fertilizers with similar compositions must be included without excluding any other chemical fertilizer which has the same elements and, as such, there is no basis for differential treatment amongst the same class. The Court referred to Ayurveda Pharmacy case[71] which had held that two vital items of the same category could not be discriminated against and where such a distinction is made between the items falling in the same category it should be done on a reasonable basis, in order to save such a classification being in contravention of Art. 14 of the Constitution.[72]

A classification on the basis of capacity to pay for purposes of taxation is valid. It is therefore permissible to levy a higher tax on those who are economically stronger than those who are weaker. "The object of a tax is not only to raise revenue but also to regulate the economic life of the society."[73]

A flat rate tax may not be bad always. It is only in marginal cases when the impact of such a tax is glaringly discriminatory or expropriatory that it may be hit by Art. 14. Therefore, a tax of Re. 1 per bottle of foreign liquor (produced in India) is valid as it is levied at a conveniently flat rate with minimal effect on overall price and it is easy to collect.[74]

A classification made to prevent evasion of tax and fraud on taxation may be held valid under Art. 14.[75] The Central Government classified match manufacturing units into mechanised and non-mechanised units and levied a lower excise duty on the latter than on the former. It was argued that the non-mechanised category did not distinguish between stronger and weaker units and thus treated unequals as equals. Rejecting the contention, the courts held that a pertinent principle of differentiation linked to productive processes had already been adopted and further sub-classi-fication between strong and weak units in the same class could not be insisted upon with reference to Art. 14.[76]

Several State Legislatures enacted statutory provisions levying cesses/taxes on minerals. These provisions were invalidated by the Supreme Court on the ground that the power to impose these levies vested with Parliament and not the States.

---

70. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Deepak Fertilizers & Petrochemical Corpn. Ltd., (2007) 10 SCC 342 : (2007) 8 JT 148.
71. (1989) 2 SCC 285 : AIR 1989 SC 1230.
72. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Deepak Fertilizers & Petrochemical Corpn. Ltd., (2007) 10 SCC 342 : (2007) 8 JT 148.
73. Kodar v. State of Kerala, AIR 1974 SC 2272 : (1974) 4 SCC 422.
Also, Hoechst Pharmaceuticals, supra, footnote 51 on 1240.
74. Balaji v. I.T.O., AIR 1962 SC 123 : (1962) 2 SCR 983.
75. Avinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1979 SC 321 : (1979) 1 SCC 137.
76. M. Match Works v. Asstt. Collector, AIR 1974 SC 497 : (1974) 4 SCC 428.

The State levies were at different rates. To protect the States from refunding the revenue collected from these levies, Parliament enacted an Act validating the State levies with retrospective effect.

This Act was challenged inter alia under Art. 14 on the ground that it imposed levies in different States at different rates. The Court held that there was no violation of Art. 14 by Parliament as there was historic justification for the law in question. Different States were imposing levies at different rates and to validate the State levies, Parliament had to adopt the very rates prevailing in the various States. "It is really not a case where the Parliamentary enactment is creating the distinction or different treatment. Distinction and different treatment was already there over several decades; each State was prescribing its own rate on the same material… The Parliament has intervened and by enacting the impugned law in exercise of its undoubted power, validated the levy and all that flows from it. In such circumstances, there was no other way except to do what has actually been done". When Parliament was re-enacting the very provisions prevalent in the States, it could not but adopt those very rates.[77]

Differentiation in taxation levied on intra-state and inter-State contract carriages was upheld by the Supreme Court in the following case,[78] on the ground that "in many factual ways the vehicles covered by two different permits do form a separate and distinct class". The courts would not interfere with classification, "which is the prerogative of the legislature", so long as it was not arbitrary or unreasonable. The nexus of the classification with the object of taxation in the instant case lay in pubic interest—"which is again within the realm of legislative wisdom unless tainted by perversity or absurdity". The Supreme Court reiterated the proposition as regards the power of the State to tax that "the State has a wide discretion in selecting the persons or objects it will tax and thus a statute is not open to attack on the ground that it taxes some persons or objects and not others." A very wide latitude is available to the legislature in the matter of classification of objects, persons and things for the purpose of taxation.

(o) ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

There is no such law that a particular commodity cannot have a dual fixation of price. Dual fixation of price based on reasonable classification of different types of customers has met with approval from the courts, e.g. Respondent coal company charging lower prices for supply of coal from core/linked sector industries while charging higher prices from appellants who did not belong to the core sector. The Court held that primary consideration for placing industries concerned in the core sector being their intrinsic importance to the economy of country and role which they play in nation building activities. Requirement of coal in the core sector is on the higher side either for captive power generation or for other uses for manufacturing operations. Any substantial increase in price of coal would have a substantial effect on cost of finished products of vital importance, and cost of services to the public. These factors legitimately call for a special treatment as far as these industries are concerned. For charging lesser prices or evolving a dual price policy it cannot be said that in such a case that equals are being treated unequally or that the classification

77. P. Kannadasan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 SC 2560 : (1996) 5 SCC 670.
78. State of Kerala v. Aravind Ramakant Modawdakar, (1999) 7 SCC 400 : AIR 1999 SC 2970.

does not rest on a rational basis. Moreover, respondent coal company is facing a heavy financial deficit having an accumulated loss of more than Rs.1000 crores. Decontrol of price was done with predominant object of enabling respondent and other coal companies which were in the red, to become solvent and profitable. An industrial company completely held by the Govt. (like respondent) cannot be denied right to keep in view the consideration of commercial expediency while formulating its policies in discharge of its functions. Though absolute and unfettered freedom cannot be granted to State owned companies, but a wide latitude and flexible approach should be conceded especially when price fixation has been taken out of the realm of statutory control.[79] In judicial review, the court is neither concerned with the (economic) policy nor with the rates. But in appropriate proceedings it may enquire into the question, whether relevant considerations have gone in and extraneous/irrelevant considerations been kept out while determining the price. In case the legislature has laid down the pricing policy and prescribed the factors which should guide the determination of the price, then the Court will, if necessary, enquire into the question whether the policy and factors were present to the mind of the authorities specifying the price. The Court does not substitute its judgment for that of the legislature or its agent as to the matters within the province of either. The judicial enquiry is confined to the question whether the findings of facts are reasonably based on evidence and whether such findings are consistent with the laws of the land.[80]

Sugar dealers in Calcutta were permitted to keep a maximum stock of 3500 quintals of sugar whereas those in towns with population up to one lakh, only 250 quintals and in towns with less than one lakh population, only 100 quintals. Such a classification of dealers was held to be not arbitrary but based on reasonable classification and so not bad under Art. 14.[81]

The agricultural debtors form a separate category because of their poverty, economic backwardness and miserable conditions. Therefore, a law enacted to give relief to agricultural indebtedness is not invalid.[82] A law imposing a minimum sentence of six months' rigorous imprisonment on offenders guilty of selling adulterated food is not hit by Art. 14.[83] When unequally placed persons are treated equally, Art. 14 is violated.[84]

By a Central law, the undertakings of 14 banks were acquired by the Central Government and these banks were prohibited from doing any banking business. This was held to be discriminatory as other banks could carry on banking business and new banks could be floated and there was thus no rational explanation for the prohibition on the 14 banks in question.[85]

The Special Bearer Bonds (Immunities and Exemptions) Act, 1981, providing for investment in bearer bonds was held valid vis-a-vis Art. 14 in R.K. Garg v.

---

79. Pallavi Refractories v. Singareni collieries Co. Ltd., (2005) 2 SCC 227 : AIR 2005 SC 744.
80. Pallavi Refractories v. Singareni collieries Co. Ltd., (2005) 2 SCC 227 : AIR 2005 SC 744.
81. P.P. Enterprises v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 1016 : (1982) 2 SCC 33.
82. Pathumma v. State of Kerala, AIR 1978 SC 771 : (1978) 2 SCC 1.
83. Inderjeet v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1979 SC 1867 : (1979) 4 SCC 246.
84. Hyderabad Karnataka Education Society v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1983 Knt. 251, 268.
85. R.C. Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 564 : (1970) 1 SCC 248.

Union of India.[86] The object of the Act being to unearth black money lying secreted, and to canalise the same into productive purposes, the classification made between those possessing black money and others could not be regarded as arbitrary or irrational. It was based on intelligible differentia having rational relation with the object of the Act. Only limited immunities had been granted to the holders of the bearer bonds. These are necessary to induce the holders of black money to invest in bearer bonds.

In the instant case, the Supreme Court emphasized that the laws relating to economic activities should be viewed with greater indulgence than ordinary laws and economic laws may not be struck down merely on account of crudities and inequities inasmuch as such legislations are designed to take care of complex situations and complex problems which do not admit of solutions through any doctrinaire approach or straight-jacket formulae.

In the words of the Court:

> "Another rule of equal importance is that laws relating to economic activities should be viewed with greater latitude than laws touching civil rights such as freedom of speech, religion etc… The court should feel more inclined to give judicial deference to legislative judgment in the field of economic regulation than in other areas where fundamental human rights are involved."

There is no Fundamental Right in a citizen to carry on trade or business in liquor.[87] The State under its regulatory power has the power to prohibit absolutely every form of activity in relation to intoxicants such as its manufacture, storage, export, import, sale and possession. However, when the State decides to grant such right or privilege to others, the State cannot escape the rigour of Art. 14. In this connection, the Supreme Court has observed in Nandlal:[88]

> "But while considering the applicability of Art. 14 in such a case we must bear in mind that having regard to the nature of the trade or business the Court would be slow to interfere with the policy laid down by the State Government for grant of licences for manufacture and sale of liquor. The court would, in view of the inherently pernicious nature of the commodity allow a large measure of latitude to the State Government in determining its policy of regulating manufacture and trade in liquor. Moreover, the grant of licences for manufacture and sale of liquor would essentially be a matter of economic policy where the court would hesitate to intervene and strike down what the State Government has done unless it appears to be plainly arbitrary, irrational or mala fide".[89]

---

86. AIR 1981 SC 2138 : (1981) 4 SCC 675.
To justify the classification, the Court emphasized upon the evils of blackmoney, viz., it adversely affects revenue; there are other adverse economic effects; it corrodes the economy. There was thus need to tackle this problem. It was thus necessary to give certain immunities to the holders of these bonds, e.g., they were not required to disclose the nature and source of acquisition of such bonds, these bonds were not to be taken into account for proceedings under any tax law, etc.

87. See, infra, under Art. 19(1)(g), Ch. XXIV, Sec. H.

88. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Nandlal Jaiswal, AIR 1987 SC 251, at 279 : (1986) 4 SCC 566.

89. Also see, Khoday Distillers Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1996 SC 912, at 915.

(p) GEOGRAPHICAL DIFFERENTIATION

Geographical considerations may form a valid basis of classification for purposes of legislation in appropriate cases. In this connection, the Supreme Court has recently observed in Clarence Pais v. Union of India[90]:

> "Historical reasons may justify differential treatment of separate geographical regions provided it bears a reason and just relation to the matter in respect of which differential treatment is accorded. Uniformity in law has to be achieved, but that is a long drawn process."

The State of Rajasthan passed an Act prescribing a procedure for fixing fair and equitable rent payable by the tenants in the Marwar region. It was challenged on the ground that it did not apply to the whole State. Rejecting the objection, the Supreme Court stated that Art. 14 prohibits unequal treatment of persons similarly situated. The Act would be bad if it were established that conditions prevailing in other areas of the State were similar to those in Marwar where the Act applied. This was not proved. An Act could not be held discriminatory merely because it did not apply to the whole State.[91]

One uniform law need not operate throughout the State regarding any particular matter. If circumstances so warrant, a State can be divided into several zones and different laws regarding the same matter applied to these zones. Thus, Orissa can have two Acts to nationalise road transport, one applying to that part of the State which was previously British, and the other to that part which was previously princely, as the conditions in the two parts differ materially.[92]

With the States' Re-organisation in 1956, territories from one State became part of another State. To avoid any dislocation in the legal system, the States Reorganisation Act stipulated that the existing laws would continue in force in these areas. The result was that in some cases, different laws prevailed in different areas of a State on the same subject. This was held valid on the ground that "differentiation arises from historical reasons; and a geographical classification based on historical reasons can be upheld as not being contrary to the equal protection clause in Art. 14."[93]

The Indian Income-tax Act provides for recovery of arrears of income-tax according to the land revenue recovery law prevalent in each State. These laws differ from State to State and prescribe different procedures, some harsher than others. It was argued that income-tax being a Union subject, the procedure for recovery of income-tax must be uniform throughout India, for to the Union all defaulters were alike and similarly situated, and thus prescribing different machinery from State to State created discrimination.

---

90. AIR 2001 SC 1151, 1155 : (2001) 4 SCC 325.
91. Kishan Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1955 SC 795 : (1955) 2 SCR 531.
92. Ram Chandra v. State of Orissa, AIR 1956 SC 298.
93. Bhaiya Lal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1962 SC 981 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 257.
Also, State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bhopal Sugar Industries, AIR 1964 SC 1179 : (1964) 6 SCR 846; Shri Amar Mutt v. Commr., H.R. & C.E. Dept., AIR 1980 SC 1 : (1979) 4 SCC 642.

The provision was held valid on the ground that to group the defaulters state-wise was to classify them on a geographical basis and this was an intelligible differentia. To subject the defaulters to the same coercive process as has been devised by their State, on a consideration of local needs, could not be regarded as bereft of a reasonable nexus between the basis of classification and the object sought to be achieved by the Indian Income-tax Act.[1] A law need not be applied to the whole State all at once. No discrimination arises if the law, to begin with, is applied to selected areas in the State.[2]

Under the Arms Act, an offence could be tried only after obtaining the sanction of the Central Government, but in the area North of the Ganga and Jamuna rivers, an offence could be tried without any such sanction. The distinction was held bad as it was based on an irrational factor. The differentiation between the area North of Ganga-Jamuna and the rest of the country had been made as a result of the political situation existing in 1857, viz., the largest opposition to the British Government had come from the talukedars in this area. But in the changed political situation of today, it was impossible to sustain any such distinction.[3]

Although geographical difference can be a basis of classification provided it had nexus with the object to be achieved, mere geographical classification cannot be sustained where the Act instead of achieving the object of legislation defeats the very purpose for which it has been made.[4]

(q) PROCEDURAL DIFFERENTIATION

Art. 14 guarantees equal protection not only as regards substantive laws but procedural laws as well. Art. 14 condemns discrimination not only by a substantive law but also by a law of procedure.[5]

As the Supreme Court has observed:[6] Art. 14 "not only guarantees equal protection as regards substantive laws but procedural laws also come within its ambit. The implication of the Article is that all litigants similarly situated are entitled to avail themselves of the same procedural rights for relief, and for defence with like protection and without discrimination." It means that all litigants, similarly situated, are entitled to the same procedural rights for relief and for defence. This means that if special procedure is laid down for a class of people as distinguished from others, then the 'class' must be based on a rational differentia having a reasonable relation with the object sought to be achieved. Further, all in the same 'class' should be subjected to the same law; there cannot be selectivity within a class. If within the same class some are subjected to a more drastic procedure than others, then it is discriminatory and bad under Art. 14. If two laws apply to a class, then the one which is more burdensome is discriminatory and so void under Art. 14.

---

1. Collector of Malabar v. E. Ebrahim, AIR 1957 SC 688 : 1957 SCR 970.
2. Shanmugha Oil Mill v. Market Committee, AIR 1960 Mad. 160.
3. Jai Lal v. Delhi Adm., AIR 1962 SC 1781 : (1963) 2 SCR 864.
4. Sarbananda Sonowal v. Union of India, (2005) 5 SCC 665 : AIR 2005 SC 2920, Illegal migrants (Determination by Tribunals) Act 1983, held to be unconstitutional.
5. Charan Lal Sahu v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1480 : (1990) 1 SCC 613.
6. Shri Meenakshi Mills Ltd., Madurai v. A.V. Visvanatha Sastri, AIR 1955 SC 13 : (1955) 1 SCR 787.

The above-mentioned principles can be illustrated by a few examples. A law in Jammu and Kashmir laying down a procedure, materially different from the ordinary criminal procedure, to try 'enemy agents' was held valid because the term 'enemy agents', as defined in the ordinance, constituted a clearly defined class. Creating a new offence, and providing a stringent procedure for its trial, do not give rise to discrimination as permissible classification under Art. 14 need not be of persons only; even offences of a serious nature may be treated as a class and tried in a way different from ordinary offences and dealt with by a drastic procedure without violating the equal protection clause.[7]

According to S. 27 of the Evidence Act, a statement made to a police officer by an accused in custody when it leads to the discovery of a fact is admissible in evidence. It was argued against the provision that it drew a distinction between statements made by persons in custody and those not in custody. The provision was however upheld because the classification between persons in custody and those not in custody in the context of admissibility of statements made by them concerning the off-ence charged was not arbitrary or artificial.[8]

Under S. 178A of the Sea Customs Act, if goods like gold, diamonds, etc., are seized in the reasonable belief that they are smuggled goods, then the burden of proving that they are not smuggled goods is on the person from whose possession they have been seized. The provision was challenged as discriminatory, for under the ordinary law it is for the prosecution to establish its case, and not for the accused to prove his innocence. Nevertheless, the provision was held valid because it was designed to minimize smuggling; it applied to goods which could easily be smuggled, and the classification of goods was based on an intelligible differentia which had a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the Act, viz., to prevent smuggling.[9]

Under the Supreme Court Rules, while no security is required to be given for filing a writ petition under Art. 32 to enforce a fundamental right, a security has to be given for moving an application for reviewing an order already made on a writ petition. There is no discrimination involved here, for in a review petition, the Court is asked to re-open a matter which had already been closed after hearing the parties.[10]

The Punjab Municipalities Act, 1911, provides for removal of a member of a municipality after giving him a hearing under specified circumstances. It also provides for removal of a member of a municipality without a hearing. This is discriminatory, for while in one case hearing is to be given to the member concerned, it may not be given in the other cases.[11]

Differential treatment by way of a provision saving proceedings in execution and those pending execution has been held to be violating Art. 14.[12]

---

7. Rehman Shagoo v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1960 SC 1 : (1960) 1 SCR 680.
8. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Deoman Upadhyaya, AIR 1960 SC 1125 : (1961) 1 SCR 14.
9. Babu Lal v. Collector of Customs, AIR 1957 SC 877.
10. Lala Ram v. Supreme Court of India, AIR 1967 SC 847 : (1967) 2 SCR 14.
11. Ram Dial v. State of Punjab, AIR 1965 SC 1518 : (1965) 2 SCR 858.
Also see, Mohta & Co. v. Vishwanath, AIR 1954 SC 545 : (1955) 1 SCR 448; Muthiah v. C.I.T., AIR 1956 SC 269 : (1955) 2 SCR 1247.
12. Mahendra Saree Emporium (II) v. G. V. Srinivasa Murthy, (2005) 1 SCC 481 : AIR 2004 SC 4289.

(r) LEGISLATION APPLICABLE TO A SINGLE PERSON

A statute based on a reasonable classification does not become invalid merely because the class to which it applies consists of only one person. A single body or institution may form a class. A legislation specifically directed to a named person or body would be valid if, on account of some special circumstances, or reasons applicable to that person, and not applicable to others, the single person could be treated as a class by himself. The Act may however be bad if there are no special circumstances differentiating the person concerned from the rest, or if others having the same attributes are not covered by the Act. A restriction imposed by reason of a statute, can be upheld in the event it is found that the person to whom the same applies, forms a separate and distinct class and such classification is a reasonable one based on intelligible differentia having nexus with the object sought to be achieved.[13]

The contention that the institution Indian Council of World Affairs (ICWA) was singled out and though there were several other institutions run by societies or other organizations which were in the grip of more serious mismanagement and maladministration were not even touched and Parliament chose to legislate as to one institution only, did not find favour with the Court. Moreover, no other institution is named or particularized so as to be comparable with ICWA. In the ICWA case successive Parliamentary Committees found substance in the complaints received that an institution of national importance was suffering from mismanagement and maladministration. The satisfaction of the President that emergent action was called for would not be vitiated merely because earlier the normal legislative process could not culminate in legislative enactments.[14]

A large cotton textiles mill employing a large labour force, closed down due to mismanagement. Parliament enacted an Act empowering the Central Government to appoint its own directors to take over the control and management of the company and its properties. A shareholder challenged the Act on the ground that since it singled out the company, it was discriminatory and bad under Art. 14. The Supreme Court by a majority declared the Act to be valid. Noting the background conditions leading to the passage of the Act in question, viz., mismanagement of the company's affairs which prejudicially affected production of an essential commodity (i.e., cloth) and had created serious unemployment among a section of the community, the Court pointed out that the facts with regard to the company were of an 'extraordinary' character and "fully justified the company being treated as a class by itself". Also, the petitioner failed to show that there were other companies in the same position as the company in question.

The minority's view in the instant case however was different. Accepting the proposition that a legislation having a reasonable classification could not be held to be unconstitutional even if its application was found to affect only one person, it, nevertheless, held the Act in question bad as it made no classification; it selected a particular company and imposed liabilities on it. The minority agreed that though presumption should be made in support of the constitutional validity of a law, yet it held that in the instant case such a presumption was excluded as discrimination was writ large over the face of the Act.[15]

---

13. John Vallamattom v. Union of India, (2003) 6 SCC 611 : AIR 2003 SC 2902.
14. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.
15. Charanjit Lal v. Union of India, AIR 1951 SC 41 : 1950 SCR 869.

To put an end to protracted litigation which arose after the death of a rich jagirdar, the Hyderabad Legislature passed an Act allowing the claims of a few, and dismissing those of the other claimants. The Act was held invalid on the ground that it denied to a few persons a right to enforce their claims in a court and thus discriminated them from the rest of the community in respect of a valuable right which 'the law secures to them all'. The only purpose of the legislation was to end certain private disputes but that did not furnish any rational basis for the discrimination made. Continuance of a dispute even for a long period of time between rival claimants to the property of a private person is not such an unusual circumstance as to invest a case with special or exceptional features and make it a class by itself justifying its differentiation from all other cases of succession disputes.[16]

The principle of the above case was again applied in Ram Prasad Sahi v. State of Bihar.[17] The court of wards granted a lease of land to the appellant. Thinking it to be against law, the Bihar Legislature enacted legislation to cancel this particular lease. Holding the Act void, the Supreme Court stated that the dispute was a legal dispute pure and simple between two private parties. What the Legislature had done was to single out a certain individual and deny him the rights which every Indian had to have his case adjudicated upon by a judicial tribunal according to law. The presumption of constitutionality of a legislative enactment, would not assist the State when on the face of a Statute there is no classification at all, and no attempt has been made to select any individual or group with reference to any differentiating attribute peculiar to that individual or group and not possessed by others.

A special law passed for Shri Jagannath Temple was held valid for the temple held a unique position amongst the Hindu temples and so it could be given a special treatment.[18] Special provisions can be made for each university as each university is a class by itself. Art. 14 does not require that provisions of every University Act must always be the same.[19]

The Prime Minister is allowed the use of an Indian Air Force aircraft for non-official purposes (including election) but not so the leaders of other political parties. This is not discriminatory because in view of the P.M.'s status and duties, he is a class by himself. It is necessary to ensure his personal safety and enable him to discharge official business promptly so that national interests may not suffer.[20]

A law providing for taking over of Auroville by government does not infringe Art. 14 as the Auroville institution has a uniqueness of its own.[21] In the same category would fall a law made applicable to a few specified objects and persons. A law nationalising twelve specified sugar mills in the State of Uttar Pradesh was held valid as these mills were in intolerable economic condition.[22]

---

16. Ameerunnissa v. Mahboob Begum, AIR 1953 SC 91 : 1953 SCR 404.
17. AIR 1953 SC 215 : 1953 SCR 1129.
18. Bira Kishore Deb v. State of Orissa, AIR 1964 SC 1501 : (1964) 7 SCR 32.
Also, Tilkayat Shri Govindlalji v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1963 SC 1638 : (1964) 1 SCR 561.
19. Azeez Basha v. Union of India, AIR 1968 SC 692 : (1968) 1 SCR 833.
20. P.V. Sastri v. Union of India, AIR 1974 Del. 1.
21. S.P. Mittal v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1 : (1983) 1 SCC 51.
22. Ishwari Khetan Sugar Mills v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 1955 : (1980) 4 SCC 136.

A single institution is capable of being treated as a class by itself if there are special circumstances or reasons which are applicable to that institution. Moreover, it is clear from the language of Entries 62 and 63 that there can be legislation in respect of a single institution.[23]

A retired member of the State Electricity Board was appointed as its Chairman in 1982 for five years. Thereafter, his appointment was further extended for five years. Thus, he was to remain in office up to 1992. With the elections to the State Legislative Assembly of Himachal Pradesh, a new Chief Minister came in power in 1990. Before the respondent's appointment could come to an end, the State Government promulgated an ordinance fixing the age of retirement for members and the Chairman of the Board at 65. The ordinance was to apply not only to future appointees but also to the present incumbents in the Board.

The respondent-Chairman of the Board challenged the constitutional validity of the ordinance (which later became an Act of the State Legislature) under Art. 14, as he had to retire from the chairmanship of the Board on reaching the age of 65 years but before his tenure came to an end. The High Court quashed the notification retiring the chairman issued under the Ordinance on the ground that the provision fixing the age of retirement could apply only prospectively and not to the present incumbents in office. On appeal by the State Government, the Supreme Court reversed the High Court and, after an exhaustive review of the case-law, upheld the validity of the Ordinance in question.[24]

The Court ruled that no one could quarrel with the desirability of the policy that a terminal point of time be provided beyond which a chairman and members of the State Electricity Board must cease to hold office by operation of law. The law is in general terms. The fact that it applies to one person at the moment does not make it invalid. Art. 14 does not come in the way of a legislature enacting a law applicable to one single person if there is reasonable classification. In the words of the Court:[25]

> "The possibility of this legislation applying to one or more persons exists in principle. The fact that only one individual came to be affected cannot render the legislation arbitrary as violative of Art. 14. This is because S. 3 is in general terms and the incidents of its applying to one individual does not render the legislation invalid."

The Court also pointed out that the courts have always refrained from attributing mala fides to the Legislature.[26]

The Bihar Legislature enacted an Act to nationalise institutions fulfilling certain criteria. The programme for nationalisation was to be carried out in phases. Under the Act immediately only one institution was taken over. Accordingly, the Schedule to the Act in question mentioned only one institution for take-over, but there was a provision in the Act to amend the Schedule by adding more institutions. The Supreme Court held the Act valid in Lalit Narayan Mishra Institute of Economic Development & Social Change, Patna v. State of Bihar,[27] on the

---

23. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.
24. State of Himachal Pradesh v. Kailash Chand Mahajan, AIR 1992 SC 1277 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 351.
25. Ibid., at 1305.
26. See, K. Nagaraj v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 551 : (1985) 1 SCC 523.
27. AIR 1988 SC 1136.

ground that no question of singling one institution arose. The Court refused to accept the argument that a law in general terms but affecting only one person at the time becomes a single person's legislation and thus violates Art. 14. The Court observed:

> "When nationalisation has to be done in a phased manner, all the institutions cannot be taken over at a time. The nationalisation in a phased manner contemplates that by and by the object of nationalisation will be taken over."

Consequent upon the Bhopal Gas Disaster, Parliament enacted the Bhopal Gas Disaster (Processing of Claims) Act, 1985. Under this Act, the Central Government took over the exclusive right of representing and acting on behalf of every victim for claiming compensation from the concerned multinational corporation. In place of the victims, the Central Government became entitled to file suits against the company for compensation. The validity of the Act was challenged on two main grounds, viz., (i) Could Parliament enact such a law? (ii) Was the law not discriminatory under Art. 14? The Supreme Court upheld the law on both these grounds in Charan Lal Sahu v. Union of India.[28] The Court ruled that the Act in question was passed in recognition of the right of the sovereign to act as parens patriae. In the words of SABYASACHI MUKHARJI, C.J.:[29]

> "But there is no prohibition or inhibition, in our opinion, conceptually or jurisprudentially, for Indian State taking over the claims of the victims or for the State acting for the victims as the Act has sought to provide…."

The Court also ruled that the Act was not discriminatory as the victims formed a distinct class having several distinguishing marks deserving special treatment, e.g., many of the victims of the tragedy could not have pursued the legal remedies on their own pitted as they were against a multinational and a big Indian corporation; the victims became exposed to a contingent of foreign contingency lawyers who descended on the scene. Again, in the words of SABYASACHI MUKHARJI, C.J.:[30]

> "….the claimants and victims can legitimately be described as a class by themselves different and distinct, sufficiently separate and identifiable to be entitled to special treatment for effective, speedy, equitable and best advantageous settlement of their claims. There indubitably is differentiation. But this differentiation is based on a principle which has rational nexus with the aim intended to be achieved by its differentiation. The disaster being unique in its character in the recorded history of industrial disasters and situated as the victims were against a mighty multinational with the presence of foreign contingency lawyers looming on the scene, in our opinion, there were sufficient grounds for such differentiation and different treatment. In treating the victims of the gas leak disaster differently and providing them a procedure which was just, fair, reasonable and which was not unwarranted or unauthorized by the Constitution, Art. 14 is not breached."

(s) TWO LAWS

If there are two laws covering a situation, one more drastic than the other, there is the danger of discrimination if the Administration has a discretion to apply any of these laws in a given case. Of the two persons placed in similar situation, one may be dealt with under the drastic law and the other under the softer law. To minimise any chance of such discrimination, the courts insist that the drastic law should lay down some rational and reasonable principle or policy to regulate administrative discretion as to its application. If the drastic law fails to do so, then it will be void under Art. 14.

28. AIR 1990 SC 1480 : (1990) 1 SCC 613.
29. Ibid., 1506.
30. Ibid., at 1533.

This proposition was applied by the Supreme Court before 1974. To evict a person from unauthorised occupation of public premises, a Punjab Act provided for a summary procedure. The collector had not two choices; he could either himself order eviction under the special law, or could file an ordinary suit in a court for eviction under the general law. The Punjab law was declared void under Art. 14 because being a drastic law it laid down no policy to guide the collector's choice as to which law to follow in what cases; the matter was left to his unguided discretion and so there could be discrimination within the same class inter se, viz., unauthorised occupants of public premises.[31]

A logical consequence of this ruling was the amendment of the general law to provide that no court would have jurisdiction to entertain any suit in respect of eviction of unauthorised occupants of public premises. With this amendment the law became valid for now only one procedure was available to evict unauthorised occupants. The procedure by way of suit was no longer available, and therefore, the vice of discrimination disappeared.[32]

The Supreme Court reconsidered the matter in Maganlal Chhagganlal v. Greater Municipality.[33] Here was involved the question of the validity of a Bombay Act which was pari passu with the earlier Punjab Act declared invalid in the Northern India case. The Supreme Court felt worried by the fact that the argument based on the availability of two procedures, one more onerous than the other and, therefore, discriminatory, should have led to the apparently harsher procedure becoming the rule and resort to ordinary civil courts being barred. The Court wondered as to "who benefits by resort to the ordinary civil courts being barred." The Court found it difficult to reconcile itself to the position that the mere possibility of resort of the civil court should make invalid a procedure which would otherwise be valid. Therefore, Northern India was now overruled, and the Bombay Act was upheld. The proposition regarding discriminatory procedures was rephrased as follows: where a statute providing for a more drastic procedure different from the ordinary procedure covers the whole field covered by the ordinary procedure, without any guidelines as to the class of cases in which either procedure is to be resorted to, the statute will be hit by Art. 14. Even there, a provision for appeal may cure the defect.

Further, if in such cases from the preamble and surrounding circumstances, as well as the provisions of the statutes themselves explained and amplified by affidavits, necessary guidelines could be inferred, the statute will not be hit by Art. 14. Then again, where the statute itself covers only a class of cases, the statute will not be bad. The fact that in such cases the executive will choose which cases are to be tried under the special procedure will not affect the validity of the stat-

---

31. Northern India Caterers v. State of Punjab, AIR 1967 SC 1581 : (1967) 3 SCR 399.
Also see, Rayala Corpn. v. Director of Enforcement, AIR 1970 SC 494 : (1969) 2 SCC 412.

32. Hari Singh v. Military Estate Officer, New Delhi, AIR 1972 SC 2205 : (1972) 2 SCC 239.

33. AIR 1974 SC 2009. Also, Ahmedabad Municipality v. Ramanlal, AIR 1975 SC 1187 : (1975) 1 SCC 778; Chairman, Auqaf Comm. v. Suraj Ram, AIR 1976 J&K 14.

ute. Therefore, the Court held that the argument that the mere availability of two procedures will vitiate one of them, that is the special procedure, is not supportable.

Applying the proposition in the instant case, the Court held that the statute in question lays down the purpose behind it, i.e. speedy eviction of unauthorised occupants of government premises. This provides sufficient guidance to the authorities in whom the power is vested. It would be extremely unreal to hold that an officer would resort to the dilatory court proceedings in any case when he has at his disposal a quick procedure. The provisions of the Act "cannot be struck down on the fanciful theory that power would be exercised in such an unrealistic fashion". The fact that the Legislature considered that the ordinary procedure is inefficient or ineffective in evicting unauthorised occupants of government property, and therefore provided a special procedure for it, is a clear guidance for the authorities charged with the duty of evicting unauthorised occupants. In addition, the Court also held that the difference between the ordinary court procedure and the special procedure was not so unconscionable as to attract the vice of discrimination. Under the special procedure, there was a provision for the concerned person to be heard and represented by a lawyer.[34] "After all Art. 14 does not demand a fanatical approach."

The Court explained Maganlal later in Iqbal Singh[35] by saying that mere availability of two procedures would not justify the quashing of a provision as being violative of Art. 14. What is necessary to attract the inhibition of Art. 14 is that there must be "substantial and qualitative differences" between the two procedures so that one is really and substantially more drastic than the other. Thus, as a result of Maganlal, judicial attitude towards differential procedures has become very tolerant.[36]

Under S. 5(1)(a) of the Minimum Wages Act, the government was required to appoint a committee representing all interests to hold a detailed enquiry regarding the concerned employment before advising the government in the matter of fixing minimum wages. Under S. 5(1)(b), the government could itself publish proposals for minimum wages and give two months time to the affected persons to make representations.

S. 5 was challenged as discriminatory on the ground that the procedure under (a) was more advantageous to the employers than under (b) as their representatives on the committee could have a better say, and there was no guidance given to the government as to when it should follow which procedure. The Court rejected the challenge saying that the purpose of both procedures was to collect necessary data concerning an employment; the advice of the committee in (a) was not binding on the government, the government could adopt either of the procedures depending upon whether it has sufficient data or not concerning an employment to enable it to fix minimum wages and so there was no discrimination.[37]

---

34. Also see, Pandia Nadar v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1974 SC 2044 : (1974) 2 SCC 539.
35. Iqbal Singh v. State (Delhi Adm.), AIR 1977 SC 2437.
36. The Maganlal Chhaganlal doctrine has been applied in State of Gujarat v. Dharam Das, AIR 1982 SC 781; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Arshad Ali Khan, AIR 1982 SC 780 : (1981) 4 SCC 144; S.T. Commr. v. Radhakrishan, AIR 1979 SC 1588; Director of Industries, U.P. v. Deep Chand, AIR 1980 SC 801 : (1980) 2 SCC 332.
37. C.B. Boarding & Lodging v. State of Mysore, AIR 1970 SC 2042 : (1969) 3 SCC 84.

Under the Bombay Town Planning Act, 1954, land could be acquired by following a procedure less favourable, and paying less compensation, than the Land Acquisition Act. It was argued that the existence of two laws for acquiring land, one less favourable than the other, was discriminatory under Art. 14. But the Supreme Court rejected the contention in Prakash Amichand Shah v. State of Gujarat.[38] The Court ruled that while the State could acquire property under the Land Acquisition Act, the local authority working under the Planning Act could do so only under that Act. There was no option to the local authority to resort to one or the other of the alternative methods which result in acquisition. Also, since the acquisition under the Town Planning Act was for a particular purpose, the Act could provide for payment of compensation for such acquisition and it was not necessary to pay compensation under the Land Acquisition Act. The Court thus found that there was no denial of equal protection of laws or the equality before the law in the instant case.

But when two laws covering the same matter differ on substantive points, the harsher law may still be held invalid under Art. 14. When there existed two legal provisions for acquisition of land for a public purpose, lower compensation being payable under the one law than under the other, the drastic law was held bad because there was no classification to whom it would apply and the State could give one owner different treatment from the other equally situated.[39]

(t) SPECIAL COURTS

In State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali Sarkar,[40] was involved a Bengal law permitting setting up of special courts for the 'speedier trial' of such 'offences', or 'classes of offences' or 'cases', or 'classes of cases', as the State Government might direct by a general or special order. These courts were to follow a procedure less advantageous to the accused in defending himself than the procedure followed by the ordinary criminal courts.

The Act was held invalid as it made no reasonable classification, laid down "no yardstick or measure for the grouping either of persons or of cases or of offences" so as to distinguish them from others outside the purview of the Act. The government had the power to pick out a case of a person and hand it over to the special tribunal while leaving the case of another person similarly situated to be tried by the ordinary criminal courts. It gave 'uncontrolled authority' to the executive 'to discriminate'. The necessity of 'speedier trial' was held to be too vague, uncertain and indefinite criterion to form the basis of a valid and reasonable classification.

On the other hand, in Kathi Raning Rawat v. Saurashtra,[41] a provision practically similar to the one involved in the Anwar Ali case was held valid because

---

38. AIR 1986 SC 468 : (1986) 1 SCC 581.

39. Deputy Commissioner, Kamrup v. Durganath, AIR 1968 SC 394 : (1968) 1 SCR 561; Nagpur Improvement Trust v. Vithal Rao, AIR 1973 SC 689 : (1973) 1 SCC 500; Om Prakash v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1202 : (1974) 1 SCC 628; D.S. Rege v. Municipal Corp. of Greater Bombay, AIR 1979 Bom. 311.

In State of Kerala v. Cochin Town Planning Trust, AIR 1980 SC 1438 : (1980) 3 SCC 554, the Court has observed that the basis of equity jurisprudence is that classification is not permissible for compensation purposes so long as differentia relied on has no rational relation to the object in view: ibid., 1446. See also, P.C. Goswami v. Collector of Darrang, AIR 1982 SC 1214 : (1982) 1 SCC 439.

40. AIR 1952 SC 75 : 1952 SCR 284.

41. AIR 1952 SC 123 : 1952 SCR 435.

the Court found that a policy was stated in the preamble to the Act, and that the government was expected to select such offences, classes of offences and classes of cases for trial in special courts as were calculated to affect public safety, maintenance of public order, etc.

Comparing the above two cases, it would appear that the main difference in the terms of the statutes, which resulted in different judicial verdicts as to their validity, was that the preamble to the Saurashtra Act was more elaborately worded than that to the Bengal Act. While the term 'speedier trial' used in the Bengal Act to set up special courts was held to be indefinite, the words 'public safety, etc.' in the preamble to the Saurashtra Act were held to be more definite and as giving a guiding principle to control administrative discretion. In essence, therefore, the difference would appear to be more of a drafting nature rather than of substance.[42]

Though the principle that law should lay down the policy if discretion to classify is vested by it in the executive, and that the executive cannot be given an uncontrolled authority to differentiate, was applied in both cases, yet difference arose in its application to specific circumstances. However, in the Saurashtra law the provision authorising the government to pick out any individual 'case' for trial by a special court was held invalid as being discriminatory. The government could specify a 'class' of cases, offences or persons for trial by special courts, but it could not claim a power to send a single, specific 'case' out of a class to a special court for trial.

The principle laid down in the above cases has been reiterated and applied in several other cases pertaining to special courts, though the result reached by the courts may not always appear to be quite satisfactory. In Kedar Nath v. State of West Bengal,[43] the law setting up special courts mentioned the offences triable by them but gave a discretion to the government to allot cases for trial to these courts. Two questions were raised for the consideration of the Supreme Court: (i) Did the law disclose any reasonable classification as to the offences mentioned ? (ii) Was the discretion left with the government to select cases for trial by special courts valid?

The Court answered both the questions in the affirmative. As regards the first, it held that the types of offences mentioned in the Act were those which were widely prevalent during wartime and the policy was clear in the Act. It should however be noted that the Act in question contained no specific words to define the policy. The Court discovered the underlying policy by its own process of rationalization. On the second question, the argument that the government could make a discriminatory choice among persons charged with the same offence, submitting one case for trial to a special court and leaving the other for trial by an ordinary court, and thus discriminate within the same class, was rejected on the ground that the standards, policy and purpose of the Act were laid down in clear terms, and the administrative authority "is expected to select the cases to be brought before the courts in fulfilment of that policy".

So far as the power to refer specific cases was sustained, the Kedar Nath case goes beyond the Saurashtra case mentioned above, but a subtle difference between the situations in the two cases may be noted: whereas the Saurashtra law made no classification of offences itself and left the whole matter to the executive subject to the policy statement in its preamble, the law in the Kedar Nath case itself made the classification of offences for trial by special courts, and subject to this classification, power to refer specific cases was conferred on the executive. Nevertheless, by its holding in the Kedar Nath case, the Court did dilute to some extent the principle it evolved in the Saurashtra case,[44] for the government could pick and choose individual cases for trial by special courts.

42. See, K. Haldar v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1960 SC 457 : (1960) 2 SCR 646.
43. AIR 1953 SC 404 : 1954 SCR 30.

In August, 1978, the President made a reference to the Supreme Court under Art. 143(1) of the Constitution,[45] seeking the Court's opinion on the constitutional validity of the Special Courts Bill proposing the setting up of special courts for speedy trial of offences committed by the holders of high public and political offices during the emergency of 1975-77. The proposed court was to be presided over by a sitting or retired High Court Judge to be appointed by the Central Government in consultation with the Chief Justice of India, and the accused could appeal to the Supreme Court against the verdict of such a court. The Supreme Court ruled that Parliament could make the law in question under entries 11A of List III and entry 77 of List I,[46] and that it did not infringe Art. 14 as the classification provided for by the Bill was valid. "The promulgation of emergency is not and cannot be a matter of normal occurrence in a nation's life, and "offences alleged to have been committed during the period of emergency constitute a class by themselves and so do the persons who are alleged to have utillised the high public or political offices by them as a cover or opportunity for the purpose of committing those offences."[47] The Court also invoked Art. 21 to assess the fairness of the procedure provided for in the Bill—this aspect is discussed later.[48]

The above-mentioned bill was enacted as the Courts Act, 1979 with one major change. Originally it was confined only to the trial of offences committed during the emergency, but, in Parliament, its scope was expanded so as to provide for setting up of special courts for trial of offences committed by those who held high "public or political offices" for all time to come. The Act was thus envisaged to be a permanent measure instead of being confined only to the emergency.

The Act was upheld by the Supreme Court in State (Delhi Administration) v. V.C. Shukla,[49] against challenge under Art. 14. The Court said that the main object of the Act was to provide for the speedy trial of certain class of offences, viz., offences committed by person holding high public or political offices as a trust. Such persons have been placed in a separate class. For maintaining democracy, administrative efficiency and purity, it is necessary that when such persons commit serious abuse of power and are guilty of a breach of trust reposed in them, they form a special class of offenders. Quick disposal of such cases is necessary, for if such cases are allowed to have their normal, leisurely, span before normal courts, then the whole purpose in launching them may be frustrated. The term 'high public or po-

44. For comprehensive discussion of these cases see the Maganlal Chhagganlal case, supra, footnote 36.
45. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F(g).
46. Supra, Ch. X, Secs. F and D.
47. AIR 1979 SC 478 : (1979) 1 SCC 380.
48. Infra, Ch. XXVI.
49. AIR 1980 SC 1382 : (1980) Supp SCC 249.

litical office' is not vague; it bears a clear connotation as it means persons holding top positions wielding large powers.

(u) UNREASONABLE LAWS

As has been explained by BHAGWATI, J., in Bachan Singh v. State of Punjab,[50] Rule of law which permeates the entire fabric of the Indian Constitution excludes arbitrariness. "Wherever we find arbitrariness or unreasonableness there is denial of rule of law." Art. 14 enacts primarily a guarantee against arbitrariness and inhibits state action, whether legislative or executive, which suffers from the vice of arbitrariness. "Every state action must be non-arbitrary and reasonable. Otherwise, the court would strike it down as invalid."

This new dimension of Art. 14 transcends the classificatory principle. Art. 14 is no longer to be equated with the principle of classification. It is primarily a guarantee against arbitrariness in state action and the doctrine of classification has been evolved only as a subsidiary rule for testing whether a particular state action is arbitrary or not. If a law is arbitrary or irrational it would fall foul of Art. 14. As an example, it has been held that any penalty disproportionate to the gravity of the misconduct would be violative of Art. 14.[51]

But controlled discretion exercisable according to a policy for a purpose clearly enunciated by a statute does not suffer from the vice of conferment of unrestricted discretion.[52]

A statutory provision providing for payment of compensation for the land acquired by the State from a person, in several annual instalments instead of one lump sum, is unreasonable. The Supreme Court has argued that the owner of the land would require compensation in lieu of land forthwith to re-establish himself by purchasing another piece of land and, therefore, compensation ought to be paid in one lump sum.[53] But section 2(6) of the West Bengal Sales Tax Act, 1994 which requires the transporter to disclose the name of the consignor or consignee was not oppressive, irrelevant or arbitrary. Moreover for the purpose of such disclosure no special proforma is mandatory nor any machinery required to effectuate the provision.[54] A mere hardship cannot be a ground for striking down a valid legislation unless it is held to be suffering from the vice of discrimination or unreasonableness.[55]

The Court has, however, pronounced a self imposed restraint that ordinarily it will not determine the merits of the legislation and arrive at a conclusion that it is arbitrary violating Art. 14. The Court has pointed out that "inquisitorial inquiry"

---

50. AIR 1982 SC 1336; infra, Ch. XXVI.
Also, E.P. Royappa v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1974 SC 555 : (1974) 4 SCC 3; Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248; Ramana D. Shetty v. International Airport Authority, AIR 1979 SC 1628 : (1979(3 SCC 489; Ajay Hasia v. Khalid Mujib, AIR 1981 SC 487 : (1981) 1 SCC 722; see, infra, note 48 on 1042.

51. Bhagat Ram v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 454, 460 : (1983) 2 SCC 442; For unreasonable and arbitrary provisions see Salem Advocate Bar Association v. Union of India, (2005) 6 SCC 344 : AIR 2005 SC 3353.

52. Federation of Railway Officers Association v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 289 : AIR 2003 SC 1344.

53. State of Tamil Nadu v. Ananthi Ammal, AIR 1995 SC 2114 at 2120 : (1995) 1 SCC 519.

54. State of West Bengal v. E.I.T.A India Ltd., (2003) 5 SCC 239 : AIR 2003 SC 4126.

55. Prafulla Kumar Das v. State of Orissa, (2003) 11 SCC 614 : AIR 2003 SC 4506.

is beyond the province of judicial review.[56] Qualifying the word "ordinarily" implies that in certain situations the Court might consider the merits. The Court has pointed out in Kerala Scheduled Tribes case that there is a presumption that the ground realities are known to the State, and, therefore, "if anybody raises a contrary contention it would be for him to bring on record sufficient material to lead the Court to arrive at a conclusion that "State's action was arbitrary".[57]

A law which was justified at the time of its enactment may, with the passage of time, become arbitrary and unreasonable with the change in circumstances.

In Motor General Traders v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[58] the Supreme Court has observed:

> "What was once a perfectly valid legislation may, in course of time, become discriminatory and liable to challenge on the ground of its being violative of Art. 14." In Synthetics and Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[59] the Supreme Court has observed that "restriction valid under one circumstance may become invalid in changed circumstances".

A provision not unconstitutional at the commencement of the Constitution can be rendered unconstitutional by later developments and thinking such as gender equality.[60]

Under the Bombay Rent Restriction Act, rents of premises were frozen at the level of 1st September, 1940. The Supreme Court declared the provision to be unreasonable and arbitrary and violative of Art. 14 in the year 1998 in view of so much inflation in the country since 1940.[61]

The Bar Council made a rule debarring persons aged above 45 years from enrolment as an advocate. The Supreme Court declared the rule to be discriminatory, unreasonable and arbitrary and thus violative of the principle of equality enshrined in Art. 14.[62]

Reservation by institutional preference is not violative of Art. 14 so long as it is reasonable and reasonableness has to be judged from a pragmatic point of view having regard to changed circumstances and practical realities.[63]

Merely because an appeal is not provided in a statute, would not by itself render a statute constitutionally invalid. However, if no appeal is provided for under a statute, an aggrieved party will still have the remedy of approaching the High Courts and Supreme Court in exercise of its power of Judicial review. Hence S. 3 Maharashtra Act. 17 of 1986 read with S. 9 Maharashtra Act 15 of 56. State of Kerala v. Peoples Union for Civil Liberties, Kerala State Unit, (2009) 8 SCC 46 : (2009) 9 JT 579.

---

57. State of Kerala v. Peoples Union for Civil Liberties, Kerala State Unit, (2009) 8 SCC 46, 91. See also V. Subramanyam v. Rajesh Raghuvendra Rao, (2009) 5 SCC 608: AIR 2009 SC 1858.
58. AIR 1984 SC 121 : (1984) 1 SCC 222. Also, Rattan Arya v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1986 SC 1444 : (1986) 3 SCC 385.
59. AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109.
60. John Vallamattom v. Union of India, (2003) 6 SCC 611 : AIR 2003 SC 2902.
61. Malpe Vishwanath Acharya v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1998 SC 602 : (1998) 2 SCC 1.
62. Indian Council of Legal Aid and Advice v. Bar Council of India, AIR 1995 SC 691 : (1995) 1 SCC 732.
63. Saurabh Choudri v. Union of India, (2003) 11 SCC 146 : AIR 2004 SC 361.

1987 abolishing appeals from original or appellate jurisdiction, was constitutionally invalid.[64]

D. ADMINISTRATIVE DISCRETION & ART. 14

A common tendency in modern democracies is to confer discretionary power on the government or administrative officers. The power is usually couched in very broad phraseology and gives a large area of choice to the administrator concerned to apply the law to actual factual situations.

In order to ensure that discretion is properly exercised, it is necessary that the statute in question lays down some norms or principles according to which the administrator has to exercise the discretion. Many a time the statutes do not do this and leave the administrator free to exercise his power according to his judgment. This creates the danger of official arbitrariness which is subversive of the doctrine of equality. To mitigate this danger, the courts have invoked Art. 14. In course of time, Art. 14 has evolved into a very meaningful guarantee against any action of the Administration which may be arbitrary, discriminatory or unequal.[65]

This principle manifests itself in the form of the following propositions:

(1) A law conferring unguided and unrestricted power on an authority is bad for arbitrary power is discriminatory.

(2) Art. 14 illegalises discrimination in the actual exercise of any discretionary power.

(3) Art. 14 strikes at arbitrariness in administrative action and ensures fairless and equality of treatment.

(i) CONFERRING ABSOLUTE DISCRETION

Proposition (1), stated above, envisages that a law conferring absolute or uncontrolled discretion on an authority negates equal protection of law because such power can be exercised arbitrarily so as to discriminate between persons and things similarly situated without reason.[66] As Bhagwati, J., has observed: "The law always frowns on uncanalised and unfettered discretion conferred on any instrumentality of the State."[67] Where power granted is open to use disproportionate to purpose to be achieved is invalid in the absence of guidelines or principles or norms which are 'essential' for exercise of such power.[68]

---

64. Jamshed N. Guzdar v. State of Maharashtra, (2005) 2 SCC 591 : AIR 2005 SC 862. Quare: Whether appellate and supervisory jurisdiction could be alternative.

65. Shrinivasa Rao v. J. Veeraiah, AIR 1993 SC 929; R.L. Bansal v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 978 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 318.

66. For discussion on proposition (2) See, infra, (ii) on 1272, under the heading "Administrative Discrimination".

67. Sheo Nandan Paswan v. State of Bihar, AIR 1987 SC 877, 895 : (1987) 1 SCC 288; see also Ajit Kumar Nag v. GM (PJ) Indian Oil Corpn. Ltd., (2005) 7 SCC 764 : AIR 2005 SC 4217.

68. District Registrar and Collector v. Canara Bank, (2005) 1 SCC 496 : AIR 2005 SC 186.

The Court can veto any conferment of discretionary power on an authority if it is too broad, sweeping or uncanalised. The Supreme Court has laid down the applicable principle in the following words in Naraindas:[69]

> "Article 14 ensures equality before law and strikes at arbitrary and discriminatory state action….
>
> If power conferred by statute on any authority of the State is vagrant and unconfined and no standards or principles are laid down by the statute to guide and control the exercise of such power, the statute would be violative of the equality clause, because it would permit arbitrary and capricious exercise of power, which is the antithesis of equality before law".

In Sudhir Chandra,[70] the Supreme Court has observed:

> "… Our Constitution envisages a society governed by rule of law. Absolute discretion uncontrolled by guidelines which may permit denial of equality before law is the antithesis of rule of law. Absolute discretion not judicially reviewable inheres the pernicious tendency to be arbitrary and is therefore violative of Art. 14. Equality before law and absolute discretion to grant or deny benefit of the law are diametrically opposed to each other and cannot coexist."

It means that the legislature cannot validly enact a provision conferring naked or arbitrary power on the Administration to be exercised by it in its absolute discretion. No law ought to confer excessive discretionary power on any authority. The court can veto conferment of discretionary power on an authority if it finds it to be naked or arbitrary. S.73 of the Stamp Act, 1899 (as applicable in the Andhra Pradesh) has been held to suffer from the vice of excessive delegation, since (i) there were no guidelines as to the persons who may be authorized by the Collector, and (ii) there was no requirement of reasons being recorded by the Collector or the person authorized for his belief necessitating search, and (iii) the power of impounding documents could be exercised without giving notice or a chance to make good the deficit stamp duty, except in case of documents in custody of a bank (no reasons having being given for making the distinction), and the power to adjudicate upon need for impounding documents in all cases being vested in the person authorized. A discretionary power may not necessarily be a discriminatory power but where a statute confers a power on an authority to decide matters of moment without laying down any guidelines or principles or norms, the power has to be struck down as being violative of Article 14. The A.P. Amendment permits inspection being carried out by the Collector by having access to the documents which are in private custody i.e. custody other than that of a public officer. According to the Court it is clear that this provision empowers invasion of the home of the person in whose possession the documents "tending" to or leading to the various facts stated in Section 73 are in existence. Section 73

---

69. Naraindas v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1232 : (1974) 4 SCC 788; Guidelines or principles or norms for exercise of discretionary power is essential. see also District Registrar and Collector v. Canara Bank, (2005) 1 SCC 496 : AIR 2005 SC 186. See also Punjab Dairy Development Board v. Cepham Milk Specialities Ltd., (2004) 8 SCC 621 : AIR 2004 SC 4466, impost of cess on the licenced capacity of the producer of milk and dairy products following Kishan Lal Lakhmi Chand v. State of Orissa, 1993 Supp (4) SCC 461; See also Raichurmatham Prabhakar v. Rawatmal Dugar, (2004) 4 SCC 766 : AIR 2004 SC 3625; Rent Act conferring arbitrary and unreasonable power.

70. Sudhir Chandra v. Tata Iron & Steel Co. Ltd., AIR 1984 SC 1064, 1071 : (1984) 3 SCC 369.

being one without any safeguards as to the probable or reasonable cause or reasonable basis or materials violates the right to privacy both of the house and of the person. Under the garb of the power conferred by Section 73 the person authorized may go on rampage searching house after house i.e. residences of the persons or the places used for the custody of documents. The possibility of any wild exercise of such power may be remote, but then on the framing of Section 73 the possibility cannot be ruled out. Any number of documents may be inspected, may be seized and may be removed and at the end the whole exercise may turn out to be an exercise in futility. The exercise may prove to be absolutely disproportionate to the purpose sought to be achieved. A reasonable nexus between stringency of the provision and the purpose sought to be achieved must exist[71]

The rationale underlying this proposition is that unbridled discretionary power may degenerate into arbitrariness, or may result in discrimination and, thus, contravenes Art. 14 which bars discrimination.[72]

To be valid, discretionary power ought to be hedged by policy, standards, guidelines or procedural safeguards to regulate its exercise otherwise the court may declare a provision conferring sweeping powers on the Administration as void. Bhagwati, J., has enunciated the principle in Maneka Gandhi[73] as follows:

> "… when a statute vests unguided and unrestricted power in an authority to affect the rights of a person without laying down any policy or principle which is to guide the authority in exercise of this power, it would be affected by the vice of discrimination since it would leave it open to the Authority to discriminate between persons and things similarly situated."

The above-mentioned principle is often invoked by the courts to assess the validity of laws conferring discretionary power. There is voluminous case-law in this area, but only a few illustrations may be given here to denote how the courts apply the principle in practice. A fuller discussion on this topic falls appropriately in the realm of Administrative Law.[74] In the context of the Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorised Occupants) Act, 1971, the Supreme Court has held that the initiation of proceedings under the Act must be as a last resort and the doctrine of proportionality should be applied to find out whether the power has been reasonably exercised.[75]

A statutory provision authorising the State Government, if it considers it necessary or expedient, to requisition by a written order any movable property and pay such compensation to the owner thereof as it may determine, is bad as it confers uncontrolled power on the government. There are no guidelines in the law regarding the object or purpose for which the government could requisition any

---

71. District Registrar and Collector v. Canara Bank, (2005) 1 SCC 496 : AIR 2005 SC 186.
72. District Registrar and Collector –vs- Canara Bank (2005) 1 SCC 496 : AIR 2005 SC 186.
73. Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, (1978) 2 SCJ at 350.
Also see, E.P. Royappa v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1974 SC 555 : (1974) 4 SCC 3
74. For a detailed discussion on this topic, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Ch. XVIII; JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON ADM. LAW, III, Ch. XV; see also Indra Parkash Gupta v. State of J & K, (2004) 6 SCC 786 : AIR 2004 SC 2523.
75. Teri Oat Estates (P) Ltd. v. U. T. Chandigarh, (2004) 2 SCC 130 : (2003) 10 SCALE 1016.

movable property; there is no requirement that the property can be requisitioned only for a public purpose.[76]

A regulation made by Air India International, a statutory corporation, fixed the normal age of retirement of air hostesses at 35 years but authorised the managing director to extend the same to 45 years at his option subject to other conditions being satisfied. The regulation was held bad as it armed the managing director with uncanalized and unguided discretion to extend the age of retirement of any air hostess. No guidelines, principles or norms were laid down subject to which the power was to be exercised.[77] Nor was there any procedural safeguard available to an air hostess who was denied extension.

S. 6(4) of the U.P. Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, authorised the State Government to remit an order of a labour tribunal for reconsideration of the adjudicating authority and that authority was to submit the award to the government after reconsideration. The Supreme Court noted that S. 6(4) did not require the Government to hear the parties before remitting the award to the concerned adjudicating authority, the Government was not required to give reasons for remitting the award; the Government was not required to inform the authority the specific points on which it was to reconsider the award. In B.B. Rajwanshi v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[78] the Supreme Court declared S. 6(4) unconstitutional under Art. 14. The Court observed:

> "The provision cannot be upheld in the absence of necessary statutory guidelines for the exercise of the power conferred by it having regard to the fact that the proceeding before the labour court or the industrial tribunal is in the nature of quasi-judicial proceeding where parties have adequate opportunity to state their respective cases, to lead evidence and make all their submissions."

S. 6(4) was so widely worded that it was likely to result in grave injustice to a party in whose favour an award was made as S. 6(4) could be used to re-open the whole case. S. 6(4) conferred "unguided and uncontrolled powers" on the State Government. The power could be used arbitrarily to favour one party over the other; the power was capable of serious mischief.[79] The Court refused to accept the argument that the Government could seek necessary guidance from the object and content of the Act.

In practice, however, courts show a good deal of tolerance and deference towards conferment of discretion, and it is only in an extreme situation that a statutory provision is declared invalid on the ground of conferring excessive administrative discretion. There are a number of cases in which conferment of broad discretion has been upheld on such grounds as: the statutory provision conferring power has sufficient guidelines, principles or policies to regulate the exercise of power; the power has been conferred on a high official who is not expected to misuse the same but is expected to exercise the power reasonably and rationally;[80] there are procedural safeguards subject to which the power is to be

---

76. State of Punjab v. Khan Chand, AIR 1974 SC 543 : (1974) 1 SCC 549.
77. Air India v. Nergesh Meerza, AIR 1981 SC 1829 : (1981) 4 SCC 335.
78. AIR 1988 SC 1089 : (1988) 2 SCC 415.
79. Ibid., 1096.
80. Chinta Lingam v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 474 : (1970) 3 SCC 768; State (Delhi Adm.) v. V.C. Shukla, AIR 1980 SC 1382 : 1980 (3) SCR 500; infra.

exercised, such as, natural justice, recording of reasons for the decision, provision of appeal to a higher authority, etc.[81]

In Laxmi Divi[82] the court has reiterated the principle that mere likelihood of abuse of discretionary power conferred under statute would not render the statutory provision unconstitutional. There is always a difference between a statute and the action taken under a statute i.e. the statute may be valid and Constitutional but the action taken under it is invalid. Thus while considering the validity of Section 47A of the Stamp Act the Court held that an arbitrary market value whether or not based on extraneous considerations can always be challenged in judicial review proceedings.

As regards laying down of principles or guiding norms, it has been held, for instance, that it is not essential that the very section in the statute which confers the power should also lay down the rules of guidance, or the policy for the administrator to follow. If the same can be gathered from the preamble, or the long title of the statute and other provisions therein, the discretion would not be regarded as uncontrolled or unguided and the statute in question will not be invalid. At times, even vague policy statements to guide administrative discretion have been held by the courts as complying with Art. 14.[83]

An Orissa Act authorised the State Government to take over any estate free from all encumbrances. According to its preamble, the Act was passed in pursuance of the Directive Principles of State policy to secure economic justice to all.[84] The Supreme Court ruled that there was a clear enunciation of the policy in the Act, and the discretion vested in the government was not absolute as it had to be exercised in the light of this policy. All estates in the State could not be taken over at once due to financial difficulties and, therefore, in the very nature of things it was necessary to give "a certain amount of discretionary latitude to the State Government."[85]

The Kerala Education Bill gave a broad power of control to the government over private schools. As for example, government could recognise or not a newly established school, or could take over any school. The Supreme Court held that the general policy of the Bill was deducible from its preamble and the title, and the same was further reinforced by more definite statements of policy in different clauses. The government was to exercise its discretion to implement that policy. The power to take over schools could be exercised only after the Assembly

---

81. Sukhwinder Pal Bipan Kumar v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 SC 65 : (1982) 1 SCC 31; Gram Saba, Shahzadpur v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 P&H 33; Shiv Dutt Rai Fateh Chand v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1194, 1212 : (1983) 3 SCC 529.

82. Govt. of Andhra Pradesh v. P. Laxmi Devi, (2008) 4 SCC 720 : AIR 2008 SC 1640.

83. Chandrakant Saha v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 314 : (1979) 1 SCC 285; Organo Chemical Industries v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 1803 : (1979) 4 SCC 573; New India Industrial Corp. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1980 Del 277; R.R. Verma v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 1461 : (1980) 3 SCC 288; State (Delhi Administration) v. V.C. Shukla, AIR 1980 SC 1399; A.K. Roy v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 710 : (1982) 1 SCC 271; for discussion on Roy, see, infra, under Preventive Detention, Ch. XXVII, Sec. B; Shri Ram Bearings Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Pat. 93; State of Mysore v. M.L. Nagade & Gadap, AIR 1983 SC 762 : (1983) 3 SCC 253; Ashok K. Yadav v. State of Haryana, AIR 1987 SC 454 : (1985) 4 SCC 417.
Also see, M.P. JAIN, THE EVOLVING INDIAN ADM. LAW, 93-102 (1983).

84. See, infra, Ch. XXXIV.

85. Biswambhar v. State of Orissa, AIR 1954 SC 139 : 1954 SCR 842.
Also, Bhairebendra v. State of Assam, AIR 1956 SC 503 : 1956 SCR 303.

passed a resolution authorising the government to do so. Thus the Bill was held valid under Art. 14.[86]

S. 10(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act empowers the government to refer an industrial dispute to a board for settlement, or a court of enquiry, or a tribunal for adjudication. It was challenged on the ground that it gave arbitrary power to the government to discriminate between parties similarly situated. Rejecting the contention, the Court observed that "no two cases are alike in nature", and the industrial disputes which arise in particular establishments require to be treated having regard to the situation prevailing in the same. The discretion is not uncontrolled as the criteria to exercise it are to be found within the Act itself.[87]

A Bihar Act enacted that every appointment, dismissal, removal of any teacher of a college made during November, 1961, and March, 1962, would be subject to such order as the Chancellor "may, on the recommendation of the University Service Commission", pass. The provision literally appears to give uncanalised powers to the Chancellor to do what he liked with respect to the said appointments. The Court however 'read down' the provision and held it valid. The Chancellor's authority was only to satisfy himself that the said appointments etc., were in accordance with the relevant University Act both as to the substantive and procedural aspects thereof. Then, before passing the order, he would receive recommendation from the University Commission which was bound to give a hearing to the person concerned. This was not uncanalised power.[88]

The power conferred by S. 10(3)(c) of the Passport Act on the Passport Authority to impound a passport "in the interests of general public" has been held to be not unguided or uncontrolled. The ground is not vague and indefinite. These words have a well-defined meaning as they have been taken from Art. 19(5).[89] There are several procedural safeguards as well, e.g., recording of reasons for impounding the passport, supplying a copy thereof to the affected person, and an appeal from him to a higher authority and hearing of the affected person.[90]

Under S. 105 of the Customs Act, if the Assistant Collector has reason to believe that some goods or documents are secreted, he can authorize any officer of customs to search for the same. The Assistant Collector is not obligated to give reasons for his belief, or to give the particulars of the goods or the documents. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court rejected the argument that arbitrary power was conferred on the Assistant Collector to make a search.

The Court ruled that not only a policy has been laid down but effective checks on his exercise of the power to search have been imposed. The policy is that the search could be in regard to the goods liable to be confiscated, or for the documents relevant to a proceedings under the Act. Though the Assistant Collector need not give reasons for ordering a search, yet if the existence of his belief is questioned in any collateral proceeding, he has to produce relevant evidence to sustain his belief. Under S. 165(5) of the Cr.P.C., he has to send forthwith to the

---

86. In Re Kerala Education Bill, AIR 1958 SC 956 : 1958 SCR 995; supra.
87. Niemla Mills Ltd. v. The 2nd Punjab Tribunal, AIR 1957 SC 329 : 1957 SCR 335.
88. Jagdish Pandey v. Chancellor, Bihar Univ., AIR 1968 SC 353 : 1968 (1) SCR 231; supra.
89. Infra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. F.
90. Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 597, 631 : (1978) 1 SCC 248. Infra, Ch. XXIV.

Collector of Customs a copy of any record made by him and the Collector can certainly give necessary directions if the Assistant Collector goes wrong. Further, under S. 136(2) of the Customs Act, the Assistant Collector can be prosecuted and punished if he requires any person or place being searched without having reason to believe that he has such goods on his person, or that goods are secreted in that place.[91]

A land tax law was challenged on the ground that it left the power to determine land value to the subjective satisfaction of the tax commissioner. The argument was rejected for the proceedings before him were quasi-judicial and an appeal lay against his decision to a tribunal. The commissioner had to reach the decision about land value objectively on materials produced before him.[92]

Under the Income-tax Act, a person may be assessed either at the place of business or residence. But the Commissioner of Income-tax may transfer a case from one I.T.O. to another, while the Board of Revenue could transfer it from one place to another. The validity of the provision was sustained in Pannalal Binjraj v. Union of India,[93] in the face of an attack that it vested the executive with arbitrary power to transfer the case of an assessee from one place to another while others similarly situated could continue to be assessed at the place of their business or residence. The Court held that the provision had been made for 'administrative convenience' and 'convenient and efficient assessment' of income-tax and, therefore, the power to transfer assessment was not naked but was guided and controlled by the purpose which is to be achieved by the Act itself. The case may be characterised as the high water-mark of judicial deference to administrative convenience, for 'administrative convenience' by itself could hardly be regarded as a definite policy to control administrative discretion.[94]

A law authorised the competent authority to declare an area as a slum area, to declare house unfit for human habitation, and declare a slum area as a clearance area. These provisions were challenged under Art. 14 on the ground that they did not provide for a reasonable opportunity to the affected parties to be heard. The considerations which the authority had to keep in view in deciding whether an area was a slum area, or whether a house was unfit for habitation were laid down.

Considering the constitutionality of the impugned provisions, the Supreme Court stated in State of Mysore v. Bhat,[95] that there were two possible approaches to this question. One, to hold the provisions unconstitutional because they did not provide a reasonable opportunity for the affected parties to be heard. Two, if in the absence of anything to the contrary, the authority concerned was bound to follow the principles of natural justice, the law was not unconstitutional but the orders issued by the authority would be bad if issued without following natural justice.

---

91. Gopikisan v. Assistant Collector, Customs, AIR 1967 SC 1298 : (1967) 2 SCR 340.
But see, Abdul Wahab & Co., v. Asst. Commr., C.T., AIR 1968 Mys 100, where power of search and seizure conferred by the Mysore Sales Tax Act, 1957, was held invalid under Art. 14.

92. Asst. Commr., U.L.T. v. B. & C. Co., AIR 1970 SC 169 : (1969) 2 SCC 55.

93. AIR 1957 SC 397 : 1957 SCR 233.

94. M.P. JAIN, Administrative Discretion and Fundamental Rights, 1 JILI, 247-8; M.P. JAIN, JUSTICE BHAGWATI and Indian Constitutional Law, 2 JILI, 36.

95. AIR 1975 SC 596 : (1975) 1 SCC 110.

The Court adopted the second alternative in the instant case. There was nothing in the Act militating against the opportunity to be heard. Further, the nature of the statutory duty was such that it implied an obligation on the authority to hear before deciding. The statutory provisions were therefore held valid, but the orders made under them were declared invalid as these had been issued without giving hearing to the affected persons. The Court could come to this conclusion because of the fact that the right of hearing is now given a wide operation in administrative proceedings.[1]

Broad discretion conferred on a high official may be held valid on the ground that he is expected to act with responsibility and not to misuse his power. As the Supreme Court observed in Organo Chemicals:[2]

> "When power is conferred on high and responsible officers they are expected to act with caution and impartiality while discharging their duties … The vesting of discretionary power in the State or public authorities or an officer of high standing is treated as a guarantee that the power will be used fairly and with a sense of responsibility."

To illustrate this principle, broad discretion conferred on the Comptroller and Auditor-General in respect of fixation of seniority among the staff was upheld on the ground that he was a high ranking constitutional authority who would act according to the needs of his department and without arbitrariness.[3] In many cases, large discretionary power conferred on the government without any built-in safeguards or guidelines, have been held valid on the ground that the government can be expected to exercise its powers with extreme caution and care.[4]

In Union of India v. Annam Ramalingam,[5] the Supreme Court upheld the validity of S. 28 of the Gold Control Act, 1968, against attack on the ground, that it provided no criteria or guidelines for the exercise of his power by the Administrator. S. 28 barred a licensed dealer, unless authorised by the Administrator, to carry on business as a money lender or banker on the security of ornaments or any other article. Although, there was no express rule prescribing the conditions or circumstances for grant of power had been made, that was held not to be decisive of the matter.

S. 28 being a part and parcel of the entire scheme of gold control as envisaged by the Act "the object of the enactment and the scheme affords sufficient guidance to the Administrator in the matter of exercising his discretion under that section". S. 28 was designed to prevent circumvention of other provisions of the Act. Against the Administrator's order a revision lay to the Central Government

---

1. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Ch. IX.

2. AIR 1979 SC 1803 : (1979) 4 SCC 573.
For detailed comments on this case see, M.P. JAIN, Survey of Adm. Law in I.L.I., XV ANNUAL SURVEY OF INDIAN LAW, 324-6 (1979).

3. Accountant-General v. S. Doraiswamy, AIR 1981 SC 783 : (1981) 4 SCC 93.

4. Laxmi Khandsari v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 873, 888 : (1981) 2 SCC 600.
In A.K. Sabhapathy v. State of Kerala, AIR 1983 Ker 24, the Kerala High Court said: "The fact that the power vests in the government is itself a sufficient safeguard".
But see, contra, Jaswant Singh v. Sub-Divisional Officer, AIR 1982 P&H 69, where the High Court has said that arbitrary discretionary power with no guidelines is not valid even though the power is conferred on a high authority like the State Government. This is only one of the many criteria to judge the constitutionality of a statute. This is a correct judicial attitude. Also see, supra.

5. AIR 1985 SC 1013 : (1985) 2 SCC 443.

"which implies that he will have to make judicious use of his power or discretion and any improper exercise is liable to be corrected by a higher authority".

On the whole, while the basic principle stands, viz., uncontrolled discretion ought not to be conferred on the administration, the general judicial tendency is to apply this principle in a very flexible manner. The courts tend to uphold the law rather than declare it invalid on this ground which is done only in rare cases.[6] The proposition that high officials can be entrusted with large powers is untenable. Every person, high or low, is susceptible to misusing power in the absence of proper controls. The status of an officer is no guarantee that he will not misuse his powers.[7] In fact, the Supreme Court has itself warned that "wide discretion is fraught with tyrannical potential even in high personages, absent legal norms and institutional checks."[8]

A powerful reiteration of the principle that uncontrolled and unguided discretionary power is incompatible with Art. 14 comes from the Supreme Court in Suman Gupta v. State of Jammu & Kashmir.[9] The Medical Council of India in a report on undergraduate medical education, recommended that with a view to encouraging national integration, 10 per cent of the seats in every medical college, other than those where admissions were planned on an All India basis, should be reserved on a reciprocal basis for students from other States. This recommendation was later accepted at a joint conference of the Central Council of Health and the Central Family Welfare Council with the modification that such reservation should be 5%. Thereafter, the States of Andhra Pradesh, Jammu & Kashmir, Karnataka, Kerala and Tamil Nadu agreed among themselves to nominate candidates reserved in the medical colleges of the other participating States.

The instant case raised the question of the validity of the nominations made by the Governments of Andhra Pradesh and Jammu & Kashmir reciprocally in the medical colleges of each other on the ground that the nominations were made by the State Governments in their absolute and arbitrary discretion. The Supreme Court declared this procedure of nominating candidates by the governments "in their absolute and unfettered choice" to seats for the MBBS course in medical colleges outside their respective States on a reciprocal basis as unconstitutional under Art. 14.

While commending the goal of national integration as highly commendable and laudable, the Court has not accepted the thesis that the selection of candidates for that purpose must remain in the unlimited discretion and the uncontrolled choice of the State Government. "The exercise of all administrative power vested in public authority must be structured within a system of controls informed by both relevance and reason, relevance in relation to the object which it seeks to serve, and reason in regard to the manner in which it attempts to do so." Art. 14 is violated by powers and procedures which in themselves result in unfairness and arbitrariness. The Court has emphasized:

---

6. Also see, Jyoti Pd. v. Union Territory of Delhi, AIR 1961 SC 1602 : (1962) 2 SCR 125; Naraindas v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1232.

7. Kishan Chand v. Commr. of Police, AIR 1961 SC 705, 715 : (1961) 3 SCR 135 (SUBBA RAO, J.)

8. Mohinder Singh Gill v. Chief Election Commr., AIR 1978 SC 851 : (1978) 1 SCC 405.

9. AIR 1983 SC 1235 : (1983) 4 SCC 309.

> "…there is a well-recognised distinction between an administrative power to be exercised within defined limits in the reasonable discretion of designated authority and the vesting of an absolute and uncontrolled power in such authority. One is power controlled by law countenanced by the Constitution, the other falls outside the Constitution altogether."

Thus, if the State Government desires to advance the objective of national integration it must adopt procedures "which are reasonable and are related to the objective". It is incumbent on the government to adopt a criterion or restrict its power by reference to norms which, while designed to achieve its object, nevertheless, confine the flow of that power within constitutional limits.

The Court rejected an argument of the State Governments that as the governments finance medical education within their respective States, they are entitled to exercise absolute discretion in the nomination of the candidates to seats in medical colleges outside the States concerned, "specially when the nomination is part of a reciprocal arrangement between the different States."

The Court directed the Medical Council of India "to formulate a proper constitutional basis for determining the selection of candidates for nomination to seats in medical colleges outside the State in the light of the observations contained in this judgment." Until such a policy is formulated and concrete criteria are embodied in the selection procedure, the nominations are to be made by selecting candidates strictly on merit, the candidates nominated being those in order of merit, immediately below the candidates selected for admission to the medical college of the home State.

S. 3 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1988, empowers the State Government to appoint as many special Judges as may be necessary "for such case or group of cases" as may be specified in the notification. The validity of this provision was challenged under Art. 14 on the ground that it confers unfettered, unguided and absolute discretion on the Government and is thus capable of leading to abuse of power by the Government.

The Supreme Court has however upheld the validity of this provision in J. Jayalalitha v. Union of India.[10] The Court has agreed with the proposition that conferment of discretionary power on the executive which in the absence of any policy or guidelines permits it to pick and choose is unconstitutional.[11] But, in the instant case, the Court has ruled that S. 3(1) does not confer unfettered or unguided power because the object of the Act and S. 3 indicate when, and under what circumstances, the power conferred by S. 3 has to be exercised. The policy can be gathered from the preamble, the provisions of the enactment and other surrounding circumstances.[12]

One of the objects of the Act is to provide speedy trial far cases of corruption. This is the policy of the Act and, therefore, while exercising the power under S. 3, the Government shall have to be guided by the said policy. The Legislature could not have anticipated as to how many special Judges would be needed in an area. There-

---

10. (1999) 5 SCC 138 : AIR 1999 SC 1912.

11. Re Special Courts Bill, 1978 (1979) 1 SCC 380 : AIR 1979 SC 478; A.R. Antulay v. R.S. Nayak, (1988) 2 SCC 602 : AIR 1988 SC 1531; State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali Sarkar, supra.

12. See, Jyoti Pershad v. Administrator for the Union Territory of Delhi, AIR 1961 SC 1602 : (1962) 2 SCR 125; Kathi Raning Rawat v. Saurashtra, AIR 1952 SC 123 : 1952 SCR 435.

fore, the Legislature could not have laid down any fixed rule or guideline. It had to leave this matter to the discretion of the State Government as it would be in a better position to know the requirement. This is why discretion has been conferred on the State Government to appoint as many special Judges as may be necessary.

Absolute discretion to give or not to give gratuity has been rejected as unenforceable.[13]

(ii) ADMINISTRATIVE DISCRIMINATION

Here we see the application of the second proposition mentioned above.[14]

The first proposition discussed above envisages that where a statute is discriminatory either because it does not make a reasonable classification, or confers unregulated discretion on the executive, the statute itself is void under Art. 14. The second proposition being discussed now, however, envisages the situation where the statute itself does not suffer from any such vice, but the administrative authority may implement it in a discriminatory manner, or may not follow the policy or principle laid down in the Act to regulate its discretion.

In such a case, the charge of violation of equal protection may be laid against the Administration and its action quashed under Art. 14. The classic case on the point is Yick Wo v. Hopkins,[15] an American case. By an ordinance, the City of San Francisco made it unlawful to carry on a laundry, without the consent of the board of supervisors, except in a brick or stone building. In administering, the ordinance, 200 Chinese launderers were denied permission, even though they complied with every requisite, while 80 non-Chinese under similar circumstances had been permitted. The U.S. Supreme Court held that the ordinance has been administered with "a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the State" of equal protection of laws. Though the law itself may be fair on its face, yet, if it is administered by public authority "with an evil eye and an unequal hand", so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of Art. 14. This Article secures all persons in India "not only against arbitrary laws but also against arbitrary application of laws." It ensures non-discrimination in state action both in the legislative and the administrative spheres.

The Cotton Control Order, 1950, banned all contracts and options in cotton except those permitted by the Textile Commissioner. The Commissioner permitted hedging contracts by members of the East-India Cotton Association. On being challenged by the M.B. Cotton Association which had been denied permission to enter into hedging contracts, the Supreme Court denied that there was discrimination because while East-India was an old and well-organised body dealing in hedging contracts, the M.B. Association was a new body and so the two Associations were not on an equal footing.[16]

---

13. Sudhir Chandra v. Tata Iron and Steel Co. Ltd., AIR 1984 SC 1064, 1071 : (1984) 3 SCC 369.
14. Supra, 1262.
15. 118, U.S. 356.
16. M.B. Cotton Association v. Union of India, AIR 1954 SC 634.

In Lumsden Club v. State of Punjab,[17] the Excise Commissioner banned the sale of liquor at the Lumsden Club but not at other clubs which were in similar position. The order was quashed as there was unjust discrimination. There could be a situation where discretion though conferred subject to a standard or policy, may be exercised in disregard of the policy. If so, it can be challenged under Art. 14.

A Tamil Trust made an application to the Government of Andhra Pradesh seeking permission to establish an engineering college for the benefit of the Tamil minority in the State of Andhra Pradesh. The Government refused permission to the Trust but at the same time it granted permission to two other societies to establish private engineering colleges. In Vellore Educational Trust v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[18] the Court quashed the Government's refusal of permission to the Tamil Trust as "not at all tenable" and quashed it. The Court also directed the Government to reconsider the matter and dispose it of according to law. This is an instance of discriminatory governmental action.

Although the principle is well-established that discriminatory administrative action can be challenged under Art. 14, yet, in practice, challenges to administrative action succeed only rarely, for the judicial attitude generally is to sustain administrative action against attacks of discrimination. The courts start with a presumption that the administration has not acted in a discriminatory manner; they would not easily assume abuse of power when discretion is vested in high officials. Further, the onus to prove that there has been an abuse of power is on the complainant. If, however, in a particular case, the complainant points out the circumstances which prima facie make out the exercise of power discriminatory qua him, then the authority concerned would be obligated to explain the circumstances under which the order was made. The court would then scrutinise the circumstances "with regard to the object sought to be achieved by the enactment and come to its own conclusion with respect to the bona fides of the order". The administration would have a good defence if it can prove bona fides.[19]

Selective application of law on an objective basis is not objectionable. The leading case in the area is Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Justice Tendolkar.[20] A commission of inquiry was appointed into Dalmia concerns by a notification under S. 3 of the Commission of Inquiry Act, 1952. S. 3 as well as the notification were challenged as discriminatory. S. 3 was held valid as the discretion conferred thereunder was not unguided because it was to be exercised subject to the policy and conditions laid down in the Act, viz., a commission could be appointed to inquire into a definite matter of public importance. The notification was also sustained against the charge that it arbitrarily singled out the petitioner and his companies for hostile and discriminatory treatment and subjected them to a harassing and oppressive inquiry.

The Court held that Parliament having left the selective application of the Inquiry Act to the discretion of the government, the latter must act on the information available to it and the opinion it formed thereon. It is to be presumed, until

---

17. AIR 1957 Punj. 20
18. AIR 1988 SC 130 : 1987 Supp SCC 543.
19. Pannalal Binjraj v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 397, 408 : 1957 SCR 233.
Also, MUKHERJEA J, in Anwar Ali, supra.
20. AIR 1958 SC 538 : 1959 SCR 279.

the contrary is proved, that the government would act honestly, properly and in conformity with the policy and the principles laid down by Parliament. The Court further held that the quality and characteristics said to exist in the petitioner's companies were so unique as to constitute a good or valid basis on which the petitioner and his companies could be regarded as a class by themselves. The facts as disclosed afforded sufficient support to the presumption of constitutionality of the notification. The petitioners failed to discharge the onus on them to prove that other persons or companies similarly situated have been left out and that they had been singled out for discriminatory and hostile treatment.

In State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Bakshi Ghulam Mohammad,[21] appointment of a Commission of Inquiry to enquire into acquisition of wealth by the former Prime Minister of the State by misuse of his official position was challenged as discriminatory as it was directed only against the Prime Minister and not the rest of his cabinet colleagues. The Court rejected the argument saying that it would be strange if the inquiry were also directed against all the other Ministers, for it could not be asserted that all Ministers had acquired wealth by misuse of their official position. The Prime Minister was a class by himself, and it could not be argued that by picking the former Prime Minister out of the entire cabinet for the enquiry, he had been discriminated.

At times, a statute may grant power to government to exempt any person or object from the operation of the Act. Such a power would be valid if not uncontrolled, and the statute in question contains a policy for its exercise.[22] But if the power of exemption granted by the statute to the government is uncanalised, unlimited or arbitrary, and the Act does not lay down any principle or policy for the guidance of exercise of discretion, or if the exemption granted is not according to the policy of the statute, the same can be quashed. Even when the grant of power of exemption is held valid, a question may still be raised that the actual exercise of power is arbitrary or illegal.

Under the Madras Buildings (Lease and Rent Control) Act, 1949, the government could exempt any building or class of buildings from the provisions of the Act. A government order exempting a specific building was held to be discriminatory as the reasons which led the government to pass the order were not such as could be countenanced by the policy or purpose of the Act.[23]

Under s. 113 of the T.N. Town and Country Planning Act, 1971, government could grant exemption to "any land or building or class of lands or buildings" from "all or any of the provisions of this Act" "subject to such conditions as they deem fit." This provision was held valid as the Supreme Court found that the preamble to the Act and many of the provisions of the Act "clearly indicate its policy". "Each of them contributes for subserving the policy of the Act, and clearly declares the purpose of the Act." Therefore, s. 113 could not be held to be 'unbridled'.

---

21. AIR 1967 SC 122 : 1966 Supp SCR 401.

22. Inder Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1957 SC 510 : 1957 SCR 605; Orient Weaving Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1963 SC 98 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 481; Consumer Action Group v. State of Tamil Nadu, (2000) 7 SCC 425; Registrar of Cooperative Societies v. K. Kunyahmu, (1980) 1 SCC 340; A.N. Parasuraman v. State of Tamil Nadu, (1989) 4 SCC 683.

23. P.J. Irani v. State of Madras, AIR 1961 SC 1781 : (1962) 2 SCR 169.

But a number of exemption orders issued under this provision were invalidated by the Supreme Court on the ground that these orders revealed non-application of mind and had been passed mechanically and arbitrarily and not in furtherance of the policy of the Act.

The State of Andhra Pradesh levied a purchase tax on purchase of sugarcane by sugar mills. The government had power to exempt from payment of tax any new factory. The government adopted the policy to grant exemption only to co-operative sugar factories and no other new factory. While 3 Judges of the Supreme Court held the exercise of discretion proper, two Judges held it invalid. According to the minority Judges, the policy of the Act was to provide incentive to the establishment of new sugar factories. Therefore, the policy regarding exemption must have some rational relation to the object. From this point of view, all new factories stand on the same footing, and there can be no justification for giving a favoured treatment to co-operative societies. Preferring co-operative societies to other new sugar factories "is wholly unrelated to the object of the exempting provision".

The view of the minority in the above case appears to be more rational for the government policy in effect meant promotion of co-operative societies and not sugar industry generally, and this was not what the Act envisaged. Each case of exemption should have been considered on merits. Whether a factory was co-operative or not was an irrelevant consideration for this purpose.[24]

At times, a statute may empower the government to extend any or all of its provisions to other persons, places or activities. Here again the same question arises: Is the power unguided? Has some policy been laid down for the purpose? If extended to a person or activity, whether this has been done according to the policy?[25]

The Government of India raised the age of compulsory retirement from 55 to 58 years subject to some conditions. The respondent was not given the benefit of this decision. The Court quashed the order holding it to be a violation of Art. 14.[26]

The Assam Foodgrains (Licensing & Control) Order, 1961, enumerated five considerations to which the licensing authority was to keep regard in granting or refusing a licence. One of these considerations was that a co-operative society was to be preferred to anyone else in certain circumstances in granting a licence. But when the government directed the licensing authority to grant licences only to a specified co-operative society, in order to create a monopoly in its favour, and the licensing officer acted accordingly, then a discrimination arose against others and this was bad under Art. 14. Under the order, it was open to the licensing authority to give preference to co-operative societies in the matter of granting a licence if in a particular locality it was of the view that that would fulfil the objectives of the statutory provision in question. But to refuse licence to anyone else only to create a monopoly in favour of one co-operative society amounted to discrimination in the administration of the law.[27]

---

24. Shri Rama Sugar Industries v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1745 : (1974) 1 SCC 534.

25. B.Y. Kshatriya v. Union of India, AIR 1963 SC 1591; Mohmedali v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 980 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 993.

26. Union of India v. Mool Chand, AIR 1971 SC 2369 : (1972) 3 SCC 273.

27. Mannalal Jain v. State of Assam, AIR 1962 SC 386 : (1962) 3 SCR 936.
For a comment on the case see, 4 JILI, 458.

When a higher qualification is prescribed having regard to the current social conditions and only graduates and post-graduates in veterinary science are coming out in large number and many degree holders are unemployed and, moreover, new diseases are discovered and new techniques are in use, the prescription of higher qualification is in consonance with the worldwide trend and in the interest of general public. Such qualification provisions are protected under the second part of Art. 19(6). Restrictions on rights of the diploma and certificate holders to continue to hold office of veterinary physician or surgeon or to practice veterinary medicine is reasonable within the meaning of Art. 19(6) and hence not violative of Art. 19(1)(g). Hardship to a section of veterinary professionals or holders of office, because of introduction of the higher qualification could not render the new provisions for higher qualification unconstitutional. Furthermore the qualifications prescribed were to operate prospectively and merely because it affected the rights of diploma and certificate holders to continue in their profession, it could not be said to have retrospective operation. The confusion which some time arises regarding conferring retrospectivity to a statute was explained to some extent by the Supreme Court in Udai Singh Dagar.[28] In that case the qualifications for veterinary practitioners was altered to the effect that their qualification should be a degree or a post-graduate degree instead of existing diplomas. The contention that it operated retrospectively since the diploma holders who are already in service could no longer hold their office was rejected by the Court on the reasoning that a person would have a right to enter into a profession and continue therewith provided he holds the requisite qualification as and when a qualification is laid down by a law within the meaning of Art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution when the same comes into effect. In other words, it would operate prospectively and, thus those who did not fulfill the qualification from the specified date would not continue to practice from that date.

VIVA VOCE

For selecting candidates for admission to government medical or engineering colleges, or for appointment to government services, a test usually applied is that of viva voce, i.e., interviewing candidates and grading them on that basis. Questions have been raised whether or not oral interview is compatible with Art. 14.

Two considerations arise in connection with the viva voce test. On the one hand, such a test is helpful in assessing the personality of the candidate. As the Supreme Court has itself accepted in Ashok Kumar Yadav v. State of Haryana,[29] the viva voce test "performs a very useful function in assessing personal characteristics and traits" of the candidates. On the other hand, it has been argued that an oral interview is subjective and based on first impressions and could thus lead to arbitrariness. A viva voce test can be manipulated. Too much reliance on this test may lead to a sabotage of the purity of the proceedings.

Taking into account these considerations, the Supreme Court has ruled that while viva voce test forms an important factor in the selection process but not too great reliance need be placed on it.[30]

---

28. Udai Singh Dagar v. Union of India, (2007) 10 SCC 306 : AIR 2007 SC 2599.
29. (1985) 4 SCC 417 : AIR 1987 SC 454.
30. Praveen Singh v. State of Punjab, (2000) 8 SCC 633 : AIR 2001 SC 152.

While holding that oral interview could not be regarded as an irrelevant or irrational test for purposes of admission to colleges or for public employment, the Supreme Court has also laid down some safeguards to reduce chances of arbitrariness as the Supreme Court is apprehensive that if too high marks are allotted for the viva voce test, it may lead to misuse of power by the concerned authorities.

In case of selection for services, a somewhat higher percentage of marks is permissible for viva voce than in case of admission to a course for, in the latter case, the personality traits of the students are not fully developed and are still in the formative stage and, therefore, in case of students, greater importance is to be accorded to the written test than to the viva voce to which importance attached ought to be minimal. In case of students, viva voce should not be relied upon as an exclusive test but should be resorted to only as an additional or supplementary test; it must be conducted by persons of high integrity, calibre and qualification; very high marks (such as 33 per cent of the total marks) should not be allocated to the interview test. For admission to colleges, not more than 15 per cent of the total marks should be fixed for interview.[31]

However, for appointment to public services (such as munsiffs), a higher relative value may be given (say 25 per cent) to the viva voce test, the reason being that candidates have mature personality.[32] The Court pointed out that the written test assesses the man's intellect and the interview test the man himself and "the twain shall meet" for a proper selection. In case of services where selection is made out of mature persons, a higher weightage may be given to the viva voce test. If, however, selection is to be made out of younger persons whose personalities are still in the process of development, a lower weightage is to be given to viva voce. "It must vary from service to service according to the requirement…."

There have been several cases in which the validity of selections made on the basis of viva voce test have been challenged. In Chitralekha v. State of Mysore,[33] a system of selection of candidates for admission to the State medical colleges by viva voce examination was challenged on the ground that it enabled the interviewers to act arbitrarily and manipulate the results. The Supreme Court rejected the contention holding that not only had the government laid down a clear policy and prescribed defined criteria in the matter of giving marks at the interview, but it had also appointed competent men to make the selection on the basis.

On the other hand, in Periakaruppan,[34] the interviews were found to be vitiated. For admission to the State medical colleges, certain marks had been allotted to the viva voce test and the interviewers were required to take five prescribed criteria into consideration for the purpose. The interviews were quashed because the total interview marks had not been divided into separate prescribed heads and marks had been given to the candidates in a lump and not on itemised basis and also while irrelevant matters had been taken into consideration certain relevant matters had been ignored.

---

31. Ajay Hasia v. Khalid Mujib, AIR 1981 SC 487 : (1981) 1 SCC 722.
Also, R. Karuppan v. Ministry of External Affairs, AIR 1982 Mad. 316: 45 marks for viva voce out of 345 marks for admission to the M.L. Degree Course held not arbitrary.

32. Lila Dhar v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1981 SC 1777 : (1981) 4 SCC 159.

33. AIR 1964 SC 1823 : (1964) 6 SCR 368.

34. A. Peeriakaruppan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1971 SC 2303 : (1971) 1 SCC 38.

The most significant pronouncement in this area is Ajay Hasia.[35] Here a large number of candidates were given admission to the regional engineering college because of high marks obtained at the interview although they had secured low marks at the written qualifying examination. According to the Supreme Court, this did give rise to the suspicion that marks at the interview had been manipulated to favour candidates but did not prove mala fides. The Court did not quash the admissions made by the college because it agreed to take in 50 best students next year in addition to the normal in-take. The Court laid down the following guidelines so that the interview system might not be vitiated under Art. 14:

> "If the marks allocated for the oral interview do not exceed 15% of the total marks and the candidates are properly interviewed and relevant questions are asked with a view to assessing their suitability with reference to the factors required to be taken into consideration, the oral interview test would satisfy the criterion of reasonableness and non-arbitrariness."

The Court further suggested that the interviews be tape-recorded so that there is evidence to judge whether interviews were conducted in an arbitrary manner or not.

In case of viva voce test for services, even between one service and another, depending upon the significance and relevance of the personality factor, maximum marks for interview may vary, as for example, higher marks for viva voce test may be prescribed for the Provincial Civil Service than in case of any other service. The Supreme Court expressed the view that in Civil Service (Executive), not more than 12.2% of the total marks be allotted to the viva voce test. Commenting upon the prescription of 33.3% marks for recruitment to administrative services of the State, the Court said that with this enormously large spread of marks for viva voce, this test "tended to become a determining factor in the selection process", and this "opens the door wide for arbitrariness, and in order to diminish, if not eliminate the risk of arbitrariness, this percentage needs to be changed."

In Ashok Yadav v. State of Haryana,[36] the Court ruled that the allocation of 33% marks for the Provincial Civil Service was excessive and would suffer from the vice of arbitrariness and, therefore, quashed it. But, in later cases, the Court has changed its opinion and has accepted allocation of high percentage of marks for viva voce test for recruitment to Senior State Administrative Services.

In Mehmood Alam Tariq v. State of Rajasthan,[37] the Court has accepted a percentage of 33 for the purpose. Distinguishing the situation in the instant case from that which was considered in Ajay Hasia, the Court has pointed out that the officers to be selected for higher services would, in course of time, be required "to man increasingly responsible positions in the core services," and, therefore, these men should be endowed with personality traits conducive to the levels of performance in such services. Ajay Hasia refers to admission of students to edu-

---

35. Supra, footnote 31.
Also see, Nishi Maghu v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1980 SC 1975 : (1980) 4 SCC 95; Arti Sapru v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1981 SC 1009 : (1981) 2 SCC 484; Koshal Kumar v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1984 SC 1056 : (1984) 2 SCC 652.
Also, infra.

36. AIR 1987 SC 454 : (1985) 4 SCC 417.

37. AIR 1988 SC 1451 : (1988) 3 SCC 241.

cational institutions and the personality of these students "is yet to develop and it is too early to identify the personal qualities." The Court observed:

> "There is nothing unreasonable or arbitrary in the stipulation that officers to be selected for higher services and who are with the passage of time, expected to man increasingly responsible positions in the core services…..should be men endowed with personality traits conducive to the level of performance expected in such services…Academic excellence is one thing. Ability to deal with public with tact and imagination is another. Both are necessary for an officer. The dose that is demanded may vary according to the nature of the service."

A similar view has been propounded in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Rafiquddin,[38] where prescription of 35% marks for selection for judicial branch was upheld.

In other services, however, the Court still insists on a low percentage of marks for viva voce. Thus, in Vikram Singh,[39] allocation of 28.5% marks for interview for selection to the posts of excise inspectors was held to be too high and was thus quashed.

The Court has ruled that for selection to the posts of assistant engineers in the State Electricity Board, a maximum of 15% marks may be allotted for interview and group discussion—10% for interview and 5% for group discussion.[40] Allocation of 33% marks for interview for selection for the posts of Assistant Engineers (Civil) and (Mechanical) for Public Works Dept. was held to be too high and not in accordance with the dictum in Ashok Yadav.[41]

The Supreme Court has pointed out in Indian Airlines Corporation v. Capt. K.C. Shukla,[42] that a distinction appears to have been made in interviews held for competitive examination or admission in educational institutions and selection for higher posts. In the former case, efforts are made to limit the scope of arbitrariness by lowering down the proportion of marks at the viva voce but the same standard cannot be applied for selection for higher posts. This becomes clear from the ruling in Lila Dhar.[43] It is thus clear that no hard and fast rule can be laid down because much would depend on the level of the post and the nature of performance expected from the incumbent. Accordingly, in Shukla, the basis of evaluation depending on 50% on assessment of confidential reports and 50% on interviews for purposes of promotion was upheld by the Court.

In Union of India v. N. Chandrasekharan,[44] for the promotional post of assistant purchase officer from the post of purchase assistant—B, the promotion was based on a written test, interview and assessment of the confidential reports. The weightage given to each component was 50, 30, 20 marks. It was also prescribed that to qualify for promotion, a candidate should secure a minimum of 50% prescribed for each head and also 60% in the aggregate. This scheme of assessment was upheld by the Supreme Court.

---

38. AIR 1988 SC 162 : 1987 Supp SCC 401.
Also, Subhash Chandra Verma v. State of Bihar, AIR 1995 SC 904 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 325.

39. Vikram Singh v. Subordinate Services Selection Board, Haryana, AIR 1991 SC 1011 : (1991) 1 SCC 686; C.P. Kalra v. Air India, (1994) Supp (1) SCC 454.

40. Munindra Kumar v. Rajiv Govil, AIR 1991 SC 1607 : (1991) 3 SCC 368.

41. Supra, footnote 36.

42. 1993(1) SCC 17.

43. Liladhar v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1981 SC 1777 : (1981) 4 SCC 159.

44. AIR 1998 SC 795 : (1998) 3 SCC 694.

(iii) ARBITRARY STATE ACTION

Art. 14 out-laws arbitrary administrative action. When there is arbitrariness in state action, Art. 14 springs into action and the courts strike down such action. Arbitrary state action infringes Art. 14.[45]

A very fascinating aspect of Art. 14 which the courts in India have developed over time is that Art. 14 embodies "a guarantee against arbitrariness" on the part of the Administration. As the Supreme Court has observed in Royappa:[46] "from a positivistic point of view, equality is antithetic to arbitrariness." Any action that is arbitrary must necessarily involve the negation of equality. Abuse of power is hit by Art. 14. The authority endowed with a power must free itself from political interference.[47]

The new orientation being given to Art. 14 by the courts has been explained by BHAGWATI, J., in Bachan Singh v. State of Punjab.[48] Rule of law which permeates the entire fabric of the Indian Constitution excludes arbitrariness. "Wherever we find arbitrariness or unreasonableness there is denial of rule of law." Art. 14 enacts primarily a guarantee against arbitrariness and inhibits state action, whether legislative or executive, which suffers from the view of arbitrariness. "Every state action must be non-arbitrary and reasonable. Otherwise, the Court would strike it down as invalid."

To challenge an arbitrary action under Art. 14, the petitioner does not have to show that there is someone else similarly situated as he himself, or that he has been dissimilarly treated. On this point, the Supreme Court has observed in Kalra:[49]

> "Article 14 strikes at arbitrariness in executive/administrative action because any action that is arbitrary must necessarily involve the negation of equality. One need not confine the denial of equality to a comparative evaluation between two persons to arrive at a conclusion of discriminatory treatment. An action per se arbitrary itself denies equality of protection by law."

This new dimension of Art. 14 transcends the classificatory principle. Art. 14 is no longer to be equated with the principle of classification. It is primarily a guarantee against arbitrariness in state action and the doctrine of classification has been evolved only as a subsidiary rule for testing whether a particular state action is arbitrary or not. If a law is arbitrary or irrational it would fall foul of Art. 14. As an example thereof, it has been held that any penalty disproportionate to the gravity of the misconduct would be violative of Art. 14.[50]

Every action of the state must be informed by reasons and guided by public interest. Actions uninformed by reason may be questioned as arbitrary. Whenever there is arbitrariness in state action, Art. 14 springs to life and judicial review strikes such an action down.[51] Arbitrariness is the antithesis of

---

45. A.P. Aggarwal v. Govt. of NCT of Delhi, AIR 2000 SC 205.
46. E.P. Royappa v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1974 SC 555 : (1974) 3 SCC 3.
47. Suresh Chandra Sharma v. Chairman, U.P. SEB, (2005) 3 SCC 153 : AIR 2005 SC 2021.
48. AIR 1982 SC 1325 : (1982) 3 SCC 24.
49. A.L. Kalra v. P & E Corpn of India, Ltd., AIR 1984 SC 1361, 1367.
50. Bhagat Ram v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 454, 460 : (1983) 2 SCC 442.
51. Dwarkadas Marfatia & Sons v. Board of Trustees, Bombay Port, AIR 1989 SC 1642; LIC v. Escorts, AIR 1986 SC 1370 : (1986) 1 SCC 264; L.I.C. of India v. Consumer Education and Research Centre, AIR 1995 SC 1811 : (1995) 5 SCC 482; M.S. Bhut Education Trust v. State of Gujarat, AIR 2000 Guj 160.

Art. 14.[52] Equality and arbitrariness are sworn enemies. Art. 14 strikes at arbitrariness in state action and ensures fairness and equality of treatment.[53]

In a number of cases, government action has been quashed on the ground of its being arbitrary or discriminatory. Art. 14 strikes not only at discrimination but also at arbitrariness in general. The wage board for working journalists divided the newspapers and news agencies into seven classes on the basis of gross revenues. According to this test, the P.T.I. should have been placed in the third category but the wage board placed it in the second—a higher category, thus placing on the P.T.I. more onerous obligations. This was held to be arbitrary which "singles out the P.T.I. for discrimination."[54]

Spot admissions on the last day for vacant seats without notice in State owned institutions for higher professional education was held bad as it denied equality of opportunity and the test of merit. "The State even in the exercise of its administrative power cannot act arbitrarily. Being the State it is obliged to act in a fair, reasonable and equitable manner."[55]

The State Government exempted only a specified number of prints of the Gandhi film (20) from payment of entertainment tax. Viewers of other prints of the film had to pay the tax. The Court held that exempting only a few prints, and not all prints of the film, was discriminatory and arbitrary.[56] When the circumstances provided under specific clauses of the Scheme and the agreement, as to events on which cash subsidy could be recovered as arrears of land revenue were not attracted on the facts, recovery of the subsidy by the State in violation of those clauses was illegal and arbitrary.[57]

The State Government fixed higher quantity of levy sugar for higher income group. The High Court held that this was not based on any rational basis as it allowed better placed persons to get more sugar at the cheapest rate.[58]

In a number of other cases, arbitrary or discriminatory exercise of power by the administration has been quashed by the courts.[59]

When an authority has power to relax a directory rule, its relaxation in particular cases has to be governed by objective considerations. No public authority can pick and choose persons for receiving the benefit of relaxation of the rules. Relaxation must be governed by defined guidelines.[60]

---

52. Express Newspapers (P.) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 872; Netai Bag v. State of West Bengal, (2000) 8 SCC 262 : AIR 2000 SC 3313.
53. Delhi Transport Corp. v. DTC Mazdoor Congress, AIR 1991 SC 101, 196; Mahesh Chandra v. Regional Manager, U.P. Financial Corpn., AIR 1993 SC 935 : (1993) 2 SCC 279.
54. The P.T.I. v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1044 : (1974) 4 SCC 638.
55. Ajay Kumar v. Chandigarh Adm., Union Territory, AIR 1983 P & H 8; Punjab Engineering College, Chandigarh v. Sanjay Gulati, AIR 1983 SC 580 : (1983) 2 SCC 517.
56. Globe Theatres v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1983 Bom. 265.
57. Sun Beverages (P) Ltd. v. State of U. P., (2004) 9 SCC 116 : AIR 2004 SC 777.
58. R. Ramanujam v. Commr. and Secretary, T.N. Govt., AIR 1982 Mad. 261.
59. Jitendra Nath v. W.B. Board of Exams., AIR 198 3 Cal 275; Dhudaram v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1983 Raj. 29; M.K. Santhamma v. State of Kerala P.S.C. AIR 1983 Ker. 84; J.P. Kulshrestha v. Allahabad University, AIR 1980 SC 2141 : (1980) 3 SCC 418; Vishundas Hundumal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 1636.
60. Principal, King George's Medical College v. Vishan Kumar, AIR 1984 SC 221, 226 : (1984) 1 SCC 416.

When the only reason for the en masse cancellation was that a "controversy" had been raised, there was clear non application of mind to any particular case or cases and more so when infact none of the cases were examined.[61]

The Government of Uttar Pradesh issued an order terminating at one stroke the appointment of all the governmental advocates throughout the entire State. In Shrilekha Vidyarthi v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[62] the Supreme Court quashed the order characterising it as arbitrary: "Arbitrariness is writ large in the impugned circular." The Court stated the applicable principle as follows:

> "It is now well-settled that every state action, in order to survive, must not be susceptible to the vice of arbitrariness which is the crux of Art. 14 of the Constitution and basic to the rule of law, the system which governs us, arbitrariness being the negation of the rule of law."

Another notable principle developed by the Supreme Court out of Art. 14 is that every action of the government, or any of its instrumentalities, must be informed by reason. Any state action which is not informed by reason cannot be protected as it would be easy for the citizens to question such an action as being arbitrary. "Non-arbitrariness, being a necessary concomitant of the rule of law, it is imperative that all actions of every public functionary in whatever sphere must be guided by reason and not humour, whim, caprice or personal predilections of the persons entrusted with the task on behalf of the State and exercise of all powers must be for public good instead of being an abuse of power."[63] The decision not to fill up the vacancies has to be taken bona fide and must pass the test of reasonableness so as not to fail on the touchstone of Art. 14.[64]

The government and other public authorities must act reasonably and fairly and that each action of such authorities must pass the test of reasonableness.[65]

But a case of arbitrariness is not made out where two views are possible and the view taken by the government cannot be challenged on the ground that the other view is a better one.[66] Mere fact that some hardship or injustice is caused to someone is no ground to strike down the rule altogether if otherwise the rule appears to be just, fair and reasonable and not unconstitutional.[67]

---

61. Onkar Lal Bajaj v. Union of India, (2003) 2 SCC 673 : AIR 2003 SC 2562.
62. AIR 1991 SC 537.
63. Style (Dress Land) v. Union Territory, Chandigarh, (1999) 7 SCC 89, 100 : AIR 1999 SC 3678; Dolly Chanda v. Chairman, Jee, (2005) 9 SCC 779 : AIR 2004 SC 5043; Admission—Arbitrary conduct of authorities. Haryana Urban Development Authority v. Dropadi Devi, (2005) 9 SCC 514 : AIR 2005 SC 1487. Arbitrary conduct of Development authority in delivering possessions.
64. Food Corporation of India v. Bhanu Lodh, (2005) 3 SCC 618 : AIR 2005 SC 2775.
65. Hansraj H. Jain v. State of Maharashtra, (1993) 3 SCC 634; New Horizons Ltd. v. Union of India, (1995) SCC 478; Mahesh Chandra v. Regional Manager, U.P. Financial Corp., AIR 1993 SC 935 : (1993) 2 SCC 279; U.P. State Road Transport Corp.v. Mohd. Ismail, AIR 1991 SC 1099 : (1991) 3 SCC 239; Common Cause, A Registered Society v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 1886; Shiv Sagar Tiwari v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 2725 : (1997) 1 SCC 444.
66. Onkar Lal Bajaj v. Union of India, (2003) 2 SCC 673 : AIR 2003 SC 2562.
67. A. P. Coop. Oil Seeds Growers Federation Ltd. v. D. Achyuta Rao, (2007) 13 SCC 320 : (2007) 4 JT 454.

(a) RIGHT OF HEARING

In some cases, the Courts have insisted, with a view to control arbitrary action on the part of the administration, that the person adversely affected by administrative action be given the right of being heard before the Administration passes an order against him. It is believed that such a procedural safeguard may minimise the chance of the Administration passing an arbitrary order. Thus, the Supreme Court has extracted from Art. 14 the principle that natural justice is an integral part of administrative process.

Art. 14 guarantees a right of hearing to the person adversely affected by an administrative order.[68] As the Supreme Court has observed in the case noted below,[69] "The audi alteram partem rule, in essence, enforces the equality clause in Art. 14 and it is applicable not only to quasi-judicial bodies but also to administrative orders adversely affecting the party in question unless the rule has been excluded by the Act in question."[70] Maneka Gandhi[71] is an authority for the proposition that the principles of natural justice are an integral part of the guarantee of equality assured by Art. 14. An order depriving a person of his civil right passed without affording him an opportunity of being heard suffers from the vice of violation of natural justice and is thus an arbitrary order.[72]

A few cases may be taken note of here to illustrate this proposition.

The Maharashtra Legislature enacted an Act to provide for summary eviction of persons unauthorisedly occupying vacant lands in urban areas. The Act gave power to an authorised authority to order vacation of any land by its occupiers. The Supreme Court held the Act to be invalid in State of Maharashtra v. Kamal,[73] under Art. 14 on the ground that it laid down no guidelines to control the exercise of discretion by the concerned authority. The Act prescribed no procedure for the concerned authority to follow before declaring any land as "Vacant land" for the purposes of the Act. The Supreme Court emphasized that the Act conferred 'uncontrolled and arbitrary" power on the authority and, therefore, in the matters covered by the Act, a hearing procedure was of the essence of the matter.

A government company made a service rule authorising it to terminate the service of a permanent employee by merely giving him a three months' notice or salary. The rule was declared to be invalid as being violative of Art. 14 on the ground that it was unconscionable.[74] The rule in question constituted a part of the employment contract between the corporation and its employees. The Court ruled that it would not enforce, and would strike down, an unfair and unreasonable clause in a contract entered into between parties who were not equal in bargain-

---

68. For a fuller discussion on Natural Justice, see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, Chs. X and XI, 304-447; JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, I, Chs. IX and X, 641-919.

69. Delhi Transport Corporation v. DTC Mazdoor Union, AIR 1999 SC 564.

70. Union of India v. Amrik Singh, AIR 1991 SC 564 : (1991) 1 SCC 654; D.K. Yadav v. JMA Industries, (1993) 3 SCC 259.

71. Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248.
For detailed discussion on this case, see, infra, Ch. XXVI.

72. Haji Abdool Shakoor & Co. v. Union of India, JT 2001 (10) SC 438.

73. AIR 1985 SC 119 : (1985) 1 SCC 234.

74. Central Inland Water Transport Corporation Ltd. v. Brojo Nath, AIR 1986 SC 1571.

ing power. This was in conformity with the mandate of the "great equality clause in Art. 14."

The Court emphasized that the judicial concept of Art. 14 has progressed "from a prohibition against discriminatory class legislation to an invalidating factor for any discriminatory or arbitrary state action." The Court also emphasized that the rule was "both arbitrary and unreasonable" and "as it also wholly ignored and set aside the audi alteram partem rule" violated Art. 14. The Court emphasized that "the principle of natural justice has now come to be recognised as being a part of the constitutional guarantee contained in Art. 14." The rule in question was "both arbitrary and unreasonable," and it also wholly ignored and set aside the audi alteram partem rule and, thus, it violated Art. 14.

The above proposition has been reiterated by the Supreme Court in D.T.C. v. D.T.C. Mazdoor Union.[75] The Court again held, rejecting a clause authorising termination of service at a month's notice, that the freedom of contract must be founded on equality of bargaining power between contracting parties. The freedom of contract must be founded on the equality of bargaining power. There can be myriad situations which result in unfair and unreasonable bargain between parties possessing wholly disproportionate and unequal bargaining power.

The Cantonment Board, Dinapur, granted permission to the respondent to make additions to their buildings situated in the cantonment. Under a provision in the Cantonments Act, 1924, the officer commanding-in-chief had power to suspend a Board's resolution. In the instant case,[76] the OCIC cancelled the Board's resolution after giving it a hearing but not to the respondent to whom the permission had been given. The Supreme Court ruled that OCIC ought to have given a hearing to the respondent as well before cancelling the permission given by the Board. The Court observed: "Audi alteram partem is a part of Art. 14 of the Constitution." The real affected party in the fact situation was the party being ultimately affected by cancellation of the Board's resolution. Because of Art. 14, "no order shall be passed at the back of a person, prejudicial in nature to him, when it entails civil consequences."

Merely because in the scheme of merger of two government companies the employees of one of them would suffer in terms of seniority or chances of promotion, the whole scheme could not be treated as discriminatory or arbitrary.[77]

(b) JUDICIAL DISCRETION

Discretion vested in a judicial officer exercisable on the facts and circumstances of each particular case may not amount to a denial of equal protection unless "there is shown to be present in it an element of intentional and purposeful discrimination."

The discretion of judicial officers is not arbitrary as the law provides for revision by superior courts of orders passed by subordinate courts.[78]

---

75. AIR 1991 SC 101 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 600.
76. Cantonment Board, Dinapore v. Taramani Devi, (1992) Supp. (2) SCC 501 : AIR 1992 SC 61.
77. Indian Airlines Officers' Assn. v. Indian Airlines Ltd., (2007) 10 SCC 684 : AIR 2007 SC 2747.
78. Budhan v. State of Bihar, AIR 1955 SC 191 : (1955) 1 SCR 1045.
For a comment on the case see, 1 JILI 181.
Also, A. Lakshmanrao v. Judicial Magistrate, AIR 1971 SC 186 : (1970) 3 SCC 501.

The discretion given to the judge to sentence an accused convicted of murder either to death or to imprisonment for life is not invalid under Art. 14. The judge has to balance all the aggravating and mitigating circumstances of the case and record his reasons in writing for awarding lesser punishment.[79] Similarly, discretion available to the judge in other criminal cases in the sentencing policy and the judicial fluctuations in punishment do not violate Art. 14.[80]

The same principle has been extended to discretion given to quasi-judicial authorities, e.g., rent controller, disciplinary authority etc.[81]

(iv) GRANT OF BENEFITS BY THE STATE

A welfare state has wide power to regulate and dispense leases, licenses, contracts, etc. The modern state is a source of great wealth and, therefore, questions often arise whether it is bound by any norm in dispensing its largess.

In India, it is now well established that in dispensing its largess, the state is expected not to act as a private individual but should act in conformity with certain healthy standards and norms.[82] The principle of non-discrimination contained in Art. 14 has been applied by the Supreme Court in an area of great contemporary importance, viz., conferment of benefits and award of contracts by the government.

Art. 14 has been applied to the grant of largess or benefit by the state. Even while conferring a benefit or largess, or giving a contract, the government is subject to Art. 14. This means that the Administration cannot act in an arbitrary or discriminatory manner even in the area of grant of largess or conferring benefit by it on individuals. The government is not as free as a private person to pick and choose the recipients of its largess. Whatever its activity, a government is always a government and, as such, is subject to the restraints, inherent in a democratic society. A democratic government cannot exercise its power arbitrarily or discriminately because Art. 14 is always there to regulate its discretion in all spheres. "The state need not enter into any contract with anyone, but if it does so, it must do so fairly without discrimination and without unfair procedure."[83] The government cannot lay down arbitrary and capricious standards for the choice of persons with whom alone it will deal. Every action of the government must be informed with reason and should be free from arbitrariness because government is always a government.[84] BHAGWATI, J., has laid down the principle as follows:[85]

> "Where the government is dealing with the public, whether by giving of jobs or entering into contracts or issuing quotas or licences or granting other forms of largess, the government cannot act arbitrarily at its sweet will and, like a pri-

---

79. Jagmohan Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 947 : (1973) 1 SCC 20.
80. Inderjeet v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1979 SC 1867 : (1979) 4 SCC 246.
81. Manindra Sanyal v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1976 Cal 174; Parkash Chander v. Haryana State Electricity Board, AIR 1976 P&H 30.
82. Netai Bag v. State of West Bengal, (2000) 8 SCC 262, 274 : AIR 2000 SC 3313.
83. Erusian Equipment and Chemicals Ltd. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1975 SC 266 : (1975) 1 SCC 70.
84. Asiatic Labour Corp. v. Union of India, AIR 1983 Guj. 86; Durga Associates, Raipur v. State of U.P., AIR 1982 All 490.
85. Ramana Dayaram Shetty v. International Airport Authority of India, AIR 1979 SC 1628 : (1979) 3 SCC 489.

> vate individual, deal with any person it pleases, but its action must be in conformity with standard or norm which is not arbitrary, irrational or irrelevant."

In Ramana,[1] the International Airport Authority, a statutory body, floated a tender for running a restaurant at the Bombay Airport. Certain conditions of eligibility were laid down for the contractor. The authority awarded the contract to one who did not fulfil the norms of eligibility laid down. The Supreme Court ruled that the authority ought to have stuck to the conditions prescribed by it. The action of the authority was discriminatory as it did not give an equal chance to other persons similarly situated to tender for the contract. The Court has emphasized that when the government lays down some norms or standards of eligibility, then the government cannot award the contract to some one not fulfilling the prescribed conditions of eligibility. If the authority does so, its action becomes discriminatory since it excludes "other persons similarly situate from tendering for the contract" and that would be "plainly arbitrary and without reason".

BHAGWATI, J., speaking for the Court has expounded the relevant principle as follows:[2]

> "It is well settled rule of administrative law that an executive authority must be rigorously held to the standards by which it professes its actions to be judged and it must scrupulously observe those standards on pain of invalidation of an act in violation of them".

The most notable aspect of Ramana is that it put a restriction on the discretion of the Administration to award a contract to whomsoever it likes. Instead, the exercise of the power to award contract must be structured by "rational, relevant and non-discriminatory" standards or norms. This means that while inviting tenders to award a contract, the norms or standards governing the tenders should be reasonable and non-discriminatory and the concerned authority should not depart from the same arbitrarily and without justification.

In another case, allotment of quotas of resin by the State to industrial units was quashed as it was based on no reasonable basis.[3]

The principle that the state cannot act in an arbitrary or discriminatory manner in the matter of conferring or not conferring benefits on individuals and that the distribution of the largess should be reasonable has been applied in a large number of cases.[4] For example, the Supreme Court has observed in Mahabir Auto Stores v. Indian Oil Corporation:[5]

---

1. Ibid.
2. AIR 1979 SC, at 1635.
3. Om Prakash v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1981 SC 1001 : (1981) 2 SCC 270.
4. Kasturi Lal v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1980 SC 1992 : (1980) 4 SCC 1; Parashram Thakur Dass v. Ram Chand, AIR 1982 SC 872; Premjit Bhat v. Delhi Development Authority, AIR 1980 SC 738; Ajoomal Lilaram v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 278; Kirti Kumar v. Indian Oil Corporation, Ahmedabad, AIR 1983 Guj 235; Asiatic Labour Corp. v. Union of India, AIR 1983 Guj 86; D.S. Sharma v. Delhi Administration, AIR 1983 Del 434; Vikas Enterprises v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 All 236.

Sri Rama Engineering Contracts v. Dept. of Space, Govt. of India, AIR 1981 AP 165; Shriram Refrigeration India Ltd. v. State Bank of India, AIR 1983 Pat 203; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Nandlal Jaiswal, AIR 1987 SC 251; Union of India v. Hindustan Development Corporation, AIR 1994 SC 988, 997; Ramniklal N. Bhutia v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1997

[Footnote 4 Contd.]

> "It appears to us that rule of reason and rule against arbitrariness and discrimination, rules of fair play and natural justice are part of the rule of law applicable in situation or action by state instrumentality in dealing with citizens in a situation like the present one. Even though the rights of the citizens are in the nature of contractual rights, the manner, the method and motive of a decision of entering or not entering into a contract, are subject to judicial review on the touchstone of relevance and reasonableness, fair play, natural justice, equality and non-discrimination in the type of the transactions and nature of the dealing as in the present case."

In Sterling Computers Ltd. v. M & N Publications Ltd.,[6] the Supreme Court has ruled that even in commercial contracts where there is a public element it is necessary that relevant considerations are taken into account and the irrelevant considerations are kept out. In Union of India v. Graphic Industries Ltd., [7] the Supreme Court has held that even in contractual matters public authorities have to act fairly.

In the area of exercise of contractual powers by governmental authorities, the function of the courts is to prevent arbitrariness and favouritism and to ensure that the power is exercised in public interest and not for a collateral purpose.[8] The Railway Board rejected the tender of the respondent. The Supreme Court ruled that the Board had acted arbitrarily and without applying its mind while doing so. The Court characterised it as a "flagrant violation of the constitutional mandate of Art. 14."[9]

Usually, the courts do not interfere with policy matters. But, in the instant case, the Supreme Court quashed the policy because it was framed in ignorance of the facts. The court stated : "Any decision be it a simple administrative decision or a policy decision, of taken without considering the relevant facts, can only be termed as an arbitrary decision."

When a term of the tender is changed after the parties have filed their offers in response thereto, it amounts to changing the rules of the game after it has begun. In such a situation, the only way out is to begin a fresh process of initial tender all over again.[10]

It is the settled law that no one has a fundamental right to carry on trade or business in liquor.[11] In exercise of its regulatory power, the State is entitled to

---

[Footnote 4 Contd.]

SC 1236; Raunaq International Ltd. v. I.V.R. Construction Ltd., AIR 1999 SC 393 : (1999) 1 SCC 492; Air India Ltd. v. Cochin International Airport Ltd., AIR 2000 SC 801 : (2000) 2 SCC 617; Centre for Public Interest Litigation v. Union of India, AIR 2001 SC 80 : (2000) 8 SCC 606.

This topic is discussed more fully under Administrative Law, see, M.P. JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS IN INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, Vol. II, Ch. XV, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I Ch. XVIII.

5. AIR 1990 SC 1031, 1037 : (1990) 3 SCC 752.

6. (1993) 1 SCC 445, 464 : AIR 1996 SC 51.

7. (1994) 5 SCC 398 : AIR 1995 SC 409.

8. Tata Cellular v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 11; Asia Foundation and Construction Ltd. v. Trafalgar House Construction (I) Ltd., (1997) 1 SCC 738 : (1997) 1 JT 309.

9. Union of India v. Dinesh Engineering Corpn., (2001) 8 SCC 491 : AIR 2001 SC 3887.

10. Monarch Infrastructure (P.) Ltd. v. Commissioner, U.M.C., AIR 2000 SC 2272 : (2000) 5 SCC 287.

11. Khoday Distilleries v. State of Karnatka, (1995) 1 SCC 574; Ugar Sugar Works Ltd. v. Delhi Administration, AIR 2001 SC 1447 : (2001) 3 SCC 635.

prohibit absolutely any form of activity in relation to an intoxicant, e.g., manufacture, possession, storage, import, export, etc. The State has the exclusive privilege to manufacture, sale, etc. of liquor. But if the State decides to part with its monopoly, then the State can regulate consistent with the principles of equality enshrined in Art. 14. The Supreme Court has observed in Doongaji & Co. v. State of Madhya Pradesh:[12]

> "Further when the State has decided to part with such right or privilege to the others, then State can regulate consistent with the principles of equality enshrined under Art. 14 and any infraction in this behalf at its pleasure is arbitrary violating Art. 14. Therefore, the exclusive right or privilege of manufacture, storage, sale, import and export of the liquor through any agency other than the State would be subject to the rigour of Art. 14…."[13]

The Supreme Court has ruled recently in TVL Sundarsan Granites v. Imperial Granites Ltd.,[14] that "while grant of largess is at the discretion of the State Government, its action should be open, fair, honest and completely above board. In the instant case, grant of lease by the State in favour of a party for quarrying coloured, granite was quashed on the ground that in doing so, the State had not acted "fairly and reasonably and had not kept public interest and mineral development in the State in view".

Grant of tehbazari by the Nagarpalika without any notice, without any auction or without any advertisement was held to be vitiated.[15]

After the terms and conditions for award of a contract have been announced, the concerned authority cannot go back on them otherwise it may result in undue favour to a particular person.[16]

Although norms and guidelines are generally to be followed, deviations for good reasons are not barred. Thus, where the guidelines issued by the RBI to bankers said that the banks should follow the broad policies contained in the guidelines relating to 'One Time Settlement' of its customers whose accounts have been classified as NPA, deviation in minor matters which does not touch the broad aspects of the policy could not be considered as violating Art. 14.[17]

When tenders are invited for execution of a work, the contract is awarded to the lowest tenderer which is in public interest. The principle of awarding contract to the lowest tenderer applies when all things are equal. The tender system eliminates favouritism and discrimination in awarding public works. It is also in public interest to adhere to the rules and regulations subject to which the tenders are invited.

Ignoring the instructions subject to which the tenders are invited would encourage and provide scope for "discrimination, arbitrariness and favouritism

---

12. AIR 1991 SC 1947 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 324.
13. Also see, Har Shankar v. Deputy Excise & Taxation Commr., AIR 1975 SC 1121 : (1975) 1 SCC 737; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Nandlal Jaiswal, supra.
14. (1999) 8 SCC 150 : AIR 1999 SC 3835.
15. 0mprakash Tiwari v. District Magistrate, Ballia, AIR 1996 All 115.
Also see, Ram and Shyam & Co. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1985 SC 1147 : (1985) 3 SCC 267.
16. Ramana Dayaram Shetty, supra; Netai Bag, supra.
17. Sardar Associates v. Punjab & Sind Bank, (2009) 8 SCC 257 : (2009) 10 JT 410.

"which are totally opposed to the Rule of Law and our constitutional values". The very purpose of issuing Rules/instructions is to ensure their enforcement lest the Rule of Law should be a casualty". Inclusion of an item in the schedule to the Drugs (Prices Control) Order, 1995 (made under the Essential Commodities Act, 1955) in deviation from a norm fixed in a policy decision may result in violation of Art. 14.[18]

But even if the regulations provide that normally allotment of land should be made by inviting applications, the authorities were not precluded in a given situation to take recourse to a regulation which enabled the authorities to make allotment to a particular company. This is because of the principle that when power exercised by a statutory authority is traceable to a provision of a statute, then in the absence of violation of any mandatory provision therein or illegality of the purpose, a decision taken in furtherance of the statute would not be interfered with.[19] Hence when a high level committee presided over by the Minister authorized under rules of Executive Business framed under Article 166 considers a project and recommends an allotment of land to a company which was to undertake the project and the State Government clears the project, the requirement of consultation is satisfied. In such circumstances the competent authorities were free to evolve their own procedure.[20] It was not imperative that consultation should be by exchange of letter.[21]

"Merely because a bid is the lowest the requirements of compliance of rules and conditions cannot be ignored". Also, the concerned authority is not obliged to award contract to a tenderer at the quoted price bid. The authority can always negotiate with the next lowest tenderer (in case the lowest is out for any reason) for awarding the contract on economically viable price bid.[22]

Section 3(1) of the Capital of Punjab (Development and Regulation) Act, 1952, grants power to the Central Government to "sell, lease or otherwise transfer" any land or building belonging to the government "on such terms and conditions" as it may think fit. The Court has ruled in the following case that the action of the Government under S. 3(1) "is required to be fair and reasonable and not actuated by considerations which could be termed as arbitrary or discriminatory. The Government cannot act like a private individual in imposing the conditions solely with the object of extracting profits from its leassees. Governmental actions are required to be based on standards which are not arbitrary or unauthorised".[23]

Similarly, before the government places the name of a person on the blacklist, he should be given an opportunity of hearing. Blacklisting creates a disability as it pre-

---

18. Secretary, Ministry of Chemicals & Fertilizers, Govt. of India v. CIPLA Ltd., (2003) 7 SCC 1 : AIR 2003 SC 3073.
19. Chairman & MD, BPL Ltd. v. S.P. Gurarajа, (2003) 8 SCC 567 : AIR 2003 SC 4536.
20. Chairman & MD, BPL Ltd. v. S.P. Gurarajа, (2003) 8 SCC 567 : AIR 2003 SC 4536.
21. Ibid.
22. West Bengal Electricity Board v. Patel Engg. Co. Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 682 : (2001) 2 SCC 451.
23. Style (Dress Land) v. Union Territory, Chandigarh, (1999) 7 SCC 90 : AIR 1999 SC 3678.

vents the person concerned from the privilege of entering into lawful relationship with government for purposes of gain:[24]

Award of contract by the Government of India to a private party for development of medium size oil fields was challenged through a public interest litigation on the ground of non-application of mind. But the Court rejected the contention because on facts the contention was not substantiated. The Court also ruled that whether the oilfield was to be developed by the Oil and Natural Gas Commission on a stand alone basis was a matter of policy and the Court would not interfere with the same. If the Court is satisfied that there have been "unreasonableness, mala fide, collateral considerations" in awarding a contract then the Court can quash the award of contract. As to the agreed price for purchase of oil extracted from the oil field in question, the Court said that this was a highly "technical and complex" problem and the Court was not qualified to probe into this matter.[25]

A contract entered into between the Lucknow Municipal Corporation and a builder to build an underground commercial complex in a municipal park was quashed by the Supreme Court in the following case.[26] The Court characterised the contract in question as being against the law and the masterplan. The contract was entered into by the corporation without calling tenders. The contract was held to be wholly unreasonable and one-sided favouring the builder. The general rule is that to dispose of public property, tenders ought to be called or a public auction held.[27] The Court described the contract in the following words:[28]

> "A bare glance at the terms of the agreement shows that not only the clauses of the agreement are unreasonable for the Mahapalika but they are atrocious. No person of ordinary prudence shall even enter into such an agreement. Valuable land in the heart of commercial area has been handed on a platter to the builder for it to exploit and to make runaway profits."

The Court ordered the building constructed to be demolished.

The great importance of disciplining discretion of the Administration in the matter of awarding contracts cannot be lost sight of in the contemporary period. To-day the state is the source of enormous wealth. Many individuals and businesses seek largess of the government in the form of contracts, licences, leases, quotas, jobs, mineral rights, property leases, etc. There is, therefore, need to develop some norms to regulate, structure and discipline government discretion to confer such benefits. The government or any of its agencies should not be allowed to act arbitrarily and confer benefits on whomsoever they want.[29]

The court can, on a finding of arbitrary methodology, itself suggest curative solutions. In Ravi Development,[30] the Supreme Court criticized the judgment of the High Court which held that the adoption of a particular method was arbitrary

---

24. Eurasian Equipment & Co. Ltd. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1975 SC 266 : (1975) 1 SCC 70; J. Vilanganson v. Executive Engineer, AIR 1978 SC 930; Raghunath Thakur v. State of Bihar, AIR 1989 SC 620; Southern Painters v. Fertilizers & Chemicals Travancore Ltd., AIR 1994 SC 1277 : 1994 Supp (2) SCC 699.

25. Centre for Public Interest Litigation v. Union of India, (2000) 8 SCC 606 : AIR 2001 SC 80.

26. M.I. Builders v. Radhey Shyam Sahu, AIR 1999 SC 2468 : (1999) 6 SCC 464.

27. See, Tata Cellular v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 11 : (1994) 6 SCC 651; Ram & Shyam v. State of Haryana, AIR 1985 SC 1147.

28. M.I. Builders, AIR 1999 SC 2468 at 2500 : (1999) 6 SCC 464.

29. This question has been discussed further in Ch. XXXIX, entitled "Government Contracts".

30. Ravi Development v. Shree Krishna Prathisthan, (2009) 7 SCC 462 : (2009) 5 JT 563.

and unreasonable but the Court put across certain suggestions for the consideration of the State Government in relation to fresh notice being given regarding the method and its applicability so that all persons interested can participate on equal terms promoting healthy competition.

(v) SALE OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

The basic principle is that a public authority does not have an open-end discretion to dispose of its property at whatever price it likes. The principle is that the sale should take place openly and the effort should be to get the best price.[31]

The several methods which can be employed for this purpose are : (i) public auction; (ii) inviting tenders for the property. As the Supreme Court has observed in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Shiv Charan Sharma:[32] "Public auction with open participation and a reserved price guarantees public interest being fully subserved."

The Supreme Court has laid down that mineral rights ought not be granted through private negotiations but by holding a public auction where those interested in the matter may bid against each other. The Court has observed: "Public auction with open participation and a reserved price guarantees public interest being fully subserved."[33]

In Haji T.M. Hassan v. Kerala Financial Corpn.,[34] the Supreme Court has emphasized that public property owned by the state or its instrumentality should be sold generally by public auction or by inviting tenders. Observance of this rule not only fetches the highest price for the property but also ensures fairness in the activities of the state and public authorities. There should be no suggestion of discrimination, bias, favouritism or nepotism. But there may be situations when departure from this rule may become necessary. However, such situations must be justified by compulsions and not by compromise. It must be justified by compelling reasons and not by just convenience.

Balco[35] is the latest pronouncement of the Supreme Court on the disposal of government property. 51% equity in Balco, a government undertaking, was sold to a private company by inviting tenders through global advertisement. The sale was challenged on various grounds but the Supreme Court rejected all the contentions and upheld the sale. The following three main propositions emerge from the Court decision:

(1) Divestment by the government in a public enterprise is a matter of economic policy which is for the government to decide. The Court does not interfere with economic policies unless there is a breach of law.

(2) Sale of an undertaking to the highest bidder after global advertisement inviting tenders at a price which was way above the reserve price fixed by the gov-

---

31. Fertilizer Corp. Kamgar Union v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 344 : (1981) 1 SCC 568.
32. AIR 1981 SC 1722 : 1981 Supp SC 85.
33. Ram & Sham Co. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1985 SC 1147 : (1985) 3 SCC 267.
34. AIR 1988 SC 157 : (1988) 1 SCC 166.
Also see, C. Rami Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1986 SC 1158; Shri Sachidanand Pandey v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1987 SC 1109 : (1987) 2 SCC 295; Bhupal Anna Vibhute v. Collector of Kolhapur, AIR 1996 Bom 314.
35. Balco Employees Union (Regd.) v. Union of India, JT 2001 SC 466 : (2002) 2 SCC 333.

ernment could not be said to be vitiated in any way. The procedure followed was proper.

(3) The matter of fixation of the reserve price, the matter being a question of fact, the Court does not interfere unless the methodology adopted for the purpose is arbitrary.

CHAPTER XXII

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS (3)
RIGHT TO EQUALITY (ii)

SYNOPSIS

A. NO DISCRIMINATION ON GROUNDS OF RELIGION ETC.

Article 15(1) specifically bars the state from discriminating against any citizen of India on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth, or any of them.

Article 15(2) prohibits subjection of a citizen to any disability, liability, restriction or condition on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex or place of birth with regard to—

(a) access to shops, public restaurants, hotels and places of entertainment, or,

(b) the use of wells, tanks, bathing ghats, roads and places of public resort maintained wholly or partly out of state funds or dedicated to the use of general public.

Under Art. 15(3), the state is not prevented from making any special provision for women and children.

Article 15(4) or Art. 29(2) does not prevent the state from making any special provisions for the advancement of any socially and educationally backward classes of citizens or for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes.[1]

Provisions contained in Arts.15 and 16 are merely enabling provisions. No citizen of India can claim reservation as a matter of right and accordingly no writ of mandamus can be issued.[2]

(a) ART. 15(1)

Article 15(1) prohibits differentiation on certain grounds mentioned above. Commenting on Art. 15(1), the Supreme Court has observed:[3]

> "Art. 15(1) prohibits discrimination on grounds of religion or caste identities so as to foster national identity which does not deny pluralism of Indian culture but rather to preserve it".

Article 15(1) is an extension of Art. 14. Art 15(1) expresses a particular application of the general principle of equality embodied in Art. 14.

Just as the principle of classification applies to Art. 14 so it does to Art. 15(1) as well. The combined effect of Arts. 14 and 15 is not that the state cannot pass unequal laws, but if it does pass unequal laws, the inequality must be based on some reasonable ground (Art. 14), and that, due to Art. 15(1), religion, race, caste, sex, or place of birth alone is not, and cannot be, a reasonable ground for discrimination.

Under Art. 15(4), the State can make special provisions for certain sections of the society as stated above. But for any section of population not falling under Art. 15(4), special provisions can be made if there is reasonable classification.

The word 'discrimination' in Art. 15(1) involves an element of unfavourable bias. The use of the word 'only' in the Arts. 15(1) and 15(2) connotes that what is discountenanced is discrimination purely and solely on account of any of the grounds mentioned. A discrimination based on any of these grounds and also on other grounds is not hit by Arts. 15(1) and 15(2) though it may be hit by Art. 14.[4] If religion, sex, caste, race or place of birth is merely one of the factors which the Legislature has taken into consideration, then, it would not be discrimination only on the ground of that fact. But, if the Legislature has discriminated only on one of these grounds, and no other factor could possibly have been present, then, undoubtedly, the law would offend against Art. 15(1).

Further, to adjudge the validity of an Act under these Articles, a distinction is to be drawn between the object underlying the impugned Act and the mode and manner adopted therein to achieve that object. The object underlying the Act may be good or laudable but its validity has to be judged by the method of its operation and its effect on the fundamental right involved. The crucial question to ask therefore is whether the operation of the impugned Act results in a prohibition only on any of the grounds mentioned in Arts. 15(1) and 15(2). It is the effect of the impugned Act that is to be considered and if its effect is to discriminate on any of the prohibited grounds, it is bad.

---

1. For comments on Art. 29, see, infra, Ch. XXX, Sec. A.
2. A.P. Public Service Commission v. Baloji Badhavath, (2009) 5 SCC 1 : (2009) 5 JT 563.
3. Valsamma Paul v. Cochin University, AIR 1996 SC 1011 at 1019 : (1996) 3 SCC 545.
4. Narasappa v. Shaik Hazrat, AIR 1960 Mys. 59.

Article 15 is a facet of Art. 14. Like Art. 14, Art. 15(1) also covers the entire range of state activities. But, in a way, the scope of Art. 15 is narrower than that of Art. 14 in several respects.

One, while Art. 14 is general in nature in the sense that it applies both to citizens as well as non-citizens, Art. 15(1) covers only the Indian citizens, and does not apply to non-citizens. No non-citizen can claim any right under Art. 15, though he can do so under Art. 14.

Two, while Art. 14 permits any reasonable classification on the basis of any rational criterion, under Art. 15(1), certain grounds mentioned therein can never form the basis of classification.

The residents of Madhya Bharat were exempted from payment of a capitation fee for admission to the State medical college, while the non-residents were required to pay the same. The Supreme Court negatived the plea of discrimination by the non-residents under Art. 15(1) because the ground of exemption was 'residence' and not 'place of birth'. Residence and place of birth are two distinct concepts with different connotations. Art. 15(1) prohibits discrimination on the basis of place of birth but not residence.[5] And, in the instant case, classification on the basis of 'residence' was held to be reasonable. Education is a State subject. A State spends money on the upkeep of educational institutions. There is, therefore, nothing wrong in the State if it so orders the educational system that some advantage ensures for the benefit of the State. Some of the resident students after securing their degree may settle in the State as doctors and serve the community. Thus, the justification for the classification on the basis of residence rested on the assumption that the residents of the State would after becoming doctors settle down and serve the needs of the people of the State.

In N. Vasundara v. State of Mysore[6], the Supreme Court has sustained the constitutional validity of reservation based on the requirement of 'residence' within the State for the purpose of admission to medical colleges.

Under the City of Bombay Police Act, while a person born outside Greater Bombay could be externed if he was convicted of any of the offences mentioned therein, no such action could be taken against a person born within Greater Bombay. This was discrimination on the basis of 'place of birth' and so was invalid under Art. 15(1).[7]

Under the U.P. Court of Wards Act, 1912, while a male proprietor could be declared incapable of managing his property only on one of the five grounds mentioned therein, and that too after giving him an opportunity of showing cause as to why such a declaration should not be made, a female proprietor could be declared incapable to manage her property on any ground and without giving her any show cause notice. The provision is bad as it amounts to discrimination on the ground of sex.[8]

---

5. D.P. Joshi v. Madhya Bharat, AIR 1955 SC 334 : (1955) 1 SCR 1215.
Also see, infra.

6. AIR 1971 SC 1439 : (1971) 2 SCC 22.
Also see, infra, under "Reservation in Admissions", Sec. D.

7. In re Shaikh Husein Shaik Mahomed, AIR 1951 Bom 285.

8. Rajeshwari v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 All 608.

A law providing for elections to municipalities on the basis of separate electorates for members of different religious communities,[9] or delimitation of panchayat circles for purposes of election to a panchayat on the basis of castes, would offend Art. 15(1).[10]

If the office of the President of a municipality is not reserved or is meant for general category, all the candidates irrespective of their caste, class or community and irrespective of the fact whether they have been elected from a reserved ward or a general ward are entitled to seek election and contest for the office of the President of the municipality. The unreserved seats euphemistically described as general category seats are open seats available for all candidates who are otherwise qualified to contest to that office. Wherever the office of the President of a municipality is required to be filled in by a member belonging to Scheduled Caste, Scheduled Tribe or Backward Class as the case may be, it would be enough if one belongs to one of those categories irrespective of the fact whether they have been elected from a general ward or a reserved ward.[11]

Acting on reports that the inhabitants of certain villages were harbouring dacoits, the Government of Rajasthan sanctioned posting of additional police in those villages. The expenses were to be borne by the villagers but the Harijan and Muslim inhabitants of these villages were exempt from this liability. This was quashed as being discriminatory on the ground of 'caste' or 'religion' as it discriminated against the peace-loving villagers other than Harijans and Muslims.[12] Allotment of building sites by a municipality only to the members of a particular religion would violate Arts. 15 and 14.[13]

Reservation does not limit number of candidates from reserved category to be elected. They are eligible to contest from the unreserved seats and get elected resulting in increase of their representation in the local bodies.[14]

(b) ART. 15(2)

Article 15(2), mentioned above, contains a prohibition of a general nature and is not confined to the state only. On the basis of this provision, it has been held that if a section of the public puts forward a claim for an exclusive use of a public well, it must establish that the well was dedicated to the exclusive use of that particular section of the public and not to the use of the general public.[15] A custom to that effect cannot be held to be reasonable, or in accordance with enlightened modern notions of utility of public wells because of the force of Art. 15.

In Art. 15(2) occurs the expression 'a place of public resort'. There is difference of opinion on the exact significance of this phrase. One view holds that a place is a 'place of public resort' only if the public have access to it as a matter of legal right.[16] A broader view, however, regards a place of public resort as one to which members of the public are allowed access and where they habitually resort

---

9. Nainsukh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1953 SC 384.
10. Bhopal Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1958 Raj 41.
11. Bihari Lal Rada v. Anil Jain (Tinu), (2009) 4 SCC 1 : (2009) 2 JT 455.
12. State of Rajasthan v. Pratap Singh, AIR 1960 SC 1208 : (1961) 1 SCR 222.
13. Chikkadasappa v. Town Municipal Corporation, AIR 1983 Kant 201.
14. Bihari Lal Rada v. Anil Jain (Tinu), (2009) 4 SCC 1 : (2009) 2 JT 455.
15. Arumugha v. Narayana, AIR 1958 Mad 282.
16. A.M. Deane v. Commr. of Police, 64 CWN 348.

to.[17] The latter view appears to be more in accord with the tenor and purpose of the constitutional provision as it would bar discrimination on a wider front.

(c) PERSONAL LAWS

In family matters, India has a system of personal laws, i.e. Hindu law for the Hindus, Muslim law for the Muslims and so on.[18] Some of these laws have been amended by statutes; some like Muslim law has been left unamended. Challenges to these laws on the basis of religious differentiation, or on the basis of differentiation between males and females have not been accepted.[19]

Legislation making provisions for Hindus specifically on matters falling within the ambit of Hindu Law has been upheld even though similar provisions have not been made for other groups. A law introducing monogamy among the Hindus, but leaving the Muslims free to take any number of wives, was upheld against the charge of discrimination on the ground of 'religion' only. The court pointed out that the Hindus have been enjoying for long their own indigenous system based on Hindu scriptures in the same way as the Mohammedans were subject to their own personal law.[20]

The Supreme Court has taken the stand that personal laws are immune from being challenged under Fundamental Rights which do not touch upon these laws. Personal laws fall outside the scope of the Fundamental Rights.[21] This seems to be a policy, rather than a legalistic, approach as the courts do not want to adjudicate upon aspects of these systems of laws which would not be able to stand the test of Fundamental Rights. The court desires that Parliament ought to deal with these matters in a rational manner.

Section 15(2)(b) of the Hindu Succession Act has been held to be not invalid on the ground of discrimination on the basis of sex. According to the Bombay High Court, the true principle is that the community governed by the given personal law itself forms a recognised class, and that itself a reasonable class of persons, for testing the given legislation and the same has to be examined in the background of the principles by which such class is governed by the tenets of its personal law. If those principles are otherwise reasonable in the context of the

---

17. Liberty Cinema v. Corp. of Calcutta, AIR 1959 Cal 45.

18. JAIN, OUTLINES OF INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, Ch. XXV.
Also see, supra, Ch. XXI, for challenges to these laws under Art. 14.

19. Gurdial Kaur v. Mangal Singh, AIR 1968 P & H 396 (Pre-constitution customs cannot be challenged as contravening Fundamental Rights); Sangannagouda v. Kalkangouda, AIR 1960 Mys. 147 (non-statutory law of adoption held valid); Santhamma v. Neelamma, AIR 1956 Mad. 642 (non-statutory law of partition held valid); Bibi Maniram v. Mohd. Ishaq, AIR 1963 Pat. 229 (Mohammedan Law of gift held invalid); Abdul Khan v. Chand Bibi, AIR 1956 Bhopal 71 (Muslim law of marriage held not invalid on the ground of sex discrimination).
But, on customs, see, Ch. XX, Sec. E, supra.

20. Srinivasa Aiyar v. Saraswati, AIR 1952 Mad. 193; State of Bombay v. N. Appa, AIR 1952 Bom. 84; H.B. Singh v. T.N.H.O.B. Devi, AIR 1959 Mani. 20. A statutory provision regarding divorce applicable to a sect of Hindus held not invalid under Art. 14 in Sudha v. Sankarappa Rai, AIR 1963 Mys. 245.

21. Krishna Singh v. Mathura Ahir, AIR 1980 SC 707 : (1981) 3 SCC 689; Sarla Mudgal v. Union of India, (1995) 3 SCC 635 : AIR 1995 SC 1531; Madhu Kishwar v. State of Bihar, (1996) 5 SCC 125; Ahmedabad Women Action Group v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 3614 : (1997) 3 SCC 573.
Also see, Ch. XX, Sec. E.

history of the given system of personal law, then the challenge is hardly maintainable. The court has made this statement in the context of new legislation enacted to modify personal laws.[22]

The Andhra Pradesh High Court declared S. 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act which provides for the restitution of conjugal rights as invalid on the ground that, in practice, it works against the females and not against the males.[23] The court argued that sexual cohabitation is an inseparable ingredient of a decree of restitution of conjugal rights. To have sex with an unwilling party against her will offends the inviolability of the body and mind. S. 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act infringes Art. 14 for two reasons: (1) S. 9 does not satisfy the traditional classification test. Although, on its face, S. 9 makes the remedy of restitution of conjugal rights available to both, husband and wife, in practice, it is almost exclusively invoked by the husband against his wife, and so the remedy becomes partial and one-sided. (2) S. 9 fails to pass the test of minimum rationality required by any statute law. It subserves no social good and promotes no legitimate public purpose.

On the other hand, the Delhi High Court has upheld the constitutional validity of S. 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act.[24] The court has said that restitution aims at cohabitation and consortium and not merely at sexual intercourse. Agreeing with the Delhi High Court, in Saroj Rani v. Sudarshan Kumar[25], the Supreme Court has held the provision to be valid vis-a-vis Arts. 14 and 21.[26] The court has emphasized that one must see the decree of restitution of conjugal rights in its proper perspective. In India, conjugal rights, i.e., the right of the husband or wife to the society of the other is not merely a creature of the statute; it is inherent in the very institution of marriage itself. There are sufficient safeguards in S. 9 to prevent it from becoming tyrannical. S. 9 is only a codification of the pre-existing law. Only when the decree is disobeyed wilfully, the court may order attachment of property. "It serves a social purpose as an aid to the prevention of break-up of marriage."

Section 16 of the Hindu Marriage Act confers legitimacy on children born out of a void marriage. The section has been held valid vis-a-vis Art. 14 as it treats all illegitimate children similarly circumstanced as forming one class for conferment of legitimacy.[27]

Under S. 6(a) of the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act, 1956, the father of a Hindu minor is the only guardian and the mother of the minor is relegated to an inferior position. She could become the guardian only 'after' the father. The provision was challenged under Arts. 14 and 15 on the ground of gender discrimination. The argument was that the mother was relegated to an inferior position on the ground of 'gender' alone as her right, as a natural guardian of the minor, is made cognisable only 'after' the father.

The Supreme Court agreed with the premise that 'gender equality' is one of the basic principles of the Constitution. If the word 'after' in S. 6(a) were to be

---

22. Sonubai v. Bala, AIR 1983 Bom. 156.
Also, Kaur Singh v. Jaggar Singh, AIR 1961 Punj. 489.
23. T. Sareetha v. T. Venkata Subbaiah, AIR 1983 AP 356.
24. Harvinder Kaur v. Harmander Singh, AIR 1984 Del 66.
25. AIR 1984 SC 1562 : (1984) 4 SCC 90.
26. For discussion on Art. 21, see, infra, Ch. XXVI.
27. P.E.K. Kalliani Amma v. K. Devi, AIR 1996 SC 1963 : (1996) 4 SCC 76.

interpreted to mean that the mother was disqualified to act as the guardian of the minor during the father's lifetime, and that she could act as such only after his death, then the same would definitely run counter to the basic requirement of the Constitutional mandate as it would lead to differentiation between male and female. But the provision in question could be so interpreted as to make it compatible with Art. 14. Accordingly, the Court interpreted S. 6 so as to mean that the mother could act as the natural guardian of the minor during the father's lifetime if the father was not in actual charge of the affairs of the minor. Similar interpretation was given to S. 19(b) of the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890.[28]

Under S. 10, Divorce Act, 1869, a Christian husband can get divorce from his wife on the ground of her adultery simpliciter. On the other hand, a Christian wife to get divorce from her husband has to prove not only his adultery but also something more, such as, adultery, incest, bigamy, rape, cruelty or desertion. The Bombay High Court has ruled in Pragati Varghese v. Cyril George Varghese,[29] that S. 10 is discriminatory on the ground of sex and is, thus, violative of Art. 15(1). Further, a Christian woman cannot seek divorce on the grounds of cruelty and desertion while women under other systems can do so. This is discrimination based merely on the ground of religion and this is also violative of Arts. 14 and 15.

The validity of the Muslim Women (Protection of Rights and Divorce) Act, 1986, was challenged on the ground that the Act, when compared with s. 125, Cr. P.C., is discriminatory against Muslim divorcee women. But the Supreme Court negatived the contention. The Court has ruled that the purpose of both laws is the same viz., to meet a situation where a divorced woman is likely to be led into destitution and vagrancy. The Muslim Act codifies and regulates the obligations due to a Muslim woman divorcee but puts her outside s. 125, Cr. P.C., The Court interpreting s. 3(1)(a) of the Act benevolently has stated that the provision means that in addition to mehr and maintenance to her during the iddat period, the husband is also obligated to make "a reasonable and fair provision" as provided for under s. 3(3) consistent with the needs of the divorced woman, the means of the husband, and the standard of living the woman enjoyed during her married life. Thus, interpreted, the scheme contained in the impugned Act is equally, if not more, beneficial to the Muslim women than s. 125, Cr.P.C.[30]

A law applicable to Hindu religious endowments only, and not to charitable and religious endowments belonging to other religions, has been upheld. Classification of religious endowments as Hindu, Muslim or Christian is neither arbitrary nor unreasonable keeping in view the purpose of the Act, viz., the better management of institutions. The distinction has existed for over a century and was not being made for the first time. The incidents and nature of the endowments belonging to different religious groups differ in several respects, and the classification cannot be said to be based solely on religion as the institutions included in the Act were both religious and secular, and keeping in view the object of the Act, the institutions having several common features can be classified under one group.[31]

---

28. Githa Hariharan v. Reserve Bank of India, AIR 1999 SC 1149 : (1999) 2 SCC 228.
29. AIR 1997 Bom 349.
30. Danial Latifi v Union of India, AIR 2001 SC 3958 : (2001) 7 SCC 740.
31. Lakshmindra Swamiar v. Commissioner, H.R.E., AIR 1952 Mad. 613; Moti Das v. S.P. Sahi, AIR 1959 SC 942 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 563; Pannalal Bansilal Patil v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1996 SC 1023 : (1996) 2 SCC 498.

B. ART. 15(3) : WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Articles 15(3) and 15(4) constitute exceptions to Arts. 15(1) and 15(2).

According to Art. 15(3), the state is not prevented from making any "special provision" for women and children.

Articles 15(1) and 15(2) prevent the state from making any discriminatory law on the ground of gender alone. The Constitution is thus characterised by gender equality. The Constitution insists on equality of status and it negates gender bias. Nevertheless, by virtue of Art. 15(3), the state is permitted, despite Art. 15(1), to make any special provision for women, thus carving out a permissible departure from the rigours of Art. 15(1). Articles 15 and 16 do not prohibit special treatment of women. The constitutional mandate is infringed only where the females would have received same treatment with males but for their sex. In English law 'but-for-sex" test has been developed to mean that no less favourable treatment is to be given to women on gender based criterion which would favour the opposite sex and women will not be deliberately selected for less favourable treatment because of their sex. The Constitution does not prohibit the employer to consider sex in making the employment decisions where this is done pursuant to a properly or legally charted affirmative action plan.[32]

Article 15(3) recognises the fact that the women in India have been socially and economically handicapped for centuries and, as a result thereof, they cannot fully participate in the socio-economic activities of the nation on a footing of equality. The purpose of Art. 15(3) is to eliminate this socio-economic backwardness of women and to empower them in such a manner as to bring about effective equality between men and women. The object of Art. 15(3) is to strengthen and improve the status of women. Art. 15(3) thus relieves the state from the bondage of Art. 15(1) and enables it to make special provisions to accord socio-economic equality to women.[33]

The scope of Art. 15(3) is wide enough to cover the entire range of state activity including that of employment. Art. 15(3) is a special provision in the nature of a proviso qualifying the general guarantees contained in Arts. 14, 15(1), 15(2), 16(1) and 16(2).[34]

A doubt has been raised whether Art. 15(3) saves any provision concerning women, or saves only such a provision as is in their favour.[35] The better view would appear to be that while the state can make laws containing special provisions for women and children, it should not discriminate against them on the basis of their gender only. This appears to be the cumulative effect of Arts. 15(1) and 15(3). Although there can be no discrimination in general on the basis of sex, the Constitution itself provides for special provisions being made for women and children by virtue of Art. 15(3). Reading Arts. 15(3) and 15(1) together, it seems to be clear that while the state may discriminate in favour of women against men,

---

32. Air India Cabin Crew Assn. v. Yeshaswinee Merchant, (2003) 6 SCC 277 : AIR 2004 SC 187.

33. On this theme, also see, "Directive Principles", infra, Ch. XXXIV; "Safeguards to Minorities," infra, XXXV.

34. For discussion on Art. 16, see, next Chapter.

35. MUKHARJI, J., in Mahadeb v. Dr. Sen, AIR 1951 Cal 563.
Also, Anjali v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1952 Cal 825; Cf. BOSE, J., ibid., 825.

it may not discriminate in favour of men against women. However, only such provisions can be made in favour of women under Art. 15(3) as are reasonable and which do not altogether obliterate or render illusory the constitutional guarantee mentioned in Art. 15(2).

The operation of Art. 15(3) can be illustrated by the following few cases:

(a) Under S. 497, I.P.C., the offence of adultery can be committed only by a male and not by a female who cannot even be punished as an abettor. As this provision makes a special provision for women, it is saved by Art. 15(3). The Supreme Court has observed:[36]

> "Sex is a sound classification and although there can be no discrimination in general on that ground the Constitution itself provides for special provisions in the case of women and children by clause (3) of Art. 15. Arts. 14 and 15 thus read together validate the last sentence of Section 497, I.P.C., which prohibits the women from being punished as an abettor of the offence of adultery."

Upholding S. 497, the Bombay High Court had said in an earlier case that the discrimination made by S. 497 is based not on the fact that women have a sex different from that of men, but "women in this country were so situated that special legislation was required in order to protect them."[37]

(b) The discretionary nature of the power of judicial review is illustrated when the supreme Court even after finding that the reservation policy of the State Government in force was contrary to Arts. 14,15 and 16 took into consideration the fact that a large number of young girls below the age of 10 years were taught in primary schools and that it would be preferable that such young girls are taught by women and held that reservation of 50% in favour of female candidates was justified.[38]

In the matter of distribution of state largesse where dealership of retail outlets of petrol pumps were reserved for women, financial capacity and ability to provide infrastructure and facilities are not relevant and material criteria when the instrumentality of the State is providing finance and the concerned outlet site is owned and retail outlet is to be operated by such instrumentality.[39]

(c) Where a female employee's grievance was the writing of a sensuous letter expressing love to her, admiring her qualities and beauty, and extending unsolicited help, it was held that the female employee's grievance ought to have been looked into according to the directions given in Vishaka Case.[40]

---

36. Yusuf Abdul Aziz v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1954 SC 321 : 1954 SCR 930.
Also see, Sowmithri Vishnu v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 1618 : 1985 Supp SCC 137; Revathi v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 835 : (1988) 2 SCC 72.

37. CHAGLA, C.J., in Yusuf Abdul Aziz v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1951 Bom 470.

38. Rajesh Kumar Gupta v. State of UP, (2005) 5 SCC 172 : AIR 2005 SC 2540.

39. A. Ritu Mahajan v. Indian Oil Corpn., (2009) 3 SCC 506 : (2009) 2 JT 327.

40. (1997) 6 SCC 241 : AIR 1997 SC 3011; D.S. Grewal v. Vimmi Joshi, (2009) 2 SCC 210 : (2009) 1 JT 400.

(d) S. 497, Cr.P.C., 1898, prohibited release of a person accused of a capital offence on bail except a woman or a child under 16 or a sick man. The provision has been held valid as it metes out a special treatment to women which is consistent with Art. 15(3). The Rajasthan High Court observed:[41]

> "The State may make laws containing special provisions for women and children, but no discrimination can be made against them on account of their sex alone."

(e) In Walter Alfred Baid, Sister Tutor (Nursing) Irwin Hospital v. Union of India,[42] a rule making male candidates ineligible for the post of Senior Tutor in the School of Nursing was held to be violative of Art. 16(2) and was not saved by Art. 15(3).

The Delhi High Court took the view that the matter relating to employment falls under Art. 16 and not under Art. 15(3). "The equality of opportunity in the matter of employment between the sexes and the corresponding prohibition against discrimination is absolute in nature and no exception has been carved out of it in Art. 16 unlike in Art. 15." The Court refused to read Art. 15(3) into Art. 16 so as to restrict the scope of the prohibition contained in Art. 16(2).[43]

(f) On the other hand, the Punjab & Haryana High Court took a different view in Shamsher Singh v. State of Punjab.[44] A rule granting a special allowance to the women principals working in a wing of the Punjab Educational Services was challenged on the ground that their male counterparts were not given the same benefit although both performed identical duties and were part of the same service. The constitutional validity of the rule was challenged under Art. 16(2).

The High Court upheld the impugned rule under Art. 15(3), holding that even though the discrimination was based on the ground of sex, it was saved by Art. 15(3). The court ruled that Art. 15(3) could be invoked for construing and determining the scope of Art. 16(2). According to the court, Art. 15(3) extends to the entire field of state activity, including the field of public employment which has been specifically dealt with in Art. 16. The Court stated that if a particular provision squarely falls within the ambit of Art. 15(3), it cannot be struck down merely because it may also amount to discrimination solely on the basis of sex. "Articles 14, 15 and 16, being the constituents of a single code of constitutional guarantees, supplementing each other, clause (3) of Article 15 can be invoked for construing and determining the scope of Art. 16(2)."

---

41. Mt. Choki v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1957 Raj 10.
This provision now is S. 437, Cr.PC, 1973.
Also see, Nirmal Kumar v. State of Rajasthan, Cr LJ 1582; Shehat Ali v. State of Rajasthan, 1992 Cr LJ 1335.

42. AIR 1976 Del 302.

43. For Art. 16, see, next Chapter.

44. AIR 1970 P & H 372.

The Court however ruled that "only such special provisions in favour of women can be made under Article 15(3), which are reasonable and do not altogether obliterate or render illusory the constitutional guarantee enshrined in Article 16(2)."

(g) A rule was made by the Punjab Government rendering women ineligible for posting in the men's jails except for the posts of clerks and matrons. Thus, a woman could not be appointed as the Superintendent of Jails. This rule was challenged as being discriminatory on the ground of sex only.

The High Court rejected the challenge in Raghubans Saudagar Singh v. State of Punjab.[45] The High Court held, "if the sex added a variety of other factors and considerations form a reasonable nexus for the object of classification then the bar of Arts. 15 and 16(2) cannot possibly be attracted." The court said that, testing the proposition in reverse, the state may for identical considerations exclude men from the post of warden and other jail officials who may have to come in direct and close contact with the women inmates of such a jail.

(h) There existed a common cadre of Probation Officers for males and females. However, for the post of the Head of the Institute for destitute women, only females were regarded as eligible. This was challenged as being discriminatory.

In B.R. Acharya v. State of Gujarat,[46] the High Court said that only because there was a common cadre, in which the officers of both sexes were appointed, it did not mean that all posts in the higher cadre must also be filled in by persons belonging to both the sexes. Keeping in view the nature of duties to be performed, the State Government may decide that only a woman will head a women's institution. Art. 15(3) enables the State to make any special provision for women and children and so the impugned rule could not be held to be unconstitutional.

(i) The Bombay Government enacted a statutory provision reserving a few seats for women in the municipalities. The provision was challenged as discriminatory. Rejecting the challenge in Dattatraya v. Motiram More,[47] the High Court pointed out that whereas under Art. 15(1) discrimination in favour of men only on the ground of sex is not permissible, by reason of Art. 15(3), the State may discriminate in favour of women without offending Art. 15(1). The court went to state:

> "Even if in making special provision for women for giving them reserved seats the State has discriminated against men, by reason of Art. 15(3) the Constitution has permitted the State to do so even though the provision may result in discrimination only on the ground of sex."

---

45. AIR 1972 P & H 117.
46. 1988 Lab IC 1465.
47. AIR 1953 Bom 311.

(j) The most significant pronouncement on Art. 15(3) is the recent Supreme Court case Government of Andhra Pradesh v. P.B. Vijay Kumar.[48]

The Supreme Court has ruled in the instant case that under Art. 15(3), the State may fix a quota for appointment of women in government services. Also, a rule saying that all other things being equal, preference would be given to women to the extent of 30% of the posts was held valid with reference to Art. 15(3).

It was argued that reservation of posts or appointments for any backward class is permissible under Art. 16(2) but not for women and so no reservation can be made in favour of women as it would amount to discrimination on the ground of sex in public employment which would be violative of Art. 16(2). Rejecting this argument, the Supreme Court has ruled that posts can be reserved for women under Art. 15(3) as it is much wider in scope and covers all state activities. While Art. 15(1) prohibits the State from making any discrimination inter alia on the ground of sex alone, by virtue of Art. 15(3), the State may make special provisions for women. Thus, Art. 15(3) clearly carves out a permissible departure from the rigours of Art. 15(1).

The Court has emphasized that an important limb of the concept of gender equality is creating job opportunities for women. Making special provisions for women in respect of employment or posts under the state is an integral part of Art. 15(3). "To say that under Art. 15(3), job opportunities for women cannot be created would be to cut at the very root of the underlying inspiration behind this Article. Making special provisions for women in respect of employment or posts under the state is an integral part of Article 15(3)."[49] This power conferred by Art. 15(3) is not whittled down in any manner by Art. 16.[50]

What does the expression "special provision" for women mean? The "special provision" which the state may make to improve women's participation in all activities under the supervision and control of the state can be in the form of either affirmative action or reservation. Thus, Art. 15(3) includes the power to make reservations for women. Talking about the provision giving preference to women, the Court has said that this provision does not make any reservation for women. It amounts to affirmative action. It operates at the initial stage of appointment and when men and women candidates are equally meritorious. Under Art. 15(3), both reservation and affirmative action are permissible in connection with employment or posts under the state. Art. 15 is designed to create an egalitarian society.

The Supreme Court has explained the relationship between Arts. 15 and 16 as follows. Art. 15 deals with every kind of state action in relation to Indian citizens. Every sphere of state activity is controlled by Art. 15(1) and, therefore, there is no reason to exclude from the ambit of Art. 15(1) employment under the state. Art. 15(3) permits

48. AIR 1995 SC 1648 : (1995) 4 SCC 520.
49. Ibid., at 1651.
50. For discussion on Art. 16, see, next Chapter.

special provisions for women. Arts. 15(1) and 15(3) go together. In addition to Art. 15(1), Art. 16(1) places certain additional prohibitions in respect of a specific area of state activity, viz., employment under the state. These are in addition to the grounds of prohibition enumerated under Art. 15(1) which are also included under Art. 16(2). The Court has observed:

> "Therefore, in dealing with employment under the state, it has to bear in mind both Arts. 15 and 16 the former being a more general provision and the latter, a more specific provision. Since Art. 16 does not touch upon any special provision for women being made by the state, it cannot in any manner derogate from the power conferred upon the state in this connection under Art. 15(3). This power conferred by Art. 15(3) is wide enough to cover the entire range of state activity including employment under the state."

It may be noted that Art. 16(2) is more limited in scope than Art. 15(1) as it is confined to employment or office under the state. The prohibited grounds of discrimination under Art. 16(2) are somewhat wider than those under Art. 15(2) because Art. 16(2) prohibits discrimination on the additional grounds of descent and residence apart from religion, caste, sex and place of birth.

(k) The Punjab University made a rule barring a male lecturer from being appointed as Principal in a Girls' College. The constitutional validity of the rule was challenged and the High Court by a majority of 3:2 held the rule to be unconstitutional. While the minority view was that the said rule fell, and was justified, under Art. 15(3), the majority ruled that the rule in question did not fall under Art. 15(3) and that the rule was discriminatory on the basis of sex.

The majority applied a qualitative test to the rule. The majority opined that discrimination can be made in favour of women under Art. 15(3) if it is found that the women are not equal with the men and are lagging behind the men in the field where reservation is sought to be made. As and when any reservation is made in favour of women, the same is to be tested on the ground of reasonableness. The state has to prima facie justify the grounds for making the reservation. In the instant case, it was held by the majority that there was no principle or criterion involved in denying the post of the Principal of a Girls' College to a male when males could be appointed as teachers and heads of departments in such colleges. The functions of Principal are mostly administrative in nature and there is no bar in a female being appointed as the Principal of a Boys' College.[51]

If separate colleges or schools for girls are justifiable, rules providing appointment of a lady Principal or teacher would also be justified. The object sought to be achieved is a precautionary, preventive and protective measure based on public morals and particularly in view of the young age of the girl students to be taught. Hence, rules empowering the authority to appoint only a lady principal or a lady teacher or a lady doctor or a woman Superintendent are not violative of Articles 14, 15 or 16.[52]

51. M.C. Sharma v. Punjab University, Chandigarh, AIR 1997 P & H 87.

C. ARTICLE 15(4) : BACKWARD CLASSES

Article 15(1) would have come in the way of making favourable provisions for backward sections of society. This can be illustrated by referring to two cases.

The Madras Government issued an order [popularly known as the Communal G.O] allotting seats in the State medical colleges community-wise as follows: Non-Brahmin (Hindus) 6; Backward Hindus, 2; Brahmins, 2; Harijans, 2; Anglo-Indians and Indian Christians, 1; Muslims, 1. This G.O. was declared invalid because it classified students merely on the basis of 'caste' and 'religion' irrespective of their merit.[53] A seven Judge Bench of the Supreme Court struck down the classification as being based on caste, race and religion for the purpose of admission to educational institutions on the ground that Art. 15 did not contain a clause such as Art. 16(4).

In another case, a government order requisitioning land for construction of a colony for harijans was held to be discriminatory under Art. 15(1) because the facilities were being given to them as a 'community' as such when other members of the public were equally in need of similar facilities.[54]

To tide over the difficulties created by such decisions in the way of helping backward classes by making discriminatory provisions in their favour, Art. 15(4) was added to the Constitution in 1951. Art. 15(4) says that the state is not prevented from making any special provisions for "the advancement of any socially and educationally backward classes of citizens or for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes".

Thus, an order acquiring land for constructing a colony for harijans is now valid under Art. 15(4).[55] Art. 15(4) does not justify grant of special remission to the prisoners of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes and not to others. The grant of remission of convicted prisoners belonging to these classes can hardly be said to be a measure for the "advancement" of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.[56]

It may be noted that the Constitution makes a few more provisions for development and amelioration of the condition of these classes of people which are discussed later at the appropriate places.[57]

Article 15(4) confers a discretion and does not create any constitutional duty or obligation. Hence no mandamus can be issued either to provide for reservation or for relaxation.[58]

---

52. Vijay Lakshmi v. Punjab University, (2003) 8 SCC 440 : AIR 2003 SC 3331.
53. State of Madras v. Champkam Dorairajan, AIR 1951 SC 226 : 1951 SCR 525.
Also see, under Art. 29(2), infra, Ch. XXX, Sec. A.
54. Jagwant Kaur v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1952 Bom. 461.
55. Moosa v. State of Kerala, AIR 1960 Ker. 355.
56. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Mohan Singh, AIR 1996 SC 2106 : (1995) 6 SCC 321.
57. See, under Art. 29, infra, Ch. XXX, Sec. A; under "Directive Principles of State Policy", infra, Ch. XXXIV, "Safeguards to Minorities" etc., Ch. XXXV.
58. Union of India v. R. Rajeshwaran, (2003) 9 SCC 294 : (2001) 10 JT 135.

Under Art. 15(4), in innumerable cases,[59] the reservation of seats for Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and Backward Classes in engineering, medical and other technological colleges has been upheld. Reservations are possible under Art. 15(4) for the advancement of any backward class of citizens or for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. Rejecting the argument that Art. 15(4) envisages "positive action" while Art. 16(4)[60] is a provision warranting programmes of "positive discrimination", the Supreme Court has observed in Indra Sawhney v. Union of India:[61]

> "We are afraid we may not be able to fit these provisions into this kind of compartmentalisation in the context and scheme of our constitutional provisions. By now, it is well settled that reservation in educational institutions and other walks of life can be provided under Art. 15(4) just as reservations can be provided in services under Art. 16(4). If so, it would not be correct to confine Art. 15(4) to programmes of positive action alone. Art. 15(4) is wider than Art. 16(4) is as much as several kinds of positive action programmes can also be evolved and implemented thereunder (in addition to reservations) to improve the conditions of SEBCs (Socially and Educationally Backward Classes), Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, whereas Art. 16(4) speaks only of one type of remedial measure, namely, reservation of appointments/posts."

The scope of Art. 15(4) is wider than Art. 16(4). Art. 15(4) covers within it several kinds of positive action programmes in addition to reservations. However, reservation of posts and appointments must be within reasonable limits, viz., 50% at the maximum. The same limit applies to Art. 15(3). Reservation to a backward class is not a constitutional mandate, but a prerogative of the State.[62]

Reservation for a backward class is not a constitutional mandate. The provisions of Articles 330(1)(b) and (c) show that the Constitution has treated Scheduled Tribes in the autonomous districts of Assam as a separate category distinct from all other Scheduled Tribes. This clearly indicates that when the Constitution makers wanted to make a subclassification of Scheduled Tribes, they have themselves made it in the text of the Constitution itself and have not empowered any legislature or Government to make such a subclassification.[63]

In Chinnaiah[64] the Court also said that Art. 341 indicates that there can be only one list of Scheduled Castes in regard to a State and that list should include all specified castes, races or tribes or part or groups notified in that Presidential List. In the entire Constitution wherever reference has been made to "Scheduled Castes" it refers only to the list prepared by the President under Article 341 and there is no reference to any subclassification or division in the said list except, may be, for the limited purpose of Article 330. Therefore, it is clear that the Constitution intended all the castes including the subcastes, races and tribes mentioned in the list to be members of one group for the purpose of the Constitution and this group cannot be subdivided for any purpose. The constitution intended

---

59. See below.
60. See Ch. XXIII, Sec. E, infra.
61. AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217.
For a fuller discussion on Indra Sawhney, see, infra.
62. E. V. Chinnaiah v. State of A.P., (2005) 1 SCC 394 : AIR 2005 SC 162.
63. E. V. Chinnaiah v. State of A.P., (2005) 1 SCC 394: AIR 2005 SC 162.
64. Ibid.

that all the castes included in the Schedule under Article 341 would be deemed to be one class of persons.

The principles laid down in Indra Sawhney case,[65] for subclassification of other Backward Classes cannot be applied as a precedent for subclassification or subgrouping Scheduled Castes in the Presidential List because that very judgment itself has specifically held that subdivision of other backward classes is not applicable to scheduled castes and scheduled tribes. This is for the obvious reason i.e. the Constitution itself has kept the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes List out of interference by the State Government.[66]

A woman who by birth did not belong to a backward class or community, would not be entitled to contest a seat reserved for a backward class community merely on the basis of her marriage to a male of that community.[67]

The validity of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Provision of Transfer of Certain Lands Act, 1978) which restricted the transfer by SC or ST of any land granted to them for particular period of time (e.g. 3 years) has been upheld because of their poverty, lack of education and backwardness which was exploited by the stronger section of the society was not unreasonable and hence not violative of Art. 19(1)(f) of the Constitution. If the object of reservation is to take affirmative action in favour of a class which is socially, educationally and economically backward, the State's jurisdiction while exercising its executive or legislative power is to decide as to what extent reservation should be made for them either in public service or for obtaining admission in educational institutions. Having already fulfilled this part of its constitutional obligation, such a class cannot be subdivided so as to give more preference to a minuscule proportion of the Scheduled Castes in preference to other members of the same class. It is not open to the State to subclassify a class already recognized by the Constitution and allot a portion of the already reserved quota amongst the State created subclass within the list of scheduled casts. Furthermore, the emphasis on efficient administration placed by Art. 335 of the Constitution must also be considered when the claims of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes to employment in the services of the Union are to be considered. Since the State had already allotted 15% of the total quota of the reservation available for backward classes to the Scheduled Castes the question of allotting any reservation under the impugned Act to the backward classes did not arise. The very fact that a legal fiction has been created is itself suggestive of the fact that the legislature of a State cannot take any action which would be contrary to or inconsistent therewith. The very idea of placing different castes or tribes or group or part thereof in a State as a conglomeration by way of a deeming definition clearly suggests that they are not to be subdivided or sub-classified further. An uniform yardstick must be adopted for giving benefits to the members of the Scheduled Castes for the purpose of the Constitution. For the purpose of identifying backwardness, a further inquiry can be made by appointing a commission as to who amongst the members of the Scheduled Castes is more backward. If benefits of reservation are not percolating to them equitably, measures should be taken to see that they are given such adequate or additional training so as to enable them to compete with the others but

---

65. 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217.
66. E. V. Chinnaiah v. State of A.P., (2005) 1 SCC 394 : AIR 2005 SC 162.
67. Sandhya Thakur v. Vimla Devi Kushwah, (2005) 2 SCC 731: AIR 2005 SC 909.

the same would not mean that in the process of rationalizing the reservation to the Scheduled Castes the constitutional mandate of Articles 14, 15 and 16 could be violated. Reservation must be considered from the social objective angle, having regard to the constitutional scheme, and not as a political issue and, thus, adequate representation must be given to the members of the Scheduled Castes as a group and not to two or more groups of persons or members of castes.[68]

As regards the identification of the "Scheduled Castes" and "Scheduled Tribes", reference is to be made to Arts. 341 and 342. These constitutional provisions are discussed later in this book.[69]

(a) SOCIALLY AND EDUCATIONALLY BACKWARD CLASSES

A major difficulty raised by Art. 15(4) is regarding the determination of who are 'socially and educationally backward classes.' This is not a simple matter as sociological and economic considerations come into play in evolving proper criteria for its determination. Art. 15(4) lays down no criteria to designate 'backward classes'; it leaves the matter to the state to specify backward classes, but the courts can go into the question whether the criteria used by the state for the purpose are relevant or not.

The question of defining backward classes has been considered by the Supreme Court in a number of cases. On the whole, the Supreme Court's approach has been that state resources are limited; protection to one group affects the constitutional rights of other citizens to demand equal opportunity, and efficiency and public interest have to be maintained in public services because it is implicit in the very idea of reservation that a less meritorious person is being preferred to a more meritorious person. The Court also seeks to guard against the perpetuation of the caste system in India and the inclusion of advance classes within the term backward classes.

From the several judicial pronouncements concerning the definition of backward classes, several propositions emerge. First, the backwardness envisaged by Art. 15(4) is both social and educational and not either social or educational. This means that a class to be identified as backward should be both socially and educationally backward.[70] In Balaji, the Court equated the "social and educational backwardness" to that of the "Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes". The Court observed: "It was realised that in the Indian society there were other classes of citizens who were equally, or may be somewhat less, backward than the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes and it was thought that some special provision ought to be made even for them."

Secondly, poverty alone cannot be the test of backwardness in India because by and large people are poor and, therefore, large sections of population would fall under the backward category and thus the whole object of reservation would be frustrated.[71]

---

68. E. V. Chinnaiah v. State of A.P., (2005) 1 SCC 394 : AIR 2005 SC 162.
69. See. Ch. XXXV, infra.
70. M.R. Balaji v. State of Mysore, AIR 1963 SC 649 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 439.
71. Janki Prasad Parimoo v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1973 SC 930 : (1973) 1 SCC 420.

Thirdly, backwardness should be comparable, though not exactly similar, to the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.

Fourthly, 'caste' may be a relevant factor to define backwardness, but it cannot be the sole or even the dominant criterion. If classification for social backwardness were to be based solely on caste, then the caste system would be perpetuated in the Indian society.[72] Also this test would break down in relation to those sections of society which do not recognise caste in the conventional sense as known to the Hindu society.

Fifthly, poverty, occupations, place of habitation, all contribute to backwardness and such factors cannot be ignored.

Sixthly, backwardness may be defined without any reference to caste. As the Supreme Court has emphasized, Art. 15(4) "does not speak of castes, but only speaks of classes", and that 'caste' and 'class' are not synonymous. Therefore, exclusion of caste to ascertain backwardness does not vitiate classification if it satisfies other tests.

(b) BALAJI

After the enactment of the above mentioned first Constitutional Amendment in 1951, Balaji was the first case which came up before the Supreme Court.[73]

An order of the Mysore Government issued under Art. 15(4) reserved seats for admission to the State medical and engineering colleges for Backward classes and 'more' Backward classes. This was in addition to the reservation of seats for the Scheduled Castes (15%) and for the Scheduled Tribes (3%). Backward and more Backward classes were designated on the basis of 'castes' and 'communities'.

The Supreme Court characterised Art. 15(4) as an exception to Art. 15(1) [as well as to Art. 29(2)].[74] The Court stated—"there is no doubt that Art. 15(4) has to be read as a proviso or an exception to Arts. 15(1) and 29(2)".

The Court declared the order bad on several grounds in Balaji v. State of Mysore[75]. The first defect in the Mysore order was that it was based solely on caste without regard to other relevant factors and this was not permissible under Art. 15(4). Though caste in relation to Hindus could be a relevant factor to consider in determining the social backwardness of a class of citizens, it must not be made the sole and dominant test in that behalf. Christians, Jains and Muslims do not believe in the caste system and, therefore, the test of caste could not be applied to them. In as much as identification of all backward classes under the impugned order had been made solely on the basis of caste, the order was bad. "Social backwardness is in the ultimate analysis the result of poverty to a very large extent."

Secondly, the test adopted by the State to measure educational backwardness was the basis of the average of student-population in the last three high school classes of all high schools in the State in relation to a thousand citizens of that community. This average for the whole State was 6.9 per thousand. The Court

---

72. See also, infra, Safeguards to Minorities, Ch. XXXV.
73. See, note 54, supra.
74. For discussion on Art. 29(2), see, infra, Ch. XXX, Sec. A.
75. AIR 1963 SC 649 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 439.

stated that assuming that the test applied was rational and permissible to judge educational backwardness, it was not validly applied. Only a community well below the State average could properly be regarded as backward, but not a community which came near the average. The vice of the Mysore order was that it included in the list of backward classes, castes or communities whose average was slightly above, or very near, or just below the State average, e.g., Lingayats with an average of 7.1 per cent were mentioned in the list of backward communities.

Thirdly, the Court declared that Art. 15(4) does not envisage classification between 'backward' and 'more backward classes' as was made by the Mysore order. Art. 15(4) authorises special provisions being made for really backward classes and not for such classes as were less advanced than the most advanced classes in the State. By adopting the technique of classifying communities into backward and more backward classes, 90 per cent of the total State population had been treated as backward. The order, in effect, sought to divide the State population into the most advanced and the rest, and put the latter into two categories—backward and more backward—and the classification of the two categories was not envisaged by Art. 15(4). "The interests of weaker sections of society which are a first charge on the State and the Centre have to be adjusted with the interests of the community as a whole. The adjustment of these competing claims is undoubtedly a difficult matter, but if under the guise of making a special provision, a State reserves practically all the seats available in all the colleges, that clearly would be subverting the object of Art. 15(4)." The State has "to approach its task objectively and in a rational manner."

In Balaji, the Supreme Court could sense the danger in treating 'caste' as the sole criterion for determining social and educational backwardness. The importance of the judgment lies in realistically appraising the situation when the Court said that economic backwardness would provide a much more reliable yardstick for determining social backwardness because more often educational backwardness is the outcome of social backwardness. The Court drew distinction between 'caste' and 'class'. An attempt at finding a new basis for ascertaining social and educational backwardness in place of caste is reflected in the Balaji decision.

The Court also ruled that reservation under Art. 15(4) should be reasonable. It should not be such as to defeat or nullify the main rule of equality enshrined in Art. 15(1). While it would not be possible to predicate the exact permissible percentage of reservation it can be stated in a general and broad way that it ought to be less than 50%; "how much less than 50% would depend upon the relevant prevailing circumstances in each case". Also a provision under Art. 15(4) need not be in the form of a law, it could as well be made by an executive order.

(c) AFTER BALAJI

An order saying that a family whose income was less than Rs. 1,200 per year, and which followed such occupations as agriculture, petty business, inferior services, crafts etc. would be treated as 'backward', was declared to be valid in Chitralekha v. State of Mysore[76]. Here two factors—economic condition and profession—were taken into account to define backwardness, but caste was ignored for the purpose.

76. AIR 1964 SC 1823 : (1964) 6 SCR 368.

In Balaji, the Supreme Court had mentioned caste as one of the relevant factors for determining social backwardness. The order in the instant case was challenged on the ground that caste had been completely ignored for the purpose. The Supreme Court ruled that though caste is a relevant circumstance in ascertaining backwardness of a class, there is nothing to preclude the authority concerned from determining social backwardness of a group of citizens if it could do so without reference to caste. Identification or classification of backward classes on the basis of occupation-cum-income, without reference to caste is not bad and would not offend Art. 15(4). SUBBA RAO, J., speaking for the majority of the Constitution Bench stated:

> "…….What we intend to emphasize is that under no circumstances a 'class' can be equated to a 'caste', though the caste of an individual or a group of individuals may be considered along with other relevant factors in putting him in particular class. We would also like to make it clear that if in a given situation caste is excluded in ascertaining a class within the meaning of Art. 15(4) of the Constitution, it does not vitiate the classification if it satisfied other tests."

In course of time, the judicial view has undergone some change in this respect and 'caste' as a factor to assess backwardness has been given somewhat more importance than in Balaji. The Supreme Court has taken note of the fact that there are numerous castes in the country which are backward socially and educationally and the state has to protect their interests. A caste is also a 'class' of citizens and, therefore, if an entire caste is found to be socially and educationally backward, as a fact, on the basis of relevant data and material, then inclusion of the caste as such would not violate Art. 15(1). When backwardness is defined with reference to castes, the Court wants to be satisfied that not 'caste' alone, but other factors have also been considered for the purpose.

On this basis, the Court upheld a Madras order defining backward classes mainly with reference to castes. Looking at the history as to how the list had come to be formulated, the Court felt satisfied that caste was not taken as the sole basis of backwardness; the main criterion for inclusion in the list was social and educational backwardness of the castes based on their occupations. Castes were only a compendious indication of the classes of people found to be socially and educationally backward.[77] In Rajendran,[78] WANCHOO, C.J., speaking for the Constitution Bench pointed out that "if the reservation in question had been based only on caste and had not taken into account the social and educational backwardness of the caste in question, it would be violative of Art. 15(1). But it must not be forgotten that a caste is also a class of citizens and if the caste as a whole is socially and educationally backward, reservation can be made in favour of such a caste on the ground that it is a socially and educationally backward class of citizens within the meaning of Art. 15(4)."

Similarly, in Balaram,[79] a list prepared by the Backward Classes Commission appointed by the Andhra Government was held valid even though backward classes were enumerated mainly by their caste names because the Court found that the Commission had prepared the list after a detailed enquiry and applying several tests like general poverty, occupations, caste and educational backward-

---

77. P. Rajendran v. State of Madras, AIR 1968 SC 1012 : (1968) 2 SCR 786. Also see, A Periakaruppan v. State of Tamilnadu, AIR 1971 SC 2303.
78. Ibid.
79. S.V. Balaram v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1972 SC 1375 : (1972) 1 SCC 660.

ness. The Court felt satisfied that the Commission had enough material before it to be satisfied that the persons included in the list were really socially and educationally backward. But where list was prepared solely with reference to castes, and no material was placed before the Court to show that other factors besides caste had been considered in preparing it, the list was quashed as violative of Art. 15(1).[80] The Court observed in Sagar, "In determining whether a particular section forms a class, caste cannot be excluded altogether. But in the determination of a class a test solely based upon the caste or community cannot also be accepted."[81]

The judicial approach that castes may be listed as backward classes provided they are found to be backward on the basis of some factors other than mere 'caste', may possibly be more practical in the context of the facts of the Indian life. But there is no doubt that this dilutes, to some extent, the Balaji approach. The danger in this judicial thinking is that it will give a lease of life to the caste system in India, and the quest for formulae to define backwardness, delinked from the caste system, will recede into the background. In this way, the goal of evolving a casteless society in India in the foreseeable future will receive a set back.

A government order excluded the candidates belonging to socially and educationally backward classes from claiming the benefit of reservation if the aggregate annual family income was Rs. 10,000 or over. The order was challenged by a candidate belonging to the backward class, but who was denied the privilege of preferential admission to medical college because her family income exceeded Rs. 10,000 annually. The Supreme Court emphasized in K.S. Jayasree v. State of Kerala,[82] that social backwardness is the result of caste and poverty. Poverty or economic standard is a relevant factor in determining backwardness, but cannot be the sole determining factor. Caste cannot also be the sole or dominant test for the purpose. "Caste and poverty are both relevant for determining the backwardness. But neither caste alone nor poverty alone will be the determining tests". Both of these factors are relevant to determine backwardness. "Social backwardness which results from poverty is likely to be magnified by caste considerations". Occupations, place of habitation may also be relevant factors for the purpose. With the improvement in economic position of a family, social backwardness disappears. To allow these persons to take advantage of the privileges meant for backward persons, will result in depriving the real backward persons of their chance to make progress.

In a number of cases,[83] it has been held that a lady marrying a Scheduled Caste/Scheduled Tribe/Other Backward Citizen (OBC), or one transplanted by adoption or any other voluntary act, does not ipso facto become entitled to claim

---

80. State of Andhra Pradesh v. P. Sagar, AIR 1968 SC 1379 : (1968) 3 SCR 595.
Also see, 11 JILI, 371 (1969); Chhotey Lal v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1979 All 135.

81. Also see, SHAH, J., in Triloki Nath v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1969 SC 1 : (1969) 1 SCR 103.

82. AIR 1976 SC 2381 : (1976) 3 SCC 730.
Also see, Chhotey Lal v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1979 All 135.

83. Kumari Madhuri Patil v. Addl. Commissioner, Tribal Development, (1994) 6 SCC 241 : 1994 SCC (199) 1349 : AIR 1995 SC 94; A.S. Sailja v. Kurnool Medical College, Kurnool, AIR 1986 AP 209; N.B. Rai v. Principal Osmania Medical College, AIR 1986 AP 196; Smt. D. Neelima v. The Dean of P.G. Studies, A.P. Agricultural Universities, Hyderabad, AIR 1993 AP 299.

reservation under either Art. 15(4) or Art. 16(4).[84] In Valsamma Paul v. Cochin University,[85] the Supreme Court has explained the rationale behind this ruling as follows:[86]

> "It is seen that Dalits and Tribes suffered social and economic disabilities recognised by Articles 17 and 15(2). Consequently, they became socially, culturally and educationally backward; the OBC also suffered social and educational backwardness. The object of reservation is to remove these handicaps, disadvantages, sufferings and restrictions to which the members of the Dalits or Tribes or OBCs were subjected to and was sought to bring them in the mainstream of the nation's life by providing them opportunities and facilities... Therefore, when a member is transplanted into the Dalits, Tribes and OBCs, he/she must of necessity also undergo same handicaps, be subject to the same disabilities, disadvantages, indignities or sufferings so as to entitle the candidate to avail the facility of reservation".

The Court went on to say that a person who has had an advantageous start in life having been born in forward caste is transplanted into a backward caste by adoption / marriage / conversion does not become eligible to the benefit of reservation either under Art. 15(4) or 16(4). "Acquisition of the status of SC, etc. by voluntary mobility into these categories would play fraud on the Constitution, and would frustrate the foreign constitutional policy under Arts. 15(4) and 16(4) of the Constitution."

What happened in Valsamma was that a Syrian Catholic (a forward caste) lady married to a Latin Catholic was appointed as a lecturer as a reserved candidate. This was challenged and the Supreme Court ultimately quashed her appointment on the ground that she was not entitled to the benefit of reservation under Art. 16(4) as a lecturer as the post in question was reserved for the backward class Latin Catholic Community.

The Supreme Court has clarified in Jagdish Negi v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[87] that no class of citizens can be perpetually treated as socially and educationally backward. Backwardness cannot continue indefinitely. Every citizen has a right to develop socially and educationally. The State is entitled to review the situation from time to time. There is no rule that once a "backward class of citizens, always such a backward class". Once a class of citizens has been held to be socially and educationally backward class of citizens, it cannot be predicated that in future it may not cease to be so. The State may review the situation from time to time and decide whether a given class of citizens which has been characterised as "socially and educationally backward" has continued to form part of that category or has ceased to fall in that category.

The Supreme Court has observed in Indra Sawhney[88] that the policy of reservation has to be operated year-wise and there cannot be any such policy in perpetuity. The State can review from year to year the eligibility of the class of socially and educationally backward class of citizens. Further, it has been held that Art. 15(4) does not mean that the percentage of reservation should be in proportion to the percentage of the population of the backward classes to the total

---

84. For Art. 16(4), see, infra, Chapter, XXIII, Sec. E.
85. AIR 1996 SC 1010 : (1996) 3 SCC 545; see, supra, Ch. XXI.
86. Ibid, at 1022.
87. AIR 1997 SC 3505 : (1997) 7 SCC 203.
88. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, see, Ch. XXIII, Sec. F, infra.

population. It is in the discretion of the State to keep reservations at reasonable level by taking into consideration all legitimate claims and the relevant factors.

(d) QUANTUM OF RESERVATION

What is the extent of reservation that can be made under Art. 15(4)?

The Supreme Court has set its face, generally speaking, against excessive reservation, for it is bound to affect efficiency and quality by eliminating general competition.

For the first time, in Balaji,[89] the question was raised before the Supreme Court relating to the extent of special provisions which the States can make under Art. 15(4). In this case, reservation up to 68% was made by the State of Mysore for backward classes for admission to the State medical and engineering colleges. The break-up of the reservation was as follows: 50% seats for backward and 'more' backward classes; 15% seats for Scheduled Castes; 3% seats for the Scheduled Tribes. In effect, 68% seats were reserved in medical, engineering and other technical colleges for the weaker sections of the society, leaving only 32% seats for the merit pool.

The State even argued that since Art. 15(4) does not contain any limitation on the State's power to make reservation, cent percent reservation could be made in favour of backward classes in the higher educational institution if the problem of backwardness in a State so demanded. The Supreme Court rejected this extreme argument. The Court also rejected the rule of 68% reservation.

The Court agreed, on the one hand, that Art. 15(4) must be read with Art. 46, a directive principle,[90] and steps ought to be taken to redress backwardness and inequality from which the backward classes, Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes suffer otherwise for them political freedom and Fundamental Rights would have little meaning. On the other hand, the Court insisted that Art. 15(4) being a special provision cannot denude Art. 15(1) of all its significance. Art. 15(4) "is not a provision which is exclusive in character, so that in looking after the advancement of those classes, the State would be justified in ignoring altogether the advancement of the rest of the society." The Court observed:

> "It is because the interests of the society at large would be served by promoting the advancement of the weaker elements in the society that Article 15(4) authorises special provision to be made. But if a provision which is in the nature of an exception completely excludes the rest of the society, that clearly is outside the scope of Article 15(4). It would be extremely unreasonable to assume that in enacting Article 15(4) Parliament intended to provide that where the advancement of the Backward Classes or the Scheduled Castes and Tribes was concerned, the fundamental rights of the citizens consisting of the rest of the society were to be completely ignored."

The Court emphasized that a special provision contemplated by Art. 15(4) must be within reasonable limits. The interests of the weaker sections of society have to be adjusted with the interests of the community as a whole. The Court insisted that considerations of national interest and the interests of the community or society as a whole cannot be ignored in determining the reasonableness of a special provision under Art. 15(4). The Court observed on this point:

---

89. M.R. Balaji v. State of Mysore, AIR 1963 SC 649 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 439; supra.
90. Infra, Ch. XXXIV.

> "The demand for technicians, scientists, doctors, economists, engineers and experts for the further economic advancement of the country is so great that it would cause grave prejudice to national interests if considerations of merit are completely excluded by wholesale reservation of seats in all technical, medical or engineering colleges or institutions of that kind".

Thus, the Supreme Court set its face against excessive reservation under Art. 15(4), for it may affect efficiency by eliminating general competition. The general principle laid down by the Court is that the maximum limit of reservation should not be more than 50% for all classes under Art. 15(4), viz., backward classes, Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. Thus, reservation of 68% was declared void in Balaji. The Court observed that the interests of the weaker sections of the society need to be adjusted with interests of the society as a whole.

In Balaji, the Supreme Court clearly indicated that in giving effect to reservations for SCs, STs and OBCs, a balance ought to be struck so that the interests of the backward classes, STs and SCs are properly balanced with the interests of the other segments of the society. In order to safeguard the interests of the reserved classes, the interests of the community as a whole cannot be ignored. It has to be remembered that Art. 15(4) is an enabling provision and its objective is to advance the interests of the weaker elements in society. Reservations under Art. 15(4) must be within a reasonable limit. If a provision under Art. 15(4) ignores the interests of the society as a whole, it would be clearly outside the purview of Art. 15(4). It may be noted that the over-all limit of 50% reservation is only for the categories mentioned in Art. 15(4); there could be additional reservation for other classes.

For admission to the State medical colleges, the Madhya Pradesh Government made the following reservation of seats: Scheduled Castes, 15%; Scheduled Tribes, 15%; Women candidates, 15%; Children of military personnel, 3%; Nominees of the Central Government, 3% and nominees of Jammu & Kashmir Government, 3%. The Scheme was challenged but the Supreme Court upheld it in State of Madhya Pradesh v. Nivedita Jain.[91]

D. RESERVATION IN ADMISSIONS

The question of reservations has become a very knotty socio-politico issue of the day. Because of keen competition for limited opportunities available in the country, governments are pressurized to indulge in all kinds of reservations for all kinds of groups apart from reservations for Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and backward classes. Basically, any reservation is discriminatory for reservation means that as between two candidates of equal merit, the candidate belonging to the reserve quota is preferred to the one having no reserve quota. Many deserving candidates thus feel frustrated because of reservation for the less deserving persons and they seek to challenge the scheme of reservation as unconstitutional. The relevant Articles are 14, 15 and 16.

Under Art. 15, reservation in educational institutions can be made for:

(1) Women under Art. 15(3);

---

91. AIR 1981 SC 2045 : (1981) 4 SCC 296.

(2) Socially and educationally backward classes and the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes under Art. 15(4);

(3) Other groups not falling under Arts. 15(3) and 15(4).

Questions arise frequently regarding reservation of seats for administration in educational institutions for categories of persons other than those falling under Arts. 15(3) and 15(4). This can be done under Art. 15(1) itself but the main question to consider is whether the classification is reasonable. The tests applied here are the same as are applicable in case of Art. 14 to adjudge whether the classification is reasonable.[1] Thus, the 'equality' principle contained in Art. 15(1) is not infringed so long reservation is made for a class which can be identified on the basis of a rational, relevant and intelligible differentia, and there is nexus between the differentia and the object to be achieved, viz., to get the best talent for admission to professional colleges. As the Supreme Court has stated, the "socially and educationally backward" can be shown some preferential treatment because of Art. 15(4). The underlying idea is that in course of time, these persons will be able to stand in equal position with the more advanced sections of the society. The same principle may be applied to other handicapped sections which do not fall under Art. 15(4). Thus, reservation of seats for children of defence personnel, ex-defence personnel, political sufferers has been upheld.[2]

Constitution being a living organ, rights are to be determined in terms of judgments interpreting the Constitution. Right of a meritorious student to get admission in a postgraduate course is a fundamental and human right which is required to be protected. Such a valuable right cannot be permitted to be whittled down at the instance of less meritorious students.[3]

Fixation of a district-wise quota on the basis of the district population to the total State population for admission to the State medical colleges has been held to be discriminatory. The object in selecting candidates for admission is to get the best possible material for admission to colleges. Whether selection is from the socially and educationally backward classes or from the general pool, the object of selection must be to secure the best possible talent from the two sources. But this purpose cannot be achieved by allocation of seats district-wise as better qualified candidates from one district may be rejected while less qualified candidates from other districts may be admitted.[4] As the object to be achieved is to get the best talent for admission to professional colleges, the allocation of seats district-wise has no reasonable relation with the object to be achieved. If anything, such allocation will result in the object being destroyed in many cases.

As a sequel to the above pronouncement, the State Government introduced a new scheme of admissions to medical colleges. These colleges in the State were grouped into several units and an applicant could seek admission to a unit. This scheme was also held to be void as being violative of Art. 14 because the students in some of the units were in a better position than those who applied in other units, since the ratio between the applicants and the number of seats in each

---

1. Supra.
2. D.N. Chanchala v. State of Mysore, AIR 1971 SC 1762 : (1971) 2 SCC 293.
3. Dr. Saurabh Chaudri v. Union of India (2004) 5 SCC 618 : AIR 2004 SC 2212.
4. P. Rajendran v. State of Madras, AIR 1968 SC 1012 : (1968) 2 SCR 786.
Also, Mohan Bir Singh Chawla v. Punjab University, AIR 1997 SC 788 : (1977) 2 SCC 171.

unit varied and several applicants who secured lesser marks than the petitioners were selected merely because their applications came to be considered in other units. The Supreme Court characterised the scheme as discriminatory against some students.[5]

Reservation for children of residents of the Union Territories (other than Delhi) in professional institutions has been upheld because of general backwardness of these areas and absence of such institutions there. Also, reservation for children of government servants posted abroad in Indian Missions has also been upheld because these persons face (because of exigencies of service) lot of difficulties in the matter of education.[6] There could be reasonable classification based on intelligible differentia for purposes of Arts. 15(1) and 15(4). The Court said that since the government bears the financial burden of running the medical colleges it can decide the sources from where the students are to be admitted. "If the sources are properly classified on territorial, geographical or other reasonable basis it is not for courts to interfere with the manner and method of making the classification." In the instant case, the Court ruled that there was no discrimination against the appellants on grounds only of religion, race, caste, language, sex or place of birth and the classification made by the Central Government was reasonable and based on intelligible differentia.

Since SCs and STs form a separate class by themselves and outside the creamy layer area and having regard to Art.46, these socially backward categories are to be taken care of at every stage and even in specialized institutions like IITs. The argument of maintenance of high standards made on behalf of Delhi IIT was rejected although the Court accepted the position that 'the petitioners were not able to secure the required credits as against the stipulated minimum requirements for continuation' of their studies.[7] This is close to Arun Shourie's 'Bending over Backwards' and discourages merit and excellence.

For admission to the medical college in the State, 60 per cent seats were to be filled on merit, 20 per cent from Scheduled Castes and other reserved categories including socially and educationally backward classes and the remaining 20 per cent of the seats were earmarked for "ensuring rectification of regional imbalances." In Nishi Meghu v. State of Jammu and Kashmir,[8] the classification made for "rectification of regional imbalances" was declared invalid as being too vague as areas suffering from imbalances had not been identified. Thereafter, the State Government identified certain villages as socially and educationally backward for applying the principle of "rectification of regional imbalances" in different parts of the State. The Supreme Court again held in Arti Sapru v. State of Jammu and Kashmir[9] that the classification suffered from the vice of arbitrariness, because there was no intelligible data before the Court for sustaining the classification. The Court invoked the principle advocated in Pradip Tandon.[10]

The Nagpur University made some reservation for wards of the university employees for admission to the Institute of Technology. The reservation was sought

---

5. A. Periakaruppan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1971 SC 2303.
6. Chitra Ghosh v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 35 : (1969) 2 SCC 228.
Also see, Narayan Sharma v. Pankaj Kumar Lehkar, AIR 2000 SC 72 : (2000) 1 SCC 44.
7. Avinash Singh Bagri v. Registrar, IIT Delhi, (2009) 8 SCC 220 : (2009) 11 SCALE 535.
8. AIR 1980 SC 1975 : (1980) 4 SCC 95.
9. AIR 1981 SC 1009 : (1981) 2 SCC 484.
10. Infra, footnote 21 on 1321.

to be justified on the ground of 'welfare of the employees'. The High Court held the scheme to be irrational. The High Court denied that such a ground could be a relevant basis for purposes of admission of students.[11]

Reservation of seats in medical colleges for sons and daughters of employees serving in the Health Department of the State was quashed as being arbitrary and irrational.[12] Similarly, 5% seats reserved for admission to the B. Tech Course in the University in favour of the sons andwards of the University employees was quashed by the Supreme Court as being violative of Art. 14.[13] The Court observed:

> "The reservation of seats for admission to the B. Tech. Course in favour of the sons and wards of the employees of the University is violative of the doctrine of equality enshrined in Art. 14 of the Constitution. There is no rationale for the reservation of the seats in favour of the sons and wards of the employees of the University nor any such reservation has any rational nexus with the object which is sought to be achieved by the University".

It may be noted that such reservation falls under Art. 15(1) and not under Art. 15(4) and this can be valid only if it fulfils the tests of reasonable classification as laid down under Art. 14.

The same principle has been applied in the case of an unaided technological institution affiliated to the University. The Court has ruled that such an institution has to abide by the University rules and the University is bound by Art. 14. Reservation of seats in the B. Tech course of the Institute in favour of the wards of the college staff does not satisfy the test of admission being given strictly on the basis of merit.[14] The Court has taken the position that any preferential treatment has to be consistent with Art. 14 which permits reasonable classification. Such classification should have a reasonable nexus with the object of the rules providing for such admission, namely, to select the most meritorious amongst the candidates to have advantage of such education.

For purposes of admission to the post-graduate courses in medicine, provision was made for weightage of 15 per cent marks on the basis of service in rural areas. The High Court ruled that while some weightage on this basis per se might not be discriminatory, the amount of weightage in question was excessive as a second class candidate could get precedence over a first class candidate. Also, reserving seats for medical officers who have been unsuccessful in post-graduate examination outside the State was held not justifiable as this amounted to putting a premium on incompetency.[15]

For admission to the medical course, a common entrance test was prescribed for candidates who had passed the pre-University course and the Higher Secondary course. The candidates were to be admitted on the basis of the results of the test. A reservation of 40 per cent of seats was made in favour of the H.S.C. candidates. The reservation was held discriminatory and arbitrary. There can be no

---

11. Prasanna v. Director-in-Charge, LIT, Nagpur, AIR 1982 Bom. 176.
12. Teachers Association, Silchar Medical College v. State of Assam, AIR 1996 Gau 97.
13. Chairman/Director, Combined Entrance Examination v. Osiris Das, (1992) 3 SCC 543.
14. Thapar Institute of Engineering & Technology v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 793 : (1997) 2 SCC 65.
15. Niranjan Pradhan v. State of Orissa, AIR 1982 Ori. 153.

valid classification after a common test has been prescribed. Such a classification has no nexus to the object of selecting the best candidates for medical course.[16]

Two per cent seats were reserved in the Kerala University for candidates from other universities in the post-graduate course in medicine. The Supreme Court held in Charles K. Skaria v. Dr. C. Mathew,[17] that this paltry reservation for outside candidates was not sufficient and infringed Art. 14 and 15. These articles do not recognise State frontiers or 'the cult of the sons of the soil.' The necessary implication of these constitutional provisions is that every basic degree holder who fills the bill can apply for admission for post-graduate courses. The niggardly quota of 2 per cent of the total number of seats for candidates of the entire country minus Kerala did not represent "a catholic approach informed by nationalist generosity". It is not a sufficient fulfilment of Arts. 14 and 15. "Fundamental rights of candidates do not depend on the grace of governments and Indians are not aliens in their own motherland when asking for seats on the score of equal opportunity."

In Chanchala's case,[18] university-wise allocation for admission in medical colleges in the State of Karnataka was held to be valid. The scheme was that students passing from colleges affiliated to one University were first admitted to government medical colleges affiliated to that University and only 20 per cent seats in each of such medical colleges could be allotted to outsiders. This was upheld on the ground that Universities were set up for satisfying the educational needs of different areas. The Supreme Court upheld University-wise distribution of seats, though it was not in conformity with the principle of section based on merit and marked a departure from this principle. The justification for taking this view was that constitutional preference was not constitutionally impermissible for two reasons. One, it would be quite legitimate for students attached to a University to desire to have training in specialised subjects, like medicine, in colleges affiliated to their own University as it would promote institutional continuity which has its own value. Two, any student from any part of the country can pass the qualifying examination of that University, irrespective of the place of his birth or residence.

The scheme of University-wise allocation was then modified by adding the rider that the proportion of admissions should be fixed by the proportion of the number of students presented by the concerned Universities for the pre-degree and B.Sc. examinations. This was held to be bad. The Court could not see any nexus between the registered student-strength and the seats to be allotted. The result of the rider was to discriminate against the backward area where the pre-degree or degree students would be fewer. The fewer the colleges, the fewer the pre-degree or degree students and so the linkage of the division of seats with the registered student-strength would make an irrational inroad into the scheme of University-wise allocation. "Such a formula would be a punishment for backwardness, not a promotion of their advancement."[19] It is clear from this decision that the Court would accept some kind of reservation if it is designed to remove backwardness.

---

16. State of Andhra Pradesh v. U.S.V. Balram, AIR 1972 SC 1375 : (1972) 1 SCC 660.
17. AIR 1980 SC 1230 : (1980) 2 SCC 752.
See also, Jagdish Saran v. Union of India, infra, footnote 34, on 1323.
18. AIR 1971 SC 1762 : (1971) 2 SCC 293; infra, footnote 55, on 1330.
19. State of Kerala v. T.P. Roshana, AIR 1979 SC 766, 774 : (1979) 1 SCC 572.

Admissions to the LL.B. course of Punjab University were made on merit with the rider that 10% of the marks obtained in the qualifying examination were to be added in case of candidates from the Punjab University. Following Chanchala, the Supreme Court upheld the scheme. The Court ruled that "university-wise preference is permissible provided it is relevant and reasonable." But the Court also ruled that 10% preference was on the higher side in this competitive age and such a preference ought not to increase 5%.[20]

The U.P. Government made reservation of seats in the State medical colleges in favour of two classes of candidates—(1) Those who came from hill areas and Uttrakhand; (2) Those who came from rural areas. The Supreme Court upheld reservations in favour of candidates from hill areas and Uttrakhand as it was satisfied that the people therein were socially and educationally backward, but reservation in favour of rural people was held unconstitutional. The rural population being 80 per cent of the entire State population, the Court found it incomprehensible as to how such a large population could be regarded as backward. Thus, the Court ruled that the reservation for rural areas as such could not be sustained on the ground that the rural population represented socially and educationally backward class of citizens. The Court held that rural element did not make it a class.

The Court refused to accept the test of poverty as the 'determining factor of social backwardness'. Poverty is not the common trait of rural people alone; it is widespread in India, and to take poverty as the exclusive test would mean that a large population in India is held backward.[21]

Similarly, in Janki Prasad,[22] the Court did not approve declaration of 'small cultivators' and 'low paid pensioners' as backward for this is to form artificial groups to confer certain benefits under the Constitution, and is to place economic considerations above other considerations which go to show whether a particular class is socially and educationally backward. Mere poverty cannot be a test of backwardness because in this country except for a small percentage of the population, the people are generally poor—some being more poor, others less poor.

The Court also held that each of the factors, traditional occupations or residents of certain inaccessible areas, can be applied by itself, to list backward classes. The Court ruled that residents of certain areas may remain in primitive conditions because of lack of communication, inaccessibility, lack of resources etc., and residents of such areas may be validly treated as socially and educationally backward. A government order laying down a list of socially and educationally backward classes but exempting therefrom the families having an aggregate income of Rs. 6,000 annually or more is valid. Poverty is a relevant factor to determine social and educational backwardness, but it cannot be an exclusive or dominant factor.[23]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the primary consideration for selecting candidates for admission to medical colleges is merit. But departure

---

20. Mohan Bir Sigh Chawla v. Punjab University, Chandigarh, AIR 1997 SC 788 : (1997) 2 SCC 171.

21. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Pradip Tandon, AIR 1975 SC 563 : (1975) 1 SCC 267.
Also see, Narayan Sharma v. Pankaj Kumar Lekhar, AIR 2000 SC 70 : (2000) 1 SCC 44.

22. Janki Pd. v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1973 SC 930 : (1973) 1 SCC 420.

23. State of Kerala v. Krishna Kumar, AIR 1976 Ker. 54.

from the merit principle is permissible where it is necessary to do so for the purpose of bringing about real equality of opportunity between those who are unequals. Merit principle may thus be departed from either in State interest,[24] or on the consideration of a region's claim for backwardness.[25]

While 'residence' may be the basis of reservation, according to the Supreme Court in Pradeep Jain v. Union of India,[26] it may be tested on the touch stone of Art. 14. Accordingly, the Court has condemned as unconstitutional and void under Art. 14 "wholesale reservation" on the basis, of the 'domicile' or 'residence' requirement within the State,[27] or on the basis of 'institutional' preference for students passing the qualifying examination for admission so as to exclude all students not satisfying the requirement regardless of merit.

The Court pointed out that the principle of selection can be diluted on the ground of regional backwardness. If the State Government starts a medical college in a backward region, and reserves most of the seats therein to the students from the region, then such reservation or preferential treatment cannot be regarded as discriminatory. Students from backward region can hardly compete with the students from advanced region. Reservation or preference in such a case may be of a high percentage but it cannot be total.

The Court however accepted reservation up to 70% of the total number of open seats (after deducting other kinds of reservations validly made) for admission to the M.B.B.S. Course on the ground of 'residence'. The Court accepted this outer limit in order to reconcile the "apparently conflicting claims of equality and excellence". But the 30% of all seats should remain open and available for admission to students on an All-India basis irrespective of the State or University from which they come.

As regards the 30% unreserved seats in the M.B.B.S. Course, the Supreme Court has ruled in Dinesh Kumar v. Motilal Nehru Medical College,[28] that these seats must not be filled on the basis of comparison of the marks obtained by the candidates at different qualifying examinations because the standard of judging

---

24. D.P. Joshi, supra, also, P. Rajendran, infra.

25. Also see, State of Uttar Pradesh v. Pradip Tandon, AIR 1975 SC 563 : (1975) 1 SCC 267; supra.

26. AIR 1984 SC 1420 : (1984) 3 SCC 654.

27. On this point, BHAGWATI, J., speaking for the Court made the following pithy remark:

> "The entire country is taken as one nation with one citizenship and every effort of the Constitution makers is directed towards emphasizing, maintaining and preserving the unity and integrity of the nation. Now if India is one Nation and there is only one citizenship, namely, citizenship of India, and every citizen has a right to move freely throughout the territory of India and to reside and settle in any part of India, irrespective of the place where he is born or the language which he speaks or the religion which he professes and he is guaranteeed freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse throughout the territory of India and is entitled to equality before the law and equal protection of the law with other citizens in every part of the territory of India, it is difficult to see how a citizen having his permanent home in Tamil Nadu or speaking Tamil language can be regarded as an outsider in Uttar Pradesh or a citizen having his permanent home in Maharashtra or speaking Marathi language be regarded as an outsider in Karnataka. He must be held entitled to the same rights as a citizen having his permanent home in Uttar Pradesh or Karnataka, as the case may be. To regard him as an outsider would be to deny him his constitutional rights and to derecognise the essential unity and integrity of the country by treating it as if it were a mere conglomeration of independent States." AIR 1984 SC 1420 at 1424, 1425 : (1984) 3 SCC 654.

28. AIR 1985 SC 1059 : (1985) 3 SCC 22. This case may be called as Dinesh I.

may vary and may not be uniform. "That would indeed be blatantly violative of the concept of equality enshrined in Art. 14." Admissions must be based on evaluation of relative merits through an entrance examination open to all candidates throughout the country. The Court has suggested that a common All-India Entrance examination be held by the Indian Medical Council for the purpose.

In Dinesh II[29], the Supreme Court has revised the formula laid down in Dinesh I. The Court has now fixed a quota of 15% of the total number of seats in a medical college without taking into account any reservation to be filled through an All-India Entrance Examination. The defect in the old formula was that a State could reduce the number of All-India seats by the simple expedient of increasing the number of reserved seats. The Court has also decided that the medium of the All-India Entrance Examination would be English and no regional language and that the examination would be conducted by the Central Board of Secondary Examination instead of the Medical Council of India which does not have the necessary infrastructure for the purpose of conducting an examination.

In Ravinder Kumar Rai v. State of Maharashtra,[30] the Supreme court has rejected the contention of the State that conducting entrance examination would delay the admission process.

The Ahmedabad Municipality started a medical college and reserved admission therein to 'local students to the MBBS Course. However, 15% of the seats were reserved for students on an All-India basis. In Ahmedabad Municipal Corporation v. Nilaybhai R. Thakore,[31] the Supreme Court held the rule to be valid. The Court pointed out that the Municipality has started the college out of municipal funds. "Its desire to provide as many seats as possible to its students is a natural and genuine desire emanating from its municipal obligations which deserves to be upheld to the extent possible." The object of the municipality, the Court said, was laudable. The Court also pointed out that the municipality has complied with its constitutional obligation by providing 15% of the seats available to All-India students.[32] The term "local student" has been interpreted by the Court to mean any permanent resident student of Ahmedabad city who has acquired his qualification from an institution situated within the Ahmedabad Urban Development Area.

So far as the undergraduate courses are concerned, the reservations based on domicile, University or Institution are permissible provided that the said reservations are not wholesale.[33] As regards admission to the post-graduate and super-speciality courses, no reservations are possible.[34]

---

29. Dinesh Kumar v. Motilal Nehru Medical College (II), AIR 1986 SC 1877 : (1986) 3 SCC 727.
30. AIR 1998 SC 1227 : (1998) 3 SCC 183.
31. AIR 2000 SC 114 : (1999) 8 SCC 139.
32. In this connection, see, Dinesh II, supra.
33. In this connection, see, Dinesh II, supra.
34. AIR 2000 SC 114 at 117 : (1999) 8 SCC 139.
Also see, D.P. Joshi v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1955 SC 334 : (1955) 1 SCR 1215; supra; D.N. Chanchala v. State of Mysore, AIR 1971 SC 1762 : (1971) 2 SCC 293, supra; Dr. Pradeep Jain v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1420 : (1984) 3 SCC 654, supra, footnote 26; Jagdish Saran v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 820 : (1980) 2 SCC 768; supra, footnote 17 on 1320.

In Nidmarti Maheshkumar v. State of Maharashtra,[35] for purposes of admission to the MBBS Course, region-wise classification was made in the State. The rule said that the students passing the XII standard examination from institutions within the jurisdiction of one University would claim admission only in the medical colleges in that region and would not be eligible for admission to medical colleges situated within the jurisdiction of another University in the State. This region-wise classification made by the State government was challenged under Art. 14. The Court ruled that Art. 14 is violated if a State is compartmentalized into different regions and mobility of students from one region to another for medical education is completely banned and, thus, they are denied equal opportunity with others in the State for medical education. This cannot be defended even on the ground of regional backwardness. Why should a brilliant student from a so-called backward region be denied admission in a medical college in an advanced region? Why should mobility for educational advancement be impeded by geographical limitations within the State especially when uniform educational standards are being maintained throughout the State, when a common examination is held by the Secondary Board, students are graded uniformly throughout the State, and only results are published and merit list prepared region-wise?

The Court characterised it as discriminatory that a student with lesser marks may be admitted in one region while a student with higher marks may be denied admission in another region. Also, a student in one region could not get admission in another region even though students with lesser marks than him have been admitted there.

The Court distinguished the instant case from Chanchal on two grounds: (1) In Chanchal, there was no common or uniform examination, while here there was one examination throughout the State; (2) In Chanchal, 20% seats were allowed for students from other regions, while in the instant case there was 100% regional reservation.

However, the Court reiterated its earlier view that region-wise reservation upto 70% of the total number of open seats in a medical college after taking into account other kinds of reservations could be made for students who had studied in institutions situated within that region. This could be justified for two reasons:

(1) many students are not able to avail of medical education away from their region, as because of lack of resources, they cannot study far away from their places of residence, and may, thus, be deprived of medical education;

(2) girl students may find it difficult to pursue medical education in another region beyond their places of residence.

But such reservation based on residence requirement or institutional preference should not exceed 70% of the total number of open seats after taking into account all other kinds of reservations validly made. The remaining 30% of the open seats at least should be made available for admission to students from other regions within the State. The Court clarified that the expression "total number of open seats", means the seats after deducting the seats required to be made available on an All-India basis as decided by the Court in Dr. Pradeep Jain's case.

35. AIR 1986 SC 1362 : (1986) 2 SCC 534.

In Jagdish Saran[36] and Pradeep Jain,[37] the Supreme Court has already upheld residential or institutional preference for admission to medical colleges. Following these cases, in Anant Madan,[38] the Supreme Court has ruled that the condition that a candidate should have studied in 10th, 10+1 and 10+2 classes in a recognised institution in the State for admission to the medical college is valid. This eligibility criterion is in conformity with the rulings in Jagdish Saran and Pradeep Jain and is not arbitrary or unreasonable or violative of Art. 14.

On the whole, the impact of judicial pronouncements in the area has been wholesome. The growing tendency to make reservations in technical institutions for all and sundry has been curbed to some extent. In the absence of Judicial control, reservation would have run riot, excluding all merit. Had this tendency not been controlled, it would have led to the inevitable result of falling standards which would have been a national loss. Many deserving and better qualified candidates from the so called advanced sections of society would have been forced to go without education and this would have been unjust to them. The Supreme Court's pronouncements put the whole problem posed by Art. 15(4) within a reasonable mould. It was also necessary to play down the importance of caste lest the caste system instead of being obliterated should be perpetuated.[39] A very important achievement of the Court is that 15% seats in medical colleges are to be filled in on an All India basis.

To this extent, the Court has overruled its earlier decision in Post-Graduate Institute of Medical Education and Research Chandigarh v. K.L. Narasimham.[40] However, at the next below stage of post-graduate level, there could be some nominal reservation, but the question has not been finally decided in Preeti Sagar.

(a) POST GRADUATE COURSES

While the Supreme Court has shown some flexibility of approach in the matter of fixation of criteria/reservation/preference for admission to graduate courses like M.B.B.S., as discussed above, it has adopted somewhat stringent approach towards admissions to post-graduate courses and still more stringent attitude to admissions to super-specialities. The basic proposition laid down by the Supreme Court is that admission to post-graduate courses should be based strictly on merit and that there should be no dilution of standards in such courses.[41] This judicial approach is illustrated by the following judicial pronouncements.

In a number of cases, the Supreme Court has expressed doubt whether there can be any reservation at the post-graduate level for backward classes. For example, in a post-graduate medical course, only M.B.B.S. candidates can be admitted. Can an M.B.B.S. be regarded as backward even though he may belong to a backward class. Reservation in the higher courses would perpetuate the perni-

---

36. Supra, note, 15.
37. Supra, note 15.
38. Anant Madaan v. State of Haryana, AIR 1995 SC 955 : (1995) 2 SCC 135.
39. MARC GALANTAR, Protective Discrimination for Backward Classes in India, 3 JILI, 39 (1961); I.L.I., EDUCATIONAL PLANNING, 56-113 (1967); Radhakrishnan, Units of Social Economic and Educational Backwardness: Caste and Individual. 7 JILI, 263 (1965); I.L.I., MINORITIES AND THE LAW (1972); SMITH, INDIA AS A SECULAR STATE (1963).
40. AIR 1997 SC 3687 : (1997) 6 SCC 283.
41. Narayan Sharma (Dr.) v. Pankaj Kr. Lehkar, AIR 2000 SC 72 : (2000) 1 SCC 44.

cious theory "once backward always backward." The Court has advocated the principle that the higher you go in the ladder of education, the lesser should be the reservation.

Generally speaking, at the post-graduate level, it is merit that ought to count. Thus, the Supreme Court has observed in Jagdish Saran,[42] that to encourage SC/ST/OBC students, the State may reserve seats for them at the under graduate level, but at the level of Ph.D., M.D., or levels of higher proficiency, "equality", measured by matching excellence, has more meaning and cannot be diluted much without grave risk." At the highest scales of proficiency or speciality, "the best skill or talent, must be hand-picked by selecting according to capability." At that level, "where international measure of talent is made, where losing one great scientist or technologist-in-the making is a national loss, the considerations we have expanded upon as important lose their potency."

In Pradeep Jain,[43] the Supreme Court expressed great reluctance in accepting any reservation for admissions to post graduate courses where ordinarily merit should prevail. The case dealt with reservation of seats for the residents of the State or the students of the same University for admission to the medical colleges.[44] The Court said in the instant case, that considerations for admission to the post-graduate courses such as M.D. and the like for reservation based residence requirements within the State or institutional preference were different from those for admission to the M.B.B.S. course. The Court emphatically stated that excellence cannot be allowed to be compromised by any other considerations because that would be detrimental to national interests. The Court thus opined that in case of admissions to the post-graduate courses, such as M.S., M.D. and the like, "it would be eminently desirable not to provide for any reservation based on residence requirement within the State or on institutional preference. The Court observed further:

> "This proposition has greater importance when we reach the higher levels of education like Post-Graduate Courses. After all, top technological expertise in any vital field like medicine is a nation's human asset without which its advance and development will be stunted. The role of high grade skill or special talent may be less at the lesser levels of education, jobs and disciplines of social consequence, but more at the higher levels of sophisticated skills and strategic employment. To devalue merit at the summit is to temporise with the country's development in the vital areas of professional expertise."

However, the Court directed in Pradeep Jain that while residence within the State would not be a ground for reservation in admissions to post-graduate courses, a certain percentage of the seats could be reserved on the basis of 'institutional preference' in the sense that a student who has passed the MBBS course from a medical college or University, may be given preference for admission to the post-graduate course in the same medical college or University. But such reservation on the basis of institutional preference should not in any event exceed 50% of the total number of open seats available for admission to the post-graduate course.

But the Court directed that even in regard to admissions to the post-graduate course, so far as super-specialities such as neurosurgery and cardiology are con-

---

42. Jagdish Saran (Dr.) v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 820 : (1980) 2 SCC 768.
43. Pradeep Jain (Dr.) v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1420 : (1984) 3 SCC 654.
44. See, supra.

cerned, there should be no reservation at all even on the basis of institutional preference and admissions should be granted purely on merit on an all India basis.[45]

The Court observed further that admission to the non-reserved seats for post-graduate courses such as M.S., M.D. and the like cannot be made on the basis of marks obtained by the students at different MBBS examinations held by different universities since there will be no comparable standard by reference to which the relative merits of the students seeking admission to post-graduate courses can be judged. In order to meet the demands of the equality clause, admissions to 50% non-reserved seats in the post-graduate courses must be made on the basis of comparative evaluation of merits of the students through an entrance examination. The Court preferred such an examination being held by the Indian Medical Council on all India basis. But if this was not possible for some reason, then such an examination could be held by the State Government or the University for the medical colleges situated within the State or affiliated to the University. Again, the Supreme Court has observed in the following case[46] that "with regard to post-graduate and super-specialities, this Court has prohibited any reservation whatsoever".

But, the Supreme Court has now changed its stance on this question and has ruled that there may be reservation of seats for backward classes in admission to post-graduate, speciality or super-speciality courses in medicine. The Court has argued that after admission, every student has to undergo the same courses and the same examination even though at the admission stage the cut-off point may be lower for backward candidates than for general candidates.[47]

In Dinesh Kumar I,[48] the Supreme Court has insisted that admission to the open seats in post-graduate medical courses (viz. 50%) ought to be made on the basis of the marks obtained in an all India examination and not on the basis of the marks obtained by the candidates at various qualifying examinations held by various bodies where the standard of judging may not be uniform. Some Universities may be very liberal in their marking while others may be strict. There would thus be no comparable standard on the basis of which the relative merits of the students may be judged and that "would indeed be blatantly violative of the concept of equality enshrined in Art. 14 of the Constitution." The Court directed the Indian Medical Council to prepare a scheme for holding the qualifying examination.

In Dinesh Kumar II,[49] the Supreme Court reconsidered some of the matters decided by it in Dinesh Kumar I and issued some fresh and modified directions as regards admissions to Post-Graduate Medical Courses. One, the medium of the all India examination to be conducted for admission for these courses shall be English. Two, instead of making available 50% of the open seats after taking into

---

45. AIR 1984 SC at 1442.
Also see, Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, Ch. XXIII, Sec. F, infra.

46. Ahmedabad Municipal Corp. v. Nilaybhai R. Thakore, AIR 1986 SC 1362.

47. P.G. Institute of Medical Education & Research v. K.L. Narasimham, AIR 1997 SC 3687 : (1997) 6 SCC 283.

48. Dinesh Kumar v. Motilal Nehru Medical College, Allahabad, AIR 1985 SC 1059 : (1985) 3 SCC 22.

49. Dinesh Kumar v. Motilal Nehru Medical College, Allahabad, AIR 1986 SC 1877 : (1986) 3 SCC 727.

account reservations validly made, 25% of the total number of seats without taking into account any reservations should be made available for being filled on the basis of an all India entrance examination. The reason behind the new formula was that a State could, under the old formula, reduce the number of the open seats by increasing reservations on various grounds. The new formula frees the open seats from any reservations which may be made by a State. Three, the entrance examination would be conducted by the All India Medical Science Institute instead of the Medical Council of India which does not have the necessary infrastructure for the purpose. In Dinesh II, the Supreme Court also rejected the suggestion that a weightage of 15% of the total marks obtained by a candidate of the All India Entrance Examination for admission to the Post-Graduate Course to the doctors who had put in a minimum of three years of rural service. The Court insisted that selection of candidates for admission to Post- Graduate medical course should be based on merits and no factor other than merit should be allowed to tilt the balance in favour of a candidate.

The University of Rajasthan issued an ordinance providing for the addition of 5% marks to the total marks obtained by a student at the entrance examination by way of college-wise institutional preference which meant that these marks were to be added to the marks obtained by a student applying for admission to the post-graduate course in any of the five medical colleges in the State, provided the student had passed his MBBS course from the same college to which admission was sought in the post-graduate course. In State of Rajasthan v. Dr. Ashok Kumar Gupta,[50] the Supreme Court disapproved the college-wise institutional preference as violative of Art. 14.

A rule provided for college-wise institutional preference for admission to post-graduate courses in Medical Science being run in the medical colleges of the State and the Municipal Corporation. The rule meant that the students of each particular college passing their MBBS examination from that college would exclude all other students obtaining their MBBS degree from the other colleges. The Supreme Court declared the rule invalid in Greater Bombay Municipal Corp. v. Thukral Anjali Deokumar.[51] The Court ruled that there was no place for college-wise reservation. The Court was in favour of removing institutional preference and pooling together all the candidates from the University. Because of the impugned rule, many meritorious students could not get admission even if they secured higher marks than those admitted in the post-graduate degree course. There arose a patent discrimination in as much as students obtaining lesser marks were preferred to those obtaining higher marks. There was no intelligible differentia for the classification by way of college-wise institutional preference. "So far as educational institutions are concerned, unless there are strong reasons for exclusion of meritorious candidates, any preference other than in order of merit, will not stand the test of Article 14 of the Constitution. So, the impugned rules are discriminatory and do not satisfy the tests of reasonable classification and, as such, cannot be sustained."

Another instance of institutional preference came before the Supreme Court in Goel.[52] The State of Uttar Pradesh has seven medical colleges offering postgraduate medical courses. A combined entrance examination was held for admission to these courses and the results of the examination were announced so as to provide for a separate merit list for each college out of the institutional students of that college and seats in each college filled on the basis of the separate merit list. An 'institutional student' meant a student obtaining MBBS degree of that institution. This was challenged.

50. AIR 1989 SC 177 : (1989) 1 SCC 93.
51. AIR 1989 SC 1194 : (1989) 2 SCC 249.
52. P.K. Goel v. U.P. Medical Council, AIR 1992 SC 1475 : (1992) 3 SCC 232.

The Supreme Court declared the issuing of separate merit list for each college invalid under Art. 14 as the classification on the basis of college-wise institutional preference was held to be discriminatory and arbitrary. "There cannot be any vested right in seeking admission in a particular college. Merit as the basis for selection in the speciality in a post-graduate degree course in one college cannot be sacrificed against convenience." If the rule of merit on the basis of institutional preference were applied, "a candidate having secured a very high position in merit in the combined merit list for the whole State of Uttar Pradesh may be deprived of getting a speciality of his choice even though he might be prepared to go in another medical college in the same State of Uttar Pradesh."

Reservation of 70% of seats by the Delhi University for admission to the post-graduate course in Dermatology for Delhi University graduates was frowned upon by the Supreme Court in Jagdish Saran v. Union of India.[53] In the instant case, a medical graduate from Madras University was seeking admission to post-graduate degree course in the Delhi University as his father had been transferred to Delhi. Though he qualified in the entrance examination, yet he was denied admission because of the rule reserving 70% of the seats at the post-graduate level to Delhi University graduates. He challenged the validity of the rule.

The Supreme Court emphasized that the primary imperative of Arts. 14 and 15 is equal opportunity for all across the nation to attain excellence. The philosophy and pragmatism of excellence through universal equal opportunity is part of the Indian culture and constitutional creed. This norm of non-discrimination, however, admits of just exceptions geared to equality, and does not forbid such basic measures as are needed to abolish the gaping realities of current inequalities afflicting 'socially and educationally backward classes' and 'the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes'. But reservation by a university for its own graduates creates a new kind of discrimination which is not sanctioned by Arts. 14 and 15. Delhi University students do not form an educationally backward class. But the Court also emphasized that at the post-graduate level "equality, measured by matching excellence, has more meaning and cannot be diluted much without grave risk." Further, "it is difficult to denounce or renounce the merit criterion when the selection is for post-graduate or post-doctoral courses in specialized subjects…. To sympathize mawkishly with the weaker sections by selecting sub-standard candidates, is to punish society as a whole by denying the prospect of excellence say in hospital service…So it is that relaxation on merit, by overruling equality and quality altogether, is a social risk where the stage is post-graduate or post-doctoral".[54] It may be pointed out that this reservation could not be justified under Art. 15(4) as the students of the Delhi University could not be regarded as educationally backward.

---

53. AIR 1980 SC 820 : (1980) 2 SCC 768.
54. AIR 1980 SC 820 at 829.

Institution-wise reservation has no place in the scheme of Art. 15, although social and educational destitution may be endemic in some parts of the country where a college or university may be started to remedy this glaring imbalance and reservation for those alumni for higher studies may be permitted. Thus, reservation is to be linked to backwardness. However, the Court stressed that reservation should not run riot otherwise that will bring about a fall in medical competence. The very best should not be rejected from admission because that will be a national loss. The Court consequently laid down the following principles for this purpose:

(i) Reservation must be kept in check by the demands of competence. A certain percentage must be available for meritorious students. Shelter of reservation should not be extended where minimum qualifications are absent.

(ii) Reservation on the ground of backwardness cannot prevail in the same measure at the highest scale of speciality where the best skill or talent must be picked up.

Chanchala's case[55] was now explained by the Court as follows: "…University-wise preferential treatment may still be consistent with the rule of equality of opportunity where it is calculated to correct an imbalance or handicap and permit equality in the larger sense." The Court pointed out that advantaged groups are exploiting the propositions applicable to disabled categories. The Court thus stated:[56]

> "If university-wise classification for post-graduate medical education is shown to be relevant and reasonable and the differentia has a nexus to the larger goal of equalisation of educational opportunities the vice of discrimination may not invalidate the rule."

Excessive reservation is an obvious inequality. The basis of classified quota can be promotion of better opportunities to the deprived categories of students or better supply of medical service to neglected regions of the country. The Delhi University reservation did not fit into these criteria as Delhi is in no sense an educationally or economically backward human region. Merit as a criteria should not be renounced for selection to post-graduate or post-doctoral courses in specialised subjects, but the court thought that some reservation for Delhi graduates may be justified for the following reasons:

(i) Delhi students belong to families which are drawn from all over India. This is not based on the 'sons of the soil' doctrine. This reservation is, therefore, qualitatively different.

(ii) Other Universities shut their doors on Delhi students.

(iii) There ought to be institutional continuity.

The Court did not specifically veto 70% reservation rule in this case as there was not sufficient data before the Court to decide the issue. But the Court any way directed that the petitioner be admitted.

---

55. Supra, footnote 18, on 1320.
56. AIR 1980 SC 831.

The Gujarat University made a rule giving preference to its own students over those from other Universities in admission to super-speciality medical course. The rule in question ran as follows:

> "The first preference is to be given to the candidates from Gujarat University. Second preference to be given to students from other Universities in Gujarat. Any vacancy remaining after this shall remain unfilled."

In Gujarat University v. Rajiv Gopinath Bhatt,[57] the Supreme Court upheld the rule with the following remarks:

> "If a rule has been framed that out of the merit list prepared, preference is to be given for admission in the super speciality course to the students of the University in question per se it cannot be held to be arbitrary, unreasonable or violative of Art. 14."

The ruling seems to be debatable in view of what the Court had observed earlier in Pradeep Jain. The last clause in the rule that the "vacancy shall remain unfilled" was, of course, vetoed by the Court.

In Mohan Bir Singh Chawla v. Punjab University,[58] the Supreme Court said that at higher levels of education it would be dangerous to depreciate merit and excellence. The court thus declared:

> "The higher you go in any discipline, lesser should be the reservations—of whatever kind."

In Narayan Sharma v. Pankaj Kumar Lehkar,[59] the Supreme Court considered the validity of the following scheme of reservation made by the Assam Government for seats in the post-graduate medical courses in its medical colleges: (i) 25% All India quota; (ii) 4 seats for North Eastern Council; (iii) 6 seats for teachers in medical colleges, (iv) 20 seats for doctors who had worked for five years in a health centre outside the municipal limits; (v) 7% for Scheduled Caste candidates and (vi) 15% OBC candidates. An entrance examination was to be conducted but candidates in categories (i), (ii), (iii) and (iv) were not required to appear at such an examination.

The Supreme Court upheld reservation for category (ii) as these seats were meant for the five Eastern States having no medical college of their own. The students of these States being handicapped in getting medical education formed a separate class and reserving a few seats for them did not violate Art. 14. But the provision exempting them from appearing at an entrance examination was quashed as selection ought to be based on merit and could not be left to the arbitrary discretion of any administrative body.

Reservation for category (iii) was also upheld. It was mandatory for teachers in medical colleges to have a postgraduate degree for their future promotions. They thus formed a separate elan by themselves and the classification was based on an intelligible differentia having rational nexus to the object of the rule. The teachers being constantly in touch with medical subjects could be validly exempted from the entrance examination.

---

57. AIR 1996 SC 2066 : (1996) 4 SCC 60.
58. AIR 1997 SC 788 : (1997) 2 SCC 171.
59. AIR 2000 SC 72 : (2000) 1 SCC 44.

Reservation for category (iv) was quashed as per the reasoning in State of U.P. v. Pradip Tandon[60] and Dinesh II,[61] rural element could not be the basis of any classification.

There was absolutely no controversy as regards category (i) which was in pursuance of several earlier pronouncements of the Supreme Court.[62]

In a recent case, A.I.I.M.S. Students' Union v. A.I.I.M.S.,[63] the Supreme Court has given its powerful support to the test of merit over that of reservation for admission to post-graduate medical courses. The All India Institute of Medical Sciences situated at Delhi is a premier medical institution in India. It runs several post graduate courses. For admission to these courses, the Institute holds an All India Entrance Examination. The Institute followed a rule of reserving 40% seats in these courses for its medical graduates irrespective of their performance in the entrance examination. This resulted in internal students with low marks at the entrance examination being admitted at the cost of other students with higher marks. Accordingly, the rule was challenged and the Supreme Court quashed it. The Court permitted 25% reservation for Institute graduate with the rider that a uniform minimum cut-off of 50% marks at the competitive entrance examination be followed for all students and that the margin of difference between the qualifying marks for Institute's candidates and the general category candidates should not be too wide.

The Court ruled : "Such a reservation based on institutional continuity in the absence of any relevant evidence in justification thereof is unconstitutional and violative of Art. 14 of the Constitution and has therefore to be struck down".[64]

The Court also pointed out that institutional reservation is not supported by the Constitution or constitutional principles. "A certain degree of preference for students of the same institution intending to prosecute further studies therein is permissible on grounds of convenience, suitability and familiarity with an educational environment. Such preference has to be reasonable and not excessive.… Minimum standards cannot be so diluted as to become practically non-existent."[65]

(b) PREETI SRIVASTAVA

The Supreme Court has rendered a momentous decision in Dr. Preeti Sagar Srivastva v. State of Madhya Pradesh.[66]

The factual context in which this case arose was as follows: For admission to post-graduate degree/diploma courses in medicine, candidates were required to appear at an entrance examination. The State Government fixed a cut-off percentage of 45% marks in this examination for admission of the general category students while no cut off percentage of marks was fixed for SC/ST candidates. This meant that there was no minimum qualifying marks in the entrance examination prescribed for the reserved category candidates for admission to the post-graduate medical courses. This was challenged and the Supreme Court quashed

60. Supra, footnote 25.
61. Supra, footnote 49.
62. Supra.
63. (2002) 1 SCC 428 : AIR 2001 SC 3262.
64. Ibid, 461.
65. Ibid, 459.
66. AIR 1999 SC 2894 : (1999) 7 SCC 120.

the same in Dr. Sadhna Devi v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[67] with the remark that if this was done, merit would be sacrificed altogether.

The Supreme Court was of the opinion that even for the reserved category candidates, there should be some minimum qualifying marks if not the same as prescribed as bench marks for general category students. Thus, there cannot be zero qualifying marks for reserved category candidates in the entrance test for admission to the post-graduate courses. The government having installed the system of holding an admission test, would not be entitled to do away with the requirement of obtaining minimum qualifying marks for the special category candidates. The government cannot say that even if these candidates have not obtained even the minimum qualifying marks they must still be selected for post-graduate courses. This amounts to rendering the admission test an idle formality because these candidates would qualify for admission even though they did not secure any marks. This thus amounts to sacrificing merit altogether. This could not be done. Therefore, if these students fail to secure the minimum qualifying marks, then the seats reserved for them should not go waste but should be released for the candidates of the general category. Otherwise there would be a national loss.[68]

In sum, in Sadhna, the Supreme Court insisted that for admission to post-graduate medical course, there ought to be prescribed a minimum cut off percentage of marks at the entrance examination for Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and other Backward Classes. It would be unconstitutional as being violative of the right to equality to keep this cut off point at zero percent.

As a sequel to the Sadhna ruling, the State of Uttar Pradesh prescribed a Post-Graduate Medical Entrance Examination for admission to Post-Graduate Degree/Diploma Course in medicine and fixed a cut-off percentage of 45 at the entrance examination for the general category candidates for admission to the post-graduate medical course. But for admission of reserved category candidates, the cut-off percentage was fixed at 20%. In addition, 50% of the seats in the post-graduate course were reserved for Scheduled Castes, Scheduled tribes and Backward classes candidates. A similar scheme was laid down in Madhya Pradesh. The Supreme Court was called upon to adjudge the validity of these schemes vis-à-vis Art. 15(4). However, in Preeti Sagar the Supreme Court did not express any opinion on the question whether reservation of seats is permissible at the post-graduate level in medicine as this question was not debated before it. The Court only examined the question whether lower qualifying marks could be prescribed for admission of reserved category candidates.

The Court has pointed out in Preeti Sagar that Arts. 15(3) and 15(4) permit compensatory or protective discrimination in favour of certain classes. Every policy pursued under Article 15(4) makes a departure from the equality norm for the benefit of the backward. Therefore, it has to be designed and worked in a manner conducive to the ultimate building up of an egalitarian non-discriminatory society. That is its final constitutional justification. Therefore, programmes and policies of compensatory discrimination under Art. 15(4) have to be designed and pursued to achieve this ultimate national interest. At the same time, these programmes cannot be unreasonable or arbitrary, nor can they be executed in a manner which undermines other vital public interests or the general good of all. "All public policies, therefore, in this area have to be tested on the anvil of reasonableness and ultimate public good….Art. 15(4) also must be used, and policies under it framed, in a reasonable manner consistently with the ultimate public interests."[69]

67. AIR 1997 SC 1120 : (1997) 3 SCC 90.
68. Ibid, at 1124.

The Court has emphasized: "Consideration of national interest and the interests of the community or society as a whole cannot be ignored in determining the reasonableness of a special provision under Article 15(4)."[70]

Any special provision under Art. 15(4) has to balance the importance of having, at the higher levels of education, students who are meritorious and who have secured admission on their merit, as against the social equity of giving compensatory benefit of admissions to the SC/ST candidates who are in a disadvantaged position. Selection of the right calibre of students is essential in the public interest at the level of specialised post-graduate education. Special provisions for SC/ST candidates at the speciality level have to be minimal.

In the interest of selecting suitable candidates for specialised education, it is necessary that the common entrance examination be of a standard and qualifying marks are prescribed for passing that examination. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has refused to accept the argument that there need not be any qualifying marks prescribed for the qualifying examination for admission to the post-graduate medical courses as the candidates have already passed the M.B.B.S. examination which is the essential pre-requisite to post-graduate medical courses.

The Court has ruled that even if minimum qualifying marks can be lower for the reserved categories candidates, there cannot be a wide disparity between the minimum qualifying marks for the reserved category candidates as against the general category candidates at the post-graduate level. This disparity must be minimal. The Court has held that the disparity between 20% marks for the reserved category and 45% marks for the general category is too great a disparity "to sustain the public interest at the level of post-graduate medical training and education". This is contrary to the mandate of Art. 15(4).

The Court has not itself laid down how much relaxation can be given to the reserved category candidates in the matter of minimum qualifying marks as compared to the general candidates. The Court has left the matter for decision to the Medical Council of India "since it affects standards of post-graduate medical education."[71]

An argument was advanced before the Court that if the threshold requirement for admission of SC/ST candidates was high then the seats allotted to them in medical colleges would not be filled up. The Court rejecting the argument maintained that the purpose of higher education is not to just fill seats by lowering standards. The purpose is to impart education to the SC/ST candidates and to enable them to rise to the standards which are expected of persons having the post-graduate medical qualification. While Art. 15(4) provides for protective discrimination in favour of the weaker sections, one cannot also ignore the wider interests of society while devising special provisions for them. A large differen-

69. AIR 1999 SC 2894 at 2904 : (1999) 7 SCC 120.
70. Ibid., at 2905.
71. Ibid., at 2909.

tiation of the qualifying marks between the two groups of students would make it very difficult to maintain the requisite standard of teaching and training at the post-graduate level.

The Court has also ruled in Preeti Sagar that at the level of super-specialization, there cannot be any special provision as it is contrary to national interest. Merit alone can be the basis of selection. This means that no reservation can be made in the super-speciality courses in favour of the reserved classes because any dilution of merit at this stage would adversely affect the national goal of having the best possible candidates at the highest levels of professional and educational training. "Opportunities for such training are few and it is in the national interest that these are made available to those who can profit from them, viz; the best brains in the country, irrespective of the class to which they belong."[72] To this extent, the Court has overruled its earlier decision in Post-Graduate Institute of Medical Education and Research, Chandigarh v. K.L. Narasimham. However, at the next lower stage of post-graduate level, there could be some nominal reservation, but the question has not been finally decided in Preeti Sagar.

So far as admission to the M.B.B.S. Course is concerned, at one stage, the Court did agree that while in the entrance examination for admission to the M.B.B.S. course, a cut off point is fixed as regards the minimum marks which a general candidate must obtain to get admission, there need be no such limit for the reserve categories candidates. For example, in State of Madhya Pradesh v. Nivedita Jain,[73] an order issued by the M.P. Government dispensing with the requirement of obtaining any minimum qualifying marks in the pre-medical entrance examination for admission to the M.B.B.S. course for SC/ST candidates has been held valid. The order was passed because of the paucity of qualified SC/ST candidates. The factual context in which the order was passed was as follows: The State reserved 15% seats each for SC and ST candidates for admission to the M.B.B.S. course. This meant 108 seats each for the two groups out of a total of 720 seats. When the result of the Pre-Medical entrance examination was published, only 18 SC candidates and 2 ST candidates qualified. In view of the large unfilled quota of SC/ST candidates, the State completely relaxed the condition relating to the minimum qualifying marks for these two categories. Upholding the relaxation, the Court argued that the relaxation in the admission qualification would not effect any relaxation in the standard of medical education or curriculum of studies in medical colleges for those candidates after their admission to the college, and the standard of examination and the curriculum would remain the same for all students.

But now the Supreme Court has changed its opinion as appears from Preeti Sagar. The Court has specifically disagreed with the view expressed by it in several earlier cases that the process of selection of candidates for admission to medical colleges has no real impact on the standard of medical education.[74] The Court has observed in Preeti Sagar:

---

72. AIR 1997 SC 3687 : (1997) 6 SCC 283; supra.
73. AIR 1981 SC 2045 : (1981) 4 SCC 296.
74. Nivedita Jain, supra; Ajay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1994) 4 SCC 401; Post-Graduate Institute of Medical Education & Research v. K.L. Narasimham, (1997) 6 SCC 283 : AIR 1997 SC 3687.

> "…the criteria for the selection of candidates have an important bearing on the standard of education which can be effectively imparted in the medical colleges. We cannot agree with the proposition that prescribing no minimum qualifying marks for admission for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes would not have an impact on the standard of education in the medical colleges."

The Court has now disagreed with the view expressed in earlier cases that since all students pass the same examination, standards of education are maintained and it does not matter even if students of lower merit are admitted.[75]

This approach of the Supreme Court is most welcome as it is a very important step towards maintenance of a semblance of standard in medical education. Weak students are bound to pull down the level of teaching as the teacher has to tone down his teaching to the level of weak students in the class. If the teacher talks at a higher level then it will pass over the heads of weak students. Accordingly, the better students will be the sufferer as the weaker students always act as a drag on the entire class.

75. Also see, supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iii)(d).

CHAPTER XXIII

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS (4)
RIGHT TO EQUALITY (iii)

SYNOPSIS

A. EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY IN PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT

Article16(1) is a facet of Art. 14. Arts. 14 and 16(1) are closely interconnected. Art. 16(1) takes its roots from Art. 14. Art. 16(1) particularizes the generality of Art. 14 and identifies, in a constitutional sense, "equality of opportunity" in matters of employment under the state.

An important point of distinction between Arts. 14 and 16 is that while Art. 14 applies to all persons, citizens as well as non-citizens, Art. 16 applies only to citizens and not to non-citizens.

Article16(1) guarantees equality of opportunity to all citizens "in matters relating to employment" or "appointment to any office" under the state. According to Art. 16(2), no citizen can be discriminated against, or be ineligible for any employment or office under the state, on the grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, descent, place of birth or residence or any of them.

Adherence to the rule of equality in public employment is a being feature of our constitution and the rule of law is its core, the Court cannot disable itself from making an order inconsistent with Articles 14 and 16 of the Constitution.[1]

Article16(2) is also an elaboration of a facet of Art. 16(1). These two clauses thus postulate the universality of Indian citizenship. As there is common citizenship, residence qualification is not required for service in any State.

Public employment is a facet of right to equality envisaged under Article 16 of the Constitution of India. The State although is a model employer, its right to create posts and recruit people therefor emanates from the statutes or statutory rules and/or rules framed under the proviso appended to Article 309 of the Constitution of India. The recruitment rules are to be framed with a view to give equal opportunity to all the citizens of India entitled for being considered for recruitment in the vacant posts.[2]

On a comparative basis, Art. 16 deals with a very limited subject, viz., public employment. On the other hand, the scope of Art. 15(1) is much wider as it covers the entire range of state activities. The ambit of Art. 16(2) is restrictive in scope than that of Art. 15(1)[3] because Art. 16(2) is confined to employment or office under the state, meaning services under the Central and State Governments and their instrumentalities. However, Art. 15 being more general in nature covers many varied situations of discrimination. Further, the prohibited grounds of discrimination under Art. 16(2) are somewhat wider than those under Art. 15(2) be-

---

1. Reserve Bank of India v. Gopinath Sharma, (2006) 6 SCC 221 : AIR 2006 SC 2614.
2. Principal, Mehar Chand Polytechnic v. Anu Lamba, (2006) 7 SCC 161 : AIR 2006 SC 3074.
3. Supra, Ch. XXII.

cause Art. 16(2) prohibits discrimination on the additional grounds of descent and residence apart from religion, race, caste, sex and place of birth.

Article 15 does not mention 'descent' and 'residence' as the prohibited grounds of discrimination, whereas Art. 16 does. Thus, with regard to the grounds of discrimination, Art. 15 is somewhat narrower than Art. 16. What Art. 16 guarantees is that all citizens in matters of state service shall be treated alike under like circumstances both in privileges and obligations. There should be no discrimination between one employee and another on the basis of any prejudice, bias or any extraneous ground.

The word 'discrimination' in Art. 16(2) involves an element of unfavourable vice. As already noted, Art. 14 guarantees right of equality generally; Arts. 15 and 16 are instances of the same right of equality in specific situations. Art. 14 is the genus while Art. 16 is a species. Arts. 14 and 16 form part of the same constitutional code of guarantees and supplement each other. In other words, Art. 16 is only an instance of the application of the general rule of equality laid down in Article 14 and it should be construed as such. Accordingly, 'equality' in Art. 16(1) means equality as between member of the same class of employees, and not equality between members of separate, independent, classes.

Equal protection of the laws does not postulate equal treatment of all persons without distinction; it merely guarantees the application of the same laws alike without discrimination to all persons similarly situated.[4] Therefore, Art. 16 does not bar a reasonable classification of employees or reasonable tests for selection. Equality of opportunity of employment means selection. Equality of opportunity of employment means equality as between members of the same class of employees and not equality between members of separate, independent, classes. There can be no denial of equality of opportunity unless the person who complains of discrimination is equally situated with the person or persons who are alleged to have been favoured. Those who are similarly circumstanced are entitled to equal treatment.

To illustrate the above proposition, reference may be made to Bagari.[5] The Army Act classifies army officers into various categories based on the requirements of the armed forces. The Supreme Court has ruled that such a classification cannot be regarded as arbitrary. Art. 14 or 16 is not violated if different pay, perks or other privileges are granted to these officers. Thus, the distinction drawn between the commissioned officers, on the one hand, and the non-commissioned officers, on the other, in the matter of grant of study leave is not "discriminatory, arbitrary or irrational". It cannot be said that this distinction in the instant case is not founded on any intelligible differentia and that it has no relation with the object sought to be achieved. The character and duties of the two classes of officers are different.[6]

The State cannot amend the statutory rules adversely affecting the pension of retired employees with retrospective effect who became entitled to the benefits of

---

4. All India Station Masters' and Assistant Station Masters' Association Delhi v. Gen. Man., Central Railway, AIR 1960 SC 384 : (1960) 2 SCR 311; Jagannath Prasad Sharma v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1961 SC 1245; Indian Rly. SAS Staff Association v. Union of India, (1998) 2 SCC 651 : AIR 1998 SC 805.

5. Union of India v. S.C. Bagari, AIR 1999 SC 1412 : (1999) 3 SCC 709.

6. Ibid., at 1415.

the revised scales of pay, and consequently to the pension calculated on such basis[7]

Article 16(1) is much wider in scope than Art. 16(2) and the grounds of discrimination expressly mentioned in Art. 16(2) are not exhaustive. Art. 16(2) brings out emphatically, in a negative form, what is guaranteed affirmatively by Art. 16(1). Discrimination is a double edged weapon; it would operate in favour of some persons but against some others. Art. 16(2) prohibits discrimination and, thus, assures the effective enforcement of the Fundamental Right guaranteed in Art. 16(1).

The emphasis in Art. 16(2) is on the word 'only'. Where there is discrimination only on the grounds mentioned therein, that Article may be attracted; but where discrimination is based partly on one such ground and partly on some other ground not mentioned in Art. 16(2), the matter may fall under Art. 16(1), but not under Art. 16(2). If the other ground is relevant for the purpose of appointment to the post, there is no contravention of the constitutional provision.

Article 16 uses the term 'office' which is synonymous with the term 'office' used in Arts. 102(a) and 191(a) discussed earlier.[8] 'Office' means a subsisting, permanent, substantive position, having an existence independent of the person who fills it, which is filled in succession by successive holders and which has more or less a public character to which duties are attached.[9]

The equality guaranteed by Art. 16(1) takes within its fold all stages of service. The expression 'matters relating to employment' in Art. 16(1) is not restricted only to the initial stage of appointment; the expression "appointment to an office" in Art. 16(1) does not mean merely the initial appointment. Art. 16(1) includes all matters in relation to employment both prior, and subsequent, to the employment which are incidental to the employment or which form part of the terms and conditions of such employment, such as, salary, periodical increments, leave, promotion, fixation of seniority, gratuity, pension, superannuation and even termination of employment. The guarantee of Art. 16(1) could become illusory if narrowly construed, for then the state could comply with its formal requirement by affording equality at the initial stage, but defeat its object by making discriminatory provisions as regards other matters subsequently.[10]

Articles 16(1) and 16(2) give effect to Arts. 14 and 15. All these Articles form part of the same constitutional code of guarantees and supplement each other. Art. 16(1) should, therefore, be construed in a broad and general way, and not in a pedantic and technical way. When so construed, the expression "matters relating to employment" cannot mean merely matters prior to the act of appointment nor can "appointment to any office" mean merely the initial appointment; it must include all matters relating to employment, whether prior or subsequent to the

---

7. U.P. Raghavendra Acharya v. State of Karnataka, (2006) 9 SCC 630 : AIR 2006 SC 2145.
8. Supra, Chs. II and VI.
9. Kanta Kathuria v. Manak Chand Surana, supra, Ch. II*; State of U.P. v. Bhola Nath*, AIR 1972 All. 460.
10. Gen. Manager, S. Rly. v. Rangachari, AIR 1962 SC 36 : (1962) 2 SCR 586; Ganga Ram v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 2178 : (1970) 1 SCC 377; State of Kerala v. Thomas, AIR 1976 SC 490 : (1976) 2 SCC 310; ABSK Sangh (Rly.) v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 298 : (1981) 1 SCC 246.

employment, or whether these are either incidental to such employment or form part of its terms and conditions.[11]

The protection of Arts. 14 and 16 is available even to a temporary government servant if he has been arbitrarily discriminated against and singled out for harsh treatment in preference to his juniors, similarly circumstanced.[12]

As under Art. 14, so under Art. 16, equality cannot be a mathematical equality. Reasonable classification is permissible for various purposes relating to employment. The onus to establish discrimination is on him who asserts it. He has to show that the classification does not rest on any just or reasonable basis.[13] Thus, differentiation made between graduate and non-graduate supervisors in the matter of promotion has been held not to be violative of Art. 16.

A warning has however been sounded against "mini-classifications based on micro-distinctions".[14] "Every inconsequential differentiation between two things does not constitute the vice of discrimination, if law clubs them together ignoring venial variances." But when recruitment rules are made, employer is bound to comply with the same and in case of non compliance the appointment would be ultra vires the regulations as well as Articles 14 and 16 where the employer is a state owned or operated corporation.[15]

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

An incident of sexual harassment of a female at the place of work, amounts to violation of her Fundamental Right to gender equality under Art. 16(2).[16]

B. MATTERS OF EMPLOYMENT

(a) SERVICE CONDITIONS

Under Art. 309, rules regulating service conditions of government servants can be made by the government,[17] but such rules have to stand the tests of Arts. 14 and 16 and, thus, have to be reasonable and fair and not grossly unjust.[18] In the absence of a rule or regulation, service conditions may be prescribed by executive instructions.

The legal position of a government servant is more one of status rather than that of contract and his rights and duties are no longer determined by contract or consent of parties but by statutes or statutory rules, which may be unilaterally

---

11. State of Kerala v. Thomas, AIR 1976 SC 490 : (1976) 2 SCC 310; see, infra; Akhil Bharatiya Soshit Karamchari Sangh (Railway) v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 298 : (1981) 1 SCC 246.

12. Govt. Branch Press v. D.B. Belliappa, AIR 1979 SC 429 : (1979) 1 SCC 477.

13. Mohd. Shujat Ali v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1631 : (1975) 3 SCC 76. Also, Prabhakar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1976 SC 1093 : (1976) 2 SCC 890.

14. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. T.N. Khosa, AIR 1974 SC 1; State of Kerala v. T.P. Roshana, AIR 1979 SC 765, 770 : (1979) 2 SCR 974.

15. National Fertilizers Ltd. v. Somvir Singh, (2006) 5 SCC 493 : AIR 2006 SC 2319.

16. Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A.K. Chopra, AIR 1999 SC 625 : (1999) 1SCC 759.
For further discussion on this question, see, infra, Chs. XXVI and XXXIV.

17. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.

18. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ramgopal, AIR 1981 SC 1041 : (1981) 3 SCC 1.
For further discussion on Art. 309, see, infra, Ch. XXXVI.

altered without the consent of the employees.[19] But these rules have to be consistent with the Fundamental Rights.[20]

Reading Arts. 14 and 16 together, the Supreme Court has laid down several propositions regulating various aspects of service—from appointment to dismissal—of public servants. The endeavour of the Court has been to eliminate administrative discrimination, favouritism, arbitrariness and misuse of power from this area.

Seniority is not a Fundamental Right. It is merely a civil right. Article 16 is applicable in the case of an appointment. It does not speak of fixation of seniority.[21] Unilateral change of status of its employee by an instrumentality of the State is arbitrary violating Arts. 14 and 16.[22]

(b) APPOINTMENT

Appointments can be made under executive power if no statutory service rules have been made. In the case noted below,[23] power to make service rules for improvement trusts in the State vested in the State Government, but no such rules were made. The Supreme Court ruled that, in the absence of the rules, a trust could make appointments under its administrative power. The Court enunciated the following proposition: "In the absence of any statutory rules governing the service conditions of the employees, the executive instructions and/or decisions taken administratively would operate in the field; appointments/promotions can be made in accordance with such executive instructions, administrative directions".

But if statutory rules are made, then the executive power to make appointments has to be exercised in accordance with them. The executive power can supplement the rules by filling the gaps therein, but cannot supplant the same.[24] Appointments ought to be made strictly according to the rules. Appointments made in violation of the rules infringe Arts. 14 and 16 and, as such, the government cannot later regularise them.[25]

If ad hoc appointments have been made de hors the rules, these appointees ought to be replaced as soon as possible by regularly selected persons according to the rules. Such a temporary employee can also compete along with others for such regular selection. If he is selected, well and good; if he is not selected, he

---

19. Calcutta Dock Labour Board v. Jaffar Imam, AIR 1966 SC 282 : (1965) 3 SCR 453; Roshanlal Tandon v. Union of India, AIR 1967 SC 1889 : (1968) 1 SCR 185; Sirsi Municipality v. Cecelia Francis Tellis, AIR 1973 SC 855 : (1973) 1 SCC 409; D.T.C. v. D.T.C. Mazdoor Congress, AIR 1991 SC 101, 186.

20. Chairman, Railway Board v. C.R. Rangadhamaiah, AIR 1997 SC 3828 : (1997) 6 SCC 623. For discussion on rule-making power under Art. 309, see, infra, Ch. XXXVI.

21. Bimlesh Tanwar v. State of Haryana, (2003) 5 SCC 604 : AIR 2003 SC 2000.

22. BALCO Captive Power Plant Mazdoor Sangh v. National Thermal Power Corpn. (2007) 14 SCC 234 : AIR 2008 SC 336.

23. Nagpur Improvement Trust v. Yadaorao Jagannath Kumbhare, (1999) 8 SCC 99 : AIR 1999 SC 3084.

24. J&K Public Service Commission v. Narinder Mohan, AIR 1994 SC 1808 : (1994) 2 SCC 630.

25. State of Orissa v. S. Mohapatra, (1993) 2 SCC 486 : AIR 1993 SC 1650; Dr. M.A. Haque v. Union of India, (1993) 2 SCC 213; J&K Public Service Comm. v. Dr. Narendra Mohan, (1994) 2 SCC 630 : AIR 1994 SC 1808.

must give way to the regularly selected candidates. The government cannot relax rules for appointment. The Supreme Court has observed in this connection:[26]

> "Backdoor ad hoc appointments at the behest of power source or otherwise and recruitment according to rules are mutually antagonistic and strange bed partners. They cannot co-exist in the same sheath. The former is in negation of fair play. The later are the product of order and regularity."

Ad hoc appointees who had been working for more than 13 years asked for regularisation of their appointments. The Supreme Court refused. Under the rules, regular appointments were to be made by the Public Service Commission. The principle is that recruitment to the service ought to be governed by the service rules and ought to be made by the appropriate authority. Consequently, ad hoc appointments would be only temporary appointments de hors the rules pending regular recruitment without conferring any right to regularisation of service.[27]

These qualifications to regularization have ultimately resulted in the Supreme Court declaring the regularization route impermissible. In Umadevi(3)[28] a Constitution Bench held that any public employment has to be in terms of the Constitutional scheme. The Court also lamentably referred to the Courts' (perhaps including the Supreme Court also) issuing orders for regularizing recruitment.

The argument advanced on behalf of the employees that an equity has arisen in their favour as a result of such appointments and their continuance of working was repelled by the Court. It also pointed out that the concept of "equal pay for equal work" is different from the concept of conferring permanency on those who have been appointed on adhoc or temporary or on no process of selection as envisaged in the concerned rules. Such regularization would also attract the vice of treating "unequals as equal" violating Articles 14 and 16.

Appointments fall within the executive sphere, and can be made under administrative directions without formal rules having been made. But posts and conditions of service should be advertised before making the selections so that every one eligible for the posts may have an opportunity of being considered by the appointing authority.[29]

When a rule requires that before appointment to a post, it should be suitably publicised, appointment made to the post without publicity is invalid.[30] An authority must be rigorously held to the standards by which it professes its action to be judged.[31] Also, compliance with such a rule seems to be necessary in the

---

26. J.K. Public Service Comm. v. Dr. Narinder Mohan, (1994) 2 SCC 630, 637 : AIR 1994 SC 1808.
Also, State of Haryana v. Piara Singh, (1992) 4 SCC 118; V. Sreenivasa Reddy v. Govt. of A.P., AIR 1995 SC 586 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 572.

27. J&K Public Service Comm. v. Dr. Narinder Mohan, supra.
Also, Dr. Surinder Singh Jamwal v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1996 SC 2775 : (1996) 9 SCC 619.

28. Secretary, State of Karnataka v. Umadevi (3), (2006) 4 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 1806.

29. B.N. Nagarajan v. State of Mysore, AIR 1966 SC 1942 : (1966) 3 SCR 682; supra.
But see, State of U.P. v. Bhola Nath, AIR 1972 All. 460, saying that advertisement may not be necessary in some situations, e.g., for filling the posts of government law officers who are appointed from the Bar to look after government work in the High Court.

30. B.S. Minhas v. Indian Statistical Institute, AIR 1984 SC 363, 371 : (1983) 4 SCC 582.

31. R.D. Shetty v. International Airport Authority, AIR 1979 SC 1628, 1635 : (1979) 3 SCC 489; supra, Ch. XXI.

name of fairplay. If a vacancy is advertised, all eligible persons may apply and the selection committee will have a large field to choose from. There will be no doubt of arbitrariness in the minds of eligible candidates for the post.[32]

Only so many posts ought to be filled as are advertised. It would be an improper exercise of power to make appointments over and above the posts advertised. It is only in a rare and exceptional circumstance and emergency situation that this rule can be deviated from. It is not as a matter of course that the appointing authority can fill up posts over and above those advertised. It should be clearly spelled out under what policy such a decision has been taken. Exercise of such power has to be tested on the touchstone of reasonableness.[33]

Where selection is to be made only on the basis of interview, and the number of applications for the posts are enormous with reference to the number of posts available to be filled up, the selection board should adopt some rational and reasonable basis to short list the candidates who have to be called for interview. The Supreme Court has decried the practice of calling a large number of candidates for interview for each post as it gives an opportunity for manipulation. Also, when large number of candidates have to be interviewed, interviews tend to be casual, superficial and sloppy and the true personality of the candidates cannot be assessed properly.[34]

Reasonable rules can be made, qualifications laid down,[35] or reasonable selective tests and processes employed, for making selections for any employment.[36] This means that there should be reasonable relation between the prescribed test for suitability of the candidate and the post as such.[37] It is permissible for the government to prescribe appropriate qualifications for appointment or promotion to various posts.[38] Qualifications for a particular post can be a "rational differentia" within the meaning of Art. 16. Prescription of stenographic ability of 100 words per minute is a relevant qualification.

Educational qualification is an acceptable criterion for determining suitability for an appointment to a particular post or cadre. For example, a requirement that the professor in orthopaedics must have a post-graduate degree in the particular speciality is valid.[39] Prescribing a first or second class post-graduate degree for the head of an educational institution has a direct nexus with the object of excellence sought to be achieved, and it cannot be said to be discriminatory. The posts of principals are not purely administrative; the principals have to take up teaching work in addition to their administrative duties.[40]

---

32. The Court has cautioned that the rule of advertising or publicising the vacancy cannot apply to each and every post, such as, high constitutional posts as there is no provision for publicity in such cases.

33. Surinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1998 SC 18 : (1997) 8 SCC 488.

34. M.P. Public Service Comm. v. Navnit Kumar Potdar, AIR 1995 SC 77 : (1994) 6 SCC 293; State of Haryana v. Subash Chander Marwaha, AIR 1973 SC 2216 : (1974) 3 SCC 220; Ashok Kumar Yadav v. State of Haryana, AIR 1987 SC 454 : (1985) 4 SCC 417.

35. Banarasi Dass v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1956 SC 520 : 1956 SCR 357.

36. Rules for selection were held violative of Arts. 14 and 16 in State of Maharashtra v. Raj Kumar, AIR 1982 SC 1301 : (1982) 3 SCC 313.

37. In State of Maharashtra v. Raj Kumar, supra, footnote 36, rules for selection for certain posts were quashed as there was no nexus between the rules and the object sought to be achieved.

38. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Shiv Ram Sharma, AIR 1999 SC 2012 : (1999) 3 SCC 653.

39. Union of India v. Dr. Kohli, AIR 1973 SC 811 : (1973) 3 SCC 592.

40. B. Venkata Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1983 S C 1108 : (1984) 1 SCC 645.

Educational qualifications can be made the basis for classification of employees in State service in the matter of pay scales, promotion, etc. Higher pay scale can be prescribed for employees possessing higher qualifications.[41] Similarly, in the matter of promotion, classification on the basis of educational qualification so as to deny eligibility to a higher post to an employer possessing lesser qualifications is valid. Educational qualifications can justifiably be made the basis for qualification for the purpose of promotion to the higher post.[42]

A candidate for appointment for a post must have the requisite qualifications prescribed in the rules.[43] When qualification has been prescribed for a post, that cannot be obliterated by posting those who do not fulfil that qualification as against those who have that qualification.[44]

For selection to an ex-cadre selection post, seniority is not relevant; the government can appoint to such a post a person whom it considers as the most suitable, and the Court will not interfere except on the ground of mala fides.[45]

Appointments based on the hereditary principle are bad because 'descent' is a prohibited ground of discrimination under Art. 16(2).[46] Abolition of hereditary posts of village officers is neither arbitrary nor unreasonable because such posts are feudalistic in character and anachronisms in the modern age.[47] A provision in the Punjab Police Rules, 1934, provided for giving preference in recruitment to sons and near relations of the police personnel. The provision was held to be invalid vis-a-vis Arts. 16(1) and (2).[48]

For the combined competitive examination—civil services examination, 1979, the candidates hailing from the Eastern States (Mizoram, Meghalaya, Negaland etc.) were given an option to take or not to take the paper on Indian languages. This was held to be non-discriminatory as these States have handicaps in the matter of language. These linguistically less advanced groups who are outside the Eighth Schedule to the Constitution may suffer serious disabilities if forced to take examinations in the languages set out in that Schedule. "This concession is not contravention of equality but conducive to equality. It helps a handicapped group and does not hamper those who are ahead."[49]

Appointment of candidates by 'pick and choose' without preparing any merit list amounts to an arbitrary exercise of power.[50]

---

41. State of Mysore v. P. Narasingh Rao, AIR 1968 SC 349; V. Markandeya v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1989 SC 1308.
42. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Triloki Nath Khosa, AIR 1974 SC 1 : (1974) 1 SCC 19; Roop Chand Adalakha v. Delhi Development Authority, AIR 1989 SC 307 : 1989 Supp (1) SCC 116; RSEB Accountants Association, Jaipur v. RSEB, AIR 1997 SC 882 : (1997) 3 SCC 103; J.N. Goel v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 729 : (1997) 2 SCC 440.
43. M.C. Bindal v. R.C. Singh, AIR 1989 SC 134 : (1989) 1 SCC 136.
44. Subhash Chand v. Delhi Electricity Supply Undertaking, AIR 1981 SC 75.
45. J.N. Sharma v. State of Bihar, AIR 1971 SC 1318.
46. Gazula Dasharatha Rama Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1961 SC 564 : (1961) 2 SCR 931.
47. K. Rajendran v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1982 SC 1107 : (1982) 2 SCC 273.
48. Yogender Pal Singh v. Union of India, (1987) 1 SCC 631.
49. Javed Niaz Beg v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 794 : 1980 Supp SCC 155.
For the Eighth Schedule to the Constitution, see, supra, Ch. XVI.
50. State of Bihar v. Kaushal Kishore Singh, AIR 1997 SC 2643.

Generally speaking, the judicial approach is that appointments ought to be made on the basis of a written test plus a viva voce test and not solely on the basis of a viva voce test. While viva voce is an important factor, it ought not to be the sole factor in the process of selection. The reason is that reliance thereon may lead to "sabotage of the purity of the proceedings". There is always room for suspicion if common appointments are made through oral interview only. There may be posts requiring persons of mature personality and such posts may be filled solely on the basis of a viva voce test. The Supreme Court has ruled in Praveen Singh v. State of Punjab[51] that the posts of block development officers at the panchayat level in the State do not require persons of mature personality and, therefore, appointment to these posts ought to be made on the basis of a written test and viva voce and not solely through viva voce.[52]

An individual applicant for any particular post does not get any right to be enforced by a mandamus unless and until he is selected in the process of selection and gets the letter of appointment.[53] Mere inclusion of a candidate's name in the list of selected candidates does not confer on him any indefeasible right to be appointed unless the relevant rules so indicate. Such a candidate could feel aggrieved by his non-appointment only when the Administration does so either arbitrarily or for no valid or bona fide reason.[54]

Merely because the name of a candidate has been placed on the waiting list, it does not confer on him any right of being appointed to any post.[55] A waiting list can remain in force only for a reasonable time and not in infinitum so that other qualified persons are not deprived of their chance of applying for the posts in the succeeding years and being selected for appointment.[56] A waiting list cannot be used as a perennial source of recruitment filling up the vacancies not advertised.

A candidate put on the waiting list cannot be appointed to a post arising subsequently without notifying the same for recruitment. Under Arts. 14 and 16, every one is entitled to claim consideration for appointment to a post under the State. The vacant posts arising or expected should be notified. No one can be appointed without due notification of vacancies and selection according to the rules.[57]

Termination of the services of temporary employees when duly selected candidates are available is valid in law.[58]

---

51. AIR 2001 SC 152 : (2000) 8 SCC 633.

52. See, supra, Ch. XXI on viva voce.
Also see, Lila Dhar v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1981 SC 1777 : (1981) 4 SCC 159.

53. Union of India v. Tarun K. Singh, AIR 2001 SC 2196.

54. State of Haryana v. Subash Chander Narwaha, AIR 1973 SC 2216 : (1974) 3 SCC 220; Shankar Das v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1583; Union Territory of Chandigarh v. Dilbagh Singh, (1993) 1 SCC 154 : AIR 1993 SC 796; State of Bihar v. Secretariat Assistants Successful Examinees Union, (1994) 1 SCC 126 : AIR 1994 SC 736; N. Mohanam v. State of Kerala, AIR 1997 SC 1826.

55. K. Jayamohan v. State of Kerala, AIR 1997 SC 2619 : (1997) 5 SCC 170.

56. Nagar Mahapalika, Kanpur v. Vinod Kumar Srivastava, AIR 1987 SC 847 : (1987) 1 SCC 602; Babita Prasad v. State of Bihar, (1993) Suppl (3) SCC 268.

57. Ashok Kumar v. Chairman, Banking Service Recruitment Board, AIR 1996 SC 976; K. Jayamohan, AIR 1997 SC 2619; Prem Singh v. Haryana State Electricity Board, (1996) 4 SCC 319; Gujarat State Dy. Executive Engineers Ass. v. State of Gujarat, (1994) Supp (2) SCC 591; Surinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1998 SC 18.

58. Surendra Kumar v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1993 SC 115 : (1992) 4 SCC 464.

Articles 16 and 14 do not forbid the government from creating different cadres or categories of posts carrying different emoluments. Also, there is no bar in the way of the state integrating different cadres into one cadre. "It is entirely a matter for the state to decide whether to have several different cadres or one integrated cadre in its services. That is a matter of policy which does not attract the applicability of the equality clause."[59]

The Supreme Court has deprecated the tendency of denying appointment to a person in government service on the ground of his political beliefs. In State of Madhya Pradesh v. Ramashankar Raghuvanshi,[60] the Court has emphasized that one cannot be turned back at the very threshold on the ground of his past political activities. According to the Court "it offends the Fundamental Rights guaranteed by Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution to deny employment to an individual because of his past political affinities, unless such affinities are considered likely to affect the integrity and efficiency of the individual's service.[61] The Court has emphasized that "the whole idea of seeking a police report on the political faith and the past political activity of a candidate for public employment appears to our mind to cut at the very root of the Fundamental Rights of equality of opportunity in the matter of employment, freedom of expression and freedom of association."[62] Report on his involvement in any criminal or subversive activity can however be sought to determine his suitability for public employment.

A State Public Service Commission announced the list of selected candidates for certain posts. Thereafter, the State Government forwarded to the Commission a list of candidates who were also selected for these posts under a rule authorising the Commission to consider any candidate who had requisite qualifications but did not apply. The Supreme Court quashed these appointments holding that the rule was intended not to bypass selections based on merit but only to cover candidates of exceptional merit. Here many of the candidates selected under the rule were found to be less meritorious than those selected earlier.[63]

A rule empowered the State Government to appoint any successful candidate at a service competitive examination to any cadre. A candidate was appointed to a lower cadre while other candidates lower in rank at the examination were appointed to a higher cadre. The rule was held to be discriminatory as it made no provisions for testing the candidate's suitability for a particular cadre, did not give an opportunity to a candidate to join the cadre of his preference and vested arbitrary power of patronage in the government as it could say at its sweet will that a particular candidate was more suitable for a particular cadre.[64]

In Janki Pd. v. State of Jammu & Kashmir,[65] the Supreme Court set aside the selections as it found the interview process to be thoroughly unsatisfactory. The interview committee did not take into account the service records of the candidates and the candidates who had secured even less than 30 per cent marks at the 59. Kishori Mohanlal Bakshi v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1139; Reserve Bank of India v. N.C. Paliwal, AIR 1976 SC 2345, 2357 : (1976) 4 SCC 838.

---

60. AIR 1983 SC 374 : (1983) 2 SCC 145.
61. Ibid., 376.
62. Ibid., 375.
63. Channabasavaih v. State of Mysore, AIR 1965 SC 1293 : (1965) 1 SCR 360.
64. State of Mysore v. Jayaram, AIR 1968 SC 346 : (1968) 1 SCR 349.
65. AIR 1973 SC 930 : (1973) 1 SCC 420.

interview were selected. The Court ruled that selection made on such a poor basis cannot be regarded as a real selection at all.

Where selection was made without interview or fake or ghost interviews, final records were tampered with and documents were fabricated, an inference can be drawn that the whole selection process was motivated by extraneous considerations. The entire selection process was set aside as being arbitrary. The selectees had no right to assume office.[66] The Supreme Court commented on the whole episode as follows:[67]

> "The whole examination and the interview have turned out to be farcical exhibiting base character of those who have been responsible for this sordid episode. It shocks our conscience to come across such a systematic fraud."

Reservation of 25% of posts for sons of bank employees and relaxation of educational qualifications and percentage of marks in their favour for appointment violates Arts. 16(1) and 16(2).[68]

Under Art. 16(2), residential requirement will be unconstitutional as a condition of eligibility for employment or appointment to an office under the State or its instrumentality.[69]

A service rule made by the Andhra Pradesh Government provided for 5% weightage to be given to Telugu medium candidates in the competitive examination held by the Public Service Commission in all Group II Service Examination. The Supreme Court declared the rule invalid vis-à-vis Arts. 14 and 16. The Court ruled that such a rule would frustrate the very concept of recruitment on merits to public posts. The Court also pointed out that the object of Arts. 14 and 16 is to ensure equality to all those who are similarly situated. In other words, all the citizens applying for employment under the State are entitled to be treated alike. If that is so then how having once allowed all candidates having minimum graduation qualification in any medium to compete for the posts, a further special benefit could be given only to the candidates having passed the minimum qualifying examination in the Telugu medium.[70]

A service rule requiring a female employee to obtain written permission of the government before solemnization of her marriage and denial of her right to be appointed on the ground that she was a married woman are discriminatory. The Supreme Court has said:[71]

> "We do not mean to universalize or dogmatise that men and women are equal in all occupations and all situations and do not exclude the need to pragmatise where the requirements of particular employment, the sensitivities of sex or the peculiarities of societal sectors or the handicaps of either sex may compel selectivity. But save where the differentiation is demonstrable, the rule of equality must govern."

---

66. Krishan Yadav v. State of Haryana, AR 1994 SC 2166 : (1994) 4 SCC 165.

67. Ibid, at 2172.
Also see, Union of India v. Tarun K. Singh, AIR 2001 SC 2196 : AIR 2001 SC 2196.

68. Auditor General of India v. G. Ananta Rajeswara Rao, AIR 1994 SC 1521 : (1994) 1 SCC 192.

69. Dr. Pradeep Jain v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1420 : (1984) 3 SCC 654; V.N. Sunanda Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1995 SC 914 : 1995 Supp (2) SCC 235.

70. V.N. Sunanda Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1995 SC 914 : 1995 Supp (2) SCC 235.

71. C.B. Muthamma v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 1868 : (1979) 4 SCC 260.

Giving preference in appointment to government posts on the basis of residence within a district or rural areas of a district has been held to run counter to the peremptory language of Art. 16(2). It has overtones of parochialism and runs counter to "our constitutional ethos founded on unity and integrity of the nation". Residence by itself—be it within a state, region, district or a lesser area within a district—cannot be a ground to accord preferential treatment or reservation, save as provided in Art. 16(3). "It is not possible to compartmentalize the State into districts with a view to offer employment to the residents of that district on a preferential basis."[72]

(c) COMPASSIONATE APPOINTMENT

Appointment on compassionate grounds of a son, daughter or widow to assist the family to relieve economic distress because of the sudden demise in harness of a government servant has been held to be valid vis-a-vis Arts. 16(1) and 16(2). The rationale underlying provision of compassionate appointments to the heirs of the deceased employee is that he was the bread winner for the family and his exit has left the family in the lurch and in precarious and vulnerable economic position.[73]

Appointment in public services on compassionate ground has been carved out, as an exception, in the interests of justice, to the general rule that appointments in the public services should be made strictly on the basis of open invitation of applications and merit and no other mode of appointment nor any other consideration is permissible.[74]

Such an appointment is to be made according to the rules and guidelines that may have been framed by the concerned authority. No person can claim appointment on compassionate grounds in disregard of such rules and guidelines.[75] No such appointment can be made if no post is available. "It will be a gross abuse of power of a public authority to appoint persons when vacancies are not available. If persons are so appointed and paid salaries, it will be a mere misuse of public funds, which is totally unauthorised."[76]

But if a vacancy is available, such an appointment should be made as soon as possible. "It is improper to keep such case pending for years…"[77] Such appointment should be made immediately to redeem the family in distress. In Sushma Gosain,[78] the candidate was kept waiting for four years. Criticising this, the Supreme Court observed: "The denial of appointment is patently arbitrary and cannot be supported in any view of the matter". There was absolutely no reason to make her to wait for such a long time.

A rule denying compassionate employment if the employee dies within two years from the date of superannuation has been held to be valid under Art. 14 as the rule is not discriminatory.[79]

---

72. Kailash Chand Sharma v. State of Rajasthan, (2002) 6 SCC 562 : AIR 2002 SC 2877.
73. Balbir Kaur v. Steel Authority of India Ltd., AIR 2000 SC 1596 : (2000) 6 SCC 493.
74. Indian Bank v. Usha, AIR 1998 SC 866, 874 : (1998) 2 SCC 663.
75. Umesh Kumar Nagpal v. State of Haryana, (1994) 4 SCC 138 : (1994) 3 JT 525.
76. Life Insurance Corp. v. Asha Ramchandra Ambekar, 1994 AIR SCW 1947.
77. Indian Bank v. K. Usha, AIR 1998 SC 566, 874 : (1998) 2 SCC 663.
78. Himachal Road Transport Corporation v. Dinesh Kumar, 1996 AIR SCW 2727 : (1996) 4 SCC 560.
Also see, Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd. v. A. Radhika Thirumalai, AIR 1997 SC 123 : (1996) 6 SCC 394.
79. Smt. Sushma Gosain v. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 1976 : (1989) 4 SCC 468.

The Supreme Court has ruled that compassionate appointment is not to be made as a matter of course but only after examining the financial condition of the family. It is only if the concerned authority is satisfied that, but for the provision of employment, the family of the deceased employee will not be able to meet the crisis that a job is to be offered to an eligible member of the family. Such an appointment can be made only against the lowest post in non-manual and manual categories.[80]

(d) PROBATION

As regards probation, the employer has the prerogative to put an employee on probation and watch his performance.[81]

(e) PROMOTION

No employee has a vested right to promotion but he certainly has the right to be considered for promotion according to the rules. Chances of promotion are not conditions of service and are defeasible by law. A rule which merely affects the chances of promotion does not amount to a change in the conditions of service. But if a rule confers a right of actual promotion, or a right to be considered for promotion, is a service rule.[82] As the Supreme Court has observed in State of Maharashtra v. Chandrakant Anant Kulkarni:[83]

> "Mere chances of promotion are not conditions of service and the fact that there was reduction in the chances of promotion did not tantamount to a change in the conditions of service. A right to be considered for promotion is a term of service, but mere chances of promotion are not".

A change in promotional policy by the Government was challenged by the employee concerned on the ground that, as a result thereof, his service conditions were adversely affected since his chances of promotion were adversely affected thereby. The Supreme Court rejected the challenge saying that a mere chance of promotion is not a condition of service, and the fact that there was reduction in the chances of promotion would not be tantamount to a change in the conditions of service. A right to be considered for promotion is a term of service, chances of promotion are not.[84]

The government can formulate or change the policy regarding promotions but the policy must conform to the principle of equality.[85] Accordingly, promotion

---

Also, West Bengal State Electricity Board v. Samir K. Sarkar, (1999) 7 SCC 672 : AIR 1999 SC 3415.

80. Umesh Kumar Nagpal v. State of Haryana, (1994) 4 SCC 138 : (1994) 4 JT 525.
Also, Smt. Sushma Gosain v. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 1976 : (1989) 4 SCC 468; Director of Edcuation (Secondary) v. Pushpendra Kumar, AIR 1998 SC 2230 : (1998) 5 SCC 192.

81. Ajit Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1983 SC 494 : (1983) 2 SCC 217.

82. High Court of Calcutta v. Amol Kumar Roy, AIR 1962 SC 1704; Mohd. Shujat Ali v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1631 : (1975) 3 SCC 76; Mohd. Bhakar v. Y. Krishna Reddy, 1970 SLR 768 (SC); Ramachandra Shankar Deodhar v. State of Maharashtra, (1974) 1 SCC 317; Syed Khalid Rizvi v. Union of India, (1993) Supp (3) SCC 575; State of Mysore v. G.N. Purohit, 1967 SLR 753 (SC).

83. AIR 1981 SC 1990 : (1981) 4 SCC 130.
Also, K. Jagadeesan v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1072 : (1990) 2 SCC 228.

84. State of West Bengal v. Pranab Ranjan Roy, AIR 1998 SC 1882 : (1998) 3 SCC 209.
Also, Union of India v. S.L. Dutta, AIR 1991 SC 363, 367 : (1991) 1 SCC 505.

85. A.S. Sangwan v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 1545 : 1980 Supp SCC 559.

rules were held to be discriminatory and unjust in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ramgopal.[86]

Persons holding posts in different grades or categories cannot claim equality in matters of promotion. Because of multifarious state activities, persons have to be employed in different cadres and classes. Each class may be a separate entity having its own rules of promotion.[87] The railways provide the guards with a better channel of promotion to higher grade station-masters than to the roadside station-masters. This is not discriminatory as the guards and the station-masters belong to separate categories with separate avenues of promotion. Equality of opportunity cannot be predicated between them.[88] 'Equality' under Art. 16 means equality as between members of the same class of employees and not equality between members of separate, independent classes.

Difficult questions have at times arisen in matters of promotion from lower to a higher grade within the same category. How far distinctions are permissible within the same class for promotion purposes? The general rule is that inequality of opportunity of promotion among members of a single class, which is based on no rational criteria, is not valid under Art. 16.[89]

The Supreme Court, generally speaking, does not countenance non-egalitarian 'micro-distinctions' in the area of promotions. The Supreme Court has warned that the doctrine of classification should not be taken to a point where instead of being a useful servant, it becomes a dangerous master. However, conditions designed to promote efficiency and best service have been accepted as valid, e.g., the basis of seniority-cum-merit.[90] In a State, mamlatdars were recruited partly directly and partly by promotion from a lower grade. But after appointment, all mamlatdars were integrated into one cadre as they had the same designation, pay scale, functions, etc. It was held that as all mamlatdars formed one class, it would not be valid to accord a favoured treatment to the appointed mamlatdars qua the promotee mamlatdars, and thus to discriminate them, for purposes of promotion to the posts of deputy collectors.[91]

Once a cadre is formed by recruiting persons drawn from various departments, there would normally be no justification for discriminating between them by subjecting one class to more onerous terms in the matter of promotional chances.[92] If, however, people being appointed to a cadre from different sources are not fully integrated into one class, then differential rules of further promotion according to the original source may be valid.[93]

---

86. AIR 1981 SC 1041.
87. Sham Sunder v. Union of India, AIR 1969 SC 212 : (1969) 1 SCR 312.
88. All India Station-Masters' Ass. v. Gen. Manager, C. Rly., AIR 1960 SC 384 : (1960) 2 SCR 311.
89. State of Mysore v. Krishna Murthy, AIR 1973 SC 1146 : (1973) 3 SCC 559.
Also, Mohd. Shujat Ali v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1631 : (1975) 3 SCC 76.
90. Union of India. v. V.J. Karnik, AIR 1970 SC 2092 : (1970) 3 SCC 658.
Also, State of Jammu & Kashmir v. T.N. Khosa, AIR 1974 SC 1 : (1974) 1 SCC 19.
91. S.M. Pandit v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1972 SC 252 : (1972) 4 SCC 778.
92. S.L. Sachdev v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 411 : (1980) 4 SCC 562.
93. Ram Lal Wadhwa v. State of Haryana, AIR 1972 SC 1982.
Also, General Manager, S.C. Rly. v. A.V.R. Sidhanti, AIR 1974 SC 1755.
For discrimination in promotion see : Roshan Lal Tandon v. Union of India, AIR 1967 SC 1889 : (1968) 1 SCR 185; Distt. Registrar, Palghat v. M.B. Royakutty, AIR 1979 SC 1060.

Usually, the Supreme Court has upheld classification, for the purposes of promotion, based on educational qualifications. However one has always to bear in mind the facts and circumstances of the case in order to judge the validity of a classification.[1] For example, in Kothandaraman,[2] the Supreme Court has reiterated that higher educational qualification is a permissible basis of classification but the acceptability thereof will depend on the facts and circumstances of each case. In the instant case, the Court found that differentiation between degree holders and diploma holders existed for a long time; that the degree holders were given different designation and gazetted status and a higher scale of pay whereas diploma holders did not enjoy these benefits. Thus, the higher educational qualification had relevance insofar as the higher promotional post was concerned, in view of the nature of the functions and duties attached to that post. "The classification has, therefore, nexus with the object to be achieved." Thus, validity of classification has to be judged on the facts and circumstances of each case.

In the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation, promotion to the post of superintending engineer was available to both degree-holder and diploma-holder executive engineers according to merit-cum-seniority. In 1988, the Corporation passed a resolution reserving 75% of the posts of superintending engineers to degree-holder executive engineers and 25% of these posts to diploma-holder executive engineers. The resolution was challenged on the ground that all executive engineers formed one cadre and did the same kind of work and, therefore, the classification made on the basis of educational qualifications was discriminatory under Arts. 14 and 16. But the Court rejected the contention and held the resolution valid saying that, for the purposes of promotion, a valid classification could be made among the members holding the same post on the basis of their qualifications. The Court also ruled that in the absence of a rule or regulation, service condition could be prescribed by executive instructions.[3]

On the other hand, there are some cases where in the context of the specific facts and circumstances, classification for the purpose of promotion, on the basis of educational qualifications has been held to be not reasonable. In the following case,[4] a quota was fixed between diploma-holders and non-diploma holders among linemen for promotion to line superintendent. The Supreme Court struck down the classification made saying that "all the linemen either diploma-holders or non-diploma-holders are performing the same kind of work and duties and they belong to the same cadre having a common/joint seniority list for promotion to the post of line Superintendent." In the instant case, because of the quota, linemen junior to the petitioner had been promoted and the Court regarded this as discriminatory and violative of the equality clause contained in Arts. 14 and 16.

---

1. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Triloki Nath Khosa, AIR 1974 SC 1 : (1974) 1 SCC 19; Roop Chand Adlakha v. Delhi Development Authority, AIR 1989 SC 307 : 1989 Supp (1) SCC 116; P. Murugesan v. State of Tamil Nadu, (1993) 2 SCC 340; Rajasthan State Electricity Board Accountants Association v. Rajasthan State Electricity Board, (1997) 3 SCC 103 : AIR 1997 SC 882 : (1994) 6 JT 157.

2. T.R. Kothandaraman v. Tamil Nadu Water Supply and Drainage Board, (1994) 6 SCC 282.

3. Shamkant Narayan Deshpande v. Maharashtra Industrial Development Corp., AIR 1993 SC 1173 : 1993 Supp (2) SCC 194.

4. Punjab State Electricity Board, Patiala v. Ravinder Kumar Sharma, AIR 1987 SC 367 : (1986) 4 SCC 617.

In an earlier case Mohammad Shujat Ali v. Union of India,[5] the Supreme Court had observed that "it cannot be laid down as an invariable rule" that any classification made on the basis of "variant educational qualification" would be valid, "irrespective of the nature and purposes of the classification or the quality and extent of the differences in the educational qualifications". The Court emphasized that the test of reasonable classification ought to be applied in each case on its peculiar facts and circumstances. In the instant case, a quota for promotion fixed for graduates and non-graduates was quashed. As both were regarded fit for promotion, fixing a quota between them and giving preferential treatment to graduates in the matter of promotion was held violative of the equality clause.

Similarly, fixation of quota for promotion to the posts of excise inspectors between graduate and non-graduate preventive officers was held to be violative of Arts. 14 and 16. For all purposes they were being effectively treated as equal. They all constituted a single cadre and they were all equal members of it. More non-graduates were recruited to the service. The Court noted that all preventive officers whether graduate or non-graduate-performed the same type of work. Once they were promoted as excise inspectors, there was no distinction between graduate or non-graduate excise inspectors.[6]

In Food Corporation of India v. Om Prakash Sharma,[7] for purposes of promotion, the eligibility criterion was fixed at three years of service for graduates and five years of service for matriculates. This differentiation was quashed by the Supreme Court on the ground that the nature of work performed by the promotees was not such as to make differentiation between graduates and non-graduates. All promotees performed the same type of work. The corporation had placed no material before the Court to justify the classification between graduates and non-graduates. The differentiation was thus held unconstitutional as offending the equality clause.

For purposes of promotion, two tests are generally applied, viz., "merit-cum-seniority" or "seniority-cum-merit". The second test involves consideration of inter se seniority of the employees who are eligible for consideration for promotion. The test means that "given the minimum necessary merit requisite for efficiency of administration, the senior, even though less meritorious, shall have priority and a comparative assessment of merit is not required to be made."[8] On the other hand, if the test of "merit-cum-seniority" is adopted then a comparative assessment of merit of the candidates is required to be made. This test lays greater emphasis on merit and not on length of service which plays a less significant role. Seniority is to be given weight if merit and ability are approximately equal.[9]

The Supreme Court has suggested to the Union and State Governments a complete change in the system of maintaining confidential rolls of their employees because a solution has to be found to the long delays in communicating the adverse entries against the employees and also against the misuse of the powers

---

5. AIR 1974 SC 1631 : (1975) 3 SCC 76.
6. N. Abdul Basheer v. K.K. Karunakaran, AIR 1989 SC 1624 : 1989 Supp (2) SCC 344.
7. AIR 1998 SC 2682 : (1998) 7 SCC 676.
8. State of Mysore v. C.R. Sheshadri, AIR 1974 SC 460 : (1974) 4 SCC 308; State of Kerala v. N.M. Thomas, AIR 1976 SC 490 : (1976) 2 SCC 310.
9. Union of India v. Mohan Lal Capoor, AIR 1974 SC 87; B.V. Sivaiah v. K. Addanki Babu, AIR 1998 SC 2565 : (1998) 6 SCC 720.

by officials who write the confidential reports. Under the prevailing system, entries are first made in the confidential report of an officer behind his back and then he is given an opportunity to make a representation against the entry by communicating the same to him after considerable time. Any representation made by him is considered by a higher authority some years later by which time any evidence that may be there to show that the entries made were baseless may have vanished. Suspensions, adverse remarks and frequent transfers from one place to another are ordered many a time without justification and without giving a reasonable opportunity to the employee concerned. Such actions surely result in the demoralisation of the services. The Courts could give very little relief in such cases. Hence the government itself should devise effective means to mitigate the hardship caused to the employees who are subjected to such treatment.

The Court has made these observations while disposing of the case of Amar Kant Choudhary, a 1964 directly-recruited Deputy Superintendent of Police in Bihar, who was wrongly left out of the list by the selection committee for promotion on the basis of adverse entries in his confidential rolls which were not communicated to him for several years, and which were later expunged by the government. The Court directed that within four months, the selection committee must consider Mr. Choudhary's case for promotion, and if he is selected, he would be entitled to the seniority and all other consequential benefits flowing therefrom.[10]

The Supreme Court has clarified the position as regards promotion of an employee against whom disciplinary proceedings have been initiated. The Court has stated in State of Madhya Pradesh v. J.S. Bansal,[11] that if disciplinary proceedings are pending on the date on which names of other employees are considered for promotion to the next higher post, the delinquent employee if he is similarly circumstanced as other employees and is also eligible, has a right to be considered for promotion to the next higher post along with other employees. His name cannot be omitted from consideration merely because of the pendency of the departmental proceedings against him. An employee cannot be denied his right at the interlocutory stage of the departmental proceedings as he is still to be found to be guilty on the basis of the evidence to be produced against him. Only because of the suspicion against him, till the charges are proved, he cannot be deprived of his right to be considered for promotion. "Mere suspicion is not a substitute for proof". To consider him for promotion along with other eligible candidates is to effectuate his fundamental right which is available even to a delinquent employee under Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution. After considering him for promotion, the recommendation of the promotions committee is to be kept in a sealed cover so that if he is exonerated from the charge against him, he may be promoted immediately to the next higher post.

(f) SENIORITY

Difficult questions arise from time to time regarding fixation of inter se seniority in a cadre. Seniority is governed by service rules. No one has a vested right

---

10. Amar Kant Choudhary v. State of Bihar, AIR 1984 SC 531 : (1984) 1 SCC 694.
Also, Gurdial Singh Fiji v. State of Punjab, AIR 1979 SC 1622 : (1981) 4 SCC 419.

11. AIR 1998 SC 1015, at 1019 : (1998) 3 SCC 714.
Also see, Union of India v. Tejinder Singh, (1991) 4 SCC 129; Union of India v. K.V. Jankiraman, (1991) 4 SCC 109 : AIR 1991 SC 2010.

to seniority but an employee has an interest in seniority acquired by working out the rules. It can be taken away only by operation of a valid law.[12]

The rule-making authority can determine with objectivity and fairness what rules should govern the inter se seniority and ranking of the personnel working in the concerned department. But the rules so formulated should be reasonable, just and equitable.[13] The rules ought not to be arbitrary and irrational resulting in inequality of opportunity amongst employees belonging to the same class.[14] Revision of seniority inter se of employees in a grade arbitrarily without any rule or principle has been held to be invalid under Art. 16(1).[15]

Seniority of an officer is determined with reference to the date of his regular appointment made according to the rules. This is consistent with Arts. 14 and 16.[16] Any earlier temporary or ad hoc service before regular appointment is to be considered as fortuitous and is not to be counted for purposes of seniority.[17] Appointment in accordance with the rules is a condition precedent to count seniority.[18] Temporary, ad hoc or fortuitous appointment, not being appointment according to the rules, cannot be counted towards seniority.[19] The date of promotion to a particular grade or category determines the seniority in that grade or category.[20] However, if the circumstances so require, a group of persons can be treated as a class separate from the rest, for any preferential or beneficial treatment while fixing their seniority.[21]

A University has merit promotee Professors and Readers and directly recruited Professor and Readers. The two constitute distinct classes as they are not at par with each other but are unequal in several respects. They cannot all be treated equally for the purposes of seniority. Fixation of inter se seniority of directly recruited Readers and Professors and those promoted on merit on the yardstick of

---

12. A.K. Bhatnagar v. Union of India; Indian Adm. Service (S.C.S.) Assn. v. Union of India; Akhil Bhartiya Soshit Karamchari Sangh v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 298 : (1981) 1 SCC 246.

13. R.S. Makashi v. I.M. Menon, AIR 1982 SC 101, 116 : (1982) 1 SCC 379.
Reasonableness of the specific rules for fixing seniority has been considered in the following cases: Mervyn Continho v. Collector of Customs, AIR 1967 SC 52 : (1966) 3 SCR 600; Govind D. Kelkar v. Chief Controller of Imports & Exports, AIR 1967 SC 839 : (1967) 2 SCR 29; SC. Jai Singhani v. Union of India, AIR 1967 SC 1427; Bishan Sarup Gupta v. Union of India, AIR 1972 SC 2627; Union of India v. Bishan Sarup Gupta, AIR 1974 SC 1618; Prabhakar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1976 SC 1093; N.K. Chauhan v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1977 SC 251 : (1977) 1 SCC 308.

14. Reserve Bank of India v. N.C. Paliwal, AIR 1976 SC 2345, 2357 : (1976) 4 SCC 838; Amarjit Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1975 SC 984, 990.

15. S.K. Ghosh v. Union of India, AIR 1968 SC 1385 : (1968) 3 SCR 631.

16. Pushpa Vishnu v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1995 SC 1346; Direct Recruitment, Class II Engineering Officers' Ass. v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1990 SC 1607 : (1990) 2 SCR 900; State of West Bengal v. Aghore Nath Dey, (1993) 3 SCC 371.

17. K.C. Joshi v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 284; Union of India v. S.K. Sharma, (1992) 2 SCC 728; D.N. Agrawal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 311; V. Sreenivasa Reddy v. Govt. of A.P, AIR 1995 SC 586 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 572.

18. Direct Recruits Class II Officers Ass. v. State of Maharashtra, (1990) 2 SCR 900.

19. D.N. Agrawal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1311; K.C. Joshi v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 284 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 272; V. Sreenivasa Reddy v. Govt. of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1995 SC 586 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 572; J&K Public Service Comm. v. Dr. Narinder Mohan, (1994) 2 SCC 630.

20. Karam Chand v. Haryana State Electricity Board, AIR 1989 SC 261 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 572.

21. Ram Janam Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1994 SC 1722 : (1994) 6 SCC 622.

continuous officiation has been held to be illegal and unconstitutional under Arts. 14 and 16(1).

Seniority is to be fixed within the same class on the basis of continuous officiation.[22] An ex cadre employee cannot be treated as a cadre employee for determining their inter se seniority as unequals cannot be treated as equals.[23]

A rule leaving "the valuable right of seniority to depend upon the mere accident of confirmation", notwithstanding the length of service is hit by Art. 16.[24] Appointment of a person with retrospective effect so as to affect the seniority of others violates Arts. 14 and 16.[25]

Service conditions pertaining to seniority are liable to alteration, by subsequent changes in the relevant rules. Except to the extent of protecting promotions that have already been earned under the previous rules, the revised rules will govern the seniority and future promotion prospects of all the persons in the concerned service. The Court can, however, assess whether the principle for determining seniority laid down in the rules is "just, fair and reasonable", or whether it is unreasonable or arbitrary.[26]

The Supreme Court has said in Makashi that there is no invariable normal rule that seniority is to be determined only on the basis of the respective dates of appointment to the post and that any departure from such a rule will be prima facie unreasonable and illegal. The rule-making authority can formulate rules of seniority. However, such rules must be "reasonable, just and equitable."[27]

(g) TRANSFER

An order of transfer of an employee is a part of the service conditions. The Court does not interfere with such an order unless it is mala fide, or that the service rules prohibit such an order, or that the authority issuing the order was not competent to do so.[28]

A government employee, or a servant of a public undertaking, has no legal right to insist for being posted at any particular place unless specifically provided in his service conditions.[29]

When an honest officer was transferred by the Government because of the pressure of vested interests, the Supreme Court quashed the same characterising it as mala fide, a case of "victimisation of an honest officer" and not in public interest. The Court said, "the transfer of the appellant is nothing but mala fide

---

22. Rashm Srivastava v. Vikram University, AIR 1995 SC 1694 : (1995) 3 SCC 653.
23. Direct Recruit Class II Engineering Officers Association v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1990 SC 1607 : (1990) 2 SCC 715.
24. S.B. Patwardhan v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1977 SC 2051, 2066 : (1977) 3 SCC 399; Pushpa Vishnu v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1995 SC 1346 : 1995 Supp (20) SCC 276.
25. Ramendra Singh v. Jagdish Prasad, AIR 1984 SC 885 : 1984 Supp SCC 142.
26. J. Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 1964, 1970.
27. Fixation of seniority was held reasonable in K .B. Shukla v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 1136 : (1979) 4 SCC 673, but unreasonable and legally erroneous in G.R. Luthra v. Lt. Gov. of Delhi, AIR 1979 SC 1900, and B.L. Goal v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1979 SC 228.
28. State Bank of India v. Anjan Sanyal, AIR 2001 SC 1748 : (2001) 5 SCC 508.
29. Chief General Manager, N.E. Telecom Circle v. Rajendra Bhattacharjee, AIR 1995 SC 813 : (1995) 2 SCC 532.

exercise of the power to demoralise honest officers who would efficiently discharge the duties of a public office."[30]

(h) COMPULSORY RETIREMENT

Provision for compulsory retirement of government servants in public interest does not infringe Arts. 14 and 16. These Articles do not prohibit the prescription of reasonable rules for compulsory retirement[31] which neither involves any civil consequences,[32] nor any stigma.[33]

It is valid to put a ban on re-appointment of persons compulsorily retired as it has a reasonable basis and has some relation to the suitability for employment or appointment to an office.[34]

(i) RETIREMENT

The expression "conditions of service" would take within its fold, fixation of the age of superannuation. Therefore, service rules made under Art. 309 may revise and reduce the age of retirement. In Nagaraj,[35] the age of superannuation was reduced from 58 to 55 years by amending the service rules. The Supreme Court ruled that service rules can be amended under Art. 309.[36]

(j) TERMINATION

There should be no discrimination in the matter of termination of service. Out of the 2000 officiating sub-inspectors of police, only the respondent was reverted while persons junior to him were allowed to officiate. This was held to be discriminatory and so bad under Art. 16.[37] Dismissal of a person on the sole ground that he is a 'non-Andhra' was held void as amounting to discrimination only on the ground of place of birth which is prohibited by Art. 16(2).[38] The constitutional provision draws no distinction between temporary and permanent posts and applies to all posts with equal rigour.

Retrenchment of employees in a department by applying a selective test which is not arbitrary, unreasonable or discriminatory would not offend Art. 16. A selective test cannot be reasonable unless there is some proximate connection between the test and the efficient performance of duties and obligations of the particular office. Therefore, while retrenching staff, preference given to 'political sufferers' and 'displaced persons' and thus retained in service was not valid, for the circumstance of a person being a 'political sufferer' had no bearing on the question whether or not he would efficiently perform his duties.[39]

---

30. Arvind Dattatraya Dhande v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1997 SC 3067 : (1997) 6 SCC 169.
31. Shiv Charana Singh v. State of Mysore, AIR 1965 SC 280; P. Radhakrishna Naidu v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1977 SC 854 : (1977) 1 SCC 561.
32. Union of India v. J.N. Sinha, AIR 1971 SC 40 : (1970) 2 SCC 458; Tara Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1975 SC 1487 : (1975) 4 SCC 86.
33. See, infra, Ch. XXXIII.
34. P.R. Naidu, supra, footnote 31.
35. K. Nagaraj v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 551 : (1985) 1 SCC 523; State of Andhra Pradesh v. S.K. Mohinuddin, AIR 1994 SC 1474.
36. For discussion on Art. 309, see, infra, Ch. XXXVI.
37. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Sughar Singh, AIR 1974 SC 423 : (1974) 1 SCC 218.
38. Jankiraman v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1959 AP 185.
39. Sukhnandan Thakur v. State of Bihar, AIR 1957 Pat. 617; Ghulam Ahmad v. Inspector-General of Police, AIR 1959 J.K. 136.

The services of a person employed in the Central Tractor Organisation were terminated after six years as being "no longer required". The Government also placed a ban on his being ever taken into service. Declaring the ban bad, the Court stated that the ban should have a reasonable basis and must have some relationship to his suitability for employment to an office. An arbitrary imposition of a ban against employment of a certain person under the government amounts to a denial of the right of equal opportunity of employment under Art. 16(1) which includes the right of being considered on merits for the post applied for.[40]

A rule empowering the government to terminate the services of a government employee by giving him one month's notice was held not invalid under Art. 16(1). Division of government service into permanent, quasi-permanent and temporary, and applying different rules of termination of service to different classes of government servants, does not involve discrimination. Nor would it amount to discrimination if the services of a person are dispensed with on the ground of unsatisfactory conduct, and persons junior to him are continued in service. It would, however, be a different matter if temporary employees were to be retrenched in which case qualifications and length of service of those holding temporary posts may be relevant, but not so in case of termination of service.[41]

Retaining the services of a junior while terminating the services of a senior, when it is not shown that the services of the latter are worse than those of the junior, is discriminatory and arbitrary.[42] The services of a temporary employee were terminated without any reason while several employees similarly situated and junior to him in the same temporary cadre had been retained. This was held to be discriminatory and arbitrary and was hit by Art. 16. No discrimination may arise under Art. 16 if the services of a temporary servant are dispensed with because of "unsatisfactory work or his unsuitability for the job". But if his services are terminated arbitrarily, and not on the ground of his "unsuitability, unsatisfactory conduct or the like" which put him in a class apart from his juniors in the same service, then a question of unfair discrimination may arise."[43]

Services of eleven executive officers of several improvement trusts were terminated by the State Government. The Government justified this action by pleading that all the improvement trusts in the State were dissolved and hence these officers were rendered redundant. The Court found as a fact that the trusts were functioning as before and discharging their normal functions; the whole of the staff of the trusts was intact except the eleven officers. What had actually been dissolved were the boards of trustees of the trusts and not the trusts themselves. A trust had a corporate personality independent of the board of trustees. The Court thus found the reasons for dispensing with the services of the petitioners as untenable and the action of the Government arbitrary and violative of Arts. 14 and 16. The Court observed: "..... Such thoroughly arbitrary action cannot be sustained."[44]

---

40. Krishan Chander Nayar v. Chairman, C.T.O., AIR 1962 SC 602 : (1962) 3 SCR 187.
41. Champak Lal v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 1854 : (1964) 5 SCR 190.
42. R.X.A de Monte Furtado v. Administrator, Goa, AIR 1982 Goa 34.
43. Government Branch Press v. D.B. Belliappa, AIR 1979 SC 429 : (1979) 1 SCC 477.
44. Ajit Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1983 SC 494 : (1983) 2 SCC 217.
On termination of service, also see, Jaswant Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 115 : (1979) 4 SCC 440.
Reversion of an employee from a higher to a lower post after six years was held unreasonable and arbitrary; C.C. Padmanabhan v. Director, Public Instruction, AIR 1981 SC 64 : 1980 Supp SCC 668.

The respondent never participated in any illegal, vicious or subversive activity after his appointment in government service. Nevertheless, he was dismissed from service on account of his political beliefs prior to his appointment. The Supreme Court held this to be invalid. Membership of a political party prior to his appointment is irrelevant for government service. Seeking of a report on the political faith of a candidate for government service is repugnant to the Constitution. Of course, a person cannot engage in political activity after entry in government service.[45]

A rule providing for a subsistence allowance of Re 1/- to a civil servant under suspension, and convicted of an offence, but pending appeal to a higher Court, is unreasonable and illusory and infringes Art. 16. He should get his normal allowance irrespective of whether he is in jail or on bail otherwise he cannot pursue his appeal effectively.[46]

Under a regulation made by the Delhi Transport Corporation, a public sector undertaking, services of an employee could be terminated by giving one month's notice. The Supreme Court declared the regulation to be arbitrary, unjust, unfair and unreasonable offending Arts. 14 and 16(1).[47]

C. EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

The Supreme Court has deduced the principle of "equal pay for equal work" from Arts. 14, 16 and 39(d) and the Preamble to the Constitution. No such principle is expressly embodied in the Constitution but the principle has now matured in a Fundamental Right. As the Supreme Court has explained in State of Madhya Pradesh v. Pramod Bhartiya,[48] the doctrine of "equal pay for equal work" is implicit in the doctrine of equality enshrined in Art. 14, and flows from it. The rule is as much a part of Art. 14 as it is of Art. 16(1). The doctrine is also stated in Art. 39(d), a directive principle, which ordains the State to direct its policy towards securing equal pay for equal work for both men and women.[49]

The Court has enunciated the doctrine as follows:[50]

> "The doctrine of equal work for equal pay would apply on the premise of similar work but it does not mean that there should be complete identity in all respects. If the two classes of persons do some work under the same employer, with similar responsibility, under similar working conditions, the doctrine of 'equal work equal pay', would apply and it would not be open to the State to discriminate one class with the other in paying salary."

But it cannot be said that being a Directive Principle, it is not enforceable in a Court of law because it is also a part of Art. 14. The Fundamental Rights and Di-

---

45. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Ramashanker Raghuvanshi, AIR 1983 SC 374 : (1983) 2 SCC 145.
46. State of Maharashtra v. Chandrabhan, AIR 1983 SC 803 : (1983) 3 SCC 387.
47. Also, Delhi Transport Corp. v. DTC Mazdoor Corporation, AIR 1991 SC 101, 206; Central Inland Water Transport Corporation v. Brojonath, AIR 1986 SC 1571 : (1986) 3 SCC 156.
On termination of services of a government employee, also see, infra, Ch. XXXVI.
48. AIR 1993 SC 286 : (1993) 1 SCC 539.
49. For discussion on Directive Principles, see, infra, Ch. XXXIV.
For Preamble to the Constitution, see, Ch. I, supra and Ch. XXXIV, infra.
50. Jaipal v. State of Haryana, AIR 1988 SC 1504, at 1509 : (1988) 3 SCC 354.

rective Principles are not supposed to be exclusionary of each other; they are complimentary to each other.[51]

The parameters for invoking the principle of equal pay for equal work include, inter alia, the nature of the work and common employer.[52] The principle may properly be applied to the cases of unequal scales of pay based on no classification or irrational classification though those drawing the different scales of pay do identical work under the same employer.[53] Thus, where all relevant considerations are the same, persons holding identical posts and discharging similar duties should not be treated differentially.

Employees under one and the same employer holding the same rank, performing similar functions and discharging similar duties and responsibilities must also be given similar scales of pay. The Court has emphasized that this is not an abstract doctrine but one of substance. Though not declared expressly in the Constitution, it is certainly a constitutional goal. The principle has been applied in a large number of cases.[54]

The principle of equal pay for equal work does not apply when the employers are different. Employees of Regional Rural Banks sponsored by a co-operative bank cannot claim the same salary and allowances as are payable to the employees of Regional Rural Bank which are sponsored by the commercial and nationalised banks.[55]

Article 14, as already stated, permits reasonable classification which means that the classification is to be based on an intelligible basis which distinguishes persons or things grouped together from those that are left out of the group and that differentia must have a rational nexus with the object to be achieved by the differentia made. In other words, there ought to be causal connection between the basis of classification and the object of classification. The doctrine of equal pay for equal work applies in case of unequal scales of pay based on no classification or irrational classification, though those drawing the different scales of pay do identical work under the same employer.

Accordingly, the Court has found it difficult to envisage a situation in research institutes where persons holding Doctorate qualification and enjoying the status of professor are governed by two different scales even though their duties, functions and responsibilities are identical.

Difference in salary of driver constables in the Delhi Police Force and other drivers in the service of the Delhi Administration has been held to be irrational as there is no reason to give driver constables a lower scale than other drivers as

---

51. For further discussion on this point, see, infra, Ch. XXXIV.
52. Alvaro Noronha Ferriera v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 1356 : (1999) 4 SCC 408.
53. P.K. Ramachandra Iyer v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 541 : (1984) 2 SCC 141.
54. Dhirendra Chamoli v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1986)1 SCC 637; Union of India v. R.G. Kashikar, AIR 1986 SC 431 : (1986) 1 SCC 458; TRC Scientific Officers (Class I) Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 490; Bhartiya Dak Tar Mazdoor Manch v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 2342; M.P. Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 485; Mewa Ram Kanojia v. AIIMS, (1989) 2 SCC 235 : AIR 1989 SC 1256; Employees of T & F Corporation of India v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1367; S.M. Ilyas v. Indian Council of Agricultural Research, AIR 1993 SC 384 : (1993) 1 SCC 182; Ajay Jadhav v. Govt. of Goa, AIR 2000 SC 451 : (1999) 9 SCC 4.
55. Kshetriya Kisan Gramin Bank v. D.B. Sharma, AIR 2001 SC 168 : (2001) 1 SCC 353.

their duties are more, not less, onerous than those of other drivers.[56] The Court refused to accept the argument of the Delhi Administration that the circumstance that persons belong to different departments of the government is itself a sufficient reason to justify different scales of pay irrespective of the identity of their powers, duties and responsibilities.

In Savita,[57] classification between two groups of senior draughtsmen was held to be without any basis as they performed the same duties and the differentiation between them was not based on any intelligible ground.

In Bhagwan Dass v. State of Haryana,[58] the Supreme Court has said that "once the nature and functions and the work are not shown to be dissimilar the fact that the recruitment was made in one way or the other would hardly be relevant from the point of view of "equal pay for equal work" doctrine".

Also, the fact that appointments are for temporary periods and the schemes are temporary in nature is irrelevant. Once it is shown that the nature of the duties and functions discharged and the work done are similar, the doctrine of "equal pay for equal work" is attracted.[59]

But this principle cannot be applied invariably to professional services. For example, dressing of a wound by a doctor or a compounder cannot be equated and be compensated on an equal basis. Similarly, a senior or a junior lawyer cannot be treated equally in the matter of remuneration. "In the field of rendering professional services at any rate the principle for equal work would be inapplicable." Therefore, doctors with different qualifications (Graduate or licensiates in indigenous medicine) can be graded differently for purposes of remuneration even though they are in charge of dispensaries.[60]

Classification on the basis of educational qualifications has always been upheld by the Supreme Court as reasonable and permissible under Art. 14. In the instant case,[61] the Government of Karnataka had prescribed two different scales of pay for the tracers—a higher scale for matriculate tracers and a lower pay scale for non-matriculate tracers. The Court negatived the plea of discrimination by the non-matriculate tracers. The Court ruled that prescribing two different scales for matriculates and non-matriculates is not violative of Arts. 14 and 16 and that distinction made on the basis of technical qualifications or for that matter even on the basis of general educational qualifications relevant to the suitability of the candidate for public service is permissible. The Court proceeded on the assumption that both matriculates and non-matriculates "were doing the same kind of work", and yet the classification made was upheld as permissible under Arts. 14 and 16.

In State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Triloki Nath Khosa,[62] the Assistant Engineers were classified into diploma holders and degree holders and more promotional

---

56. Randhir Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 879 : (1982) 1 SCC 618.
57. P. Savita v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 1124 : 1985 Supp SCC 94.
58. AIR 1987 SC 2049 : (1987) 4 SCC 634.
59. Jaipal v. State of Haryana, AIR 1988 SC 1504 : (1988) 3 SCC 354.
60. Dr. C. Girijambal v. Govt. of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 1537, 1539 : (1981) 2 SCC 155.
61. State of Mysore v. P. Narasingha Rao, AIR 1968 SC 349 : (1968) 1 SCR 407. Also see, Mohd. Shujat Ali v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1631 : (1975) 3 SCC 76.
62. AIR 1974 SC 1 : (1974) 1 SCC 19.

avenues were provided to degree holders. This was upheld as reasonable. In Sita Devi,[63] the Supreme Court upheld the distinction drawn by the Haryana Government between matriculate and under-matriculate instructors in the Adul literacy Programme. The under-matriculate petitioners had not made any attempt in their writ petition to allege and establish that their qualifications, duties and functions were similar to the matriculate teachers.

In Markendeya v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[64] difference in pay scales between graduate supervisors holding degree in Engineering and non-graduate supervisors being diploma and licence-holders was upheld. It was held that on the basis of difference in educational qualifications such difference in pay scales was justified and would not offend Arts. 14 and 16. The Court pointed out that where two classes of employees perform identical or similar duties and carry out the same functions with the same measure of responsibility having the same academic qualifications, they would be entitled to equal pay. "Principle of equal pay for equal work is applicable among equals. It cannot be applied to unequals". Equal treatment cannot be accorded to totally distinct and unequal categories of employees.[65] Thus, daily-rated workers cannot be equated with regular employees of the state in the matter of wages. There are differences of qualifications, age, manner of selection between the two categories of employees.[66] The Court observed in Markandeya:[67]

> "Relief to an aggrieved person seeking to enforce the principle of equal pay for equal work can be granted only after it is demonstrated before the Court that invidious discrimination is practised by the State in prescribing two different scales for the two classes of employees without there being any reasonable classification for the same."

Equality under Art. 16(1) means equality between members of the same class of employees and not between members of separate classes.[68] Thus, giving special pay to members of Rajasthan Administrative Service, but not to the members of Secretarial Service, is not discriminatory as methods of recruitment, qualifications etc. of the two services are not identical.[69]

In Purshottam v. Union of India,[70] implementation of revised pay scales as recommended by the Pay Commission for certain categories of servants but non-implementation thereof for certain other categories was held to be discriminatory. The Government had made a reference to the Commission in respect of all its employees, and when it accepted its recommendations it should implement them in respect of all employees. Not to implement the recommendations with respect to some employees only violated Arts. 14 and 16.[71]

---

63. Also see, Sita Devi v. State of Haryana, AIR 1996 SC 2764 : (1996) 10 SCC 1.
64. AIR 1989 SC 1308 : (1989) 3 SCC 191.
65. State of Tamil Nadu v. M.R. Alagappan, AIR 1997 SC 2006 : (1997) 4 SCC 401.
66. State of Haryana v. Jasmer Singh, 1997 (1) Supreme 137 : (1996) 11 SCC 77; Babu Lal, Convenor v. New Delhi Municipal Committee, (1994) Suppl. 2 SCC 633 : AIR 1994 SC 2214; State of Orissa v. Balram Sahu, (2002) 8 JT 477 : AIR 2003 SC 33.
67. Paras 9, 10, 13 of AIR 1989 SC 1308.
68. C.A. Rajendran v. Union of India, AIR 1968 SC 507 : (1968) 1 SCR 721; Sham Sunder v. Union of India, AIR 1969 SC 212 : (1969) 1 SCR 312.
69. Menon v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1968 SC 81 : (1967) 3 SCR 430.
70. AIR 1973 SC 1088 : (1973) 1 SCC 651.
71. Also see, Laljee Dubey v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 252 : (1974) 1 SCC 230.

An army instruction conferring some benefit on those joining the Army Medical Corps after acquiring the post-graduate qualification was held not violative of Arts. 14 and 16. It was given as an incentive with a view to attract more persons having higher qualifications.[72]

In judging the equality of work, consideration may be given to educational qualifications, qualitative difference between posts and quantum of responsibilities associated with the posts. If the classification has reasonable nexus with the objective of achieving efficiency in administration, the State would be justified in prescribing different pay scales. As the Supreme Court has emphasized: "Equality must be among the equals. Unequal cannot claim equality".[73]

A classification based on difference in educational qualifications justifies a difference in pay scales. A mere nomenclature designating a person as say a carpenter or a craftsman is not enough to come to the conclusion that he is doing the same work as another carpenter or craftsman in regular service. The quality of work which is produced may be different and even the nature of work assigned may be different. It is not just a comparison of physical activity. The application of the principle of equal pay for equal work requires consideration of various dimensions of a given job. The accuracy required and the dexterity that the job may entail may differ from job to job. It cannot be judged by the mere volume of work. There may be qualitative difference as regards reliability and responsibility. Functions may be the same but the responsibilities make a difference. Thus normally the applicability of this principle must be left to be evaluated and determined by an expert body. These are not matters where a writ Court can lightly interfere.[74]

In Federation of A.I. Custom and Central Excise Stenographers (Recog.) v. Union of India,[75] the Supreme Court has emphasized that equal pay must depend on the "nature of the work done", and not "mere volume of work" as "there may be qualitative difference as regards reliability and responsibility". "Functions may be the same but the responsibilities make a difference." The Court has further observed:

> "The same amount of physical work may entail different quality of work, some more sensitive, some requiring more tact, some less—it varies from nature and culture of employment. The problem about equal pay cannot always be translated into a mathematical formula....."

In the instant case, stenographers attached with officers in the pay scales of Rs. 2500-2750 claimed parity with the stenographers attached with the Joint Secretaries and Officers above that rank. Their contention was that they held identical posts and discharged same functions. Nevertheless, the Court rejected their contention saying that "it is not possible to say that the differentiation is based on no rational nexus with the object sought for to be achieved". The Government had justified the differentiation amongst the two classes of stenographers on the

---

72. D.D. Joshi v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 420.

73. State of Uttar Pradesh v. J.P. Chaurasia, (1989) 1 SCC 121 : AIR 1989 SC 19; Gopal Krishna Sharma v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1993 SC 81 : 1993 Supp (2) SCC 375.
Also see, Babulal v. New Delhi Municipal Committee, AIR 1994 SC 2214 : 1994 Supp (4) SCC 633.

74. State of Haryana v. Charanjit Singh (2006) 9 SCC 321 : AIR 2006 SC 161.

75. AIR 1988 SC 1291 : (1988) 3 SCC 91.

ground of difference in their responsibility, confidentiality and the relationship with public.

The claim of the employees of grih kalyan kendras for pay parity with the employees working in the New Delhi Municipal Committee and other departments of the Delhi Administration was rejected by the Supreme Court.[76] These kendras are run by a welfare organisation working under the aegis of the Deptt. of Personnel and Administrative Reforms. Employment in these kendras is unique in character and not comparable with any other employment. "It is difficult to conceive of any other service which one can enter at any age, regardless of educational qualifications, and from which one can retire when one chooses". Therefore, the principle of equal pay for equal work cannot be applied to kendra employees. It is trite that the concept of equality implies and requires equal treatment for those who are situated equally. One cannot draw comparisons between unequals.

In State of Madhya Pradesh v. Pramod Bhartiya,[77] the lecturers working in the higher secondary schools in Madhya Pradesh claimed parity in pay with lecturers working in Technical schools. The qualifications prescribed for, and service conditions of, both groups of lecturers were the same and the status of both types of schools was also the same. Nevertheless, the Court still refused to concede to the lecturers in higher secondary schools the same pay as the lecturers in the Technical schools were getting on one ground, viz., there was no material to suggest that the functions and responsibilities of both the categories of lecturers was qualitatively speaking similar. On this crucial point, the Court observed:[78]

> "It is not enough to say that the qualifications are same nor is it enough to say that the schools are of the same status. It is also not sufficient to say that the service conditions are similar. What is more important and crucial is whether they discharge similar duties, functions and responsibilities."

The Court went on to observe that the quality of work may vary from post to post, institution to institution. "We cannot ignore or overlook this reality. It is not a matter of assumption but one of proof."

The Court also clarified another significant point. Since the plea of equal pay for equal work has to be examined with reference to Art. 14, the burden is upon the petitioners to establish their right to equal pay, or the plea of discrimination, as the case may be.[79] In the instant case, the petitioners (respondents before the Supreme Court) failed to discharge this onus.

The principle of "equal pay for equal work" does not apply to two sets of employees working in different organisations and when there is qualitative difference in the duties and functions discharged by them.[80]

At times, it may prove very difficult for the Court to apply the principle of equal pay for equal work as there are inherent difficulties in comparing and evaluating work done by different persons in different organizations, or even in

---

76. (1991) 1 SCC 619.
77. AIR 1993 SC 286; supra.
78. Ibid, at 291.
79. Supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. B.
Also see, State Bank of India v. M.R. Ganesh, JT 2002 (4) SC 129, 136 : (2002) 4 SCC 556 : AIR 2002 SC 1955.
80. Garhwal Jal Sammelan Karmachari v. State of U.P., AIR 1997 SC 2143 : (1997) 4 SCC 24.

the same organization.[81] Often the difference is a matter of degree and there is an element of value judgment. The Supreme Court has observed in this connection:[82]

> "So long as such value judgment is made bona fide reasonably on an intelligible criterion which has a rational nexus with the object of differentiation, such differentiation will not amount to discrimination. It is important to emphasize that equal pay for equal work is a concomitant of Art. 14 of the Constitution. But it follows naturally that equal pay for unequal work will be a negation of that right."

The above discussion reveals that the initial zeal to do justice got tempered by too many claims for equality requiring the Court to take up intensive factual enquiry beyond its competence. However in Dineshan, after noticing the restrictive approach of the Supreme Court in relation to the principle of "equal pay for equal work" it was held held that it would not be correct to lay down as an absolute rule that merely because determination and granting of pay scale is the prerogative of the executive, the Court had no jurisdiction to examine any pay structure and an aggrieved employee has no remedy if he is unjustly treated by arbitrary State action or inaction. It was pointed out that when there is no dispute with regard to the duties and responsibilities of the persons who held identical posts or ranks but they are treated differently merely because they belonged to different departments or the basis of classification of posts which is ex facie irrational, arbitrary or unjust, the Court had power to intervene.[83] The case, however, is important because of the virtual resurrection of the principle as to the reviewability of an issue relating to equal pay for equal work and Article 14 in that context.

Like in some other areas the Court has adopted a restrictive approach perhaps because of realizing that it had opened the doors wider than what was required. On the authority of Charanjit Singh[84] it has been held that Art. 39(d) could be of no assistance for application of the rule of equal pay for equal work unless the Court is satisfied that the incumbents are performing equal and identical work as discharged by the employees vis-à-vis whom the claim is made.[85] The Court could have avoided the 'identity' criterion since the claim in the case involved obviously different classes of teachers on the one hand and clerical staff on the other.

D. EXCEPTIONS TO ARTS. 16(1) & 16(2)

The right of equality guaranteed by Arts. 16(1) and (2) are subject to a few exceptions.

(a) ART. 16(3)

First, under Art. 16(3), Parliament may make a law to prescribe a requirement as to residence within a State or Union Territory for eligibility to be appointed

---

81. See, State of Haryana v. Jasmer Singh, 1997 (1) Supreme 137 : (1996) 11 SCC 77 : AIR 1997 SC 1788.

82. Federation of All India Customs and Central Excise Stenographers (Recognized) v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 1291 : (1988) 3 SCC 91.
Also see, State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ministerial Karmachari Sangh, AIR 1998 SC 303 : (1988) 1 SCC 422; State Bank of India v. Ganesh, op. cit.

83. Union of India v. Dineshan KK, (2008) 1 SCC 586 : AIR 2008 SC 1026, here, the Union of India's affidavit, however, admitted the disparity in the pay scales.

84. State of Haryana v. Charanjit Singh, (2006) 9 SCC 321 : AIR 2006 SC 161.

85. S. C. Chandra v. State of Jharkhand, (2007) 8 SCC 279, 288 : AIR 2007 SC 3021.

with respect to specified classes of appointments or posts. Thus, Art. 16(2) which bans discrimination of citizens on the ground of 'residence' only in respect of any office or employment under the state, can be qualified as regards residence, and a 'residential qualification' imposed on the right of appointment in the State for specified appointments. This provision, therefore, introduces some flexibility, and takes cognisance of the fact that there may be some very good reasons for restricting certain posts in a State for its residents.

Article 16(3), however, incorporates a safeguard to ensure that it is not abused. Power has been given to Parliament and not to the State Legislatures to relax the principle of non-discrimination on the ground of residence so that only a minimum relaxation is made in this regard. The State Legislatures being subjected to greater local pressures might have been tempted to create all kinds of barriers in the matter of public services.

Under Art. 16(3), Parliament has enacted the Public Employment (Requirement as to Residence) Act, 1957. The Act repeals all laws in force prescribing a requirement as to residence within a State or Union Territory except Himachal Pradesh, Manipur, Tripura and Telengana—the area transferred to Andhra Pradesh from the erstwhile State of Hyderabad. Due to the backwardness of these areas, the Act permits prescription of a residential qualification for a period up to March 21, 1974, in regard to non-gazetted services.

In A.V.S. Narasimha Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[86] the Supreme Court declared that part of the Act unconstitutional which prescribed a residence qualification for government services in Telengana—a part of the State of Andhra Pradesh. The Court took the view that under Art. 16(3), Parliament can impose a residential qualification for services in the whole State, but not in a part of the State, for Art. 16(3) uses the word 'State' which signifies 'State' as a unit and not parts of a State as districts, taluqs, cities, etc. Art. 16(3) speaks of the whole state as the venue for residential qualification. Thus, while Parliament can reserve certain posts in the State of Andhra Pradesh for the residents of the State, it cannot reserve posts in Telengana (which is a part of the State) for the residents of Telengana. The life of this Act came to an end in 1974. For Andhra Pradesh, however, some special provisions have been made under Art. 371D.[87]

(b) ART. 16(5)

Secondly, Art. 16(5) provides that a law may prescribe that the incumbent of an office in connection with the affairs of a religious or denominational institution, or a member of the governing body thereof, shall belong to the particular religion or denomination.

(c) ART. 16(4)

Thirdly, Art. 16(4) constitutes a very significant exception to the principle of equality embodied in Art. 16(1) and, therefore, needs to be discussed in some detail.

---

86. AIR 1970 SC 422 : (1969) 1 SCC 839. Further, on the Telengana issue see, Director of Industries & Commerce v. V. Venkata Reddy, AIR 1973 SC 827 : (1973) 1 SCC 99.
See, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. E, under Art. 35.

87. See, supra, Ch. IX.

E. RESERVATIONS IN SERVICES : ART. 16(4)

Under Art. 16(4), the state may make reservation of appointments or posts in favour of any 'backward class' of citizens which, in the opinion of the state, is not adequately represented in the public services under the state. The term 'state' denotes both the Central and the State Governments and their instrumentalities.[88] State as an employer is entitled to fix separate quotas of promotion for degree holders, diploma holders and certificate holders in exercise of its rule making power under Art. 309.[89]

Explaining the nature of Art. 16(4), the Supreme Court has stated in Mohan Kumar Singhania v. Union of India,[90] that it is "an enabling provision" conferring a discretionary power on the state for making any provision or reservation of appointments or posts in favour of any backward class of citizens which, in the opinion of the state, is not adequately represented in the service of the state. Art. 16(4) neither imposes any constitutional duty nor confers any Fundamental Right on any one for claiming reservation.[91]

Under Art. 16(4), it is incumbent on a State Government to reach a conclusion that the backward class/classes for which the reservation is made is not adequately represented in the State services. Different States may have different methods of reservation and it is not for the Court to look into the wisdom of the method adopted.[92] While doing so, the State Government may take the total population of a particular backward class and representation in the State services. When the State Government after doing the necessary exercise makes the reservation and provides the extent of percentage of posts to be reserved for the said backward class, then the percentage has to be followed strictly. If some Scheduled Caste or backward class candidates are appointed or promoted against the general posts, they are not to be counted against the reserved posts. The number ofreserved posts cannot be reduced on this account. The State may, however, on an overall view of the situation review the matter and refix the percentages of reservation.[93]

Reservation does not rule out merits. Judging of merit may be at several tiers. It may undergo several filtrations. Ultimately, the constitutional scheme is to have the candidates who would be able to serve the society and discharge the functions attached to the office. Vacancies are not filled up by way of charity. Emphasis has all along been made, times without number, to select candidates and/or students based upon their merit in each category. The disadvantaged group or the socially backward people may not be able to compete with the open category people but that would not mean that they would not be able to pass the basic minimum criteria laid down therefor.[94]

---

88. See, supra, Ch. XX, Sec. D.
89. Chandravathi P. K. v. C. K. Saji, (2004) 5 SCC 618 : AIR 2004 SC 2212.
90. AIR 1992 SC 1, 26 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 594.
91. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, infra, Sec. G; Ajit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2000) 1 SCC 430.
92. Nair Service Society v. Dr. T. Beermasthan, (2009) 5 SCC 545 : (2009) 4 JT 614.
93. R.K. Sabharwal v. State of Punjab, AIR 1995 SC 1371, 1375 : (1995) 2 SCC 745.
94. Andhra Pradesh Public Service Commission v. Baloji Badhavath, (2009) 5 SCC 1 : (2009) 5 JT 563.

One of the tests to be applied when a statutory provision for reservation is challenged is whether the width of the power has given rise to excessive reservation and that as to whether this wide extent would make an inroad into the principles of equality under Article 16(1) and it is for the state concerned to show in each case the extent of the existence of compelling reasons, namely backwardness, inadequacy of representation and overall administrative efficiency before making provision for reservation. Since, however, the constitutional amendments which were under challenge were enabling provision, it was open to the state to exercise their discretion to make such provisions after collecting quantifiable date showing backwardness of the class and inadequacy of representation of that class in public employment in addition to compliance with Art. 355 subject to the clarification that the reservation provision does not exceed the ceiling limit of 50% or obliterate the creamy layer or extend the reservation indefinitely.[1]

Further Art. 16(4) has to be interpreted in the background of Art. 335.[2]

The equality of opportunity guaranteed by Art. 16(1) is to each individual citizen of the country while Art. 16(4) contemplates special provision being made in favour of the socially disadvantaged classes. Both must be balanced against each other. Neither should be allowed to eclipse the other. Accordingly, the rule of 50% reservation in a year should be taken as a unit and not the entire strength of the cadre, service or the unit as the case may be.[3]

The term 'Backward Class', as used in Art. 16(4), takes within its fold Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. Art. 15(4) speaks about "socially and educationally backward classes of citizens". Art. 16(4) speaks only of "any backward class of citizens." However, it has been settled by a series of judicial pronouncements that the expression "backward class of citizens" in Art. 16(4) means the same thing as the expression "any socially and educationally backward classes of citizens" in Art. 15(4). Thus, to qualify for being called a 'backward class citizen' under Art. 16(4), one must be a member of a 'socially and educationally backward class'.[4]

It has been emphasized that the expression "Backward Class" is not synonymous with "backward caste" or "backward community". In determining whether a section of population forms a Backward Class for purposes of Art. 16(4), a test solely based on caste, community, race, religion, sex, descent, place of birth or residence cannot be adopted because it would directly be violative of Art. 16(2).[5]

Article 16(4) does not, however, cover the entire ground covered by Arts. 16(1) and 16(2). Some of the matters relating to employment in respect of which equality of opportunity has been predicated by Arts. 16(1) and 16(2) do not fall within the scope of the non-obstante clause in Art. 16(4). For instance, as regards conditions of service relating to employment, such as, salary increment, gratuity, pension and age of superannuation are matters relating to employment and, as

---

1. M.Nagaraj v. Union of India, (2006) 8 SCC 212 : AIR 2006 SC 71.
2. For discussion on Art. 335, see, infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. F.
3. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217; see, infra, Sec. G.
4. Janki Prasad Parimoo v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1973 SC 930 : (1973) 1 SCC 420.
5. Triloki Nath v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1969 SC 1 : (1969) 1 SCR 103.
Also see, State of Uttar Pradesh v. Pradip Tandon, AIR 1975 SC 563 : (1975) 1 SCC 267.

such, they do not form the subject matter of Art. 16(4). It means that, in these matters, there can be no exception even in regard to the backward classes of citizens. In other words, these matters relating to employment are absolutely protected by the doctrine of equality and do not form the subject-matter of Art. 16(4).

Article 16(4) neither confers a right on anyone to claim, nor imposes a constitutional duty on the government to make, any reservation for any one in public services. It is merely an enabling provision and confers a discretionary power on the state to reserve posts in favour of backward classes of citizens, which, in its opinion, are not adequately represented in the state services. A balance needs to be struck between individual rights under Arts. 14 and 16(1), on the one hand, and the affirmative action taken by the state under Art. 16(4). Therefore, reservation under Art. 16(4) has to be within reasonable and legitimate limits. In making reservation under Art. 16(4), the state cannot ignore the Fundamental Rights of the rest of the citizens.[6]

The amalgamation of two classes of people for reservation would be unreasonable as two different classes are treated similarly which is in violation of the mandate of Article 14 which mandates 'to treat similar similarly and to treat different differently". It is well settled that to treat different unequals as equals violates Article 14 of the Constitution.[7]

Article 16(4) does not envisage any reservation in services independent of backwardness. Reservation of posts was made in a State on the basis of various castes and communities like Harijans, backward Hindus, Muslims, Hindu Brahmins, non-Brahmins and Christians. The Supreme Court ruled in Venkataraman[8] that Art. 16(4) expressly permits reservation of posts in favour of backward classes but not with regard to those not regarded as backward. While reservation of posts in favour of any backward class of citizens cannot be voided, reservation of posts between Hindus, Muslims and Christians infringes Arts. 16(1) and (2).[9] This is not reservation for backward classes but distribution of posts on the basis of community, a ground prohibited by Art. 16(2). The expression 'backward class' used in Art. 16(4) is not synonymous with 'backward caste' or 'backward community'. To determine whether a section of the population forms a 'class' for purposes of Art. 16(4), a test solely based on caste, community, race, religion, sex, descent, place of birth or residence cannot be adopted.

In Rangachari,[10] the validity of the circulars issued by the Railway Administration providing for reservation in favour of the Scheduled Castes/Scheduled Tribes in promotions (by selection) was questioned. The argument was that Art. 16(4) was confined to direct recruitment only and did not comprehend reserva-

---

6. C.A. Rajendran v. Union of India, AIR 1968 SC 507 : (1968) 1 SCR 721.
Also see, P & T Scheduled Caste/Tribe Employees Welfare Ass. (Regd.) v. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 139 : (1988) 4 SCC 147; S.B.I. SC/ST Employees Welfare Ass. v. State Bank of India, AIR 1996 SC 1838, 1841; Ajit Singh v. State of Punjab, (1999) 7 SCC at 229.

7. Atyant Pichhara Barg Chhatra Sangh v. Jharkhand State Vaishya Federation, (2006) 6 SCC 718 : AIR 2006 SC 2814.

8. Venkataramana v. State of Madras, AIR 1951 SC 229.

9. Also see, Triloki Nath Tiku v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1969 SC 1 : (1969) 1 SCR 103; Makhan Lal v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1971 SC 2206.

10. General Manager, Southern Rly. v. Rangachari, AIR 1962 SC 36 : (1962) 2 SCR 586, for a comment on the case see, 3 JILI 367 (1961).
Also, State of Punjab v. Hira Lal, AIR 1971 SC 1777 : (1970) 3 SCC 567.

tion in the matter of promotions as well. The Supreme Court ruled by a majority of 3 : 2 that under Art. 16(4), reservation in government services can be made not only at the initial stage of recruitment, but even in the matter of promotion from a lower to a higher post or cadre. Thus, selection posts can also be reserved for backward classes.

The Court went on to explain that the expression 'adequately represented' in Art. 16(4) imports considerations of 'size' as well as 'values', numbers as well as the nature of appointments held and so it involves not merely the numerical test but also the qualitative one. Adequacy of representation of backward classes in any service has to be judged by reference to numerical as well as qualitative tests. The advancement of the socially and educationally backward classes require not only that they should have adequate representation in the lowest rung of services but that they should secure adequate representation in selection posts as well. Inadequacy of representation of backward classes can be cured by applying reservation to senior posts as well.

The Courts have interpreted Art. 16(4) liberally because the Constitution attaches great importance to advancement of backward classes. However, reservation should not be excessive for two reasons. One, Art. 335[11] enjoins that in taking into consideration the claims of the members of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in the making of appointments in connection with the affairs of the Union or a State, the policy of the State should be consistent with "the maintenance of efficiency of administration". Insisted the Court: "It must not be forgotten that the efficiency of administration is of such paramount importance that it would be unwise and impermissible to make any reservation at the cost of efficiency of administration." Therefore, the Court observed:[12]

> "There can be no doubt that the Constitution-makers assumed …….. that while making adequate reservation under article 16(4) care would be taken not to provide for unreasonable, excessive or extravagant reservation….Therefore, like the special provision improperly made under Article 15(4), reservation made under article 16(4) beyond the permissible and legitimate limits would be liable to be challenged as a fraud on the Constitution."

Secondly, because Art. 16(4) forms an exception to Arts. 16(1) and 16(2), Art. 16(4) could not be given such an operation as to destroy the main Articles. Reservation for backward classes could not be so excessive which would in effect efface the guarantee under Art. 16(1) of equal opportunity in the matter of public employment, or at best make it illusory.

(a) BALAJI

The locus classicus on this question is the Balaji case.[13] In this case, the Court attempted to impose a constitutional limit on the extent of preference, not on the "narrower ground of reservation," but on the broader grounds of policy. The Court spoke of adjusting the interests of the weaker sections of society with the interests of the community as a whole. The Court declared that a formula must be evolved which would strike a reasonable balance between the several relevant considerations.

---

11. Infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. F.
12. Rangachari, AIR 1962 SC 36, at 42-44; see, supra, footnote 10.
13. Balaji v. State of Mysore, AIR 1963 SC 649 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 439; supra, Ch. XXII.

While striking down as unconstitutional a government order by which 68% of the seats in educational institutions were reserved for Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and other Backward Classes on the ground of excessive reservation and as a fraud on the Constitution, the Court observed:[14]

> "Speaking generally and in a broad way, a special provision should be less than 50 per cent; how much less than 50 per cent would depend upon the relevant prevailing circumstances in each case."

(b) DEVADASAN

Immediately thereafter came the Devadasan[15] case before the Supreme Court in which the Court was required to adjudge the validity of the 'carry forward' rule.

The 'carry forward' rule envisaged that in a year, 17½ per cent posts were to be reserved for Scheduled Castes/Tribes; if all the reserved posts were not filled in a year for want of suitable candidates from those classes, then the shortfall was to be carried forward to the next year and added to the reserved quota for that year, and this could be done for the next two years. The result of the rule was that in a year out of 45 vacancies in the cadre of section officers, 29 went to the reserved quota and only 16 posts were left for others. This meant reservation upto 65% in the third year, and while candidates with low marks from the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes were appointed, candidates with higher marks from other classes were not taken.

Basing itself on the Balaji principle, the Supreme Court declared that more than 50 per cent reservation of posts in a single year would be unconstitutional as it per se destroys Art. 16(1). The Court emphasized that in the name of advancement of backward communities, the Fundamental Rights of other communities should not be completely annihilated. By a majority of 4:1, the Court held that as Art. 16(4) was a proviso or an exception to Art. 16(1), it should not be interpreted so as to nullify or destroy the main provision, as otherwise it would in effect render the guarantee of equality of opportunity in the matter of public employment under Art. 16(1) wholly illusory and meaningless. The Court observed:

> "The overriding effect of Cl. (4) of Art. 16 on Cls. (1) and (2) could only extend to the making of a reasonable number of reservations of appointments and posts in certain circumstances. A 'reasonable number' is one which strikes a reasonable balance between the claims of the backward classes and those of other citizens."

The Court emphasized that each year of recruitment has to be considered by itself and the reservation for backward communities should not be so excessive as to create a monopoly or to disturb unduly the legitimate claims of other communities.

The Supreme Court has ruled in Arati[16] that in order to effectuate the guarantee contained in Art. 16(1), each year of recruitment has to be considered separately by itself and "the reservation for backward communities should not be so excessive as to create a monopoly or to disturb unduly the legitimate claims of

---

14. AIR 1963 SC 649, at 663.
15. T. Devadasan v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 179 : (1964) 4 SCR 680.
16. Arati Ray Choudhury v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 532 : (1974) 1 SCC 87.

other communities". Reservation for vacancies up to 45% in a year has been held valid in the instant case.

The Supreme Court has observed in the case noted below,[17] that Art. 16(4) is an enabling provision and the reservation thereunder should not exceed legitimate limits. In making reservations for the backward classes, the State cannot ignore the Fundamental Rights of the rest of the citizens.

The above-mentioned judicial decisions did, on the whole, improve the position of the Scheduled Castes, etc. But an optimum limit on reservation of posts in their favour in any one year was also placed. Underlying the Devadasan case was the feeling on the part of the judiciary that filling of senior posts by not so qualified candidates in preference to the better qualified candidates, while discriminatory to the latter, was also subversive of administrative efficiency. It was this feeling which had led the minority in the Rangachari case to confine Art. 16(4) to initial appointments only. But the majority thought otherwise. That the majority view in the Rangachari case was full of pit-falls was soon revealed in the Devadasan case.

The governments in India have been under a great political pressure to make larger and larger reservations in favour of various categories of persons both in the services as well as admission to technical institutions.[18] By prescribing the optimum limit on such reservations, both under Arts. 15(4) and 16(4), the Supreme Court did seek to help the governments to withstand these pressures to some extent in the interests of administrative efficiency or educational standards.

(c) THOMAS

In State of Kerala v. N.M. Thomas,[19] the Supreme Court held that it was permissible to give preferential treatment to Scheduled Castes/Tribes under Art. 16(1) outside Art. 16(4). In Devadasan, the majority had taken the view that Art. 16(4) was an exception to Arts. 16(1) an 16(2). This was the view expressed also in Balaji and Rangachari. On the other hand, in Devadasan, in a dissenting opinion, SUBBA RAO, J., had expressed the opinion that Art. 16(4) was not an exception to Art. 16(1), but was a legislative device by which the framers of the Constitution had sought to preserve a power untrammelled by the other provisions of the Article. It was a facet of Art. 16(1) as "it fosters and furthers the idea of equality of opportunity with special reference to under privileged and deprived classes of citizens."

In Thomas, the majority accepted this view of SUBBA RAO, J. Accordingly, the Court observed: "Art. 16(4) is not in the nature of an exception to Art. 16(1). It is a facet of Art. 16(1) which fosters and furthers the idea of equality of opportunity with special reference to an under privileged and deprived class of citizens…." Thus, Art. 16(1) being a facet of the doctrine of equality enshrined in Art. 14 permits reasonable classification just as Art. 14 does. The majority ruled in Thomas that Art. 16(4) is not an exception to Art. 16(1). Art. 16(1) itself permits reasonable classification for attaining equality of opportunity assured by it.

---

17. P.G. Institute of Medical Education & Research v. Faculty Ass., AIR 1998 SC at 1780 : (1998) 4 SCC 1.
18. The question of reservations in admissions has been discussed in Ch. XXII, Sec. D, supra.
19. AIR 1976 SC 490 : (1976) 2 SCC 310.

For assuring equality of opportunity, it may be necessary in certain situations to treat unequally situated persons unequally. Not doing so would perpetuate and accentuate inequality. Art. 16(4) is an instance of classification implicit in, and permitted by, Art. 16(1). The "backward class of citizens" are classified as a separate category deserving a separate treatment in the nature of reserving appointments or posts in the services of the state. Art. 16(4) should be read along, and in harmony, with Art. 16(1). Indeed even without Art. 16(4), the state could have reserved posts for backward classes. Art. 16(4) merely puts the matter beyond any doubt or controversy in specific terms.

However, two judges expressing a dissenting view in Thomas adhered to the majority view in Devadasan that Art. 16(4) was an exception to Arts. 16(1) and (2). In their view, Art. 16(1) only embodied the notion of formal or legal equality and, therefore, there was no scope for spelling out any concept of preferential treatment from the language of Art. 16(1).

Thomas marks the beginning of a new judicial thinking on Art. 16 and leads to greater concessions to S/C, S/T and other backward persons. If the Supreme Court had stuck to the view propagated in earlier cases that Art. 16(4) was an exception to Art. 16(1), then no reservation for any other class, such as army personnel, freedom fighters, physically handicapped, could have been made in services.[20]

The fact situation in Thomas was that the Kerala Government made rules to say that promotion from the cadre of lower division clerks to the higher cadre of upper division clerks depended on passing a test within two years. For S/Cs and S/Ts, exemption could be granted for a longer period. These classes were given two extra years to pass the test. This exemption was challenged as discriminatory under Art. 16(1) on the ground that Art. 16 permitted only reservation in favour of backward classes but it was not a case of reservation of posts for S/Cs and S/Ts under Art. 16(4) and that these persons were not entitled to any favoured treatment in promotion outside Art. 16(4).

By majority, the Supreme Court rejected the argument. It ruled that Art. 16(1) being a facet of Art. 14, would permit reasonable classification and, thus, envisaged equality between the members of a the same class of employees but not equality between members of a separate, independent class. Classification on the basis of backwardness did not fall within Art. 16(2) and was legitimate for the purposes of Art. 16(1). Giving preference to an under-represented backward community was valid and would not contravene Arts. 14, 16(1) and 16(2). Art. 16(4) removes any doubt in this respect. In the words of RAY, C.J.: "The classification of employees belonging to Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes for allowing them an extended period of two years for passing the special tests for promotion is a just and reasonable classification having rational nexus to the object of providing equal opportunity for all citizens in matters relating to employment or appointment to public office."[21]

It was emphasized that the basic qualification for promotion, viz., seniority, was not being relaxed in case of S/Cs and S/Ts. Only a temporary relaxation was being given in the passing of the qualification test. This was warranted by their inadequate representation in the services and their over-all backwardness. Without providing for such a relaxation for a temporary period, it would not have been possible to give adequate promotion to the lower division clerks belonging to the S/Cs and S/Ts. To achieve equality, differential treatment of persons who are unequal was permissible. This is characterised as "compensatory discrimination" or "affirmative action".

20. Also see, Indra Sawhney, infra, Sec. F.
21. AIR 1976 SC, at 500.

It was also emphasized that Scheduled Caste was not a caste within the ordinary meaning of caste as envisaged by Art. 16(2). S/Cs were notified by the President under Art. 341.[22] The object of Art. 341 was to provide protection to the members of the S/Cs having regard to the economic and educational backwardness from which they suffer. However, the over-all needs of administrative efficiency must be kept in view. A view was also expressed that the rule of 50% reservation evolved in Balaji was "a mere rule of caution" and was not meant to be exhaustive of all categories.[23]

The minority view, on the other hand, was that the principle of classification could not be extended so as to confer a preferential treatment on members of the S/Cs and S/Ts outside Art. 16(4). The principle of preferential treatment for backward classes was contained in Art. 16(4) and Art. 16(1) would not warrant any preference to any citizen against the other. A classification based upon the consideration that an employee belonged to a particular section of the population with a view to accord preferential treatment for promotion would be a clear violation of Art. 16(1). Classification and differential treatment for purposes of promotion among employees who possessing the same educational qualifications were initially appointed, as in the present case, to the same category of posts was not permissible. Any exemption, temporary or otherwise, could not validly be granted to one set of employees withholding the same from the other.

The majority adopted a very liberal attitude in Thomas as regards S/Cs and S/Ts and backward classes. The result of the pronouncement is to enable the state to give the backward classes a preferential treatment in many different ways other than reservation of posts as envisaged in Art. 16(4). This would, no doubt, help the backward classes a great deal. But there lurks a danger also in this formulation. The guarantee of equality could be completely eroded if this preferential treatment is overdone under political pressure. Thus, the obligation of the Courts to be ever vigilant in this area does correspondingly increase. After all, preferential treatment for one is discriminatory treatment for another and, therefore, it is necessary to draw a balance between the interests of the backward classes and the other classes. The Supreme Court has shown consciousness of this danger and, therefore, has laid down a few criteria which a classification must fulfil, viz.:

(i) the basis of the classification has to be backwardness;

(ii) the preferential treatment accorded to backward classes has to be reasonable and must have a rational nexus to the object in view, namely, adequate representation of the under-represented backward classes;

(iii) the overall consideration of administrative efficiency should be kept in view in giving preferential treatment to the backward classes.

---

22. Infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. B.
23. Per FAZAL ALI, J., in Thomas.

It is obvious that in Thomas, the Court has taken a more flexible view of Art. 16(1) than had been taken by it in earlier cases. It is now clearly established that Art. 16(4) does not cover the entire field covered by Arts. 16(1) and (2) and some of the matters relating to employment in respect of which equality of opportunity is guaranteed by Arts. 16(1) and (2) do not fall within Art. 16(4). The Thomas decision threw into the melting pot the decision in Devadasan in which the "carry forward rule" was called in question. Even the rule requiring that the overall limit of reservation should not exceed 50% was now sought to be diluted as this rule was characterised by FAZL ALI, J., as a rule of 'caution' rather than an 'absolute' rule. In Thomas, the Court upheld filling of 34 vacancies out of 51 by members of SCs and STs on the basis of the carry forward rule relating to Class III posts.

Thomas represents a new trend—a high water mark—on the question of reservation in services for, and grant of other concessions to, the backward classes.

(d) AFTER THOMAS

In A.B.S.K. Sangh (Rly.) v. Union of India,[24] the Supreme Court again went into the question of reservation in public services vis-a-vis Art. 16. The Court upheld reservation of posts at various levels and making of various concessions in favour of the members of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.

The Court reiterated the Thomas proposition that under Art. 16(1) itself, the state may classify, "based upon substantial differentia, groups or classes" for recruitment to public services, and "this process does not necessarily spell violation of Articles 14 to 16."[25]

Article 16(2) expressly forbids discrimination on the basis of 'caste'. Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes are not castes within the ordinary meaning of caste. These are backward human groups. There is a great divide between these persons and the rest of the community. As Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes suffer from socio-economic backward status, the fundamental right of equality of opportunity justifies categorisation of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes separately for the purpose of 'adequate representation' in the state services. This is constitutionally sanctioned in terms, as Arts. 16(4) and 46 specificate.[26] The Court emphasized that equality of opportunity of employment means equality as between members of the same class of employees and not equality between members of separate and independent classes.

Thus, reservation in selection posts in railways for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes was held valid. The quantum of reservation (17½%) in railway services for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes was held not excessive and the field of eligibility was not too unreasonable. The 'carry forward' rule for three years was held not bad. In the Devadasan case,[27] the 'carry forward' rule for backward classes was struck down as it far exceeded 50%. In the instant case, under the carry forward rule, the quota for Scheduled Castes/Tribes could go up to a maximum of 66% of posts. This was upheld with the remark that figures on 24. Akhil Bhartiya Soshit Karmachari Sangh (Railway) v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 298 : (1981) 1 SCC 246.

---

25. Ibid.
26. For Art. 46, a Directive Principle, see, infra, Ch. XXXIV.
27. AIR 1981 SC, at 321.

paper were not so important as the facts and circumstances in real life which showed that the quota was never fully filled. But this fixation was subject to the rider that, as a fact, in any particular year, there would not be a substantial increase over 50% in induction of reserved candidates. According to the Court: "There is no fixed ceiling to reservation or preferential treatment in favour of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes though generally reservation may not be far in excess of fifty percent."

Reservation in promotion posts based on seniority-cum-suitability as well as in non-selection posts was also held valid. If reservation in selection posts where the role of merit is functionally more relevant than in the non-selection posts is valid, then reservation in non-selection posts is a fortiori valid.

The Court sounded a warning regarding backward classes outside the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. Such classes cannot bypass Art. 16(2) save where any substantial cultural and economic disparity stares at society. In the words of the Court: "The dubious obssession with 'backwardness' and the politicking with castes labelled backward classes may, on an appropriate occasion, demand judicial examination. The politics of power cannot sabotage the principles of one man, one value."[28]

In A.B.S.K. Sangh, the Court took the actual facts, rather than the paper rules, into consideration. As a fact, the Court found that the actual intake of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes against vacancies reserved for them in recruitment and promotion categories in the railways had been slow and painful. The Court also administered a warning with respect to Art. 16(4). It observed:

> "The success of state action under Art. 16(4) consists in the speed with which result oriented reservation withers away as no longer a need, not in the ever widening and everlasting operation of an exception [Art. 16(4)] as if it were a super-fundamental right to continue backwardness all the time. To lend immortality to the reservation policy is to defeat its raison d'etre; to politicise this provision for communal support and party ends is to subvert the solemn undertaking of Art. 16(1), to casteify 'reservation' even beyond the dismal groups of backward most people, euphemistically described as scheduled castes and scheduled tribes, is to run a grave constitutional risk. Caste, ipso facto, is not class in a secular State."

Whether or not reserved vacancies would be deserved or not is a matter primarily for the government to decide. De-reservation could be resorted to only when it is not reasonably possible within the contemplation of the law to fill the reserved vacancies.[29]

(e) SINGLE POST : NO RESERVATION

It has been ruled by the Supreme Court in Chakradhar Paswan v. State of Bihar,[30] that where there is only one post in the cadre, "there can be no reservation for the backward classes (ST, SC, and OBC) with reference to that post either for recruitment at the initial stage or filling up a future vacancy in respect of that post. A reservation which would come under Art. 16(4), pre-supposes the availability of at least more than one post in that cadre.' According to Devadasan, no reservation could be made under Art. 16(4) so as to create a monopoly. Otherwise, the guarantee of equal opportunity contained in Arts. 16(1) and 16(2) would be rendered wholly meaningless and illusory.

28. AIR 1981 SC at 330.
29. S.S. Sharma v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 588.
30. AIR 1988 SC 959 : (1988) 2 SCC 214.

A single promotional post cannot also be reserved.[31] The Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court has upheld this principle and has observed in Post-Graduate Institute of Medcial Edcuation and Research, Chandigarh v. Faculty Association:[32]

> "In a single post cadre, reservation at any point of time on account of rotation or roster is bound to bring about a situation where such single post in the cadre will be kept reserved exclusively for the members of the backward classes and in total exclusion of the general members of the public. Such total exclusion of general members of the public and cent per cent reservation for the backward classes is not permitted within the constitutional framework."

Hence, until there is plurality of posts in a cadre, the question of reservation does not arise.[33] The Court has emphasized: "Articles 14, 15 and 16 including Arts. 16(4), 16(4A) must be applied in such a manner so that the balance is struck in the matter of appointments by creating reasonable opportunities for the reserved classes and also for the other members of the community who do not belong to reserved classes."[34] The Court has further observed in this regard:

> "It cannot, however, be lost sight of that in the anxiety for such reservation for the backward classes, a situation should not be brought by which the chance of appointment is completely taken away so far as the members of other segments of the society are concerned by making such single post cent per cent reserved for the reserved categories to the exclusion of other members of the community even when such member is senior in service and is otherwise more meritorious."[35]

Adequate reservation does not mean proportional representation. Thus when or rule has been inserted mechanically without taking into consideration the prerequisites for making such a provision as required under Article 16(4-A) of the Constitution of India.[36]

This proposition has since been reiterated by the Court in S.R. Murthy v. State of Karnataka.[37]

F. WHAT ARE BACKWARD CLASSES?

In K.C. Vasanth Kumar v. State of Karnataka,[38] the Supreme Court had an occasion to consider the question of characterising backward classes. The Karnataka Government wanted to appoint a commission to go into this question and the Government requested the Court to lay down guidelines for the commission in the discharge of its task. However, the judges expressed a diversity of views on this complex question. Five Judges participating in the decision wrote five separate opinions.

---

31. Chetna Dilip Motghare v. Bhide Girls Education Society, Nagpur, AIR 1994 SC 1917 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 157.
32. AIR 1998 SC 1767 : (1998) 4 SCC 1.
33. On this point, the Supreme Court has overruled several of its own earlier decisions holding that a single post in a cadre could be reserved: State of Bihar v. Bageshwari Prasad, (1995) Supp (1) SCC 432; Union of India v. Madhav, (1997) 2 SCC 332 : AIR 1997 SC 3074; Union of India v. Brij Lal Thakur, (1997) AIR SCW 1937; Post Graduate Institute of Medical Education and Research v. Faculty Association, (1997) AIR SCW 2274 : (1998) 4 SCC 1.
34. AIR 1998 SC, at 1780.
35. Ibid.
36. Anil Chandra v. Radha Krishna Gaur, (2009) 9 SCC 454 : (2009) 5 JT 147.
37. AIR 2000 SC 450 : (1999) 8 SCC 176.
38. AIR 1985 SC 1495 : 1985 Supp SCC 714.

According to CHANDRACHUD, C.J., two tests should be conjunctively applied for identifying backward classes: one, they should be comparable to the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in the matter of their backwardness; and, two, they should satisfy the means test, that is to say, the test of economic backwardness, laid down by the State Government in the context of the prevailing economic conditions.[39]

DESAI, J., was against 'caste' being regarded as a major determinant of backwardness. He argued, "If State patronage for preferred treatment accepts caste as the only insignia for determining social and educational backwardness, the danger looms large that this approach alone would legitimise and perpetuate caste system which contradicts secular principles and also run against Art. 16(2). Also, caste based reservation had been usurped by the economically well-placed section in the same caste". According to DESAI, J., the only criterion which can be realistically devised is the one of economic backwardness."[40] Adoption of an economic criterion would translate into reality two constitutional goals: one, to strike at the perpetuation of the caste stratification of the Indian society and to take a firm step towards establishing a casteless society; and, two, to progressively eliminate poverty.[41]

According to CHINNAPPA REDDY, J., "poverty, caste, occupation and habitation are the principal factors contributing to social backwardness". As regards caste, his view was that the caste-system has firm links with economic power and that "caste is the primary index of social backwardness, so that social backwardness is often readily identifiable with reference to a person's caste."[42]

According to SEN, J.: "The predominant and the only factor for making special provisions under Art. 15(4) or for reservation of posts and appointments under Art. 16(4) should be poverty, and caste or a sub-caste or a group should be used only for purposes of identification of persons comparable to Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes". VENKATARAMIAH, J., stressed upon the relevance of caste factor as an index of backwardness. According to him, the expression 'backward classes' can only refer to certain castes, races, tribes or communities or parts thereof other than Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and Anglo-Indian community, which are backward', and "caste or community is an important relevant factor in determining social and educational backwardness". He, however, suggested caste-cum-means test as a 'rational test' to identify backward people for purposes of Arts. 15(4) and 16(4) for all members of a caste need not be treated as backward.

The only points on which there appears to be a unanimity of views are: 'caste' cannot be the sole determinant of backwardness, but it is not an irrelevant test either and can be taken into account along with certain other factors. Also, backwardness is something comparable to the position of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. Poverty is also a relevant factor to determine backwardness.

In Vasanth Kumar,[43] it was emphasized that the doctrine of protective discrimination embodied in Arts. 15(4) and 16(4) and the mandate of Art.

---

39. Ibid., at 1499.
40. Ibid., at 1506.
41. Ibid., at 1507.
42. Ibid., at 1512.
43. Supra, footnote 38.

29(2)[44] were subject to the requirements of Art. 335[45] and could not be stretched beyond a particular limit. The Court sounded a caution:[46]

> "The State's objective of bringing about and maintaining social justice must be achieved reasonably having regard to the interests of all. Irrational and unreasonable moves by the State will slowly but tear apart the fabric of society. It is primarily the duty and function of the State to inject moderation into the decisions taken under Arts. 15(4) and 16(4), because justice lives in the hearts of men and a growing sense of injustice and reverse discrimination, fuelled by unwise state action, will destroy, not advance, social justice. If the state contravenes the constitutional mandates of Art. 16(1) and Art. 335 this Court will of course have to perform its duty."

An idea was thrown in this case that there could be some services where expertise and skill are of the essence, such as, medical services which directly affect and deal with the health and life of the populace; pilots and aviation engineers where a high degree of technical knowledge and operation skill is required. Besides, "there are other similar fields of governmental activity where professional technological, scientific or other special skill is called for". In such services or posts under the Union or the States, suggested the Court, "there can be no room for reservation of posts; merit alone must be the sole and decisive consideration for appointments."[47] This idea has been further projected by the Court in Indra Sawhnay.[48]

The policy of reservation gives rise to some evils. This has been brought out in the following observation by KRISHNA IYER, J., who was one of the most liberal Supreme Court Judges. IYER, J., observed in State of Kerala v. N.M. Thomas:[49]

> "A word of sociological caution. In the light of experience, here and elsewhere the danger of 'reservation', it seems to me, is three-fold. Its benefits, by and large, are snatched away by the top creamy layer of the 'backward' caste or class, thus keeping the weakest among the weak always weak and leaving the fortunate layers to consume the whole cake. Secondly, this claim is over-played extravagantly in democracy by large and vocal groups whose burden of backwardness has been substantially lightened by the march of time and measures of better education and more opportunities of employment, but wish to wear the "weaker section" label as a means to score over their near-equals formally categorised as the upper brackets. Lastly, a lasting solution to the problem comes only from improvement of social environment, added educational facilities and cross fertilisation of castes by inter-caste and inter-class marriages…."

The ideas thrown out in the above quotation have been further projected by the Supreme Court in Indra Sawhney.[50]

G. THE MANDAL COMMISSION CASE : INDRA SAWHNEY V. INDIA

Indra Sawhney v. Union of India,[51] known as the Mandal Commission case, is a very significant pronouncement of the Supreme Court on the question of reser-

---

44. Infra, Ch. XXX, Sec. A.
45. Infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. F.
46. Ibid., at 1531—per SEN J.
47. Ibid.—SEN, J.
48. See below, Sec. G.
49. AIR 1976 SC 490 : (1976) 2 SCC 310.
50. See, infra, Sec. G.
51. AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217.

vation of posts for backward classes. The Court has dealt with this question in a very exhaustive manner.

The Mandal Commission was appointed by the Government of India in terms of Art. 340 of the Constitution in 1979 to investigate the conditions of socially and educationally backward classes.[52] One of the major recommendations made by the Commission was that, besides the Scheduled Castes (SCs) and Scheduled Tribes (STs), for Other Backward Classes (OBCs) which constitute nearly 52% component of the population, 27% government jobs be reserved so that the total reservation for all, SCs, STs and OBCs, amounts to 50%.

No action was taken on the basis of the Mandal Report for long after it was submitted, except that it was discussed in the Houses of Parliament twice, once in 1982 and again in 1983. On Aug. 13, 1990, the V.P. Singh Government at the centre issued an office memorandum accepting the Mandal Commission recommendation and announcing 27% reservation for the socially and educationally backward classes in vacancies in civil posts and services under the Government of India.

This memorandum led to widespread disturbances in the country. In 1991, the Narasimha Rao Government modified the above memorandum in two respects: one, the poorer sections among the backward classes would get preference over the other sections; two, 10% vacancies would be reserved for other "economically backward sections" of the people who were not covered by any existing reservation scheme.

Ultimately, the constitutional validity of the memorandum came to be questioned in the Supreme Court through several writ petitions. The question of constitutional validity of the memorandum was considered by a Bench of 9 Judges. Six opinions were delivered. The leading opinion was delivered by JEEVAN REDDY, J., on behalf of himself, KANIA, C.J., VENKATACHALIAH, and AHMADI, JJ. Two judges, PANDIAN and SAWANT, JJ., in separate opinions concurred with REDDY, J. Three judges, THOMMEN, KULDIP SINGH and SAHAI, JJ., in separate opinions dissented from REDDY, J., on several points.

After referring to the previous decisions of the Supreme Court on Arts. 15 and 16,[53] and also after taking note of some of the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court on racial discrimination, REDDY, J., in his elaborate judgment answered the several questions which emerged in the instant case. Some of the significant points emerging from REDDY, J.'s opinion are noted below:

1. A measure of the nature contemplated by Art. 16(4) can be provided not only by the Parliament/Legislature but also by the executive through administrative instructions in respect of Central/State services and by the local bodies and 'other authorities' as contemplated by Art. 12, in respect of their services.

---

52. For Art. 340, see, infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. E.

53. Reference was made inter alia to the following cases: State of Madras v. Champakam, Dorairajan, supra; Venkataramana v. State of Madras, supra; Balaji v. State of Mysore, supra; General Manager, Southern Rly. v. Rangachari, supra; Devadasan v. Union of India, supra; Chitralekha v. State of Mysore, supra; P. Rajendran v. State of Madras, supra; Trilokinath v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, supra; Peeriakaruppan v. State of Tamil Nadu, supra; State of Andhra Pradesh v. U.S.V. Balram, supra; Janki Prasad Parimoo v. State of J&K, supra; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Pradip Tandon, supra; State of Kerala v. N.M. Thomas, supra; K.C. Vasanth Kumar v. State of Karnataka, supra; Comptroller & Auditor-General v. Mohan Lal Mehrotra, AIR 1991 SC 2288 : (1992) 1 SCC 20.

2. The provision made by the executive under Art. 16(4) becomes effective and enforceable by itself without its being enacted into a law made by a legislature.[54]

3. The Court has reiterated the view, expressed by it earlier in Thomas,[55] that Art. 16(1) permits classification for ensuring attainment of equality of opportunity assured by Art. 16(1) itself. Art. 16(1) is a facet of Art. 14. Just as Art. 14 permits reasonable classification so does Art. 16(1). A classification may involve reservation of seats or vacancies, as the case may be. In other words, under Art. 16(1), appointments and/or posts can be reserved in favour of a class.

Article 16(4) is not an exception to Art. 16(1), but only an instance of classification implicit and permitted by Art. 16(1). Even without Art. 16(4), the State could have classified "backward class of citizens" in a separate category for special treatment in the nature of reservation of posts/appointments in government services. Art. 16(4) merely puts the matter beyond any shadow of doubt in specific terms.

4. Art. 16(4) permits reservation in favour of any "backward classes of citizens". Backward classes having been classified by the Constitution itself as a class deserving special treatment, and the Constitution having itself specified the nature of special treatment, it should be presumed that no further classification or special treatment is permissible in their favour apart from or outside of Art. 16(4).

Article 16(4) is exhaustive of the provisions that can be made in favour of the backward classes in the matter of employment. No reservations can be provided outside Art. 16(4) in favour of backward classes though it may not be exhaustive of the very concept of reservation.

Reservations for other classes can be provided under Cl. 16(1). If for backward classes, reservations are made both under Clause (4) as well as Cl. (1), then "the vacancies available for free competition as well as reserved categories would be correspondingly whittled down and that is not a reasonable thing to do".

In one sense, the Court has given a broad interpretation to Art. 16(4). The Court has broadly interpreted the word 'reservation" therein. "Reservation" does not mean "reservation simpliciter" but takes in "other forms of special provisions like preferences, concessions and exemptions." "Reservation is the highest form of special provision" while "preference, concession and exemption are lesser forms", and the former includes the latter. Thus, the Court has observed:

> "The Constitutional scheme and context of Article 16(4) induces us to take the view that larger concept of reservations takes within its sweep all supplemental and ancillary provisions as also lesser types of special provisions like exemptions concessions and relaxations, consistent no doubt with the requirement of maintenance of efficiency of administration—the admonition of Art. 335."[56]

---

54. State of Kerala v. N.M. Thomas, supra.
55. Ibid.
56. For Art. 335, see, infra, Ch. XXXV.

This means that all supplemental and ancillary provisions to ensure full availment of provisions for reservations can be provided as part of reservation itself under Art. 16(4) and there is no need to fall back upon Art. 16(1) for this purpose as was done in Thomas.[57] In this sense, Art. 16(4) is exhaustive of the special provisions that can be made in favour of the backward classes. The Court has observed in this regard:

> "Backward classes having been classified by the Constitution itself as a class deserving special treatment and the Constitution having itself specified the nature of special treatment, it should be presumed that no further classification or special treatment is permissible in their favour apart from or outside of clause (4) of Art. 16."[58]

5. Even under Art. 16(1), reservations cannot be made on the basis of economic criterion alone.

6. What is the meaning of the expression "backward class of citizens" used in Art. 16(4)? What does the expression signify and how should such classes be identified? The accent of Art. 16(4) is on social backwardness. From a review of the previous case-law in the area, the Court has concluded that the judicial opinions emphasize the integral connection between caste, occupation, poverty and social backwardness. Social, educational and economic backwardness are closely intertwined in the Indian context. As regards identification of backward classes, caste may be used as a criterion because caste often is a social class in India. But caste cannot be the sole criterion for reservation. Reservation is not being made under Art. 16(4) in favour of a caste but a backward class. Once a caste satisfies the criteria of backwardness, it becomes a backward class for purposes of Art. 16(4). "Besides castes (whether found among the Hindus or others) there may be other communities, groups, classes and denominations which may qualify as backward class of citizens. REDDY, J., has observed in this connection:[59]

> "..... the classification is not on the basis of the caste but on the ground that that caste is found to be a backward class not adequately represented in the services of the State."

Among the non-Hindus, there are several occupational groups, sects and denominations which, for historical reasons, are socially backward. They too represent backward social collectivities for the purposes of Art. 16(4).

7. Backwardness under Art. 16(4) need not be social as well as educational as is the case under Art. 15(4).[60] Art. 16(4) does not contain the qualifying words "socially and educationally" as does Art. 15(4). It is not correct to say that "backward class of citizens" in Art. 16(4) are the same as the "socially and educationally backward classes" in Art. 15(4). "Saying so would mean and imply reading a limitation into a beneficial provision like Art. 16(4)." Backwardness contemplated by Art. 16(4) is mainly social backwardness.

A backward class cannot be identified only and exclusively with reference to economic criterion. A backward class may, however, be identified on the basis of occupation-cum-income without any reference to caste. There is no constitutional

---

57. Supra, footnote 49.
58. AIR 1993 SC, at 541.
59. AIR 1993 SC 477, at 555.
60. See, Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C.

bar in the State categorising the backward classes as 'backward' and 'more backward'.

8. The Court has left the task of actually identifying backward classes to the commission/authority to be appointed by the Government. This body would evolve a proper and relevant criteria and test the several groups, castes, classes and sections of people against that criteria. (See point 20 below).

9. A very important recommendation made by the Court is that the "creamy layer", the socially advanced members of a backward class, should be excluded from the benefit of reservation. Such exclusion would benefit the truly backward people and, thus, more appropriately serve the purpose of Art. 16(4). But the real difficulty is how and where to draw the line? "For, while drawing the line, it should be ensured that it does not result in taking away with one hand what is given by the other." REDDY, J., has opined that the basis of exclusion should not merely be economic, unless, of course, "the economic advancement is so high that it necessarily means social advancement".

There are however certain positions, the occupants of which can be treated as "socially advanced" without any further inquiry. Thus, when a member of a designated backward class becomes a member of IAS or IPS or any other All India Service, his status in society rises; he is no longer socially disadvantaged. His children get full opportunity to realise their potential. They are in no way handicapped in the race of life. His salary is also such that he is above want. It is but logical that in such a situation, his children are not given the benefit of reservation. For giving them benefit of reservation, other disadvantaged members of that backward class may be deprived of that benefit.

However, instead of itself laying down finally the test to identify the 'creamy layer', the Court has directed the Government to specify the basis of exclusion—whether on the basis of income, extent of holding or otherwise.

This ruling aims at ensuring that the benefit of reservation reaches the proper and the weakest section of the backward class. For the idea of excluding the 'creamy layer' of a backward class from the benefit of reservation, reference may be made to the opinion of KRISHNA IYER, J., in Thomas.[61]

10. Not only should a class be a backward class for meriting reservations, it should also be inadequately represented in the services under the state. This matter lies within the subjective satisfaction of the State under Art. 16(4). However, there must be some material upon the basis of which the opinion is formed by the state.

11. The total reservation cannot exceed 50% in any one year. Art. 16(4) speaks of 'adequate representation' and not 'proportional representation'. The power under Art. 16(4) must be exercised in a fair manner and within reasonable limits. Therefore, reservation under Art. 16(4) should not exceed 50% of the appointments or posts "barring certain extraordinary situations" as explained hereafter. Accordingly, 27% reservation in favour of backward classes together with reservation in favour of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, comes to a total of 49.5%.

---

61. Supra, footnotes 49 and 54.

12. The extraordinary situations meriting exceptions from the 50% rule have been explained thus by REDDY, J.:[62]

> "While 50% shall be the rule, it is necessary not to put out of consideration certain extraordinary situations inherent in the great diversity of this country and the people. It might happen that in far-flung and remote areas the population inhabiting those areas might, on account of their being out of the mainstream of national life and in view of conditions peculiar to and characteristical to them, need to be treated in a different way, some relaxation in this strict rule may become imperative. In doing so, extreme caution is to be exercised and a special case made out."

13. Further, if a member belonging to, say, a Scheduled Caste gets selected in the open competition on the basis of his own merit, he will not be counted against the quota reserved for the Scheduled Castes; he will be treated as open competition candidate.[63]

14. The Court has divided the total reservation of 50% into "vertical" and "horizontal" reservations. The reservation in favour of S/C, S/T and other backward classes (OBC) under Art. 16(4) may be called vertical reservation whereas reservation made in favour of physically handicapped [under Art. 16(1)] can be referred to as horizontal reservation. Horizontal reservations cut across the vertical reservations what is called interlocking reservations.

To be more precise, suppose 3% of the vacancies are reserved for physically handicapped persons. This reservation is relatable to Art. 16(1). The persons selected against this quota will be placed in the appropriate category, i.e. if he belongs to the S/C category, he will be placed in that quota by making necessary adjustments; similarly, if he belongs to the open competition category, he will be placed in that category by making necessary adjustments. Even after providing for those horizontal reservations, the over-all percentage of reservations in favour of Backward class of citizen "remain and should remain the same".

15. A year is to be taken as a unit for the purposes of applying the 50% rule. The Court has now overruled the Devadasan case[64] which ruled out the 'carry forward' rule. Thus, reserved posts remaining unfilled in one year may be carried forward to the next year but subject to the over-all limit that over-all reservation in any one year ought not to be more than 50%.

16. A significant point made by the Court is not to apply the rule of reservation to promotions. Under Art. 16(4), reservation is permissible only at the stage of entry into the State service, i.e. only at the initial stage of direct recruitment and not at the subsequent promotional stage. The Court has now disagreed with the proposition that Art. 16(4) "contemplates or permits reservation in promo-

---

62. AIR 1993 SC, at 566.

63. This proposition has been applied by the Supreme Court in Ritesh R. Sah v. Y.L. Yamul, AIR 1996 SC 1378 : (1996) 3 SCC 253.

But see, K. Duraisamy v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 2001 SC 717 : (2001) 2 SCC 538, where the Court refused to apply this proposition. Where quotas for admission to super speciality and post-graduate medical courses were fixed for in-service candidates and non-service candidates. This was done not under Art. 16(4). The Court drew a line of distinction between "reservation" and "fixation of quota". The two "drastically differ in their purport and contents as well as the object".

64. T. Devadasan v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 179 : (1964) 4 SCR 680.

tions as well". The Court has reached this conclusion as a result of the combined reading of Art. 16(4) and Art. 335.[65] REDDY, J., has observed on this point:[66]

> "While it is certainly just to say that a handicap should be given to backward class of citizens at the stage of initial appointment, it would be a serious and unacceptable inroad into the rule of equality of opportunity to say that such a handicap should be provided at every stage of promotion throughout their career. That would mean creation of a permanent separate category apart from the mainstream—a vertical division of the administrative apparatus..... All this is bound to affect the efficiency of administration... At the initial stage of recruitment reservation can be made in favour of backward class of citizens but once they enter the service, efficiency of administration demands that these members too compete with others and earn promotion like all others; ....They are expected to operate on equal footing with others....."

Thus, the Court now overruled Rangachari[67] which had held the field for the last thirty years. To soften the adverse impact of the new ruling, the Court directed that it would be operative only prospectively and wherever reservations had been provided in promotions, it would continue for a period of five years.[68]

The Court has also ruled that "it would not be impermissible for the state to extend concessions and relaxations to members of reserved categories in the matter of promotion without compromising the efficiency of the administration".

17. For the reserved category in service, minimum standards can be prescribed. In fact, Art. 335 demands that some such standards be prescribed. In the words of REDDY, J.;[69]

> "It may be permissible for the Government to prescribe a reasonable lower standard for Scheduled Castes/Scheduled Tribes/Backward Classes—consistent with the requirements of efficiency of administration—it would not be permissible not to prescribe any such minimum standard at all. While prescribing the lower minimum standard for reserved category, the nature of duties attached to the post and the interest of the general public also should be kept in mind."

18. For certain services and certain posts, it may not be advisable to apply the rule of reservation. These are posts where merit alone counts. The Court has included the following posts in this category:

(i) Defence services including all technical posts therein but excluding civil posts;

(ii) All technical posts in establishments engaged in Research and Development including those connected with atomic energy and space and establishments engaged in production of defence equipment;

(iii) Teaching posts of Professors—and above, if any;

(iv) Posts in super-specialities in Medicine, engineering and other scientific and technical subjects;

(v) Posts of pilots (and co-pilots) in Indian Airlines and Air India.

---

65. For Art. 335, see, infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. F.
66. AIR 1993 SC, at 573.
67. Gen. Manager, Southern Rly. v. Rangachari, AIR 1962 SC 36 : (1962) 2 SCR 586.
68. On the doctrine of Prospective Overruling, see, infra, Ch. XL.
69. AIR 1993 SC, at 576.

These are some of the posts mentioned. The above list is only illustrative and not exhaustive. It has been left to the Government of India "to consider and specify the service and posts to which the rule of reservation shall not apply". Justifying exclusion of certain posts from the rule of reservation, REDDY, J., has observed:[70]

> "We may point out that the services/posts enumerated above, on account of their nature and duties attached, are such as call for highest level of intelligence, skill and excellence. Some of them are second level and third level posts in the ascending order. Hence, they form a category apart. Reservation therein may not be consistent with "efficiency of administration" contemplated by Art. 335."

19. It is open to the Government to notify which classes among the several designated OBCs are more backward and apportion reserved vacancies/posts among 'backward' and more 'backward'.

20. The Court has rejected the reservation of 10% posts (made by the Narasimha Rao Government) in favour of "other economically backward sections of the people who are not covered by any existing schemes of reservations." Such a category cannot be related to Art. 16(4). If at all, it can be related to Art. 16(1). Even so, the Court could not sustain it. Reservation of 10% vacancies among open competition candidates on the basis of income/property-holding means exclusion of those who are above the demarcating line from those 10% seats. It is not permissible to debar a citizen from being considered for appointment to an office under the state solely on the basis of his income or property-holding. Any such bar would be inconsistent with the guarantee of equal opportunity held out by Art. 16(1).

21. The Court has directed that there ought to be established a permanent body—commission or tribunal, both at the Centre and in each State, which can look into the complaints of wrong inclusion or non-inclusion of groups, classes and sections in the lists of OBCs. Such a body would go a long way in redressing genuine grievances. A body of this type can be created under Art. 16(4) itself. Persons aggrieved can approach it for appropriate redress.

22. There should be a periodic revision of lists of OBCs so as to exclude those who have ceased to be backward or to include new classes. The above-mentioned body may be consulted in this exercise.

In Indra Sawhney, the Supreme Court has taken cognizance of many complex but very momentous questions having a bearing on the future welfare and stability of the Indian society. The Supreme Court has delivered a very thoughtful, creative and exhaustive opinion dealing with various aspects of the reservation problem. Basically reservation in government services, is anti-meritocracy, because when a candidate is appointed to a reserved post, it inevitably excludes a more meritorious candidate. But reservation is now a fact of life and it will be the ruling norm for years to come. The society may find it very difficult to shed the reservation rule in the near future. But the Court's opinion has checked the system of reservation from running riot and has also mitigated some of its evils.

Three positive aspects of the Supreme Court's opinion may be highlighted.

---

70. Ibid., 577.

One, the over-all reservation in a year is now limited to a maximum of 50%.

Two, amongst the classes granted reservation, those who have been benefited from reservation and have thus improved their social status (called the 'creamy layer' by the Court), should not be allowed to benefit from reservation over and over again. This means that the benefit of reservation should not be misappropriated by the upper crust but that the benefit of reservation should be allowed to filter down to the lowliest so that they may benefit from reservation to improve their position.

This proposition raises the ticklish question of finding suitable socio-economic tests to identify the creamy layer among the backward classes. The Court admits that identifying the elite classes may not be an easy exercise. Accordingly, the Court has left the task of chalking out the criteria for the purpose to the government concerned. However, the Court has given one clear indication of its thinking on this issue. The Court has said that if a member of a backward family becomes a member of IAS, IPS or any other All-India Service, his social status rises; he is no longer socially disadvantaged. This means that, in effect, a family can avail of the reservation only once.

Three, an element of merit has now been introduced into the scheme of reservation. This has been done in several ways, e.g.:

(a) promotions are to be merit-based and are to be excluded from the reservation rule;

(b) certain posts are to be excluded from the reservation rule and recruitment to such posts is to be merit-based;

(c) minimum standards have to be laid down for recruitment to the reserved posts. In fact, the Court has insisted that some minimum standards must be laid down even though the same may be lower than the standards laid down for the non-reserved posts.

(a) AFTER INDRA SAWHNEY

The Court has not been able to completely eliminate the caste factor in identifying the backward classes. However, the Court has sought to keep the caste factor within limits. Caste can be one of the factors, but not the sole factor, to assess backwardness.

Reservation has become the bane of the contemporary Indian life. More and more sections of the society are demanding reservation for themselves in government services. The politicians are also vying among themselves for demanding reservations to all and sundry groups whether deserved or not. Needless to say, reservation is inequitable insofar as a meritorious candidate may have to be passed over in favour of a much less meritorious candidate in the reserved category.

Reservation normally implies a separate quota which is reserved for a special category of persons. Within that category, appointments to the reserved posts may be made in the order of merit. However, the category for whose benefit reservation is provided is not required to compete on equal terms with the open category. Their selection and appointment to the reserved posts is made independently on their inter se merit and not as compared with the merit of candidates in the open category. The very purpose of reservation is to protect the weak category against competition from the general category candidates. As the Supreme Court has explained in Indra Sawhney, "The very idea of reservation implies selection of a less meritorious person." The only justification for reservation is social justice. It is a constitutionally recognised method of overcoming backwardness. This may adversely affect efficiency in administration.

But, for the present, the system of reservation has to be accepted as necessary. However, while accepting reservation upto a point as a present day politico-sociolo-gical necessity, it does not mean that it must not be kept within strict limits. The defects of the system of reservation ought not to be minimised as far as possible.

The Supreme Court's opinion in Indra Sawhney makes a signal contribution to this end. For example, there should be prescribed some minimum qualifications for the candidates of the reserved categories. Also, the list of services where merit will prevail may be enlarged. Above all, it seems to be essential that reservation for more than 50% ought to be declared unconstitutional as adversely affecting the 'basic' feature of the constitutions, viz., equality, so that reservation may not be increased beyond 50% even by a constitutional amendment. This is necessary to contain the growing demand of politicians for more and more reservation in favour of groups they seek to represent.

The reservation should be made on the basis of quantifiable data showing backwardness of the class and inadequacy of representation of that class in public employment. The Court appears to have introduced the principle of proportionality by saying that "even if the State has compelling reasons ….. the State will have to see that its reservation provision does not lead to excessiveness so as to breach the ceiling limit of 50% or obliterate the creamy layer or extend the reservation indefinitely."[71]

What is needed for the future socio-economic development of the nation, as a whole, is progressively lessening, not increasing, reservation, so that ultimately meritocracy may have some chance to prevail over mediocrity. Art. 335 lays down the ideal of "efficiency of administration". It is suggested that Art. 335 should be treated not only as a "directive principle" but as an "operative and binding constitutional principle" so that any move towards reservation, and any administrative decision concerning reservation, should be assessed by the Court on the touchstone laid down in Art. 335, viz., "efficiency of administration". [72]

Art. 335 refers only to the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. There is no specific provision insisting on the need for maintenance of "efficiency of administration" so far as the backward classes are concerned. But the Supreme Court has insisted in Indra Sawhney II[73] that the principle of efficiency of administration is equally paramount and is implied in Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution so far as backward classes are concerned. To hold otherwise would not only be irrational but even discriminatory between the two classes of backward citizens, viz., Scheduled Castes/Sche-duled Tribes and Other Backward Classes. Therefore, considerations underlying Art. 335 prevail even while making provisions in favour of Other Backward Classes under Art. 16(4). "Reservation even

71. M. Nagaraj v. Union of India, (2006) 8 SCC 212 : AIR 2007 SC 71.
72. For discussion on Art. 335, see, infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. F.
73. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India (II), AIR 2000 SC 498, at 515 : (2000) 1 SCC 168.

for Backward Classes can be made only if it will not undermine the efficiency of the administration in the particular department".[74] As the Supreme Court has observed in Ajit Singh v. State of Punjab (II):[75]

> "It is necessary to see that the rule of adequate representation in Art. 16(4) for the Backward Classes….do not adversely affect the efficiency in administration….. Thus, in the matter of due representation in services for Backward Classes…. maintenance of efficiency in administration is of paramount importance".

The Court has also suggested a periodic review of the list of backward classes. The Court has opined that inclusion of castes in the list of backward classes should not be done without adequate relevant data. Forward castes should not get included in this list. The process of periodic review of the list of OBCs may lead to the exclusion of a backward class if it ceases to be socially backward or if it is adequately represented in the services. The maxim "Once backward, always backward is not acceptable."[76]

Even policy matters have to be tested on the touchstone of arbitrariness and to be struck down if it is held to be discriminatory or arbitrary.[77] The Supreme Court has explained that the effect of Indra Sawhney[78] in the determination of the question of categorisation of the backward classes did not provide for any mandatory requirement for adducing empirical evidence or materials to show that the community in question was adequately represented before taking away of benefit of reservation.[79] The Court has also said that sub-division of class is not unconstitutional and it was open to the state to categorize backward classes as backward and more backward. There is no Constitutional bar to a State categorising the backward classes as backward and more backward class. The actions of the State Government while including or excluding classes to the list is subject to judicial review.

(b) CREAMY LAYER

In the Mandal case, the Supreme Court has clearly and authoritatively laid down that the "socially" advanced members of a backward class, the "creamy layer", has to be excluded from the backward class and the benefit of reservation under Art. 16(4) can only be given to the "class" which remains after the exclusion of the 'creamy layer'. This would more appropriately serve the purpose and object of Art. 16(4).

The reason underlying this approach is that an effort be made so that the most deserving section of the backward class is benefited by reservations under Art. 16(4). At present, the benefits of job reservations are mostly chewed up by the more effluent sections of the backward class and the poorer and the really backward sections among them keep on getting poorer and more backward. The jobs are few in comparison to the population of the backward classes and it is not possible to give them adequate representation in state services. Therefore, it is neces-

---

74. Ibid.
75. AIR 1999 SC 3471 : (1999) 7 SCC 209.
76. Indra Sawhney II, AIR 2000 SC, at 505 : (2000) 1 SCC 168.
77. Atyant Pichhara Barg Chhatra Sangh v. Jharkhand State Vaishya Federation, (2006) 6 SCC 718 : AIR 2006 SC 2814.
78. 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217.
79. Ibid.

sary that the benefit of reservation should reach the poorer and the weakest section of the backward class.

In his opinion in Indra Sawhney, JEEVAN REDDY, J., has emphasized that upon the member of a backward class reaching an "advanced social level or status", he would no longer belong to the backward class and would have to be weeded out. The Court has opined that exclusion of creamy layer, i.e., socially advanced members, will make the class a truly backward class and would more appropriately serve the purpose and object of Art. 16(4). JEEVAN REDDY, J., has stated that there are sections among the backward classes who are highly advanced socially and educationally, and they constitute the forward section of the community. These advanced sections do not belong to the true backward class. "After excluding them alone, would the class be a compact class. In fact, such exclusion benefits the truly backward."

A line has to be drawn between the forward in the backward class and the rest of the backward. If the creamy layer is not excluded, the truly disadvantaged members of the backward class to which they belong will be deprived of the benefits of reservation. If the creamy layer among backward classes were given same benefits as backward classes, it will amount to treating unequals equally which amounts to the violation of the equality clause.

According to JEEVAN REDDY, J., the exclusion of the creamy layer must be on the basis of social advancement and not on the basis of economic interest alone. It is difficult to draw a line where a person belonging to the backward class ceases to be so and becomes part of the 'creamy layer'. It is not possible to lay down the criteria exhaustively. But JEEVAN REDDY, J., specifically laid down one criterion.

There are certain positions the occupants of which can be treated as socially advanced without any further inquiry. The Court has specifically declared that the children of the I.A.S., I.P.S., or any other All India Services in the Backward Classes constitute the creamy layer and this is true without further inquiry. The social status of any such officer rises and he is no longer socially disadvantaged. His children get full opportunity to realise their potential. They are in no way handicapped in the area of life. It is but logical that his children be not given the benefit of reservation for by giving them the benefit of reservation other disadvantaged members of that backward class may be deprived of the benefit. In other cases, in a big country like India, norms may differ from State to State or from region to region. Accordingly, the Court has directed that a body be constituted both at the Centre and at the State level to identify the creamy layer within the backward classes.

The Supreme Court has observed in this connection:

> "The backward class under Art. 16(4) means the class which has no element of "creamy layer" in it. It is mandatory under Art. 16(4)—as interpreted by this Court—that the State must identify the 'creamy layer' in a backward class and thereafter by excluding the 'creamy layer' extend the benefit of reservation to the 'class' which remains after such exclusion."

There has been a good deal of resistance on the part of the States to the idea of excluding the creamy layer. The States have adopted various devices to continue to confer benefits of reservation on the creamy layer. The reason may be that the policy-making power vests in the creamy layer and such persons do not like to curtail their own privileges. This is illustrated by the following two cases.

In Ashoka Kumar Thakur v. State of Bihar,[80] the Supreme Court has assessed the validity of unrealistically high levels of income or holding of other conditions prescribed by the Legislatures of Uttar Pradesh and Bihar as criteria to identify the creamy layer. For example, while the Supreme Court in the Mandal case has categorically said that the Children of IAS or IPS, etc. without anything more could not avail the benefit of reservation, in the scheme drawn in UP and Bihar, a few more conditions were added for falling in the creamy layer, such as, he/she should be getting a salary of Rs. 10,000/- p.m. or more; the wife or husband to be a graduate and owning a house in an urban area. Or, if a professional doctor, surgeon, lawyer, architect, etc., he should be having an income not less than Rs. 10 lakhs, his/her spouse is a graduate and having family property worth Rs. 20 lakhs. Similar conditions were added in case of others, such as, traders, artisans, etc.

The Supreme Court has quashed these conditions as discriminatory. The Court has ruled that these conditions laid down by the two States have no 'nexus' with the object sought to be achieved. The criteria laid down by the two States to identify the creamy layer are violative of Art. 16(4), wholly arbitrary, violative of Art. 14, and against the law laid down by the Supreme Court in the Mandal case, where the Court has expressed the view that a member of the All India Service without anything more ought to be regarded as belonging to the "creamy layer". The Court has observed in this regard:[81]

> "The backward class under Article 16(4) means the class which has no element of 'creamy layer' in it. It is mandatory under Art. 16(4)—as interpreted by this Court—that the state must identify the 'creamy layer' in a backward class and thereafter, by excluding the 'creamy layer' extend the benefit of reservation to the 'class' which remains after such exclusion. This Court has laid down, clear and easy to follow guidelines for the identification of 'creamy layer'. The States of Bihar and Uttar Pradesh have acted wholly arbitrary and in utter violation of the law laid down by this Court in Mandal case. It is difficult to accept that in India where the per capita national income is Rs. 6929 (1993-94), a person who is a member of the IAS and a professional who is earning less than Rs. 10 lakhs per annum is socially and educationally backward. We are of the view that the criteria laid down by the States of Bihar and Uttar Pradesh, for identifying the 'creamy layer' on the face of it is arbitrary and has to be rejected."

The Kerala Legislature passed an Act in 1995 declaring that there was no creamy layer in the State of Kerala. The validity of the State Act was challenged in the Supreme Court. In Indra Sawhney v. Union of India (II),[82] the Court has explained further the rationale underlying the rule of exclusion of 'creamy-layer'. As the 'creamy layer' is not entitled to the benefits of reservation, non-exclusion thereof will be discrimination and violation of Arts. 14 and 16 in as much as unequals cannot be treated as equals, i.e., equal to the rest of the backward class. Therefore, any executive or legislative action refusing to exclude the creamy

---

80. AIR 1996 SC 75 : (1995) 5 SCC 403.
81. AIR 1996 SC, at 85.
82. AIR 2000 SC 498 : (2000) 1 SCC 168. The case is also known as the Kerala Creamy Layer case.

layer from the benefits of reservation will amount to violation of Arts. 14, 16(1) and 16(4).

In the instant case, the Court has declared the Kerala Act declaring that there are no socially advanced sections in any backward class in the State as unconstitutional as being violative of Arts. 14 and 16(1). According to the Court, the Act has shut its eyes to the realities and facts; it has no factual basis. "The declaration is a mere cloak and is unrelated to facts in existence". The Court has emphasized that equality is the basic feature of the Constitution and neither Parliament nor any State Legislature can transgress this principle.[83] Non-exclusion of creamy layer will not only be a breach of Art. 14 but even of the basic structure of the Constitution and, therefore, totally illegal.[84] The Court has criticised the attitude of the State of Kerala in this matter in trenchant terms, characterising the State action as being against Rule of Law and amounting to "deliberate violation of the directions of the Court". The Court has observed:[85]

> "……. the unreasonable delay on the part of the Kerala Government and the discriminatory law made by the Kerala Legislature have been in virtual defiance of the rule of law and also an indefensible breach of the equality principle which is a basic feature of the Constitution. They are also in open violation of the judgments of this Court which are binding under Article 141 and the fundamental concept of separation of powers which has also been held to be a basic feature of the constitution. The State has already been held guilty of contempt."

The Court has directed the State to make provision for the exclusion of the creamy layer among the backward classes in the State.

Just as the Court has insisted on the exclusion of the creamy layer from the backward classes, so also the Court has insisted on the exclusion of the forward classes from the list of backward classes. The Court has again referred to this matter in Indra Sawhney II. This exclusion is necessary with a view to confer full benefits of reservation on the real backward classes. If forward classes are included in the list of backward classes, most of the benefits will be knocked away by the forward classes and the same will not reach the really backward among the backward classes. "That will leave the truly backward, backward for ever".

The Court has emphasized that to include a forward class as a backward class will amount to treating unequals as equals and this will amount to violation of Arts. 14 and 16.

The Court seems to have reacted to excessive affirmative action following Indra Sawhney-I.[86] In Nagaraj[87] a Constitution Bench pointed out that although the State was free to exercise its discretion in providing for reservation, such discretion was not unfettered but subject to limitation, namely, that there must exist compelling reasons of backwardness, inadequacy of representation in a class of posts keeping in mind the overall administrative efficiency, and that, even if the State had reasons to make reservation but the law enacted for implementing such

---

83. For the Doctrine of "Basic features of the Constitution", see, infra, Ch. XLI.
84. Ibid.
85. The State of Kerala Creamy Layer case, supra, footnote 82, at 521.
86. 1992 Supp. (3) SCC 217 : AIR 2007 SC 71.
87. M. Nagaraj v. Union of India, (2006) 8 SCC 212 : AIR 2007 SC 71.

reservation was liable to be set aside if it violated any of the substantive limits on the width of the power.

(c) ART. 16(4) : A TRANSITORY PROVISION

Article 16(4) is an enabling provision and confers a discretionary power on the State to make reservation in the matter of appointments in favour of backward classes of citizens which in its opinion are not adequately represented either numerically or qualitatively in services of the State. But it confers no Constitutional right upon the members of the backward classes to claim reservation. This article does not say that only such Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes which are mentioned in the Presidential Order issued under Arts. 341(1) or 342(1) for a particular State alone would be recognized as backward classes of citizens and none else. If a State or Union Territory makes a provision whereunder the benefit of reservation is extended only to such Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes which are recognized as such in relation to that State or Union Territory then such a provision would be perfectly valid. The UT of Pondicherry having adopted a policy of the Central Government whereunder all Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes, irrespective of their State are eligible for posts which are reserved for SC/ST candidates, no legal infirmity can be ascribed to such a policy and the same cannot be held to be contrary to any provision of law.[88]

In Preeti Sagar[89] that the Constitution permits preferential treatment for historically disadvantaged groups in the context of entrenched and clearly perceived social inequalities. That is why Art. 16(4) permits reservation of appointments or posts in favour of any backward class which is not adequately represented in the services under the State. Reservation is linked with adequate representation in the services. Reservation is thus a dynamic and flexible concept. The departure from the principle of equality of opportunity has to be constantly watched. So long as the backward group is not adequately represented in the services under the State, reservations should be made.

From the above it is clear that the mechanism of reservation has been considered as a transitory measure that will enable the backward to enter and be adequately represented in the state services against the backdrop of prejudice and social discrimination. But, finally, as the social backdrop changes—and a change in the social backdrop is one of the constitutional imperatives, as the backward are able to secure adequate representation in the services, the reservations will not be required. Art. 335 enters a further caveat on reservations, viz., while considering the claims of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes as well as backward classes, for appointments, the maintenance of efficiency of administration is to be kept in sight.

(d) RESERVATION IN JUDICIAL SERVICES

Reference has already been made earlier to State of Bihar v. Bal Mukund Sah[90] The Supreme Court declared a State Act seeking to make reservation for SCs, STs and OBCs in subordinate judiciary unconstitutional, as the State enacted the Act without any consultation with the concerned High Court.

---

88. S. Pushpa v. Sivachanmugavelu, (2005) 3 SCC 1 : AIR 2005 SC 1038.
89. Dr. Preeti Sagar v. State of Madhya Pradesh, (1997) 7 SCC 120, 142 143 : AIR 1999 SC 2894; supra.
90. AIR 2000 SC 1296 : (2000) 4 SCC 640; supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G(h).

The Court has insisted that Art. 16(4) must be read with Art. 335. This means that maintenance of efficiency of administration in the making of appointments to services and posts is a sine qua non before considering the case for reservation in judicial services. Further, the High Court must be consulted before enacting any such law as according to Art. 235, the High Court is entrusted with full control over subordinate judiciary. The Supreme Court has asserted that the "independence of the judiciary" and "separation of powers between the Legislature, Executive and the judiciary" are the two principles which constitute the "basic structure of the Constitution and thus these principles cannot be violated by any law.[91]

H. CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

After Indra Sawhny, two Constitutional Amendments have been incorporated in Art. 16(4) to somewhat tone down the impact of the Supreme Court pronouncement.

(a) ART. 16(4A)

In Rangachari,[92] the Supreme Court by majority had held that Art. 16(4) permitted reservation of posts not only at the initial stage of appointment but also included promotion to selection posts. This proposition was reiterated in several subsequent pronouncements by the Supreme Court.[93] The Supreme Court had thus interpreted the term 'appointment' in Art. 16 liberally as including initial appointment as well as promotion. This position continued till the Indra Sawhney pronouncement.

In Indra Sawhney, as stated above, eight out of nine Judges opined that Art. 16(4) was confined to initial appointments only and it did not permit or warrant reservations in the matter of promotion as such, as this gave rise to several untoward and inequitous results.[94] The Court however permitted the existing rules in that behalf to operate for a period of five years from the date of the judgment. Thus, Rangachari decision was overruled.

Since then, however, the 77th Constitutional Amendment has been brought into effect permitting reservation in promotion to the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.[95] The following clause [4A] has been added to Art. 16 in 1995:

> "Nothing in this Article shall prevent the State from making any provision for reservation in matters of promotion to any class or classes of posts in the services under the State in favour of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes which in the opinion of the State are not adequately represented in the services under the State."

The Constitutional Amendment was brought into effect before the expiry of the time-limit set by the Supreme Court, viz., five years from the date of the

---

91. For the Doctrine of Basic Features, see, Ch. XLI, infra.
92. Supra, footnote 67.
93. See, for example, State of Kerala v. Thomas, supra, note 39 and 42; also, Sec. E(c), supra; Akhil Bharatiya Soshit Karmachari Sangh (Railway) v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 298 : (1981) 1 SCC 246, supra, Sec. E(d), supra.
94. Supra, 1130; also see below under (b).
95. Also see, infra, Ch. XLII.

judgment for the rule permitting reservation in promotion to end. Art. 16(4A) came into force from 17-6-1995.

Thus, by amending the Constitution, Parliament has removed the base as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Indra Sawhney that "appointment" does not include "promotion". Art 16(4A) thus revives the interpretation put on Art. 16 in Rangachari. Rule of reservation can now apply not only to initial recruitment but also to promotions as well where the state is of the opinion that the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes are not adequately represented in promotional posts in services under the state.[1]

It may however be noted that Art 16(4A) permits reservation in promotion posts only for the members of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes but not for other Backward Classes. This means that the position taken by the Supreme Court in Indra Sawhney still prevails as regards OBCs in respect of promotion posts. No reservation can be made in promotion posts for the OBCs.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that Art. 16(4A) ought to be applied in such a manner that a balance is struck in the matter of appointments by creating reasonable opportunities for the reserved classes as well as for other members of the society.[2]

It has also been held that Art. 16(4A) is an enabling provision. It the State makes no reservation, the High Court has no jurisdiction under Art. 226 of the Constitution to issue any direction therefor.[3]

(b) PROMOTION & SENIORITY

Promotion of S/C and S/T employees out of turn because of the scheme of reservation gives rise to several problems, especially, pertaining to seniority of such persons over the employees belonging to the general category. The Supreme Court has sought to grapple with such problems keeping in view considerations of equity and fairness.

In Union of India v. Virpal Singh Chauhan,[4] a two-Judge Bench of the Supreme Court reiterated what the Court had said in Indra Sawhney that providing reservation in promotion was not warranted by Art. 16(4). The rule of reservation in promotion factually created a very poignant and objectionable situation in Virpal.

Of the 33 candidates being considered for promotion to 11 vacancies, all were SC/ST candidates. Not a single candidate among them belonged to the general category. The Court described the resultant situation arising out of reservation in promotion posts as follows:[5]

> "Not only the juniors are stealing a march over the seniors but the march is so rapid that not only erstwhile compatriots are left far behind but even the persons who were in the higher categories at the time of entry of Scheduled Castes/

---

1. See, Commissioner of Commercial Taxes, Andhra Pradesh v. G Sethumadhava Rao, AIR 1996 SC 1915 : (1996) 7 SCC 512; G.S.I.C. Karmachari Union v. Gujarat Small Scale Industries Corpn., (1997) 2 SCC 339.
2. P.G. Institute of Medical Education and Research v. Faculty Association, AIR 1998 SC 1767 : (1998) 4 SCC 1.
3. A.P. Sarpanch Association v. Govt. of A.P., AIR 2001 AP 474.
4. AIR 1996 SC 448 : (1995) 6 SCC 684.
5. Ibid., at 461.

> Scheduled Tribes candidates in the service have also been left behind. Such a configuration could not certainly have been intended by the framers of the Constitution or the framers of the rules of reservation".

The Court stated in Virpal that there is no uniform or prescribed method of providing reservation. The extent and nature of reservation is a matter for the state to decide having regard to the facts and requirements of each case. It is open to a state to say that while the reservation is to be applied and the roster followed in the matter of promotions to or within a particular service, class or category, the candidate promoted earlier by virtue of the rule of reservation/roster shall not be entitled to seniority over his senior in the feeder category and that as and when a general candidate who was senior to him in the feeder category is promoted, such general candidate would regain his seniority over the reserved candidate notwithstanding that he has been promoted subsequent to the reserved candidate. There is no unconstitutionality involved in this. It is permissible for the state to so provide.

In Ajit Singh Januja v. State of Punjab,[6] a three-Judge Bench of the Supreme Court has gone a step ahead than Virpal. Reading Arts. 14, 16 and 335, the Supreme Court has now categorically laid down that when there arises a question to fill up a post reserved for a SC/ST candidate in a still higher grade, then a SC/ST candidate is to be promoted first, but when the question is in respect of promotion to a general category post, then the general category candidate who has been promoted later would be considered first for promotion applying either the principle of seniority cum merit or merit cum seniority.

The Court has agreed with the Virpal ruling that seniority between the reserved category candidates and the general candidates in the promoted category shall continue to be governed by their panel position, i.e., with reference to their inter se seniority in the lower grade. The rule of reservation gives accelerated promotion, but it does not give the accelerated "consequential seniority". Explaining the rationale underlying this ruling, the Court has observed:

> "If this rule and procedure is not applied then result will be that majority of the posts in the higher grade shall be held at one stage by persons who have not only entered in service on basis of reservation and roster but have excluded the general category candidates from being promoted to the posts reserved for general category candidates merely on the ground of their initial accelerated promotions. This will not be consistent with the requirement or spirit of Articles 16(4) or Article 335 of the Constitution."[7]

Accordingly, the Court ruled that the question of seniority at the promotional level must be decided according to the provisions of Arts. 14 and 16(1) and "if any order, circular or rule provided that such reserved candidates who got promotions at roster points were to be treated as senior to the senior candidates who were promoted later, then such an order, circular or rule would be violative of Articles 14 and 16(1)".

The position, however, would be different if before the senior general candidate got his promotion under the normal rule of seniority or selection, the reserved candidate who was promoted earlier at the roster point, had got a further promotion. The Court said in Ajit Singh I, that the balance must be maintained in such a manner that there is no reverse discrimination against the general candidates and that any rule, circular or order giving seniority to the reserved candidates promoted at roster point, would be violative of Arts. 14 and 16(1) of the Constitution of India.

---

6. AIR 1996 SC 1188 : (1996) 2 SCC 715.
7. Ibid., at 1201.

But, then, in Jagdish Lal v. State of Haryana,[8] a three Judge Bench differed from the above rulings. The Court now argued that the normal rule of seniority ought to prevail in this area as well, viz., that the seniority rule ought to apply meaning thereby that the seniority is to be counted from the date of promotion.

Ultimately, the Court reconsidered the whole matter in Ajit Singh II.[9] A Constitution Bench has now overruled Jagdish Lal and has restored the view as expressed in Ajit Singh I.

The Court has now stated that the primary purpose of Art. 16(4) is due representation of certain classes in certain posts. But, along with Art. 16(4), there are Arts. 14, 16(1) and 335 as well. Arts. 14 and 16 lay down the permissible limits of the affirmative action by way of reservation which may be taken under Arts. 16(4) and 16(4-A). While permitting reservations, Art. 14 and 16(1) also lay down certain limitations at the same time. Art. 335 ensures that the efficiency of administration is not jeopardized.[10]

The right to equal opportunity in the matter of promotion in the sense of a right to be "considered" for promotion is a Fundamental Right guaranteed by Art. 16(1). Art. 16(1) provides to every employee otherwise eligible for promotion, or who comes within the zone of consideration, a Fundamental Right to be "considered" for promotion. If a person satisfies the eligibility and zone criteria but is not considered for promotion, then there will be a clear infraction of his Fundamental Right to be "considered" for promotion, which is his personal right.

Article 16(4) or 16(4A) contains no directive or command; it is only an enabling provision;[11] it imposes no constitutional duty on the state and confers no Fundamental Right on any one. It is necessary to balance Art. 16(1) and Arts. 16(4) and 16(4A). The interests of the reserved classes must be balanced against the interests of other segments of society.[12]

The doctrine of equality of opportunity in Art. 16(1) is to be reconciled in favour of backward classes under Art. 16(4) in such a manner that Art. 16(4), while serving the cause of backward classes shall not unreasonably encroach upon the field of equality. It is necessary to strike such a balance so as to attract meritorious and talented persons to the public services. It is also necessary to ensure that the rule of adequate representation in Art. 16(4) for the backward classes and the rule of adequate representation in promotion for SC/ST under Art. 16(4-A) do not adversely affect the efficiency in administration as warranted by Art. 335.

---

8. AIR 1997 SC 2366 : (1997) 6 SCC 538.
9. AIR 1999 SC 3471 : (1999) 7 SCC 209.
10. See, infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. F, for Art. 335.
11. See, C.A. Rajendran v. Union of India, supra; P & T Scheduled Caste/Tribe Employees' Welfare Assn. v. Union of India, (1988) 4 SCC 147 : AIR 1989 SC 139; State Bank of India Scheduled Caste/Tribe Employees' Welfare Assn. v. State Bank of India, (1996) 4 SCC 119. The Court overruled Ashok Kumar Gupta v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1997) 5 SCC 201 : 1997 SCC (L&S) 1299 and Jagdish Lal.
12. See, M.R. Balaji v. State of Mysore, supra, Indra Sawhney, supra; Post Graduate Institute of Medical Education and Research v. Faculty Assn., (1998) 4 SCC 1 : AIR 1998 SC 1767; see also Mangat Ram v. State of Punjab, (2005) 9 SCC 323.

When a reserved candidate is recruited at the initial level he does not go through the same normal process of selection which is applied to a general candidate. A reserved candidate gets appointment to a post reserved for his group. He is promoted to a higher post without competing with general candidates. The normal seniority rule, viz., from the date of "continuous officiation" from the date of promotion applies when a candidate is promoted in the normal manner and not to the promotion of a reserved candidate. Accordingly, in Ajit Singh II, the Court has laid down the following principle to regulate the seniority of the promoted reserved candidates:[13]

> "…. the roster-point promotees (reserved category) cannot count their seniority in the promoted category from the date of their continuous officiation in the promoted post—vis-a-vis the general candidates who were senior to them in the lower category and who were later promoted. On the other hand, the senior general candidate at the lower level, if he reaches the promotional level later but before the further promotion of the reserved candidate—he will have to be treated as senior, at the promotion level, to the reserved candidate even if the reserved candidate was earlier promoted to that level."

The Court has ruled that Virpal and Ajit Singh I have been correctly decided but not Jagdish Lal.

In M.G. Badappanavar v. State of Karnataka,[14] the Supreme Court has again confirmed its earlier ruling in Ajit Singh II and directed that the seniority lists as between the general and reserved promotees, and promotions, be reviewed in the light of the ruling in that case. The Court directed that the seniority of the general candidates be restored accordingly.

(c) ART. 16(4B)

The Constitution (Eighty-First Amendment) Act, 2000, has added Art. 16(4B) to the Constitution. Art. 16(4B) runs as follows:

> "Nothing in this Article shall prevent the State from considering any unfilled vacancies of a year which are reserved for being filled up in that year in accordance with any provision for reservation made under clause (4) or clause (4A) as a separate class of vacancies to be filled up in any succeeding year or years and such class of vacancies shall not be considered together with the vacancies of the year in which they are being filled up for determining the ceiling of fifty percent reservation on total number of vacancies of that year."

The Amendment envisages that the unfilled reserved vacancies in a year are to be carried forward to subsequent years and that these vacancies are to be treated as distinct and separate from the current vacancies during any year. The rule of 50% reservation laid down by the Supreme Court is to be applied only to the normal vacancies and not to the posts of backlog of reserved vacancies. This means that the unfilled reserved vacancies are to be carried forward from year to year without any limit, and are to be filled separately from the normal vacancies.

---

13. Ajit Singh v. State of Punjab II, AIR 1999 SC 3471, 3491 : (1999) 7 SCC 209; supra, note 81.
This ruling has been followed in Jatindra Pal Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 2000 SC 609 : 1999 (7) SCC 257; Ram Prasad v. D.K. Vijay, AIR 1999 SC 3563 : (1999) 7 SCC 251.

14. JT 2000 (Suppl. 3) SC 408 : AIR 2001 SC 260 : (2001) 2 SCC 666.
Also see, Sube Singh Bahanani v. State of Haryana, (1999) 8 SCC 213 : 1999 SCC (L&S) 1453.

This Amendment also modifies the proposition laid down by the Supreme Court in Indra Sawhney.

The Amendment does increase the employment opportunities for the S/C, S/T and OBC candidates.

I. ABOLITION OF UNTOUCHABILITY

Article 17 abolishes untouchability and forbids its practice in any form. The enforcement of any disability arising out of "untouchability" is to be an offence punishable in accordance with law.

Abolition of untouchability in itself is complete and its effect is all pervading applicable to state action as well as acts or omissions by individuals, institutions or juristic body of persons.[15]

The main object of Art. 17 is to ban the practice of untouchability in any form. To give effect to Art. 17, Parliament enacted the Untouchability (Offences) Act, 1955, prescribing punishments for practising untouchability in various forms. In 1976, the Act was renamed as the "Protection of Civil Rights Act, 1955".

The word "untouchability" has not been defined either in the Constitution or in the Act, because it is not capable of any precise definition.

It has however been held that the subject-mater of Art. 17 is not untouchability in its literal or grammatical sense but the "practice as it had developed historically in this country". Therefore, treating of persons as untouchables either temporarily or otherwise for various reasons, e.g., suffering from an epidemic or a contagious disease, or social observances associated with birth or death, or social boycott resulting from caste or other disputes do not come within the purview of Art. 17. Art. 17 is concerned with those regarded untouchables in the course of historic development.[16] Thus, instigation of a social boycott of a few individuals, or their exclusion from worship, religious services or food, etc., is not within the contemplation of Art. 17.[17] It is not clear whether Art. 17 would prohibit outcasting or ex-communication of a person of a higher caste from his caste.[18]

The State Legislature passed a law to improve the conditions of living of untouchables. Accordingly, the Act provided for acquisition of land for constructing a colony for them. It was argued against the validity of the law that the construction of a colony would not be in conformity with Art. 17. The Madras High Court rejected the argument.[19] The Court stated that what Art. 17 prohibits is singling out the Harijan community for hostile treatment as a socially backward community. By no process of reasoning, could Art. 17 be held to prohibit the State from

---

15. State of Karnataka v. Appa Balu Ingale, AIR 1993 SC 1126 : 1995 Supp (4) SCC 469.

16. Denial of access to a Jain temple to a person on the ground of his being a non-JAIN, but not on the ground of his being a harijan, does not constitute an offence under the Act; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Puranchand, AIR 1958 MP 352.
Also see, MARC GALANTER, Caste Disabilities and Indian Federalism, 3 JILI, 205 (1961).
See, infra, Ch. XXIX, Sec. B, under Art. 25.

17. Devarajiah v. Padmanna, AIR 1961 Mad 35, 39.
Also see, I.L.I., MINORITIES AND THE LAW, 143-170(1972).

18. Hadibandhu Behera v. Banamali Sahu, AIR 1961 Ori. 33.

19. Pavadai v. State of Madras, AIR 1973 Mad 458.

introducing a scheme for improving the condition of living of such persons. The Court also referred to Art. 15(4) in this connection.[20]

Parliament has also enacted the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989, in order—(i) to prevent the commission of atrocities against the members of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes; (ii) to provide for setting up of special Courts for the trial of offences under the Act and (iii) also to provide for the relief and rehabilitation of victims of such offences. The statement of Objects and Reasons accompanying the corresponding Bill stated as follows:

> "Despite various measures to improve the socio-economic conditions of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes, they remain vulnerable. They are denied number of civil rights. They are subjected to various offences, indignities, humiliations and harassment. They have, in several brutal incidents, been deprived of their life and property. Serious crimes are committed against them for various historical, social and economic reasons…."[21]

Art. 15(2) also helps in the eradication of untouchability, as no person shall, on the grounds only of "religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them", be denied access to shops, etc., as mentioned therein.[22]

An interesting point to note is that while the Fundamental Rights, generally speaking, are restrictions mainly on government activities, Arts. 17 and 15(2) protect an individual from discriminatory conduct not only on the part of the state but even on the part of private persons in certain situations.

The Supreme Court has stated that whenever any Fundamental Right like Art. 17 is violated by a private individual, it is the constitutional obligation of the state to take the necessary steps for the purpose of interdicting such violation and ensuring observance of the Fundamental Right by the private individual who is transgressing the same. The state is under a constitutional obligation to see that there is no violation of the Fundamental Right of such person. Reference may also be made in this connection to Arts. 14, 21, 23, 25 and 29, discussed later.[23]

The Directive Principles, especially Arts. 38 and 46, obligate the state to render socio-economic and political justice to Dalits and improve the quality of their life. [24] "The abolition of untouchability is the arch of the Constitution to make its preamble meaningful and to integrate the Dalits in the national mainstream".[25]

J. ABOLITION OF TITLES

Article 18(1) prohibits the state from conferring any 'title' except a military or academic distinction. Art. 18(2) prohibits citizens of India from accepting any title from a foreign government. A foreigner holding any office of profit or trust under the state cannot accept any title from any foreign state without the consent

---

20. Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C.
21. For comments on this Act, see, Jai Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1993 Raj 177; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Ram Krishna Balothia, AIR 1995 SC 1198 : (1995) 3 SCC 221.
22. Supra.
23. See, Ch. XXI, supra, for Art. 14; Ch. XXVI, infra, for Art. 21; Ch. XXVIII, Sec. A, infra, for Art. 23; Ch. XXIX, Sec. B, infra, for Art. 25 and Ch. XXX, Sec. A, infra, for Art. 29.
24. For discussion on Directive Principles, see, infra, Ch. XXXIV.
25. K. RAMASWAMY, J., in Appa Balu Ingale, supra, at 1134.

of the President [Art. 18(3)]. No person holding any office of profit under the state is to accept, without the consent of the President, any present, emolument, or office of any kind from or under any foreign state [Art. 18(4)].

It is not clear as to what would happen if a citizen accepts a title in contravention of Art. 18(2). It is open to Parliament, under its residuary powers, to make a law prescribing what should be done with regard to an individual who accepts a title contrary to the Article.[26]

The Supreme Court has ruled in Balaji Raghavan v. Union of India,[27] that the national awards like "Bharat Ratna", "Padma Vibhushan", etc. awarded by the Government of India, are not 'titles' within the meaning of Art. 18(1). These awards are not violative of the principles of equality as guaranteed by Arts. 14 and 18. The Court has observed in this connection:[28]

> "The theory of equality does not mandate that merit should not be recognized. Art. 51A of the Constitution speaks of the fundamental duties of every citizen of India. In this context, we may refer to the various clauses of Art. 51A and specifically clause (j) which exhorts every citizen "to strive towards excellence in all spheres of individual and collective activity, so that the nation constantly rises to higher levels of endeavour and achievement". It is, therefore, necessary that there should be a system of awards and decorations to recognize excellence in the performance of these duties".[29]

However, awards conferred by the state are not to be used as suffixes or prefixes. The Court has also suggested that the Prime Minister in consultation with the President should appoint a high level committee to lay down criteria for selection of persons for these awards. In the words of KULDIP SINGH, J., "Conferment of Padma awards without any firm guidelines and foolproof method of selection is bound to breed nepotism, favouritism, patronage and even corruption."[30]

---

26. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. I.
27. AIR 1996 SC 770 : (1996) 1 SCC 361.
28. AIR 1996 SC 770, at 777 : (1996) 1 SCC 361.
29. For discussion on "Fundamental Duties" under Art. 51A, see, infra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. E.
30. AIR 1996 SC 770, at 778 : (1996) 1 SCC 361.

CHAPTER XXIV

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS (5)
SIX FREEDOMS OF A CITIZEN

SYNOPSIS

A. RIGHT TO FREEDOM

Clauses (a) to (g) of Art. 19(1) guarantee to the citizens of India six freedoms, viz., of 'speech and expression', 'peaceable assembly' 'association', 'free movement', 'residence', and 'practising any profession and carrying on any business'.

These various freedoms are necessary not only to promote certain basic rights of the citizens but also certain democratic values in, and the oneness and unity of, the country. Art. 19 guarantees some of the basic, valued and natural rights inherent in a person.

According to the Supreme Court, it is possible that a right does not find express mention in any clause of Art. 19(1) and yet it may be covered by some clause therein.[1] This gives an additional dimension to Art. 19(1) in the sense that even though a right may not be explicit, it may yet be implicit, in the various clauses of Art. 19.[2]

It has been said that these rights are great and basic rights which are recognized and guaranteed as the natural rights, inherent in the status of a citizen of a free country but not absolute in nature and uncontrolled in operation. The scheme of Article 19 shows that a group of rights are listed as clauses (a) to (g) and are recognized as Fundamental Rights conferred on citizens. All the rights do not stand on a common pedestal but have varying dimensions and underlying philosophies. The common thread that runs throughout clauses (2) to (6) is that the operation of any existing law or the enactment by the State of any law which imposes reasonable restrictions to achieve certain objects, is saved; however, the quality and content of such law would be different by reference to each of sub clauses (a) to (g) of clause (1) of Article 19.[3]

---

1. Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248; Kharak Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1963 SC 1295 : (1964) 1 SCR 332; For conjoint reading see also State of Gujarat v. Mirzapur Moti Kureshi Kassab Jamal, (2005) 8 SCC 534 : AIR 2006 SC 212.
Also see, infra, Sec. F, under Art. 19(1)(d) .
2. See, supra, Ch. XX; infra, Chs. XXVI, XXXIV and XL.
3. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.

Originally, Art. 19 guaranteed seven freedoms. The freedom to hold and acquire property was deleted in 1978.[4]

However, the freedoms guaranteed by Art. 19(1) are not absolute as no right can be. Each of these rights is liable to be controlled, curtailed and regulated to some extent by laws made by Parliament or the State Legislatures. Accordingly, clauses (2) to (6) of Art. 19 lay down the grounds and the purposes for which a legislature can impose 'reasonable restrictions' on the rights guaranteed by Arts. 19(1)(a) to (g).

Article 19 confers the several freedoms on the citizens. Therefore, a municipal committee,[5] deity,[6] or a foreigner[7] cannot invoke Art. 19. The question of citizenship of a company or a corporation has already been discussed earlier.[8]

Article 19 protects the six freedoms of an Indian citizen from state action, and violation of these freedoms by private conduct of an individual is not within its purview.[9]

Inspite of there being a general presumption in favour of constitutionality of a legislation, in a challenge laid to the validity of any legislation allegedly violating any right or freedom guaranteed by clause (1) of Art. 19, on a prima facie case of such violation having been made out, the onus would shift upon the respondent State to show that the legislation comes within the permissible limits of restrictions set out in clauses (2) to (6) of Art. 19, and that the particular restriction is reasonable. The Constitutional Court would expect the State to place before it sufficient material justifying the restriction and its reasonability. Thus the onus of proof in such cases is an ongoing shifting process to be consciously observed by the Court called upon to decide the constitutional validity of a legislation by reference to Article 19 of the Constitution.[10] These rights have been advisedly set out in broad terms leaving scope for their expansion and adaptation, through interpretation, to the changing needs and evolving notions of a free society.[11] Every right is coupled with a duty. Part III of the Constitution of India although confers rights, duties and restrictions are inherent thereunder. Such reasonable restrictions have been found to be contained in the provisions of Part III of the constitution of India, apart from clauses (2) to (4) and (6) of Article 19 of the Constitution of India. Thus, the right to fly the National Flag is subject to certain restrictions which can be read from chapter IV-A.[12]

FOREIGNERS

A foreigner enjoys no rights under Art. 19. Art. 19 confers certain Fundamental Rights on the citizens and not on non-citizens of India.[13]

---

4. See, infra, Chs. XXXI and XXXII.
5. Amritsar Municipality v. State of Punjab, AIR 1969 SC 1100 : (1969) 1 SCC 475.
6. Deity L.P. v. Chief Commr., AIR 1960 Man 20.
7. British I.S.N. Co. v. Jasjit Singh, AIR 1964 SC 1451 : 1964 (2) SCJ 543.
8. Supra, Ch. XVIII.
9. Shamdasani v. Central Bank of India, AIR 1952 SC 59 : 1952 SCR 391; Supra, 463.
10. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.
11. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (2004) 2 SCC 476 : AIR 2004 SC 1442.
12. Union of India v. Naveen Jindal, (2004) 2 SCC 510 : AIR 2004 SC 1559.
13. State Trading Corp. of India Ltd. v. Commercial Tax Officer, AIR 1963 SC 1811 : (1964) 4 SCR 99; Hans Muller of Nuremberg v. Superintendent, Presidency Jail, Calcutta, AIR 1955 SC 367 : (1955) 1 SCR 1284; Anwar v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1971 SC 337 : (1971) 3 SCC 104; Gilles Pfeiffer v. Union of India, AIR 1996 Mad 322.

A foreigner can thus claim no right "to reside and settle in India", as mentioned in Art. 19(1)(e).[14] The Government thus has an unrestricted right to expel a foreigner. As regards the right to be heard, there is no hard and fast rule about the manner in which a person concerned has to be given such an opportunity.

A foreigner who came to India in 1937 on a Belgian passport engaged himself in Christian missionary work. He had been staying continuously in India since 1937. By an order dated 8-7-1987, his request for further stay in India was rejected and he was ordered to leave the country. He challenged the order through a writ petition under Art. 32 which was rejected.

The Court ruled that he had not become a citizen of India under Art. 5 of the Constitution as he had not acquired his domicile in India.[15] For this purpose, "He must prove that he had formed the intention of making his permanent home in the country of residence and of continuing to reside there permanently. Residence alone, unaccompanied by this state of mind, is insufficient. "In the instant case, there was nothing to suggest even remotely that the petitioner had formed any intention of permanently residing here."[16]

A foreigner does, however, enjoy the Fundamental Right to life and personal liberty under Art. 21.[17] According to the tenor of the language of Art. 21, it is available not only to every citizen of this country, but also to a person who may not be a citizen of this country. Even those who come to India merely as tourists or in any other capacity are entitled to the protection of their lives under Art. 21.[18]

B. REASONABLE RESTRICTIONS: ARTS. 19(2) TO 19(6)

Limitations imposed by Arts. 19(2) to 19(6) on the freedoms guaranteed by Arts. 19(1)(a) to (g) serve a twofold purpose, viz., on the one hand, they specify that these freedoms are not absolute but are subject to regulation; on the other hand, they put a limitation on the power of a legislature to restrict these freedoms. A legislature cannot restrict these freedoms beyond the requirements of Arts. 19(2) to 19(6).

Three significant characteristics of clauses 19(2) to 19(6) may be noted:

(1) The restrictions under them can be imposed only by or under the authority of a law; no restriction can be imposed by executive action alone without there being a law to back it up.

(2) Each restriction must be reasonable.

(3) A restriction must be related to the purposes mentioned in Clauses 19(2) to 19(6).

There is thus a double test to adjudge the validity of a restriction:

---

14. See, infra, Sec. F.
15. Louis De Raedt v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1886 : (1991) 3 SCC 554; supra, Ch. XVIII.
16. Supra, Chap. XVIII.
17. Anwar v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1971 SC 337 : (1971) 3 SCC 104; see, infra, Ch. XXVI.
18. The Chairman, Railway Board v. Mrs. Chandrima Das, JT 2000 (1) SC 426 : AIR 2000 SC 988.

(a) whether it is reasonable; and

(b) whether it is for a purpose mentioned in the clause under which the restriction is being imposed?

Both these questions are to be determined finally by the Courts when a law is challenged as unconstitutional. The legislative determination of what restrictions to impose on a freedom is not final and conclusive as it is subject to judicial review.

(a) TEST FOR REASONABLENESS

It is difficult to give an exact definition of the word "reasonable".[19] There is no definite test to adjudge reasonableness of a restriction. Each case is to be judged on its own merits, and no abstract standard, or general pattern of reasonableness is applicable uniformly to all cases. As the Supreme Court has observed in State of Madras v. V.G. Row:[20] "It is important in this context to bear in mind that the test of reasonableness, wherever prescribed, should be applied to each individual statute impugned, and no abstract standard or general pattern, of reasonableness can be laid down as applicable to all cases."

However, the Courts have laid down a few broad propositions in this respect.

When the law contains 'substantive' restrictions with regard to the exercise of the right, as well as 'procedural' provisions, the Courts would consider the reasonableness of both.

For adjudging reasonableness of a restriction, the Courts consider such factors as: the duration and the extent of the restrictions; the circumstances under which, and the manner in which, that imposition has been authorised. The nature of the right infringed, the underlying purpose of the restrictions imposed, the extent and the urgency of the evil sought to be remedied thereby, the disproportion of the imposition, the prevailing conditions at the time, all these considerations enter into the judicial verdict.[21]

The Court, confronted with a challenge to the constitutional validity of any legislative enactment by reference to Article 19 of the Constitution, shall first ask what is the sweep of the Fundamental Right guaranteed by the relevant sub clause out of sub clauses (a) to (g) of clause (1). If the right canvassed falls within the sweep and expanse of any of the sub-clauses of clause (1), then the next question to be asked would be, whether the impugned law imposes a reasonable restriction falling within the scope of clauses (2) to (6) respectively. However, if the right sought to be canvassed does not fall within the sweep of the Fundamental Rights but is a mere concomitant or adjunct or expansion or incidence of that right, then the validity thereof is not to be tested by reference to clauses (2) to (6). The test which it would be required to satisfy for its constitu-

---

19. Gujarat Water Supply v. Unique Electro (Gujarat) (P), AIR 1989 SC 973 : (1989) 1 SCC 532.

20. AIR 1952 SC 196 : 1952 SCR 597.

21. Chintaman Rao v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1951 SC 118 : 1950 SCR 759; State of Madras v. Row, AIR 1952 SC 195 : 1952 SCR 583; Maneklal Chhotalal v. M.G. Makwana, AIR 1967 SC 1373 : (1967) 3 SCR 65; State of Bihar v. K.K. Misra, AIR 1971 SC 1667 : (1969) 3 SCR 337; Laxmi v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 1323 : (1969) 1 SCR 22; Harakchand v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1453 : (1969) 2 SCC 166; Krishnan Kakkanth v. Govt. of Kerala, AIR 1997 SC 128, 135 : (1997) 9 SCC 495.

tional validity is one of reasonableness, as propounded in the case of V.G. Row[22] or if it comes into conflict with any other provisions of the constitution.

The questions : (i) whether the right claimed is a Fundamental Right, (ii) whether the restriction is one contemplated by any of clauses (2) to (6) of Article 19, and (iii) whether the restriction is reasonable or unreasonable, are all questions which shall have to be decided by keeping in view the substance of the legislation and not beguiled by the mere appearance of the legislation.[23]

Thus, the standard of reasonableness is to be judged with due reference to the subject-matter of the legislation in question, economic and social conditions in India and the surrounding circumstances. The Supreme Court has emphasized in Pathumma[24] that in interpreting the constitutional provision, the Court should keep in mind the social setting of the country so as to show a complete consciousness and deep awareness of the growing requirements of the society, the increasing needs of the nation, the burning problems of the day and the complex issues facing the people which the legislature in its wisdom through beneficial legislation seeks to solve. The judicial approach should be dynamic rather than static, pragmatic and not pedantic, and elastic rather than rigid.

The concept of reasonableness must change with passage of time and absorb the current socio-economic values as exemplified in Telecasting case involving the State owned Doordarshan. The complaint of violation of the Fundamental Right under Art. 19(1)(a) of the Constitution was made against Doordarshan when it decided not to telecast a documentary film titled "Father, Son and Holy War". The film was the third part of a trilogy of documentary film against communal violence. In this film the respondent film maker looked at the question of gender along with the issue of religious violence (prompted by the understanding of Sati in Deorala and thousands of young men celebrating the death of Roop Kanwar). The filmmaker challenged the refusal of Doordarshan to telecast the film which was disposed of by a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court by directing Doordarshan to take a decision on the application of the film maker. A selection committee was constituted by Doordarshan to pre-view the film and according to the Committee the violence depicted in the film would have adverse effect on the minds of the viewers. This decision came up for consideration before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court came to the conclusion that the film maker had a right to convey his perception on the oppression of women, flawed understanding of manhood and evils of communal violence throughout the film. The film, according to the Court, in its entirety had a serious message to convey which was relevant in the present context and Doordarshan, being a state controlled agency funded by public funds, could not have denied access to screen the documentary. The Court pointed out that the test of fairness has to be looked into from various angles and common sense point of view; the manner in which the film maker has handled the thinking the absence of offensive matters like vulgarity and obscenity etc. The Court considered the implications of the states power to impose reasonable restrictions under Article 19(2). It also took note of the fact that India was a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and observed:

---

22. AIR 1952 SC 196.
23. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1559.
24. Pathumma v. State of Kerala, AIR 1978 SC 771 : (1978) 2 SCC 1.

> "The catchword here is reasonable restriction which corresponds to societal norms of decency. In the present matter, the documentary film Father, Son and Holy War depicts social vices that are eating into the very foundation of our Constitution. Communal riots, caste and class issues and violence against women are issues that require every citizen's attention for a feasible solution. Only the citizens especially the youth of our nation who are correctly informed can arrive at a correct solution. This documentary film in our considered opinion showcases a real picture of crime and violence against women and members of various religious groups perpetrated by politically motivated leaders for political, social and personal gains."[25]

The limitation imposed on a freedom should not be arbitrary or excessive, or beyond what is required in the situation in the interests of the public.[26] A legislation arbitrarily or excessively invading the right cannot be characterised as reasonable. A restriction should strike a proper balance between the freedom guaranteed by any of the clauses and the social control, so that the freedom is limited only to the extent necessary to protect society of which a citizen is only a part.[27] This introduces the principle of proportionality. This means that the Court would consider whether the restriction imposed by legislation on the Fundamental Right are disproportionate to the situation and are "not the least restrictive of the choices".

The burden to show that the restriction is reasonable, lies on the state. The restrictions are imposed by law on the Fundamental Rights contained in Art. 19(1)(a) to (g) and the Courts are entitled to consider the "proportionality" of these restrictions which means that the restrictions should not be "arbitrary or of an excessive" nature, beyond what is required for achieving the objects of the legislation. Legislation which arbitrarily or excessively invades the Fundamental Right, cannot be said to contain the quality of reasonableness unless it strikes a proper balance between the Fundamental Right guaranteed and the restriction imposed thereon.[28]

Further, a restriction to be valid must have a direct and proximate nexus, or a rational relation with the object which the legislature seeks to achieve and must not be in excess of the object.[29] It is the substance of the legislation, and not merely its appearance or form, which is to be taken into consideration while assessing its validity. It is the direct, inevitable and the real, not the remote, effect of the legislation on the Fundamental Right which is to be considered,[30] subject to the rider that the legislature cannot indirectly take away or abridge a Fundamental Right when it cannot do so directly.[31]

---

25. Director General, Directorate General of Doordarshan v. Anand Patwardhan, (2006) 8 SCC 433 : AIR 2006 SC 3346.
26. M.R.F. Ltd. v. Inspector Kerala Govt., AIR 1999 SC 188, 191 : (1998) 8 SCC 227.
27. Om Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 3689. Also see, infra.
28. See, Chintaman Rao v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1951 SC 118 : 1950 SCR 188; State of Madras v. V.S. Rao, AIR 1952 SC 196 : 1952 SCR 597; Om Kumar v. Union of India, JT 2000 (Suppl. 3) SC 92 : AIR 2000 3689.
29. Arunachala Nadar v. State of Madras, AIR 1959 SC 300 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 92; M.R.F. v. Inspector, Kerala Govt., supra.
30. Express Newspapers v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 578 : 1959 SCR 12; Bachan Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1980 SC 898 : (1980) 2 SCC 684.
31. In re Kerala Education Bill, AIR 1958 SC 956 : (1959) SCR 995; Supra. On this point, see, the Bennett Coleman case, infra.

The Directive Principles of State Policy are also relevant in considering whether a restriction on a Fundamental Right is reasonable or not.[32] A restriction which promotes a Directive Principle is generally regarded as reasonable.[33] As the Supreme Court has observed in Kasturi Lal Lakshmi Reddy,[34] "Any action taken by the Government with a view to giving effect to any one or more of the Directive Principles would ordinarily, subject to any constitutional or legal inhibitions or other overriding considerations, qualify for being regarded as reasonable, while an action which is inconsistent with or runs counter to a Directive Principle would incur the reproach of being unreasonable. So also the concept of public interest must as far as possible receive its orientation from the Directive Principles."[35]

In Papnasam,[36] the Supreme Court has stated that the following principles and guidelines should be kept in view while considering the constitutionality of a statutory provision imposing restriction on a Fundamental Right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a) to (g) when challenged on the ground of unreasonableness of the restriction imposed by it:

(a) The restriction must not be arbitrary or of an excessive nature so as to go beyond the requirement of felt need of the society and object sought to be achieved.

(b) There must be a direct and proximate nexus or a reasonable connection between the restriction imposed and the object sought to beachived.

(c) No abstract or fixed principle can be laid down which may have universal application in all cases. Such consideration on the question of qualify of reasonableness, therefore, is expected to vary from case to case.

(d) In interpreting constitutional provisions, the Court should be alive to the felt need of the society and complex issues facing the people which the legislature intends to solve through effective legislation.

(e) In appreciating such problems and felt need of the society the judicial approach must necessarily be dynamic, pragmatic and elastic.

(f) It is imperative that for consideration of reasonableness of restriction imposed by a statute, the Court should examine whether the social control as envisaged in Art. 19 is being effectuated by the restriction imposed on the Fundamental Right.

(g) The Rights guaranteed to a citizen by Art. 19 do not confer any absolute or unconditional right. Each Right is subject to reasonable restriction which the legislature may impose in public interest. It is therefore

---

32. On Directive Principles, see, infra, Ch. XXXIV.

33. State of Bombay v. Balsara, AIR 1951 SC 318 : 1951 SCR 682; Quraishi v. State of Bihar, AIR 1958 SC 731 : 1959 SCR 629; Jalan Trading Co. v. D.M. Aney, AIR 1979 SC 233 : (1979) 3 SCC 220; Laxmi Khandsari v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 873 : (1981) 2 SCC 600.
Also see, Ch. XXXIV, infra.

34. Kasturi Lal Lakshmi Reddy v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1980 SC 1992 : (1980) 4 SCC 1.

35. Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248; Union of India v. Hindustan Development Corp., AIR 1994 SC 988 : (1993) 4 SCC 499.

36. Papnasam Labour Union v. Madura Coats Ltd., AIR 1995 SC 2200 : (1995) 1 SCC 501.

necessary to examine whether such restriction is meant to protect social welfare satisfying the need of prevailing social values.

(h) The reasonableness has got to be tested both from the procedural and substantive aspects. It should not be bound by procedural perniciousness or jurisprudence of remedies.

(i) A restriction imposed on a Fundamental Right guaranteed by Art. 19 must not be arbitrary, unbridled, uncanalised and excessive and also not unreasonably discriminatory. Ex hypothesi, therefore, a restriction to be reasonable must also be consistent with Art. 14 of the Constitution.[37]

(j) In judging the reasonableness of the restriction imposed under Art. 19(6), the Court has to bear in mind Directive Principles of State Policy.[38]

(k) Ordinarily, any restriction so imposed which has the effect of promoting or effectuating a Directive Principle can be presumed to be reasonable restriction in public interest.

It is clear from the above that a Court evaluating the reasonableness of a restriction imposed on a Fundamental Right guaranteed by Art. 19 enjoys a lot of discretion in the matter.

A statute imposing a restriction with retrospective effect is not prima facie unreasonable; but retrospectivity is an element to be taken into consideration in determining whether the restriction is reasonable or not.[39]

A law affecting a Fundamental Right may be held bad for sheer vagueness and uncertainty.[40] The word 'restriction' includes 'prohibition'. Under certain circumstances, therefore, a law depriving a citizen of his Fundamental Right may be regarded as reasonable.[41]

A restriction to be valid must have a rational relation with the grounds for which the legislature is entitled to impose restrictions. These grounds are laid down in Arts. 19(2) to (6). Too remote connection between a restriction and the constitutionally authorized ground for restriction will render the law invalid.[42]

When a law is found to infringe a right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a) to (g), the law will be invalid unless it can be brought under the protective provisions of Arts. 19(2) to (6). The burden to show this is on those who seek that protection and not on the citizen to show that the restrictive enactment is invalid.[43] Thus, the onus is on the state to justify that the restriction imposed on any Fundamental Right guaranteed by Arts. 19(1)(a) to (g) is reasonable under clauses 19(2) to (6).[44]

Where a law purports to authorise the imposition of restrictions on a Fundamental Right in language wide enough to cover restrictions both within and with-

---

37. Supra, Ch. XXI.
38. Infra, Ch. XXXIV.
39. See Sec. G., infra.
40. K.A. Abbas v. Union of India, AIR 1973 SC 123; see infra.
41. Narendra Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 430 : (1960) 2 SCR 375; see infra.
42. Superintendent, District Jail v. Lohia, AIR 1960 SC 633 : (1960) 2 SCR 821.
43. Vrajlal M. & Co. v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 129 : (1969) 2 SCC 248.
44. Laxmi Khandsari v. State of Uttar Pradesh, infra.

out the limits of constitutionally permissible legislative actions affecting such right, it is not possible to uphold it even insofar as it may be applied within the constitutional limits as it is not severable.[45] So long as the possibility of such a provision being applied for purposes not sanctioned by the Constitution cannot be ruled out, it may be held to be wholly unconstitutional and void. For example, Art. 19(2) allows imposition of restrictions on the freedom of speech and expression only in cases where danger to the state is involved (Public order/Security of State), an enactment which is capable of being applied to cases where no such danger could arise cannot be held to be constitutional and valid to any extent.[46]

The above are only a few general guiding norms and not absolutes applicable with mathematical precision in judging the reasonableness of a restriction. The Judges enjoy a broad discretion in this respect as the Supreme Court itself has stated: [47]

> "In evaluating such elusive factors and forming their own conception of what is reasonable in all the circumstances of a given case, it is inevitable that the social philosophy and the scale of values of the judges participating in the decision should play an important part, and limit to their interference with legislative judgment in such cases can only be dictated by their sense of responsibility and self-restraint and the sobering reflection that the Constitution is meant not only for people of their way of thinking but for all, that the majority of the elected representatives of the people have, in authorising the imposition of the restrictions, considered them to be reasonable."

A consequence of such judicial discretion is the creation of uncertainty as to what constitutes a 'reasonable' restriction on a Fundamental Right. It is not always easy to find a common denominator in the various judicial pronouncements in this area as will be evident from the discussion that follows.

It needs to be emphasized that any restriction under Arts. 19(2) to 19(6) on any right guaranteed by Arts. 19(1)(a) to (g) can be imposed only by a law and not through a mere administrative direction or departmental instructions which have no statutory force.[48]

(b) EFFECT V. SUBJECT-MATTER TEST

A significant point which arises from a study of the above cases deserves to be mentioned here. What is the test to be applied to ascertain whether a law violates Art. 19(1)(a), or any other Fundamental Right? Should the Courts look into its subject-matter or the effect of the legislation for this purpose?

In Bennett Coleman,[49] the Central Government argued in support of the newsprint policy that its subject-matter was rationing of imported commodity and not freedom of speech, and the test to adjudge the validity of a regulatory provision should be its subject-matter, its pith and substance, and not its effect or result. The Court rejected this approach and enunciated the test: What is the 'direct' or 'inevitable' consequence or effect of the impugned state action on the Funda-

---

45. On the doctrine of severability, see, supra, Ch. XX, Sec. H.
Also see, Ch. XL, infra.

46. Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, AIR 1950 SC 124 : 1950 SCR 594.

47. State of Madras v. Row, AIR 1952 SC 196 : 1952 SCR 597.

48. Kharak Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1963 SC 1295 : (1964) 1 SCR 332; infra; Bijoe Emmanual v. State of Kerala, AIR 1987 SC 748 : (1986) 3 SCC 615; infra.

49. Bennett Coleman & Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1973 SC 106 : (1972) 2 SCC 788; see, infra.

mental Right of the petitioner? "The true test is whether the effect of the impugned action is to take away or abridge Fundamental Rights."

A legislation or government action may have a direct effect on a Fundamental Right although its subject-matter may be different. The object of the law or executive action is irrelevant when it infringes a Fundamental Right although its subject-matter may be different. Even a law dealing directly with a purpose mentioned in Art. 19(2) would be invalid if it is not reasonable. The Court stated that "no law or action would state in words that rights of freedom of speech and expression are abridged or taken away. That is why Courts have to protect and guard Fundamental Rights by considering the scope and provisions of the Act and its effect upon the Fundamental Rights."

The Court held that, in the instant case, the object of the restrictions imposed on newspapers has nothing to do with the availability of newsprint or foreign exchange because these were post-quota restrictions which fell outside the purview of Art. 19(2). Thus, in the instant case, the Court applied the test of 'direct effect' of law on a Fundamental Right.

The 'effect' test has been applied by the Supreme Court in Maneka Gandhi[50] and several other cases.[51] For example, in the Bank Nationalization case,[52] the Supreme Court has said that it is the direct operation of the Act upon the rights which form the real test. However, earlier, in the Gopalan case,[53] the Supreme Court had applied the test of subject-matter in order to uphold the validity of the Preventive Detention Act against a challenge under Art. 19(1)(a).[54]

Logically, the Bennett Coleman approach should mean that the validity of the Preventive Detention Act should be adjudged with reference to Art. 19(1)(a) as well along with Arts. 21 and 22.[55] In course of time, the Bennett Coleman approach has been accepted and the Gopalan approach discarded.[56] This approach gives greater protection to Fundamental Rights.

It may, however, be noted that under the Bennett Coleman doctrine, it is the 'direct' effect on a Fundamental Right which is determinative. A difference of judicial opinion is possible on the question whether the 'effect' of a provision on a Fundamental Right is 'direct' or 'indirect'.[57]

C. FREEDOM OF SPEECH: ARTICLES 19(1)(A) AND 19(2)

(a) IMPORTANCE OF FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Freedom of speech is the bulwark of democratic government. This freedom is essential for the proper functioning of the democratic process. The freedom of speech and expression is regarded as the first condition of liberty. It occupies a

50. Infra, Ch. XXVI.
51. As for example, see, the Sakal Papers case, infra.
52. Infra, Ch. XXXI.
53. See infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. B.
54. The subject-matter test was also applied in the Hamdard Dawakhana case, infra. Also, Ram Singh v. Delhi, infra, Ch. XXVI.
55. See, infra, Chs. XXVI and XXVII.
56. Infra, Chs. XXVI and XXVII.
57. This test has been applied in the Express Newspapers case, infra; Also see the judgment of MATHEW, J., in the Bennett Coleman case, supra.

preferred position in the hierarchy of liberties giving succour and protection to all other liberties. It has been truly said that it is the mother of all other liberties.[58]

In a democracy, freedom of speech and expression opens up channels of free discussion of issues. Freedom of speech plays a crucial role in the formation of public opinion on social, political and economic matters. Freedom of speech and expression, just as equality clause and the guarantee of life and liberty has been very broadly construed by the Supreme Court right from the 1950s. It has been variously described as a "basic human right", "a natural right" and the like. It embraces within its scope the freedom of propagation and interchange of ideas, dissemination of information which would help formation of one's opinion and view point and debates on matters of public concern. So long as the expression is confined to nationalism, patriotism and love for the motherland, the use of the National Flag by way of expression of those sentiments would be a Fundamental Right. It cannot be used for commercial purpose or otherwise. The law in USA not only recognizes the right to fly National Flag but it has gone to the extent of holding flag burning as an expression of free speech and free expression of its citizens against the establishment but our constitution does not approve the latter part of the right as envisaged in the U.S.[59]

In Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India,[60] BHAGWATI, J., has emphasized on the significance of the freedom of speech and expression in these words:

> "Democracy is based essentially on free debate and open discussion, for that is the only corrective of government action in a democratic set up. If democracy means government of the people by the people, it is obvious that every citizen must be entitled to participate in the democratic process and in order to enable him to intelligently exercise his right of making a choice, free and general discussion of public matters is absolutely essential."

In 1927, in Whitney v. California,[61] LOUIS BRANDEIS, J., made a classic statement on the freedom of speech in the context of the U.S. Constitution:

> "Those who won our independence believed that the final end of the state was to make men free to develop their faculties... They believed liberty to be the secret of happiness and courage to be the secret of liberty. They believed that the freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth; that without free speech and assembly discussion would be futile.... that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government."

Talking about the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution which guarantees freedom of speech in the U.S.A. The U.S. Supreme Court has observed:[62]

> "It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited market place of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market whether it be by the Government itself or a private licensee".

---

58. Report of the Second Press Comm., Vol. I, 34-35.
59. Union of India v. Naveen Jindal, (2004) 2 SCC 510 : AIR 2004 SC 1559.
60. AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248.
61. 247 U.S. 214.
62. Associated Press v. U.S., 326 US 1.

(b) ARTICLE 19(1)(A) OF THE CONSTITUTION

Out of the several rights enumerated in clause (1) of Article 19, the right in sub-clause (a) is not merely a right of speech and expression but a right to freedom of speech and expression. The enumeration of other rights is not by reference to freedom.[63]

Article 19(1)(a) guarantees to all citizens the right to 'freedom of speech and expression'. Under Art. 19(2), 'reasonable restrictions can be imposed on the exercise of this right for certain purposes. Any limitation on the exercise of the right under Art. 19(1)(a) not falling within the four corners of Art. 19(2) cannot be valid.

The freedom of speech under Art. 19(1)(a) includes the right to express one's views and opinions at any issue through any medium, e.g., by words of mouth, writing, printing, picture, film, movie, etc. It thus includes the freedom of communication and the right to propagate or publish opinion. But this right is subject to reasonable restrictions being imposed under Art. 19(2). Free expression cannot be equated or confused with a licence to make unfounded and irresponsible allegations against the judiciary.[64]

Article 19(1)(a) corresponds to Amendment I of the U.S. Constitution which says: "Congress shall make no law....abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Unlike Art. 19(1)(a) of the Indian Constitution, the provision in the U.S. Constitution has two notable features, viz.,

(1) Freedom of Press is specifically mentioned therein;

(2) No restrictions are mentioned on the freedom of speech unlike Art. 19(2) which spells out the restrictions on Art. 19(1).

The Courts in the U.S.A. have to spell out the restrictions on this right from case to case.[65] This provision protects the right to receive information and ideas. The First Amendment preserves "an uninhibited market place of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail...It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, aesthetic, moral and other ideas and experiences".[66]

As stated earlier, in case of a conflict between the freedom of speech under Art. 19(1)(a) and the privilege of Parliament or a State Legislature under Art. 105 or 194 respectively, the freedom of speech will give way to accommodate the legislative privilege.[67] It has also been ruled by the Supreme Court that the freedom of speech available to a Member of Parliament under Art. 105(1) (as well as to a Member of a State Legislature under Art. 194(1)] is wider in amplitude than the right to freedom of speech and expression guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(a) since the freedom of speech of the members of a Legislature on the floor of the House under Art. 105(1) is not subject to the limitations contained in Art. 19(2).[68]

---

63. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.
64. Radha Mohan Lal v. Rajasthan High Court, (2003) 3 SCC 427 : AIR 2003 SC 1467.
65. For a discussion on the American provision, see, Secretary, Ministry of Information & Broadcasting v. Cricket Association, Bengal, AIR 1995 SC 1236 : (1995) 2 SCC 161, et. seq.
66. Kleindiest v. Mandel, 408 US 753, 763.
67. Supra, Chs. II and VI.
68. P.V. Narasimha Rao v. State, AIR 1998 SC 2120 : (1958) 4 SCC 626; supra, Ch. II.

The Jammu & Kashmir Legislature has passed an anti-defection law requiring a member of the legislature to resign his seat in the legislature if he defects from the party to which he belonged at the time of his election to the legislature. The purpose of the law is to discourage defection which has so much vitiated the country's political atmosphere. The law was challenged under Art. 19(1)(a) on the ground that it unreasonably curbs the right of dissent and violates the freedom of speech and expression of a legislator. Rejecting the challenge, the Court has pointed out that the totality of rights enjoyed by a legislator including the freedom to speak on the floor of the House are merely privileges governed by Art. 105 and not Fundamental Rights.[69]

In Kihota Hollohon v. Zachilhu,[70] the Supreme Court has refused to test the anti-defection law passed by Parliament to prohibit defection of members of Legislatures and Parliament from one political party to another against the touchstone of Art. 19(1)(a). Here arises a clash of two values—(i) freedom of speech and expression; (ii) to improve and strengthen the democratic fabric of the country. The Court has given preference to promotion of democracy over freedom of speech and expression if there is any inconsistency between the two. "Unprincipled defection is a political and social evil." It subverts democracy.

An exhibitor of video films, it has been held, cannot claim protection of Art. 19(1)(a) as he is not propagating or circulating any of his own views. The producer of a film can, but a mere exhibitor of video films cannot, claim protection of Art. 19(1)(a).A right of a film maker to make and exhibit his film is a part of his Fundamental Right of freedom of speech and expression under Article 19(1)(a) and the restrictions imposed under Sections 4 and 5A of the Cinematograph Act, 1952 relating to certification by Censor Board by applying the guiding principles set out in Section 5B is a reasonable restrictions contemplated under Article 19(2).[71] The exhibitor shows films merely to earn profit and not to propagate any ideas or arousing any public opinion. An exhibitor of films cannot be equated with circulation or distribution of newspapers. Exhibiting films is a commercial activity. Circulation of newspapers and magazines continues with the publisher but the film after production goes out of the producer's hands for being exhibited by such persons as are totally unconnected with production.[72]

The phrase 'speech and expression' used in Art. 19(1)(a) has broad connotation. The right to paint or sing or dance or to write poetry or literature is also covered by Art. 19(1)(a) because the common basic characteristic of all these activities is freedom of speech and expression.[73]

THE RIGHT TO FLY NATIONAL FLAG AND SING NATIONAL ANTHEM

The right to fly the national flag however is neither unfettered, unsubscribed, unrestricted nor unchannellised. Right to fly the flag is regulated by the Emblems and Names (Prevention of Improper Use) Act, 1950 and Prevention of Insults to National Honour Act, 1971.

---

69. Mian Bashir v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1982 J & K 26.
70. AIR 1993 SC 412 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651; supra, Ch. II, Sec. F(a).
71. Director of Film Festivals v. Gaurav Ashwin Jain, (2007) 4 SCC 737 : AIR 2007 SC 1640.
72. Star Video v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1994 All 25.
73. Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248; Usha Uthup v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1984 Cal. 268.

National Anthem, National Flag and National Song are secular symbols of the nationhood. They represent the supreme collective expression of commitment and loyalty to the nation as well as patriotism for the country. They are necessary adjuncts of sovereignty being symbols and actions associated therewith. If the unity and integrity of India is to be perceived in diverse situations, the feeling of loyalty, commitment and patriotism can be judged not only by giving effect to constitutionalism but also on their secular symbols. Unrestricted use of the National Flag may result in commercial exploitation of the flag. The unrestricted use of the National Flag may result in its indiscriminate use in procession, meetings etc. Instances of insults to the National Flag as a matter of protest may also occur. It must certainly be treated with the utmost respect and dignity. This might not be possible without imposing any restrictions on its use. Flag Code although is not a law within the meaning of Article 13(3) (a) of the Constitution of India, for the purpose of clause (2) of Article 19 it would not restrictively regulate the free exercise of the right of flying the National Flag. But the Flag Code to the extent it provides for preserving respect and dignity of the National Flag, the same deserves to be followed.[74] In other words, our National Flag cannot suffer any indignity.

In Baragur Ramachandrappa[75] The Supreme Court rejected the challenge that Section 95 of the Criminal Procedure Code which confers power on the State Government to forfeit certain publications referred to in that section including news papers, was violative of Article 19(1) (a). The issue as to the validity of the section arose in relation to a book which was considered by the petitioner to be objectionable, inflammatory, hurtful and insulting to the sentiments and feelings of a religious sect known as Veerashaivas who were the followers of Basaveshwara, a great saint of the twelfth century. On behalf of the author it was contended that the entire matter should be examined in the backdrop of the philosophy and principles underlying sub clause (h) of the Article 51A of the Constitution which envisaged the development of a scientific temperament, a feeling of humanism and a spirit of inquiry and reform as well as the Fundamental Right to freedom of speech under Article 19(1)(a). The Court after taking into consideration the vast disparities in language, culture and religion in the country, was of the view that unwarranted and malicious criticism or interference in the faith of others could not be accepted, and after referring to certain earlier cases of the Court[76] held that the challenge could not be sustained on the finding that publication of a book which endangers public order and held that the extracts quoted from "The Book" from chapter XII were not in sync with the rest of the novel and had been deliberately designed to be hurtful.

(c) RIGHT TO SILENCE

The right to speech implies the right to silence. It implies freedom, not to listen, and not to be forced to listen. The right comprehends the freedom to be free

---

74. Union of India v. Naveen Jindal, (2004) 2 SCC 510 : AIR 2004 SC 1559.
75. Baragur Ramachandrappa v. State of Karnataka, (2007) 5 SCC 11 : (2007) 6 JT 411.
76. Indian Express Newspapers (Bombay) Pvt. Ltd. v. Union of India, (1985) 1 SCC 641; The State of Uttar Pradesh v. Lalai Singh Yadav, (1976) 4 SCC 213; S. Rangarajan v. P. Jagjivan Ram, (1989) 2 SCC 574.

from what one desires to be free from. A loudspeaker forces a person to hear what he wishes not to hear. The use of a loudspeaker may be incidental to the exercise of the right but, its use is not a matter of right, or part of the rights guaranteed by Article 19(1).[77]

(d) RIGHT TO RECEIVE INFORMATION

The expression "freedom of speech and expression" in Art. 19(1)(a) has been held to include the right to acquire information and disseminate the same. It includes the right to communicate it through any available media whether print or electronic or audio-visual, such as, advertisement, movie, article or speech, etc. This freedom includes the freedom to communicate or circulate one's opinion without interference to as large a population in the country, as well as abroad, as is possible to reach.

In People's Union for Civil Liberties, the Supreme Court dealt with this aspect of the freedom elaborately. The right of the citizens to obtain information on matters relating to public acts flows from the Fundamental Right enshrined in Art. 19(1)(a). Securing information on the basic details concerning the candidates contesting for elections to Parliament or the State Legislature promotes freedom of expression and therefore the right to information forms an integral part of Article 19(1)(a).[78]

Freedom of expression, as contemplated by Article 19(1) (a) which in many respects overlaps and coincides with freedom of speech, has manifold meanings. It need not and ought not to be confined to expressing something in words orally or in writing. Even a manifestation of an emotion, feeling etc. without words would amount to expression. Communication of emotion and display of talent through music, painting etc. is also a sort of expression. The Court noted that ballot is the instrument by which the voter expresses his choice between candidates.[79]

While expounding the scope of "expression" in Article 19(1) (a), the Supreme Court has drawn a distinction between the conferment of the right to vote on fulfillment of requisite criteria and the culmination of that right in the final act of expressing choice towards a particular candidate by means of ballot. The Court pointed out that though the initial right cannot be placed on the pedestal of a fundamental right, but, at the stage when the voter goes to the polling booth and casts his vote, his freedom to express arises. The casting of vote in favour of one or the other candidate tantamounts to expression of his opinion and preference and that final stage in the exercise of voting right marks the accomplishment of freedom of expression of the voter and that is where Article 19(1) (a) is attracted.[80]

Since right to information is a constituent of the freedom of expression under Art. 19(1)(a), the amended S. 33-B of Representation of People Act, 1951 which provides that notwithstanding anything contained in the judgment of any Court or directions issued by the Election Commission, no candidate shall be liable to disclose or furnish any such information in respect of his election which is not re-

---

77. Noise Pollution (V), In re, (2005) 5 SCC 733 : AIR 2005 SC 3136.
78. PUCL v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 399 : AIR 2003 SC 2363.
79. Ibid.
80. PUCL v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 399.

quired to be disclosed or furnished under the Act or the rules made thereunder, is on the face of it beyond the legislative competence, as the Supreme Court has held that the voter has a Fundamental Right under Article 19(1)(a) to know the antecedents of a candidate and was therefore ultra vires Act. 19(1)(a).[81]

It has been said that although elections are fought by political parties, the same would be a farce if the voters are unaware of the antecedents of candidates contesting elections and it would be a vote without any basis. Such elections cannot be considered as free or fair. The concomitant of the right to vote which is the basic postulate of democracy is two fold:

First, formulation of an opinion about the candidates; and

Secondly the expression of choice by casing a vote in favour of the candidate preferred by the voter.[82] In Peoples Union for Civil Liberties[83] the petitioners sought disclosure of information relating to safety violations and defects in various nuclear power plants, the Court upheld the contention of Union of India that data about fissile materials are matters of sensitive character which may enable the enemies of the nation to monitor strategic activities and therefore any information relating to training features, processes or technology of nuclear plants cannot be disclosed.

Right to information is a facet of the right to freedom of speech and expression as contained in Article 19(1)(a) of the Constitution. Right to information, thus, indisputably is a Fundamental Right.

But the right does not carry with it an unrestricted right to gather information. A reasonable restriction on the exercise of the right to know or right to information is always permissible in the interest of the security of the State. Generally, the exemptions/exceptions under the laws referred to in Article 19(2) entitled the Government to withhold information relating to the following matters :

(i) International relations,

(ii) National security (including defence) and public safety;

(iii) Investigation, detection and prevention of crime;

(iv) Internal deliberations of the Government;

(v) Information received in confidence from a source outside the Government;

(vi) Information, which if disclosed, would violate the privacy of the individual;

(vii) Information of an economic nature, (including trade secrets) which, if disclosed, would confer an unfair advantage on some persons or concern, or, subject some person or Government to an unfair disadvantage;

---

81. People's Union for Civil Liberties (PUCL) v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 399 : AIR 2003 SC 2363.

82. People's Union for Civil Liberties (PUCL) v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 399 : AIR 2003 SC 2363.

83. Peoples Union for Civil/Liberties v. Union of India, (2004) 2 SCC 476 : AIR 2004 SC 1442.

(viii) Information which is subject to a claim of legal professional privilege, e.g. communication between a legal adviser and the client; between a physician and the patient;

(ix) Information about scientific discoveries.[84]

(x) Much of this has been covered by the Right to Information Act, 2006

The Supreme Court has given a broad dimension to Art. 19(1)(a) by laying down the proposition that freedom of speech involves not only communication, but also receipt, of information. Communication and receipt of information are the two sides of the same coin. Right to know is a basic right of the citizens of a free country and Art. 19(1)(a) protects this right. The right to receive information springs from the right to freedom of speech and expression enshrined in Art. 19(1)(a). The freedom to receive and to communicate information and ideas without interference is an important aspect of the freedom of speech and expression. Without adequate information, a person cannot form an informed opinion.

When allegations of political patronage are made, the public in general has a right to know the circumstances under which their elected representatives got such allotment.[85]

In case of a matter being part of public records, including Court records cannot be claimed.[86]

In State of Uttar Pradesh v. Raj Narain,[87] the Supreme Court has held that Art. 19(1)(a) not only guarantees freedom of speech and expression, it also ensures and comprehends the right of the citizens to know, the right to receive information regarding matters of public concern. The Supreme Court has underlined the significance of the right to know in a democracy in these words:

> "In a government of responsibility like ours, where all the agents of the public must be responsible for their conduct there can be but few secrets. The people of this country have a right to know every public act, everything that is done in a public way, by their public functionaries. They are entitled to know the particulars of every public transaction in all its bearings. The right to know, which is derived from the concept of freedom of speech, though not absolute, is a factor which should make one wary, when secrecy is claimed for transactions which can, at any rate, have no repercussion on public security. To cover with veil of secrecy, the common routine business, is not in the interest of the public. Such secrecy can seldom be legitimately desired. It is generally desired for the purpose of parties and politics or personal self-interest or bureaucratic routine. The responsibility of officials to explain and to justify their acts is the chief safeguard against oppression and corruption".

In Secretary, Ministry of Information and Broadcasting, Govt. of India v. Cricket Association of Bengal,[88] the Supreme Court reiterated the proposition

---

84. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (2004) 2 SCC 476 : AIR 2004 SC 1442.
85. Onkar Lal Bajaj v. Union of India, (2003) 2 SCC 673.
86. District Registrar and Collector v. Canara Bank (2005) 1 SCC 496 : AIR 2004 SC 1442.
87. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Raj Narain, AIR 1975 SC 865, 884 : (1975) 4 SCC 428.
Also see, Reliance Petrochemicals Ltd. v. Indian Express, AIR 1989 SC 190 : (1988) 4 SCC 592; infra, footnote 38 on 1430.
88. Secretary, Ministry of Information and Broadcasting, Govt. of India v. Cricket Association of Bengal, AIR 1995 SC 1236; infra, 1177-78.

that the freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a) includes the right to acquire information and to disseminate the same.

In Dinesh Trivedi, M.P. and Others v. Union of India,[89] the Supreme Court dealt with the right to freedom of information and observed "in modern constitutional democracies, it is axiomatic that citizens have a right to know about the affairs of the government which, having been elected by them, seek to formulate sound policies of governance aimed at their welfare". The Court further observed:

> "Democracy expects openness and openness is concomitant of a free society and the sunlight is a best disinfectant".

The Delhi High Court in Association for Democratic Reforms v. Union of India,[90] has emphasized that the right to receive information acquires great significance in the context of elections.[91]

It is now common knowledge that there is criminalisation of politics in India. It is a matter of great concern that anti-social and criminals are seeking to enter the political arena through the mechanism of elections to State Legislatures and even to Parliament. Parliament has not yet been able to enact a law to uproot the evil. In this scenario, the Delhi High Court has sought to cleanse the electoral process through the mechanism of the right to know of the people. The Delhi High Court has ruled that from every candidate for election, the Election Commission shall secure for the voters the following information:

(1) Whether the candidate is accused of any offence punishable with imprisonment.

(2) Assets possessed by the candidate, his or her spouse and dependant children.

(3) Facts denoting the candidate's competence and suitability for being a parliamentarian. This should include the candidate's educational qualification.

(4) Any other relevant information regarding candidates' competence to be a member of Parliament or State Legislature.

It needs to be emphasized that through its pronouncement, the Delhi High Court is not seeking to impose any additional qualification on a candidate over and above what the Constitution and the relevant law prescribe. What the Court is seeking to achieve is that a voter after knowing the background of the candidate will vote properly. As the Court has said, "… since the future of the country depends upon the power of the ballot, the voters must be given an opportunity for making an informed decision." Exercise of the informed option to vote in favour or against a candidate will strengthen democracy in the country and root out the evil of corruption and criminality at present extant in politics.

On appeal, the Supreme Court substantially agreed with The Delhi High Court. The Court has upheld the right of a voter to know about the antecedents of

---

89. (1997) 4 SCC 306 : (1997) 1 SCJ 697.

90. Association for Democratic Reforms v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Del 126, 137. Also see, infra, 1431.

91. Supra, Ch. XIX.

his candidate as a part of his Fundamental Right under Art. 19(1)(a). Democracy cannot survive without free and fairly informed voters. The Court has observed:

> "... one-sided information, disinformation, mis-information and non-information will equally create an uniformed citizenary which makes democracy a faree... Freedom of speech and expression includes right to impart and receive information which includes freedom to hold opinions".[1]

The Court has ruled that candidates for the Lok Sabha or State Legislative Assemblies would have to disclose their antecedents, assets and educational qualifications to help the electorate make the right choice. The Court has said: "Votes cast by uninformed voters in favour of a candidate would be meaningless." The common man may think twice before electing law-breakers as law-makers. Reiterating that law-makers are public servants and, therefore, the people of the country have a right to know about every public act by public functionaries, including MPs and MLAs who are public functionaries.

Rejecting the argument that the voters do not have a right to know about the "private" affairs of public functionaries, the Court has observed:

> "There are widespread allegations of corruption against persons holding post and power. In such a situation, the question is not of knowing personal affairs but to have openness in democracy for attempting to cure the cancerous growth of corruption by a few rays of light".

The Court has said that the Election Commission must make it mandatory for the candidates to give details on the following counts:

- Whether the candidate is convicted or acquitted or discharged of any criminal offence in the past—whether he has been punished with imprisonment or fine?
- Prior to six months of filing of nomination, whether the candidates has been accused in any pending case, of any offence punishable with imprisonment for two years or more. Whether charge is framed or cognisance is taken by the Court of law, if so details thereof;
- The assets (immovable, movable, bank balances etc) of a candidate and of his/her spouse and that of dependants;
- Liabilities, if any, particularly whether there are any overdues of any public financial institution or government dues;
- The educational qualification of the candidate.

It will be appreciated that the judiciary has used its craftsmanship to harness the right to information to achieve an extremely laudable social objective, viz., that of preventing criminalisation of the Indian politics.

Since right to information is not absolute, a report made by Committee of Judges regarding the conduct of High Court Judges to the Chief Justice of India is wholly confidential and is only for the purpose of satisfaction of the Chief Justice of India. It is purely preliminary in nature, ad hoc and not final. The authority by which the Chief Justice of India can exercise this power of inquiry is moral or ethical and not in the exercise of powers under any law. Exercise of such

---

1. Union of India v. Association for Democratic Reforms, JT 2002(4) SC 501.
Also see, Ch. II, Sec. D(e), supra; Ch. XIX, Sec. D(b), supra.

power of the Chief Justice of India based on moral authority cannot be made the subject matter of a writ petition to disclose a report made to him.[2]

(e) FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

In the U.S.A., the First Amendment, mentioned above, specifically protects a free press. The view developed by the U.S. Supreme Court is that freedom of the press includes more than merely serving as a "neutral conduit of information between the people and their elected leaders or as a neutral form of debate."

The prime purpose of the free press guarantee is regarded as creating a fourth institution outside the government as an additional check on the three official branches—executive, legislative and the judiciary.[3] It is the primary function of the press to provide comprehensive and objective information on all aspects of the country's social, economic and political life. The press serves as a powerful antidote to any abuse of power by government officials and as a means for keeping the elected officials responsible to the people whom they were elected to serve.

The democratic credentials of a state are judged today by the extent of the freedom press enjoys in that state. DOUGLAS, J., of the U.S. Supreme Court has observed that "acceptance by Government of a dissident press is a measure of the maturity of the nation."[4] Suppression of the right of the press to praise or criticise government agents and to clamour and contend for or against change violates the First Amendment by restraining one of the very agencies the framers of the U.S. Constitution selected to improve the American society and to keep it free.[5] The freedom of speech and of the press is protected not only from direct government encroachment but also from more subtle government interference. The U.S. Supreme Court has emphasized that it has power to nullify "action which encroaches on freedom of utterance under the guise of punishing libel."[6]

In India, freedom of the press is implied from the freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a). There is no specific provision ensuring freedom of the press as such. The freedom of the press is regarded as a "species of which freedom of expression is a genus."[7] Thus, being only a right flowing from the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press in India stands on no higher footing than the freedom of speech of a citizen, and the press enjoys no privilege as such distinct from the freedom of the citizen.

The Supreme Court has laid emphasis in several cases on the importance of maintaining freedom of press in a democratic society. The press seeks to advance public interest by publishing facts and opinions without which a democratic electorate cannot make responsible judgments. Articles and news are published in the press from time to time to expose the weaknesses of the government. This leads at times to the suppression of the freedom of the press by the government.

---

2. Indira Jaising v. Registrar General, Supreme Court of India, (2003) 5 SCC 494.
3. New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254; New York Times Company v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971) (known as the Pentagon Papers case).
4. Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1.
5. Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214.
6. Beauharnais v. Illinois, 72 S. Ct. 1070.
7. Sakal Papers v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 305 : (1962) 3 SCR 842.

It is, therefore, the primary duty of the Courts to uphold the said freedom and invalidate all laws or administrative actions which interfere with the freedom of the press contrary to the constitutional mandate.[8]

In Printers (Mysore) Ltd. v. Assistant Commercial Tax Officer,[9] the Supreme Court has reiterated that though freedom of the press is not expressly guaranteed as a Fundamental Right, it is implicit in the freedom of speech and expression. Freedom of the press has always been a cherished right in all democratic countries and the press has rightly been described as the fourth estate. The democratic credentials of a state are judged by the extent of freedom the press enjoys in that state.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the freedom of the press is not so much for the benefit of the press as for the benefit of the general community because the community has a right to be supplied with information and the government owes a duty to educate the people within the limits of its resources.

Article 19(1)(a) applies to citizens only and so a non-citizen running a newspaper cannot seek the guarantee of this constitutional provision.

Imposition of pre-censorship on a newspaper,[10] or prohibiting it from publishing its own views or those of its correspondents on a burning topic of the day,[11] constitute an encroachment on the freedom of speech and expression. The freedom of speech and expression includes freedom to propagate ideas which is ensured by freedom of circulation of a publication, as a publication is of little value without circulation. Therefore, imposition of a ban upon entry and circulation of a journal within a State is restriction of Art. 19(1)(a).[12]

Olivier v. Buttigieg,[13] a Privy Council case from Malta, is interesting on the point of circulation. The constitutional provisions in India and Malta regarding freedom of speech are practically synonymous. The church authorities condemned 'Voice of Malta', a paper run by the opposition party. The Health Minister thereupon issued a circular prohibiting the entry of the newspaper in the various hospitals and branches of the Health Department. The entry of any other newspaper was not prohibited. The Privy Council decided that the Minister's order amounted to a hindrance in the way of the editor of the paper in the enjoyment of his freedom to impart ideas and information which is an essential part of the freedom of speech and expression. The Privy Council refused to accept the argument that the hindrance was slight and that it could be ignored as being de minimis.

(f) SAKAL PAPERS

An Act[14] and a government order[15] thereunder sought to regulate the number of pages according to the price charged, prescribed the number of supplements to

---

8. Indian Express Newspapers (Bombay) P. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 515 at 527 : (1985) 1 SCC 641.
9. (1994) 2 SCC 434.
10. Brij Bhushan v. Delhi, AIR 1950 SC 129 : 1950 SCR 605.
11. Virendra v. State of Punjab, AIR 1957 SC 896 : 1958 SCR 308.
12. Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, AIR 1950 SC 124 : 1950 SCR 594.
13. (1966) 2 All E.R. 459.
14. The Newspaper (Price and Page) Act, 1956.
15. The Daily Newspaper (Price and Page) Order, 1960.

be published, and regulate the size and area of advertisements in relation to other matter contained in a newspaper. Thus, the number of pages published by a newspaper depended upon the price charged to the readers.

The Supreme Court ruled it invalid for its purpose was to reduce circulation of some newspapers by making their price unattractively high for their readers. Reduction in the area for advertisements would reduce revenues forcing the newspapers to raise their prices which was also bound to affect circulation. This directly affected the freedom of speech and expression because inherent in this freedom is the right to publish and circulate the publication.

Art 19(1)(a) guarantees not only what a person circulates but also the volume of circulation. "The freedom of a newspaper to publish any number of pages or to circulate it to any number of persons is each an integral part of the freedom of speech and expression. A restraint placed upon either of them would be a direct infringement of the right of freedom of speech and expression" Being a restriction on Art. 19(1)(a), it was not related to any of the purposes mentioned in Art. 19(2), and so it was invalid.[16]

In the instant case, the Central Government sought to support the Act and the order by pleading that they regulated the commercial aspects of the newspapers, and not dissemination of news and views by them, and amounted to reasonable restrictions under Art. 19(6).[17] The Court agreed that newspapers have two aspects—dissemination of news and views and commercial. The two aspects are different, the former falls under Art. 19(1)(a) read with Art. 19(2), and the latter falls under Art. 19(1)(g) and can be regulated under Art. 19(6).[18] However, the state cannot seek to place restrictions on business by directly and immediately curtailing any other freedom of the citizen guaranteed by the Constitution and which is not susceptible of abridgement on the same grounds as are set out in Art. 19(6). "Therefore, the right of freedom of speech cannot be taken away with the object of placing restrictions on the business activities of a citizen."

The grounds on which the two freedoms—of speech and of trade and commerce—can be curtailed are different. The freedom of speech cannot be curtailed 'in the interests of the general public', but the freedom to carry on business can be. If a law directly affecting freedom of speech is challenged, "it is no answer that the restrictions enacted by it are justifiable under clauses (3) to (6)."

Article 19 enumerates different freedoms separately and then specifies the extent of restrictions to which each of them can be subjected and the objects for securing which this could be done.[19] A citizen is entitled to enjoy each and every one of the freedoms together and Art. 19(1) does not prefer one freedom to another. The state cannot make a law which directly restricts one freedom even for securing the better enjoyment of another freedom. "All the greater reason, therefore, for holding that the state cannot directly restrict one freedom by placing an otherwise permissible restriction on another freedom." Therefore, referring the press as a business and justifying the impugned restriction under Art. 19(6) as a proper restriction on the right to carry on the business of publishing a newspaper

---

16. For discussion on Art. 19(2), see below.
17. Sakal Papers v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 305, at 314 : (1962) 3 SCR 842.
18. For discussion on Arts. 19(1)(g) read with 19(6), see, infra, Sec.H.
19. See, infra, for discussion on restrictions on the freedoms guaranteed by Arts. 19(1)(a) to 19(1)(g).

"would be wholly irrelevant for considering whether the impugned Act infringes or does not infringe the freedom guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a)." This means that freedom of speech cannot be restricted for the purpose of regulating the commercial aspect of the activities of the newspapers.

As the purpose of the law in question was to effect directly the right of circulation of newspapers "which would necessarily undermine their power to influence public opinion it cannot but be regarded as a dangerous weapon which is capable of being used against democracy itself." The Court emphasized, "The freedom of speech and expression of opinion is of paramount importance under a democratic constitution which envisages changes in the composition of legislatures and Governments and must be preserved."[20]

(g) BENNETT COLEMAN

Bennett Coleman & Co. v. Union of India,[21] is a case of great significance in the area of freedom of speech and expression. India faces a shortage of indigenous newsprint. Therefore, newsprint has to be imported from foreign countries. Because of the shortage of foreign exchange, quantity of newsprint imported was not adequate to meet all requirements. Some restrictions, therefore, became necessary on the consumption of newsprint. Accordingly, a system of newsprint quota for newspapers was evolved. The actual consumption of newsprint by a newspaper during the year 1970-71 or 1971-72, whichever was less, was taken as the base. For dailies with a circulation up to 100,000 copies, 10 per cent increase in the basic entitlement was to be granted, but for newspapers with a larger circulation, the increase was to be only 3 per cent. Newspapers with less than 10 pages daily could raise the number of pages by 20 per cent subject to the ceiling of 10. A few more restrictions were imposed on the user of newsprint.

The dominant direction of the policy was to curtail the growth of big newspapers which could not increase the number of pages, page-area or periodicity by reducing circulation to meet their requirements even within their admissible quota of newsprint. This newsprint policy was challenged in the Supreme Court.

By a majority, the Supreme Court declared the policy unconstitutional. While the Government could evolve a policy of allotting newsprint on a fair and equitable basis, keeping in view the interests of small, medium and big newspapers, the Government could not, in the garb of regulating distribution of newsprint, control the growth and circulation of newspapers. In effect, here the newsprint policy became the newspaper control policy. While newsprint quota could be fixed on a reasonable basis, post-quota restrictions could not be imposed. The newspapers should be left free to determine their pages, circulation and new editions within their fixed quota. The policy of limiting all papers whether small or large, in English or an Indian language, to 10 pages was held to be discriminatory as it treated unequals as equals. The restrictions imposed cut at the very root of the guaranteed freedom. The Court stated:[22]

> "The effect and consequence of the impugned policy upon the newspapers is directly controlling the growth and circulation of newspapers. The direct effect

20. AIR 1962 SC at 314-15 : 91962) 3 SCR 842.
21. AIR 1973 SC 106 : (1972) 2 SCC 788.
For a comment on the case by the author, see 15 JILI 154.
22. Ibid, at 120-121.

> is the restriction upon circulation of newspapers. The direct effect is upon growth of newspapers through pages. The direct effect is that newspapers are deprived of their area of advertisement. The direct effect is that they are exposed to financial loss. The direct effect is that freedom of speech and expression is infringed."

The Court maintained that the freedom of the press embodies the right of the people to speak and express. The freedom of speech and expression is not only in the volume of circulation but also in the volume of news and views. The press has the right of free publication and their circulation without any obvious restraint on publication. In the words of the Court: "Freedom of the press is both qualitative and quantitative. Freedom lies both in circulation and in content."[23]

(h) INDIAN EXPRESS

Several newspapers filed writ petitions challenging the constitutional validity of the notifications issued by the Centre imposing from March 1, 1981, specified rates of customs duty and auxiliary duty on newsprint imported by different categories of newspapers. The levy was challenged in the Supreme Court. The main plea of the petitioners was that the impugned levy of duty on imported newsprint was excessive and had the direct effect of crippling the freedom of speech and expression and the carrying on of the business of publishing newspapers as it had led to an increase in the price of newspapers resulting in reduction of their circulation.

The Supreme Court accepted the plea of the newspapers with the following observation:[24]

> "What may, however, have to be observed in levying a tax on newspaper industry is that it should not be an overburden on newspapers which constitute the Fourth Estate of the country. Nor should it single out newspaper industry for harsh treatment. A wise administrator should realise that the imposition of a tax like the customs duty on newsprint is an imposition on knowledge and would virtually amount to a burden on a man for being literate."

The fundamental principle involved was the "people's right to know". Freedom of speech and expression should, therefore, receive a generous support from all those who believe in the participation of the people in the administration. The Court noted that with a view to checking malpractices interfering with the free flow of information, democratic constitutions the world over make provisions guaranteeing freedom of speech and expression and laying down the limits of interference therewith. It is, therefore, the primary duty of all national Courts to uphold this freedom and invalidate all laws or administrative actions which interfere with this freedom, contrary to the constitutional mandate.

The Court pointed out that the imposition of customs duty on newsprint amounts to an imposition of tax on knowledge and virtually amounts to a burden imposed on a man for being literate and for being conscious of his duty as a citizen to inform himself of the world around him. It is on account of the special interest which society has in the freedom of speech and expression that the approach of the government must be more cautious while levying taxes on matters concerning newspaper industry than while levying taxes on other matters.

---

23. Ibid, at 130.
24. Indian Express Newspapers (Bombay) Pvt. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 515 at 539 : (1985) 1 SCC 641.

But instead of quashing the impugned notification itself, the Court directed the Government to consider within six months the entire question of levy of import duty or auxiliary duty on newsprint with effect from March 1, 1981. If on such reconsideration, the government decided to modify the levy of the duty, it should take necessary steps to that end. Quashing the impugned notifications would have led to the petitioners paying much higher duty and the result would have been disastrous to them.

The Court emphasized that it did not wish the Government to be deprived of the legitimate duty which the petitioners would have to pay on the imported newsprint. The Court thus rejected the plea of the petitioners that no duty could be levied on the newspaper industry. Having regard to the facilities like telephones, teleprinters, postal, transport and other communication amenities provided by the state at considerable cost to itself, the newspapers "have to bear the common fiscal burden like the others." However, such a levy was "subject to review by Courts in the light of the provisions of the Constitution."[25] The Court has to reconcile the social interest involved in the freedom of speech and expression with the public interest involved in the fiscal levies imposed by the Government specially because newsprint constitutes the body, if expression happens to be the soul.

Underlining the importance of the freedom of the press in democratic society, the Court has stated that in to-day's free world, freedom of press is the heart of social and political intercourse. The purpose of the press is to advance the public interest by publishing facts and opinions without which a democratic electorate cannot make responsible judgments. With a view to checking malpractices interfering with the free flow of information, democratic constitutions all the world over make provisions guaranteeing the freedom of speech and expression and laying down the limits of interference with it. "It is, therefore, the primary duty of all the national Courts to uphold the said freedom and invalidate all laws or administrative actions which interfere with it contrary to the constitutional mandate."[26]

(i) HINDUSTAN TIMES

Executive orders issued by State Government under Art. 162 directing deduction of an amount of 5% from the bills payable to newspapers having circulation of more than 25,000 copies for publication of government advertisements for implementation of its "Pension and Social Security Scheme for Full time Journalists" has been held to be ultra vires. The Court observed that advertisements in newspapers play an important role in the matter of revenue of the newspapers and have a direct nexus with its circulation by making the newspapers available to the readers at a price at which they can afford and they have no other option but to collect more funds by publishing commercial and other advertisements and as such the State cannot, in view of the equality doctrine contained in Article 14 of the Constitution, resort to the theory of "take it or leave it". Every executive action which operates to the prejudice of any person must have the sanction of

---

25. Indian Express Newspapers (Bombay) Pvt. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 515 at 539 : (1985) 1 SCC 641.
26. Ibid, at 527.

law and the executive cannot interfere with the rights and liabilities of any person unless the legality thereof is supportable in any Court of law.[27]

(j) OTHER ASPECTS OF THE FREEDOM OF PRESS

The newspaper reporters can interview the prisoners condemned to death if they are willing to be interviewed. Unless, in a given case, there are weighty reasons for denying the opportunity to interview a condemned prisoner, the right of the press to interview the prisoners should not be denied. The reasons for denying the interview should be recorded in writing.[28] In the instant case, the President had declined to commute the death sentence to life imprisonment; the convicted prisoners were willing to be interviewed. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the denial of right to the petitioner press reporter to interview these condemned prisoners, in the absence of any weighty considerations, was not justified.

Again in M. Hasan v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[29] the Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that denial of permission to a press reporter to interview a willing condemned prisoner on a ground not falling within Art. 19(2) is not valid. "Any such denial is deprivation of a citizen's Fundamental Right of freedom of speech and expression". Convicts are not wholly denuded of their Fundamental Rights.

During the course of a trial of a suit for damages, the judge ordered that the evidence of a witness should not be published in the newspapers. The Supreme Court rejected the plea that the order infringed the Fundamental Right of a press reporter under Art. 19(1)(a). The Court observed that, as a judicial decision purports to decide the controversy between the parties before the Court and nothing more, a judicial verdict pronounced by a Court in relation to a matter brought before it for its decision would not affect the right of citizens under Art. 19(1).[30]

An Act[31] enacted to regulate conditions of service of employees of newspaper establishments, e.g., gratuity, hours of work, leave, wages, etc. does not violate Art. 19(1)(a). An argument against its validity was that it would adversely affect the financial position of the marginally situated newspapers which might be forced to close down and thus the tendency of the Act was to curtail circulation, which violated Art. 19(1)(a). The Court held, on the other hand, that the press had no immunity from general laws like tax or industrial laws. The purpose of the Act was to ameliorate the conditions of the workmen in the newspaper industry. The burden on marginally viable newspapers was an extraneous consequence or incidental disadvantage and not what the legislature aimed at in enacting the measure. The burden on the industry was remote which might or might not come about, and unless the burden was the direct and inevitable consequence of the Act itself, it could not be held invalid under Art. 19(1)(a).[32]

The press is not immune from taxation or general labour laws or civil or criminal laws. The prohibition is upon the imposition of any restriction directly

---

27. Hindustan Times v. State of U.P., (2003) 1 SCC 591 : AIR 2003 SC 250.
28. Smt. Prabha Dutt v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 6 : (1982) 1 SCC 1.
29. AIR 1998 AP 35.
Also see, State v. Charulata Joshi, AIR 1999 SC 1379 : (1999) 4 SCC 65, on the question of interviewing an under-trial prisoner.
30. Naresh Mirajkar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1967 SC 1 : 1966 (3) SCR 744.
31. The Working Journalists (Conditions of Service) and Miscellaneous Provisions Act, 1955.
32. Express Newspapers v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 578 : 1959 SCR 12. Also see, Indian Express Newspapers (P.) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 965.

relatable to the right to publish, to the right to disseminate information and to the circulation of newspapers.[33]

It is not inconsistent with Art. 19(1)(a) for the Central Government to appoint a committee to enquire into the economics of the newspaper industry.[34]

A legal provision requiring printing of the name of the printer, place of printing, name of the publisher and the place of publication on every paper or book does not infringe Art. 19(1)(a) for the intention of the provision is to inform the public as to who the printer or publisher is.[35]

Under S. 99A, Cr. P.C., a State Government can forfeit any book or newspaper if it appears it to contain any seditious matter, or matter intended to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of citizens, or matter intended to outrage the religious feelings of a class of citizens. The aggrieved party can move the High Court against the order of forefeiture. The provision has been held valid under Art. 19(2) as having been made in the interest of public order, decency or morality.[36]

Reliance Petrochemicals undertook a mega issue of debentures worth more than Rs. 500 crores. Suits and writ petitions were filed in various Courts seeking injunction against the said public issue. On an application by Reliance, the Supreme Court transferred all these cases to itself for decision, and also made an ex parte direction that the issue of debentures should go on "without let or hindrance". The Indian Express published an article questioning the validity of the consent given by the Controller of Capital Issues to the issue in question. Reliance secured from the Supreme Court an order of injunction prohibiting the newspaper from publishing anything questioning the legality or validity of the issue of debentures—a matter which at the time was sub judice.

The debentures were over-subscribed though not allotted yet when the concerned newspaper sought vacation of the Court's order against it. Reliance opposed vacation of the injunction at that stage on the ground that before allotment was made, the subscribers could withdraw their applications which might adversely affect the issue and so they pleaded that "the danger still persists". The newspaper argued that pre-stoppage of newspaper publication on matters of public importance was contrary to the freedom of the press enshrined in the Constitution. The Supreme Court adopted the test laid down in Anita Whitney v. California[37] that there must be reasonable ground to believe that the danger apprehended was "real and imminent". BRANDEIS, J., has said in Whitney that the fact that speech was likely to result in some violence or in destruction of property was not enough to justify its suppression. There must be probability of serious injury to the state.

In Reliance Petrochemicals Ltd. v. Indian Express,[38] the Court has underscored the right of the people to know. The Court has pointed out that in the instant case it had to balance two interests of great public importance-freedom of speech and administration of justice. "A balance, in our opinion, has to be struck

---

33. Printers (Mysore) Ltd. v. Asst. Commercial Tax Officer, (1994) 2 SCC 434.
34. The Statesman v. Fact Finding Committee, AIR 1975 Cal. 14.
35. In re G. Alavander, AIR 1957 Mad 427.
36. Veerabrahman v. State, AIR 1969 AP 572. For discussion on Art. 19(2), see, infra.
37. (1926) 71 Law Ed. 1095.
38. AIR 1989 SC 190 : (1988) 4 SCC 592.

between the requirements of free press and free trial..." The Court has observed in this regard:[39]

> "We must see whether there is a present and imminent danger for the continuance of the injunction ..... It is necessary to reiterate that the continuance of this injunction would amount to interference with the freedom of press in the form of preventive injunction and it must, therefore, be based on reasonable grounds for the sole purpose of keeping the administration of justice unimpaired... We must remember that the people at large have a right to know in order to be able to take part in a participatory development in the industrial life and democracy. Right to know is a basic right which citizens of a free country aspire in the broaden horizon of the right to live in this age on our land under Art. 21 of the Constitution. That right has reached new dimensions and urgency. That right puts greater responsibility upon those who take upon the responsibility to inform."[40]

The Court thus ordered that there was no longer any need to continue the injunction. "Preventive remedy in the form of an injunction is no longer necessary." Of course, the Court has pointed out that if any article written in the newspaper comes in the way of administration of justice by the Court in the instant case, there would always be available the concept of contempt of Court to take care of such an eventuality.

In Dainik Sambad v. Tripura,[41] Gauhati High Court has considered another matter of significance to the freedom of press. Does discriminatory allotment by Government of its advertisements among the various newspapers in the same category impair the freedom of press and the right to equality? The State had argued in the instant case that it was not bound to give advertisements to the petitioner newspaper equally with other newspapers as it had raised communal frenzy through its editorials, refused to publish Government contradictions and had always been critical of the Government.

Rejecting the argument, the High Court pointed out that the fundamental principle involved here was the people's right to know. The Court laid emphasis upon the importance of freedom of press in strengthening an individual's participation in the decision-making process by the Government as the Supreme Court has emphasized in Indian Express.[42] In sum, "the fundamental principle involved here is the people's right to know."[43] Freedom of press should receive a generous support from all those who believe in the participation of the people in the administration. Thus, the society has an interest in the freedom of press. In the instant case, the High Court directed the State to distribute its advertisements equally among all newspapers including the petitioner. The Court said: "Such power should not be used on the newspaper establishment so as to make the establishment subservient to the Government."

To the same effect is Sushil Choudhury v. Tripura,[44] where the High Court has stated that discriminatory allocation of government advertisements among the

---

39. Ibid, at 202-3.
40. For discussion on Art. 21, see, infra, Ch. XXVI.
For the right to be informed, see, supra, 1155.
41. AIR 1989 Gau 30.
42. Indian Express v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 515 : (1985) 1 SCC 641; supra.
43. On the "right to know" see, supra, 1066.
44. AIR 1998 Gau 28.

newspapers adversely affects freedom of speech and expression as it may result in reduction of circulation of these newspapers which get less advertisement. A large number of newspaper readers are interested in government advertisements. Such readers may prefer to subscribe to those newspapers which have government advertisements. If a newspaper gains in circulation, it comes to have a great influence on the public mind, and this strikes at the very foundation of the freedom of speech and expression.

In Rajgopal[45], the question was how far the press could criticise and comment on the acts and conduct of public officials. The Supreme Court felt that freedom of the press extends to engaging in uninhibited debate about the involvement of public figures in public issues and events. But, as regards their private life, a proper balancing of freedom of the press as well as the right of privacy and defamation has to be done in terms of the democratic way of life laid down in the Constitution.

The Supreme Court has ruled that neither the State nor its officers have any authority in law to impose any prior restraint on publication of any material in the press on the ground that it is defamatory of the State or its officers. Their remedy arises only after publication by way of suit for damages for defamation.

(k) ADVERTISEMENTS

How far are advertisements protected under Art. 19(1)(a)? The Supreme Court has considered this question in Hamdard Dawakhana v. Union of India.[46]

Parliament enacted an Act with a view to control advertisements of drugs in certain cases. The Act was challenged on the ground that restriction on advertisements was a direct abridgment of the freedom of expression. The Court ruled that the predominant object of the Act was not merely to curb advertisements offending against decency or morality, but also to prevent self-medication by prohibiting instruments which might be used to advocate or spread the evil. The Court stated that an advertisement, no doubt, is a form of speech, but its true character is to be determined by the object which it seeks to promote. It may amount to an expression of ideas and propagation of human thought and, thus, would fall within the scope of Art. 19(1)(a). But a commercial advertisement having an element of trade and commerce and promoting business has an element of trade and commerce, and it no longer falls within the concept of freedom of speech for its object is not to propagate any ideas—social, political or economic or to further literature or human thought.

An advertisement promoting drugs and commodities, the sale of which is not in public interest, could not be regarded as propagating any idea and, as such, could not claim the protection of Art. 19(1)(a).

An advertisement meant to further business falls within the concept of trade or commerce. A commercial advertisement advertising an individual's business cannot be regarded as a part of freedom of speech.

---

45. R. Rajagopal v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1995 SC 264 : (1994) 6 SCC 632.
Also see, infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(i), under 'Right to Privacy', for further discussion on this case.

46. AIR 1960 SC 554 : (1960) 2 SCR 671.

But the Supreme Court has modified its view expressed in Hamdard Dawakhana somewhat in later cases. In Sakal[47] and Bennett Coleman,[48] the Supreme Court has dilated upon the great significance of advertisement revenue for the economy of newspapers. In Indian Express Newspapers,[49] differing from Hamdard Dawakhana ruling, the Court has observed: "We are of the view that all commercial advertisements cannot be denied the protection of Art. 19(1)(a) of the Constitution merely because they are issued by business men". Advertising pays large portion of the costs of supplying the public with newspapers. "For a democratic press the advertising "subsidy" is crucial". With the curtailment in advertisements, the price of newspaper will be forced up and this will adversely affect its circulation and this will be a direct interference with the right of freedom of speech and expression guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(a).

Reading Hamdard Dawakhana and Indian Express together, the Supreme Court has concluded in Tata Press[50] that "commercial speech" cannot be denied the protection of Art. 19(1)(a) merely because the same is issued by businessmen. "Commercial speech" is a part of freedom of speech guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(a). The public at large has a right to receive the "commercial speech". Art 19(1)(a) protects the rights of an individual "to listen, read and receive" the "commercial speech". The protection of Art 19(1)(a) is available both to the speaker as well as the recipient of the speech.

Advertising is a 'commercial speech' which has two facets:

(1) Advertising which is no more than a commercial transaction, nonetheless, disseminates information regarding the product advertised. Public at large stands benefited by the information made available through advertisement. In a democratic economy, free flow of commercial information is indispensable. Therefore, any curtailment of advertisement would affect the Fundamental Right under Art 19(1)(a) on the aspects of propagation, publication and circulation.

(2) The public at large has a right to receive commercial information. Art 19(1)(a) protects the right of an individual to listen, read and receive the said speech. The protection of Art. 19(1)(a) is available to the speaker as well as the recipient of the speech.

In Tata, the Supreme Court accepted as valid the printing of yellow pages by the Tata Press. Printing of a directory of telephone subscribers is to be done exclusively by the Telephone Department as a part of its service to the telephone subscribers. But yellow pages only contain commercial advertisements and Art. 19(1)(a) guarantee freedom to publish the same.

Reference may be made here to a few foreign cases having a bearing on the freedom of the press.

In New York Times v. Sullivan,[51] the facts were as follows: In 1960, the New York times carried a full page paid advertisement sponsored by the 'Committee to Defend Martin Luther King and the Struggle for Freedom in the South', which 47. Sakal Papers, supra.

---

48. Bennett Coleman, supra.
49. AIR 1986 SC 515 : (1985) 1 SCC 641.
50. Tata Press Ltd. v. Mahanagar Telephone Nigam Ltd., AIR 1995 SC 2438, 2446 : (1995) 5 SCC 139.
51. (1964) 376 US 254.

asserted or implied that law enforcement officials in Montgomery, Alabama, had improperly arrested and harassed Dr. King and other civil rights demonstrators on various occasions. The respondent, who was the elected Police Commissioner of Montgomery, brought an action for libel against the Times and several of the individual signatories to the advertisement. It was found that some of the assertions contained in the advertisement were inaccurate.

The State Court awarded damages against the newspaper, but the U.S. Supreme Court reversed. BRENNAN, J., stated:

> "Authoritative interpretations of the First Amendment guarantees have consistently refused to recognize an exception for any test of truth—whether administered by judges, juries, or administrative officials—and especially one that puts the burden of proving the truth on the speaker…… A rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all his factual assertions—and to do so on pain of libel judgments virtually unlimited in amount—leads to….. "self-censorship". Allowance of the defense of truth, with the burden of proving it on the defendant, does not mean that only false speech will be deterred…. Under such a rule, would-be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism, even though it is believed to be true and even though it is in fact true, because of doubt whether it can be proved in Court or fear of the expenses of having to do so. They tend to make only statements which "steer far wider of the unlawful zone."…. The rule thus dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate. It is inconsistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments.
>
> The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with "actual malice"—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard to whether it was false or not…"

In Derbyshire County Council v. Times Newspapers Ltd.,[52] the House of Lords ruled that a local authority could not sue the press for libel. The Lords held that there is no public interest in allowing government institutions to sue for liable; it is "contrary to the public interest because to admit such actions would place an undesirable fetter on freedom of speech".

In Leonard Hector v. Att. Gen. of Antiqua and Berbuda,[53] the Privy Council has observed:

> "In a free democratic society it is almost too obvious to need stating that those who hold office in government and who are responsible for public administration must always be open to criticism. Any attempt to stifle or fetter such criticism amounts to political censorship of the most insidious and objectionable kind. At the same time it is no less obvious that the very purpose of criticism levelled at those who have the conduct of public affairs by their political opponents is to undermine public confidence in their stewardship and to persuade the electorate that the opponents would make a better job of it than those presently holding office. In the light of these considerations their Lordships cannot help viewing a statutory provision which criminalises statements likely to undermine public confidence in the conduct of public affairs with the utmost suspicion."

The question is how far the principles stated in the above cases are applicable in India. The Supreme Court has answered this question as follows:[54]

---

52. (1993) 2 WLR 449.
53. (1990) 2 AC 312.

> "So far as the freedom of press is concerned, it flows from the freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Article 19(1)(a). But the said right is subject to reasonable restrictions placed thereon by an existing law or a law made after the commencement of the Constitution in the interests of or in relation to the several matters set out therein. Decency and defamation are two of the grounds mentioned in clause (2). Law of Torts providing for damages for invasion of the right to privacy and defamation and sections 499/500, I.P.C. are the existing laws saved under clause (2). But what is called for today—in the present times—is a proper balancing of the freedom of press and said laws consistent with the democratic way of life ordained by the Constitution. Over the last few decades, press and electronic media have emerged as major factors in our nation's life. They are still expanding—and in the process becoming more inquisitive. Our system of government demands—as do the systems of Government of the United States of America and United Kingdom—constant vigilance over exercise of governmental power by the press and the media among others. It is essential for a good Government. At the same time, we must remember that our society may not share the degree of public awareness obtaining in United Kingdom or United States. The sweep of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution and the freedom of speech and expression under our Constitution is not identical though similar in their major premises. All this may call for some modification of the principles emerging from the English and United States decisions in their application to our legal system."

One principle which the Court did lay down is that the State or its officers cannot impose any prior restraint or prohibition on any publication because they apprehend that they may be defamed. Their remedy, if any, would arise only after the publication.[55]

(l) PICKETING, DEMONSTRATION AND STRIKE

Within certain limits, picketing or demonstration may be regarded as the manifestation of one's freedom of speech and expression. "Peaceful picketing is free speech. Non violent acts are like words." Picketing or demonstration is a non-violent act of persuasion.[56]

In V. Vengan,[57] picketing a North-Indian shop and dissuading intending customers from purchasing in that shop was held to be not warranted by Art. 19(1)(a). Art. 15(1) prohibits discrimination on the ground of place of birth,[58] and if the State Legislature were to pass an Act forbidding South Indians to purchase from North Indian shops, such an Act would be unconstitutional. Therefore, the picketing and the propaganda in question contained an unconstitutional germ in support of which the Constitution could not be invoked. The conduct of the petitioner, if carried to its extreme conclusion, would undermine the security of the State by creating disaffection and ultimately strife and hatred between South Indians and North Indians residing and doing business in the South.

As regards government servants, the judicial view appears to be that while banning demonstrations by them is not valid, a strike by them can be validly pro-

---

54. R. Rajagopal v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1995 SC 264 : (1994) 6 SCC 632.
55. Also see, infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(i) under 'Right to Privacy'.
56. Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 US 88 (1940).
Also, HARROP A FREEMAN, Needed a Jurisprudential Theory for Liberal Democracy, 2 JILI, 49.
57. (1951) 2 M.L.J. 241.
Also, Damodar v. State of Bombay, AIR 1951 Bom. 459.
58. Supra, Ch. XXII.

hibited. A rule made by the Bihar Government prohibited government servants from participating in any demonstration or strike in connection with any matter pertaining to their conditions of service. The rule was challenged. The Supreme Court said that a government servant does not, by accepting government service, lose his Fundamental Rights under Art. 19. A demonstration, held the Court, is a visible manifestation of the feelings or sentiments of an individual or a group. It is thus a communication of one's ideas to others and is in effect a form of speech or expression, because speech need not be vocal since signs made by a dumb person would also be a form of speech and expression. Accordingly, certain forms of demonstration would fall under Art. 19(1)(a).

In the instant case, the government justified the rule as being in the interests of 'public order'. Nevertheless, the Court declared the rule bad as it banned every type of demonstration howsoever innocent, and did not confine itself to those forms of demonstrations only which might lead to a breach of public tranquillity, or would fall under the other limiting criteria specified in Art. 19(2). However, the rule was not held bad in so far as it prohibited a strike, for there was no Fundamental Right to resort to strike.[59]

Again, in O.K. Ghosh v. E.X. Joseph,[60] a disciplinary rule prohibited government servants from participating in any demonstration. The Court held the rule to be invalid. The Court emphasized that the rule could be valid if it imposed a reasonable restriction in the interests of public order. The Court did however emphasize that government servants are subject to the rules of discipline which are intended to maintain discipline among them and to lead to an efficient discharge of their duties.

The above-stated principle has been reiterated by the Court in other cases as well. S. 3 of the Essential Services Maintenance Ordinance, 1960, authorised the Central Government to prohibit any strike in any essential service in the public interest. Going on a prohibited strike became illegal and punishable with imprisonment. The provision was declared valid as it did not curtail freedom of speech and there was no Fundamental Right to go on a strike.[61]

(m) BANDH

In a landmark decision in Bharat Kumar,[62] a full Bench of the Kerala High Court has declared "Bandhs" organised by political parties from time to time as unconstitutional being violative of the Fundamental Rights of the people. The Court refused to accept it as an exercise of the freedom of speech and expression by the concerned party calling for the bandh. When a bandh is called, people are expected not to travel, not to carry on their trade, not to attend to their work. A threat is held out either expressly or impliedly that any attempt to go against the call for bandh may result in physical injury.

A call for bandh is clearly different from a call for general strike or hartal. There is destruction of public property during a bandh. Accordingly, the High Court has directed that a call for a bandh by any association, organisation or political party and enforcing of that call by it, is illegal and unconstitutional. The

---

59. Kameshwar Pd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1962 SC 1166 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 369.
60. AIR 1963 SC 812 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 789; also see, infra.
61. Radhey Shyam v. P.M.G., Nagpur, AIR 1965 SC 311 : (1964) 7 SCR 403.
62. Bharat Kumar K. Palicha v. State of Kerala, AIR 1997 Ker 291.

High Court has also directed the State and all its law enforcement agencies to do all that may be necessary to give effect to the Court order.

The Supreme Court has dismissed an appeal against the above-mentioned High Court decision. The Supreme Court refused to interfere with the High Court decision. The Court has accepted the distinction drawn by the High Court between a 'bandh' and a strike. A bandh interferes with the exercise of the Fundamental Freedoms of other citizens, in addition to causing national loss in many ways. The Fundamental Rights of the people as a whole cannot be regarded as subservient to a claim of Fundamental Right of an individual, or of a section of the people.[63]

The Supreme Court has now declared the reason why bandh should be banned. In the name of hartal or bandh or strike no person has any right to cause inconvenience to any other person or to cause in any manner a threat or apprehension of risk to life, liberty and property of any citizen or destruction of life and property, and the least to any government or public property. The Supreme Court pointed out that it was high time that the authorities concerned took serious note of this requirement while dealing with those who destroy public property in the name of strike, hartal or bandh. Any soft or lenient approach for such offenders would be an affront to the rule of law and challenge to public order and peace.[64]

In Ranchi Bar Association v. State of Bihar,[65] following the Apex Court decision, mentioned above, the Patna High Court has ruled that no party has a right to organise a bandh causing/compelling the people by force to stop them from exercising their lawful activities. The government is duty bound to prevent unlawful activities like bandh which invades people's life, liberty and property. The government is bound to pay compensation to those who suffer loss of life, liberty or property as a result of a bandh because of the failure of the government to discharge its public duty to protect them.

In appropriate cases, even the organisers of the bandh may be directed to pay compensation. Any organization interfering with the functioning of the Courts commits contempt of Court and can be punished accordingly. A peaceful strike which does not interfere with the rights and properties of the people is however not illegal. In the instant case, the High Court did award compensation against the State Government for loss of property and death of a person during the bandh for failure of the authorities to take appropriate action and provide adequate protection to the people's life, liberty and property. The Government failed to discharge its public duty to protect the people during the bandh.

(n) RIGHT TO TRAVEL ABROAD

An interesting question considered in Maneka was whether the right to travel abroad could be regarded as a part of Arts. 19(1)(a) and (g).[66] The right to freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a) is exerciseable not only in India but outside as well. According to BHAGWATI, J., state action taken in India may impair or restrict the exercise of this right elsewhere. For example, a journalist may be prevented from sending his dispatches abroad. The same applies by parity to Art. 19(1)(g). But the Court refused to accept the argument, that the right to travel abroad was an 'essential part' of the freedoms guaranteed by

---

63. Communist Party of India v. Bharat Kumar, AIR 1998 SC 184 : (1998) 1 SCC 201.
64. James Martin v. State of Kerala, (2004) 2 SCC 203 : (2003) 10 JT 371.
65. AIR 1999 Pat 169.
66. Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, supra.

Arts. 19(1)(a) and (g) so that whenever the former was violated, the latter would also be impaired.

The right to travel abroad is not specifically named as a Fundamental Right in Art. 19(1). But a right not named expressly may still be covered by some clause in Art. 19, if it "is an integral part of a named Fundamental Right or partakes of the same basic nature and character as the named Fundamental Right so that the exercise of such right is in reality and substance nothing but an instance of the exercise of the named Fundamental Right".[67] Judged by this test, the right to travel abroad is not an integral part of the rights under Art. 19(1)(a) or (g), but only a concomitant or peripheral right to these rights. S. 10(3)(c) of the Passport Act which authorises imposition of restrictions on the right to go abroad by impounding of passport, could not, therefore, be held void under Art. 19(1)(a) or (g).

But this does not mean that an order made under S. 10(3)(c), Passport Act, may not violate Art. 19(1)(a) or (g) under any circumstances. There may be situations when denial of the right to travel abroad may have a direct and inevitable effect to abridge or take away the freedom of speech and expression, or the right to carry on a profession or business. In the words of BHAGWATI, J.:[68]

> "...There may be many such cases where the restriction imposed is apparently only on the right to go abroad but the direct and inevitable consequence is to interfere with the freedom of speech and expression or the right to carry on a profession. A musician may want to go abroad to sing, a dancer to dance, a visiting professor to teach and a scholar to participate in a conference or seminar. If in such a case his passport is denied or impounded, it would directly interfere with his freedom of speech and expression... Examples can be multiplied, but the point of the matter is that though the right to go abroad is not a Fundamental Right, the denial of the right to go abroad may, in truth and in effect, restrict freedom of speech and expression or freedom to carry on a profession..."

When a right under Art. 19(1)(a) or (g) is infringed, impounding of the passport would have to be justified under Art. 19(2) or (6). In that case, the expression 'in the interests of the general public' in S. 10(3)(c) will have to be read down to mean 'public order, decency or morality' [words used in Art. 19(2)],[69] if there is a violation of the right under Art. 19(1)(a). Then impounding of a passport for an indefinite length of time would amount to an unreasonable restriction under Arts. 19(2) and (6). BHAGWATI, J., however, cautioned the Passport Authority that the power to refuse or impound a passport should not be exercised lightly as it is a basic human right recognised in Art. 13 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; it is a valuable right, a part of personal liberty with which the authority seeks to interfere.

(o) TELEPHONE TAPPING

The freedom of speech and expression means the right to express one's convictions and opinions freely by word of mouth, writing, printing, picture, or in any other manner.

---

67. For discussion on the doctrine of Implied Fundamental Rights, see, supra, Sec. A. Also see, infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J.
68. AIR 1978 SC at 644-5.
69. See, infra, Sec. D.

When a person is talking on telephone, he is exercising his right to freedom of speech and expression. Telephone tapping, accordingly, infracts Art. 19(1)(a) unless it falls within the grounds of restrictions falling under Art. 19(2).[70]

The Court also treated it as an aspect of privacy and invoked Art. 21 against telephone tapping.[71]

(p) SOME MISCELLANEOUS SITUATIONS

When a professor was suspended by the university concerned, and later on an enquiry was set up against him on the allegation that he had made derogatory remarks against the Prime Minister, it was held that Art. 19(1)(a) could not protect him against such an inquiry.[72]

Carrying of letters written by others against payment does not fall within Art. 19(1)(a).[73]

A condition imposed on cinema exhibitors to show about 2000 ft. of educational films, or films dealing with news and current affairs, or documentary films, has been held to be not inconsistent with Art. 19(1)(a) . This is a means of communication and propagation of scientific ideas and the like.[74]

An argument raised against the impugned provision was that just as a restraint on free speech is a violation of Art. 19(1)(a) [except as permitted under Art. 19(2)] compelled speech, often known as a "must carry" provision in a statute, is equally an infringement of the right to free speech, except to the extent permitted under Art. 19(2).

The Court countered this argument by stating that whether compelled speech will or will not amount to a violation of the freedom of speech and expression, "will depend on the nature of a 'must carry' provision." If it furthers informed decision-making which is the essence of the right to free speech and expression, it will not amount to any violation of the Fundamental Freedom of speech and expression. If, however, such a provision compels a person to carry out propaganda, or project a partisan or distorted point of view, contrary to his wish, it may amount to a restraint on his freedom of speech and expression. Justifying the provision in question, the Court has observed:

> "The social context of any such legislation cannot be ignored. When a substantially significant population body is illiterate or does not have easy access to ideas or information, it is important that all available means of communication, particularly audio visual communication, are utilised not just for entertainment but also for education, information, propagation of scientific ideas and the like".

The provision in question does not require the cinema exhibitor to show a propaganda film, or a film conveying the views which he objects to.

Levy of an entertainment tax on cable operators has been held to be valid. Their activities have two aspects—business and speech. There is no reason why

---

70. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 568 at 574-575 : (1997) 1 SCC 301; for discussion on Art. 19(2), see, infra, Sec. D.
71. See, infra, under Art. 21, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(i).
72. A.N. Nigam v. University of Jodhpur, AIR 1982 Raj 248.
73. Inland Commercial (TPT) Service v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Del 393.
74. Union of India v. The Motion Picture Association, AIR 1999 SC 2334 : (1999) 6 SCC 150.

the business part cannot be taxed when a similar tax is levied on cinema shows. "Where the freedom of speech gets intertwined with business, it undergoes a fundamental change and its exercise has to be balanced against social interests….while there can be no tax on the right to exercise freedom of expression, tax is leviable on profession, occupation, trade, business and industry".[75]

(q) LIFE INSURANCE CORPORATION

The Consumer Education and Research Centre published a study entitled "A Fraud On Policyholders". It was a scientific research made into the working of the Life Insurance Corporation. This study tried to portray and establish the discriminatory practices which the Corporation was alleged to have adopted and which adversely affected a large number of policy holders, their investment policies, their expense ratio, availability of term insurance and other cognate matters.

The Director of the Corporation wrote a reply to it. His reply was published in The Hindu. In that reply, he tried to challenge the conclusions recorded in the study prepared by the Centre. The Director's reply was also published by the Corporation in 'Yogakshema', a journal run by the Corporation. On a scientific and studied basis, the Executive Trustee of the Centre (petitioner) rejoined the Director and replied to his reply. Since Yogakshema had published the Director's reply, the petitioner requested the Corporation to publish his reply also in Yogakshema. The Corporation refused to do so.

In these circumstances, the Gujarat High Court ruled in the case noted below[76] that the action of the Corporation was violative of the petitioner's Fundamental Rights under Art. 19(1)(a) and Art. 14. The Corporation is a public body and belongs to no individual. Therefore, the considerations which govern the case of an individual do not apply to a statutory public body. Every citizen has a right to demand of the State to make available to him a particular channel or channels for publishing his studied criticism of the concerned branch of public administration. To make such an opportunity available to an admirer and to deny it to a critic is to deny to him his freedom of speech and expression and to throttle democracy. In a democratic polity, though people may not directly participate in governmental working or public administration, they have a right to demand of those who are in charge of their destiny for the time being how they deal with the problems which they are facing. A Corporation which carries on the business of life insurance in the shape of a statutory monopoly is answerable to the people of India with whose funds it deals and to whose welfare it claims to cater. "The Corporation is a public body and belongs to no individual."

Article 19(1)(a) embraces within its sweep both acts of omission and commission which curtail or abridge the freedom of speech and expression, subject to the reasonable restrictions contemplated by Art. 19(2). The Corporation is obligated to publish a studied criticism of its activities and a citizen has a right to express through the medium of such Corporation his studied criticisms of its activities. By spending public funds on publishing only what is appreciative of its activities and by refusing to publish a critical study of its activities, the Corporation will only assume the guardianship of public mind. This cannot be allowed because of

---

75. A. Suresh v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1997 SC 1889 : (1997) 1 SCC 319.
Also, Hukum Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1998 All 120.
76. Prof. Manubhai D. Shah v. Life Insurance Coprn., AIR 1981 Guj 15.

Art. 19(1)(a). If the official Gazette publishes a studied criticism of someone's study without publishing the original article or study, it is under an obligation to publish a studied reply to such a criticism which is the study of a problem. Assuming that All India Radio or Doordarshan publishes something which is a reply to someone's study or is a criticism of someone's studied article by naming that person, it is under an obligation to publish a studied reply to it.

The Court rejected the claim made by the Corporation to the editorial privilege and absolute discretion to publish or not to publish an article as being inconsistent with the Fundamental Rights guaranteed by the Constitution. The Court also rejected as untenable the contention that 'Yogakshema' was a house magazine and not a mass media. Merely because it is interested in a particular subject-matter and happens to find its circulation amongst officers, employees and agents of the Corporation, it does not attain the character of a house magazine. Under the pretext and guise of publishing a house magazine, the Corporation cannot violate the Fundamental Rights of the petitioner. A house magazine cannot claim any privilege against the Fundamental Rights of a citizen.

The Court also held it against Art. 14 to make available public funds to an admirer and not to a sober critic. Both have an equal place in the social order and both must be treated equally and alike. Thus, refusal to the petitioner to make 'Yogakshema' available for voicing his studied criticism violated Art. 14.

The matter then came before Supreme Court in Life Insurance Corporation of India v. Manubhai D. Shah.[77] The Supreme Court has stated in this case that a liberal interpretation should be given to the right of freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a). The Court has characterised this right as a "basic human right". This right includes "the right to propagate one's views through the print media or through any other communication channel, e.g. the radio and television". Thus, every citizen "has the right to air his or her views through the print and/or the electronic media subject, of course, to permissible restrictions imposed under Art. 19(2) of the Constitution".[78]

In the instant case, the Supreme Court has taken cognisance of two situations. One, the respondent circulated a research article suggesting that the LIC was charging unduly high premiums from those who took out life insurance policies. The LIC published a counter reply to this paper in a daily newspaper and also in its own in-house magazine Yogakshema. The respondent then prepared a rejoinder and got it printed in the same daily newspaper. He also wanted the LIC to print his rejoinder in Yogakshema, but the LIC refused to do so. The Supreme Court was called upon to decide the question whether the LIC was right in refusing to publish the rejoinder by the respondent in Yogakshema. Answering in the negative, the Court pointed out that the attitude of the LIC was both "unfair and unreasonable"—unfair because fairness demanded that both view points were placed before the readers and unreasonable because there was no justification for refusing publication. By refusing to print and publish the rejoinder the LIC had violated the respondent's Fundamental Right.

Every free citizen has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public. Freedom of speech and expression is subject only to the restrictions imposable under Art. 19(2). Efforts by intolerant authorities to curb or suffocate this freedom must be firmly repelled, more so when public authorities betray autocratic, tendencies.

---

77. AIR 1993 SC 171 : (1992) 3 SCC 637.
78. On Art. 19(2), see, infra.

LIC is a 'state' within the meaning of Art. 12.[79] The LIC Act enacted by Parliament requires LIC to function in the best interest of the community. The community is, therefore, entitled to know whether or not, this requirement of the statute is being satisfied in the functioning of the LIC.

(r) TELEVISION

The other situation dealt with by the Supreme Court in the instant case arose out of the Doordarshan's refusal to telecast a documentary film on Bhopal gas tragedy prepared by the petitioner. The film in question had won the golden lotus award as the best non-feature film in 1987 and yet the Doordarshan refused to telecast the film on the ground that "the contents being outdated do not have relevance now for the telecast." The Supreme Court has ruled that a film maker has a Fundamental Right under Art. 19(1)(a) to exhibit his film and, therefore, the party which claims that it is entitled to refuse enforcement of this right by virtue of law made under Art. 19(2), is under an onus to show that the film does not conform to the requirements of the law.

The Court has emphasized that the words "freedom of speech and expression in Art. 19(1)(a) must be broadly interpreted so as to include the freedom to circulate one's views by words of mouth or in writing or through audio-visual instrumentalities, like radio and television, subject, of course, to permissible restrictions imposed under Art. 19(2). "The print media, the radio and the tiny screen play the role of public educators, so vital to the growth of a healthy democracy". Subject to reasonable restrictions placed under Art. 19(2), a citizen has a right to publish, circulate and disseminate his views and any attempt to thwart or deny the same would offend Art. 19(1)(a).

Ultimately, the Court has rejected Doordarshan's reasons for not showing the film on the Television. The Court has stated concerning the film: "To bring out the inadequacy of the State effort or the indifference of the officers, etc., cannot amount to an attack on any political party if the criticism is genuine and objective and made in good faith." Doordarshan being a state-controlled agency funded by public funds could not have denied access to screen except on valid grounds.

In Ramesh,[80] a writ petition was filed to restrain the screening of serial Tamas on the television on the ground that it violated Arts. 21 and 25 of the Constitution as well as s. 58 of the Cinematograph Act, 1952. The Court rejected the petition saying that the serial viewed in its entirety "is capable of creating a lasting impression of the message of peace and co-existence..." The Court quoted copiously from its earlier decision in Abbas.[81]

Odyssey,[82] another case involving the Doordarshan, arose on appeal against a stay order issued by the Bombay High Court restraining telecasting of certain episodes of the serial Honi Anhonee. The question before the Supreme Court was

---

79. See, supra, Ch. XX, Sec. D.
80. Ramesh v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 775 : (1988) 1 SCC 668.
81. Khwaja Ahmad Abbas v. Union of India, supra; infra.
82. Odyssey Communications Pvt. Ltd. v. Lok Vidyayan Sanghatana, AIR 1988 SC 1642 : (1988) 3 SCC 410.

whether these episodes should be prohibited from being telecast. Refusing to do so, the Court has pointed out that the right of a citizen to exhibit films on the Doordarshan, subject to the terms and conditions imposed by Doordarshan, is a part of the Fundamental Right of freedom of expression guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(a) which can be curtailed only under circumstances set out in Art. 19(2). A citizen's right to exhibit films on television "is similar to the right of a citizen to publish his views through any other media such as newspapers, magazines, advertisements, hoardings etc., subject to the terms and conditions of the owners of the media." The episodes in question did not violate any law or any right of the petitioners nor was the serial likely to affect prejudicially the well being of the people. The showing of these episodes was not likely to endanger public morality. The Court thus allowed the appeal.

Commenting upon the issue of an interim injunction by the High Court, the Supreme Court stated that "the High Court overlooked that the issue of an order of interim injunction in this case would infringe a Fundamental Right of the producer of the serial." Also, the Court has reserved its opinion on the question whether a citizen has a Fundamental Right to establish a private broadcasting station, or television centre. Underlining the great value which the Court attaches to the of speech and expression, the Court has emphasized:

> "Freedom of expression is a preferred right which is always very zealously guarded by this Court."

The petitioner produced a documentary on violence and terrorism in Punjab. The film received a "U" certificate from the Board of Film Censors. Besides, it also received several international awards. Nevertheless, the Doordarshan refused to telecast the film. The Bombay High Court ruled that the refusal of Doordarshan to telecast the film was unjustified and amounted to violation of the petitioner's right under Art. 19(1)(a). It also amounted to violation of the right of the people under Art. 19(1)(a) to be informed and enlightened about the situation in Punjab. The Court emphasized that every person has a Fundamental Right to form his own opinion on any issue of general concern. The State cannot prevent open discussion and open expression of views however hateful to its policies. Restrictions on freedom of speech and expression can be imposed only under Art. 19(2) and not outside that provision. Accordingly, the Court directed the Doordarshan to exhibit the film on Channel I or II at a proper time.[83]

As the Supreme Court has emphasized, television plays a very important and significant role in modern life. Many people obtain the bulk of their information on matters of contemporary interest from the broadcasting medium. The combination of picture and voice makes it an irresistibly attractive medium of presentation. It exercises tremendous influence over millions of people. Freedom of speech and expression includes the right to receive information and ideas as well as freedom to impart them.[84]

During the course of recording of the interview of the petitioner for a T.V. programme pertaining to "Laws relating to Women" on the invitation of Doordarshan itself, she made critical remarks about a Bill which was then

---

83. Anand Patwardhan v. Union of India, AIR 1997 Bom 25.
Also see, C. Gopal Krishnan v. Union of India, AIR 1996 Ker 333.

84. Secretary, Ministry of Information and Broadcasting v. Cricket Assn. of Bengal, AIR 1995 SC 1236 : (1995) 2 SCC 161; see, infra.

pending before Parliament as being violative of women's right to equality. When the programme was telecast, her views on the Bill were deleted. The petitioner in a writ petition asserted that this amounted to censorship of her views by the television authorities as her views were against the views of the ruling party. The Doordarshan authorities justified deletion on the basis that it only amounted to editing and not censorship. The High Court ruled in Indira Jai Singh v. Union of India[85] that the deletion of her views was not by way of editing but by way of censorship.

The interesting aspect of the High Court's decision is the ruling that the right of freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a), protects this freedom on the television as much as it does anywhere else. The Court has observed:

> "A citizen who is interviewed over television by invitation of the television authorities is entitled to express his or her views freely. Censorship or deliberate distortion of these views would violate Art. 19. Any restriction of this right must be within the ambit of Art. 19(2) and by law."

The Court held that the respondents restricted the petitioner's right under Art. 19(1)(a) arbitrarily and by an executive fiat. The Court has emphasized that the executive action restraining exercising of a right under Art. 19(1)(a) cannot be taken without any legislative authority.

(s) CENSORSHIP OF FILMS

In K.A. Abbas v. Union of India,[86] the Supreme Court has upheld censorship of films under Art. 19(1)(a) on the ground that films have to be treated separately from other forms of art and expression because a motion picture is able to stir up emotions more deeply than any other product of art. A film can therefore be censored on the grounds mentioned in Art. 19(2).

Another case on film censorship is Rangarajan[87] which came before the Supreme Court by way of appeal from the Madras High Court. In this case, the Supreme Court has considered the question of censorship of films vis-a-vis Art. 19(1)(a).

The Court has justified pre-censorship of a film because it caters for mass audience, it has unique capacity to disturb and arouse feelings and has as much potential for evil as it has for good. A film cannot therefore be allowed to function in a free market place just as the newspapers or magazines do.

Here was a film which criticised the reservation policy of the Tamil Nadu Government. While the Board of Film Censors certified the film as fit for showing, and granted it U certificate, the Madras High Court banned the film from being exhibited and cancelled the certificate as there was some public protest against the film. So, the matter came before the Supreme Court in appeal and the Court reversed the High Court and accepted the appeal. Emphasizing upon the concept of freedom of speech and expression, the Court has stated:

> "Our commitment of freedom of expression demands that it cannot be suppressed unless the situations created by allowing the freedom are pressing and the community interest is endangered. The anticipated danger should not be

85. AIR 1989 Bom 25.
86. AIR 1971 SC 481 : (1970) 2 SCC 780.
87. Rangarajan v. P. Jagjivan Ram, (1989) 2 SCC 574 : (1989) 2 SCR 204.

remote, conjectural or far-fetched. It should have proximate and direct nexus with the expression.

A film producer is entitled to project his own message which others may not approve of. Everyone has a Fundamental Right to form his own opinion on any issue of general concern. The State cannot prevent open discussion and open expression of views, however critical of its own views.

At another place in the judgment, the Court has observed:

> "In democracy it is not necessary that every one should sing the same song. Freedom of expression is the rule and it is generally taken for granted. Every one has a Fundamental Right to form his own opinion on any issue of general concern. He can form and inform by any legitimate means. The democracy is a Government by the people via open discussion."

The Court has accepted that movies doubtless enjoy the guarantee under Art. 19(1)(a).

The State Government had pleaded for banning the exhibition of the film on the ground that otherwise there might arise a serious law and order situation in the State. To this plea, the Court has given a caustic reply as follows:

> "What good is the protection of freedom of expression if the State does not take care to protect it? If the film is unobjectionable and cannot constitutionally be restricted under Art. 19(2), freedom of expression cannot be suppressed on account of threat of demonstration and processions or threats of violence .... It is the duty of the State to protect the freedom of expression since it is a liberty guaranteed against the State...."

The Court has emphasized that if the film is unobjectionable and cannot constitutionally be restricted under Art. 19(2), freedom of expression cannot be suppressed on account of threat of demonstration or threats of violence. That would tantamount to negation of the rule of law and a surrender to blackmail and intimidation. The State cannot plead its inability to handle the hostile audience problem. Freedom of expression which is legitimate and constitutionally protected cannot be held to ransom by an intolerant group of people.

In the end, the Court has observed:

> "The fundamental freedom under Art. 19(1)(a) can be reasonably restricted only for the purposes mentioned in Art. 19(2) and the restriction must be justified on the anvil of necessity and not the quicksand of convenience or expediency. Open criticism of Government policies and operations is not a ground for restricting expression. We must practice tolerance to the views of others. Intolerance is as much dangerous to democracy as to the person himself."

The Delhi High Court directed certain excisions to be made from the film "Bandit queen". On appeal, the Supreme Court set aside the High Court's decision.[88]

(t) TELECASTING

In Cricket Association,[89] the Supreme Court has considered the significant question of freedom of telecasting vis-a-vis Art. 19(1)(a).

---

88. Bobby Art International v. Om Pal Singh Hoon, JT 1996 (4) SC 533 : AIR 1996 SC 1846.
89. Secretary, Ministry of Information and Broadcasting v. Cricket Association, Bengal, AIR 1995 SC 1236 : (1995) 2 SCC 161.

In this case, the right of the Cricket Association to telecast the cricket match came up for consideration before the Supreme Court.

Telecasting is a system of communication either audio or visual or both. Organisation of an event in India is an aspect of the freedom of speech and expression protected by Art. 19(1)(a) and reasonable restrictions can be imposed thereon under Art. 19(2). It therefore follows that organisation, production and recording of an event cannot be prevented except by a law permitted by Art. 19(2). Similarly, the publication or communication of the recorded event through the cassettes cannot be restricted or prevented except under a law made under Art. 19(2).

The freedom to receive and communicate information and ideas without interference is an important aspect of the freedom of speech and expression under Art. 19(1)(a). Freedom of speech includes the right to propagate one's views through print media or through any other communication channel, e.g., radio and television. The right to impart and receive information is a species of freedom of speech. No monopoly of electronic media is permissible as Art. 19(2) does not permit state monopoly.

Unlike the print media, there are certain built-in limitations on the use of electronic media, viz.: (i) the airwaves or frequencies are a public property and they have to be used for the benefit of the society at large; (ii) the frequencies are limited; (iii) the airwaves are owned or controlled by the Government or a central national authority; (iv) they are not available on account of the scarcity, costs and competition.

Broadcasting is a means of communication, and, therefore, a medium of speech and expression. Hence, in a democratic society, neither any private body nor any governmental organisation can claim any monopoly over it. The Indian Constitution also forbids monopoly either in the print or electronic media. The Constitution only permits state monopoly in respect of a trade or business.[90] The Government can however claim regulatory powers over broadcasting so as to utilize the public resources in the form of the limited frequencies available for the benefit of the society at large and to prevent concentration of the frequencies in the hands of the rich few who can then monopolise the dissemination of views and information to suit their interests. In democratic countries, this regulatory function is discharged by an independent autonomous broadcasting authority which is representative of all sections of the society and is free from state control. In this case, the Court has laid down the following three propositions:

(1) The airwaves or frequencies are a public property. Their use has to be controlled and regulated by a public authority in the interest of the public and to prevent the invasion of their rights. Since the electronic media involves the use of the airwaves, this factor creates an in-built restriction on its use as in the case of any other public property.

(2) The right to impart and receive information is a species of the right of freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a). A citizen has a Fundamental Right to use the best means of imparting and receiving information and as such to have an access to telecasting for the purpose. However, this right to have an access to telecasting has limitations on account of the use of the public property, viz., the airwaves, involved in the exercise of the right and can be controlled and regulated by the public authority. This limitation imposed by the nature of the public property involved in the use of the electronic media is in addition to the restrictions imposed on the right to freedom of speech and expression under Art. 19(2) of the Constitution.[91]

---

90. Art. 19(6).
For discussion on Art. 19(6), see, infra, under Sec. I.

(3) The broadcasting media should be under the control of the public as distinct from the Government. The Central Government shall, therefore, take immediate steps to establish an independent autonomous public authority representative of all sections and interests in the society to control and regulate the use of the airwaves.

The Supreme Court has also emphasized in the instant case that freedom of speech and expression involves not merely freedom to communicate information and ideas without interference but also the freedom to receive the same.

The right to freedom of speech and expression includes the right to educate, to inform and to entertain and also the right to be educated, informed and entertained. The right to telecast a sporting event therefore includes the right to educate and inform the present and the prospective sportsmen interested in the particular game and also to inform and entertain the lovers of the game. The right to information and right to acquire knowledge about the game of cricket through electronic media is a right guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(a).

The Board of Cricket Control or the Cricket Association function on the basis of "no profit no loss". Their main aim is to promote the game of cricket. Therefore, telecast by such a body of a cricket match can hardly be regarded as a commercial activity. Because of its educational and entertainment values, this activity falls more appropriately under Art. 19(1)(a).

It can thus be seen that the Supreme Court has interpreted Art. 19(1)(a) broadly so as to bring broadcasting and telecasting within its coverage. Also, the Court has taken a very significant step by way of freeing these activities from governmental monopolistic control. Also, the function of regulating airwaves will henceforth be performed by an autonomous body rather than the Government itself.

(u) VOTING

Voting at an election is a form of expression.[92] A citizen as a voter is the master of his vote. He must have necessary information so that he can intelligently decide in favour of a candidate who satisfies his criterion of being elected as an MP or MLA.

D. RESTRICTIONS UNDER ART. 19(2)

(a) GROUNDS OF RESTRICTIONS

While it is necessary to maintain and preserve freedom of speech and expression in a democracy, so also it is necessary to place some curbs on this freedom for the maintenance of social order. No freedom can be absolute or completely unrestricted. Accordingly, under Art. 19(2), the state may make a law imposing 'reasonable restrictions' on the exercise of the right to freedom of speech and expression 'in the interests of' the security of the State, friendly relations with foreign States, public order, decency, morality, sovereignty and integrity of India, or 'in relation to contempt of Court, defamation or incitement to an offence'.

---

91. On the right to receive information, see, supra, Sec. C(d), this Chapter.

92. People's Union for Civil Liberties (PUCL) v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 399 : AIR 2003 SC 2363.

The expression used in Art. 19(2) "in the interests of" give a wide amplitude to the permissible law which can be enacted to impose reasonable restrictions on the right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a) under one of the heads mentioned in Art. 19(2). No restriction can be placed on the right to freedom of speech and expression on any ground other than those specified in Art. 19(2).

The burden is on the authority to justify the restrictions imposed.

A look at the grounds contained in Art. 19(2) goes to show that they are all conceived in the national interest or in the interest of the society. The first set of grounds, viz., the sovereignty and integrity of India, the security of the State, friendly relations with foreign States and public order—are all grounds referable to national interest; whereas, the second set of grounds, viz., decency, morality, contempt of Court, defamation and incitement to offence are all conceived in the interest of the society. Some of the grounds for which restrictions can be imposed are explained below.

(b) SECURITY OF STATE AND PUBLIC ORDER

Article 19(2) uses two concepts: 'public order' and 'security of state'. The concept of 'public order' is wider than 'security of state'.[93] As the Supreme Court points out, in Art. 19(2), there exist two expressions 'public order' and 'security of state'. Thus, 'security of state' having been specifically and expressly provided for, "public order cannot include the security of state, though in its widest sense it may be capable of including the said concept. Therefore, in cl. (2), public order is virtually synonymous with public peace, safety and tranquillity."[94]

The term 'public order' covers a small riot, an affray, breaches of peace, or acts disturbing public tranquillity. But 'public order' and 'public tranquillity' may not always be synonymous. For example, a man playing loud music in his home at night may disturb public tranquillity, but not public order. Therefore, such acts as disturb only the serenity of others may not fall within the term 'public order'.[95]

In a foreign case, the Privy Council justified restrictions on the use of loudspeakers at public meetings under 'public order' giving the phrase a meaning wide enough to cover action taken for the avoidance of excessive noise seriously interfering with the comfort or convenience of the people.[96] It will be difficult to give such an extended meaning to 'public order' in India. There should be some

---

93. Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, AIR 1950 SC 124 : 1950 SCR 594; Supdt., Central Prison v. Ram Manohar Lohia, AIR 1960 SC 633 : (1960) 2 SCR 821; R.M. Lohia v. State of Bihar, AIR 1966 SC 740 : (1966) 1 SCR 709.
Also see, infra, Ch. XXVII, under Preventive Detention.

94. O.K. Ghosh v. E.X. Joseph, AIR 1962 SC 812, at 814.

95. Madhu Limaye v. S.D.M., Monghyr, AIR 1971 SC 2486 : (1970) 3 SCC 746.

96. Francis v. Chief of Police, (1973) 2 All ER 251.

element of disturbance of peace to bring a matter under 'public order'.[1] But the Indian Courts have been able to place some curb on noise pollution.[2]All grounds on which action can be taken under S. 144, Cr. P.C., fall within the term 'public order' with this rider that 'annoyance' should be of grave proportions.[3]

An aggravated form of disturbance of peace which threatens the foundations of, or threatens to overthrow, the state will fall within the scope of the phrase 'security of state'. The expression 'overthrowing the state' is covered by the term 'security of state'. Therefore, making a speech tending to overthrow the state can be made punishable.[4]

Under Art. 19(2), a restriction can be imposed 'in the interests of' public order, etc. The expression 'in the interests of' gives a greater leeway to the legislature to curtail freedom of speech and expression, for a law penalising activities having a tendency to cause, and not actually causing public disorder, may be valid as being 'in the interests of' public order. However, the restriction imposed must have a reasonable and rational relation with the public order, security of state, etc. If the nexus between the restriction and public order, etc., is farfetched, then the restriction cannot be sustained as being in the 'interests' of public order, etc.[5] As has been stated earlier, this introduces the concept of proportionality in the area of Fundamental Rights.[6]

The Supreme Court has lucidly explained the effect of the clause "in the interests of" in O.K. Ghosh v. E.X. Joseph as follows:[7]

> "This clause again cannot be interpreted to mean that even if the connection between the restriction and the public order is remote and indirect, the restriction can be said to be in the interests of public order. A restriction can be said to be in the interests of public order only if the connection between the restriction and the public order is proximate and direct. Indirect or far-fetched or unreal connection between the restriction and public order would not fall within the purview of the expression 'in the interests of public order.' "

In Ram Manohar Lohia,[8] SUBBA RAO, J., speaking for the Court, pointed out that the expression "in the interests of public order" though wider than the phrase "for the maintenance of public order" still could not mean that the existence of any remote or fanciful connection between the impugned act and public order would be sufficient to sustain the validity of the law. The connection between the act prohibited or penalised and public order should be intimate. In other words, there should be a reasonable and rational relation between it and the object sought to be achieved, viz., public order. The nexus should thus be proximate—not far-fetched, problematical or too remote in the chain of its relation with public order.

---

1. D. Anantha Prabhu v. Distt. Collector, Ernakulam, AIR 1975 Ker 117.
2. Infra, (j).
Also see, Infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(p), under Art. 21.
3. The Madhu Limaye case, supra footnote 95.
Also, see, infra.
4. Santokh Singh v. Delhi Administration, AIR 1973 SC 1091 : (1973) 1 SCC 659.
5. V.K. Javali v. State of Mysore, AIR 1966 SC 1387 : (1962) 1 LLJ 134.
6. Supra, Sec. B.
7. AIR 1962 SC 814 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 571.
8. Supdt. Central Prison v. Ram Manohar Lohia, supra.

A legal provision making penal speeches or expressions on the part of an individual 'which incite or encourage the commission of violent crimes such as murder' would be valid as these speeches or expressions cannot but undermine the security of the State.[9] Sec. 295A, I.P.C., penalizes a person who 'with deliberate and malicious intention', by words either spoken or written, or by visible representations, insults or attempts to insult the religious beliefs of any class. The constitutional validity of the provision was challenged on the ground that the section was wide enough to cover even trifling forms of religious insults which may not involve any question of public order. It was thus argued that S. 295A, IPC, be declared void.

But the Supreme Court did not do so. The Court ruled that S. 295A makes criminal only graver types of conduct involving insults to religion or religious beliefs. The provision penalizes not every act of, or attempt to, insult the religious beliefs of a class of citizens, but only those aggravated forms of insult to religion which are perpetrated with the deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of a class of citizens. The calculated tendency of such an aggravated form of insult is clearly to disrupt public order and hence the provision is valid.[10]

A provision made penal any instigation not to pay any exaction to government. The Supreme Court ruled that the prohibition imposed was too wide, as it "takes in the innocent and the guilty persons, bona fide and mala fide advice, individuals and class, abstention from payment and deferment of payment, express or implied instigation, indirect or direct instigation... In short, no person, whether legal adviser or a friend or a well-wisher of a person instigated can escape the tentacles of this section, though in fact the rent due has been collected through coercive process or otherwise".

The section was declared invalid as there was no proximate or even foreseeable connection between such instigation and public order. The Court emphasised that the Fundamental Rights could not be controlled on "hypothetical and imaginary considerations". The Court rejected the argument that any instigation to break the law would in itself be a disturbance of the public order with the remark that "if this argument without obvious limitation be accepted, it would destroy the right to freedom of speech which is the very foundation of democratic way of life".[11]

Section 124A, I.P.C., punishes any person who by words, spoken or written, attempts to bring into hatred or contempt, or excites disaffection towards the government established by law. In the pre-Independence era, this section had been interpreted very broadly, and exciting or attempting to incite bad feelings towards the government was held punishable whether or not it resulted in public disorder.[12] Obviously, the section in such a broad form could not be sustained under Art. 19(2). In Kedar Nath v. State of Bihar,[13] the Supreme Court upheld S. 124A by interpreting it restrictively—as rendering penal only such activities as would be intended, or have a tendency, to create disorder.

---

9. State of Bihar v. Shailabala, AIR 1952 SC 329 : 1952 SCR 654.
10. Ramji Lal Modi v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1957 SC 650.
11. Superintendent, Central Prison v. Lohia, AIR 1960 SC 633 : (1960) 2 SCR 821.
12. Emperor v. Sadashiv Narayan, AIR 1947 SC 82.
13. AIR 1962 SC 955 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 769.

In Kedar Nath, the Court took the position that when a provision of law is capable of two interpretations, one of which makes it constitutional and the other unconstitutional, the interpretation which makes it constitutional should be preferred. Accordingly, the Court ruled that a mere criticism of government action, however strongly worded, would be consistent with the Fundamental Right of freedom of speech and expression. Only the words having the pernicious tendency, or intended to create disturbance of law and order would be penal in the interests of public order. The gist of the offence, the Supreme Court said, "is incitement to disorder or tendency or likelihood of public disorder or the reasonable apprehension thereof." For determination of criminality, the Court in each case has to determine whether the words in question have "the pernicious tendency" and the uttered has the "intention of creating public disorder or disturbance of law and order." Then only the penal law would take note of the utterance.[14]

On the other hand, considering the constitutional validity of S. 3 of the Pepsu Police (Incitement to Disaffection) Act, the Court has ruled that attempting to cause disaffection amongst the members of a police force towards government established by law, or inducing any member of a police force to commit a breach of discipline may be made penal. Any breach of discipline by members of police force must reasonably be reflected in a threat to public order, for an indisciplined police force could hardly serve as an instrument for maintenance of public order.[15] The Court observed: "Any breach in the discipline by its members must necessarily be reflected in a threat to public order and tranquillity. If the police force itself were indisciplined they could hardly serve as instruments for the maintenance of public order or function properly as the machinery through which order could be maintained among the general public."

Public order is not the same thing as public safety. Hence no restrictions can be imposed on the right to freedom of speech and expression on the ground that public safety is endangered.

(c) SOVEREIGNTY AND INTEGRITY OF INDIA

Section 2 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1961, makes penal the questioning of the "territorial integrity or frontiers of India" in a manner which is, or is likely to be, prejudicial to the interests of the safety or security of India.

(d) FRIENDLY RELATIONS WITH FOREIGN STATES

The idea behind imposing restrictions on the freedom of speech in the interests of friendly relations with a foreign country is that persistent and malicious propaganda against a foreign power having friendly relations with India may cause considerable embarrassment to India, and, accordingly, indulging in such a propaganda may be prohibited. The ground, however, is of broad import and is susceptible of supporting legislation which may even restrict legitimate criticism of the foreign policy of the Government of India.

---

14. For a comment on this case see, R.K. MISRA, Freedom of Speech and the Law of Sedition, 8 JILI, 117 (1966).
Also see, I.L.I., THE LAW OF SEDITION IN INDIA, (1964).

15. Dalbir Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1962 SC 1106 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 25.

Under Art. 367(3), a foreign State means any State other than India. The President, however, may, subject to any law made by Parliament, by order declare any State not to be a foreign State for such purposes as may be specified in the order. The Constitution (Declaration as to Foreign State) Order, 1950, directs that a Commonwealth country is not to be a foreign State for the purposes of the Constitution.

The question, therefore, arises whether a restriction can be imposed on the freedom of speech on the ground of its being prejudicial to a Commonwealth country. The Supreme Court has stated in Jagan Nath v. Union of India[16] that a country may not be regarded as a foreign State for the purposes of the Constitution, but may be regarded as a foreign power for other purposes. The affairs amongst the Commonwealth countries are foreign affairs and they are foreign powers in relation to each other. Therefore, a Commonwealth country is a foreign country for purposes of Art. 19(2).

(e) INCITEMENT TO AN OFFENCE

According to the general theories of criminal law, incitement and abutment of a crime is punishable. Incitement to serious and aggravated offences, like murder, may be punished as involving the security of the State.[17] Incitement to many other offences may be made punishable as affecting the public order. But there may still be some offences like bribery, forgery, cheating, etc., having no public order aspect, and incitement to which could not be made punishable as an aspect of public order. So. Art. 19(2) has the words 'incitement to an offence'.

The word 'offence' has not been defined in the Constitution but according to the General Clauses Act it means any act or omission made punishable by law. This is a broad concept and so it is possible for the Legislature to create an offence and make incitement thereto punishable. In this way, the freedom of speech can be effectively circumscribed as any subject can be precluded from public discussion by making it an offence.

(f) CONTEMPT OF COURT

In a democratic society, freedom of speech and expression is a prized privilege and a salutary right of the people. But, at the same time, no less important is the maintenance of independence and integrity of the judiciary and public confidence in the administration of justice. It thus becomes necessary to draw a balance between the two values.

Power has been specifically conferred on the Supreme Court [Art. 129] as well as each High Court [Art. 215] to punish its contempt. The freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a) is thus subject to Arts. 19(2), 129 and 215.

The question of contempt of the Supreme Court and of the High Courts has already been discussed earlier.[18] Contempt of other Courts can be punished by the High Courts under the Contempt of Courts Act, 1952. A challenge to the Act as imposing an unreasonable restriction on the right under Art. 19(1)(a), because it

---

16. AIR 1960 SC 675 : (1960) 2 SCR 942.
17. Shailabala's case, supra.
18. Supra, Chs. IV, Sec. C(i) and VIII, Sec. C(i).

provides no definition of the expression 'contempt of Court', has been rejected on the ground that the expression has a well-recognised judicial interpretation.[19]

The law of contempt of Court as administered by the Supreme Court under Art. 129 has been held to be reasonable under Art. 19(2).[20] S. 228, I.P.C., also makes some cases of contempt of Court punishable.

While the Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and expression, it also lays down that in exercising that right, contempt of Court may not be committed. The underlying idea is that authority of Courts be preserved and obstructions to the due administration of justice removed.

Charging the judiciary as "an instrument of oppression", and the judges as "guided and dominated by class hatred" "instinctively favouring the rich against the poor" has been held to constitute contempt of Court as these words weaken the authority of law and law Courts, and have the effect of lowering the prestige of judges and Courts in the eyes of the people.[21] The Supreme Court has observed recently on the question of contempt of Court:

> "We wish to emphasize that under the cover of freedom of speech and expression no party can be given a licence to misrepresent the proceedings and orders of the Court and deliberately paint an absolutely wrong and incomplete picture which has the tendency to scandalise the Court and bring it into dispute or ridicule….Indeed, freedom of speech and expression is "life blood of democracy" but this freedom is subject to certain qualifications. An offence of scandalising the Court per se is one such qualification."[22]

(g) TRIAL BY MEDIA

Interference with administration of justice is not a permissible freedom nor an unreasonable restriction. In a case relating to suicide by wife due to her harassment for dowry, an application for grant of anticipatory bail was rejected by Courts below. When special leave petition from such rejection was pending before Supreme Court, an article appeared in a magazine based on an interview of the family of the deceased, giving their version of the tragedy and extensively quoting the father of the deceased as to his version of the case which could all be materials that may be used in the forthcoming trial. The Supreme Court took the view that such articles appearing in the media would certainly interfere with the administration of justice and deprecated such practice and cautioned the publisher, editor and the journalist who were responsible for the said article against indulging in such trial by media when the issue was sub judice.[23]

Again the Supreme Court has said that before placing criticism of a judgment in public, all concerned in its publication have to see whether any such criticism has crossed limits of fair criticism. Right to freedom of media has to be exercised responsibly and internal mechanism should be devised to prevent publications that would bring judiciary into disrepute and interfere with administration of jus-

---

19. E.T. Sen v. E. Narayanan, AIR 1969 Del. 201.
20. C.K. Daphtary v. O.P. Gupta, AIR 1971 SC 1132 : (1971) 1 SCC 626.
21. E.M.S. Namboodiripad v. T.N. Nambiar, AIR 1970 SC 2015 : (1970) 2 SCC 325; In re: D.C. Saxena, AIR 1996 SC 2481.
Also see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(i).
22. Narmada Bachao Andolan v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 3345, 3347 : (1999) 8 SCC 308.
Also see, In re: D.C. Sazena, AIR 1996 SC 2481 : (1996) 5 SCC 216.
23. M.P. Lohia v. State of West Bengal, (2005) 2 SCC 686 : AIR 2005 SC 790.

tice, especially since judiciary has no way of replying thereto by the very nature of its office. Proclivity to sensationalism is to be curbed in every case and it would be no answer to plead that publisher, editor or others concerned did not know of the contemptuous nature of publication or that it was done in haste. For rule of law and orderly society, a free responsible press and independent judiciary are both indispensable. Both have to be, therefore, protected. While the media can, in the public interest, resort to reasonable criticism of a judicial act or the judgment of a Court for public good or report any such statements, it should refrain from casting scurrilous aspersions on, or impute improper motives or personal bias to the judge. Nor should they scandalize the Court or the judiciary as a whole, or make personal allegations of lack of ability or integrity against a judge. The judgments of Courts are public documents and can be commented upon, analysed and criticized, but it has to be in a dignified manner without attributing motives.[24]

(h) DEFAMATION

Defamation is both a crime as well as a tort. According to Winfield: "Defamation is the publication of a statement which reflects on a person's reputation and tends to lower him in the estimation of right-thinking members of society generally or tends to make them shun or avoid him."[25] As a crime, Defamation is defined in S. 49, I.P.C. The law seeks to protect a person in his reputation as in his person or property.

(i) DECENCY OR MORALITY

These are terms of variable content having no fixed meaning for ideas about decency or morality vary from society to society and time to time depending on the standards of morals prevailing in the contemporary society.

The Indian Penal Code in Ss. 292 to 294 lists some of the offences like selling obscene books, selling obscene things to young persons, committing an obscene act, or singing an obscene song in a public place. S. 292, I.P.C., has been held valid because the law against obscenity seeks no more than to promote public decency and morality.[26]

The test of obscenity is whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscene is to deprive and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of this sort is likely to fall.[27]

Again, the Court has observed in Chandrakant:[28] "What we have to see is that whether a class, not an isolated case, into whose hands the book, article, or story falls suffer in their moral outlook or become depraved by reading it or might have impure and lecherous thoughts aroused in their minds. The charge of obscenity must, therefore, be judged from this aspect". On the question of obscenity, the Court has laid emphasis on "the importance of art to a value judgment" by the censors. Art should be preserved and promoted in any scheme of censorship for, as the Court observed, "The artistic appeal or presentation of an episode

---

24. Rajendra Sail v. M. P. High Court Bar Assn., (2005) 6 SCC 109 : AIR 2005 SC 2473.
25. WINFIELD and JOLOWICZ on Tort, 274 (1979).
26. Ranjit Udeshi v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1965 SC 881 : 1965 (1) SCR 65.
27. R. v. Hicklin, L.R. 3 Q.B. 360; Ranjit D. Udeshi v. State of Maharashtra, ibid.
28. Chandrakant Kalyandas Kakodkar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1970 SC 1390 : (1969) 2 SCC 687. Also see, Chandra Rajkumari v. Police Commissioner, AIR 1998 AP 302.

robs it of its vulgarity and harm...” In short what the Court means is that there is a distinction between artistry and pornography.

In Ramesh Prabhoo,[29] the Supreme Court has given somewhat wider meaning to the term ‘decency’ and ‘morality’. The Court has maintained that ‘decency’ or ‘morality’ is not confined to sexual morality alone. The ordinary dictionary meaning of ‘decency’ indicates that the action must be in conformity with the current standards of behaviour or propriety. The Court has cited with approval the following observation from an English case:[30]

> “…… Indecency is not confined to sexual indecency; indeed it is difficult to find any limit short of saying that it includes anything which an ordinary decent man or woman would find to be shocking, disgusting and revolting….”

Accordingly, the Court has ruled that in a secular society, the requirement of correct behaviour or propriety is that a candidate at an election should not make an appeal for votes in the name of his religion. Seeking of votes at an election on the ground of the candidate’s religion in a secular state is against the norms of decency and propriety of the society and a statutory provision declaring this as a corrupt practice is constitutionally valid.

(j) FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND DISCIPLINE IN CIVIL SERVICE

The Supreme Court has ruled in Devendrappa that reasonable restrictions may have to be imposed on the freedom of speech and expression in the interest of maintaining discipline in public services, even though it may not have been mentioned as a ground in Art. 19(2).[31]

The appellant, in the instant case, was the general manager of the Karnataka Small Industries Development Corporation. In a statement made to the press he made a direct attack on the head of his organisation. In a letter to the Governor, he made attacks on several officials of the corporation. He was dismissed from service on the ground that his conduct was clearly detrimental to the proper functioning of the organization, or its internal discipline. He challenged the service rules as well as his dismissal, but the Supreme Court upheld both. He challenged his dismissal on the ground of breach of his freedom of speech and expression, but the Court rejected his plea.

The Court expressed the view that a service rule is made to maintain discipline within the service and not to curtail the freedom of speech. Rules of government service designed for proper discharge of duties and obligations by government servants are not invalidated under Art. 19(1)(a) although such rules may, to some extent, curtail or impose limitations on the Fundamental Rights of these persons. Although freedom under Art. 19(1)(a) applies to government servants, it does not mean that the responsibility arising from official position of government servants could not impose some limitations on the exercise of their rights as citizens.

The Court justified the service rules under Art. 19(2). These rules cannot be invalidated even if not justified under Art. 19(2). On the question of interrelation

---

29. Dr. Ramesh Yeshwant Prabhoo v. Prabhakar Kashinath Kunte, AIR 1996 SC 1113 : (1996) 1 SCC 130.

30. Knuller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd. v. Director of Public Prosecutions, (1972) 2 All ER 898.

31. M.H. Devendrappa v. Karnataka State Small Industries Development Corpn., AIR 1998 SC 1064 : (1998) 3 SCC 732.

of several freedoms guaranteed by Art. 19, the Court has observed that they "are not necessarily and in all circumstances mutually supportive, although taken together they weave a fabric of a free and equal democratic society". Proper exercise of rights may have, implicit in them, certain restrictions. The rights must be harmoniously construed so that they are properly promoted with the minimum of such implied and necessary restrictions. Joining government service has, implicit in it, if not explicitly so laid down, the observance of a certain code of conduct necessary for the proper discharge of functions as a government servant. This code cannot be flouted in the name of other freedoms. Of course, the Courts have to be vigilant to ensure that the code is not so widely framed as to unreasonably restrict fundamental freedoms. "But a reasonable code designed to promote discipline and efficiency can be enforced by the Government organisation in the sense that those who flout it can be subjected to disciplinary action".[32]

In the instant case, the conduct of the petitioner was clearly detrimental to the proper functioning of the organisation, or its internal discipline. "On a proper balancing, therefore, of individual freedom of the appellant and the proper functioning of the government organisation which had employed him, this was a fit case where the employer was entitled to take disciplinary action against him under the service Rules."

But the Supreme Court has refused to apply the Devendrappa ruling to an elected member of the corporation who criticised the house tax assessment by the council and asked the tax payers to approach him for sorting out their grievances. He was exercising his democratic right of fair criticism, and it could not be regarded as misconduct on his part, and he could not be removed from the municipal council on that ground.[33] He was an elected member of the municipal council and not its employee. As a representative of the people he owed a duty not merely to the municipal council, but also to the public in his constituency. He held the office in trust for them. As an elected representative of the people, he was expected to safeguard their interest. As such, he would enjoy freedom of speech under Art. 19(1)(a), which includes fair criticism of the law or any executive action. The Supreme Court has observed in this connection:[34]

> "Freedom of speech and expression is guaranteed in our democratic republic both in legislature as well as in local bodies and, therefore, a legislator or a municipal councillor legitimately can express his views in regard to what he thinks to be in public interest. A legitimate exercise of right of speech and expression including a fair criticism is not to be throttled."

(k) NOISE POLLUTION

Lately the Courts have been very conscious of the fact of environmental pollution in India. Accordingly, the Courts have started playing an activist role in the matter of protecting environment.

For this purpose, the Courts have invoked Art. 21 and in a number of cases thereunder, the Courts have tackled a number of problems relating to pollution.[35] The Courts have also interpreted Art. 19 so as to ensure that anti-environmental activities are not protected thereby. On perusal of the relevant case-law, one may

---

32. Also see, under Balakothaiah case, infra.
33. Baldev Singh Gandhi v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2002 SC 1124.
34. Ibid, at 1127.
35. See, Infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(p).

conclude that the Courts have refused to protect polluting activities under Art. 19. On the other hand, it seems that the various clauses in Art. 19 have been so interpreted as to exclude such activities from their protection.

Coming to Art. 19(1)(a), the emerging judicial view is that the freedom of speech can be exercised by a person subject to keeping the level of noise pollution within bearable limits. Although noise pollution has not been mentioned in Art. 19(2) as a ground for which reasonable restrictions can be imposed on the freedom of speech, the Courts have implied this limitation from Art. 19(1)(a) itself.

The Courts have argued that freedom of speech includes the freedom to remain silent. The Courts have raised the question: can a person exercise his right under Art. 19(1)(a) so as to interfere with the freedom of others? To put it differently, can a citizen say that notwithstanding that he is causing public nuisance and interfering with the right of others, he would be entitled to enjoy his freedom under Art. 19(1)(a) in any way he likes, or absolutely without any restriction?

The Courts have answered this question as follows: when a person enjoys his right under Art. 19(1)(a), he must do so causing very minimum inconvenience to others. A person cannot claim his freedom of speech so as to interfere with the human rights and Fundamental Rights of others.[36]

The question of noise pollution has arisen in connection with the use of loud speakers. Loud speakers amplify sound manifold and thus create noise pollution. The question has arisen: how far can the use of loud speakers be regulated under Art. 19(1)(a)?

In the U.S.A., an uncontrolled discretion vested in the Chief of Police to permit or not to permit the use of loudspeakers at public meetings has been held to be bad for "loudspeakers are today indispensable instruments of effective public speech".[37]

To begin with, the Courts in India also took the same position. It was ruled that the right to use loudspeakers can be regarded as a Fundamental Right in itself being a part of the right of the freedom of speech and expression and, so, a blanket ban on the use of loudspeakers cannot be imposed. A person has a right to propagate, communicate and circulate his views through all means of communication and through all forms of media for reaching a wider audience. Reasonable restriction can, however, be imposed on this right under Art. 19(2).

An uncontrolled discretion cannot be given to executive officers to control the use of loudspeakers, etc. The discretion will have to be controlled as exercisable only when there is an apprehension of a breach of peace. A condition that at a public meeting, loudspeakers should not be used at any time infringes Art. 19(1)(a).[38] For example, in an early case, Indulal v. State of Gujarat,[39] the Gujarat High Court held that freedom of speech includes freedom to circulate one's views in any manner. The Court drew support for this view from the Privy Council's decision in Francis v. Chief of Police.[40]

---

36. New Road Brothers v. Commissioner of Police, Ernakulam, AIR 1999 Ker 262.
37. Saia v. New York, 334 US 558 (1948).
38. D. Anantha Prabhu v. Dist. Collector, AIR 1975 Ker 117; Satya Yug Party v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1996 AP 218.
39. AIR 1963 Guj 259.
40. Supra.

On the other hand, lately the Courts have started adopting a different stance. For example, in K. Venu v. Director General of Police,[41] a single Judge of the Kerala High Court expressed the view that he was not inclined to hold that the right to use loudspeakers was a Fundamental Right in itself on the ground that sound pollution was an accepted danger and indiscriminate use of loudspeakers could not be permitted. In a given situation, it was for the authority concerned to satisfy itself whether a loudspeaker could be used or not.

In P.A. Jacob v. Supdt. of Police, Kottayam,[42] the Kerala High Court has taken noise pollution into account saying, "exposure to high noise is a known risk". The Court has observed: "If an absolute right is conceded in this behalf, it will be an unlimited charter for aural aggression." "However wide a right is, it cannot be as wide as to destroy similar or other rights in others". And, further the High Court has said:

> "The right to speech implies the right to silence. It implies freedom, not to listen, and not to be forced to listen".

But the Court has maintained that even though use of loudspeakers does not constitute a Fundamental Right, denial of the use of loudspeakers could validly take place only within the confines of the relevant law. In the instant case, denial of permission by the police authorities was held to be wrongful and arbitrary and for no reason.

The Calcutta High Court has imposed restrictions on the use of loudspeakers at the time of azan on the ground of noise pollution. The Court has stated that excessive noise certainly causes pollution in society. In India, there is no effective law made to control the noise creator. But, under Art. 19(1)(a), read with Art. 21, the citizens have a right of a decent environment and have a right to live peacefully, right to sleep at night and a right to leisure which are all necessary ingredients of the right to life guaranteed under Art. 21.[43]

In another case,[44] the Calcutta High Court has stated that unfortunately, in India, no restriction has been placed on the user of microphones or loudspeakers. Therefore, it is the duty of the Court to show judicial creativity in the matter. The Court has stated, "….where a law of the past does not fit in the present context, the Court should evolve a new law…"[45]

The Court has emphasized that the citizens are entitled to live in society peacefully, free from mechanical and artificial sounds which create a tremendous health hazards and adverse effect on the citizen. Citizens have a right to live in a society which is free from pollution. If the legislature fails to make an appropriate law for the purpose of controlling noise pollution, the Courts have to fill the gap. In the words of the Court:[46]

---

41. AIR 1990 Ker 344.
42. AIR 1993 Ker 1.
43. Maulana Mufti Syed Md. Noorur Rehman Barkati v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1999 Cal 15. Also see, Om Biranjana Religious Society v. State of West Bengal, (1996) 100 Cal WN 617; Free Legal Aid Cell v. Delhi, AIR 2001 Del 455.
44. Burrabazar Fire Works Dealers Assn. v. Commissioner of Police, Calcutta, AIR 1998 Cal 121.
45. Ibid, at 129.
46. Ibid, at 134.

> "If a citizen has a right it is also equally a duty on the part of this Court to see that such rights are preserved and not allowed to be destroyed. Legislature may not rise to the occasion but that does not mean that Court will keep its hand folded in the absence of any legislative mandate. The Courts are the custodian of the rights of the citizens and if the Court is of the view that citizens rights guaranteed under the Constitution of India are violated, the Court is not powerless to end the wrong."

The question of controlling noise pollution has also become embroiled with the question of religious freedom guaranteed by Arts. 25 and 26.[47] Can a church claim the freedom to relay prayers on the loud speakers causing noise pollution and nuisance to the residents?. The Supreme Court has ruled in Church of God v. K.K.R.M.C.Welfare Ass.[48] that the question of religious freedom does not arise as no religion requires that prayers be performed through voice amplifiers. The Court directed that the guidelines framed by the Government under the relevant rules framed under the Environment Protection Act, 1986, must be followed by the concerned authorities.[49]

(l) ADMINISTRATIVE DISCRETION

The general principle is that it is unreasonable to leave absolute and arbitrary discretion to an administrative officer to regulate the freedom of speech and expression. The discretion to be valid must be exercisable for purposes specified in Art. 19(2), and subject to legislative policy and procedural safeguards. This judicial approach is illustrated by the following cases.

A provision authorising the district magistrate to prohibit dramatic performances of a scandalous or defamatory nature, corrupting persons or arousing or likely to excite feelings of disaffection to the government has been held to be unconstitutional for it makes a district magistrate the final authority to determine the question whether or not a particular play is offensive under the Act. Further, the district magistrate is not obligated to give reasons for his decision and there is no high authority (judicial or otherwise) to review his decision.[50]

A significant judicial pronouncement in the area is Virendra v. State of Punjab.[51] Sec. 2 of a Punjab Act empowered the State Government to prohibit the printing of any matter relating to a particular subject for a maximum period of two months in any issue of a newspaper if the government was satisfied that such action was necessary to prevent any activity prejudicial to the maintenance of communal harmony likely to affect public order. The aggrieved party could make a representation to the government against the order, which, after consideration of the same, could modify, confirm or rescind the order. Sec. 3 authorised the State Government to prohibit the bringing into Punjab of any newspaper if it was satisfied that such action was necessary to prevent any activity prejudicial to the maintenance of communal harmony affecting public order.

These provisions were challenged on the ground of giving arbitrary and uncontrolled discretion to the government to curtail freedom of speech 'on its sub-

---

47. Infra, Ch. XXIX, Secs. B and C.
48. AIR 2000 SC 2773 : (2000) 7 SCC 282.
49. Also see, Om Biranguna Religious Society v. State of West Bengal, (1996) 100 Cal WN 617.
50. State of U.P. v. Baboolal, AIR 1956 All. 571; Harnam v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 Punj. 243.
51. AIR 1957 SC 896 : 1958 SCR 409.

jective satisfaction'. The Supreme Court pointed out that there existed in Punjab serious tension amongst the various communities and in such a situation, conferment of wide powers to be exercised in the subjective satisfaction of the government could not be regarded as an unreasonable restriction. The State Government being in possession of all material facts, was the best authority to take anticipatory action for prevention of threatened breach of peace. Therefore, determination of the time when, and the extent to which, restriction should be imposed on the Press must of necessity be left to the judgment and discretion of the government. To make the exercise of those powers justiciable would defeat the very purpose of the Act.

Further, the Court held that a law conferring discretion on the executive could not be invalid if it laid down the policy so that discretion was exercised to effectuate the policy. The law in question satisfied this test for it laid down the purposes for which the power could be exercised. Further, in S. 2, there were two safeguards subject to which the government was to exercise its power, viz., an order could remain in force only for two months, and the aggrieved person could make a representation to the government against the order, and so S. 2, as a whole, was valid. S. 3 was held invalid for it neither laid down any time-limit for the operation of the order, nor did it provide for any representation to the government against the order.[52]

Under S. 144, Cr.P.C., where in the opinion of a district magistrate there is sufficient ground for proceeding under this section and immediate prevention or speedy remedy is desirable, he may, by a written order stating the material facts of the case, direct any person to abstain from a certain act if the district magistrate considers that such direction is likely to prevent danger to human life, health or safety, or a disturbance of the public tranquillity, or a riot, or an affray. The magistrate could, either on his own motion or on the application of any aggrieved person, rescind or alter any order made by him. When an aggrieved person applies, the magistrate is to give him an opportunity of showing cause against the order. If the application is rejected, the magistrate will record his reasons in writing for doing so. No order under S. 144 is to remain in force for longer than two months, but the State Government could direct otherwise in cases of danger to human life, health or safety, or a likelihood of a riot or an affray.

The provision was challenged on the ground that it confers too wide powers on the district magistrate to put restrictions on the freedom of speech and assembly. Rejecting the argument, the Supreme Court has ruled in Babulal Parate,[93] that S. 144 is intended to be availed of for preventing disorders, obstructions and annoyances. The magistrate has to act judicially; restraints permissible under S. 144 are of a temporary nature and can only be imposed in an emergency. An opportunity is to be given to the aggrieved person to show cause against the order and the magistrate has to record reasons if he rejects the application of the aggrieved person. The duty to maintain law and order rests on the district magistrate and, therefore, there is nothing unreasonable in making him the initial judge of the emergency.[53]

---

52. For further discussion on this topic, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMN. LAW, 792-794 (1996).

53. Babulal Parate v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1961 SC 884 : (1961) 3 SCR 423; JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, III, 1809-1813.

But that part of the section [S. 144(6)] which authorises the State Government to extend the life of the order beyond two months has been found to be invalid in Misra,[54] because no safeguards were provided in that case. The government exercises its powers in an executive manner; an order passed by it need not be of a temporary duration, and the aggrieved party has been given no opportunity to make representation against government's order.

Under S. 99-A, Cr.P.C., 1898 [presently S. 95, Cr.P.C., 1974) the State Government may, by notification in the Gazette stating the grounds of its opinion, forfeit any book, newspaper or any document containing seditious matter, etc. In Harnam Das v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[55] the Court quashed the notification forfeiting certain books because the Government failed to state the grounds for forming its opinion. The ambit of government's power is too large and uncontrolled.

A notable example of administrative regulation of freedom of speech and expression is to be found in the system of film censorship. In K.A. Abbas v. Union of India,[56] the Supreme Court has upheld censorship of films under 19(1)(a) on the ground that films have to be treated separately from other forms of art and expression because a motion picture is able to stir up emotions more deeply than any other product of art. Films can therefore be censored on the grounds mentioned in Art. 19(2). There exists the Board of Film Censors for the purpose.[57]

Prior to the Abbas case, the final appellate powers from the decision of the film censors lay in the Central Government. This was challenged on the ground of its inconsistency with Art. 19(1)(a). The Central Government agreed to change this and vest the appellate powers in an independent tribunal. The Court expressed satisfaction that the Central Government would cease to perform curial functions through one of its Secretaries in the sensitive field of freedom of speech and expression. "Experts sitting as a Tribunal and deciding matters quasi-judicially inspire more confidence than a Secretary..." The Government also agreed to prescribe reasonable time-limits for the decision of the authorities censoring the film.[58]

A tribunal has now been established to replace the Central Government as the appellate tribunal from the decision of the Board of Film Censors. But a provision was put in the Cinematography Act through which the Central Government could review the decision of the Appellate Tribunal. The Supreme Court held this provision to be unconstitutional being "a travesty of the Rule of law which is one of the basic structure of the Constitution."

The Court disliked the idea of the executive sitting in appeal over the decision of a quasi-judicial body. The Court insisted that the executive must obey judicial orders rather than vice versa. The government claimed that the power was necessary because on certain occasions there was public resentment to a film, and this created law and order problem even though the film had been cleared by the Board or the Tribunal. Rejecting the argument, the Court insisted that in such a

---

54. State of Bihar v. K.K. Misra, AIR 1971 SC 1667; JAIN, CASES, III, 1813-1816.
55. AIR 1961 SC 1662 : (1962) 2 SCR 371.
56. AIR 1971 SC 481 : (1970) 2 SCC 780.
57. See, supra, Sec. C(s), under "Censorship of Films".
58. For a description of the working of the film censors see, LEVIN, Hearing Procedures of Three Administrative Agencies, 4 JILI, 205 (1962).

situation, "the clear duty of the government is to ensure that law and order is maintained by taking appropriate action against the persons who break the law.[59]

According to a G.O. issued by the Andhra Government, all government advertisements were to be released to the newspapers only by the Director of Information subject to the following guidelines: advertisements were not to be issued to a newspaper or a periodical adopting any of the following tones: (i) anti-national; (ii) communal; (iii) rabid, abusive; (iv) provoking tensions between different sections of society; (v) distorting news for mischievous purposes; (vi) character assassination; black-marketing, mudslinging, etc.; (vii) fomenting group rivalries; (viii) abusive and slanderous attacks on government and its functionaries.

In Ushodaya Publications (P) Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[60] the Andhra Pradesh High Court said that the newspapers had no right to demand advertisements from the government. On the other hand, the government did have a right to choose the newspapers in which it would advertise. While the government could give its advertisements to such papers as it pleased, it could not discriminate between one newspaper and another.[61] Government's discretion to grant largess must be structured by rational, relevant and non-discriminatory standards or norms.[62] The government must not use its power to give advertisements to muzzle the press which criticises its policies and actions. The Court held conditions (i), (ii), (iv), (vi) and (viii) valid but not conditions (iii), (v) and (vii) as it was very difficult to decide the matters mentioned therein.[63]

A notice served on the Indian Express for cancellation of the lease and demolition of its building was quashed by the Supreme Court in Express Newspapers Pvt. Ltd. v. Union of India.[64] The company publishing the paper took on perpetual lease a piece of land from the Central Government for construction of its building. On the allegation that the building did not conform with the sanctioned plan, a notice to cancel the lease and for re-entry and demolition of the building was served on the company. The company challenged the same as being violative of the freedom of the press. The allegation was that the Indian Express was a trenchant critic of the Prime Minister Indira Gandhi and as a vindictive measure the notice in question had been given to it. It was also stated that whatever the deviations, they had all been sanctioned by the concerned Central Minister.

The Supreme Court quashed the notice holding it to be mala fide. The Court came to the conclusion that the notice of the re-entry and the threatened demolition of the Express buildings were intended and meant to silence the voice of the Indian Express. The impugned notice was held to constitute a direct and immediate threat to the freedom of the press and, thus, violative of Art. 19(1)(a) read with Art. 14.

(m) PRESS COUNCIL

The Press Council was first established in 1965 but was abolished in 1976 during the internal emergency declared on June 25, 1975.[65] The Council was re-

---

59. Union of India v. K.M. Shankarappa, AIR 2000 SC 3678 : (2001) 1 SCC 582.
60. AIR 1981 AP 109.
61. See, supra, under Art. 14, Ch. XXI.
62. Ramana, Supra, 496; E.E.C. Ltd. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1975 SC 266 : (1975) 1 SCC 70.
63. Also see, supra, Sec. C(e), on this point.
64. AIR 1986 SC 872 : (1986) 1 SCC 133.
65. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
Also see, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F, infra.

established in 1978 by the Press Council Act, 1978. The Council is conceived as an agency of self-regulation, and the preservation of the freedom, of the press. It consists primarily of working journalists, managers and owners of newspapers. Its avowed objects are preservation of the freedom of the press and maintenance and improvement of the standards of newspapers in India. If a newspaper offends against standards of journalistic ethics or public taste, or if an editor or working journalist commits professional misconduct, the council may, after giving a hearing and recording the reasons, censure newspaper, editor or the journalist concerned.[66]

The jurisdiction of the council to protect the freedom of the press is every broad. The council can take note of violation of the right to liberty of the press from any agency—be that the State, State functionary, public authority, companies, individual or any person, real or fictional.[67]

E. FREEDOM TO ASSEMBLE: ARTS. 19(1)(b) AND 19(3)

ARTICLE 19(1)(B)

Article 19(1)(b) guarantees to the citizens of India the right to assemble peaceably and without arms. Under Art. 19(3), however, the state can make any law imposing reasonable restrictions on the exercise of this right in the interests of public order, and sovereignty and integrity of India.

To some extent, there is common ground between Arts. 19(1)(a) and 19(1)(b). For example, demonstrations, processions and meetings considered under Art. 19(1)(a) also fall under Art. 19(1)(b) for a demonstration also amounts to an assembly and, therefore, the same principles apply under both Articles.[68] The right to strike is not available under either of these Articles.[69]

Article 19(1)(b) does not confer on any one a right to hold meetings in government premises. Therefore, Railways can validly prohibit holding of meetings in their premises either within or outside office hours. The right of assembly cannot be exercised on the property of somebody. Railways are entitled to enjoy their properties in the same manner as any private individual subject to such restrictions as may be placed on them by law or usage.[70] But a right to hold public meetings on government property (like a maidan) can be created by usage.[71]

It is not valid to confer uncontrolled discretion on administrative officers to regulate the freedom of assembly. A rule banning holding of public meetings on public streets without police permission has been held bad in Himmat Lal v. Police Commissioner.[72] In India, citizens had a right to hold meetings on public streets before the Constitution, subject to the control of appropriate authority regarding the time and place of the meeting and considerations of public order. The rule in question gave no guidance as to the circumstances in which permission to hold a meeting could be refused and, therefore, gave arbitrary powers.[73]

---

66. For comments on the Press Council Bill, 1965, see 7 JILI, 112 (1965).
67. See, State of Bihar v. Press Council, AIR 1975 Del 79.
68. Supra, Sec. C(l).
69. Ibid; see also T. K. Rangarajan v. Govt. of T. N., (2003) 6 SCC 581 : AIR 2003 SC 3032.
70. Railway Board v. Niranjan Singh, AIR 1969 SC 966 : (1969) 1 SCC 502.
71. D. Anantha Prabhu v. District Collector, AIR 1975 Ker 117.
72. AIR 1973 SC 87 : (1973) 1 SCC 227.
73. Also see, Mathai v. State, AIR 1954 TC 47; Brahmanand v. State of Bihar, AIR 1959 Pat. 425; In re Annadurai, AIR 1959 Mad 63; Dasappa v. Dy. Addl. Commr., AIR 1960 Mys 57.

F. FREEDOM TO FORM ASSOCIATION : ARTS. (19)(1)(c) AND 19(4)

(a) ARTICLE 19(1)(C)

Article 19(1)(c) guarantees to the citizens of India the right to form associations or unions. Under Art. 19(4), reasonable restrictions in the interests of public order or morality or sovereignty and integrity of India may be imposed on this right by law.

The right to form associations is the very lifeblood of democracy. Without such a right, political parties cannot be formed, and without such parties a democratic form of government, especially that of the parliamentary type, cannot be run properly. Hence the Constitution guarantees the right to form associations subject to such restrictions as can be imposed under Art. 19(4).

Recognising the importance of the right of forming associations in a democratic society, the Courts have not favoured the vesting of absolute discretion in the executive to interfere with this Fundamental Right. A discretion vested in a government official to prohibit formation of an association, without proper safeguards, has been held to be unconstitutional.

A law empowered the State Government to declare an association unlawful on the ground that such association constituted a danger to the public peace, or interfered with the maintenance of public order, or the administration of the law. The government notification had to specify the grounds for making the order and fix a reasonable period to make a representation against the order. The State Government was, however, authorised not to disclose any facts which it regarded as being against public interest. The government had to place the notification and the representation against it before an advisory board. If the board, after considering the material, found that there was no sufficient cause for declaring the association unlawful, the government was bound to cancel the order.

In State of Madras v. V.G. Row,[74] the Supreme Court declared the provision to be unconstitutional, for the test to declare an association unlawful was 'subjective' and the factual existence of the grounds was not justiciable. The Court emphasized that curtailing the right to form associations was fraught with serious potential reactions in religious, political and economic fields. Therefore, the vesting of power in the government to impose restrictions on this right without having the grounds therefor tested in a judicial inquiry was a strong element to be taken into consideration in judging the reasonableness of the restrictions. The existence of a summary and largely one-sided review by an advisory board was no substitute for a judicial inquiry.

A requirement that teachers of schools should seek the Board's permission to engage in political activities has been held to be wholesome, for a teacher has got to be under certain terms and discipline of employment and it is detrimental to his calling to get mixed up into rivalries in respect of the union, panchayat or the district board.[75]

---

74. AIR 1952 SC 196 : 1952 SCR 597.
Also see, JAIN, Cases, III, 1817-1822.

75. Hazi Mohd. v. District Board, Malda, AIR 1958 Cal. 401.

At times, recognition of an association by the government may affect the right to form an association, e.g., if the government were to prohibit its servants from becoming members of an unrecognised association, then formation of an association becomes vitally linked up with government recognition, for without recognition, the right to form association becomes illusory. In such a situation, Art. 19(1)(c) would control the power of the government to recognise associations. A rule provided that a union could not represent the parties in an industrial dispute unless it had been approved by the Labour Commissioner for this purpose. The application for approval could be made only two years after its formation and the Labour Commissioner had absolute discretion to accept or reject the application. These conditions for recognition were held to contravene Art. 19(1)(c).[76]

Similarly, the Supreme Court invalidated a rule which provided that no government servant could join or continue to be a member of any services association which the government did not recognise or in respect of which recognition has been refused or withdrawn by it. The Court held that the rule imposed a restriction on the undoubted right of a government servant under Art. 19(1)(c). The rule in question was neither reasonable nor in the interest of "public order" under Art. 19(4). The restriction was such as to make the right guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(c) illusory since the government could refuse or withdraw recognition of an association on considerations which might not have any direct or reasonable connection with discipline or efficiency of government servants or public order.[77]

Does the right to form associations also involve a guarantee that an association shall have the concomitant right to achieve its objectives for which it has been formed? Can the law place some restrictions on trade unions in the way of their acting as instruments of agitating and collective bargain to improve the wages of the workmen? Can it be argued that if the concomitant right of an association to achieve its purposes is not guaranteed, then the right to form association becomes an idle right? The right to form associations or unions does not include within its ken as a Fundamental Right a right to form association or unions for achieving a particular object or running a particular institution, the same being a concomitant or concomitant to a concomitant of a Fundamental Right, but not the Fundamental Right itself. A right to form association guaranteed under Article 19(1) (c) does not imply the fulfillment of every object of an association as it would be contradictory to the scheme underlying the text and the frame of the several Fundamental Rights guaranteed by Part III and particularly by the scheme of the guarantees conferred by sub-clauses (a) to (g) of clause (1) of Article 19.[78]

The Supreme Court has, however, not countenanced this extended dimension sought to be given to Art. 19(1)(c). The Court has ruled that the right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(c) does not carry with it a concomitant right that unions formed for protecting the interests of labour shall achieve their object such that any interference to such achievement by any law would be unconstitutional unless it could be justified under Art. 19(4) as being in the interests of public order or morality. The right under Art. 19(1)(c) extends only to the formation of an association or union and insofar as the activities of the association or union are concerned, or as regards the steps which the union might take to achieve its object, they are sub-

---

76. U.P. Shramik Maha Sangh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1960 All. 45.
Also, E.R.E. Congress v. General Manager, E. Rly., AIR 1965 Cal. 389.
77. O.K. Ghosh v. E.X. Joseph, AIR 1963 SC 812 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 789; supra.
78. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.

ject to such laws as may be framed and such laws cannot be tested under Art. 19(4). The Court has held that even a very liberal interpretation of Art. 19(1)(c) cannot mean that the trade unions have a guaranteed right to strike. The right to strike may be controlled by appropriate industrial legislation.[79]

The above-mentioned proposition has been reiterated by the Court in the case noted below.[80] Art. 19(1)(c) does not extend to, or embrace within it, the objects or purposes or the activities of an association. In other words, Art. 19(1)(c) does not carry with it a further guarantee that the objects or purposes or activities of an association so formed shall not be interfered with by law except on grounds as mentioned in Art. 19(4). In the instant case, the State Government took over an educational institution run by a society. The Court ruled that Art. 19(1)(c) had not been violated since the institute was taken over and the rights of the society remained unimpaired and uninterfered. It may be that the Institute was the only activity of the society but the Court is concerned with the right of the society to form association. So long as there is no interference with the society, its constitution or composition, merely because of the taking over or acquisition of the Institute, which was the only property or activity of the society, the Fundamental Right of the society to form association is not infringed.

The Court adopted a similar approach in Raghubar Dayal v. Union of India.[81] The Forward Contracts (Regulation) Act, 1952, authorises the Central Government to ban forward trading in any commodity by any one except by a recognised association. A recognised association could not amend its rules except with the previous approval of the Central Government. The government could also direct the association to make certain rules. These provisions were challenged as infringing Art. 19(1)(c) and not being germane to public order or morality were not warranted by Art. 19(4). It was argued that the freedom to form an association should also include ensuring effective functioning of an association so as to enable it to achieve its lawful objects. The argument in a nutshell was that if a law regulates the recognition of an association under certain conditions subject to which alone recognition could be accorded or continued such conditions would be invalid. Thus, the Court was called upon to consider the question whether the freedom of association implies or involves a guaranteed right of recognition. The contention in the instant case was that if the object of an association was lawful, no restriction could be placed upon it except in the interest of public order and that freedom to form an association carried with it the right to determine its internal arrangements also.

The Court rejected the argument. It ruled that Parliament has power to legislate for regulation of forward trading. It is voluntary, and not compulsory, for an association to seek recognition, and, therefore, conditions of recognition would not affect freedom to form associations. The Supreme Court thus refused to accept the theory that Art. 19(1)(c) also confers a Fundamental Right on an association to achieve each of its objectives for which it has been formed and that a law hampering the fulfilment of any of its objects, but not falling under Art.

---

79. All India Bank Employees' Ass. v. The National Industrial Tribunal, AIR 1962 SC 171 : (1962) 3 SCR 269.
Also, Radhey Shyam v. P.M.G., Nagpur, supra.

80. L.N. Mishra Institute of E.D. & Social Change v. State of Bihar, AIR 1988 SC 1136 : (1988) 2 SCC 433.

81. AIR 1962 SC 263 : (1962) 3 SCR 547.

19(4), would be unconstitutional. The freedom to associate does not involve freedom to pursue without restriction the objects of the association.[82] Thus, while the right to form association is fundamental, recognition of such an association is not a Fundamental Right and, thus, Parliament can by law regulate the working of such associations by imposing conditions and restrictions on such functions. There can be no objection to statutory interference with the composition or functioning of associations which are created, controlled and governed by statute. Legislative provisions can be validly made for eliminating qualifications for membership based on sex, religion, persuasion or mode of life. However, so long as there is no legislative intervention, it is not open to the Court or authorities purportedly acting under a statute to coin a theory that a particular approved bye-law of a registered cooperative society is not desirable and would be opposed to public policy as indicted by the Constitution. Hence a challenge to the Constitutional validity of a bye law of Zoroastrian Cooperative Society restricting its membership to Parsi community has been repelled.[83]

A Bombay Act provided that only a 'representative union', i.e. a union having at least 15 per cent of the total employees in an industry in a local area, could represent the entire body of workers in their relations with the employees. The Court held that the Act imposed no restriction on the right to form unions of textile workers; there was nothing to prevent other unions of other workers from forming a fresh union and enrolling a higher percentage so as to acquire the right of representation.[84]

In P. Balakotaiah v. Union of India,[85] certain railway employees who belonged to a Worker's Union sponsored by the Communists carried on agitation for a general strike in order to paralyse communications and movement of essential supplies. They were chargesheeted and their services were terminated. The action was taken against the employees not because they were Communists but because they were engaging themselves in subversive activities. The appellants, however, submitted that their dismissal from service for being communists and trade unionists amounted in substance to a denial to them of the freedom to form association. The Supreme Court rejected the plea saying that the impugned order did not prevent them from continuing to be communists or trade unionists. Their right in that regard remained as before. The appellants, no doubt, enjoyed a Fundamental Right to form associations under Art. 19(1)(c), but they had no Fundamental Right to remain in government service, and so when their services were terminated they could not complain of violation of any Fundamental Right.

In Devendrappa,[86] the Supreme Court has dissented from the Balakotaiah ruling entailing freedom v. service. The Court has now said that legitimate action discreetly and properly taken by a government servant with a sense of responsibility and at the proper level to remedy any malfunction in the organisation may

---

82. Also see, D.A.V. College v. State of Punjab, AIR 1971 SC 1737 : (1971) 2 SCC 269; Manohar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1984 Bom 47, 53.

83. Zoroastrian Coop. Housing Society Ltd. v. District Registrar, Coop. Societies (Urban), (2005) 5 SCC 632 : AIR 2005 SC 2306. Exclusionist associations based on sex or religion etc. in secular India, history and objects of cooperative movement, theory of "area of operation" of cooperative societies, discussed.

84. Raja Kulkarni v. State of Bombay, AIR 1954 SC 73 : 1954 SCR 384.

85. AIR 1958 SC 242.

86. M.H. Devendrappa v. Karnataka State Small Industries Development Corpn., AIR 1998 SC 1064 : (1998) 3 SCC 732; supra.

not be barred. A person who legitimately seeks to exercise his rights under Art. 19 cannot be told that you are free to exercise the rights, but the consequences will be so serious and so damaging, that you will not, in effect, be able to exercise your freedom. This means that the Balakotaiah approach saying that a government servant is free to exercise his freedom under Art. 19(1)(a) or (b), but at the cost of his service, clearly amounts to deprivation of freedom of speech. Therefore, what the Court has to consider is the reasonableness of service rules which curtail certain kinds of activities amongst government servants in the interests of efficiency and discipline in order that they may discharge their public duties as government servants in a proper manner without undermining the prestige or efficiency of the organisation. If the rules are directly and primarily meant for this purpose, "they being in furtherance of Art. 19(1)(g)",[87] can be upheld although they may indirectly impinge upon some other limbs of Art. 19 qua an individual employee. Courts ensure that such impingement is minimal and rules are made in public interest and for proper discharge of public interest. "A proper balancing of interests of an individual as a citizen and the right of the state to frame a code of conduct for its employees in the interest of proper functioning of the state, is required".

Thus, Devendrappa reduces somewhat the harshness of the Balakotaiah ruling. Balakotaiah seemed to suggest that a government servant cannot exercise any freedom under Art. 19 and he can enjoy his freedom only if he gives up government service. But Devendrappa ruling permits some space to a government servant to enjoy his freedoms subject to proper functioning of the state. A balance has to be drawn between the interests of a government servant as a citizen and the interests of the state as an employer in promoting the efficiency of public service.

The Hindi Sahitya Sammelan is a society registered under the Societies Registration Act. Because of differences among its management, some litigation started. Parliament intervened by enacting a law creating a statutory body to take over the assets of the old society. All members of the old society were to be members of the new body with some new members added by law without the volition of the original members. The Supreme Court declared the law bad mainly on the ground that it interfered with the composition of the society itself; it interfered with the right of association of the pre-existing members of the old society insofar as new members were added without their consent, and also enrolment of new members was not at the choice of the original members. Imposing new members on the old members against their wishes clearly interfered with their right to continue to function as members of the society which was voluntarily formed by the original founders. "The right to form an association" "necessarily implies that the persons forming the association, have also the right to continue to be associated with only those whom they voluntarily admit in the association. Any law by which members are introduced in the voluntary association without any option being given to the members to keep them out, or any law which takes away the membership of those who have voluntarily joined it, will be a law violating the right to form an association."

Even a very liberal interpretation of Article 19(1) (c) cannot lead to the conclusion that the trade unions have a guaranteed right to an effective collective bargaining or to strike, either as part of collective bargaining or otherwise. The right to strike or the right to declare a lockout may be controlled or restricted by appropriate industrial legislation.[88]

87. See, infra, Sec. I.

This means that any law compulsorily altering the composition of the association amounts to a breach of the right to form the association because it violates the composite right of forming an association and the right to continue it as the original members desired it. The right to form association is not restricted only to the initial stage of forming an association. It also protects the right to continue the association with its own composition as voluntarily agreed upon by the persons forming the association. Otherwise, the right under Art. 19(1)(c) would be meaningless because, as soon as an association is formed, a law may be passed interfering with its composition, so that the association formed may not be able to function at all. The right can be effective only if it is held to include within it the right to continue the association with its composition as voluntarily agreed upon by the persons forming the association. The law in question did not merely regulate the affairs of the society; it altered its composition. Any law altering the composition of the association compulsorily will be a breach of the right to form the association of the original members guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(c). Such a law is not protected under Art. 19(4).[89]

(b) THE UNLAWFUL ACTIVITIES (PREVENTION) ACT, 1967

The Act authorises the Central Government to declare by notification in official gazette an association as unlawful on certain grounds mentioned in S. 2(f) of the Act. To keep control over the government power, provision has been made for appointment of a tribunal consisting of a sitting High Court Judge. A notification declaring an association unlawful is not to be effective until it is confirmed by the tribunal. The tribunal is to decide whether or not there is sufficient cause for declaring the association as unlawful. Undoubtedly, the mechanism of a tribunal is incorporated into the law as a consequence of what the Supreme Court had stated earlier in Row.[90]

In the wake of demolition of the Babri Mosque at Ayodhya, the Government of India issued notifications under the Act on December 10, 1992, declaring the following bodies as unlawful for two years: Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP); Rashtriya Swayam Sevak Sangh (RSS); Bajrang Dal; Islamik Sevak Sangh and Jamaat-e-Islami Hind. The tribunal appointed under the Act upheld the ban against the VHP, but quashed the same against RSS and Bajrang Dal. The ban against the Jammat-e-Islami was upheld by the tribunal, but, on appeal, from the tribunal decision, the Supreme Court quashed the order on the ground that "there was no objective determination of the factual basis for the notification to amount to adjudication by the tribunal, contemplated by the Act.[91]

---

88. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.

89. Damyanti Naranga v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 966 : (1971) 1 SCC 678.
Also see, Asom Rastrabhasa Prachar Samiti v. State of Assam, AIR 1989 SC 2126 : (1989) 4 SCC 496; Mani Ram v. State of Haryana, AIR 1996 P&H 92.

90. State of Madras v. V.G. Row, supra, footnote 74.

91. Jamaat-e-Islami Hind v. Union of India, (1995) SCC 428; see also Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295; JAIN, CASES ON INDIAN ADM. LAW., Ch. XVI, Sec. D(iii).
Also see, Rajendra Prasad Agarwal v. Union of India, AIR 1993 All 258.

The ban against the VHP came to an end on December 9, 1994. Again, on January 14, 1995, the Government of India declared VHP as unlawful. This ban was negatived by the tribunal. It ruled that the notification had been issued on "extraneous considerations" and so it was vitiated. The tribunal ruled that the notification had been for "collateral purposes and not for the purpose of maintaining peace and tranquillity in society", and that the Government had "taken into account matters which it ought not to have taken into consideration".

(c) RIGHT NOT TO FORM ASSOCIATION

A question not yet free from doubt is whether the Fundamental Right to form association also envisages the right to refuse to form an association. In Tikaramji v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[1] the Supreme Court observed that assuming that the right to form an association "implies a right not to form an association, it does not follow that the negative right must also be regarded as a Fundamental Right". It has been already seen that while the constitution guarantees a right to form an association or unions the association or union cannot claim as a further Fundamental Right to achieve the particular purpose for which such association has been established and that such a right even if concomitant to the Fundamental Right is not a Fundamental Right in itself unless the same is justified Article 19(4).[2]

A co-operative society of canegrowers was formed to supply sugarcane to the sugar mills. The membership of the co-operative was voluntary. The canegrowers were free to join or not to join the society. The members were free to resign their membership except when indebted to the society. The Court held that the society did not fall foul of Art. 19(1)(c).

A High Court has held that the right to form an association necessarily implies that a person is free to refuse to be a member of an association if he so desires, and, therefore, a rule making it compulsory for every teacher to become a member of a government sponsored association at the risk of suffering disciplinary action in case a teacher absents from two consecutive meetings infringes Art. 19(1)(c).[3]

(d) GOVERNMENT SERVANTS

The Fundamental Right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(c) can be claimed by government servants as well. A government servant may not lose his right under Art. 19(1)(c) by joining government service. But the right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(c) to form association does not involve a guaranteed right to recognition thereof as well.

In Delhi Police Non-Gazetted Karmchari Sangh v. Union of India,[4] the Supreme Court has upheld the validity of the Police Forces (Restriction of Rights) Act, 1966, which imposes certain restrictions on the enjoyment of Fundamental Rights on members of the police force. The Act has been enacted under Art. 33 but it is also valid under Art. 19(4).

---

1. AIR 1956 SC 676 : 1956 SCR 393.
2. See also Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.
3. Sitharamachary v. Deputy Inspector of Schools, AIR 1958 AP 78.
Also see on Art. 19(1)(c), S.N. DWIVEDI, Right to Group-Life under the Constitution—Its Nature & Scope, 12 JILI 237 (1970).
4. AIR 1987 SC 379 : (1987) 1 SCC 115.

A rule compelling a member of the police force to withdraw his membership of an association as soon as recognition accorded to it is withdrawn, or if, no recognition is granted to it, would be protected by Art. 33. [5] It is also protected by Art. 19(4), as it is a reasonable restriction on the right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(c) in the interest of discipline and public order.

(e) MORALITY

The term 'morality' in Art. 19(4) is to be given a broad connotation as meaning not merely 'sexual morality' but 'public morality' as well in the wider sense as understood by the people as a whole.[6]

G. FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT AND RESIDENCE: ARTS. 19(1)(d), (19)(1)(e) AND 19(5)

(a) ARTICLE 19(1)(D)

Article 19(1)(d) guarantees to every citizen the right to move freely throughout the territory of India. Art. 19(1)(e) guarantees to a citizen the right to reside and settle in any part of India. According to Art. 19(5), however, the State may impose reasonable restrictions on these rights by law in the interests of general public or for the protection of the interests of any Scheduled Tribe.

These constitutional provisions guarantee to the Indian citizens the right to go or to reside wherever they like within the Indian territory. A citizen can move freely from one State to another, or from one place to another within a State. These rights underline the concept that India is one unit so far as the citizens are concerned.

The rights of movement [Art. 19(1)(d)] and residence [Art. 19(1)(e)] go together in most cases for when a person is asked to quit a particular place, both these rights are simultaneously affected. Therefore, most of the cases fall both under Arts. 19(1)(d) and (e) simultaneously, and more or less the same principles are followed in the matter of restrictions on any of these two rights, and hence these are being discussed together.

(b) FOREIGNERS

Article 19(1)(e) applies only to the citizens and not to foreigners. Accordingly, the Fundamental Right of a foreigner is confined to Art. 21 guaranteeing his life and liberty.[7] He cannot claim the right to reside and settle in the country as guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(e). The Government of India thus has power to expel foreigners from India.[8]

(c) RESTRICTING MOVEMENT TO MAINTAIN PUBLIC ORDER

The Punjab Akalis threatened to hold a demonstration in Delhi on the occasion of the inauguration of Asian games. To frustrate such demonstration, the Governments of Haryana and Uttar Pradesh took stringent measures, such as, barri-

---

5. For Art. 33, see, infra, XXXIII, Sec. E.
6. Manohar v. State of Maharashtra, supra; Brijgopal Denga v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1979 M.P. 173.
7. See, infra, Ch. XXVI.
8. Louis De Raedt, see, supra, Ch. XVIII.

cading highways, resorting to seizure and arrests, intercepting movement of Akalis across the border on to Delhi.

These steps were challenged through a writ petition in the Supreme Court. The Court laid down some general norms as to how the police should behave in such a situation. The police is entitled to impose reasonable restraints on the physical movement of the members of the public in order to protect public property and avoid needless inconvenience to other citizens in their lawful pursuits. But all such restraints on personal liberty have to be commensurate with the object which furnishes their justification. These should be minimal and ought not to exceed the constraints of the particular situation, either in nature or in duration. Above all, these cannot be used as engines of oppression, persecution and harassment. The sanctity of person and privacy has to be maintained at all costs and ought not to be violated in the name of maintenance of law and order. The rule of law requires that no one is to be subjected to harsh, uncivilised or discriminatory treatment even when the objective is the securing of the paramount exigencies of law and order.[9]

(d) WEARING HELMETS

A rule was made under the Motor Vehicles Act requiring compulsory wearing of helmet by a person driving a scooter or a motor cycle. The rule was challenged as infringing the free movement of the driver of a two wheeler guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(d), but the Court refused to accept the argument. The Court maintained that the rule has been framed for the benefit and welfare of, and safe journey by, a person driving a two wheeler vehicle. The rule is made to prevent accidents not to curtail freedom of movement. Even if it be assumed that the rule does put some restriction on the freedom of movement, it is justifiable under Art. 19(5) as a reasonable restriction in the interest of the general public.[10]

(e) EXTERNMENT

Articles 19(1)(d) and 19(1)(e) have been invoked frequently to challenge the validity of an externment order served by the executive on a citizen requiring him to leave a State or a district. Such an order prima facie curtails the freedoms guaranteed by these Articles, and, therefore, the Courts are entitled to test whether the order, and the law under which it has been made, are reasonable within Art. 19(5).

An externment order was challenged on the ground that it was not a reasoned order. The Supreme Court rejected the challenge pointing out that there is a certain brand of lawless elements in society whom it is impossible to bring to book by established methods of judicial trial because the legal evidence essential for conviction is impossible to obtain. For fear of reprisals, witnesses are unwilling to depose in public against such characters. So, in the externment order against such a person, and in the disposal of appeal against that order, the concerned authority is not bound to give reasons or to write a reasoned order. The externee is only entitled to be informed of the general nature of the material allegations.[11]

---

9. Rupinder Singh Sodhi v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 65 : (1983) 1 SCC 140.
10. Ajay Canu v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 2027 : (1988) 4 SCC 156.
11. State of Maharashtra v. Saleem Hasan Khan, AIR 1989 SC 1304 : (1989) 2 SCC 316.

The district magistrate of Delhi, empowered by the East Punjab Safety Act, 1949, served an externment order on Khare asking him to immediately remove himself from Delhi and not to return there for three months.

The Act in question empowered the State Government, or the district magistrate, to make an order of externment on being satisfied that such an order was necessary to prevent a person from acting in any manner prejudicial to public safety or maintenance of public order. The satisfaction was 'final' and not open to judicial review. A district magistrate's order could not remain in force for more than three months while that of the government could last for an indefinite period.

In Khare,[12] the Supreme Court held the above-mentioned provision valid pointing out the several safeguards subject to which the executive could pass an order of externment, e.g., the district magistrate could not extern a person from his district, and the government could not extern a person from the State and this was a great safeguard; the grounds on which an externment order was made had to be communicated to the externee by the authority making the order, and if the order was to remain in force for more than three months, he had a right to make a representation which was to be referred to an advisory board constituted under the Act. It may be noted however that the opinion of the board was only of a recommendatory nature and not binding on the government.

Under the Bombay Police Act, the Commissioner of Police could direct a person to remove himself from Greater Bombay for a period up to two years if—(i) the Commissioner was satisfied that his acts were calculated to cause alarm or danger to person or property, or that he was about to commit an offence involving violence or force; and (ii) in his opinion, witnesses were not forthcoming to testify against him in public.

The person concerned had some procedural safeguards: he was to have in writing the main allegations against him: he was to have an opportunity to explain the allegations; he could appear through a lawyer and produce witnesses to clear his character. He could appeal to the State Government against the externment order and could resort to a Court on certain grounds.

The Supreme Court held in Hari[13] that the law was valid vis-à-vis Art. 19(5) as the restrictions had been imposed to protect the public from dangerous and bad characters; there were many safeguards, and the maximum time-limit for an externment order could only be two years.[5]

An argument was taken against the validity of the law that there was no advisory board to scrutinize the material on which the authority took action against the person concerned. The Supreme Court rejected the argument with the remark that there was no universal rule that the absence of an advisory board would necessarily make such legislation unconstitutional. Another argument advanced against the validity of the law was that the case against the externee was initiated by the police and it was the police itself who was the judge in the case. The Court

---

12. N.B. Khare v. Delhi, AIR 1950 SC 211 : 1950 SCR 519.

13. Hari v. Dy. Commr. of Police, AIR 1959 SC 559 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 769.
Also, Bhagubhai v. District Magistrate, AIR 1956 SC 585 : 1956 SCR 533; Gurbachan v. State of Bombay, AIR 1952 SC 221 : 1952 SCR 737; JAIN, CASES ON ADM. LAW, Ch. XV, Sec. D(iv); R. DEB, Operation of Special Laws relating to Externment of Bad Characters, 11 JILI, 1 (1969).

rejected the contention arguing that whereas the case could be initiated by an inspector of police, the order of externment could be made only by the Commissioner of Police. A safeguard available in the law was that an appeal against the order lay to the State Government and a reference could be made to the Courts on some points.

A State law authorised the district magistrate to require a person to live, or not to live, at a particular place, or to notify his movements, in the interests of security of the State or public order. Although there were adequate procedural safeguards, nevertheless, the Supreme Court declared the law unreasonable mainly on the ground that it required a person to reside at any place, without giving him a hearing before selecting a place for him. A place could be selected for him where he might not have any residential accommodation or means of subsistence. There was no provision for providing him with residence or means of livelihood in the place selected for him for his residence.[14]

Another law authorised the district magistrate, in an area declared by the State Government as disturbed, to direct a 'goonda' not to remain within, or enter into, a specified part of the district, if he was satisfied that his presence was prejudicial to the interests of the general public. Adequate procedural safeguards were provided but the Supreme Court declared the Act invalid on the ground inter alia that the definition of a 'goonda' afforded no assistance to deciding who fell in that category. 'Goonda' had been defined as meaning a hooligan, rouge or a vagabond and included a person who was dangerous to public peace or tranquillity. This was an inclusive definition; it did not indicate any tests to be applied to decide whether a person fell in the first part of the definition, and it was left to the unguided discretion of the magistrate to treat any citizen as a goonda which was hardly proper.[15] The Court insisted that the Act must have clearly indicated when and under what circumstances a person could be called a 'goonda'.

In Prem Chand v. Union of India,[16] the Court has adopted a very strict approach on the question of externment. The Court has characterised exterment of a person as "economic harakari and psychic distress". The Court has emphasized that externment provisions have to be read strictly and that any "police apprehension is not enough. Some ground or other is not adequate. There must be a clear and present danger based upon creditable material which makes the movements and acts of the person in question alarming or dangerous or fraught with violence". Natural justice must be fairly complied with.

In the instant case, the Supreme Court quashed the externment proceedings by the police against the petitioner (under the Delhi Police Act, 1978) on the ground of misuse of power and laid down the following guidelines for the use of such a power: [17]

> "There must be a clear and present danger based upon credible material which makes the movements and acts of the person in question alarming or dangerous or fraught with violence. Likewise, there must be sufficient reason to believe that the person proceeded against is so desperate and dangerous that

---

14. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bharat Singh, AIR 1967 SC 1170 : (1967) 2 SCR 454.
15. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Baldeo Prasad, AIR 1961 SC 293 : (1961) 1 SCR 970; JAIN, CASES III, 1834-1838.
16. AIR 1981 SC 613 : (1981) 1 SCC 639.
17. Ibid., at 616.

> his mere presence in Delhi or any part thereof is hazardous to its community and its safety.... Natural justice must be fairly complied with and vague allegations and secret hearings are gross violations of Articles 14, 19 and 21 of the Constitution..."

It will be appreciated that the Court has shown a tougher attitude in this case than in the Bombay case mentioned above. In the instant case, the restriction could be imposed only in a disturbed area and only on a 'goonda'. There were no such restrictions in the Bombay Act under which any person could be externed and this was much broader than the term 'goonda' howsoever vaguely it might have been defined. The discretion conferred in the Bombay Act was, therefore, much broader than in the instant case but still while the Bombay Act had been held valid, the Act in the instant case was declared invalid.

The above cases appear to establish the proposition that a person can be externed from a local area on the grounds mentioned in Art. 19(5). The power to make such an order may be left to the subjective satisfaction of an administrative officer, subject to some substantive and procedural safeguards. The grounds served on an externee should not be vague, indefinite or incomplete and they should have a direct bearing on the purposes for which an externment order can be made under the relevant law. The externee should be given an opportunity to make a representation or of being heard against the order of externment. This appears to be the minimal procedural safeguard which should be given to the externee.[18]

(f) DEPORTATION

Article 19(1)(e) has also been used to challenge deportation of Indian citizens out of the country and, in this area, the Supreme Court has limited the powers of the executive a great deal. This judicial approach is illustrated by the following cases.

When the residence visa permit of a person who entered India on the basis of a valid permit was cancelled, the Supreme Court held that having regard to the fact that he has entered the country legally, the competent authority must inform him of the reasons for his proposed deportation. The reasons must be sufficient to enable the petitioner to make effective representation and only after considering the representation, the competent authority may pass an appropriate order. The Court however observed that the procedure may be departed from for compelling reasons.[19]

A Central law authorised the Central Government to direct the removal from India of any person against whom a reasonable suspicion existed of having entered India without a permit, or on an invalid permit, or committing a breach of a condition of the permit. The Supreme Court held the provision invalid in its relation to the Indian citizens. While an Indian citizen guilty of serious prejudicial acts like espionage or disloyalty to his country, may render himself liable to the gravest penalty, it would be repugnant to all notions of democracy, and inconsistent with his Fundamental Rights, to expel him from the country for any other reason. This amounts to destroying his citizenship which could be done only by taking recourse to Art. 11.[20]

---

18. Raja Sukhnandan v. State of U.P., AIR 1972 All. 498.
19. Hasan Ali Raihani v. Union of India, (2006) 3 SCC 705 : AIR 2006 SC 1714.
20. Supra, Ch. XVIII.

Further, a person could be externed when the government entertained a reasonable suspicion that an offence had been committed under the Act. Thus, the question whether an offence had been committed or not was left entirely to the 'arbitrary and unrestrained discretion' of the government. A person could thus be removed merely on suspicion without giving him a reasonable opportunity to clear his conduct and this was nothing short of a travesty of the right of citizenship. A forfeiture of citizenship on suspicion of committing a breach of permit regulations could hardly be regarded as a reasonable restriction on the Fundamental Right to reside and settle in the country.[21]

According to a Passport rule, no person could enter India without a valid passport. An Indian citizen entered the country without a passport and he was fined for committing the offence. Holding the rule valid, the Supreme Court stated that it is a proper restriction upon entry of an Indian citizen returning from a foreign country to require him to produce a passport.[22] But it will be a different matter to say that if he enters India without a passport he may be deported from India. Such an order will be bad under the Ebrahim Vazir ruling.

(g) POLICE SURVEILLANCE

Since the pre-independence days, there have been in operation in some of the States, some police regulations providing for police surveillance of activities of persons suspected of criminal habits or tendencies. This includes secret picketing of the house, domiciliary visits at nights, and shadowing the movements of the suspect. The purpose of police surveillance is prevention of commission of crimes by such persons.

The validity of such regulations with reference to Art. 19(1)(d) was first considered by the Supreme Court in Kharak Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh.[23] The Court ruled by a majority that no aspect of police surveillance fell within the scope of Art. 19(1)(d). The purpose of secret picketing was only to identify the visitors to the suspect so that police might have some idea of his activities and this did not affect his right of movement in any material form. Against the validity of shadowing of the suspect's movements, it was argued that if a person suspected that his movements were being watched by the police, it would induce in him a psychological inhibition against movement and this would infringe Art. 19(1)(d) which should be interpreted as postulating freedom not only from physical, but even psychological, restraints on a person's movement. Rejecting this argument which advocated too broad a view of the scope of the safeguard guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(d), the Court ruled that Art. 19(1)(d) guarantees freedom from physical, direct and tangible restraints; it has no reference to 'mere personal sensitiveness', or 'the imponderable effect on the mind of a person which might guide his action in the matter of his movement or locomotion'.

On the same view, domiciliary visits were also held to fall outside the scope of Art. 19(1)(d) as a knock at the door, or rousing a man from his sleep, does not impede or prejudice his locomotion in any manner.

---

21. Ebrahim Vazir v. State of Bombay, AIR 1954 SC 229 : 1954 SCR 933. For further discussion on this case see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, 800-801.
22. Abdul Rahim v. State of Bombay, AIR 1959 SC 1315 : (1960) 1 SCR 285.
23. AIR 1963 SC 1295 : (1964) 1 SCR 332.

The minority view, on the other hand, was that all acts of surveillance result in a close observation of a suspect's movements which infringes Art. 19(1)(d). If a man is shadowed, his movements are constricted. "He can move physically, but it can only be a movement of an automation."

Needless to say, in Kharak Singh, the majority took too restrictive a view of Art. 19(1)(d) and that the minority view contained a lot of truth. The flaw in the majority view was that if there was no physical restraint on a person's movements, then the reasonableness of police surveillance could not be scrutinised vis-à-vis Art. 19(1)(d). This flaw has now been removed by the Supreme Court by its pronouncement in Govind v. State of Madhya Pradesh.[24] The Court has now held that police surveillance will have to be restricted to such persons only against whom reasonable materials exist to induce the opinion that they show 'a determination to lead a life of crime'—'crime in this context being confined to such as involve public peace or security only and if they are dangerous to security risks.' Similarly domiciliary visits and secret picketing by the police should be restricted to clearest cases of danger to community security and should not be resorted to as routine follow-up at the end of a conviction or release from prison or at the whim of a police officer. The Court administered a warning that these old regulations 'ill-accord with the essence of personal freedom,' verge 'perilously near unconstitutionality' and, therefore, need to be revised.

The Supreme Court has reiterated in Malak Singh v. State of Punjab[25] that police can maintain discreet surveillance over reputed bad characters, habitual offenders and other potential offenders in order to maintain public peace and prevent commission of offences. However, intrusive surveillance seriously encroaching on a citizen's privacy is not permissible under Arts. 19(1)(d) and 21.

(h) RIGHT TO PRIVACY

An interesting question considered by the Court in these cases is whether there is in India a fundamental Right to privacy.

In the Kharak Singh case, [26] the Supreme Court ruled definitively that the 'right to privacy' was not a guaranteed right in India. But in Govind,[27] the Court appears to have accepted a limited Fundamental Right to privacy 'as an emanation' from Arts. 19(1)(a), (d) and 21.

The right to privacy is not, however, absolute, and reasonable restrictions can be placed thereon in public interest under Art. 19(5). The impugned police regulations were characterised as making 'drastic inroads directly into the privacy' and 'indirectly into the Fundamental Rights,' of the suspect and, therefore, they were given a restrictive operation as stated above.

A further discussion is held on the right to privacy later under Art. 21.[28]

(i) ADMINISTRATIVE DISCRETION

A review of the cases concerning Arts. 19(1)(c), (d) and (e) will reveal that there appears to be a difference in judicial attitude towards the permissible limits

---

24. AIR 1975 SC 1378 : (1975) 2 SCC 148.
25. AIR 1981 SC 760 : (1981) 1 SCC 420.
26. Supra, footnote 23.
27. Supra, footnote 24.
28. Infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(i) .

of administrative discretion to curtail the Fundamental Rights of 'association', 'movement' or 'residence'. The right of association is better protected for the administrative authority cannot be empowered to restrict the right finally in its discretion; some kind of judicial scrutiny should be provided for.[29] In other cases, judicial review may not be necessary over administrative discretion.

It is also interesting to note the variable judicial attitude to the adequacy of an advisory board (provided for in preventive detention cases),[30] as a control mechanism over administrative discretion. In case of right of association, the Supreme Court has said that since there is an advisory board in preventive detention cases, it does not mean that it will be sufficient in cases of restraint on the right of association as well. On the other hand, in cases of restraint on the right of 'movement or residence', the Court has stated that advisory board is not necessary in such cases just because there is one in preventive detention cases. The dichotomy in judicial attitude may be because of the realisation that in a democracy right of 'association' should be protected effectively as that is the basis of organisation of political parties.

H. RIGHT TO PROPERTY: ARTICLES 19(1)(F) AND 19(5)

Article 19(1)(f) guaranteed to the Indian citizens a right to acquire, hold and dispose of property. Art. 19(5), however, permitted the state to impose by law reasonable restrictions on this right in the interests of the general public or for the protection of the interests of any Scheduled Tribe. Arts. 19(1)(f) and 19(5) have been repealed by the Constitution (Forty-fourth Amendment) Act, 1979.[31]

Some aspects of Art. 19(1)(f) have been discussed later under the Right to Property.[32]

I. FREEDOM TO CARRY ON TRADE AND COMMERCE: ARTS. 19(1)(g) AND 19(6)

(a) ARTICLE 19(1)(G)

Article 19(1)(g) guarantees to all citizens the right to practise any profession, or to carry on any occupation, trade or business. Under Art. 19(6), however, the state is not prevented from making a law imposing, in the interests of the general public, reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the above right. Nor is the state prevented from making—

(i) a law relating to professional or technical qualifications necessary for practising a profession or carrying on any occupation, trade or business; or

(ii) a law relating to the carrying on by the state, or by corporation owned or controlled by it, of any trade, business, industry or service, whether to the exclusion, complete or partial, of citizens or otherwise.

For long India has believed in a regulated and planned economy and not in a laissez faire economy. A number of constitutional provisions made under the title

---

29. Supra, Sec. F.
30. Infra, Ch. XXVII, Sec. B.
31. See, Chs. XXXI, Sec. B, and XLII, infra.
32. Infra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. B.

of "Directive Principles of State Policy" bear testimony to this economic philosophy.[33] 'Reasonable restrictions' on trade, commerce or business have to be assessed keeping this factor in mind. Consequently, the right to carry on trade is very much regulated in India and the Courts have upheld, in course of time, a good deal of social control over private enterprise.[34] By and large it is correct to say that despite Art. 19(1)(g), the government enjoys power to regulate and order the economy in any way it pleases.

In 1978, by the 44th Amendment of the Constitution, the word 'socialist' has been introduced in the Preamble to the Constitution characterising India as 'sovereign socialist secular democratic Republic'.[35] Does the addition of the word 'socialist' mean that the Courts should sanction a more rigorous social control of trade and commerce? Should the Courts lean more and more in favour of nationalisation and state ownership of industries? Should the concept of socialism and social justice be pushed to such an extreme as to ignore entirely the interests of private enterprise?

The Supreme Court sought to answer these questions in Excel Wear v. Union of India.[36] The Court emphasized that while there may be greater emphasis on nationalisation and state ownership of industries, private ownership of industries is recognised; private enterprise forms an overwhelmingly large proportion of India's economic structure. Limited companies having shareholders own a large number of industries. There are creditors and depositors and various other persons having dealings with the undertakings. Socialism cannot go to the extent of ignoring the interests of all such persons. A private sector undertaking differs from a public sector undertaking. When the latter closes down, it can protect the labour even at the cost of the public exchequer. But a private undertaking is run for return to the owner not only to meet his livelihood or expenses but also for the formation of capital for growth of the national economy. The Court has posed the question: Does it stand to reason that by rigorous restrictions all these interests should be completely or substantially ignored? The Court has said: "The questions posed are suggestive of the answers."[37] In the application of the Fundamental Right to carry on business, the Court has permitted the invoking of the principle of "level playing field", subject however, to the doctrine of public interest. The Court has taken note of the fact that "level playing field" is an important factor to be kept in mind and this factor is embodied in Article 19(1)(g) of the Constitution.[38]

For some time now the trend has been undergoing a change. Instead of nationalisation, the trend has shifted to privatisation. Instead of government control over trade and commerce, the emphasis now is to relax government control. The government has come to view its role more as a facilitator, rather than as a controller, of private enterprise. From the case law, one can see that, hitherto, the

---

33. See, infra, Ch. XXXIV.

34. See, M.P. JAIN, ADMINISTRATIVE PROCESS UNDER THE ESSENTIAL COMMODITIES ACT, 1955 (ILI, 1964); M.P. JAIN, COMMODITY CONTROL IN I.L.I., GOVERNMENT REGULATION OF PRIVATE ENTERPRISE 19-44 (1971); M.P. JAIN, A Survey of Laws Preventing Concentration of Economic Power in I.L.I., SOME PROBLEMS OF MONOPOLY AND COMPANY LAW, 43-62 (1972).

35. Supra, Ch. I; infra, Ch. XXXIV.

36. AIR 1979 SC at 36. Also see, infra.

37. For discussion on this aspect, also see, supra, Ch. I and, infra, Ch. XXXIV.

38. Reliance Energy Ltd. v. Maharashtra State Road Development Corpn. Ltd., (2007) 8 SCC 1 : (2007) 11 JT 1.

orientation of the Courts has been favourable to state control. One can visualise that the present-day liberal trend will manifest itself in the case-law arising in future.

Article 19(1)(g) uses four expressions, viz., profession, occupation, trade and business. Their fields may overlap but each of these expressions has a content of its own distinct from the others.

The Fundamental Right to establish educational institution as contained in Article 19(1) (g) of the Constitution of India would, however, be subject only to the reasonable restrictions which may be imposed by any law in terms of clause (6) thereof.[39]

(b) STATE MONOPOLY

Article 19(6)(ii) (see above) enables the state to make laws for creating state monoplies either partially or complete in respect of any trade or business or industry or service. The state may enter into any trade like any other person either for administrative reasons, or with the object of mitigating the evils in the trade, or even for the purpose of making profits in order to enrich the exchequer.

The law relating to such trading activities must be presumed to be reasonable and in the interest of general public. This was the view taken by the Supreme Court in Akadasi,[40] where the Court observed that the law relating to such state monopoly should be presumed to be reasonable and in the interest of general public within the scope of Art. 19(6)(ii). The state is not required to justify its trade monopoly as a 'reasonable' restriction and as being in the 'interests of the general public'.[41] It is presumed to be so. No objection can be taken under Art. 19(1)(g) if the state carries on a business either as a monopoly, complete or partial, to the exclusion of all or some citizens only, or in competition with any citizen.[42] Thus, the right of the citizens to carry on a trade has been subordinated to the right of the state to create a monopoly in its favour.[43]

Article 19(6)(ii) is a saving provision; its function is not to create a power, but to immunize the exercise of legislative power falling within its ambit from being attacked under Art. 19(1)(g).[44] Art. 19(6)(ii) does not envisage that a State can carry on a trade only under its own law and not under a law made by Parliament. Parliament has power to create trading monopolies in the States under entry 21 in the Concurrent List.[45]

Reference may also be made in this connection to Art. 298, according to which the Union and each State has power to carry on any trade or commerce.[46]

---

39. Modern School v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 583 : AIR 2004 SC 2236.
40. Akadasi Padhan v. State of Orissa, AIR 1963 SC 1047 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 691.
41. New Bihar Biri Leaves Co. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1981 SC 679 : (1981) 1 SCC 537; Utkal Contractors & Joinery (P.) Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1987 SC 2310 : 1987 Supp SCC 751.
42. P.T. Society v. R.T.A., AIR 1960 SC 801 : 1960 (3) SCR 177.
43. Ramchandra v. State of Orissa, AIR 1956 SC 298 : 1956 SCR 28; J.Y. Kondala Rao v. Andhra Pradesh Road Transport Corp., AIR 1961 SC 82 : (1961) 1 SCR 642.
44. H.C. Narayanappa v. State of Mysore, AIR 1960 SC 1073 : (1960) 3 SCR 742.
45. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
46. Ch. XII, Sec. C.

In Akadasi,[47] the Supreme Court upheld the validity of an Orissa Law conferring monopoly rights on the State in the matter of trade in kendu leaves. Nevertheless, the Court restricted the scope of the protection under Art. 19(6)(ii). The Court ruled that Art. 19(6)(ii) protects only those statutory provisions which are "basically and essentially" necessary for creating the State monopoly and not such provisions as are only 'subsidiary, incidental, or helpful' to the operation of the State monopoly. Such subsidiary provisions are not immunized by Art. 19(6)(ii) and they would have to satisfy the twin tests of 'reasonableness' and 'public interest' as laid down in Art. 19(6).

In Akadasi, the provisions dealing with the fixation of the price at which the kendu leaves were to be purchased from the growers were treated as incidental and, thus, held to be grossly unfair contravening the rights of the growers under Art. 19(1)(f). Thus, before a law can get immunity under Art. 19(6)(ii), the Court has to apply a kind of value judgment, separate the 'essential' monopolistic provisions from the 'non-essential', and test the validity of the latter under Art. 19(6) like that of any other ordinary law restricting trade and commerce.[48]

Further, under Art. 19(6)(ii), a State may create monopoly in its own favour but not in favour of third persons for their benefit.[49] The latter law has to fulfil the normal requirements of Art. 19(1)(g) read with Art. 19(6). When monopoly in kendu leaves was given to certain agents appointed by the State, but those persons were free from government control and the profit was theirs and not of the State, the Supreme Court held that those persons were not really agents of the concerned State within Art. 19(6)(ii).[50]

Reiterating this principle, the Supreme Court emphasized that the monopoly created by the State in favour of third parties is different from a monopoly created by the State in its own favour. "The profit resulting from the sale must be for public benefit and not for private gain." The test thus is whether the entire benefit arising from the monopoly enures to the State. Monopoly in a commodity may be valid if it is only for the benefit of the State. It should not serve the private interests of any one person or class of persons.[51] State monopoly ought not to be used as a cloak for conferring private benefit upon a limited class of persons.[52]

A government policy to purchase certain medicines for government hospitals from public sector manufacturers only was held not to amount to a monopoly. The policy does not prohibit other manufacturers from manufacturing and selling their products to other consumers. The government's requirement for drugs is very limited. There is a lot of public demand for drugs in the open market from other consumers. The Supreme Court has observed in this regard in the undernoted case:[53]

> "Monopoly as contemplated under Art. 19(6) of the Constitution is something to the total exclusion of others. Creation of a small captive market in fa-

---

47. Akadasi Padhan v. State of Orissa, AIR 1963 SC 1047 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 691.
Also, Rasbihari Panda v. State of Orissa, AIR 1969 SC 1081 : (1969) 1 SCC 414; New Bihar Biri Leaves Co. v. State of Bihar, supra, note 5.

48. Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 564 : (1970) 1 SCC 248; Vrajlal M. & Co. v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 129 : (1969) 2 SCC 248.

49. State of Rajasthan v. Mohanlal, AIR 1971 SC 2068 : (1971) 3 SCC 705.

50. Akadasi, supra, footnote 47.

51. New Bihar Biri Leaves, supra, footnote 41.

52. Rasbihari, supra, footnote 47.

53. Indian Drugs & Pharm. Ltd. v. Punjab Drugs Manufacturers Assn., AIR 1999 SC 1626 : (1999) 6 SCC 247.

> vour of a State-owned undertaking out of a larger market can hardly be treated as creation of monopoly as contemplated under Art. 19(6) of the Constitution, more so because this captive market consists only of State owned hospitals and dispensaries. Thus, on facts… there is no monopoly created by the impugned policy."

When prohibition is only with respect to the exercise of the right referable only in a particular area of activity or relating to particular matters, there is no total prohibition. Hence, when total prohibition is imposed on the slaughter of cow and her progeny the ban is total with regard to slaughter of one particular class of cattle and is not on total activity of butchers as they are left free to slaughter cattle other than those specified in impugned Act.[54]

Again where a municipality by its resolution prohibited the issue of certain receipts and passes to commission agents on behalf of owners of grain, but not restricting their entry into the market on legitimate business, it was held that the resolution merely prohibited employees of the municipality from issuing such receipts and passes but did not prevent them from carrying on business as an Adatya of a seller of grain which could be considered as a restriction but not a total prohibition.[55]

(c) TRADE: MEANING OF

The guarantee in Art. 19(1)(g) extends to practice any profession or to carry on any occupation, trade or business. Art. 19(1)(g) uses four different expressions so as to make the guarantee in Art. 19(1)(g) as comprehensive as possible and to include all avenues and modes through which a person earns his livelihood. Nevertheless, Art. 19(1)(g) protects only such activities which are of a commercial or a trading nature. Any activity not regarded as trade or business falls outside the purview of this protection. This means that the validity of a law regulating any such activity need not be decided upon by the yardstick of reasonableness and public interest as laid down in Art. 19(6). Thus, a judicial technique to promote rigorous government control of some activities is to refuse to characterise them as trading or commercial activities because of considerations of public morality, public interest, or their harmful and dangerous character.

Plying motor vehicles,[56] or rickshaws[57] on public pathways have been held to be trade and commerce.

(d) LIQUOR TRADE

The judicial opinion on the question whether liquor trade is trade or not for the purposes of Art. 19(1)(g) has taken time to stabilize.

An early as 1954, in Cooverji,[58] the Supreme Court ruled that no one has an inherent right to sell intoxicating liquors in retail sale. A citizen has no such privilege. As it is a business which is dangerous to the community, the State may

---

54. State of Gujarat v. Mirzapur Moti Kureshi Kassab Jamat, (2005) 8 SCC 534 : AIR 2006 SC 212.
55. Krishna Kumar v. Municipal Committee, (2005) 8 SCC 612.
56. Saghir Ahmad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 728 : (1955) SCR 707 ; Raman & Raman v. State of Madras, AIR 1959 SC 694 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 227.
57. Iqbal v. Municipal Board, AIR 1959 All. 186.
58. Cooverjee v. Excise Commissioner, Ajmer, AIR 1954 SC 220 : 1954 SCR 873.

entirely prohibit it or permit it under conditions. The manner and extent of regulation rest within the discretion of the State.

Again, in Krishan Kumar v. State of Jammu & Kashmir,[59] the Supreme Court refused to countenance the argument that dealing in noxious and dangerous goods like liquor was dangerous to the community and subversive of its morals and, therefore, was not trade. The Court stated that the acceptance of such a broad argument "involves the position that the meaning of the expression 'trade or business' depends upon, and varies with, the general acceptance of the standards of morality obtaining at a particular point of time in our country". The Court was of the view that while standards of morality could afford guidance to impose restrictions, they could not limit the scope of the right. The morality or illegality or otherwise of a deal would not affect the quality or character of the activity though it might be a ground for imposing a restriction on the activity.

However, the judicial view underwent a fundamental change in course of time. In Nashirwar v. State of Madhya Pradesh,[60] the Supreme Court held that there was no Fundamental Right to carry on trade in liquor because of the reasons of public morality, public interest and harmful and dangerous character of liquor. The Court ruled that "there is the police power of the state to enforce public morality to prohibit trades in noxious or dangerous goods". Reference was also made to Art. 47 a Directive Principle, in support of this view.[61]

In Har Shankar,[62] after reviewing the previous case-law, the Court observed: "There is no Fundamental Right to do trade or business in intoxicants. The state under its regulatory powers, has the right to prohibit absolutely every form of activity in relation to intoxicants—its manufacture, storage, export, import, sale and possession."

Again, in Khoday Distilleries,[63] the Court observed that a citizen has no Fundamental Right to trade or business in intoxicating liquors and that trade or business in such liquors can be completely prohibited. Because of its pernicious and vicious nature, dealing in intoxicating liquors is considered to be res extra commercium. The state can create a monopoly either in itself or in an agency created by it for manufacture, possession, sale and distribution of liquor as a beverage. The state can impose restrictions, limitations and even prohibition on intoxicating liquors.[64]

Alternatively the Court has argued in McDowell,[65] that even if it were to be argued that trade in intoxicating liquors falls within the scope of Art. 19(1)(g), the State could still impose severe restrictions, or even prohibition, on the trade in intoxicating liquors. Art. 47 expressly speaks of the obligation of the state to endeavour to bring about prohibition of the consumption of intoxicating liquors. Therefore, imposing prohibition is to achieve the directive principle adumbrated in Art. 47. Such a course merits to be treated as a reasonable restric-

---

59. AIR 1967 SC 1368 : (1967) 3 SCR 50.
60. AIR 1975 SC 360 : (1975) 1 SCC 29.
61. Infra, Ch. XXXIV.
62. Har Shankar v. Dy. E.T. Commr., AIR 1975 SC 1121 : (1975) 1 SCC 737.
63. Khoday Distilleries v. State of Karnataka, (1995) 1 SCC 574 : (1994) 6 JT 588.
64. Ugar Sugar Works Ltd. v. Delhi Administration, AIR 2001 SC 1447, 1452 : (2001) 3 SCC 635.
65. State of Andhra Pradesh v. Mcdowell & Co., AIR 1996 SC 1627 : (1996) 3 SCC 709.

tion within the meaning of Art. 19(6). Thus, whichever line of thought one adopts, an Act imposing prohibition on manufacture, production, consumption and sale of intoxicating drinks is valid.

Liquor trade may thus be subjected to rigorous control. Restrictions which may not be lawful in case of other trades may be permissible as regards the liquor trade. Even prohibition of the liquor trade may be regarded permissible and lawful. The state has complete right of controlling any aspect of the liquor trade. The state has exclusive right to manufacture and sell liquor. The state can sell its right to raise revenue, and the consideration charged by the state for this purpose is neither tax not fee but is like rental.[66] The state can sell its right by public auction or private negotiation. Whatever has been said here in relation to liquor trade applies with equal force to trade in all intoxicants and nauseous drinks.[67]

A caveat may, however, be added here. Although, regulation of liquor trade may fall outside Art. 19(1)(g), Art. 14 can still be invoked if a restriction imposed on liquor trade is found to be arbitrary, irrational or unreasonable.[68]

(e) BETTING AND GAMBLING

The Supreme Court has refused to characterise many other activities as trade for purposes of Art. 19(1)(g). Prize chits serve no social purpose but are prejudicial to public interests as they exploit the poor people and so these can be totally banned.[69] Betting and gambling have been held to be not trade and so fall outside the purview of Art. 19(1)(g), as gambling activities from their very nature and in essence "are extra commercium although the external forms, formalities and instruments of trade may be employed".[70] Prize competitions involving substantial skill are regarded as business activities. On the other hand, a prize competition which is of a gambling nature would not fall within the protection of Art. 19(1)(g).[71]

(f) OTHER TRADES

In Krishnachandra v. State of Madhya Pradesh, the Court considered the reasonableness of the Gambling Act under Art. 19(1)(g) as if gambling was trade and the Court did not take the stand, as it had done earlier, that gambling was not protected by Art. 19(1)(g).[72]

The Calcutta High Court has ruled that Art. 19(1)(g) does not guarantee the Fundamental Right to carry on trade or business which generates pollution. No one has a Fundamental Right to manufacture, sell and deal in fireworks which produce sound beyond permissible limits, or which generates pollution which would endanger health and public order.[73]

---

66. Harshankar v. Dy. E. & T. Commr., AIR 1975 SC 1121 : (1975) 1 SCC 737; Sat Pal & Co. v. Lt. Governor of Delhi, AIR 1979 SC 1550 : (1979) 4 SCC 232.
67. P.N. Kaushal v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 1457 : (1978) 3 SCC 558; Southern Pharmaceuticals & Chemicals v. State of Kerala, AIR 1981 SC 1862 : 1981 LIC 1520.
68. Ugar Sugar, supra.
69. Srinivasa Enterprises v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 504 : (1980) 4 SCC 507.
70. State of Bombay v. R.M.D.Chamarbaugwala., AIR 1957 SC 699; R.M.D.C. v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 628 : 1957 SCR 930.
71. Supra, footnote 70.
72. AIR 1965 SC 307 : 1964 (1) SCR 765.
73. Burrabazar Fire Works Dealers Association v. Commissioner of Police, Calcutta, AIR 1998 Cal 121.

The Supreme Court has declared that no one can claim a Fundamental Right to carry on business in adulterated foodstuffs thus implying that it is not a trade for purposes of Art. 19(1)(g).[74] Money-lending to poor villagers has been held to be not trade and commerce as it is exploitative of the village people. Such an activity has been considered as 'anti-social, usurious, unscrupulous'. On the other hand, money-lending amongst the commercial community is trade as it is integral to trade and commerce.[75]

A contract between an individual and a government is not protected by Art. 19(1)(g). If the government infringes the contract, the individual may sue for damages or specific performance, but he cannot argue that he has been deprived of his Fundamental Right to carry on trade and commerce guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(g).[76]

The Supreme Court has ruled in Unni Krishnan,[77] that establishing educational institutions cannot be regarded as trade or commerce falling under Art. 19(1)(g). Imparting education cannot be allowed to become commerce. Trade or business normally connotes an activity carried on for a profit motive. Imparting of education has never been regarded as commerce in India.

Private educational institutions are a necessity of the day as the government alone cannot meet the demand for education particularly in the sector of medical and technical education which calls for huge outlays.

In this case, the Court was faced with the question—how to encourage private educational institutions without allowing them to commercialize education.[78] Establishing and administering an educational institution for imparting knowledge to students is an occupation, protected by Article 19(1) (g) and additionally by Article 26(a), if there is no element of profit generation. Although imparting education has also become a means of livelihood for some professionals and a mission in life for some altruists and is characterized as an occupation, yet it does not cease to be a service to the society and cannot be equated to a trade or a business.

Teaching may however be regarded as a profession falling under art. 19(1)(g).

The law regulating to local administration of an urban or rural area affects the social and economic life of the community. The reasonableness of complete restriction imposed on trade of non vegetarian food items has, therefore, to be viewed from the cultural and religious background of the three municipal towns of Haridwar, Rishikesh and Muni ki Reti. Therefore, the impugned bye-law notified by the Municipal Board, Rishikesh which prohibited the sale and consumption of eggs within the limits of the Municipal Board was not violative of Art. 19(1)(g) cannot be held to be violative of Article 19(1) (g).[79]

(g) ARTS. 19(1)(G) AND 301

Article 301 also guarantees freedom of trade. The scope of Art. 301 and its relation with Art. 19(1)(g) has been discussed earlier.[80] A provision infringing

---

74. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Kartar Singh, AIR 1964 SC 1135 : 1964 (6) SCR 679.
75. Fateh Chand v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1977 SC 1825 : (1977) 2 SCC 670; Supra.
76. Achutan v. State of Kerala, AIR 1959 SC 490 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 787.
Also see, infra, Ch. XXXIX.
77. Unni Krishnan v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1993 SC 2178, at 2244 : (1993) 1 SCC 645.
78. Also see, infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(i).
79. Om Prakash v. State of U.P., (2004) 3 SCC 402 : AIR 2004 SC 1896.
80. Supra, Ch. XV, Sec. C.

Arts. 301 and 304 may, and ordinarily will, infringe Art. 19(1)(g) as well and so it can be challenged under Art. 19(1)(g).[81]

J. RESTRICTIONS ON TRADE AND COMMERCE

In several cases, the Courts have upheld measures affecting trade and commerce to some extent, on the ground that they do not constitute restrictions on the Fundamental Right concerned.

Reasonableness of restriction is to be determined in an objective manner and from the standpoint of interest of the general public and not from the standpoint of the interests of persons upon whom the restrictions have been imposed or upon abstract considerations. A restriction cannot be said to be unreasonable merely because in a given case, it operates harshly. In determining whether there is any unfairness involved, the nature of the right alleged to have been infringed, the underlying purpose of the restriction imposed, the extent and urgency of the evil sought to be remedied thereby, the disproportion of the imposition, the prevailing condition at the relevant time enter into judicial verdict. The reasonableness of the legitimate expectation has to be determined with respect to the circumstances relating to the trade or business in question. Canalisation of a particular business in favour of even a specified individual is reasonable where the interest of the country are concerned or where the business affects the economy of the country.[82]

In Ram Jawaya v. State of Punjab,[83] the government scheme to nationalise school text books was held valid under Art. 19(1)(g) because the private publishers' right to print and publish any book they liked and offer the same for sale, was not curtailed. The choice of text books for the recognised schools lay with the government and the publishers had no Fundamental Right to have any of their books prescribed as a text book by the school authorities.

The Government of Kerala directed that the farmers getting assistance from it for purchase of pumpsets had to purchase them from government approved pump dealers. The private dealers challenged the direction as violation of their right under Art. 19(1)(g), but the Supreme Court rejected the contention. The Court ruled that no one has the "Fundamental Right to insist upon the government or any other individual for doing business with him." A government or an individual is free to determine with whom it will do business. The government has every right to select dealers of its choice for delivering of pump sets keeping in view the price and after sale service and this cannot be challenged as an unreasonable restriction under Art. 19(1)(g) read with Art. 19(6).[84]

A regulation of trade and commerce becomes challengeable under Art. 19(1)(g), if it is shown that it directly and proximately interferes in praesenti with the exercise of freedom of trade. If the alleged restriction does not directly or proximately interfere with the exercise of freedom of trade, the freedom guaran-

---

81. S. Ahmad v. State of Mysore, AIR 1975 SC 1443 : (1975) 2 SCC 131.
82. Bannari Amman Sugars Ltd. v. CTO, (2005) 1 SCC 625 : (2004) 10 JT 500.
83. AIR 1955 SC 549; supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(iii).
Also, Naraindas v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1232 : (1974) 4 SCC 788.
84. Krishnan Kakkanth v. Govt. of Kerala, AIR 1997 SC 128 : (1997) 9 SCC 495.

teed by Art. 19(1)(g) is not violated.[85] Once it is assumed that the impugned legislation imposes a restriction on the freedom of trade, the burden is on those who support it to show that the restriction imposed is reasonable and in the interest of general public. The burden is on those who seek the protection of Art. 19(6) and not on the citizen who challenges the restriction as invalid.[86] The Supreme Court has also emphasized that "the greater the restriction, the more the need for strict scrutiny by the Court".[87]

(a) REASONABLE RESTRICTION : WHAT IS?

What is a 'reasonable restriction' under Art. 19(6)?[88] Reasonableness of a restriction has to be tested both from procedural as well as substantive aspects of the law. In order to determine the reasonableness of the restrictions, regard must be had to the nature of the business and the conditions prevailing in the trade. These factors differ from trade to trade and no hard and fast rules concerning all trades can be laid down.[89] Further, a restriction on a trade or business is unreasonable if it is arbitrary or drastic and has no relation to, or goes much in excess of, the objective of the law which seeks to impose it.

As early as 1951, in Chintaman Rao,[90] the Supreme Court laid down the test for a "reasonable restriction" as follows:

> "The phrase reasonable restriction cannotes that the limitation imposed on a person in enjoyment of the right should not be arbitrary or of an excessive nature beyond what is required in the interest of the public. The word reasonable implies intelligent care and deliberation, that is, the choice of a course which reason dictates. Legislation which arbitrarily or excessively invades the right cannot be said to contain the quality of reasonableness and unless it strikes a proper balance between the freedom guaranteed in article 19(1)(g) and the social control permitted by clause (6) of Article 19, it must be held to be wanting in that quality."[91]

The Court has further explained the concept of "reasonableness" as envisaged in Art. 19(6) in Krishnan:[92]

> "The reasonableness of restriction is to be determined in an objective manner and from the standpoint of the interests of general public and not from the standpoint of the interests of the persons upon whom the restrictions are imposed or upon abstract consideration. A restriction cannot be said to be unreasonable merely because in a given case, it operates harshly…..In determining the infringement of the right guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(g), the nature of right alleged to have been infringed, the underlying purpose of the restriction imposed, the extent and urgency of the evil sought to be remedied thereby, the

---

85. Sukhnandan Saran Dinesh Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 902 : (1982) 2 SCC 150.
86. Laxmi Khandsari v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 860, 873 : (1981) 2 SCC 600.
87. Narendra Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 430, 437 : (1960) 2 SCR 375; Municipal Corp. v. Jan Mohammad, AIR 1986 SC 1205 : (1986) 3 SCC 20.
88. See, supra, Sec. B.
89. Sreenivasa General Traders v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 1246 : (1983) 4 SCC 353.
90. Chintaman Rao v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1951 SC 118 : 1950 SCR 759; see, infra, note 62.
91. Also see, Bishambhar Dayal Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 SC 33; P.P. Enterprises v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 1016 : (1982) 2 SCC 33.
92. Krishnan Kakkanth v. Govt. of Kerala, AIR 1997 SC 128, at 135 : (1997) 9 SCC 495.

> disproportion of the imposition, the prevailing conditions at the time, enter into judicial verdict."

Thus, restrictions to be reasonable must not be arbitrary or excessive in nature so as to go beyond the interest of general public. This formulation involves a balancing of private interest vis-a-vis public interest. In this process, the Courts have leaned towards the consumers' interests. Thus, while far-reaching restrictions are imposed on trade and commerce, only rarely will a restriction be held as unreasonable.

It has since been held that in judging the reasonableness of the restrictions imposed by Art. 19(6), the Court has to bear in mind the Directive Principles.[1]

In Sivani,[2] the Supreme Court has laid down the criteria to evaluate the reasonableness of a restriction under Art. 19(6). The Court must take into account whether the law has struck a proper balance between social control, on the one hand, and the right of the individual on the other. The Court has to take into account such factors as, nature of the right enshrined, underlying purpose of the restriction imposed, evil sought to be remedied by the law, its extent and urgency, how far the restriction is or is not proportionate to the evil and the prevailing conditions at the time. The Court cannot proceed on any abstract or general notion of what is reasonable. The Court cannot judge reasonableness of a restriction from the point of view of one person or a class of persons on whom the restriction may be imposed.

In the context of the Lotteries (Regulation) Act 1988 the Supreme Court has held that if by a statutory action the rights of an agent to carry on business is affected, he may in his own right maintain an action. A quia time application is also maintainable if his right in any manner to carry on business is infringed or is a threatened.[3]

To adjudge the reasonableness of the restriction, regard must be had to the nature of the business, and the conditions prevailing therein which would differ from trade to trade. No hard and fast rules covering all trades can be laid down. The nature of the business and its indelible effect on public interest etc. are important elements in deciding reasonableness of therestriction. No one has inherent right to carry on a business which is injurious to public interest. Trade or business attended with danger to the community may be totally prohibited or be permitted subject to such conditions or restrictions as would prevent the evils to the utmost.

(b) CAN RESTRICTION AMOUNT TO A PROHIBITION?

A question has arisen from time to time whether a restriction can amount to a prohibition. The position of the Supreme Court on this question has been that restriction may even amount to prohibition in a given case if the mischief to be remedied warrants total prohibition.[4]

---

1. See, infra, Ch. XXXIV.
Also see, infra, footnotes 40-43 on 1494.

2. Sivani v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1995 SC 1770, at 1774 : (1995) 6 SCC 289.

3. Tashi Delek Gaming Solutions v. State of Karnataka, (2006) 1 SCC 442 : AIR 2005 SC 4256.

4. Peerless General Finance & Investment Co. Ltd. v. Reserve Bank of India, AIR 1992 SC 1033, 1065 : (1992) 2 SCC 343.

In Narendra Kumar,[5] the Supreme Court construed the term 'restriction' to include 'prohibition' and ruled that the reasonableness of such a restruction has to be considered "in the background of the facts and circumstances under which the order was made, taking into account the nature of the evil that was sought to be remedied by such law, the ratio of the harm caused to individual citizens by the proposed remedy, to the beneficial effect reasonably expected to result to the general public", and "whether the restraint caused by the law was more than what was necessary in the interests of the general public." Even though total prohibition upon carrying on one's profession can be imposed by way of regulatory measure but for doing so such prohibition must pass through a stringent test of public interest.[6]

Rent Act, which imposes a limit on the rent which can be charged, would pass the test of reasonable restriction.[7]

The Court has again explained the position as follows in Mohd. Faruk:[8]

> "The Court must in considering the validity of the impugned law imposing a prohibition on the carrying on of a business or profession, attempt an evaluation of its direct and immediate impact upon the Fundamental Rights of the citizens affected thereby and the larger public interest sought to be ensured in the light of the object sought to be achieved, the necessity to restrict the citizen's freedom, the inherent pernicious nature of the act prohibited or its capacity or tendency to be harmful to the general public, the possibility of achieving the object by imposing a less drastic restraint and in the absence of exceptional situations such as the prevalence of a state of emergency—national or local—or the necessity to maintain essential supplies, or the necessity to stop activities inherently dangerous, the existence of a machinery to satisfy the administrative authority that no case for imposing the restriction is made out or that a less drastic restriction may ensure the object intended to be achieved."

In Narendra Kumar, a total prohibition on copper dealers was held valid.[9] In Systopic Laboratories,[10] complete ban on manufacture and sale of certain medical formulations was held to be not an unreasonable restriction on the right to carry on trade under Art. 19(1)(g). The Central Government took the said decision on the recommendation of the Drugs Consultative Committee which had thoroughly studied the matter. Implementation of directive principles would be in the interest of the general public and, therefore, trades that are harmful or dangerous to the ecology may be regulated or totally prohibited.[11]

Although regulatory measures for better efficiency, conduct and behaviour in the public interest would be a reasonable restriction, but a total prohibition on a person from carrying on his profession at an age chosen by the Government would not be a reasonable restriction unless special reasons are shown to exist.[12] The Court also expressed the view that the freedom of carrying on a profession should be enjoyed by the citizen to the fullest possible extent without putting "shackles" of avoidable cobweb of rules and regulations putting restrictions in

---

5. Narendra Kumar, supra, at 436.
6. B. P. Sharma v. Union of India, (2003) 7 SCC 309 : AIR 2003 SC 3863.
7. Municipal Corpn. of Greater Mumbai v. Kamla Mills Ltd., (2003) 6 SCC 315.
8. Md. Faruk v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 93 : (1969) 1 SCC 853.
9. Supra, footnote 5.
10. Systopic Laboratories (P) Ltd. v. Prem Gupta, AIR 1994 SC 205 : (1994) Supp (1) SCC 160.
11. Indian Handicrafts Emporium v. Union of India, (2003) 7 SCC 589 : AIR 2003 SC 3240.
12. B. P. Sharma v. Union of India, (2003) 7 SCC 309 : AIR 2003 SC 3863.

the enjoyment of such freedoms. As such clause 17 of the conditions of licence issued by the Tourism Department of the State restricting the age of tourist guide as 60 years was held to be unconstitutional.

Thus, it is clear from the above discussion that in certain circumstances, a restriction on trade may amount even to prohibition. As stated above, protection of Art. 19(1)(g) has already been withdrawn from trade in intoxicants.[13] No person has any Fundamental Right to carry on trade in any noxious or dangerous goods like intoxicating drugs or intoxicating liquors.[14]

(c) MISCELLANEOUS SITUATIONS

A State law prohibited the manufacture of bidis in the villages during the agricultural season. No person residing in the villages could employ any other person, nor engage himself, in the manufacture of bidis during the agricultural season. The object of the provision was to ensure adequate supply of labour for agricultural purposes. The bidi manufacturer could not even import labour from outside, and so had to suspend manufacture of bidis during the agricultural season. Even villagers incapable of engaging in agriculture, like old people, women and children, etc., who supplemented their income by making bidis in their spare time, were prohibited from engaging themselves in bidi manufacture without any reason. The prohibition was held to be unreasonable because it was in excess of the object in view and was drastic in nature.[15]

An order obligating wheat growers to dispose of excess wheat within 15 days was held unreasonable as it did not create any corresponding obligation whatever on any one to purchase wheat at a reasonable price.[16]

In order to curb the increasing menace of vehicle theft the central government devised a system of introducing High Security Registration Plates and accordingly issued the Motor Vehicles (New High Security Registration Plates) Order 2001. The Ministry of Road Transport and Highway left the discretion to the states in the matter of using Notice Inviting Tender (NIT) for supplying such plates. The petitioners challenged the conditions of NIT concerning experience and extent of business of the prospective bidders and the NIT stipulated that the bidders should be operating in at least five countries for licence plates and in atleast three countries having security features worldwide, with minimum annual turnover equivalent to must be from licence place business. The agreement is to subsist for a period of 15 years during which the bidder will be approved except in case of termination of contract. The petitioners challenged these conditions contending that the conditions concerning experience and extent of business are discriminatory and tailor made to suit the interest of a class of manufacturers having foreign collaboration and a cartel of companies. The State was well aware that only one or two companies could satisfy the eligibility conditions in the name of implementing Rule 50 requiring use of such number plates and in the process was taking away the rights of existing manufacturers violating their Fundamental Right under Article 19(1)(g) of the Constitution by eliminating individual manufacturers of plates.

---

13. Supra, Sec. I(d).
14. Southern Pharmaceuticals & Chemicals v. State of Kerala, AIR 1981 SC 1862 : 1981 LIC 1520.
15. Chintaman Rao v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1951 SC 118 : 1950 SCR 759.
16. Partap Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1975 P&H 324.

Rejecting the petitioner's plea, the Court held that the impugned clauses had been incorporated to ensure that the manufacturers are technically and financially competent to fulfill the contractual obligation. The know how was available outside India and the indigenous manufacturers are mostly those who have foreign collaboration. Keeping in mind the nature and magnitude of the job, the huge infrastructure required for nationwide implementation, the state's attempt to select foreign manufacturers having foreign collaboration and experience in foreign countries cannot be held to be discriminatory and even if one manufacturer is selected through open tender the said selection cannot be held to be creating monopoly or violative of Article 19(g) read with Clause 6.[17]

With a view to stop production of Khandsari, a restriction was imposed by way of stopping the crushers for two months. The restriction was held valid in Laxmi Khandsari v. State of Uttar Pradesh[18] as it was imposed with a view to stop production of Khandsari so as to promote production of white sugar and to make it available to the consumers at reasonable rates. The restriction was held to be in public interest and as bearing a reasonable nexus to the objects sought to be achieved, viz., to reduce shortage of sugar and ensure its equitable distribution. The restriction was not more excessive than what the situation demanded.

A law prohibiting advertisements relating to magic remedies was held valid because the underlying purpose of the law was to prevent objectionable and unethical advertisements in order to discourage self-medication and self-treatment.[19]

Whether a particular restriction on trade (prohibiting selling of eggs) to the extent of its complete prohibition is to be considered reasonable within the meaning of clause (b) depends on the nature of trade involved and the public interest to be subserved by such total prohibition. In this respect the Supreme Court has held that the term reasonable restriction as appearing in clause (6) is highly flexible and draws colour from its context. In this case the Court come to the reasoning that a large number of residents are strict vegetarians. A major source of employment and revenue in Rishikesh, Haridwar and Muni Ki Reti is derived from tourism and a floating population of pilgrims. On the other hand as the appellant/petitioners who are running hotels and restaurants form a small section of the population who can also trade in adjoining towns and villages no substantial harm is caused to them.[20]

A law setting up markets for commercial crops and prohibiting any trade in such crops within a reasonable radius of a market has been held to be reasonable. The purpose is to reduce scope for exploitation in dealings. Such markets ensure correct weighing and reasonable prices and provide other facilities to the growers of commercial crops.[21]

Qualitative restrictions imposed on fruit products through a legal provision have been held valid as being reasonable and in public interest.[22]

---

17. Association of Registration Plates v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 364 : AIR 2005 SC 1354.
18. AIR 1981 SC 860, 873.
19. Hamdard Dawakhana v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 554 : 1960 (2) SCR 671; supra.
20. Om Prakash v. State of U.P., (2004) 3 SCC 402 : AIR 2004 SC 1896.
21. M.C.V.S. Arunachala Nadar v. State of Madras, AIR 1959 SC 300 : 1959 Supp (1); Mohd. Hussain v. State of Bombay, AIR 1962 SC 97 : 1962 (2) SCR 659; Jan Mohd. Noor Mohd. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1966 SC 385 : 1966 (1) SCR 505.
22. Hamdard Dawakhana v. Union of India, AIR 1965 SC 1167 : (1965) 2 SCR 192.

In Minerva Talkies, Bangalore v. State of Karnataka,[23] the Supreme Court has upheld a rule made by the State Government to the effect that no licensee shall exhibit more than four cinema shows in a day. The Court has ruled that the rule in question does not impose any unreasonable restriction on the freedom to carry on any occupation, trade or business guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(g) in the interest of general public.

The state law prohibited members of the State Medical Education Service from private practice. The Supreme Court held the restriction to be reasonable and hence valid.[24] The Court said that no one compels any one to join the service; one is free to leave it at anytime. The restriction is not on the freedom to practise the medical profession but on such practice while one continues to be a member of the state service. The restriction is in public interest. The state is free to recruit persons to its services on such terms as it thinks desirable to make the services beneficial to the public.

(d) STREET HAWKERS

In Bombay Hawkers' Union v. Bombay Municipal Corporation,[25] the Supreme Court ruled, in answer to the claim of the hawkers that under Art. 19(1)(g) they have a Fundamental Right to carry on their trade on public streets, that no one has a right to do business so as to cause annoyance or inconvenience to members of the public. Public streets are meant for use by the general public; they are not meant to facilitate the carrying on of private trade or business. But the hawkers ought not to be completely deprived of their right to carry on trade. So, the Court directed that there should be hawking zones in the city where licenses should not be refused to the hawkers except for good reasons.

In Sodan Singh v. New Delhi Municipality,[26] (I) the Supreme Court again considered the question: how far the hawkers have a right to ply their trade on pavements meant for pedestrians? In the instant case, the Court has come to the conclusion that the right to carry on trade or business mentioned in Art. 19(1)(g) on street pavements, if properly regulated, cannot be denied on the ground that the street pavements are meant exclusively for pedestrians and cannot be put to any other use. Proper regulation is, however, a necessary condition, for otherwise the very object of laying roads would be defeated. The State holds all public roads and streets in the country as a trustee on behalf of the public and the members of the public are entitled as beneficiaries to use them for trading as a matter of right subject to the right of others including pedestrians. The right of hawkers is subject to reasonable restrictions under Art. 19(6). The Court has however negatived the contention of the hawkers that they have a Fundamental Right to occupy a particular place on the pavement where they can squat and do business. "The petitioners do have a Fundamental Right to carry on a trade or business of their choice but not do so at a particular place,[27]" said the Court. The Court has conceded to the hawkers the right to do business while going from place to place subject to proper regulation in the interest of general convenience of the public.

---

23. AIR 1988 SC 526 : 1988 Supp SCC 176.
24. Sukumar Mukherjee v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1993 SC 2335.
25. AIR 1985 SC 1206 : 1985 (3) SCC 528.
26. AIR 1989 SC 1988 : (1989) 4 SCC 455.
27. Ibid, at 1996.

The Sodan ruling has been reiterated by the Court in Sodan Singh v. NDMC (II).[28] The Court has said that every citizen has a right to the use of a public street vested in the state as a beneficiary but this right is subject to reasonable restrictions as the state may choose to impose. "Street trading is albeit a Fundamental Right under Art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution but it is subject to reasonable restrictions which the state may choose to impose by virtue of Art. 19(6)." This right includes hawking on the street pavements by moving from one place to another without being stationary on any part of the pavement. This does not include a citizen occupying or squatting on any specific place of his choice on the pavement, regardless of the rights of others, including the pedestrians, to use the pavements. The Court has emphasized in this connection: "Proper regulation is, however a necessary condition, for otherwise the very object of laying roads would be defeated."[29]

The right to hawk cannot be unreasonably restricted The correct approach is to determine where hawking is not to be permitted and thereafter such areas to be non-hawking zones.[30]

In a matter relating to eviction of illegal squatters occupying railway property and also areas around Rabindra Sarobar, the Calcutta High Court directed the railway administration and the State of West Bengal to provide sanitary facilities to the squatters as interim measure. The Union of India went to Supreme Court contending that the High Court ought to have directed police assistance for eviction and rather than providing them with further benefit as such occupation was causing danger to passengers and goods carried by railway and also causing pollution. The Supreme Court directed that the High Court should take necessary steps to give effect to the orders of eviction passed by competent authorities and also the High Court from time to time.[31]

It is clear that in these cases the Supreme Court has sought to reconcile the interests of the pedestrians with those of the hawkers.[32]

(e) WAGES, GRATUITY, LABOUR DISPUTES

There is a close relationship between the right to carry on trade and wages payable to the employees in a trade or industry. Too high wages may affect the economic viability of an industry; but too low wages may amount to exploitation of human labour. A balance has to be drawn between the two conflicting values and the Supreme Court has sought to do so in several cases. The Court has held that the technique of appointing a wage board consisting equally of the representatives of the employers and employees with a few neutral members and a neutral chairman for fixing wages in an industry according to factors laid down and according to natural justice, does not amount to an unreasonable restriction on trade and commerce.[33]

---

28. AIR 1992 SC 1153 : (1992) 2 SCC 458. Also see, Sodan Singh v. NDMC (III), AIR 1998 SC 1174 : (1998) 2 SCC 727; Maharashtra Ekta Hawkers Union v. Municipal Corporation Greater Mumbai, 2004 (1) SCC 625, 640 : AIR 2004 SC 416.

29. Ibid, at 1154.

30. Maharashtra Ekta Hawkers Union v. Municipal Corporation, Greater Mumbai, (2004) 1 SCC 625 : AIR 2004 SC 416.

31. Union of India v. Howrah Ganatantrik Nagarik Samity, (2003) 9 SCC 302 : AIR 2003 SC 3990.

32. Also see, South Calcutta Hawkers Association v. Government of West Bengal, AIR 1997 Cal 234; Bapuji Nagar Khudra Byabsai Ass. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1997 Ori 189.

33. Express Newspapers v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 578 : 1959 SCR 12.

Wages are usually classified into 'living wage', 'fair wage' and 'minimum wage'. A 'minimum wage' provides for bare sustenance of life just sufficient to cover the bare physical needs of a worker and his family and such a wage must be paid to a worker irrespective of the industry's capacity to pay. 'A living wage' provides a frugal measure of comfort and other amenities, e.g., education and health in addition to what 'minimum wage' provides for. A 'fair wage' is a mean between 'minimum' and 'living' wages. Arts. 19(1)(g) and 19(6) demand that in fixing 'living' or 'fair' wages, industry's capacity to pay is an essential ingredient. Fixing 'living' or 'fair' wages without taking into consideration 'capacity to pay' amounts to an unreasonable restraint on the right to carry on trade.[34]

Gratuity, the Supreme Court has held, is a retirement benefit which may be awarded by an employer when an employee retires or resigns from service voluntarily after completion of 15 years' continuous service. Gratuity being a reward for good, efficient and faithful service rendered for a considerable period, there could be no justification for awarding it when an employee resigns only after three years' service except under exceptional circumstances. Accordingly, a provision of law providing for gratuity in such a case amounts to an unreasonable restriction under Art. 19(6) on the employer's right to carry on business and would be liable to be struck down as unconstitutional.[35]

In British Paints,[36] the Supreme Court accepted 10 years' minimum period of service for earning gratuity. In Straw Board,[37] the Court again changed its position and upheld the 5 years' minimum qualifying period of service for entitlement to gratuity to workmen who voluntarily retire or resign. This shows that the concept of "gratuity" has undergone a metamorphosis over time. The obligation of the employer to pay gratuity to the employee on his resignation or retirement after a continuous service of five years has been held to be a reasonable restriction in public interest on the employer's right to carry on trade. The Court has justified it as a welfare measure in the interest of the general public to secure social and economic justice to workmen to assist them in their old age and to ensure them a decent standard of life on their retirement.[38]

Provisions made for labour-welfare providing for annual paid leave or one month's notice for dismissal have been held to be reasonable.[39]

In Jalan Trading Co. v. D.M. Aney,[40] a statutory obligation to pay the statutory minimum bonus by the employers to the employees even when the employer sustained loss has been held to be reasonable and in public interest, as this is in implementation of the Directive Principles in Arts. 39 and 43.[41] What is sanctioned by the Directive Principles cannot be regarded as unreasonable or contrary to public interest in the context of Art. 19.[42] A state law increasing the number of compulsory

---

34. Ibid.; The P.T.I. v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1044 : (1974) 4 SCC 638.
Also, U. Unichayi v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 12 : (1962) 1 SCR 946.
35. Express Newspapers (Pr.) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 578 : 1959 SCR 12.
36. British Paints (India) Ltd. v. Its Workmen, AIR 1966 SC 732 : 1966 (2) SCR 523.
37. Straw Board Mfg. Co. Ltd. v. Their Workmen, AIR 1977 SC 941 : (1977) 2 SCC 329.
38. Bakshish Singh v. Darshan Engg. Works, AIR 1994 SC 251.
39. M.G. Beedi Works v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1832 : (1974) 4 SCC 43.
40. AIR 1979 SC 233 : (1979) 3 SCC 220.
41. For Directive Principles see, infra, Ch. XXXIV.
42. See, supra, footnote 1 on 1488.

paid national and paid holidays from 9 to 13 during a year has been held to be valid in view of Art. 43.[43]

(f) ESSENTIAL COMMODITIES

Trades in certain commodities (designated as essential commodities) may be more drastically regulated than trade in other commodities. To assess the reasonableness of a restriction, the nature of the business and conditions prevailing therein are important factors to be considered. As these factors differ from trade to trade, no hard and fast rules concerning all trades can be laid down. The result of this approach is that Courts may hold drastic restrictions on certain trades in certain circumstances as reasonable. As for example, fixation of a ceiling of 200 quintals on wheat stocks possessed by a dealer at any time is valid to obviate black-marketing and hoarding in essential commodities.[44] A similar embargo on sugar stocks has been held valid.[45]

A notification under the Essential Commodities Act imposed a levy on sugar manufacturers. They were required to hand over to the government 50 per cent of their production at a fixed price. They could sell the rest in free market. The notification was challenged on the ground that the price of levy sugar was not sufficient to cover their manufacturing cost. The Court rejected the argument on the following grounds: (1) Interest of the consumers must prevail over that of manufacturers. The dominant object of the price control policy was to ensure equitable distribution and make the commodity available at fair price so as to benefit the consumers. Thus, individual interests must yield to the larger interests of the community. (2) Even if the petitioners had to bear some loss, that would not make the restriction unreasonable.[46] The determining factor was the interest of the consumer and not that of the producer. (3) Since the petitioners could sell 50 per cent of their production in the open market, the loss to them, if any, would be minimal.[47]

An order establishing direct relation, in the field of copper trade, between the importer and the consumer of copper, and completely eliminating the middleman—the dealer, was held valid in Narendra Kumar.[48] Copper is an essential commodity; its indigenous production is small; consumers depend on imported copper and there is a tendency of its price to go up. The order was promulgated in an honest effort to protect the interests of the general public.

A rule banning all hedging contracts in cotton except those permitted by the Textile Commissioner, and also authorising him to place such restrictions as he thought fit on such contracts, was held valid. Cotton being an essential commodity, restrictions may reasonably amount to prohibition for a time of all normal trading in the commodity.[49]

---

43. M.R.F. Ltd. v. Inspector, Kerala Govt., AIR 1999 SC 188. Also see, infra, footnotes 54-59, on 1496-1497.
44. Suraj Mal Kailash Chand v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 130 : (1981) 4 SCC 554.
45. P.P. Enterprises v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 1016 : (1982) 2 SCC 33.
46. Ref. Meenakshi & Prag Ice, infra.
47. New India Sugar Works v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 998 : (1981) 2 SCC 293. Also see, infra, Sub-sec. (O) on 1507, under Price Fixing.
48. Narendra Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 430 : (1960) 2 SCR 375.
49. M.B. Association v. Union of India, AIR 1954 SC 634.

Drastic restrictions placed on the dealers of gold by the Gold (Control) Act have been upheld.[50]

(g) SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS

To reconcile the right of butchers to carry on their trade, and restrictions imposed on killing of animals through several State laws, the Supreme Court has adopted an economic approach, viz., killing of useful animals could be prohibited but not of those animals who have become economically useless to the society. The Court has emphasized that a prohibition imposed on the Fundamental Right to carry on trade and commerce cannot be regarded as reasonable if it is imposed not in the interest of general public, but merely to respect the susceptibilities and sentiments of a section of the people. Thus, it is reasonable to prohibit slaughter of cows of all ages and male or female calves of cows or buffaloes; prohibition of slaughter of bulls, bullocks and she-buffaloes below the age of twenty-five years is an unreasonable restriction on the butchers' right to carry on their trade as well as not in public interest as these animals cease to be useful after the age of 15 years.[51] The Court observed in this connection in Quareshi: "The maintenance of useless cattle involves a wasteful drain on the nation's cattle feed. To maintain them is to deprive the useful cattle of the much needed nourishment. The presence of so many useless animals tends to deteriorate the breed."

An elaborate procedure for certification of animals for slaughter has also been held unreasonable as imposing disproportionate restriction on the butchers' right to carry on their trade.[52] A municipal corporation issued a standing order under a statute directing closure of slaughter houses for seven holidays in a year. The order was challenged as putting an unreasonable restriction on the trade of the butchers. The question before the Court was whether the restriction was reasonable in the interest of the general public. The question before the Court was whether the restriction was reasonable in the interest of the general public. The Supreme Court took the view that the expression "in the interest of general public" found in Art. 19(6) "is of wide import comprehending public order, public health, public security, morals, economic welfare of the community and the objects mentioned in the Directive Principles." The Court ruled that the order in question did not put any unreasonable restrictions on the Fundamental Right of the petitioners under Art. 19(1)(g).[53]

A ban was put on the slaughter of bulls and bullocks below the age of 16 years. The Supreme Court found that these animals could be used for breeding, draught and agricultural purposes up to the age of 16 years. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the restriction was not unreasonable, looking to the balance which needs to be struck between public interest, which requires preservation of useful animals, and permitting the different traders in beef, etc. to carry on their trade and profession.[54]

---

50. Manick Chand v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1249 : (1984) 3 SCC 65.
51. M.H. Quareshi v. State of Bihar, AIR 1958 SC 731; Abdul Hakim v. State of Bihar, AIR 1961 SC 448 : (1961) 2 SCR 610.
52. Md. Faruk v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 93 : (1969) 1 SCC 853.
Also, supra, Sec. B and infra, Chap. XXXIV, under Directive Principles.
53. Municipal Corporation, Ahmedabad v. Jan Mohammed, AIR 1986 SC 1205 : (1986) 3 SCC 20.
54. Haji Usmanbhai Hasanbhai Qureshi v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1986 SC 1213 : (1986) 3 SCC 12.

Again, the State of Madhya Pradesh imposed a total ban on the slaughter of bulls and, bullocks and again, the Supreme Court quashed the same.[55]

After referring to all the provisions cases on this question, the Court stuck to its view that these animals were useful only up to the age of 16 years and their slaughter thereafter could not be banned. Referring to Art. 48, a Directive Principle,[56] the Court observed that absolute ban on slaughter of bulls and bullocks is not necessary to comply with Art. 48. The Court has thus sought to strike a balance between the right of the butchers to carry on their trade and public interest.

(h) IMPORT AND EXPORT

Drastic restrictions on the right of trade and commerce have been judicially upheld for the purpose of import and export control. The reason is that import and export policy of a country has to be flexible in modern times as it needs constant adjustments keeping in view the needs of the country, international relations, foreign exchange position, need to protect indigenous industries and a number of other relevant factors. No one can claim an unrestricted right to import or export. The import and export policy forms an integral part of the country's economic policy.[57] Thus, the system of licensing of imports and exports has been held to be reasonable. To regulate imports and exports, there is first the Imports and Exports (Control) Act, 1947, which is a short enactment of eight sections. Issued thereunder are the two orders, the Import Control Order and the Export Control Order. Then, at the third stage, there is the import and export policy announced by the Central Government from time to time. The policy statement is not statutory but only administrative.

The Supreme Court has accepted the right of the Central Government to change, rescind or alter the policy from time to time merely by administrative instructions. Courts do not normally go into such policy decisions. It has also been held that no person can claim a right to the grant of an import or export licence, enforceable at law, merely on the basis of a policy statement.[58] Then, with a view to earn foreign exchange, if under the Import or Export Order, the Government decides to canalise import or export of a commodity through a specialised channel, import or export licences in that commodity could be refused to individuals. Such canalisation is not per se an unreasonable restriction and it would be presumed to be in public interest unless the contrary is shown clearly.[59] For example, in Glass Chatons,[60] the import of glass chatons was

---

55. Hasmattullah v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1996 SC 2076 : (1996) 4 SCC 391.
Also see, Mirzapur Moti Kureshi Kasab Jamat v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1998 Guj 220. Abdul Sattar Yusufbhai Qureshi v. State of Gujarat, AIR 2001 Guj 179.

56. See, Ch. XXXIV, infra.

57. Bhatnagars & Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 478 : 1957 SCR 701; Supra.

58. Andhra Ind. Works v. C.C. of Imports, AIR 1974 SC 1539 : (1974) 2 SCC 348, J. Fernandes & Co. v. Dy. Chief Controller or Imports and Exports, AIR 1975 SC 1208 : (1975) 1 SCC 716.
But see, Oswal Woollen Mills Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 969 : (1983) 4 SCC 345, where certain administrative decisions not in accordance with certain provisions of the Import Policy were quashed.

59. Daya v. Jt. Chief Controller, I. & E., AIR 1962 SC 1796 : (1963) 2 SCR 73; Glass Chatons Importers and Users Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1961 SC 1514 : (1962) 1 SCR 862; Daruka & Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1973 SC 2713; A.M. Ahmad & Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Mad. 247.

60. Supra, footnote 59.

banned, but import licences were issued to the State Trading Corporation under the import order. This is an example where by administrative policy-making, and by using its power to issue import or export licences, the government was able to create a monopoly for import and export of several commodities in favour of its specialized agencies like the State Trading Corporation, the Mineral and Metal Trade Corporation, etc.

To earn foreign exchange, Parliament enacted a law to impose an obligation on sugar mills to hand over a percentage of their production to a government agency for export. The export price realised was less than the government fixed internal price. The scheme was challenged on the ground that the mills were being forced to sell a part of their production at a loss. The government's contention however was that in fixing the internal price, it had added a margin to cover the loss on export. The Supreme Court upheld the scheme as reasonable because the loss, if any, was comparatively less and there was a very real possibility of its being recouped. The Court also ruled that reasonableness of a restriction imposed under one Act could be assessed by taking into account the countervailing advantage conferred under another Act if both the Acts are enacted as part of a single legislative plan.[61]

(i) TAXING LAWS

At times, taxing statutes have been challenged under Art. 19(1)(g), but it is rarely that such a challenge succeeds.[62] A taxing statute is not per se regarded as a restriction on the freedom under Art. 19(1)(g) even if it imposes some hardship in individual cases. "Then again, the mere excessiveness of a tax or even the circumstance that its imposition might tend towards the diminution of the earnings or profits of the persons of incidence does not per se, and without more, constitute violation of the rights under Art. 19(1)(g)."[63] Accordingly, the Supreme Court upheld a tax on "chargeable expenditure" in a hotel having room rent of Rs. 400 or more per day.[64]

Sales tax is a tax on the sale of goods. Unless confiscatory, such a tax does not impose an unreasonable restriction on the right of a person to carry on trade whether or not law permits or prohibits the dealers from passing on tax to the purchasers.[65]

Imposition of a tax with retrospective effect is not ordinarily regarded as invalid. To test whether a retrospective imposition of a tax operates so harshly as to violate the Fundamental Right under Art. 19(1)(g), the Court considers such factors as relevant as the context in which retroactivity was contemplated, such as, whether the law is one of validation of a taxing statute struck down by the Courts for certain defects, the period of such retroactivity, and the degree and extent of 61. Lord Krishna Sugar Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1959 SC 1124 : (1960) 1 SCR 39. For a comment on the case see, 1 JILI 572.

---

62. Hoechst Pharmaceuticals Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019 : (1983) 4 SCC 45; Malwa Bus Service v. State of Punjab, AIR 1983 SC 634 : (1983) 3 SCC 237; State of Karnataka v. Hansa Corp., AIR 1981 SC 463 : (1980) 4 SCC 697.

63. Federation of Hotel & Restaurant v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1637 : 1989 Supp (2) SCC 169, at 1655.

Also see, Express Hotels (P) Ltd. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1989 SC 1949 : (1989) 3 SCC 677.

64. Federation of Hotel, Ibid.

65. S. Kodar v. State of Kerala, AIR 1974 SC 2272 : (1974) 4 SCC 422.

any unforeseen or unforeseeable financial burden for the past period, etc. A sales tax law voided by the High Court was validated by the State Legislature with retrospective effect by passing an Act. This retrospective law was held valid. Had the law not been validated, dealers who had already collected the tax from customers would have had a windfall as they would not have had any such right had the original law been held valid.[66] A competent legislature can always validate a law declared invalid by the Courts provided the infirmities and vitiating factors noticed by the Court are in its judgment, are removed or cured by the legislature. Such a validating law can be made retrospective.[67]

The Courts do not usually interfere with a tax on the ground of its being excessive, or that it imposes a heavy burden on trade and commerce, or that the profits of the business are greatly reduced thereby.[68] Except in the extreme case when the Court regards an impost as confiscatory,[69] or discriminatory.[70]

An impost on trade, whether a licence-fee or a tax, levied through an invalid or unconstitutional law, infringes Art. 19(1)(g) for an illegal impost always amounts to an unreasonable restriction on a citizen's right.[71]

A tax which is 'compensatory' in nature can never operate as an unreasonable restriction on the right to carry on trade or business. The very idea underlying such a tax is service more or less commensurate with the tax levied, and no citizen can claim a right to engage in trade without paying for the special services he receives from the state. This is part of the cost of carrying on business.[72]

(j) INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES

The scale of compensation payable to the employees by the employers who close their undertakings, prescribed by the Industrial Disputes Act, has been held to be not unreasonable,[73] because it is based on social justice.[74]

In Fertilizer Corporation Kamagar Union v. Union of India,[75] the workers in the Public undertaking challenged the validity of sale of certain plants and equipment claiming that this would result in the retrenchment of many workers and, thus, depriving them of their right under Art. 19(1)(g). The Court rejected

---

66. Krishnamurthi & Co. v. State of Madras, AIR 1972 SC 2455 : (1973) 1 SCC 75.
67. Ujagar Prints v. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 516 : (1989) 3 SCC 488.
68. Nazeeria Motor Service v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 1864 : (1969) 2 SCC 576; Jagan Nath v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 148 : (1962) 2 SCR 118.
69. For an example of such a tax see K.T. Moopil Nair v. State of Kerala, AIR 1961 SC 552 : (1961) 3 SCR 77; supra.
70. Supra, Ch. XXI, under Art. 14.
Also see, supra, Ch. XI, Sec. H, under 'fees'.
A fee can be declared as excessive if it has no relation to the service performed. See, Chandrakant Krishnarao Pradhan v. Collector of Customs, AIR 1962 SC 204, where a licence renewal fee for customs agents was held unreasonable as there was no service being rendered at that stage and "under the guise of a fee there must not be an attempt to raise revenue for the general funds of the State".
71. Yasin v. Town Area Committee, AIR 1952 SC 115 : 1952 SCR 572; Himmat Lal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 403; Bengal Immunity Co. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1955 SC 661 : (1955) 2 SCR 603.
72. G.K. Krishnan v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1975 SC 583 : (1975) 1 SCC 375; Supra, Ch. XV.
73. Hathisingh Mfg. Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 923.
74. Infra, Ch. XXXIV.
75. AIR 1981 SC 344 : (1981) 1 SCC 568.

the challenge saying that Art. 19(1)(g) does not protect the right to work in a particular post under a contract of employment. "The right to pursue a calling or to carry on an occupation is not the same thing as the right to work in any particular post under a contract of employment." Art. 19(1)(g) cannot be invoked against the loss of a job or retrenchment or removal from service. If workers are retrenched in a factory, they can pursue their rights and remedies under the industrial laws. The closure of an establishment in which a workman is for the time being employed does not by itself infringe his Fundamental Right under Art. 19(1)(g). "Art. 19(1)(g) confers a broad and general right which is available to all persons to do work of any particular kind and of their choice. It does not confer the right to hold a particular job or to occupy a particular post of one's choice."

(k) ADMINISTRATIVE REGULATION

An administrative order not authorised by law under which it is made, and imposing a restriction on the right to carry on business, is void under Art. 19(1)(g).[76] Thus, a condition imposed on the licensee by the licensing authority which is not justified by the Act and the rules under which the licence is issued and which also seriously affects the business of the licensee, would be unreasonable.[77] An order made under a law should impose reasonable restrictions on trade and commerce. Thus, fixing a period of 26 days for disposal of sugar released for free sale in the open market was held unreasonable. Further, refusal by government to extend the period when the petitioners had done every thing they could to remove the sugar from their godowns was also held to be unreasonable as the government acted mechanically in the matter.[78]

The area of trade, commerce and business is progressively coming under rigorous administrative regulation. Licensing, price-fixing, requisitioning of stocks, control on movement of commodities, regulation of industry have been undertaken in the country on a large scale; because of several reasons, e.g., shortage and scarcity of essential commodities, need for economic regeneration of the country under the impact of the five year plans, to discourage some immoral and illegal trades and unfair trade practices, the present day concept of socialist pattern of society, and to reduce concentration of wealth in a few hands.[79] The general principle is that the power conferred on the executive by a law to regulate trade or commerce should not be arbitrary, "unregulated by any rule or principle". A law or order which confers arbitrary power upon the executive in the matter of regulating trade or business is regarded unreasonable.[80]

Generally speaking, administrative discretion is not regarded as arbitrary if the circumstances in, or the grounds on, which it can be exercised are stated, or if the law lays down the policy to achieve which the discretion is to be exercised, or if there are enough procedural safeguards in the law to provide security against

---

76. Tahir Hussain v. District Board, AIR 1954 SC 630; Bidi Supply Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1956 SC 479 : 1956 SCR 267; Mineral Development Co. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1960 SC 468; Bishamber Dayal Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 SC 33 : (1982) 1 SCC 39.

77. Hamid Raza v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1960 SC 994.

78. Oudh Sugar Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1907.
Also, R.H. Hegde v. Market Commission, Sirsa, AIR 1971 SC 1017 : (1971) 1 SCC 349.

79. I.L.I., Government Regulation of Private Enterprise, (1971).

80. Dwarka Pd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 224 : 1954 SCR 803; Partap Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1975 P&H 323.

misuse of the discretion. In case of trades which are illegal, dangerous, immoral or injurious to the health, morality and welfare of the public, a greater discretionary power may be left with the Executive than is permissible in case of normal trades. The practical operation of these norms can be illustrated with reference to some judicial pronouncements.

A lot of discretionary power is conferred on the Central/State Governments under several labour laws to regulate labour-management relationship. Several cases have arisen based on these discretionary powers.

In Bijay Cotton Mills v. Ajmer,[81] the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, was challenged on the ground that it put unreasonable restrictions on employers (who could not carry on their trade without paying minimum wages), the employees (who could not work on terms mutually agreed upon between them and their employers), and that the procedure to fix minimum wages was arbitrary as it left everything to the unfettered discretion of the government. The Supreme Court held the Act valid. Securing of living wages to labourers is in public interest for it is necessary to ensure not only bare physical subsistence but also health and decency to labourers. It is necessary to curb the freedom of contract to prevent the exploitation of labour. Though the powers enjoyed by the government are wide, yet there are sufficient procedural safeguards, viz., the government is to take into consideration, before fixing the minimum wages, advice of the committee or representations of the people so affected; consultation with advisory bodies is obligatory for revision of minimum wages; there is a Central Advisory Board to advise the Central and State Governments in the matter of fixing and revision of minimum wages and to act as a co-ordinating agency for different advisory bodies: each committee or advisory body is to consist of an equal number of representatives of employers and employees with a few independent persons who could take a fair and impartial view of the matter. There is no provision for review of the government decision, but that does not make the Act unreasonable as it has adequate safeguards against hasty or capricious decision by the government.

A provision in the Industrial Disputes Act [S. 25-O] requires an employer intending to close down his industrial undertaking to give a three months' notice to the government of his intended closure. The government could refuse to permit closure if it was satisfied that the reasons for the intended closure of the undertaking were "not adequate and sufficient" or that "such closure is prejudicial to the public interest". If an employer closed down the undertaking without observing this procedure, he could be punished with imprisonment up to 6 months, or fine up to 5000 rupees or with both. The closure would be illegal and the workmen would be entitled to all the benefits under any law as if no notice had been given to them.

In Excel Wear v. Union of India,[82] the Supreme Court declared this provision to be unconstitutional. Commenting on the above provision, the Court said that the reasons given by the employer for closure of the undertaking might be correct yet permission could still be refused if the government thought them to be "not adequate and sufficient". No provision has been made for review of the 81. AIR 1955 SC 33 : 1955 (1) SCR 752. Also see, supra.

82. AIR 1979 SC 25 : (1978) 4 SCC 2224.
Also see, JAIN, CASES ON ADM. LAW, III, 1887.

order, or for appeal from it. No reasons need be given in the government order granting or refusing the permission. So, the order could be whimsical and capricious. Government is enjoined to pass the order within the 90 days' period. The right to close down a business is "an integral part" of the right to carry it on.[83]

The Court rejected the contention that "an employer has no right to close down a business once he starts it." The right to close is itself a Fundamental Right embedded in the right to carry on any business guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(g). But as no right is absolute in scope, this right could also be restricted, regulated or controlled by law in the interest of the general public. The restrictions imposed on this right by the impugned provision in question were held to be unreasonable as there was no higher body to scrutinize the government order negativing employer's request to close down. The Court also rejected the contention of the employers that the right to close down business was at par with the right not to start a business at all. The Court said that while no one can be compelled to start a business, it is different from closing down a business. The two rights cannot be equated.

Thereafter, S. 25-N was enacted. This provision says that an employer cannot retrench any worker who has been in service for a year without the consent of the government. If the government fails to communicate its decision within two months, the permission shall be deemed to have been granted. In Meenakshi Mills,[84] the Supreme Court has held that S. 25-N constitutes a reasonable restriction on the employer's right to carry on trade. The discretion of the government is not absolute but subject to proper procedural safeguards. For example, the government is to make an inquiry according to natural justice before coming to a decision; the government is to record reasons for its decision and it has to decide the matter within a time frame of 10 days and, thus, cannot unduly delay matters.

In course of time, S. 25-O was amended the vices pointed out therein in Excel Wear were sought to be removed. The constitutional validity of the amended S. 25-O came to be considered by the Supreme Court in the undernoted case.[85] Under the amended section, the government order granting or refusing permission must be in writing and be a reasoned order. The government order was to be passed after giving a reasonable opportunity of being heard to the employer, the workmen and any one else interested in the closure. A review tribunal had also been established the government must pass its order in 60 days failing which the permission would be deemed to have been granted. In the circumstances, the Court upheld the validity of the amended provision.

A similar provision, S. 25-M of the Industrial Disputes Act, requiring government's prior permission to lay off any worker has been held to be valid in Papnasam.[86] S. 25-M contains all the procedural safeguards to be found in S. 25-N.

---

83. Ref. Hathisingh Mfg. Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 923 : (1960) 3 SCC 528.

84. Workmen, Meenakshi Mills Ltd. v. Meenakshi Mills Ltd., AIR 1994 SC 2696 : (1992) 3 SCC 336.
Also see, JAIN, CASES, III, 1890-1898.

85. Orissa Textile & Steel Ltd. v. State of Orissa, (2002) 2 SCC 578.

86. Papnasam Labour Union v. Madura Coats Ltd., AIR 1995 SC 2200 : (1995) 1 SCC 501.
Also see, JAIN, CASES, III, 1899-1901.

(l) LICENSING

Regulation of trade through a licensing system is the order of the day,[87] In a number of cases, Courts have considered the permissible scope of the licensing power of the Administration with reference to Arts. 19(1)(g) and 19(6). It is now clearly settled that a system of licensing of a trade is not unreasonable provided that the licensing officers are not left with uncontrolled power to grant, revoke or cancel a licence. There should be reasonable norms, policy or principles to guide administrative power as well as some procedural safeguards. The Supreme Court has stated on this point in the following case:[88]

> "Where, however, power is entrusted to an administrative agency to grant or withhold a permit or licence in its uncontrolled discretion the law ex facie infringes the Fundamental Right under Art. 19(1)(g)."

In Seshadri v. Dist. Magistrate,[89] a rule requiring a cinema licensee to show at each performance approved film of such length and for such length of time as the government might direct has been held to be unreasonable because the government is vested with an unregulated discretion to compel an exhibitor to show a film of any length and there is no principle to guide the government in this matter. Similarly, prescribing a minimum length of film to be shown at a performance without fixing a maximum, is also unreasonable for this confers an unfettered discretion on the government to interfere with the cinema licensee's right to carry on trade. No principle is laid down to guide the government. A condition couched in such wide language is bound to operate harshly upon the cinema business and, thus, cannot be regarded as a reasonable restriction.

A provision conferring wide power to grant or cancel a licence on an administrator, without mentioning the grounds on which he could exercise his power was held unreasonable in Dwarka Pd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[90] as the matter was left to the unrestrained will of a single individual. The only safeguard against improper exercise of power was that the licensing officer would record reasons for the action taken by him. This was not regarded as an effective safeguard as there was no higher authority to examine the propriety of these reasons, and revise or review his decision, and the reasons recorded by him were thus only for his own subjective satisfaction and not for furnishing any remedy to the aggrieved person.

To the same effect is the case noted below.[91] A regulation imposed a licensing system for non-tribal orders. If the licence was refused, the reasons for refusal had to be recorded. The Supreme Court quashed the regulation as it did not provide any principles or standards on which the licensing authority was to act. "There being no principles or standards laid down in the Regulation there are obviously no restraints or limits within which the power of the Executive Committee to refuse to grant or renew a licence is to be exercised". There was no provision for appeal against the decision of the authority refusing to grant the licence. On the other hand, where law gave guidance to the licensing authority in the matter of issuing licences, obligated

---

87. LAKSHMI SWAMINATHAN, Right to be heard in Licensing Cases, 12 JILI 657 (1970).
88. Municipal Corporation, Ahmedabad v. Jan Mohammed, AIR 1986 SC 1205, 1210 : (1986) 3 SCC 20.
89. AIR 1954 SC 747 : (1955) 1 SCR 686.
90. AIR 1954 SC 224 : 1954 SCR 803.
91. Hari Chand Sarda v. Mizo District Council, AIR 1967 SC 829 : 1967 (1) SCR 1012. Also see, JAIN, CASES, III, 1867-1873.

it to record reasons in case licence was refused, and provided for appeals and revision against his decisions, it was held reasonable.[92]

The provision in the Gold Control Act for licensing of dealers of gold ornaments was held invalid in Harakchand v. Union of India,[93] because it conferred unguided power on the executive. The administrator in granting licences was to have regard to such factors as 'suitability of the applicant', 'anticipated demand as estimated by him for ornaments in the region' and 'public interest'. The Supreme Court held that these terms were vague, not capable of objective assessment, provided no objective norm to guide the administrator's discretion and, thus, unfettered power had been given to him to grant or refuse a licence. The Court also held it unreasonable to prescribe the same conditions for renewal as for initial grant of licence as that rendered the entire future of business uncertain and subject to arbitrary administrative will.

A Tamil Nadu Act introduced a system of licensing of private educational institutions. The relevant statutory provision merely said that the State Government "may grant or refuse to grant permission". The only procedural safeguard laid down was that the permission would not be refused "unless the applicant has been given an opportunity of making his representa-tion". Thus, the licensing authority could grant or refuse to grant a license but he could not refuse without giving to the applicant an opportunity to make a representation.

The Supreme Court held the provision unconstitutional under Art. 19(1)(g) in Parasuraman.[94] There was no criteria laid down for the government to adopt in exercising its licensing power. "The result is that the power to grant or refuse permission is to be exercised according to the whims of the authority and it may differ from person to person holding the office." The government was left with "unrestricted and unguided discretion" which rendered the provision "unfair and discriminatory" vis-a-vis Art. 19(1)(g). The power to cancel a license on contravention of any direction issued by the competent authority was held to suffer from the vice of arbitrariness.

The criteria laid down in the Railway Tourist Agent Rules for recognition of a person as an authorised railway tourist agent have been held to be not irrelevant or arbitrary.[95] A rule in the Motor Vehicles Rules laying down a scheme for the evaluation of the merits of various applicants for a stage carriage permit, and giving preference to new entrants for short routes, has been held valid under Art. 19(1)(g) as it is salutary and avoids monopoly.[96] A provision giving preference to an application from state transport undertaking for operating in any interstate route has been held valid.[97]

---

92. Vishnu Dayal v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1489 : (1974) 2 SCC 306; M.G. Beedi Works v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1832 : (1974) 4 SCC 43; S.C. Dogra v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1984 HP 29.

93. AIR 1970 SC 1453 : (1969) 2 SCC 166. But see, Manick Chand v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1249 : (1984) 3 SCC 65.
Also see, JAIN, CASES, Ch. XV, Sec. D(V); Union of India v. Annam Ramaligam, AIR 1985 SC 1014.
Also see, JAIN, CASES, 1854-1856.

94. A.N. Parasuraman v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 40 : (1989) 4 SCC 683.

95. Inder Mal Jain v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 415 : (1984) 1 SCC 361.

96. P. Venkaiah v. G. Krishna Rao, AIR 1981 SC 1910 : (1981) 4 SCC 105.

97. Sher Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 200 : (1984) 1 SCC 107.

In a scheme for distribution of foodstuffs through fair price shops run by government, giving preference to co-operative societies is not violative of Art. 19(1)(g).[1] Co-operative societies play positive and progressive role in country's economy and, most surely, in the fair and effective distribution of foodstuffs.

The Customs House Agents Licensing Rules, 1960, restricted the number of such licences to be issued. This was held valid for "a profession or trade has sometimes to be limited in the public interest", e.g., porters at a railway station, taxi cabs, etc. A rule vesting authority in the customs collector to reject an application for licence if the applicant was not considered "suitable" was held invalid as it vested discretion in the collector to reject a candidate for 'trumpery reasons'. The collector was not required to state his reasons for rejecting an application. The rule authorising the collector to cancel a licence for failure to comply with the rules was held valid as rules were made for compliance and not for breach, and there was the safeguard of an appeal to a higher authority.[2]

A provision in the Calcutta Municipal Act required a licence for use of premises for a purpose which in the opinion of the corporation was dangerous to life, health or property. The opinion of the corporation was made conclusive as it could not be challenged in a Court. The provision was declared to be unreasonable under Art. 19(6) as it put carrying on of a business entirely at the mercy of the corporation.[3]

Similarly, a rule conferring an uncontrolled power to cancel a licence, without stipulating that reasons be given and some procedure be followed by the licensing authority for the purpose, is not reasonable.[4] A provision providing for cancellation of licence for specified causes, and after giving reasonable opportunity of hearing to the licensee, is valid.[5] Even under a valid provision, an administrative order cancelling the licence will be quashed if it does not fulfil the condition laid down, or if the concerned administrative officer is biased against the licensee, or if a reasonable opportunity of hearing is not given. The function of cancelling a licence has been characterised as quasi-judicial and, therefore, rules of natural justice must be followed.[6]

The Bihar Mica Act, 1948, introduced a licensing system to regulate trading in mica in the State. S. 25 authorised the State Government to cancel the license on the grounds stated therein. Before cancelling a license, it was necessary to furnish the grounds to the licensee and afford him a reasonable opportunity to show cause against cancellation. The Supreme Court in Mineral Development Ltd. v.

---

1. Sarkari Sasta Anaj Vikreta Sangh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 2030 : (1981) 4 SCC 471; M.P. Ration Vikreta Sangh Society v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1982 SC 2001.
Also, Krishna Kakkanth v. State of Kerala, (1997) 9 SCC 495 : AIR 1997 SC 128.

2. Chandrakant Krishnarao Pradhan v. Collector of Customs, AIR 1962 SC 204 : 1962 (3) SCR 108; JAIN, CASES, III, 1859-1867.

3. Corp. of Calcutta v. Tramways Co. Ltd., AIR 1964 SC 1279 : (1964) 5 SCR 25.

4. Ganpati v. Ajmer, AIR 1955 SC 188 : (1955) 1 SCR 1065. Kishan Chand Arora v. Commr. of Police, AIR 1961 SC 705 : (1961) 3 SCR 135, sustaining power to cancel a licence without any procedure being followed does not now represent good law.

5. Sukhwinder Pal Bipan Kumar v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 SC 65 : (1982) 1 SCC 31; Fedco v. Bilgrami, AIR 1960 SC 415 : (1960) 2 SCR 408.

6. Mahabir Prasad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 1302 : (1970) 1 SCC 764; supra; Mohd. Hameed v. Collector, Hyderabad, AIR 1974 A.P. 119.

State of Bihar[7] held the provisions reasonable. The discretion to cancel the licence was vested in the highest executive authority in the State which ordinarily could be relied upon to discharge the duties honestly and in public interest. The provision provided clearly ascertainable standards for the State Government to apply to the facts of each case and due procedural safeguards had been provided to the licensee.

Video games being games of chance and not of skill, broad discretion may be conferred on the licensing authority to regulate such games. However, a restriction imposed must not be arbitrary. Action of the concerned authority must be informed by reason. An action uninformed by reason may be regarded as arbitrary. The action of the concerned authority must be founded upon relevant grounds of public interest.[8]

S. 4(1) of the Chit Funds Act, 1982, says that no chit is to be commenced without the previous sanction of the State Government. S. 4(3) gives guidance to the State Government for granting and/or refusing to grant previous sanction. The Supreme Court held the provisions to be regulatory in nature and not violative of Art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution.[9]

Ordinarily a licence may be suspended (pending inquiry for cancellation) without giving any hearing to the licensee, for suspension is a preliminary stage and inquiry must be held before cancellation.[10]

S. 8B of the Imports Control Order empowers the Central Government or the Chief Controller of Imports and Exports to keep in abeyance applications for licences or allotment of imported goods for 6 months in public interest where any investigation is pending into any allegation against a licensee or importer. No reasons need be given.

The Supreme Court has ruled in Liberty Oil Mills v. Union of India[11] that such an order cannot be made without due investigation and without giving a reasonable opportunity to the affected party. "Procedural fairness embodying natural justice is to be implied whenever action is taken affecting the rights of parties." The abeyance order must be communicated to the concerned person. Reasons must exist for the decision since "the decision may only be taken if the authority is satisfied that the grant of the licence or allotment of imported goods will not be in the public interest." An outline of the allegations must be given to provide an opportunity to the person affected to make representation. In this case, however, the opportunity of hearing had to be post-decisional.

The trade of money lending was sought to be regulated through a licensing system. The power given to the licensing officer to forfeit security furnished by a licensee on contravention of the licence terms was held to be unreasonable as there were many other adequate provisions for ensuring compliance with the conditions of the licence.[12]

---

7. AIR 1960 SC 468 : 1960 (2) SCR 609. Also see, Chandrakant Saha v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 314 : (1979) 1 SCC 285.
8. M.J. Sivani v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1995 SC 1770 : (1995) 6 SCC 289.
9. Shriram Chits and Investment (P.) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 2063.
10. Sukhwinder Pal Bipan Kumar v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 SC 65 : (1982) 1 SCC 31; JAIN, CASES, III, 1856-1867.
11. AIR 1984 SC 1271 : (1984) 3 SCC 465.
12. Sate of Kerala v. Monarch Investments, AIR 1992 SC 493 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 208.

(m) MOVEMENT OF GOODS

Clause 3 of the Cotton Textiles (Control of Movement) Order, 1948, provided that no person should transport by rail, road, sea or inland navigation any cloth or yarn except under a permit issued by the Textile Commissioner. The restriction was held valid for to leave transport of essential commodities uncontrolled would seriously hamper the supply of such commodities to the public. The Textile Commissioner did not have an unregulated and arbitrary power to refuse or grant a permit, because the discretion given to him was to be exercised so as to effectuate the policy underlying the order, viz., to regulate the import of cotton textiles so as to ensure its even distribution in the country and make it available at a fair price to all. The conferment of such discretion could not be regarded as invalid.[13]

A perusal of the Court's opinion leaves the impression that the Court has taken a more relaxed view with respect to movement permits than trading licences. The reason for this may be that whereas without a licence a person could not at all carry on his trade, a restriction on movement affects only one aspect of the total trade leaving the rest free. Therefore, Courts insist on better safeguards in case of administrative discretion relating to trading licences than in the case of issue of movement permits.[14]

(n) REQUISITIONING OF STOCKS

The Rajasthan Foodgrains Control Order authorised administrative authority to freeze any stocks of foodgrains held by a person and also to requisition and dispose of such stocks at the government procurement price. Objection was taken to it on the ground that an absolute discretion had been conferred on the administrative authority. The Court, however, observed that though the specific rule in question did not mention the grounds on which stocks could be frozen, yet the parent Act, viz., the Essential Supplies Act, 1946, did lay down the policy, and the freezing of stocks was reasonably related to that object, and so the clause was valid. The power to requisition stocks at a rate fixed by it and dispose of such stocks at any rate in its discretion vested an unrestrained authority to requisition stocks of foodgrains at an arbitrary price and so was invalid.[15]

(o) PRICE FIXING

A regulatory power over trade and commerce, of great significance in modern times, conceded to the Administration under several legal provisions, is that of price-fixing of commodities. A balance has to be drawn here between the interests of the manufacturers as well as of the consumers. The Courts have in several cases considered the question of scope of such a power and subject to what safeguards it should be conferred on the Administration. The basic norm in this case, as in other cases, is that unlimited discretion to fix prices should not be conferred on administrative authorities.

In the earlier cases, the Supreme Court appeared to insist that the relevant law should lay down the considerations which the price-fixing authority must keep in

---

13. Harishankar Bagla v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 455 : 1955 (1) SCR 216.
Also, Chinta Lingam v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 474 : (1970) 3 SCC 768.
14. Chinta Lingam v. Union of India, ibid.
15. State of Rajasthan v. Nathmal, AIR 1954 SC 307 : 1954 SCR 982.
Also see, supra, sub-sec. (f).

mind while fixing prices. Thus, in Dwarka Prasad,[16] the very first case on price-fixing, the statutory formula for fixing prices mentioned 8 items, of these, six were fixed but two left some marginal discretion to the executive. The formula was held to be good, the Court stating that "arbitrary power unregulated by any rule or principle" was bad, and that discretion should not be absolute. But, in later cases, the rigours of this judicial stand have been very much diluted.

Clause 11B of the Iron and Steel Order, 1941, issued by the Central Government, authorised the Iron Controller to fix maximum prices to sell iron. Such prices could differ for iron and steel obtainable from different sources, and could include allowances for contribution to, and payment from, an equalisation fund established by the Controller. No more guidance was given to the Controller in the matter of fixing prices, yet the Order was held valid on the ground that since the parent Act, the Essential Supplies Act, laid down the policy, the Order could not be regarded as conferring uncontrolled power on the Controller to fix prices.[17]

This judicial approach does not appear to be satisfactory. The parent Act [The Essential Commodities Act, 1955] applies not only to iron and steel but to a number of commodities, and not only to price-fixing but to regulation of all aspects of trade in essential commodities. Therefore, the policy laid down in the Act is in very general terms, and is hardly of much efficacy to control administrative discretion. The necessary elements going into price-fixing are bound to vary from commodity to commodity, and one general formula applicable to all commodities can hardly be adequate. It is, therefore, necessary that specific considerations applicable to price-fixing of individual commodities be laid down separately. It is only when this is done that Courts can evaluate whether or not relevant considerations have been followed by the administration in fixing the price of the concerned commodity.

An order authorised the controller to fix the price of ice. Four factors were stated in the order which the controller had to take in view while fixing the price. The High Court upheld the formula saying that it gave enough, clear and effective guidelines to the controller to fix prices, and it excluded any chance of capricious or arbitrary fixation of price for the manufacturers.[18]

The Courts do not insist on any procedural safeguards in this area.[19] Price-fixing is regarded more in the nature of a legislative power than an administrative power and, consequently, the rules of natural justice are not required to be followed.[20] The Supreme Court once emphasized that the price fixed should be fair and not arbitrary; that it should not be below the cost of production: that the price should not be fixed on extraneous considerations; and if the price is fixed in such a manner that the producer is enabled to recover his cost of production and secure a reasonable margin of profit, no aspect of Fundamental Right under Art. 19(1)(g) is infringed.[21]

---

16. Dwarka Pd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 224 : 1954 SCR 803.
17. Union of India v. Bhanamal Gulzarimal, AIR 1960 SC 475 : 1960 (2) SCR 627.
18. New India Industrial Corp. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1980 Del 277.
19. Diwan Sugar Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1959 SC 626 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 123.
20. Saraswati I. Syndicate v. Union of India, AIR 1975 SC 460 : (1974) 2 SCC 630.
21. Shree Meenakshi Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 366 : (1974) 1 SCC 468.

In spite of this norm, except in one case, viz., Premier Automobiles,[22] the Supreme Court has not interfered with any price-fixing order. In the Iron price case,[23] the Court said that in considering the validity of a price fixed, it was not enough to show that a particular stock-holder suffered loss in respect of particular transactions. What was to be proved was the general effect of the price in question on all classes of dealers taken as a whole. If it were shown that in a large majority of cases, the impugned price fixed would adversely affect the Fundamental Right of the dealers guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(g), then it might constitute a serious infirmity in the price fixed. In Meenakshi,[24] a case dealing with fixation of yarn prices, the Supreme Court refused to intervene stating that even if some producers sustained loss for sometime, it would not be regarded as an unreasonable restriction for the purpose of price fixation was not only to consider the profit of the manufacturer but also to hold the price line. Trade and commerce undergoes periods of prosperity and adversity because of economic, social or political factors. The price fixed had not been shown to be 'arbitrary' or 'so grossly inadequate that it not only results in huge losses but also is a threat to the supply position of yarn'.[84]

In the matter of fixation of sugar price, items of cost have to be standardised on the basis of representative cross-section of reasonably efficient and economic manufacturing units in a region and it is impractical to take into account the costs incurred by each individual unit.[25] In Saraswati Syndicate,[26] the Court rejected the writ petition challenging an order fixing ex-factory price of sugar issued under Cl. 7 of the Sugar (Control) Order, 1966. The Court ruled that the price fixed was not shown to be inadequate and there was no breach of any mandatory duty which could justify the issue of mandamus. The Court would not interfere if the basis adopted was not shown to be so patently unreasonable as to be in excess of the price-fixing power. In fixing fair price, no doubt, the criteria adopted must be reasonable and reasonable margin of profit judged by average standard of efficiency should be provided for, but in the instant case, however, the price fixed was not shown to be erroneous or unreasonable, and the government had not acted arbitrarily or unreasonably or taken into consideration any extraneous matter.

The Central Government fixed the retention price for each producer of aluminium and its sale price under the Aluminium Control Order, 1970, made under the Essential Commodities Act, 1955. The difference between the two prices was paid into the Aluminimum Regulation Account. Out of this fund, contributions were made to the producer whose retention price was higher than the sale price. The scheme of price fixation was held valid in Union of India v. Hindustan Aluminium Corp. Ltd.[27] as it was adopted in the interest of the consumer which was of paramount consideration. "The interest of producers or manufacturers of an

---

22. Premier Automobiles v. Union of India, AIR 1972 SC 1690 : (1972) 2 SCR 526, see below.
23. The Bhanamal Gulzarimal case, supra.
24. Meenakshi Mills' case, supra, footnote 21.
25. Anakapalle Co-op. Society v. Union of India, AIR 1973 SC 734 : (1973) 3 SCC 435; Panipat Co-op. S. Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1973 SC 537 : (1973) 1 SCC 129.
In these cases, the Supreme Court considered the fixation of ex-mill price of sugar under s. 3(3C) of the Essential Commodities Act, 1955, which lays down the elements for the purpose. On Essential Commodities, also see, supra, sub-sec. (f).
26. Supra, footnote 20.
27. AIR 1983 Cal. 307.

essential commodity is no doubt a factor to be taken into consideration, but surely it is of much lesser importance and must yield to the interest of the general public who are the consumers." The loss to industry for a temporary period is no ground to set aside the price fixation of an essential commodity. The Court, however, did emphasize that the government should see that the loss was not perpetual and huge resulting in the closure of the industry.

In Premier Automobiles, the Court considered the concept of fair price under section 18G of the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act, 1951, in relation to the fixing of car prices. The Court explained that it "takes in all the elements which make it fair for the consumer leaving a reasonable margin of profit to the manufacturer without which no one will engage in any manufacturing activity". In the instant case, the Court asked the government to review car prices every six months. The fact that in Premier Automobiles, the Court showed some consideration for the interests of the manufacturers may be because a car is not an essential commodity.

In Deepak Theatres, Dhuri v. State of Punjab,[28] the Supreme Court has ruled that the power to fix rates of admission to cinema theatres can be validly conferred on the Administration vis-a-vis Art. 19(1)(g) as such a power is clothed with public interest.

On the whole, it appears that the Courts have no inclination to police the area of price-fixation. The Courts have conceded a great deal of discretion to the executive in this area. The Courts lean more towards the interests of the consumer rather than that of the manufacturer. As the Supreme Court has said: "No price fixation order need guarantee profit to an establishment in respect of each unit of article served or sold. It is the over-all picture in the trade and commerce that needs to be examined."[29] The Administration enjoys quite a good deal of flexibility and it is extremely difficult to challenge successfully a price-fixing order in a Court. The main reason is that the considerations entering into this area are primarily of an economic nature which the Courts can evaluate only superficially, and most of the time they would defer to the administrative judgment in this regard. In this connection, the Supreme Court has said in Prag Ice & Oil Mills.[30] "In the ultimate analysis, the mechanics of price fixation has necessarily to be left to the judgment of the executive and unless it is patent that there is hostile discrimination against a class of operators, the processual basis of price fixation has to be accepted in the generality of cases as valid."

In the area of the regulation of trade and commerce, the judiciary has hitherto laid more stress on social control and has devalued the individual interest of the trader or the manufacturer. So far, the tenor of Court cases by and large has been to expand the area of social control over trade and commerce and correspondingly to reduce the scope of protection and safeguard to individual interest.

In the Chintaman Rao case,[31] the Supreme Court had emphasized that a reasonable restriction is one which is not in excess of the requirements of the case. This test involves a drawing of balance between, and a relative evaluation of, the interest of the individual and the exigencies of public control. In the judicial

---

28. AIR 1992 SC 1519 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 684.
29. Welcome Hotel v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 1015 : (1983) 4 SCC 575.
30. Prag Ice & Oil Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 1296 : (1978) 3 SCC 459.
31. Supra.

evaluative process of the restrictions under Art. 19(6), however, this approach has by and large been ignored. The consideration whether in a given situation the restriction imposed is in excess of the needs of social control has been rather absent in judicial pronouncements.

In this area, the Courts have shown much deference to the legislative and administrative judgment. Hitherto, the judicial approach appears to have been very much coloured by the prevailing philosophy of a socialist pattern of society in the country. But, it remains to be seen, whether, in course of time, this judicial attitude will undergo a change in view of the toning down of the socialist rhetoric and the contemporary philosophy of liberalisation and privatisation.

CHAPTER XXXV

SAFEGUARDS TO MINORITIES, SCHEDULED CASTES, SCHEDULED TRIBES AND BACKWARD CLASSES

SYNOPSIS

A. GENERAL

India has a composite population, having a number of groups based on religion, language, caste, ethnicity or backwardness, such as, the Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes, Anglo-Indians, Muslims, Parsis, Sikhs, Indian Christians, etc.

The minority problem very much influenced and coloured the political life of the country before Independence. The major problem at the time was regarding the Muslim minority and this led to the partition of the country. That diluted, to some extent, the Muslim minority problem, but did not solve completely the minority problem, as such, because a number of other minority groups, as well as a large number of Muslims, are still present in the country.

The framers of the Indian Constitution took care to safeguard the interests of the minorities, to give them a sense of security, to protect them against any discrimination, and to help them to get integrated in the main stream of national life.[1] With this in view, a number of provisions have been incorporated in the Constitution for safeguarding specifically the social, economic and educational interests of minority groups. In addition, certain general constitutional provisions, e.g., Fundamental Rights, protect some of the rights of the minority groups.

The policy of the Constitution is to do away with caste and to strive to create a casteless society. There is thus neither any safeguard to any one specifically based on caste except to the Scheduled Castes, to some extent, nor is there any discrimination against anyone on the basis of caste.

Another policy-objective of the Constitution is to make the government secular. The Constitution does not recognise any religion for any kind of favoured treatment, but treats all religions alike, and protects the cultural or religious practices of all people from state interference.[2] Although under Arts. 15(4) and 16(4),[3] reservations can be made in educational institutions and public services for socially and educationally backward classes, no reservation or special representation has been made for these classes either in the House of the People or in the State Legislative Assemblies.[4]

The Constitution does not define the term 'Minority'. The Constitution uses the term 'minority' only twice. Once in the marginal note to Art. 29, but in the text of the Article the expression used is "Any section of the citizens…. having a distinct language, script or culture of its own…."[5] The emphasis of Art. 29, thus, is on linguistic and cultural minorities. Again, in Art 30, the expression used is

---

1. For discussion in the Constituent Assembly, see III CAD, 211-314.
Reference may also be made to: MARC GALANTER, Protective Discrimination for Backward Classes in India, 3 JILI, 38 (1961), and Competing Equalities: N. RADHA KRISHNAN, Reservation to Backward Classes, 13 Indian Y.B. on Int'l Affairs, 293 (1964) and Units of Social and Economic Educational Backwardness: Caste and Individual 7 JILI, 262 (1965); ILI, EDUCATIONAL PLANNING (1967); Imam, Reservation of Seats for Backward Classes in Public Services and Educational Institutions, 8 JILI 441 (1966); ILI, MINORITIES AND THE LAW (1972); REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON UNTOUCHABILITY (1969).
2. Supra, Chs. XXIX and XXX.
3. See, supra, Chs. XXII, Sec. C and XXIII, Sec. E.
4. See, supra, Chs. II and VI.
5. Ch. XXX, Sec. A, supra.

"All minorities, whether based on religion or language…." Art. 30 thus refers to linguistic or religious minorities.[6]

The National Minorities Commission[7] treats Muslims, Christians, Sikhs, Buddhists and Zoroastrians as religious minorities at the national level because their numerical strength as compared with the rest of the Indian citizens is smaller.

(a) FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

A wide range of minority rights are covered by the provisions relating to the Fundamental Rights. Arts. 14[8], 15,[9] 16,[10] 25,[11] 26[12] and 29(2)[13] seek to protect them from hostile and discriminatory State action. Arts. 15(2),(4),(5)[14], 16(3),(4),(4A),(4B)[15], 17[16], 23[17] and 25(2)(b)[18] seek to remove social and economic disabilities of the depressed classes of people. Arts. 25 to 30 safeguard religion and culture of minority groups in India.[19]

(b) DIRECTIVE PRINCIPLES

Besides the Fundamental Rights, certain Directive Principles obligate the State to ensure the welfare of certain sections of the people.[20]

Article 46 requires the state to take special care in promoting educational and economic interests of the weaker sections of the people, and, in particular, of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.[21]

Article 38 requires the state to promote the welfare of the people by securing a social order based on justice.[22]

(c) ELECTIONS

According to Art. 325, there is to be only one general electoral roll and no person is ineligible for being included therein on the ground only of religion, race, caste or sex.[23] Thus, all discrimination is barred in matters of election. Adult suffrage also strengthens the political position of the minorities as the political parties constantly vie with each other to woo them.

The purpose of all the provisions, mentioned above, is to integrate the minorities into one mainstream of national life and thus keep in check the divisive forces which may otherwise be released by the existence of several minority

---

6. See, supra, Ch. XXX, Sec. B(b).
7. For discussion on the National Minorities Commission, see, Sec. G(e), infra.
8. Supra, Ch. XXI.
9. Supra, Ch. XXII.
10. Supra, Ch. XXIII.
11. Supra, Ch. XXIX.
12. Supra, Ch. XXIX.
13. Supra, Ch. XXX.
14. Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. A(b).
15. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. D(a).
16. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. I.
17. Supra, Ch. XXVIII, Sec. A..
18. Supra, Chs. XXIX, Sec. B(e).
19. Supra, Chs. XXIX and XXX.
20. Supra, Ch. XXXIV.
21. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D.
22. Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D, supra.
23. Supra, Ch. XIX.

groups. The Constitution while extending safeguards to minorities also seeks to weld and integrate the diverse elements into one political and national life. That is why the system of separate electorates was not adopted and elections to all legislatures are held on the basis of joint electorates.[24]

Besides the above, there are some other constitutional provisions directed towards specific groups of people, and conferring benefits on them.

B. SCHEDULED CASTES

The Constitution treats the Scheduled Castes in India with special favour and affords them with some valuable safeguards. Arts. 14, 15 and 16 of the Constitution confer several benefits of social and economic advancement and empowerment and social equality of status and dignity of person, by providing reservation in government services and in educational institutions for the Scheduled Castes and Schedule Tribes.[25]

The Scheduled Castes are not, strictly speaking, a racial, linguistic or religious minority. They are part and parcel of the Hindu society. They are the depressed sections of the Hindus who have suffered for long under social handicaps and thus need special protection and help for the amelioration of their social, economic and political conditions.

They are known as untouchables or Harijans and constitute nearly 15 per cent of the Indian population. They usually engage themselves in the so-called dirty jobs like tanning and skinning of hides, manufacture of leather goods, sweeping of streets, scavenging, etc. Even amongst the Harijans, there are high and low, at the lowest rung of the ladder being the bhangi.

The framers of the Constitution were determined to eradicate the scourge of untouchability. With this in view, Art. 17 abolishes untouchability[26] and Art. 25(2)(b) provides for opening of Hindu temples to the Harijans.[27] To promote their educational and economic interests, Arts. 15(4) &(5) and 16 provide for reservation of seats for them in educational institutions and in government services.[28]

C. SCHEDULED TRIBES

The Scheduled Tribes [S/T], also known as aborigines, are those backward sections of the Indian population who still observe their tribal ways, their own peculiar customs and cultural norms. The tribal people have remained backward because of the fact that they live in inaccessible forests and hilly regions and have thus been cut off from the main currents of national life.

---

24. Report of the Advisory Committee on Minorities. Also, ILI, Minorities, supra, footnote 1, 2004, at 23-25.

25. S. Nagarajan v. District Collector, Salem, AIR 1997 SC 935 : (1997) 2 SCC 571.
See, Chs. XXI, XXII and XXIII, supra.

26. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. I.
The title of the Untouchability (Offences) Act has now been changed to the Protection of Civil Rights Act, 1955.

27. Supra, Ch. XXIX, Sec. B(e).

28. Supra, Chs. XXII, Sec. C and XXIII Sec. G.

These people are divided into four distinct zones—North, Eastern, Central and Southern. The three main characteristics of these people are their primitive way of living, nomadic habits, love for drink and dance and habitation in remote and inaccessible areas.[29] They constitute nearly 7.5 per cent of the country's total population. The Constitution enjoins to provide facilities and opportunities for development of tribal economic and educational standards.

The Scheduled Tribes also need special provisions for safeguarding their interests. The main problem concerning these people is that their socio-economic conditions be improved at such a pace and in such a way as not to disturb suddenly their social organisation and way of living. The need is to evolve ways and means to gradually adjust the tribal population to changed conditions, and integrate them slowly in the general life of the country without undue and hasty disruption of their way of living.

It has been thought that it may be harmful to the tribal people if they are brought into indiscriminate contact with the outside world. Thus, the Legislatures have been empowered to impose restrictions on the Fundamental Rights guaranteed by Arts. 19(1)(d), 19(1)(e) and 19(1)(f) in the interests of the Scheduled Tribes,[30] in order that movement of people from developed areas to tribal areas may be restricted so that the tribal people are not exploited by outsiders. Laws have, therefore, been enacted prohibiting the entry of non-tribals into the tribal areas without permits, living of non-tribals permanently in tribal areas, and transfer of tribal land to non-tribals. Further, to protect the interests of the tribal people who are simple and less-politically conscious, separate provisions have been made for the administration of the tribal areas.[31] Reservation of seats can also be made for them in educational institutions and government services under Arts. 15(4),(5), 16(4), 41, 46 and 335.[32]

(a) IDENTIFICATION OF S/Cs AND S/Ts

The Constitution does not specify the castes or the tribes which are to be called as the Scheduled Castes or the Scheduled Tribes. It leaves the power to list these castes and tribes to the President, i.e., the Central Executive.

Scheduled Castes, according to Art. 366(24) read with Art. 341, are those castes, races or tribes, or parts thereof, as the President may notify. According to Art. 341(1), the President may by public notification specify what castes, races or tribes, or groups thereof in each State and Union Territory would be regarded as the Scheduled Castes for the purposes of the Constitution in relation to that State or Union Territory. Thus, the lists of the Scheduled Castes may vary from State to State and one Union Territory to another.

As regards the States, the President issues the notification after consultation with the Governor of the State concerned.

The purpose of this provision is to avoid disputes as to whether a particular caste, race or tribe should be specified as a Scheduled Caste or not. Only those castes, races or tribes can be characterised as Scheduled Castes which are noti-

---

29. First Report of the Commissioner for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, 3, 11 (1952).
30. Supra, Chs. XXIV, Sec. G and XXXI, Sec. B.
31. Art. 244; supra, Ch. IX, Sec. C.
32. Supra, Chs. XXII, Sec. C; XXIII, Sec. E; XXXIV, Sec. D and infra, this Chapter.

fied in the Presidential Order under Art. 341. To determine whether or not a particular caste, race or tribe is a Scheduled Caste or not in a State, one has to look only at the notification issued by the President under Art. 341.[33]

The Supreme Court has expressed in Milind[34] that the words "castes" or "tribes" in the expression "Scheduled Castes" and "Scheduled Tribes" have not been used in the ordinary sense of the terms but are used in the sense of the definitions contained in Arts. 366(24) and 366(25). In this view, a caste is a "Scheduled Caste" or a tribe is a "Scheduled Tribe" only if they are included in the President's Orders issued under Arts. 341 and 342.

It has been held that a person belong to S/C in one State cannot be deemed to be so in relation to any other State to which he migrates for the purpose of employment or education. Lists of S/Cs are declared in relation to each State separately.[35]

Under Art. 341(2), however, once the notification is issued by the President under Art. 341(1), any modifications therein, by way either of including or excluding from the list any caste, race or tribe or a part or a group thereof, can be made by Parliament by law and not by a Presidential notification. This means that the entries in the Presidential notification issued under Art. 341(1) have to be taken as final unless altered by Parliament by law.[36] The Constitutional mandate thus is that it is the President who is empowered, in consultation with the Governor of the State, to specify by a public notification the castes, races or tribes or parts or groups within castes, races and tribes which shall, for the purposes of the Constitution, be deemed to be Scheduled Castes in relation to that State.

It is not open to any one to include any caste as coming within the notification on the basis of evidence—oral or documentary—if the caste in question is not specifically mentioned in the notification. It is therefore not possible to give evidence that a particular caste is a Scheduled Caste even though not mentioned in the Presidential Order.[37]

Even the court cannot modify, add or subtract any entry in the Presidential Order. The function of the court is to interpret what an entry in the PO is intended to mean.[37] In Pankaj,[38] the Supreme Court has observed :

---

33. K. Adhikanda Patra v. Gandua, AIR 1983 Ori 89; E.V. Chinnaiah v. State of A.P., (2005) 1 SCC 394, at page 409; State of Maharashtra v. Mana Adim Jamat Mandal, (2006) 4 SCC 98.

34. Maharashtra v. Milind, AIR 2001 SC 393 : (2001) 1 SCC 4.
Also see, footnote 45, infra.

35. Marri Chandra Shekhar Rao v. Dean, Seth G.S. Medical College, (1990) 3 SCC 130 : (1990) 2 SCR 843; MCD v. Veena, AIR 2001 SC 2749 : (2001) 6 SCC 571 at page 574; U.P. Public Service Commission v. Sanjay Kumar Singh, (2003) 7 SCC 657, at page 658 : AIR 2003 SC 3626.

36. B. Basavalingappa v. D. Munichinappa, AIR 1965 SC 1269 : (1965) 1 SCR 316. Also, Parsram v. Shivchand, AIR 1969 SC 597 : (1969) 1 SCC 20; Kumari Madhuri Patil v. Addl. Commr., Tribal Development, AIR 1995 SC 94 : (1994) 6 SCC 241; K.S. Vijaylakshmi v. Tahsildar, Palakkad, AIR 2000 Ker. 262; S. Swvigaradoss v. Zonal Manager, F.C.I., AIR 1996 SC 1182 : (1996) 3 SCC 100.

37. Srish Kumar Choudhury v. State of Tripura, AIR 1990 SC 991 : 1990 Supp SCC 220. Also see, Vimal Ghosh v. State of Kerala, AIR 1997 Ker 237; State of Maharashtra v. Mana Adim Jamat Mandal, (2006) 4 SCC 98, at page 102 : AIR 2006 SC 3446.

38. Pankaj Kumar Saha v. The Sub-Divisional Officer, Islampur, (1996) AIR SCW 1943 : (1996) 8 SCC 264. Also, Nityanand Sharma v. State of Bihar, 1996 AIR SCW 782 : 1996 (3) SCC 576. See also Raju Ramsing Vasave v. Mahesh Deorao Bhivapurkar, (2008) 9 SCC 54.

> "It is now settled law that….the Court is devoid of power to include or exclude from or substitute or declare synonyms to be a Scheduled Caste or Scheduled Tribe."

It is for Parliament to amend the list and include therein, or exclude therefrom, any caste, race or tribe.

The purpose of Art. 341(1) is to avoid all disputes as to whether a particular caste is a Scheduled Caste or not for purposes of the Constitution. It is the President's notification issued under Art. 341(1), which determines whether a particular caste is a Scheduled Caste or not.[39] If a particular caste is not mentioned in the Presidential Order, it cannot be characterised as a Scheduled Caste.[40] Only those castes can be regarded as Scheduled Castes which are notified in the PO made under Art. 341. The Supreme Court has observed as regards the President's power under Art. 341:[41]

> "It is obvious that in specifying castes, races or tribes, the President has been expressly authorised to limit the notification to parts of or groups within the castes, races or tribes, and that must mean that after examining the educational and social backwardness of a caste, race or tribe, the President may well come to the conclusion that not the whole caste, race or tribe, but parts of or groups within them would be specified. Similarly, the President can specify castes, races or tribes or parts thereof in relation not only to the entire State, but in relation to parts of the State where he is satisfied that the examination of the social and educational backwardness of the race, caste or tribe justifies such specification. In fact, it is well known that before a notification is issued under Art. 341(1), an elaborate enquiry is made and it is as a result of this inquiry that social justice is sought to be done to the castes, races or tribes as may appear to be necessary, and in doing justice, it would obviously be expedient not only to specify parts or groups of castes, races or tribes, but to make the said specification by reference to different areas in the State. Educational and social backwardness in regard to these castes, races or tribes may not be uniform or of the same intensity in the whole of the State; it may vary in degree or in kind in different areas and may justify the division of the Sate into convenient and suitable areas for the purpose of issuing the public notification in question."

Similarly, Scheduled Tribes, according to Art. 366(25) read with Art. 342, are those tribes or tribal communities, or parts or groups thereof, as the President my notify. The President may specify under Art. 342(1) by public notification what tribes or tribal communities are to be treated as the Scheduled Tribes with respect to each State and Union Territory. A person belonging to a Scheduled Tribe in one State cannot ipso facto claim the same status in another State unless his tribe is declared to be a Scheduled Tribe in relation to that State.[42]

In case of the States, the President issues the notification after consulting the Governor of the State concerned. There is no uniform test for classifying the tribes as the Scheduled Tribes and, therefore, there exist difficulties in determining which tribe can rightly be included in, or excluded from, the schedule of tribes.

---

39. Bhaiyalal v. Harikishan, AIR 1965 SC 1557, 1560 : (1965) 2 SCR 1557.
40. Parsram v. Shivchand, AIR 1969 SC 597 : (1969) 1 SCC 20.
41. Bhaiyalal v. Harikishan, supra, footnote 39.
42. Action Committee v. Union of India, (1994) 5 SCC 244; U.P. Public Service Commission v. Sanjay Kumar Singh, (2003) 7 SCC 657 : AIR 2003 SC 3626; S. Pushpa v. Sivachanmugavelu, (2005) 3 SCC 1 : AIR 2005 SC 1038.

Once these lists have been issued by the President, any later additions or subtractions can be made therein only by a law of Parliament and not by a Presidential notification [Art. 342(2)]. Clarifying the position in this regard, the Supreme Court has observed in State of Maharashtra v. Milind[43] that the Scheduled Tribes Order must be read as it is. It is not even permissible to say that a tribe, sub-tribe, part or group of any tribe or tribal community is synonymous to the one mentioned in the order if they are not so specifically mentioned in it. It is also not at all permissible to hold any enquiry or let in any evidence to decide or declare that any tribe or tribal community or part of or group within any tribe or tribal community is included in the general name even though it is not specifically mentioned in the concerned entry in the said order.[44]

Under the above-mentioned provisions, the President promulgated a number of orders listing the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes, i.e., The Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order, 1950;[45] The Constitution (Scheduled Tribes) Order, 1950;[41] The Constitution (Scheduled Castes—Part C States) Order, 1951, and The Constitution (Scheduled Tribes—Part C States) Order, 1951.

As stated above, once these orders have been issued by the President, no other authority except Parliament, that too by passing a law, can amend these orders.

These orders did not give entire satisfaction to the people and the Central Government received a number of requests for revision and modification of the lists contained in these orders. The Central Government referred all these requests to the Backward Classes Commission.[46] On the recommendation of the Commission, Parliament modified the Presidential Orders by enacting the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes Order (Amendment) Act, 1956.

After the re-organisation of the States on a linguistic basis in 1957,[47] a new Presidential Order was issued under the States' Re-organisation Act. Besides, various other orders have been issued mainly for the Union Territories. The Scheduled Castes & Tribes Orders of 1950 have been further modified by the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes Orders (Amendment) Act, 1976.

The Supreme Court has stated in Ganesh v. State of Maharashtra[48] : "The notification of the President under Art. 342 of the Constitution, subject to the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes Act, 1976, is conclusive and final." Similarly "by virtue of Article 341, the Presidential orders made under Clause (1) thereof acquire an overriding status. But for Articles 341 and 342 of the Constitution, it would have been possible for both the Union and the States, to legislate upon, or frame policies, concerning the subject of reservation, vis-`-vis inclusion of Castes/Tribes. The presence of Articles 338, 338A, 341, 342 in the Constitution clearly preclude that".[49]

---

43. AIR 2001 SC 393 : (2001) 1 SCC 4.

44. Also see, B. Basavalingappa v. D. Munichinnappa, AIR 1965 SC 1269 : (1965) 1 SCR 316; Sirsh Kumar Choudhury v. State of Tripura, AIR 1990 SC 991 : 1990 Supp SCC 220; Nityanand Sharma v. State of Bihar, AIR 1996 SC 2306 : (1996) 35 SCC 576.

45. Bhaiya Ram v. Anirudh, AIR 1971 SC 2533 : (1970) 2 SCC 825; Dadaji v. Sukdeobabu, AIR 1980 SC 150 : (1980) 1 SCC 621; K. Adikanda Patra v. Gandua, AIR 1983 Ori 89; Principal, Guntur Medical College v. Y. Panduranga Rao, AIR 1983 AP 339.

46. See, infra, Sec. D.

47. Ch. V, supra.

48. AIR 1997 SC 2333 : (1997) 4 SCC 340.

49. Subhash Chandra v. Delhi Subordinate Services Selection Board, JT 2009 (10) SC 615, 2009 (11) SCALE 278; Union of India v. Shantiranjan Sarkar, (2009) 3 SCC 90.

The Andhra Pradesh Scheduled Castes (Rationalisation of Reservations) Act, 2000 regrouped the 59 castes found in the Presidential List into 4 separate groups and allotted them different percentage out of the total reservation made for Scheduled Castes as a class. Striking down the Act as unconstitutional,[50] the Supreme Court said that the State cannot claim legislative power to make a law dividing the Scheduled Castes List of the State by tracing its legislative competence to Entry 41 of List II or Entry 25 of List III nor could the principles laid down in Indra Sawhney case[51] for sub-classification of Other Backward Classes be applied as a precedent for sub-classification or sub-grouping Scheduled Castes in the Presidential List. If they are one class under the Constitution, any division of these classes of persons based on any consideration would, apart from being violative of Article 14 of the Constitution, amount to tinkering with the Presidential List and therefore be unconstitutional.[52]

In Subhash Chandra v. Delhi Subordinate Services Selection Board[53] the Supreme Court clarified that there exists a distinction between State Service and State run institutions including Union Territory Services and Union Territory run institutions on the one hand, and the Central Civil Services and the institutions run by the Central Government on the other. In the case of the former, the reservation whether for admission or appointment in an institution and employment or appointment in the services or posts in a State or Union Territory must be confined to the members of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes as notified in the Presidential Orders. But in respect of All India Services, Central Civil Services or admission to an institution run and founded by the Central Government, the members of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes and other reserved category candidates irrespective of their State for which they have been notified are entitled to the benefits thereof.

Clause 3 of the Scheduled Castes Order, 1950, originally declared that "….no person who professes a religion different from Hindusim" would be deemed to be a member of a Scheduled Caste. This para was substituted by the following para of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes Orders (Amendment) Act, 1956 : "….no person who professes a religion different from the Hindu or the Sikh religion shall be deemed to be a member of a Scheduled Caste".

This provision has created some difficulty as is illustrated by Punjabrao v. Meshram,[54] The Supreme Court held in the instant case that under cl. 3 of the Order, only a person professing the Hindu or Sikh religion could belong to a Scheduled Caste, and a person who became a Buddhist and declared that he had ceased to be a Hindu could not derive any benefit from the Order. He could not thus contest election from a constituency reserved for members of the Scheduled Castes.

---

50. E.V. Chinnaiah v. State of A.P., (2005) 1 SCC 394 : AIR 2005 SC 162.
51. 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217.
52. E.V. Chinnaiah v. State of A.P., (2005) 1 SCC 394, at page 414, 418 : (2006) 10 SCALE 472.
53. JT 2009 (10) SC 615, 2009 (11) SCALE 278: See also Kavita Khorwal v.The Delhi University: 154 (2008) DLT 755.
54. AIR 1965 SC 1179 : (1965) 1 SCR 849.
Also see, S. Rajagopal v. C.M. Armugam, AIR 1969 SC 101; Soosai v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 733 : 1985 Supp SCC 590, supra, footnote 29.

To undo the effect of this ruling, the Scheduled Castes order, 1950, has been amended by the Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Orders (Amendment) Act, 1990 which adds the word "Buddhist" after "the Sikh" in cl. 3. This means that a scheduled caste person professing the Buddhist religion does not cease to be a scheduled caste.[55] This Amendment shows that change of religion does not alter the social and economic conditions of the Scheduled Castes.

In Soosai v. Union of India,[56] the Supreme Court has posed the following important question:

> "Whether a Hindu belonging to a Scheduled Caste retains his caste on conversion to Christianity"?

The question becomes relevant to decide whether certain facilities granted to the Scheduled Castes can be denied to a scheduled caste person on changing his religion from Hinduism to another religion. Will this denial amount to discrimination on the ground of 'religion' only and thus be violative of Arts. 14 and 15(1) of the Constitution?

In Soosai the constitutional validity of para 3, mentioned above, was challenged under Art. 14 and Art. 15(I) as being discriminatory on the basis of religion.

In its judgment (delivered by PATHAK, J.), the Court has accepted that "caste was retained on conversion from one religion to another",[57] but the Court has also observed that such an oppressed group of people was part of the Hindu society alone. The Court insisted that to sustain discrimination the petitioner must prove that the disabilities and handicaps suffered from such caste membership in the social order of its origin—Hinduism—continue in their oppressive severity in the new environment of a different religious community as well. In the words of the Court :

> "To establish that paragraph 3 of the Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order, 1950 discriminates against Christian members of the enumerated castes it must be shown that they suffer from a comparable depth of social and economic disabilities and cultural and educational backwardness and similar levels of degradation within the Christian community necessitating intervention by the State under the provisions of the Constitution. It is not sufficient to show that the same caste continues after conversion. It is necessary to establish further that the disabilities and handicaps suffered from such caste membership in the social order of its origin—Hinduism continue in their oppressive severity in the new environment of a different religion community"

In the instant case, no authoritative and detailed dealing with the present conditions of Christian society had been placed before the Court. Accordingly, the Court refused to hold that the President acted arbitrarily in the exercise of his judgment in enacting paragraph 3 of the Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order, 1950.

The Court asserted that it is well established that when violation of Art. 14 or any of its related provisions, is alleged, the burden rests on the petitioner to es-

---

55. Sandipan Bhagwant Thorat v. Ramdas Bandu Athavale, AIR 2002 Bom 110.
56. AIR 1986 SC 733.
57. Ibid., 735.

tablish by clear and cogent evidence that the state has been guilty of arbitrary discrimination. In the instant case, the petitioner had failed to establish his case.[58]

The Supreme Court has also considered another interesting question: when a member of a Scheduled Caste is converted to Christianity and, thereafter, is re-converted to Hinduism, what is his status? The Court has held that reconversion would not entitle him to be automatically treaded as belonging to his original caste, before conversion; he would belong to his original caste if the members of the caste accept him as a member. The caste is a "social combination of persons governed by its rules and regulations," and it may admit a new member just as it can expel an existing member.[59] The Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court has observed on this point in Guntur Medical College[60]:

> "….on conversion to Hinduism, a person born of Christian converts would not become a member of the caste to which his parents belonged prior to their conversion to Christianity, automatically or as a matter of course, but would become such member if the other members of the caste accept him as a member and admit him within the fold."

The Supreme Court has held that a woman when married to a member of a tribe, after due observance of all formalities and after getting the approval of the elders of the tribe, would be regarded as a member of the tribe to which her husband belongs on the analogy of the wife taking the husband's domicile. In the instant case,[61] the husband belonged to the Munda Tribe. His wife sought to contest for a seat in the Lok Sabha from a reserved tribal constituency. It was argued against her that as she was not a member of the Scheduled Tribe, she was not eligible to contest from the reserved seat. The Supreme Court however ruled that as she was duly married to a person from the Munda Tribe, she acquired membership of that tribe.

However, more recently the Supreme Court has held that[62] a woman belonging to a Forward Class marrying a tribal cannot automatically attain the status of tribal unless she has been accepted by the community as one of them, observed all rituals, customs and traditions which have been practised by the tribals from time immemorial and accepted by the community of the village as a member of tribal society. Such acceptance must be by a resolution of the village community which must be entered in the Village Register kept for the purpose. In any event the off-spring of such a marriage would be tribal. On the other hand if a non-tribal man marries a tribal woman, their off-spring would not be tribal.[63] Further, conversion of the parents does not automatically affect the tribal status of the child.[64]

A member of a Scheduled Tribe in one State, on migration to another State, does not carry with him the tribal status if his Tribe is not recognised as such in

---

58. See also State of Kerala v. Chandramohanan, (2004) 3 SCC 429, at page 435 : AIR 2004 SC 1672; Anjan Kumar v. Union of India, (2006) 3 SCC 257, at page 265 : AIR 2006 SC 1177. See, Ch. XXI, supra.

59. C.M. Arumugam v. S. Rajagopal, AIR 1976 SC 939 : (1976) 1 SCC 863.

60. Guntur Medical College v. Mohan Rao, AIR 1976 SC 1904 : (1976) 3 SCC 411.
Also see, W.S.V. Satyanarayana v. Director of Tribal Welfare, AIR 1997 AP 137.

61. N.E. Horo v. Jahanara Jaipal Singh, AIR 1972 SC 1840 : (1972) 1 SCC 771.

62. Anjan Kumar v. Union of India, (2006) 3 SCC 257, at page 261 : AIR 2006 SC 1177.

63. Ibid at page 261.
Ed: The observations appear to be too generalized and requires reconsideration.

64. Lillykutty v. Scrutiny Committee, SC & ST, (2005) 8 SCC 283 : AIR 2005 SC 4.

the other State. Each State has its own list of Tribes [see Art. 342].[65] In the instant case,[66] the petitioner belonged to a Scheduled Tribe in Andhra Pradesh. He migrated to Maharashtra where his Tribe was not listed as a Scheduled Tribe. The Supreme Court ruled that be could not be treated as a member of the Schedule Tribe in Maharashtra though he would be one in Andhra Pradesh. The Court ruled that under Art. 342, the Scheduled Tribes are specified in relation to each State and Union Territory and, therefore, a member of a Scheduled Tribe in one State does not carry that status to another State. But when an area dominated by members of the same tribe belonging to the same region has been bifurcated between two States, the members would continue to get the same benefit when the said tribe is recognized in both the States.[67] This interpretation of Art. 342 is in line with the interpretation of Art. 341 as mentioned above.[68]

A person belonging to a forward class cannot claim the status of a S/T by obtaining a false certificate to that effect for purposes of admission to an educational institution.[69]

(b) CONSTITUTIONAL SAFEGUARDS

Under Art. 330, seats are to be reserved for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes in Lok Sabha. Originally, this reservation was to operate for ten years from the commencement of the Constitution. But this duration has been extended continuously since then by 10 years each time. Now, under the Amendment of the Constitution, enacted in 1999, this reservation is to last until January 25, 2010 [Art. 334(a)][70]. It is felt that the handicaps and disabilities under which these people live have not yet been removed and that they need this reservation for some time more so that their condition may be ameliorated and they may catch up with the rest of the nation.

The reservation for Lok Sabha seats for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes has to be made in each State and Union Territory on population basis. The number of Lok Sabha seats reserved in a State or Union Territory for such Castes and Tribes is to bear, as nearly as possible, the same proportion to the total number of seats allotted to that State or Union Territory in the Lok Sabha as the population of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes (excluding the Scheduled Tribes in the autonomous districts of Assam)[71] in the concerned State or the Union Territory bears to the total population of the State or the Union Territory [Art. 330(2)].

---

65. Supra. See also Sau Kusum v. State of Maharashtra, (2009) 2 SCC 109.
66. Marri Chandra v. Dean, S.G.S. Medical College, (1990) 3 SCC 130 : (1990) 2 SCR 843.
67. Sudhakar Vithal Kumbhare v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 9 SCC 481, at page 483 : AIR 2004 SC 1036.
68. Also see, Kumari Madhuri Patil, infra, footnote 69; Dudh Nath Prasad v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 525 : (2000) 2 SCC 20; State of Uttaranchal v. Sidharth Srivastava, (2003) 9 SCC 336, at page 352 : AIR 2003 SC 4062.
69. Kumari Madhuri Patil v. Addl. Commr. Tribal Development, (1994) 6 SCC 241 : 1994 SCC (125) 1349.
70. The Constitution (One Hundred And Ninth Amendment) Bill, 2009, to amend Article 334 of the Constitution by substituting the words "seventy years" for the words "sixty years" is pending.
71. These Tribal Districts of Assam (Schedule VI) are not under regular administration and the tribes therein are excluded from such representation, supra, Ch. IX, Sec. C.

Similarly, under Art. 332(1), seats are to be reserved for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes (excluding the tribes in the autonomous districts of Assam)[72] in the State Legislative Assemblies. Under Art. 334(a), this reservation is to operate until January 25, 2010.[73] The seats reserved for such Castes and Tribes in a State Legislative Assembly are to bear, as nearly as possible, the same proportion to the total number of seats in the Assembly as the population of such Castes and Tribes in the State bears to the total State population.[74]

By the 42nd Amendment of the Constitution, the number of seats for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in Lok Sabha and the State Legislative Assemblies were frozen at the level of the 1971 census population figures and this number will not be varied until the first census held after the year 2000.[75] A new Constitutional Amendment has now been passed to freeze the seats in the Lok Sabha and State Legislature, at the 2001 census level until the year 2026.[76]

Article 243-T of the Constitution provides for reservation of seats for the Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and women in every municipality and further enables the legislature of a State to make provision for reservation of seats in any municipality or offices of the Chairpersons in the municipalities in favour of Backward Class of citizens. It also mandates that the offices of Chairpersons in the municipalities shall be reserved for the Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and women as the legislature of a State may, by law, provide.

Elections to the reserved seats are held on the basis of a single electoral roll, and each voter in the reserved constituency is entitled to vote. There is no separate electorate. It is not for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes alone to elect their representatives. Thus, to elect a person belonging to such Castes and Tribes to a reserved seat, all the voters in the constituency have a right to vote. This method has been adopted with a view to discourage the differentiation of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes from other people and to gradually integrate them in the main stream of national life. Also, a member of the Scheduled Castes or the Scheduled Tribes is not debarred from contesting a general non-reserved seat.[77]

The fact that reservation of seats in the Legislatures is not on a permanent basis, but is at present provided for a 10 year period at a time, shows that it is envisaged that the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes would ultimately assimilate themselves fully in the political and national life of the country so

---

72. Ibid.

73. The Constitution (Seventy-ninth Amendment) Act, 1999; see, Ch. XLII, infra.

74. Special provisions have been made through Arts. 332(4), (5) and (6) for representation of Autonomous Tribal Districts in the Assam Legislature. Each district has seats in the Legislature in proportion to its population with respect to the total State population; Constituencies in an autonomous district do not comprise any area outside the district; none other than a member of a scheduled tribe of an autonomous district is eligible for election to the Assembly from that district. See Subrata Acharjee v. Union of India, (2002) 2 SCC 725 for reservation of seats for Scheduled Tribes in the Tripura Legislative Assembly on a basis other than the proportion of population.

75. In 1980, there were 78 Harijan and 39 Adivasi members in the Lok Sabha and 546 Harijan and 291 Adivasi members in the Assemblies.

76. See, supra, Chs. II and VI; infra, Ch. XLII.

77. V.V. Giri v. D.S. Dora, AIR 1959 SC 1318 : (1960) 1 SCR 426.See also Bihari Lal Rada v. Anil Jain (Tinu) : (2009) 4 SCC 1.
Also, supra, Ch. XIX.

much so that there would be no need for any special safeguards for them and that there would be no need to draw a distinction between one citizen and another. Their condition would improve so much that they would feel that their interests are secure without any kind of reservation.

(c) CONSIDERATIONS OF EFFICIENCY

The general principle adopted as regards government service is merit, but in case of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes, some relaxation is needed because of their backwardness. Art. 335, therefore, provides that the claims of the members of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes are to be taken into consideration, consistently with the maintenance of efficiency of administration, in making appointments to services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Union or of a State. This provision thus imposes a constitutional obligation on the various governments to take steps to ensure that the claims of members of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes are duly considered in making appointments to government services.

In this connection, reference may be made to the discussion under Arts. 16(1) and 16(4).[78] Art. 16(4) is an enabling provision conferring power on the State to make reservation of posts in favour of any backward class of citizens who, in the opinion of the State Government, are not adequately represented in the State services. In this connection, reference may also be made to Art. 46, a Directive Principle.[79]

Article 335 runs follows :

> "The claims of the members of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes shall be taken into consideration, consistently with the maintenance of efficiency of administration, in the making of appointments to services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Union or of a State."

Article 335 insists on drawing a balance between reservation of posts for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in government posts and maintenance of efficiency in the administration. Art. 335 makes efficiency in administration of paramount importance. Art. 335 makes efficiency in administration an express constitutional limitation upon the discretion vested in the state while making provisions for adequate representation for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.[80]

As the Supreme Court has stated in Indra Sawhney,[81] the provisions of the Constitution must be interpreted in such a manner that a sense of competition is cultivated among all service personnel, including the reserved category.

The Supreme Court has observed in this connection:[82]

> "Art. 335 stipulates that the claims of the members of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes shall be taken into consideration, consistent with the

---

78. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Secs. E and G.
79. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D.
80. Ajit Singh II v. State of Punjab, AIR 1999 SC 3471 : (1999) 7 SCC 209.See also A.P. Public Service Commission v. Baloji Badhavath, (2009) 5 SCC 1.
81. Indra Sawhney I v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217; Indra Sowhney II v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 498.
Also see, Ch. XXIII, Sec. G, supra; see, infra, Sec. E.
82. Ashutosh Gupta v. State of Rajasthan, (2002) 4 SCC 34, 40.

> maintenance of efficiency of administration, in the making of appointment to services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Union or of the State. It is thus, apparent that even in the matter of reservation in favour of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes the founding fathers of the Constitution did make a provision relating to the maintenance of efficiency of administration. In this view of the matter if any statutory provision provides for recruitment of a candidate without bearing in mind the maintenance of efficiency of administration such a provision cannot be sustained, being against the constitutional mandate".

Whether a particular class is adequately represented in the State services or not is a matter which lies within the subjective satisfaction of the concerned government. Although not stated specifically in the Constitution, the same principle of efficiency of administration[83] is to apply to reservation of posts for Other Backward Classes (OBCs) as well.[84]

(d) ADDITIONAL PROVISIONS FOR SCHEDULED TRIBES

The Constitution provides for the appointment of a Minister for Tribal Welfare in each of the States of Bihar, Madhya Pradesh, and Orissa. This Minister can also be put additionally in charge of the welfare of the Scheduled Castes and Backward Classes, or any other work [proviso to Art. 164(1)].[85]

Under Art. 339(1), the President may appoint a Commission at any time, and must appoint it after ten years of the commencement of the Constitution, to report on the welfare of the Scheduled Tribes in the States and the administration of the Scheduled Areas. The Presidential Order appointing the Commission may define its composition, powers and procedure and may make other incidental or ancillary provisions. No such provision has been made in the Constitution as regards the Scheduled Castes.

Article 339(2) empowers the Centre to issue directives to any State giving directions as to the drawing up and execution of schemes specified in the directives to be essential for the welfare of the Scheduled Tribes in the State. Art. 339(2) is supplementary to Art. 275(1)[86] which provides, inter alia, that grants-in-aid shall be payable to a State out of the Consolidated Fund of India for purposes of meeting costs of such schemes of developments as the State may undertake with the approval of the Government of India for promoting the welfare of the Scheduled Tribes in that State. Thus, Art. 275(1) furnishes the raison d'etre of Art. 339. The Central Government has been given the power to give directions as respects such schemes because it pays the cost thereof.

There are special provisions made for administration of the areas known as the Scheduled Areas [Schedules V & VI to the Constitution] which have already been discussed earlier in this book.[87]

The main problem with the Scheduled Tribes is to improve their socio-economic condition not at a very quick pace, but in such a way as not to do violence to their social organisation and way of life. The need is to evolve ways and means of gradual adjustment of the tribal population to the changed conditions,

---

83. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217.
84. See further under Art. 16. On "OBCs", see, infra, Sec. D.
85. Supra, Ch. VII; VII CAD, 521.
86. For Art. 275(1), supra, Ch. XI, Sec. M.
Also see, Art. 164, supra, Ch. VII, Sec. A(ii)(a); supra, footnote 85.
87. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. C.

and their slow integration in the general life of the country without undue and hasty disruption of their way of living.

It has been thought that it may be harmful to the tribal people if they are brought in indiscriminate contact with the outside world. Thus, the legislatures have been empowered to impose restrictions on the Fundamental Rights of other citizens guaranteed by Arts. 19(1)(d) and 19(1)(e) in the interest of the Scheduled Tribes,[88] so that movement of people from the progressive to the tribal areas, may be restricted. Accordingly, to check exploitation of the tribals, many States have enacted laws prohibiting non-tribals into the tribal areas without permits, living of non-tribals permanently in tribal areas and the transfer of tribal land to non-tribals. Reservations can also be made for them in educational institutions and government services under Arts. 15(4),(5) and 16(4).

(e) THE SCHEDULED CASTES AND THE SCHEDULED TRIBES (PREVENTION OF ATROCITIES) ACT, 1989.

Parliament has enacted the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989. The underlying purpose of the Act is to prevent the commission of offences of atrocities against the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, to establish special courts for the trial of such offences and to provide for the relief and rehabilitation of the victims of such offences.

Section 3(1) of the Act contains a list of such acts as fall within the category of atrocity. These acts have been made punishable with imprisonment for a term of six months to five years and with fine.

Section 3(2) lists certain other acts, such as, giving of false evidence against a member of a Scheduled Caste or a Scheduled Tribe to implicate him in a criminal offence, which have also been made punishable.

Provision has been made [s. 14] for designating special courts for the purpose of providing for speedy trial of offences under the Act. Provision has also been made for imposing collective fines [s. 16].

Provisions of this Act override the provisions of any other Act [s. 20].

Every year the Central Government has to lay on the table of each House of Parliament a report on the measures taken by itself and the State Governments in pursuance of this Act [s. 21(4)].

The State Governments are required to make provision for the economic and social rehabilitation of the victims of atrocities, and provide them legal aid [s. 21].

Reference has already been made to the Protection of Civil Rights Act, 1955.[89]

D. ANGLO-INDIANS

The Constitution contains some special provisions safeguarding the interests of the Anglo-Indian community.

---

88. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. G.
89. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. I.
Also see, infra, Sec. E.

Anglo-Indians constitute a religious, social, as well as a linguistic minority. An Anglo-Indian, according to Article 366(2), is a person whose father, or any of whose other male progenitors in the male line, is or was of European descent but who is domiciled within the territory of India and is or was born within such territory of parents habitually resident therein and not established there for temporary purposes only.

The President, if he is of opinion that the Anglo-Indian community is not adequately represented in the Lok Sabha, may nominate thereto not more than two members of the community [Art. 331].[90] Similarly, the Governor of a State, if he is of opinion that the Anglo-Indian community needs representation in the State Legislative Assembly, and is not adequately represented there, may nominate one member of the community to the Assembly [Art. 333].[91]

These provisions were necessary, for, otherwise, being numerically an extremely small community, and being interspersed all over India, the Anglo-Indians could not hope to get any seat in any Legislature through election. The concession shown to the Anglo-Indians by way of providing for their representation in the Lok Sabha and the State Legislative Assemblies is to last for the present up to the 25th January, 2010 [Art. 334(b)].

Before Independence, Anglo-Indians were enjoying some special privileges in services in railways, customs, posts and telegraph. It was thought necessary that these concessions be continued for some time more and be withdrawn gradually. Accordingly, Art. 336(1) provided that for two years after the Constitution came into force, appointment of Anglo-Indians to these posts would continue on the same basis as it was before August 14, 1947. Thereafter, there was to be a progressive diminution in the number of posts reserved for them in these services at the rate of 10 per cent every two years. All such reservations came to an end by the 25th January, 1960. However, under Art. 336(2), this reservation was not to bar the appointment of qualified Anglo-Indians on merit to other posts.

Further, before Independence, Anglo-Indian educational institutions were getting special grants. Art. 337 protected these grants for the first three years after the beginning of the Constitution. Thereafter, during each succeeding year, these grants could be reduced by ten per cent as compared to the grants in the preceding three years so that ten years after the commencement of the Constitution, such grants, to the extent to which they were a special concession to the Anglo-Indian community, were to cease. Thus, Art. 337 has now exhausted itself.[92]

E. OTHER BACKWARD CLASSES

Besides the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes, there are Other Backward Classes. The Constitution extends some protection to the 'Other Backward Classes [OBCs]' as well as these classes have been neglected for long. The Other Backward Classes are to be found amongst all religious groups—Hindus, Muslims, Christians, etc.

---

90. Also see, supra, Ch. II.
91. Also Art. 170, supra, Ch. VI.
92. See, State of Bombay v. Bombay Education Society, AIR 1954 SC 561 : (1955) 1 SCR 568; supra, Ch. XXX, Sec. C.

Under Art. 15(4), the State is empowered to make any special provision for the advancement of any socially and educationally backward class besides the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes.[1] The expression 'special provision, for advancement' has a wide connotation. It may include many things, such as, reservation of seats in educational institutions, financial assistance, scholarships, free housing and so on. Article 15 (5) now enables the State to enact a law relating to the admission of Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes or socially and educationally backward classes of citizens in educational institutions other than the minority educational institutions referred to in Art.30(1).[2] The Central Educational Institutions (Reservation in Admission) Act, 2007 provides for reservation of seats in Central Educational Institutions inter alia for the Other Backward Classes. 'Other Backward Classes' has been defined as "the class or classes of citizens who are socially and educationally backward, and are so determined by the Central Government". Presumably having regard to Art. 335, specified institutions of excellence, research institutions and institutions of national and strategic importance have been kept outside the scope of the Act. Under Art. 16(4), the state can make provisions for the reservation of appointments or posts in favour of "any backward class of citizens".[3]

While there exist in the Constitution special provisions for reservation of seats for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in the Lok Sabha and the State Legislative Assemblies [Arts. 330 and 332], and for the representation of the Anglo-Indian Community in these various Houses, there exists no such provision for reservation of seats for socially and educationally Backward Classes in the Lok Sabha and the State Legislative Assemblies.

Again, while under Art. 335, there is a constitutional obligation to consider the claims of the members of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in the making of appointments to services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Centre and the States, there exists no corresponding provision for the Other Backward Classes. However, under Art. 16(4), it is permissible to reserve posts in favour of any backward class of citizens which, in the opinion of the concerned Government, is not adequately represented in the services of the State or the Central Government.[4]

It has been ruled by the Supreme Court that Art. 16(4) must be read along with Art. 335. Though on the express terms of Art. 335, the OBCs are not included therein, even the OBCs are also covered by the thrust of Art. 335.[5] This means that when the State proposes to provide reservation for OBCs, "if it is considered by the appropriate authority that such reservation will adversely affect the efficiency of the administration, then exercise under Art. 16(4) is not permissible". This is the constitutional limitation on the exercise of the enabling power of reservation under Art. 16(4).

---

1. Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C.
2. See supra under Education.
3. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. D(c) and Sec. E.
4. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. D(c) and Sec. E. Besides, reference may also be made to Art. 29, supra, Ch. XXX, Sec. A.
5. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India (I), AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217; Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, (II), AIR 2000 SC 498 : (2000) 1 SCC 168; Ashoka Kumar Thakur v. Union of India, (2008) 6 SCC 1 : (2008) 5 JT 1; supra, footnote 81.

Further, if reservation is to be provided by passing a law by the State Legislature in the subordinate judiciary covered by Arts. 233 and 234,[6] "then the efficiency of the judicial administration will be affected is a matter within the exclusive purview of the High Court which shall have to be consulted". Such consultation is a constitutional obligation before any Act/Rules are made for the purpose.[7] Accordingly, a Bihar Act making reservation in appointment of district and subordinate judge for OBCs was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court as the High Court had not been consulted before passing the Act.[8]

A very difficult problem of the day is to identify Other Backward Classes. Generally, socially and educationally backward persons fall within the category of Backward Classes, but even after 50 years of enforcement of the Constitution, it has not been possible to evolve acceptable criteria for the purpose of identifying the OBCs.

It is necessary to state here that the expression "weaker sections" of the people used in Art. 46 is somewhat different from the expression "backward class" of citizens used in Art. 16(4) which is only a part of the weaker sections.[9] The expression "weaker sections" of the people is wider than the expression "backward class" of citizens which is only a part of the "weaker sections".

The expression "weaker sections" connotes all sections of society who are rendered weaker due to various causes. Art. 46 is aimed at promoting their educational and economic interests and protecting them from social injustice and exploitation. This obligation cast on the state is consistent both with the Preamble as well as Art. 38.[10] The term 'backward class" denotes a class which is socially backward and whose educational and economic backwardness is because of its social backwardness. Thus, the expression "backward class" in Art. 16 does not comprise all weaker sections of people but only those which are socially and, therefore, educationally and economically backward.

The Other Backward Classes have not been specified in the Constitution for, at the time of the Constitution-making, not much information was available about them. The Constitution in its various provisions does not even use a single uniform expression, but uses various expressions, to characterise Backward Classes. In Arts. 15(4), 15(5) and 340, the expression used is 'socially and educationally backward classes. In Art. 16(4), the expression used is 'backward' simpliciter; in Art. 46, the term used is 'weaker sections of the people'.[11] One of the main criteria for determining socially and educationally backward classes is poverty. Therefore the principle of exclusion of "creamy layer" is necessary.[12]

A person belonging to OBC in one State cannot automatically claim the same status in another State. Each State has its own list of OBCs. The Supreme Court has explained the rationale underlying this rule as follows:[13]

---

6. See, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G(r).
7. State of Bihar v. BalMukand Sah, AIR 2000 SC at 1312 : (2000) 4 SCC 640; supra, footnote 82.
8. For a detailed discussion on this aspect, see, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G.
9. Supra, for Art. 46, see Ch. XXXIV; for Art. 16(4), see, supra, Ch. XXIII.
10. For Art. 38, see, supra, Ch. XXXIV.
11. Supra, Ch. XXXIV.
12. Ashoka Kumar Thakur v. Union of India, (2008) 6 SCC 1 : (2008) 5 JT 1.
13. Municipal Corp. of Delhi v. Veena, AIR 2001 SC 2749, at 2750-2751 : (2001) 6 SCC 571.

> "Castes or groups are specified in relation to a given State or Union Territory, which obviously means that such caste would include caste belonging to an OBC group in relation to that State or Union Territory for which it is specified. The matters that are to be taken into consideration for specifying a particular caste in a particular group belonging to OBCs would depend on the nature and extent of disadvantages and social handicaps suffered by that caste or group in that State. However, it may not be so in another State to which a person belongs thereto goes by migration…."

Thus, a person belonging to OBC on migration from the State of his origin in another state where his caste is not in the OBC list was entitled to the benefits or concessions admissible to the OBCs in his State of origin and Union Government, but not in the State to which he has migrated.

In Valsamma,[14] the Court considered the following general question which is relevant to S/Cs, S/Ts and OBCs:

> "Whether a lady marrying a S/C, S/T or OBC citizen or one transplanted by adoption or any other voluntary act, ipso facto, becomes entitled to claim reservation under Art. 15(4) or 16(4), as the case may be?"

The Court has answered the question in the negative. The Court has argued that S/Cs, S/Ts and OBCs have suffered social disabilities for long and so they have become "socially, culturally and educationally backward". The object of reservation is to remove these handicaps and to bring them in the mainstream of national life. A person belonging to a forward class has an advantageous start in life; when he or she is transplanted in the backward class by adoption or marriage or conversion, he cannot claim the benefits of reservation either under Art. 15(4) or 16(4), as the case may be. "Acquisition of the status of a S/C etc. by voluntary mobility into these categories would play fraud on the Constitution and would frustrate the benign constitutional policy under Articles 15(4) and 16(4) of the Constitution".

(a) BACKWARD CLASSES COMMISSION

To facilitate the task of identifying the backward classes and laying down criteria for the purpose, Art. 340(1) empowers the President to appoint a Commission consisting of such persons as he thinks fit to investigate the conditions of "socially and educationally backward classes" in India and the difficulties under which they labour.

The Commission may recommend the steps that should be taken by the Central and State Governments to remove their difficulties and improve their condition. The Commission may also make recommendations as to the grants which should be made for the purpose by the Centre or any State, and the conditions subject to which such grants should be made. The Presidential Order appointing the Commission is to define the procedure to be followed by the Commission.

The Commission is to investigate the matters referred to it and present its report to the President setting out the facts as found by it and making its recommendations [Art. 340(2)]. The report of the Commission together with a memorandum setting out the action taken thereon by the Central Government is to be laid before each House of Parliament [Art. 340(3)].

---

14. Valsamma Paul v. Cochin University, AIR 1996 SC 1011, at 1022 : (1996) 3 SCC 545. Also see, supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C, and Ch. XXIII, Sec. D(c).

(b) FIRST BACKWARD CLASSES COMMISSION

As envisaged by the Constitution, the Backward Classes Commission was appointed by the President in January, 1953, under the Chairmanship of Kaka Kalelkar. The Commission was asked, among other things, to determine the criteria to be adopted for classifying socially and educationally backward classes.

The Commission submitted its report in 1955. The report was not unanimous and disclosed a considerable divergence of opinion among its members and failed to specify any easily discernible objective tests to define "backwardness". The majority of the members of the Commission expressed the view that the position of the individual in the social hierarchy based on caste should determine backwardness.

The Central Government could not accept such a criterion because "the caste system is the greatest hindrance in the way of our progress towards an egalitarian society, and the recognition of the specified castes as backward may serve to maintain and even perpetuate the existing distinctions on the basis of caste."

Besides, while some members in some castes may be characterised as backward "educationally and economically," some may not be so classified. Similarly, among the so-called upper and advanced classes, there are large number of persons who are not less backward educationally and economically, and even among the backward classes some castes are more backward than others. Then, conditions differ from State to State and region to region.

The Commission also suggested certain other criteria to identify backwardness, e.g., lack of general educational advancement among the major sections of a caste or community, inadequate representation in the field of trade, commerce and industry, communities consisting of a large percentage of small landowners with uneconomic holdings, etc. The Government's reaction to this was that "these are obviously vague tests, more or less of an individual character, and even if they are accepted they would encompass a large majority of the country's population." And, if the entire community, barring a few exceptions, were thus to be regarded as backward, the really needy would be swamped by the multitude and hardly receive attention or adequate assistance, nor would such a dispensation fulfil the conditions laid down in Art. 340 of the Constitution.

The Government of India thus came to the conclusion that further investigation was necessary with a view to devise some positive and workable criteria to specify the socially and educationally backward classes so as to give them adequate assistance and relief in all suitable ways so as to enable them to make up for the leeway of the past and to acquire the normal standards of life prevalent in the country on a systematic and elaborate basis. In the meantime, relief was to be provided to such groups of people to whom disabilities were attached by reasons of environment and occupations considered to be low, and to other classes who, adjudged in the light of reasonable standards, might well be regarded as socially and educationally backward.The task to devise positive and workable critieria to identify backwardness on an all-India basis thus remained incomplete. No indisputable yardstick could be evolved for the purpose. Each State defined backwardness in its own way, and political expediency played some role in this matter. There was thus no uniformity of approach in the country in this respect.

For purposes of Arts. 15(4)[15],(5) and 16(4)[16], it is for the State concerned to list the Backward Classes. The Centre can also list them for purposes of admission into Central educational institutions and Central Services. Even this the Centre was not able to do. The task is an extremely difficult one. Many communities desire to be characterised as backward because of the facilities of admissions and services which are available to such classes, and they thus bring political influence to bear upon the government for being recognised as 'backward'. When a class is designated as backward, then even rich and well educated members of the class claim the privileges available; the more unfortunate members of the class thus get excluded. This is against the best interests of the really backward persons. This frustrates the basic objective of the Constitution, viz., amelioration of the really and factually weak and downtrodden people.

A bulk of case-law has arisen on this point. The courts have been able to instil some rationality in this regard by insisting that for purposes of Arts. 15(4),(5) and 16(4), caste cannot be the sole determinant of backwardness and that other tests like economic, professional, environmental, educational should also be taken into consideration.

The practice to name the castes as 'Backward Classes', without any economic considerations, has two main defects. One, it has a tendency to perpetuate the caste system and, thus, hamper the growth of an egalitarian society. To accept caste as the basis of backwardness, it will lead to legitimisation and perpetuation of the caste system in the country which goes against the secular character of the Indian polity.[17] Also, the traditional caste system is breaking down and is gradually being replaced by contractual relations between individuals.

The future Indian society has undoubtedly to be classless and casteless. It is also not true to assume that all members of a caste are equally socially and educationally backward. Within a backward caste, if no economic considerations are applied, then all the privileges may be utilised by well to do people leaving the poor in the cold. It is, therefore, imperative that the castes as such should not be recognised for purposes of giving assistance. Instead, economic backwardness of classes of people should be the criteria for the purpose.

These considerations have had an impact on the judicial approach concerning characterisation of backward classes so much so that caste cannot be taken as the sole criterion for the purpose and increasing emphasis is being laid on economic factors.[18] Reference may be made here to a few of these judicial pronouncements.

In Balaji,[19] the Supreme Court ruled with reference to Art. 15(4), that it may not be irrelevant to take into account 'caste' to determine social backwardness. But it should not be made the "sole dominant test" for the purpose without regard to other relevant factors. It was observed in the instant case that "social backwardness is on the ultimate analysis the result of poverty to a very large extent".

---

15. Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C.
16. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. D(c).
17. For discussion on this aspect, see, supra, Ch. XXIX, Sec. A.
18. Reference may be made in this connection to the discussion under Arts. 15(4) and 16(4), supra, Chs. XXII, Sec. C and XXIII, Sec. D(c).
19. Balaji v. State of Mysore, AIR 1963 SC 649 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 439; supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C(b).

The Court also emphasized that for purposes of Art. 15(4), the backwardness must be social and educational and not either social or educational.

In Rajendran,[20] the Court accepted classification of backward classes based on 'caste' because the social and educational backwardness of the castes was based on their occupations.

In P. Sagar,[21] caste-wise classification was rejected because no other factor except caste was taken into consideration: The Court maintained that in determining whether a particular section forms a class, caste could not be excluded altogether. But in case the caste was made a criterion, proper inquiry or investigation should be conducted by the State Government before listing certain castes as socially and educationally backward.

In K.S. Jayasree v. State of Kerala,[22] the Supreme Court upheld a government order listing backward classes but exempting therefrom such families as had an aggregate annual income of Rs. 10,000. The order was challenged by a candidate belonging to the backward class but who was denied the privilege of preferential admission to a medical college because her family income exceeded Rs. 10,000 annually. The Court emphasized that poverty or economic standard is a relevant factor in determining backwardness. Neither caste nor poverty alone could be the sole or dominant test, but both are relevant, to determine backwardness. With the improvement in economic position of a family, social backwardness disappears. To permit these persons to take advantage of the privileges meant for backward persons, is to deprive the real backward poor persons of their chance to make progress.

The question has been elaborately considered by the Supreme Court in Indra Sawhney I.[23] For example, PANDIAN, J., has stated that before a conclusion is drawn that a caste is backward, "the existence of circumstances relevant to the formation of opinions is a sine qua non. If the opinion suffers from the vice of non-application of mind or formulation of collateral grounds or beyond the scope of statute, or irrelevant and extraneous material, then that opinion is challengeable." Similarly, JEEVAN REDDY, J., has emphasized that opinion in regard to backwardness must be based on relevant material. He went on to observe that under Art. 16(4), reservation is not being made in favour of a 'caste' but a backward class. "Once a caste satisfies the criteria of backwardness, it becomes a backward class for the purposes of Art. 16(4)". JEEVAN REDDY, J., further emphasized: "Once backward, always backward is not acceptable." Therefore, if a caste ceases to be backward in course of time, it should be excluded from the list of Backward Classes.

The Supreme Court has observed in Indra Sawhney II:[24] "Caste only cannot be the basis for reservation. Reservation can be for a backward class of citizen of a 20. P. Rajendran v. State of Madras, AIR 1968 SC 1012 : (1968) 2 SCR 786; supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C(c).

---

21. P. Sagar v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 1379 : (1968) 3 SCR 595.
22. AIR 1976 SC 2381; supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C(c).
23. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. G.
Also see, Indra Sawhney v. Union of India (II), AIR 2000 SC 498, 505 : (2000) 1 SCC 168, supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. G(b).
24. (2000) 1 SCC 168, at 185 : AIR 2000 SC 498; supra, Ch. XXIII, supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. G(b).

particular caste. Therefore, from that, the creamy layer and the non-backward class of citizens are to be excluded."

Recently Parliament enacted the Central Educational Institutions (Reservation in Admission) Act, 2006 providing 27 per cent quota to OBCs in institutions for higher education without identifying who could be considered to be an OBC. The Supreme Court in Ashoka Kumar Thakur v. Union of India clarified that if the determination of "Other Backward Classes" by the Central Government is with reference to a caste, it shall exclude the "creamy layer" among such caste.[25]

(c) SECOND BACKWARD CLASSES COMMISSION

The Government of India again appointed the Backward Classes Commission (known as the Mandal Commission after its Chairman B.P. Mandal) under Art. 340 on January 1, 1979, with a view to investigate the conditions of the socially and educationally backward classes within the territory of India. The terms of reference of the Commission were as follows :

(i) to determine the criteria for defining the socially and educationally Backward Classes;

(ii) to recommend steps to be taken for the advancement of the socially and educationally backward classes of citizens so identified;

(iii) to examine the desirability or otherwise of making provision for the reservation of appointments or posts in Central and State Governments in favour of Backward Classes.

(iv) to make such recommendations as the Commission thinks proper.

The Commission submitted its report on 31st December, 1980. The Commission was inter alia "entrusted with the task of determining the criteria for defining the socially and educationally backward classes in the country." To determine social and educational backwardness, the Commission evolved eleven indicators or criteria, grouped under three broad heads—social, educational and economic.

The Commission looked at the whole question of reservation of quotas for backward classes in recruitment for government services.[26] The Commission held that (besides the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes who amount to 22.56% of the total population), 52% of the total Indian population could be characterised as backward and, therefore, 52% of all posts could be reserved for them. The Commission, however, refrained from making such a drastic recommendation in view of the Supreme Court's ruling that the total quantum of reservations under Art. 16(4) should be below 50%.[27] In view of this legal constraint, the Commission was obliged to recommend reservation of 27% only for the Other Backward Classes so that the total reservation for Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and the Other Backward Classes would amount to a little less than 50%.

The Commission by and large identified castes with backward classes and more or less entirely ignored the economic tests.[28] The Commission also ignored

---

25. (2008) 6 SCC 1.

26. Report of the Backward Classes Commission 52 (1980).
Reference has been made earlier to the Commission's Report, supra, Ch. XXIII.

27. Supra, Ch. XXIII.

28. REPORT OF THE BACKWARD CLASSES COMMISSION, Chs. IV, V & VII (1980).
Also see, supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. F.

the fact that even among the so-called higher castes, there may be a number of socially and educationally backward people deserving of help. On the whole, the Commission's recommendations have proved to be very controversial.

Subsequent to the Report of the Backward Commission, the question of characterising backward classes again cropped up before the Supreme Court. In Vasanth Kumar.[29] The Judges of the Supreme Court expressed a diversity of views in this regard. The only point on which all the Judges were agreed was that 'caste' cannot be the sole determinant of backwardness, but that it is not an irrelevant test and can be taken into account along with other factors. Some of the Judges were in favour of adopting the means-cum-caste test to determine backwardness.

Then, in 1993, in the famous Indra Sawhney case, a nine Judge Bench of the Supreme Court considered in depth the question of backwardness and reservation of posts under Art. 16(4). The highlights of this case have already been taken note of.[30] More recently a Constitution Bench considered the same issue of backwardness and reservation in connection with educational institutions where, as noted earlier, the Court held that there can be no definite determination of the number of Other Backward Classes without including economically backward classes[31].

F. LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

At the time of the framing of the Constitution, practically every State was multi-lingual. Therefore, the problem of linguistic minorities loomed large on the horizon as there were linguistic minorities in practically every State. It therefore became incumbent to make provisions to safeguard some of their rights. Accordingly, a few provisions were incorporated in the Constitution to cope with the problems of linguistic minorities. For example, there is the provision in Art. 14 barring discrimination.[32] Arts. 15(1) and 15(2), noted earlier, do not specifically out-law discrimination on the ground of 'language'.[33] Neither do Arts. 15(4) and 16(4) make any special provisions for linguistee minorities, or provide for reservation in services on the basis of language.[34] Arts. 29 and 30 do confer rights on these minorities to conserve their culture and language.[35]

As has already been pointed out,[36] under Art. 345, a State can prescribe a language for carrying on its official work. However, to protect the interests of a linguistic minority in a State,[37] and to give it a sense of participation in State ad-

---

29. K.C. Vasanth Kumar v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1985 SC 1495. See, supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C,and Ch. XXIII, Sec. F.

30. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217; supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. G.

31, (2008) 6 SCC 1, at page 601

32. Supra, Ch. XXI.

33. Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. A.

34. For Art. 16(4), see Ch. XXIII, Sec. D(c) supra.

35. Supra, Ch. XXX.

36. Supra, Ch. XVI, Sec. B.

37. The Minorities Commission treats those groups as linguistic minorities which have separate languages and which constitute numerically smaller sections of the people in a State. In other words, linguistic minorities are determined on a Statewise basis. It is not necessary that a language should also have a distinct script to be entitled to protection. For Minorities Commission, see, infra, Sec. G(e).

ministration, Art. 347 lays down that, on a demand being made in that behalf, the President may, if he is satisfied that a substantial proportion of the population of a State desires the use of any language spoken by them to be recognised by that State, direct that such language shall also be officially recognized throughout that State, or any part thereof, for such purposes as he may specify.[38] The onus to have a language recognised by the President in a State is thus placed on the people concerned.

Another constitutional provision to safeguard the interests of the linguistic minorities is Art. 350. It makes an interesting provision that every person is entitled to submit a representation for redress of any grievance to any officer or authority of the Union or a State in any of the languages used in the Union or in the State as the case may be.[39]

The States Re-organisation Commission submitting its report in 1956 recommended that the Central Government should adopt, in consultation with the States, a clear code to govern the use of different languages at different levels of the State Administration and that effective steps be taken to see that this code is followed.

In the wake of the re-organisation of the States on a linguistic basis in 1956, a number of unilingual States were formed.[40] But this did not solve the problem of linguistic minorities. Even though new States were formed more or less on linguistic basis, each of these States also came to have linguistic minorities as well. Thus, the reorganisation of the States threw up in an acute form the difficult problem of linguistic minorities in practically every State, because while there was one dominant language group, in a State, several small language groups with languages different from the dominant language also came into being.

A linguistic minority is a group of people having mother-tongue different from that of the majority in a State or a part thereof. The Constitution-makers had anticipated some such problem and had, accordingly, made provisions to meet the situation in Arts. 29,[41] 30,[42] 347 and 350, as noted above. But the dimensions of the problem as it emerged after 1956 were much bigger than what the Constitution-makers had envisaged or what the existing Constitutional provisions could adequately cope with. Consequently, two more Articles, 350A and 350B, were added to the Constitution specifically with a view to protect the interests of the linguistic minorities.

There are three basic problems which a linguistic minority group faces in a State. First, the claim of the linguistic groups that education be imparted to their children in their own mother-tongues. Two, there is the problem of use of minority languages in the administration. Three, there is the problem of representation of the linguistec minorities in the State services.

---

38. Ibid.

39. M.P. JAIN, Constitutional Aspects of the Language Problem in India, Yearbook of the South Asia Institute, Heidelberg Univ., (1967-68), 116-136; Report of the States' Reorganisation Comm., 211, 212.
For Art. 350, see, Ch. XVI, supra.

40. Supra, Ch. V.

41. Supra, Ch. XXX, Sec. A.

42. Supra, Ch. XXX, Sec. B.

(a) ART. 350A

As regards the problem of education in a minority language, Arts. 29 and 30 as noted earlier, do make some provisions for this purpose. The purpose of Art. 29 is to facilitate inter-State migration of people. If, for example, a few people from Madras were to come and settle down in Bombay, they would constitute a cultural, as well as a linguistic, minority group in Maharashtra, and Art. 29 would protect their culture, language and script in Maharashtra.

Article 29 does not impose any positive obligation on the State to take any action to conserve any culture or language. It merely enables a cultural or linguistic minority to preserve its own culture or language, and bars the State from imposing on it any other language or culture.

Similarly, Art. 30 concedes to the minority the right to establish and administer its own educational institutions. It does not impose any positive obligation on a State to provide facilities for education in a minority language.

The States Re-organisation Commission felt that these provisions were not adequate to meet the newly emerging situation after the linguistic re-organisation of the States. The linguistic minorities may not have the resources required to establish and maintain their own educational institutions. The language of instruction in educational institutions touches, in practice, many vital aspects of an individual's life and constitutes, in fact, the core of the problem of linguistic minorities. The Commission, therefore, suggested that the Constitution be amended so as to cast a positive obligation on the States to provide for facilities at the primary stage for education to the children of such minorities in their mother-tongue and, further, to empower the Central Government to issue appropriate directives for enforcing this obligation on the States.[43] Accordingly, Art. 350A was added to the Constitution.

Art 350A supplements Art. 29 as it directs every State, and every local authority within a State, to endeavour to provide adequate facilities for instruction in the mother-tongue at the primary stage of education to the children of linguistic minorities. The Article also empowers the President to issue such directions to any State as he considers necessary or proper for securing the provision of these facilities.

The Commission was of the opinion that the secondary education would have to be treated differently from the primary education. Accordingly, the Commission did not recommend recognition in the Constitution of the right to have instruction in the mother-tongue at the secondary stage. It however suggested that the Government of India should, in consultation with the State Governments, lay down a clear policy in this area and take more effective steps to implement it.

No special provision has been made in the Constitution in regard to the medium of instruction at the University level. Reference may however be made in this connection to the Guru Nanak University case.[44] The Supreme Court has ruled that while a university has a right to provide for the education of the majority in the regional medium, it cannot stifle the language and script of any section of the 43. REPORT, 209-10.

---

44. D.A.V. College, Jullundar v. State of Punjab, AIR 1971 SC 1737 : (1971) 2 SCC 269; supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iii)(d).
Also see, Ch. XXX, Sec. C(j) supra.

Indian population. It is does so, then the right of such citizens to conserve their language or script through educational institutions of their own is stifled. A university cannot impede the right of the minorities to conserve their language, script and culture.

(b) GOVERNMENT SERVICES

The States Re-organisation Commission also referred to the question of discrimination indulged in the matter of government services in some States against linguistic minorities by invoking residence qualification. The Commission pointed out that the States have confined entry to their services to permanent residents of the State, the term 'permanent residents' being defined in various ways. The Commission pointed out that the domicile tests in force in some States worked to the disadvantage of the minority groups. The Commission, therefore, suggested the passing of a law by Parliament under Art. 16(3) with a view to liberalise residence requirements for services in the States. Accordingly, the Public Employment (Requirement of Residence) Act, 1957, abolishes all laws prescribing residence as a qualification for State services.[45]

(c) EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

One kind of discrimination still remains and this has even been upheld by the Supreme Court in Joshi,[46] viz., use of residence qualification for admission to the State-maintained educational institutions. A requirement that for admission to State medical colleges, an applicant should have studied for 10 years in the educational institutions in the State, has been upheld as not infringing Arts. 19(1)(d) and (e). These articles ensure residence and movement throughout India but not that every citizen should have all the advantages and privileges available to citizens domiciled or residing in a State. A State can accord some preferential treatment to citizens domiciled or residing therein provided that it is not hit by Art. 14.[47] Recently the Supreme Court has laid down that so far as admissions to postgraduate courses such as MS, MD and the like are concerned, it would be imminently desirable not to provide for any reservation based on residence or institutional preference.[48]

G. APPARATUS TO SUPERVISE SAFEGUARDS

In order to ensure that the safeguards provided to the various groups under the Constitution do not just remain mere paper safeguards but are implemented effectively, the Constitution-makers felt it necessary to set up a machinery to keep a continuous watch and vigilance over the working of these safeguards throughout the country, and also to bring to the notice of the government and the legislature concerned any defects existing in the protection of these various groups.

(a) COMMISSIONER FOR SCHEDULED CASTES AND SCHEDULED TRIBES

Article 338(1) provided for the appointment of a Commissioner for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. He was appointed by the President. His duty

---

45. Supra, Ch. XXIII.
46. Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. A(a).
47. Arun Narayan v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1976 Kant 174.
48. Ashoka Kumar Thakur v. Union of India, (2008) 6 SCC 1, at page 624 : (2008) 5 JT 1.

was to investigate all matters relating to the safeguards provided to the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes under the Constitution and to report to the President upon the working of those safeguards to the President from time to time. These reports were to be laid before each House of Parliament. (Art. 338(2))

The Commissioner used to make annual reports. The Commissioner used to collect materials for these reports from his own personal observations, information received by him from various State Governments, Government of India and non-official agencies. The Commissioner used to receive a large number of complaints from individuals and non-official agencies relating to injustices against, and harassment of, the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes. He investigated these complaints in order to ascertain facts.Although he was all the powers of a civil court for the purposes of such investigation, he was not in fact a court and was not empowered to issue orders like a civil court.[49]

His reports usually dealt with such matters as social disabilities, legislative measures adopted by the various governments for the advancement of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes, representation of these communities in Parliament and State legislatures; administrative set up in the governments to look after the interests of these various classes; reservations made for them in government services; educational facilities granted to the students of these classes by the government; welfare schemes of the State Governments for improving the conditions of the Scheduled Castes, Backward Classes, Scheduled Tribes and Scheduled Areas and grants-in-aid by the Central Government to the State governments for these schemes.

The Commissioner in his reports also reviewed the working of the constitutional safeguards in relation to the Anglo-Indians, and the working of the non-official agencies engaged in the task of helping these communities, and made recommendations and suggestions for the amelioration of the condition of these various classes in his charge.

In brief, the reports of the Commissioner contained valuable information and important source material not only on the working of the various safeguards—constitutional, statutory and administrative—for the Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and other weaker and backward sections of the population, but also on sociological and economic conditions of these people in the various regions of the country.

In addition to the obligations imposed on the Commissioner under the Constitution, he also came to discharge, by convention, certain other functions, such as, representation of the Union Government on the managing committees of the non-official agencies receiving grants from the Centre; examining accounts of these organisations; advising the Central Government regarding the schemes for development of the Scheduled and Tribal Areas,[50] removal of untouchability and welfare of the Scheduled Tribes and other backward classes,[51] submitted by the State Governments and non-official agencies for grants-in-aid.

---

49. All India Indian Overseas Bank SC and ST Employees Welfare Assocn v. Union of India : (1996) 6 SCC 606.
50. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. C.
51. Supra. Sec. E.

On the whole, the Commissioner was concerned with the amelioration and development of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes, Tribal Areas and their administration, removal of untouchability, etc. To maintain a live contact with local conditions, a few Regional Assistant Commissioners functioned throughout the country to assist the Commissioner.[52]

In his report for the year 1957-58, the Commissioner made an extremely valuable suggestion. He stated that backwardness has a tendency to perpetuate itself and become a vested interest and that if the ultimate goal of having a classless and casteless society is to be attained, the lists of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes would have to be reduced from year to year and replaced in due course by a list based on criteria of income-cum-merit. This has not, however, happened so far. In fact, the list originally drawn in 1950 has become longer and longer since then. More and more communities constantly pressurize for inclusion in the list. Logically, with the rising tempo of development activities, one would have expected that some of these communities would by now be ready to be excluded from the list of Scheduled Castes, but, what one actually finds is a reverse process in operation, viz., that of enlargement of the lists as more and more communities want to enjoy the rights and privileges available to these classes.

The Advisory Committee for the revision of the lists of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, appointed by the Central Government in 1965, suggested that the more advanced communities in the lists concerned be gradually descheduled and a deadline be fixed when these lists would totally be dispensed with in the interest of complete integration of the Indian population. But it is not expected that any such suggestion will be acted upon in the near future because this is an area where political expediency takes precedence over sagacious action.

In 1968, Parliament appointed a Parliamentary Committee on the Welfare of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes and, thus, another concrete step was taken towards strengthening the supervisory mechanism over the working of the safeguards for these people.[53]

The committee consists of 20 members elected from the Lok Sabha, and 10 members elected from the Rajya Sabha. It has been invested with powers to criticise, guide and control the Government of India in the matter of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. It considered the reports of the Commissioner of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. The committee reports to both Houses of Parliament on the action to be taken by the Government for the welfare of these people.

The committee also goes into the question of their employment in services under the Central Government including the public sector undertakings. The committee could thus go deeper into the major recommendations made by the Commissioner and could assess how far these recommendations had been implemented.

Under Art. 338(3), the Commissioner of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes also discharged similar functions with respect to such other Backward Classes as the President, on receipt of the report of the Backward Classes Commission, specified by order. No such classes were ever specified.[54] Further, the Commissioner was also required to discharge similar functions with regard to the Anglo-Indian community as he did with respect to the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes.

---

52. Reports of the Commissioner for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.
53. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(iv).

(b) COMMISSIONER FOR LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

To investigate all matters relating to the safeguards provided for the linguistic minorities under the Constitution, and to report on these matters to the President at such interval as he may direct, Art. 350B, which was added to the Constitution on the suggestion of the States Re-organization Commission,[55] provides for the appointment by the Central Government of the Commissioner for Linguistic Minorities.[56]

The Commissioner at present submits his report annually; these reports are laid before each House of Parliament where they are discussed, and are also sent to the concerned State Governments.

The Commissioner plays a creative role in implementing safeguards to minorities and protecting their interests. However, his role is more of an investigative nature. He is not directly responsible for implementing, or overseeing the progress of implementation of, the safeguards for minorities. That is a weakness of the present system.

In the XIIth report, the Commissioner for Linguistic Minorities suggested a review whether the implementing machinery of the safeguards at the State, district or any other level was adequate or not. It was also suggested by the Commissioner that there should be some central machinery to supervise the implementation of the safeguards.[57]

(c) ZONAL COUNCILS

The Zonal Councils provide another institutional set-up to safeguard the interests of these minorities.[58] The underlying idea is to enable the States in a zone to evolve a common policy regarding these minorities. The question of treatment of these minorities by the States may affect good neighbourliness amongst them. This can, to a large extent, be avoided by mutual discussions amongst them. The Zonal Council provides the forum for this purpose.

(d) NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR SCHEDULED CASTES AND SCHEDULED TRIBES

In course of time, it began to be felt that instead of a special officer (Commissioner of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes), a more effective arrangement for the purpose would be to have a high level multi-member Commission to guarantee constitutional safeguards for these people. Accordingly, Art. 338 was

---

54. Supra, Sec. E.
55. Supra, Ch. XVI.
56. Supra, Sec. E.
For a discussion on the working of the Safeguards to Linguistic Minorities see, I.L.I., MINORITIES, supra, footnote 1 on 2004.
57. XII REPORT, 78 (1971) The 45th Report was presented to the President on February 15, 2009.
58. Supra, Ch. XIV, Sec. D.

amended by the Constitution (65th Amendment) Act, 1990,[59] so as to abolish the office of the Commissioner and to provide for the appointment of the National Commission for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes [Art. 338(1)]. By a subsequent amendment[60] the Commission was bifurcated into the National Commission for Scheduled Castes [Art. 338] and the National Commission for Scheduled Tribes [Art. 338A].

Each Commission is to consist of a Chairperson, Vice-Chairperson and three other members to be appointed by the President of India. Subject to any law made by Parliament, the conditions of service and tenure of office of these persons is to be determined by rules made by the President [Art. 338(2) and Art. 338A(2)].

The Commissions investigate and monitor all matters relating to the safeguards provided for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes under the Constitution, or under any other law or under any order of the Government. The Commissions are also to evaluate the working of the safeguards. The Commissions are to inquire into specific complaints with respect to deprivation of any rights and safeguards to these people and to participate and advise on the planning process of socio-economic development of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes as the case may be and to evaluate the progress of their development under the Union and any State [Art. 338(5)(a), (b), (c) and Art. 338A (5)(a),(b),(c)].

The Commissions are to make recommendations as to the measures to be taken by the various Governments for the effective implementation of these safeguards and other measures for the protection, welfare and socio-economic development of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes [Art. 338(5)(e) and Art. 338A(5)(e)].

In addition, the Commissions are to discharge such other functions in relation to the protection, welfare and development and advancement of the Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes as the President may, subject to any law made by Parliament, by rule specify [Art. 338(5)(f) and Art. 338A(5) (f)].

The Central and every State Government are required to consult the Commissions on all major policy matters affecting Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. The Commissions have power to regulate their own procedure [Art. 338(9) and Art. 338A(9)].

The Commissions are to make annual reports to the President. They can also make reports as and when it is necessary. These reports are to be placed before each House of Parliament along with a memorandum by the Government as to the action taken or proposed to be taken on the recommendations made by the Commissions. Any report of the Commissions pertaining to a State Government is to be forwarded to the State Governor and is to be placed before the State Legislature with a government memorandum explaining the action taken or proposed to be taken on these recommendations or the reasons, if any, for the non-acceptance of any of such recommendations [Arts. 338(d), (6), (7), 338A (5)(d),(6), (7)].

---

59. See, infra, Ch. XLII.
60. The Constitution (Eighty-ninth Amendment) Act, 2003 w.e.f. 19-2-04.

The Commissions have been given power of a civil court trying a suit and, in particular, in respect of such matters as summoning and examination of witnesses, discovery and production of documents [Arts. 338(8), 338(8)].

The Supreme Court has ruled that the Commission has no power to grant injunctions whether temporary or permanent.[61]

The Commissions have several State offices located in different States and Union Territories. These offices serve as the "eyes and ears" of the Commissions as these offices keep the Commissions informed of all important activities, decisions and orders of the State Governments concerning SCs and STs.

The important constitutional safeguards for the SCs and STs are as follows :

Article 46 refers to developmental and protective safeguards;[62] Art. 17,[63] Art. 23, Art. 24,[64] Art. 25(2)(b)[65] confer social safeguards; Art. 244,[66] Art. 275(1),[67] Fifth and Sixth Schedules confer economic safeguards, Art. 15(4),(5)[68] Art. 29(1)[69] and Art. 350A[70] refer to educational and cultural safeguards.

Political safeguards are conferred by Arts. 164(1),[71] 330, 332, 334,[72] 371A, 371B, 371C, 371F.[73]

Arts. 16(4), 16(4A), 335 and 320(4) confer service safeguards.[74]

Arts. 338(5)(c) and 338A(5)(c) of the Constitution refer to socio-economic development of the SCs/STs. This is a very important function of the Commissions, which have to keep track of all the major policy decisions, legislative or executive action by the Government of India or any State Government. The Commissions are required to inquire into specific complaints with respect to the deprivation of rights and safeguards of SCs and STs [Arts. 338(5)(b) and 338A(5)(b)].

A number of statutes have been enacted to provide safeguards to SCs/STs. For example, to give effect to Art. 17[75] the Protection of Civil Rights Act, 1955, has been enacted. This Act makes the practice of untouchability as both congnizable and non-compoundable offence and provides for strict punishment for the offences committed under the Act. Under the Act, responsibility is cast on the State Governments to take such measures as may be necessary for ensuring that the rights arising from abolition of untouchability are made available to the persons subjected to any disability arising out of untouchability.

---

61. All India Indian Overseas Bank v. Union of India, (1996) 6 SCC 606 : (1996) 10 JT 287.
62. Ch. XXXIV, supra.
63. Ch. XXIII, Sec. I.
64. Ch. XXVIII, supra.
65. Ch. XXIX, Sec. B, supra.
66. Ch. IX, Sec. C, supra.
67. Ch. XI, Sec. M, supra.
68. Ch. XXII, Sec. C, supra.
69. Ch. XXX, Sec. A, supra.
70. Supra, this Chapter, Sec. F(a).
71. Supra, Ch. VII.
72. Supra, Chs. II, VI, supra; Sec. A(c).
73. Ch. IX, supra.
74. Chs. XXIII, supra; Ch. XXXVI, infra.
75. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. I, supra.

There is also the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989. The Act specifies the atrocities which are made penal under the Act.

The Commissions are concerned with devising ways and means to ensure effective implementation of these Acts. The Commissions collect monthly statistics concerning the offences committed under these Acts.[76] The Commissions make suggestions to the State Governments for effectively dealing with the crimes committed under these Acts. The Commissions are concerned with the education of the children of SCs and STs and make recommendations for strengthening the infrastructure for the purpose.[77]

Another area of interest for the Commissions is economic development of the SCs and STs. For this purpose, the Commissions review the development programmes undertaken by the States for SCs and STs.[78]

(e) NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR MINORITIES

As a further step to safeguard the interests of the religious and linguistic minorities, to preserve the country's secular traditions, to promote national integration and remove any feeling of inequality and discrimination amongst these sections of the people, the Government of India appointed a Minorities' Commission in 1978 under an administrative resolution.[79] The Commission was charged with the function of evaluating the various safeguards provided in the Constitution for the protection of the minorities and in the laws passed by Parliament and the State Legislatures.

The Commission was to make recommendations with a view to ensuring effective implementation and enforcement of all the safeguards and the laws, undertake review of the implementation of the policies pursued by the Central and the State Governments with respect to the minorities and look into specific complaints regarding deprivation of rights and safeguards of the minorities.

The Commission was to conduct studies, research and analysis on the question of avoidance of the discrimination against minorities, suggest appropriate legal and welfare measures in respect of any minority and serve as a national clearing house for information in respect of the conditions of the minorities.

The Commission made periodical reports at prescribed intervals to the Central Government. The Commission submitted an annual report to the President detailing its activities and recommendations. This however did not preclude the Commission from submitting reports to the government at any time it considered necessary on the matters within its scope of its work. The annual report together with a memorandum outlining the action taken on the recommendations, and explaining the reasons for non-acceptance of recommendations, if any, in so far as it related to the Central Government was laid before each House of Parliament. The scope of the Commission's work extended to minorities whether based on religion or language.

---

76. See, NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR SCS AND STS, FOURTH REPORT, 231-246 (1996-97).
77. Ibid, 260-264.
78. Ibid, 82-117.
79. Notification issued by the Government of India, dated the 12th January, 1978.

In course of time, the Commission suggested that its position be strengthened by conferring on it statutory powers of enquiry under the Commissions of Inquiry Act, 1952. The Commission also suggested that it be given a constitutional status so that it could function more effectively.[80] Accordingly, Parliament enacted the National Commission for Minorities Act, 1992, to establish the National Commission For Minorities [NCM] on a statutory basis.

An interesting feature of the Act is that it does not define the term 'Minority' but leaves it to the Central Government to notify minorities for the purposes of the Act [s. 2(c)].[81]

The Commission consists of a Chairperson, a Vice-Chairperson and five members who are nominated by the Central Government from time to time from amongst persons of eminence, ability and integrity subject to the rider that five members including the chairperson must belong to the minority communities [s. 3]. The Chairperson and every member holds office for three years from the date he assumes office [s. 4]. Under s. 4(2), the Government has power to remove the Chairperson or any member on a few specified grounds, such as, insolvency, moral turpitude, unsoundness of mind, abuse of power, etc.

The Central Government also appoints a Secretary to the Commission [s. 5]. The Commission meets as and when necessary [s. 8(1)], has power to regulate its own procedure [s. 8(2)], and enjoys powers of a civil court for purposes of summoning witnesses, receiving evidence on affidavits etc. [s. 9(4)].

The Commission discharges the following functions [s. 9] :

(a) evaluate the progress of the development of minorities under the Union and States;

(b) monitor the working of the safeguards provided in the Constitution and in laws enacted by Parliament and the State Legislatures;

(c) make recommendations for the effective implementation of safeguards for the protection of the interests of minorities by the Central government or the State Governments;

(d) look into specific complaints regarding deprivation of rights and safeguards of the minorities and take up such matters with the appropriate authorities;

(e) cause studies to be undertaken into problems arising out of any discrimination against minorities and recommend measures for their removal;

(f) conduct studies, research and analysis on the issues relating to socio-economic and educational development of minorities;

(g) suggest appropriate measures in respect of any minority to be undertaken by the Central Government or the State Governments;

(h) make periodical or special reports to the Central Government on any matter pertaining to minorities and in particular difficulties confronted by them; and

---

80. THE MINORITIES' COMM., FOURTH ANNUAL REPORT, 87, 395 (1983).
For comments on the Commission and some of its recommendations; see Bharatiya. Minorities Commission: Constitutional Metamorphosis, (1979) 21 JILI 268.

81. This is Act XIX of 1992. The Act has been amended in 1995 by Act XLI of 1995.

(i) any other matter which may be referred to it by the Central Government.

The Central Government is required to lay the recommendations made by the Commission under head (c) above before each House of Parliament along with a memorandum explaining the action taken or proposed to be taken on the recommendations relating to the Centre. If the Central Government does not accept any of these recommendations, it has to explain the reasons for non-acceptance [s. 9(2)].

If any such recommendation concerns a State Government, the Commission forwards it to that government which follows the same procedure as mentioned above in s. 9(2). The Government lays the recommendation before the State legislature along with an explanatory memorandum [s. 9(3)].

The Central Government makes grants to the Commission for being utilised by it for the purposes of this Act [s. 10]. The salaries and allowances to the Chairperson and members and other staff are paid out of these grants.

The Commission makes an annual report giving an account of its activities [s. 12]. The Central Government lays the report before both Houses of Parliament along with an explanatory memorandum of action taken on the recommendations contained in the annual report and the reasons for the non-acceptance, if any, of such recommendations [s. 12].

Reading ss. 3 and 9 of the Act together, the Supreme Court has observed in Misbah Alam Shaikh v. State of Maharashtra:[82]

> "….it is the duty of the Central Government to constitute: a National Commission and it shall be the duty and the responsibility of the National Commission to ensure compliance of the principles and programmes evaluated in section 9 of the Act protecting the interest of the minorities for their development and working of the safeguards provided to them in the Constitution and the law enacted by Parliament as well as the State Legislatures. The object thereby is to integrate them in the national main stream in the united and integrated Bharat providing facilities and opportunities to improve their economic and social status and empowerment."

On the question of minorities, the following observation of Justice H.R. KHANNA in St. Xavier's[83] case may be quoted here :

> "India is the most populous country of the world. The people inhabiting this vast land profess different religious and speak different languages. Despite the diversity of religion and language, there runs through the fabric of the Nation the golden thread of a basic innate unity. It is a mosaic of different religions, languages and cultures. Each of them has made a mark on Indian polity and India today represents a synthesis of them all. Our mission is to satisfy every interest and safeguard the interest of all the Minorities to their satisfaction. It is in the context of this background that we should view the provisions of the Constitution contained in Articles 25 to 30. The object of Articles 25 to 30 was to preserve the rights of religious and linguistic minorities so as to place them on a secure pedestal and withdraw them from the vicissitudes of political controversy."

---

82. AIR 1997 SC 1409, 1410 : (1997) 4 SCC 528.
83. Supra, Ch. XXX, Sec. C(d).

Minorities Commissions have also been established in several States, e.g., Bihar, Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka.

After T.M.A.Pai[84] decided that for the purpose of determining the minority the unit will be the state and not the whole of India, an interesting issue was raised before the Supreme Court in Bal Patil v. Union of India[85]. The Commission had recommended that Jains should be notified as a minority under section 2(c) of the Act. The question before the court was whether it was for the State Government or the Centre to issue the relevant notification.

The Court said that the power under Section 2(c) of the Act vests in the Central Government which alone, on its own assessment, has to accept or reject the claim of status of minority by a community. The recommendation of the Commission is only advisory and before the Central Government takes decision on claims of Jains as a "minority" under Section 2(c) of the Act, the identification has to be done on a State-wise basis.

However the Court went on to observe that "The power of the Central Government has to be exercised not merely on the advice and recommendation of the Commission but on consideration of the social, cultural and religious conditions of the Jain community in each State. Statistical data produced to show that a community is numerically a minority cannot be the sole criterion. If it is found that a majority of the members of the community belong to the affluent class of industrialists, businessmen, professionals and propertied class, it may not be necessary to notify them under the Act as such and extend any special treatment or protection to them as a minority."[86] The court introduced a concept of the "creamy layer" which is alien to Art. 30 and in direct conflict with the decision in T.M.A.Pai which held that a minority had to be determined only on the basis of their numbers.

More startlingly the Court said "The Commission instead of encouraging claims from different communities for being added to the list of notified minorities under the Act should suggest ways and means to help to create social conditions where the list of notified minorities is gradually reduced and done away with altogether"[87].

The mandate is contrary to the object of the Act which envisages that the Commission should be for the minorities and not for their elimination.

(f) NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR BACKWARD CLASSES

In the Indra Sawhney case,[88] the Supreme Court had directed that an expert body consisting of officials and non-officials be established at the level of the Centre and each State to look into the complaints of wrong inclusion or non-inclusion of groups, classes and sections in the lists of Backward Classes other than the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. Accordingly, Parliament has enacted the National Commission for Backward Classes Act, 1993, to establish the National Commission for Backward Classes.

---

84. (2002) 8 SCC 481.
85. (2005) 6 SCC 690.
86. Ibid at page 698.
87. Ibid at page 704.
88. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. G.

The function of the Commission is to examine requests for inclusion of any class of citizens as a Backward Class in the lists and hear complaints of over-inclusion or under-inclusion ofany Backward Class in such lists and tender such advice to the Central Government as it deems appropriate [s. 9(1)]. The advice of the Commission shall ordinarily be binding upon the Central Government [s. 9(2)]. Lists of Backward Classes are prepared by the Central Government from time to time for purposes of making provision for the reservation of appointments or posts in favour of the Backward Classes of citizens which, in the opinion of that Government, are not adequately represented in the services under that Government or any other authority under the control of that Government [s. 2(c)].

The Central Government revises these lists from time to time. At the expiration of three years from the enforcement of this Act, and after every succeeding period of ten years thereafter, the Government is bound to undertake revision of the lists with a view to excluding therefrom those classes who have ceased to be Backward Classes, or for including in such lists new Backward Classes. While undertaking any such revision, the Central Government is to consult the Commission [s. 11].

The Commission consists of the following members nominated by the Central Government:

(a) a Chairperson, who is or has been a Supreme Court or a High Court Judge;

(b) a social scientist;

(c) two persons having special knowledge in matters relating to Backward Classes; and

(d) a member-secretary, who is or has been an officer of the Central Government in the rank of a Secretary to the Government of India [s. 3].

Every member holds office for a term of three years from the date he assumes office [s. 4].

The Commission meets as and when necessary and has power to regulate its own procedure [s. 8].

While performing its functions, the Commission enjoys powers of a civil court trying a civil suit in respect of such matters as summoning witnesses etc. [s. 10].

The Commission submits an annual report of its activities during the year to the Central Government [s. 14]. The Central Government lays the report before both Houses of Parliament along with a memorandum of action taken on the advice tendered by the Commission and the reasons for the non-acceptance of any such advice [s. 15].

Several States have set up State Commssions for Backward Classes after the decision in Indra Sawhney. Thus the Kerala State Commission for Backward Classes was constituted under the provisions of the Kerala State Commission for Backward Classes Act, 1993. Similarly The Karnataka Backward Classes Commission has been constituted under the Karnataka State Commission for Backward Classes Act, 1995 The Tamilnadu Backward Classes Commission has been constituted as a permanent body under Article 16(4) read with Article 340 of the Constitution of India under a Government Order in 1993.

H. WOMEN

Women as a class neither belong to a minority group nor are they regarded as forming a Backward Class. India has traditionally been a male dominated society and, therefore, presently women suffer from many social and economic disabilities and handicaps. It thus becomes necessary that such conditions be created, and necessary ameliorative steps be taken, so that women as a class may make progress and are able to shed their disabilities as soon as possible.

The Constitution does not contain many provisions specifically favouring women as such. There is Art. 15(3), reference to which has already been made earlier,[89] which is a provision of permissive nature as it merely says that the state is not prevented from making any special provision for women. Then, there are such general provisions as Arts. 14[90] and 15(2)[91] which outlaw any kind of gender discrimination against women. Art. 21 is also there which can be used to spell out some safeguards for women.[92] The Supreme Court has, in course of time, by its interpretative process of these various constitutional provisions extended some safeguards to women. Reference may be made to a few of these judicial pronouncements.

Recognising that women in India need to be liberated from unjust social political and economic suppression, the Supreme Court has declared in Bodhisattwa[93], that rape is a heinous crime against a woman and amounts to violation of the Fundamental Right guaranteed to a woman under Art. 21. The Court has gone further and recognised the right of a rape victim to claim compensation from the offender for violation of his constitutional right to live with human dignity which is guaranteed to her by Art. 21.[94]

The Court has reiterated this view in Chairman, Rly. Board v. Chandrima Das,[95] where a Bangladeshi woman was gang raped by a few railway employees at Sealdah Railway Station. The Court awarded compensation to her to the tune of Rs. 10 lakhs for violation of her rights under Art. 21.

In Visakha,[96] the Supreme Court has come down heavily on sexual harassment of women at work places and has declared the same to be violation of women's right under Art. 21.

A law providing in favour of male succession to property in the male line was challenged on the premise that the provision was discriminatory and unfair against women and, therefore, ultra vires the equality clause in the Constitution. But the Court refused to do so as "this would bring about a chaos in the existing state of law." The Court, however, did recognise the right to livelihood of the immediate female relatives of the last male holder to hold the land till they find an alternative source of livelihood for otherwise they would be rendered desti-

---

89. Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. B.
90. Supra, Ch. XXI.
91. Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. A(a).
92. Supra, Ch. XXVI.
93. Boodhisattwa Gautam v. Subhra Chakraborty, AIR 1996 SC 922 : (1996) 1 SCC 490; supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(l).
94. Visakha, AIR 1997 SC 3011 : (1997) 6 SCC 241; supra, Chs. XXVI, Sec. J(k), XXXIII, Sec. A(p).
95. AIR 2000 SC 988 : (2000) 2 SCC 465; supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(l).
96. Supra, footnote 94.

tute. [1] Now by reason of an amendment in 2005 to the Hindu Succession Act, 1956 all female heirs have been conferred equal right in the matter of succession and inheritance with that of male heirs.[2]

In Githa Hariharan,[3] the Supreme Court has interpreted s. 6(a) of the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act, 1956, as well as s. 19(b) of the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890, to mean that when the father is not in actual charge of the affairs of the minor either because of his indifference, or because of an agreement (oral or written) between him and the minor's mother, and the minor is in the exclusive care and custody of the mother, or the father for any other reason is unable to take care of the minor because of his physical and/or mental incapacity, the mother can act as the natural guardian of the minor and all her actions would be valid even during the life time of the father, who would be deemed to be 'absent' for the purpose of s. 6(a) of the HMG Act and s. 19(b) of the GW Act.

A woman who is major has the right to go any where and live with anyone she likes without getting married. "This may be regarded immoral by society but it is not illegal. There is a difference between law and morality."[4]

Reference may also be made to Sarla Mudgal and Lily Thomas discussed earlier.[5]

The Supreme Court has used the Directive Principles contained in Arts. 39(a), 39(d) and 39(e) to confer economic empowerment on women. [6]

NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR WOMEN

To ameliorate the general social condition of the women in the country, Parliament has enacted the National Commission for Women Act, 1990, to establish the National Commission for Women (NCW).

The Commission consists of the following :

(a) a Chairperson, committed to the cause of women;

(b) five members nominated from amongst persons having experience in law, trade unionism, management of an industry, administration, economic development, health, education, social welfare, women's voluntary organisations;

(c) a member-secretary who is either a member of a civil service under the Centre, or an expert in the field of management, sociological movement [s. 3].

All these persons hold office for three years and are appointed by the Central Government [s. 4].

The Commission has power to constitute committees as may be necessary to deal with special issues taken up by the Commission from time to time [s. 8]. The

---

1. Madhu Kishwar v. State of Bihar, AIR 1996 SC 1864 : (1996) 5 SCC 125; supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D(d).
2. See G. Sekar v. Geetha, (2009) 6 SCC 99.
3. Githa Hariharan v. Reserve Bank of India, AIR 1999 SC 1149 : (1999) 2 SCC 228.
4. Payal Sharma v. Supdt., Nari Niketan Kalindri Vihar, Agra, AIR 2001 All 254.
5. Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D(p).
Also see, Danial Latifi v. Union of India, ibid.
6. See John Vallamattom v. Union of India : (2003) 6 SCC 611.Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D(t).

Commission has power to regulate its own procedure [s. 9] and has power of a civil court in matters like summoning witnesses [s. 10(4)]. The Commission presents an annual report of its activities [s. 13], which is presented to both Houses of Parliament along with a government memorandum of action taken thereon [s. 14].

The terms of reference of the Commission as laid down in s. 10 of the Act are very comprehensive. The Commission discharges the following functions [s. 10(1)] :

(a) investigate and examine all matters relating to the safeguards provided for women under the Constitution and other laws;

(b) present to the Central Government, annually and at such other times as the Commission may deem fit, reports upon the working of those safeguards;

(c) make in such reports recommendations for the effective implementation of those safeguards for improving the conditions of women by the Union or any State;

(d) review, from time to time, the existing provisions of the Constitution and other laws affecting women and recommend amendments thereto so as to suggest remedial legislative measures to meet any lacunae, inadequacies or shortcomings in such legislation;

(e) take up the cases of violation of the provisions or the Constitution and of other laws relating to women with the appropriate authorities;

(f) look into complaints and take suo motu notice of matters relating to—

(i) deprivation of women's rights;

(ii) non-implementation of laws enacted to provide protection to women and also to achieve the objective of equality and development;

(iii) non-compliance of policy decisions, guidelines or instructions aimed at mitigating hardships and ensuring welfare and providing relief to women, and take up the issues arising out of such matters with appropriate authorities;

(g) call for special studies or investigations into specific problems or situations arising out of discrimination and atrocities against women and identify the constraints so as to recommend strategies for their removal;

(h) undertake promotional and educational research so as to suggest ways of ensuring due representation of women in all spheres and identify factors responsible for impeding their advancement, such as, lack of access to housing and basic services, inadequate support services and technologies for reducing drudgery and occupational health hazards and for increasing their productivity;

(i) participate and advise on the planning process of socio economic development of women;

(j) evaluate the progress of the development of women under the Union and any State;

(k) inspect or cause to be inspected a jail, remand home, women's institution or other place of custody where women are kept as prisoners or otherwise, and take up with the concerned authorities for remedial action, if found necessary;

(l) fund litigation involving issues affecting a large body of women;

(m) make periodical reports to the Government on any matter pertaining to women and in particular various difficulties under which women toil;

(n) any other matter which may be referred to it by the Central Government.

The Central Government is required to lay before the two Houses of Parliament all the reports sent to it by the Commission under (b) above along with a memorandum explaining the action taken or proposed to be taken on the recommendations and the reasons for non-acceptance, if any, of any such recommendations [s. 10(2)].

If a recommendation relates to a State Government, the Commission sends the same to that government which lays the same before the State Legislature along with an explanatory memorandum [s. 10(3)].

The Central Government makes grants to the Commission for being utilised for the purposes of the Act [s. 11].

The salaries and allowances payable to the Chairperson and members of the Commission and its administrative expenses are to be paid out of the grants as mentioned above [s. 6].

While investigating any matter referred to in (a), or sub-cl. (i) of cl. (f), the Commission enjoys all the powers of a civil court trying a suit, such as, summoning of witnesses, receiving evidence on affidavits etc.

Section 16 of the Act makes it obligatory on the part of the Central Government to consult the Commission on all major policy matters affecting women.

A reference to the annual report of the Commission for the year 1997-98 throws light on the functioning of the Commission. The Commission has undertaken review of all laws for the protection and empowerment of women. Out of 39 such laws, the Commission has reviewed the following ten laws during the year under review, viz., The Commission of Sati (Prevention) Act, 1987; The Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act, 1971; The Child Marriage Restraint Act, 1929; The Family Courts Act, 1984; the Foreign Marriage Act, 1969; The Guardian and Wards Act, 1869; The Indian Succession Act, 1925; The Hindu Marriage Act, 1955; The Indian Penal Code. The Commission has suggested suitable amendments in all these laws with a view to affording better protection to the women. In Chapter III of the Report, the Commission has reviewed cases of violence against women. The Commission has observed in this connection: "Gender-based violence is recognised to-day as a major issue on national human rights agenda."

The Commission views violence against women "as one of the most crucial social mechanisms by which women are forced into a subordinate position."

In Ch. IV, the Commission has surveyed the problem of prostitution and has suggested strict implementation of s. 13 of the Immoral Traffic Prevention Act which provides for appointment of special officers to fight traffickers.

In Ch. V, the Commission has looked into the problems being faced by such groups of women as Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, mentally ill and handicapped women, widows, minorities. These groups need special attention because "the problems of such women were peculiar to the socio-economic, cultural and situational factors affecting them."

Other issues considered by the Commission in this report are : political participation by women (Ch. VI); women in custody (Ch. VIII); socio-economic development of women (Ch. VII).

The Commission has defined its function as follows:

> "The ultimate objective of the affairs of the Commission is to help enable the women to live a dignified life without distress and with undiscriminated socio-economic status in the society."

More recently, in Seema v. Ashwani Kumar, the Commission submitted an affidavit in support of its opinion that non-registration of marriages affects women the most and a law making marriages compulsorily registrable would be of critical importance to various women-related issues such as:

(a) Prevention of child marriages and to ensure minimum age of marriage.

(b) Prevention of marriages without the consent of the parties.

(c) Check illegal bigamy/polygamy.

(d) Enabling married women to claim their right to live in the matrimonial house, maintenance, etc.

(e) Enabling widows to claim their inheritance rights and other benefits and privileges which they are entitled to after the death of their husband.

(f) Deterring men from deserting women after marriage.

(g) Deterring parents/guardians from selling daughters/young girls to any person including a foreigner, under the garb of marriage.

The Supreme Court[7] accepted the views expressed by the Commission and directed the States and the Central Government to take the necessary steps to effect such a law.

7. (2006) 2 SCC 578, at page 583 : AIR 2006 SC 1158.

CHAPTER XXXVI

GOVERNMENT SERVICES

SYNOPSIS

A. INTRODUCTORY

Articles 309 to 323 of the Constitution make elaborate provisions for the Central and State services.[1]

The civil servant is indispensable to the governance of the country in the modern administrative age. Ministers frame policies and legislatures enact laws, but the task of efficiently and effectively implementing these policies and laws falls on the civil servants. The bureaucracy thus helps the political executive in the governance of the country. The Constitution, therefore, seeks to inculcate in the civil servant a sense of security and fairplay so that he may work and function efficiently and give his best to the country. Nevertheless, the overriding power of the government to dismiss or demote a servant has been kept intact, even though safeguards have been provided subject to which only such a power can be exercised.

The service jurisprudence in India is rather complex, intertwined as it is with legislation, rules, directions, practices, judicial decisions and with principles of Administrative Law, Constitutional Law, Fundamental Rights and Natural Justice. The role of the Courts in this area is crucial as they seek to draw a balance between the twin needs of the civil service, viz., (1) the need to maintain discipline in the ranks of the civil servants; and (2) the need to ensure that the disciplinary authorities exercise their powers properly and fairly.

1. This Chapter may be read along with Ch. XXIII, supra.

B. LEGISLATIVE POWER

According to Art. 309, Parliament or a State Legislature may, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, regulate the recruitment and conditions of service of persons appointed to the public services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Union or the State, as the case may be.[2] Pending such legislation, the President, or the Governor, or any person authorised by him, may make rules in this respect [Proviso to Art. 309]. The rules take effect subject to any legislation that may be enacted for the purpose. This rule-making power is thus in the nature of an interim power to be exercised by the Executive so long as the Legislature does not act.

The rule-making power is characterised as 'legislative' and not 'executive' power as it is a power which the legislature is competent to exercise but has not in fact exercised.[3]

Rules made by the Government under this power are regarded as legislative in character and so these rules can even be made to take effect retrospectively,[4] but the Supreme Court has said that the President/Governor cannot make such retrospective rules under Art. 309 as contravene Arts. 14, 16 or 311 and "affect vested right of an employee".[5]

The Supreme Court has ruled in Kapur[6] that "the benefits acquired under the existing rule cannot be taken away by an amendment with retrospective effect, that is to say, there is no power to make such a rule under the proviso to Art. 309 which affects or impairs vested rights." Upholding the power to frame rules retrospectively, the Court has subjected the power to the following rider in B.S. Yadav v. State of Haryana:[7]

> "But the date from which the rules are made to operate must be shown to bear, either from the face of the rules or by extrinsic evidence, reasonable nexus with the provisions contained in the rules, especially when the retrospective effect extends over a long period as in this case."

This means that the "retrospective operation of the rule will be struck down if there exists no reasonable nexus between the concerned rule and its retrospectivity."

Rules were made in 1985 but given operation with effect from 1976. The Supreme Court declared the rules invalid with the following comment:[8]

---

2. See entries 70 and 71 in List I, supra, Ch. X, and entries 41 and 42 in List II, supra, Ch. X.
3. B.S. Yadav v. State of Haryana, AIR 1981 SC 561 : 1980 Supp SCC 524.
4. B.S. Vedera v. Union of India, AIR 1969 SC 118 : (1968) 3 SCR 575; S.S. Bola v. B.D. Sardana, AIR 1977 SC 3127.
Also see, V.K. Sood v. Secretary, Civil Aviation, AIR 1993 SC 2285 : 1993 Supp (3) SCC 9.
5. R.N. Nanjundappa v. T. Thimmaiah, AIR 1972 SC 1767 : (1972) 1 SCC 409; Ex. Capt. K.C. Arora v. State of Haryana, AIR 1987 SC 1858 : (1984) 3 SCC 281; P.D. Aggarwal v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1987 SC 1676 : (1987) 3 SCC 622.
6. T.R. Kapur v. State of Haryana, AIR 1987 SC 415 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 44.
7. Supra, footnote 3.
8. K. Narayanan v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1994 SC 55, 64 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 44.

> "As even earlier there is no nexus between framing a rule permitting appointment by transfer and making it retrospective with effect from 1996….The retrospective operation of the impugned rule attempts to disturb a system which has been existing for more than twenty years. And that too without any rationale. Absence of nexus apart no rule can be made retrospectively to operate unjustly and unfairly against other. In our opinion the retrospective operation of the rule with effect from 1976 is discriminatory and violative of Arts. 14 and 16."

The Court also said: "Retrospectivity of the rules is a camouflage for appointment of junior engineers from a back date. In our opinion the rule operates viciously against all those Assistant Engineers who were appointed between 1976 to 1985."

The Court appears to have taken this stand because, at times, State Governments amend service rules with long retrospectivity. The Court has said that the governments change the rules as if they "are a play-thing in the hands of the government".

If there is breach of a statutory rule framed under Art. 309 in relation to the conditions of service, the aggrieved government servant can take recourse to the Court for redress.[9] Questions of interpretation of service rules continually arise before the Courts.[10]

It is not obligatory on the government to frame rules for creating a service, or a post, or to lay down qualifications for a post or service, or to recruit people for the same, as the government can proceed to do so under its executive power.[11] Article 309 does not abridge the power of the Executive to act under Articles 73 and 162 without a law.[12] When a rule has been framed under proviso to Art. 309 of the Constitution laying down the mode and manner of recruitment, no executive order even issued under Art. 162 of the Constitution could be made by way of alteration or amendment of such rules.[13] However, if a rule or a law is in existence then the Executive must abide by it.

The Government cannot amend or supersede statutory rules by administrative instructions, but if the rules are silent on any particular point, then the Government can fill up the gaps and supplement the rules, or the law, by issuing instructions not inconsistent therewith.[14] The Government has power to issue administrative directions governing the service conditions of its employees in the

---

9. State of Mysore v. Bellary, AIR 1965 SC 868 : (1964) 7 SCR 471 ; Shea Dayal Sinha v. State of Bihar, AIR 1981 SC 1543 : (1982) 1 SCC 373.

10. There is a good deal of case-law on the point: see, for example, Asim Kumar Bose v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 509 : (1983) 1 SCC 345; Paluru Ramkrishnaiah v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 166 : (1989) 2 SCC 541.

11. Ramesh Prasad v. State of Bihar, AIR 1978 SC 327.

12. See, supra, Chs. III and VII.

13. Punjab State Warehousing Corpn, Chandigarh v. Manmohan Singh, (2007) 9 SCC 337 : (2007) 4 JT 291. See also State of Uttaranchal v. Alok Sharma, (2009) 7 SCC 647 : (2009) 6 JT 463, no condition in derogation of rules under Art. 309.

14. B.N. Nagarajan v. State of Mysore, AIR 1966 SC 1942; Sant Ram v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1967 SC 1910; State of Assam v. Premadhar, AIR 1970 SC 1314 : (1970) 2 SCC 211; State of Haryana v. Shamsher Jang Bahadur, AIR 1972 SC 1546; V.T. Khanzode v. Reserve Bank of India, AIR 1982 SC 917 : (1982) 2 SCC 7; Union of India v. Patnakar, AIR 1984 SC 1587; Krushna Chandra Sahu v. State of Orissa, AIR 1996 SC 352 : (1995) 6 SCC 1; O.P. Lather v. Satish Kumar Kakkar, AIR 2001 SC 821 : (2001) 3 SCC 110; Union of India v. Rakesh Kumar, AIR 2001 SC 1877.

absence of any statutory provisions governing the field.[15] In Baleshwar Dass v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[16] an office memorandum regarding seniority in government posts was held binding as the government had been following the same for nearly two decades.

A rule framed under Article 309 cannot be modified by an executive order.[17] An administrative instruction cannot abridge, or run counter to, a statutory provision.[18]

When there is a conflict between a rule made under Art. 309, and an executive instruction, it is the rule which prevails. An executive instruction can make provision only with regard to a matter not covered by the Rules; executive instructions cannot override the rules.[19]

Where a person was appointed inconsistent with the rules but under an administrative instruction, the appointment was quashed by the Supreme Court with the following observation:[20]

> "The settled position of law is that no Government order, Notification or circular can be a substitute of the statutory rules framed under the authority of law. Following any other course would be disastrous inasmuch as it would deprive the security of tenure and right of equality conferred upon the civil servants under the constitutional scheme. It would be negating the so far accepted service jurisprudence."

The legislative or rule-making power under Article 309 is specifically made "subject to the provisions of this Constitution". Therefore, the powers is to be exercised subject to the Fundamental Rights, especially, Article 14,[21] 15,[22] 16[23] and 19(1).[24] Thus, rules have to be reasonable, fair and not grossly unjust, if they are to survive the test of Arts. 14 and 16.[25]

In Chairman, Railway Board v. C.R. Rangadhamaiah,[26] the Supreme Court has maintained that a rule made under the proviso to Art. 309 has to be exercised subject to the provisions of the Constitution. This means that the rules can be challenged on the ground of violation of the provisions of the Constitution including the Fundamental Rights. In this case, a rule made on December 5, 1988, reduced the pension of those railway employees who had retired after January 1, 1973, and before December 5, 1988. The Court declared the rule as invalid as being violative not only of Arts. 31(1), 19(1)(f), (since repealed),[27] but also of Arts. 14 and 16 on the ground that it was "unreasonable and arbitrary" since it

---

15. M.M. Dolichan v. State of Kerala, AIR 2001 SC 216 : (2001) 1 SCC 151.
16. AIR 1981 SC 41 : (1980) 4 SCC 226.
17. State of Maharashtra v. Chandrakant, AIR 1981 SC 1990 : (1981) 4 SCC 130.
18. State of Gujarat v. Lal Singh, AIR 1981 SC 368 : (1981) 2 SCC 75.
19. Union of India v. Sh. Soma Sundaram Vishwanath, AIR 1988 SC 2255; Paluru Ramkrishnaiah v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 166, 171 : (1989) 2 SCC 541.
20. Rajinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 2001 SC 1769 : (2001) 5 SCC 482.
21. Supra, Ch. XXI.
22. Supra, Ch. XXII.
23. Supra, Ch. XXIII.
24. Supra, Ch. XXIV.
25. Baleshwar Dass v. State of Uttar Pradesh, supra; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ram Gopal, AIR 1981 SC 1041 : (1981) 3 SCC 1; B.S. Yadav v. Union of India, supra; P. Balakotiah v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 232; State of Mysore v. Krishna Murthy, AIR 1973 SC 1146.
26. AIR 1997 SC 3828 : (1997) 6 SCC 623.
27. Supra, Chs. XXXI and XXXII.

had the effect of reducing the amount of pension that had become payable to the employees (as per the rules then prevalent) who had already retired from service on the date of issuance of the impugned rule.[28]

Similarly, any direction issued by the government in exercise of its administrative power, and any practice followed by it, is subject to these Fundamental Rights and thus arbitrary and unreasonable directions regarding service matters cannot be valid.[29]

An instructive case is Rattan Lal v. State of Haryana,[30] The Haryana Government followed the practice of appointing teachers on an ad hoc basis at the beginning of the academic year and terminating their services at the end of the year before the beginning of summer vacation, and appointing them again in the beginning of the next academic session and repeating the same process over and over again. The teachers were thus made to lose the benefits of summer vacation, salary and allowances for that period and leave privileges, available to all government servants. Condemning such a practice under Arts. 14 and 16, the Supreme Court said: "These ad hoc teachers are unnecessarily subjected to an arbitrary "hiring and firing" policy..... The Government appears to be exploiting this situation. This is not a sound personnel policy.... It is needless to say that the State Government is expected to function as a model employer."

The power conferred by Art. 309 is exercisable subject to the provisions of Arts. 233, 234 and 235.[31] Accordingly, the Supreme Court has ruled in State of Bihar v. Bal Mukund Sah[32] that the Bihar Reservation of vacancies in Posts and Services (for Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and Other Backward classes) Act, 1991, in ultra vires the Constitution insofar as the Act seeks to reserve 50% of the posts in subordinate judiciary for these sections. The Act is inconsistent with Arts. 233 and 234.[33] The State Legislature cannot lay down a statutory scheme of reservation in subordinate judiciary without consulting the High Court.

On the question of inter-relationship between Arts. 235 and 309, the Supreme Court has observed in Sisir :[34]

> "…the mere fact that Art. 309 gives power to the executive and the legislature to prescribe the service conditions of the judiciary does not mean that the judiciary should have no say in the matter. It would be against the spirit of the Constitution to deny any role to the judiciary in that behalf, for theoretically it would not be impossible for the executive or the legislature to turn and twist the tail of the judiciary by using the said power. Such a consequence would be against one of the seminal mandates of the Constitution, namely, to maintain the independence of the judiciary."

It is thus settled law that the power under Art. 309 can be exercised in relation to subordinate judiciary keeping "in view the opinion of the High Court of the

---

28. Also see, Salabuddin Mohammad Yunus v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1984 SC 1905 : 1984 Supp SCC 399.
29. S.L. Sachdev v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 411 : (1980) 4 SCC 562.
30. (1985) 4 SCC 43 : AIR 1987 SC 478.
31. For these provisions see, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G..
32. AIR 2000 SC 1296 : (2000) 4 SCC 640.
33. For details, see, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G(h).
34. Registrar (Admin.), High Court of Orissa, Cuttack v. Sisir Kanta Satapahty, AIR 1999 SC 3265 : (1999) 7 SCC 725.

concerned State and the same cannot be whisked away".[35] The framers of the Constitution have separately dealt with the judicial services of the State and have made exclusive provisions [Arts. 233 to 237] for the purpose. These provisions stand on their own and quite independently of the general provisions dealing with State Services, viz., Arts. 308 to 323. Thus, Art. 309, which, on its express terms, is made subject to other provisions of the Constitution gets circumscribed "to the extent to which from its general field of operation is carved out a separate and exclusive field for operation" by Arts. 233 to 239 dealing with subordinate judiciary. In laying down this proposition, the Supreme Court is guided by the premise that judicial independence is the very essence and basic structure of the Constitution.[36]

The Courts also lay down norms to deal with service matters when either no norms have been laid down under Article 309, or they are not fair and just.[37]

Besides, independently of general provisions of Art. 309, special provisions exist in the Constitution for some categories of public servants.

For officers of the Supreme Court, rules regarding conditions of service can be made by the Chief Justice subject to a law of Parliament [Art. 146(2)].[38]

For persons in the Audit and Accounts Department, conditions of service may be prescribed by rules made by the President after consultation with the Comptroller and Auditor-General, subject to a law made by Parliament [Art. 148(5)].[39]

Rules regarding conditions of service for officers and servants of a High Court can be made, subject to a law of the State Legislature, by the Chief Justice [Art. 229(2)].[40]

For servants of State Legislatures and Parliament, the relevant provisions in the Constitution are Articles 187[41] and 98.[42]

Article 312 makes provision for the creation of all-India Services common to the Union and the States.[43]

The rule-making or legislative power under Article 309 is subject to constitutional provisions[44] and so it is subject to Article 310 laying down the doctrine of pleasure; and Article 311 which controls Article 310.[45]

---

35. State of Bihar v. Bal Mukund Sah,, AIR 2000 SC at 1319 : (2000) 4 SCC 640.
36. Ibid, at 1318.
Also see, Sisir, supra, footnote 34*; All Inida Judges' Ass. v. Union of India*, AIR 1993 SC. 2493; supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. F and Sec. G.
37. Krushna Chandra Sahu, supra, footnote 14.
38. Supra, Ch. IV, Secs. I(f) and (g).
39. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(s).
40. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(u).
41. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. D(c).
42. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. H(c).
43. Supra, Ch. XII, Sec. G.
44. Supra, Sec. B.
45. Art. 313 was a transitory provision as it kept in force all pre-constitution rules relating to public services, so far as consistent with the Constitution, until fresh rules were made under Art. 309.

C. DOCTRINE OF PLEASURE

In Britain, traditionally, a servant of the Crown holds office during the pleasure of the Crown. This is the common-law doctrine. The tenure of office of a civil servant, except where it is otherwise provided by a statute, can be terminated at any time at will without assigning any cause, without notice. The civil servant has no right at common-law to take recourse to the Courts, or claim any damages for wrongful dismissal. He cannot file a case for arrears of his salary. The Crown is not bound even by any special contract between it and a civil servant, for the theory is that the Crown could not fetter its future executive action by entering into a contract in matters concerning the welfare of the country.

The justification for the rule is that the Crown should not be bound to continue in public service any person whose conduct is not satisfactory.[46] The doctrine is based on public policy, the operation of which can be modified by an Act of Parliament. In practice, however, things are different as many inroads have been made now into the traditional system by legislation relating to employment, social security and labour relations. As De Smith observes: "The remarkably high degree of security enjoyed by established civil servants surpassed only by judiciary, was not recognised by rules applied in the Courts."[47]

A similar rule is embodied in Article 310(1) which lays down that the defence personnel[48] and civil servants[49] of the Union, and the members of an All-India Service, hold office during the 'pleasure of the President'. Similarly, a civil servant in a State holds office 'during the pleasure of the Governor'.

This is the general rule which operates "except as expressly provided by the Constitution". This means that the "doctrine of pleasure" is subject to general constitutional limitations. Therefore, when there is a specific provision in the Constitution giving to a servant a tenure different from that provided in Article 310, then that servant would be excluded from the operation of the doctrine of pleasure. The Supreme Court Judges [Art. 124][50], Auditor-General [Art. 148][51], High Court Judges [Arts. 217, 218][52], a member of a Public Service Commission [Art. 317][53], and the Chief Election Commissioner[54] have been expressly excluded by the Constitution from the rule of pleasure.

(a) IMPLICATIONS OF THE DOCTRINE OF PLEASURE

The Supreme Court has recently justified the pleasure doctrine on the basis of 'public policy', 'public interest' and 'public good' insofar as inefficient, dishon-

---

46. Shenton v. Smith, (1895) AC 229; Gould v. Stuart, (1896) AC 575; Reilly v. The King, (1934) AC 176; Terrell v. Secy. of State, (1953) 2 QB 482; Chelliah Kodeeswaran v. Attorney-General of Ceylon, (1970) AC 1111.

47. S.A. DE SMITH, CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 189 (1977).
Also see, Wade ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 67-71 (2000).

48. The term 'defence personnel' means a member of a defence service or a person holding any post connected with defence.

49. For meaning of the term 'civil servant' see, infra, Sec. D.

50. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. B(m).

51. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(s).

52. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(t).

53. Infra, Sec. K.

54. Art. 324, supra, Ch. XIX, Sec. D.

est or corrupt persons, or those who have become a security risk, should not continue in service.[55]

Under Article 310, the government has power to punish any of its servants for misconduct committed not only in the course of official duties but even for that committed by him in private life. The government has a right to expect that each of its servants will observe certain standards of decency and morality in his private life. For example, government has power to demand that no servant shall remarry during the life-time of his first wife, or that he shall not drink at social functions, or that he shall not lend or borrow or acquire and dispose of property. If the government were not able to do so, there would be a catastrophic fall in the moral prestige of the administration. Thus, disciplinary action can be taken against a police constable for his behaving very rudely and improperly with a member of the public in his private life.[56]

A rule emanating from the doctrine of pleasure in Britain is that no servant of the Crown can maintain an action against the Crown for any arrears of salary. The assumption underlying this rule is that the only claim of the civil servants is on the bounty of the Crown and not for a contractual debt.[57]

The Supreme Court in India refused to follow the abovementioned rule in State of Bihar v. Abdul Majid.[58] A sub-inspector of police, dismissed from service on the ground of cowardice, was later reinstated in service, but the government contested his claim for arrears of salary for the period of his dismissal. The Supreme Court upheld his claim for arrears of salary on the ground of contract or quantum meruit, i.e., for the value of the service rendered.

The above ruling was reiterated by the Supreme Court in Om Parkash v. State of Uttar Pradesh[59] where it was held that when the dismissal of a civil servant was found to be unlawful, he was entitled to get his salary from the date of dismissal to the date when his dismissal was declared unlawful. In State of Maharashtra v. Joshi,[60] a claim for arrears of salary was held to be based on contract.

(b) LEGISLATIVE POWER IS SUBJECT TO THE DOCTRINE OF PLEASURE

The legislative power conferred on Parliament or a State Legislature, or the rule-making power conferred on the President or the Governor, by Article 309 is controlled by the doctrine of pleasure embodied in Article 310 for Article 309 opens with a restrictive clause, viz., 'subject to the provisions of the Constitution.'[61] Therefore, the power of the Legislature or that of the Executive to make

---

55. Union of India v. Tulsiram Patel, AIR 1985 SC 1416 : (1985) 3 SCC 398.

56. Madhosingh v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1960 Bom 285.
Also see, Laxmi Narain v. Dist. Magistrate., AIR 1960 All. 55.

57. Mulvenna v. The Admiralty, 1926 S.C. 842; Lucas v. Lucas and High Commissioner for India, (1943) P. 68; I.M. Lall's case, 75 I.A. 225; ANSON, LAW AND CUSTOM OF THE CONST., II. 335-36.
See, D.W. LOGAN, A Civil Servant and his Pay, 61 LQR 240 (1945). Logan not only criticises the rule but even doubts its correctness.
Also see, Chelliah Kodeeswaran v. Att. Gen., supra, footnote 46.

58. AIR 1954 SC 245 : 1954 SCR 786.

59. AIR 1955 SC 600.
Also, Madhav v. State of Mysore, AIR 1962 SC 8 : 1962 SCR 886.

60. AIR 1969 SC 1302 : (1969) 1 SCC 1302.

61. Moti Ram Deka v. N.E.F. Rlys., AIR 1964 SC 600 : (1964) 5 SCR 683.

rules, to lay down conditions of service of public servants is subject to 'the tenure at pleasure' doctrine under Article 310.

Article 309 is, therefore, to be read subject to Art. 310. A law or a rule cannot impinge upon the overriding power of the President or the Governor to put an end to the tenure of a civil servant at his pleasure.[62] The inter-relationship between Arts. 309 and 310 has been explained by the Supreme Court as follows in Tulsiram Patel:

> "The opening words of Art. 309 make that article expressly subject to the provisions of this Constitution. Rules made under the proviso to Art. 309 or under Acts referable to that Article must, therefore, be made subject to the provisions of the Constitution if they are to be valid. Art. 310(1) which embodies the pleasure doctrine is a provision contained in the Constitution. Therefore, rules made under the proviso to Art. 309 or under Acts referable to that Article are subject to Art. 310(1). By the opening words of Art. 310(1) the pleasure doctrine contained therein operates "except as expressly provided by this Constitution." Art. 311 is an express provision of the Constitution. Therefore, rules made under the proviso to Art. 309 or under Acts referable to Art. 309 would be subject both to Arts. 310(1) and Art. 311."

The result is that the rules made under Art. 309 are not applicable to defence personnel as they remain subject to the President's pleasure.[63]

The position in India differs from that in Britain, because in Britain, the doctrine of pleasure being a common law doctrine, Parliament may by law supersede the doctrine of pleasure in any case it likes. But, the same cannot be done in India. Here the doctrine of pleasure is sanctioned by the Constitution and can, therefore, be excluded only by a constitutional provision, such as, Article 311, but not by any legislation or rules.[64]

(c) DISCIPLINARY ACTION TAKEN UNDER STATUTORY AUTHORITY

Though a law (or the rules) made under Article 309 cannot restrict the pleasure of the President or the Governor, as noted above, yet a law or a rule can prescribe the procedure by which, and the authority by whom, disciplinary powers can be exercised over civil servants. Whatever this authority then does, it does so by virtue of the express power conferred on it by the law (or the rules), and not under the 'pleasure' of the President or the Governor.

The statutory power of the authority to take disciplinary action cannot be equated with the pleasure of the Governor or the President. The disciplinary authority has to act within the compass of its statutory power, and any infringement of this may result in the order being quashed by the Court. For example, in the case noted below,[65] the power to take disciplinary action was conferred under the law on the Inspector-General of Police subject to the approval of the State

---

62. Union of India v. K.S. Subramanian, AIR 1989 SC 662 : (1989) Supp 1 SCC 331.
Also, Shamsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192; Union of India v. Tulsiram Patel, AIR 1985 SC 1416 : (1985) 3 SCC 398; Union of India v. S.B. Mishra, AIR 1996 SC 613 : (1995) 5 SCC 657.

63. Union of India v. S.B. Mishra, AIR 1996 SC 613.

64. Sampuran Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 SC 1407 : (1982) 3 SCC 200.
Also, Ramanatha Pillai v. State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC 2641 : (1973) 2 SCC 650.

65. Supdt. of Police, Manipur v. R.K. Tomalsana Singh, AIR 1984 SC 535 : 1984 Supp SCC 155.
Also, Union of India v. Ram Kishan, AIR 1971 SC 1402 : (1971) 2 SCC 349.

Government. Dismissal of a sub-inspector of police by the I.G. without the approval of the State Government would be invalid.

Conferment of disciplinary powers by statute or rules on a designated authority does not in any way override the pleasure of the Governor or the President, as the case may be. This 'pleasure' remains intact. The Governor or the President can still dismiss, remove or reduce in rank a government servant even though such power has also been conferred on any other authority. But, so far as this authority is concerned, the validity of its action is to be tested with reference to the law under which it functions, and the doctrine of pleasure cannot be invoked to justify a wrongful order made by such an authority. The doctrine of pleasure can be invoked only when an order of termination of service has been made in the name of the Governor or the President.

The pleasure of the President or the Governor is not required to be exercised by either of them personally. Such pleasure can be exercised by the President or the Governor acting with the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers.[66] The Supreme Court has propounded the view in Shamsher Singh[67] and Sripati Ranjan[68] that the Constitution 'conclusively contemplates' a 'constitutional President' acting with the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers. Appointment, dismissal or removal of civil servants is not a 'personal' but an 'executive' function of the President or the Governor. Wherever the Constitution requires the satisfaction of the President or the Governor for the exercise by him of any power, it is not his personal satisfaction which is required but satisfaction in the constitutional sense. Thus, an officer authorised under the rules of business can take the desired action in the name of the President or the Governor as the case may be.[69]

In Ranjan,[70] an appeal in case of dismissal of an employee was disposed of by the Minister when, under the rules, the appeal lay to the President. The Supreme Court ruled that the disposal of the appeal was proper and legal.

D. CIVIL SERVANT

The term civil servant includes members of a civil service of the Centre or a State, or of an all-India service, or all those who hold civil posts under the Centre or a State. A 'civil post' means an appointment or office on the civil side and includes all personnel employed in the civil administration of the Union or a State.

What, however, is necessary to make a civil post 'under the government' is the relation of master and servant between the state and the employee. Whether such a relationship exists is a question of fact to be decided in each case. A host of factors have to be taken into consideration to determine such relationship. None of these factors may be conclusive and no single factor may be considered absolutely essential.

---

66. See, Ch. III, Sec. A(iii) and Sec. B; and Ch. VII, Sec. A(ii) and Secs. B and C supra.

67. Shamsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 overruling State of Uttar Pradesh v. Babu Ram Upadhya, AIR 1961 SC 751 : (1961) 2 SCR 679 on this point.
Also, supra, Ch. III, Sec. B; Sec. B, Ch. VII.

68. Union of India v. Sripati Ranjan, AIR 1975 SC 1755 : (1975) 4 SCC 699.

69. For "Rules of Business", see Chs. III and VII, supra.

70. Supra, footnote 68.

Some of these factors are:

(i) who selects the employee?

(ii) Who appoints him?

(iii) Who pays him the remuneration or wages?

(iv) Who controls the method of his work?

(v) Who has power to suspend or remove him from employment?

(vi) Who has a right to prescribe the conditions of service?

(vii) Who can issue directions to the employee?

If the answer to all these questions is, the Government then it is a civil post under the Government. Co-existence of all these indicia is not predicated in every case to make the relationship as one of master and servant. In special classes of employment, a contract of service may exist even in the absence of one or more of these indicia. Ordinarily, the right of an employer to control the method of doing work, and the power of superintendence and control are strong indicators of the master and servant relationship.[71]

A civil post outside the regularly constituted services does not have to carry a definite rate of pay; he may be paid on commission basis; the post need not be whole-time, it may be part-time and its holder may even be free to engage himself in other activities. What is important, however, is the existence of the master-servant relationship.[72] Applying the above indicia, the Supreme Court has held the panchayat service in Gujarat created by a State law to be State civil service and its members as servants of the State.[73]

The kurk-amins appointed on commission basis by the collectors have been held to be government servants as there exists no difference between them and the kurk-amins appointed on salary basis. The former perform the same duties and responsibilities as the latter.[74]

The term 'civil servant' does not include a member of a defence service,[75] or even a civilian employee in defence service who is paid salary out of the estimates of the Ministry of Defence.[76] These persons, therefore, while falling under Articles 309 and 310 do not enjoy the protection of Article 311. A member of the police force, however, is a 'civil servant'.[77]

The statutory public corporations, or government companies registered under the Companies Act, although regarded as instrumentalities of the State and, thus, 'authorities' for the purposes of Art. 12,[78] yet have their own distinctive personality separate from the government. Accordingly, employees of such bodies are

---

71. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Audh Narain Singh, AIR 1965 SC 360 : (1964) 7 SCR 89.

72. State of Assam v. Kanak Chandra Dutta, AIR 1967 SC 884 : (1967) 1 SCR 679.
Also see, Supdt. of Post Offices v. P.K. Rajamma, AIR 1977 SC 1677 : (1977) 3 SCC 94.

73. State of Gujarat v. Ramanlal Keshav Lal, AIR 1984 SC 161.
Also see, Mathuradas v. S.D. Munshaw, AIR 1981 SC 53.

74. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Chandra Prakash Pandey, AIR 2001 SC 1298 : (2001) 4 SCC 78.

75. Inder Sain v. Union of India, AIR 1969 Del 220. Defence personnel have their own service rules and regulations for maintaining discipline among their ranks.

76. Lekh Raj v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 2111 : (1971) 1 SCC 780.

77. Jagannath Prasad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1961 SC 1245.

78. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. D.

not regarded as employees of the government and do not, thus, fall within the term 'civil servants' and do not, therefore, fall under the scope of Arts. 310 and 311.[79]

Appointments made under a scheme and recruitment process being carried out through a committee would not render the incumbents thereof holders of civil post. No rule or regulation has been shown governing the mode of their recruitment. A distinction must be made about a post created by the Central Government or the State Governments in exercise of their power under Articles 77 or 162 of the Constitution of India or under a statute vis-à-vis cases of this nature which are sui generis. Terms and conditions of services of an employee may be referable to Acts of appropriate legislature. The matter may also come within the purview of Article 309 of the Constitution.[80] In this case a scheme was floated by the Central Government on a year to year basis and workers known as 'anganwadi workers' were appointed as helpers on honorarium basis. They were also given certain other financial benefits as per the recommendation of a Review Committee constituted by the Central Government. Anganwadi helpers conteded that they were holders of civil posts within the meaning of Article 309 of the Constitution. Distinguishing its earlier decision in Kanak Chandra Dutta[81] the Court pointed out that such workers did not carry out any function of the State. They do not hold posts under any statute. Recruitment rules ordinarily applicable to employees of the state were not applicable in their case. No process of selection was involved. In such factual context the Court held that such Anganwadi workers did not hold any civil post under the State and the State was not required to comply with constitutional scheme of equality under Articles 14 and 16 of the Constitution.[82]

In Ameerbai[83] after considering a number of its earlier decision the Court held that even though a person may be considered as an employee of an employer to which Art. 12 is attracted, he would not be considered as a government employee holding a 'civil post' under Art. 311. And the fact that such workers were subject to state controlled Integrated Child Development Scheme to which they were attached is not crucial.[84]

Employees of these bodies do remain subject to Fundamental Rights and can also claim natural justice in case of dismissal, reduction in rank, etc.[85] Similar is the status of employees of local bodies.[86]

---

79. Bool Chand v. Kurukshetra University, AIR 1968 SC 292 : (1968) 1 SCR 434; S.L. Agarwal v. Hindustan Steel, AIR 1970 SC 1150; Sabhajit Tewary v. Union of India, AIR 1975 SC 1329 : (1975) 1 SCC 485; Sukhdev Singh v. Bhagatram, AIR 1975 SC 1331; A.L. Kalra v. Project and Equipment Corp. of India Ltd., AIR 1984 SC 1361 : (1984) 3 SCC 316; K.C. Joshi v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 1046; Rajasthan SRTC v. Gurudas Singh, (2004) 13 SCC 418.

Also see, M.P. JAIN, The Legal Status of Public Corporations and Their Employees, 18 JILI 1-34 (1976); JAIN and JAIN, PRINCIPLES OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, Ch XXV (1986).

80. State of Karnataka v. Ameerbi, (2007) 11 SCC 681 : (2007) 1 JT 279.

81. State of Assam v. Kanak Chandra Dutta, AIR 1967 SC 884.

82. Ibid.

83. (2007) 11 SCC 681 : (2007) 1 JT 279.

84. See also Uttar Haryana Bijli Vitran Nigam Ltd. v. Surji Devi, (2008) 2 SCC 310 : AIR 2008 SC 1114.

85. For the concept of Natural Justice, see, supra, Ch. VIII.

86. Kumaon Mandal Vikas Nigam Ltd. v. Girija Shankar Pant, AIR 2001 SC 24 : (2000) 1 SCC 182.

Officers and members of a High Court are civil servants.[87]

Protection under Art. 311 is not available to Members of Autonomous District/Regional Council under Sch. VI.[88]

Employees of an employer who come within the meaning of Article 12 of the Constitution are not necessarily government servants. The State by virtue of a scheme may exercise control over a section of the persons working but merely because of that such persons do not become entitled to protection under Article 311 of the Constitution.[89]

E. RESTRICTIONS ON THE DOCTRINE OF PLEASURE

The Doctrine of Pleasure embodied in Article 310, though not subject to legislative power is not, however, unlimited. On its exercise, the Constitution imposes the following several qualifications:

(1) The 'pleasure' under Art. 310 cannot be exercised in a discriminatory manner and is controlled by the Fundamental Rights, especially, Arts. 14, 15 and 16.

Article 14 can be invoked when a person's services are terminated in a discriminatory manner.[90] Art. 15(1) comes into play if a person's services are terminated on account of religious bigotry, racial prejudice, casteism, provincialism or gender.[91] Art. 16(1) imposes equable treatment and bars arbitrary discrimination.[92]

(2) Under Art. 320(3)(c), the Union or the State Public Services Commission is to be consulted on all disciplinary matters affecting a person serving in a civil capacity under the Central or a State Government.[93]

(3) When a person (not being a member of a defence service or an All-India service or a civil service) is appointed to a civil post on contract for a fixed term, the contract may (if the President or the Governor, as the case may be, deems it necessary in order to secure the services of a person having special qualifications) provide for the payment of compensation to him if, before the agreed period, that post is abolished, or that person is required to vacate that post for reasons not connected with misconduct on his part [Article 310(2)].

The Chief Minister and the Ministers appointed certain persons of their choice in their respective establishments. The order appointing the employees expressly stated not only that their services shall be terminated at any time without giving any notice and without assigning any reason but also that their appointment was for a limited period conterminous with the concerned minister's tenure. These

---

87. Pradyat Kumar v. Chief Justice, Calcutta High Court, AIR 1956 SC 285 : (1955) 2 SCR 1331; Akhil Kumar v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1960 All 193; supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. E(iv)(d).
88. Pu Myllai Hlychho v. State of Mizoram, (2005) 2 SCC 92 : AIR 2005 SC 1537.
89. State of Karnataka v. Ameerbi, (2007) 11 SCC 681,
90. See, supra, Ch. XXI.
91. See, supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. A.
92. See, Supra. Ch. XXIII, Sec. A.
93. See, infra, Sec. G.

employees were also asked to execute an undertaking in the above terms. They did execute such an undertaking.

The Supreme Court ruled that their appointment was purely a contractual appointment conterminous with the tenure of the Minister's establishment, at whose choice and instance they were appointed. The appointees in question could not be treated as temporary government servants. As soon as the tenure of the ministers at whose instance and on whose recommendation they were appointed came to an end, their services also came to an end simultaneously. Neither an order of termination as such, nor any prior notice was necessary for putting an end to their service. "They ought to go out in the manner they have come in."[1]

4. An important limitation on the doctrine of pleasure is imposed by Article 311(1). According to this constitutional provision, no civil servant is to be dismissed or removed by an authority 'subordinate' to the authority by which he was appointed. Dismissal or removal of a civil servant by an authority subordinate to the appointing authority is invalid.[2]

This requirement does not mean that the removal or dismissal must be by the appointing authority itself, or its direct superior. It is enough if the removing authority is of the same or co-ordinate rank or grade as the appointing authority.

The government can confer powers on an officer other than the appointing authority to dismiss a government servant provided he is not subordinate in rank to the appointing authority[3]. This means that a person appointed by Secretary cannot be dismissed by the Deputy Secretary.[4] A person appointed by the Central Government can be dismissed by it but not by the State Government.[5] A rule authorising a junior officer to dismiss employees appointed by a senior authority is invalid as contravening Article 311(1).[6]

The purpose underlying Article 311(1) is to ensure a certain amount of security to civil servants. The Article bars dismissal or removal by subordinate authorities in whose judgment the civil servants may not have much faith.[7] This requirement is not a restriction on the pleasure of the President or the Governor, for he may always dismiss a servant whether appointed by him or by some one subordinate to him. In effect, it constitutes a restriction on subordinate appointing authorities. In their case, the power of dismissal is to be exercised by authorities of the same rank as the appointing authorities.

Article 311(1) does not debar a superior authority from entrusting the function of making an inquiry to a subordinate and then acting on his report.[8]

---

1. State of Gujarat v. P.J. Kampavat, AIR 1992 SC 1685 : (1992) 2 SCC 226.
2. Krishna Kumar v. Divl. Asstt., E.E. Central Rly., AIR 1979 SC 1912; Sampuran Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 SC 1407 : (1982) 3 SCC 200.
3. Mahesh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1955 SC 70 : (1955) 1 SCR 965; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ram Naresh Lal, AIR 1970 SC 1263 : (1970) 3 SCC 173; Sampuran Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 SC 1407 : (1982) 3 SCC 200; Jai Jai Ram v. U.P. State Road Transport Corp., AIR 1996 SC 2289 : (1996) 4 SCC 727.
4. Satish v. West Bengal, AIR 1960 Cal 278.
5. Union of India v. Gurbaksh Singh, AIR 1975 SC 641. Also, Mysore S.R.T. Corp. v. Mirja Khasim, AIR 1977 SC 747 : (1977) 2 SCC 747.
6. Mohd. Ghouse v. Andhra, AIR 1957 SC 246 : 1957 SCR 414.
7. Parshotam Lal Dhingra v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 36, 44 : 1958 SCR 828.
8. Pradyat Kumar v. Chief Justice, Calcutta, AIR 1956 SC 285 : (1955) 2 SCR 1331.

In State of Madhya Pradesh v. Shardul Singh,[9] a departmental enquiry was initiated against a sub-inspector of police by Superintendent of Police. After holding an enquiry, hesent his report to the Inspector General of Police who ultimately dismissed the sub-inspector from service. The order of dismissal was challenged on the ground of its being inconsistent with Art. 311(1). It was argued that the inquiry held by the superintendent of police infringed the mandate of Art. 311(1) as the sub-inspector was appointed by the Inspector General of Police.

The Supreme Court ruled that Art. 311(1) "does not in terms require that the authority empowered under that provision to dismiss or remove an official should itself initiate or conduct the enquiry proceeding the dismissal or removal of the officer, or even that inquiry should be done at his instance". The only right guaranteed to a civil servant under Art. 311(1) is that he shall not be dismissed or removed by an authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed.

The Court has also pointed out that Article 311(1) does not command that the dismissal must be by the very same authority who made the appointment or by its direct superior. The dismissal can be either by the appointing authority or by any other authority to which the appointing authority is subordinate. The dismissal of a civil servant must comply with the procedure laid down in Article 311.[10]

The Supreme Court refused to agree with the proposition that the guarantee given by Art. 311(1) "includes within itself a further guarantee that the disciplinary proceedings resulting in dismissal or removal of a civil servant should also be initiated and conducted by the authorities mentioned in Art. 311(1). Thus, the initiation of a departmental proceeding and conducting an inquiry can be by an authority other than the one competent to impose the proposed penalty.[11]

The legal position is now well settled that it is not necessary that the authority competent to impose the penalty must initiate the disciplinary proceedings and that the proceedings can be initiated by any superior authority who can be held to be controlling authority who may be an officer subordinate to the appointing authority.[12]

The power is concurrently conferred upon the appointing authority and as well as the authority to which the appointing authority is subordinate. There is no dispute that the Engineer-in-Chief being the appointing authority in respect of the post that was held by the respondent delinquent at the time of initiation of disciplinary enquiry is undoubtedly subordinate to the Government. It cannot be said that the Government had no jurisdiction or the authority under the Rules to impose a major penalty on a member of subordinate service.[13]

5. The most important limitation imposed on the doctrine of 'pleasure' is by Art. 311(2). According to this provision, no civil servant can be dismissed,

---

9. (1970) 1 SCC 108.

10. Govt. of Andhra Pradesh v. N. Ramanaiah, (2009) 7 SCC 165 : (2009) 6 JT 606.

11. P.V. Srinivasa Sastry v. Comptroller and Auditor General, (1993) 1 SCC 419 : AIR 1993 SC 1321; Transport Commissioner, Madras v. A. Radha Krishna Moorthy, (1995) 1 SCC 332 : 1995 SCC (L&S) 313; I.G. of Police v. Thavasiappan, AIR 1996 SC 1318 : 1996 SCC (125) 433.

12. Director General, ESI v. T. Abdul Razak, (1996) 4 SCC 708; Steel Authority of India v. Dr. R.K. Diwakar, AIR 1998 SC 2210 : (1997) 11 SCC 17.

13. Govt. of Andhra Pradesh v. N. Ramanaiah, (2009) 7 SCC 165 : (2009) 6 JT 606.

removed or reduced in rank except after an inquiry in which he has been informed of the charges against him and given a reasonable opportunity of being heard in respect of those charges.[14]

It may be pointed out that there are two kinds of penalties in service jurisprudence—major and minor. Amongst the minor penalties are: censure, withholding promotion, withholding increments. The major penalties are: dismissal, removal from service, compulsory retirement and reduction in rank. Art. 311(2) applies only to three major penalties, viz., dismissal, removal, or reduction in rank.

6. The rule of reasonable opportunity embodied in Art. 311(2) does not however apply in three situations as mentioned in the second proviso to Art. 311(2) in clauses (a) (b) (c).[15] These constitutional provisions are discussed later.[16]

It will be seen from the above that the two main limitations on the doctrine of pleasure are as follows:

(1) A civil servant cannot be dismissed by any disciplinary authority which is subordinate to the authority by which the appointment in question was made.

(2) A civil servant cannot be dismissed, removed or reduced in rank until he has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him.

These two qualifications on the President's/Governor's pleasure are in reality two safeguards which the Constitution extends to a civil servant.

These two restrictions (mentioned in (1) and (2) above) on the doctrine of pleasure are imperative and mandatory. If any of these restrictions is infringed, the matter is justiciable and the aggrieved party is entitled to suitable relief at the hands of the Courts.

F. DISMISSAL, REMOVAL, REDUCTION IN RANK

(i) DISMISSAL/REMOVAL

These are regarded as major punishments awarded to a civil servant. Art. 311(1) applies to the cases of 'dismissal' or 'removal', while Art. 311(2) covers all these three punishments. Art. 311(1) is thus narrower than that of Art. 311(2) insofar as 'reduction in rank' falls within the ambit of the latter but not the former. Over the years, through judicial exposition, these terms have acquired a somewhat technical significance.

Termination of service of a civil servant when the post held by him is abolished does not involve any punishment and is, thus, neither dismissal nor removal, and so does not attract Art. 311(2). Whether any post is to be retained or abolished is essentially a matter for the government to decide. But a decision to abolish a post should be taken in good faith. It will lose its effective character if it has been made arbitrarily, mala fide or as a cloak to take penal action against the

---

14. For comments on this provision, see, infra, Sec. G.
15. Second Proviso to Art. 311(2), the opening words of which are: Provided further that this clause [Art. 311(2)] shall not apply..."
16. Infra, Sec. H.

concerned employee which falls within the meaning of Art. 311(2). In such a case, abolition of the post will suffer from a serious infirmity.[17]

'Dismissal' and 'removal' are practically similar concepts except that in 'dismissal' the person concerned is barred from future employment but not in case of removal.[18]

Both dismissal and removal involve termination of service, but every case of termination of service does not amount to dismissal or removal for purposes of Art. 311(2). This matter can be discussed under the following several heads.

(a) PERMANENT POST

If the employee has the right to hold the post either under the terms of contract of employment, express or implied, or under the rules governing the conditions of service, then the termination of his service attracts Art. 311(2).

A person appointed substantively to a permanent post in government service normally acquires a right to hold the post until he attains the age of superannuation. Termination of service of such a person is regarded per se as punishment, for it operates as a forfeiture of his rights and brings about a premature end of his employment. He is therefore entitled to the protection of Art. 311(2).

Removal of a permanent government employee from service for overstaying his leave, or long absence, without observing Art. 311(2), is illegal even when the service rules make a provision to that effect.[19] A rule providing for termination of service of permanent employees merely by notice for a prescribed period, or payment of salary in lieu of the notice, is invalid as being inconsistent with Art. 311(2).[20]

When an employee is confirmed in a payscale, the same cannot be reduced without giving him an opportunity of being heard. An employee on confirmation becomes entitled to a right to the post and to the scale of pay fixed.[21]

A constable in the State Armed Police was discharged from service without being given a hearing. The order of discharge cast a stigma on him. The Supreme Court ruled that he should have been given reasonable opportunity of representation.[22]

(b) QUASI-PERMANENT

According to the government service rules, a person appointed to a post temporarily assumes quasi-permanent status when he has been in continuous service for more than three years, and has been certified by the appointing authority as fit for employment in a quasi-permanent capacity.

---

17. N. Ramanatha Pillai v. State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC 2641 : (1973) 2 SCC 650; State of Haryana v. D.R. Sangar, AIR 1976 SC 1199 : (1976) 2 SCC 844; K. Rajendran v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1982 SC 1107 : (1982) 2 SCC 273.
18. Mohd. Abdul Salam Khan v. Sarfaraz, AIR 1975 SC 1064 : (1975) 1 SCC 669.
19. Jai Shanker v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1966 SC 492 : (1966) 1 SCR 825; Deokinandan Prasad v. State of Bihar,, AIR 1971 SC 1409 : (1971) 2 SCC 330.
20. Moti Ram Deka v. N.E. Frontier Rly., AIR 1964 SC 600 : (1964) 5 SCR 683.
21. Div. Supdt., Eastern Rly. v. L.N. Keshri, AIR 1974 SC 1889 : (1975) 3 SCC 1.
22. Director General of Police v. Mrityunjoy Sarkar, AIR 1997 SC 249 : (1996) 8 SCC 280.

A quasi-permanent post can be terminated in the same manner as the employment of a permanent government servant, or, when a reduction occurs in the number of posts for such employees. If, therefore, a quasi-permanent servant's services are terminated otherwise than in accordance with this rule, he is deprived of his right to that post and it will prima facie be a punishment and regarded as dismissal or removal from service so as to attract Art. 311.[23]

(c) FIXED TENURE SERVICE

The service of a person appointed to a post for a fixed term cannot, in the absence of a contract or a service rule permitting its premature termination, be terminated before the expiry of the stipulated period unless he has been guilty of some misconduct, negligence, inefficiency or other disqualifications and appropriate proceedings are taken under Art. 311(2). The premature termination of the service of a servant so appointed will prima facie be a dismissal or removal from service by way of punishment and so would fall within the purview of Art. 311(2).

(d) TEMPORARY POST

It is an implied term of a temporary appointment, other than the one for a fixed term, that the service of the appointee may be terminated on a reasonable notice, usually one month's notice.[24]

A temporary government servant has no right to the post he is holding. The character of employment in his case is transitory. His service is liable to be terminated at any time by giving him one month's notice without assigning any reason either under the terms of the contract or under the service rules. This does not per se amount to dismissal or removal and, accordingly, Art. 311(2) is not attracted.[25]

An order of termination simpliciter without casting any stigma on him or disclosing any penal consequences does not attract the application of Art. 311(2).[26]

It is now well settled that a temporary servant can be discharged if it is found that he is not suitable for the post which he is holding without complying with Art. 311(2). Suitability does not depend on mere proficiency or excellence in work.

The words 'unsuitable' or 'unfit' for the job do not amount to a stigma.[27] Ordinarily, the position is that if an order terminating the service of a temporary servant is an order of termination simpliciter without attaching any stigma to the employee, and if the order is not by way of punishment, Art. 311 is not

---

23. K.S. Srinivasan v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 419 : 1958 SCR 1295; Champaklal v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 1854 : (1964) 5 SCR 190.
24. Satish Chandra Anand v. Union of India, AIR 1953 SC 250 : 1953 SCR 655.
25. Nagaland v. G. Vasantha, AIR 1970 SC 537.
26. Triveni Shankar Saxena v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1992 SC 496 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 524; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Km. Premlata Misra, (1994) 4 SCC 189 : AIR 1994 SC 2411.
27. T.C.M. Pillai v. Technology Institute, AIR 1971 SC 1811 : (1971) 2 SCC 251.
Also, Hari Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2263; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ram Chandra, AIR 1976 SC 2547; Commodore Commanding, Southern Naval Area v. V.N. Rajan, AIR 1981 SC 965 : (1981) 2 SCC 636.

attracted.[28] Even if misconduct, negligence, inefficiency may be the motive or the inducing factor which influences the concerned authority to terminate the service of a temporary employee, such termination cannot be termed as penalty or punishment.[29]

An order of termination of service of a temporary employee simpliciter is not invalid. But, if disciplinary grounds or other reasons are set out in the termination order, the same attaches stigma to the employee and, therefore, such an order cannot be made without an enquiry.[30] When the order of termination of service is passed by way of punishment and is ex facie punitive in nature, such an order cannot be passed even in respect of a temporary employee, without a regular departmental inquiry.[31]

The Supreme Court has ruled in a recent case that if there are allegations of misconduct against an employee on probation and an enquiry is held to find out the truth of that misconduct and an order terminating the service is passed on the basis of that enquiry, the order would be punitive in nature as the enquiry was held not with a view to assess the general suitability of the employee for the post in question, but to find out the truth of allegations of misconduct against that employee. In such a situation, the order would be founded on misconduct.[32]

If the government dismisses such an employee in a punitive manner, or as a punishment, then termination of his service may amount to 'dismissal' or 'removal' attracting the application of Art. 311.[33] In such a case, it becomes incumbent to hold a formal inquiry by framing charges against him and giving him reasonable opportunity in accordance with Art. 311(2).

From this, it is clear that government can terminate the service of a temporary servant in either of the two ways:

(i) It can discharge him purporting to exercise its power under the terms of contract or the relevant rules simply by giving him notice. In such a case, it is only a case of discharge and nothing more and Art. 311 is not attracted.

(ii) The government may terminate his service by way of punishment in which case Art. 311 is attracted.

Even in the first case, the authority concerned, before exercising its power to discharge a temporary servant, may have to examine the question of the employee's suitability for being continued in service, and it may give him a chance to explain by giving him a show-cause notice enquiring whether he should be continued in service or not. Such an obligation may be imposed on the authority concerned by the relevant service rules.

---

28. Union of India v. P.S. Bhatt, AIR 1981 SC 957 : (1981) 2 SCC 761; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Bhoop Singh, AIR 1979 SC 684 : (1979) 2 SCC 111; Commodore Commanding, Southern Naval Area, Cochin v. V.N. Rajan, AIR 1981 SC 965 : (1981) 2 SCC 636.

29. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Bhoop Singh Verma, AIR 1979 SC 684 : (1979) 2 SCC 111; ONGC v. Iskander Ali, AIR 1980 SC 1242.

30. Chandreshwar Narain Dubey v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 2671 : (1998) 6 SCC 671.

31. Nar Singh Pal v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 1401 : (2000) 3 SCC 588.

32. Chandra Praksh Shahi v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 2000 SC 1706, at 1715 : (2000) 5 SCC 152.

33. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Ramashanker Raghuvanshi, AIR 1983 SC 374 : (1983) 2 SCC 145; Kanhailal v. Distt. Judge, AIR 1983 SC 351 : (1983) 3 SCC 32; Nepal Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 1459 : (1980) 3 SCC 288.

The Courts have taken the view that Art. 311 does not apply to such an enquiry because it is held only with a view to determine the suitability of the servant concerned to be continued in service or not, and that there is no element of punishment involved therein. Misconduct, negligence, inefficiency or such other disqualification of the servant may have led the authority to terminate his service, but that would not change the character of the inquiry from being one to assess his suitability to one of punishment.[34]

If, on the other hand, a formal inquiry is held against the servant on charges of misconduct, negligence, inefficiency or other disqualification, findings are recorded against him and his service is terminated thereafter then, in substance, it would amount to dismissal.

In Madan Goptal v. State of Punjab,[35] a temporary employee was discharged from service after holding an inquiry into charges of bribery against him. He was found guilty of the charges by the enquiry officer. The order of discharge indicated that the punishing authority agreed with the enquiry officer's finding that he had accepted bribes. As the inquiry was held with a view to decide whether or not disciplinary action should be taken against him for his alleged misconduct, Art. 311(2) became applicable. The order of discharge was held to be one for dismissal because it had been preceded by a formal inquiry. The order was quashed as Art. 311(2) had not been observed.

The Courts have, therefore, to examine the facts in each case to determine whether the order of discharge of a temporary servant is one for discharge simpliciter or is for dismissal by way of punishment.

A distinction is thus drawn between an inquiry held to assess the suitability of such a servant to be continued in service, and a formal inquiry undertaken with a view to punish him. Art. 311 does not apply in the former case but it does in the latter case. The reason is that otherwise it would lead to this anomalous result that while an authority can discharge a temporary servant without inquiring into his alleged inefficiency or unsuitability, if it chooses to act fairly and make some kind of an inquiry and give the servant involved an opportunity to explain his alleged deficiency, the discharge becomes dismissal and attracts Art. 311.

The Court can lift the veil of an innocuously worded order to find out whether the foundation of the order is misconduct. If it is so, then an enquiry according to Art. 311(2) becomes inevitable. The Supreme Court has observed in this connection: "It is settled law that the order though is innocuous, it is open to the Court to lift the veil and find the cause for terminating the temporary employment. If it is by way of punishment, then necessarily an enquiry has got to be made in accordance with the rules."[36]

---

34. Ranendra Chandra Banerjee v. Union of India, AIR 1963 SC 1552 : (1968) 3 SCR 234; Champaklal Chimanlal Shah v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 1854 : (1964) 5 SCR 190; State of Punjab v. Sukh Raj Bahadur, AIR 1968 : (1964) 2 SCR 135 SC 1089 : (1968) 3 SCR 234; Benjamin, A.G. v. Union of India, (1967) 1 Lab LJ 718; Ram Gopal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 158; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Kaushal Kishore Shukla, (1991) 1 SCC 691.

35. AIR 1963 SC 531 : (1963) 3 SCR 716.

36. G.B. Pant Agricultural and Technology University v. Kesho Ram, AIR 1995 SC 718 : (1994) 4 SCC 437.

Also see, Madan Gopal v. State of Punjab, AIR 1963 SC 531 : (1963) 3 SCR 716; Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the form of the order is not decisive and whether an order is one for punishment or not is a matter of substance which has to be decided on the basis of the entirety of circumstances preceding or attendant on the impugned order.[37]

An order may ex facie disclose that a stigma is cast on the servant, or that it visits him with penal consequences. Where an order of dismissal was founded on the ground that the employer had failed in the performance of his duties administratively and technically, it was characterised ex facie as "stigmatic as also punitive". The order was quashed as it had been passed without an inquiry according to natural justice.[38]

But it may also be that while termination of service is by way of punishment, the order ex facie is innocuous and shows termination simpliciter. In such a case, if the government servant can establish by material on record that the order is in fact passed by way of punishment, Art. 311(2) would apply. The Court can even send for the official record where the government servant is able to make out a prima facie case that the order is by way of punishment and the government seeks to rebut the same.[39]

If the order is merely a camouflage for an order of dismissal for misconduct, the Court can go behind the form and ascertain the true character of the order. If the order is found in reality to be a cloak for an order of punishment, the Court can give effect to the rights conferred by law upon the employee. On this basis, the order of dismissal was quashed in Anoop v. Union of India.[40]

An order of discharge against a temporary employee though couched in innocent terms was really made on the basis of the misconduct as found on inquiry behind her back. She was served with no charge sheet; no explanation was called for from her; she was given no opportunity to cross-examine witnesses and was given no opportunity to show cause against the purported order of dismissal. The order was merely a camouflage for an order of dismissal from service and was made in total contravention of Art. 311(2) and was therefore quashed.[41]

Even when no formal inquiry is held, Art. 311 is attracted if the order of discharge visits the servant concerned with any evil consequences, or casts an aspersion or stigma on his character or integrity. Such an order is characterised as an order to punish. An order of discharge on the ground of "unsatisfactory work and conduct" does not cast a stigma on the servant concerned.[42] But an order

---

37. Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831; R.S. Sial v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 1317 : (1975) 3 SCC 111; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ram Chandra, AIR 1976 SC 2547.

38. V.P. Ahuja v. State of Punjab, (2000) 3 SCC 239 : AIR 2000 SC 1080.

39. Maharashtra v. Veerappa R. Saboji, AIR 1980 SC 42 : (1979) 4 SCC 466; Manager, Government Branch Press v. D.B. Belliappa, AIR 1979 SC 429 : (1979) 1 SCC 477.

40. AIR 1984 SC 636 : (1984) 2 SCC 369.
Also, Nepal Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 84 : (1985) 1 SCC 56; Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd. v. Mazdoor Sabha, (1980) 2 SCC 593 : AIR 1980 SC 1896; Nar Singh Pal v. Union of India, (2000) 3 SCC 588 : AIR 2000 SC 1401.

41. Smt. Rajinder Kaur v. State of Punjab, AIR 1986 SC 1790 : (1986) 4 SCL 141.
Also see, Babu Lal v. State of Haryana, AIR 1991 SC 1310; Radhey Shyam Gupta v. U.P. State Agro Industries Corpn. Ltd., AIR 1999 SC 609 : (1999) 2 SCC 21.

42. See, Orissa v. Ram Narayan Das, AIR 1961 SC 177; Hari Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2263; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Kaushal Kishore Shukla, (1991) 1 SCC 691 : 1991 SCC (L&S) 587; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Prem Lata Misra, AIR 1994 SC 2411 : (1994) 4 SCC 189.

discharging a temporary servant on the ground that he had been "found undesirable to be retained in government service" amounts to an order of dismissal as it "expressly casts a stigma" on him. Such an order can be passed only after an inquiry under Art. 311.[43]

In Shesh Narain Awasthy v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[44] the service of a temporary constable in the U.P. Police was terminated apparently by an innocuous order. On scrutiny, however, the Court found that his service was terminated on account of his alleged participation in the activities on an unrecognised police karamchari parishad. The termination order, therefore, was held to be bad as having been passed without following the procedure prescribed by Art. 311(2).

(e) PERMANENT APPOINTMENT ON PROBATION

The object of appointment on probation is to test the suitability of the appointee; if the appointing authority finds that the candidate is not suitable, it has power to terminate the services of the employee either during or at the end of the period of probation and normally this is not regarded as amounting to imposing the punishment of dismissal attracting the application of Art. 311(2).[45]

In Krishnamani,[46] the appellant was first appointed on an ad hoc basis. Thereafter, to regularise his services, he was put on probation. During probation, his services having been found to be not satisfactory, were terminated. During the probation, he did not acquire any right to the post; only if he had been regularised on his work being found to be satisfactory, he would have acquired the right to continue in the post.

The words 'unsuitable' or 'unfit' or 'unsatisfactory work and conduct' for the job do not cast any stigma.[47]

In State of Orissa v. Ram Narayan Das,[48] a Sub-Inspector of Police, on probation, was discharged from service on the ground of 'unsatisfactory work and conduct.' An inquiry was held against him under Rule 55B of the Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules, 1930. Under the rule, when a probationer's service is proposed to be terminated for any specific fault, or on account of his unsuitability, the probationer is to be apprised of the grounds of such proposal and given an opportunity to show cause against it, and only then an order of termination of service can be passed. The Supreme Court held that the purpose of an inquiry under this rule is not to punish the servant concerned, but is merely to ascertain whether he is fit to be confirmed. Therefore, it was not a case of dismissal and Art. 311(2) would not apply to such an inquiry.

In Champaklal v. Union of India,[49] a memorandum containing four charges was served on a temporary government servant, who was asked to explain why

---

43. Jagdish Mitter v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 449 : (1964) 1 LLJ 418.
44. (1988) 2 LLJ 99 (SC).
45. Hartwell Prescott Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1957 SC 886 : 1958 SCR 509; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Akbar Ali, AIR 1966 SC 1842 : (1966) 3 SCR 821.
46. K.V. Krishnamani v. Lalit Kala Academy, AIR 1996 SC 2444 : (1996) 5 SCC 89.
47. See, supra, footnote 27.
Also see, State of Orissa v. Ram Narayan Das, AIR 1961 SC 177 : (1961) 1 SCR 606; Union of India v. R.S. Dhabe, (1969) 3 SCC 603.
48. AIR 1961 SC 177 : (1961) 1 SCR 606.
49. AIR 1964 SC 1854 : (1964) 5 SCR 190.
Also, State of Punjab v. Sukh Raj, AIR 1968 SC 1089 : (1968) 3 SCR 234.

disciplinary action should not be taken against him. No formal departmental inquiry was held against him and after six months his services were terminated without assigning any reason. The Supreme Court ruled that, as no formal inquiry was held against him, the action taken against him was not punitive and, therefore, Art. 311(2) was not attracted. Issue of a memorandum of charges was not material as no formal inquiry was held thereafter. The Court pointed out that, generally, a preliminary inquiry is held to determine whether a prima facie case for a formal inquiry is made out or not. The preliminary inquiry and the formal inquiry should not be confused with each other. The preliminary inquiry is only for enabling the authority to decide whether punitive action should be taken against the servant concerned or he should be discharged under the terms of the contract or the relevant service rules. Therefore, Art. 311(2) would apply only to a formal inquiry and not to a preliminary inquiry.

In State of Punjab v. Sukh Raj Bahadur,[50] a charge memo was served on the employee on probation for a regular inquiry. The employee replied and thereafter the inquiry was dropped and a simple termination order was issued. The Court held that the order of termination was not founded on any findings as to misconduct. The termination was held valid.

In Jagdish Prasad v. Sachiv, Zila Gaon Committee,[51] the termination order stated that the officer had concealed certain facts relating to his removal from an earlier service on charge of corruption and, therefore, he was not suitable for appointment. This was held to amount to stigma.

Usually, the use of the words "unsatisfactory work and conduct" in the termination order are not regarded as stigmatic. In such a case, termination of the service of a probationer without a formal hearing is not regarded as bad.[52]

Termination of service of a probationer without formal hearing would be bad if the termination order is ex facie stigmatic.[53]

At times, the employer may hold an inquiry before passing the termination order to satisfy himself about the suitability of the probationer for the job in question. If the language of the order does not cast a stigma on him, the order remains valid.[54]

From the above sundry cases it becomes clear that no hearing need be given to a probationer if the order of termination is not stigmatic. It depends on the facts and circumstances of each case and the language or the words used in the termination order to assess whether the words used amount to stigma or not.

The Supreme Court has now clarified through its decisions in R.S. Gupta v. U.P. State Agro Industries Corp. Ltd.[55] and D.P. Banerjee v. S.N. Bose National Centre for Basic Sciences, Calcutta,[56] that whether an order of termination of a

---

50. AIR 1968 SC 1089 : (1968) 3 SCR 234.
51. AIR 1986 SC 1108 : (1986) 2 SCC 338.
52. Dipti Banerjee v. Satyendra Nath Bose National Centre for Basic Sciences, AIR 1999 SC 983; H.F. Sungati v. Registrar—General High Court of Karnataka, AIR 2001 SC 1148; Krishnadevaraya Ed. Trust v. L.A. Balakrishna, AIR 2001 SC 625.
53. V.P. Ahuja v. State of Punjab, AIR 2000 SC 1080 : (2000) 3 SCC 239.
54. Pavendra Narayan Verma v. Sanjay Gandhi P.G.I. of Medical Sciences, AIR 2002 SC 23; Chandra Prakash Shahi v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 2000 SC 1706.
55. 1999 AIR SCW 207 : AIR 1999 SC 608 : (1999) 2 SCC 21.
56. AIR 1999 SC 983 : (1999) 3 SCC 60.

probationer can be said to be punitive or not depends upon whether certain allegations which are the cause of termination are the motive or the foundation. If findings were arrived at in an inquiry as to misconduct, behind the back of the employee or without a regular departmental inquiry, the simple order of termination is to be treated as 'founded' on the allegations and will be bad. But if the inquiry was not held, no finding were arrived at and the employer was not inclined to conduct an inquiry but, at the same time, he was not willing to continue the employee against whom there were complaints, it would only be a case of motive and the order of termination would not be bad. Similarly, if the employer did not want to inquire into the truth of the allegations because of delay in regular departmental proceedings, or he was doubtful about securing adequate evidence; in such a circumstance, the allegation would be a motive and not the foundation and the simple order of termination would be valid.

In Banerjee, the order of termination was held not to be a simple order of termination. The letters written by the employer to the employee contained findings which were arrived at without a full-fledged departmental inquiry. Those findings amounted to stigma and would come in the way of his career. When stigma is cast, it has an adverse effect on the person's future career.

In State of Bihar v. Gopi Kishore Prasad,[57] a show cause notice was served seeking a reply to the allegation regarding the officer's bad reputation. The termination order stated that grave doubts had arisen about his integrity which indicated that he was a corrupt officer. It was also stated that confidential inquiries revealed that he was a corrupt officer having bad reputation. The Court quashed the order and ruled that it was a clear case of stigma and it required a full-fledged departmental inquiry under Art. 311(2).

The case-law concerning termination of service of a probationer has been in a state of confusion as each case is based on its own peculiar facts. The Supreme Court has in Chandra Prakash Shah v. Uttar Pradesh,[58] has extensively reviewed the previous case-law and sought to rationalize the same on the basis of the concept of "motive" and "foundation".

The Court has stated that an order dismissing a probationer though innocuously worded may be punitive in character. The form of the order is not conclusive and the Court can go behind the order to find out the real foundation of the order. Where misconduct on the part of the employee was the 'foundation' for the order, it is to be regarded as punitive in nature. But where it is only the motive for passing the order of termination, then it is not to be regarded as punitive.

A probationer has no right to hold the post and his services can be terminated at any time on account of general unsuitability for the post in question. To determine his suitability an inquiry may be held and, on the basis of the inquiry, a decision is taken to terminate his services, the order is not punitive and Art. 311(2) is not attracted. But if there are allegations of misconduct, and an inquiry is held to find out the truth, and the order of termination is based on that inquiry, the order is regarded as punitive as it is founded on misconduct and it will not be a mere matter of motive.

---

57. AIR 1960 SC 689 : (1960) 1 LLJ 577.
58. (2000) 5 SCC 152 : AIR 2000 SC 1706.

In the instant case, a probationer constable's services were terminated by a simple notice. The Court ruled that the order was punitive in nature. There were allegations of indiscipline and misbehavior against him; a preliminary inquiry was held and on the basis of that inquiry his services were terminated. As the procedure under Art. 311(2) had not been followed, the order of termination was set aside.

The services of a probationer were terminated because of her long absence from duty. The order of termination merely said that she was 'dismissed' from service. Holding the order as having been passed validly, the Supreme Court has pointed out that the services of a probationer can be terminated if his services are unsatisfactory. If the services of a probationer are terminated without any reason whatsoever, it is possible to characterise the order as having been passed arbitrarily. On the other hand, when there is a reason for terminating the services of a probationer and the termination order is worded in an innocuous manner, the order cannot be regarded as having been passed by way of punishment. The use of the word 'dismissed' in the order cannot be regarded as being by way of punishment.[59]

(ii) REDUCTION IN RANK

The expression 'reduction in rank' means reduction of an employee from a higher to a lower rank. The principles discussed above regarding dismissal or removal apply mutatis mutandis to reduction in rank as well. When reduction in rank is imposed as a punishment, Art. 311(2) becomes applicable but not otherwise.

When a civil servant has a right to a particular rank, his reduction from that rank operates as a penalty as he loses the emoluments and privileges of that rank. If, however, an employee is appointed temporarily to, or to officiate in, a higher post, his appointment is of transitory nature and he acquires no right to the higher post and, therefore, his reduction to his original substantive post does not per se attract Art. 311(2).[60] But even in such a case reduction by way of punishment attracts Art. 311(2), as when the employee is visited with penal consequences, such as, forfeiture of his pay or allowances or loss of seniority in his substantive rank, or stoppage or postponement of his future chances of promotion, or if a stigma is attached to him, or when a full-scale formal inquiry was held before his reversion.[61]

The petitioner appointed to officiate in a higher position was reverted to his original position after two years because of unsatisfactory work. Art. 311(2) was held non-applicable to him because—having been appointed in an officiating capacity he had no right to continue in the post; an officiating appointment can be terminated at any time on reasonable notice; his seniority in his substantive post or his future chance of promotion were not affected as he could be considered for

---

59. Ganganagar Zila Dugdh Utpadak Sahkari Sangh Ltd. v. Priyanka Joshi, AIR 1999 SC 2363 : (1999) 6 SCC 214.

60. Hartwell Prescott Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1957 SC 186 : 1958 SCR 509.

61. Div. Personnel Officer, S. Rly. v. S. Raghavendrachar, AIR 1966 SC 1529; State of Punjab v. Sukh Raj Bahadur, AIR 1968 SC 1089 : (1968) 3 SCR 234; G.S. Gill v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 1898 : (1975) 3 SCC 73; R.S. Sial v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1317 : (1975) 3 SCC 111.

promotion in future if his work and conduct justified the same and, hence, his reduction did not operate as a forfeiture of any right or amount to punishment.[62]

As noted above, mere unsuitability or unfitness for the job does not amount to any stigma. When after reduction, the employee loses his seniority in his substantive post, Art. 311(2) becomes applicable.[63] In Wadhwa,[64] the appellant was officiating as Additional Superintendent of Police. He was reverted to his substantive post on the ground that he was found to be immature as a Supdt. of Police. The record showed that he was not reverted because of the return of the permanent incumbent from leave, and other officers junior to him continued while he was reverted. The record also revealed that an enquiry was not resorted to for the reason that it would take a long time. His reversion was regarded as reduction in rank.

The Chief Secretary to a State Government, and a member of the Indian Civil Service, was appointed as a Secretary to the Central Government, a tenure post. But before the expiry of the tenure, he was asked to choose between compulsory retirement or reversion to his State post. It was held that the order was a stigma and amounted to reduction in rank and Art. 311(2) became applicable.[65]

When reversion of a probationer to his substantive post appeared to be mala fide and really as a punishment for some misconduct, Art. 311(2) became operative.[66] When charges were served on a probationer, but he was reverted without an enquiry, Art. 311(2) did not apply to his case as no formal inquiry had been held against him.[67]

Out of 200 officers appointed on an officiating basis, some of whom were junior to the respondent, only he was reverted to his substantive rank. The order of reversion was prima facie innocuous. Nevertheless, the attendant circumstances were such that reversion was by way of punishment attracting Art. 311(2).[68]

In S.P. Vasudeva v. State of Haryana,[69] the Supreme Court expressed dissatisfaction with the view taken in some earlier cases that when order of discharge or reversion of a temporary or probationer employee is preceded by an inquiry, then Art. 311(2) must apply. It results in the anomalous position that the Court may not interfere if the order ex facie gives no reasons for discharge or reversal, but it may interfere if the superior official makes a bona fide inquiry before making up his mind as to the suitability of the employee. The position at present is confusing.

A mere loss of seniority as a result of re-adjustment and re-fixing of seniority inter se does not amount to reduction in rank within Art. 311(2).[70]

---

62. Parshotam Lal Dhingra v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 36 : 1958 SCR 828.
63. Madhav Laxman Vaikunthe v. State of Mysore, AIR 1962 SC 8 : (1962) 1 SCR 886.
64. P.C. Wadhwa v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 423 : (1964) 5 SCR 598.
65. Debesh Chandra Das v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 77 : (1969) 2 SCC 158.
66. Sukhbans Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1962 SC 1711 : (1963) 1 SCR 416.
67. State of Punjab v. Sukh Raj, AIR 1968 SC 1089 : (1968) 3 SCR 234, applying the principle of Ram Narayan Das, supra, footnote 42.
68. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Sughar Singh, AIR 1974 SC 423.
Also, Regional Manager v. Pawan Kumar, AIR 1976 SC 1766 : (1976) 3 SCC 334.
69. AIR 1976 SC 2292 : (1976) 1 SCC 236.
70. G. Samuel v. State of Kerala, AIR 1960 Ker 237; M. Kamalamma v. State of Mysore, AIR 1960 Mys. 255.

Even when Art. 311(2) is inapplicable to a case of reversion, it may be discriminatory or for a collateral or extraneous purpose attracting challenge under Art. 16.[71]

G. REASONABLE OPPORTUNITY TO SHOW CAUSE

Under Art. 311(2), a civil servant is not to be dismissed, removed or reduced in rank except after an inquiry in which he has been informed of the charges against him and given a reasonable opportunity of being heard in respect of those charges. Art. 311(2) gives a constitutional mandate to the principles of natural justice. [72] The disciplinary proceedings before a domestic tribunal are of quasi-judicial character.

A mass of case-law has gathered around the question: what constitutes a 'reasonable opportunity' for purposes of Art. 311(2)? The Courts have laid down a number of norms to define the content of, and elements constituting this concept. A full discussion of these various norms falls appropriately within the realm of Administrative Law and not within the scope of this work, but a few salient principles may be noted here.

The concept of 'reasonable opportunity' being a constitutional limitation on the doctrine of 'tenure at pleasure',[73] Parliament or a State Legislature can make a law defining the content of 'reasonable opportunity', and prescribing procedure for affording the said opportunity to the accused government servant. Pending legislation, rules can be made by the executive for the purpose under Art. 309.[74]

Neither the law nor the rules are, however, decisive of the content of the concept of 'reasonable opportunity'. It is finally for the Courts to ascertain whether or not the law or the rules provide a reasonable opportunity and the Courts can thus test the validity of the law or the rules from this point of view.[75] The reason is that the word 'opportunity' in Art. 311(2) is prefixed by the word 'reasonable'. In each case, therefore, it is for the Courts to see whether, on the facts of the case, a reasonable opportunity was given to the government servant or not.

The concept of "reasonable opportunity to show cause" is synonymous with natural justice. According to the Supreme Court, Art. 311(2) gives a constitutional mandate to the principles of natural justice.[76]

But natural justice does not have a fixed connotation; it cannot be put in a straight-jacket. Natural justice depends on the circumstnaces of each case—the nature of the inquiry, the rules under which the inquiry is being held, the subject-matter which is being dealt with and so forth. The essential point is that the person concerned should have a reasonable opportunity of presenting his case and

---

71. State of Mysore v. Kulkarni, AIR 1972 SC 2170 : (1973) 3 SCC 597; supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. A.
72. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, Ch. IX; JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, Ch. VIII.
73. Supra, Sec. E.
74. Supra, Sec. B.
75. K. S. Hemrajsinhji Pravinsinhji v. Ins. Gen. Police, AIR 1961 Guj 63.
76. See footnote 66.

that the administrative authority should act fairly, impatially and reasonably. The duty is not so much to act 'judicially' but 'fairly'.[77]

A few general propositions may however be stated here.

The question of requirement of apply the principles of natural justice can be only invoked where there was a jural relationship of employer and employee existed at any point of time. Thus where a person procured in a post meant for a reserved category candidate, on the basis of a false caste certificate has been held not to be a person holding civil post within the meaning of Art. 311. Such appointment, held, is no appointment in the eye of the law and has dismissal will not attract Art. 311.[78]

There must be an inquiry into the charges made against a government servant before any of the three punishments is awarded to him. A statutory departmental inquiry was held into a railway accident. The inquiry committee came to the conclusion that the accident was due to the negligence of the Asst. Station Master. He was later served with a show cause notice as to why he should not be reduced in rank. Thereafter, he was reduced in rank. The Supreme Court held that the inquiry into the accident was not directed against the appellant as such. The findings reached by the statutory inquiry committee could not be said to be findings made against the appellant for the alleged neglect of duty. It was necessary to give him a chance to show his innocence by holding an inquiry in the charge that he was responsible for the accident before imposing any major punishment on him. The order was thus set aside.[79]

The Constitution guarantees to the government servant a fair inquiry into his conduct. The inquiry should therefore be in accordance with the principles of natural justice.[80] When several delinquent officers are involved in a matter, it is salutary to conduct a common inquiry against them all. This avoids multiplicity of proceedings and saves time. Even if one charged officer cites another charged officer as a witness, in his defence, there is no need to split the inquiry. A disciplinary inquiry is not to be equated to a criminal prosecution where defendants are arrayed as co-accused. In a disciplinary proceeding, the concept of co-accused does not arise.[81]

The delinquent officer should be informed of the charges against him. This requirement is specifically laid down in Art. 311(2). The charges must be clear, precise and accurate. If a charge is vague, the inquiry may be vitiated. As for example, a vague accusation that a government servant accepts bribe is not sufficient. He should be given particulars of specific acts of accepting bribes.[82]

Along with the charges, the government servant concerned should also be informed of the evidence by which those charges are sought to be substantiated

---

77. Kumaon Mandal Vikas Nigam Ltd. v. Girja Shankar Pant, AIR 2001 SC 24 : (2001) 1 SCC 182.
78. R. Vishwanatha Pillai v. State of Kerala, (2004) 2 SCC 105 : AIR 2004 SC 1469.
79. Amalendu v. Dist. Traffic Supdt., AIR 1960 SC 992 : (1960) 2 LLJ 61. Also, Jagdish Pd. Saxena v. Madhya Bharat, AIR 1961 SC 1070 : (1963) 1 LLJ 325.
80. Supra, Ch. VIII; Nand Kishore v. State of Bihar,, AIR 1978 SC 1277 : (1978) 3 SCC 366.
81. Balbir Chand v. Food Corporation of India Ltd., AIR 1997 SC 2229 : (1997) 3 SCC 371.
82. Surath Chandra Chakravarthy v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1971 SC 752 : (1971) 3 SCR 1; State of Tamil Nadu v. Thiru K.V. Perumal, AIR 1996 SC 2474 : (1996) 5 SCC 474.

against him.[83] This is very necessary in order to give him an opportunity to deny his guilt and establish his innocence. At times, prior to the framing of charges, Government may hold a confidential investigation to ascertain what charges should be enquired into. The report of this investigation need not be given to the servant unless it forms part of the evidence at the formal inquiry held into the charges framed against him, and is relied on by the inquiry officer at any stage.[84]

Copies of relevant documents must be supplied to the concerned employee. The inquiry is vitiated if the non-supply of documents has prejudiced the case of the concerned employee.[85] The test to be applied in this behalf has been set out by the Supreme Court in State Bank of Patiala v. S.K. Sharma.[86] It was the duty of the employee under enquiry to point out how each and every document was relevant to the charges or to the enquiry being held against him and whether and how their non-supply has prejudiced his case.[87]

The Court has insisted that the opportunity of hearing must be an effective opportunity and not a mere pretence. When charge-sheet is served on a person, documents to prove the charges mentioned therein must be supplied him. But when neither copies of these documents are supplied to him in spite of his request, nor an opportunity given to him to inspect these documents, then there is violation of natural justice.[88]

Not all documents need be supplied to him. If a document has no bearing on the charges, or if it is not relied upon by the enquiry officer to support the charges, or the material was not necessary for the purposes of cross-examination, it need not be supplied.

Many a time, witnesses are examined in the preliminary enquiry in the absence of the person charged, and on the basis of this evidence, charges are framed later. It is, therefore, necessary that copies of these statements be supplied to him. If this is not done, it may vitiate the inquiry.[89]

Where disciplinary proceedings are initiated by issuing a charge sheet, actual service of the charge sheet on the person concerned is essential as the concerned person is required to submit his reply thereto.[90]

After the charges have been intimated to the servant concerned, and his formal reply thereto has been received, the disciplinary authority has to apply his mind to decide whether a further inquiry is called for. If after deliberation and due con-

---

83. Tribhuwan v. State of Bihar,, AIR 1960 Pat 116; Altafur Rahman v. Coll., Central Excise, AIR 1960 All 551; Khem Chand v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 300 : 1958 SCR 1080; Ram Prakash v. State of Punjab, AIR 1960 Punj. 278; Saghir v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1960 All 270.

84. Krishna Chandra Tandon v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1589 : (1974) 4 SCC 374.

85. State of Tamil Nadu v. K.V. Perumal, AIR 1996 SC 2474 : (1996) 5 SCC 474.

86. 1996 (3) Scale 202 : (1996) 3 SCC 364.

87. Also see, Secretary to Government v. A.C.J. Britto, AIR 1997 SC 1393 : (1997) 3 SCC 387.

88. Chandrama Tewari v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 117 : 1987 Supp SCC 518; Kashinath Dikshita v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 2118 : (1986) 3 SCC 229; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Mohd. Sharif, AIR 1982 SC 937; Govt. of Tamil Nadu v. K.N. Ratnavelu, AIR 1998 SC 3037 : (1998) 7 SCC 569.

89. Govt. of T.N. v. K.N. Ratnavelu, AIR 1998 SC 3037 : (1998) 7 SCC 569.

90. Union of India v. Dinanath Shantaram Karekar, AIR 1998 SC 2722 : (1998) 7 SCC 569.

sideration, the disciplinary authority has come to an affirmative decision, a formal inquiry is to be held into those charges.[91]

Personal hearing is a part of reasonable opportunity, and, if it is demanded by the delinquent servant it cannot be refused.[92]

If the delinquent fails to appear before the inquiry officer in spite of several opportunities having been given to him, then the inquiry officer can proceed ex parte.[93]

At the inquiry, the servant concerned must be given full opportunity to answer the charges levelled against him, and to put up his defence by demonstrating that the evidence against him is untrue and unreliable. With this in view, the employee charged must be provided with an opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses produced against him.[94]

Ordinarily speaking, all evidence must be given in his presence. Finding a person guilty on the basis of evidence recorded behind his back is a violation of the principles of natural justice.[95] However, statements of the witnesses taken at the preliminary inquiry can be used at the time of the formal inquiry provided that the statements are made available to the accused employee and he is given opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses in respect of those statements.[96] It is not necessary for making each witness repeat word for word the statement made by him earlier. A mere synopsis of those statements does not satisfy the requirements of Art. 311(2).[97] The Supreme Court has laid down the procedure as follows:[98]

> "Reasonable opportunity contemplated by Art. 311(2) means "hearing" in accordance with the principles of natural justice under which one of the basic requirements is that all the witnesses in the departmental inquiry shall be examined in the presence of the delinquent who shall be given an opportunity to cross-examine them. Where a statement previously made by a witness, either during the course of preliminary enquiry or investigation, is proposed to be brought on record in the departmental proceedings, the law as laid by this Court is that a copy of that statement should first be supplied to the delinquent who should thereafter be given an opportunity to cross-examine that witness".

No material should be relied on against the accused employee without giving him an opportunity to explain it. A sub-inspector of police was dismissed from service. Holding the dismissal order invalid, the Supreme Court pointed out that the officers making confidential reports against him were not summoned for examination at the inquiry and this deprived him of the opportunity of cross-

---

91. State of Punjab v. V.K. Khanna, AIR 2001 SC 343 : (2001) 2 SCC 330.
92. State of Punjab v. Karam Chand, AIR 1959 Punj 402; C.S. Sharma v. State of U.P., AIR 1961 All 45; Nripendra v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1961 Cal 1.
93. State of Tamil Nadu v. M. Natarajan, AIR 1997 SC 3120 : (1997) 6 SCC 415.
94. John v. Travancore-Cochin, AIR 1955 SC 160; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Chintaman, AIR 1961 SC 1623; Bombay v. Nurul Khan, AIR 1966 SC 269 : (1965) 3 SCR 135; Bhagat Ram v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 454 : (1983) 2 SCC 442.
95. M/s. Kesoram Cotton Mills v. Gangadhar, AIR 1964 SC 708 : (1964) 2 SCR 809.
96. State of Mysore v. Shivbasappa, AIR 1963 SC 375 : (1963) 2 SCR 943; State of Uttar Pradesh v. O.P. Gupta, AIR 1970 SC 679; State Bank of Bikaner and Jaipur v. Srinath Gupta, AIR 1997 SC 243 : (1996) 6 SCC 486.
97. State of Punjab v. Bhagat Ram, AIR 1974 SC 2335.
98. Kuldeep Singh v. The Commr. of Police, AIR 1999 SC 677, at 683 : (1999) 2 SCC 10.

examining these persons. Thus, reasonable opportunity of defending himself was denied to him.[1]

Strict rules of evidence as laid down in the Indian Evidence Act do not apply to disciplinary enquiries.[2] Ordinarily, a confession or admission of guilt made by a person accused of an offence before a police officer is not admissible in according to ss. 25 and 26 of the Evidence Act. But as rules of evidence do not apply to departmental enquiries, a confession which is relevant and voluntary can be admitted in a departmental inquiry.[3]

It is however necessary that the inquiry officer bases his findings on some evidence. The Court would quash a dismissal order if it is based on findings recorded by the inquiry officer which are not supported by evidence and were thus wholly perverse.[4]

The inquiry officer should not make private enquiries behind the back of the employee. If it is done, the evidence against him must be disclosed to hi m. An inquiry is vitiated if the findings are based on secret information which the accused officer had no opportunity of meeting.[5] Therefore, the inquiry officer can refer to the past conduct of the accused servant only after giving him an opportunity to explain it.[6]

The accused servant should be given an opportunity to give his testimony. He should have an opportunity of adducing all relevant evidence on which he relies and examines witnesses in his defence.[7]

The inquiry officer should attempt to secure the attendance of defence witnesses. Without so trying, he cannot take shelter behind the plea that he has no legal authority to compel their attendance. Refusal on his part to summon witnesses may vitiate the inquiry.[8] But the right of the servant charged to cross-examine witnesses and produce his own witnesses can be controlled by the inquiry officer so as to see that cross-examination is not done in an irrelevant manner, or that irrelevant evidence is not given. The inquiry officer has to ensure that the inquiry proceedings are not unduly or deliberately prolonged.[9] The Indian Evidence Act as such does not apply to enquiries against Government servants. All materials which are logically probative for a prudent mind are permissible.[10]

The government servant against whom an inquiry is being held has a right to argue his own case, for the right to argue is deemed to be a part of personal

---

1. State of Punjab v. Dewan Chuni Lal, AIR 1970 SC 2086 : (1970) 1 SCC 479.
2. State of Mysore v. Shivabasappa, AIR 1963 SC 375 : (1963) 2 SCR 943; Assam v. M.K. Das, AIR 1970 SC 1255; State Bank of Bikaner & Jaipur v. Srinath Gupta, AIR 1997 SC 243 : (1996) 6 SCC 486; Union of India v. A.N. Rao, AIR 1998 SC 111 : (1998) 1 SCC 700.
3. Kuldip Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 79 : (1996) 10 SCC 659.
4. S.S. Moghe v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 1495 : (1981) 3 SCC 271. Also see, infra.
5. State of Mysore v. S.S. Makapur, AIR 1963 SC 375; Assam v. M.K. Das, AIR 1970 SC 1255 : (1970) 1 SCC 709; Krishna Chandra v. Union of India, supra, footnote 84; Andhra Pradesh v. S.M. Nizamuddin, AIR 1976 SC 1964 : (1976) 4 SCC 745.
6. Nanjudeshwar v. State of Mysore, AIR 1960 Mys. 159; Damodar v. Land Reforms Comm., AIR 1959 All 437.
7. Khem Chand v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 300 : 1958 SCR 1080.
8. Hanif v. Supdt. Police, AIR 1957 All 634; Valayya v. A.P., AIR 1958 AP 240.
9. Bombay v. Nurul Khan, AIR 1966 SC 269 : (1965) 3 SCR 135.
10. Union of India v. Verma, AIR 1957 SC 882; K.L. Shinde v. State of Mysore, AIR 1976 SC 1080; Haryana v. Rattan Singh, AIR 1977 SC 1512 : (1977) 2 SCC 491.

hearing to which he is entitled. A general and absolute right to have legal representation at the inquiry is not recognised. When there is no oral evidence to be recorded, and so no need to cross-examine witnesses, and no legal complexity in a case, absence of a lawyer does not amount to denial of natural justice.[11] But, there may be circumstances when it may be regarded just to permit the help of a lawyer as a part of 'reasonable opportunity' to defend himself, as for example, when the case is complicated and long and a large number of witnesses have to be examined.[12]

When the case against the officer is being handled by a trained prosecutor (though not a lawyer) it is a good ground for allowing him to engage a legal practitioner to defend him lest the scales should be weighed against him.[13] When however the employer appoints a legally trained person as the presenting officer, the delinquent employee must also be allowed to take the assistance of a lawyer.[14]

In the instant case,[15] the presenting officer was a person with legal attainments and experience. The Supreme Court therefore ruled that the refusal of the service of a lawyer to the concerned employee, who had no legal background, resulted in denial of natural justice.

Under Rule 15(5) of the Central Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules, 1967, a government servant may present his case with the assistance of any government servant approved by the disciplinary authority or, with its permission, through a lawyer. This is a mandatory rule. Denial of assistance of a government servant to an accused officer at the inquiry against him amounts to denial of reasonable opportunity to defend himself.

The Supreme Court has gone further and insisted that justice and fairplay demand that when in a disciplinary proceeding, the department is represented by a presenting officer, the delinquent officer should be informed that he has a right to take the help of another government servant from his department to defend him. When at the inquiry against a class IV employee, the Government was represented by a presenting officer but not the employee, and he was not informed of his right to seek assistance of another government servant in the department to represent him, the Supreme Court held the enquiry vitiated and the order of dismissal based on such an inquiry was quashed.[16]

Reasons must be given for their decisions by the inquiry officer as well as the disciplinary authority.[17]

---

11. Krishna Chandra v. Union of India, supra, footnote 84; H. Sharma v. S.C. Kagti, AIR 1960 Ass 141; Hari Pd. v. CIT, AIR 1972 Cal. 27.

12. Dr. K. Subbarao v. Hyderabad, AIR 1957 AP 414; Nripendra v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1961 Cal. 1; also see, Jeevaratnam v. State of Madras, AIR 1966 SC 951 : (1966) 2 SCR 204, T. Muniswamy v. State of Mysore, AIR 1964 Mys. 250.

13. C.L. Subramanian v. Collector of Customs, AIR 1972 SC 2178.
Also, LAKSHMI SWAMINATHAN, A Civil Servant's Right to be represented in Disciplinary Proceedings, 16 JILI 282 (1974).

14. Board of Trustees, Bombay Port v. Dilipkumar, AIR 1983 SC 109 : (1983) 1 SCC 124.

15. J.K. Aggarwal v. Haryana Seeds Development Corp. Ltd., AIR 1991 SC 1221 : (1991) 2 SCC 283.

16. Bhagat Ram v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 454 : (1983) 2 SCC 442.

17. A.L. Kalra v. P & E Corp. of India, AIR 1984 SC 1361 : (1984) 3 SCC 316.

There is no bar in the disciplinary authority deputing some responsible and competent official to enquire and report into the conduct of the servant against whom action is proposed to be taken. It is open to the disciplinary authority to hold the inquiry itself, or appoint an inquiry officer to conduct the inquiry into the charges against an employee. What cannot be delegated, however, by the disciplinary authority, except when the law specifically so provides, is the ultimate responsibility for the exercise of power of punishment.[18]

The inquiry officer, however, cannot delegate his functions. The inquiry is improper if the inquiry officer delegates the task of hearing witnesses to someone else and then decides the case upon the mere record of evidence.[19] In case an inquiry is held by someone other than the authority, the latter can order a re-inquiry, or a fresh inquiry superseding the earlier inquiry.

If the disciplinary authority exonerates the civil servant finally, no re-inquiry or fresh inquiry on the same facts can then be ordered unless there is a specific provision for reviewing an order of exoneration of this kind in the service rules or any law to that effect.[20] This view is based on the ground of justice, equity and good conscience. Of course, exoneration in a departmental inquiry is no bar to prosecuting the servant concerned in a Court of law.

In the Kumaon case, cited above,[21] disciplinary inquiry conducted against an employee was quashed on the ground of denial to him of a reasonable opportunity to defend himself as there were many flaws in the procedure adopted, e.g., no documents were shown to the employee; there was no presenting officer; no defence witness was examined and no cross-examination of the witnesses testifying against him was allowed.

As has already been discussed, even if the servant is found guilty in a departmental inquiry and action is taken against him on that basis, he can still be prosecuted in a Court.[22]

It is well established proposition that the disciplinary authority is the sole judge of the facts.[23] The report of the inquiry officer is not binding on the disciplinary authority. The disciplinary authority is not bound by the findings reached by the inquiry officer. The disciplinary authority has to make its own mind as regards the guilt of the accused servant and the punishment to be meted out to him on the basis of the evidence before him. In this, the inquiry officer's findings can assist, but do not bind, the punishing authority. The report of the enquiry officer is not final or conclusive till the disciplinary authority takes the final decision thereon. The inquiry is not complete till the disciplinary authority comes to its own conclusions whether the charges have been proved or not. Even when the inquiry officer holds that the charges against the concerned employee have not

---

18. Pradyat Kumar v. Chief Justice, Calcutta H.C., AIR 1956 SC 285 : (1955) 2 SCR 1331. Also see, Ramesh Verma v. R.D. Verma, AIR 1958 All 532; S. Neelakanta v. State of Kerala, AIR 1960 Ker 279; Sreedharaiah v. Dist. Supdt. of Police, AIR 1960 AP 473.

19. Amulya Kumar v. L.M. Bakshi, AIR 1958 Cal 470.

20. Dwarkachand v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1958 Raj 38; V. Moopan v. State of Kerala, AIR 1960 Ker 294.

21. Kumaon Mandal Vikas Nigam Ltd. v. Girja Shankar Pant, AIR 2001 SC 24 : (2001) 1 SCC 182.

22. Supra, Ch. XXV, Sec. B.

23. Kumaon Mandal Vikas Nigam Ltd. v. Girja Shankar Pant, AIR 2001 SC 24, at 32 : (2001) 1 SCC 182.

been established, the disciplinary authority may disagree with these findings, and hold that the charges were proved.[24]

The Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court observed in India v. Goel,[25] that "the Government may agree with the report or may differ, either wholly or partially, from the conclusions recorded in the report." The Court has stated the legal position in D'Silva[26] that neither the findings of the enquiry officer nor his recommendations are binding on the punishing authority.

The Supreme Court has further clarified the position in this regard recently in Shashikant:[27]

> "The findings of the Inquiry officer are only his opinion on the materials, but such findings are not binding on the disciplinary authority as the decision making authority is the punishing authority and, therefore, that authority can come to its own conclusion, of course bearing in mind the views expressed by the Inquiry Officer."

When an earlier order of removal from service was quashed because of a technical flaw in the inquiry and the concerned government servant was reinstated, a second inquiry on merits can still be held on the same charges.[28] Even if an employee is acquitted by a criminal Court, departmental inquiry may still continue.[29]

The degree of proof required in a departmental disciplinary proceeding need not be of the same standard as the degree of proof required for establishing the guilt of an accused in a criminal case. However, even then suspicion, however strong, cannot be substituted for proof.

The Courts do not sit in appeal over the findings recorded by the disciplinary authority, or the enquiry officer in a departmental inquiry. But this does not mean that in no circumstance can the Court interfere.

The Supreme Court has emphasized again and again that the enquiry officer should arrive at his conclusions on the basis of some evidence which, with some degree of definiteness, points to the guilt of the delinquent and does not leave the matter in a suspicious state as mere suspicion cannot take the place of proof even in domestic enquiries. If there is no evidence to sustain the charges framed against the delinquent, he cannot be held to be guilty as, in that event, the finding recorded by the enquiry officer would be perverse.[30] As the Supreme Court has observed in Kuldeep Singh:[31]

> "Where the findings of misconduct are based on no legal evidence and the conclusion is one to which no reasonable man could come, the findings can be

---

24. Yoginath D. Bagade v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1999 SC 3734.
25. Union of India v. Goel, AIR 1964 SC 364 : (1964) 4 SCR 718.
Also, Railway Board v. N. Singh, AIR 1969 SC 966; Krishna Chander v. Union of India, AIR 1974 SC 1589.
26. A.N. D'Silva v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1130 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 968.
27. High Court of Judicature v. Shashikant S. Patil, AIR 2000 SC 22, 26 : (2000) 1 SCC 416.
28. Union of India v. M.B. Patnaik, AIR 1981 SC 858 : (1981) 2 SCC 159; Anand Narain Shukla v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1979 SC 1923 : (1980) 1 SCC 252.
29. Corp. of Nagpur v. Ram Chandra Modak, AIR 1984 SC 636.
30. Mysore v. Shivbasappa, AIR 1963 SC 375 : (1963) 2 SCR 943; Nand Kishore v. State of Bihar,, AIR 1978 SC 1277 : 1978 (3) SCC 366; State of Andhra Pradesh v. Sree Rama Rao, AIR 1963 SC 1723; Rajinder Kumar Kindra v. Delhi Administration, AIR 1984 SC 1805 : (1984) 4 SCC 635.
31. Kuldeep Singh v. Commr. of Police, AIR 1999 SC 677, 679 : (1999) 2 SCC 10.

> rejected as perverse….Where a quasi-judicial Tribunal records findings based on no legal evidence and the findings are his mere ipse dixit or based on conjectures and surmises, the enquiry suffers from the additional infirmity of non-application of mind and stands vitiated."

A broad distinction has therefore, to be maintained between the decisions which are perverse and those which are not. If a decision is arrived at on no evidence or evidence which is thoroughly unreliable and no reasonable person would act on it, the decision would be perverse. But if there is some evidence on record which is acceptable and which could be relied upon, the decision would not be regarded as perverse and the Court would not interfere with the findings.

In Kuldeep Singh, the Court quashed the findings of the enquiry officer as there was absolutely no evidence in support of the charge framed against the concerned employee; the entire findings recorded by the enquiry officer were held vitiated as they were not supported by any evidence on record and were wholly perverse.

In S.S. Moghe v. Union of India,[32] an order of dismissal was set aside because the findings recorded by the inquiry officer were not supported by evidence and were wholly perverse.

The Court can also interfere if the findings recorded were such as could not have been reached by an ordinary prudent man or the findings were perverse, or the decision of the disciplinary authority was based on surmises and conjectures rather than the evidence on record.[33]

What is the impact of delay on departmental proceedings? Can delay vitiate these proceedings? The Supreme Court has refused to lay down any predetermined principle applicable to all cases and in all situations where there is delay in concluding the disciplinary proceedings. Whether on the ground of delay, the disciplinary proceedings are to be terminated depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. The Court has to balance all relevant factors to determine whether in the interest of clean and honest administration, the disciplinary proceedings should be terminated because of long delay.

In State of Andhra Pradesh v. N. Radhakishan,[34] the Supreme Court quashed the charge memo issued in 1995 because of delay in holding the inquiry. On the other hand, in Punjab v. Chaman Lal,[35] the incident occurred in 1987, but the inquiry was initiated in 1993, i.e., nearly 5½ years later. There was no explanation for the delay. The Supreme Court did not quash the disciplinary proceedings. The Court ruled that in the interest of justice as well as administration, the inquiry ought to be completed.

(a) SECOND OPPORTUNITY

Before December, 1976, after the completion of enquiry against a civil servant, if it was proposed to impose on him the punishment of dismissal, removal

---

32. AIR 1981 SC 1495 : (1981) 3 SCC 271.
See also, Syed Rahimuddin v. Director General C.S.I.R., AIR 2001 SC 2418 : (2001) 9 SCC 575.

33. Nand Kishore v. State of Bihar,, AIR 1978 SC 1277; State of Andhra Pradesh v. Sree Rama Rao, AIR 1963 SC 1723; Yoginath D. Bagade v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1999 SC 3734.

34. AIR 1998 SC 1833 : (1998) 4 SCC 154.

35. (1995) 2 SCC 570 : 1995 SCC (L&S) 541.

or reduction in rank, then it was necessary to give him another opportunity of making a representation as to why the proposed punishment should not be awarded to him. It was illegal to impose any of these punishments without this formality.[36] The Courts reached this conclusion by interpreting Art. 311(2).

A mass of case-law gathered around this second opportunity of hearing. At this stage, the punishing authority was not bound to hear the civil servant, and a written representation by him was regarded as sufficient.[37] The second opportunity enabled the servant to plead that no case had been made out against him, or that the conclusions of fact drawn from the evidence were not correct, or that the proposed punishment was excessive.[38]

In course of time, a feeling grew that Art. 311(2), as interpreted by the Courts, had come to impose elaborate procedural formalities before a delinquent civil servant could be punished. Fulfilment of these formalities appeared to consume too much time and cause undue delay in meting out punishment to guilty officials which resulted in lowering the standards of employee discipline in government establishments. The second opportunity, it was thought, protracted disciplinary proceedings without affording any additional safeguard to the guilty officials. It was thus thought desirable to cut down some procedural formalities to expedite disciplinary proceedings against civil servants.[39] With this in view, the Fifteenth Amendment of the Constitution was undertaken.[40]

Originally, the amending bill proposed abolition of the second opportunity as such. But this proposal ran into heavy weather in Parliament. Consequently, the bill was modified and the second opportunity was retained with this restriction that the employee was to make representation on the penalty proposed, but only on the basis of the evidence adduced during the enquiry. This meant that the concerned employee should seek to refer only to the evidence produced at the time of the inquiry and he should not throw in any fresh evidence at that stage.

The XV Constitutional Amendment did not dilute the second opportunity to any significant extent. However, the 42nd Constitutional Amendment abolished the second opportunity.[41] It provides expressly that it is not necessary to give to a delinquent government servant any opportunity of making representation on the proposed penalty.

The position now is that where it is proposed, after inquiry, to impose upon a government servant the punishment of dismissal, removal or reduction in rank, it may be imposed on the basis of the evidence adduced at the inquiry without giving him any opportunity of making representation on the penalty proposed.

It has now been ruled by the Supreme Court that if the inquiry officer holds the charges proved, a copy of the inquiry report must be furnished to the con-

---

36. Union of India v. Jeewan Ram, AIR 1958 SC 905; Kapur Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 493 : (1960) 2 SCR 569; Bachhittar Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1963 SC 395 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 713; Maharashtra v. B.A. Joshi, AIR 1969 SC 1302 : (1969) 1 SCC 804.

37. U.R. Bhatt v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1344 : (1962) 1 LLJ 656.

38. Khem Chand v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 300; Union of India v. Goel, supra, footnote 25, on 1696.

39. I.L.I, Disciplinary Proceedings against Government Servants, 90 (1962); Report of the Santhanam Committee on Prevention of Corruption (1964).

40. See, infra, Ch. XLII.

41. Ibid.

cerned officer against whom disciplinary action is proposed to be taken.[42] This means that after the inquiry officer submits his report containing his findings and recommendations, but before the disciplinary authority takes a final view thereon, a copy of the report of the inquiry officer ought to be sent to the delinquent employee and his comments invited thereon. The Court has explained the position in Ramzan Khan thus:

> "….the disciplinary authority is very much influenced by the conclusions of the Inquiry Officer and even by the recommendation relating to the nature of punishment to be inflicted. Even if the second stage of the inquiry has been abolished, the delinquent is still entitled to represent against the conclusion of the Inquiry Officer."

Accordingly, the Court has concluded:

> "….supply of a copy of the inquiry report along with recommendations, if any, in the matter of proposed punishment to be inflicted would be within the rules of natural justice"

The Court has reiterated this proposition in E.C.I.L.[43]

The Court has explained that the disciplinary proceedings break into two stages. The first stage ends when the disciplinary authority arrives at its conclusions on the basis of the evidence, inquiry officer's report and the delinquent employee's reply to it. The second stage begins when the disciplinary authority decides to impose penalty on the basis of its conclusions. The 42nd Amendment has taken away the second right, but the right of the charged officer to receive the report of the inquiry officer was an essential part of the first stage itself. The Court has, therefore, observed in E.C.I.L.:

> "Both, the dictates of the reasonable opportunity as well as the principles of natural justice, therefore, require that before the disciplinary authority comes to its own conclusions, the delinquent employee should have an opportunity to reply to the enquiry officer's findings. The disciplinary authority is then required to consider the evidence, the report of the enquiry officer and the representation of the employee against it."

The ECIL ruling was given in the context of natural justice. But the Court ruled that the position would be the same where statutory rules governed the procedure. The ECIL principle would apply even when statutory rules were silent or even prohibited the supply of a copy of the enquiry report to the delinquent.

But the Court has imposed a rider, viz., merely because an enquiry report has not been furnished to the delinquent employee, the order of dismissal is not vitiated unless it is shown that the delinquent has been prejudiced thereby. "Whether, in fact, prejudice has been caused to the employee or not on account of the denial to him of the report has to be considered on the facts and circumstances of each case".

A Court/tribunal ought not to interfere with the order of punishment if it concludes that the non-supply of the report would have made no difference to the ultimate result and the punishment given. "The Court/tribunal should not mechanically set aside the order of punishment on the ground that the report was not furnished." Only if the Court/tribunal finds that the furnishing of the report would have made a difference to the result that the order of punishment should be set aside.

---

42. Union of India v. Mohd. Ramzan Khan, AIR 1991 SC 471 : (1991) 1 SCC 588.
43. Managing Director, E.C.I.L. v. B. Karunakar, AIR 1994 SC 1074 : (1973) 4 SCC 727.

The same principle applies even when a statutory rule requires that a copy of the inquiry report be furnished to the delinquent officer before passing the order of punishment. Under a Civil Service Rule, the report of the inquiry officer has to be furnished to the delinquent officer. The report was not sent to him in the instant case[44] but he was dismissed from service. The Supreme Court ruled that the effect of the non-submission of the inquiry report to the delinquent on the punishment awarded to him would depend on the question whether in fact prejudice had been caused to the concerned employee because of denial of the report to him. If the Court concludes that the non-supply of the report would have made no difference to the ultimate findings and the punishment given by the disciplinary authority, the Court ought not to interfere with the order of punishment. The Court ought not to mechanically set aside the order of punishment on the ground that the report was not furnished to the delinquent employee.[45]

HEARING BY DISCIPLINARY AUTHORITY

In Punjab National Bank v. Kunj Behari Misra,[46] the following question was raised: when the inquiry officer, during the course of the disciplinary proceedings, comes to the conclusion that the charges of misconduct against an official are not proved, then can the disciplinary authority differ from that view and give a contrary finding without affording any opportunity to the delinquent officer?

The Court has ruled that natural justice demands that the authority which proposes to hold the delinquent officer guilty must give him a hearing. If the inquiry officer holds the charges to be proved then the report has to be given to the delinquent officer who can make a representation before the disciplinary authority takes further action prejudicial to the delinquent officer.

Further, in case the report of the inquiry officer is favourable to the delinquent officer, but the disciplinary authority takes a different view, and holds the delinquent employee to be guilty, then it must record its tentative findings with reasons and give an opportunity to the concerned officer to represent against these findings. Only, thereafter, the disciplinary authority can record its final findings. The Court has observed:

> "The principles of natural justice….require the authority, which has to take a final decision and can impose a penalty, to give an opportunity to the officer charged of misconduct to file representation before the disciplinary authority records its findings on the charges framed against the officer".[47]

---

44. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Harendra Arora, AIR 2001 SC 2319 : (2001) 6 SCC 392.
Also see, Oriental Insurance Co. v. S. Balakrishnan, AIR 2001 SC 2400 : (2003) 1 SCC 734.

45. Also see, Oriental Insurance Co. v. S. Balakrishnan, AIR 2001 SC 2400.
The Supreme Court has adopted this position on pragmatic considerations. As the Court has observed : "where therefore, even after the furnishing of the report, no different consequence would have followed it would be a perversion of justice to permit the employee to resume duty and to get all the consequential benefits."
See, Managing Director, ECIL, Hyderabad v. B. Karunakar, AIR 1994 SC 1074 : (1993) 4 SCC 727.

46. AIR 1998 SC 2713 : (1998) 7 SCC 84.

47. Also see, State Bank of India v. Arvind K. Shukla, AIR 2001 SC 2398.

To the same effect is the ruling of the Supreme Court in Yoginath D. Bagde v. State of Maharashtra.[48] A delinquent officer has a right of hearing not only during the enquiry proceedings conducted by the enquiry officer into the charges levelled against him, but also when those findings are considered by the disciplinary authority and when the disciplinary authority forms a tentative opinion that it does not agree with the findings recorded by the enquiry officer. If the findings of the enquiry officer are favourable to the delinquent employee holding that the charges are not proved against him, it is all the more necessary to give to the delinquent officer an opportunity before reversing the findings of the enquiry officer.

The formation of the opinion by the disciplinary authority should be tentative and not final. It is at this stage that the delinquent officer should be given an opportunity of hearing after he is informed of the reasons on the basis of which the disciplinary authority proposes to disagree with the findings of the inquiry officer. When the disciplinary authority disagrees with the enquiry officer, the disciplinary authority must give reasons as to why it disagrees with the enquiry officer. In the absence of reasons, it will be difficult for the employee charged to satisfactorily give reasons to persuade the disciplinary authority to agree with the conclusions reached by the inquiry officer.[49]

This has been held to be in consonance with Art. 311(2). Till a final decision is taken in the matter, the inquiry does not come to an end. The enquiry ends when the disciplinary authority has taken a final view and held whether the charges are proved or not proved and punishment inflicted on the delinquent. That being so, the right of being heard is available to the delinquent employee upto the final stage. This being a constitutional right of the employee under Art. 311(2) cannot be whittled down by any law or service rules made under Art. 309.[50]

(b) EFFECT OF FAILURE OF NATURAL JUSTICE

What is the impact of failure of natural justice at the inquiry stage on the ultimate order imposing punishment on the delinquent officer. After discussing the matter elaborately in State Bank of Patiala v. S.K. Sharma,[51] the Supreme Court has ruled that the Court must distinguish between two situations—

(1) where there is a total violation of natural justice, i.e., where no opportunity of hearing has been given; where there has been no notice/no hearing at all; and

(2) where a facet of natural justice has been violated, i.e., where there has not been adequate opportunity of hearing, or where a fair hearing is lacking.

In situation (1), the order would undoubtedly be void. In such a case, normally, the authority concerned can proceed afresh according to natural justice.

In situation (2), the Court has to see whether in the totality of the circumstances, the delinquent servant did or did not have a fair hearing. While applying the audi alteram partem rule, the ultimate and overriding objective must be kept in mind, viz.,

---

48. AIR 1999 SC 3734 : (1999) 7 SCC 739.
49. Also see, State Bank of India v. Arvind K. Shukla, AIR 2001 SC 2398 : (2004) 13 SCC 797.
50. On Art. 309, see, supra, Sec. B.
51. AIR 1996 SC 1669 : (1996) 3 SCC 364.

to ensure a fair hearing and to ensure that there is no failure of justice. Whether any prejudice was caused to the person concerned?[52]

Further, there may be situations, where in the interests of the state or public interest, the audi alteram partem rule may have to be curtailed. "In such situations, the Court may have to balance public/state interest with the requirement of natural justice and arrive at an appropriate decision."

The application of the above propositions can be illustrated by referring to a few cases.

An order made without giving any notice to the affected person and without giving him any hearing, has been held to be bad in law.[53]

Where a copy of the enquiry officer's report has not been supplied to the delinquent officer, the order of punishment should be set aside only if there has been a failure of justice. It is only if the Court finds that furnishing the report would have made a difference to the result in the case that it should set aside the order.[54]

(c) BIAS

Bias on the part of the inquiry officer vitiates the inquiry. The inquiry officer should be a person with an open mind and he should hold an impartial domestic enquiry. He should not be biased either in favour of the department or against the person against whom the inquiry is to be held, or prejudge the issue, or have a foreclosed mind, or have pre-determined notions.[55] The test is that "there should be a real danger of bias". The conclusion as to bias can be drawn from the surrounding circumstances.[56] A fanciful allegation of bias would not vitiate the proceedings.

An inquiry by a person who is biased against the charged officer is a clear denial of a reasonable opportunity.[57] For example, one and the same person cannot be a judge and a witness in the same case. Therefore, the inquiry officer cannot also be a witness against the servant against whom he is holding the inquiry. Such a procedure denotes a biased state of mind against the person concerned.[58]

An employee was dismissed by his superior officer on charge of misconduct in relation to himself after himself considering the employee's explanation. The order of dismissal was held to be illegal as violative of natural justice since no person can be a judge in his own cause. Any one having a personal stake in the enquiry must keep himself aloof from the enquiry.[59]

---

52. Jankinath Sarangi v. State of Orissa, (1969) 3 SCC 392; K.L. Tripathi v. State Bank of India, (1984) 1 SCC 43 : AIR 1984 SC 273; State Bank of Patiala v. S.K. Sharma, AIR 1996 SC 1669 : (1996) 3 SCC 364.

53. C.B. Gautam v. Union of India, (1993) 1 SCC 78 : AIR 1994 SC 771; Chintapalli Agency T.A.S.C.S. Ltd. v. Secretary (F&A) Govt. of A.P., AIR 1977 SC 2313 : (1977) 4 SCC 337; S.L. Kapoor v. Jagmohan, AIR 1981 SC 136 : (1980) 4 SCC 379.

54. Managing Director, E.C.I.L. v. B. Karunakar, (1993) 4 SCC 727; supra, footnote 43.

55. B. Martin v. Union of India, AIR 1976 Kant. 144.
Also, Sunil Kumar v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1980 SC 1170.

56. Kumaon Mandal Vikas Nigam Ltd. Girja Shankar Pant, AIR 2001 SC 24 : (2001) 1 SCC 182; State of Punjab v. V.K. Khanna, AIR 2001 SC 343 : (2001) 2 SCC 330.

57. State of Uttar Pradesh v. C.S. Sharma, AIR 1963 All 94; Manihar Singh v. Supdt. of Police, AIR 1969 Ass. 1; Sreeramulu v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1970 AP 114.

58. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Nooh, AIR 1958 SC 86 : 1958 SCR 595.

59. Arjun Chaubey v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1356 : (1984) 2 SCC 578.

In Kuldeep Singh,[60] the Supreme Court held the inquiry officer as biased as he "did not sit with an open mind to hold an impartial domestic inquiry which is an essential component of natural justice as also that of "reasonable opportunity", contemplated by Art. 311(2) of the Constitution." The inquiry officer, said the Court, acted so arbitrarily in the matter and found the employee guilty in such a coarse manner that it became apparent that he was merely carrying out the command from some superior officer who perhaps directed to "fix him up."

Bias on the part of the disciplinary authority may vitiate disciplinary proceedings.[61] In Kahanna,[62] the Supreme Court has ruled that the test of bias is whether "there is a real danger of bias.

In the instant case, the Punjab Government issued a charge-sheet against Khanna who was the former Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government. Even before Khanna could reply the Chief Minister announced appointment of an inquiry officer to enquire into the charges against Khanna. This was held to show bias against Khanna. In Service Jurisprudence, the disciplinary authority has to apply its mind upon receipt of the reply to the charge-sheet as to whether a further inquiry is called for or not. Only, thereafter, the inquiry follows and not otherwise. But here the enquiry officer was appointed even before receiving the reply of the delinquest officer. From this fact and the tenor of the charge-sheet, the Court deduced that there was bias in the proceedings.

(d) ENFORCEABILITY OF DISCIPLINARY RULES

Often the rules framed under Art. 309 lay down procedure to be followed at inquiries conducted into charges against civil servants.

In the beginning, some of the High Courts took the view that the rules were merely in the nature of administrative instructions, meant for the guidance of inquiry officers, but were not mandatory and their breach would not create any cause of action in the accused servant. This approach was the result of the doctrine of pleasure which, these Courts held, was controllable not by the rules or law but by constitutional provisions only, and that the procedure at the inquiry was to be tested on the touchstone of Art. 311(2) and not by the rules.[63]

But, the Supreme Court's approach has been to treat the rules as binding and not merely directory in nature, and to insist that statutory disciplinary authorities should act within the rules.[64] For example, the Court held with reference to a service rule in Uttar Pradesh that itgave an option to a gazetted civil servant to request the Governor that his case be tried by an administrative tribunal and not otherwise, and the rule imposed an obligation on the Governor to grant such a request. The proceedings in the instant case were quashed as the servant's request to this effect was not granted and this violated the rule in question.[65]

---

60. Kuldeep Singh v. Commissioner of Police, AIR 1999 SC 677, 684 : (1999) 2 SCC 10.

61. State of Punjab v. V.K. Khanna, AIR 2001 SC 343.
On bias, see, Ch. VIII, Sec. E (iv)(c).

62. AIR 2001 SC 343 : (2001) 2 SCC 330.

63. Dr. Tribhuvan v. State of Bihar,, AIR 1960 Pat. 116; Krishnaswamy v. State of Kerala, AIR 1960 Ker. 224; Shankerlingam v. Union of India, AIR 1960 Bom. 431; Nripendra v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1961 Cal. 1.

64. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Babu Ram Upadhya, AIR 1961 SC 751 : (1961) 2 SCR 679; Ranendra Chandra v. Union of India, AIR 1963 SC 1552 : (1964) 2 SCR 135.

65. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Jogendra Singh, AIR 1963 SC 1618 : (1964) 2 SCR 197.

Dismissal of a sub-inspector of police by the superintendent of police without observing the rules pertaining to inquiry made under the Police Act was held bad as mandatory rules had not been observed.[66] In another case, the Court held that Rule 55 of the Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules made it mandatory on the inquiry officer to hold an oral hearing, if the servant charged desired such an inquiry, and the denial of such an inquiry would introduce a fatal infirmity in the inquiry because of the contravention of the mandatory provisions of the rule. This requirement was held to be based plainly upon consideration of natural justice.[67]

Under the concept of 'reasonable opportunity' contained in Art. 311(2), the Courts resort to the concept of 'natural justice' which, in substance means minimal procedural safeguards to the accused person. Therefore, if the service rules provide more safeguards than the minimal, the rules are to be observed. If, however, the rules fall below the minimal safeguards, then the rules have to be supplemented with the natural justice concept.[68] The rules have to be considered in the light of the provisions of Art. 311(2) to find out whether the rules purport to provide reasonable opportunity of hearing to the delinquent employee.[69]

There were two separate rules for civil servants in Tamil Nadu—(i) general disciplinary rules, and (ii) for cases of corruption. The Supreme Court has ruled in the case noted below that the inquiry into corruption cases must be held under the relevant rules, and not under the general disciplinary rules. As both sets of rules have been framed under Art. 309, they both have equal force of law.[70]

In State Bank of Patiala v. S.K. Sharma,[71] a statutory regulation provided that copies of the statements of witnesses recorded earlier would be furnished to the delinquent employee. The copies of the statements were not supplied but he was advised to peruse, examine and take notes of the statements half an hour before the commencement of the inquiry. This meant, in substance, three days before the examination of these witnesses. The Supreme Court ruled that the said regulation contained a facet of natural justice and was designed to provide an adequate opportunity to the delinquent officer to cross-examine the witnesses effectively and thereby defend himself properly. However, in the circumstances of the case, the Court concluded that there was a substantial compliance with the regulation in question, though not a full compliance. On account of the said violation, it could not be said that the concerned employee did not receive a fair hearing.

In the instant case, the Court has considered the general question whether each and every violation of rules/regulations governing the inquiry would automatically vitiate the inquiry. The Court has laid down the following propositions concerning the impact of breach of these rules on the validity of the ultimate order:

(1) An order passed imposing punishment on an employee consequent upon a disciplinary inquiry held in violation of the rules/regulations, statutory provisions

---

66. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Babu Ram Upadhya, AIR 1961 SC 751 : (1961) 2 SCR 679.
67. Bombay v. Nurul Khan, AIR 1966 SC 269 : (1965) 3 SCR 135.
68. Kapur Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 493 : (1960) 2 SCR 569; State of Uttar Pradesh v. C.S. Sharma, AIR 1968 SC 158.
69. Kuldeep Singh v. Commr. of Police, AIR 1999 SC 677, 683 : (1999) 2 SCC 10.
70. Secretary to T.N. Govt. v. D. Subramanyan Rajadevan, AIR 1996 SC 2634 : (1996) 5 SCC 334.
71. AIR 1996 SC 1669 : (1996) 3 SCC 364.

governing such enquiries should not be set aside automatically. The Court should enquire whether—(a) the provision violated is of a substantive character, or (b) whether it is procedural in nature.

(2) A substantive provision has normally to be complied with and the theory of substantial compliance or the test of prejudice would not apply in such a case.

(3) Procedural provisions generally mean to afford a reasonable and adequate opportunity to the delinquent employee. These rules are generally conceived in his interest. Accordingly, violation of any and every procedural provision cannot be said to automatically vitiate the enquiry held or order passed.

(4) Except for the cases falling under the categories of 'no notice', 'no opportunity' and 'no hearing', any complaint of violation of procedural rules should be examined from the point of view of prejudice, viz., whether such violation has prejudiced the delinquent employee in defending himself properly and effectively.

(5) If it is found that he has been so prejudiced, appropriate orders will have to be made to repair and remedy the prejudice including setting aside the enquiry and/or the order of punishment. If no prejudice is caused, no interference is called for.

(6) There may be certain procedural provisions which are of a fundamental character, whose violation is by itself proof of prejudice. The Court may not insist on proof of prejudice in any such case.

(7) To repeat, the test is one of prejudice, i.e., whether a person has received a fair hearing considering all things. This aspect can also be looked at from the point of view of mandatory and directory provisions.

(8) In case of violation of a mandatory rule, it has to be ascertained whether the provision is conceived in the interest of the person proceeded against or in public interest. In the former case, he can waive the same either expressly or by his conduct. If he has waived the same, the order imposing punishment cannot be set aside. If he has not waived it, or the provision is such that cannot be waived, then the Court has to give appropriate directions. The ultimate test is always the same, viz., the test of prejudice or the test of fair hearing, as it may be called.

(9) If the breach of a directory rule has occurred, the complaint of violation has to be examined from the standpoint of substantial compliance. The order passed can be set aside only where such violation has caused prejudice to the delinquent employee.

Where the inquiry is not governed by rules but by the general concept of natural justice, the Court has to distinguish between—(i) total violation of natural justice; and (ii) violation of a facet of natural justice. In other words, a distinction has to be made between—(i) no opportunity, and (ii) no adequate opportunity.

The first category comprises: 'no notice', 'no hearing' and 'no fair hearing'. In such a case, the order passed is invalid or a nullity. An example of this is to be found in the case noted below,[72] where the departmental inquiry was quashed as being "totally unsatisfactory" and "without observing the minimum required procedure for proving the charge."

---

72. Ministry of Finance v. S.B. Ramesh, AIR 1998 SC 853 : (1998) 3 SCC 227.

In the second case, the matter has to be examined from the point of view of prejudice, i.e., the Court has to see whether in the totality of circumstances, the delinquent employee has or has not received a fair hearing.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the ultimate and overriding aim of audi alteram partem rule is to ensure a fair hearing and to ensure that there is no failure of justice.

The above propositions apply to the audi alteram partem rule and not to bias which has different tests.

(e) DEPARTMENTAL INQUIRY AND CRIMINAL PROSECUTION

Generally speaking, a criminal prosecution and a departmental inquiry, on the same set of facts, can both run simultaneously. The basis for this proposition is that proceedings in a criminal case and the departmental proceedings operate in distinct and different jurisdictional areas. In departmental proceedings, the charge relates to misconduct, and many factors, such as, enforcement of discipline or investigation into the level of integrity of the delinquent or other staff, operate in the mind of the disciplinary authority. Further, the standard of proof required in disciplinary proceedings is also different from that required in a criminal case. In departmental proceedings, the standard of proof is one of preponderance of the probabilities; in a criminal case, the charge has to be proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt. Another consideration is that criminal cases drag on for long and disciplinary proceedings should not be delayed unduly in the interest of good administration.

In Meena,[73] there were charges of misappropriation of public funds by the respondent who was a member of the IAS. Disciplinary proceedings were initiated against him in 1992. In 1993, criminal proceedings were initiated against him. The question arose whether the disciplinary inquiry against the respondent be stayed pending the criminal trial when the charges in the disciplinary proceedings and charges in criminal case were based on the same facts and allegations. The Supreme Court answered in the negative.

In Nelson,[74] the Supreme Court rejected the contention that disciplinary proceedings could not be continued in the face of the acquittal in the criminal case and held that the nature and scope of the criminal case are very different from those of a departmental disciplinary proceedings and an order of acquittal, therefore, cannot conclude departmental proceedings. This is so because in a criminal case, the charge has to be proved beyond reasonable doubt while in departmental proceedings the standard of proof for proving the charge is preponderance of probabilities.

The Nelson case was followed in Gopalan.[75] The respondent who was employed as sub-post master was put on trial for the offences under ss. 407, 467 and 477(A), I.P.C. In the meantime, departmental proceedings were also initiated for these offences as well as for misappropriation. In the departmental proceedings, the charges were held proved and he was ordered to be compulsorily retired. Later, he was acquitted of the criminal charge on benefit of doubt as the offences

---

73. State of Rajasthan v. B.K. Meena, AIR 1997 SC 13 : (1996) 6 SCC 417.
74. Nelson Motis v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 1981 : (1992) 4 SCC 711.
75. Senior Supdt. of Post Offices, Pathamanthitta v. A. Gopalan, AIR 1999 SC 1514 : (1997) 11 SCC 239.

were not established beyond reasonable doubt. It was argued that in view of his acquittal by the criminal Court, the finding of the inquiry officer holding him guilty of those charges could not be sustained. The Supreme Court rejected the contention, citing Nelson, on the ground that the two types of proceedings are different from each other. The disciplinary proceedings were based not only on the offence tried by the criminal Court but on an additional charge also, viz., misappropriation. The second charge was held established in departmental proceedings, and the punishment of compulsory retirement was imposed on him. Therefore, an acquittal in the criminal case, could not conclude the departmental proceedings.

The Courts have however made one exception to the above proposition, viz., where the departmental proceedings and the criminal proceedings are both based on the same set of facts and the evidence in both the proceedings is common without there being a variance, and the criminal charge is of grave nature, in such a situation, the Courts have preferred that the departmental proceedings be suspended pending the final outcome of the criminal prosecution. After taking note of the previous cases,[76] on this point, the Supreme Court has laid down the following propositions in Anthony:[77]

(1) Departmental proceedings and proceedings in a criminal case can proceed simultaneously as there is no bar in their being conducted simultaneously, though separately.

(2) If the departmental proceedings and the criminal case are based on identical and similar set of facts and the charge in the criminal case against the delinquent employee is of a grave nature which involves complicated questions of law and fact, it would be desirable to stay the departmental proceedings till the conclusion of the criminal case.

(3) Whether the nature of a charge in a criminal case is grave and whether complicated questions of fact and law are involved in that case, will depend upon the nature of the offence and the nature of the case launched against the employee on the basis of evidence and material collected against him during investigation or as reflected in the charge sheet.

(4) The factors mentioned in (2) and (3) above cannot be considered in isolation to stay the departmental proceedings but due regard has to be given to the fact that the departmental proceedings cannot be unduly delayed.

(5) If the criminal case does not proceed, or its disposal is being unduly delayed, the departmental proceedings, even if they were stayed on account of the pendency of the criminal case, can be resumed and proceeded with so as to conclude them at an early date, so that if the employee is found not guilty his honour may be vindicated and in case he is found guilty, administration may get rid of him at the earliest.

In Anthony,[78] the appellant was employed as a security officer at the Kolar Gold Fields. In a raid on his house (according to the police version), some gold

---

76. Jang Bahadur Singh v. Brij Nath Tiwari, AIR 1969 SC 30 : (1969) 1 SCR 134; Kusheshwar Dubey v. Bharat Coking Coal Co. Ltd., AIR 1988 SC 2118 : (1988) 4 SCC 319; Depot Manager, APSRTC v. Mohd. Yousuf Khan, AIR 1997 SC 2232 : (1997) 2 SCC 699.

77. M. Paul Anthony v. Bharat Gold Mines Ltd., AIR 1999 SC 1416 at 1422 : (1999) 3 SCC 679.

78. Ibid.

sand was recovered. He was suspended from service and a charge sheet issued to him on June 4, 1985. A criminal prosecution was also launched against him. Simultaneously departmental proceedings were also launched against him and he was held guilty and dismissed from service on 7-6-1986. On 3rd February, 1987, the appellant was acquitted by the criminal Court with the categorical finding that the prosecution had failed to establish its case. Thereafter, the appellant requested for reinstatement but he was informed that as he had already been dismissed from service, the judgment passed by the magistrate did not matter.

The Supreme Court ruled in Anthony that the findings recorded by the inquiry officer were based on the evidence of the police officers who had raided his house. The criminal case and the departmental proceedings were based on the same set of facts, viz., "the raid conducted at the appellant's residence and recovery of incriminating articles therefrom. "At the departmental inquiry, the charges framed against Anthony were sought to be proved by the evidence of the same police officers who were examined in the criminal Court. On examination of the same evidence, while the inquiry officer upheld the charge, the Court held, on the other hand, that no search was ever made and nothing was recovered from his residence, and the Court thus threw out the entire prosecution case and acquitted the appellant. The Supreme Court thus observed:[79]

> "In this situation, therefore, where the appellant is acquitted by a judicial pronouncement with the finding that the 'raid and recovery' at the residence of the appellant were not proved, it would be unjust, unfair and rather oppressive to allow the findings recorded at the ex parte departmental proceedings, to stand."

The Court stated that since the facts and the evidence in both the proceedings were the same without there being any iota of difference, the distinction, which is usually drawn as between the departmental proceedings and the criminal case on the basis of approach and burden of proof, would not apply to the instant case.

The appellant was ordered to be reinstated forthwith and was paid the entire arrears of salary since the date of his suspension.

H. EXCLUSION OF ART. 311(2)

The second proviso to Art. 311(2), in clauses (a), (b) and (c) : lays down three situations where Art. 311(2) does not apply. Holding of inquiry by informing the government servant of the charges and giving reasonable opportunity of being heard is the rule and dispensing therewith is an exception.[80] These clauses are as follows:

(a) Where a civil servant is dismissed or removed or reduced in rank on the ground of conduct which has led to his conviction on a criminal charge [Art. 311(2)(a)].

The Supreme Court has emphasized that under Art. 311(2)(a), the disciplinary authority is to regard the conviction of the concerned civil servant as sufficient proof of misconduct on his part. The authority is to decide whether conviction demands the imposition of any penalty and, if so, what penalty. For this purpose,

---

79. Ibid, at 1425.
80. Sudesh Kumar v. State of Hryana, (2005) 11 SCC 525.

the authority has to take into consideration the judgment of the criminal Court, the entire conduct of the civil servant, the gravity of the offence, the impact of the offence on the administration, whether the offence was of a technical or trivial nature, and the extenuating circumstances, if any. This the disciplinary authority has to do ex parte and without giving a hearing to the concerned civil servant.

Action under Art. 311(2)(a) is to be taken only when the conduct which has led to his conviction is such that it deserves any of the three major punishments mentioned in Art. 311(2). The power has to be exercised "fairly, justly and reasonably". No hearing need be given while imposing the penalty after conviction on a criminal charge, but "the right to impose a penalty carries with it the duty to act justly".[81] For example, a government servant convicted for parking his scooter in a no-parking area cannot be dismissed from service.

However, if the Court finds that the penalty imposed by the impugned order is arbitrary, or grossly excessive, or out of all proportion to the offence committed, or not warranted by the facts and circumstances of the case, or the requirements of that particular government service, the Court will strike down the order. One such case is Shankar Dass v. India[82] where the order imposing the penalty of dismissal was set aside as the Court found that in the fact-situation, the penalty of dismissal from service was whimsical. The Supreme Court emphasized that the power under cl. (a) of the second proviso to Art. 311(2) must be exercised "fairly, justly and reasonably" and that "the right to impose a penalty carries with it the duty to act justly."

A civil servant hit his superior officer with an iron rod leading to his conviction under s. 332, I.P.C., but he was put on probation instead of being sentenced to imprisonment. The disciplinary authority then removed him from service. The Supreme Court ruled that the punishment inflicted on the civil servant cannot be said to be excessive or arbitrary in the fact situation.[83]

A question of importance has been raised in relation to Art. 311(2)(a), viz., after conviction by the lower Court, the concerned employee may appeal to a higher Court against his conviction. Can he be dismissed from service after conviction pending his appeal, or can he be dismissed immediately after conviction irrespective of his appeal?

The Supreme Court has answered this question in Nagoor Meera.[84] Art. 311(2)(a) speaks of "conduct which has led to his conviction on a criminal charge". It does not speak of sentence or punishment awarded. The Court has ruled that the appropriate course in such cases would be to take action as soon as a government servant is convicted of a criminal charge and not to wait for the appeal or revision against conviction. If, however, he is acquitted on appeal or other proceeding, the order can always be revised. If the government servant is reinstated, he will be entitled to all the benefits to which he would have been entitled to had he continued in service.

---

81. Shankar Dass v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 772 : (1985) 2 SCC 358.
82. Ibid.
83. Tulsiram Patel, infra, footnote 87.
84. Dy. Director of Collegiate Education (Administration), Madras v. S. Nagoor Meera, AIR 1995 SC 1364 : (1995) 3 SCC 377.

The Court disapproved of the suggestion that the government servant ought not to be dismissed till the appeal, revision or other remedies are over as that would mean continuing in service a person who has been convicted of a serious offence by a criminal Court.

In Nagoor Meera,[85] a government servant was convicted on a charge of corruption and was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one year in addition to a fine of Rs. 5,000/-. On appeal, the High Court suspended his sentence pending disposal of his appeal. The Supreme Court ruled that merely because the sentence was suspended and he was released on bail, the conviction would not cease to be operative. As he was found guilty of corruption by a criminal Court, he could be dismissed from service; it would not be advisable to retain him in service. If his appeal succeeded, the matter could always be reviewed in such a manner that he suffered no prejudice.

An employee was convicted of an offence under the Prevention of Corruption Act and was sentenced to imprisonment for three years. Accordingly, he was dismissed from service. He then appealed to the High Court which suspended the sentence pending final disposal of the appeal and released him on bail. The Supreme Court ruled in Union of India v. Ramesh Kumar,[86] that suspension of the sentence does not wipe out conviction which continues and is not obliterated. Accordingly, his dismissal from service was not affected and so it could not be quashed.

(b) Where an authority empowered to dismiss or remove a civil servant or reduce him in rank is satisfied that, for some reason to be recorded by it in writing, it is not reasonably practicable to hold such inquiry [Art. 311(2)(b)].

The important thing to note is that this clause applies only when the conduct of the government servant is such as he deserves the punishment of dismissal, removal or reduction in rank. Before denying a government servant his constitutional right to an inquiry, the paramount consideration is whether the conduct of the government servant is such as justifies the penalty of dismissal, removal or reduction in rank.

Explaining the scope of the clause, the Supreme Court has said in Tulsiram Patel:[87] "... whether it was practicable to hold the inquiry or not must be judged in the context of whether it was reasonably practicable to do so. It is not a total or absolute impracticability which is required by clause (b). What is requisite is that the holding of the inquiry is not practicable in the opinion of a reasonable man taking a reasonable view of the prevailing situation."

The reasonable practicability of holding an inquiry is a matter of assessment to be made by the disciplinary authority. The disciplinary authority is the best judge of the situation.[88]

The Court has explained that it would not be reasonably practicable to hold the inquiry where an atmosphere of violence or of general indiscipline and insubordination prevails. It is immaterial whether the concerned government servant himself is or is not a party to bringing about such an atmosphere. It is the disci-

---

85. Ibid.
86. AIR 1997 SC 3531 : (1997) 7 SCC 514.
87. Union of India v. Tulsiram Patel, AIR 1985 SC 1416 : (1985) 3 SCC 398.
88. Kuldip Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 79 : (1996) 10 SCC 659.

plinary authority which is the best Judge of the "reasonable practicability of holding an inquiry.

The decision of the disciplinary authority is final [Art. 311(3)], provided it records the reasons in writing for denying the inquiry to the concerned civil servant. But a disciplinary authority is not expected to dispense with a disciplinary inquiry lightly or arbitrarily, or out of ulterior motives, or merely in order to avoid the holding of an inquiry, or because the department's case against the government servant is weak and must fail. In such a case, the Court can strike down the order dispensing with the inquiry as also the order imposing penalty.[89]

Principles of Administrative Law regarding discretionary decisions are applicable in this area as well.[90] The Supreme Court has emphasized that the reasons for dispensing with the inquiry must be germane to the issue, viz., dispensing with the inquiry. While the Court cannot enquire into the adequacy or sufficiency of the reasons, it can examine the reasons ex facie, and if they are not germane, it can hold that the pre-requisite for the exercise of power having not been satisfied, the exercise of power was bad or without jurisdiction.[91] The disciplinary authority has to reach this decision ex parte.

(c) Where the President or the Governor, as the case may be, is satisfied that, in the interest of the security of the State, it is not expedient to give to a civil servant such an opportunity [Art. 311(2)(c)].

While under clause (b) above, the satisfaction has to be that of the disciplinary authority, under clause (c) it is that of the President or the Governor, as the case may be. The satisfaction of the President or the Governor must be with respect to the expediency or in expediency of holding an inquiry in the interest of the security of the state. Security of state being paramount, all other interests are subordinated to it. Further the satisfaction of the President as provided for in sub-clause (c) of Clause (2) of Art. 311 must be the satisfaction of the President himself and not of any delegated authority by reason of the GOI (Allocation of Business) Rules 1961 made under Art. 77(3) of the Constitution relying on the earlier pronouncement of a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court in Jayantilal.[92]

The satisfaction mentioned here is subjective and is not circumscribed by any objective standards.[93] Whereas under Art. 311(2)(b), as stated above, the competent authority is required to record in writing the reason for its satisfaction that it is not reasonably practicable to hold an inquiry, there is no such requirement for recording the reason in Cl. (c). In this connection, the Supreme Court has observed in Tulsiram:

> "The satisfaction so reached by the President or Governor must necessarily be a subjective satisfaction. Expediency involves matters of policy. Satisfaction may be arrived at as a result of secret information received by the Government about the brewing danger to the interest of the security of the State and like

---

89. Arjun Chaubey v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1356 : (1984) 2 SCC 578; Tulsiram Patel, supra, footnote 87.
90. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Ch. XIX.
91. Workmen, Hindustan Steel Ltd. v. Hindustan Steel Ltd., AIR 1985 SC 251 : 1984 Supp SCC 554.
92. AIR 1964 SC 648, 656 : AIR 1971 SC 1547.
93. Jagdish v. State of Bombay, AIR 1958 Bom 283; Mohd. Hyder v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1960 AP 479.

> matters. There may be other factors which may be required to be considered, weighed and balanced in order to reach the requisite satisfaction whether holding an inquiry would be expedient or not…."

In Bk. Sardari Lal v. Union of India,[1] the Supreme Court ruled that under this constitutional provision, 'satisfaction' must be that of the President or Governor personally and that that function could not be allocated or delegated to any one else. But this view was overruled in Shamsher Singh,[2] and Sripati Ranjan.[3] Thus, 'personal satisfaction' of the President or the Governor is not necessary to dispense with the inquiry. Such 'satisfaction' may be arrived at by any one authorized under the Rules of Business.[4] It is the satisfaction of the President or the Governor in the constitutional sense.

Under (c), enquiry can be dispensed with only when it is not expedient to hold it 'in the interest of the security of the state.' 'Security of state' may comprise a situation of disobedience and insubordination on the part of members of the police force. As the Supreme Court has clarified in Tulsiram Patel,[5] the question is not whether the security of the state has been affected or not, for the expression used in Cl. (c) is "in the interest of the security of the state". The interest of the security of the state may be affected by actual act, or even the likelihood of such acts taking place. So, the Court has observed: "What is required under clause (c) is not the satisfaction of the President or the Governor ....., that the interest of the security of the state is or will be affected but his satisfaction that in the interest of the security of the state, it is not expedient to hold an inquiry as contemplated by Article 311(2)." This means that the satisfaction of the President/Governor must be with respect to the expediency or inexpediency of holding an inquiry "in the interest of the security of the state".

The scope of judicial review under Cl. (c) is much more restrictive than under Cl. (b). The scope of judicial review under (c) has thus been defined by the Supreme Court in these words:[6]

> "….an order passed under Cl. (c) of the second proviso to Art. 311(2) is subject to judicial review and its validity can be examined by the Court on the ground that the satisfaction of the President or the Governor is vitiated by mala fides or is based on wholly extraneous or irrelevant grounds…."

The Government must disclose to the Court the nature of the activities of the employee on the basis of which the satisfaction of the President or the Governor was arrived at for the purpose of passing an order under Art. 311(2)(c) "so that the Court or tribunal may be able to determine whether the said activities could be regarded as having a reasonable nexus with the interest of the security of the state." In the absence of any indication about the nature of the activities, it would not be possible for the Court to determine whether the satisfaction was arrived at on the basis of relevant consideration. The government is obliged to place before the Court relevant material on the basis of which the satisfaction was arrived at subject to a claim of privilege under Ss. 123 and 124 of the Evidence Act.

---

1. AIR 1971 SC 1547 : (1971) 1 SCC 411.
2. Supra, Sec. C(c).
3. Supra, Sec. C(c).
4. Supra, Chs. III and VII.
5. Supra, footnote 87.
6. A.K. Kaul v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1403, 1414-1415 : (1995) 4 SCC 73.

The Supreme Court has clarified in Union of India v. Tulsiram Patel[7] that in none of the situations described in (a), (b), (c) above, there is to be held any inquiry or hearing as Art. 311(2) does not apply. The second proviso to Art. 311(2) has been inserted in the Constitution "as a matter of public policy and in public interest and for public good." "The second proviso expressly mentions that clause (2) shall not apply where one of the clauses of that proviso becomes applicable. This express mention excludes everything that clause (2) contains and there can be no scope for once again introducing the opportunities provided by clause (2) or any of them into the second proviso."

The Supreme Court has also refused to imply natural justice therein because it is expressly excluded by the opening words of the second proviso. Art. 14 cannot be invoked to imply natural justice in any of these three situations because Art. 311(2) is expressly excluded by the opening words of the second proviso. However, if any of the above three clauses is applied on extraneous grounds or a ground having no relation to the situation envisaged in that clause, the action in so applying it would be mala fide, and, therefore, void. "In such a case the invalidating factor may be referable to Art. 14."[8]

The Court has ruled that even the service rules made under Art. 309 cannot liberalize the exclusionary effect of the second proviso. The reason is that the rule-making power under Art. 309 is subject to Art. 311. Any rule contravening Art. 311(1) or 311(2) would be invalid.

To reach the above conclusion, the Court has overruled its earlier decision in Challappan[9] from which it could be inferred that under the three above clauses, a limited enquiry ought to be held on the question of nature and extent of the penalty to be imposed. Also, Challappan raised the possibility of service rules conferring a right of hearing on a delinquent government servant in the three situations mentioned in (a), (b), (c) above. On both these grounds, the Court has now overruled Challappan.

Rules cannot do what the second proviso to Art. 311(2) denies. Rules cannot restrict the exclusionary impact of the second proviso to Art. 311(2) "because that would be to impose a restriction upon the pleasure under Art. 310(1) which has become free of the restrictions placed upon it by clause 2 of Art. 311 by reason of the operation of the second proviso to that clause." Also, the Court has now ruled: "Considerations of fair play and justice requiring a hearing to be given to a government servant with respect to the penalty proposed to be imposed upon him do not enter into the picture when the second proviso to Art. 311(2) comes into play and the same would be the position in the case of a service rule reproducing the second proviso in whole or in part and whether the language used is identical with that used in the second proviso or not."

The Tulsiram Patel ruling has been applied in the following fact-situations under Art. 311(2)(b):

---

7. Supra, footnote 87.

8. On Art. 14 and Administrative Process, see, supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. D.
Also see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, Ch. XVII.

9. Divisional Personnel Officer, S. Rly. v. T.R. Chellappan, (1976) 1 SCR 783 : AIR 1975 SC 2216.

(i) Certain employees of the Research and Analysis Wing (RAW) were dismissed from service under Art. 311(2), second proviso, clause (b), without holding an inquiry. These orders were challenged as mala fide. It was argued that the reasons given therein for dispensing with the inquiry were not true and that an inquiry was reasonably practicable. The facts were that a large number of employees of RAW had been indulging in various acts of misconduct, indiscipline, intimidation and insubordination and had resorted to coercion, intimidation and incitement of other fellow employees.

The said employees were dismissed without an inquiry for the following reasons. Because of coercion and intimidation by them, no witness would co-operate if an inquiry were held against them and, therefore, the concerned disciplinary authority was satisfied that the circumstances were such that it was not reasonably practicable to hold a regular enquiry.

Applying the Tulsiram Patel ruling to the facts of the case, the Supreme Court upheld the impugned order of dismissal in Satyavir Singh v. Union of India[10] saying that clause (b) of the second proviso to Art. 311 was properly applied in the facts of the case. As held in Tulsiram Patel, "it will not be reasonably practicable to hold an inquiry where an atmosphere of violence or of general indiscipline and insubordination prevails." In the situation then prevailing, prompt and urgent action was required to bring the situation under control.

(ii) A large number of the members of the Central Industrial Security Force (CISF) stationed at Bokaro Steel Plant staged an agitation which assumed an aggravated form for recognition of their association. They indulged in agitational acts and violent indiscipline so much so that the army had to be called out. There was exchange of fire between the army and the CISF personnel resulting in a number of deaths. A large number of the members of the CISF were dismissed by applying cl. (b) of the second proviso to Art. 311(2). It was believed that any inquiry under Art. 311(2) would be dangerous and counter-productive. The Court held that clause (b) was properly applied in the fact-situation.

(iii) Railway employees staged an illegal strike. A number of employees belonging to the all-India loco-running staff were dismissed by applying clause (b) as they were concerned in incidents in furtherance of the strike. Railway services being vital to the country, railway is a public utility service. The Court ruled that clause (b) was properly applied in their case.

(iv) Members of the Madhya Pradesh Police Force stationed at the annual mela at Gwalior indulged in violent behaviour and rioting. Some of the active leaders were dismissed by applying clause (c). The orders were issued by the Governor on the advice of the Council of Ministers. Police are the guardians of law and order but they themselves turned into law breakers.

---

10. (1985) 4 SCC 252 : AIR 1986 SC 555.

The Court ruled that clause (c) was rightly applied as the situation was such that prompt and urgent action was necessary and holding of an inquiry into the conduct of the dismissed members of the police force would not have been expedient in the interest of the security of the State.

(v) A sub-inspector of police was dismissed by the Senior Superintendent of Police after dispensing with the inquiry invoking proviso (b) to clause (2) of Art. 311. The order of dismissal recited that "it is not reasonably practicable to hold an inquiry" against the said sub-inspector "for the reason that the witnesses cannot come forward freely to depose against him in a regular departmental inquiry."

The order was challenged but the same was upheld by the Supreme Court. After looking into the facts of the case, the Court concluded that the Senior Superintendent of Police "cannot be said to be not justified in holding that it is not reasonably practicable to hold an inquiry against the sub-inspector."[11]

(vi) A head constable of police in the service of the Punjab Government was dismissed from service without holding an enquiry as contemplated by Art. 311(2). The Senior Superintendent of Police invoked Art. 311(2)(b) dispensing with the inquiry on the ground that it was not reasonably practicable to hold such an inquiry. The constable had links with terrorists, was mixed up with them and was supplying secret information to them. It was impossible to hold an inquiry as nobody would come forward to depose against such "militant police official". He was also preparing to murder senior police officials. In a confession, he had admitted his links with terrorists. The Court found these reasons for dispensing with the enquiry quite acceptable and ruled that the satisfaction not to hold the inquiry was not unjustified or unwarranted.[12]

(vii) Insofar as Cl. (b) is concerned, two conditions must be satisfied to sustain action thereunder, viz., (i) there must exist a situation which renders holding of any inquiry "not reasonably practicable"; and (ii) the disciplinary authority must record in writing its reasons in support of its satisfaction and other surrounding circumstances. This means that the question of reasonable practicability must be judged in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the date of the passing of the order.

The decision not to hold the enquiry cannot rest solely on the ipse dixit of the concerned authority. It is incumbent on the concerned authority when the decision not to hold the inquiry is questioned in a Court, to show that its 'satisfaction' is based on certain objective facts and is not the outcome of the whim or caprice of the concerned officer. "Clause (b) of the second proviso to Art. 311(2) can be invoked only when the authority is satisfied from the material placed before

---

11. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 1203 : (1997) 3 SCC 433.
12. Kuldip Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 79 : (1996) 10 SCC 659.

him that it is not reasonably practicable to hold a departmental inquiry."

In Jaswant Singh,[13] the Court quashed the order of dismissal as the "subjective satisfaction" dispensing with the inquiry under Art. 311(2)(b) was not fortified by any independent material to justify the dispensing with the inquiry envisaged by Art. 311(2).

(viii) An inquiry was dispensed with and the respondent removed from service. The reason for dispensing with the inquiry was that the witnesses appearing against the employee concerned "are likely to suffer personal humiliation and insults thereafter and even they and their family members may become targets of acts of violence".

The Supreme Court considered this reason for dispensing with the inquiry as "totally irrelevant and totally insufficient in law." "There is total absence of sufficient material or good grounds for dispensing with the inquiry."[14]

The interpretation of the Second Proviso to Art. 311(2) now adopted by the Supreme Court in Tulsiram Patel no doubt strengthens the hands of the government to take disciplinary action against its servants in cases of grave misconduct. As MADON, J., delivering the majority opinion of the Court said, it could not possibly have been the intention of the Constitution-makers to grant immunity from summary dismissal to dishonest or corrupt government servants so that they may continue in service for months together "at public expense and to public detriment." But, at the same time, care has been taken by the Court to ensure that the power is not misused through a limited judicial review and departmental appeal.

The Supreme Court has upheld the order passed under Art. 311(2)(c) inter alia in the following situations.

(i) In A.K. Kaul v. Union of India.[15] The appellant was employed as Deputy Central Intelligence Officer in the Intelligence Bureau in the Ministry of Home Affairs, Govt. of India. The employees in the Intelligence Bureau formed an Association and the appellant was elected as its general secretary. He was dismissed from service without holding an enquiry under Art. 311(2)(c). The President was satisfied, said the order, that "in the interest of the security of the State it is not expedient to hold an inquiry" in his case. Having regard to the facts and circumstances of the case, the Court refused to hold that the order was mala fide or was based on wholly extraneous or irrelevant grounds.

(ii) In Union of India v. Balbir Singh,[16] the respondent who was one of the accused in the assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi wad dismissed from Delhi Police without holding an inquiry. The dismissal was based on the recommendations of a High-Powered Committee of advisors constituted according to the directive of the Central Government. The Committee considered information and documents collected by the Intelligence Bureau having a bearing on the security of the state.

---

13. Jaswant Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1991 SC 385 : (1991) 1 SCC 362.
14. Chief Security Officer v. Singasan Rabi Das, AIR 1991 SC 1043 : (1991) 1 SCC 729.
15. AIR 1995 SC 1403 : (1995) 4 SCC 73.
16. AIR 1998 SC 2043 : (1998) 5 SCC 216.

The Court upheld the dismissal observing that this was not a case where there was absolutely no material relating to the activities of the respondent prejudicial to the security of state. Though the respondent was acquitted in criminal trial against him, yet the material placed before the committee was not confined to the assassination only; it related to various other activities of the respondent as well, which the authorities considered as prejudicial to the security of the state and, therefore, acquittal did not make any difference to the order which was passed by the President on the totality of material which was before the authorities long prior to the conclusion of the criminal trial.

Article 311(3) runs as follows:

> "If, in respect of any such person as aforesaid, a question arises whether it is reasonably practicable to hold such inquiry as is referred to in Clause (2), the decision thereon of the authority empowered to discuss or remove such person or to reduce him in rank shall be final."

This finality clause refers mainly to the situation covered by Art. 311(2)(b), proviso II, mentioned above. The Supreme Court has however ruled that Art. 311(3) does not completely bar judicial review of the action taken under Cls. 2(b) of Art. 311, second proviso.

The Supreme Court has commented on this aspect in Tulsiram in the following words:

> "The finality given by clause (3) of Art. 311 to the disciplinary authority's decision that it was not reasonably practicable to hold the inquiry is not binding upon the Court. The Court will also examine the charge of mala fides, if any, made in the writ petition. In examining the relevancy of the reasons, the Court will consider the situation which according to the disciplinary authority made it come to the conclusion that it was not reasonably practicable to hold the inquiry. If the Court finds that the reasons are irrelevant then the recording of its satisfaction by the disciplinary authority would be an abuse of power conferred upon it by clause (b) and would take the case out of the purview of that clause and the impugned order of penalty would stand invalidated. In considering the relevancy of the reasons given by the disciplinary authority, the Court will not however, sit in judgment over them, like a Court of first appeal."

The Supreme Court has reiterated the proposition in Jaswant Singh v. State of Punjab,[17] that in spite of Art. 311(3) the "finality can certainly be tested in a Court of law and interfered with if the action is found to be arbitrary or mala fide or motivated by extraneous considerations or merely a ruse to dispense with the inquiry.[18]

Even the President's satisfaction under Cl. (c), mentioned above, can be examined by the Court on such grounds as mala fides, or being based wholly on extraneous and/or irrelevant grounds.

Even if some of the material on which the action is taken is found to be irrelevant, the Court would still not interfere so long as there is some relevant material sustaining the action. The Court will not question the truth or correctness of the

---

17. AIR 1991 SC 385 : (1991) 1 SCC 362.

18. Also see, Satyavir Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 555 : (1985) 4 SCC 252; Shivaji Atmaji Sawant v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1986 SC 617 : (1986) 2 SCC 112; Ikramuddin Ahmad Borah v. Supdt. of Police, Darrang, AIR 1988 SC 2245 : 1988 Supp SCC 643; Kuldip Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 79, 82 : (1996) 10 SCC 659.

material nor will it go into the question of adequacy of the material; the Court will not substitute its own opinion for that of the President.

The ground of mala fides includes inter alia situations where the order is found to be a clear case of abuse of power or fraud on power. The Court does not lightly presume abuse or misuse of power as it will make allowance for the fact that the President and the Council of Ministers are the best judge of the situation and that they possess information and material and the Constitution trusts their judgment in the matter, but still they do not become the final arbiter in the matter or that their opinion is conclusive.[19]

The Supreme Court has ruled in Balbir,[20] as regards clause (c) that the Court can examine the circumstances on which the satisfaction of the President/Governor is based. If the Court finds that the said circumstances have no bearing whatsoever on the security of the state, the Court can hold that the satisfaction of the President/ Governor which is required for passing such an order has been vitiated by wholly extraneous or irrelevant considerations.

I. OTHER INCIDENTS OF GOVERNMENT SERVICE

Article 311(2) refers to three incidents of government service, viz., dismissal, removal and reduction in rank. But there are many other incidents of government service besides the above mentioned three incidents. An effort is made to throw some light on these other incidents of government service which fall outside the purview of Art. 311(2).[21]

It is the Executive which lays down the conditions of service subject to any law made by the Legislature. The Executive can prescribe the conditions of service subject to any law made by the Legislature and the Executive can do so either by making rules under the proviso to Art. 309[22], or by issuing instructions in exercise of its executive power.

The function of the Courts in the area of Service Law is to ensure rule of law and to ensure that the Executive acts fairly and gives a fair deal to its employees consistent with Arts. 14 and 16. The state ought not to exploit its employees. The Courts ensure that the Executive observes the statutory provisions, rules and instructions, if any, regulating the conditions of service of government employees.[23]

(a) APPOINTMENTS

An authority has freedom to devise procedure for selecting candidates for posts under it, but it does not mean and imply that the employer can do so at the cost of "fairplay, good conscience and equity."[24]

It is the prerogative of the Executive to create and abolish a post. Demarcation of cadres or gradation in the same cadre on higher and lower qualifications is a

---

19. S.R. Bommai v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 1918 : (1994) 3 SCC 1; A.K. Kaul v. Union of India, supra, footnote 15.
20. Union of India v. Balbir Singh, AIR 1998 SC 2043 : (1998) 5 SCC 216.
21. This portion may be read along with the material in Ch. XXIII, Sec. B, supra, under Art. 16.
22. On Art. 309, see, supra, Sec. B.
23. State of Haryana v. Piara Singh, AIR 1992 SC 2130 : (1992) 4 SCC 118.
24. Praveen Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 2001 SC 152 : (2000) 8 SCC 633.

common phenomenon for fixing hierarchy in service. It is a valid basis of classification.[25]

When the Government proposes to constitute a new service, it is fully within its competence to decide as a matter of policy the sources from which the personnel required for manning the service are to be drawn.[26]

The State indisputably, subject to the constitutional limitations having regard to its power contained in the proviso appended to Article 309 of the Constitution of India, is entitled to frame rules laying down the mode and manner in which vacancies are to be filled up. If the State has the legislative competence to frame rules, indisputably, it can issue governmental orders in exercise of its power under Article 162 of the Constitution of India.[27]

The selection committee functions according to the Service Rules. It has no inherent jurisdiction to lay down the norms for selection nor can such power be assumed by necessary implication.[28]

The Government can create civil posts and fill them up according to executive instructions consistent with Arts. 14 and 16.[29] Existence of statutory rules is not necessary for the purpose. But once the rules for recruitment have been made, the appointments have to be made according to the rules. The executive power can only be used to supplement, and not supplant, the rules.

Under Art. 320, it is not necessary for the Government to make all appointments through the Public Service Commission. [30] But the procedure prescribed for the purpose should be just, fair and reasonable. An opportunity is to be given to eligible persons by inviting applications through public notifications.

Appointments made in violation of the recruitment rules violate Arts. 14 and 16.[31] The Supreme Court has insisted again and again that the recruitment rules made under Art. 309 must be followed strictly. If these rules are disregarded, it will open a back-door for illegal recruitment without limit.[32] Recently, the Supreme Court has observed:[33]

> "The decisions of this Court have recently been requiring strict conformity with the recruitment rules for direct recruits and promotees. The view is that there can be no relaxation of the basic or fundamental rules of recruitment."[34]

---

25. State of Mysore v. P. Narasinga Rao, AIR 1968 SC 349 : (1968) 1 SCR 407; Union of India v. Dr. (Mrs.) S.B. Kohli, AIR 1973 SC 811 : (1973) 3 SCC 592; State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Triloki Nath Khosa, AIR 1974 SC 1 : (1974) 1 SCC 19; K. Narayanan v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1994 SC 55 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 44.

26. S.S. Moghe v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 1495.

27. Andhra Pradesh Public Service Commission v. Baloji Badhavath, (2009) 5 SCC 1 : (2009) 5 JT 563.

28. Ramachandra Iyer v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 541; Umesh Chandra Shukla v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 1351 : (1985) 3 SCC 721; Durgacharan Misra v. State of Orissa, AIR 1987 SC 2267 : (1987) 4 SCC 646.

29. See, supra, Chs. XXI and XXIII.

30. For Art. 320, see, infra, Sec. K.

31. State of Orissa v. S. Mohapatra, (1993) 2 SCC 486; State of J&K Public Service Comm. v. Narinder Mohan, AIR 1994 SC 1808 : (1994) 2 SCC 630.

32. Dr. Arundhati Ajit Pargaonkar v. Maharashtra, AIR 1995 SC 962 : 1994 Supp (3) SCC 380.

33. Suraj Parkash Gupta v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 2000 SC 2386 : (2000) 7 SCC 561.

34. See, for example, Keshav Chandra Joshi v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 284 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 272; State of Orissa v. Sukanti Mohapatra, AIR 1993 SC 1650 : (1993) 2 SCC 486; J&K Public Service Comm. v. Dr. Narinder Mohan, AIR 1994 SC 1808; Dr. M. A. Haque v. Union of India, (1993) 2 SCC 213 : 1993 SCC (L&S) 412.

It is common experience that it is a vicious circle that initially governments impose ban on recruitment, and then make massive ad hoc appointments de hors the rules giving a go by to making appointments in accordance with the rules. Thereafter the governments resort to regularisation of such appointments exercising the power under Art. 320(3) proviso[35] or Art. 162[36] to make them regular members of the service. The Supreme Court has expressed its unhappiness at such practice in these words:[37]

> "This practice not only violates the mandates of Arts. 14 and 16 but also denies to all eligible candidates their legitimate right to apply for and stand for selection and get selected."

The Court has ruled that regularisation in violation of the statutory rules is not permissible, in exercise of the executive power of the State which has the effect of overriding the rules framed under Art. 309. No regularisation in exercise of executive power under Art. 162, in contravention of the statutory rules is permissible.[38] The Supreme Court has insisted that once the rules are framed under Art. 309, the actions of the government in respect of matters covered by the rules should be regulated by these rules.[39]

The selection by the Commission of a candidate for appointment to a post is only a recommendation and the final authority for appointment is the Government. The Commission's selection is only recommendatory. This means that the Government is free to accept or decline to accept the recommendation made by the Commission. But if the Government chooses not to accept the Commission's recommendation, then the Constitution enjoins the Government under Art. 323 to place on the table of Parliament or State Legislature its reasons for doing so. The Government is made answerable to the Legislature for any departure from the Commission's recommendations, vide Art. 323.[40] The candidates, as such, gets no right to appointment pursuant to the Commission's recommendation.

The Government must make appointments in order of merit fixed by the Commission. The Government cannot disturb the order of merit according to its own sweet will except for other good reasons, viz., bad conduct or character. The Government cannot also appoint any one whose name is not on the recommended list. The Government decides as to how many appointments it will make. The Government decides as to how many appointments it will make.

The Government is not required by Art. 323 to give its reasons to the Commission for departing from its recommendations. All that Art. 323 requires is that along with the report of the Commission, a memorandum containing the reasons for declining to accept the recommendation of the Commission ought to be placed before the Legislature. The Government should place the reasons for not accepting the Commission's recommendations on the file so that it can produce the same in the Court as and when called upon to do so. The Government can

---

35. See, infra, Sec. K.
36. See, supra, Ch. VII, Sec. B.
37. K.C. Joshi v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 284; V. Sreenivasa Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1995 SC 586 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 572.
38. B.N. Nagarajan v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1979 SC 1676 : (1979) 4 SCC 507. Also see, Subedar Singh v. District Judge, Mirzapur, AIR 2001 SC 201 : (2001) 1 SCC 37.
39. A.K. Bhatnagar v. Union of India, (1991) 1 SCC 544.
40. See, infra, Sec. K.

take into consideration any developments which may take place after the Commission has made its recommendations.[41]

A candidate on making an application for a post pursuant to an advertisement does not acquire any vested right of selection or appointment to the post in question.[42] A candidate who is eligible and otherwise qualified in accordance with the rules and the terms of the advertisement acquires a vested right of being considered for selection in accordance with the rules as they existed on the date of the advertisement. He cannot be deprived of this limited right during the pendency of selection unless the rules are amended with retrospective effect.[43]

Mere inclusion of the name of a candidate in the list of selected candidates does not confer any right on him to be appointed unless the relevant rules so indicate.[44] He could feel aggrieved at his non-appointment if the Administration does so either arbitrarily or for no bona fide or valid reason. The Supreme Court has clarified the position in this regard thus: [45]

> "It is not correct to say that if a number of vacancies are notified for appointment and adequate number of candidates are found fit, the successful candidates acquire an indefeasible right to be appointed which cannot be legitimately denied. Ordinarily the notification merely amounts to an invitation to qualified candidates to apply for recruitment and on their selection they do not acquire any right to the post. Unless the relevant recruitment rules so indicate, the state is under no legal duty to fill up all or any of the vacancies. However it does not mean that the state has the licence of acting in an arbitrary manner. The decision not to fill up the vacancies has to be taken bona fide for appropriate reasons. And if the vacancies or any of them are filled up, the state is bound to respect the comparative merit of the candidates as reflected at the recruitment test, and no discrimination can be permitted".[46]

The Supreme Court has however ruled that when the list of selected candidates is challenged through a writ petition, it is necessary to make these candidates as parties, or to implead some of them in a representative capacity, if their number is very large. The selected candidates may not have a vested right to be appointed, they surely are interested in defending the select list; setting aside the list will affect them adversely. Natural justice demands that any person who may be adversely affected by a Court order should have an opportunity of being heard.[47]

---

41. Jatinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, AIR 1984 SC 1850 : (1985) 1 SCC 122; H. Mukherjee v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 495; Mrs. Asha Kaul v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, (1993) 2 JT (SC) 688 : (1993) 2 SCC 573.

42. Jatinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, AIR 1984 SC 1850 : (1985) 1 SCC 122.

43. N.T. Devin Katti v. State of Karnataka PSC, AIR 1990 SC 1233 : (1990) 3 SCC 157.
Also see, S.N. Nagarajan v. State of Mysore, AIR 1966 SC 1942 : (1966) 3 SCR 682; P. Ganeshwar Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1988 SC 2068 : 1988 Supp SCC 740; P. Mahendra v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1990 SC 405.

44. Union Territory of Chandigarh v. Dilbagh Singh, (1993) 1 SCC 154 : AIR 1993 SC 796.

45. Shankarasan Dash v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1612 : (1991) 3 SCC 47.

46. See, State of Haryana v. Subhash Chander Marwaha, AIR 1973 SC 2216 : (1974) 3 SCC 220; Neelima Shangla v. State of Haryana, AIR 1987 SC 169 : (1986) 4 SCC 268; Jatinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, AIR 1984 SC 1850 : (1985) 1 SCC 122; Union of India v. Ishwar Singh Khatri, 1992 Supp (3) SCC 84 : 1992 SCC (L&S) 1999; All India SC and ST Employees Association v. A. Arthur Jeen, AIR 2001 SC 1851 : (2001) 6 SCC 380.

47. Prabodh Verma v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 167; A.M.S. Sushanth v. M. Sujatha, (2000) 10 SCC 197; All India SC and ST Employees Ass. v. A. Arthur Jeen, AIR 2001 SC 1851 : (2001) 6 SCC 380.

A panel of select candidates can be kept operative for a reasonable time. A long waiting list cannot be kept in infinitum in view of the principle "infinitum injure reprobatur".[48] The reason for limiting the life of the waiting list is to ensure that other qualified candidates are not deprived of their chance to apply for the posts in succeeding years and be selected for appointment.

In the following case,[49] select list was prepared on the basis of merit in the examination without any qualifying marks. All those who wrote the examination were ranked in the list. These candidates claimed that they had a right to be appointed and that no fresh list be prepared till this list was exhausted. The Supreme Court rejected their contention observing that empanelment is, at best, a condition of eligibility and by itself confers no indefeasible right on the candidates so listed unless the rules do so provide.

For appointment to the posts of presiding officers of the labour Courts, the minimum qualification prescribed was five years' practice. While short-listing the candidates for viva voce, the candidates with 7½ years practice were selected. This was held to be valid by the Supreme Court in M.P. Public Service Commission v. Navnit Kumar Potdar.[50] This did not amount to changing the statutory criteria. A person with more practice experience is maturer. The fixing of limit at 7½ years instead of five cannot be said to be "irrational, arbitrary having no nexus with the object to select the best among the applicants."

In Krishn Yadav v. State of Haryana,[51] the Supreme Court found the process of selection by the subordinate selection board to be arbitrary, vitiated by fraud and motivated by extraneous considerations. The process of selection was quashed with the remark that "it is stinking" and "conceived in fraud."

175 candidates were appointed as assistant teachers, but before they could join, the Deputy Development Commissioner cancelled the orders of appointment on the ground that the appointing authority had no power to make these appointments. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court ruled that these appointees ought to have been given a hearing before their appointments were cancelled.[52]

Where a temporary or ad hoc appointment is continued for long, the Court presumes that there is need and warrant for a regular post and may accordingly direct regularization. 50,000 persons were being employed by the State on daily-rated or monthly-rated basis for over 20 years. The Court ordered the regularisation of all workers who had completed 10 years of service.[53]

Normally, as stated above, an appointment made in violation of the Service Rules is regarded as invalid and is quashed by the Courts. As the Supreme Court has observed: "It is well settled that where recruitment to service is regulated by

---

48. Babita Prasad v. State of Bihar,, 1993 Supp (3) SCC 268 : (1993) 1 SLR 44.

49. State of Bihar v. Secretariat Assistant Successful Examinees Union, 1986, (1994) 1 SCC 126 : AIR 1994 SC 736.
Also N. Mohanan v. State of Kerala, AIR 1997 SC 1896 : (1997) 2 SCC 556.

50. AIR 1995 SC 77.
Also see, Haryana v. Subash Chander Marwaha, AIR 1973 SC 2216 : (1974) 3 SCC 220.

51. AIR 1994 SC 2166 : (1994) 4 SCC 165.

52. Uttar Pradesh v. Girish Bihari, AIR 1997 SC 1354 : (1997) 4 SCC 362.

53. Dharwad District P.W.D. Literate Daily Wage Employees Association v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1990 SC 883 : (1990) 2 SCC 396.
Also see, Jacob v. Kerala Water Authority, AIR 1990 SC 2228; State of Haryana v. Piara Singh, AIR 1992 SC 2130 : (1992) 4 SCC 118.

the statutory rules, recruitment must be made in accordance with those rules, any appointment made in breach of rules would be illegal."[54]

In several cases, such appointments have been set aside even if it means uprooting of persons after appointment. But the Supreme Court has taken this unpalatable step because it has felt that "if equality and equal protection before the law have any meaning and if our public institutions are to inspire that confidence which is expected of them we would be failing in our duty if we did not, even at the cost of considerable inconvenience to Government and the selected candidates, do the right thing."[55]

But, on the other hand, there are cases where the Supreme Court has desisted from quashing irregular appointments on humanitarian considerations, such as, the incumbent has been holding the post for a long period.[56] In Rafiquddin,[57] appointment of Judges was made against the rules. The appointments were made in 1975. The Supreme Court did not strike down these appointments "having regard to the period of 12 years that have elapsed."

In the following case,[58] even appointments made in contravention of Art. 16 by allotting higher marks than warranted for the viva voce test, were not quashed by the Supreme Court, as the selected candidates had already joined the posts long back.

(b) CONFIDENTIAL REPORTS

No statutory rules have been made so far under Art. 309 regulating the award of entries in the character roll of a Central or State Government employees. Accordingly, the entire field is regulated by administrative directions.

Under these directions, the character rolls of government servants are maintained. Every year, entries are made in these rolls by superior competent authorities regarding the work, conduct and character of government servants. These entries are confidential in nature. These entries contain the assessment of the work and conduct of each government servant, reflecting his efficiency or defect in his work and conduct. If any penalty has been imposed on a government servant, it is mentioned in these entries. These entries are important as they constitute the foundation on which the career of an employee is based and is made or marred.

On the basis of these entries, a government servant's suitability to the office is assessed for the purpose of his confirmation, promotion and even for retention in service. The purpose of writing confidential reports is two fold—(1) to give an opportunity to the officer to remove deficiencies and to inculcate discipline; (2) it seeks to serve improvement of quality and excellence and efficiency of public service.

Any adverse entries against a government servant are communicated to him with a view to inform him regarding the deficiencies in his work and conduct and

---

54. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Rafiquddin, AIR 1988 SC 162, 176 : 1987 Supp SCC 401.
55. C. Channabasavaiah v. State of Mysore, AIR 1965 SC 1293.
Also, Umesh Chandra Shukla v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 1351 : (1985) 3 SCC 721.
56. See, for example, Shainda Hasan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1381; H.C. Puttaswamy v. High Court, AIR 1991 SC 295 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 421.
57. Supra, footnote 54.
58. Vikram Singh v. Subordinate Services Selection Board, AIR 1999 SC 1011 : (1991) 1 SCC 686.

afford him an opportunity to make, amend, and improve in his work and, further, if the entries are not justified the communication affords him an opportunity to make representation.

The Supreme Court has observed in this connection:[59]

> "the object of writing the confidential reports or character roll of a Government servant and communication of the adverse remarks is to afford an opportunity to the concerned officer to make amends to his remiss; to reform himself; to amend his conduct and to be disciplined, to do hard work, to bring home his lapse in his integrity and character so that he corrects himself and improves the efficiency in public service. The entries, therefore, require an objective assessment of the work and conduct of a government servant…."

The employee can make a representation against any adverse entry awarded to him. If the competent authority feels that the remarks are justified, he may reject the employer's representation and inform him accordingly. But if he finds the adverse remarks not justified, unfounded or incorrect, he may expunge the same. This means that the adverse remarks ought to be communicated to the employee concerned as soon as possible. If the adverse remarks are communicated to the employee after several years, then the object of communicating the same is lost. In this connection, the Supreme Court has observed in Baidyanath Mahapatra v. State of Orissa:[60]

> "It is therefore imperative that the adverse entries awarded to a government servant must be communicated to him within a reasonable period to afford him opportunity to improve his work and conduct and also to make representation in the event of the entry being unjustified."

There is no rule that before an adverse entry is recorded in the character roll, an opportunity of hearing must be given to the concerned employee.[61] There is no rule or principle that the competent authority ought to give reasons for rejecting the employee's representation. The competent authority is obligated to consider the employee's representation in a fair and just manner and if thereafter the representation is rejected, the order of rejection would not be invalid merely because of the absence of reasons. In case the order rejecting the employee's representation is challenged in a Court, the competent authority can always place the reasons before the Court for rejecting the representation.[62]

In view of the importance of the confidential and character rolls on the career of the employee, the Supreme Court has emphasized that these be written by superior officers higher above the cadres. The officer should show objectivity, impartiality, and fair assessment without any prejudices whatsoever with the highest sense of responsibility to inculcate devotion to duty, honestly and integrity to improve excellence of the individual officer.

It is for the employer to prescribe the officer competent to write the confidentials but he should be a superior officer of high rank lest the employees get demoralised which would be deleterious to the efficacy and efficiency of public

---

59. Swatantar Singh v. State of Haryana, AIR 1997 SC 2105 : (1997) 4 SCC 14.
60. AIR 1989 SC 2218, 2221 : (1989) 4 SCC 664.
61. R.L. Butail v. Union of India, (1970) 2 SCC 876 : (1970) 2 LLJ 514; Maj. Gen. I.P.S. Dewan v. Union of India, (1995) 3 SCC 383 : (1995) SCC (L&S) 691; Ramachandra Raju v. State of Orissa, (1994) Supp (3) SCC 424 : 1995 SCC (L&S) 74; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Yamuna Shanker Misra, AIR 1997 SC 3671 : (1997) 4 SCC 7.
62. Union of India v. E.G. Nambudri, AIR 1991 SC 1216 : (1991) 3 SCC 38.

service. There should be another higher officer in rank above the one writing the confidential report to review such report. The appointing authority or any equivalent officer would be competent to approve the confidential reports or character rolls.[63]

In a recent case,[64] the Supreme Court has again explained that the confidential reports of an officer "are basically the performance appraisal of the said officer and go to constitute vital service record in relation to his career advancement. Any adverse remark in the CRs could mar the entire career of that officer". The Court has therefore emphasized that:

> "it is necessary that in the event of a remark being called for in the Confidential Records, the authority directing such remark must first come to the conclusion that the fact-situation is such that it is imperative to make such remarks to set right the wrong committed by the officer concerned. A decision in this regard must be taken objectively after careful consideration of all the materials which are before the authority directing the remarks being entered in the C.Rs."

In the instant case, the direction entering adverse remarks against a sessions Court judge by the High Court was quashed by the Supreme Court as having been based on no material. In another case,[65] adverse entries against a subordinate judge were quashed by the High Court as being "unjustified, arbitrary and based on non-existent facts".

(c) CONFIRMATION OF A PROBATIONER

The usual practice is that a person is appointed on probation against a permanent post and is confirmed after the lapse of the period of probation. At times, the employee may not be con-firmed after the lapse of the period of probation. A question then arises as to what is the status of such an employee—is he still to be regarded as being on probation or having been confirmed automatically?

The judicial decisions on this point have been varying depending upon the specific rules/regulations and the scheme underlying them.

A person appointed on probation for a specified period does not ipso facto stand confirmed after the lapse of the period of probation unless a specific order of confirmation is made. The period of probation can be extended if the relevant rules so permit, i.e., if the rules do not prescribe any period of probation, or if the rules prescribe only a minimum and not maximum period for the purpose. Allowing a probationer to continue in the post beyond the period of probation, without an order of confirmation, only means that by implication his period of probation has been extended and he acquires no substantive right to hold the post.

There is no right in a government servant to the confirmed merely because he has completed his period of probation. The Supreme Court has ruled out the proposition of automatic confirmation on completion of the period of probation. The permanent status can be acquired only by a specific order confirming the employee on the post held by him on probation. The function of confirmation

---

63. State Bank of India v. Kashinath Kher, AIR 1996 SC 1328, 1333-34 : (1996) 8 SCC 762.
Also, High Court of Judicature at Allahabad v. Sarnam Singh, AIR 2000 SC 2150 : (2000) 2 SCC 339.

64. P.K. Shastri v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 3273 : (1959) 7 SCC 329.

65. High Court of Judicature at Allahabad v. Sarnam Singh, AIR 2000 SC 2150 : (2000) 2 SCC 339.

implies the exercise of judgment by the confirming authority on the overall suitability of the employee for permanent absorption in service.[66] Therefore, termination after expiry of probation is not invalid. The Supreme Court has observed in this connection:[67]

> "….if in the rule or order of appointment, a period of probation is specified and a power to extend probation is also conferred and the officer is allowed to continue beyond this prescribed period of probation, he cannot be deemed to be confirmed…."

A probationer may, however, automatically stand confirmed and acquire the status of a permanent employee by lapse of probation in one of the two situations:

(1) If the service rules applicable to him expressly provide for such a result; or

(2) If the order of appointment itself stipulates that the appointee will stand confirmed at the end of the period of probation in the absence of any order to the contrary.[68]

(3) When the rule fixes the maximum period of probation, and the probation cannot be extended beyond that period, on the expiry of the prescribed period of probation.[69]

When a service rule prohibited extension of period of probation beyond three years, a probationer in a permanent post was held to have become confirmed after three years without an express order of confirmation having been passed.

In Dharam Singh,[70] under the relevant rule, after an initial period of one year's probation, the same could be extended upto a maximum period of three years. The petitioner was on probation for five years, and, thereafter, his services were terminated without an enquiry. The termination was held to be invalid as his probation could not be extended beyond four years. As the maximum period of probation was fixed by the rules, the employee must be held to be confirmed after the lapse of this period.[71] On the other hand, even when a maximum period of probation is fixed, if there is a further provision in the rules for continuation of probation beyond the maximum period, there will be no deemed confirmation in

---

66. G.S. Ramaswamy v. I.G. of State of Mysore, AIR 1966 SC 175 : (1964) 6 SCR 279; U.P. v. Akbar Ali Khan, AIR 1966 SC 1842 : (1966) 3 SCR 821; State of Punjab v. Dharam Singh, AIR 1968 SC 1210; Partap Singh v. U.T. of Chandigarh, AIR 1980 SC 57; Dhanjibhai Ramjibhai v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1985 SC 603 : (1985) 2 SCC 5; Municipal Corp. Raipur v. Ashok Kumar Misra, AIR 1991 SC 1402 : (1991) 3 SCC 325; Chandra Prakash Shahi v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 2000 SC 1706 : (2000) 5 SCC 152.

67. Karnataka State Road Transport Coprn. v. S. Manjunath, (2000) 5 SCC 250 : AIR 2000 SC 2070; Dayaram Dayal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, (1997) 7 SCC 443 : AIR 1997 SC 3269; Wasim Beg. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1998) 3 SCC 321 : 1998 SCC (L&S) 840; State of Punjab v. Baldev Singh Khosla, (1996) 9 SCC 190 : AIR 1997 SC 432.

68. Sukhbans Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1962 SC 1711; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Akbar Ali, AIR 1966 SC 1482 : (1966) 3 SCR 284.

69. Om Prakash Maurya v. U.P. Co-op. Sugar Factories Federation, AIR 1986 SC 1844; M.A. Agarwal v. Gurgaon Bank, AIR 1988 SC 286 : 1987 Supp SCC 343.

70. State of Punjab v. Dharam Singh, AIR 1968 SC 1210; S.M. Mehta, Legal status of Probationers in Government Service, 16 JILI, 104 (1974).

71. Also, Wasim Beg v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1998) 3 SCC 321 : 1998 SCC (L&S) 840.

such a case, and the probation period is deemed extended.[72] This judicial view has been consistently followed in several cases subsequently.[73]

In Samsher Singh,[74] the relevant rule provided for an initial period of probation of 2 years which could be further extended for a maximum period of one year. But there was an explanation saying that the period of probation shall be deemed extended if a subordinate judge is not confirmed on the expiry of his period of probation. The Supreme Court ruled that the explanation meant that "the provisions regarding the maximum period of probation for three years is directory and not mandatory unlike in Dharam Singh, and that a probationer is not in fact confirmed till an order of confirmation is made."

The Supreme Court has observed in Patwardhan,[75] that "confirmation is one of the inglorious uncertainties of government service depending neither on efficiency of the incumbent nor on the availability of substantive vacancies."

(d) SENIORITY

Seniority is an incident of service which cannot be eroded or curtailed by a rule which operates discriminately. A person entering government service should feel secure of equality in continuance, promotion, etc. Any executive action violating it cannot be upheld.[76]

Once an appointment is made to a post according to the service rules, the seniority of the person so appointed is to be counted from the date of his appointment and not with regard to the date of his confirmation. Where the initial appointment is only ad hoc and not according to the rules and has been made as a stop gap arrangement, the officiation in such post cannot be taken into account for considering the seniority.[77]

Appointment in accordance with the rules is a condition precedent to count seniority. Temporary, or ad hoc or fortuitous appointment, etc. is not an appointment in accordance with the rules and cannot be counted towards the seniority.[78] Therefore, seniority is to be counted from the date on which the appointee is appointed to the post in accordance with the rules, and starts discharging the duty of the post borne on the cadre, and the previous temporary service is

---

72. Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, (1974) 2 SCC 831 : AIR 1974 SC 2192; Satya Narayan Athya v. High Court of M.P., (1996) 1 SCC 560 : 1996 SCC (L&S) 338.

73. Om Prakash Maurya v. U.P. Co-op. Sugar Factories Federation, AIR 1986 SC 1844 : 1986 Supp SCC 95; M.K. Agarwal v. Gurgoan Gramin Bank, AIR 1988 SC 286 : 1987 Supp SCC 643; Dayaram Dayal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1997 SC 3269 : (1997) 7 SCC 443.

74. AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831.
Also see, Municipal Corp. Raipur v. Ashok Kumar Misra, (1991) 3 SCC 325 : AIR 1991 SC 1402.

75. S.B. Patwardhan v. Maharashtra, AIR 1977 SC 2051 : (1977) 3 SCC 399.

76. K. Narayanan v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1994 SC 55 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 44.

77. Direct Recruitment Class II Engineering Officers' Association v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1990 SC 1607; West Bengal v. Aghore Nath Dey, (1993) 3 SCC 371 : 1993 SCC (L&S) 783; S.K. Saha v.Prem Prakash Agarwal, AIR 1994 SC 745 : (1994) 1 SCC 431; O.P. Garg v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1991 SC 1202.

78. Direct Recruits, op cit.; D.N. Agrawal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1311; Excise Commr., Karnataka v. Sreekanta, (1993) AIR SCW 1740 : AIR 1993 SC 1564; V. Sreenivasa Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1995 SC 586.

to be considered as fortuitous.[79] Seniority cannot relate back to the date of temporary appointment.[80]

A temporary appointee appointed de hors the rules, or on an ad hoc basis, or in a fortuitous vacancy gets seniority from the date of regular appointment.[81]

The quintessence of the proposition is that the appointment to a post must be according to the rules and not by way of ad hoc or stop gap arrangement made due to administrative exigencies.

But along with this proposition, the Court has also stated another proposition, viz., if the initial appointment is not made by following the procedure laid down by the rules, but the appointee continues in the post for long uninterruptedly, till the regularisation of his service in accordance with the rules, the period of officiating service will be counted. Since the Government deliberately deviated from the rules and allowed the appointee to be in continuous service for well over 15 to 20 years, the Government must be deemed to have relaxed the rules.[82]

No one has a vested right to seniority but an officer has an interest in seniority acquired by working out the rules. It could be taken away only by operation of a valid law. As has been observed by the Supreme Court:[83]

> "Thus to have a particular position in the seniority list within a cadre can neither be said to be accrued or vested right of a Government servant and losing some places in the seniority list within the cadre does not amount to reduction in rank even though the future chances of promotion gets delayed thereby."

If the circumstances so require, a group of persons, can be treated as a class separate from the rest, for any preferential or beneficial treatment while fixing their seniority. But, whether such group of persons belong to a special class for any special treatment in the matter of seniority, has to be decided on objective consideration and on taking into account relevant factors which can stand the test of Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution.[84]

(e) TRANSFER

A government servant has no legal right to insist for being posted at any particular place. A person holding a transferable post has no choice in the matter of posting unless specifically provided in his service conditions. The transfer of a public servant made on administrative grounds or in public interest is not to be interfered with unless there are strong and compelling reasons rendering the

---

79. K.C. Joshi v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 284 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 272; Masood Akhtar Khan v. M.P., (1990) 4 SCC 24 : 1990 SCC (L&S) 580.

80. D.N. Agrawal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1311 : (1990) 2 SCC 553; V. Sreenivasa Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1995 SC 586, 591 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 572; Vijay Kumar Jain v. State of Madhya Pradesh, (1992) Supp. (2) SCC 95 : 1992 SCC (L&S) 627.

81. Union of India v. S.K. Sharma, AIR 1992 SC 1188 : 1992 (2) SCC 728.

82. Direct Recruits, supra, footnote 77; Narender Chadha v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 638 : (1986) 2 SCC 157; Keshav Chandra Joshi v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 284 : 1992 Supp (1) SCC 272.

83. S.S. Bola v. B.D. Sardana, AIR 1997 SC 3127 : (1997) 8 SCC 522.

84. Ram Janam Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1994 SC 1722 : (1994) 2 SCC 622.
For Arts. 14 and 16, see, Chs. XXI and XXIII, supra.

transfer order improper and unjustifiable.[85] A Court would not interfere with a bona fide order of transfer.[86]

Transfer of a government servant in a transferable service is a necessary incident of the service matter. When a government servant is transferred to an equivalent post without any adverse consequence on his service or career prospects, the scope of judicial review is very limited—it is confined only to the grounds of mala fides and violation of any specific provision or guidelines regulating such transfers amounting to arbitrariness.

A public servant is bound to comply with an order of transfer. If he has any genuine difficulty, he can make a representation against such an order; but if the initial order stands, he has to comply with it, otherwise he will expose himself to disciplinary action under the relevant service rules.[87]

A transfer of a government servant may be against public interest only if the transfer was avoidable and the successor is not suitable for the post.[88]

(f) PROMOTION

Promotion means appointment of a person of any category or grade of a service or a class of service to a higher category or grade of such service or class. The Supreme Court has observed that promotion means that a person already holding a position would have a promotion if he is appointed to another post which satisfies either of the two conditions, viz.: that the new post is in a higher category of the same service, or that the new post carries higher grade in the same service or class.[89]

Eligibility for promotion provided in rules framed under Art. 309 of the Constitution reflect the policy of the State and judicial review in such policy matters will not be entertained unless there is a clear violation of the Constitution or a statutory provision.[90]

No employee has a right to promotion but he has a right to be considered for promotion according to the rules. The right to be considered for promotion is a part of the conditions of service, but chances of promotion are not considered as conditions of service. A rule merely affecting the chances of promotion cannot be regarded as varying the conditions of service.[91] The Supreme Court has observed in State of Maharashtra v. Chandrakant Anant Kulkarni:[92]

> "Mere chances of promotion are not conditions of service and the fact that there was reduction in the chances of promotion did not tantamount to a change in the conditions of service. A right to be considered for promotion is a term of service, but mere chances of promotion are not."

---

85. Chief General Manager (Telecom), N.E. Telecom Circle v. Rajendra Chand Bhattacharjee, AIR 1995 SC 812 : (1995) 2 SCC 532.
86. Union of India v. S.L. Abbas, (1993) 4 SCC 357 : AIR 1993 SC 2444.
87. Gujarat Electricity Board v. Atmaram, AIR 1989 SC 1433 : (1989) 2 SCC 602.
88. N.K. Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 423 : (1994) 6 SCC 98.
89. C.C. Padmanabhan v. Director of Public Instructions, AIR 1981 SC 64 : 1980 Supp SCC 668.
90. Dilip Kumar Garg v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2009) 4 SCC 753 : (2009) 3 JT 202.
91. S.S. Bola v. B.D. Sardana, AIR 1997 SC 3127 : (1997) 8 SCC 522.
Also, R.S. Dhull v. State of Haryana, AIR 1998 SC 2090 : (1998) 4 SCC 379.
92. AIR 1981 SC 1990 : (1981) 4 SCC 130. Also see, K. Jagadeesan v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1072; Union of India v. S.L. Dutta, AIR 1991 SC 363 : (1991) 1 SCC 505.

An employee falling within the zone of consideration cannot be denied promotion merely because some disciplinary criminal proceedings are pending against him.[1] If a charge memo/charge sheet has been issued to him, or if he is suspended, then the sealed cover procedure can be resorted to. But this procedure cannot be resorted to when only preliminary investigation is being made into the charges against him. The reason being that many a time nothing comes out of the preliminary investigation and such an investigation may be initiated at the instance of interested parties.[2]

The above-mentioned proposition is illustrated by the Supreme Court decision in State of Madhya Pradesh v. R.N. Mishra.[3] In 1976, a preliminary inquiry was initiated to inquire into allegations of misconduct against the respondent. In 1977, he was promoted to a higher post while the preliminary inquiry was in progress. After a due inquiry, the State Government in 1986 inflicted on him the penalty by way of withholding his two increments. He challenged the order. His argument was that by his promotion in 1977, the allegations of misconduct against him stood condoned by the State Government and, as such, the penalty imposed on him was without jurisdiction. The Supreme Court rejected the contention with the following observation:[4]

> "….an employee/officer who is required to be considered for promotion, despite the pendency of the preliminary inquiry or contemplated inquiry against him is promoted, having been found fit, the promotion so made would not amount to condonation of misconduct which is subject matter of the inquiry."

The Court has gone on to say that the government servant after appointment as such acquires a status, as his conditions of service are regulated by statutory rules or provisions of an Act. Under the law, Government is not justified in excluding an employee from the field of consideration for promotion merely because certain disciplinary proceedings are contemplated, or some preliminary inquiry to inquire into the misconduct attributed to that employee are pending.

In the instant case, under the law, the State Government had no option but to consider the case of the respondent for promotion. The State Government could not have excluded the respondent from the zone of consideration, merely on the ground that a preliminary inquiry to enquire into the allegations of misconduct attributed to him was pending. "In such a situation, the doctrine of condonation of misconduct cannot be applied as to wash off the acts of misconduct which was the subject matter of preliminary enquiry." Accordingly, the Court ruled that in the instant case, promotion of the respondent could not amount to condonation of misconduct alleged against him which was the subject matter of the preliminary inquiry. Consequently, the punishment on the respondent by the State Government was held to be valid and legal.

When an employee substantively holding a lower post is asked to discharge the duties of a higher post, it is not regarded as promotion. In such a case, he does not get the salary of the higher post but gets only a 'charge allowance'. Such a

---

1. New Bank of India v. N.P. Sehgal, 1991 AIR SCW 565 : (1991) 2 SCC 220.
2. Union of India v. Janakiraman, K.V., AIR 1991 SC 2010 : (1991) 4 SCC 109; B.C. Chaturvedi v. Union of India, (1995) 6 SCC 749, 757 : 1996 SCC (L&S) 80.
3. AIR 1997 SC 3548 : (1997) 7 SCC 644.
4. Ibid, at 3549.

person continues to hold his substantive lower post and he only discharges the duties of the higher post essentially as a stop gap arrangement.[5]

Ordinarily, the Courts/tribunals do not interfere with assessments made by departmental Promotion Committees in regard to merit or fitness of a candidate for promotion. But there may be a rare case where the Court may interfere with such assessment if it—[6]

> "is either proved to be mala fide or is found based on inadmissible or irrelevant or insignificant and trivial material–and if an attitude of ignoring or not giving weight to the positive aspects of one's career is strongly displayed, or if the inferences drawn are such that no reasonable person can reach such conclusions, or if there is illegality attached to the decision…."

Ordinarily, a Court does not interfere with assessment of a candidate made by a departmental promotion committee, but in an exceptional case, the Court can review such an assessment "within the narrow Wednesbury principles or on the ground of mala fides"[7]

Such a situation occurred in Badrinath v. Govt. of Tamil Nadu where assessment by a departmental committee was set aside by the Supreme Court.

(g) SUSPENSION

Suspension of an employee pending disciplinary proceedings against him is not a punishment. Its purpose is to forbid or disable an employee to discharge the duties of the post held by him. The purpose is to refrain him from availing further opportunity to perpetrate the same misconduct, or from scuttling the enquiry, or investigation, or to win over the witnesses. Suspension of a government servant pending an inquiry against him does not amount to dismissal or removal as it does not put an end to his service. He continues to be a member of the service in spite of his suspension, though he is not permitted to work and he draws only a subsistence allowance which is usually less than the salary.[8]

The authority entitled to appoint a public servant is also entitled to suspend him pending a departmental inquiry into his conduct, or pending a criminal proceeding which may eventually result in a departmental inquiry against him.[9] If the service rules so provide, an employee may be suspended and subsistence allowance paid to him during the period of suspension. But if the rules do not so provide, and if an employee is suspended in the absence of such a power, he is entitled to be paid full remuneration for the period of suspension.[10]

---

5. Ramakant Shripad Sinai Advalpalkar v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1145 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 733.
Also see, State of Madhya Pradesh v. Laxmi Shankar, AIR 1979 SC 979.

6. Badrinath v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 2000 SC 3243, 3253 : (2000) 8 SCC 395.

7. The Supreme Court has accepted the Wadnesbury ruling in Tata Cellular v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 11.
The Supreme Court has said that the grounds of judicial review of an administrative action are : (i) Illegality; (ii) Irrationality, and (iii) Procedural impropriety.

8. State of Madhya Pradesh v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1977 SC 1466.
Also, State of Orissa v. Shiva Parshad Das, AIR 1985 SC 701 : (1985) 2 SCC 65; O.P. Gupta v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 2257; M. Paul Anthony v. Bharat Gold Mines, Ltd., AIR 1999 SC 1416 : (1999) 3 SCC 679.

9. R.P. Kapur v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 787; Balwantrai Ratilal Patel v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1968 SC 800 : (1968) 2 SCR 577.

10. V.P. Gidroniya v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 1494 : (1970) 1 SCC 362, P.R.. Nayak v. Union of India, AIR 1972 SC 554.

It is not an administrative routine or an automatic order to suspend an employee. Each case has to be considered depending on the nature of the allegations, gravity of the situation, etc. The suspension must be a step in aid of the ultimate result of the investigation or inquiry.[11] In the instant case,[12] there were serious allegations of misconduct against the employee and the Court held that the appointing authority was justified in suspending the employee pending an inquiry against him.

In Punjab v. Khemi Ram,[13] the Supreme Court has ruled that in case of an order of suspension, the order is communicated as soon as it goes out of office for onward communication and the actual service of the order is not material.

No hearing need be given when an employee is suspended.[14] Art. 311(2) does not protect suspension. An order of suspension is invalid if it is actuated by mala fides, or is arbitrary, or has been made for an ulterior purpose.[15] An order of suspension can also be challenged in a Court on the ground that the concerned authority formed his satisfaction to suspend the employee on extraneous or irrelevant considerations, or that there was a total lack of application of mind to the question whether it was necessary or desirable to suspend him.[16]

If a suspended employee is reinstated he goes back to his service. If the order of reinstatement is set aside, the concerned employee reverts to his immediate anterior status of suspension.[17]

On the question of payment of subsistence allowance to the suspended employee, the Supreme Court has taken objection to non-payment thereof, characterising it as an "inhuman act" which has an impropitious effect on the life of the employee. Such an allowance is paid so that the employee can sustain himself during the suspension period.[18]

The Court has linked the payment of subsistence allowance with the right to life under Art. 21 of the Constitution.[19] The provision for payment of subsistence allowance to an employee made in the Service Rules only ensures "non-violation" of the right to life of the employee. On becoming a government servant, a person does not lose his Fundamental Rights including the right to life under Art. 21. Accordingly, in State of Maharashtra v. Chanderbhan,[20] the Court struck down a service rule which provided for payment of a nominal amount of Re. 1/- p.m. as subsistence allowance to an employee under suspension.

---

11. V.P. Gidroniya v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 1494 : (1970) 1 SCC 362; Govt. of India, Ministry of Home Affairs v. Tarak Nath Ghosh, AIR 1971 SC 823 : (1971) 1 SCC 734; U.P. Rajya Krishi Utpadan Mandi Parishad v. Sanjiv Rajan, (1993) Supp (3) SCC 483 : (1994) SCC (L&S) 67.

12. State of Orissa v. Bimal Kumar Mohanty, AIR 1994 SC 2296 : (1994) 4 SCC 126.

13. AIR 1970 SC 214 : (1969) 3 SCC 28.

14. Furnell v. Whangrei High School Board, (1973) All ER 400.
Also, Vasant Vaze, Natural Justice, Unsavoury Procedure, 16 J.I.L.I., 276 (1974).

15. State of Orissa v. Bimal Kumar Mohanty, op. cit.

16. State of Tamil Nadu v. P.M. Belliappa, 1985 Lab IC 51 (Mad).

17. Baldev Raj. v. Punjab Haryana High Court, AIR 1976 SC 2490, 2499 : (1976) 4 SCC 201.

18. M. Paul Anthony v. Bharat Gold Mines Ltd., AIR 1999 SC 1416 : (1999) 3 SCC 679.
Also see, O.P. Gupta v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 2257 at 1423 : (1987) 4 SCC 328.

19. Supra, Ch. XXVI.
Also see, State of Maharashtra v. Chanderbhan, AIR 1983 SC 803 : (1983) 3 SCC 387.

20. AIR 1983 SC 803 : (1983) 3 SCC 387.

It was held in Fakirbhai,[21] that if an employee could not attend the departmental proceedings because of financial stringency arising out of non-payment of subsistence allowance to him, and thereby he could not undertake a journey away from his home to attend the departmental proceedings, then the order of punishment, including the whole proceedings, would stand vitiated.[22]

An employee was prosecuted for corruption but was acquitted. He was suspended during prosecution. On acquittal, he was reinstated. The Supreme Court ruled that since he was a man of doubtful integrity and his confidential reports were not good, he was not entitled to get back wages for the period of suspension.[23]

The appellant was suspended while he was being prosecuted for defalcation of funds and fabrication of records. The prosecution culminated in his acquittal. The Supreme Court ruled in Krishnakant,[24] that the appellant would not be entitled to reinstatement with grant of all consequential benefits with full back wages as a matter of course, "if the conduct alleged is the foundation for prosecution though it may end in acquittal on appreciation of evidence or lack of sufficient evidence." There are two courses open to the disciplinary authority in such a situation, viz.:

(1) It may enquire into the misconduct unless the self-same conduct was subject of charge and on trial the acquittal was recorded on a positive finding that the accused did not commit the offence at all; but acquittal is not on benefit of doubt given. Appropriate action may be taken thereon.

(2) The authority may on reinstatement, after following the principles of natural justice, pass appropriate order including treating suspension period as period of not on duty.

When a government servant is acquitted he would be entitled to be reinstated but may not be entitled to all the consequential benefits treating the suspension period as duty period. In Krishnakant, interpreting the Maharashtra Civil Service Rules, the Court ruled that the employee though would be reinstated on acquittal would not be entitled to the consequential benefits. This meant that he would not be entitled to the increments for the period of suspension and he would not be treated, for purposes of pensionary benefits, etc., as being on duty during the period of suspension.

When an employee is completely exonerated and is not visited with any penalty, not even that of censure, indicating that he was completely blameless, he cannot be deprived of any benefits including the salary of the promotional post, from the date he would have been promoted in the ordinary course.[25] But there may be cases where the proceedings are delayed at the instance of the concerned employee himself, or his clearance in the disciplinary proceedings, or acquittal in criminal proceedings against him, is with benefit of doubt, or on account of non-availability of evidence due to the actions of the employee concerned. In such

---

21. Fakirbhai Fulabhai Solanki v. Presiding Officer, AIR 1986 SC 1168 : (1986) 3 SCC 131.
22. Also see, Ghanshyam Dass Shrivastava v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 1183 : (1973) 1 SCC 656; M. Paul Anthony, supra, footnote 18.
23. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ved Pal Singh, AIR 1997 SC 608 : (1997) 3 SCC 483.
24. Krishnakant Raghunath Bishavnekar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1997 SC 1434 : (1997) 3 SCC 636.
25. M. Paul Anthony v. Bharat Gold Mines Ltd., AIR 1999 SC 1416 : (1999) 3 SCC 679.

cases, the concerned authorities have power to decide whether the employee deserves to get any salary for the intervening period, and, if so, how much.[26]

(h) CENSURE

Censure is one of the penalties which may be imposed on a member of the civil service. Ordinarily, natural justice must be afforded to the person concerned which means that he must be given an opportunity to show cause against the proposed imposition of penalty of censure before the penalty is imposed on him.[27]

(i) FORFEITURE OF SERVICE

The Supreme Court has ruled that rules of natural justice must be observed when an order of forfeiture of service on ground of participation in an illegal strike is to be made.[28]

There is a difference between "reduction in rank" and "forfeiture of approved service". The expression 'reduction in rank' within the meaning of Art. 311(2) means reduction from a higher to a lower rank or post. On the other hand, "forfeiture of service" entails merely losing places in the rank or cadre to which the government servant belongs; he may lose his seniority within his cadre; he may lose a higher salary and his chances of promotion may be affected.[29]

Interpreting the Punjab Civil Service Rules, the Supreme Court has ruled that 'forfeiture of service' does not have any effect on the length of qualifying service for purposes of pension or compulsory retirement or premature retirement.[30]

(j) RESIGNATION

The services of a government servant normally stand terminated from the date on which the letter of resignation is accepted by the appropriate authority unless there is some rule to the contrary.[31] However, it is open to a government servant to make his resignation operative from a future date and to withdraw such resignation before it is accepted.[32]

(k) CHANGING THE DATE OF BIRTH

After he enters into service, a government servant acquires the right to continue in service till he reaches the age of retirement as fixed by the Government, unless his services are dispensed with on grounds contained in the service rules following the prescribed procedure. Accordingly, the date of birth entered in the service record assumes great importance for him for it determines his right to remain in service.

Usually, after several years of service, government servants seek to rectify the date of birth recorded earlier claiming to be younger than the recorded date so that they can remain in service somewhat longer. The Supreme Court declared in

---

26. Union of India v. K.V. Janakiraman, AIR 1991 SC 2010 : (1991) 4 SCC 109.
27. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Vijay Kumar Tripathi, AIR 1995 SC 1130 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 552.
28. Dayal Saran v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 554 : (1980) 3 SCC 25; Shiv Shankar v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 514 : (1985) 2 SCC 30.
29. State of Punjab v. Kishan Chand, AIR 1971 SC 766.
30. Chamba Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 2455 : (1997) 11 SCC 452.
31. Raj Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1969 SC 180 : (1968) 3 SCR 857.
32. P. Kasilingam v. P.S.G. College of Technology, AIR 1981 SC 789 : (1981) 1 SCC 405.

Harnam Singh,[33] that a Government servant who has declared his date of birth at the initial stage of employment would not be debarred from later making a request to correct his age if he has irrefutable proof to support his claim. He should do so within reasonable time if the government has not fixed any period of limitation for the purpose.

But, lately, the Supreme Court has exhibited a more rigid stand on this question. The Court has ruled in India v. C. Ramaswamy,[34] that when the date of birth of the employee is entered in the service record on his representation, the principle of estoppel would apply to the employee when he asks for a change in his date of birth, and the authorities concerned would be justified in declining to alter the same.

The Supreme Court has also interdicted the Courts from granting any relief in the matter even if it is shown that the date of birth as originally recorded was incorrect because the candidate concerned had represented a different date of birth to be taken into consideration obviously with a view that that would be to his advantage. Once having secured entry into the service, possibly in preference to other candidates, the principle of estoppel would be clearly applicable to him and relief by way of change in his date of birth can be legitimately denied.[35]

(l) RETIREMENT

Article 311 does not apply to a case of retirement on attaining the age of superannuation as it does not amount to imposing a penalty.[36] The term 'conditions of service' used in Art. 309 includes the power to fix and reduce the age of superannuation.[37]

Termination of service of a civil servant by a change in the age of superannuation does not attract Art. 311(2), and does not amount to removal from service within the meaning of Art. 311(2) which applies only in three situations, viz., dismissal, removal and reduction in rank. When a person joined the State Civil Service, the age of superannuation was fixed at 55 years; it was then raised to 58 years by the Government which lowered it again to 55 years. Consequently, he had to retire. Art. 311(2) was held inapplicable to such a situation. In the instant case, the Court also rejected the contention that the rule in question was retrospective. The Court held that there was no retrospectivity in the rule whatsoever as it applied to all uniformly notwithstanding whether they entered in service prior or subsequent to the date of the order.[38]

---

33. Union of India v. Harnam Singh, 1993 AIR SCW 1241, 1246 : (1993) 2 SCC 162.
Also see, Union of India v. Kantilal Hematram Pandya, AIR 1995 SC 1349 : (1995) 3 SCC 17; Burn Standard Co. Ltd. v. Dinabandhu Majumdar, AIR 1995 SC 1499 : (1995) 4 SCC 172.

34. AIR 1997 SC 2055 : (1997) 4 SCC 647.

35. Ibid, at 2062.
Also see, Secretary and Commissioner, Home Dept. v. R. Kirubakaran, AIR 1993 SC 2647 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 155; Burn Standard Co. Ltd. v. Dinabandhu Majumdar, AIR 1995 SC 1499 : (1995) 4 SCC 172; G.M. Bharat Coking Coal Ltd., W.B. v. Shib Kumar Dushad, AIR 2001 SC 72 : (2000) 8 SCC 696.

36. Union of India v. S.A. Razak, AIR 1981 SC 360 : (1981) 2 SCC 74.

37. Bishun Narain v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1965 SC 1567 : (1965) 1 SCR 693.
Also see, State of Andhra Pradesh v. S.K. Mohinuddin, AIR 1994 SC 1474.

38. Bishun Narain, op. cit.

In 1979, the A.P. Government increased the age of superannuation from 55 to 58 years. In 1983, the age was reduced from 58 to 55 years. The order was challenged but, in Nagaraj,[39] the Supreme Court rejected the challenge. The Court ruled that it was open to the Government to reduce the age of superannuation and the reduction in age was not unreasonable. In reducing the age of retirement, the Government did not act "arbitrarily or irrationally". The impugned decision was actuated and influenced predominantly by the consideration of creating new avenues of employment for the youth. The reduction in age of retirement is not therefore hit by Art. 14 or 16 as it was not "arbitrary or unreasonable."

A member of the Indian Police Service was due to retire on 31st March, 1996. On 20th March, he was granted extension of service for six months, but, on 23rd March, the extension was cancelled. The Supreme Court ruled that it was not necessary to give a hearing to the concerned employee. Till the order came into force, no vested right could have arisen. If the order of the extension created no right, its cancellation could not have withdrawn any right and hence the right to hearing did not arise and there was no violation of the rules of natural justice.[40]

(m) COMPULSORY RETIREMENT

When the Service Rules so provide, compulsory retirement of civil servants, earlier than their normal superannuation is regarded as different from dismissal or removal. While dismissal or removal is a punishment as it results in the government servant concerned losing his pensionary rights which would otherwise have accrued to him in respect of the service already put in by him, compulsory retirement is not regarded as penal in nature. It does not cast any stigma or implication of misbehaviour or incapacity, nor does the employee concerned lose his retrial benefits. The government servant thus retired is entitled to pension proportionate to the period of service already put in by him.[41]

Compulsory retirement takes place, earlier than the normal age of retirement, when the Service Rules so provide. Under Art. 465-A of the Civil Service Regulations, the Government can retire an employee, who has put in 25 years' service, in public interest. Compulsory retirement arises only when the Service Rules fix one age for superannuation, and another age of compulsory retirement, and the services of a civil servant are terminated between these two points of time.

The Supreme Court has laid down the principle that the rule provising for compulsory retirement "must not only contain the outside limit of superannuation but there must also be a provision for a reasonably long period of qualified service."[42] The termination of service of a civil servant under a rule which does not prescribe a reasonably long period of qualified service in substance amounts to removal under Art. 311(2).[43] When the rules do not fix the age of compulsory retirement, retiring a person before the age of superannuation amounts to dis-

---

39. K. Nagaraj v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 551 : (1985) 1 SCC 523.
40. State of U.P. v. Girish Behari, AIR 1997 SC 1354 : (1997) 4 SCC 362.
41. Shaymlal v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 369 : (1955) 1 SCR 26.
42. Takhatray Shivdattrai Mankad v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1970 SC 143 : (1969) 2 SCC 120. Also, *Bombay v. Subhagchand M. Doshi,*AIR 1957 SC 892 : 1958 SCR 571.
43. Gurdev v. State of Punjab, AIR 1964 SC 1585.

missal. Similarly, retiring a person earlier than the age fixed for compulsory retirement would amount to dismissal or removal.[44]

The rationale underlying compulsory retirement is that in all organizations, and more so in government organizations, there is good deal of dead wood, and it is in public interest to chop off the same. The power to compulsorily retire a government servant is one of the facets of the doctrine of pleasure embodied in Art. 310. A balance is sought to be drawn between the rights of the individual government servant and the interest of the public. While a minimum service is assured to the government servant, the Government is given power to energize its machinery and make it more efficient by compulsorily retiring those who in its opinion should not be there in public interest. Compulsory retirement is therefore resorted to in public interest.[45]

As the Supreme Court has observed in Kandaswamy:[46] "The Government is given power to energise its machinery by weeding out deadwood, inefficient, corrupt and people of doubtful integrity by compulsorily retiring them from service." Emphasizing upon the need to compulsorily retire government servants, the Supreme Court has observed in State of Orissa v. Ram Chandra Das:[47]

> "….the settled legal proposition is that the Government is empowered and would be entitled to compulsorily retire a government servant in public interest with a view to improve efficiency of the administration or to weed out the people of doubtful integrity or corrupt but sufficient evidence was not available to take disciplinary action in accordance with the rules so as to inculcate a sense of discipline in the service."

It is for the Government to decide whether or not an employee's retirement is in public interest. The exercise of power must be bona fide and in public interest. If the authority concerned bona fide forms the opinion that it is so, then its correctness is not liable to challenge in a Court of law.[48] But the same may be challenged on the ground that the requisite opinion is based on no evidence, or has not been formed, or the decision is based on collateral grounds, or that it is an arbitrary decision.

As compulsory retirement is not considered to be dismissal or removal, and is not considered as a punishment, it does not attract the procedural safeguard contained in Art. 311(2).[49] Therefore, no opportunity of hearing need be given to the concerned government servant before exercising the power of compulsory retirement.[50]

But compulsory retirement may amount to dismissal or removal in certain situations, e.g. if the order casts a stigma on the employee retired. This happen

---

44. Moti Ram Deka v. N.E.F. Rly., AIR 1964 SC 600 : (1964) 5 SCR 683; Ram Parshad v. State of Punjab, AIR 1966 SC 1607; Takhatray, op. cit.; Murari Mohan v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 931 : (1985) 3 SCC 120.
45. Union of India v. J.N. Sinha, AIR 1971 SC 40 : (1970) 2 SCC 458.
46. K. Kandaswamy v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 277 : (1995) 6 SCC 162.
47. AIR 1996 SC 2436 : (1996) 5 SCC 331.
48. Union of India v. J.N. Sinha, op. cit.; T.G. Shivacharana Singh v. State of Mysore, AIR 1965 SC 280; N.V. Puttabhatta v. State of Mysore, AIR 1972 SC 2185 : (1972) 3 SCC 739; Tara Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1975 SC 1487; Union of India v. M.E. Reddy, AIR 1980 SC 563; Baldev Raj v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 70; S. Ramachandra Raju v. State of Orissa, (1994) 3 SCC 424; Bishwanath Prasad Singh v. State of Bihar, (2001) 2 SCC 305.
49. Dinesh Chandra v. State of Assam, AIR 1978 SC 17 : (1977) 4 SCC 441.
50. Union of India v. J.N. Sinha, AIR 1971 SC 40 : (1970) 2 SCC 458.

when the order of retirement contains words from which a stigma, misbehaviour or incapacity may be inferred against the officer retired, or, if he is being made to lose the benefit already earned by him.[51] For example, a civil servant was retired after 28 years' service on the ground that he had outlived his utility. The Supreme Court ruled that as the order on its face stated that he was incapable of holding the post and, as this was a stigma against the employee, it amounted to dismissal and attracted Art. 311(2).[52]

An order of compulsory retirement may be couched in innocuous language without making any imputations against the concerned government servant. But, if challenged, the Court can lift the veil, look into his service record and consider whether the order was based on any misconduct of the employee, or was made bona fide and not with any oblique or extraneous purpose. If the Court finds that the order of compulsory retirement was by way of casting stigma on the reputation or career of the employee concerned, then the order would be regarded as being in contravention of Art. 311(2).[53] The Supreme Court has observed in the instant case: "Mere form of the order in such cases cannot deter the Court from delving into the basis of the order if the order in question is challenged by the concerned government servant."

In Anoop,[54] the Court has stated: "If the Court holds that the order though in the form is merely a determination of employment is in reality a cloak for an order of punishment, the Court would not be debarred, merely because of the form of the order, in giving effect to the rights conferred by law upon the employee."

An employee can be compulsorily retired if there is material to doubt his integrity.[55]

The Supreme Court has laid down the following propositions concerning compulsory retirement in Baikuntha Nath Das v. Chief District Medical Officer, Baripada[56] and Posts and Telegraphs Board v. C.S.N. Murthy:[57]

(1) An order of compulsory retirement is not a punishment as it implies no stigma nor any suggestion of misbehaviour.

(2) Principles of natural justice do not apply to an order of compulsory retirement.

These two propositions have already been discussed above.

(3) The order is passed in its subjective satisfaction by the Government on forming the opinion that it is in public interest to retire a government servant compulsorily.

---

51. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Shyam Lal Sharma, AIR 1971 SC 2151 : (1971) 2 SCC 514.

52. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Madan Mohan, AIR 1967 SC 1260 : (1967) 2 SCR 333; I.N. Saxena v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1967 SC 1264.

53. Ram Ekbal Sharma v. State of Bihar,, AIR 1990 SC 1368 : (1990) 3 SCC 504;

54. Anoop Jaiswal v. Government of India, AIR 1984 SC 636 : (1984) 2 SCC 369.
Also, State of Uttar Pradesh v. Abhai Kishore Masta, (1995) 1 SCC 336 : 1995 SCC (L&S) 317.

55. S. Govinda Menon v. Union of India, AIR 1967 SC 1274 : (1967) 2 SCR 566; Periyar and Pareekanni Rubber Ltd. v. State of Kerala, AIR 1990 SC 2192 : (1991) 4 SCC 195; Union of India v. A.K. Patnaik, AIR 1996 SC 280 : (1995) 6 SCC 442.

56. AIR 1992 SC 1020 : (1992) 2 SCC 299.

57. (1992) 2 SCC 317 : AIR 1992 SC 1368.
Also see, Gujarat v. Umedbhai M. Patel, AIR 2001 SC 1109 : (2001) 3 SCC 314.

(4) The Government has to consider the entire record of service before taking a decision in the matter. The record to be considered would include the entries in the confidential records/character rolls, both favourable and adverse.

(5) An order of compulsory retirement is not challengable merely on the ground that while passing the same, uncommunicated adverse remarks were also taken into consideration.[58]

(6) As regards the judicial scrutiny of an order of compulsory retirement, the High Court or the Supreme Court does not act as a Court of appeal; the Court can interfere if the order is passed on any of the following grounds, viz.:

(a) mala fides; or

(b) extraneous reasons;[59] or

(c) based on no evidence;

(d) it is arbitrary which means that no reasonable person would form the requisite opinion on the given material; in short, if it is found to be a perverse order. In this connection, the Supreme Court has stated in India v. V.P. Seth:[60]

> "….an order of compulsory retirement can be made subject to judicial review only on grounds of mala fides, arbitrariness or perversity and that the rule of audi alteram partem has no application since the order of compulsory retirement in such a situation is not penal in nature."

A few words need be said concerning proposition (5), stated above. There has been some shift in the judicial opinion on the question whether the uncommunicated adverse entries in the service record can be considered for the purposes of compulsory retirement. In Union of India v. M.E. Reddy,[61] the Court had laid down that uncommunicated adverse remarks can be relied upon while passing an order of compulsory retirement. But, then, the Court took a different view in Brij Mohan Singh Chopra v. State of Punjab[62] and Baidyanath.[63] The Court ruled therein that uncommunicated entries could not legally be relied upon while making an order of compulsory retirement. It was also held in Baidyanath that if a representation was pending against the adverse remarks, then these remarks could not be taken into consideration unless the representation itself was considered and disposed of. But in Baikuntha Nath,[64] as stated above, the Reddy view has been adopted and reiterated and the view expressed in Baidyanath and Brij Mohan was overruled. The Baikuntha Nath ruling is now the prevailing norm and has been followed in a number of cases.[65] The position, therefore, is that uncom-

---

58. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Lalsa Ram, AIR 2001 SC 1137 : (2001) 3 SCC 389.
59. State of Gujarat v. Umedbhai M. Patel, supra.
60. AIR 1994 SC 1261.
61. AIR 1980 SC 563 : (1980) 2 SCC 15.
62. AIR 1987 SC 948.
63. Baidyanath Mahapatra v. State of Orissa, AIR 1989 SC 2218 : (1989) 4 SCC 664.
64. AIR 1992 SC 1020 : (1992) 2 SCC 299.
65. Posts and Telegraphs Board v. C.S.N. Murthy, AIR 1992 SC 1368 : (1992) 2 SCC 317; Secretary to the Govt., Harijan & Tribal Welfare Dept. v. Nityananda Pati, AIR 1993 SC 383 : 1993 Supp (2) SCC 391; Union of India v. V.P. Seth, AIR 1994 SC 1261 : 1994 SCC (L&S) 1052; M.S. Bindra v. Union of India, (1998) 7 SCC 310 : AIR 1998 SC 3058; Gujarat v. Suryakant Chunilal Shah, (1998) 8 JT (SC) 326; Madan Mohan Choudhary v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 1018 : (1999) 3 SCC 396.

municated adverse remarks may also be considered for the purpose of compulsory retirement of an employee.

The Supreme Court has emphasized in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Bihari Lal[66] that the entire service record should be considered before taking a decision to compulsorily retire a government servant including any adverse remarks whether communicated to him or not. "It is on an overall assessment of the record that the authority would reach a decision whether the government servant should be compulsorily retired in public interest."

While considering the entire record of the employee concerned, before taking a decision as regards his compulsory retirement, more importance is to be attached to the record of performance during the later years which would include entries in his character roll both favourable and unfavourable. If a government servant is promoted to a higher post, notwithstanding the adverse remarks, then such remarks lose their sting, more so, if the promotion is based upon selection and not upon seniority.[67]

In Baldev,[68] the order of compulsory retirement was held to be arbitrary when it was based on old confidential entries made 20 years earlier. The Court emphasized that such stale entries could not be taken into consideration for retiring an employee compulsorily, particularly when he had been promoted subsequent to these entries. The Court observed that on promotion to a higher post, any prior adverse entries in his service record lost all significance and such entries remained on record as part of the past history.

There was one solitary adverse entry and after this entry the employee concerned was promoted to a higher post. The order of compulsory retirement was quashed. The Court observed that his entire service record had not been taken into consideration objectively.[69]

In State of Orissa v. Ram Chandra Das,[70] the Supreme Court has observed that if the Government on consideration of the entire service record comes to the conclusion "as a reasonable prudentman" that the employee should be compulsorily retired, then the Court would not interfere with such a decision. The Court went on to say that merely because a promotion was given to the concerned employee after adverse entries had been made against him, it would be no ground to hold that the compulsory retirement of the employee could not be ordered. This ruling seems to modify the Baldev Raj and Baikuntha Nath,[71] rulings to some extent.

In State of Punjab v. Gurdas Singh,[72] the Court has reiterated the view expressed by it in Ram Chandra Das, and it has observed:

> "Before the decision to retire a government servant prematurely is taken the authorities are required to consider the whole record of service. Any adverse entry prior to earning of promotion or crossing of efficiency bar or picking up

---

66. AIR 1995 SC 1161, 1162 : 1994 Supp (3) SCC 594.
67. Baikunith Nath Das, supra; Posts and Telegraphs Board, supra.
68. Baldev Raj v. State of Punjab, AIR 1984 SC 986 : 1984 Supp SCC 221.
69. S. Ramachandra Raju v. State of Orissa, AIR 1995 SC 111 : 1994 Supp (3) SCC 424.
70. AIR 1996 SC 2436 : (1996) 5 SCC 331.
Also see, K. Kandaswamy v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 277 : (1995) 6 SCC 162; Union of India v. V.P. Sethi, AIR 1994 SC 1261 : (1994) 2 LLJ 411.
71. Supra, footnotes 67 and 68.
72. AIR 1998 SC 1661, 1666 : (1998) 4 SCC 92.

> higher rank is not wiped out and can be taken into consideration while considering the overall performance of the employee during whole of his tenure of service whether it is in public interest to retain him in the service. The whole record of service of the employee will include any uncommunicated adverse entries as well."

As regards proposition (6), stated above, over time, the Courts have quashed a number of orders of compulsory retirement. A few examples may be cited here. Such an order was quashed in Madan Mohan Choudhary v. State of Bihar,[73] on the ground that it was arbitrary in the sense that no reasonable person could have come to the conclusion, on the material available, that the concerned employee had outlived his utility and become a dead wood which had to be chopped off. An order of compulsory retirement of an employee would be unjustified when there is nothing adverse against him in the service record.[74]

In Ramaswami,[75] charges were framed against a civil servant but were dropped and he was promoted to a very responsible post. Thereafter, he was compulsorily retired. The Supreme Court held that there was nothing even mildly suggestive of inaptitude or inefficiency after promotion, and there was no entry in the service record to his discredit, or even hinting even remotely that he had outlived his utility as a government servant, and, therefore, the order of retirement was held to be invalid.

A judge after having been allowed to cross the second efficiency bar was compulsorily retired by the High Court. The Supreme Court quashed the order of retirement as there was nothing to show that suddenly there was deterioration in the quality of his work or integrity so as to deserve compulsory retirement.[76]

The Supreme Court quashed an order of compulsory retirement in S.R. Venkataraman v. Union of India,[77] on the ground of abuse of power by the concerned authority. In Sonam Lama,[78] the reason given for issuing an order of compulsory retirement was that "the better talent which is available in the department can be used and entrusted with the functions of these officers who can be compulsorily retired….the functions of these officers can be better done by more qualified persons." The Supreme Court quashed the order as being "wholly erroneous" which could not be sustained in law. The Court observed:

> "Apparently the above reasoning cannot be the basis for compulsorily retiring any official. The report does not state that in the public interest the officers cannot be continued. The assessment of performance of the officers is only to the effect that there are better talented persons available in the department and the work performed by the officials could be better done by more qualified persons. This is wholly extraneous consideration for compulsorily retiring any official. 'The better talent' is a relative term. That does not mean that the incumbent in the office has become a dead wood."

---

73. AIR 1999 SC 1018 : (1999) 3 SCC 396.
74. High Court of Judicature at Allahabad v. Sarnam Singh, (2000) 2 SCC 339 : AIR 2000 SC 2150.
75. D. Ramaswami v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1982 SC 793 : (1982) 1 SCC 510.
76. Swami Saran v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 269 : (1980) 1 SCC 12.
77. AIR 1979 SC 49 : (1979) 2 SCC 491.
78. Sikkim v. Sonam Lama, AIR 1991 SC 534 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 179.

On the question of compulsory retirement of a government servant, the Supreme Court has warned:[79]

> "To dunk an officer into the puddle of "doubtful integrity", it is not enough that the doubt fringes on a mere hunch. That doubt should be of such a nature as would reasonably and consciously be entertainable by a reasonable man on the given material. Mere possibility is hardly sufficient to assume that it would have happened. There must be preponderance of probability for the reasonable man to entertain doubt regarding that possibility. Only then there is justification to ram an officer with the label 'doubtful integrity'"

In the following case,[80] the respondent was suspended from service on charges of misconduct and an inquiry was ordered against him. Pending completion of the inquiry, he was retired from service. The Supreme Court concluded that the order of compulsory retirement though innocuously worded was in fact an order of his removal from service and could not thus be sustained.

In the case noted below,[81] an order of compulsory retirement was quashed as having been passed for extraneous grounds for the following reasons :

(1) There was no adverse entry in the respondent's confidential record;

(2) He has crossed the efficiency bar at the ages of 50 and 55;

(3) He had less than two years to retire;

(4) A disciplinary inquiry initiated against him was not completed within a reasonable time. The authorities did not wait for the conclusion of the inquiry and decided to dispense with his services on the basis of unproved allegations.

An employee appointed for a fixed term of five years does not superannuate; he only goes out of office on completion of his tenure. Therefore, the question of prematurely retiring him does not arise.[82]

(n) VOLUNTARY RETIREMENT

A government servant can seek voluntary retirement from service before the age of normal superannuation if he has put in the specified numbers of years of service as required by the Service Rules applicable to him.

It is a matter of interpretation of the relevant Service Rules whether an employee has a right to seek voluntary retirement—(i) without the employer having any say in the matter; or (ii) subject to the permission of the employer.

Interpreting fundamental Rule 56(c), the Supreme Court held in Dinesh,[83] that "there is no question of acceptance of the request for voluntary retirement by the Government, when the government servant exercises his right under FR56(c)." Under Rule 56(c), a government servant enjoys an option in absolute terms to voluntary retire with three months' previous notice, after he reaches 50 years of age, or has completed 25 years of service, and the consent of the Government is not nec-

---

79. M.S. Bindra v. Union of India, (1998) 7 SCC 310 : (1988) 7 SCC 310.
80. High Court of Punjab and Haryana v. Ishwarchand Jain, AIR 1999 SC 1677 : (1999) 4 SCC 579.
81. State of Gujarat v. Umedbhai M. Patel, AIR 2001 SC 1109 : (2001) 3 SCC 314.
82. L.P. Agarwal v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 1872 : (1992) 3 SCC 526.
83. Dinesh Chandra Sangma v. State of Assam, AIR 1978 SC 17 : (1977) 4 SCC 441.
Also, B.J. Shelat v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1978 SC 1109.

essary to give legal effect to the voluntary retirement of the government servant under that rule.

In B.J. Shelat v. Gujarat,[84] the rule in question gave a right to say 'no' to the Government to the employee's request to voluntary retire if any departmental proceedings were pending or contemplated against him. The right of the employee to seek voluntary retirement under this rule is conditional, but the government has to pass an order withholding permission to retire on one of the conditions mentioned in the rule. If no such order is made and communicated to the concerned employee, he retires at the end of the notice period.

Interpreting the Service Rules of a corporation, the Supreme Court concluded that after completion of 25 years' service, or on attaining the age of 50 years, whichever is earlier, the employee has a right to make a request for voluntary retirement, but his request becomes effective only if he is "permitted" to retire. The employee has a right to make a request to permit him to retire, but if his request is not accepted and permission is not granted, the employee cannot retire. There cannot be automatic retirement under the rules.[85]

In Syed Muzaffar Mir,[86] the respondent, a railway employee, was under suspension. He sought premature retirement by giving three months' notice. No order withholding retirement was passed. The notice period expired on 21-10-1985 and thereafter an order of removal was passed against him on 4-11-1985. The question arose whether the order of removal was validly passed. Interpreting the relevant Railway Service Rules, the Supreme Court ruled that the order of removal was non-est. Under the Rules, permission to retire could be withhled in case the employee was under suspension. In the instant case, no such order was passed.

But, then, the Court changed its position in this matter. A government employee expressed his intention for voluntary retirement and gave a three months' notice for the purpose on Sept. 20, 1993. He handed over charge on February 11, 94, even without acceptance of voluntary retirement. On February 25, 1994, the concerned authority declined to accept his request to retire.

The matter fell under Rule 5.32(B) of the Punjab Civil Services Rules. Prosecution against the petitioner for certain offences were pending trial. The Court distinguished the fact-situation in this case from that in Muzaffar where the respondent was under suspension and not facing criminal trial. Upholding this order in Baljit,[87] the Court pointed out that "when serious offences are pending trial it is open to the appropriate Government to decide whether or not the delinquent should be permitted to retire voluntarily or such disciplinary action as is available should be taken under the law. Therefore, mere expiry of three months' period of notice given, does not automatically put an end to the jural relationship of employer and employee between Government and the delinquent official. Only on acceptance by the employer of resignation or request for voluntary retirement their jural relationship ceases. It would, therefore, be of necessity that the Government takes appropriate decision, whether the delinquent would be permitted to retire voluntarily from service pending the action against him." In the instant

84. AIR 1978 SC 1109 : (1978) 2 SCC 202.
85. HPMC v. Shri Suman Behari Sharma, AIR 1996 SC 1353 : (1996) 4 SCC 584.
86. Union of India v. Sayed Muzaffar Mir, AIR 1995 SC 176 : (1994) 6 JT 288.
87. Baljit Singh v. State of Haryana, AIR 1997 SC 2150 : (1997) 1 SCC 754.

case, serious offences were pending trial against the employee. The Government, therefore, rightly refused to permit him to retire voluntarily from service. "Each case should be considered in its own backdrop of facts. Until the jural relations of employer and employee comes to a close according to law, the employer always has power to decide and pass appropriate order."

But the Court overruled Baljit in Singhal[88] interpreting the same Rule. The Court ruled that under the Rule, a government employee can seek voluntary retirement after 20 years of service by giving a three months' notice for the purpose. If the appointing authority does not refuse to grant permission for retirement within the notice period the retirement becomes effective from the date of expiry of the notice period. Under this Rule, the Government could say 'no' to the request of retirement within the notice period but it was not necessary for the Government to say 'yes'.

The Court held that the Baljit ruling went against the rulings in Dinesh and Shelat where the Court had taken the view under similar rules that "a positive order had to be passed within the notice period withholding permission to retire and that the said order was also to be communicated to the employee during the said period."

(o) PENSION

Right to receive pension is a valuable right vesting in a civil servant. Payment of pension to a government servant depends not on government's discretion but on rules. A government servant falling within the rules is entitled to receive pension. It may be that an order is needed for quantification of the pension, but the right to receive the same flows not from the order but from the rules.

Pensionary benefits as well as any other terminal benefits constitute conditions of service. Therefore, the employer can revise these benefits and fix a date from which the revised benefits shall take effect. Such a date may be set prospectively or retrospectively so long as it is set in a reasonable manner. If questioned, the only question will be whether the prescription of the date is unreasonable or discriminatory.[89]

Pension is not a bounty depending on the sweet will and pleasure of the government, but is right to property.[90] Therefore, an order imposing a cut in the pension of a retiring civil servant cannot be passed without giving the affected employee a reasonable opportunity of being heard against the proposed reduction in the amount of his pension as the order adversely affects him.[91]

A government servant can be deprived of the whole or part of his pensionary rights only in accordance with the rules. Under R. 9(1) of the Civil Service Pension Rules, 1972, the President can withhold the whole or part of the pension of a

---

88. State of Haryana v. S.K. Singhal, AIR 1999 SC 1829 : (1999) 4 SCC 293.
Also see, Tek Chand v. Dile Ram, AIR 2001 SC 905 : (2001) 3 SCC 290.

89. West Bengal v. Ratan Behari Dey, (1993) 4 SCC 62 : 1993 SCC (L&S) 1123.

90. Deokinandan Prasad v. State of Bihar, AIR 1971 SC 1409 : (1971) 2 SCC 330; Kerala v. Padmabhan Nair, AIR 1985 SC 356 : (1985) 1 SCC 429; D.S. Nakara v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 130 : (1983) 1 SCC 305.
Also see, supra, Ch. XXXIV, under Art. 41.

91. Punjab v. Iqbal Singh, AIR 1976 SC 667 : (1976) 2 SCC 1; State of Punjab v. K.R. Erry, AIR 1973 SC 834.
Also see, Union of India v. P.D. Yadav, (2002) 1 SCC 405.

government employee if he is found guilty of "grave misconduct or negligence" during the period of his service. In the absence of a finding of "grave misconduct or negligence" either in a judicial proceeding, or a departmental inquiry, the President is "without authority of law to impose penalty of withholding pension as a measure of punishment." As the employee's right to pension is a statutory right, the measure of deprivation must, therefore, be correlative to or commensurate with the gravity of the misconduct.[92]

In Union of India v. B. Dev,[93] absence from duty by the employee concerned was found to be wilful and pre-meditated amounting to misconduct. Therefore, an order withholding from him full pensionary benefit was upheld by the Supreme Court. Divesting pensionary rights of a pensioner is not valid.[94]

The Service Rules may require "future good conduct" on the part of a pensioner. Pension may be withheld if the pensioner is convicted of any serious crime or is guilty of misconduct.[95]

A few persons were granted pensionary benefits by erroneous interpretation of the rules. The Court refused to perpetuate the same mistake. The Court could not direct something being done which was contrary to rules. "In such cases, there is no question of application of Article 14 of the Constitution. No person can claim any right on the basis of decision which is de hors the statutory rules nor can there be any estoppel."[96]

(p) GRATUITY

Gratuity is a statutory retiral benefit earned by an employee.

The Supreme Court has ruled that the word 'pension' in R. 9(1) of the Pension Rules, stated above, covers gratuity also. Therefore, gratuity can also be withdrawn or reduced along with pension under that Rule.[97] Also, like pension, gratuity also cannot be reduced without giving the employee a reasonable opportunity of hearing.

(q) TRANSFER OF A GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENT TO A CORPORATION

Where all the functions of a government department along with posts are transferred to some government corporation, the question arises as to how to transfer the services of the government employees because of Art. 311. While Art. 311 applies to a government department it does not apply to a corporation and, therefore, government servants may not prefer the change of a department into a corporation, as their services become less secure because of the absence of Art. 311.

In State of Mysore v. H. Papanna Gowde,[98] it has been held that because of Art. 311, it is not open to the Government to declare even by a statutory rule that

---

92. Jarnail Singh v. Secretary, Ministry of Home Affairs, (1993) 1 SCC 47 : AIR 1994 SC 1484; Union of India v. G. Gangayuthan, AIR 1997 SC 3387 : (1997) 7 SCC 463.
93. AIR 1998 SC 2709 : (1998) 7 SCC 691.
94. Salabuddin Mohammad Yunus v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1984 SC 1905 : 1984 Supp SCL 399; supra.
95. State of Haryana v. S.K. Singhal, AIR 1999 SC 1829, 1832 : (1999) 4 SCC 293.
96. Union of India v. Rakesh Kumar, AIR 2001 SC 1877, at 1885 : (2001) 4 SCC 309
97. See, footnote 72, supra.
98. AIR 1971 SC 191 : (1970) 3 SCC 545.

after transfer of the department along with posts to a corporation, the holders of these posts under the Government in the department shall cease to be in the service of the Government because that will be violative of Art. 311, as civil servants cannot be dismissed or removed from service. Art. 311, as such, is not applicable to a corporation. Therefore, the procedure suggested by the Supreme Court in S.K. Saha v. Prem Prakash Agarwal,[1] is that the Government can give an option to the holders of such posts either to be absorbed in some other government department, or to leave the government service and opt for the service of the proposed corporation. Once he opts for service in the corporation, the government servant ceases to be in the government service. He cannot then be treated as having been deputed to the corporation holding his lien with the Government.

J. DISCIPLINARY PROCEEDINGS

(a) DISCRETION OF DISCIPLINARY AUTHORITIES

A disciplinary authority may hold an inquiry into the charges against a civil servant either by itself or may depute an inquiry officer for the purpose. The inquiry officer after holding the inquiry submits his report to the disciplinary authority. The disciplinary authority has discretion to accept the findings of the inquiry officer. But, the authority can disagree with those findings and come to its own conclusions on the basis of the evidence tendered at the enquiry.

The disciplinary authority is regarded as the final fact finding authority. This point has been emphasized again and again by the Supreme Court. In B.C. Chaturvedi v. Union of India,[2] the Supreme Court has observed:

> "The disciplinary authority is the sole judge of facts where appeal is presented; the appellate authority has co-extensive power to re-appreciate the evidence or the nature of punishment."

In the case mentioned below,[3] in an enquiry against the respondent, the enquiry officer came to the conclusion that the respondent molested a female employee and that he acted against moral sanctions and his acts did not withstand the test of decency and modesty. The disciplinary authority, agreeing with the report of the enquiry officer, imposed the penalty of removing him from service.

The respondent challenged his removal through a writ petition in the High Court. The High Court ruled that on the basis of evidence produced before the enquiry officer, it was not possible to come to the conclusion that the respondent attempted to molest.

On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the High Court saying that the High Court over-looked the settled position that in departmental proceedings, "the disciplinary authority is the sole Judge of facts". The High Court cannot, normally speaking, substitute its own conclusion, with regard to the guilt of the delinquent, for that of the departmental authorities. With these remarks, the Supreme Court set aside the order of the High Court and restored the punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority on the respondent.

---

1. AIR 1994 SC 745 : (1994) 1 SCC 431.
2. (1995) 6 SCC 749 : AIR 1996 SC 484.
3. Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A.K. Chopra, (1999) 1 SCC 759 : (1999) 1 SCC 759.

After finding the facts, if the concerned officer is held to be guilty and the charges against him are held to have been established, then the disciplinary authority can impose the punishment on the delinquent officer. In the matter of punishment, the disciplinary authority has the final say.

Nevertheless, it needs to be emphasized that the disciplinary authority exercises its discretion subject to Arts. 14 and 16.[4] The Supreme Court has emphasized in Nepal Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh:[5] "In dealing with a government servant the state must conform to the constitutional requirements of Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution. An arbitrary exercise of power by the state violates those constitutional guarantees." Arts. 14 and 16 guarantee fair and just treatment. "When a government servant satisfies the Court prima facie that an order terminating his services violates Arts. 14 and 16, the competent authority must discharge the burden of showing that the power to terminate the services was exercised honestly and in good faith, on valid considerations, fairly and without discrimination."

As a sequel to the police agitation, the State Government dismissed 1100 members of the police force for participation in the agitation. Later, 1000 of these persons were reinstated. The Government was not able to explain the criteria which were applied to distinguish between those who were reinstated and those who were not. The Court ruled that the petitioners had been arbitrarily weeded out for discriminatory treatment as compared to others who were similarly situated. The treatment meted out to the appellants was held to be arbitrary which amounted to denial of equal treatment under Art. 14.[6]

Further, the disciplinary authority has to exercise its discretion subject to the principles of Administrative Law governing the exercise of discretionary powers.[7] Thus, mala fides on the part of the disciplinary authority vitiates the inquiry, but there must be positive evidence of mala fides on record. For example, in Partap Singh v. State of Punjab,[8] the Supreme Court quashed the government's order suspending the appellant civil servant and ordering an inquiry against him on the ground that the order was vitiated by mala fides insofar as it was motivated by an improper purpose which was outside the purpose for which the discretion to punish had been conferred on the Government.

In State of Punjab v. V.K. Khanna,[9] the Supreme Court quashed the charge sheet issued by the Government against a senior civil servant with the following observation:[10]

> "….in the event there is an element of malice or mala fide motive involved in the matter of issue of a charge-sheet or the concerned authority is so biased that the inquiry would be a mere farcical show and the conclusions are well known then and in that event law Courts are otherwise justified in interfering at the earliest stage so as to avoid the harassment and humiliation of a public official".

---

4. Supra, Chs. XXI and XXIII.
5. AIR 1985 SC 84 : (1985) 1 SCC 56.
6. Senghara Singh v. State of Punjab, (1983) 4 SCC 225.
7. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Ch. XIX; JAIN CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, II. Ch. XVI.
8. AIR 1964 SC 72.
9. AIR 2001 SC 343 : (2001) 2 SCC 330.
10. Ibid, at 357.

In Kalra,[11] the Supreme Court held the order of dismissal to be arbitrary as the facts established did not amount to misconduct warranting dismissal.

(b) COURTS AND DISCIPLINARY PROCEEDINGS

There is an immense amount of case-law in this area. An analysis of these cases show that under Art. 226, roles of the High Courts and of the Supreme Court under Art. 32 are rather limited in disciplinary proceedings. The Court does not act as a Court of appeal against the order of the disciplinary authority. The disciplinary authority is regarded as the sole judge of the facts if the inquiry is properly conducted.

The Courts have really three principal functions to discharge in this area:

(1) to decide whether a civil servant is entitled to the protection of Art. 311 or not;

(2) to ensure that enquiries against civil servants are held according to the principles of natural justice, or according to the statutory rules, if any, framed for the purpose; and

(3) to ensure that the inquiry officer and the disciplinary authority function according to the principles of Administrative Law.

The Courts are extremely reluctant to intervene beyond these points.[12]

A disciplinary proceeding is not a criminal trial. The standard of proof required is that of preponderance of probability and not proof beyond reasonable doubt.[13]

The Courts do not go into the adequacy or reliability of evidence in support of a particular finding by the inquiry officer. The only question which the Courts consider is whether or not the findings of fact by the inquiry officer are supported by any probative evidence. The Courts thus apply the 'no evidence' rule and quash a finding of fact if there is no evidence at all to support it.[14] The Courts do not re-appreciate the evidence tendered at the inquiry and arrive at their own findings, or assume the position of a Court of appeal from the inquiry officer.[15] If there is some legal evidence on which the findings can be based then adequacy or even reliability of that evidence is not a matter for judicial interference.

The Supreme Court has observed in Goel,[16] in this connection:

> "If the conclusion, upon consideration of the evidence, reached by the disciplinary authority, is perverse or suffers from patent error on the face of the record or based on no evidence at all, a writ of certiorari could be issued."[17]

---

11. A.L. Kalra v. P & E. Corporation of Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1361 : (1984) 3 SCC 316.
12. See below.
13. Union of India v. Sardar Bahadur, 1972 Lab IC 627 : (1972) 4 SCC 618.
14. State of West Bengal v. B.K. Barman, AIR 1971 SC 156 : (1970) 3 SCC 612; Nand Kishore v. State of Bihar, AIR 1978 SC 1277 : (1978) 3 SCC 366; supra.
15. State of Madras v. G. Sundaram, AIR 1965 SC 1103; Union of India v. H.C. Goel, AIR 1964 SC 364 : 1964 (4) SCR 718; High Court of Judicature v. Shashikant S. Patil, (2000) 1 SCC 416 : AIR 2000 SC 22.
16. Union of India v. H.C. Goel, AIR 1964 SC 364; Union of India v. S.L. Abbas, (1993) 4 SCC 357 : AIR 1993 SC 2444.
17. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. E (iv), for discussion on Certiorari.

Thus, the Court will interfere with the findings of fact by the disciplinary authority if there is a finding which shocks the judicial conscience of the Court.[18]

A Court, however, interferes if the departmental authorities have taken into account some considerations extraneous to the evidence and the merits of the case, or have been influenced by extraneous or irrelevant considerations, or where the conclusions appear to be arbitrary or perverse.[19]

The inquiry officer should arrive at his conclusions on the basis of some evidence. Suspicion cannot be allowed to take the place of proof even in disciplinary enquiries. The Court does not interfere with disciplinary proceedings merely on the ground that it was based on evidence which would be insufficient for conviction of the delinquent on the same charge at a criminal trial. If the enquiry is properly held, then the disciplinary authorities are the sole judge of facts and the Courts do not substitute their own opinion on the merits or the facts even if they differ from those of the inquiry or the punishing authorities.

Whether the evidence is sufficient for the authority to impose the punishment, or whether the evidence is such as is legally admissible in terms of the Evidence Act, are not the questions into which the Courts would go.[20] The review Court is not concerned with the correctness of the findings of fact so long as those findings are reasonably supported by evidence. Judicial review is directed not against the decision, but is confined to the examination of the decision-making process.

The Supreme Court has stated in this connection in State of Andhra Pradesh v. S. Sree Rama Rao:[21]

> "The High Court is not constituted in a proceeding under Art. 226 of the Constitution as a Court of appeal over the decision of the authorities holding a departmental inquiry against a public servant: it is concerned to determine whether the inquiry is held by an authority competent in that behalf, and whether the rules of natural justice are not violated. Whether there is some evidence, which the authority entrusted with the duty to hold the enquiry has accepted and which evidence may reasonably support the conclusion that the delinquent officer is guilty of the charge, it is not the function of the High Court in a petition for a writ under Art. 226 to review the evidence and to arrive at an independent finding on the evidence."

The Supreme Court has observed in this connection in B.C. Chaturvedi v. India:[22]

> "When an inquiry is conducted on charges of misconduct by a public servant, the Court/Tribunal is concerned to determine whether the enquiry was held by a competent officer or whether the rules of natural justice are complied with. Whether the findings or conclusions are based on some evidence, the authority entrusted with the power to hold inquiry has jurisdiction, power and authority to reach a finding of fact or conclusion. But that finding must be based on some evidence. Neither the technical rules of Evidence Act nor of proof of fact or evidence as defined therein, apply to disciplinary proceedings."

Similarly, the Supreme Court has emphasized recently in Kuldeep Singh,[23] that while in exercise of its power of judicial review, the Court would not interfere

---

18. Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A.K. Chopra, AIR 1999 SC 625.
19. Bhagat Ram v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 454 : (1983) 2 SCC 442.
20. State of Orissa v. Murlidhar, AIR 1963 SC 404; also, supra, footnote 14.
21. AIR 1963 SC 1723 : 1964 (3) SCR 25.
22. AIR 1996 SC 484 : (1995) 6 SCC 749.
23. Kuldeep Singh v. Commissioner of Police, AIR 1999 SC 677, at 679 : (1999) 2 SCC 10.

with the findings recorded at the departmental enquiry by the disciplinary authority or the enquiry officer "as a matter of course," yet the Court can interfere with the conclusions reached therein "if there was no evidence to support the findings or the findings recorded were such as could not have been reached by an ordinary prudent man or the findings were perverse or made at the dictate of the superior authority."[24]

In Shashikant,[25] the Supreme Court has emphasized that the disciplinary authority is the sole judge of the facts "if the inquiry has been properly conducted". The Court has observed further:

> "The settled legal position is that if there is some legal evidence on which the findings can be based then adequacy or even reliability of that evidence is not a matter for canvassing before the High Court in a writ petition filed under Art. 226 of the Constitution."

Head (3), mentioned above, would include such grounds as: the decision of the disciplinary authority is vitiated by extraneous considerations, or is wholly arbitrary or capricious that no reasonable person could have arrived at such a conclusion.

In V.S. Menon v. Union of India,[26] the disciplinary proceedings were quashed as the charges levied were such as could not be sustained under the Civil Services (Safeguarding of National Security) Rules, 1949, under which the disciplinary action was sought to be taken. This was a case of ultra vires, i.e., going outside the purview of the law. When a tribunal of enquiry functions beyond its jurisdiction (as laid down in the rules), then the enquiry by it could not be regarded as falling under Art. 311(2) and no order of dismissal could be founded on it. Lack of jurisdiction in the tribunal vitiates the entire proceedings.[27]

While, ordinarily, a Court does not interfere with the charge sheet at the initial stage of a disciplinary proceeding, yet:

> "in the event there is an element of malice or mala fide, motive involved in the matter of issue of a charge-sheet or the concerned authority is so biased that the inquiry would be a mere farcical show and the conclusions are well known then and in that event law Courts are otherwise justified in interfering at the earliest stage so as to avoid the harassment and humiliation of a public official."

This is with a view of not shielding any misdeed, but to maintain due of process of law in the society.[28]

Article 311(2) imposes only procedural safeguards and no substantive restrictions. Therefore, the quantum of punishment awarded to a delinquent employee lies within the discretion of the disciplinary authority. The Constitution merely guarantees reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the proposed punishment, but does not say that the punishment should not exceed any prescribed

---

24. See, Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A.K. Chopra, (1999) 1 SCC 759: AIR 1999 SC 625.
25. High Court of Judicature at Bombay v. Shashikant S. Patil, AIR 2000 SC 22, at 26 : 2000 (1) SCC 416.
26. AIR 1963 SC 1160 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 404.
27. B.N. Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1960 All 754.
28. State of Punjab v. V.K. Khanna, AIR 2001 SC 343 : (2001) 2 SCC 330.

standard.[29] The disciplinary authority is invested with the discretion to impose appropriate punishment keeping in view the magnitude or gravity of the misconduct. The reviewing Court does not normally substitute its own judgment on penalty for that of the disciplinary authority. The Court would not normally interfere with, and change, the punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority.

In the following case,[30] the Governor passed a dismissal order on the basis of five charges which were held to have been substantiated by the enquiry tribunal. Later, the Supreme Court held that the tribunal's findings on two charges were vitiated because of failure of natural justice, but other findings of the tribunal were not so vitiated. Nevertheless the Court refused to interfere with the order of dismissal or direct the Governor to reconsider the matter.

The Supreme Court pointed out that had the Governor's order been based solely on the two vitiated findings, then the order would have been illegal. But when the rest of the findings of the tribunal stood, and these findings established that the servant was prima facie guilty of grave delinquency, the Court could not then direct the Governor to reconsider the order of dismissal. The reasons which induce the punishing authority to impose the punishment if there has been a proper inquiry, or the penalty imposed, are not justiciable. If some of the findings of the tribunal were unassailable, then the Governor's order, on whose powers no restrictions were attached to determine appropriate punishment, would be final.

The same view has been reiterated in another case[31] in which punishment was imposed on the basis of two charges, of which one was held unsustainable by the Court. The Supreme Court ruled that it could not quash the punishment imposed and stated the principle that if the order could be supported on the basis of any finding of substantial misdemeanour for which the punishment could lawfully be imposed, then it was not for the Court to consider whether that ground alone would have weighed with the authority in imposing the punishment in question.

An order removing a government servant from service should be a speaking order.[32]

Normally the Supreme Court does not interfere with the punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority on the delinquent employee as the matter falls within the ambit of the discretion of the authority. The Supreme Court does however maintain that the punishment imposed should be consonant with the gravity of the offence, and if the punishment was disproportionate to the misconduct proved, then the Supreme Court ruled that it would interfere.

The Supreme Court has emphasized in Tulsiram Patel:[33]

> "The disciplinary authorities are expected to act justly and fairly after taking into account all the facts and circumstances of the case and if they act arbitrarily and impose a penalty which is unduly excessive, capricious or vindictive, it can be set aside in a departmental appeal. In any event, the remedy by way of judicial review is always open to a government servant."

---

29. A.N. D'Silva v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1130 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 968; U.R. Bhatt v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1344 : 1962 (1) LLJ 656.
30. Orissa v. Bidyabhushan, AIR 1963 SC 779 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 648.
31. Railway Board v. N. Singh, AIR 1969 SC 966 : (1969) 1 SCC 502.
32. Nand Kishore v. State of Bihar,, AIR 1978 SC 1277 : (1978) 3 SCC 366.
33. Supra, footnote 87, at 2094.

At another place, the Court has said: "Where the Court finds that the penalty imposed by the impugned order is arbitrary or grossly excessive or out of all proportion to the offence committed or not warranted by the facts and circumstances of the case or the requirements of that particular government service the Court will also strike down the impugned order."

There are cases where the Supreme Court has reduced the punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority. In Shankar Das v. Union of India,[34] the order of dismissal was set aside on the ground that the penalty was whimsical and the concerned government servant was ordered to be reinstated with full back wages.

The Court may not however always order reinstatement. It may substitute a penalty which in its opinion would be just and proper in the circumstances of the case.

In Dasayan,[35] the Supreme Court reduced the punishment of dismissal to compulsory retirement as the co-accused had also been given the same punishment.

In Dr. Anil Kapoor v. Union of India,[36] the Supreme Court refused to interfere with the punishment of removal from service although the Court did say that "it is possible to take another view in this matter", but that "that will not be a ground for interfering with the orders passed by the disciplinary proceedings."

In Ram Kishan v. Union of India,[37] an employee was dismissed after inquiry for using abusive language towards his superior authority. The Supreme Court set aside the dismissal order holding it to be "harsh and disproportionate to the gravity of the charge…."

In Ram Avtar Singh v. State Public Service Tribunal,[38] the punishment of dismissal of a police constable who remained absent for one day on hunger strike for opposing his transfer was held to be disproportionate by the Supreme Court. The Court set aside his dismissal and ordered his reinstatement in service on only 50% of backwages as he remained jobless since 1991 when he was dismissed and on tendering a written apology for what he had done.[39]

In Kartar Singh Grewal v. State of Punjab,[40] the concerned employee had put in unblemished service for 29 years. Three days before retirement, the disciplinary authority imposed on him the punishment of dismissal after a departmental enquiry. The Public Service Commission did not agree with the punishment; the evidence in support of the charges against him was not very strong; the employee had died leaving behind him his widow who was in bad health. In these circumstances, the Supreme Court reduced the punishment to compulsory retirement. The Court thought that this will meet the ends of justice in the instant case.[41]

---

34. AIR 1989 SC 1137 : 1989 Supp (1) SCC 686.
35. Director-General of Police v. G. Dasayan, AIR 1998 SC 2265.
36. AIR 1999 SC 1528 : (1998) 9 SCC 47.
37. AIR 1996 SC 255 : (1995) 6 SCC 157.
Also see, Union of India v. Iqbal Singh Cheema, AIR 1996 SC 426 : 1995 Supp (4) SCC 84.
38. AIR 1999 SC 1542 : (1998) 9 SCC 666.
39. Also see, V.R. Kartaki v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1991 SC 1241 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 267.
40. AIR 1991 SC 1067 : (1991) 2 SCC 635.
41. Also see, Laxmi Shankar Pandey v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1070 : (1991) 2 SCC 488.

In Mohal,[42] the Court reduced the punishment from removal from service to compulsory retirement in the interest of justice. The inquiry against the employee was ex parte as he could not attend the inquiry because of financial stringency arising due to non-payment of subsistence allowance to him owing to a technicality.

In this connection, an interesting fact may be noted. Until 1996, there existed a dichotomy between the powers of the Supreme Court and the High Courts to interfere with the punishment imposed on a civil servant by the disciplinary authority. As stated above, the Supreme Court ruled that while it was empowered to interfere with the punishment imposed, the High Courts were not so authorised.

As early as 1963, in State of Orissa v. Bidyabhushan Mohapatra,[43] the Supreme Court ruled that having regard to the gravity of the established misconduct, the punishing authority had the power and jurisdiction to impose punishment. The penalty was not open to review by the High Court under Art. 226. If the High Court reached a finding that there was some evidence to reach the conclusion, it became unassailable. The order of the Governor who had jurisdiction and unrestricted power to determine the appropriate punishment was final.[44]

This situation continued till 1996 when in B.C. Chaturvedi v. Union of India,[45] the Supreme Court ruled that normally, in exercise of its power of judicial review, the High Court does not substitute its own conclusion on penalty and impose some other penalty. But, observed the Court:

> "If the punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority or the appellate authority shocks the conscience of the High Court/Tribunal, it would appropriately mould the relief, either directing the disciplinary appellate authority to reconsider the penalty imposed, or to shorten the litigation, it may itself, in exceptional and rare cases, impose appropriate punishment with cogent reasons in support thereof."

Thus, if the penalty imposed shocks the conscience of the High Court, it can appropriately mould the relief. If the punishment imposed on the delinquent servant is shockingly disproportionate to the charges held proved against the employee, it will be open to the High Court to interfere.[46]

In Chaturvedi,[47] after an inquiry, an ITO was found to have assets disproportionate to his known sources of income. The disciplinary authority imposed on him the penalty of dismissal. The tribunal changed it into compulsory retirement on the ground that he was "no longer fit to continue in government service" as he had reached the age of 50 years. But the Supreme Court quashed the tribunal order saying that the reasoning was wholly unsupportable, "not relevant nor germane to modify the punishment". The Court observed:

---

42. A.V. Mohal v. Senior Supdt. of Post Office, AIR 1991 SC 328 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 503.
43. AIR 1963 SC 779 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 648.
44. In Krishna Chandra v. Union of India, AIR 1992 Ori 261, HANSARIA, C.J., raised the question as to why the power to do complete justice had been denied to the High Courts.
45. AIR 1996 SC 484 : (1995) 6 SCC 749.
46. B.C. Chaturvedi v. Union of India, (1995) 6 SCC 749 : AIR 1996 SC 484; Colour-Chem Ltd. v. A.L. Alaspurkar, (1998) 3 SCC 192 : AIR 1998 SC 948; U.P. State Road Transport Corpn. v. Mahesh Kumar Mishra, (2000) 3 SCC 450 : AIR 2000 SC 1151.
47. Ibid.

> "In view of the gravity of the misconduct, namely, the appellant having been found to be in possession of assets disproportionate to the known source of his income, the interference with the imposition of punishments was wholly unwarranted."

Again, it has been emphasized by the Supreme Court in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Nand Kishore Shukla,[48] that a High Court not being a Court of appeal from the disciplinary authority, cannot go into the question of imposition of punishment. It is for the disciplinary authority to consider what would be the nature of the punishment to be imposed on a government servant based on his proved misconduct.

In the case mentioned below,[49] the disciplinary authority imposed the punishment of removal from service on the respondent for seeking to molest a subordinate female employee in the work place. A writ petition was filed in the High Court challenging this decision, the Court reduced the punishment. The Supreme Court, on appeal, objected to the High Court ruling with the following observation:

> "The High Court should not have substituted its own discretion for that of the authority: what punishment was required to be imposed, in the facts and circumstances of the case, was a matter which fell exclusively within the jurisdiction of the competent authority and did not warrant any interference by the High Court".

On the whole, it would seem that under Art. 136 (read with Art. 142), the Supreme Court enjoys far more discretion to interfere with the punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority on the delinquent employee than does either High Court under Art. 226, or the Administrative Tribunal.

When the disciplinary action against an employee is held to be vitiated, it is quashed, and, usually, status quo ante is restored, but it may not always be so because the High Court/Supreme Court has power to mould relief according to the specific facts and circumstances of each case.

In Banerjee,[50] termination of the service of a probationer was quashed because no regular departmental inquiry was held. The Court ordered his reinstatement with back wages as there was no material to show that he had been gainfully employed after termination. On the other hand, in Haryana v. Jagdish Chander,[51] although the inquiry was quashed yet the employee was not reinstated in service.

The difference between Jagdish and Bannerjee was this: In Bannerjee, no inquiry was held at all, whereas in Jagdish¸ an inquiry was held but was found deficient in one respect, viz., theinquiry report had not been given to him as required by the Supreme Court decision in Karunakar.[52] Accordingly, in Jagdish the Court directed the report to be given to the concerned employee, and the proceedings from that stage were set aside and the Court stated that no order for reinstatement or backwages, needed to be passed at that stage because the rest of the inquiry proceedings were yet to go on and had not finally concluded.

---

48. AIR 1996 SC 1561 : (1996) 3 SCC 750.
49. Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A.K. Chopra, (1999) 1 SCC 759 at 773 : AIR 1999 SC 625.
50. D.P. Bannerjee v. S.N. Bose National Centre for Basic Sciences, Calcutta, AIR 1999 SC 983, 993 : (1999) 3 SCC 60.
51. (1995) 2 SCC 567 : AIR 1995 SC 984.
52. Managing Director, ECIL v. B. Karunakar, (1993) 4 SCC 727 : 1993 SCC (L&S) 1184.

(c) SERVICE TRIBUNALS

The 42nd Constitutional Amendment introduces an innovation in the Constitution in the form of a new Article 323A.[53] It provides that Parliament may establish tribunals for adjudication of disputes concerning recruitment and conditions of service of persons appointed to public service under Central, State or any local or other authority, or a corporation owned or controlled by Government. The law made by Parliament for the purpose may specify the jurisdiction and procedure of these tribunals and exclude the jurisdiction of all Courts, except that of the Supreme Court under Art. 136, with respect to the service matters falling within the purview of these tribunals.

The justification for Art. 323A lay in the fact that massive case-law was being generated in the country in relation to service matters and too much time of the Courts, especially of the High Courts, was being consumed on this type of litigation. Art. 323A seeks to relieve the High Courts which used to take cognizance of service matters under Art. 226.

Article 323A is an enabling provision. Its scope is very wide, and is synonymous with Art. 309.[54] The expression 'conditions of service' used in Art. 323A also occurs in Art. 309 and means all those conditions which regulate the holding of a post by a person right from the time of his appointment till his retirement and even beyond it in such matters as pension etc., and includes matters of dismissal or termination of the service of government servants. Therefore, the tribunals can be endowed with comprehensive jurisdiction in relation to service matters.

An interesting question which arises is whether the setting up of these tribunals will be merely for purposes of holding inquiries against government servants or also for imposing punishment. The use of the expression 'adjudication of disputes' indicates that wider frame of reference is envisaged. It will be for Parliament to settle all the intricate questions in the law to be enacted.

Another interesting aspect of Art. 323A is that Parliament has been given power to establish service tribunals not only for the Central employees, but also for the employees of the States, local governments and of the government corporations. This will effect quite a drastic change in the present system where each of these units has control over the disciplinary proceedings relating to its servants.

While the States are subject to Art. 311(2), the local governments are not, and in their case only principles of natural justice are applicable. Similarly, in case of government undertakings, natural justice may apply.[55]

The Indian Parliament has enacted the Administrative Tribunals Act, 1985, establishing administrative tribunals for adjudication of service disputes in civil services under the Centre as well as the States. The Central Government is to establish the Central Administrative Tribunal (CAT) for central services. An appeal

---

53. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I..
54. Supra, Sec. B.
55. JAIN, THE LEGAL STATUS, etc., see supra.
Also, JAIN and JAIN, PRINCIPLES OF ADM. LAW, Ch. XXV (1986).

from CAT lies to the Supreme Court under the Act. A detailed discussion of these tribunals falls legitimately under Administrative Law.[56]

CAT exercises jurisdiction equivalent to that of the High Courts under Art. 226. It is thus more of a supervisory, rather than, an appellate body. It has therefore been held that—

(1) CAT cannot interfere with an order of transfer made bona fide by the concerned authority;[57]

(2) the tribunal is not an appellate authority and cannot thus substitute the role of authorities to clear the efficiency bar of a public servant;[58]

(3) The tribunal could not appreciate the evidence before the inquiry officers and substitute its own conclusion for that of the disciplinary authority.[59]

The Supreme Court has laid emphasis upon this aspect in several cases. For example, in State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Subramaniam,[60] the Court has observed:

> "In Judicial review, it is settled law that the Court or the tribunal has no power to trench on the jurisdiction to appreciate the evidence and to arrive at its own conclusion….When the conclusion reached by the authority is based on evidence, Tribunal is devoid of power to re-appreciate the evidence….The only consideration the Court/Tribunal has in its judicial review is to consider whether the conclusion is based on evidence on record and supports the finding or whether the conclusion is based on no evidence."[61]

In the instant case, the Court quashed the order of the Tribunal with the remark: "The Tribunal has committed serious error of law in appreciation of the evidence and in coming to its own conclusion that the charge had not been proved. Thus we hold that the view of the Tribunal is ex facie illegal."

But if the findings are perverse and based on no evidence, the reviewing Court or tribunal can quash the same.[62]

(4) It is not the province of the Tribunal to go into the truth or otherwise of the charges; the tribunal is not an appellate authority over the departmental authorities. Therefore, the tribunal exceeds its jurisdiction when it enters upon a discussion whether the charges are established on the materials available.[63]

---

56. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Ch. XIII; JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, II, Ch. XII

57. Union of India v. S.L. Abbas, (1993) 4 SCC 357 : AIR 1993 SC 2444.

58. Administrator of Dadra & Nagar Haveli v. H.P. Vora, AIR 1992 SC 2303 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 551.

59. State Bank of India v. Samarendra Kishore Endow, (1994) 1 JT (SC) 217 : (1994) 2 SCC 537; Union of India v. A.N. Rao, AIR 1998 SC 111 : (1958) 1 SCC 700.

60. (1996) 7 SCC 506.

61. Also see, B.C. Chaturvedi v. Union of India, (1995) 6 SCC 749 : AIR 1996 SC 484; State of Tamil Nadu v. T.V. Venugopalan, (1994) 6 SCC 302; Union of India v. Upendra Singh, (1994) 3 SCC 357 : 1994 (1) LLJ 808; State of Tamil Nadu v. Rajapandian, (1995) 1 SCC 216 : AIR 1995 SC 561; High Court of Judicature at Bombay v. Uday Singh, AIR 1997 SC 2286 : (1997) 5 SCC 129.

62. See, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. E(iv)(c).

63. State of Tamil Nadu v. Thiru K.V. Perumal, AIR 1996 SC 2474 : (1996) 5 SCC 474.

In Government of Tamil Nadu v. A. Rajapandian,[64] the Supreme Court has ruled that the Tribunal cannot sit as a Court of appeal over a decision based on the findings of the enquiring authority in disciplinary proceedings. The Court has stated:

> "Where there is some relevant material which the disciplinary authority has accepted and which material reasonably supports the conclusion reached by the disciplinary authority, it is not the function of the Administrative Tribunal to review the same and reach different finding than, that of the disciplinary authority."

In Union of India v. S.L. Abbas,[65] the tribunal interfered with the order of transfer. The Supreme Court ruled that the tribunal was not an appellate body and, therefore, it could not substitute its own judgment for that of a bona fide order of transfer.

The power of the tribunal to interfere with the quantum of punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority on the delinquent employee is pari passu with that of the High Court under Art. 226. Normally, the Tribunal does not substitute its own conclusion on penalty for that of the disciplinary authority and impose some other punishment. The Supreme Court has emphasized that the tribunal cannot, while exercising the power of judicial review, normally speaking, substitute its own conclusion on penalty and impose some other penalty. But if the punishment imposed "shocks the conscience" of the Tribunal, it could appropriately interfere with it by moulding relief either by referring the matter to the disciplinary authority to reconsider the penalty imposed, or, in an exceptional and rare case, with a view to shorten litigation, it may itself impose appropriate punishment giving cogent reasons in support thereof.[66]

In Ganayutham,[67] the disciplinary authority, after inquiry, imposed the punishment of withdrawal of 50% pension and gratuity on the employee on the ground that the government suffered substantial loss of revenue due to the misconduct of the employee. The Tribunal held that the punishment was too severe and reduced the punishment to withholding of 50% pension for ten years instead of on a permanent basis. On appeal, the Supreme Court restored the punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority saying that the Tribunal could interfere with the punishment awarded to the employee by the disciplinary authority only if it is irrational which means that it is in outrageous defiance of logic or moral standards. The Tribunal would not interfere if the authority has reasonably arrived at its decision as to punishment.

In Om Kumar v. Union of India,[68] the Supreme Court has elaborately considered the question of scope of judicial review of the punishment imposed on an employee by the concerned disciplinary authority. The Court has now ruled that where an administrative decision relating to punishment in disciplinary cases is questioned as 'arbitrary' under Art. 14, the Court is confined to the Wednesbury

---

64. (1995) 1 SCC 216 : AIR 1995 SC 561.
65. AIR 1993 SC 2444.
66. State Bank of India v. Samarendra Kishore Endow, (1994) 2 SCC 537 : 1994 SCC (L&S) 687; B.C. Chaturvedi v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 484 : (1995) 6 SCC 749.
Also, Indian Oil Corp. v. Ashok Kumar Arora, (1997) 3 SCC 72 : AIR 1997 SC 1030.
67. Union of India v. G. Ganayutham, AIR 1997 SC 3387, 3390 : (1997) 7 SCC 463.
68. AIR 2000 SC 3689.

principles.[69] This means that the discretion of the punishing authority can be challenged on such grounds as—the order was contrary to law; relevant factors were not considered, irrelevant factors were considered, the decision was one which no reasonable person could have taken.[70] But when administrative action is challenged under Art. 14 as being discriminatory, the question to consider is whether it is excessive.

(d) INQUIRY AGAINST JUDGES OF SUBORDINATE COURTS

Article 235 provides that the control over district Courts and Courts subordinate thereto is vested in the High Courts.[71] The word 'control' in this provision includes disciplinary control as well.[72] Besides Art. 235, superintendence vested in a High Court by Art. 227 over all subordinate Courts in the State also imports control, as there can be no superintendence without control.[73]

The vesting of disciplinary control over members of the subordinate judiciary in a State in the High Court ensures maintenance of the independence and integrity of the judiciary and protection from executive interference. As the Supreme Court has observed in Shamsher,[74] the members of the subordinate judiciary are not only under the control but also under the care and custody of the High Court.

Article 235 means that it is for the High Courts to hold inquiries into the conduct of judicial officers who are entitled to the protection of Art. 311(2). The Supreme Court has laid emphasis on the protective role of the High Courts in these words:[75]

> "….the High Court while exercising its power of control over the subordinate judiciary is under a constitutional obligation to guide and protect judicial officers from being harassed or annoyed by trifling complaints relating to judicial orders so that the Officers may discharge their duties honestly and independently unconcerned by the ill-conceived or motivated complaints, made by unscrupulous lawyers and litigants".

Article 235 vests in the High Court the power to hold inquiries, impose punishments, initiate disciplinary proceedings, suspend any member of subordinate judiciary. The Supreme Court has observed in this regard:[76]

> "Article 235, therefore, relates to the power of taking a decision by the High Court against a member of the subordinate judiciary. Such a decision either to hold enquiry into conduct of a judicial officer, subordinate or higher judiciary, or to have the inquiry conducted….and to consider the report of the enquiry officer for taking further action is of the High Court. Equally, the decision to consider the report of the enquiry officer and to take follow up action and to make

---

69. Associated provincial Picture Houses v. Wednesbury Corporation, (1948) 1 KB 223.
70. For a detailed discussion on this topic, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM., LAW, I, Ch. XIX (1996); JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, Ch. XVI.
71. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G.
72. Mohd. Ghouse v. Madras, AIR 1957 SC 246 : 1957 SCR 414; Chief Justice of A.P. v. L.V.A. Dikshitulu, AIR 1979 SC 193 : (1979) 2 SCC 34.
73. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. C(iv).
74. Shamsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831.
75. Registrar, High Court of Madras v. R. Rajiah, AIR 1988 SC 1388 : (1988) 3 SCC 211.
76. High Court of Judicature at Bombay v. Shirish Kumar R. Patil, AIR 1997 SC 2631, 2636 : (1997) 6 SCC 339; Madan Mohan Choudhary v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 1018 : (1999) 3 SCC 396.

appropriate recommendation to the Disciplinary Committee or the Governor, is entirely of the High Court."

The appointing authority in respect of the State judicial service is the Governor. He is, therefore, the actual authority to impose a major punishment of dismissal, removal or reduction in rank under Art. 311(1). The High Court itself cannot pass such an order.[77] But in view of Art. 235, the Governor is not entitled to conduct disciplinary proceedings, or set up an enquiry or disciplinary tribunal, apart from the High Court. It is the High Court alone which has to conduct an inquiry into the charges against a judicial officer and send its report with its recommendations to the Governor. In imposing punishment, the Governor is to have regard to this report. In such a case, the High Court is only a recommendatory authority and cannot itself pass the order; such an order is passed by the State Government on the recommendation of the High Court.

On this point, the Supreme Court has emphasized that, in such cases, the Constitution contemplates that the Governor will act in harmony with the recommendations of the High Court. The recommendation of the High Court is binding on the Government. The Supreme Court has emphasized that the Governor cannot take any action against a member of Subordinate judicial service without, and contrary to, the recommendations of the High Court.[78] If the High Court's recommendations were not to be binding on the State, then unfortunate consequences will follow. It is in public interest that the State accepts the High Court's recommendations. Thus, the State could not pass an order of compulsory retirement on a judicial officer when the High Court had made no such recommendation.[79]

This point has been emphasized again by the Supreme Court in Baldev Raj v. Punjab and Haryana High Court.[80] The High Court after enquiry recommended removal of a sub-judge. The Government referred the matter to the State Public Service Commission for advice and, on its advice, the Sub-Judge was reinstated. The Supreme Court quashed this order saying that the sole and exclusive disciplinary control over subordinate judiciary is vested in the High Court and its recommendation is binding on the Government. The Government does not have to consult any other body except the High Court in this area, not even the Public Service Commission.

Unfortunately, there have been cases where the Supreme Court has had to quash the enquiries made by the High Courts against the subordinate judges for one reason or another, such as, lack of bona fides on the part of the High Court in instituting disciplinary proceedings against a member of the Higher Judicial Service in the State,[81] or the High Court's advice is arbitrary and is not supported by any material,[82] failure of natural justice.[83]

---

77. Baradakanta Mishra v. High Court of State of Orissa, AIR 1976 SC 1899 : (1976) 3 SCC 327.

78. The Registrar, High Court of Madras v. R. Rajiah, AIR 1988 SC 1388; High Court of M.P. v. Mahesh Prakash, AIR 1994 SC 2595 : (1995) 1 SCC 203; Registrar (Administration) High Court of State of Orissa, Cuttack v. Sisir Kanta Satapathy, AIR 1999 SC 3265 : (1999) 7 SCC 725.

79. State of Haryana v. Inder Prakash, AIR 1976 SC 1841 : (1976) 2 SCC 977.
Also, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G(e).

80. AIR 1976 SC 2490.
Also, West Bengal v. N.N. Bagchi, AIR 1966 SC 447 : 1966 (1) SCR 771.

81. R.C. Sood v. High Court of State of Rajasthan, 1994 (Supp) 3 SCC 711 and AIR 1999 SC 707 : (1958) 5 SCC 493.

82. Madan Mohan Choudhary v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 1018 : (1999) 3 SCC 396.

83. Ch. VIII, Sec. G(e).

The Supreme Court has emphasized that an independent and honest judiciary being a sine qua non for the Rule of Law, the High Court should seek to protect honest judicial officers against ill-conceived or motivated complaints. The Supreme Court has laid down some guidelines for initiating a disciplinary action against a judicial or a quasi-judicial officer :

(i) where he has conducted in a manner reflecting on his reputation or integrity or good faith or devotion to duty;

(ii) there is prima facie material to show recklessness or misconduct in the discharge of his duty;

(iii) that he has acted negligently or that he omitted the prescribed conditions which are essential for the exercise of the statutory powers;

(iv) that he had acted in order to unduly favour a party;

(v) that he had been actuated by corrupt motive.[84]

K. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSIONS

For proper and efficient working of a democracy, it is very necessary that civil service be free of political pressures and personal patronage. It is therefore necessary to ensure that the best available person be selected for appointment to a post so as to avoid arbitrariness and nepotism in the matter of appointment. This objective can be achieved if civil servants are appointed solely on the basis of merit without any favouritism or nepotism or political pressures. A difficult task in any country, it becomes all the more difficult in a multi-lingual, multi-religious country like India which has a number of minority groups and backward classes and where the state is the most significant employer and government service has a prestige of its own.

This role and objectives are reflected in the opinion of the Supreme Court to the effect that Public Service Commissions are institutions of utmost importance created by the Constitution and for efficient functioning of a democracy it is imperative that such Commissions are manned by people of the highest skill and irreproachable integrity, so that selections to various public posts can be immunized from all sorts of extraneous factors like political pressure or personal favouritism and are made solely on considerations of merit. It was also held that since PSCs are a constitutional creation, principles of service law that are ordinarily applicable in instances of dismissal of government employees cannot be extended to proceedings for removal and suspension of PSC members.[85]

To achieve these objectives, the Constitution creates Public Service Commissions which are autonomous bodies and are immunized from various pressures so that they can function independently, fairly and impartially. Being a constitutional authority, it cannot be by passed by way of circular or otherwise.[86]

A Commission constituted in terms of Art.315 of the Constitution is bound to conduct examinations for appointment to the services of the State in terms of the

---

84. See, Union of India v. A.N. Saxena, AIR 1992 SC 1333; Union of India v. K.K. Dhawan, AIR 1993 SC 1478; P.C. Joshi v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 2001 SC 2788.

85. Ram Kumar Kashyap v. Union of India, (2009) 9 SCC 378.

86. State of Uttaranchal v. Alok Sharma, (2009) 7 SCC 647, 657 : (2009) 6 JT 463.

Rules framed by the State. It is, however, free to evolve the procedure for conduct of examination. While conducting the examination in a fair and transparent manner as also following known principles of fair play, it cannot completely shut its eyes to the constitutional requirements of Article 335 of the Constitution of India.[87]

The independence of the members of these commissions is secured by several constitutional provisions as noted below. In this connection, the Supreme Court has observed:

> "The values of independence, impartiality and integrity are the basic determinants of the constitutional conception of Public Service Commissions and their role and functions".

Investigation into the affairs of the Public Service Commission even though it might affect the image of the Commission, cannot be a ground to stall investigation. On the other hand, the investigation has to be done in a transparent manner.[88]

It is through these Commissions both at the Centre and in the States that the bulk of government servants are recruited and, thus, the guarantee given by Art. 16(1) is sought to be concretised.[89] These Commissions also advise Governments in matters of discipline pertaining to civil servants. This ensures that disciplinary action is not taken on extraneous considerations.

The appellant Commission which has been constituted in terms of Art. 315 of the Constitution of India is bound to conduct examination for appointment to the services of the State in terms of the Rules framed by the State. It is, however, free to evolve procedure for conduct of examination. While conducting the examination in a fair and transparent manner as also following known principles of fair play, it cannot completely shut its eyes to the constitutional requirements of Article 335 of the Constitution of India.[90]

How such a Commission would judge the merit of the candidates is its function. Unless the procedure adopted by it is held to be arbitrary or against the known principles of fair play, the Courts will not ordinarily interfere therewith.[91]

The significance of the role played by a Public Service Commission has been underlined by the Supreme Court in Ahok Kumar Yadav v. State of Haryana,[92] in the following words:

> "….the Public Service Commission occupies a pivotal place of importance in the State and the integrity and efficiency of its administrative apparatus depends considerably on the quality of the selections made by the Public Service Commission. It is absolutely essential that the best and the finest talent should be drawn in the administration and the administrative services must be composed of men who are honest, upright and independent and who are not swayed

---

87. Andhra Pradesh Public Service Commission v. Baloji Badhavath, (2009) 5 SCC 1 : (2009) 5 JT 563.
88. Seema Dhamdhere, Secretary, Maharashtra Public Service Commission v. State of Maharashtra, (2008) 2 SCC 290 : (2007) 13 JT 658.
89. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. A.
90. Andhra Pradesh Public Service Commission v. Baloji Badhavath, (2009) 5 SCC 1 : (2009) 5 JT 563.
91. Andhra Pradesh Public Service Commission v. Baloji Badhavath, (2009) 5 SCC 1 : (2009) 5 JT 563.
92. AIR 1987 SC 454, 477 : (1995) 4 SCC 417.

by the political winds blowing in the country. The selection of candidates for the administrative services must therefore be made strictly on merits, keeping in view various factors which go to make up a strong, efficient and people oriented administrator."

"To achieve these objectives, it is necessary that the chairman and members of the Public Service Commission are eminent men possessing a high degree of calibre, competence and integrity, who would inspire confidence in the public mind about the objectivity and impartiality of the selections to be made by them."

The Court has, therefore, exhorted every State Government "to take care to see that its Public Service Commission is manned by competent, honest and independent persons of outstanding ability and high reputation who command the confidence of the people and who would not allow themselves to be deflected by any extraneous considerations from discharging their duty of making selections strictly on merit…."

Unfortunately, the opposite of what the Supreme Court has envisaged is happening in practice. The State Governments seek to pack the Service Commissions with pliable persons.

(i) UNION PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

(a) COMPOSITION

The U.P.S.C. consists of a Chairman and a number of members who are appointed by the President who, of course, acts in this matter, as in all other matters, on the advice of the concerned Minister [Arts. 315(1) and 316(1)].

No qualifications are prescribed for the Commission's membership except that, as nearly as may be, one-half of the members should be persons who have held offices for at least ten years either under the Government of India or that of a State [Proviso to Art. 316(1)]. This provision envisages that such persons as are well versed in the internal exigencies of the public service are given adequate representation on the Commission, so that suitable, experienced and fit persons may be appointed to the civil services.

The President may appoint an acting Chairman of the Commission if the office of the Chairman falls vacant, or if the Chairman is unable to discharge his functions due to absence or some other reason. The acting Chairman functions till the chairman is able to resume his duties, or the person appointed as Chairman enters on the duties of the office [Art. 316(1-A)].

The Constitution does not fix the number of members of the Commission. This task has been left to the Central Government. Thus, according to Art. 318, the President may, by regulations, determine the number of members of the Commission and their conditions of service. The power of the Central Government to determine the conditions of service of a member of the Commission is, however, subject to the restriction that they cannot be varied to the disadvantage of a member after his appointment.

A member of the Commission is to hold office for six years from the date he takes charge of his office, or until he attains the age of sixty-five years, whichever is earlier [Art. 316(2)]. A member may, however, resign from his office by writing to the President [Art. 316(2)(a)].

(b) REMOVAL OF A MEMBER

Provisions exist in the Constitution for the removal of the Chairman or a member before the expiry of his term [Arts. 316(2)(b) and 317]. He can be removed only by the order of the President on the ground of misbehaviour. Such an order can be passed after—(1) the President makes a reference to the Supreme Court, and (2) the Court, after holding an inquiry, reports to the President that the person concerned ought to be removed from office [Art. 317(1)]. These procedural safeguards envisaged in Art.317 are to protect PSC members from undue political pressures or personal facvouritism and vendetta, so that a Public Commissions is able to discharge their constitutional obligations in full measure.[1]

At the stage of clause (1) of Art. 317 a tentative conclusion that, if not rebutted, the charges of misbehaviour would stand made out and it is not necessary to consider in detail the evidence on record to reach a conclusion as to whether the charges stood proved.[2]

In a reference made by the President under Article 317(1) of the Constitution, the question relating to misbehaviour by the Chairman/Chhattishgarh Service Commission came up for consideration before the Supreme Court. On facts, the Court found that the evidence did not warrant any conclusion of misbehaviour. But in the course of the judgment, the Court expressed certain views regarding the object behind the provisions of Article 315 and 317 of the Constitution. In relation to Article 315. The Court held that the object of the Article is to ensure that the Commission should be independent and impartial body as indicated by their salary etc. being charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State and their removal by following the procedure laid down in the Constitution i.e. their offices were constitutionally protected. The Court also noted that misbehaviour is not defined in Article 317 but what constitutes misbehaviour in the these words :

> "The Chairman of the Public Service Commission is expected to show absolute integrity and impartiality in exercising the powers and duties as Chairman. His actions shall be transparent and he shall discharge his functions with utmost sincerity and integrity. If there is any failure on his part, or he commits any act which is not befitting the honour and prestige as a Chairman of the Public Service Commission, it would amount to misbehaviour as contemplated under the Constitution. If it is proved that he has shown any favour to the candidate during the selection process, that would certainly be an act of misbehaviour."[3]

There have been a few references made to the Supreme Court by the President under Art. 317(1) as regards the members/Chairmen of State Public Service Commissions.[4] The Supreme Court has ruled that in a reference under Art. 317(1), it can go into questions of fact, summon witnesses, and record their evi-

---

1. Ram Kumar Kashyap v. Union of India, (2009) 9 SCC 378.
2. S.S. Joshi Re, (2005) 8 SCC 501.
3. (2009) 8 SCC 41, reference under Article 317(1) of the Constitution of India, Chhattisgarh Public Service Commission—Ref. No. 1 of 2006, decided on 8th July, 2009.
4. See, infra, for provisions regarding State Public Service Commissions.

dence. Upon the facts found, the Court can pronounce whether the charge of misbehaviour or incapacity has been established against the member/Chairman.[5]

The Supreme Court has ruled in the under-mentioned case[6] that the issue of misconduct of a member of the Commission does not come to an end even after the expiry of his term.

Hearing or an opportunity to show cause against a proposed reference is not contemplated.[7] There is, however, an indication of a qualification in the Court's subsequent observations to the effect that it is not necessary that principles of audi alteram partem rigorously followed in domain of service law need to be applied with same degree of rigour in proceedings involving removal and suspension of members of State Public Service Commission.[8]

In a reference against a member of the Haryana P.S.C., the Supreme Court delegated the task of recording evidence to the additional district and sessions judge at Delhi.[9]

In Ref. Punjab Public Service Commission,[10] two questions were referred to the Supreme Court: (1) Had the respondent-member slapped the lady chairperson of the Commission; (2) whether he should be removed from office? The Supreme Court answered in the affirmative. The Court pointed out that persons occupying high public offices should maintain irreproachable behavior and a certain minimum standard of code of conduct is expected of them. In the circumstances of this case, the member concerned miserably failed to maintain the standard of conduct expected of a member of the Public Service Commission and, so, he was held to be guilty of misbehaviour under Art. 317(1).

In a reference made by the President against a member of the Haryana Public Service in 1995, the Supreme Court answered the reference in the affirmative holding that the member be removed from the office of the member of the Commission on the ground of misconduct.[11]

In a reference made by the President against the Chairman of the Bihar Public Service Commission, the Court, after hearing the matter and the charges levelled against him, found that the Chairman could not be held to be guilty of any misbehaviour within the meaning of Art. 317(1) inviting action for his removal from office. Nevertheless, the Court adversely commented on his conduct as Chairman, B.P.S.C. He did not, at times, exhibit exemplary behaviour or conduct expected of him. There were many lapses on his part. The Court underlined the significance of impartiality and objectivity on the part of these Commissions in the following words:[12]

---

5. For these reference, see: In the matter of: Ref. under Art. 317(1), AIR 1983 SC 996 : (1983) 4 SCC 258; Ref. Punjab Public Service Commission, (1990) 4 SCC 262; Ref. Sher Singh, Member, State of Haryana, P.S.C., AIR 1997 SC 906; In R/o. Dr. Ram Ashray Yadav, Chairman, State of Bihar, Public Service Commission, AIR 2000 SC 1448 : (2000) 4 SCC 309.

6. See, Ref. Punjab PS, supra. Also, Ram Ashray Yadav v. State of Bihar, AIR 1998 Pat 125.

7. H.B. Mirdha Re, (2005) 6 SCC 789.

8. Ram Kumar Kashyap v. Union of India, (2009) 9 SCC 378.

9. In the matter of: Ref. under Art. 317(1), AIR 1983 SC 996 : (1983) 4 SCC 258.

10. Ref. Punjab Public Service Comm., (1990) 4 SCC 262.

11. Re: Sher Singh, supra, footnote 5.

12. In R/O Ram Ashray Yadav, AIR 2000 SC 1448 at 1456 : (2000) 4 SCC 309.

> "The credibility of the institution of Public Service Commission is founded upon faith of the common man on its proper functioning. The faith would be eroded and confidence destroyed if it appears that the Chairman or the members of the Commission act subjectively and not objectively or that their actions are suspect. Society expects honesty, integrity and complete objectivity from the chairman and members of the Commission. The Commission must act fairly, without any pressure or influence from any quarter, unbiased and impartially, so that the society does not loose confidence in the Commission. The high constitutional trustees, like the Chairman and Members of the Public Service Commission must for ever remain vigilant and conscious of these necessary adjuncts."

In this reference, the Court concluded that no charge of misbehaviour was established against Dr. Yadav, although, at times, he "did not exhibit exemplary behaviour or conduct, expected of him." There were "lapses" on his part but not "misbehaviour" within the meaning of Art. 317 of the Constitution inviting action of his removal from office under Art. 317(1).

In Joshi[13] the President made a reference to the Supreme Court in relation to the conduct of a member of Maharashtra Public Service Commission. Referring to its earlier decisions[14] the Court noticed the high character of the institutions and laid down the approach to be as to whether the materials disclosed conduct of the member (a constitutional functionary) which would be misbehaviour within the meaning of Art. 317(1) of the Constitution. Several charges were framed against her including that she did not inform the Commission that her daughter was a candidate for the examination. Her plea that the daughter ultimately did not appear for the examination was considered to be irrelevant by the Supreme Court. The Court answered the reference by opining that the member had not behaved in a manner befitting a member of constitutional body like the Public Service Commission.

The President may suspend the Chairman or a member in respect of whom a reference has been made to the Supreme Court until he passes final orders [Art. 317(2)]. The issuance of suspension orders is as per the "procedure established by law" and not in derogation of the same. Hence petitioners were not entitled to any opportunity to show cause or to be heard before orders of suspension were passed by Governor under Art. 317(2), after the President had referred a matter to Supreme Court.[15]

Further, the President is empowered to remove a member or the Chairman of the Commission [Art. 317(3)], without reference to the Supreme Court, if he—(a) is adjudged an insolvent; or (b) engages during his term of office in any paid employment outside the duties of his office; or (c) is, in the opinion of the Presi-

---

13. Sayalee Sanjeev Joshi (Smt.) Member, Maharashtra Public Service Commission, In Re, (2007) 11 SCC 547 : AIR 2007 SC 2809.

14. In the Matter of Reference under Article 317(1) of the Constitution of India, (1983) 4 SCC 258; Reference under Article 317(1) of the Constitution of India regarding Enquiry & Report on the Allegations against Sh. M. Megha Chandra Singh, Chairman, Manipur Public Service Commission, 1994 Supp (2) SCC 166 : (1994) 2 JT 63; In Re : Reference under Article 317(1) of the Constitution of India, (1990) 4 SCC 262 : AIR 1997 SC 906; Sher Singh, in Re, (1997) 3 SCC 216 : AIR 1997 SC 906; In R/O Dr. Ra, Ashray Yadav, Chairman, Bihar Public Service Commission, (2000) 4 SCC 309 : AIR 2005 SC 1448.

15. Ram Kumar Kashyap v. Union of India, (2009) 9 SCC 378.

dent, unfit to continue in office by reason of infirmity of mind and body [Art. 317(3)].

Infirmities referred to in Art. 317(3)(c) must be such as disable the member from efficient discharge of his functions. Further, the infirmity must be post-appointment. When a blind university professor was appointed as a member of the State Public Service Commission, he could not be removed on the ground of infirmity under Art. 317(3)(c) because his infirmity was pre, and not post, appointment.[16]

The question whether a member ought to be removed on the ground of infirmity is left solely to the President [i.e. the Central Executive] for determination. It is for him to determine in his subjective satisfaction whether the infirmity is of such a nature as to in capacitate the concerned member from discharging the functions of his office.[17]

According to Art. 317(4), if the Chairman or a member of the Commission becomes in any way concerned or interested in a contract or agreement made by or on behalf of the Central or the State Government, or participates in any way in the profit thereof or in any benefit or emolument arising therefrom, otherwise than as a member and in common with other members of an incorporated company, he is to be deemed to be guilty of misbehaviour for purposes of Art. 317(1).

(c) OTHER PROVISIONS

A person who holds office as a member of the Commission cannot be re-appointed to that office on the expiry of his term of office [Art. 316(3)], nor is he eligible for any other employment under the Central or the State Government [Art. 319(c)]. He can, however, be appointed as the Chairman of the Union Public Service Commission, or a State Public Service Commission [Art. 319(c)].

Article 319(c) bars "any other employment". This phrase includes even an employment by contract.[18]

The Chairman of the Commission is not eligible for any further employment either under the Government of India or under the Government of a State [Art. 319(a)]. Appointment of the Chairman of the Commission as the chairman of a statutory board which is not under the Government does not violate Art. 319(a).[19] These restrictions have been imposed on a member or the Chairman of the Commission because the Commission serves the Government and decides matters in which the Government is directly interested, viz., recruitment of persons to civil service. A Minister might possibly influence a member of the Commission by promising him something else after retirement if he recommends a certain candidate in whom the Minister may be interested.

Between the Executive and the Commission, the relation is a very close and integral one, and so the necessary precautions have to be taken.[20] Thus, to ensure that the members of the Commission discharge their duties with impartiality, it is

---

16. Jai Shankar Prasad v. State of Bihar,, (1993) 2 SCC 597 : AIR 1993 SC 1906.
17. Ibid.
18. Union of India v. U.D. Dwivedi, AIR 1997 SC 1313 : (1997) 3 SCC 182.
19. Sher Singh, Member State of Haryana, P.S.C., AIR 1997 SC 906 : (1997) 3 SCC 216.
20. VIII CAD, 259-60; IX CAD, 574.

necessary that they ought not to be able to look up to the Executive for any favour.

The Supreme Court has ruled that when a member of a Commission is appointed as its Chairman, he shall hold the new office for six years, or until the age of superannuation, whichever is earlier.[21]

The expenses of the Union Public Service Commission, including any salaries, allowances and pensions payable to or in respect of the members of the staff of the Commission, are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India [Art. 322].[22] This provision frees the Commission from parliamentary pressure.

The President may by regulations make provisions with respect to the number of the staff of the Commission and their conditions of service [Art. 318].

It is clear from the above provisions that every precaution has been taken by the framers of the Constitution to ensure independence of the members of the Commission and to immunize the Commission from political pressures. The expenses of the Commission have been charged on the Consolidated Fund, and so the Commission has been rendered free from Parliamentary pressure. Provisions immunizing the Commission from the Executive influence are: restriction on varying the conditions of service to the disadvantage of a member after his appointment; fixed tenure of the members; removal of the members only after a verdict of the Supreme Court; and restrictions on their re-employment after retirement from the commission.

(d) FUNCTIONS OF THE COMMISSION

It is the duty of the Union Public Service Commission to conduct examinations for appointment to the services of the Union [Art. 320(1)]. This does not mean that the examination should always be competitive and not selective. The object of holding the examination is to test the capacity of the candidates and just to have an idea whether a particular candidate is fit for the proposed appointment or not. In addition to the results of the examination, other considerations may also be kept in view in making appointments, e.g., the viva voce test.[23]

PSCs must scrupulously follow the statutory rules during recruitment and in making appointment.[24]

The Commission, if requested for the purpose by two or more States, has to assist those States in framing and operating schemes for joint recruitment for any services for which candidates possessing special qualifications are required [Art. 320(2)].

Under Art. 320(3), the Commission has many advisory functions to discharge. It is to be consulted on—

(i) All matters relating to methods of recruitment to civil services and for civil posts [Art. 320(2)(a)].[25]

---

21. State of Mysore v. R.V. Bidap, AIR 1973 SC 2555 : (1974) 3 SCC 337.
22. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(h).
23. Kesava v. State of Mysore, AIR 1956 Mys 20.
On viva voce test see, supra, Chs. XXI and XXIII, Sec. B(b).
24. Inder Parkash Gupta v. State of J&K, (2004) 6 SCC 786 : AIR 2004 SC 2523.
25. See Art. 146(1), Proviso, regarding appointment of officers and servants of the Supreme Court, supra.

The provision is directory and not mandatory and any appointment by the Government without consulting the Commission would not be invalid.[26]

(ii) The principles to be followed in making appointments to civil services and posts, in making promotions and transfers from one service to another, and on the suitability of candidates for such appointments, promotions or transfers [Art. 320(3)(b)].[27]

(iii) All disciplinary matters affecting a person serving under the Government in a civil capacity, including memorials or petitions relating to such matters [Art. 320(3)(c)]. This provision has been discussed below.

(iv) Any claim by or in respect of a person in government service in a civil capacity, that any costs incurred by him in defending proceedings instituted against him in respect of acts done or purported to be done in execution of his duty should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund of India [Art. 320(3)(d)].

(v) Any claim for the award of a pension in respect of injuries sustained by a person while in a government service, in a civil capacity, and any question as to the amount of any such award [Art. 320(3)(e)].

It is the duty of the Commission to advise the President on any matter referred to it by him. However, the President is empowered to frame regulations specifying the matters in which either generally, or in any particular class of cases or circumstances, it is not necessary to consult the Commission [Proviso to Art. 320(3)]. Such regulations are to be laid before each House of Parliament for not less than 14 days as soon as possible after they have been made. The regulations are subject to such modifications, whether by way of repeal or amendment, as both Houses of Parliament may make during the session in which they are so laid [Art. 320(5)].

The Commission need not be consulted in the following cases:

1. While making reservations of appointments or posts in favour of any backward class of citizens which, in the opinion of the Government, is not adequately represented. Such a power has been conferred on the Government under Art. 16(4) [Art. 320(4)].[28]

2. While taking into consideration, under Art. 335, the claims of the Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes in making appointments to the Central Services [Art. 320(4)].

3. Under proviso to Art. 320(3), the President as respects the all-India services and other services or posts for the Centre, may make regulations specifying the matters in which either generally, or in any particular cases, it will not be necessary to consult the Public Service

---

26. On the analogy of Art. 320(3)(c), see below; Dambarudhar v. State of Orissa, AIR 1960 Ori 62; H.S. Bedi v. Patiala, AIR 1953 Pepsu 196.

27. See, B.N. Nagarajan v. State of Mysore, AIR 1966 SC 1943 : (1966) 3 SCR 682; Md. Israils v. State of West Bengal, AIR 2002 SC 511 : (2002) 2 SCC 306.

28. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. E.

Commission. Similarly, the Governor can do in relation to the State Services.

Parliament may by law confer additional functions on the Commission regarding services of the Union, public institution, or a corporation created by law [Art. 321]. It has been held that besides the functions conferred on the Commission by the Constitution, other functions can be conferred on the Commission only by way of legislation and not by way of a departmental arrangement between Government and the Commission.[29]

Every year, the Commission presents to the President a report of the work done by it. The report, together with the Government's memorandum explaining the cases where the Commission's advice was not accepted, and the reasons for such non-acceptance, is to be laid before each House of Parliament. This constitutes a safeguard against arbitrary action on the part of the Executive in rejecting the Commission's advice [Art. 323(1)].

The Mysore High Court has held that since the Commission is an advisory or a consultative body to the Government, and also because under Art. 323 the Government has to explain the reasons for non-acceptance of the Commission's advice, it is not open to the Commission to withhold any information wanted by the Government.[30]

An important function of the Commission is that of giving advice in matters of discipline affecting a civil servant. The relevant provision is Art. 320(3)(c) according to which the Commission 'shall' be consulted on all disciplinary matters affecting a person serving under the Government of India in a civil capacity.

Consultation with the Commission on disciplinary matters affecting the civil servants has been provided for in order, first, to assure the Services that a wholly independent body, not directly concerned with the making of orders adversely affecting public servants, has considered with an open mind, the action proposed to be taken against a particular public servant; and, secondly, to make available to the Government an unbiased advice and opinion on matters vitally affecting the morale of the public services.

The phrase "all disciplinary matters affecting a person" in Art. 320(3)(c) is sufficiently comprehensive to include any kind of disciplinary action proposed to be taken in respect of a particular person.[31] The advice of the Commission is not however binding on the Government. But even so, the Government should consult the Commission, when it proposes to take any disciplinary action against a public servant, not as a mere formality, but with a view to getting proper assistance in assessing the guilt or otherwise of the person proceeded against and the suitability and adequacy of the penalty proposed to be imposed. Once Government takes action against a servant in consultation with the Commission, it is not necessary to consult it again when the servant files a review petition with the higher authorities.[32]

---

29. Mira Chatterji v. Public Service Comm., AIR 1958 Cal. 345.
30. Kesava v. State of Mysore, AIR 1956 Mys. 20.
31. Pradyat Kumar v. Chief Justice, Calcutta High Court, AIR 1956 SC 285 : 1955 (2) SCR 1331.
32. Joseph John v. Travancore-Cochin, AIR 1955 SC 160 : 1955 (1) SCR 1011.

The Supreme Court has held in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Manbodhan Lal Srivastava[33] that Art. 320(3)(c) is not mandatory. In that case, the Government of U.P. had reduced an officer in rank. The officer alleged that there was irregularity in the consultation of the State Commission by the Government. The Supreme Court was, therefore, called upon to decide whether irregularity in, though not complete absence of, consultation with the State Public Service Commission could enable the officer concerned to challenge the order passed by the Government. The procedure adopted in the case fulfilled the requirements of Art. 311.

The Supreme Court held that Art. 320(3)(c) does not confer any rights on a public servant so that the absence of, or any irregularity in, consultation would not afford him a cause of action in a Court of law. The main reasons for this view are:

(1) The opinion of the Commission has not been made binding on the Government. In the absense of such a binding character, it is difficult to see how non-compliance with this provision could have the effect of nullifying the final order passed by the Government. If the opinion of the Commission were binding on the government, it could have been argued with some force that non-compliance with the rule for consultation would have been fatal to the validity of the order proposed to be passed against a public servant.

(2) The Constitution does not provide for the contingency as to what is to happen in the event of non-compliance with this provision. It does not either expressly or impliedly provide that non-compliance will invalidate to the final order of the Government.

(3) The proviso to Article 320 itself indicates that in certain cases or classes of cases, the Commission need not be consulted. The President may make regulations to take away the protection of Art. 320(3)(c) in certain cases or classes of cases.

Though Manbodhan referred to the State Commission yet the same principle would apply to the Union Commission as well because Art. 320(3)(c) is common to both. The Manbodhan ruling has been reiterated by the Supreme Court in several cases.[34]

The efficacy of Art. 320(3)(c) has been very much diluted by the Supreme Court's decision in Manbodhan. There have been cases where action has been taken by the Government against its servants without consulting the Commission, and the Courts have had occasion to pass strictures against such a practice of ignoring Art. 320(3)(c) and not consulting the Commission. This has happened mostly at the State level.[35]

Not only Art. 320(3)(c), but the whole of Art. 320(3) has been held to be directory and not mandatory.[36] The recommendations made by the Commission are only advisory and it is for the Government to accept them or not. The only safe-

---

33. AIR 1957 SC 912 : 1958 SCR 533.

34. See, U.R. Bhatt v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1344 : 1962 (1) LLJ 656; Ram Gopal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 158 : (1969) 2 SCC 240.

35. See, for example, Durga v. State of Punjab, AIR 1957 Punj 97.

36. A.N. D'Silva v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1130 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 968; State of Haryana v. Subash Chander Marwaha, (1974) 2 SCC 220 : AIR 1973 SC 2216; Jatinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, (1985) 1 SCC 122 : AIR 1984 SC 1850.

guard is Art. 323 which makes the Government answerable to the legislature for departing from the Commission's recommendation.

The ruling in Manbodhan needs to be contrasted with the ruling in Dinakar.[37] A rule (Rule 4A) made by the Maharashtra Government said that the Government "may, in consultation with the Maharashtra Public Service Commission" (MPSC) make appointments in relaxation of the percentage fixed for promotees and directly appointed persons. The Supreme Court was called upon to consider the question whether under this rule consultation with the Commission was "directory" or "mandatory". The Court ruled that the word "may" in the rule ought to mean "shall" making consultation mandatory.

The Court made no reference to Manbodhan. Rejecting the argument that "may" used in the Rule is "directory", the Court observed that "….to give such a meaning would render the very object of consultation with MPSC wherever necessary nugatory. It would give unbridled power to the Government to dispense with the consultation with MPSC which may result into arbitrary exercise of powers by the authority." "This could never be the object of Rule 4-A. In our considered view, the word 'may' must mean "shall"…."[38]

There seems to be no reason as to why the logic of Dinakar ought not to be applied to the interpretation of Art. 320(3)(c). In view of Dinakar, the Manbodhan ruling calls for reconsideration by the Supreme Court.

(e) STAFF OF THE SUPREME COURT

The members of the staff of the Supreme Court do not fall within the purview of Art. 320(3)(c). Though they are the persons appointed to the public services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Union (as their salaries are paid out of the Consolidated Fund of India), yet they are not persons serving 'under the Government of India in a civil capacity' which phrase has reference to such persons in respect of whom the administrative control is vested in the Central Government functioning in the name of the President.

The administrative control in respect of the staff of the Supreme Court is vested in the Chief Justice who has the power to appoint, remove, and make rules for their conditions of service.[39] While the constitutional safeguards under Art. 311 are available to every person in the civil service including persons employed in the Supreme Court, the safeguard in Art. 320(3)(c) is not available to the staff of the Supreme Court, otherwise it would be contrary to the implications of Art. 146.[40]

(ii) STATE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

(a) COMPOSITION

The Constitution establishes a Public Service Commission in each State [Art. 315(1)]. It is possible for two or more States to have a Joint Public Service Commission [Art. 315(2)].

---

37. Dinakar Anna Patil v. State of Maharashtra, (1999) 1 SCC 354 : 1999 SCC (L&S) 216.
38. Ibid 365. Also, Keshav Chandra Joshi v. Union of India, (1992) Supp (1) SCC 272 : AIR 1991 SC 284.
39. Pradyat Kumar v. Chief Justice, AIR 1956 SC 285 : 1955 (2) SCR 1331.
40. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I.

The basic policy of the Constitution is that each State should have its own Public Service Commission, but if for administrative or financial reasons it is not possible for each State to have a Commission of its own, two or more States may have a Joint Public Service Commission.

A Joint Commission for several States may be established by Parliament by law if a resolution to that effect is passed by each State Legislature concerned [Art. 315(2) & (3)]. Even the Union Public Service Commission, if requested by a State Governor to do so, may, with the approval of the President, agree to serve all or any of the needs of a State [Art. 315(4)].

The composition of the State Commissions is governed by the same constitutional provisions as apply to the Union Commission. Thus, a State Commission consists of a Chairman and several members who are appointed by the Governor [Art. 316(1)]. In case of a Joint Commission, the President makes these appointments [Art. 316(1)]. Like the U.P.S.C., as nearly as may be, one half of the members of a State Commission should be persons who have held a government office for at least ten years at the date of their appointment to the Commission [Proviso to Art. 316(1)].[41]

The Governor of the State (the President in case of a Joint Commission) may by regulations determine the number of members of the Commission and their conditions of service [Art. 318]. The conditions of service of a member cannot be varied to his disadvantage after his appointment [Proviso to Art. 318].

All provisions regarding the tenure of a member of the Union Commission apply mutatis mutandis to a member of a State Commission except with the following differences:

(1) The age of retirement of a member of a State Commission is 62 years instead of 65 years as in the case of a member of the U.P.S.C.

(2) To resign, a member of a State Commission writes to the Governor and a member of a Joint Commission to the President [Arts. 316 and 317].

The expenses of the State Commission are charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State [Art. 322].[42] The Governor makes provisions with respect to the number of the Commission's staff and their conditions of service.

Under Art. 317(1), the President makes a reference to the Supreme Court the question of misbehavior committed by the Chairman or a member of the State Public Service Commission for inquiry and report. If the Court reports that he should be removed from office on any such ground, then the President shall remove him.[43]

An interesting point concerning the State Public Service Commissions may be noted. While appointment of the Chairman or members of the State Commission is made by the State Governor (Art. 316(1)), the power to remove any of these

---

41. Supra, Sec. K(i)(a).
42. Supra, Ch. VI.
43. For discussion on Art. 317(1), see, supra, 1753.

persons on the ground of misconduct vests in the President, and not the Governor. It is the President who makes a reference to the Supreme Court under Art. 317(1).

Under Art. 317(2) the governor has power to suspend a member/chairman of the State Public Service Commission in respect of whom a reference has been made to the Supreme Court under Art. 317(1).[44]

In Sayalee Sanjeev Joshi[45] the Court has propounded the approach to its exercise of jurisdiction on a reference. Its task is to find out as a fact whether materials disclosed conduct on the part of a member which, would constitute 'misbehaviour' within Art. 317 (1) of the Constitution. It has to consider admissibility and relevance of evidence adduced and cannot proceed on the basis of suspicion instead of proof.

A person holding office as a member of a State Commission is not to be reappointed on expiry of his term [Art. 316(3)]. The Chairman of a State Commission can be appointed as the Chairman or member of the Union Public Service Commission, or as the Chairman of any other State Commission, but not to any post under the Central or the State Government [Art. 319(b)]. A member, other than the Chairman, of a State Commission is eligible for appointment as the Chairman or member of the Union Public Service Commission, or as the Chairman of that State Commission, or of any other State Commission, but is not eligible for any other employment either under the Central or the State Government [Art. 319(d)].

It has been ruled by the Supreme Court in Hargovind Pant v. Raghukual Tilak,[46] that a member of a State Public Service Commission can be appointed as the Governor of a State. The main reason for this ruling being that the office of the Governor, is a high constitutional office and cannot be said to be under the Government of India.

(b) FUNCTIONS OF THE STATE COMMISSION

A State Public Service Commission discharges all those functions in respect of the State Services as does the Union Commission in relation to the Union Services. Therefore, the discussion under this heading for the U.P.S.C. holds good mutatis mutandis for a State Commission as well with this difference, however, that instead of the 'Union', 'President', and 'Parliament' the 'State', 'Governor' and the 'State Legislature' may be substituted [Art. 320].

The protection of Art. 320(3)(c) does not apply to the staff of the High Court and, therefore, the Chief Justice need not consult the State Public Service Commission when he dismisses a High Court employee.[47]

In case of subordinate judges, the Governor is to act on the recommendation of the High Court and need not consult the Public Service Commission for removal

---

44. Ram Ashray Yadav v. State of Bihar, AIR 1998 Pat. 125
45. (2007) 11 SCC 547 : AIR 2007 SC 2924.
46. AIR 1979 SC 1109.
Also see, *su*pra, Ch. VII, Sec. A(I)(b).
47. Pradyat Kumar v. C.J. of Calcutta H.C., AIR 1956 SC 285 : 1955 (2) SCR 1331; supra, 709.

of any such officer.[48] "There is no room for any outside body between the Governor and the High Court." In the instant case, the order of the Governor passed on the advice of the Commission (contrary to the advice of the High Court) was held to be constitutionally invalid and was thus quashed.[49]

The State Legislature may impose additional functions on the State Commission regarding the State Services, local authority, public institutions or any other corporate authority constituted by law [Art. 321].

The State Commission is to be consulted by the Governor while framing rules for appointment to judicial service other than the posts of District Judges [Art. 234].

The State Commission is to present to the Governor an annual report of the work done by it. The report and the Governor's memorandum explaining as respects the cases where the Commission's advice was not accepted and the reasons for such non-acceptance, are to be laid before the State Legislature [Art. 323(2)]. A Joint Commission presents a similar report to each of the concerned State Governors and each Governor then takes the action as detailed above [Art. 323(2)].

In Hariharan[50] a statutory provision requiring the Electricity Board to consult the State Public Service Commission in the matter of appointment of assistant engineers has been held to be mandatory.

The Supreme Court has ruled that a member of the Commission could not question the validity or correctness of the functions performed or duties discharged by the Public Service Commission as a body. A member is regarded as a party to the function discharged or duty performed by the Commission, even though the member concerned might have been a dissenting member, or a member in a minority, or a member who abstained from participation in the function performed or duty discharged.[51]

From time to time, the Supreme Court has cautioned the State Public Service Commissions to work as independent institutions without being pressurized by any one. For example, the Court has observed in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Rafiquddin:[52]

> "The Public Service Commission is a constitutional and independent authority. It plays a pivotal role in the selection and appointment of persons to public services. It secures efficiency in the public administration by selecting suitable and efficient persons for appointment to the services. The Commission has to perform its functions, and duties in an independent and objective manner unin-

---

48. State of Haryana v. Inder Prakash, AIR 1976 SC 1841 : (1976) 2 SCC 977; Baldev Raj v. Punjab & Haryana High Court, AIR 1976 SC 2490 : (1976) 4 SCC 201.

49. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G.

50. R. Hariharan v. K. Balachandran Nair, AIR 2000 SC 2933 : (2000) 7 SCC 399.
Also see, State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Mrs. Raj Dulari Razdan, AIR 1979 SC 586 : (1979) 1 SCC 461.

51. Bihar Public Service Commission v. S.J. Thakur, AIR 1994 SC 2466 : 1994 Supp (3) SCC 220.

52. AIR 1988 SC 162, 177 : 1987 Supp SCC 401.

> fluenced by the dictates of any other authority. It is not subservient to the directions of the Government unless such directions were permissible by law…."

The Public Service Commission is expected to be fair and impartial and to function free from any influence from any quarter. Unfortunately, these bodies have not always maintained these high standards in some of the States. This comes out clearly from the number of cases referred to the Supreme Court under art. 317(1).[53] All these cases refer to the State Public Service Commissions.

The Supreme Court has suggested that the Public Service Commissions must be made more functional, their efficacy be streamlined by appointing thereto people of eminence, experience and competence with undoubted integrity; recruit the candidates for posts in accordance with the rules and backdoor entry by nepotism be put an end to. The Court has also advised that the power under the proviso to Art. 320(3) be used sparingly. Free play of exercise of the power under the proviso to Art. 320(3) would undermine the efficacy of constitutional institutions, viz., the Public Service Commissions.[54]

53. Supra, Sec. K(i)(b).
54. V. Sreenivasa Reddy v. Govt. of A.P., AIR 1995 SC 586 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 572.

PART VI

MISCELLANEOUS TOPICS

CHAPTER XXXVII

OBLIGATIONS

SYNOPSIS

A. SUCCESSION TO OBLIGATIONS

Arts. 294 to 297 deal with succession by the Central Government and State Governments to the property, rights, liabilities etc. of the various Governments functioning in India in the pre-Constitution era.

To appreciate the significance of these Constitutional provisions, it is necessary to remember that before 1947, India was a part of the British Empire; India was then partitioned into India and Pakistan, and India became a republic in 1950, with the inauguration of the new Constitution. Also, before 1947, India was divided into British India and the Princely India.

The British India was divided into several administrative units known as the Governors' Provinces. These Provinces became Part A States under the new Constitution. The Princely India consisted of a number of States under the Indian rulers and by merger out of these States were formed several Part B States in the new Constitution. In course of time, the nomenclature, Part A and Part B States, has been dropped from the Constitution, and all States have been placed on an equal footing,[1] but Arts. 294 and 297 still use the old nomenclature—States of Part A and Part B.

By virtue of Art. 294(a), all property and assets which were vested in His Majesty (i.e., British King), immediately before the commencement of the Constitution, for the purposes of the Government of the Dominion of India, or a Governor's Province, became vested in the Union and the corresponding State under the present Constitution.

Article 294(b) vests in the Government of India, and the corresponding State, all rights, liabilities and obligations of the Government of the Dominion of India, or of a Governor's Province, whether arising out of contract or otherwise.

Article 294 declares which property would vest in the Union and which would vest in the State Government. In determining the property, assets, rights, liabilities and obligations of the Government immediately before the Constitution, the adjustments made as a result of the partition of India into India and Pakistan were to be taken into account. The assumption of the liabilities under Art. 294(b) does in no way derogate from the legislative power either of Parliament or a State legislature under the Constitution.[2]

The application of these constitutional provisions is illustrated by Krishan Saran v. State of Uttar Pradesh.[3] The right to run a ferry in a village across the Ganges was conferred on the petitioner by the East India Co. in 1781. The obligation and engagement thus incurred by the Company were assumed by the Government of India under the Government of India Act, 1858, and then by the State concerned under the new Constitution. Therefore, the right granted by the Company in respect of the ferry continued to operate unless taken away or destroyed by some valid law.[4]

Under Art. 295(1)(a) and Art. 295(1)(b), all property and assets, and all rights and obligations, contractual or otherwise, which were vested in or imposed on any Indian State (corresponding to a Part B State), immediately before the commencement of the Constitution, became vested in the Union, if the purpose for which the property and assets were held, or obligations imposed, fell within the Union List. The provisions of Arts. 295(1)(a) and (b) were subject to any agreement entered into in that behalf by the Government of India with the Government of that State.

Under Art. 295(2), the Government of each Part B State, as from the commencement of the Constitution, succeeded to all property, assets, rights, liabilities and obligations, vested in the corresponding Indian State, whether arising out of contract or otherwise, other than those referred to in Art. 295(1).

The wordings of Art. 295, not only denote a transference of the rights, liabilities and obligations to the Government of India, or to the State Government concerned, but also bind it to the obligations transferred to it and it is duty bound to discharge them. A few examples of the working of these constitutional provisions may be furnished here.

---

1. Supra, Chap. V.
2. Umeg Singh v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 540 : (1955) 2 SCR 164.
3. AIR 1957 All 455.
4. Also see, Union of India v. Mundra Salt and Chemical Industries, AIR 2001 SC 203 : (2001) 1 SCC 222.

(i) Railways belong to the Union List (Entry 22, List I)[5] and, therefore, the liability of Madhya Bharat (a State) in respect of the Scindia State Railway (an enterprise run by the erstwhile Gwalior State—a Princely State), became the liability of the Government of India under the new Constitution. Hence, a suit for wrongful dismissal of an employee of the Scindia State Railway before its transfer to the Centre lay against the Union of India.[6]

(ii) The plaintiff retired from the service of Navanagar State (a Princely State) in 1937, but his pension was sanctioned by the State only in 1948. Thereafter, Navanagar was merged with Saurashtra and the Saurashtra Government agreed to continue his pension. The plaintiff, however, sued the Saurashtra Government for arrears of pension for the period of 1937 to 1948. His claim was rejected on the ground that he could not have sued Navanagar State for the arrears, as under the rules then prevailing in that State, pension could not be claimed as a matter of right. Accordingly, it was held that the Saurashtra Government was under no liability under Art. 295(2) to pay the arrears.[7]

An obligation flowing to the Centre or a State under Art. 295, can be nullified or abrogated by passing a law either by Parliament, or the State Legislature, as the case may be, provided there is nothing in the Constitution against enactment of such a law.[8]

The Maharajah of Gwalior by an order on 18-1-47 exempted from income-tax for 12 years a company set up by Birla Brothers in the State. In 1948, Gwalior merged with Madhya Bharat, and in 1950-51, assessment proceedings were started against Birla Bros., as the law levying income taxation was extended to Madhya Bharat.

The company's claim for exemption in terms of the Maharajah's order was negatived by the Supreme Court. The Court ruled that there was nothing in the Constitution restraining the power of Parliament to levy income-tax in the State. Art. 295(1) only provided that liabilities and obligations of the Government of India would be the same as in the case of the princely State which originally entered into contract. Therefore, the Government of India would have the same defences to such a contract as the previous Indian State would have had, and, if the contract could be affected by legislation previously, it could be equally affected after Art. 295(1)(b). The fact that the obligation of the Ruler of Gwalior under the said agreement devolved eventually on the Centre, by virtue of Art. 295(1)(b), did not take away the power of Parliament to pass a valid law within its competence, which did not transgress any constitutional limits, even though it might completely supersede the obligation arising out of the said agreement.[9]

The process of integration of the several princely States with the Indian Union passed through several stages. Before 1947, these States were under the suzerainty of the British Crown. This suzerainty came to an end with the passage of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, by the British Parliament. Thereafter, these States acceded to the Indian Union through instruments of accession. As most of

---

5. Supra, Ch. X.
6. Union of India v. Tej Narain, AIR 1957 MB 108.
7. Somchand Karamchand v. Saurashtra, AIR 1953 Sau. 21.
8. Supra, Ch. X.
9. Union of India v. Gwalior Rayon Silk Mfg. (Wvg.) Co. Ltd., AIR 1964 SC 1903 : (1964) 7 SCR 892.

the princely States were small and were not viable as such, they were merged inter se to form bigger units. Thereafter, these bigger units formed Part B States under the new Constitution as stated above.

Before 1947, many princely States had granted various concessions and assumed various obligations. After the inauguration of the Constitution of India in 1950, questions arose how far the respective Part B States, or the Centre, were liable for these obligations. The courts took the view that the merger of the princely States inter se, was an 'act of state';[10] a new sovereignty was created thereby which could have repudiated the obligations of the previous princely States. Against this new sovereignty, only such rights could be availed of as were recognised by it expressly or impliedly. When the Constitution came into force, only such previous obligations and liabilities could be enforced against a Part B State, or the Central Government, as the case may be, as had been recognised, and not repudiated, in the pre-Constitution era by the concerned Government.

After the Constitution came into force, the concerned Government could have abrogated the previous liabilities and obligations but only by acting within the terms of the Constitution. If the previous obligation had a statutory basis, the new successor Government could have passed a law if it had competence to do so under the Constitution. If the previous obligation was based in an agreement or administrative order, then the same could be abrogated either by an administrative order or law depending upon the circumstances of each case.

A was an employee of Wadhwan, a princely State. A Wadhwan law fixed the age of superannuation at 60. Wadhwan merged with Saurashtra in June, 1948. Saurashtra became a Part B State in 1950 when it retired A at the age of 55. A's claim for compensation for premature retirement was upheld by the Supreme Court.[11] A had a right under the Wadhwan law to remain in service till the age of 60 years. On merger, the State of Saurashtra, before 1950, could have repudiated the obligation as an 'act of state', but that was not done. The new State did not repeal the Wadhwan law. A's right was carried over after the new Constitution. A became an Indian citizen under the Constitution, and the state could not then repudiate its liability towards A as an 'act of state,' as there can be no 'act of state' between a State and its citizens.[12] A's rights could only be defeated by legislation, which had not been enacted.

The Supreme Court adopted a similar approach in Virendra Singh v. State of U.P.[13] In 1948, a Ruler of an Indian State granted a few villages to the petitioner. After the State acceded to the Indian Union, the Government sought to revoke the grant by an executive order. The Supreme Court held that the grant could be revoked only by law and not by executive order because, after the enforcement of the new Constitution, there could be no 'act of state' between the Sovereign and its own subjects.

Dalmia Dadri Cement Co., obtained some concessions in 1938 from the Ruler of Jind. In 1948, Jind merged with several other States to form a bigger unit known as the Patiala Union. By a law promulgated by it, the Union abrogated all laws operating in all the former States, and made the laws prevailing in the

---

10. See below, Sec. B, for explanation of this concept.
11. Bholanath J. Thaker v. Saurashtra, AIR 1954 SC 680 : (1955) 1 LLJ 355.
12. Infra, Sec. B.
13. AIR 1954 SC 447 : (1955) 1 SCR 415.

Patiala State uniformly applicable throughout the Union. The Union then became a Part B State of the Indian Union and the Income-tax Act became applicable to it.

The Company claimed exemption from payment of income tax by virtue of the concession originally granted to it by the Jind Ruler. The Supreme Court rejected the contention because when the State merged, a new sovereignty was created; the rights granted by the States could be enforced against the Patiala Union only if it recognised them by conduct or an affirmative declaration. The Patiala Union did not affirm the contract between the company and the Jind Ruler. On the other hand, it abrogated all those rights by abrogating all old laws prevailing in the various States and applying the Patiala laws throughout. The Patiala Union not having assumed the obligation, it could not pass it to the Part B State or the Central Government and so the company was liable to be taxed.

The company had also argued that the law of the Patiala Union abrogating previous rights was inconsistent with the merger covenant signed by the State Rulers to form the Union. The Supreme Court ruled that the merger covenant was a matter between independent sovereigns, an 'act of state' pure and simple, and no resident of any of the merging States could enforce any of its terms in the municipal courts of the Union. The newly formed Sovereign was free to recognise or not the rights of the subjects of the merging States.[14]

A resident of Dholpur, a Princely State, secured a permit to export chuni in 1947 and deposited Rs. 30,000 as advance for export duty. He could export only a part of it till December, 1947, when the permit expired. He was entitled to the refund of the proportionate export duty for the quantity of chuni not exported under the Dholpur Law. In the meantime, Dholpur merged with the Matsya Union which was again merged with the United State of Rajasthan which then became a Part B State of Rajasthan on Jan. 26, 1950. The respondent filed a suit for refund of money against Rajasthan, and the Supreme Court upheld his contention.[15] The Court held that when the new State continued all the old laws until altered or repealed, it must have intended to respect all rights, and assume all liabilities, arising under the old laws. Under Art. 295(2), the liability ultimately fell on Rajasthan.

The basic difference between Shyam Lal and Dalmia Dadri was that in the latter case, the old laws were repealed and, thus, repudiated, while in the former, the old laws were continued and nothing was done to repudiate the past obligations.

B. ACT OF STATE

In many cases, mentioned above, the courts have utilised the concept of 'act of state' to free the Government from any liability. It is, therefore, necessary to have some idea of this concept.

Under the English law, an act of state is an act of the Government as a matter of policy performed in the course of its relations with another foreign State, or

---

14. Dalmia Dadri Cement Co. v. Commr., Income-tax, AIR 1958 SC 816 : 1959 SCR 729.
Also see, Amar Singhji v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1955 SC 504 : (1955) 2 SCR 303; Amarchand Butail v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 1658.

15. State of Rajasthan v. Shyam Lal, AIR 1964 SC 1495 : (1964) 7 SCR 174. Also, Sudhansusekhar v. Orissa, AIR 1961 SC 196 : (1961) 1 SCR 779.

during its relations with the subjects of that State, unless they are temporarily within the allegiance of the British Crown.

An act of state is an act of a Sovereign against another Sovereign, or an alien outside its territory. It is a sovereign act which is not grounded in law. As an act of state derives its authority not from municipal law, but from ultra-legal or supra-legal means, municipal courts have no power to examine its propriety or legality. There is legal immunity in respect of acts done by the State against an alien outside its territory.[16] An act of state cannot be questioned, or made the subject of legal proceedings. in a municipal Court. But there cannot be an act of state by the government against its own citizens.[17]

The principles were applied in India in a number of cases in the pre-Constitution era. In Nabab of Carnatic v. East India Co.,[18] a suit brought by the Nabab against the East India Company for an account of rents of his territories while in Company's possession under a political treaty between the Company and the Nabab, was dismissed as it was a matter between two Sovereigns, the Company having acted throughout in its political capacity.

In East India Co. v. Syed Ally,[19] the resumption by the Madras Government of a jagir granted by the former Nabab of Carnatic before the date of cession to the East India Co., was held to be an act of sovereign power and so exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts.

In Secretary of State v. Kamachee Boyee Sahaba,[20] a claim was made to the properties seized by the East India Company on the death of Raja of Tanjore without heirs. The Privy Council held that as the act was an act of state which was not grounded in municipal law, the courts had no jurisdiction in the matter, for transactions between independent States were governed by laws other than the municipal law.

In Ex-Raja of Coorg v. East India Co.,[21] the Company had made war against the Raja of Coorg, annexed his territory, and taken his property. The Raja filed a suit against the Company but it was dismissed on the ground that the Company had acted in its sovereign capacity.

There can be no act of state between a State and its subjects. An act done by a State against its citizens is not immune from judicial scrutiny; its legality and validity must be tested under the municipal law and in municipal courts.[22]

The above-mentioned principle can be illustrated by reference to Forester v. Secretary of State.[23] The Government of India on the death of Begum Sumroo, resumed property formerly belonging to her. The legality of this action was questioned by her heirs. It appeared that the Begum had not acquired the position of a Sovereign, that she was a British subject at the time of her death, and that the seizure of territories was not by arbitrary power belonging to a Sovereign, but was resumption, under colour of legal title, of lands previously held from the

---

16. Eshugbayi Eleko v. Govt. of Nigeria, 1931 AC 662; Johnstone v. Pedlar, (1921) 2 AC 262.
17. B.K. Mohapatra v. State of Orissa, AIR 1988 SC 24 : 1987 Supp SCC 553.
18. 30 ER 391 and 521 (1791-93).
19. 7 MIA 555 (1827).
20. 7 MIA 476.
21. 54 ER 642 (1860).
22. P.V. Rao v. Khusaldas, AIR 1949 Bom. 277, 287.
23. I.A. Supp. Vol., 10.

Government by a subject under a particular tenure, on the alleged determination of that tenure. It was held that, as the seizure of land was under colour of title, it could not be an act of state and the questions raised in the suit were cognizable by a municipal Court.

These principles have been applied in independent India as well. Acquisition of territory by a sovereign State for the first time is an act of state, and it does not matter whether the acquisition has been brought about by conquest or cession.[24] An inhabitant of the acquired territory can have only such rights as the new Sovereign recognizes and the rights he had under the preceding rule avail him nothing. The merger of princely States with India is an act of state.[25]

The above-mentioned principle was applied in the Dalmia Dadri case noted above.[26] In Saurashtra v. Memon Haji Ismail,[27] the administration of the princely State of Junagadh, was taken over by the Government of India, and some property previously gifted by the former Nabab of Junagadh was resumed. The Supreme Court held that Junagadh was a sovereign State when its administration was assumed by the Indian Government and the State subjects were aliens and not Indian citizens at the time, and, therefore, the resumption of the property was an act of state, for which no action could be brought in a Court.

Certain rights created by a princely State in the State forests on the eve of its merger with the Indian Union were repudiated by the Government of Bombay which took over the administration of the State. The Supreme Court held in State of Gujarat v. Vora Fiddali[28] that merger was an act of state and the grantees under the previous ruler did not carry with them, on a change of sovereignty, any inchoate rights as against the new Sovereign.

The State of Bharatpur established a mandi at Bharatpur, and agreed to grant to the prospective buyers of plots a concession of 25 per cent in the customs duty on all goods imported from outside into the mandi and sold for consumption within the State as well as on export of goods from the mandi. The appellant purchased a plot in the mandi in 1946. Thereafter the State of Bharatpur merged with the Matsya Union which then merged with the Rajasthan State which abolished all free mandis. Thereupon, the appellant filed a suit to recover the excess amount of customs duty paid to the Rajasthan Government. The Supreme Court decided against the appellant.[29] The Court ruled that the successor State did not automatically inherit the rights and obligations of the merged State. The contractual obligations of the preceding State could bind the succeeding sovereign State only if it recognised, either expressly or impliedly, those obligations.

Accession of one State to another is an 'act of state' and the subjects of the former State may claim protection of only such rights as the new Sovereign recognises as enforceable in its municipal courts. Even if an obligation was recognized by the new Government, the Legislature would still be competent to enact a

---

24. Promod v. State of Orissa, AIR 1962 SC 1288 : (1962) 1 Supp SCR 405.
25. B.K. Mohapatra v. State of Orissa, AIR 1988 SC 24 : 1987 Supp SCC 553.
26. Supra, footnote 14.
Also see, Virendra Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 447 : (1955) 1 SCR 415; State of Madras v. Rajagopalan, AIR 1955 SC 817 : (1955) 2 SCR 817.
27. AIR 1959 SC 1383 : (1960) 1 SCR 537.
28. AIR 1964 SC 1043 : (1964) 6 SCR 461.
29. Firm Bansidhar Premsukhdas v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1967 SC 40 : 1966 Supp SCR 81.

law altering the terms and conditions of a previous contract, or of a grant under which the liability of the Government arose. The legislative competence of Parliament, or of the State Legislatures can only be circumscribed by an express prohibition contained in the Constitution itself. Without there being any provision in the Constitution prohibiting legislation on the subject, there is no fetter on the plenary powers of the legislature to legislate on the topics enumerated in the relevant lists.[30]

Accordingly, in Maharaja Shree Umaid Mills Ltd. v. Union of India,[31] it was held that there is nothing in Article 295 of the Consitution which prohibits Parliament from enacting a law altering the terms and conditions of a contract, or of a grant, under which the liability of the Government of India arises, or to impose excise duty or income tax in territories which became Part B States, and no such prohibition can be read into Article 295 by virtue of some contract entered into with any person by the then ruler of an Indian State.[32] This means that Art. 295 speaks only of devolution of the liability; it does not act as a limitation upon the legislative competence of the Union or a State Legislature.

C. ESCHEAT

According to Art. 296, any property in India which, "if this Constitution had not come into force", would have vested in His Majesty, or the Ruler of an Indian State by escheat, lapse or bana vacatia for want of a rightful owner, shall vest in a State, if the property is situated there, and in the Union, in any other case. Accordingly, location of the property is the primary rule to determine whether the property vests in the Centre or a State.

By a proviso to Art. 296, the rule of situs has been made to give way to the rule of user. If any property which, at the date when it would have accrued by escheat, lapse or bona vacatia, was in the possession or control of the Government of India or of a State, shall, according as the purposes of its user were purposes of the Union or of a State, vest in the Union or in that State.

The Article does not say what property would accrue to the Government by lapse, escheat or bona vacatia. What it does is to maintain the status quo prevailing in India before the Constitution. The words 'if this Constitution had not come into force' signify that the Constitution itself envisages no change in the laws regarding escheat, lapse or bona vacatia.

On failure of heirs, natural or legal, the property of the deceased reverts to the State as bona vacatia.[33] Before the Government puts forward a claim of escheat, onus lies heavily on it to prove the absence of any heir of the deceased anywhere in the world.[34] The doctrine of bona vacatia applies to a dissolved company whose assets, if any, will be taken over by the state. It is not necessary to have any provision for that purpose in the Companies Act in view of Art. 296.[35]

---

30. Jagannath Baksh Singh v. United Provinces, AIR 1949 PC 127; Umeg Singh v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 540 : (1955) 2 SCR 164; supra, Ch. X.
31. AIR 1963 SC 953 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 515.
32. See, BHIMSEN RAO, Act of State Doctrine in India, 12 JILI 304 (1970).
33. Phuman Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1961 Punj. 200.
34. State of Bihar v. Radha Krishna Singh, AIR 1983 SC 684 : (1983) 3 SCC 118.
35. In re U.N. Mandal's Estate, AIR 1959 Cal. 490.

The Government takes by escheat all property—movable or immovable—for want of an heir or successor. This is an incident of sovereignty and rests on the ultimate ownership of the state of all property within its jurisdiction.

The Supreme Court has explained the concept of escheat in Sheo Nand.[36] Escheat literally means "to revert to the state". This event happens in default of heirs or devisees. When there is no owner of property, it vests in the state and this is known as bona vacatia. Consequently, the property of an intestate dying without leaving lawful heirs, and the property of a dissolved corporation pass to the Government as escheat or bona vacatia.[37]

Certain statutes also make provisions regarding Escheat. For example, S. 29 of the Hindu Succession Act provides that if an intestate has left no heir qualified to succeed, such property shall devolve on the Government subject to the obligations and liabilities to which an heir would have been subject.

The legislative power to enact legislation relating to Escheat falls under entries 35 and 44 in the State List and entry 32 in the Union List.[38]

D. THINGS OF VALUE IN TERRITORIAL WATERS

Article 297 asserts India's sovereign rights over sea-wealth.[39] Originally, Art. 297 merely Stated that all lands, minerals and other things of value underlying the ocean within the territorial waters, or the continental shelf, of India vest in the Union and are held for the purposes of the Union.

The genesis of this Article may be said to lie in the dispute which arose in America between the California State and the Central Government as to whether territorial waters belonged to the Centre or the maritime States. California had granted leases of petroleum and other minerals deposited in the sea-bed in territorial waters. The Centre claimed that the sea-bed with all its minerals vested in it and, therefore, the State had no right to deal with them.

The Supreme Court decided the controversy in favour of the Centre mainly on the ground that the protection and control of the territorial waters was a function of the national external sovereignty. The Court held that California was not the owner of the territorial belt, and that the Centre, rather than the State, had full dominion and power over the lands, minerals and other products therein.[40] In U.S. v. State of Texas,[41] the Supreme Court held that the Centre and not the State had the right to oil and other products under the bed of the ocean below low water mark off the shores of Texas.[42]

---

36. Sheo Nand v. Dy. Director of Consolidation, Allahabad, AIR 2000 SC 1141 : (2000) 3 SCC 103.

37. P. Leslie & Co. v. V.O. Wapshare, AIR 1969 SC 843 : (1969) 3 SCR 203.
Also see, Bombay Dyeing and Mfg. Co. v. State of Bombay, AIR 1958 SC 328 : 1958 SCR 328; Supdt. and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, State of West Bengal v. Corpn. of Calcutta, AIR 1967 SC 997 : (1967) 2 SCR 170.

38. See, supra, Ch. X.

39. V.S. MANI, India's Maritime Zones and International Law, (1979) 21 JILI 336.

40. U.S. v. State of California, 332 US 18 (1975).
Also, U.S. v. State of Louisiana, 339 US 699 (1950).

41. 339 US 707 (1950).

42. DOWLING and EDWARDS, AMERICAN CONST. LAW, 213 (1954).

The bases of the Centre's paramount rights in these cases were the national interests, national responsibilities, and national concerns. Consequent upon these decisions, the U.S. Congress enacted the Submerged Land Act, 1953, which vested in, and assigned to, the States the 'title to and ownership of' their respective portions of the submerged land and resources in land and water.[43]

The framers of the Indian Constitution apprehended that in future the maritime States might raise the issue that anything underlying the ocean within the territorial waters vested in them. In order to negative the possibility of any such contention being raised in future, the Constitution-makers put Art. 297 in the Constitution[37] which enacted precisely the law laid down by the U.S. Supreme Court in the cases mentioned above.

It is one of the moot points of International Law as to what exactly is the extent of territorial waters. Because of this uncertainty, the Constitution did not prescribe the extent of territorial waters. On the 22nd March, 1956, the President by a proclamation prescribed the limits of territorial waters at six nautical miles measured from the appropriate base-line. But a fresh proclamation was issued by the President on December 3, 1956. It recited that whereas International Law recognises that on the high seas adjacent to its territorial water, a coastal State may exercise the control necessary to prevent and punish the infringement within its territorial waters of its customs, fiscal, immigration and sanitary regulations, control has been assumed up to a distance of 12 nautical miles from the base line from which the width of the territorial waters is measured.

By another proclamation concerning fishing activities in the high seas adjacent to territorial waters, control was assumed within a distance of 100 nautical miles from the outer limits of territorial waters.

By another proclamation, dated the 30th August, 1955, full and exclusive sovereign rights of India were declared by the President on the continental shelf. The proclamation stated that whereas valuable natural resources are known to exist on the sea-bed and in the sub-soil of the continental shelf and the utilisation of such resources is being made practicable by modern technological progress; and whereas it is established by international practice that for the purpose of exploring and exploiting such resources in an ordinary manner, every coastal State has sovereign right over the sea-bed and sub-soil of the continental shelf adjoining its territory; accordingly, India has, and always had, full and exclusive sovereign right over the sea-bed and sub-soil of the continental shelf adjoining its territory and beyond its territorial waters.

The words "all lands, minerals and other things of value underlying the ocean" in the constitutional provision are of great significance. One of the moot points of International Law is whether there is any difference between what may be called surface rights, mineral rights and soil rights. Article 297 asserts that all lands, minerals and other things of value underlying the ocean vest in the Union.

The Madras High Court considered the interesting question whether the Chank fisheries[44] in the territorial waters of Sivaganaga vest in the Centre or the Madras

---

43. VIII CAD, 889-892.

44. A.M.S.S.V.M. Co. v. State of Madras, AIR 1954 Mad 291: P.S.A. Susai v. Director of Fisheries, (1965) II MLJ 35. For a critique of the case see, M.K. NAWAZ AND LAKSHMI JAMBHOLKAR, The Chank Fisheries Case Revisited, 13 JILI 494 (1973).

Government. The Court voted in favour of the State on the following three grounds, viz.:

(i) Entry 21, List II, is 'Fisheries'[45] while entry 57 in List I, runs as "Fishing and fisheries beyond territorial waters".[46]

Reading the two entries together, the State has been held to have competence to legislate generally on fisheries, and that only the fisheries and fishing rights beyond territorial waters fall outside the State jurisdiction. Therefore, a State law regulating the use of fisheries in territorial waters would fall within the State sphere and Art. 297 does not affect this position. The rights of the Centre over territorial waters are subject to the legislative powers of the States. Even if territorial waters vest in the Centre under Art. 297, entry 21 in List II, is sufficient to clothe the States with power to enact laws in respect of fisheries in territorial waters.

(ii) Before 1950, these fisheries vested in the Province of Madras and so under Art. 294, these must now vest in the corresponding State and not in the Centre.[47]

(iii) The High Court opined that under Art. 297, territorial waters do not vest in the Centre. What this provision vests in the Centre is what underlies the ocean within territorial waters and not the territorial waters themselves.

According to the High Court, the two concepts—territorial waters and the seabed—do not stand in the same position. For the purpose of the vesting under Art. 297, the dividing line lies between the bed of the ocean and the waters above it and that what does not underlie the bed of the ocean would be outside the purview of Art. 297.

This view of the High Court is arguable. The framers of the Constitution took the view that "anything above land goes with the land. If there is a tree above the land, the tree goes with the land. Water is above the land and so it goes with the land."[48] The framers, therefore, thought that the word 'land' in Art. 297 would denote not only land but also water over it, and by declaring that land within territorial waters belonged to the Centre, the Article would also impliedly declare that the territorial waters over this land belonged to the Centre.

However, the question of ownership of territorial waters does not appear to be of much practical significance. It is purely a Federal-State question and not one of International Law according to which the territory of India not only includes its physical territory but also territorial waters. The valuable resources within territorial waters have been vested in the Centre. The laws of a State within its legislative sphere will operate on the territorial waters adjacent to it. The question of ownership thus appears to be of academic interest.

The words "for the purposes of the Union" in Art. 297 do not necessarily mean that the maritime States have been deprived of all and every kind of advantages accruing from the ocean. These words are flexible and do not militate against

---

45. Supra, Ch. X.
46. Ibid.
47. Supra, Sec. A.
48. VIII CAD, 892.

some of the benefits being allotted to the maritime or coastal States by the Centre.[49]

For a very long time, the law of the sea has been debated in an international conference and consensus has emerged among the nations on three points :

(i) the limit of the territorial waters should extend to 12 miles;

(ii) the exclusive economic zone will extend to 200 miles; and

(iii) the continental shelf may go beyond 200 miles.

Accordingly, Art. 297 has been amended, and its scope enlarged, by the Constitution (Fortieth) Amendment Act, 1976, so as to enable Parliament to enact suitable legislation in terms of the international consensus.[50]

Article 297(1) now provides that all lands, minerals and other things of value underlying the ocean within the territorial waters, or the continental shelf, or the exclusive economic zone, of India shall vest in the Union and be held for the purposes of the Union.

According to Art. 297(2), all other resources of the exclusive economic zone of India shall also vest in the Union and be held for the purposes of the Union.

Further, Art. 297(3) provides that the limits of the territorial waters, the continental shelf, the exclusive economic zone, and other maritime zones of India shall be such as may be specified, from time to time, by or under any law made by Parliament.

Thus, while originally, only territorial waters and the continental shelf were mentioned in Art. 297, now it refers, besides these concepts, to India's exclusive economic zone and other maritime zones. All things of value underlying the territorial waters or the continental shelf, the economic Zone of India, along with all other resources of the economic zone, vest in India for the purpose of the Union. Formerly, the extent of territorial waters and continental shelf were fixed through presidential proclamations. Now, the power vests in Parliament to specify the limits of (i) territorial waters, (ii) Continental shelf, and (iii) economic zone.

Under Art. 297, Parliament has enacted the Territorial Waters, Continental Shelf, Exclusive Economic Zone and other Maritime Zones Act, 1976. The main features of this Act are as follows:

(i) India has sovereignty over territorial waters which will extend to 12 nautical miles measured from the appropriate baseline but the Central Government may alter this limit keeping in view international law and state practice. Such a notification can be issued after its approval by both Houses of Parliament.

---

49. Similar questions have arisen in Canada and Australia.

For Canada, see the Advisory Opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada handed down on the 7th November, 1967, in In the Matter of Offshore Mineral Rights.

For Australia see, O'CONNEL, Problems of Australian Coastal Jurisdiction, 42 Australian Law JI., 39 (1968); Lumb, The Off-Shore Petroleum Agreement & Legislation, ibid., 453; State of New South Wales v. Commonwealth, 50 ALJR 218; for a note on the case see, 50 ALJ 153 (1976).

50. For this Amendment, see, infra, Ch. XLII.

(ii) In the contiguous zone of 12 miles beyond the territorial waters, India will exercise jurisdiction over security, immigration, health, customs and other fiscal matters. The extent of contiguous zone can also be varied by the Central Government with the approval of Parliament.

(iii) India has sovereignty over its continental shelf which extends to 200 miles or the outer edge of the continental margin whichever is longer.

(iv) India's exclusive economic zone extends up to 200 nautical miles.[51] But the extent of the zone can be varied by the Centre with Parliament's approval.

(v) The sovereignty of India extends to the historic waters. The limit of such waters is to be specified by the Central Government.

E. BARRING COURTS' JURISDICTION IN DISPUTES ARISING OUT OF CERTAIN TREATIES

Article 363(1) bars all courts from having any jurisdiction in any dispute arising out of a pre-Constitution treaty, agreement, covenant, engagement or sanad executed between a Ruler of an Indian State and the Government of India, or in any dispute in respect of any right accruing under or any liability or obligation arising out of any of the provisions of the Constitution relating to any such treaty etc.

This Article refers to the numerous agreements and covenants entered into between the then Government of India and the Rulers of the Indian States as a part of the arrangements by which the Indian States were incorporated with the rest of India before the inauguration of the new Constitution.

These arrangements and covenants were in the nature of treaties between two States and, as such, were 'acts of state' outside the purview of the municipal courts.[52]

There are two conditions for the application of Art. 363(1):

(i) the covenant with the Ruler must have been entered into before the coming into force of the Constitution, and

(ii) the covenant must continue in force after the commencement of the Indian Constitution.

Article 363(1) bars the jurisdiction of each and every Court. A few features of this provision have been already explained earlier.[53] A few more points regarding the Article may be noted here.

The Supreme Court has held that it could not entertain inter alia the following claims because of Art. 363(1) :

(i) a challenge by the Ruler of an Indian State, who had entered into a merger-agreement with the Government of India, that the agreement was void as being without consideration;[54]

---

51. S.P. JAGOTA, The Sea Around Us, The Illustrated Weekly, Dec. 19-25, 1976, pp. 8-17.
52. Supra, Sec. B.
53. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(iii)(d).
54. State of Seraikella v. Union of India, AIR 1951 SC 253 : 1951 SCR 474.

(ii) a challenge by the jagirdars of the erstwhile Indian States which had merged in the State of Bombay to the vires of a Bombay Act abolishing jagirs on the ground that the Act contravened the letters of guarantee which had been given to the Rulers.[55]

(iii) The Supreme Court has ruled that in view of Art. 363 "any dispute arising out of the Merger Agreement, or the Instrument of Accession, is beyond the competence of the Courts to enquire into."[56]

The only way to bring such cases before the Supreme Court is to invoke its advisory jurisdiction.[57]

The following matter has been held as not barred by Art. 363(1). The Ruler of Ratlam passed orders raising the rates at which the plaintiffs were to be paid for the supply of liquor to the warehouses in the Ratlam State. After the merger of the State, all the old laws were continued by the newly formed State of Madhya Bharat. This right subsisted even after the commencement of the Constitution in 1950, and the liability of Ratlam became the liability of the new State of Madhya Bharat under Art. 295(2).[58] As it was not a claim to enforce any right under the covenant of merger, Art. 363 did not apply. Art. 363 bars the jurisdiction of the courts only in respect of disputes arising out of the covenant.[59]

Article 363 does not come into picture in cases arising under the existing law.[60] The ex-Ruler of a merged State evicted the appellants who had been in occupation of his private land. A suit by the evicted tenants to be restored to possession, was held maintainable as it arose out of the action of eviction by the ex-Ruler and not out of the merger agreement.[61]

Execution of a money decree against an ex-Ruler was not barred as the dispute had nothing to do with the agreement of merger and so was not covered by Art. 363.[62]

PRIVY PURSES OF THE RULERS

As noted above, numerous agreements and covenants were entered into between the Government of India and the erstwhile Indian Rulers guaranteeing to them privy purses and other personal privileges in lieu of their accession to the Union of India. The Constitution originally contained three provisions guaranteeing the privy purses and Rulers' personal privileges.

---

55. Umeg Singh v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 540 : (1955) 2 SCR 164. Also, Raghubar Sarup v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1959 SC 909; Joginder Sen v. Union of India, AIR 1967 HP 6.

56. Maharaja Pravir Chandra Bhanj Deo Kakatiya v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1961 SC 775 : (1961) 2 SCR 501. Also see, State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Karan Singh, AIR 1997 J&K 132.

57. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F.

58. Supra, Sec. A.

59. State of Madhya Bharat v. Behramji, AIR 1958 MP 71.

60. Bholanath J. Thacker v. Saurashtra, AIR 1954 SC 680 : (1955) 1 LLJ 355; Lachhman Dass v. State of Punjab, AIR 1963 SC 222 : (1963) 2 SCR 353.

61. Jagannath Behera v. Harihar Singh, AIR 1958 SC 239 : 1958 SCR 1067.

62. Thakoresaheb Khanji v. Gulam Rasul Chandbhai, AIR 1955 Bom 449. Also, Pratapsinhji v. State of Bombay, AIR 1957 Bom 155.

(i) Art. 291 charged the privy purses payable to the Rulers on the Consolidated Fund of India,[63] and exempted the same from levy of income tax.

(ii) Art. 362 obligated Parliament and State Legislatures while making laws, and the Centre and the States while exercising their executive power, to have due regard to the assurances and guarantees made in the covenants or agreements with regard to the Rulers' personal rights etc.

(iii) Art. 366(22) provided that 'Ruler' of an Indian State would mean a prince, chief or other person by whom any such agreement or covenant was entered into and who, for the time being, was recognised by the President as the 'Ruler' of the State.

In course of time, the Central Government decided to abolish privy purses and other privileges of the Rulers. For this purpose, the Government of India moved a Constitution Amendment Bill in Parliament, but the same could not be enacted as it failed to secure the requisite majority in Rajya Sabha.[64]

The Government then took recourse to Art. 366(22) for this purpose. On September 7, 1970, the President issued an omnibus order under Art. 366(22) derecognising all the rulers. The validity of this order was challenged in the Supreme Court through a petition under Art. 32 in Madhav Rao Scindia v. Union of India.[65]

A question for consideration of the Court was whether it was barred from taking cognisance of the petition under Art. 363. The Court answered in the negative. It interpreted Art. 363 narrowly in accordance with the well known rule of interpretation of provisions barring jurisdiction of the courts that they must be strictly construed for the "exclusion of the jurisdiction of a civil Court, and least of all the Supreme Court, is not to be lightly inferred." The Court therefore held that the bar of Art. 363 applied only to Art. 362 which was a provision relating to a treaty, covenant etc. Art. 291 was free from the restraints of Art. 363 as its dominant purpose was to ensure payment of privy purses, charge them on Consolidated Fund and exempt them from income tax.

It was also held that Art. 366(22) would also be within the bar of Art. 363 so long as the President in recognising a Ruler was effectuating the provisions of the covenant or agreement. But, "where the President acts wholly outside the provisions of Art. 366(22), his action can be questioned because the bar applies on bona fide and legitimate action and not to ultra vires action." The Presidential Order withdrawing recognition of all rulers was held to be wholly outside Art. 366(22). The President was incompetent to withdraw recognition of all Rulers. "The continuity of a Ruler of an Indian State is obligatory so long as the Ruler is alive or a successor can be found." Accordingly, the Court held by a majority that the Presidential Order was ultra vires.[66]

Thereafter, Art. 363A was introduced in the Constitution by the Twenty-sixth Constitutional Amendment in 1971. With this, the recognition of the Indian Rul-

---

63. Supra, Ch. II.
64. For Constitution Amending Process, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
65. AIR 1971 SC 530 : (1971) 1 SCC 85.
66. See also, infra, Ch. XL and XLII.

ers by the President came to an end. Along with this, privy purses payable to the Indian Rulers also came to an end.[67]

F. CONTINUANCE OF THE PRE-CONSTITUTION LAWS

The Government of India Act, 1935, was repealed by Art. 395 of the Constitution, but the laws in force in India immediately before the commencement of the Constitution, were continued in force under Art. 372(1) until altered, repealed or amended by a competent legislature or other authority.[68] The term 'law in force' includes a law passed or made by a legislature, or other competent authority, in India before the commencement of that Constitution, and not previously repealed even though it might not have been put into operation.

The effect of the above provision is to continue the entire body of law as prevailing in India before the Constitution came into force. Not only statutory law, but also non-statutory law like the Law of Torts,[69] Hindu Law, Mohammedan Law, customs having the force of law,[70] the common law of England which had been adopted as the law of India before the Constitution,[71] the Letters Patent of High Courts,[72] all were continued in force.

Laws which were of a temporary nature[73] were not to continue beyond the period for which they were enacted. Similarly, laws which had been previously repealed, or which had died a natural death, were not to be revived.[74] The word 'law' includes delegated legislation[75] and, therefore, regulations or orders having the force of law were also continued.[76] Art. 372 saved an order of legislative nature but not a mere administrative order.[77]

The Supreme Court has ruled in Dena Bank[78] that the rule of the Common Law that the right of the state to recover tax arrears from an assessee has a priority over the right of a private person to recover his unsecured private debt from

---

67. See, infra, Ch. XLII, for the Amendment.

68. Art. 372(2) empowered the President to adapt and modify the pre-Constitution laws so as to bring them in accord with the provisions of the Constitution. The power was to subsist for three years after the Constitution. This constitutional provision made it possible to adapt the pre-Constitution laws within a short span of time without throwing a great burden on Parliament.

69. Director of Rationing v. Corpn. of Calcutta, AIR 1960 SC 1355 : (1961) 1 SCR 158; infra, Sec. H.

70. Motesingh v. Chandra Bali, AIR 1959 MP 212; Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR 1958 Mad 539; In the matter of Basanta Chandra Ghosh, AIR 1960 Pat 430.

71. Dir of Rationing v. Corp. of Cal., supra, footnote 67; B.S. Corp. v. Union of India, AIR 1956 Cal 26.

72. Nirmalchand v. Smt. Parmeshwari Devi, AIR 1958 MP 333; In re Ranganayakulu, AIR 1956 AP 161; In the matter of B.C. Ghosh, footnote 70, supra.

73. Explanation III to Art. 372.

74. State of U.P. v. Jagamander, AIR 1954 SC 683 : 1954 Cri LJ 1736.

75. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.

76. Edward Mills v. Ajmer, AIR 1955 SC 25 : (1955) 1 SCR 735; Seshadri, R.M. v. State of Madras, AIR 1954 Mad 543; In re Ranganayakulu, AIR 1956 AP 161.

77. Madhavrao v. Madhya Bharat, AIR 1961 SC 298. Also see, Edward Mills v. Ajmer, AIR 1955 SC 25 : (1955) 1 SCR 735; Atindra v. Gillot, AIR 1955 Cal 543; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Gokulchand, AIR 1957 MP 145; John K.O. v. State, AIR 1956 TC 117; Narsing Pratap Dev v. State of Orissa, AIR 1964 SC 1793 : (1967) 7 SCR 112; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Lal Rampal, AIR 1966 SC 820.

78. Dena Bank v. Bhikhabhai Prabhudas Parekh & Co., (2000) 5 SCC 694.

the assessee, being "law in force in British India under Art. 372(1) continues to operate even now. The common-law rule is founded on the rule of necessity and public policy.

In Superintendent and Legal Remembrancer, West Bengal v. Corporation of Calcutta,[79] the Supreme Court held by a majority that Art. 372 did not continue all the norms of interpretation applied by the courts in the pre-Constitution India, as distinguished from the principles of substantive law. The courts can now decide whether these norms should or should not apply to interpret the statutes in Independent India.

Article 372(1) continued the pre-Constitution laws subject to the provisions of the Constitution. Thus, no law is to be valid if it contravenes a Fundamental Right or any other provision of the Constitution.[80]

A pre-constitutional law enacted while concept of equality between two sexes was not known may no longer be valid because of the social and political values of the makers of the Constitution once it is accepted that they intended to apply equality in all spheres of life which as reflected in articles 14 and 15 of the Constitution. But here also absolute equality is not contemplated and it would be permissible for the State to make a classification on the ground of sex so long as classification is founded on a rational criteria and the societal conditions which prevailed in the early 20th century may not be a rational criteria in the 21st century.[81]

As regards the distribution of powers between the Centre and the States, however, the validity of a law is to be tested with reference to the competence of the enacting legislature under the scheme of distribution prevailing at the time the law was enacted and not under the new Constitution.[82] Thus, if a law was invalid when it was made, no question of its continuance after the Constitution arises.[83] If the pre-Constitution law was made by a competent legislature at the time, it will continue to subsist even if the enacting legislature loses its competence after the Constitution came into force, provided the law in question does not fall foul of any constitutional provision.[84]

In State of Madras v. Menon,[85] the Supreme Court held that such of the British statutes as applied to India before the Constitution, but the language of which did not accord with the new independent status of India, could not be regarded as being applicable after the Constitution. The question in the instant case was whether the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, was continued by Art. 372. The Court found that the scheme of the Act was that the British possessions which were contiguous to one another, and between whom there were frequent intercommunication, were treated as one integrated territory and a summary procedure was adopted to extradite per-

---

79. Infra, footnote 92.

80. Panch Gujar v. Amar Singh, AIR 1954 Raj 100; T.H. Vareed v. Travancore Cochin, AIR 1956 SC 142, 145 : (1955) 2 SCR 1022, S.I. Corporation v. Board of Revenue, AIR 1964 SC 207; Union of India v. Bellary Municipality, AIR 1978 SC 1803; See also District Registrar and Collector v. Canara Bank, (2005) 1 SCC 496 : AIR 2005 SC 186.

81. Anuj Garg v. Hotel Association of India, (2008) 3 SCC 1 : AIR 2008 SC 663.

82. Kanpur Oil Mills v. Judge, Sales Tax, AIR 1955 All 99; State of West Bengal v. Tarun Kumar, AIR 1974 Cal 39; B.V. Patankar v. Sastry, AIR 1961 SC 272 : (1961) 1 SCR 591.

83. Umaid Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1963 SC 953 : (1963) Supp (2) SCR 575.

84. S.I. Corpn. v. Board of Revenue, AIR 1964 SC 207 : (1964) 2 SCR 280; See also John Vallamattom v. Union of India, (2003) 6 SCC 611 : AIR 2003 SC 2902.

85. AIR 1954 SC 517 : (1955) 1 SCR 280.

sons committing offences in this integrated territory. After India became a Sovereign Democratic Republic under the new Constitution, India could no longer be described as a British possession and so it could not be grouped amongst British possessions and, therefore, the Fugitive Offenders Act was no longer applicable. Art. 372 could not save this law because the grouping was repugnant to the concept of a Sovereign Democratic Republic.

The principle of priority of debts owed to state over private debts is not inconsistent with anything in the Republican Constitution. It is essential to the proper functioning of any state that the debts due to it should have a priority over debts owed to private individuals.[86]

The decisions of the Privy Council were binding on all courts in India, and the law declared by the Privy Council was the law, before the Constitution became operative on January 26, 1950. Under Art. 225, the law administered in any High Court on January 25, 1950, continues to be the same law as was administered by it prior to the Constitution subject to the provisions of the Constitution and of any law made by any competent legislature.[87]

Under Art. 372(1) also, the pre-Constitution laws remain in force until altered or repealed or amended by a competent legislature or authority. Therefore, the law declared by the Privy Council as well as the Federal Court remains binding on the High Courts even after January 25, 1950, until the Supreme Court rules otherwise.[88]

The position of the Supreme Court is somewhat different from this point of view. The decisions of the Privy Council and of the Federal Court are not binding on the Supreme Court though these decisions are of persuasive authority and are entitled to all respect and attention which they deserve. Thus, in State of Bihar v. Abdul Majid,[89] the Supreme Court refused to follow the Federal Court's decision in State of Punjab v. Tara Chand[90] and the Privy Council's decision in High Commissioner for India v. Lall.[91] Similarly, in the Legal Remembrancer case,[92] the Supreme Court disagreed with the view expressed by the Privy Council in Province of Bombay v. Municipal Corporation.[93]

Article 372(1) makes it clear that the pre-Constitution laws continued in force after the Constitution may be altered, amended or repealed by a competent legislature.

G. SUITS BY OR AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT

Article 300 lays down that the Government of India, or of the State, may sue or be sued by the name of the Union of India or of the State respectively. The Centre or a State can thus be sued as a juristic personality.

---

86. Builders Supply Corpn. v. Union of India, AIR 1965 SC 1061 : (1965) 2 SCR 289.
87. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. C(ii).
88. Pritam Singh v. State, AIR 1950 SC 169 : 1950 SCR 453; Calcutta Corporation v. Director of Rationing, AIR 1955 Cal 282; Chatturbhuj v. Moreshwar, AIR 1954 SC 236 : 1954 SCR 817; Bihar v. Abdul Majid, AIR 1954 SC 245 : 1954 SCR 786; Bombay v. Chhaganlal, AIR 1955 Bom 1; Srinivas v. Narayan, AIR 1954 SC 379 : (1955) 1 SCR 1; Radharani v. Sisir Kumar, AIR 1953 Cal 524.
89. Supra, note 87. Also, supra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. C.
90. AIR 1947 FC 23.
91. AIR 1948 PC 121.
92. AIR 1967 SC 997 : (1967) 2 SCR 170, infra, Sec. H.
93. 73 I.A. 271; see, infra, next Section.

As regards the extent of government liability, the Article declares that the Government of India, or of a State, may be sued "in relation to their respective affairs in the like cases as the Dominion of India and the corresponding Provinces, or the corresponding Indian States might have sued or been sued", if the Constitution had not been enacted. This, however, is subject to any law made by Parliament or a State Legislature.

Under this provision, the liability of the Centre or a State is co-terminous with that of the Dominion of India, or a Province, before the Constitution. Under S. 176 of the Government of India Act, 1935, this liability was co-extensive with that of the Secretary of State for India under S. 32 of the Government of India Act, 1915. The Act of 1915, in turn made it co-extensive with that of the East India Company prior to the Government of India Act, 1858. S. 95 the Act of 1858, declared that all persons would have and take the same suits, remedies and proceedings against the Secretary of State in Council for India as they could have against the East India Company.

The consequence of the above provisions is that in order to understand the extent of the present-day liability of a Government in India, it becomes necessary to know the extent to which the Company was liable before 1858.

To start with, the Company was purely a mercantile body. Gradually, it acquired territories in India and also the sovereign powers to make war and peace and raise armies.[94] As it was an autonomous corporation, having an existence of its own, and bearing no relationship of servant or agent to the British Crown, the immunity enjoyed by the Crown was never extended to it.[95]

H. STATUTORY LIMITATIONS ON STATE LIABILITY

A reference to Art. 300 shows that it is open to Parliament or a State Legislature to enact a law giving a right to sue in favour of, or against, the Government in a case in which such a right does not exist, or taking away or restricting an existing right to sue.

A number of statutes expressly enact provisions to immunize the Government from any liability thereunder. The list of such Acts is too long to be given here, but the modern tendency of the Government is to immunize itself through statutory formulae.

A formula of very common occurrence in the present day statutes is: "No suit, prosecution or other legal proceeding shall lie against any person for anything in good faith done or intended to be done under this Act." This formula does not, however, protect an ultra vires act from being challenged in a Court.[96] Even damages may be awarded against the Government for an act which is mala fide and an abuse of power and causes injury to an individual.[97]

---

94. M.P. JAIN, OUTLINES OF INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, 1—172 .
95. WADE & PHILLIPS, CONSTITUTION LAW, 623 et. seq. (1977).
96. Union of India v. Ayed Ram, AIR 1958 Pat 439; Kamala Mills v. State of Bombay, AIR 1965 SC 1942 : (1966) 1 SCR 64; Bharat Kala Bhandar v. Dhamangaon Municipality, AIR 1966 SC 249 : (1965) 3 SCR 499; Dhulabhai v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1969 SC 78 : (1968) 3 SCR 662.
97. Prem Lal v. U.P. Government, AIR 1962 All 233; Bhiwandi Municipality v. K.S. Works, AIR 1975 SC 529 : (1974) 2 SCC 596; S.I. Syndicate v. Union of India, AIR 1975 SC 460.

Rice was procured under an order passed under the Essential Commodities Act. The order was later found to be ultra vires. The Act contains the immunity clause mentioned above. Nevertheless, the High Court ruled that the Government must make good the loss caused to the concerned person as he was made to supply rice at less than the market price without legal authority. No question of good faith arises in the situation. The clause in question can protect only legal orders.[1]

An interesting question which has arisen in Independent India has been whether a statute would bind the State without expressly saying so. The Supreme Court discussed this question first in Director of Rationing and Distribution v. Corporation of Calcutta.[2]

Section 386(1)(a) of the Calcutta Municipal Act prohibited any person from storing rice, flour, etc., in any premises without a licence granted by the corporation. The Director of Rationing, West Bengal Government, was prosecuted by the corporation for storing foodgrains without obtaining a licence from the corporation. The question was whether the Government was bound by the said provision.?

In Britain, the maxim "King can do no wrong" operates. One of the results of this maxim is that the King is not bound by a statute unless he is expressly named, or unless he is bound by necessary implication, or unless the statute, being for the public good, it would be absurd to exclude the King from its purview.[3]

That was the law accepted in India also before independence and the arrival of the new Constitution, as was authoritatively laid down by the Privy Council in Province of Bombay v. Municipal Corporation.[4] The main question for consideration in the Director of Rationing case was whether this rule based on the concept of monarchy could still apply in the Republican India which had no monarchy. The Supreme Court ruled by a majority that the old rule continued to be valid for several reasons, viz.:

(i) There were no words in the Constitution to support the proposition that the position changed after the Republican form of Government had been ushered in by the Constitution.

(ii) The immunity of the Government from the operation of certain statutes and, particularly, statutes creating offences, was based upon the fundamental concept that the Government or its officers could not be a party to committing a crime—analogous to the 'prerogative of perfection' that the King can do no wrong—and had been adopted as a rule of statutory interpretation in India on the ground of public policy.

(iii) The rule was not peculiar to a monarchical system but applied even to a republican system such as that in the U.S.A.[5]

---

1. State of Gujarat v. Janta Pauva Factory, AIR 1983 Guj 64.
2. AIR 1960 SC 1355 : (1961) 1 SCR 158.
3. STREET, GOVERNMENTAL LIABILITY, Ch VI.
4. 73 I.A. 271.
Also see, Corporation of Calcutta v. Sub-postmaster, Dharamatala, 54 CWN 429, in which this rule was followed. But in State of Punjab v. Buyers Syndicate, AIR 1958 Punj 456, the Punjab High Court did not follow this rule.
5. U.S. v. United Mine Workers of America, 91 L E d 884; U.S. v. Reginald P. Wittek, 93 L Ed 1406; Jess Larson v. Domestic and Foreign Commerce Corp., 93 L Ed 1628.

(iv) All pre-Constitution laws had been continued by Article 372.[6]

Accordingly, the rule of statutory interpretation that the State was not bound by a statute unless it was so provided in express terms, or by necessary implication, was still good law. Therefore, the Court held that the Director of Rationing could not be prosecuted as there was nothing in the statutory provision in question to suggest that the Government was bound by it by necessary implication.

The rule laid down in the Rationing case[7] was often criticised on the ground that it was difficult to apply[8] and was socially and politically objectionable.[9] The Law Commission suggested the adoption of the rule that the State would be bound by a statute in the absence of express words or necessary implication to the contrary.[10] The Supreme Court got another opportunity to review its earlier ruling in Superintendent and Legal Remembrancer, State of West Bengal v. Corp. of Calcutta.[11]

Under S. 218 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1881, every person who exercises or carries on in Calcutta any trade has to take out a license and pay the prescribed fees to the Corporation. The State of West Bengal was carrying on the trade of a daily market without obtaining a licence from the Corporation as was required under S. 218. The question arose whether the State was bound to take out a licence under S. 218.? The Supreme Court differing from its earlier ruling in the Director of Rationing case now held by a majority of 8 to 1 that the rule that the State would not be bound by a law unless expressly mentioned or by necessary implication was only a rule of construction and not a part of the substantive law and was not continued after the new Constitution. Art. 372 continued only the substantive law and not the norms of interpretation.[12]

The Court refused to apply the rule in the new context as there was no Crown in India. The archaic rule based on the prerogative of the Crown had no relevance to a democratic republic; it was inconsistent with the rule of law based on the doctrine of equality,[13] and it introduced conflicts and discrimination. Accordingly, S. 218 was held to bind the State of West Bengal as well. Thus, the rule was laid down that an Act would apply to citizens as well as the State unless it expressly or by necessary implication excepted the State from its operation.

The Supreme Court followed this ruling in Union of India v. Jubbi.[14] The Court held that the Himachal Pradesh Abolition of Big Landed Estates and Land Reforms Act, 1953, would bind every landlord whether an individual or the Government. The Court pointed out that the Act sought to free the tenants of landlordism and ensure to them security of tenure. That being the paramount object of the legislature, it was hardly likely that it would make any discrimination between the State and the citizen in the matter of application of the Act. There was

---

6. Supra, Sec. F.
7. The Court again followed the rule in State of Punjab v. O.G.B. Syndicate Ltd., AIR 1964 SC 669 : (1964) 5 SCR 387.
8. GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, CROWN PROCEEDINGS, 49, 53.
9. FRIEDMAN, LAW AND SOCIAL CHANGE, Ch 12.
10. FIRST REPORT, 29-30.
11. AIR 1967 SC 997 : (1967) 2 SCR 170.
12. Supra, Sec. F.
13. Supra, Ch. XXI.
14. AIR 1968 SC 360 : (1968) 1 SCR 447.

nothing in the Act to indicate that the State was exempt from its purview. Thus, the claim of the respondent, a tenant of the Union Government, that he had acquired proprietary rights in the land under the Act in question was sustained.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

TORTIOUS LIABILITY OF THE GOVERNMENT

SYNOPSIS

A. SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY

(a) P&O CASE

An important question which occurs frequently concerns governmental liability for torts of its servants.[1] As noted above, Art. 300 of the Constitution maintains the pre-Constitution status quo in this regard. This means that the liability of the present government is pari passu with the liability of the East India Company.[2] This means that the law regarding the tortious liability of the Government was frozen at the 1858 stage in India. The position was reminiscent of the days when the East India Company ruled India. The Company had a dual capacity—commercial and sovereign. The Company was exempt from any tortious liability in its sovereign capacity.

The leading case in the area is P & O Steam Navigation Co. v. Secretary of State.[3] The P & O Co. made a claim for damages for injury caused to its horse by the negligence of some workmen in the Government Kidarpur Dockyard. The Bombay High Court ruled that where an act was done in the exercise of sovereign powers, which could not be lawfully exercised except by a sovereign, or private individual delegated by a sovereign to exercise them, no action would lie. On the other hand, the Secretary of State would be liable for damages occasioned by the negligence of servants of the Government if the negligence was such as would render an ordinary employer liable.

Two principles thus emerged from the case:

(1) Apart from special statutory provisions, suits could have been brought against the East India Company, and, consequently, against the Sec-

---

1. For a detailed discussion of the topic see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, II.
2. Supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. G.
3. 5 Bom HCR App. 1.

retary of State as successor to the Company, in respect of acts done in the conduct of undertakings which might be carried on by private individuals without sovereign powers.

(2) The Secretary of State was not liable for any thing done in exercise of sovereign powers.

The first rule has been accepted without dissent since it was laid down, but there has been a conflict of judicial opinion as regards the second rule. In some cases, this rule has been followed literally while in others it has been treated as an obiter dicta and has been departed from.

First, a few examples may be mentioned here where the above mentioned rules have been followed :

In Secretary of State v. Cockraft,[4] the plaintiff was injured by the negligent leaving of a heap of gravel on a military road over which he was walking. The suit brought by the plaintiff for damages against the government was held not maintainable because the military and the maintenance of military roads was a sovereign, and not a private, function.

In Secretary of State v. Moment,[5] the Privy Council held that a suit for damages for wrongful interference with the plaintiff's property could be brought against the government, as such a suit would have lain against the East India Company under the ruling of the P & O. case.

The plaintiff was convicted for the offence of embezzlement. Later, it transpired that he had not committed the offence with which he was charged. He brought a suit for damages against the Secretary of State. The suit was dismissed because it was a sovereign function of the government to take cognisance of offences and try them.[6]

In Gurucharan,[7] it was held that no suit would lie against the government for wrongful confinement, as it was discharging a sovereign function.

The Secretary of State was held not liable for torts of the servants employed in a government hospital as maintenance of hospitals for public benefit out of public revenue was regarded as a sovereign function.[8]

The Forest Range Officer wrongfully interfered with the removal of timber by the purchaser of the forest. The Secretary of State was held to be liable for the officer's wrongful acts as these arose out of the exercise of commercial, and not sovereign, functions.[9]

Under the Defence of India Act, 1915, certain classes of goods could be commandeered by the government, the price of such goods being settled by arbitration. Some of the goods commandeered were not taken delivery of by the government as the war came to an end. The claim for damages by the supplier was rejected for a commandeering order was held to be a sovereign act.[10]

---

4. AIR 1915 Mad 993.
5. 40 IA 48.
6. Mata Pd. v. Secretary of State, AIR 1931 Oudh 29.
7. Gurucharan v. State of Madras, AIR 1942 Mad 539.
8. Etti C. v. Secretary of State, AIR 1939 Mad 663.
9. Secretary of State v. Sheoramjee, AIR 1952 Nag 213.
10. Kessoram Poddar v. Secretary of State, ILR 54 Cal 969; Purnendu Deb v. India, AIR 1956 Cal 66.

No cause of action arose when a person was killed by rash and negligent driving of a military truck by a military driver while engaged on military duty because it was held to be a sovereign function.[11] A military truck was carrying carbon dioxide gas from the factory to a Navy ship. Due to rash driving, a ten year old boy was injured. The court refused to award any damage on the ground that he was injured during the discharge of a sovereign function.[12]

The government was held not responsible for damages for injury caused to a person by a road roller which was engaged in maintaining roads as this was held to be a sovereign function.[13]

To this strict rule of government liability, an exception was, however, made, viz., where the government detained any land, goods and chattels belonging to a subject, the government was held liable to pay compensation.[14] Thus, the government was held liable to pay damages for trespass over, and injury to, the plaintiff's property by troops during the Second World War,[15] or for removing earth from the plaintiff's land and placing it on the railway track under construction.[16]

(b) HARI BHANJI

In another line of cases, a broader view of government liability, and a narrower view of the P&O ruling, was adopted by the High Courts, insofar as these cases accepted the first, but not the second, proposition laid down therein and which have been stated above.

These cases propounded the view that the P & O. case was an authority for the proposition that the government was responsible for injuries in the course of transactions of a commercial or private character, but that it did not exclude liability in other respects. Accordingly, these cases held that the government was liable for all acts other than an 'act of state',[17] and that the distinction based on, 'sovereign' and 'non-sovereign' functions was not well founded. The view was taken that the acts of the government fell either outside, or within, the municipal law and that it was only the former of which the courts could not take cognizance.

The leading case in this category was Secretary of State v. Hari Bhanji.[18] The fact, however, remains that the decisions accepting the second proposition of the P. & O. case, and excluding the government from liability for sovereign functions, far outnumbered the cases following the Hari Bhanji ruling.

---

11. Union of India v. Harbans Singh, AIR 1959 Punj 39.
12. Thangarajan v. Union of India, AIR 1975 Mad 32.
13. Krishnamurthy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1961 AP 283.
14. State of Bihar v. Sonabati, AIR 1954 Pat 513; Uday Chand v. Province of Bengal, 51 CWN 537.
15. Union of India v. Ram Kamal, AIR 1953 Ass 116.
16. Union of India v. Muralidhar, AIR 1952 Ass 141.
17. Supra, Ch. XXXVII.
18. ILR 5 Mad 273.

Also see, Ross v. Secretary of State, AIR 1915 Mad. 434; P.V. Rao v. Khushaldas, AIR 1949 Bom 277; Wyllie v. Secretary of State, AIR 1928 Lah 346; Union of India v. Muralidhar, supra, footnote 16.

In State of Bihar v. Sonabati, supra, footnote 14, the state was held guilty of committing contempt of court.

B. VIDYAWATI CASE

In 1962, the Supreme Court was for the first time since the constitution came into force called upon to consider the question of state liability for the tortious acts of its servants in State of Rajasthan v. Vidhyawati.[19] The driver of a jeep, owned and maintained by the State of Rajasthan for the official use of the collector, drove it rashly and negligently, while bringing it back from the workshop after repairs, and fatally injured a pedestrian. The Court held that the State was vicariously liable for the negligence of the driver.

Referring to the P.&O. case, the Court derived the proposition that the government would be liable for damages occasioned by negligence of its servants if the negligence was such as would render an ordinary employer liable. At another place, the Court observed that to uphold the vicarious liability of the State would be only to recognise the old established rule going back to more than 100 years at least.

Along with this, the Court also made certain general observations underlining the need to hold the State liable vicariously. "Viewing the case from the point of view of first principles", observed the Court, "there should be no difficulty in holding that the State should be as much liable for tort in respect of a tortious act committed by its servant within the scope of his employment and functioning as such, as any other employer." At another place, the Court stated, "Now that we have, by our Constitution, established a Republican form of government, and one of the objectives is to establish a socialistic state with its varied industrial and other activities, employing a large army of servants, there is no justification in principle, or in public interest, that the state should not be held liable vicariously for the tortious act of its servant."

A careful reading of the Court's opinion in Vidyawati suggests that while the Court did make some observations justifying a broader view of the state's liability for torts of its servants than what the P. & O. case had laid down, in effect, neither did it overrule the test of sovereign functions to determine government's liability nor did it refer to it, nor did it specifically say that the function in the instant case out of which the liability arose was non-sovereign.

There was a possibility that the Vidhyawati case, in course of time, might have been the precursor of a new trend in the area of state liability, but this process got arrested by the Court's subsequent pronouncement in Kasturi Lal Ralia Ram Jain v. State of Uttar Pradesh.[20] In the instant case, the police seized some gold from Ralia Ram on suspicion that it was stolen property. It was kept in the government malkhana but was misappropriated by a constable who fled to Pakistan. Ralia Ram was acquitted of the charge. The question arose whether the State was liable to compensate Ralia Ram for the loss caused to him by the police officers employed by the State.

The Supreme Court held on the basis of the P & O case that no claim lay for compensation if the tortious act was committed in the course of an undertaking or employment which was referable to the exercise of sovereign power. The Court explained away the Vidhyawati ruling by saying that when the government

---

19. AIR 1962 SC 933 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 989. For comments on the case, see, 4 JILI 279, 287 (1962).

20. AIR 1965 SC 1039 : (1965) 1 SCR 375. For comments on the case, see, 7 JILI 246 (1965).

employee was driving the car from the workshop to the collector's residence, he was not employed on a task referable to the State's sovereign power, for the employment of a driver to drive the jeep for the use of a civil servant was an activity not connected in any manner with the State's sovereign power.

In the instant case, the act giving rise to damages had been committed by the State's employee during the course of his employment which fell within the concept of sovereign power and so the claim for damages could not be entertained. The power to arrest a person, seize him, search him, and seize property found with him were powers conferred on the specified officers by statute and, in the ultimate analysis, these were powers which could be properly characterised as sovereign powers.

The Court, however, noted that the position regarding the scope of tortious liability of the state in India was very unsatisfactory and suggested that a law be enacted to deal with the problem on the lines of the Crown Proceedings Act of England.

The law regarding government's tortious liability was extremely outmoded and antiquated and unjust to the people. The distinction between sovereign and non-sovereign functions, which the Supreme Court perpetuated through the Kasturilal ruling, was irrational in the modern context. In effect, the proposition that the state was exempt from liability for a sovereign act amounted to applying the doctrine of 'act of state' to the relationship between the state and the citizen, although, according to the theory of English law, there can be no 'act of state' between the state and its subjects.[21]

On this reasoning, it appeared to be necessary that the view of the P. & O. case should be discarded, as whatever justification there might have been for this ruling during the British period, there was hardly any justification for the same in Independent India. The state today embarks on so many varied activities, and state activities have made a deep impact on all facets of an individual's life. It was, therefore, necessary that the liability of the state should match its present-day role and not be confined to the laissez faire era which P. & O. represented.

In the modern context, it is extremely difficult to distinguish between sovereign and non-sovereign functions. For example, it could plausibly be argued, on the facts of the Vidhyawati case, that administration, and, accordingly, maintenance of transport for an administrative officer, is a sovereign function. On the other hand, on the facts of the Kasturilal case, it could plausibly be argued that keeping of gold in the malkhana amounted to bailment—an activity which can be undertaken by a private person as well.[22]

The difficulty of characterising a governmental activity as 'sovereign' or 'non-sovereign' can be highlighted by some judicial pronouncements. For example, running of railways was regarded as a sovereign function by one High Court,[23] but non-sovereign by another,[24] and the Supreme Court held it to be a non-sovereign function.[25]

---

21. Supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. B.
22. State of Gujarat v. Memon Mahomed Haji Hasan, AIR 1967 SC 1885 : (1967) 3 SCR 938.
23. Bata Shoe Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1954 Bom 129.
24. Maharaja Bose v. Governor Gen. in Council, AIR 1952 Cal 242.
25. Union of India v. Ladulal Jain, AIR 1963 SC 1681 : (1964) 3 SCR 624.

In all democratic countries, a wider view of state liability has now come to be accepted than was the case in India. Before 1947, in Britain, the Crown was immune from any liability for torts committed by its servants because of the common law maxim that the King can do no wrong which implies that neither the King can authorise a wrong nor any wrong be imputed to him. The position was changed by the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, which made the Crown, within certain exceptions, liable in torts like a private person of full age and capacity. The exceptions, inter alia, are defence of the realm, maintenance of armed forces and postal service.[26]

A similar result had been achieved in the U.S.A. as early as 1946 by the Federal Tort Claims Act. The law in India as laid down in Kasturi Lal did not compare favourably with these enactments in other democracies and time appears to have come when the Indian law should also be brought in line with modern democratic thinking on the subject.

As the Supreme Court had suggested in Kasturilal, the situation could be redeemed by a legislative enactment and not by judicial process.[27] As early as 1956, the Law Commission of India had adversely commented upon the state of law in India.

The Law Commission referred to the expanding scope of functions of a welfare state. "While the responsibilities of the State have increased, the increase in its activities has led to a greater impact on the citizens". Therefore, the Commission recommended:

> "The old distinction between sovereign and non-sovereign functions or governmental and non-governmental functions should no longer be invoked to determine the liability of the state."

The Commission even drafted a Bill to define the scope of the state's tortious liability,[28] but no law has yet been enacted for the purpose.[29]

C. JUDICIAL PRONOUNCEMENTS

Failure of Parliament to do anything to ameliorate the situation in the area of government's tortious liability, has led the courts to show activism in this area and improve the situation through their pronouncements. For sometime, the courts have been alleviating the situation by restricting the concept of 'sovereign' function, and holding many modern functions performed by the government as 'non-sovereign'.

To identify a non-sovereign function, the courts adopt a simple test: Is the function such which can be performed by an ordinary person? To take an example, in Union of India v. Savita Sharma,[30] a military truck going to the railway station to bring military personnel to the unit headquarters dashed against a vehicle and injured its occupants. The High Court ruled that the driver of the truck

---

26. WADE, Administrative Law, 698 (1982).
27. Also see, Thangarajan v. Union of India, AIR 1975 Mad 32, supra, footnote 12, where the High Court adversely commented upon the prevailing state of law in India.
28. First Report, 6.
29. BLACKSHIELD, Tortious Liability of Government : Jurisprudential Case Note, 8 JILI 643 (1966). Also see, 12 JILI 333.
30. AIR 1979 J&K 6.

was not engaged in performing any sovereign function as transportation of military personnel from one place to another could be performed by any one.

A sovereign function is one which can be performed only by the state and not by private individuals. Thus, the function is sovereign when to maintain law and order, police uses lathicharge on an unruly procession. Such an action is not justiciable.[31]

Accordingly, the following functions inter alia have been held to be non-sovereign:

(i) Running of bus service by the state;[32]

(ii) Banking business run by the state;[33]

(iii) Activities of the public works department of the state;[34]

(iv) Construction of a reservoir for facilitating supply of drinking water to the residents of a town;[35]

(v) Use of a military vehicle to carry hockey and basketball teams to an Indian Air Force Station to play matches against the Indian Air Force;[36]

(vi) Transportation of records, ranging machines and other equipment in a military truck from the workshop to the School of Artillery.[37]

(vii) In Shyam Sunder v. State of Rajasthan,[38] famine relief work by a State has been held to be a non-sovereign function. It is a function which can be undertaken by private individuals as well and there is nothing peculiar about it so that it might be predicated that the state alone can legitimately undertake such a work.

In the instant case, a truck belonging to the Public Works Department was engaged in famine relief Work. The truck met with an accident because of the negligence of the driver. The State was held liable to pay compensation for the person who died in the accident. The Supreme Court rejected the plea of the State that famine relief was a sovereign function.

(viii) Running of railways has been held to be a commercial activity.

(ix) Establishing Yatri Niwas at various Railway Stations to provide lodging and boarding facilities to passengers on payment of charges is regarded as a part of the commercial activity of the Union of India. This activity cannot be equated with the exercise of sovereign power.[39]

Over time, due to various judicial pronouncements, the area of "sovereign" function of the state has shrunk very much. The area of "non-sovereign" functions has correspondingly expanded over time.

---

31. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Chironjilal, AIR 1981 MP 65; State of Orissa v. Padmalochan, AIR 1975 Ori 41.
32. Amulya Patnaik v. State of Orissa, AIR 1967 Ori 116; Satya Narain v. Distt. Engineer, AIR 1962 SC 1161 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 105; State of Madras v. ESI Corp., AIR 1967 Mad 372.
33. State of U.P. v. Hindustan Lever, AIR 1972 All 488.
34. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Ram Pratap, AIR 1972 MP 219.
35. State of Mysore v. Ramchandra, AIR 1972 Bom 93.
36. Satya Wati v. Union of India, AIR 1967 Del 98.
37. Union of India v. Sugrabai, AIR 1969 Bom 13.
38. AIR 1974 SC 890.
39. Chairman, Railway Board v. Chandrima Das, AIR 2000 SC 988 : (2000) 2 SCC 465.

The Supreme Court has expressly dissented with its earlier ruling in Kasturi Lal Rallia Ram v. State of Uttar Pradesh[40] and it has not been followed in subsequent cases. The Supreme Court has recently obsevered[41]:

> "The theory of sovereign power which was propounded in Kasturi Lal's case has yielded to new theories and is no longer available in a welfare state. It may be pointed out that functions of the Government in a welfare state are manifold, all of which cannot be said to be the activities relating to exercise of sovereign powers. The functions of the state not only relate to the defence of the country or the administration of justice, but they extend to many other spheres as, for example, education, commercial, social, economic, political and even marital. These activities cannot be said to be related to sovereign power".

In the non-sovereign area, the principle of vicarious liability operates between the government and its servants while acting within the scope of their employment. This means that the government has to pay damages if a person is injured by any tortious act of any of its servants. As the 'sovereign' area is shrinking, and the 'non-sovereign' area expanding through judicial activism, it means that the government is increasingly becoming liable to pay damages if any of its employees commits a tortious act against a private person. A few examples of this judicial approach are given below.

A person was killed in an accident with a jeep driven by a government employee during the scope and course of his employment. The government was held liable to pay damages to the widow of the deceased on the principle of vicarious liability for its servant's tortious act,[42] as driving a jeep is a non-sovereign function. Any person can drive a jeep.

The driver of a military vehicle while driving to the railway station to bring jawans of the army from there to the unit headquarters, injured some persons on the way by his rash and negligent driving. The High Court held the government liable to pay compensation as the act of transportation (even of jawans) was not a sovereign function. Such an act could be performed even by a private transporter.[43]

A cyclist was knocked down while a crane belonging to the defence department was being towed away for repairs by army personnel. Holding the Central Government liable, the High Court said that the function of towing away bore no imprint of any sovereign function. The court even suggested that the government should not plead sovereign immunity in such cases but seek to defend the suit on merits.[44]

Similarly, the government was held liable when an accident occurred because of the negligence of the driver of a missile carrier.[45]

Plying of buses by government by way of commercial activity does not amount to running the buses on public service. Thus, the state is liable to pay compensation for injuries caused by negligent driving of such buses.[46]

---

40. Supra, footnote 20.
41. Chairman, Rly Board, infra, footnote 71.
42. Annamalai v. Abithakujambal, AIR 1979 Mad 276.
43. Union of India v. Savita Sharma, AIR 1979 J & K 6.
44. Union of India v. Sadashiv, AIR 1985 Bom 345.
45. Pushpinder Kaur Sekhon v. Corporal Sharma, AIR 1985 P&H 81.
46. Satya Narain v. District Engineer, P.W.D., AIR 1962 SC 1161 : 1964 Supp (3) SCR 105.

The employees of the Government of India who run the railway, manage railway stations and Yatri Niwas constitute a component of the government machinery which carries on the commercial activity. If any of such employees commits a tortious act, the Central Government of which they are employees, can, subject to other legal requirements being satisfied, be held vicariously liable in damages to the person wronged by those employees.[47]

The state has been held liable for acts of negligence committed by hospital employees in the course of their employment in the state run hospitals.[48]

In an earlier case,[49] the Bombay High Court had ruled that running of hospitals was part of the sovereign function of the government and so the state could not be held liable for the tortious acts of the hospital employees. But this view has now been overruled. The court has now held that the running of hospitals is not a sovereign function. It is neither a 'primary and inalienable' function of a constitutional government nor it is such that 'no private citizen can undertake the same'. So, the state is liable for the negligence of the hospital staff. The Supreme Court has reiterated this ruling.[50]

A poor lady having a number of children got herself operated at a government hospital for complete sterilisation. Thereafter, she gave birth to a child. For the negligence of the hospital staff, the Supreme Court awarded damages to the lady, equal to the cost of bringing up the 'unwanted' child upto the age of 18.[51] This establishes the principle of vicarious liability of the state for the negligence of its medical officers.[52]

Damages were awarded against the State for negligence of its prison staff which resulted in the death of a prisoner.[53] The Court rejected the contention that the State was not liable as the establishment and maintenance of the prison is part of the sovereign functions of the State. The Court ruled that there was violation of Art. 21 of the Constitution. The Court observed:[54] "Thus, fundamental rights, which also include basic human rights, continue to be available to a prisoner and those rights cannot be defeated by pleading the old and archaic defence of immunity in respect of sovereign acts……"

The above cases show that the area of "sovereign immunity" has been very much restricted by the courts over a period of time.

The present-day liberal judicial approach as regards the liability of the state for the tortious acts of its servants has been described by the Supreme Court in Nagendra Rao as follows:[55]

---

47. Chairman, Rly Board, supra, footnote 41.
48. Mohd. Shafi Suleman Kazi v. Dr. Vilas Dhondu Kavishwar, AIR 1982 Bom 27.
49. State of Maharashtra v. A.H. Khodwe, ILR 1980 Bom 660.
Also see, footnote 8, supra.
50. Achutrao Haribhau Khodwa v. State of Maharashtra, (1996) 2 SCC 634.
51. State of Haryana v. Santra, (2000) 5 SCC 182 : AIR 2000 SC 1888.
52. Legal Aid Committee v. State of Bihar, (1991) 3 SCC 482; Dr. Jacob George v. State of Kerala, (1994) 3 SCC 430 : 1994 SCC (Cri) 774; Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1996 SC 2426 : (1996) 4 SCC 37.
53. State of Andhra Pradesh v. Challa Ramakrishna Reddy, (2000) 5 SCC 712 : AIR 2000 SC 2083.
54. Ibid, 726.
For a detailed discussion on Art. 21, see, supra Ch. XXVI
55. N. Nagendra Rao & Co. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1994 SC 2663 : (1994) 6 SCC 205.
Also see, Common Cause, Registered Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979 : (1999) 6 SCC 667.

> "The modern social thinking of progressive societies and the judicial approach is to do away with archaic State protection and place the State or the Government par with any other juristic legal entity. Any watertight compartmentalisation of the functions of the State as "sovereign" and "non-sovereign" or "governmental" and "non-governmental" is not sound. It is contrary to modern judicial thinking… In welfare state, functions of the state are not only defence of the country or administration of justice or maintaining law and order but it extends to regulating and controlling the activities of people in almost every sphere, educational, commercial, social, economic, political and even marital. The demarcating line between sovereign and non-sovereign powers for which no rational basis survives has largely disappeared. Therefore, barring functions such as administration of justice, maintenance of law and order and repression of crime etc. which are among the primary and inalienable functions of a constitutional government, the State cannot claim any immunity".[56]

In Nagendra Rao, the appellant carried on the business in fertilizer and foodgrains. Huge stocks of foodgrains, fertilizers and other commodities were seized by police authorities. The appellant represented to the state authorities several times that fertilizer be sold otherwise it would become useless. No steps were taken by the authorities to do the needful. At last, the stock seized was released as the appellant was found to be not guilty of any breach of law. But the appellant refused to take delivery of the stock because of deterioration in quality. He filed a suit to recover the price of the stock by way of compensation.

After reviewing the case-law, the Supreme Court held the state liable to make good the loss to the appellant. Criticizing the doctrine of "sovereign immunity", the Supreme Court stated :

> "No civilised system can permit an executive to play with the people of its country and claim that it is entitled to act in any manner as it is sovereign : No legal or political system today can place the state above law as it is unjust and unfair for a citizen to be deprived of his property illegally by negligent act of officers of the State without any remedy."

The Supreme Court has thus given short shrift to the argument of "sovereign immunity".

In Nagendra Rao, the Supreme Court propounded two basic propositions, viz. (1) In modern state, the distinction between sovereign or non-sovereign functions does not exist, (2) Barring such functions as administration of justice, maintenance of law and order and repression of crime etc., which are among the "primary and inalienable" functions of a constitutional government, the state cannot claim any immunity.

The court went on to say that "barring functions such as administration of justice, maintenance of law and order and repression of crime etc. which are among the primary and inalienable functions of a constitutional Government, the state cannot claim any immunity".

In retrospect, one can say that non-enactment of a law defining the scope of tortious liability of the state has proved to be a blessing in disguise in the long run. Had such a law been enacted, the law in the area would have been circumscribed within the narrow confines of the statutory provisions of the enacted law. Absence of legislation, on the other hand, gave an opportunity for the full play of

---

56. Nagendra Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1994 SC 2663 at 2683 : (1994) 6 SCC 205.

judicial creativity and the Supreme Court has thus been able to transform an archaic law concerning state tortious liability in to a very liberal law favouring the citizen vis-à-vis the state.

D. STATUTORY FUNCTIONS

A restriction on the state liability for tortious acts of its servants arising out of the maxim of 'respondent superior' is that a master is not liable for the acts of its servants performed in the discharge of a duty imposed on them by law.[57] This principle of the English law has been followed in numerous cases in India. It has thus been ruled in several cases that where an official perform an act in exercise of statutory powrs, then the aggrieved person has no remedy against the state, as such the rationale underlying this judicial approch is that since the official acts under the statute, his action is not subject to the control of the state. Hence the principle of vicarious liability does not apply.

Following are some of the cases which illustrate the above approach.

In Shivabhajan v. Secretary of State,[58] certain bundles of hay were attached by the chief constable of Mahim because they were believed to be stolen property. The person from whose possession hay was attached was prosecuted but acquitted. The hay was lost in the meantime. The person concerned sued the Secretary of State for compensation for negligence of the chief constable. The High Court held that the Secretary of State was not liable as the chief constable had acted under powers conferred on him by the Criminal Procedure Code.

In Ross v. Secretary of State,[59] the Secretary of State was held not liable for the wrongful acts of the district magistrate done by him in the exercise of statutory authority.

In Secretary of State v. Srigobinda Chaudhuri,[60] a suit for damages against the Secretary of State for misfeasance, wrongs, negligence or omissions of duties of managers appointed by the court of wards was rejected because these officers of the government acted in exercise of statutory powers.

In Secretary of State v. Ramnath,[61] the deputy collector by mistake paid some money to a person who was not entitled to it. The Secretary of State was held not liable for the mistake of the deputy collector as it was committed in exercise of his statutory duties.

The police recovered some stolen property which was deposited in malkhana. The property was stoeln from there. The High Court ruled that the State was not liable to pay damages as its servant was performing a statutory obligation.[62]

---

57. Tobin v. The Queen, 143 ER 1148; Nireaha v. Baker, 1901 AC 561.
58. ILR 28 Bom 314.
59. AIR 1915 Mad 434.
60. AIR 1932 Cal 834.
Also see, Ram Shankar v. Secretary of State, AIR 1932 All 575.
61. AIR 1934 Cal 128.
Also, Uday Chand v. Province of Bengal, 51 CWN 537.
62. Ram Ghulam v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1950 All 206.
Also see, Mohd. Murad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1956 All 75.

A certain quantity of non-duty-paid tobacco was seized from the plaintiff's shop and the Collector of Central Excise, acting under S. 33 of the Central Excise and Salt Act, confiscated the seized tobacco which could be released on payment of duty and fine. The plaintiff paid the duty and the fine, but, thereafter, the tobacco was sold by the Department and the sale proceeds deposited in the government treasury. The plaintiff brought a suit against the Union of India for damages for the tort of conversion. The Union of India was held not liable, for the Department acted under statutory power. But, to the extent the sale proceeds were deposited in the treasury, the Government was benefited and the plaintiff was entitled to the refund of this money.[63]

Hard coke supplied by the plaintiff to a jute mill belonging to the Military Department was rejected as it was not up to the specification. The Deputy Coal Commissioner then gave directions for its disposal by sale and for payment of the price thus realised to the plaintiff. This was done under the statutory powers conferred on the Commissioner by the Coal Control Order. The plaintiff brought a suit against the Government of India to recover the price stipulated, but it was dismissed and the Government was held not liable. The court ruled that assuming that the Commissioner exceeded his statutory authority, the plaintiff should have sued him and not the Government for the doctrine of respondent superior could not be applied so as to make the Government responsible when the Commissioner was acting in exercise of his statutory powers, and not under the control or order of the Government.[64]

Under the Rajasthan Public Safety Act, the Rajasthan Government conferred power on the Commissioner to make arrests. The Commissioner arrested the plaintiff and the State Government approved the action. The order of the Commissioner was found not to have been made in good faith. The plaintiff's suit for damages against the State Government was rejected on the ground that the Commissioner was exercising a statutory power; that the delegation did not make him an agent of the Government for he had to exercise his own discretion in the matter; in the circumstances, the maxim 'respondent superior' did not apply. Where a Government officer purports to act under a statutory power conferred upon him, he cannot be said to be acting as an ordinary agent of the State, and whatever wrong he does is his own and not that of his employer.[65]

The above rule to immunize the state from liability does not, however, apply in a situation where the impugned act has been expressly authorised by the state or the state has been profited by its performance.[66] In such a case, the state is liable for the wrongful acts of the servants even though performed under their statutory duties. In Saurashtra v. Vallabhdas,[67] confiscation of grams, their detention and release, were expressly authorised by the Saurashtra Government and no discretion was left to its officers. The State Government was, therefore, held liable for the loss occasioned to the importers.

---

63. Union of India v. Ayed Ram, AIR 1958 Pat 439.
64. Union of India v. Dhansar Coal Co., AIR 1959 Pat 347.
65. State of Rajasthan v. Rikhabchand, AIR 1961 Raj 64.
Also, State of Uttar Pradesh v. Chhotey Lal, AIR 1967 All 327.
66. Uday Chand v. Prov. of Bengal, supra, footnote 61; Ross v. Secy. of State of Madras, AIR 1915 Mad 434; Bihar v. Sonabati, AIR 1954 Pat 513; Abdul Kadir v. Saurashtra, AIR 1956 Sau 62.
67. AIR 1956 Sau 65.

The principle laid down in the above cases is not rational. An official of the government always remains its agent whether he functions under an order of the government or under powers conferred on him by a statute, for the Legislature confers powers on him only because he is an agent of the government.

The principle mentioned above boils down to this: if the power is conferred by a statute on the government, and the government directs an officer to do something in pursuance of this power, the government is liable for the acts of the officer. But, if the power is conferred directly on the officer by a statutory provision, then the government is not liable. It means that if the officer acts under the direction of the Executive, the government is liable. But if the officer acts under the direction of the Legislature, the government is not liable.

This dichotomy between the Executive and the Legislature is irrational as both constitute parts of the same government and each and every act of the government is carried on within the framework of law. Powers are conferred on public servants by the Legislature because they are government servants. Had they not been government servants powers would not have been conferred on them.

Also, for an ordinary citizen, it makes little difference whether the act which injures him has been done by a public servant under direct authority of a statute, or under the instructions of the government. Further, it can be argued that legislative authorisation to an officer to perform a duty only extends to performing it in good faith and not negligently.

The rule is unjust in the modern administrative age when more and more statutory powers are being conferred on government servants. It is, therefore, necessary that by suitable legislation the government should be made liable for all wrongful acts of its servants, whether performed in discharge of a statutory function or otherwise during the course of their employment.[68]

The validity of the above-mentioned rulings seems to have been shaken by the Supreme Court decision in N. Nagendra Rao & Co. v. State of Andhra Pradesh[69]. Fertilizer belonging to the appellants was seized by the district revenue officer in exercise of statutory powers under s. 6A of the Essential Commodities Act. No steps were taken, as required by the statutory provision, to dispose of the fertilizer with the result that it deteriorated in quality in course of time. The collector released the stock of fertilizer as no violation of any law by the appellants could be established. The appellants filed a suit for compensation against the State of Andhra Pradesh for negligence of its officers. The Court held the State liable to pay the value of the damaged fertilizer to the appellants along with interest thereon even though it could be argued that the concerned official was acting in pursuance of statutory powers.

The Supreme Court has ruled in Nagendra that the vicarious liability of the State is linked with the negligence of its officers. If the officer can be sued personally, there is no reason or rationale for the proposition that the State cannot be sued. "If a suit is maintainable against the officer personally, then there is no reason to doubt that it would not be maintainable against the State".[70]

---

68. Law Comm. of India, First Report, 33.
69. AIR 1994 SC 2663 : (1994) 6 SCC 205, supra, footnote 55.
70. Ibid., at p. 2683.

E. DAMAGES AND WRITS

Ordinarily, a person has to file a civil suit against the government to claim damages as it raises questions of fact for which the court has to take oral evidence. This is a protracted process for civil litigation in India is an extremely slow and tardy process.

However, lately, a new judicial trend has emerged. Damages have been awarded against the government by the Supreme Court and the High Courts through writ petitions under Arts. 32 and 226,[71] for infringement of Fundamental Rights, especially of Art 21. The matter has already been discussed earlier.[72] A detailed discussion on this topic falls more appropriately within the compass of Administrative Law.[73] Here the matter is referred to only in an outline.

The Supreme Court has observed on this point[74] :

> "However it cannot be understood as laying a law that in every case of tortious liability recourse must be had to a suit. When there is negligence on the face of it and infringement of Art. 21 is there it cannot be said that there will be any bar to proceed under Art. 226 of the Constitution. Right to life is one of the basic human rights guaranteed under Art. 21 of the Constitution."

In Rudul Sah v. State of Bihar[75] the Supreme Court awarded compensation for illegal detention. Reference, has already been made to Chairman, Rly. Board v. Chandrima Das.[76]

In a number of cases,[77] compensation has been awarded on account of police atrocities,[78] or custodial deaths.[79]

Compensation has also been awarded for medical negligence in government hospitals.[80] In the instant case, the Supreme Court has ruled that Art. 21 imposes on the state an obligation to safeguard the life of every person. The state-run hospitals and the medical officers employed therein are duty bound to extend medical assistance for preserving human life. Violation of this duty amounts to violation of Art. 21. Adequate compensation can be awarded by the court for such violation by way of redress in proceedings under Art. 32 or Art. 226.

---

71. See, Ch. XXIII, Sec. A(q); Ch. VIII, Sec. D(r), supra. See the following cases : Nilabati Behera v. Orissa, AIR 1993 SC 1960 : (1993) 2 SCC 746; supra; Kumari (Smt.) v. Tamil Nadu, AIR 1992 SC 2069 : (1992) 2 SCC 223; D.K. Basu v. West Bengal, AIR 1997 SC 610 : (1997) 1 SCC 416, supra; Chairman, Rly Board v. Mrs. Chandrima, AIR 2000 SC 988 : (2000) 2 SCC 465.

72. See, supra, Ch. XXXIII, under Art. 32; supra, Ch. VIII, under Art. 226; supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. H under Art. 21.

73. See, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, II.

74. Rudul Shah v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 1086 : (1983) 4 SCC 141.
Also, Bhim Singh v. Jammu and Kashmir, AIR 1986 SC 494; supra; D.K. Basu v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1997 SC 610 : (1997) 1 SCC 416.

75. Supra, footnote 74.

76. AIR 2000 SC 988; supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(l).

77. See for example, People's Union for Democratic Rights v. State of Bihar, AIR 1987 SC 355; D.K. Basu v. Ashok K. Johri, AIR 1997 SC 610 : (1997) 1 SCC 416.

78. D.K. Basu v. Ashok K. Johri, supra.

79. Nilabati Behara v. State of Orissa, AIR 1993 SC 1960 : (1993) 2 SCC 746; People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 1203; supra.

80. Dr. Jacob George v. State of Kerala, (1994) 3 SCC 430.
Also see, Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1996 SC 2426, Marri Yadamma v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 2002 AP 164.

HIV infected blood was transfused in a woman patient in a hospital maintained by a government corporation. The Andhra Pradesh High Court in M. Vijaya v. Chairman and Managing that the writ petition was maintainable. The court referred to Art. 21 of the Constitution which guarantees a dignified human existence to the Indians and not a mere animal existence. Art. 21 confers a right to enjoy all facilities of life. Accordingly, the High Court directed payment of Rs. one lac to the petitioner by way of compensation as a public law remedy. This was in addition to whatever compensation may be granted to her in a civil suit.

A child of seven years studying in a municipal school was crushed to death by a vehicle while crossing road in front of the school. The child had gone out during school hours to fetch drinking water, as water was not available within the school premises. The Court treated it as a matter of negligence to discharge the duty of care by the school authorities and awarded damages on a writ petition filed under Art. 226.[81]

When a prisoner was killed in a bomb attack on him while lodged in the prison, the Supreme Court awarded compensation for breach of his right to life guaranteed by Art. 21. The court asserted that even a prisoner has Fundamental Rights including other human rights.[82]

The court may however refuse to issue a writ to pay compensation when disputed questions of fact arise and the tortious liability is clearly denied by the state.[83] In such a situation recourse ought to be had to a civil suit. On the other hand, when there is negligence on the face ot it on the part of the state and Art. 21 is infringed, Right to life is one of the basic human rights guaranteed under Art. 21.[84]

The above discussion shows that over time, the Supreme Court and the High Courts have transformed the archaic concept of no state liability in the area of tortious liability into that of state liability.

When breach of a Fundamental Right is not involved, the courts are very selective in avoiding damages in writ jurisdiction. The Calcutta University delayed inordinately delcaration of result of a candidate. He filed a writ petition in the High Court under Art. 226 for compensation for the negligence of the University. Holding that the matter ought to be agitated in a civil court and not through a writ petition, the Supreme Court observed that in its writ jurisdiction, the Supreme Court or a High Court "would not award damages against public authorities merely because they have made some order which turns out to be ultra vires, or there has been some inaction in the performance of the duties unless there is malice or consious abuse. Before exemplary damages can be awarded it must be shown that some fundamental right under Art. 21 has been infringed by arbitrary or capricious action on the part of the public functionaries and that the sufferer was a helpless victim of that act."[85]

---

81. All India Lawyers Union v. Union of India, AIR 1999 Del 120.
82. State of Andhra Pradesh v. Challa Ramkrishna Reddy, AIR 2000 SC 2083 : (2000) 5 SCC 712.
83. Grid Corporation of Orissa Ltd. v. Sukamani Das, AIR 1999 SC 3412 : (1999) 7 SCC 298; Tamil Nadu Electricity Board v. Sumathi, AIR 2000 SC 1603 : (2000) 4 SCC 543.
84. See, Ch. XXI, Sec. D(iv); Ch. XXVI, Secs. H and J; Ch. VIII, Sec. D(r); Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A(q), supra.
85. Rabindra Nath Ghosal v. University of Calcutta, (2002) 7 SCALE 137 : AIR 2002 SC 3560 : (2002) 7 SCC 478.

CHAPTER XXXIX

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

SYNOPSIS

A. INTRODUCTORY

The subject of government contracts has assumed great importance in modern times. To-day state is the source of wealth. In the modern era of a welfare state, government's economic activities are expanding and the government is increasingly assuming the role of the dispenser of a large number of benefits. More and more of an individual's wealth to-day consists of new forms of property. More and more individuals and businesses enjoy largess in the form of government contracts, licences, quotas, mineral rights, jobs, etc. Most of these forms of wealth are in the nature of 'privileges', though some may be regarded as legal rights.[1]

There is thus need to develop some norms to protect individual interest in such wealth. The basic question is to regulate, structure and discipline government discretion to confer such benefits.

B. POSITION IN BRITAIN

At Common Law, before 1947, the Crown could not be sued in a Court on a contract. This privilege was traceable to the days of feudalism when a lord could not be sued in his own courts. Another maxim which was pressed into service was that the King can do no wrong.

1. Charles A. Reich. The New Property, 73 Yale LJ 733 : (1964); also by the same author. Individual Rights and Social Welfare: The Emerging Legal Issues, 74 Yale LJ 1245 (1965).

A subject could, however, seek redress against the Crown through a petition of right in which he set out his claim, and if the royal flat was granted, the action could then be tried in the Court. The royal fiat was granted as a matter of course, but not as a matter of right, and there was no remedy if the fiat was refused.

The Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, abolished this procedure and permitted suits being brought against the Crown in the ordinary courts to enforce contractual liability, a few types of contracts being, however, excepted.[2]

C. POSITION IN INDIA : ART. 299 OF THE CONSTITUTION

(a) FORMATION OF CONTRACTS

Article 299(1) of the Constitution lays down three conditions which the contracts made in the exercise of the executive power of the Centre or a State must fulfil to be valid: These conditions are:

(1) Such contracts must be expressed to be made by the President/ Governor as the case may be;

(2) Such contracts made in exercise of the executive power are to be executed on behalf of the President/Governor as the case may be; and

(3) The contracts are to be 'executed' by such persons and in such manner as the President/Governor may direct or authorise.

(4) The word executed in Art. 299(1) indicates that the contract between the government and any person must be in writing. A mere oral contract is not sufficient for the purposes of Art. 299(1).[3]

Questions often arise whether a contract not fulfilling the above requisites is valid.

Generally, the courts have taken the position that Art. 299(1) has not been inserted in the Constitution for the sake of mere form. Its function is to safeguard the government from being saddled with liability for unauthorised contracts. The provisions have been embodied to protect the general public as represented by the government. The terms of the Article have therefore been held to be mandatory and not merely directory. This means that a contract not couched in the particular form stipulated by Article 299(1) cannot be enforced at the instance of any of the contracting parties. Neither the government can be sued and held liable for

---

2. WADE AND PHILLIPS, CONST. LAW, 623 et. seq. (1977).
3. For detailed discussion of this topic see: JAIN & JAIN, Principles of Administrative Law, Ch. XXII (1986); Jain, A Treatise on Adm. Law, II (2002).

breach of such a contract, nor can the government enforce such a contract against the other contracting party.[4]

The Supreme Court has observed in K.P. Chowdhry v. State of Madhya Pradesh,[5] that "in view of Art. 299(1) there can be no implied contract between the Government and another person." Art. 299(1) being in 'mandatory terms' "no implied contract could be spelled out between the Government and the appellant" as "Art 299 in effect rules out all implied contracts between the Government and another person."[6] The Court also ruled that "if the contract between the Government and another person is not in full compliance with Art. 299(1), it would be no contract at all and could not be enforced either by the Government or other person as a contract."[7]

In K.P. Chowdhry v. State of Madhya Pradesh,[8] a person before bidding at an auction, signed a sale notice agreeing to abide by the terms of the auction. One of the terms was that if the bidder failed to complete the formalities after acceptance of his bid, his earnest money would be forfeited, the contract reauctioned at his risk and any deficiency occurring was to be recoverable from him as arrears of land revenue. The question arose whether signing of the sale notice by the bidder created any contract between the government and the bidder. It was not in full compliance of Art. 299. The Supreme Court held that there was no contract between the bidder and the government. The Court also ruled out any implied contracts between government and another person.

The Court justified this strict view by saying that if implied contracts between the government and other persons were allowed, they would, in effect, make Art. 299 a dead letter, for then a person who had a contract with the government which was not executed at all in the manner provided in Art. 299(1) could get away by pleading that an implied contract be inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case.

The Court took a similar rigid stand in Mulamchand v. State of Madhya Pradesh.[9]

But, then, the courts have also realised that insistence on too rigid observance of all the conditions stipulated in Art. 299 may not always be practicable. Hundreds of government officers daily enter into a variety of contracts, often of a petty nature, with private parties. At times, contracts are entered into through cor-

---

4. Chatturbhuj v. Moreshwar, AIR 1954 SC 236 : 1954 SCR 236; Bhikraj Jaipuria v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 113 : (1962) 2 SCR 880; Mulamchand v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 1218 : (1968) 3 SCR 214; Jit Ram Shiv Kumar v. State of Haryana, AIR 1980 SC 1285 : (1981) 1 SCC 11; Bishandayal & Sons v. Orissa, AIR 2001 SC 544.

A contract for the supply of goods would not cease to attract S. 7(d) of the Representation of the People Act merely because it does not comply with Art. 299(1) and as such is not enforceable against the government: Chatturbhuj v. Moreshwar, supra; also see, Abdul Rahiman Khan v. Sadasiva Tripathi, AIR 1969 SC 302; Konappa Rudrappa Nadgouda v. Vishwanath Reddy, AIR 1969 SC 447 : (1969) 1 SCR 395.

But in Laliteshwar Prasad v. Bateshwar Prasad, AIR 1966 SC 580 : (1966) 2 SCR 63, the Court refused to extend the Moreshwar principle to a situation where a contract not complying with Art. 299 has in fact not been ratified.

5. AIR 1967 SC 203 : (1966) 3 SCR 919.

6. Ibid., at 207.

7. Also see, Mulamchand v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 1218 : (1968) 2 SCR 880.

8. AIR 1967 SC 203 : (1966) 3 SCR 919.

9. AIR 1968 SC 1218 : (1968) 2 SCR 880.

respondence or even orally. It would be extremely inconvenient from an administrative point of view if it were insisted that each and every contract must be effected by a ponderous legal document couched in a particular form.

The judicial attitude to Art. 299 has sought to balance two motivations:

(i) on the one hand, to protect the Government from unauthorised contracts; and

(ii) on the other hand, to safeguard the interests of unsuspecting and unwary parties who enter into contracts with government officials without fulfilling all the formalities laid down in the Constitution.

A strict compliance with these conditions may be inequitable to private parties, and, at the same time, make government operations extremely difficult and inconvenient in practice. Consequently, in the context of the facts of some cases, the courts have somewhat mitigated the rigours of the formalities contained in Art. 299(1), and have enforced contracts even when there has been not full, but substantial, compliance with the requirements of Art. 299(1). In effect, it may be true to say that judicial view has oscillated between the liberal and the rigid interpretation of Art. 299.

A contract to be valid under Art. 299(1) has to be in writing. It does not, however, mean that there should always be a formal legal document between the government and the other contracting party for the purpose. A valid contract could emerge through correspondence, or through offer and acceptance, if all the conditions of Art. 299(1) are fulfilled.

In Union of India v. Rallia Ram,[10] the Chief Director of Purchases, Government of India, invited tenders for purchase of some cigarettes. The respondent's tender was accepted and the acceptance letter was signed by the Director and it contained an arbitration clause. The Supreme Court held that the constitutional provision [Art. 299(1)] did not in terms stipulate that only a formal document executed on behalf of the Government of India with the other contracting party was effective. In the absence of any direction by the President prescribing the manner in which a contract is to be executed, a valid contract may result from correspondence between the parties concerned. A tender for purchase of goods in pursuance of an invitation issued by, and acceptance in writing which is expressed to be made in the name of, the President and executed on his behalf by a person authorised for the purpose would conform to the requirements of Art. 299(1). In the instant case, the correspondence between the parties ultimately resulting in the acceptance note was held to amount to a contract. This means that a binding contract by tender and acceptance can come into existence if the acceptance is by a person duly authorized in this behalf by the President.[11]

Under Art. 299(1), a contract can be entered into on behalf of the government by a person authorised for the purpose by the President, or the Governor, as the case may be. The authority to execute the contract on behalf of the government may be granted by rules, formal notifications, or special orders; such authority may also be given in respect of a particular contract or contracts by the President/Governor to an officer other than the one notified under the rules. Art. 299(1) does not prescribe any particular mode in which authority must be con-

10. AIR 1963 SC 1685 : (1964) 3 SCR 164.
11. Union of India v. N.K. Pri. Ltd., AIR 1972 SC 915 : (1973) 3 SCC 388.

ferred; authorisation may be conferred ad hoc on any person.[12] A contract entered into by an officer not authorised to enter the same is not valid or binding.[13]

In Bhikraj Jaipuria v. Union of India,[14] the firm tendered large quantity of foodgrains. The offer was accepted by the Railway Administration. A scheme to distribute it to railway employees was accepted by the Railway Board. Officers were authorised to take delivery, transport and distribute it. They fixed programme of inspection, kept wagons for taking delivery, returned empty wagons, entered into correspondence, accepted bills and railway receipts and made payments of bills. No express authority to execute contracts had been conferred on the Divisional Superintendent who had issued the purchase orders. Nevertheless, the Court inferred from the facts that he acted under special authority granted to him to enter into the contract for the purchase of foodgrains.

In the case mentioned below,[15] the respondent company made an offer to purchase surplus rails from the Railway Board. The letter accepting the offer was written by the Secretary to the Railway Board. The Supreme Court ruled that no binding or concluded contract came into effect because the only person authorised to enter into a contract for the sale of the rails was the Director of Stores, and the Secretary was not authorised to enter into the contract on behalf of the President of India.

Lastly, under Art. 299(1), a contract between the government and a private party to be enforceable has to be expressed in the name of the President (or the Governor). Even though a contract is made by a person authorised by the President (or the Governor) to make it, it will still not be enforceable against the government if it is not expressed to be made on behalf of the President (or the Governor).[16] The constitutional provision regarding the form of contract is regarded to be mandatory.

In Bhikraj, mentioned above, no formal contracts were executed for the supply of foodgrains by the appellant. He had merely offered to supply foodgrains by letters sent to the divisional Superintendent, East India Railway, and he had accepted those offers through purchase orders. These purchase orders were not expressed to be made in the name of the Governor-General, nor were they executed on behalf of the Governor-General, but were signed by the divisional superintendent himself. The Court ruled that the resultant contracts were unenforceable. The result was that the appellant in Bhikraj was held not entitled to claim compensation for the foodgrains supplied by him as the contract was not in the proper form.

This rule has at times been judicially criticised, for a contract fully in order otherwise becomes unenforceable only because of a single defect in form.[17] In some cases, however, the rigours of this rule have been somewhat relaxed because of considerations of practical convenience not only of the private parties entering into agreements with the government but even of the government itself. Thus, the mere fact that the signing officer fails to mention that he was signing

---

12. State of Bihar v. Karam Chand Thapur, AIR 1962 SC 110 : (1962) 1 SCR 827.
13. Union of India v. Chouthmal, AIR 1976 MP 199.
14. AIR 1962 SC 113 : (1962) 2 SCR 880.
15. Union of India v. N.K. Pvt. Ltd., AIR 1972 SC 915 : (1973) 3 SCC 388.
16. Bhikraj Jaipuria v. Union of India, supra, footnote 14.
17. See, G.S. Partners v. Union of India, AIR 1959 Cal 287.

on behalf of the President, has been regarded not an infirmity fatal to the validity of the contract when it was expressed to have been made on behalf of the President. According to the Rallia Ram[18] ruling, when an officer signs in his official capacity but fails to state in the description that the contract was being executed on behalf of the President, the Court could ignore the technicality if from the correspondence it could reasonably be inferred that the contract was executed on behalf of the President.[19]

But, in several cases, the courts have adopted the rigid concept of Art. 299(1). In Karamshi v. State of Bombay,[20] there was an agreement for the supply of canal water for the irrigation of a cane-farm entered into by letters, but no formal contract in the name of the Governor was executed. After supplying water for sometime, the supply was stopped by the government. The Court found from the documentary evidence that though an agreement had been reached between the government and the party concerned, yet it could not be enforced because no formal document was executed in the name of the Governor and it was also not clear whether the Superintendent Engineer who had entered into the agreement was legally authorized to do so. The letters in question mentioned the names of the Minister of Public Works Department as well as the government but these letters did not purport to emanate from the Governor. The Court did not like to stretch the point further for fear of its resulting in the negation of the constitutional provision.[21]

In the case mentioned below,[22] the Supreme Court has reiterated the well established principle that no valid contract between the State Government and a tenderer for any work can arise unless the acceptance letter is signed in the name of the Governor. Here, the Executive Engineer, P.W.D., accepted the tender of the respondent for construction of a bridge; the letter of acceptance was signed by him as Executive Engineer, but not in the name of the Governor. Later the respondent withdrew his offer. According to the P.W.D. Code, the Executive Engineer was authorised to enter into such a contract. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court ruled that no valid contract had come into existence between the State Government and the respondent. The Court refused to accept the plea of the State that as the Executive Engineer had authority to accept the tender on behalf of the Government, it must be presumed that the contract had been entered into in accordance with the provisions of Art. 299. The Court reiterated that Art. 299(1) has been enacted not merely for the sake of form but as a matter of public policy to protect the government against unauthorised contracts.

(b) RATIFICATION

Before 1968, a judicial view was expressed that though, ordinarily, the government could not be sued on informal contracts, yet the government could accept responsibility for them by ratifying them.[23] For example, in Mondal[24] the Supreme Court stated that a contract not conforming with Art. 299(1) was not 'void' in the 'technical sense' that it could not be ratified.

---

18. Supra, footnote 10.
19. D.G. Factory v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1971 SC 141 : (1970) 3 SCC 874.
20. AIR 1964 SC 1714 : (1964) 6 SCR 984.
21. Also, Nanalal Madhavji v. Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1982 Cal 167.
22. State of Punjab v. Om Prakash Baldev Krishan, AIR 1988 SC 2149 : 1988 Supp SCC 722.
23. N. Purkayastha v. Union of India, AIR 1955 Ass 33; Chatturbhuj v. Moreshwar, supra; Laliteshwar Prasad v. Bateshwar Prasad, AIR 1966 SC 580 : (1966) 2 SCR 63.
24. State of West Bengal v. B.K. Mondal, AIR 1962 SC 779 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 876.

Again, in Karam Chand Thapar,[25] the Supreme Court expressed the view that when a contract was entered into by an unauthorized person, it could be ratified by the government, especially when the contract was for its benefit.

But, in Mulamchand,[26] the Supreme Court adopting a rigid view of Art. 299(1) held that there was no question of ratification or estoppel by or against the government in case of a contract not conforming to Art. 299(1). The Court reiterated the view that Art. 299(1) has not been enacted for the sake of mere form and, therefore, the formalities prescribed by it cannot be dispensed with. If the plea of the government regarding estoppel or ratification is admitted, that would mean repeal of an important constitutional provision intended for the protection of the general public.

In State of Uttar Pradesh v. Murari Lal,[27] the Court specifically said that "the consensus of opinion is that a contract entered into without complying with conditions laid down in Art. 299(1) is void". The Court was very specific that no question of ratification of such a contract could arise because being void it was not capable of ratification.

(c) NO ESTOPPEL

No estoppel can apply against the government if it seeks to nullify a contract which is not in the form as prescribed by Art. 299. "There is no question of estoppel or ratification in such a case".[28] Therefore, Art. 299(1) cannot be bypassed by invoking the doctrine of estoppel.

Estoppel can however apply in case of statutory contracts, or contracts by statutory bodies, as such contracts do not fall under the purview of Art. 299(1).[29]

(d) VOIDNESS OF CONTRACT IS RELATIVE

A view has been expressed that a contract not complying with the requirements of Art. 299 is only relatively void but not void for all purposes. It means that while the contract is not enforceable by the parties thereto, it can still subsist for some collateral purposes.[30]

(e) SERVICE AGREEMENTS

A contract of service with government is not to be struck down for non-compliance with the provisions of Art. 299.[31] The reason is that once appointed, the government servant acquires a status and his rights and obligations are no longer determined by consent of the two parties, but by statutory rules framed by the government under Art. 309.[32]

---

25. Bihar v. Karamchand Thapar Bros.Ltd., AIR 1962 SC 110.
26. Infra, footnote 28.
27. AIR 1971 SC 2210 : (1971) 2 SCC 449.
28. Mulamchand v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 1218 : (1968) 3 SCR 214; N. Ramanatha v. State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC 2461. Bihar E.G.F. Cooperative Society v. Sipahi Singh, AIR 1977 SC 2149 : (1977) 4 SCC 145; Jit Ram Shivkumar v. State of Haryana, AIR 1980 SC 1285 : (1981) 1 SCC 11.
29. Gujarat State Financial Corp. v. Lotus Hotels Pvt. Ltd., AIR 1983 SC 848 : (1983) 3 SCC 379, see, infra.
30. M. Mohammed v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Bom 443.
31. Ranjit Kumar v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1958 Cal 551; Union of India v. Jyotirmoyee, AIR 1967 Cal 461.
32. Supra, Chapter XXXVI, Sec. B.

Usually, no formal document is executed between the government and the servant; government's service starts with nothing more than a letter of appointment. In this context, it is necessary to regard service contracts as falling out of the scope of Art. 299(1).

Bose, J., in Parshotamlal Dhingra v. Union of India,[33] has stated that, as a service contract with the government is subject to 'pleasure' under Art. 310(1),[34] and can be terminated at will despite an express condition to the contrary, it cannot be regarded as a contract in the usual sense of the term and, as such, it should not be brought within the purview of Art. 299(1).

(f) STATUTORY CONTRACTS

Article 299 does not apply to a statutory contract, i.e., a contract made in exercise of statutory powers and not general executive powers.[35] A distinction is thus drawn between contracts executed in exercise of the executive powers and those executed in exercise of the ordinary statutory powers. Art. 299(1) applies to the former, but not to the latter, types of contracts.

In Lal Chand,[36] the Supreme Court considered a contract granting exclusive privilege of liquor vending, executed in exercise of the statutory powers referable to the Punjab Excise Act, and the rules made thereunder. The Court held that the grant of exclusive privilege gave rise to a contract of a statutory nature, distinguished from the one executed under Art. 299(1) and, therefore, compliance with Art. 299(1) was not required in such a case.

The Supreme Court has clarified that only because one of the parties to the agreement is statutory or public body, the contract cannot be characterised as a statutory contract. The Court has observed on this point:[37]

> "Every act of a statutory body need not necessarily involve an exercise of statutory power. Statutory bodies, like private parties, have power to contract or deal with property. Such activities may not raise any issue of public law".

Allotment of land pursuant to declared socio economic policy of the state is an executive act covered under Art. 162 and not a contract coming within ambit of Art. 299.[38]

D. CONTRACTUAL LIABILITY

Article 299(2) immunizes the President, or the Governor, or the person executing any contract on his behalf, from any personal liability in respect of any

---

33. AIR 1958 SC 36 : 1958 SCR 828; supra.

34. Supra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. C.

35. B.C. Gowda v. State of Mysore, AIR 1974 Kant 135; A Damodaran v. State of Kerala, AIR 1976 SC 1533 : (1976) 3 SCC 61.

36. State of Haryana v. Lal Chand, AIR 1984 SC 1326.
Also, Lalji Khimji v. State of Gujarat, (1993) Suppl. (3) SCC 567; Steel Authority of India v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1630 : (1999) 4 SCC 76.

37. Kerala State Electricity Board v. Kurien E. Kalathil, AIR 2000 SC 2573, at 2576 : (2000) 6 SCC 293.
On statutory contracts, also see, India Thermal Power Ltd. v. State of Madhya Pardesh, AIR 2000 SC 1005, at 1009 : (2000) 3 SCC 379. To the extent, the terms of the contract entered into by a statutory body are fixed by a statute, the contract may be regarded as statutory.

38. Govt. of A.P. v. Maharshi Publishers (P) Ltd., (2003) 1 SCC 95 : AIR 2003 SC 296.

contract executed for the purposes of the Constitution, or for purposes of any enactment relating to the Government of India heretofore in force.

This immunity is purely personal and does not immunize the government, as such, from a contractual liability arising under a contract which fulfils the requirements of Art. 299(1).[39]

RESTITUTION

Earlier, a view was expressed that when a contract was not in proper form, the exemption of Art. 299(2) would not apply to the officer executing the contract and it could be enforced against him personally under S. 230(3) of the Indian Contract Act.[40] But, a different view was expressed by the Supreme Court in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Murari Lal.[41] A contract entered into without complying with Art. 299(1) is void. There is no contract in the eyes of law and so S. 230(3) of the Contract Act is inapplicable.

The governmental liability is practically the same as that of a private person, subject, of course, to any statutory provision to the contrary.[42]

In order to protect innocent parties, the courts have held that if government derives any benefit under an agreement not fulfilling the requisites of Art. 299(1), the Government may be held liable to compensate the other contracting party under S. 70 of the Indian Contract Act, on the basis of a quasi-contractual liability, to the extent of the benefit received. The reason is that it is not just and equitable for government to retain any benefit it has received under an agreement which does not bind it. Art. 299(1) is not nullified if compensation is allowed to the plaintiffs for work actually done or services rendered on a reasonable basis and not on the basis of the terms of the contract.

The courts have adopted this view on practical considerations also. Modern government is a vast organisation. Officers have to enter into a variety of petty contracts, many a time orally or through correspondence without strictly complying with Art. 299. In such a case, if what has been done is for the benefit of the government for its use and enjoyment, and is otherwise legitimate and proper, S. 70 of the Contract Act should step in and support a claim for compensation made by the contracting parties notwithstanding the fact that the contract in question had not been made as required by Art. 299. If S. 70 were to be held inapplicable, it would lead to extremely unreasonable consequences and may even hamper the working of the government. Like ordinary citizens, even government should be subject to the provisions of S. 70.[43]

The basis of Section 70 of the Indian Contract Act is the equitable doctrine of restitution and not any implied contract. In Mondal,[44] a contractor constructed a building at the request of an official who had accepted his tender. The building was constructed and accepted by the government but the contractor was not paid. The government argued that the request in pursuance of which the building was

---

39. State of Bihar v. Sonabati, AIR 1954 Pat 513.
40. Chatturbhuj v. Moreshwar, supra, footnote 4.
41. Supra, footnote 27.
42. State of Bihar v. Abdul Majid, AIR 1954 SC 245 : 1954 SCR 786.
43. State of West Bengal v. B.K. Mondal, AIR 1962 SC 779 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 876; New Marine Coal Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 152 : (1964) 2 SCR 859.
44. State of West Bengal v. B.K. Mondal, supra, footnote 43.

constructed was unauthorised and so there was no privity of contract between the contractor and the government. There was no contract fulfilling the requisites of Art. 299(1) and enforceable as such. The Supreme Court held that though the contract was unenforceable as it did not fulfil the requisites of Art. 299, yet the State was still liable to pay under S. 70 of the Contract Act on a quasi-contract for the work done by the contractor and accepted by the government.

Section 70 lays down three conditions, namely:

(i) a person should lawfully do something for another person or deliver something to him;

(ii) in doing so, he must not intend to act gratuitously, and

(iii) the other person for whom something is done or to whom something is delivered must enjoy the benefit thereof.

In Mondal, all the three elements had been satisfied and so the government was held liable.[45]

Similarly, if under a contract with a government, a person has obtained any benefit, he can be sued for the dues under S. 70 of the Indian Contract Act though the contract did not conform to Art. 299.[46] If the government has made any payments under a void contract, it can recover the same under S. 65 of the Contract Act.[47]

The Mondal principle has been applied in a number of cases.[48]

It needs to be emphasized that S. 70, Contract Act, does not deal with the rights and liabilities of parties accruing from a contract. It deals with the rights and liabilities of the parties accruing from relations which resemble those created by contract. Thus, in cases falling under S. 70, the person doing something for another cannot sue for specific performance of the contract nor can he ask for damages for breach of contract for the simple reason that no valid contract exits between the parties. All that S. 70 provides is that if the goods delivered are accepted, or the work done is voluntarily enjoyed, then the liability to pay compensation for the said work or goods arises. S. 70 deals with cases where a person does a thing not intending to act gratuitously and the other enjoys it.

Section 70, Contract Act, in no way detracts from the binding character of Art. 299(1). The cause of action for the respondent's claim under S. 70 is not any breach of contract by the government. In fact, the claim under S. 70 is based on the assumption that the contract in pursuance of which the respondent has supplied the goods, or made the construction in question, is ineffective and, as such, amounts to no contract at all. Thus, S. 70 does not nullify Art. 299(1). In fact, S. 70 may be treated as supplementing the provisions of Art. 299(1). What s. 70

---

45. Mulamchand v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1968 SC 1218 : (1968) 3 SCR 214; Manohar Lal v. Union of India, AIR 1974 Pat 56; Rambabu v. State, AIR 1981 All 16.

46. State of Orissa v. Rajballav, AIR 1976 Ori 79.

47. Pannalal v. Deputy Commissioner, AIR 1973 SC 1174 : (1973) 1 SCC 639; Union of India v. Sita Ram Jaiswal, AIR 1977 SC 329 : (1976) 4 SCC 505; Nanalal Madhoji v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1982 Cal 167; Union of India v. J.K. Gas Plant, AIR 1980 SC 1330 : (1980) 3 SCC 469.

48. See, for example, The New Marine Coal Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 152, 155 : (1964) 2 SCR 859.

prevents is unjust enrichment and it applies as much to individuals as to corporations and governments.

E. AWARD OF CONTRACTS

In modern times, the welfare state is the source of enormous wealth and more and more persons enjoy government largess in the form of jobs, contracts, licenses, quotas, mineral rights, concessions, etc. This raises the possibility of exercise of power by a government to dispense largess in an arbitrary manner. It is axiomatic that a government or any of its agencies ought not to be allowed to act arbitrarily and confer benefits on whomsoever they want. Questions have often arises whether the state is bound by any norms in dispensing its largess.

Since 1979, there have been far reaching developments in the law relating to government contracts outside Art. 299.[49] Art. 299 has a very limited range, viz., it lays down only some formal rules regarding such mundane matters as how a contract between government and a private person is to be executed, or expressed, and who can enter into such a contract on behalf of the government? But Art. 299 does not say anything as to how the executive power to enter into contracts is to be exercised by the government? Whether there are any limitations subject to which this power is to be exercised? To what extent can there be judicial review of government contracts under Art. 226?

Before 1979, the position was that the Government enjoyed lots of discretion in the matter of awarding contracts to whomsoever it liked. The contractual freedom of the government was equated practically to that of a private person. The courts followed the general principle that the government was free to enter into a contract with any one it liked. Thus, the Supreme Court stated in Achutan in 1959[50] : "When one person is chosen rather than another, the aggrieved party cannot claim the protection of Art. 14 because the choice of the person to fulfil a particular contract must be left to the Government," and also that "a contract which is held from Government stands on no different footing from a contract from a private party."

The Kerala High Court observed in the same tenor in 1974[51] : "It is perfectly open to the Government even as it is to a private party to choose a person to their liking to fulfil a contract which they wished to perform."

But, in course of time, the judicial attitude has undergone a sea change on this question. The courts had to shed their passive attitude in this area as a realisation dawned on them that a welfare state exists for the welfare and common good of the largest number of people, and not for the good of the favoured few, and that the state does not enjoy the same freedom as a private person does because a government is always a government subject to rule of law in all its activities.[52]

So, the Supreme Court veered round to the view that there is need to develop some norms to regulate, structure and discipline the government discretion to

---

49. For a more detailed discussion of this topic, see, Jain, A Treatise on Administration Law, II. Ch. XXIV.
50. C.K. Achutan v. State of Kerala, AIR 1959 SC 490 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 787.
51. G.E. & E. Co. v. Chief Engineer, AIR 1974 Ker 23.
52. For discussion on this topic, see, supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. D(iv).

confer such benefits, and impose judicial review in this area to some extent. In 1975, in Eurasian,[53] the Supreme Court stated that "the government is not and should not be as free as an individual" in the matter of entering into contracts and that "whatever its activity, the government is still the government":

It is now well established that in dispensing its largess, the state is expected not to act as a private individual but should act in conformity with certain healthy standards and norms. The principle of non discrimination contained in Art. 14 has been applied by the Supreme Court in an area of great contemporary importance, viz., conferment of benefits and award of contracts by the government.[54]

The leading case in this area is Ramana.[55] In 1979, the Supreme Court laid down some principles for awarding contracts by a government or its agencies. The Court declared that the executive power of a government to award contracts would be subject to Art. 14 which means that no government can award contracts in an arbitrary or discriminatory manner. The government is still the government when it acts in the matter of granting largess and it cannot act arbitrarily in this respect. No government can give or withhold largess "in its arbitrary discretion or its sweet will". The government cannot discriminate between individuals in the matter of entering into contracts and the government action must be based on standards that are not arbitrary or unauthorised.

The government is bound by the standards which it announces it will observe. The government cannot relax those standards in favour of a specific person without bringing it to the notice of others who may be similarly situated. For example, if the notice inviting tenders says that the tenders would be received by a specific time on a specific date, then it will be wrong on the part of the concerned authority to receive a tender after the specified time and date.

The Court has also insisted that the norms laid down for qualification of the person to whom the contract is to be awarded ought to be "reasonable, objective and non-discriminatory" and must be strictly adhered to. The Court accordingly observed;

> "It must therefore follow as a necessary corollary from the principle of equality enshrined in Art. 14 that though the state is entitled to refuse to enter into relationship with anyone, yet if it does so, it cannot arbitrarily choose any person it likes for entering into such relationship and discriminate between persons similarly circumstanced, but it must act in conformity with some standard or principle which meets the test of reasonableness and non-discrimination and any departure from such standard or principle would be invalid unless it can be supported or justified on some rational and non-discriminatory ground."

The Court observed further :

> "The power or discretion of the government in the matter of grant of largess including award of jobs, contracts, quotas, licences, etc. must be confined and structured by rational, relevant and non-discriminatory standard or norm and if

---

53. Erusian Equipment & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1975 SC 266 : (1975) 1 SCC 70.

Also see, Sukhdev v. Bhagatram, AIR 1975 SC 1331 : (1975) 1 SCC 421; Kasturi Lal v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1980 SC 1992*;* see also Jespar I. Slong v. State of Meghalaya, (2004) 11 SCC 485 : AIR 2004 SC 3533.

54. For discussion on Art. 14, see, Ch. XXI, supra.

55. Ramana Dayaram Shetty v. International Airport Authority, AIR 1979 SC 1628 : (1979) 3 SCC 489.

> the government departs from such standard or norm in any particular case or cases, the action of the government would be liable to be struck down, unless it can be shown by the government that the departure was not arbitrary but was based on some valid principle which in itself was not irrational, unreasonable or discriminatory."

The following main principles emerge from Ramana:

(1) The government does not have an open and unrestricted choice in the matter of awarding contracts to whomsoever it likes.

(2) The government is to exercise its discretion in conformity with some reasonable non-discriminatory standards or principles.

(3) The government is bound by the standards laid down by it.

(4) The government can depart from these standards only when it is not arbitrary to do so and the departure is based on some valid principle which in itself is not "irrational, unreasonable or discriminatory".

The above-mentioned propositions have been reiterated by the Supreme Court in a number of cases. For example, in 1993, in F.C.I. v. Kamdhenu Cattle Feed Industries,[56] the Supreme Court has observed :

> "In contractual sphere as in all other state actions, the state and all its instrumentalities have to conform to Article 14 of the Constitution of which non-arbitrariness is a significant facet. There is not unfettered discretion in public law : A public authority possesses powers only to use them for public good. This imposes the duty to act fairly, and to adopt a procedure which is fairplay in action."

It is thus clear from the above observations of the Supreme Court that the government cannot act arbitrarily in the matter of entering into contractual relationship with third parties. It cannot choose any person it likes. Its action must conform to some standard or norm which is rational and non-discriminatory.

Since Ramana, in order to ensure that the government exercises its power to award contracts in a non-discriminatory manner, the Supreme Court has laid down inter alia the following propositions in respect of award of contracts by the government or its agencies :

(i) The government must lay down some norms or standards of eligibility. These standards ought to be rational and non-discriminatory. A democratic government cannot lay down arbitrary and capricious standards for the choice of persons with whom alone it will deal.

(ii) The government must adhere to, and must not deviate from, the standards laid down by it.[57]

(iii) The government ought not to award the contract to some one not fulfilling the prescribed conditions of eligibility. If the authority does so, its action becomes discriminatory since it excludes other persons similarly situate from tendering for the contract and that would be plainly arbitrary

---

56. AIR 1993 SC 1601 : (1993) 1 SCC 71.
57. West Bengal Electricity Board v. Patel Engineers, AIR 2001 SC 682 : (2001) 2 SCC 451.

and without reason. The rule flows from Art. 14 as well as from Administrative Law.[58]

(iv) The terms and conditions issued in the advertisement inviting tenders cannot be altered to the advantage of a particular person having regard to the fact that if such favourable terms and conditions were known to all other participants, they would have participated in the tender.[59]

(v) Expression of different views and opinions in exercise of contractual powers may be there. However, such difference of opinion must be based on specified norms. Those norms may be legal norms or accounting norms. As long as the norms are clear and properly understood by the decision maker and the bidders and other stakeholders, uncertainty and question of breach of the rule of law will not arise.[60]

(vi) For execution of any work, tenders must be invited. The contract must be awarded to one with the lowest tender except when, in a specific case, there are some good reasons for not doing so.

As the Supreme Court has insisted in Tata Cellular[61] : "But the principles laid down in Art. 14 of the Constitution have to be kept in view while accepting or refusing a tender."

The Supreme Court has stated in another case[62] : "…….the Government had the right to either accept or reject the lowest offer but that of course, if done on a policy, should be on some rational and reasonable grounds."[63]

It is clear that when an instrumentality of the State acts contrary to public good and public interest, unfairly, unjustly and unreasonably, in its contractual, constitutional or statutory obligations, it really acts contrary to the constitutional guarantee found in Art. 14 of the Constitution. Therefore once the State or an instrumentality of the State is a party, it has an obligation in law to act fairly, justly and reasonably consistent with Article 14. Since the Export Credit Guarantee Corporation being an instrumentality of the State and a monopoly body had to be approached by the appellants by compulsion to cover its export risk and the policy was issued after seeking all required information and after receiving huge sums of money as premium exceeding Rs. 16 lakhs and the liability of the insurer under the policy arose when the default of the exporter occurred and thereafter when the Government of the country to which the goods were exported failed to fulfil its guarantee, the appellant was entitled to relief even though a suitable efficacious alternate remedy was available by way of a suit.[64]

Article 14 prohibits the Government from arbitrarily choosing a contractor at its will and pleasure. However, no person can claim a Fundamental Right to carry on business with the Government. All that he can claim is that in competing for

---

58. Premium Granites v. State of Tamil Nadu, (1994) 2 SCC 691 : AIR 1994 SC 2233; Raunaq International Ltd. v. I.V.R. Construction Ltd., AIR 1999 SC 393 : (1999) 1 SCC 492.
59. G.J. Fernandez v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1990 SC 958.
60. Reliance Energy Ltd. v. Maharashtra State Road Development Corpn. Ltd., (2007) 8 SCC 1 : (2007) 11 JT 1.
61. Tata Cellular v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC at 25.
62. Union of India v. Hindustan Development Corporation, AIR 1994 SC 1000.
63. Lalzawmliana v. Mizoram, AIR 2001 Gau 23.
64. ABL International Ltd. v. Export Credit Guarantee Corporation of India Ltd., (2004) 3 SCC 553: (2003) 10 JT 300.

the contract, he should not be unfairly treated and discriminated against, to the detriment of the public interest. Thus the notices inviting tenders for supply of high security vehicle registration places are open to response by all, and even if one single manufacturer is ultimately chosen for a region or State, it cannot be said that the State has created a monopoly of business in favour of private party.[65]

In the context of privatisation of Delhi and Mumbai Airports and selection of joint venture partners by multi-tier bidding process alteration of terms of original tender documents could not be expanded or narrowed down at the evaluation stage as it was beyond authority and contrary to the scoring system that was to be followed.[66]

It is well settled that the State and its authorities including instrumentalities of States have to be just fair and reasonable in all their activities including those in the field of contracts. In the field of contracts the State and its instrumentalities ought to so design their activities as would ensure fair competition and non discrimination. They can augment their resources but the object should be to serve the public cause and to do public good by resorting to fair and reasonable methods.[67]

The Supreme Court has further intensified review in this area. In Reliance Energy[68] the Supreme Court has sought to co-relate the right conferred by Article 14 with those under Article 21 of the Constitution. It also laid down that the norms laid down by the administration must be clearly and properly understood by the administration as well as those interacting with the administration. If such norms are uncertain then the rule of law could be breached. The Court observed that legal certainty was an important aspect of the rule of law and any vagueness or subjectivity in such norms could result in unequal and discriminatory treatment and thereby violate the doctrine of "level playing field". Reliance Energy shows the depth to which a Court in exercise of its power of judicial review could travel when such norms are challenged on the grounds of uncertainty, vagueness and subjectivity.

In Reliance Energy the Supreme Court after referring to the three heads of judicial review namely illegality, irrationality and procedural impropriety, has held that all errors of law are jurisdictional errors.[69] This is a giant leap because a jurisdictional error has many ramifications e.g. whether it voids the exercise or whether the bar of alternative remedy would apply etc.

In Reliance Airport[70] the scoring system formed part of the evaluation process and its object was to provide identification of factor, alteration of marks of each

---

65. Assn. of Registration Places v. Union of India, (2005) 1 SCC 679 : AIR 2005 SC 469.
66. Reliance Airport Developers (P) Ltd. v. Airports Authority of India, (2006) 10 SCC 1 : (2006) 10 JT 424.
67. Jamshed Hormusji Wadia v. Board of Trustees, Port of Mumbai, (2004) 3 SCC 214 : AIR 2004 SC 1815.
68. Reliance Energy Ltd. v. Maharashtra State Road Development Corpn. Ltd., (2007) 8 SCC 1 : (2007) 11 JT 1.
69. Reliance Energy Ltd. v. Maharashtra State Road Development Corpn. Ltd., (2007) 8 SCC 1 : (2007) 11 JT 1.
70. (2006) 10 SCC 1 : (2006) 10 JT 424.

of those factors and giving marks at different stages so as to achieve objectivity in the decision making process.[71]

Ordinarily a contract ought to be awarded after inviting tenders for the purpose. This provides an opportunity to all those who may be interested in securing the contract to offer their bids for the purpose. Also, the concerned authority may select the best offer on competitive price without affecting the quality of work. It eliminates favouritism and discrimination in awarding the contract. Award of a contract to an individual without inviting tenders is invalid as it amounts to "pick and choose" which violates Art. 14.[72]

In Business Link[73] it was contended that the notice inviting tenders was published in newspapers not having wide circulation. This contention was rejected on the finding that one of the newspapers in which the publication was made had a circulation of 39,600 copies per day for about 50 years and the other 30,000 copies per day for about 11 years in the city concerned. The argument that the advertisements were inadequate was negatived on the finding that 12% responded which was suggestive of wide circulation.[74]

The terms of the invitation to tender are not open to judicial scrutiny, the same being in the realm of contract. The government must have a free hand in setting the terms of the tender. The courts can scrutinize the award of the contracts. The courts cannot strike down the terms of the tender prescribed by the Government because it feels that some other terms in the tender would have been fair, wiser or logical.[75]

When tenders are invited for execution of a work, the contract is awarded to the lowest tenderer which is in public interest. Ignoring the instructions subject to which the tenders are invited would encourage and provide scope for "discrimination arbit rareness and favourtism which are totally opposed to the Rule of Law and our constitutional values. The very purpose of issuing instructions is to ensure their enforcement lest "the Rule of Law should be a casualty." A writ Court can interfere if the lowest tender is illegally rejected.[76] The Supreme Court has however emphasized in the case noted below[77] that the rule that the contract ought to be awarded to the lowest tenderer applies when all things are equal. If the lowest tenderer does not satisfy the prescribed conditions, the contract cannot be awarded to him. "Merely because a bid is the lowest the requirements of compliance of rules and conditions cannot be ignored." The decision to reject the lowest tender must be based upon some reason which would satisfy and meet the requirements of Art. 14 of the Constitution. Also, the concerned authority is not obliged to award contract to a tenderer at the quoted price bid. The authority can always negotiate with the next tenderer (in case the lowest tender is out for any

---

71. Reliance Energy Ltd. v. Maharashtra State Road Development Corpn. Ltd., (2007) 8 SCC 1: (2007) 11 JT 1.

72. Sterling Computers, supra; V. Sivakumar v. State of Kerala, AIR 1999 Ker 49.

73. Business Link v. A. S. Advertising Co., (2003) 10 SCC 258 : AIR 2004 SC 4959.

74. Business Link v. A. S. Advertising Co., (2003) 10 SCC 258: AIR 2004 SC 4959.

75. Directorate of Education v. Educomp Datamatics Ltd., (2004) 4 SCC 19 : AIR 2004 SC 1962. The proposition is expressed with undue rigidly e.g., would an eligibility criteria that is designed to favour a particular class.

76. Pritam Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 P&H 194; Tata Cellular v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 11.
See, Sec. F, infra.

77. West Bengal Electricity Board v. Patel Engg. Co. Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 682 : (2001) 2 SCC 451.

reason) for awarding the contract on economically viable price bid.[78] A practical compulsion which necessitates an avoidable choice cannot be termed as perverse or lacking in rationality.[79]

In the case noted below,[80] the award of a contract was quashed because the decision of the concerned authority to reject the lower tender of the petitioner was found to be "totally arbitrary, capricious and devoid of any sense of fairplay".

In a given situation the Court may not upset the grant.[81]

Again on some occasions judicial review in tender matters have been restricted. In Master Marine Services[82] the tender document required bidder to have licence to act as surveyor/loss assessor under Insurance Act to prequalify. The appellant company did not have such licence in its name, but its chairman did. The contracting authority, exercising its power under tender conditions to do so, waived this technical requirement for various reasons given by it and the contract was awarded to the appellant on financial grounds since its bid for the work involved was lower. The Court found that 98 per cent of the work being of a clerical nature, which required no licence under Insurance Act, contracting authority was justified in awarding contract to appellant company primarily on financial/commercial considerations.

However, while ascertaining that principles of judicial review applied to the exercise of contractual powers by government bodies in order to prevent arbitrariness or favouritism, the Court cautioned that there are inherent limitations in the exercise of such review. If a review of the administrative decision is permitted indiscriminately it will be substituting its own decision, without the necessary expertise, which itself may be fallible. The Government must have freedom of contract. Free play in the joints is a necessary concomitant for an administrative body functioning in an administrative sphere or quasi-administrative sphere. However, the decision must not only be tested by the application of Wednesbury principles of reasonableness but must be free from arbitrariness unaffected by bias or actuated by mala fides. Such caution in quashing decision may impose heavy administrative burden on the administration and lead to increased and unbudgeted expenditure.[82]

A challenge to the award of contract to the appellant on ground that certain tender conditions relating to applicability of Rules relating to disposal/transportation of hazardous waste was vague in that whether correct Rules and sub rules had been mentioned and incorporated in the contract was turned down on the basis that such ground of attack was irrelevant, since the parties would be bound by the statutory obligations in any case.[83]

---

78. West Bengal Electricity Board v. Patel Engineering Co. Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 682 : (2001) 2 SCC 451. Also see : Y. Konda Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1997 AP 121.

79. Reliance Airport Developers (P) Ltd. v. Airports Authority of India, (2006) 10 SCC 1 : (2006) 10 JT 424.

80. PSC Engineers Pvt. Ltd. v. Tripura, AIR 2000 Gau 198.

81. Subhash Projects & Marketing Ltd. v. W.B. Power Development Corpn. Ltd., (2005) 8 SCC 438 : AIR 2006 SC 116, where compensation was awarded by the Court in the facts and circumstances of the case.

82. Master Marine Services (P) Ltd. v. Metcalfe & Hodgkinson (P) Ltd., (2005) 6 SCC 138 : AIR 2005 SC 2299.

83. Ganapathi Metals v. MSTC Ltd., (2005) 12 SCC 169.

The award of a contract for execution of a public work on the basis of competitive bidding has many advantages for the state:

(a) it offers fair opportunity to compete for the contract;

(b) the concerned authority may select the best person for the job on competitive price without compromising with the quality of work;

(c) it eliminates favouritism and discrimination in awarding the contract.

In the matter of a ward of dealership in petroleum products interpretation of the advertisement inviting application the principle of casus omissus can be invoked to gather the true import of an eligibility condition.[84]

A municipal committee awarded a contract to the second respondent with a view to help him, throwing all norms to the winds. The conditions advertised were revised to help him without advertising the same. The action of the committee was held to be arbitrary. The Court ruled that the revised norms ought to have been advertised in order to enable all the eligible persons to take part in the tender.[85]

There have been a large number of cases since Ramana in which the award of contracts by the government and its agencies have been challenged before the courts[86] and, in some ofthese cases, the award of contracts has been quashed because of improper exercise of power by the concerned authority.[87]

The Supreme Court has affirmed the decision of the High Court which in effect granted specific performance of a contract.[88]

According to the Supreme Court in Tata Cellular[89] the Court can review administrative discretion in awarding a contract on the following grounds : (1) Illelgality; (2) Irrationality and (3) Procedural Impropriety.

These principles have been reiterated by the courts in a number of cases.

In Dinesh,[90] the Railway Board rejected the tender of the respondent. The Supreme Court ruled that the Board had acted arbitrarily and without applying its mind while doing so. It was characterised as a "flagrant violation of the constitutional mandate of Art. 14."

In the instant case, there was a clause in the Guidelines issued along with the tender saying that the Railway was entitled to reject any tender offer without assigning any reasons. So, it was argued that the Railway had power to accept, or not to accept, the lowest tender. But the Supreme Court said that "a public

---

84. Sangeeta Singh v. Union of India, (2005) 7 SCC 484 : AIR 2005 SC 4459.
85. S.Y. Nawab v. Municipal Corpn. of Hyderabad, AIR 2001 AP 403.
86. Tata Cellular v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 11; Union of India v. Hindustan Development Corpn., AIR 1994 SC 989; Asia Foundation and Construction Ltd. v. Trafalgar House Construction (I) Ltd., (1997) 1 SCC 738; New Horizons Ltd. v. Union of India, (1995) 1 SCC 478; Delhi Science Forum v., (1996) 2 SCC 405.
87. Sterling Computers Ltd. v. M. and N. Publications Ltd., AIR 1996 SC 51 : (1993) 1 SCC 445; Harminder Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1986 SC 1527; Prestress India Corp. v. U.P. State Electricity Board, AIR 1988 SC 2035; Alok Prasad Varma v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Pat 211; see also Assn. of Registration Plates v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 364 : AIR 2005 SC 1354.
88. State of M.P. v. Ramswaroop Vaishya, (2003) 2 SCC 254 : AIR 2003 SC 1067.
89. Tata Cellular v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 11 : (1994) 6 SCC 651.
90. Union of India v. Dinesh Engineering Corporation, (2001) 8 SCC 491 : AIR 2001 SC 3887.

authority even in contractual matters should not have unfettered discretion". In contracts having commercial element, the authorities are bound to follow the norms recognised by the courts. This requirement is necessary to avoid unreasonable and arbitrary decisions being taken by public authorities whose actions are amenable to judicial review. As regards the specific clause mentioned above, the Court said:

> "This does not give an arbitrary power to railways to reject the bid offered by a party merely because it has that power. This is a power which can be exercised on the existence of certain conditions which in the opinion of the railways are not in the interest of the railways to accept the offer."

A few examples of this judicial approach may be cited here. Award of a contract is quashed on such grounds as, mala fides; corruption; favouritism; discrimination; arbitrariness; improper motives; non-application of mind on the part of concerned authority; award or terms of the contract being arbitrary or unreasonable;[1] contract awarded without any publicity.[2]

Award of a contract is quashed if the concerned authority takes into account irrelevant considerations;[3] or if the contract is awarded by accepting a tender at a higher rate against the interest of revence;[4] or if the contract is awarded to one who does not fulfil the prescribed eligibility conditions.

In Chaitanya,[5] the award of contracts was quashed by the Supreme Court. It characterised the award of contracts to ineligible persons in preference to eligible persons as an "unusual, wilful and perverse way of exercising the power of distributing state largess". It was argued on behalf of the state in the instant case that no loss would be caused to the State Exchequer by the award of the contracts. The Supreme Court rejected this argument saying that even if the award of the contracts "was not at the expense of the Exchequer, there could be no question that what was done was the distribution by the State of favours loaded with bounty by way of enabling the recipients of the favours to earn enormous profits".[6]

Award of a contract by the government or any of its authority may be quashed by the Court if the contract is entered into for a collateral purpose, or if there is discrimination or unreasonableness".[7]

There may however be some special circumstances when the Court may uphold award of a contract without inviting tenders for the same.[8] For example, a contract reached through negotiations between a State Government and a company to set up as a joint venture a multi-super-speciality hospital to give medical

---

1. G.J. Fernandez v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1990 SC 958 : (1990) 2 SCC 488; Centre for Public Interest Litigation v. Union of India, AIR 2001 SC 80 : (2000) 8 SCC 606; Common Cause, A Regd. Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979, 2994 : (1999) 6 SCC 667; Centre for Public Interest Litigation v. Union of India, AIR 2001 SC 80.
2. M.I. Builders Pri. Ltd. v. Radhey Shyam Sahu, AIR 1999 SC 2468 : (1999) 6 SCC 464.
3. Sterling Computers Ltd. v. M & N. Publications Ltd., AIR 1996 SC 51.
4. Dutta Associates Pvt. Ltd. v. Indo Mercantiles Pvt. Ltd., (1997) 1 SCC 53; P.S.C. Engineers Pvt. Ltd. v. Tripura, AIR 2000 Gau 198.
5. In Chaitanya Kumar v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1986 SC 825 : (1986) 2 SCC 594.
6. Ibid, at 828.
7. Asia Foundation & Construction Ltd. v. Trafalgar House Construction Ltd., (1997) 1 SCC 738; Raunaq International Ltd. v. IVR Construction, AIR 1999 SC 393 : (1999) 1 SCC 492.
8. Kasturilal Lakshmi Reddy v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1980 SC 1992 : (1980) 4 SCC 1; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Nandlal Jaiswal Bengal, AIR 1987 SC 1109.

aid to government employees on a no profit no loss basis and give free medical aid to the poor people was held to be valid even though no tenders were invited for the same.[9] The State is not constitutionally obliged to shun a private party who offers to develop a Project and the State negotiates with such a party and agrees to provide resources and other facilities for the purpose of development of the project eg. a Port.[10] The example given by Panchal J. is instructive; "Please wait I will first advertise, see whether any other offers are forthcoming and then after considering all offers, decide whether I should get the Port developed through you". It would be most unrealistic to insist on such a procedure, particularly, in an area like Pondicherry, which on account of historical, political and other reasons, is not yet industrially developed and where entrepreneurs have to be offered attractive terms in order to persuade them to set up industries. The State must be free in such a case to negotiate with a private entrepreneur with a view to inducing him to develop the Port and if the State enters into a contract with such an entrepreneur for providing resources and other facilities for developing the Port, the contract cannot be assailed as invalid because the State has acted bona fide, reasonably and in public interest. The Court ruled that so long as the State action was bona fide and reasonable, it would not interfere merely on the ground that no advertisement was given or publicity made or tenders invited. Similarly, State can negotiate with a party to set up an industry in the State.[11] Tender conditions may have to be construed differently having regard to fact situation obtaining in each case. In a given situation there may be a variation of tender conditions. No hard and fast rule can be laid down therefor.[12]

A public sector undertaking in view of the principles of good corporate governance may accept such tenders which are economically beneficial to it and may vary the tender condition to a reasonable extent in public interest.[13]

Fixation of value of a tender is entirely within the purview of the executive and the courts have hardly any role to play in this process except striking down such action of the executive as is proved to be arbitrary.[14]

In the matter of formulating conditions of a tender document and awarding a contract of the nature of those for supply of HSVRP's, greater latitude is required to be conceded to the State authorities. Certain conditions have to be laid down to ensure that the contractor has the capacity and the resources to successfully execute the work. Unless action of tendering authority is found to be malicious and a misuse of its statutory powers, tender conditions are unassailable. The manufacturer chosen to supply HSVRPs would, in fact, be a sort of agent or medium of the RTOs concerned for fulfillment of the statutory obligations in accordance with R. 50, Central Motor Vehicles Rules, 1989 (as amended), and these obligations would be better discharged if there is one manufacturer instead of multi manufacturers as suppliers. A contract providing for technical expertise, financial capability and experience qualifications with a long term of 15 years would serve

---

9. Tej Singh Sarupriya v. Rajasthan State Mines and Minerals Ltd., AIR 2001 Raj 225.
10. Villianur Iyarkkai Padukappu Maiyam v. U.O.I., (2009) 7 SCC, 561, 605 : (2009) 8 JT 339.
11. Kasturi Lal Lakshmi Reddy v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1980 SC 1992.
12. BSN Joshi & Sons Ltd. v. Nair Coal Services Ltd., (2006) 11 SCC 548 : AIR 2007 SC 437.
13. BSN Joshi & Sons Ltd. v. Nair Coal Services Ltd., (2006) 11 SCC 548 : AIR 2007 SC 437.
14. Jespar I. Slong v. State of Meghalaya, (2004) 11 SCC 485 : AIR 2004 SC 3533.

the dual purpose of attracting sound parties to stake their money in undertaking the job of supply of HSVRPs and safeguard the public interest by ensuring that for a long period the work of affixation of security HSVRPs would continue uninterrupted in fulfillment of the object of the scheme contained in R.50.[15]

If there are two alternatives available, of giving a short term or a long term contract, it is not for the Court to suggest that the short term contract should be given.[16]

F. ISSUE OF WRITS IN MATTERS OF CONTRACT

A writ petition can be moved in the High Court under Art. 226, or the Supreme Court under Art. 32, to challenge award of a contract on the grounds as discussed above. In the area of exercise of contractual powers by governmental authorities, the function of the courts is to prevent arbitrariness and favouritism and to ensure that the power is exercised in public interest and not for a collateral purpose.[17] The application of Article 14 in contractual matters as well as in matters relating to government policy has been stated in unqualified affirmative terms.[18]

After the award of the contract comes the stage of fulfilling the contractual obligations. There has been controversy on the question whether one could resort to the writ jurisdiction for imposing contractual obligations on a public authority.

Even when the courts had veered round to the view that the award of a contract by the government and its agencies would be amenable to the writ jurisdiction, to some extent, as stated above, they still maintained the position that the question of breach of a contract was one which fell primarily within the area of private law under the Contract Act, and that the remedy therefor lay in a civil Court and not under the writ jurisdiction of the High Courts under Art. 226.[19] The view was held for long that a writ petition would not be an appropriate remedy for imposing contractual obligations on the government.[20] "The interpretation and implementation of a clause in a contract cannot be the subject-matter of a writ petition".[21] If a term of a contract is violated, ordinarily the remedy is not a writ petition.

The Supreme Court stated this position in Radhakrishnan[22] where the Court maintained that after the government had entered into a contract with a private

---

15. Assn. of Registration Places v. Union of India, (2005) 1 SCC 679 : AIR 2005 SC 469.
16. Assn. of Registration Places v. Union of India, (2005) 1 SCC 679 : AIR 2005 SC 469.
17. See, Air India Ltd. v. Cochin International Airport Ltd., AIR 2000 SC 801; (2002) 2 SCC 617; Asian Techs Ltd. v. State of Kerala, AIR 2001 Ker. 388.
18. Reliance Energy Ltd. v. Maharashtra State Road Development Corpn. Ltd., (2007) 8 SCC 1 : (2007) 11 JT 1; see also (2007) 2 SCC 1 : AIR 2007 SC 861.
19. For Art. 226, see, Ch. VIII, Secs. D and E.
20. C.K. Achutan v. State of Kerala, supra; State of Bihar v. Jain Plastics and Chemicals Ltd., AIR 2002 SC 206 : (2002) 1 SCC 216.
21. Kerala State Electricity Board v. Kurien V. Kalathil, AIR 2000 SC 2573.
22. Radhakrishan Agarwal v. State of Bihar, AIR 1977 SC 1496.

party, the relations inter se between the contracting parties were not governed by any constitutional provision but by the provisions of the Contract Act which would determine the rights and obligations of the concerned parties. No question arose regarding the violation of Art. 14, or of any other constitutional provision, when the government was acting within the contractual field. In State of Punjab v. Balbir Singh,[23] the Supreme Court pointed out that a High Court had no jurisdiction to enforce the liabilities arising out of mutually agreed conditions of contract, in a writ proceeding under Art. 226 of the Constitution.

In D.F.O. v. Biswanath Tea Co.,[24] the Supreme Court ruled that a party could not claim under Art. 226 enforcement of contractual obligations and recover damages. Proper relief for the party would lie to seek specific performance of the contract or damages in a civil Court. The court has reiterated that it will not enforce the terms of a contract qua contract.[25]

One of the main reasons for this judicial stance was that question of breach of contract would depend on facts and evidence. Such seriously disputed questions regarding breach of contract ought to be investigated and determined on the basis of evidence which may be led by the contesting parties. This can be done in a properly instituted civil suit rather than in a writ petition.[26]

Where the dispute is purely a contractual dispute as to whether there is a right reserved in the private party to pass on the additional liability to the purchasers, such dispute is to be determined by the terms of the contract between the parties. It is necessary that the facts in each case have to be investigated, the terms of the contract between the parties determined on evidence and construed before the dispute can be satisfactorily adjudicated.[27]

The power of judicial review cannot be denied even in contractual matters or matters in which the Government exercised its contractual power.[28]

Permitting a contractor to get his bill paid the Supreme Court has observed that Art. 14 has received a liberal interpretation over the years and its scope has also been extended by creative interpretation[29] SINHA J. speaking for the 2 Judge Bench tried to distinguish Burmah Construction[30] which had held that a pure money claim could not furnish a cause of action in a proceeding under Art. 226 but the distinction is not traceable from what SINHA J said as he has not disclosed any reason.

But, then, judicial view began to undergo a change. The courts began to adopt the stance that Art. 14 strikes at arbitrariness in governmental action and ensures

---

23. AIR 1977 SC 1717.
24. AIR 1981 SC 1368.
25. Karnataka State Forest Industries Corporation v. Indian Rocks, (2009) 1 SCC 150 : AIR 2009 SC 684.
26. State of Bihar v. Jain Plastics and Chemicals Ltd., AIR 2002 SC 206.
27. Defence Enclave Residents Society v. State of UP, (2004) 8 SCC 321 : AIR 2004 SC 4877.
28. Reliance Airport Developers (P) Ltd. v. Airports Authority of India, (2006) 10 SCC 1 : (2006) 10 JT 424; see also (2007) 2 SCC 1 : AIR 2007 SC 861.
29. Food Corporation of India v. SEIL Ltd., (2008) 3 SCC 440 : AIR 2008 SC 1101.
30. Burmah Construction Co. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1962 SC 1320.

fairness and equality of treatment. The Supreme Court has stated in Shrilekha Vidyarthi v. State of Uttar Pradesh[31] :

> "The scope of judicial review in respect of disputes falling within the domain of contractual obligations may be more limited and in doubtful cases the parties may be relegated to adjudication of their rights by resort to remedies providing for adjudication of purely contractual disputes."

The Court then observed :

> "However, to the extent, challenge is made on the ground of violation of Art. 14 by alleging that the impugned act is arbitrary, unfair or unreasonable, the fact that the dispute also falls within the domain of contractual obligations would not relieve the state of its obligation to comply with the basic requirements of Art. 14. To this extent, the obligation is of a public character invariably in every case irrespective of there being any other right or obligation in addition thereto. An additional contractual obligation cannot divest the claimant of the guarantee under Art. 14 of non-arbitrariness at the hands of the state in any of its actions."

The position now is that where the dispute lies within the contractual field pure and simple, a writ petition is not maintainable. The relations between the parties are governed by the contract which determines the rights and obligations of the parties inter se. For example, the Supreme Court has ruled that the interpretation and implementation of a clause in a contract cannot be the subject-matter of a writ petition. If a term of a contract is violated, or whether the state has made excess payment to the contractor or not, these are disputes of a civil nature to be adjudicated in civil courts and not fit to be decided in writ petitions.[32]

But contractual obligations may fall under judicial review if there is some public law element involved therein. For example in Sterling Computers.[33]

It has been held that even in commercial contracts where there is a public element, it is necessary that relevant considerations are taken into account and the irrelevant consideration discarded.

In LIC,[34] the Supreme Court has observed:

> "The actions of the State, its instrumentality, any public authority or person whose actions bear insignia of public law element or public character are amenable to judicial review and the validity of such an action would be tested on the anvil of Art. 14"[35]

Thus, when the matter falls within the realm of public law rather than of private law, the High Court can take cognisance of the same under Art. 226.[36]

---

31. AIR 1991 SC 537 : (1991) 1 SCC 212.
32. Kerala State Electricty Board v. Kurien E. Kalathil, AIR 2000 SC 2573 : (2000) 6 SCC 293; N.T. Abraham v. State of Kerala, AIR 2000 SC 3459; Radharaman Enterprises v. Cuttack Municipal Corp., AIR 2001 Ori 57.
33. Sterling Computers Ltd. v. M and N Publications Ltd., (1993) 1 SCC 445, 464.
34. LIC of India v. Consumer Education and Research Centre, AIR 1995 SC 1811, at 1822 : (1995) 5 SCC 482.
35. Also see, Ch. XXI, Sec. D(iv).
36. Common Cause, a Registered Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979 : (1999) 6 SCC 667.

If the government takes unreasonable and arbitrary decisions while acting in pursuance of a contract, the matter would fall under the writ jurisdiction. There is the duty on the state to act fairly in respect of a contract as well.[37] But where a municipality is financially handicapped, it would not be arbitrary to enter into contract with a private person to take house numbering, erection of street sign boards etc. on the condition that the entire costs of the project would be borne by the private party though some nominal payment would be made by the Corporation and although the private person would be free to let out to its clients space provided for advertising purposes.[38]

When some statutory element enters into a contract, a writ may be issuable. A writ may be issued when some features of public law are involved along with contractual relationship. In many cases of contracts between government and private persons, the concerned officers seek to exercise statutory or administrative powers. The exercise of such powers can not be viewed as exercise of powers under the contract between the government and the private party concerned. As the Supreme Court has observed in Ram Sanehi[39] : "We are unable to hold that merely because the source of the right which the respondent claims was initially a contract, for obtaining relief against any arbitrary and unlawful action on the part of a public authority he must resort to a suit and not a petition by way of a writ."

In Ram Sanehi, the petitioner had purchased, through an auction, the right to cut trees for a year. The Divisional Forest Officer (D.F.O.) passed an order depriving the petitioner of some timber cut by him. He filed a writ petition challenging the DFO's order on the ground that he was not given a hearing by him before passing the order. The DFO argued that the matter arose out of the terms of the contract and so no writ petition was maintainable.

The Supreme Court rejected the contention of the DFO and quashed the order passed by him stating that by his order, a public authority had deprived the petitioner of a valuable right. The writ petition was maintainable, even if the "right to relief arose out of an alleged breach of contract where the action challenged was of a public authority invested with statutory power".

This means that a writ petition is maintainable to challenge action by a public administrator when it is exercising statutory or administrative power even within the frame of contractual relationship between the authority and the person concerned. Besides, there is now a growing body of cases where writ petitions have been held maintainable where the contract has a statutory flavour, or where some question of public law is involved.[40]

---

37. See, Gujarat State Financial Corp. v. Lotus Hotels Pvt. Ltd., AIR 1983 SC 848; Asst. Excise Commissioner v. Issac Peter, (1994) 4 SCC 104; Mahabir Auto Stores v. India, AIR 1990 SC 1031; Dwarka Marfatia & Sons. v. Board of Trustees of the Port of Bombay, AIR 1989 SC 1642; India v. Graphic Industries Co., AIR 1995 SC 409.

38. M & T Consultants, Secunderabad v. S.Y. Nawab, (2003) 8 SCC 100 : AIR 2004 SC 4942.

39. D.F.O. v. Ram Sanehi Singh, AIR 1973 SC 205.

40. See, Surendra Nath v. DDA, AIR 1988 Del 277; M.S. Desai & Co. v. Hindustan Petroleum Corpn. Ltd., AIR 1987 Guj 20. This topic falls more appropriately in the area of Administrative Law rather than Constitutional Law. For detailed discussion on this topic, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, II

In regard to a challenge to a voluntary retirement scheme of a nationalized bank, the contention that the writ petition was not maintainable as the employees sought to enforce a contract has been repelled.[41]

The Indian Oil Corporation issued a letter of intent to the petitioner allotting a petrol pump to him. Later the Corporation cancelled the letter of intent. The Patna High Court quashed the order of cancellation under Art. 226 as being arbitrary as there was no material supporting the order. The Court asserted that arbitrariness is anathema to law.[42] The Court maintained that government and its agencies must act fairly even in contractual matters.[43]

However, confusion is worse confounded when the Supreme Court in regular intervals, says that contractual duties cannot be enforced by way of mandamus. For example, the court has said: (a) The contractual power is used for a public purpose and a contract cannot be characterised statutory simply because it is awarded by a statutory body;[44] (b) Mandamus will not be issued to compel the authorities to do something, unless it is shown that there is a statute which imposes a legal duty and the aggrieved party has a legal right under the statute to enforce its performance; (c) The prayer made in the writ petition is for issuance of a writ of mandamus to direct the NTC to supply the contracted goods (cloth) because it was a case of pure and simple business contract.[45]

The question relating to justiciability of matters pertaining to contracts has been considered also in many recent cases.[46] In Ramchandra[47] the Court recognized the necessity of a statutory authority while exercising its powers under the Act must necessarily take policy decisions and although a tender has been floated and before the completion of the process, a new policy is adopted, the question is not whether the offer of the appellants should have been rejected (being the highest offer) but is as to whether the Authority in law could have altered its policy in regard to disposal of its properties. A policy decision would involve change of the policy from time to time. But only because a change is effected, the same by itself does not render a policy decision to be illegal or otherwise vitiated in law. Hence the decision taken by the authority for canceling a tender process so as to enable it to have a relook of the entire project would not by itself be termed as arbitrary. And the point that the executive committee appointed by the Authority which dealt with the tender process did not cancel the tender was of no significance since it was the Authority, which "exercises a larger power" was clearly entitled to make alterations in the policy.

In ABL International the Court held that judicial review is not ousted merely because the activity of the authority relates to a contractual matter subject to the obvious that each case must be decided on its own facts. In Star Enterprises the Supreme Court pointed out that the traditional limitation relating to judicial

---

41. Bank of India v. O.P. Swarnakar, (2003) 2 SCC 721 : AIR 2003 SC 858.
42. Alok Prasad Verma v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Pat 211.
43. Mahabir Auto Stores v. Indian Oil Corporation, AIR 1990 SC 1031 : (1990) 3 SCC 752.
44. Binny Ltd. v. V. Sadasivan, (2005) 6 SCC 657 : AIR 2005 SC 3202.
45. National Textile Corpn. Ltd. v. Haribox Swalram, (2004) 9 SCC 786 : AIR 2004 SC 1998.
46. Ramchandra Murarilal Bhattad v. State of Maharashtra, (2007) 2 SCC 588 : AIR 2007 SC 401; ABL International Ltd. v. Export Credit Guarantee Corporation of India Ltd., (2004) 3 SCC 553 : (2003) 10 JT 300; Star Enterprises v. City and Industrial Development Corporation of Maharashtra Ltd., (1990) 3 SCC 280.
47. (2007) 2 SCC 588 : AIR 2007 SC 401.

review have been vanishing and judicial scrutiny is being expanded. As Ranganath Misra, J said:

> "As the State has descended into the commercial field and giant public sector undertakings have grown up, the stake of the public exchequer is also large justifying larger social audit, judicial control and review by opening of the public gaze; these necessitate recording of reasons for executive actions including cases of rejection of highest offers".

By imposing a condition like purchase preference no option is left and a monopoly is being created. The increase in effectiveness of PSEs cannot be done on an uniform policy without examination as to whether such protection is necessary for a particular PSE. It has to be examined individually as to whether any differential treatment is called for, and therefore, directed that industry-wise assessment be done and if there is already cost effectiveness in any PSEs there may not be any need for the preference being given. The examination should be on the line as to whether any preference is called for and what would be the margin of preference which would ensure level paying field.[48] Where the State or its agency is unable to perform a contract for supplying granite blocks not because of any default on the part of the successful bidders, it is obliged to refund the deposits held by it and the threat of forfeiture by its instrumentality was unjust and arbitrary.[49]

G. SALE OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

The basic purpose observed in this area is that a public authority does not have an open end discretion to dispose of its property at whatever price it likes. The principle is that the sale should take place openly and the effort should be to get the best price. The several methods which can be employed for this purpose are : (i) public auction; (ii) inviting tenders for the property.

As the Supreme Court has observed in State of Uttar Pradesh v. Shiv Charan Sharma:[50]

> "Public auction with open participation and a reserved price, guarantees public interest being fully subserved".

The Supreme Court has laid down that mineral rights ought not to be granted through private negotiations but by holding a public auction where those interested in the matter may bid against each other. The Court has observed : "Public auction with open participation and a reserved price guarantees public interest being fully subserved."[51]

In Haji T.M. Hassan v. Kerala Financial Corpn.;[52] the Supreme Court has emphasized that public property owned by the state or its instrumentality should be sold generally by public auction or by inviting tenders. Observance of this rule

---

48. Doiwala Sehkari Shram Samvida Samiti Ltd. v. State of Uttaranchal, (2007) 11 SCC 641 : (2006) 13 SCALE 540.

49. Karnataka State Forest Industries Corporation v. Indian Rocks, (2009) 1 SCC 150 : AIR 2009 SC 684.

50. AIR 1981 SC 1722 : 1981 Supp SCC 85.

51. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Shiv Charan Sharma, AIR 1981 SC 1722 : 1981 Supp SCC 85. Also, Ram and Shyam Co. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1985 SC 1147 : (1985) 3 SCC 267.

52. AIR 1988 SC 157 : (1988) 1 SCC 166.

not only fatches the highest price for the property but also ensures fairness in the activities of the state and public authorities. There should be no suggestion of discrimination, bias, favouritism or nepotism. But there may be situations when departure from this rule may become necessary. Such situations must however be justified by compulsion and not by compromise. It must be justified by compelling reasons and not by just convenience.

Balco,[53] is the latest pronouncement of the Supreme Court on the disposal of government property. 51% equity in Balco, a government undertaking, was sold to a private company by inviting tenders through global advertisement. The sale was challenged on various grounds but the Supreme Court rejected all the contentions and upheld the sale. The following three main propositions emerge from the Court decision:

(1) Divestment by the government in a public enterprise is a matter of economic policy which is for the government to decide. The Court does not interfere with economic policies unless there is a breach of law.

(2) Sale of an undertaking to the highest bidder after global advertisement inviting tenders at a price which was way above the reserve price fixed by the government could not be said to be vitiated in any way. The procedure followed was proper.

(3) The matter of fixation of the reserve price being a question of fact, the Court does not interfere unless the methodology adopted for the purpose is arbitrary

The State or its instrumentalities should not discharge their functions so as to aspire to earn a huge profit at the cost of those who are fully dependent upon it for supply of a monopoly item. They could however be permitted to make a reasonable profit.[54] In Ashoka Smokeless[55] the Supreme Court was considering the challenge under Articles 14 and 19 as to the validity of price fixation by the coal companies in the public sector by the method of e-auction through the internet. The Court referring to the constitutional and statutory obligations of the Central Government as well as the coal companies observed that since they were exercising monopolistic power, it was their duty to distribute coal equitably and at a fair price.[56] Although they are not expected to suffer losses but at the same time must make an essential commodity available at a fair price.[57] The Court considered the advantages as well as the disadvantages of e-Auction and indicated certain factors to be taken into consideration :

(i) The concept of price fixation is that all persons who are in requirement of the commodity should know the basis or criteria thereof;[58]

(ii) While adopting a policy decision as regards the mode of determining the price of coal, either fixed or variable, the coal companies were

---

53. Balco Employees Union (Regd.) v. Union of India, AIR 2002 SC 350 : (2002) 2 SCC 333.
54. Ashoka Smokeless Coal India (P) Ltd. v. Union of India, (2007) 2 SCC 640 : (2007) 1 JT 125.
55. Ibid.
56. Ibid.
57. Ibid at 687.
58. Ibid at 691.

bound to keep in mind social and economic aspect of the matter. They could not take any step which would defeat the constitutional goal;

(iii) Arbitrary fixation of price and arbitrary mode of fixation would be violative of article 14 of the constitution;

(iv) A monopoly concern is meant to cater to the needs of all sections of people;

(v) E-auction is not a policy decision of the Central Government but a policy decision on the part of the executive of the Central Government and must be strictly construed in terms of Article 77 of the Constitution;

(vi) Since the price fixation of an essential commodity is to be determined on the touchstone of public interest, the state has to follow a rational and fair procedure and for that purpose may collect data, obtain public opinion, and may appoint an Expert Committee;

(vii) In the facts the coal companies proceeded only to safeguard their own interest as dealer and not as a State and primarily for a profit motive;

(viii) It was no defence for the coal companies to say that they were acting at the instance of the Central Government when there was no control over the price and had no say in the matter of fixation of price under the Colliery Control Order, 2000;

(ix) The government or the coal company could change an existing policy subject to satisfaction of the constitutional requirements and adopt e-advertisement or e-tender if due and proper transparency is maintained;

It would not be proper to confine these tests to price fixation through E-auction only. Most of these tests would be applicable to price fixation generally.

PART VII

CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION AND AMENDMENT

CHAPTER XL

CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

SYNOPSIS

A. DOCTRINE OF JUDICIAL REVIEW

In democratic countries, the judiciary is given a place of great significance. Primarily, the courts constitute a dispute-resolving mechanism. The primary function of the courts is to settle disputes and dispense justice between one citizen and another. But courts also resolve disputes between the citizen and the state and the various organs of the state itself.

In many countries with written constitutions, there prevails the doctrine of judicial review. It means that the constitution is the supreme law of the land and any law inconsistent therewith is void. The courts perform the role of expounding the provisions of the constitution and exercise power of declaring any law or administrative action which may be inconsistent with the constitution as unconstitutional and hence void. This judicial function stems from a feeling that a system based on a written constitution can hardly be effective in practice without an authoritative, independent and impartial arbiter of constitutional issues and also that it is necessary to restrain governmental organs from exercising powers which may not be sanctioned by the constitution.[1]

The responsibilities which a Court carries in a country with a written constitution are very onerous—much more onerous than the responsibilities of a Court without a written constitution. The courts in a country like Britain interpret the laws but not the Constitution, whereas the courts in a country with a written constitution interpret the provisions of the constitution and, thus, give meaning to the cold letter of the constitution. The courts thus act as the Supreme interpreter, protector and guardian of the supremacy of the constitution by keeping all authorities—legislative, executive, administrative, judicial or quasi-judicial—within legal bounds. The judiciary has the responsibility to scrutinize all governmental actions in order to assess whether or not they conform with the constitution and the valid laws made thereunder.

The Courts can declare any exercise of power invalid if it infringes any provision in the constitution. In a constitution having provisions guaranteeing Fundamental Rights of the people, the judiciary has the power as well as the obligation to protect the people's rights from any undue and unjustified encroachment by any organ of the State. Further, in a country having a federal system, the judiciary acts as the balance-wheel of federalism by settling disputes between the Centre and the States, or among the States inter se. Federalism is a legalistic form of government because of distribution of powers between the Centre and the States

---

1. There is a wealth of material elucidating the contribution made by the U.S. Supreme Court to the development of the Constitution through its interpretative process : Douglas, FROM MARSHALL TO MUKHERJEA : STUDIES IN AMERICAN AND INDIAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, (1956); RAMASWAMY, THE CREATIVE ROLE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES (1956); SCHWARTZ, THE SUPREME COURT (1957); SWISHER, THE SUPREME COURT IN MODERN ROLE (1958); ZIEGLER, THE SUPREME COURT AND THE AMERCIAN ECONOMIC LIFE (1962); MCCLOSKEY, ESSAYS IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (1962); FREUND, ON UNDERSTANDING THE SUPREME COURT (1951); ROBERTS, THE COURT AND THE CONSTITUTION (1951); CHASE & DUCAT, CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION (1974). Also, IRANI, THE COURTS AND THE LEGISLATURE IN INDIA, 14 ICLQ., 950 (1965); CAPPELLETTI JUDICIAL REVIEW IN THE ONTEMPORARY WORLD; HILLER, The LAW-CREATIVE ROLE OF APPELLATE COURTS IN DEVELOPING COUNTRIES; An Emphasis on East Africa, 24 Int. & Comp LQ 205 (1975); SEERVAI, THE POSITION OF THE JUDICIARY UNDER THE CONSTITUTION OF INDIA (1970); V.S. DESHPANDE, JUDICIAL REVIEW OF LEGISLATION (1975) and author's review thereof in 16 JILI 727 (1974); DIPLOCK, The Courts as Legislators (1965); JAFFE, ENGLISH & AMERICAN JUDGES AS LAW MAKERS (1969); M.P. JAIN, Role of the Judiciary in a Democracy, (1979) JMCL 239; S.P. SATHE, JUDICIAL ACTIVISM IN INDIA (2002); T.R. ANDHYARUJINA, JUDICIAL ACTIVISM AND CONSTITUTIONAL DEMOCRACY IN INDIA (1992). Court only interprets the law and cannot legislate thereof, if a provision of law gives rise to misuse, it is for the legislature to amend, modify or repeal it, if deemed necessary. Sushil Kumar Sharma v. Union of India, (2005) 6 SCC 281.

by the constitution itself, and, therefore, an arbiter is needed to draw a balance between the Centre and the States.[2]

The task of interpreting the constitution is a highly creative judicial function. A democratic society lives and swears by certain values—individual liberty, human dignity, rule of law, constitutionalism, limited government, and it is the task of the judiciary to so interpret the constitution and the law as to constantly inculcate these values on which democracy thrives. Also, the courts must keep in mind that the society does not stand still; it is dynamic and not static; social and economic conditions change continually. Therefore, the courts must so interpret the constitution that it does not fall behind the changing, contemporary societal needs. The words of the constitution remain the same, but their significance changes from time to time through judicial interpretation.[3]

Judicial review has two prime functions: (1) Legitimizing Governmental action; (2) to protect the constitution against any undue encroachments by the Government. These two functions are inter-related.

In exercising the power of judicial review, the courts discharge a function which may be regarded as crucial to the entire governmental process in the country. The bare text of the constitution does not represent in itself the 'living' law of the country. For that purpose, one has to read the Fundamental text along with the gloss put thereon by the courts. As Dowling has stated while evaluating the role of the U.S. Supreme Court; "The study of constitutional law may be described in general terms as a study of the doctrine of judicial review in action."[4]

This characterisation is true of the U.S.A. To some lesser extent, it is true of other constitutions as well. To what extent the judicial interpretation supplements the written text of a constitution depends on how creative and activist role is played by the courts. The task of rendering an authoritative interpretation of the constitution converts the courts into vital instruments of government and policy-making. Here is a challenging and creative task for the courts to perform.

The interpretative function of the constitution is discharged by the courts through direct as well as indirect judicial review. In direct judicial review, the Court overrides or annuls an enactment or an executive act on the ground that it is inconsistent with the constitution. In indirect judicial review, while considering constitutionality of a statute, the Court so interprets the statutory language as to steer clear of the alleged element of unconstitutionality.

JUSTICE DOUGLAS characterises this practice as "tailoring an Act to make it constitutional" and explains it further thus: "If a construction of the Act is possible that will save it from being constitutionally infirm, the Court will adopt that construction. This practice of saving an Act by construing it to avoid the constitutional issue has sometimes been carried a long way."[5] But this is a part of judicial strategy in deciding constitutional controversies. When a judge faced with several alternative interpretations of a constitutional provision, chooses one of these, he necessarily performs a 'law-making' function.

---

2. Supra, Chs. X-XV.
3. Also see, next Chapter.
4. DOWLING, CASES AND MATERIALS ON CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 19 (1965).
5. DOUGLAS, MARSHALL TO MUKHERJEA, 16; infra, See H, this Chapter.

Britain has no written constitution and, therefore, there is no direct judicial review there. But courts do resort to indirect judicial review at times. They interpret constitutional provisions restrictively to protect civil liberties.[6] Some rules of statutory interpretation have been developed with this aim in view, e.g., a criminal law or a tax law should be strictly construed, or that judicial review of delegated legislation cannot be excluded unless there are clear words to that effect.[7]

The Constitution of Canada or Australia does not contain any express provision for judicial review, yet the process goes on and judicial review has become an integral part of the constitutional process. The historical origin of judicial review in these countries is traceable to the colonial era. The colonial legislatures were regarded as subordinate legislatures vis-a-vis the British Parliament[8] and they had to function within the parameters of the statutes enacted by the British Parliament. The colonial laws were, therefore, subject to judicial review, and this process continued long after the colonies ripened into self-governing dominions. The doctrine of judicial review was thus ingrained into the legal fabric of Canada and Australia and, therefore, no need was felt to include a specific constitutional provision in the basic laws of these countries.[9]

The doctrine of judicial review is an integral part of the American judicial and constitutional process although the U.S. Constitution does not explicitly mention the same in any provision. The Constitution merely says that it would be the supreme law of the land.

Before the Constitution, the legislation of the American colonies was subject to judicial review. But, after the Constitution, in 1803, in the famous case of Marbury v. Madison,[10] in one of its most creative opinions, the U.S. Supreme Court very clearly and specifically claimed that it had the power of judicial review and that it would review the constitutionality of the Acts passed by the Congress. The Court argued that the Constitution seeks to define and limit the powers of the legislature, and there would be no purpose in doing so if the legislature could overstep these limits at any time.

In the words of the Court: "Certainly all those who have framed the written constitutions contemplate them as forming the Fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and consequently, the theory of every such government must be that an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void." And, further, "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each. So if a law be in opposition to the constitution; if both the law and the constitution apply to a particular case, so that the Court must either decide that case conformably to the law disregarding the constitution; or conformably to the constitution disregarding the law; the Court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is the very essence of Judicial duty."

---

6. Infra, footnote 18.
7. See, supra, Ch. I; Ch. II, Sec. N, supra.
8. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. M.
9. EDWARD MCWHINNEY, JUDICIAL REVIEW, 49-75 (1969); LEDERMAN, THE COURTS AND THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION (1964).
10. 1 Cranch 137; 2 L Ed 60.

Thus, the theoretical foundation of the doctrine of judicial review in the U.S.A. is that in exercise of its judicial functions, the Supreme Court has the power to say what the law is, and in case of conflict between the constitution and a legislative statute, the Court will follow the former, which is the superior of the two laws, and declare the latter to be unconstitutional.

If a law inconsistent with the constitution were not to be declared void, then the written constitution loses all its value and significance. When a law is in opposition to the constitution, it is the duty of the courts to follow the constitution and not the law.

About the significance of judicial review in a written constitution, SCHWARTZ observes: "A constitution is naught but empty words if it cannot be enforced by the courts. It is judicial review that makes constitutional provisions more than mere maxims of political morality. In practice, there can be no constitution without judicial review. It provides the only adequate safeguard that has been invented against unconstitutional legislation. It is, in truth, the sine qua non of the constitutional structure."[11]

The doctrine of judicial review has made the U.S. Supreme Court a vital institution in the governmental process in the country.[12] In the U.S. Constitution the Fundamental Rights of the people are couched in very general phraseology, and the exceptions and restrictions thereon are worked out judicially from time to time in the context of contemporary socio-economic and political conditions.[13] For example, the phrase 'due process of law' used in the U.S. Constitution gives a good deal of leeway to the Supreme Court for creativity.[14]

Although the modern doctrine of judicial review is ascribed to Marbury v. Madison, as noted above, the idea underlying judicial review, namely, to test and invalidate 'state action' (legislative or executive) by reference to a higher organic instrument can be traced to the natural law doctrine according to which man-made law was susceptible to correction and invalidation by reference to a higher law.[15]

This natural law doctrine found expression in Britain in 1610 in Dr. Bonham's case,[16] where COKE, LCJ, asserted : "When an act of Parliament is against common law right and reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will control it and adjudge such act to be void." This doctrine did not, however, become fully operational in Britain. In course of time, this doctrine was jettisoned and its place was taken over by the theory of parliamentary sover-

---

11. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW: A TEXTBOOK, 3 (1972).
12. See, RAOUL BERGER, GOVERNMENT BY JUDICIARY (1977).
13. For example, in 1952, the U.S. Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 US 483, invalidated segregation between the Whites and the Blacks in educational institutions overruling its earlier decision in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 US 527 (1896). In Reynolds v. Sims, 377 US 533, the Supreme Court translated the equality principle in to the principle of "one man-one vote". The Court thus held that the seats in a House of State Legislature must be apportioned on population basis.
14. In Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 US 335, the Court accepted the right of an accused to have a lawyer at state expense, if he could not afford one himself. In Miranda v. Arizona, 384 US 436, the Supreme Court granted certain rights to an accused at the time of police interrogation.
15. M.J. HARMON, POLITICAL THOUGHT FROM PLATO TO THE PRESENT; Grant, The Natural Law Background of Due Process, 31 Col LR 56; Corwin, The 'Higher Law' Background of American Constitutional Law, 42 Harv LR 149.
16. 8 Coke's Reports, 114 at 118.

eignty. Because of the conflict between the Crown and Parliament, judges sided with Parliament and, in the process, accepted the theory of parliamentary sovereignty. The doctrine of judicial review then became confined to the colonies overseas. Even prior to the U.S. Constitution, the Privy Council did exercise powers of judicial review over the American and other colonies.[17]

But even in Britain indirect judicial review does go on all the time. As Wade points out: "All law students are taught that Parliamentary sovereignty is absolute. But it is the judges who have the last word. If they interpret an Act to mean the opposite of what it says, it is their view which represents the law."[18]

There are many who argue against the very concept of judicial review of constitutional issues. They characterise it as anti-majoritarian. In the U.S.A., since Marbury v. Madison,[19] the institution of judicial review has been a subject of perennial and even passionate debate among the scholars and jurists.

Some scholars have asserted that it is a usurpation of power by the judiciary as the Constitution is silent on the point of judicial review.[20] Others assert that review of legislation is not a judicial function and is very different from the function usually discharged by the courts. But several scholars have argued that it is not so and that the framers of the Constitution did envisage and contemplate judicial review.[21] Some have asserted that judicial review is undemocratic as the judges who declare statutes unconstitutional are neither elected by, nor are responsible to, the people.[22]

But there are many scholars who do not agree with this view. They argue that a democracy need not have all officials elected, and that judicial review is democratic as it promotes democracy by safeguarding the rights of the people and cabining government organs within the confines of the constitution.[23] In a democracy, the majority may not always be right and there always lurks the danger of oppression of the minority by the majority. Judicial review can keep such a tendency in check by keeping the majority within the bounds of the constitution. In the words of Chief Justice WARREN : "The Court's essential function is to act as the final arbiter of minority rights."

A democracy needs a forum, other than the legislature and the executive, for redressing the legitimate grievances of the minorities-racial, religious, political or others. In India, at the present time, the Supreme Court is laying great emphasis on vindication of the rights of the poor and deprived people.[24] This sentiment has been expressed graphically by a Supreme Court Judge as follows: "Judicial

---

17. As early as 1727, the Privy Council declared a Connecticut statute null and void: Winthorp v. Lechmere in Thayer, Cases on Constitutional Law, 34 (1895).

18. WADE, CONSTITUTIONAL FUNDAMENTALS, 65.
Also see, J.A.G. GRIFFITH, THE POLITICS OF JUDICIARY (1977).

19. Supra, footnote, 10.

20. BOUDIN, GOVERNMENT BY JUDICIARY (1932); HAND, THE BILL OF RIGHTS (1958).

21. BERGER, CONGRESS V. THE SUPREME COURT (1969).

22. THAYER, The Origin and Scope of the American Doctrine of Constitutional Law, 7 Harv LR 129 (1889); SCHWARTZ, A BASIC HISTORY OF THE US SUPREME COURT, 87 (1970).

23. ROSTOW, The Democratic Character of Judicial Review, 66 Harv, LR 193 (1952); BLACK JR., THE PEOPLE AND THE COURT: JUDICIAL REVIEW IN A DEMOCRACY (1960); ATIYAH, JUDGES AND POLICY, supra, at 362-5.
See generally on Judicial Review, LEONARD W. LEVY, JUDICIAL REVIEW AND SUPREME COURT (1967).

24. See, supra, Ch. XXXIV on "Directive Principles".
Also see, supra, Chs. VIII, Sec. D(k) and XXXIII, Sec. B, under "Public Interest Litigation".

activism gets its highest bonus when its order wipes some tears from some eyes."[25] Thus, there are supporters and detractors of judicial review.

In spite of this debate, the fact remains that judicial review is an integral part of the American constitutional process, a part of the living Constitution in the U.S.A., and the same is true of India. There are overwhelming reasons as to why the courts should act as authoritative expounder of the constitution and possess power of judicial review.

A written constitution is not a self-executing document, and meanings of several provisions may not always be self-evident. Such a constitution would be reduced to a mere paper document in the absence of an independent organ to interpret, expound and enforce the same. The power of constitutional review by some organ of government is implicit in the concept of a written constitution which seeks to confer limited powers. In the absence of an accepted authority to interpret the constitution, a written constitution would promote discord rather than order in society when different organs of government take conflicting action in the name of the constitution, or when government takes action against the individual.

The legislature and the executive are politically partisan bodies and are committed to certain policies and programmes which they wish to implement. Therefore, they cannot be trusted with the final power of constitutional interpretation. They would often seek to bend the constitution to their own views and accommodate their own policies. The constitution would thus become a plaything of the politicians.

The judiciary is by and large free from active political bias, is politically neutral, and so can be expected to bring to bear a somewhat detached and non-political outlook on constitutional interpretation. If there is any institution in the country which can do so it is the judiciary. It can be expected to expound the constitution dispassionately, apolitically, coolly and with some sense of detachment, to the extent it is humanly possible to achieve such a mental condition in human beings.

The Court gives a reasoned decision after hearing arguments for and against a particular alternative. It is, therefore, regarded as the most suited to act as an umpire in constitutional controversies. In the absence of any effective enforcement machinery, the Fundamental Rights in the constitution will be reduced to mere formal and empty platitudes with no restraint on the government or the legislature.

Federalism and Fundamental Rights add new dimensions to the significance of the judicial role of constitutional interpretation. In the absence of an effective enforcement machinery, the Fundamental Rights will be reduced to mere platitudes. Similarly, the balance of power between the Centre and the States will become untenable if either of them were to have the power to decide for itself where the limits for its functions were to lie. It is only the courts, away from contemporary partisan political controversies, which can with some detachment draw the line between the functions of the Centre and the States.

---

25. The Punjab Rickshaw Pullers' case, infra.
Also see, State of Haryana v. Darshana Devi, AIR 1979 SC 857 : (1979) 2 SCC 236; D.S. Nakara v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 130 : (1983) 1 SCC 305.

The judicial review serves as a necessary check on the possible excesses by the legislature and the executive. Judicial review helps in channelizing the acute and extreme controversies of the day into legal channels.

In the U.S.A., judicial review has been characterised as "the principal process of enunciating and applying certain enduring values of" the American society. As Justice JACKSON observes: "The people have seemed to feel that the Supreme Court, whatever its defects, is still the most detached, dispassionate and trustworthy custodian that our system affords for the translation of abstract into concrete constitutional commands."[26]

There is another more abiding consideration in favour of judicial review. Modern political thought draws a distinction between 'constitution' and 'constitutionalism'[27]. A country may have a constitution but not necessarily constitutionalism. Constitutionalism denotes a constitution not only of powers but also restraints as well. A constitution envisages checks and balances and putting the powers of the legislature and the executive under some restraints and not making them uncontrolled and arbitrary. "Constitutionalism has one essential quality: it is a legal limitation on government; it is the antithesis of arbitrary rule; its opposite is despotic government, the government of will instead of law....."[28] Judicial Review is the cornerstone of constitutionalism.

Even in Britain at present there is a growing demand that there should be a written constitution with judicial review. Judicial review plays a significant role in promoting constitutionalism, democratic values and rule of law in the country.[29]

In a parliamentary system, the majority automatically supports the government in office. This results in the powers of the legislature gravitating towards the executive. In such a context, in order to maintain personal rights and a balanced administration, some external restraint on government becomes an absolute necessity. Therefore, even if it slows down somewhat the implementation of socio-economic programmes, that is the price one has to pay for promoting constitutionalism, rule of law and democratic behaviour in the country.

It can also be argued that democracy should not be seen simply as the majority rule, it also includes a set of principles about the exercise of power. Also, a parliamentary majority on a particular issue may not reflect majority opinion in the society.

It is wrong to assume that a society is not democratic unless its legislature has unlimited powers. In a parliamentary system, the majority automatically supports the government of the day, and, thus, the powers of the legislature gravitate to the government and to maintain individual rights, some external restrictions on the government are absolutely necessary.

In any case, the controversy over the role of judicial review is merely academic at present as the people have come to accept it. They realize that the only

---

26. JACKSON, THE SUPREME COURT IN THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT, 23 (1965).
27. Supra, Ch. I.
28. MCLLLWAIN, CONSTITUTIONALISM, ANCIENT & MODERN, 21-22, 146 (1958). Also, supra.
29. SCARMAN, THE NEW DIMENSIONS OF ENGLISH LAW.
Also see, Lord Hailsham's Richard Dimbleby Lecture in the Times, Oct. 15, 1976. He has characterised the present-day government in Britain as "elective dictatorship".
Also, supra, Ch. 20, Sec. A. way in which constitutional limitations can be enforced in practice is through the medium of the courts.

Finally, the following observations of Justice CARDOZO may be quoted in support of judicial review:[30]

> "The great ideals of liberty and equality are preserved against the assaults of opportunism, the expediency of the passing hour, the erosion of small encroachments, the scorn and derision of those who have no patience with general principles, by enshrining them in constitutions, the consecrating to the task of their protection a body of defenders. By conscious or sub-conscious influence, the presence of this restraining power, aloof in the background, but none the less always in reserve, tends to stabilize and rationalize the legislative judgment, to infuse it with the glow of principle, to hold the standard aloft and visible for those who must run the race and keep the faith."[31]

Justice CARDOZO accepted that the judiciary only rarely declares a statute unconstitutional but he insisted:

> "The utility of an external power restraining the legislative judgment is not to be measured by counting the occasions of its exercise ..... The restraining power of the judiciary does not manifest its chief worth in the few cases in which the legislature has gone beyond the lines that mark the limits of discretion. Rather shall we find its chief worth in making vocal and audible the ideals that might otherwise be silenced, in giving them continuity of life and of expression, in guiding and directing choice within the limits where choice ranges. This function should preserve to the courts the power that now belongs to them, if only the power is exercised with insight into social values, and with suppleness of adaptation to changing social needs."

But as CHARLES L. BLACK JUNIOR emphasizes judicial review has two aspects—that of imprinting governmental action with the stamp of legitimacy as well as that of checking political power when it encroaches on any ground forbidden by the constitution. Both these functions are interdependent; the legitimating and checking functions go hand in hand.[32]

It needs to be underlined that in spite of the avowed acceptance of the law creative role of the judges, they are not traditionally attuned to too much activism. The above statement of CHARLES EVANS HUGHES is really an over-statement and represents too drastic and too simplified an analysis of the complex position of the judiciary and the judicial review in the country's constitutional system. [33]

The judges are not absolutely free agents in rendering their decisions. They are bound inter alia by the taught tradition of the law, stare decisis, their own sense

---

30. BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO, THE NATURE OF THE JUDICIAL PROCESS, 91-93.

31. A similar idea is expressed by EDWARD MCWHINNEY in COMPARATIVE FEDERALISM in the following words:

> "The Court consists of elitist group of high talents, aspirations and ideals. Liberal democratic society rests, in the ultimate, on certain basic ideals such as, free speech, and discussion, freedom of association, freedom of conscience and when they are threatened by the Executive and Legislative authority, it is absurd to rest on any abstract academic conception of separation of powers and say that judges may not properly intervene in the protection of those interests. Thus, the maintenance of free society posits the existence of an independent judiciary and entrusting to the judiciary all the responsibilities in the ultimate for the preservation of the open society ideal."

32. THE PEOPLE AND THE COURT, 123.

33. Infra, footnote 51.

of self-restraint, the socio-economico-political setting in which they are deciding a controversy. The courts decide a matter only when it is brought before them and not otherwise. The Court's decisions may be reversed either by legislation or constitutional amendment and the Court may correct itself by overruling a previous decision.[34] The Judges have often reminded themselves of the restraints under which they function. In the pithy words of JUSTICE STONE of the U.S. Supreme Court:

> "The power of courts to declare a statute unconstitutional is subject to two guiding principles of decision.... One is that courts are concerned only with the power to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. The other is that while unconstitutional exercise of power by the executive and legislative branches of the government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint. For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books appeal lies not to the courts, but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government."[35]

B. LITERAL V. LIBERAL APPROACH

How do the courts approach their task of interpreting the constitution. Judicial attitude to the constitution is linked with another basic question of jurisprudential nature: Do courts make law or do they only declare law?

The old orthodox theory was that a judge never creates law, but that he only declares law. This mechanistic view of the judicial function was prevalent in Britain in the early twentieth century. This typical attitude was expressed by BLACKSTONE thus: the duty of the Court is not to 'pronounce a new law but to maintain and expound the old one.'[36] Even as late as 1951, Lord Chancellor JOWITT expressed a similar attitude.[37]

But, in modern times, this time-honoured fiction of the declaratory role of the judge has been dissented from. Lord DENNING has openly preached that the task of common law is to act as an instrument of evolution in accordance with the changing needs of the society and the demands of justice.[38] This view is shared by many other eminent British Judges, such as, Lords DIPLOCK, DEVLIN and REID.[39]

The law-creative function of the judges is very well recognised now.[40] The American realist jurists greatly emphasize such a judicial role.[41] A judge is not an automaton. He has his own scale of values and makes choices accordingly. If one interpretation of the law leads to unjust results, and another interpretation to just results, what prevents a Court from adopting the latter interpretation.

---

34. Infra, this Chapter, Sec. J.
35. U.S. v. Butler, 297 US 1 (1935).
36. BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES, 69 (1808).
37. Australian Law Convention (1951).
38. DENNING, FROM PRECEDENT TO PRECEDENT; KEETON, VENTURING TO DO JUSTICE.
39. LORD DIPLOCK, Judicial Development of Law in the Commonwealth, (1978) 1 MLJ cviii—cxiii; Reid, The Judge as Lawmaker, 12 JSPTL 22 (1972); LORD HAILSHAM, The Independence of the Judiciary in a Democratic Society, (1978) 2 MLJ cxv.
40. P.N. BHAGWATI, Judicial Activism and Public Interest Litigation, (1985) Col JI. of Transnational Law, 561; ATIYAH, Judges and Policy, (1980) 15 Israel LR 346; BAXI, THE INDIAN SUPREME COURT AND POLITICS, (1980).
41. GRAY, THE NATURE AND SOURCES OF THE LAW, 84 (1931).

Influenced by these judicial attitudes, there have been two approaches to the interpretation of a written constitution. One approach is literal, mechanical, narrow interpretation of the constitution where the judgment of the Court constitutes a mere exegesis of the Fundamental text. This approach envisages that the constitution is treated as any other statute passed by the legislature and the same canons of interpretation are applied thereto as are usually applied to the interpretation of ordinary legislative enactments. This is the positivist or the Austinian approach.

The other is the liberal, purposive, law-creative interpretation of the constitution "with insight into social values, and with suppleness of adaptation to changing needs."[42] The courts start with the premise that the constitution being the Fundamental law of the land should be given a somewhat different treatment and interpreted more liberally than an ordinary statute. Interpretation of a statute affects only a limited number of people, but interpretation of the constitution and declaring a statute constitutional or unconstitutional affects the entire governmental functioning, policy-making and even the constitutional process in the country.

Thus, a constitution is not just one of the ordinary statutes. Here the courts play a creative role and even make law while interpreting the constitution. In discharging this task, the courts may have to make implications within the written words of the constitution to bring the whole thing in accord with the more acceptable contemporary norms. Passage of time has been a factor in the interpretative process. Sec. 118 of the Succession Act, 1925 was enacted to prevent persons from making ill-considered deathbed bequests under religious influence. The object behind the said legislation was, therefore, to protect a section of illiterate or semi-literate persons who used to blindly follow the preachers of the religion. Such a purpose has lost all significance with the passage of time and, therefore, has to be declared ultra vires.[43]

The courts have to balance public interest and individual interest. It may be that in a given situation, the judge may be faced with several alternative approaches to interpreting a constitutional provision, and when he chooses one of these, he is influenced by his own predisposition, values and policies and these may not necessarily be the same as those of the constitution-makers, or of the legislators enacting the law impugned. Here the role of the courts may not be very much different from being 'constituent' or that of 'law-making.' It has been pointed out that whereas larger interest of the country must be perceived, the law makers cannot shut their eyes to the local needs also. Constitutional interpretation is a difficult task. Its concept varies from statute to statute, fact to fact situations. Mostly the backward suffer from disability either for belonging to an oppressed community or by way of economical, cultural or social imbalances. The courts shall all along strive hard for maintaining a balance.[44]

It may be noted that ultimately it is a matter of judicial attitudes and choices as to how the judges approach the task of constitutional interpretation. At one time, there may be one undercurrent, and at another time, there may be another undercurrent. At one time, a Court may indulge in judicial passivism and at other time

---

42. CARDOZO, supra, footnote 30.
43. John Vallamattom v. Union of India, (2003) 6 SCC 611, 622 : AIR 2003 SC 2902.
44. Saurabh Chaudri v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 369.

the same Court may show signs of judicial activism depending upon the predisposition of the judges as well as the type of legislation being considered by them. If at one time the majority of the judges on the Court takes one view, invariably there may be a minority taking the other view. The Constitution is not an ephemeral legal document embodying a set of legal rules for the passing hour. It sets out principles for an expanding future and is intended to endure for ages to come and consequently to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. Therefore, a purposive rather than a strict literal approach to interpretation should be adopted. A constitutional provision must be construed not in a narrow and constricted sense but in a wide and liberal manner so as to anticipate and take account of changing conditions and purposes so that a provision does not get fossilised but remains flexible enough to meet the newly emerging problems and challenges. This principle of interpretation is particularly apposite to the interpretation of Fundamental Rights.[45]

During the colonial days, the Privy Council would usually apply the canons of statutory interpretation to constitutional interpretation as well.[46] For example, the Privy Council said in King-Emperor v. Benoari Lal Sharma:[47] "The question whether the ordinance is intra vires or ultra vires does not depend on considerations of jurisprudence or policy. It depends simply on examining the language of the Government of India Act." In relation to Canada, the Privy Council said that it would apply to the British North America Act, 1867, the same methods of construction and exposition as were applied to other statutes.[48]

There were two main reasons for such an approach:

(1) the colonial constitutions, e.g., the Government of India Act, or the British North America Act, were only statutes of the British Parliament and so the British judges interpreted them as statutes;

(2) there was preponderant emphasis on the literal approach as the law creative role of the judges had not yet been fully recognised.

After the colonial era gave way to the commonwealth era, the attitude of the Privy Council towards interpretation of the constitutions of the ex-overseas colonies underwent a sea change. For example, in Hinds v. The Queen,[49] the Privy Council said: "To seek to apply to constitutional instruments the canons of construction applicable to ordinary legislation in the fields of substantive criminal or civil law would ..... be misleading."

In Minister of Home Affairs v. Fisher,[50] the Privy Council posed the question: should a constitution be interpreted according to the same rules as a statute? There were two answers to this question, said the Privy Council. One, recognising the status of the constitution as, in effect an Act of Parliament, there is room for interpreting it with less rigidity, and greater generosity, than other Acts. Two, the more radical answer is: to treat a constitutional institutional instrument such as this as sui generis, calling for principles of interpretation of its own, suitable to

---

45. M. Nagaraj v. Union of India, (2006) 8 SCC 212 : AIR 2007 SC 71.
46. The high-water mark of this approach can be seen in Kariapper v. Wijesinha, (1968) AC 717.
47. (1945) 72 IA 57.
48. Bank of Toronto v. Lambe, 12 AC 575.
49. (1976) 1 All ER 356. Also see, Liyanage v. Regina, (1966) 1 All ER 650.
50. (1979) 3 All ER 21, 25. Also see, Teh Cheng Poh v. Public Prosecutor, (1979) 1 MLJ 50.

its character as already described, without necessary acceptance of all the presumptions that are relevant to legislation of private law. The Privy Council preferred the second option. The Privy Council was here interpreting the Fundamental Rights provisions of the Bermuda Constitution. The Privy Council concluded that these provisions "call for a generous interpretation avoiding the austerity of tabulated legalism, suitable to give to individuals the full measure of the Fundamental Rights and freedoms."

In the U.S.A., in the area of constitutional interpretation, judges have always accepted a law-creative role and from time to time have made statements putting emphasis on judicial activism in constitutional matters. For example, there is the famous dictum by CHARLES EVANS HUGHES to the following effect: "We are under a constitution, but the constitution is what the judges say it is."[51]

Voicing a similar approach, a scholar has said: "The texts of constitutional instruments.... seem merely to be the servants of ultimate judicial policies."[52] Thus, in the U.S.A., there has been a greater emphasis on law-creative function of the judiciary. The reason for this may be that the U.S. Constitution is a brief and compact document; it is couched in general language which can be interpreted and re-interpreted by the courts from time to time in the context of contemporary circumstances, e.g., due process of law, interstate commerce, etc. The Supreme Court has thus evolved a number of doctrines which are not mentioned explicitly in the Constitution, e.g., immunity of instrumentalities, separation of powers, police powers, etc.

Further, amendment of the U.S. Constitution has proved to be a very difficult process.[53] Therefore, by and large, it has fallen on the judiciary to re-orient the Constitution to new contemporary socio-economic situations by its interpretative process. In the absence of any such judicial effort, the U.S.A. would have been faced with a static Constitution and its social and economic progress would have been hampered. The Supreme Court has interpreted the U.S. Constitution in such a creative manner that an old document, of nearly 200 years in age, without many amendments, has been serving the needs of the present highly sophisticated technological era. In this way, the Court has not only played the role of an interpreter of the Constitution but even the role of a constitution-maker.

The truth was realised by the U.S. Judges quite early in the day that the interpretation of the Constitution was quite a different matter from interpretation of a statute. As MARSHALL, C.J., said in McCulloch v. Maryland:[54] "We must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding" and that the Constitution is "intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." BRANDEIS, J., has written :

> "Our Constitution is not a straight jacket. It is a living organism. As such it is capable of growth, of expansion and of adaptation to new conditions. Growth implies changes, political, economic and social. Growth which is significant manifests itself rather in intellectual and moral conceptions of material things."[55]

---

51. ABRAHAM, THE JUDICIAL PROCESS, 326 (1968); ABRAHAM, THE JUDICIARY: THE SUPREME COURT IN THE GOVERNMENT PROCESS (1977).
52. EDWARD MCWHINNEY, supra, footnote 9, at 19.
53. See, infra, Ch. XLI.
54. 17 US 316.
55. HARVARD LAW SCHOOL, BRANDEIS PAPERS.

Courts must have regard to its "great outlines" and important objects. During the last 200 years, there have been quite a few famous law-creative judgments of the U.S. Supreme Court in relation to the U.S. Constitution.

It may be interesting to remember that exercise of the power of constitutional interpretation and judicial review of legislation may not always be smooth for the judiciary. At times, it involves the courts in controversies, and some of the judicial pronouncements may not be palatable to the government of the day, for example, in India, such controversies arose as a result of judicial approach to private property, especially on the question of compensation payable for compulsory acquisition of private property.[56] The Supreme Court's ruling in Kesavananda was not liked by the government which sought for an unrestricted power in Parliament to amend the Constitution.[57]

For example, in the U.S.A., in the 1930's, President Roosevelt, in order to fight the prevailing economic depression, initiated an ambitious economic programme, known as the New Deal, but the Supreme Court declared some parts of it unconstitutional. The President was so much annoyed at this that he proposed a plan of appointing a number of judges to pack the Court so as to tilt its decisions in favour of the New Deal programme.[58] But the plan was not pursued as it became very controversial and, with the resignation of one Judge, the President got an opportunity to appoint a Judge of his choice and, subsequently, most of the programme could be judicially upheld.

In Australia and Canada as well, judicial views expressed in relation to certain constitutional provisions have been criticised from time to time.[59]

But such controversies are inherent in any system of judicial review. Courts have no control over the cases which come to them for decision. When a case comes before it, the Court has to decide it one way or the other and, in a politically sensitive case, either way it will give rise to a controversy. Even if the courts were to refuse jurisdiction over a case, or refuse to give the relief asked for, it is still going to give rise to a controversy.

C. JUDICIAL REVIEW IN INDIA

Unlike the U.S.A., the Constitution of India explicitly establishes the doctrine of judicial review in several Articles, such as, 13, 32, 131-136, 143, 226 and 246.[60] The doctrine of judicial review is thus firmly rooted in India, and has the explicit sanction of the Constitution.

Article 13(2) even goes to the extent of saying that "The state shall not make any law which takes away or abridges the rights conferred by this Part [Part III containing Fundamental Rights] and any law made in contravention of this clause shall, to the extent of the contravention, be void."[61] The courts in India are thus

---

56. Supra, Chs. XXXI and XXXII.
57. Infra, next Chapter.
58. CHARLES E. HUGHES, THE SUPREME COURT OF THE US, 84-7 (1936); JACKSON, THE STRUGGLE FOR JUDICIAL SUPREMACY, 343 et seq.; COPE, ALFRED HAINES, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT AND THE SUPREME COURT (1952).
59. MCWHINNEY, JUDICIAL REVIEW, 61-95 (1969).
60. Supra, Chs. IV, VIII, X, XX and XXXIII.
61. For discussion on Art. 13(2), see, supra, Ch. XX.

under a constitutional duty to interpret the Constitution and declare the law as unconstitutional if found to be contrary to any constitutional provision. The courts act as sentinel on the qui vive so far as the Constitution is concerned.

Underlining this aspect of the matter, the Supreme Court stated in State of Madras v. Row that the Constitution contains express provisions for judicial review of legislation as to its conformity with the Constitution and that the courts "face up to such important and none too easy task" not out of any desire "to tilt at legislative authority in a crusader's spirit, but in discharge of a duty plainly laid upon them by the Constitution."[62] The Court observed further: "While the Court naturally attaches great weight to the legislative judgment, it cannot desert its own duty to determine finally the constitutionality of an impugned statute."

As the Supreme Court emphasized in Gopalan: "In India it is the Constitution that is supreme" and that a "statute law to be valid, must in all cases be in conformity with the constitutional requirements and it is for the judiciary to decide whether any enactment is constitutional or not" and if a legislature transgresses any constitutional limits, the Court has to declare the law unconsitutional "for the Court is bound by its oath to uphold the Constitution."[63]

The doctrines of supremacy of the constitution and judicial review has been expounded very lucidly but forcefully by BHAGWATI, J., as follows in Rajasthan v. Union of India:[64]

> "It is necessary to assert in the clearest terms particularly in the context of recent history, that the constitution is supreme lex, the permanent law of the land, and there is no department or branch of government above or beyond it. Every organ of government, be it the executive or the legislature or the judiciary, derives its authority from the constitution and it has to act within the limits of its authority. No one however highly placed and no authority howsoever lofty can claim that it shall be the sole judge of the extent of its power under the constitution or whether its action is within the confines of such power laid down by the constitution. This Court is the ultimate interpreter of the constitution and to this Court is assigned the delicate task of determining what is the power conferred on each branch of government, whether it is limited, and if so, what are the limits and whether any action of that branch transgresses such limits".

Therefore, the courts in India cannot be accused of usurping the function of constitutional adjudication; it is a function which has been imposed on them by the Constitution itself. It is a delicate task; the courts may even find it embarrassing at times to discharge it, but they cannot shirk their constitutional responsibility.

Justifying judicial review, RAMASWAMI, J., has observed in S.S. Bola v. B.D. Sharma.[65]

> "The founding fathers very wisely, therefore, incorporated in the Constitution itself the provisions of judicial review so as to maintain the balance of federalism, to protect the Fundamental Rights and Fundamental freedoms guaranteed to the citizens and to afford a useful weapon for availability, availment and enjoyment of equality, liberty and Fundamental freedoms and to help to create

---

62. AIR 1952 SC 196, 199 : 1952 SCR 597; Ch. XXIV, supra.
63. AIR 1950 SC 27; supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. A.
64. AIR 1977 SC 1361 : (1977) 3 SCC 592.
65. AIR 1997 SC 3127, 3170.

> a healthy nationalism. The function of judicial review is a part of the constitutional interpretation itself. It adjusts the constitution to meet new conditions and needs of the time."

In a number of cases, the Supreme Court has emphasized upon the importance of judicial review in India. KHANNA, J., emphasized in Kesavananda:[66]

> "As long as some Fundamental Rights exist and are a part of the Constitution, the power of judicial review has also to be exercised with a view to see that the guarantees afforded by these Rights are not contravened…… Judicial review has thus become an integral part of our Constitutional system……"

In Minerva Mills[67] CHANDRACHUD, C.J.. speaking on behalf of the majority, observed :

> "It is the function of the Judges, may their duty, to pronounce upon the validity of laws. If courts are totally deprived of that power, the Fundamental Rights conferred on the people will become a mere adornment because rights without remedies are as writ in water. A controlled constitution will then become uncontrolled."

In his minority judgement in Minerva,[68] BHAGWATI, J., observed :

> "It is for the judiciary to uphold the constitutional values and to enforce the constitutional limitations. That is the essence of the rule of law, which inter alia requires that 'the exercise of powers by the government whether it be the legislature or the executive or any other authority, be conditioned by the Constitution and the law.' The power of judicial review is an integral part of our constitutional system…. the power of judicial review….. is unquestionably….. part of the basic structure of the Constitution."[69]

AHMADI, C.J., ……speaking on behalf of a bench of seven judges in L. Chandra Kumar v. Union of India,[70] has observed :

> "The judges of the Supreme Courts have been entrusted with the task of upholding the Constitution and to this end, have been conferred the power to interpret it. It is they who have to ensure that the balance of power envisaged by the Constitution is maintained and that the legislature and the executive do not, in the discharge of their functions, transgress constitutional limitations……."

Thus, the jurisdiction conferred on the Supreme Court under Art. 32 and on the High Courts under Arts. 226/227 of the Constitution has been held to be part of the inviolable basic structure of the Constitution which cannot be ousted even by a Constitutional Amendment.[71]

The scope of judicial review in India is somewhat circumscribed as compared to that in the U.S.A. In India, the Fundamental Rights are not so broadly worded as in the U.S.A., and limitations thereon have been stated in the Constitution itself and this task has not been left to the courts. The constitution-makers adopted this strategy as they felt that the courts might find it difficult to work out the limitations on the Fundamental Rights and the same better be laiddown in the Consti-

---

66. See, infra, Ch. XLI.
67. Infra, Ch. XLI.
68. Ibid.
69. For the doctrine of the "Basic Structure of the Constitution, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
70. AIR 1997 SC 1125, 1150 : (1997) 3 SCC 261; see, Ch. VIII, Sec. I, supra.
71. For discussion on Arts. 32, 226 and 227, see, supra, Chs. VIII and XXXIII.
See, next Chapter, for discussion on the theory of 'Basic Structure' of the Constitution.

tution itself. The constitution-makers also felt that the judiciary should not be raised to the level of the 'super-legislature'.[72]

Whatever the justification for the methodology adopted by the constitution-makers, the inevitable result of this has been to restrict the range of judicial review in India. The Indian Constitution does not afford the same scope of judicial creativity to the courts as does the U.S. Constitution.[73] Further, over the years, the scope of some of the Fundamental Rights has been curtailed by constitutional amendments, and, thus, the scope of judicial review has been further restricted.[74] This process can be seen very clearly in the context of the right to property.[75]

In spite of all this, the Supreme Court does play a significant role in the Indian constitutional process. Since the commencement of the Constitution, the Supreme Court has rendered hundreds of decisions expounding various provisions of the Constitution, and, thus, a distinct constitutional jurisprudence has come into existence. In many cases, the Supreme Court has displayed judicial creativity of a very high order, for example, in Kesavananda[76] and in expanding the scope of Art. 21.[77]

The bare text of the Indian Constitution does not by itself give a full picture of the Indian Constitutional Law. To have a full comprehension thereof, one must read the constitutional text along with the gloss put on it by the Judiciary from time to time and case to case.

There is no denying the fact that there have been occasions when judicial pronouncements have not been palatable to the governments and the Legislatures in India. The exercise of the power of judicial review has at times generated controversies and tensions between the courts, the executive and the legislature. For example, the judicial pronouncements in the area of property relations,[78] legislative privileges,[79] and constitutional amendments[80] have been controversial and have even led to several constitutional amendments which were undertaken to undo or dilute judicial rulings which the Central Government did not like.

Efforts have been made in India to curtail the scope of judicial review in some constitutional areas. Cases like Golak Nath,[81] Bank Nationalisation[82] or Kesavananda Bharati[83] have raised passionate controversies in India.

The Law Minister in the Central Government once stated in Parliament that the courts had, through their exercise of power of judicial review, retarded the process of socio-economic development of the country, and, therefore, he justified certain restrictions on the powers of the courts to declare laws unconstitu-

---

72. VII CAD 1195; IX CAD 1195-6; G. AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION, 164 et seq. Also, supra, Chs. XXXI and XXXII.
73. Supra. Sec. A; Ch. XX, Sec. A, supra.
74. Infra, Chs. XLI and XLII.
75. Supra, Chs. XXXI and XXXII.
76. For Kesavananda, see, infra, next Chapter.
77. For discussion on Art. 21, see, Ch. XXVI, supra.
For discussion on this theme generally, see below.
78. Supra, Ch XXXI.
79. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L; Ch. VI, Sec. H.
80. Infra, next Chapter.
81. Infra, next Chapter.
82. Supra, Ch. XXXI.
83. Infra, next Chapter.

tional.[84] But, in spite of all these hurdles, the institution of judicial review has a vibrancy of its own and has even been declared as the basic feature of the Constitution.

D. JUDICIAL CREATIVITY IN INDIA

(a) LITERAL INTERPRETATION

To begin with, generally speaking, the predominant approach of the Indian Judiciary was positivist, i.e., to interpret the Constitution literally and to apply to it more or less the same restrictive canons of interpretation as are usually applied to the interpretation of ordinary statutes. This is also described as the positivist approach. The approach emanates from the basic traditional therory that a judge does not create law but merely declares the law. Such a view prevailed in Britain in the XIXth and the early XXth centuries. Judicially, the principle was laid down in these words: "In interpreting the provisions of our Constitution, we should go by the plain words used by the constitution-makers."[85]

To some extent, the Constitution itself incorporates the principle of statutory construction. Art. 367 provides that the General Clauses Act, 1897,[86] shall apply for the interpretation of the Constitution as it applies for the interpretation of legislative enactments. The courts have held that not only the 'general definitions' in the General Clauses Act, but also the "general rules of construction" in the Act, apply to the Constitution.[87] Accordingly, the power to appoint in Art. 229(1) has been held to include the power of dismissal by virtue of S. 16 of the General Clauses Act.[88] The words 'person' in Art. 226 and 'offence' in Art. 20 have been given the same meaning respectively as Ss. 3(42) and 3(37) of the Act give to these words.[89] The General Clauses Act can be amended by Parliament. Art. 367 thus means that interpretation of many words and phrases used in the Constitution can be modified by Parliamentary legislation without amending the Constitution.

In the same genre falls the interpretation given to the expression 'sale of goods' in entry 54 in List II. The Supreme Court has held that the expression bears the same meaning as in the Sale of Goods Act.[90]

The position appears to be somewhat anomalous in so far as the meaning attached to a provision in the Constitution depends to some extent on parliamentary pleasure, and because of Art. 367, the courts have to acquiesce in it.

The crowning example of the strict constitutional interpretation can be seen in Gopalan which denuded Art. 21 of much of its efficacy and effectiveness and

---

84. Parl. Debates on the Constitution (Forty-fourth) Amendment Bill; see, infra, Chs. XLI and XLII.
85. MUKHERJEA, J., in Chiranjit Lal's case, AIR 1951 SC at 58.
86. This Act contains, as it were, a legislative dictionary for India.
87. Jugmendar Das v. State of U.P., AIR 1951 All 703; In re Keshavan Madhav Menon, AIR 1951 Bom 188; Anand Bihari v. Ram Sahay, AIR 1952 MB 31.
88. Pradyat Kumar v. Chief Justice, Calcutta High Court, AIR 1956 SC 285 L (1955) 2 SCR 1331; Bool Chand v. Chancellor, Kurukshetra Univ., AIR 1968 SC 292 : (1968) 1 SCR 434.
89. Bijoy Ranjan v. B.C. Das Gupta, AIR 1953 Cal 289; Jawala Ram v. Pepsu, AIR 1962 SC 1246 : (1962) 2 SCR 503.
90. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. D.

made 'personal liberty' a matter of legislative discretion which it would have been even in the absence of Art. 21.[1]

In Keshavan Madhava Menon,[2] the Supreme Court applied to the Constitution the rule of statutory interpretation that every statute prima facie is prospective unless expressly or by necessary implication it is made to have retrospective operation. On this basis, the Court held that Art. 13(1) was wholly prospective in so far as any proceeding initiated before the commencement of the Constitution would not abate but continue even though the relevant law was hit by a Fundamental Right.

In Saka Venkata Rao,[3] the Court interpreted Art. 226 narrowly as regards the High Court's jurisdiction to issue writs. This position had to be rectified by an amendment of the Constitution. These cases illustrate the general trend of judicial approach to the Constitution as a statute. In the same category may also be placed the following :

(i) the application of the doctrine of res judicata to the interrelationship of Arts. 32 and 226, by which the scope of Art. 32 has been somewhat cut down by the Supreme Court even when the Constitution places no such restriction on it ;[4]

(ii) the application of the law of limitation to writ petitions although the Constitution is silent on this point;[5]

(iii) the Supreme Court decision in the Habeas Corpus case during the emergency.[6]

The Habeas Corpus case has been characterised as one of the worst decisions rendered by the Supreme Court in its entire career because it struck at the very foundations of constitutionalism and the rule of law in the country. The Court failed to provide any protection to the people when its protection was needed most. The case can be explained as the consequence of narrow, restrictive, literal interpretation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court.

(b) LIBERAL INTERPRETATION

But then things have changed and the judicial approach to the Constitution is no longer solely and exclusively one of statutory interpretation. The liberal interpretation emerges because of the change in theory of the role of the judge. In course of time, the fiction of the declaratory role of the judge has been abandoned. The law creative role of a judge is very well recognised in modern times.

---

1. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. B(a).
See, SEERVAI, THE POSITION OF THE JUDICIARY UNDER THE CONSTITUTION OF INDIA, 62, where the author supports Gopalan. He appears to be a votary of literal interpretation of the Constitution. He praises Gopalan as a "landmark of Judicial wisdom, Judicial detachment and judicial restraint." However, few scholars share the views of SEERVAI as regards Gopalan. Any way, time has proved him wrong as Art. 21 has been very liberally interpreted since 1978.

2. Supra, Ch. XX. Sec. C.

3. Infra, next Chapter.
Also see, Ch. VIII, Sec. D(b), supra.

4. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D(f).

5. Ibid., M.P. Jain, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in India, Proceedings of the Third Commonwealth and Empire Law Conference, Sydney (1965).

6. Supra, Ch. XXXIII.

The American Realist Jurists greatly emphasize such a judicial role. A judge is not an automaton; he has to make choices out of several alternatives.

The liberal approach is designed to give a creative and purposive interpretation to the Constitution "with insight into social values, and with suppleness of adaptation to changing needs."[7]. Our Constitution is organic in nature and being a living organ, it is ongoing. Hence, with the passage of time, the law must change.[8] Modern scholars by and large now favour liberal judicial approach to the Constitution. The Constitution is a mechanism under which laws are made; it is not a mere statute which only declares what the law is to be. Therefore, it is advocated that the Constitution must not be construed in a narrow or pedantic manner. New situations arise in the country which may never have been visualised by the constitution-makers at the time of the constitution making. Therefore, a generic interpretation or flexible construction need to be given to the Constitutional provisions so as to make the constitution as a living organism so that it may meet the needs of the changing society at different times. Law which was at one point of time constitutional may be rendered unconstitutional later.[9]

A constitution is intended to serve the needs of the day when it was enacted and also to meet the needs of the changing conditions in new circumstances. Constitution has no fixed meaning and its interpretation must be based on the experience of the people in the course of working of the Constitution. However the same thing cannot be said in relation to interpreting the words and expressions in a statute.[10]

In relation to Part III of the Constitution, it has been held that certain unarticulated rights are implicit in the enumerated guarantees. For example, freedom of information has been held to be implicit in the guarantee of freedom of speech and expression.[11]

The liberal judicial interpretation of the written constitution emanates from the feeling that the function of interpreting a written constitution is very crucial to the governmental process in the country and, therefore, the judicial approach to this task has to be entirely different from that of interpreting a statute. While interpretation of a statute one way or other affects only a limited number of persons, interpreting the constitution and declaring a parliamentary statute unconstitutional affects the entire governmental functioning, policy-making and the constitutional process in the country. The Constitution is at the base of the whole governmental fabric, it guarantees Fundamental Rights of the people; it guarantees a democratic government and rule of law in the country; it distributes powers between the various organs of the state, viz., executive, judiciary and the legislature. A federal constitution distributes powers between the Centre and the States. Thus, interpretation of a constitution is a different exercise qualitatively than interpreting a statute.

---

7. CARDOZO, op. cit., Sec. F.
Also see, DENNING, FROM FREEDOM TO PRECEDENT; REID, The Judges as a law maker, 12 J.S.P.T.L. 22 (1972).

8. Saurabh Chaudri v. Union of India, (2003) 11 SCC 146 : AIR 2004 SC 361 regarding reservation.

9. Indian Handicrafts Emporium v. Union of India, (2003) 7 SCC 589 : AIR 2003 SC 3240.

10. Ashok Tanwar v. State of H.P., (2005) 2 SCC 104 : AIR 2005 SC 614.

11. M. Nagaraj v. Union of India, (2006) 8 SCC 212 : AIR 2007 SC 71.

The liberal interpretation also has an ideological tinge to it, viz., the courts cast themselves in the role of the protector and guardian of the Constitution, especially, of the Fundamental Rights of the people and the democratic values. The courts by adopting liberal approach constantly expand the frontiers of the people's Fundamental Rights so as to make the government more and more liberal and democratic. The courts seek to bring the static clauses in the constitutional document to life in conformity with the needs of a dynamic society. A creative interpretation of the Constitution would involve—

(i) interpreting the powers of the government affecting person or property somewhat restrictively rather than broadly; and

(ii) interpreting people's rights broadly and liberally rather than mechanically and literally.

Occasions are not wanting in India, when the Supreme Court has broken this self-imposed shackle and given a creative, purposive interpretation to constitutional provisions. At times, the consciousness that the Constitution is somewhat different from an ordinary statute—the essential difference being that it is the basic law of the country to which other statutes have to conform—has manifested itself and led the judiciary to interpret the Constitution liberally and broadly. The Supreme Court has recently declared, with a view to promote the highest democratic values in the country, that a popular mandate cannot override the Constitution. The Court has observed: "The constitution prevails over the will of the people as expressed through the majority party" in the Legislature. "The will of the people as expressed through the majority party prevails only if it is in accord with the Constitution," the Court has said.[12]

At times, the Supreme Court has emphasized that the Constitution must not be construed in any narrow and pedantic sense. To express this idea, KANIA, C.J. in Gopalan adopted the following quotation from an Australian case:[13] "Although we are to interpret words of the Constitution on the same principles of interpretation as we apply to any ordinary law, these very principles of interpretation compel us to take into account the nature and scope of the Act we are interpreting—to remember that it is a constitution, a mechanism under which laws are to be made and not a mere Act which declares what the law is to be". Many a time, the Supreme Court has stated the proposition that the Constitution should be interpreted liberally, as a constitution and not as a statute.[14]

In Pathuma,[15] the Supreme Court has emphasized that the judicial approach to the Constitution should be dynamic rather than static, pragmatic and not pedantic, elastic rather than rigid. Constitution is not to be interpreted as a mere statute but as a machinery by which laws are made.

The Supreme Court has observed in India Cement.[16] :

---

12. B.R. Kapur v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 2001 SC 3435, at 3455 : (2001) 7 SCC 231. Also see, supra, Ch. I and Ch. VII.

13. HIGGINS J. In Att. Gen., N.S.W. v. Brewery Employees Union, 6 CLR 469, 611-12. Also, James v. Commonwealth of Australia, 1936 AC 578, 614.

14. Pathumma v. State of Kerala, AIR 1978 SC 771 : (1978) 2 SCC 1; R.S. Joshi v. Ajit Mills, AIR 1977 SC 2279 : (1977) 4 SCC 98.

15. Pathumma v. State of Kerala, supra, footnote 14.

16. India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1990 SC 85 : (1990) 1 SCC 12.

> "It has to be remembered that it is a constitution that requires interpretation. Constitution is the mechanism under which the laws are to be made and not merely an Act which declares what the law is to be."

In another case,[17] the Supreme Court has also observed :

> "A constitutional provision is never static, it is ever evolving and ever changing and, therefore, does not admit of a narrow, pedantic or syllogistic approach….. It seems well settled….. that constitutional provisions must receive a broad interpretation and the scope and ambit of such provisions, and in particular the Fundamental rights, should not be cut down by too astute or too restricted an approach."

The Supreme Court has emphasized in Goodyear[18] that the Constitution is to be construed not in a narrow or pedantic sense. It is to be construed not as mere law but as the machinery by which laws are to be made. The constitution is a living and organic thing and, therefore, it needs to be construed broadly and liberally.

Recently, in S.R. Chaudhuri v. State of Punjab,[19] the Supreme Court rejected the argument that Art. 164(4) [as well as Art. 75(5) which is in pari materia to Art. 164(4)][20] be interpreted in a literal manner on its "plain language". Instead, the Court argued in favour of a purposive interpretation of the provision. The Court observed in this connection:

> "Constitutional provisions are required to be understood and interpreted with an object oriented approach. A Constitution must not be construed in a narrow and pedantic sense. The words used may be general in terms but, their full import and true meaning, has to be appreciated considering the true context in which the same are used and the purpose which they seek to achieve... We must remember that a Constitution is not just a document in solemn form, but a living framework for the Government of the people exhibiting a sufficient degree of cohesion and its successful working depends upon the democratic spirit underlying it being respected in letter and in spirit."[21]

At another place, the Supreme Court has emphasized that the Articles should be so construed as to "further the principles of a representative and responsible Government".[22]

A few examples of this approach may be cited here:

(i) The principle of broad and liberal interpretation has been consistently applied to construction of legislative entries in the three Lists. These entries are given a broad sense beneficial to the widest possible amplitude of powers and not a narrow or restricted sense. The entries include within their scope and ambit all ancillary matters which legitimately come within the topics mentioned therein.[23]

---

17. Life Insurance Corp. of India v. Manubhai D. Shah, AIR 1993 SC 171, at 176-177 : (1992) 3 SCC 637.
18. Goodyear India Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1990 SC 781, at 791 : (1990) 2 SCC 71.
19. AIR 2001 SC 2707 : (2001) 7 SCC 126; supra, Ch. VII, Sec. B.
20. See, supra, Chs. III, Sec. B; Ch. VII, Sec. B.
21. AIR 2001 SC at 2717.
22. Ibid, at 2719.
23. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(i).
Also, Vishnu Agencies v. Commercial Tax Officer, AIR 1978 SC 449, 458 : (1978) 1 SCC 520.

(ii) A significant matter in which the Supreme Court has not interpreted the Constitution literally pertains to the permissible limits within which Parliament can delegate legislative power on the executive. There is no specific constitutional provision covering this matter, yet the Supreme Court has implied a restriction on delegation from the Constitution—an approach which differs from that of statutory interpretation.[24]

(iii) In the Express Newspaper case,[25] while interpreting Art. 19(1)(g), the Court expounded the socio-economic theories regarding the concepts of 'living', 'minimum' and 'fair' wages, and introduced the principle of 'capacity to pay' as an essential ingredient in fixing 'living' and 'fair' wages. For this purpose, the Court quoted extensively from the Report of the Committee of Fair Wages, the Report of the Press Commission, and a number of other publications dealing with fixation of wages.

(iv) While delimiting the concept of the freedom of the press in Express Newspaper, the Supreme Court made use of the Report of the Commission on Freedom of Press in the U.S.A. The case constitutes a very good illustration of judicial policy-making.

(v) In Quareshi,[26] the Court mentioned various considerations—religious, economic, agricultural, nutritive—to decide the extent to which the slaughter of cattle could be prohibited with reference to Art. 19(1)(g).

The Supreme Court quoted from various reports, such as, the Report on Marketing of Cattle in India, the Report of the Cattle Preservation and Development Committee, etc.

The Court's judgment forms a very good essay on improvement of cattle wealth in India. It constitutes another good example of judicial policy-making giving guidance to the State Governments which were being politically pressurized on the issue of banning animal slaughter especially cow slaughter.

(vi) In deciding what is a reasonable restriction on a Fundamental Right under Art. 19, the Supreme Court has at times embarked on a broad canvas.[27]

While considering reasonableness of a restriction on the right to hold property under Arts. 19(1)(f) and 19(5), the Court stated in Jyoti Pd. v. Delhi:[28] "The criteria for determining the degree of restriction on the right to hold property which would be considered reasonable, are by no means fixed or static, but must obviously vary from age to age and be related to the adjustments necessary to solve the problems which communities face from time to time.... If law failed to take account of unusual situations of pressing urgency arising in the country, and of the social urges generated by the patterns of thought evolution

24. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.
25. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Secs. I and J.
26. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. J(g).
27. Ibid.
28. Ibid.

and of social consciousness which we witness in the second half of the century, it would have to be written down as having failed in the very purpose of its existence."

The Court has further emphasized that in judging the validity of social legislation the "courts have necessarily to approach it from the point of view of furthering the social interest which it is the purpose of the legislation to promote, for the courts are not, in these matters, functioning as it were in vacuo, but as parts of a society which is trying, by enacted law, to solve its problems and achieve social concord and peaceful adjustment and thus furthering the moral and material progress of the community as a whole."

(vii) In the Golak Nath case,[29] the majority of the Supreme Court while holding the Fundamental Rights as non-amendable emphasized the great value and significance of these rights and expressed the apprehension that if these rights were to be diluted or curtailed then it would usher in a totalitarian regime in the country.

In support of this thesis, the Court quoted extensively from the writings of the various political thinkers.

HIDAYATULLAH, J., criticised the 'doctrinaire conceptualism' based on an "arid textual approach."[30]

A similar approach is visible in Kesavananda Bharati[31] and Indira Nehru Gandhi v. Rajnarain[32]—the two cases dealing with Amendments of the Constitution.

(viii) Kesavananda may be regarded as the high water-mark of purposive interpretation of the Constitution. The judgment depicts an attempt on the part of the Supreme Court to protect some of the basic values of the Constitution from the onslaught of transient majority in Parliament.[33]

(ix) The Supreme Court consistently sought to give some protection to 'private property', particularly, on the question of compensation, and this may be regarded as an instance of judicial policy-making.[34]

(x) Barring the emergency period of 1975-1977, the Supreme Court has provided some protection to persons detained in preventive detention by creatively applying the principles of Administrative Law.[35]

(xi) In B. Banerjee v. Anita Pan,[36] while considering the vires of a social legislation, the Supreme Court has emphasized upon the need on the

---

29. Infra, next Chapter.
30. Golak Nath, infra, next Chapter.
31. Infra, next Chapter.
32. Infra, next Chapter.
Also see, infra, Ch. XLII.
33. Infra, next Chapter.
34. Supra, Ch. XXXI.
35. Supra, Ch, XXVII, Sec. D.
Also, M.P. Jain, note, 1 on 1813.
36. AIR 1975 SC 1145, 1148 : (1975) 1 SCC 166; supra, Ch. XXIV.

part of the government to present to the Court relevant socio-economic data in support of the impugned legislation.

In the words of K. IYER, J.: "Welfare legislation calculated to benefit weaker classes, when their vires is challenged in Court, cast an obligation on the State ..... to support the law, if necessary by a Brandeis brief and supply of socio-economic circumstances and statistics inspiring the enactment. Courts cannot, on their own, adventure into social research outside the record and if Government lets down the legislature in Court by not illumining the provisions from the angle of the social mischief or economic menace sought to be countered, the victims will be the class of beneficiaries the State professed to protect."

(xii) In the post emergency era beginning 1978, with its pronouncement in Maneka Gandhi,[37] the Supreme Court has breathed new vigour and life into the concept of personal liberty[38] and given new dimensions to the right to equality.[39] The Supreme Court has thus contributed much to the cause of human rights in India.

Many a time, the Supreme Court has asserted that "the attempt of the Court should be to expand the reach and ambit of Fundamental Rights rather than attenuate their meaning and content by process of judicial construction….."[40]

The impact of the liberal judicial approach on Fundamental Rights has been remarkable over a period of time. This is demonstrated in many ways.

One, the Supreme Court has given an extended meaning to Art. 142 giving an extension to its own power to give relief.[41]

Two, the Supreme Court has been expanding the horizon of Art. 12 primarily to inject respect for human rights and social conscience in India's corporate structure.[42]

Three, many Fundamental Rights have been broadly interpreted thus expanding the range and scope of these rights. For example, the right to equality contained in Art. 14 has been given a new dimension by the Supreme Court ruling that an unreasonable and arbitrary law or administrative action infringes Art. 14.[43]

The Court has inferred the right to know from the guarantee of free speech contained in Art. 19(1)(a).[44]

Four, Maneka Gandhi[45] has infused new vigour in the moribund Art. 21 by giving an expansive interpretation to the word 'life' therein as meaning not only mere 'animal existence' but 'life with human dignity'; 'the right to life includes the right to live with human dignity and all that goes along with it.[46] The

---

37. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. C.
38. Ibid.
39. Supra, Ch. XXI.
40. Pathuma, supra, footnote 14.
41. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. G.
42. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. D.
43. Supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. D.
44. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C(c).
45. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. C.
46. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. E(a).

Supreme Court has thus infused a qualitative concept in Art. 21. From this hypothesis, a number of rights have been implied from Art. 21 and a whole lot of human rights jurisprudence has sprung up. Art. 21 has become a reservoir of Fundamental Rights.

By an expansive interpretation of Art. 21, the Court has spelled out several Fundamental Rights which are not specifically mentioned in the Constitution. Some of the rights implied from Art. 21 are : right to livelihood, right to education, right to privacy, right to clean and pollution-free environment, right to shelter, right against sexual harassment, right to legal aid and speedy trial. These and various other rights are held to emanate from Art. 21 and, thus, this provision has become the source of many human rights and the scope of this Article is still being expanded.[47]

Art. 21 has thus been placed on the high pedestal of one of the few most cherished, expansive and significant rights guaranteed by the Constitution. As compared to the narrow, static and mechanical interpretation put by the Supreme Court on Art. 21 in Gopalan,[48] there has been a remarkable transformation in the range and scope of Art. 21 over time.

Five, the Supreme Court has ruled that there is no rule that unless a right has been expressly stated in the Constitution as a Fundamental Right, it cannot be treated as one. This means that a Fundamental Right need not be explicitly stated in the Constitution; it can also be implied from an expressly stated Fundamental Right. In the words of the Court : "This Court has not followed the rule that unless a right is expressly stated as a Fundamental Right, it cannot be treated as one."[49]

In course of time, the Supreme Court has developed a number of Fundamental Rights by its creative interpretative process out of the ones already expressly mentioned. To name a few implied rights, freedom of press has been implied from freedom of speech;[50] a bundle of rights implied from Art. 21 have already been mentioned above.

Six, another creditable achievement of the Supreme Court is to read Fundamental Rights along with the Directive Principles so as to supplement each other.[51] The Supreme Court has thus been able to expand the scope and content of several Fundamental Rights, especially, right to equality, right to life and freedom of carrying on trade or business. On this point, the Court has ruled in Unni Krishnan v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[52] "This Court has also been consistently adopting the approach that Fundamental Rights and directive principles are supplementary and complementary to each other and that the provisions in Part III (Fundamental Rights) should be interpreted having regard to the Preamble and the Directive Principles of the state policy."

This approach has served two purposes, viz., : (1) it has given depth to many Fundamental Rights, as for example, Arts. 14 and 21; (2) many directive princi-

---

47. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J.
48. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. B(a).
49. Unni Krishnan v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1993 SC 2178, 2226 : (1993) 1 SCC 645. Also see, Ch. XXVII, Sec. A, supra.
50. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C(e).
51. On Directive Principles, see, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. C, supra.
52. AIR 1993 SC 2178 : (1993) 1 SCC 645.

ples, which are inherently non-enforceable, have become enforceable. Thus, a number of socio-economic Fundamental economic rights have been created in the process. e.g., the right to economic justice.[53], right to economic empowerment of women and weaker sections of the society,[54] right to social justice[55].

Seven, the high watermark of judicial creativity has been reached by the Court in such cases as Golak Nath[56] and Kesavananda[57] in connection with the question of amendability of the Constitution. In these cases, the role played by the Court can even be characterised as constituent or that of constitution-making.

In Golak Nath, SUBBA RAO, C.J., explicity claimed a law-making role for the Supreme Court in the following words :[58]

> "……Arts. 32, 141 and 142 are couched in such wide and elastic terms as to enable this Court to formulate legal doctrines to meet the ends of justice. To deny this power to the Supreme Court on the basis of some outmoded theory that the Court only finds the law but does not make it is to make ineffective the powerful instrument of justice placed in the hands of the highest judiciary of this country."

With these words, the Supreme Court has openly asserted a law creative role for itself.

Recently, in P. Ramachandra Rao v. State of Karnataka,[59] RAJU, J., has expressed a liberal view of the powers of the Supreme Court in these pithy words:

> "Though this Court does not consider itself to be an imperium in imperio or would function as a despotic branch of "the state," the fact that the founding fathers of our Constitution designedly and deliberately, perhaps, did not envisage the imposition of any jurisdictional embargo on this Court, except in Article 363 of the Constitution of India is significant and sufficient enough, in my views, to identify the depth and width or extent of its powers. The other fetters devised or perceived on its exercise of powers or jurisdiction to entertain/deal with a matter were merely self-imposed for one or the other reason assigned therefor and they could not stand in the way of or deter this Court in any manner from rising up to respond in a given situation as and when necessitated and effectively play its role in accommodating the Constitution to changing circumstances and enduring values as a sentinel on the qui vive to preserve and safeguard the Constitution, protect and enforce the Fundamental Rights and other constitutional mandates—which constitute the inviolable rights of the people as well as those features, which formed its basic structure too and considered to be even beyond the reach of any subsequent constitutional amendment. In substance, this Court in my view, is the ultimate repository of all judicial powers at national level by virtue of it being the summit Court at the pyramidal height of administration of justice in the country and as the upholder and final interpreter of the Constitution of India and defender of the fundamentals of "rule of law."

---

53. Dalmia Cement v. Union of India, (1996) 4 JT (SC) 555 : (1996) 10 SCC 104; LIC v. Consumer Education and Research Centre, AIR 1995 SC 1811; E.S.C. Ltd. v. S.C. Bose, AIR 1992 SC 573, supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D.
54. Ashok K. Gupta v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1997) 5 SCC 201, supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D.
55. See, supra, Chapter XXXIV, Sec. D.
56. See, next Chapter.
57. For discussion on this case, see, next Chapter.
58. AIR 1967 SC at 1669 : (1967) 2 SCR 762.
59. (2002) 4 SCC 578, at 606.

A liberal approach is being followed by the courts in many common-law countries having written constitutions. It may be instructive to take note of some notable recent developments in the area of constitutional interpretation in some of these countries.

An outstanding example of the liberal approach is furnished by a recent case in Australia, viz., Nationwide News Pty Ltd. v. Wills.[60] The Australian Constitution does not contain any Charter of Fundamental Rights. The significance of this case lies in the fact that the High Court has found the freedom of political discussion in the basic structure of the Constitution and declared a law enacted by the Australian Parliament unconstitutional on the ground of its unduly infringing such freedom.

The Court has argued that since the Constitution can thrive only when people have freedom of political discussion, therefore, this freedom ought to be regarded as a part of the Constitution. The case is the result of the belief that the Court has to play a major role in protecting the individual against both the legislature and the executive. The case creates the possibility of the High Court implying some basic rights of the people even though the Constitution is silent on the point. This is judicial creativity of a very high order.

The U.S. Supreme Court has never adopted a literal approach to the Constitution. It has always interpreted the U.S. Constitution as 'constitution' and not as a 'statute'. As early as 1810, Chief Justice Marshall of the US Supreme Court declared in McCulloch v. Maryland : "It is a Constitution we are expounding."

This statement underlines the difference between the static interpretation of a statute and the dynamic interpretation of a written constitution. It is because of such judicial approach that the U.S. Constitution drafted in 1787 has been able to keep abreast of the changing socio-economic needs of the dynamic American Society, especially when the process of constitutional amendment is exceptionally rigid. The Supreme Court has thus rendered a yeoman service to the cause of constitutionalism in the U.S.A.

The U.S. Supreme Court Judges frankly and avowedly take recourse to policy considerations and use socio-economic materials to interpret the Constitution.[61] The Court's approach is to canvass, directly and openly, the merits of alternative choices in arriving at a decision. Social and economic facts are directly incorporated into the briefs presented to the Supreme Court. Such briefs are known as the Brandeis Briefs.

Two main reasons for such an attitude on the part of the U.S. Supreme Court are: the brief and compact nature of the U.S. Constitution and use of very general and broad phrases therein which can be interpreted and re-interpreted by the courts, from time to time, in the context of contemporary circumstances, e.g., such phrases as due process of law, interstate commerce, etc. The Court has therefore evolved a number of doctrines which are not mentioned explicitly in the

---

60. (1992) 177 CLR 1.
Also see, Australian Capital Television Pty. Ltd. v. Common-wealth, (1992) 117 CLR 106. See for comments on this case, Stephen Donaghue, The Glamour of Silent Constitutional Principles, (1996) 24 Fed. L.R. 133.

61. Policy-making in a Democracy : "The Role of U.S. Supreme Court", (1957) JI. Of Public Law, 275-508.
Also, M.P. Jain, Role of the Judiciary in a Democracy, (1979) JMCL 239.

Constitution, e.g. immunity of instrumentalities, separation of powers, police powers, etc.

The U.S. Supreme Court has interpreted the U.S. Constitution in such a creative manner that an old document, of nearly 200 years of age, without many amendments, has been able to serve the needs of the present highly sophisticated and dynamic technological era. In this way, the Court has not only played the role of an interpreter of the Constitution but even the role of a constitution-maker.

Many outstanding decisions have been rendered by the Supreme Court on the Constitution; a few may be noted here. For example, while interpreting the due process clause, the Court has laid emphasis on the word 'due' which has been interpreted to mean 'just', 'proper' or 'reasonable'. Thus, the Supreme Court can pronounce whether a law affecting a person's life, liberty or property is reasonable or not. This had led the Court to create the doctrine of substantive due process as well as procedural due process.

The idea underlying procedural due process is that governmental action affecting the liberty of the subject, which violates natural justice without due procedure is void. Under this doctrine, the Court has endeavored to secure fair criminal trials. In Miranda v. Arizona,[62] the Supreme Court granted certain rights to an accused at the time of police interrogation. In Gideon v. Wainwright,[63] the Court accepted some rights of an accused at the time of police interrogation.

Under the substantive due process concept, the U.S. Supreme Court can strike down any arbitrary, unreasonable or capricious legislative or executive act as being volative of the Constitution. Thus, infliction of cruel and unusual punishment has been invalidated by the Court.[64]

The word 'liberty' in the due process clause has not been confined merely to 'personal liberty,' but has been given a much wider interpretation. It has been held to comprise economic rights and freedom of contract. Currently, the U.S. Supreme Court is endeavouring to derive from 'liberty' a constitutional protection for privacy, personal autonomy and some family relationship. As the Court has said in Meyer v. Nebraska,[65] the liberty protected by due process "denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint, but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and, generally, to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by freemen".

A law forbidding use of contraceptives has been invalidated as invading the right of privacy – a penumbral right emanating from the V and XIV Amendments.[66] The Court has also ruled that a pregnant woman has a right to abort within the first trimester for, according to the Court : 'The right of privacy… is

---

62. 384 U.S. 436 (1966).
Also see, Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25.
63. 372 U.S. 335.
Also see, Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201.
64. Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660; Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972).
65. 262 U.S. 390 (1923).
66. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).

broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy"[67] Thus, the state could not interfere with the decision of a woman to abort her pregnancy during the first trimester; in the second trimester, the state can regulate the abortion procedure and, in the third trimester, the state could forbid an abortion except when it is necessary to protect the life or health of the mother.

The concept of equality found in the XIV Amendment of the Constitution has been used by the Supreme Court to promote and preseve human freedom in several ways. In Brown v. Board of Education,[68] a monumental decision, the Court invalidated segregation between the whites and the blacks in educational institutions. The Court changed its old ruling regarding 'separate but equal'[69] to 'equal but not separation' so as to discourage racial segregation. "Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal" declared the Court. In Reed v. Reed,[70] distinction based on sex or gender has been held to be unconstitutional.

Generally, the Court has declared that classification cannot be made on the basis of criteria wholly unrelated to the objective of the statute. A classification must be reasonable, not arbitrary and must rest on some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation with the objects of the legislation, so that all persons similarly circumstanced shall be treated alike.

In Reynolds v. Sims,[71] the Supreme Court translated the equality principle into the principle of "one man one vote". The Court thus held that the seats in a House of State Legislature must be apportioned on population basis.

The Supreme Court has broadly interpreted the First Amendment guaranteeing freedom of the press. Press is regarded not only as a "neutral conduct of information between the people and their elected leaders or as a neutral forum of debate", but also as a fourth institution outside the government as an additional check on the three official branches.[72]

In another case,[73] the First Amendment has been held to "support the view that the press must be free to publish news, whatever the source, without censorship, injunctions, or prior restraints".

These decisions by the U.S. Supreme Court have triggered revolutionary changes in social, economic and political structure of America's body politic. In the words of Chief Justice WARREN : "The Court's essential function is to act as the final arbiter of minority rights."[74]

The dynamic theory of constitutional interpretation of the constitution has been explained by Justice BRENNAM of the U.S. Supreme Court. For him, the

---

67. Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).
68. 347 U.S. 483 (1953).
69. See, Plessey v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 527 (1996).
70. 404 U.S. 71 (1971).
Also, Frontiero v. Richardson, 41 U.S. 677, holding discrimination based on sex as invalid.
71. 377 U.S. 553.
72. New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964).
73. New York Times Co. v. U.S. (The Pentagon Papers case), 403 U.S. 713 (1971).
74. Quoted in Abraham, THE JUDICIARY : THE SUPREME COURT IN THE GOVERNMENT PROCESS, 189 (1977).

ultimate question of constitutional interpretation is: "what do the words of the text mean in our time?" He says :

> "We current Justices read the Constitution in the only way that we can : as Twentieth Century Americans. We look to the history of the time of framing and to the intervening history of interpretation. But the ultimate question must be, what do the words of the text mean in our time. For the genius of the Constitution rests not on any static meaning it might have had in a world that is dead and gone, but in the adaptability of its great principles to cope with current problems and current needs. What the constitutional fundamentals meant to the wisdom of other times cannot be their measure to the vision of our time. Similarly what those fundamentals mean for us, our descendants will learn, cannot be the measure to the vision of their time".

It is only because of such dynamic judicial approach that a constitution, nearly 200 years old, with only a few amendments made to it, has been able to endure and subsist. Had it been interpreted in a static manner, it would have failed to cope with the societal needs of the changing times.

The upshot of the above discussion is that interpretation of a constitution is a complicated exercise and cannot be looked upon merely as a matter of statutory interpretation. The constitution is not just an ordinary statute; it is the ground-norm and thus it conditions the entire legislative and executive process in the country. Its interpretation must of necessity proceed on lines somewhat different from interpreting, say, the Transfer of Property Act or the Indian Contract Act.

There is no doubt that the courts can with great advantage use socio-economic data to elucidate constitutional provisions and assess the constitutionality of controversial laws. At present, most of the legislation has economic overtones.

It is well to remember that, after all, judicial review of constitutional issues affects governmental policies in the ultimate analysis as the government has to keep itself within the bounds prescribed by the courts. Judicial review is not merely a sterile function of interpreting an "i" here and an "a" there, but it is a creative role which the courts discharge.

It may perhaps be mentioned here that even in Britian where the courts do not discharge the function of interpreting the constitution, the courts do not function in a mere mechanistic manner. The British courts also make policy choices and play a creative role in the development of law.[75] Constitutional interpretation is a more creative function than statutory interpretation.

E. NORMS OF CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

(a) POLICY CONSIDERATIONS

In the U.S.A., the Supreme Court Judges avowedly take recourse to policy considerations in arriving at their conclusions on questions of constitutional interpretation. The judges freely use socio-economic materials in interpreting the Constitution and freely, directly and openly canvass the merits of alternative choices in arriving at a decision.[76]

---

75. STEVENS, The Role of a Final Appeal Court in a Democracy: The House of Lords To-day, 28 MLR 509 (1965).

76. Policy-making in a Democracy: The Role of US Supreme Court, (1957) JI. of Public Law, 257-508.

This trend has become much more pronounced in the post-1937 era, i.e., after the Depression. This enables the judge to play an effective role in shaping, moulding, developing and creating constitutional law and is more meaningful than the traditional positivist literal approach which amounts to formalistic, mechanical approach of statutory interpretation of a constitutional document.

Even in Britain, where the doctrine of Supremacy of Parliament prevails,[77] and the function of the judges is to interpret statutes rather than the Constitution, scholars have asserted that judges have policies which they seek to implement through their decisions. As WADE says :

> "Today no apology is needed for talking openly about judicial policy. Twenty or thirty years ago judges questioned about administrative law were prone to say that their function was merely to give effect to the will of Parliament and that they were not concerned with policy. In reality they are up to their necks in policy....."[78]

At another place, he asserts that the judges are already immersed in 'politics' and 'have no hope of getting out of it", because they are "constantly having to decide cases which involve politics as well as law". Judges have to choose from "the wide range of alternative policies."[79]

By and large, until recently, the Indian Supreme Court Judges eschewed the policy approach as they treated the Indian Constitution as a statute and construed it according to the ordinary canons of statutory construction, except in one area, viz. the amendability of the Constitution.[80] One could usually come across such statements as the following strewn in the judicial pronouncements : "This Court is not concerned with policy or economic considerations."[81]

In Cooper v. Union of India,[82] the Supreme Court declared the economic considerations and policies underlying the Banks Nationalization Act "have little relevance in determining the legality of the measure." These statements mean that the Court is concerned with the law, as such, and not with the merits of the underlying policies. For example, whether nationalisation of banks is good or bad and whether it ought to be undertaken or not is a matter of legislative policy and the legislature is the best judge of the same and not the courts. To some extent, the same attitude prevails even to-day.

But, for some time now, the Judges seem to have become more forthcoming in adopting a 'policy' approach in interpreting constitutional provisions, as emphasis has come to be placed on a more creative law-making judicial role as regards constitutional interpretation.

This trend may be said to have become prominent with Maneka Gandhi where BHAGWATI, J., has openly declared that the role of the courts is to expand not to extenuate the Fundamental Rights.[83] This judicial policy has been translated into practical terms through a series of post-Maneka cases, particularly, in the area of

---

77. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. M.
78. H.W.R WADE, CONSTITUTIONAL FUNDAMENTAL, 61-62.
79. Ibid., 75-77. Also, GRIFFITH, THE POLITICS OF THE JUDICIARY, 211.
80. Infra, next Chapter.
81. State of Bombay v. Bombay Education Society, AIR 1954 SC 561, 567 : (1955) 1 SCR 568.
82. AIR 1970 SC 564, 601 : (1970) 1 SCC 248.
83. See, Maneka Gandhi, supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. C; Pathumma, supra, footnote 14.

personal liberty and freedom of speech. Economic rights of the poor also now claim protection at the hands of the Supreme Court.[84]

Another notable trend is the emergence of 'public interest litigation' which is avowedly meant for the protection of basic rights of the poor and the deprived.[85]

Although the present judicial trend in India is towards liberal constitutional interpretation, it is not true to think that the literal approach is completely moribund. Such an approach does manifest itself from time to time. Also, one and the same judge may at one time resort to liberal approach but may at other time resort to literal approach.

A typical case-study in this connection is provided by the Sankalchand case[86], where the question was whether Art. 222 should be so interpreted as to permit transfer of a Judge from one High Court to another only with his consent, i.e., consensual transfer. The question was whether the word 'transfer' in Art. 222 could be interpreted only to mean 'consensual' transfer and not compulsory transfer? The conflict in judicial approaches becomes obvious when the majority applying the literal approach interpreted Art. 222 on its own terms, but the minority (BHAGWATI and UNTWALIA, JJ.) applied liberal approach to interpreting Art. 222.

CHANDRACHUD, J., (a majority judge) treated the Constitution as a statute and applied to it the norms of statutory interpretation and even extolled the literal approach to the Constitution. On the other hand, BHAGWATI, J., imports into Art. 222, by necessary implication, the consent of the Judge to his transfer from one to another High Court and strongly decries the technique of literal interpretation of the Constitution in the following words:

> ".... when the Court interprets a constitutional provision, it breathes life into the inert words used in the founding document. The problem before the constitution Court is not a mere verbal problem... The Court cannot interpret a provision of the Constitution by making "a fortress out of the dictionary". The significance of a constitutional problem is vital, not formal: it has to be gathered not simply by taking the words and a dictionary, but by considering the purpose and intendment of the framers as gathered from the context and the setting in which the words occur .... (T)he process of constitutional interpretation is in the ultimate analysis one of reading values into its clauses".[87]

BHAGWATI, J., reads 'consent' into the provision to mean 'transfer' only as consensual transfer to give effect to the paramount intention of the constitution-makers to safeguard the independence of the superior judiciary by placing it out of the reach of the power of the executive. Another majority judge, K. IYER, J., who usually adopted a liberal approach in socio-economic matters adopted a literal approach in interpreting Art. 222.

As an illustration of his approach in socio-economic matters, note the following observation of the Court:

> "Our emphasis is on abandoning formal legalistics or sterile logomachy in assessing the vires of statutes regulating vital economic areas, and adopting instead a dynamic, goal-based approach to problems of constitutionality."[88]

---

84. See, supra, Ch. XXXIV.
85. Supra, Chs. VIII, Sec. D(k) and XXXIII, Sec. B.
86. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(q).
87. AIR 1977 SC at 2362 : (1977) 4 SCC 193.
88. State of Karnataka v. Ranganatha Reddy, AIR 1978 SC 215 at 234 : (1977) 4 SCC 471.

(b) CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY DEBATES

The debates of the Constituent Assembly running into hundreds of printed pages constitute a veritable source of information throwing a flood of light on the genesis of many provisions of the Constitution, and the ideas and reasons underlying their adopting. The courts do not rely very much on historical materials to interpret a provision of the Constitution. The report of the Drafting Committee on the Constitution, or the speeches of the members of the Constituent Assembly, the courts have emphasized, can be used only in case of ambiguity or for properly understanding the circumstances under which a provision of the Constitution was passed but not for the purpose of controlling its meaning.[89]

Where the language of a provision admits of two interpretations, the Court may resort to the historical materials.[90] The reason for not placing much reliance on the historical materials to interpret the Constitution has been explained in the following words: "A speech made in the course of the debate on a bill could at best be indicative of the subjective intent of the speaker, but it could not reflect the inarticulate mental process lying behind the majority vote which carried the bill. Nor it is reasonable to assume that the minds of all those legislators were in accord.

The Court could only search for the objective intent of the legislature primarily in the words used in the enactment, aided by such historical material as reports of statutory committees, preambles, etc.".[91] This reluctance to use the debates of the Constituent Assembly or reports of the various Committees appointed by it to interpret constitutional provisions may be regarded as emanating from the judicial approach of applying canons of statutory interpretation to the Constitution. But cases are not entirely wanting when some judges have taken recourse to this historical material to elucidate the meaning of a constitutional provision.[92] For example, Justice V.R. KRISHNA IYER quoted copiously from the Constituent Assembly Debates, in Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab[93] to come to the conclusion that the President is only a constitutional head. Copious extracts from the Constituent Assembly Debates are to be found in Kesavananda,[94] but still the rule has been reiterated that while one may seek confirmation of one's interpretation in debates, it is quite a different thing to interpret constitutional provisions in the light of the debates.

---

89. Travancore-Cochin v. Bombay Co. Ltd., AIR 1952 SC 366; Aswini Kumar v. Arabinda Bose, AIR 1952 SC 369 : 1953 SCR; State of West Bengal v. Bella Banerjee, AIR 1954 SC 170; KANIA, C.J., and FAZL ALI, J., in Gopalan, AIR 1950 SC 27, 38; Automobile Transport v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1962 SC 1406; The Golak Nath case, op. cit., at 1682, 1728.

90. See FAZL ALI, J., in S.P. Gupta v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 304-14; supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(c).

91. Gopalan's case, per PATANJALI SASTRI, J., AIR 1950 SC 27 at 73.

92. Some reference is made to the debates of the Constituent Assembly in Sankal Chand, supra, footnote 86, to show that the constitution-makers put a great premium on the independence of the judiciary.

In State of Karnataka v. Ranganatha Reddy, AIR 1978 SC 215, K. IYER, J., refers to the historical materials on the questions of compensation and public purpose in Art. 31, supra, Ch XXXI, Sec. C.

93. AIR 1974 SC 2192 at 2212-2219 : (1974) 2 SCC 831; supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.; Ch. VII, Sec. B.

94. AIR 1973 SC 1516 : (1973) 4 SCC 225; infra, next chapter.

Recently, in S.R. Chaudhuri v. State of Punjab,[1] while interpreting Art. 164(4)[2] the Supreme Court referred to the debates of the Constituent Assembly to find out the intention of the framers of the Constitution. The Court went on to assert in the instant case: "It is a settled position that debates in the Constituent Assembly may be relied upon as an aid to interpret a constitutional provision because it is the function of the Court to find out the intention of the framers of the Constitution."

In the U.S.A., the rule of excluding the debates has not always been adhered to; sometimes distinction is drawn between using materials to ascertain the purpose of the constitutional provision and using it to ascertain its meaning.[3] In Australia, the individual opinion of members of the Convention expressed in the debates is not referred to for the purpose of construing the Constitution.[4]

There is, however, enough in these historical materials of use and interest to a constitutional lawyer. A commentator has observed: "Indian Legal scholars can contribute to an understanding of Indian Constitutional development by clarifying the intentions of the original framers and the departures which the responsible leaders have found desirable. Whether or not the material they find is of a kind that courts will take into account under their rules of constitutional construction, it will throw light on the growth of India's organic law".[5]

Further, in America, 'the rich mine of original constitutional materials, more than a century and half old' has been worked out completely, but in India 'the ore has scarcely been touched.' A study of these materials (mainly Constituent Assembly Debates) may contribute much to an understanding of the intentions of the original framers of the Constitution and, consequently, to an understanding of the Constitution itself.[6] In view, however, of the general judicial attitude towards the historical sources, this task has to be performed by academic lawyers.[7]

(c) PREAMBLE

By itself alone, the Preamble to the Constitution can afford no basis for a claim of either government power or a private right.[8] Nevertheless, the preamble serves two significant ends. First, it indicates the source from which the Constitution derives its claim to obedience and legitimacy, namely, the People of India. Secondly, it states the great objects which the Constitution and the government established by it are expected to promote.[9]

The Supreme Court has clarified the status of the Preamble to the Constitution in several cases.[10] The declaration made by the People of India in exercise of

---

1. AIR 2001 SC 2707, at 2717 : (2001) 7 SCC 126.
2. See, supra, Ch. VII, Sec. B, for this provision.
3. U.S. v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 US 649.
4. Municipal Council of Sydney v. Commonwealth, 1904 CLR 208.
5. Historical Footnote to Bela Banerjee's case, 1 JILI 375 (1959).
6. ALEXANDROWICZ, CONST. DEVELOPMENT IN INDIA, 18.
7. Several books based on these historical materials have been published. See, for example: AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION; CORNERSTONE OF A NATION (1966), supra, 2; TEWARY, THE MAKING OF THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION (1967); GHOSH, THE CONSTITUTION OF INDIA: HOW IT HAS BEEN FRAMED (1966); B. SHIVA RAO, THE FRAMING OF INDIA'S CONSTITUTION, 4 Vols. (1966).
8. For Preamble, see, supra, Chs. I, Sec. E and XXXIV, Sec. A.
9. CORWIN, THE CONSTITUTION AND WHAT IT MEANS, 1 (1954).
10. See, supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. A, on this point.

their sovereign will in the Preamble to the Constitution is "a key to the mind of the constitution-makers",[11] which may show the general purposes for which they made the several provisions in the Constitution. But the Preamble is neither a part of the Constitution nor is it the source of any substantive power of the government. Such powers embrace only those powers which are either expressly granted by the Constitution or which may be implied from those granted. Nor can any prohibitions and limitations be implied on the government from the Preamble.

The Supreme Court has stated that "at the highest it may perhaps be arguable that if the terms used in any of the articles in the Constitution are ambiguous or are capable of two meanings, in interpreting them some assistance may be sought in the objectives enshrined in the Preamble."[12]

In Kesavananda, a view has been expressed that the Preamble to the Constitution is of extreme importance and the Constitution should be read and interpreted in "the light of the grand and noble vision expressed in the Preamble."[13] The view expressed in Berubari[14] that the Preamble was not a part of the Constitution was disputed by some Judges in Kesavanda.[15]

Recently, the Supreme Court has used the word 'socialist' in the Preamble to expound such principles as: "equal pay for equal work".[16] The concept has also been used to gain a liberal pension scheme for old retirees from government service,[17] as well as to seek economic empowerment of the weaker sections of the society.[18]

(d) SPIRIT OF THE CONSTITUTION

The Supreme Court has emphasized that it will confine itself to the written text of the Constitution for the purpose of judicial review and not take recourse to any abstract concept like the "spirit of the constitution."

Chief Justice KANIA observed in Gopalan's case that the courts "are not at liberty to declare an Act void because in their opinion it is opposed to a spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution but not expressed in words. Where the Fundamental law has not limited, either in terms or by necessary implication, the general powers conferred on the Legislature, we cannot declare a limitation under the notion of having discovered something in the Constitution which is not even mentioned in the instrument. It is difficult upon any general principles to limit the omnipotence of the sovereign legislative power by judicial interposition, except so far as the express words of a written Constitution give that authority."[19]

---

11. Ref. on Berubari, AIR 1960 SC 845 : (1960) 3 SCR 250; supra, Ch. V, Sec. C.
12. Also, Golak Nath, AIR 1967 SC 1643, 1682 : (1967) 2 SCR 762; see next Chapter.
13. AIR 1973 SC 1506, 1579, 1680.
Also see, Behram Khurshid Pesikaka v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 123 : (1955) 1 SCR 613; In re Kerala Education Bill, AIR 1958 SC 956 : 1959 SCR 995.
14. Supra, footnote 11.
15. SIKRI, C.J., AIR 1973 SC 1503; Ray, J., Ibid., at 1680.
16. Randhir Singh v. Union of India, supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. C.
Also see, P. Savita v. Union of India, AIR 1985 SC 1124; supra, Chs. XXI, XXIII, Sec. C and XXXIV, Sec. D.
17. D.S. Nakara v. Union of India, supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. C(c).
18. See, supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D, under "Directive Principles of State Policy".
19. AIR 1950 SC 42, Sec. B(a).

This theme has been reiterated time and again by the Supreme Court. MAHAJAN, J., observed in State of Bihar v. Kameshwar:[20] "It is well settled that recourse cannot be had to the spirit of the Constitution when its provisions are explicit in respect of a certain right or matter. When the Fundamental law has not limited either in terms or by necessary implication the general power conferred on the Legislature, it is not possible to deduce a limitation from something supposed to be inherent in the spirit of the Constitution. This elusive spirit is no guide in this matter. The spirit of the Constitution cannot prevail as against its letter. The courts are not at liberty to declare an act void because in their opinion it is opposed to the spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution but not expressed in words."

These statements put emphasis basically on the statutory or literal interpretation of the Constitution.[21] But, then, in cases on the constitutional amendment, the Supreme Court did renounce this approach and adopted the doctrine of immutability of the "basic features" of the Constitution which is a judge-made concept.[22] Then, there are cases in which the Supreme Court has invoked the concepts of independence of the Judiciary and Rule of law to interpret constitutional provisions.

(e) POLITICAL QUESTIONS

A question is raised at times whether the courts should entertain a political question. Many constitutional law questions have political overtones. Should the courts refuse to take cognisance of such questions?

If the courts do so, then the scope of constitutional litigation will be very much reduced and no ready-made machinery may be available to solve such questions and this may raise tensions in the body politic.

The plea of non-justiciability of a political question was raised by the Central Government as early as 1971 in Madhav Rao Scindia v. Union of India.[23] In this case, the Supreme Court went into the question of the validity of a Presidential order derecognising the rulers of the erstwhile Princely States. The argument against judicial review of the order was that recognition of a ruler by the President was a political question and that the Court ought not to take cognisance of the matter raised in that case. But the Court rejected the argument saying that the power of the President to determine the status of the rulers by cancelling or withdrawing recognition to abolish the concept of rulership with a view to effectuate government policy was liable to be challenged.[24] The Court quashed the order.

HEDGE, J., said in the same case: "There is nothing like a political power under our Constitution in the matter of relationship between the executive and the citizens."[25]

---

20. AIR 1952 SC 252 at 309 : 1952 SCR 889.
Also see, Keshavan Madhava Menon v. State of Bombay, AIR 1951 SC 128 : 1951 SCR 228; supra, Ch. XX, Sec. F.
21. See supra, Sec. D(b).
22. See, next Chapter.
23. AIR 1971 SC 530 : (1971) 1 SCC 85; supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. E.
24. SHAH, J., ibid., 565.
25. Ibid. 619.

Next time, the same question cropped up in State of Rajasthan v. Union of India,[26] in relation to the power of the President to dissolve State Assemblies under Art. 356. The Supreme Court answered the question by saying that it would not entertain a purely political question which does not involve determination of any legal or constitutional right or obligation. The Court is concerned only with adjudication of legal rights and liabilities. But merely because a question has a political complexion, that by itself is no ground why the Court should shrink from performing its duty under the Constitution if it raises an issue of constitutional determination.

A constitution is a matter of purest politics, a structure of power. Merely because a question has a political colour, the Court cannot fold its hands. So long as a question arises whether an authority under the Constitution has acted within the limits of its power or exceeded it, it can certainly be decided by the Court. Indeed, it is its constitutional obligation to do so. The Constitution is the supreme lex, the paramount law of the land, and there is no department or branch of government above or beyond it.

In this connection, reference has been made to an American case, Baker v. Carr[27] where the U.S. Supreme Court held that it could entertain an action challenging a statute apportioning legislative districts as contrary to the equal protection clause. Justice BRENNAN expressed the view that "the mere fact that the suit seeks protection of a political right does not mean that it presents a political question". In this case, the U.S. Supreme Court decided that voting districts within a State should be of approximately equal proportion.[28]

The Court emphasized that the claim of the appellants that they were being denied equal protection was justiciable. If there is discrimination, the right to relief under the equal protection clause is not diminished by the fact that the discrimination relates to political rights. "The non-justiciability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers". "The courts cannot reject as 'no-law suit' a bona fide controversy as to whether some action denominated "political" exceeds constitutional authority". The Baker decision did reverse a uniform course of decisions established by a number of cases of judicial non-interference in demarcation of voting districts. An example of what the U.S. Supreme Court regards as a non-justiciable political question is furnished by Coleman v. Miller.[29]

In Rajasthan, the Supreme Court did however suggest that it may not entertain a matter in which it could not lay down 'judicially discoverable and manageable standards.'[30]

Reference was again made to the 'political question' doctrine in A.K. Roy v. India.[31] The question was whether the President's satisfaction to issue an ordinance was justiciable, or could it be characterised as a non-justiciable political

---

26. State of Rajasthan v. Union of India, AIR 1977 SC 1361, 1412 : (1977) 3 SCC 592; supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. D.
27. (1962) 369 US 186.
28. Other cases in this area are: White v. Register, 412 US 755 (1973); Hoff v. Buckley, 379 US 359 (1965).
29. (1939) 307 US 433.
30. State of Rajasthan v. Union of India, AIR 1977 SC 1361, at 1413 : (1977) 3 SCC 592.
31. AIR 1982 SC 710; supra, Chs. III, Sec. D(ii)(d) and VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).

question? The Court pointed out certain differences between the Indian and the American constitutional systems implying that the doctrine could not be adopted in India. The doctrine is based in the U.S.A. on the principle of 'Separation of Powers'; in the U.S.A., the President exercises power in his own right but, in India, he acts on the advice of the Council of Ministers. Thus, in India, "the President's 'satisfaction' is, therefore, nothing but the satisfaction of his Council of Ministers in whom the real executive power resides".

It was pointed out in Roy[32] that the doctrine of the political question has come under adverse criticism even in the USA so much so that the phrase "political question" has become "a little more than a play of words".

The question has been elaborately discussed by the Supreme Court in R.C. Poudyal v. Union of India[33]. The XXXVI Amendment[34] introduced Art. 371F in the Constitution granting statehood to Sikkim but at the same time making some special provisions for the State.[35] Art. 371F(f) provides for reservation of seats in the State Legislature based on ethnic group. It was argued that the Court should not consider the matter as it raised a political question. The Court rejected the contention and did consider the question whether Art. 371F(f) was constitutionally invalid as it destroyed a basic feature of the Constitution.

On the question of non-judiciability of a political question, the Court has maintained that "Our Court has received and viewed this doctrine with a cautious reservation."

The doctrine of 'political question' is invoked by the government whenever it seeks non-reviewability of certain actions or decisions taken by it. While the doctrine may not be invoked liberally so as to adversely affect judicial review, it need not be rejected completely also as there may be an occasion when a question may arise to which no legally ascertainable standard may be applicable and may be regarded as non-justiciable on that account.

One such occasion arose before the Delhi High Court sometime back.[36] There were riots in Delhi following the assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi in which a number of Sikhs were killed. The Government refused to appoint an inquiry commission to inquire into the riots. The Delhi High Court refused to intervene saying that the refusal by the Government to appoint a commission of inquiry was a "political decision".

(f) FOREIGN PRECEDENTS

While construing the provisions of the Indian Constitution, constitutional precedents from such countries as the U.S.A., Canada, Australia and Britain are often cited before the Indian courts. The Supreme Court has, however, warned from time to time that foreign precedents have persuasive value but they ought to be used with caution and not indiscriminately.[37]

---

32. Ibid.
33. AIR 1993 SC 1804, at 1844-45 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 324; supra, Chs. V, Sec. B and IX, Sec. D.
34. See, supra, Chs. V and IX; also infra, Chs. XLI and XLII.
35. Ibid.
36. Peoples Union for Democratic Rights v. Ministry of Home Affairs, AIR 1985 Del 268, 283.
37. MUKHERJEE, J., in the Delhi Laws Act case, supra, Ch. II.

Foreign precedents as such are not binding on the Indian courts and they are thus free to use or not to use them. The Supreme Court has ruled in Chaturbhuj v. Moreshwar,[38] that it is not bound by the dicta and authority of the English cases.

The matter has been put in the right perspective by the Supreme Court in Sundaramier v. Union of India,[39] where the Court observed: "The threads of our Constitution were no doubt taken from other Federal Constitutions but when they were woven into the fabric of our Constitution their reach and their complexion underwent changes. Therefore, valuable as the American decisions are as showing how the question is dealt with in a sister Federal Constitution, great care should be taken in applying them in the interpretation of our Constitution. We must not forget that it is our Constitution that we are to interpret, and that interpretation must depend on the context and setting of the particular provision which has to be interpreted."

The same words used in constitutional enactments of various nations may bear different connotations. The social conditions also differ from country to country.

This warning notwithstanding, cases from other constitutions are often cited and considered by the Indian judiciary. The reason for this approach was explained by the Supreme Court itself in the Atiabari case:[40] "When you are dealing with the problem of construing a constitutional provision which is none too clear or lucid you feel inclined to inquire how other judicial minds have responded to the challenge presented by similar provisions in other sister constitutions." The Indian Courts thus adopt a selective process in applying foreign precedents.

A large number of American cases were cited in the Express Newspaper case[41] on the freedom of speech and expression on the ground that the freedom as enshrined in Art. 19(1)(a) "is based on the provisions in Amendment I of the Constitution of the U.S.A., and it would be, therefore, legitimate and proper to refer to those decisions of the Supreme Court of the U.S.A. in order to appreciate the true nature, scope and extent of this right".

Again, in Indian Express Newspapers v. Union of India,[42] American cases on the I Amendment were cited. But the Supreme Court said that it could not "solely" be guided by the American decisions, for the pattern of Art. 19(1)(a) is different from the I Amendment "which is almost absolute in its terms." "But in order to understand the basic principles of freedom of speech and expression and the need for that freedom in a democratic country, we may take them into consideration."[43]

On a few points , foreign precedents have been helpful in giving guidance, while on many others, they have not been followed. On the whole, the value of foreign precedents in interpreting the provisions of the Indian Constitution has been only marginal. Thus, the American Constitutional precedents on the Com-

---

38. AIR 1954 SC 236 : 1954 SCR 817.
39. Supra, Ch. XI.
Also see, L. Jagannath v. Authorised Officer, Land Reforms, Madurai, AIR 1972 SC 425 : (1971) 2 SCC 893.
40. Supra, Ch. XV, Sec. D.
41. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C, under Art. 19(1)(a).
42. (1985) 1 SCC 641 : AIR 1986 SC 515.
43. Ibid.

merce Clause have not been followed as guiding factors to interpret Art. 301,[44] as the American Constitution does not contain provisions like Arts. 19(1)(g)[45] and 301.[46] In the U.S.A., the word 'commerce' has been interpreted broadly so as to include even gambling, the reason being that if 'commerce' were not so interpreted, gambling would fall outside the purview of the Commerce Clause and the Centre would then be unable to regulate it on an interstate basis. This approach obviously did not suit India where the purpose of suppressing gambling could be achieved only by denying that gambling is commerce and thus keep it out of the protection of Arts. 19(1)(g) and 301.[47]

The Supreme Court has expressed reservations in following American cases to interpret the term 'reasonable restrictions' in Art. 19(6) because of the difference in social conditions.[48] In Sundaramier's case, the Supreme Court again refused to follow the American position of denying to the importing States power to levy sales tax on interstate commerce. It was argued that interstate commerce being with the Centre in India, the States should be denied the power to levy a sales tax on interstate sales on the American analogy. The Supreme Court refused to accept the argument and decided the question on an interpretation of Art. 286.[49]

In Travancore-Cochin v. Bombay Co.[50] while interpreting Art. 286, the Supreme Court refused to follow the American cases on the Commerce Clause regarding the 'export stream' of goods and their immunity from taxation by the States on the ground that the U.S. Commerce Clause and Art. 286 "are widely different in language, scope and purpose, and a varying body of doctrines and tests have grown around their interpretations extending or restricting, from time to time, their operation and application in the context of the expanding American commerce and industry".

Similarly, the Supreme Court in India has refused to apply such American concepts as police power and original package. As regards police powers, FAZL ALI, J., said in the Chiranjit Lal case[51] that the principles underlying the concept were not peculiar to the U.S.A., but were recognised in every modern civilized country. But, in later cases, the doctrine has been completely refused recognition in India.[52] MUKHERJEA, J., in the very same case refused to import the doctrine in India stating: "In interpreting the provisions of our Constitution, we should go by the plain words used by the Constitution-makers and the importing of expressions like 'police power' which is a term of variable and indefinite connotation in American Law can only make the task of interpretation more difficult".[53] The Court characterised the expression "police power" as alien to the scheme of the Indian Constitution.

---

44. Supra, Ch. XV, Sec. D.
45. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Secs. I and J..
46. Supra, Ch. XV, Sec. D.
47. Supra, Chs. XV, Sec. D, and XXIV, Secs. I and J.
48. Pathumma v. State of Kerala, AIR 1971 SC 771 : (1978) 2 SCC 1.
49. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J.
50. Ibid.
51. AIR 1951 SC 41, Ch. XXXI, Sec. A.
52. Supra, Ch. XXXI under Art. 31. K.K. Kochuni v. State of Madras, AIR 1960 SC 1080 : (1960) 3 SCR 887.
53. Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109; supra, Ch. XI.

The doctrine of original package has been discussed by the Indian Supreme Court in the Balsara case.[54] The doctrine applies in the U.S.A. to commodities imported from foreign countries and envisages that importation is not over till goods remain in original package[55] and so the constituent States of the U.S.A. have no power to tax imports till the original package is broken or there is at least one sale if the goods remain in original package.

The doctrine was cited in the Balsara case to interpret the word 'import' in entry 41, List I,[56] broadly and so to curtail the State power correspondingly. The Supreme Court refused to accept the doctrine in view of the scheme of legislation outlined in the Constitution in which the various entries in the legislative lists have been expressed in clear terms and precise language. In the U.S.A., widest meaning could be given to the Commerce Clause as it was not to be reconciled with any State power. In India, entry 41 in List I has to be limited in view of entry 8, List II,[57] dealing with intoxicating drugs.

The doctrine of immunity of instrumentality evolved in the U.S.A. has also not found acceptance in India.[58]

The Supreme Court has refused to apply in India the American doctrine of preferred Fundamental Rights. The doctrine envisages that any law restricting freedoms of speech, press, religion or assembly must be taken on its face to be invalid till it is proved to be valid.[59] The result of this doctrine is to shift the burden of proof on the shoulders of those defending the law, without raising in their favour the presumption of the validity of the legislation. In India, this doctrine has not found a foot-hold. As the Supreme Court has stated, it is not possible to say that any one Fundamental Right is superior to the other or that Art. 19 contains a hierarchy.[60]

The Supreme Court has refused to apply the American doctrine of substantive due process on the ground that "it seeks to set up the courts as arbiters of the wisdom of the Legislature in enacting the particular piece of Legislation."[61] To some extent, however, the doctrine has been incorporated in Art. 14 under which a statute can be declared unconstitutional if it is "arbitrary or unreasonable;"[62] as well as in Art. 19 in the concept of "reasonable restrictions".[63]

The following principles, inter alia, of the American Constitution have found acceptance at the hands of the Indian Supreme Court:

(1) No one whose right is not directly affected can question the constitutionality of law. But this rule of standing has been liberalized and is now subject to public interest litigation.[64]

---

54. State of Bombay v. Balsara, AIR 1951 SC 318 : 1951 SCR 682.
55. Brown v. Maryland, 25 US 419; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 US 100.
56. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D.
57. Ibid.
58. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii).
59. Kovacs v. Cooper, 373 US 77 (1947).
60. Madhu Limaye v. S.D.M., Monghyr, AIR 1971 SC 2486 : (1970) 3 SCC 746; supra, Ch. XXIV.
61. State of Andhra Pradesh v. McDowell & Co., AIR 1996 SC 1628 at 1641 : (1996) 3 SCC 309.
62. State of Tamil Nadu v. Ananthi Ammal, (1995) 1 SCC 519; supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. C(q).
63. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. B.
64. Supra, Chs. VIII, Sec. D(j) and XXXIII, Sec. A(n).

(2) There is a presumption in favour of the constitutionality of a statute challenged under Art. 14.[65]

(3) The constitutionality of a statute is to be tested under Art. 14 by applying the principle of reasonable classification.[66]

Justifying the adoption of the American principle for interpreting Art. 14, the Supreme Court has observed as follows: Art. 14 is adopted from the last clause of S. 1 of the XIV Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. It may, therefore, be reasonably assumed that the Constitution-makers while enshrining the guarantee of equal protection of laws in the Constitution, were aware of its content as delimited by the judicial interpretation in the U.S.A. In adopting the views of the American courts, therefore, the courts in India would not "be incorporating principles foreign to our constitution, or be proceeding upon the slippery ground of apparent similarity of expressions or concepts in an alien jurisprudence developed by a society whose approach to similar problems on account of historical or other reasons differ from ours."[67]

But many a time, while interpreting Art. 14, the Supreme Court of India has refused to follow the American cases on the equality clause in the U.S. Constitution with the remark that while the American cases provide useful guidance, they cannot be followed as such.[68]

(4) The legislature should lay down the policy while delegating legislative power to the executive.[69]

(5) In the Express Newspaper case, the American principle that laws regulating payment of wages to the Press do not abridge freedom of speech and expression was made use of by the Supreme Court to hold that appointment of a wage board to fix minimum wages of the journalists does not infringe Art. 19(1)(a).[70]

(6) In the Golak Nath case, five Judges of the Supreme Court have adopted the doctrine of prospective overruling—a doctrine which has its origins in the U.S.A.[71]

(7) In Govind v. State of Madhya Pradesh, the Supreme Court referred to the concept of 'right to privacy' evolved in the U.S.A. and showed readiness to adopt the same in India to some extent while interpreting Arts. 19(1) and 21.[72]

(8) As regards the all important American doctrine of due process of law, the Supreme Court first refused to apply the same in India.

---

65. Supra, Ch. XXI.
Also see, infra, Sec. H.
The relevant American cases are: Middleton v. Texas Power and Light Co., 249 US 159; Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 US 61.
66. Supra, Ch. XXI.
67. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Deoman, AIR 1960 SC 1125 : (1961) 1 SCR 14; supra.
68. Air India v. Nergesh Meerza, AIR 1981 SC 1829, 1852 : (1981) 4 SCC 335.
69. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.
70. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. J(e).
71. Infra, next Chapter.
72. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J(m).

In Gopalan,[73] the Supreme Court refused to read the American concept of "due process" in the words "procedure established by law" found in Art. 21, on the ground that ".... when the same words are not used it will be against the ordinary canons of construction to interpret a provision in our constitution in accordance with the interpretation put on a somewhat analogous provision in the constitution of another country, where not only the language is different, but the entire political conditions and constitutional set up are dissimilar."

But in Maneka Gandhi, the Supreme Court reversed this position and integrated the concept of procedural due process with procedure established by law in Art. 21. This matter has already been discussed earlier.[74]

(9) Following the American cases holding that commercial speech is protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the Supreme Court has also ruled in Tata Press Ltd. v. Mahanagar Telephone Nigam Ltd.[75] that commercial speech is also protected in India under Art. 19(1)(a).[76]

Cases from Australia on S. 92 of the Australian Constitution have been freely cited in connection with the interpretation of Art. 301, but the impact of these cases has not been much as there is nothing in Australia like Arts. 19(6) and 302-304.[77] Still, the Australian view has been adopted in India in certain respects, e.g., gambling is not commerce;[78] Art. 301 outlaws only 'direct' restraints on trade, commerce and intercourse;[79] compensatory taxes were not hit by the concept of freedom of trade and commerce.[80]

The developments in the area of the doctrine of 'immunity of instrumentalities' in Australia have been noted by the Supreme Court in India while expounding the scope of Arts. 285 and 289.[81]

The major contribution of the Canadian Constitution to the interpretative process of the Indian Constitution has been the doctrine of 'pith and substance' which has been evolved in Canada to interpret the legislative lists contained in Ss. 91 and 92 of the British North America Act.[82] On the doctrine of 'immunity' also, the views of the Supreme Court in India have corresponded to those of the Canadian Courts.[83]

While interpreting the term 'excise' in the relevant legislative entries in India, the Supreme Court has not followed the judicial views expressed in any one of the other three Federal Constitutions. But the Supreme Court has taken its cue

---

73. Ibid, Sec. B(a).
74. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. C.
75. AIR 1995 SC 2438, 2442-2445 : (1995) 5 SCC 139.
76. See, supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C(k).
77. Supra, Ch. XV.
78. Supra, Chs. XV and XXIV. The relevant Australian case in Mansell v. Beck, 30 Aust. LJ 346.
79. Supra, Ch. XV.
80. Ibid.
81. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(iii).
82. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iv).
83. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii).

from these constitutions in holding that the Central Government in India can levy duties of excise and customs on goods manufactured or imported by a State.[84]

The Indian Constitution borrows from Britain the basic feature of parliamentary form of government.[85] India very closely follows Britain in the area of legislative privileges.[86] In several cases, the Supreme Court has surveyed the developments in the area in Britain over time and taken note of several cases from there to interpret Arts. 105 and 194.[87]

Widest possible use of English precedents has been made in India under Arts. 32 and 226.[88] The courts have power to issue writs under these provisions and the conditions and circumstances under which writs may be issued in India have been determined by and large on the basis of the principles evolved in Britain, though the Supreme Court has emphasized that the courts in India should only follow broad and Fundamental principles of these writs and not all the procedural technicalities and nuances thereof in the English law.[89] For Arts. 32, 226 and 136, at times, differentiation is made between administrative and quasi-judicial functions for which purpose again cases from Britain are freely cited.[90] Again, on the concept of natural justice, the cases from Britain are freely cited.[91]

It is also of interest to note that some of the principles of the English Common law which emanate form the existence of the monarchy in Britain have been found not applicable to the republican form of government in India and have thus been specifically departed from, e.g., the English Common law doctrine that the State is not bound by a statute unless specifically named therein is not followed in India.[92] Similarly, unlike Britain, a civil servant in India can sue for arrears of his salary.[93]

In U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi,[94] it was urged that the Supreme Court should interpret Art. 75(3) on its own terms regardless of the conventions that prevail in Britain. To this the Court's reply was that if the words of an article are clear, notwithstanding any relevant convention, effect will no doubt be given to the words. "But it must be remembered that we are interpreting a Constitution and not an Act of Parliament, a Constitution which establishes a Parliamentary system of Government with a Cabinet. In trying to understand one may well keep in mind the conventions prevalent at the time the Constitution was framed."[95]

F. PRINCIPLE OF HARMONIOUS INTERPRETATION

The Constitution should be so interpreted as to give effect to all its parts. The presumption is that no conflict or repugnancy was intended by the framers

---

84. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii).
85. Supra, Chs. I, II, III, VI and VII.
86. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L and VI, Sec. H.
87. Ibid.
88. Supra, Chs. IV, VIII, Sec. D and XXXIII, Sec. A.
89. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D.
90. Supra, Chs. IV, Sec. D, VIII, Sec. D and XXXIII, Sec. A.
91. See, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. E(iv)(d).
92. Supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. G.
93. Supra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. C(a).
94. AIR 1971 SC 1002, 1003 : (1971) 2 SCC 63.
95. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.

between the various provisions of the Constitution. Accordingly, it has been laid down that if certain provisions in the Constitution appear to be in conflict with each other, these provisions should be interpreted so as to effect a reconciliation between them so that, if possible, effect could be given to all.[1] This is, what is known as, the rule of harmonious interpretation.

The principle has been applied to resolve conflict between Arts. 25(2)(b) and 26(b),[2] and to delimit the mutual relationship between the Directive Principles and Fundamental Rights.[3] Art. 14 has been held to control Art. 310.[4]

The principle of harmonious construction has been applied to interpret the entries in the various legislative lists.[5] The Fundamental Rights and the legislative privileges have also been reconciled so as to give effect to both as far as possible.[6] Reconciliation has also been effected between Arts. 13 and 359.[7] The principle of harmonious interpretation has been applied to Fundamental Rights and Directive Principles so as to give effect to both as far as possible.[8]

In Shankari Prasad,[9] the Court reconciled the conflict between Art. 13 and Art. 368 by applying the principle of harmonious interpretation. According to Art. 13, no 'law' can abridge any Fundamental Right. According to Art. 368, on the other hand, Parliament can amend any constitutional provision by passing a law according to the procedure laid down in Art. 368. If both these Articles are given a broad interpretation, a conflict, arises between them. It can be argued that a 'law' passed under Art. 368 abrogating or restricting a Fundamental Right would fall foul of Art. 13. A Constitution Amendment Act is a 'law' and if it is abrogative of a Fundamental Right, it would be void under Art. 13. In Shankari Prasad, PATANJALI SASTRY, J., rejected this contention and sought to interpret both Articles harmoniously by ruling that Art. 13 would exclude a Constitution Amendment Act from its purview. He observed :

> "In short, we have two Articles (Arts. 13 and 368) each of which is widely phrased, but conflicts in its operation with the other. Harmonious construction requires that one should be read as controlled and qualified by the other. We are of the opinion that in the context of Article 13 'law' must be taken to mean rules or regulations made in exercise of ordinary legislative power and not amendments to the Constitution made in exercise of constituent powers, with the result that Article 13(2) does not affect amendments made under Article 368."

Later, in Golak Nath,[10] the Supreme Court disagreeing with the approach in Shankari Prasad held that Art. 13 controlled Art. 368. But, then, in Kesavananda[11] the Court again reverted to the Shankari Prasad view as regards the inter-relation of Arts. 13 and 368 and, thus, differed with the Golak Nath ruling.

---

1. MUKHERJEA, J., in Gopalan's case, AIR 1950 SC 27, 93 : 1950 SCR 27.
2. Moinuddin v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1960 All 484; Supra, Ch XXIX.
3. Venkataramana v. State of Mysore, AIR 1958 SC 255 : 1958 SCR 895; supra, Ch XXXIV.
4. Supra, Chs. XXI and XXXVI, Sec. C.
5. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(ii).
6. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L(iii) and VI, Sec. H.
7. Supra, Chs. XX, Sec. C and XXXIII, Sec. F. Mohd. Yaqub v. State of Jammu and Kashmir, AIR 1968 SC 765 : (1968) 2 SCR 227.
8. In re Kerala Education Bill, AIR 1958 SC 956 : 1959 SCR 995; supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. C.
9. See, next Chapter.
10. Ibid.
11. Ibid.

G. PROSPECTIVE OVERRULING

A proposition of some significance was enunciated by five Judges of the Supreme Court in Galak Nath in an attempt to soften somewhat the impact of declaring a law unconstitutional after it has remained on the statute book for sometime.[12]

Traditionally, a judicial declaration that a law is unconstitutional is deemed effective prospectively as well as retrospectively. An unconstitutional law is regarded to have been void from its very inception.[13] The theory is that the judge "does not make law but discovers or finds true law". Therefore, when a Court decision changes the earlier law, then this law should be regarded not as 'new', but as having been there all the time which the Court has now discovered. Accordingly, the law as now found by the Court must apply to the past as well as future transactions.

As against this view, the U.S. Supreme Court has developed the doctrine of 'prospective overruling'. The Court has in some cases taken the position that rather than disturb the past transactions, the new view of the law adopted by the Court might be made effective as regards future transactions only. The doctrine of 'prospective overruling' envisages that a well-established precedent may be overruled from a future date and not retrospectively. The U.S. Supreme Court asserts that it has power to decide on a balance of all relevant considerations whether a decision overruling a previous principle should be applied retroactively or not.[14] Thus, declaring a law invalid may not necessarily affect transactions and vested rights prior to, but may operate only with respect to transactions and rights arising after, the judicial invalidation of the law. The Court thus consciously modifies a rule and also makes it operative only as to the future transactions.

This doctrine overtly testifies to the law-making function of the judiciary. This doctrine implies a clear admission by the courts that they do make new law, and the posing of the question whether the new rule should be applied retrospectively or only prospectively indicates awareness of its law-making aspects. As Sawer points out, this view rests to some extent on acceptance of the modern view that law in general is not a fixed and durable set of rules, but something whose meaning and application varies from time to time and is actually established only in the act of judicial decision.[15]

Retrospective overruling may cause administrative inconvenience in some situations and, by disturbing vested rights, may cause hardship to those who may have acted on the basis of the old rule. The doctrine of prospective overruling seeks to avoid such harsh results.[16]

The application of the doctrine remains uncertain. In the words of the U.S. Supreme Court itself: ".... there is no inflexible rule requiring in all circumstances

---

12. Infra, Ch. XLI, for discussion on Golak Nath.
13. See, infra, Sec. I.
14. Linkletter v. Walker, 381 US 618, 629 (1965).
15. MODERN FEDERALISM, 71.
16. Great Northern Rly. v. Sunburst Oil & Ref. Co., 287 US 358 (1932); Chicot County Drainage District v. Baxter State Bank, 308 US 371 (1940); Griffin v. Illinois, 351 US 12 (1956); Wolf v. Colorado, 338 US 25; Jenkins v. Delaware, 395 US 213 (1969); Williams v. U.S., 401 US 646 (1971); Hill v. California, 401 US 797.

either absolute retroactivity or complete prospectivity for decisions construing the broad language of the Bill of Rights ..... Rather we have proceeded to weigh the merits and demerits in each case by looking to the prior history of the rule in question, its purpose and effect, and whether retrospective operation will further or retard its operation."[17]

A scholar has thus explained the circumstances when the Court would resort to 'prospective' rather than 'retrospective' overruling:

> "In general, it may be said that to warrant prospectivity, there must be an awareness that the results of 'normal' retrospectivity would be, not merely inconvenient, but gravely unjust or would involve an extremely burdensome sorting out process for courts or administrators. Injustice to a single litigant will normally not suffice. What is required is that retrospectivity would disrupt the private lives of many citizens or would throw a substantial network of business arrangements or property transactions into doubt or confusion; or would destroy the validity of elaborate administrative arrangements or property transactions into doubt or confusion; or would destroy the validity of elaborate administrative arrangements which had already been worked out, and which as a practical matter could not possibly be reopened or, as in the recent American cases, the matter may need to be decided by reference to the particular social policy which the "new" rule is designed to implement. Given that this social policy is in any event being implemented for the future by the 'new' decision, will its implementation really be much enhanced by making it retrospective? And, whatever degree of enhancement such retrospectivity would bring, is it sufficient to outweigh the frustration which "normal" retrospection might bring to other social policies?"[18]

There have been dissentient voices from the bench against the doctrine. It has been asserted that the Court should faithfully enforce the safeguards guaranteed by the Bill of Rights.[19]

In Golak Nath, five out of 11 Judges took recourse to the doctrine of prospective overruling. While holding that Parliament could not amend Fundamental Rights, they declared that this norm would operate only in the future and not retrospectively. This meant that none of the amendments made to the Fundamental Rights up to the date of the Golak Nath decision would be invalidated. Thus, while all amendments made to the Fundamental Rights till Golak Nath were to remain effective, thereafter Parliament was not to be competent to modify Fundamental Rights.[20]

The Supreme Court took recourse to the doctrine of prospective overruling because of the fact that between the coming into force of the Constitution on January 26, 1950, and the date of the judgment in Golaknath, a number of constitution amendments amending the Fundamental Rights had been enacted and all these amendments were treated as valid by the Supreme Court in Shankari Prasad and Sajjan Singh. Based on these Amendments the State legislatures had en-

---

17. Williams v. U.S., ibid.

18. A.R. Blackshield, Fundamental Rights and the Economic Viability of the Indian Nation, 10 JILI 183, 227 (1968). Also see, W.S. Hooker Jr., Prospective Overruling in India: Golak Nath and After, 9 JILI 596 (1967).
Andrew G.L. Nicol, Prospective Overruling: A New Device for English Courts, 39 Mod. LR 542 (1976).

19. Justice Black in De Backer v. Brainard, 396 US 28, 34.
Also, Justice Harlan in Mackey v. US., 401 US 667, 676.

20. See, infra, next Chapter, on Constitutional Amendment.

acted agrarian legislation revolutionizing the agrarian social structure. If Golak Nath ruling were now given a retrospective ruling, all this wholesome legislation would fall to the ground. This would have resulted in a chaotic situation in the country, as a large number of laws enacted in pursuance of the pre-Golak Nath Amendments would have become void. To avoid such a situation, the Court ruled that the Golak Nath ruling would have only a prospective effect.

Justifying the application of the doctrine of prospective overruling the Court observed:

> "Should we now give retrospectivity to our decision, it would introduce chaos and unsettle the conditions in our country. Should we hold that because of the said consequence Parliament had power to take away Fundamental rights, a time might come when we would gradually and imperceptibly pass under a totalitarian rule… As the highest Court in the land we must evolve some reasonable principle to meet the extraordinary situation… To meet the present extraordinary situation that may be caused by our decision, we must evolve some doctrine which has roots in reason and precedents so that the past may be preserved and the future protected.[21]

It needs to be noted that the Judges put certain restrictions on the applicability of the doctrine of prospective overruling, namely:

(i) The doctrine of prospective overruling would for the time being be used only in constitutional matters;

(ii) this doctrine would be applied only by the Supreme Court itself and by no other Court as it has the constitutional jurisdiction to declare law binding on all courts in India.

(iii) the precise version of prospectivity to be imposed is to be a matter for the Court's discretion, "to be moulded in accordance with the justice of the cause or matter before it".

There is no gainsaying the fact that 'prospective overruling' doctrine avowedly recognises the law and policy-making role of the Supreme Court.[22]

It may also be pointed out here that in Golak Nath, 'prospective overruling' has been applied in an extremely narrow area, viz., in the case of invalidity of constitutional amendments which had been in force for a long time and which had become the basis of a mass of legislation affecting agrarian economy. On the other hand, in the U.S.A., the rule of 'prospective overruling' has been applied in case of changes in judicial views as regards the scope and interpretation of constitutional provisions generally.

There is, however, one point to note in this connection. The Supreme Court Judges used the doctrine of prospective overruling in Golak Nath very differently from the way the doctrine has been made use of in the U.S.A. In the U.S.A., the theory of prospective overruling has been applied to hold the impugned law invalid from the date of the decision and not earlier. But in Golak Nath, all the constitution amendments were to remain valid for ever, even after the Supreme Court decision in Golak Nath, only the principle of non-amendability of the Fundamental Rights was to apply in future. If the American doctrine had been

---

21. Emphasis added.
22. DOWLING, CASES AND MATERIALS ON CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 892-7 (1970).

applied, the amendments ought to have been held invalid from the date of the Golak Nath decision if not earlier. Therefore, the Supreme Court diluted the doctrine of prospective overruling still further in its application in India.

A very significant use of the doctrine of prospective overruling is to be found in the Mandal case.[23] In Mandal decided in the year 1992, the ratio of Rangachari,[24] decided in 1962, was overturned. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court ruled that the Mandal ruling would come into effect after 5 years. The Court thus postponed giving effect to the Mandal ruling for five years from the date of the judgment. This was not only extending the principle of prospective overruling but even further elongating the same for 5 more years by postponing the operation of the Mandal ruling.

The Supreme Court upheld the constitutional validity of the Court ruling in Mandal vis-à-vis Art. 13(2) of the Constitution[25] in Ashok Kumar Gupta v. State of Uttar Pradesh.[26] Under the Rangachari ruling, which had been in operation for three decades, a number of persons of the Scheduled Castes and Schedule Tribes had got promotion. The Supreme Court showed judicial creativity in Ashok so as to avoid any hiatus in the operation of the Rangachari ruling, and to bring about smooth transition of the operation of the law of promotions for S/Cs and S/Ts. It was necessary to do so to adjust the competing claims of both the disadvantaged and the advantaged sections of the society. The Court observed in Ashok: "The prospective overruling of Rangachari ratio in Mandal case is constitutional and fulfils the competing equality between sections of the society."[27]

There are examples of the Supreme Court applying the doctrine of prospective overruling in another area, viz., when the Court declares a statute unconstitutional, it may make the ruling operational in future from the date of the decision without affecting the validity of the past transactions. In Githa Hariharan,[28] the Supreme Court gave a new interpretation to s. 6(a) of the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act so as to protect it from being declared unconstitutional under Arts. 14 and 15, on the ground of gender discrimination. But the Court gave a prospective effect to the new interpretation. No past transaction was to be reopened or questioned on the basis of this judgment.

The High Court of Rajasthan declared a circular, giving preference on the basis of 'residence' in a district in the matter of Government appointments as unconstitutional vis-à-vis Arts. 16(2) and 16(3). On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the High Court ruling but held that the ruling would be effective from the date of the High Court judgment and that appointments made prior to that judgment would not be disturbed.[29]

---

23. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217; Indra Sawhey v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 498 : (2000) 1 SCC 168; supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. G.
24. AIR 1962 SC 36 : (1962) 2 SCR 586; supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. D(c) and G.
25. For Art. 13(2), see, supra, Ch. XX, Sec. C.
26. (1997) 5 SCC 201.
27. Ibid, at 222.
28. Githa Hariharan v. Reserve Bank of India, AIR 1999 SC 1149, at 1155 : (1999) 2 SCC 228.
29. Kailash Chand Sharma v. State of Rajasthan, (2002) 6 SCC 562.
Also see, supra, Ch. XXIII.

In India Cement,[30] while declaring the cess as unconstitutional, the Court ruled that the State would not be liable to refund the cess already collected by it.[31]

The Court applied the doctrine of prospective overruling in Raymond,[32] but this case did not raise a constitutional question. The Court gave a new interpretation to a statutory provision. Had this view been applied retrospectively, the Electricity Board would have been placed under a huge financial liability. To avoid such a contingency, the Court ruled that the new view of the law would be applied prospectively and not retrospectively.

The Court adopted a similar approach in Union of India v. Mohd. Ramzan Khan.[33]

In a way, the Supreme Court has applied the doctrine of prospective overruling in a different context in Suman Gupta v. State of Jammu and Kashmir.[34] The Court ruled that vesting of absolute power in the State Government to nominate candidates for admission to medical colleges outside the State infringed Art. 14 but refused to disturb the nominations already made as these candidates had already covered a substantial part of their course of studies. The Court suggested that a proper procedure for the purpose must be designed for the future by theMedical Council of India. In this way, the principle laid down by the Court was to be operative in future.[35]

H. CONSTITUTIONALITY OF A STATUTE

The doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty as it obtains in England does not prevail here except to the extent and in the fields provided by the Constitution. The entire scheme of the Constitution is such that it ensures the sovereignty and integrity of the country as a republic and the democratic way of life by parliamentary institutions based on free and fair elections.[36]

A law to be valid must conform with the constitutional norms. The unconstitutionality of a statute arises from various constitutional violations, e.g.

(1) violation of the scheme of distribution of powers between the Centre and the States;

(2) infringement of a Fundamental Right;

(3) violation of other constitutional restrictions/limitations.

The power to legislate is a plenary power vested in the legislature and unless those who challenge the legislation clearly establish that their Fundamental

---

30. Orissa Cement Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1991 SC 1676, at 1717.

31. Also see, Orissa Cement Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1991 SC 1676 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 430; Somaiya Organics (India) Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 2001 SC 1723 : (2001) 5 SCC 519, supra, Ch. XI.

32. Raymond Ltd. v. State of Madhya Pradesh Electricity Board, AIR 2001 SC 238 : (2001) 1 SCC 534.

33. AIR 1991 SC 474, supra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. G(a).
Also see, Managing Director, ECIL, Hyderabad v. B. Karunakar, AIR 1994 SC 1074 : (1993) 4 SCC 727, supra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. G(a).

34. AIR 1983 SC 1235 : (1983) 4 SCC 339; supra, Ch XXI.

35. The Supreme Court has adopted a similar attitude in several other cases, e.g., Janki Prasad v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1973 SC 930 : (1973) 1 SCC 420; P. Rajendran v. State of Madras, AIR 1968 SC 1012 : (1968) 2 SCR 786.

36. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 399 : AIR 2003 SC 2363.

Rights under the Constitution are affected or that the legislature lacked legislative competence, they would not succeed in their challenge to the enactment bought forward in the wisdom of the legislature. Conferment of a right to claim the benefit of a statute, being not a vested right, the same could be withdrawn by the legislature which made the enactment. It is open to the legislature to bring in a law that has retrospective operation. When it affects vested rights or accrued rights, that question will have to be considered in that context. But the right to take advantage of a statute has been held to be not an accrued right.[37]

A statute which is not within the scope of legislative authority, or which offends some constitutional restriction or prohibition is unconstitutional and hence invalid. A statute to be valid ought to be with respect to a matter assigned to the particular legislature which has enacted it. This essentially refers to the question of distribution of powers between the Centre and the States.[38] Parliament has exclusive power to legislate with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List I, notwithstanding anything contained in clauses (2) and (3) of Article 246. The non obstante clause under Article 246(1) indicates the predominance or supremacy of the law made by the Union Legislature in the event of an overlap of the law made by Parliament with respect to a matter enumerated in List I and a law made by the state legislature with respect to a matter enumerated in List II of the Seventh Schedule. However both Parliament and the State Legislatures are supreme in their respective assigned fields. It is the duty of the Court to interpret the legislations made by Parliament and the state legislature in such a manner as to avoid any conflict. But if the conflict is unavoidable, and the two enactments are irreconcilable then by the force of the non obstante clause in clause (1) of Article 246, the parliamentary legislation would prevail notwithstanding the exclusive power of the state legislature to make a law with respect to a matter enumerated in the State List. Repugnancy between the parliamentary legislation and the state legislation can arise in two ways. First, where the legislations, though enacted with respect to matters in their allotted sphere overlap and conflict. Second, where the two legislations are with respect to matters in the Concurrent List and there is a conflict. In both the situations, parliamentary legislation will predominate, in the first, by virtue of the non obstante clause in Article 246(1), in the second, by reason of Article 254(1).[39]

The norms to interpret the entries, and to assess whether a statute falls within an entry, have already been considered.[40] Any way, it may be mentioned here that these entries are to be interpreted broadly as these are not powers but fields of legislation. It is the judicial policy to give the widest amplitude to the language of these entries.[41]

A special mention may be made here of the rule of 'pith and substance' which means that to determine whether a statute is ultra vires the enacting legislature, its pith and substance, its true character, is to be ascertained. The advantage of

---

37. Mylapore Club v. State of T.N., (2005) 12 SCC 752 : AIR 2006 SC 523.
38. Supra, Ch. X.
39. Govt. of A.P. v. J. B. Educational Society, (2005) 3 SCC 212 : AIR 2005 SC 2014; For detailed discussion see Chapter X on "Legislature Relations"
40. Ibid, Sec. G.
41. Ibid, Sec. G(i).
Also see, Jilubhai Nanbhai Khachar v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1995 SC 142, 148 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 596.

the rule is that it avoids a law being declared unconstitutional merely because it incidentally trenches into the prohibited legislative area. The rule thus adds a further dimension to the legislative power of a legislature.[42]

When a statute has been enacted by a State Legislature, its operation ought not to extend beyond the concerned State boundaries. For this purpose, the principle of territorial nexus is applied.[43]

In addition, the impugned statute should not infringe any other fetter, restriction or prohibition which may be imposed by the Constitution, e.g., Fundamental Rights. Art. 13(2) specifically declares that a law taking away or abridging a Fundamental Right "shall, to the extent of contravention, be void."[44]

As stated earlier,[45] a statute cannot be struck down merely because the Court thinks it to be arbitrary or unreasonable. Any such ground of invalidity must be related to a constitutional provision, such as, Arts. 14, 19 or 21.[46] Challenge on ground of wisdom of legislation is not permissible as it is for the legislature to balance various interests.[47]

However, the Court has also pointed out that the principles on which constitutionality of a statute is judged is its reasonableness and that is to be judged having regard to the various factors including the effect thereof on the persons to whom it is applicable carrying on a business. If the state in exercise of its delegated power imposes condition the same has to be a reasonable condition. It had to be definite and not vague. When a statute provides for a condition which is impossible to be performed its unreasonableness shall be presumed and it would be for the State in such a situation to justify the reasonableness of such conditions.[48]

Although carrying on trade of liquor may not be a Fundamental right, but the contractual rights given to a licensee in terms of the provision of a statute are enforceable. The terms of the licence are governed by the statute and since the violation thereof could lead to penal consequences, interpretation principles requires the application of reasonableness, equity as well as good conscience.[49] Hence where a person may be held guilty even if the contents of ethyl alcohol exceeds 8.1% marginally in the liquor on which a person is trading in alcohol, the statute or the statutory conditions must show as to what extent he can go and to what

---

42. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iv); see also State of Gujarat v. Akhil Gujarat Pravasi V.S. Mahamandal, (2004) 5 SCC 155 : AIR 2004 SC 3894.

43. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. A.

44. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. C.

Whether arbitrariness and unreasonableness or manifest arbitrariness and unreasonableness, being facets of Art. 14 are available or not as grounds to invalidate legislation (both primary and subordinate has been referred to a larger Bench in view of the decision in Mardia Chemicals, (2004) 4 SCC 311; Malpe Vishwanath Acharya, (1998) 2 SCC 1 (both cases striking down primary legislation on ground of arbitrariness and unreasonableness and being decisions of three Judge Benches) and S. G. Jaisinghani, AIR 1967 SC 1427 and Shrilekha Vidyarthi, (1991) 1 SCC 212 (two Judge Bench)(both cases striking down subordinate legislation on ground of arbitrariness and unreasonableness), on the one hand, and McDowell & Co., (1996) 3 SCC 709, and Khoday Distilleries, (1996) 10 SCC 304 (both being decisions by three Judge Benches), on the other hand Subramaniam Swamy v. Director, CBI, (2005) 2 SCC 317 : (2005) 2 JT 382.

45. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. M.

46. Supra, Chs. XXI, XXIV and XXVI.

47. Mylapore Club v. State of T.N., (2005) 12 SCC 752 : AIR 2006 SC 523.

48. Hasham Abbas Sayyad v. Usman Abbas Sayyad (2007) 2 SCC 355 : AIR 2007 SC 1077.

49. Hasham Abbas Sayyad v. Usman Abbas Sayyad, (2007) 2 SCC 355 : AIR 2007 SC 1077.

extent he cannot. The matter cannot, thus, be left to an act of nature. In the absence of such mode or machinery it will suffer from the vice of vagueness or unreasonableness.[50]

The judicial function of assessing the constitutional legitimacy of legislation is both delicate and responsible. To declare a statute unconstitutional places an onerous burden on the courts, for a statute is enacted by an elected legislature which is conversant with the needs and aspirations of the people. The courts, therefore, do not hold legislation unconstitutional in a light vein. They have to draw a fine balance between the 'felt necessities of the time' and 'constitutional fundamentals'.

India being a signatory to the Declaration on the Right to Development adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights and Article 18 of the United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966, the impugned provision of a statute must, therefore, also be judged having regard to the aforementioned treaties and covenants.[51]

As has already been stated, the courts impose on themselves a good deal of self restraint in performing their task of judicial review of legislation. The courts will hold a statute unconstitutional only as a last resort. The courts do not cavel at legislation but go to great lengths to uphold legislation impugned before them. The truth is that the courts in India (like the courts elsewhere) have evolved certain canons, strategies, maxims and norms by which opportunities to assess the constitutionality of statutes and holding them invalid are minimised. The courts usually resort to these strategies either to make challenges to legislation difficult or to by-pass such challenges.

The first important principle is that only a person whose right is directly affected by a law can challenge its constitutionality. A person cannot impeach a law because someone else is hurt. It is the fact of injury to the complainant himself, and not to others, which justifies judicial interference. But this rule of locus standi is now subject to the growth of the concept of public interest litigation.[52]

In dealing with a constitutional controversy, a Court is slow to embark upon an unnecessarily wide or general inquiry. The courts adjudge only concrete cases and do not indulge in pronouncing abstract, theoretical principles. This is called the process of "empiric adjudication".[53] The Court seeks to confine its decision, as far as may be reasonably practicable, within the narrow limits of the controversy between the concerned parties in a particular case.[54] A Court does not embark upon larger or academic questions but confines itself to those questions which arise from the provisions of the impugned statute.

The judicial attempt is to narrow, not to broaden, the area of conflict and express its opinions only on specific issues in controversy. The courts have often emphasized that in constitutional matters, it is advisable to decide only those points which necessarily arise for determination on the facts of the case before the Court.[55] The Supreme Court has said in A.K. Roy : "The position is now

---

50. State of Kerala v. Unni, (2007) 2 SCC 365 : (2006) 13 SCALE 208.
51. John Vallamattom v. Union of India (2003) 6 SCC 611 : AIR 2003 SC 2902.
52. Supra, Chs. IV, VIII and XXXIII.
53. Sukhdev v. Bhagatram, AIR 1975 SC 1331, 1349 : (1975) 1 SCC 421.
54. Atiabari, AIR 1961 SC 232, 251 : (1961) 1 SCR 809; supra, Ch. XV, Sec. D.
55. U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi, AIR 1971 SC 1002 : (1971) 2 SCC 63; supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.

firmly established that the Court will decide no more than needs to be decided in a particular case. Abstract questions present interesting challenges, but it is for scholars and text-book writers to unravel their mystique. It is not for the courts to decide questions which are but of academic importance."[56] Earlier the Court had observed in Basheshar Nath:[57] "This case should not make any pronouncement on any question which is not strictly necessary for the disposal of the particular case". Constitutional issues not directly arising for decision are not decided by the Court.[58]

The Courts do not adjudicate upon a constitutional question unless it is absolutely necessary to do so for disposal of the case in hand.[59] If a statute is challenged under several constitutional provisions, but if the question of its validity can be disposed of with reference to one constitutional provision only, the Court would not then usually go into the question of its unconstitutionality under the other constitutional provisions. For example, in Saghir Ahmad,[60] the Court found an impugned law bad under Arts. 19(1)(g) and 31(2) and so it refrained from going into the question whether or not the impugned law was bad under Art. 301 as well because it was no longer necessary to decide that question.

A Court would not cover the ground which is strictly not relevant for the purpose of deciding the matter before it. Obiter observations and discussion of problems not directly involved in a proceeding before them are generally avoided by the courts in constitutional matters.[61] Accordingly, a Court would go into the question of vires of a statute only when it is attracted by the facts of the case. If the issue is not so attracted, then the courts would not go into its constitutionality, because in that case, the decision would be purely academic and courts do not decide constitutional issues merely as an academic exercise.[62]

A statute cannot be declared invalid on the ground that it contains vague or uncertain or ambiguous or mutually inconsistent provisions.[63]

A legislation may not be amenable to challenge on ground of violation of Art. 14 when it is intended to give effect to principles specified under Art. 15 or 16 or when the differentiation is not unreasonable or arbitrary but when a classification is made which is per se violative of constitutional provisions, the same cannot be upheld.[64]

If there is a challenge to the legislative competence the courts will try to ascertain the pith and substance of such enactment on a scrutiny of the Act in question. In this process, it is necessary for the courts to go into and examine the true character of the enactment, its object, its scope and effect to find out whether the

---

56. A.K. Roy v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC at 724; D.C. Wadhwa v. State of Bihar, AIR 1987 SC 579; Gurudevdatta VKSSS Maryadit v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 2001 SC at 1985 : (2001) 4 SCC 534.
57. Basheshar Nath v. Commr., Income Tax, AIR 1959 SC 149, 157 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 578.
58. See, Ashok K. Gupta v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1997) 5 SCC 201.
59. H.M. Trivedi v. V.B. Raju, AIR 1973 SC 2602 : (1974) 3 SCC 415.
60. Supra, Chs. XXIV, Secs. I and J and XXXI, Sec. C(ii).
61. Naresh v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1967 SC 1 : (1966) 3 SCR 744; supra, Ch. XXIV, Secs. C and D.
62. State of Bihar v. Hurdut R.M. Jute Mills, AIR 1960 SC 378 : (1960) 2 SCR 331.
63. Nand Lal v. State of Haryana, AIR 1980 SC 2097, 2100 : 1980 Supp SCC 574, A.K. Roy v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 711, 737 : (1982) 1 SCC 271.
64. E. V. Chinnaiah v. State of AP, (2005) 1 SCC 394 : AIR 2005 SC 162.

enactment in question is genuinely referable to the field of legislation allotted to the State under the constitutional scheme.[65]

But in construing a statute, where a right is not explicitly taken away, a presumption must be raised that the legal right existing in favour of a person has not been taken away.[66]

While considering the constitutionality of a statute, the courts usually do not use such materials as the legislative debates, statements of objects and reasons annexed to the relevant bill in the legislature, except for the limited purpose of ascertaining the conditions prevailing at the time of its enactment and the extent and urgency of the evil sought to be remedied by it.[67]

In the U.S.A., it is an established practice to directly incorporate social and economic facts into the briefs presented to the Supreme Court by the parties. This kind of brief is known as the Brandies brief. It is generally recognised in the U.S.A. that underlying questions of fact—political, social and economic—do condition the constitutionality of legislation and constitute a social element in decision-making by the Court.[68]

In India, by and large, the courts still seek to ignore extra-legal materials pertaining to measures impugned before them and seek to derive their ratio of decisions largely from the language of the statute and the decided cases. The courts tend to ignore the fact that often problems presented in constitutional cases are not purely legal but have political, social and economic connotations as well. The courts go too much by the words of the statute maintaining a divorce between law and politics, economics or sociology. The courts do not recognise the fact that if materials from other social sciences are also taken into consideration, the dry statutory provisions may have an ampler meaning especially when their constitutional validity is being considered.

The Courts generally lean towards the constitutionality of a statute upon the premise that a legislature appreciates and understands the needs of the people, that it knows what is good or bad for them, that the laws it enacts are directed to problems which are made manifest by experience, that the elected representatives in a legislature enact laws which they consider to be reasonable for the purposes for which these laws are enacted and that a legislature would not deliberately flout a constitutional safeguard or right.[69] The legislature composed as it is of the elected representatives of the people is supposed to know and be aware of the needs of the people and what is good or bad for them and that a Court cannot sit in judgment over the wisdom of the Legislature.[70] Therefore, usually, the pre-

---

65. E. V. Chinnaiah v. State of A.P. (2005) 1 SCC 394 : AIR 2005 SC 162.
66. ICICI Bank Ltd. v. SIDCO Leathers Ltd., (2006) 10 SCC 452 : AIR 2006 SC 2088.
67. J.R.G. Mfg. Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1589; B. Banerjee v. Anita Pan, AIR 1975 SC 1146 : (1975) 1 SCC 166, supra, Sec. D.
68. MCWHINNEY, JUDICIAL REVIEW, 17, 22, 175-89.
69. Ram Krishna Dalmia v. S.R. Tendolkar, AIR 1958 SC 538 : 1959 SCR 279; Vrajlal Manilal and Co. v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 129; B. Banerjee v. Anita Pan, supra, note, 54; Bachan Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 SC 1325 : (1982) 3 SCC 24.
70. State of Andhra Pradesh v. McDowell & Co., AIR 1996 SC 1628, 1641.

sumption is in favour of the constitutionality of the statute, and the onus to prove that it is unconstitutional lies upon the person who challenges it.[71]

The Supreme Court has stated the principle as follows:[72]

> "A statute is construed so as to make it effective and operative. There is always a presumption that the legislature does not exceed its jurisdiction and the burden of establishing that the legislature has transgressed constitutional mandates, such as, that relating to Fundamental Rights is always on the person who challenges its vires."

This rule of presumption has been borrowed from the U.S.A.[73] Thus, the law in question is treated as valid unless the parties to litigation challenge it on constitutional grounds. FAZAL ALI, J., stated in Charanjit Lal[74] :

> "……..it is the accepted doctrine of the American Courts, which I consider it to be well-founded on principle, that the presumption is always in favour of the constitutionality of an enactment, and the burden is upon him who attacks it to show that there has been a clear transgression of the constitutional principles."

Recourse may not always be taken to the principles of presumption in favour of constitutionality of statute or reading down of statute to uphold validity of a statute.[75]

Since no particulars or material was placed on record to substantiate the contention that the Notification dated 20th August, 1991 bringing into force Maharashtra Act 15 of 1987 was issued due to pressure brought about by a section of lawyers and for extraneous consideration, the contention was rejected.[76]

To sustain the presumption of constitutionality, the Court may take into consideration matters of common knowledge and may assume every state of facts which can reasonably be conceived as existing at the time of the enactment of the legislation in question.[77]

The Supreme Court has stated in Commr. of Sales Tax, Madhya Pradesh, Indore v. Radhakrishan,[78] that for sustaining the presumption of constitutionality, the Court may take into consideration matters of common knowledge, matters of common report, the history of the times and may assume every state of facts which can be conceived and an even read down this section.

---

71. Charanjit Lal Chowdhuri v. Union of India, AIR 1951 SC 41; Bombay v. F.N. Balsara, AIR 1951 SC 318 : 1951 SCR 682; Ram Krishna Dalmia v. S.R. Tendolkar, AIR 1958 SC 538 : 1959 SCR 279; Mahant Moti Das v. S.P. Sahi, AIR 1959 SC 942 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 563; Delhi Transport Corporation v. D.T.C. Mazdoor Congress, AIR 1991 SC 101 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 600.

72. Union of India v. Elphinstone Spinning and Weaving Co. Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 724, at 733 : (2001) 4 SCC 139.

73. Middleton v. Texas Power and Light Co., 249 US 152, 157; supra, Sec.

74. AIR 1951 SC 41 : 1950 SCR 869.

75. State of W. B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.

76. Jamshed N. Guzdar v. State of Maharashtra, (2005) 2 SCC 591 : AIR 2005 SC 862.

77. Ramkrishna Dalmia v. Tendolkar, AIR 1958 SC 538 : 1959 SCR 279; Hamdard Dawakhana v. Union of India, AIR 1960 SC 554, 560 : (1960) 2 SCR 671; R.K. Garg v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 2138, 2146; Bank of Baroda v. Rednam, AIR 1989 SC 2105 : (1989) 4 SCC 470; Gauri Sahankar v. Union of India, (1994) 6 SCC 349; Amrit Banaspati Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1340 : (1995) 3 SCC 335; New Delhi Municipal Committee v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 2847. For presumption of constitutionality see also Karnataka Bank Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, (2008) 2 SCC 254 : (2008) 1 SCALE 660.

78. AIR 1979 SC 1588 : (1979) 2 SCC 249.

Affidavits may be filed to show reasons for the enactment of the law in question, the circumstances in which it was conceived and the evils it was to cure.[79] For example, in Pannalal Binjraj v. Union of India,[80] a challenge to the validity of classification was repelled by placing reliance on an affidavit filed on behalf of the Central Board of Revenue disclosing the true object of enacting the impugned provisions in the Income-tax Act.

In Musaliar,[81] the Court relied on an affidavit filed by the State to ascertain the circumstances which prevailed at the time when the law under consideration had been passed and which necessitated the passing of that law.

A statute cannot be challenged on the ground of mala fides.[82]

At times, the Supreme Court has used the Statement of Objects and Reasons accompanying the Bill, which later became the Act impugned, to ascertain the circumstances which prevailed at the time of the passage of the Act impugned to determine its purposes and object. "For the limited purpose of appreciating the background and the antecedent factual matrix leading to the legislation, it is permissible to look into the Statement of Objects and Reasons of the Bill which actuated the step to provide a remedy for the then existing malady."[83] For example in Musaliar,[84] the Statement of Objects and Reasons was used for judging the reasonableness of a classification made in an enactment to see if it infringed, or was contrary to, the Constitution. The Supreme Court reiterated in State of West Bengal v. Union of India,[85] that the Statement of Objects and Reasons accompanying a Bill when introduced in Parliament, can be used for the limited purpose of understanding the background and the antecedent state of affairs leading up to the legislation."[86]

On behalf of the Constitution Bench, MUDHOLKAR, J., observed in Burrakur Coal Co. v. Union of India,[87]:

> "Where the validity of a law made by a competent legislature is challenged in a Court of law, that Court is bound to presume in favour of its validity. Further, while considering the validity of the law the Court will not consider itself restricted to the pleadings of the state and would be free to satisfy itself whether under any provision of the Constitution the law can be sustained."

To the same effect is the observation of the Constitution Bench in Sanjeev Coke Manufacturing Co. v. Bharat Coking Ltd.,[88]:

---

79. Cases cited in Ch. XXXIII Also, K.K. Kochunni v. State of Madras, AIR 1959 SC 725 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 316.
80. AIR 1957 SC 397 : 1957 SCR 397.
81. Thangal Kunju Musaiar v. M. Venkitachalam Potti, AIR 1956 SC 246 : (1955) 2 SCR 1196.
82. General Manager, North West Railway v. Chanda Devi, (2008) 2 SCC 108 : (2007) 14 SCALE 296, meaning obviously notice in fact.
83. Gurudevdatta VKSSS Maryadit v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 2001 SC 1980, at 1989 : (2001) 4 SCC 534.
84. Supra, footnote 81.
85. AIR 1963 SC 1241 : (1964) 1 SCR 371.
86. But see an earlier case, Aswini Kumar Ghose v. Arabinda Bose, AIR 1952 SC 369 : 1953 SCR 1, where the Supreme Court had ruled out the Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the Bill "as an aid to the construction of a statute".
87. AIR 1961 SC 953 at 963 : (1962) 1 SCR 44.
88. AIR 1983 SC 239 : (1983) 1 SCC 147.
Also see, New Delhi Municipality Committee v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC at 2903 : 91997) 7 SCC 339.

> "Validity of the legislation is not to be judged merely by affidavits filed on behalf of the state, but by all the relevant circumstances which the Court may ultimately find and more especially by what may be gathered from what the legislature has itself said."

In Gauri Shankar,[89] the Supreme Court has observed that "in order to sustain the presumption of constitutionality the Court may take into consideration matters of common knowledge, matters of common report, the history of the times and may assume every state of facts which can be conceived existing at the time of legislation."

The burden is upon the person who attacks the constitutional validity of a law to show that there has been a transgression of the constitutional principles. The allegations regarding the violation of a constitutional provision should be specific, clear and unambiguous and it is for the person who impeaches the law as violative of a constitutional guarantee to show that the particular provision is infirm for the reasons stated by him.[90]

At times, the onus placed on the petitioner to establish the unconstitutionality of a statute may be very onerous. This happened in Chiranjit Lal[91] where the majority in the Supreme Court dismissed the petition as the petitioners could not discharge the onus satisfactorily. The minority, however, protested against casting such a burden on the petitioner.

At times, the judges have departed from the normal rule of presumption of constitutionality. When on the face of the impugned statute, there is no classification at all, and no attempt made to select any individual with reference to any differentiating attribute peculiar to it and not possessed by others, the courts may not let the state depend on the presumption in favour of the validity of the statute under Art. 14.[92]

If, however, the petitioner is able to establish that the legislation has invaded his Fundamental Rights then the Court may shift the onus on the state to justify the law. In some cases, under Art. 19, when a law has been found prima facie to violate a Fundamental Right, the Supreme Court has shifted the onus on the state to place materials before the Court to show that the impugned law comes within the permissible limits.[93] For example, the Court has argued that when an invasion of a right under Art. 19(1)(g) has been established, the state should then satisfy the Court that the legislation falls within the purview of Art. 19(6) which is in the nature of an exception to Art. 19(1)(g).[94]

A similar rule of onus has been applied in regard to Art. 304. When a law has been shown to invade the right to freedom of trade, the state ought to prove that the restrictions imposed are reasonable and in public interest within the meaning of Art. 304(b).[95] But this again is not a universal rule and in Anita Pan, while

---

89. Gauri Shankar v. Union of India, (1994) 6 SCC 349.
90. Amrit Banaspati Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1340, at 1343 : (1995) 3 SCC 335.
91. Supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. C(r).
92. Supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. B.
93. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Secs. B and J(a).
94. Vrajlal Manilal and Co., supra; Saghir Ahmad, supra; Khyerbari Tea Co. v. Assam, supra. Also, supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. B and Sec. I.
95. Khyerbari Tea Co., supra, Ch. XV, Sec. E.

considering the validity of a law under Art. 19(1)(f), the Court presumed the validity of the law.[1]

In regard to constitutional validity of the pre-constitution laws, the Supreme Court has taken the position that all such laws remain operative till the Court declares any of them void. Therefore, it is not for the state to establish the validity of any such law as no such law is regarded as unconstitutional to start with. The burden is on him who contends that a particular law has become void after the commencement of the Constitution.[2] Pre-constitutional laws must also conform to provisions of Part III. Even the unamended Section 73 of the Stamp Act, 1899 must conform to the provisions of Part III of the Constitution.[3]

Under Art. 21, it is the state which has to establish the constitutional validity of a law depriving a person of his life or personal liberty.[4]

While assessing the validity of a law, the Court does not consider itself restricted to the pleadings of the state and is free to satisfy itself whether the law in question can be sustained under any constitutional provision which might not have been specifically pleaded in its support. When the government sought to sustain a law under Art. 31A(1)(e), but the Supreme Court found it sustainable under Art. 31(2) and not under Art. 31A(1)(e), the Court held it valid even though the government had not invoked Art. 31(2).[5]

The courts are very reluctant to declare a law to be unconstitutional and they do so only as a last resort. This can be shown by one or two examples.

The Punjab Cycle Rickshaw (Regulation of Licence) Act, 1976, was challenged under Art. 19(1)(g). The object of the Act was to provide that only the rickshaw-pullers who were owners of the rickshaws could get licence to pull the rickshaw. The Act was challenged on the ground that it contained no provisions to enable the rickshaw-pullers to become the rickshaw owners. The Supreme Court held that the purpose of the Act was to ameliorate the economic conditions of the rickshaw-pullers and to protect them from exploitation. The Court took into account an administrative scheme introduced by nationalised banks to enable the rickshaw-pullers to become the owners thereof. The Court referred to the principle that the validity of one statute should not be made to depend on another unconnected statute, but if two or more statutes form parts of one and the same legislative scheme, then both may be considered together.[6] In the instant case, the Court considered the Act and the scheme together on the ground that the scheme supplied the mechanics for the operation of the Act, and that the Act and the scheme were closely connected and constituted an integrated plan. Over and above this, the Court also formulated a set of guidelines of its own to make the Act and the scheme of the banks work more effectively.[7]

---

1. B. Banerjee v. Anita Pan, AIR 1975 SC 1146 : (1975) 1 SCC 166.
2. Madhu Limaye v. S.D.M., Monghyr, AIR 1971 SC 2486 : (1970) 3 SCC 746.
3. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (2004) 2 SCC 476 : AIR 2004 SC 1442.
4. Supra, Ch. XXVI.
5. Burrakur Coal Co. v. Union of India, supra; also supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C(iii).
6. Lord Krishna Sugar Mills v. Union of India, supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. I.
7. Azad Rickshaw-Pullers' Union v. State of Punjab, AIR 1981 SC 14 : 1980 Supp SCC 601; Man Singh v. State of Punjab, (1985) 4 SCC 146 : AIR 1985 SC 1737.

In A.K. Roy v. Union of India,[8] the National Security Act conferred power to detain a person if he was acting in any manner "prejudicial to the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community". The Court found this phrase to be vague and imprecise as it was not made clear as to which 'supplies' or 'services' were regarded essential to the community. In the absence of any definition of 'supplies and services essential to the community', the detaining authority could extend the application of this clause to any commodities or services which it regarded essential to the community. The clause was, therefore, capable of wanton abuse as it enabled the authorities to detain a person in respect of any commodity or service. The clause violated Art. 21 as it was violative of "fairness and justness of procedure". Nevertheless, the Court did not strike down the clause but merely directed that no person was to be detained under the clause unless, "by a law, order or notification made or published fairly in advance, the supplies and services the maintenance of which is regarded as essential to the community and in respect of which the order of detention is proposed to be passed, are made known appropriately, to the public." Moreover, "people should be forewarned if new categories are to be added to the list".

The courts usually adopt a liberal attitude towards socio-economic legislation.

For example, in B. Banerjee v. Anita Pan,[9] a drastic law controlling accommodation and rents in urban areas, and imposing drastic restrictions on the right of the landlords to evict their tenants, was challenged under Art. 19(1)(f). The High Court declared the law to be invalid. But, on appeal, the Supreme Court held it valid by majority. The Court took the position that it was bascially a social legislation, a piece of social justice, and was designed to reduce the hardships of tenants in big towns where there was scarcity of accommodation. Therefore, it should not be invalidated if a reasonable interpretation can save it unless the violation of landlords' Fundamental right was manifest. Referring to the statement of Justice STONE, mentioned above, the Court stated that it "hesitates to strike a socially beneficial statute dead, leading to escalation of the mischief to suppress which the High House legislated—unless, of course a plain breach of Fundamental right of the citizen is manifest".

The Supreme Court has stated several times that in case of economic legislation, the Court feels more inclined to judicial deference to legislative judgment.[10]

In this connection, the Supreme Court has observed[11] :

> "Another rule of equal importance is that laws relating to economic activities should be viewed with greater latitude than laws touching civil rights such as freedom of speech, religion etc. It has been said by no less a person than HOLMES, J., that the legislature should be allowed some play in the joints, because it has to deal with complex problems which do not admit of solution through any doctrinaire or straight jacket formula and this is particularly true in case of legislation dealing with economic matters, where, having regard to the nature of the problems required to be dealt with, greater play in the joints has to be allowed to the legislature. The Court should feel more inclined to give judi-

---

8. AIR 1982 SC 710 : (1982) 1 SCC 271; supra, Ch. XXVII, Sec. C(i)(a).
9. Chs. XXXI, Sec. B and XXXIV.
10. Delhi Cloth & Gen. Mills Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 937; R.K. Garg v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 2138, 2147 : 91981) 4 SCC 675; Union of India v. Elphinstone Spn. & Wvg. Co. Ltd., AIR 2001 SC at 735 : (2001) 4 SCC 139; Morey v. Doud, (1957) 354 US 457.
11. Amrit Banaspati Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1340, at 1343 : (1995) 3 SCC 335.

> cial deference to legislative judgement in the field of economic regulation than in other areas where Fundamental human rights are involved….."

Similarly, the courts adopt a liberal attitude towards tax legislation. Explaining its attitude towards such legislation, the Supreme Court said in Hoechst Pharmaceuticals Ltd. v. State of Bihar:[12]

> "On questions of economic regulations and related matters, the Court must defer to the legislative judgment. When the power to tax exists, the extent of the burden is a matter for the discretion of the law-makers. It is not the function of the Court to consider the propriety or justness of the tax, or enter upon the realm of legislative policy....".

But, in Indian Express Newspapers v. Union of India,[13] the Supreme Court expressed a different view. The Court was assessing the vires of the levy of customs duty on newsprint vis-a-vis the freedom of the press under Art. 19(1)(a). The Court was thus seeking to reconcile the levy of the customs duty on the newsprint with the freedom of the press. The Court expressed its approach in the matter in these words:

> "It is true that this Court has adopted a liberal approach while dealing with fiscal measures and has upheld different kinds of levies.... But in the cases before us the Court is called upon to reconcile the social interest involved in the freedom of speech and expression with the public interest involved in the fiscal levies imposed by the Government specially because newsprint constitutes the body, if expression happens to be the soul. In view of the intimate connection of newsprint with the freedom of the press, the tests for determining the vires of a statute taxing newsprint have, therefore, to be different from the tests usually adopted for testing vires of the taxing statutes. In the case of ordinary taxing statutes, the laws may be questioned only if they are either openly confiscatory or a colourable device to confiscate. On the other hand, in the case of a tax on newsprint, it may be sufficient to show a distinct and noticeable burdensomeness, clearly and directly attributable to the law."[14]

In assessing the constitutionality of a statute, the Court is not concerned with the motives, bona fides or mala fides of the legislature. No mala fides or motives are attributed to the legislature.[15] The Legislature, as a body, cannot be accused of having passed a law for an extraneous purpose. "Even assuming that the executive, in a given case, has an ulterior motive in moving a legislation, that motive cannot render the passing of the law mala fide. This kind of transferred malice is unknown in the field of legislation."[16]

If the legislature is competent to pass a particular law, the motives which impelled it to act are really irrelevant.[17] Similarly, the Court is not concerned with the wisdom of the legislature in enacting a particular law.[18] The 'constitutional-

---

12. AIR 1983 SC 1019 : (1983) 4 SCC 45.
13. (1985) 1 SCC 641 : AIR 1986 SC 515.
14. Ibid., at 686.
Also, supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C(h).
15. G.C. Kanungo v. State of Orissa, AIR 1995 SC 1655, at 1660-61 : (1995) 5 SCC 96.
16. K. Nagaraj v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 551 at 556 : (1985) 1 SCC 523.
17. K.C. Gajapati Narayan Deo v. State of Orissa, AIR 1953 SC 375 : 1954 SCR 1; Gullapalli N. Rao v. State of Andhra P.S.R.T. Corp., AIR 1959 SC 308 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 319; supra, Ch. II, Sec. M.
18. Y.V. Srinivasamurthy v. State of Mysore, AIR 1959 SC 894.

ity' and not 'unwisdom' of a legislation is the narrow area of judicial review.[19] The Court cannot sit in judgment over the wisdom of the legislature. A law cannot be struck down merely because the Court thinks it to be unjustified or unwise. As the Supreme Court has stated:[20] "What form a regulatory measure must take is for the legislature to decide and the Court would not examine its wisdom or efficacy except to the extent that Article 13 of the Constitution is attracted." On this point, the Supreme Court has observed in State of Andhra Pradesh v. McDowell & Co. :[21]

> "No enactment can be struck down by just saying that it is arbitrary or unreasonable. Some or other constitutional infirmity has to be found before invalidating an Act. An enactment cannot be struck down on the ground that Court thinks it unjustified. The Parliament and the legislatures, composed as they are of the representatives of the people, and are supposed to know the needs of the people and what is good and bad for them. The Court cannot sit in judgment over their wisdom."

It is only a law which has to be tested with reference to Art. 13.[22] Flag Code containing the executive instructions of the Central Government is not "law" within the meaning of Art. 13 and for the purposes of Arts. 19(2) to (6) and therefore cannot impose restrictions on the rights enumerated under Arts. 19(1) (a) to (e) and (g). But the guidelines as laid down under the Flag Code deserve to be followed to the extent it provides for preservation of dignity and respect for the National Flag. The right to fly the National Flag is not an absolute right. The freedom of expression for the purpose of giving a feeling of nationalism is met by showing respect to the flag. The State may not tolerate even the slightest disrespect.[23]

The Courts also are not concerned with the need or propriety of laws. The judicial function is not to canvass the legislative judgment, or to hold the impugned statute to be ill-advised or unjustified or not justified by the facts on which it is based. The function of the courts is to see whether the law in question transgresses any constitutional restriction imposed on the legislature.[24]

The constitutionality of a statute passed by a competent legislature cannot also be challenged on the ground that it is not reasonable or just unless the Constitution expressly imposes such a stipulation as in Art. 19.[25] Mr. Justice Douglas has very forcefully reiterated this point thus: "Congress acting within its constitutional powers, has the final say on policy issues. If it acts unwisely the electorate can make a change."[26]

---

19. Mr. Justice STONE in U.S. v. Butler, 297 US 1; Murthy Match Works v. Asst. Collector of Central Excise, AIR 1974 SC 497, 503 : (1974) 4 SCC 428; B. Banerjee v. Anita Pan, AIR 1975 SC 1146, 1153 : (1975) 1 SCC 166.

20. Delhi Cloth & Gen. Mills Co. Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 937, 947, 950.

21. AIR 1996 SC 1628 at 1641 : (1996) 3 SCC 709.
See also Legal Remembrancer's Manual not covered. State of U.P. v. Johri Mal, (2004) 4 SCC 714 : AIR 2004 SC 3800.

22. State of Kerala v. Chandramohanan ,(2004) 3 SCC 429 : AIR 2004 SC 1155, Government circulars—Not law within the meaning of Art 13.

23. Union of India v. Naveen Jindal, (2004) 2 SCC 510 : AIR 2004 SC 1559.

24. Chiranjit Lal v. Union of India, supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. C.

25. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. B.

26. Railway Employees' Department v. Hansen, 351 US 225 (1956).

The possibility of abuse of a statute otherwise valid does not impart to it any invalidity.[27] Conversely a statute which is invalid as being unreasonable cannot be saved because it is being administered in a reasonable manner.[28]

Reference may also be made in this connection to the doctrine of colourable legislation discussed earlier.[29]

For the purpose of determining whether a particular enactment curtails a Fundamental Right or not, the Supreme Court has expounded not one but several formulae and, speaking generally, the particular formula which happens to be favourable to the validity of the legislation impugned, is usually adopted by the Court.

One such formula is that a law is not questionable under a Fundamental Right unless the legislation is directly in respect of it. Thus, a law can be attacked under Art. 19(1)(a), if it is directly in respect of the subject covered by Art. 19(1)(a), but not if it touches that Article only incidentally or indirectly. If the law in question directly abridges the freedom of speech, it may be repugnant to Art. 19(1)(a), but it may not be invalid if it relates to some other right and affects the freedom of speech only incidentally or indirectly.[30]

This was the test applied in Gopalan to repudiate the argument that the validity of the Preventive Detention Act be judged under Art. 19(1)(a) as well. KANIA, C.J. held that such a question could arise only when the legislation directly attempted to control a citizen's freedom of speech and expression, but it was not directly in respect of Art. 19(1)(a), and the right guaranteed in that Article was abridged as a result of operation of other legislation, then the question of application of Art. 19(1)(a) would not arise. "The true approach", observed the Judge,"is only to consider the directness of the legislation and not what will be the result of the detention otherwise valid, on the mode of detenu's life".[31]

The same test was applied again in Ram Singh v. Delhi.[32] Had the Court taken into consideration the effect of detention on the freedom of speech, and, thus, applied Art. 19(1)(a), the detention in Ram Singh's case might have been invalid. But, instead, the Court took the view that the order of preventive detention did not fall within the purview of Art. 19(1)(a) as its direct object was preventive detention and not the infringement of the freedom of speech and expression which was merely consequential to detention.

Another test applied in some cases, very much like the above test, is that of 'pith and substance', or true nature or character, or the subject-matter of the impugned statute. In State of Bombay v. R.M.D.C.,[33] while considering the validity

---

27. R.K. Garg v. Union of India, supra, footnote 10; Union of India v. Elphinstone Spn. & Wvg. Co. Ltd., AIR 2001, at 735 : (2001) 4 SCC 139.

28. Collector of Customs, Madras v. Nathella Sampathu Chetty, AIR 1962 SC 316, at 332 : (1962) 3 SCR 786.

29. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(v).

30. Naresh v. State of Maharashtra, supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.
The Supreme Court held that the High Court's order in the instant case was directly concerned with giving protection to the witness with a view to obtain true evidence from him in order to do justice between the parties. If incidentally it affected the right of the petitioner under Art. 19(1)(a), that would not affect the validity of the order.

31. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. B(a).

32. AIR 1951 SC 270; supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. C.

33. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. I(c).
Also see, Cooverji v. Excise Commr., Ch. XI, Sec. H.

of the Bombay Lotteries and Prize Competitions Control and Tax (Amendment) Act, 1952, vis-a-vis Arts. 19(1)(g) and 301, the Supreme Court pointed out that in pith and substance the impugned Act was in respect of betting and gambling and since betting and gambling did not constitute trade, commerce or business, the validity of the Act need not be decided upon by the yardstick of reasonableness and public interest laid down in Arts. 19(6) and 304.[34]

In the Atiabari case,[35] however, the Supreme Court doubted whether the doctrine of pith and substance could be applied to an area other than the legislative lists.[36]

In Hamdard Dawakhana v. Union of India,[37] the Court again expressed a doubt whether the doctrine was relevant to determining the constitutional validity of a statute with reference to a Fundamental Right. There the law was challenged as being unconstitutional under Art. 19(1)(a). Instead of the pith and substance doctrine, the Court preferred the doctrine of 'true character and nature' which meant that the subject-matter of the impugned legislation, the area in which it is intended to operate, its purport and intent should be determined to adjudicate upon its constitutionality.

To do so, it is legitimate to take into consideration all factors, such as, the history of the legislation, the purpose thereof, the surrounding circumstances and conditions, the mischief which is intended to be suppressed, the remedy for the disease which the legislature resolved to cure and the reason for the remedy. The justification for the approach is that the Court should look to the substance, rather than the form, of the legislation impugned.

It is not, however, very clear as to what precisely is the difference between 'pith and substance' and 'true character and nature'. The two doctrines appear to be convergent except for verbal differentiation.[38]

The test of "true nature and character" was first proposed by MAHAJAN, J., in Dwarkadas v. Sholapur Mills.[39] In Sundaramier's case,[40] the test of true nature and scope was applied to adjudge the constitutionality of a statute with reference to Art. 286.

In some cases, the test of real effect and impact of the impugned legislation on the Fundamental Right has been applied. In the Kerala case, the Supreme Court took recourse to the test of 'effect and impact'.[41] This test was narrowed down to some extent in Express Newspaper where the Supreme Court considered the 'direct and inevitable consequences'[42] of the impugned Act as distinguished from its 'remote consequences'.

---

34. Supra, Chs. XV, Sec. D(a) and XXIV, Secs. B and J(a).
35. Supra, Ch. XV, Secs. C and E.
36. Ch. X, Sec. G(iv)
37. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Secs. C (k).
38. Also see, Mahant Moti Das v. S.P. Sahi, AIR 1959 SC 942 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 563.
39. AIR 1954 SC 119 : 1954 SCR 674; supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. I; Ch. XXXI, Sec. C(ii).
40. AIR 1958 SC 468; supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(i).
41. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. B.
Also see, State of Bombay v. Bombay Education Society, supra, Ch. XXX, Sec. A; M.H. Quareshi v. State of Bihar, supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. J(g).
42. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C.

In the Bank Nationalisation case,[43] the Court advocated the test of the 'effect of the law' or its 'direct operation' upon the individual's right to assess the validity of a law with reference to a Fundamental Right. The Court emphasized that it was the substance of the legislation and its practical result which should be considered rather than the pure legal form. A similar test was applied in Sakal Papers where the validity of the order was adjudged under Art. 19(1)(a) and not under Art. 19(1)(g).[44]

The Supreme Court has stated in Man Singh v. State of Punjab[45] "that the true test of the validity of a statute must be the 'effect and consequence' of its operation on the citizen's Fundamental Right. The object underlying the legislation embodies the intent of the Legislature in enacting it, but the Court has to consider the question whether its impact on the Fundamental Right can be regarded as a reasonable restriction on the exercise of the right. "The focal point during such examination is the Fundamental right, and the duty of the Court must be to consider the quality and degree of the encroachment made by the operation of the statute on the citizen's exercise of that right."

A good deal of discussion on the applicability of these various tests is to be found in Express Newspapers. There the Working Journalists Act, 1955, was challenged on the ground that, in substance, in its 'true nature and character' and in 'effect and operation', it regulated employment in the newspaper industry and thus fell within the prohibition of Art. 19(1)(a) as affecting the freedom of the press. The Court, however, thought that the true nature of the Act was to regulate the service conditions of working journalists. It might result in certain disadvantages to the newspaper industry but these were only 'incidental' and 'extraneous' to the Act.

The Court formulated the proposition thus: unless the disadvantages accruing to the newspaper industry under the Act were the 'direct and inevitable' consequences of the Act, it could not be struck down. There was an interesting argument in the case on whether Art. 19(1)(a) would operate only when legislation "directly" dealt with the "freedom of speech and expression", or also when the statute in 'effect' affects that right. The Court did not give a definitive ruling on the 'subject-matter' v. 'effect' controversy.

The 'subject-matter' test is narrower in the sense that it would permit indirect encroachments on a Fundamental Right. It appears that the Court did not favour any of these tests but favoured instead an intermediate position, viz., the test of 'true nature' of the legislation in question. This test is narrower than the 'effect' test for it permits incidental encroachments on the Fundamental Right in question but it is broader than the 'subject-matter' test because, even though a legislation does not deal with a Fundamental Right, yet it may become bad if it imposes restrictions on the right which are not inconsequential or incidental.[46]

In Bennett Coleman,[47] the Supreme Court applied the 'effect' test. There the constitutional validity of a legislation not directly in respect of Art. 19(1)(a), nevertheless, affecting freedom of speech was assessed with reference to Art.

---

43. AIR 1970 SC 564, 597; supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C(iii).
44. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C(f).
45. (1985) 4 SCC 146 : AIR 1985 SC 1737.
46. M.P. JAIN, Justice Bhagwati and Indian Constitutional Law, 2 JILI 31, 37.
47. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C(g).

19(1)(a). It had been argued in Bennett Coleman that the subject-matter of the newsprint policy (the validity of which was challenged in the case) was not freedom of speech but rationing of imported commodity. The government also invoked the rule of pith the substance for the purpose. The Court ruled that the tests of "pith and substance" or the "subject-matter", and of "direct and incidental effect" of legislation were relevant to the question of legislative competence but were irrelevant to the question of Fundamental Rights. The test to be applied in such a case was whether the "effect" of the impugned action was to take away or abridge Fundamental Rights. A legislation may have a 'direct' effect on a Fundamental Right although its direct subject-matter might be different. The object of the law was irrelevant when it infringed a Fundamental Right. A difficulty in this test is to assess whether the 'consequence' of a provision on a Fundamental Right is 'direct' or 'indirect'. This may give rise to a difference of opinion. But this test helps better in preservation of the Fundamental Rights than the 'subject-matter' test.[48]

In Maneka Gandhi, BHAGWATI, J., used the test of "direct and inevitable effect" as "in the absence of operational criteria for judging 'directness' it would give the Court an unquantifiable discretion to decide whether in a given case a consequence or effect is direct or not". According to him, the test of 'direct and inevitable effect' would quantify the extent of directness necessary to constitute infringement of a Fundamental Right. He applied the test to see whether the impugned section violated freedom of speech and/or freedom of occupation.[49]

The above discussion shows that the judiciary keeps a number of options open to itself. This gives to the judicial review some flexibility and elasticity, and to the courts a good deal of maneuverability in discharging their function of adjudicating upon the constitutionality of legislation. This also creates uncertainty as to the judicial response to a particular problem because what test will the Court apply in a particular situation cannot be predicated with definiteness or with certainty.

A reference has already been made to the technique of indirect judicial review.[50] Here the Court so interprets the law as to sustain its validity. If a statutory provision is capable of two possible interpretations, so that by one it is rendered unconstitutional, and by the other it becomes constitutional, the Court will prefer the interpretation which saves and preserves the provision in preference to the one which destroys it. The principle is that if certain provisions of law construed in one way will be consistent with the Constitution, and if another interpretation would render them unconstitutional, the Court would bear in favour of the former construction.[51] This strategy is adopted because of the concern of the Court to salvage a legislation to achieve its objective and not to let it fall merely because of a possible ingenious interpretation. Words are not static but dynamic. As the Supreme Court has observed:[52]

---

48. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. B.
Also, supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. C.

49. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. D.

50. Supra.

51. The Mysore State Electricity Board v. Bangalore Woollen, Cotton and Silk Mills Ltd., AIR 1963 SC 1128 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 127; Delhi Transport Corpon. v. D.T.C. Mazdoor Congress, AIR 1991 SC 101, 167-170, 175-180, 201-205 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 600.

52. B.R. Enterprises v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1867, at 1906 : (1999) 9 SCC 700.

> "It is also well settled, first attempt should be made by the Courts to uphold the charged provision and not to invalidate it merely because one of the possible interpretations leads to such a result, howsoever attractive it may be. Thus, when there are two possible interpretations, one invalidating the law and the another upholding, the latter should be adopted. For this, the courts have been endeavoring, sometimes to give restrictive or expansive meaning keeping in view the nature of legislation, may be beneficial, penal or fiscal etc….. Yet in spite of this, if the impugned legislation cannot be saved, the courts shall not hesitate to strike it down."

In another case,[53] the Supreme Court has observed: "Words are not static but dynamic and courts must adopt that dynamic meaning which upholds the validity of any provision."

In Githa Hariharan v. Reserve Bank of India,[54] the Supreme Court reinterpreted s. 6(a) of the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act, 1956, so as to "retain it within constitutional limits."

The courts have evolved the technique known as 'reading down' a statute and the courts often resort to this strategy to ensure constitutionality of the statute in question.[55] This technique involves interpreting general words in a statute narrowly. As the Supreme Court has observed : "… for upholding any provision, if it could be saved by reading it down, it should be done, unless plain words are so clear to be in defiance of the Constitution."[56]

A few examples of the application of the technique of 'reading down' may be cited here. The Central Legislature enacted the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act conferring certain rights on Hindu women in 'property'. The Central Legislature had jurisdiction only on 'non-agricultural property, and not 'agricultural' property. Accordingly, to save the Act from unconstitutionality, the Federal Court interpreted the word 'property' used in the Act as referring to "property other than agricultural land". The Court observed :[57]

> "When a Legislature with limited and restricted powers makes use in an Act of a word of such wide and general import as "property", the presumption must be that it is using it with reference to that kind of property with respect to which it is competent to legislate and to no other."

Parliament enacted the Prize Competitions Act to provide for the control and regulation of prize competitions. The expression "prize competitions" was defined very broadly. To save the Act from unconstitutionality, the Supreme Court in RMDC[58] restricted its meaning to such competitions as are of a gambling nature.

In Kedar Nath v. State of Bihar, s. 124A I.P.C., was interpreted in the narrower sense and was thus sustained against a challenge under Art. 19(2). Sedition

---

53. Quarry Owners Association v. State of Bihar, AIR 2000 SC 2870, 2886 : (2000) 8 SCC 655.
54. AIR 1999 SC 1149, 1153.
Also see, Union of India v. Elphinstone Spinning and Weaving Co. Ltd., AIR 2001 SC at 733 : (2001) 4 SCC 139.
55. DTC v. DTC Mazdoor Congress, supra; B.R. Enterprises v. State of Uttar Pradesh, supra.
56. B.R. Enterprises, supra.
57. In Re, The Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, AIR 1941 FC 72
58. RMD Chamiarbaugwalla v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 628 : 1957 SCR 930; supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. I(e).
Also, BR. Enterprises v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1999 SC 1867 : (1999) 9 SCC 700.

was defined as meaning words, deeds or writings having a tendency or intention to disturb public tranquility, to create public disturbance or to promote disorder. The Supreme Court rejected the broader view of S. 124A that incitement to public order was not an essential element of the offence of sedition under this section. This broad view would have made s. 124A unconstitutional vis-a-vis Art. 19(1)(a) read with Art. 19(2).[59]

When an interpretation of a clause makes it vulnerable to attack under Art. 14, it should be avoided. If there is obvious anomaly in applying the law, the Court could shape the law to remove the anomaly and give effect to the purpose of the legislature. That could be done, if necessary, even by modification of the language used.[60]

A good example of application of the strategy of reading down is provided by Rt. Rev. Magr. Mark Netto v. Govt. of Kerala.[61] The State Government made a rule which was challenged as violative of the right conferred upon the minorities by Art. 30. If the rule were to be interpreted broadly it could fall foul of Art. 30. So, the rule was interpreted restrictively so as to be inapplicable to a minority educational institution. The Court observed :[62]

> "We do not think it necessary or advisable to strike down the Rule as a whole but to restrict its operation and make it inapplicable to a minority educational institution in a situation like the one which arose in this case."

The Supreme Court has explained the scope of the doctrine of reading down as follows :[63]

> "It is thus clear that the doctrine of reading down or of recasting the statute can be applied in limited situations. It is essentially used, firstly, for saving a statute from being struck down on account of its unconstitutionality. It is an extension of the principle that when two interpretations are possible one rendering it constitutional and the other making it unconstitutional, the former should be preferred….. The second situation which summons its aid is where the provisions of the statute are vague and ambiguous and it is possible to gather the intentions of the legislature from the object of the statute, the context in which the provision occurs and the purpose for which it is made."

It is not be proper to read down the provisions of a statute in relation to the period during which the statute was subsisting as it would then affect persons who never went to Court, because during the period it existed it did not apply to them.[64]

When adherence to statutory language leads to unjust or illogical results, and, thus, makes the law vulnerable to attack under Art. 14, the Court may take recourse to indirect judicial review. The Supreme Court has observed in this con-

---

59. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. D(b).

60. Union of India v. Filip Tiago De Gama, AIR 1990 SC 981 at 985 : (1990) 1 SCC 277.
Also, Mahadeolal Kanodia v. The Administrator-General of West Bengal, AIR 1960 SC 936 : (1960) 3 SCR 578.

61. AIR 1979 SC 83 : (1979) 1 SCC 23; supra, Ch. XXX, Sec. B; Sec. C(h).

62. The Court applied the same strategy in New Delhi Municipal Committee v. State of Punjab, AIR 1997 SC 2847 at 2903, 2904 : (1997) 7 SCC 339.

63. Delhi Transport Corporation v. D.T.C. Mazdoor Congress, AIR 1991 SC 101, at 180; see also reading down statute to save arbitrariness and exercise of discretionary power. Salem Advocate Bar Association v. Union of India, (2005) 6 SCC 344 : AIR 2005 SC 3353.

64. Punjab Dairy Development Board v. Cepham Milk Specialities Ltd., (2004) 8 SCC 621 : AIR 2004 SC 4466.

nection that if there is obvious anomaly in the application of the law, the Court could shape the law to remove the anomaly. If the strict grammatical interpretation gives rise to absurdity or inconsistency, the Court could discard such interpretation and adopt an interpretation which will give effect to the purpose of the legislature. That could be done, if necessary, even by modification of the language used. A law does not deal with specific controversies which the courts decide. A law incorporates general purpose behind the statutory words, the Court decides specific cases. If a given case falls well within the general purpose of the legislature, but not within the literal meaning of the statute, then the Court must strike the balance.[65]

A similar approach is to be seen in Govind v. State of Madhya Pradesh[66] where police regulations were restrictively read by the Court and thus held valid under Art. 19(1)(d).

Thus, reading down a statute to ensure its constitutionality is a common judicial strategy. As KRISHNA IYER, J., has said in Bhim Singhji v. Union of India:[67] "…. reading down meanings of words with loose lexical amplitude is permissible as part of the judicial process. To sustain a law by interpretation is the rule."

But it is not in every case that the Court would resort to the technique of 'reading down' the statute. When the provision in question is cast in a definite and unambiguous language, and its intention is clear, the Court will not mend or bend it but declare it unconstitutional leaving it to the legislature to amend it if it so desires. One example of the Court refusing to apply the doctrine of reading down is furnished by Minerva Mills Ltd. v. Union of India,[68] The Court refused to read down Art. 31C to save it from the challenge of unconstitutionality. The Court ruled that "if the Parliament has manifested a clear intention to exercise an unlimited power, it is impermissible to read down the amplitude of that power so as to make it limited. The principle of reading down cannot be invoked or applied in opposition to the clear intention of the legislature."

The Supreme Court also refused to apply the doctrine of reading down in DTC.[69] A service regulation was made conferring power on the authority to terminate the services of a permanent and confirmed employee without assigning any reason by giving one month's notice. The regulation was characterised as arbitrary, discriminatory and violative of Art. 14. The Court ruled : "The language of the regulation is so crystal clear that no two interpretations are possible to be placed on it and hence it is not permissible to read in it any meaning other than what is clearly sought to be conveyed by it."[70]

There are instances where instead of reading down the impugned law, the Court may read something therein to uphold its validity. A few examples of such judicial approach may be cited here.

---

65. Mahadeolal Kanodia v. The Administrator General of West Bengal, AIR 1960 SC 936 : (1960) 3 SCR 578; Union of India v. Filip Tiago De Gama, AIR 1990 SC 981, 955 : (1990) 1 SCC 277.
66. AIR 1975 SC 1378; supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. G.
67. AIR 1981 SC at 242 : (1981) 1 SCC 166.
68. See, infra, next Chapter.
69. DTC v. DTC Mazdoor Congress, supra.
70. AIR 1991 SC at 181.

In State of Mysore v. Bhat,[71] instead of holding the law invalid under Art. 14 on the ground of lack of procedural safeguards, the Supreme Court read natural justice into the law and sustained its validity, but quashed the orders made thereunder because of denial of natural justice.

In Express Newspaper,[72] the Supreme Court read the ingredient 'capacity to pay' into the law enacted for fixing wages even though the law had failed to specify the same and held it valid. Instead, the Court quashed the decision of the wage board as it had not taken this ingredient into consideration while fixing the wages. This technique avoided a re-enactment of the law in question but only required a revision of the wage board's decision keeping in view the capacity of the industry to pay.[73]

Just because the constitution validity of a statutory provision is pending in appeal before the Supreme Court, it does not bar the High Court from deciding an issue relating to such a provision.[74]

I. EFFECT OF UNCONSTITUTIONALITY

If an Act is initially unconstitutional being violative of a Fundamental Right, its invalidity cannot be cured by framing rules for removing the infirmities from which the Act was suffering. Thus, the Maharashtra Vacant lands (Prohibition of Unauthorised Occupation and Summary Eviction) was held to be violative of Art. 14 and 19(1)(f). The unconstitutionality of the Act was not cured by framing the Rules thereunder.[75]

What is the effect of a judicial declaration that a legislative enactment is unconstitutional?

In an American case, the answer to the question was given as follows: "An unconstitutional Act is not a law, it confers no rights, it imposes no duties, it affords no protection, it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it has never been passed."[76]

A similar theme is present in certain observations of MAHAJAN, J., in the Keshavan Madhava Menon case.[77]

When the Supreme Court declares a law unconstitutional, the decision is binding on all courts in India under Art. 141.[78] The virtual effect thereof is that the decision operates as a judgment in rem against all persons who may seek relief subsequenlty and it is not necessary for them to establish the unconstitutionality of the statute again. The courts are bound to ignore an unconstitutional law.

If a person is prosecuted for contravening a section, a part of which has been declared unconstitutional, no onus is cast on the accused to prove that his case

---

71. AIR 1975 SC 596 : (1975) 1 SCC 110; supra, Ch. XXI, Sec. D.
72. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. J(e).
73. M.P. JAIN, Justice Bhagwati and the Indian Constitutional Law, 2 JILI, 31, 38.
74. Carona Ltd. v. Parvathy Swaminathan & Sons, (2007) 8 SCC 559 : AIR 2008 SC 187.
75. State of Maharashtra v. Kamal S. Durgule, AIR 1985 SC 119 : (1985) 1 SCC 234 for Art. 14, see, Ch. XXI, supra; for Art. 19(1)(f), see, Ch. XXXI, Sec. B.
76. Norton v. Shelby County, 118 US 425, 442 (1886).
77. AIR 1951 SC 128 : 1951 SCR 228; supra, Ch. XX, Sec. F.
78. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I(e); Sec. J.

falls under the unconstitutional portion. To succeed, the prosecution must establish that the accused has contravened the constitutional, and, thus, the enforceable, portion of the section.[79]

An unconstitutional statute is void since its inception; it is regarded as non-est.[80] Anything done under it is void and illegal; even convictions made under it are set aside; anything done under it, whether closed, completed, or inchoate, is wholly illegal and the person affected is entitled to relief in one shape or another.[81]

What is stated above is the general effect of the declaration of a statute as unconstitutional. But there may be cases where the Court may tone down the drastic effect in exercise of its power to "mould relief."[82] As stated earlier, the Court may apply the doctrine of prospective overruling.[83] As the Supreme Court has observed in Orissa Cement Ltd. v. State of Orissa:[84]

> "… The declaration regarding the invalidity of a provision and the determination of the relief that should be granted in consequence thereof are two different things and, in the latter sphere, the Court has, and must be held to have, a certain amount of discretion. It is a well settled proposition that it is open to the Court to grant, mould or restrict the relief in a manner most appropriate to the situation before it in such a way as to advance the interests of justice. It will be appreciated that it is not always possible in all situations to give a logical and complete effect to a finding…"

Thus, there have been cases where a tax levied by a State has been declared to be unconstitutional but while the Court has barred the State from collecting the tax in future, it has freed the state from the obligation of refunding the tax already collected. Ordinarily, once the tax is held unconstitutional, the tax ought to be held bad ab initio from the date of its origin. But, the Supreme Court exercising its power to mould relief under Art. 142, has modified the position by ruling that the past collection of the tax would not be regarded as invalid. This has been done to protect the financial position of the concerned State.[85]

Viewed in this light, the doctrine of Prospective Overruling, discussed earlier, may be regarded as an aspect of the Supreme Court's power to mould relief. The principle is that the Court "moulds the reliefs claimed to meet the justice of the case—Justice not in its logical but in its equitable sense."[86] The Supreme Court has been specifically given this power under Art. 142 of the Constitution. Under Art. 142, the Court has power to do 'complete justice'.[87]

---

79. Behram v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 133; supra, Ch XX, Sec. F.
80. See, Behram Khurshed Pesikaka v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 123, 145 : (1955) 1 SCR 613; R.M.D.C. v. Union of India, AIR 1957 SC 628, 633; M.P.V. Sundararamier & Co. v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1958 SC 468, 489 : 1958 SCR 1422; Mahendra Lal Jaini v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1963 SC 1019, 1029-1031 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 912.
81. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. F.
82. See, supra, Chs. XXXIII, Sec. A(o) and VIII, Sec. D(q).
83. See, supra, Sec. G under "Prospective Overruling".
84. AIR 1991 SC 1676, at 1717 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 430.
85. For Art. 142, see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. G.
86. Somaiya Organics (India) Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 2001 SC 1723, 1731 : (2001) 5 SCC 519.
87. See, footnote 85, supra.

In Ashok Kumar Gupta v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[88] the Supreme Court has characterised the doctrine of Prospective Overruling as a method evolved by the courts to adjust competing rights of parties so as to save transactions "whether statutory or otherwise, that were effected by the earlier law". The Court has further observed that it was a "rule of judicial craftsmanship with pragmatism and judicial statesmanship as a useful outline to bring about smooth transition of the operation of law without unduly affecting the rights of the people who acted upon the law as it operated prior to the date of the judgment overruling the previous law." Ultimately, it is a matter of the discretion of the Supreme Court and is relatable directly to the grant of relief by the Court.

What is the effect on an unconstitutional statute of a constitutional amendment which removes the constitutional objection due to which the statute was declared invalid? The matter has already been discussed earlier.[89] In the Sundaramier case,[90] the Supreme Court applying the Doctrine of Eclipse held that the portions of a statute declared bad under Art. 286 were revived when the Article was amended so as to remove the constitutional quencher.

But this principle is not applied to a statute which may be invalid because of excessive delegation.[91] A law was challenged before the Supreme Court on this ground. Pending the Court's decision, an amending Act was enacted to remove the defect. The Supreme Court ruled by a majority that when an Act is bad on the ground of excessive delegation, it is void ab initio and still-born and it cannot be revived by an amending Act seeking to remove the vice. It means that the whole Act has to be re-enacted in the modified form.[92]

(a) SEVERABILITY

Reference may be made to the doctrine of severability which has already been discussed earlier.[93] The doctrine is invoked to protect the valid parts of the law and to eliminate only the invalid parts thereof.[94]

If the unconstitutional portion is severable from the constitutional portion, then only the former is affected; the statute is not regarded unconstitutional as a whole; the statute minus the unconstitutional portion stands.[95] For example, since the State has no legislative competence to enact provisions relating to natural gas and liquefied natural gas it is to that extent that the State Act would be ultra vires the Constitution.[96]

The doctrine makes it possible that not the entire statute, but only the invalid part thereof, has to go provided the good and the bad parts thereof can be separated.

Severing is thus an attempt on the part of the judiciary to minimize the destructive effect of judicial declaration of constitutional invalidity of some por-

---

88. (1997) 5 SCC 201, see, supra.
89. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. G, under 'Doctrine of Eclipse'.
90. AIR 1958 SC 468 : 1958 SCR 1422; supra, Ch. XI.
91. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.
92. B. Shama Rao v. Union Territory, AIR 1967 SC 1480 : (1967) 2 SCR 650; supra, Ch. XX, Sec. G.
93. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. H.
94. Ibid.
95. D.S. Nakara v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 130, 147 : (1983) 1 SCC 305.
96. Special Reference No. 1 of 2001 In re (2004) 4 SCC 489 : AIR 2004 SC 2647.

tions of a statute. If, however, the constitutional part cannot be separated from the unconstitutional part, then the whole statute is held to be invalid.[1]

(b) LEGISLATIVE VALIDATION OF AN INVALID STATUTE

It is possible that a statute held invalid by the Court may later be sought to be validated by the legislature by passing suitable legislation retrospectively removing the defects and deficiencies in the law which resulted in its being declared invalid. The Legislature cannot directly overrule a Court decision. The legislature cannot seek to override a Court decision by a mere declaration or even by making a statutory provision.[2]

The Supreme Court has enunciated the principle as follows:[3]

> "On the words used in the Act, it is plain that the Legislature attempted to overrule or set-aside the decision of this Court. That, in our judgment, is not open to the Legislature to do under our constitutional scheme. It is open to the legislature within certain limits to amend the provisions of an Act retrospectively and to declare what the law shall be deemed to have been, but it is not open to the legislature to say that a judgment of a Court properly constituted and rendered in exercise of its powers in matters brought before it shall be deemed to be ineffective and the interpretation of the law shall be otherwise than as declared by the Court. That judgment was binding between the parties and also by virtue of Article 141 binding on all courts in the territory of India. The legislature could not say that the declaration of the law was either erroneous, invalid or ineffective either as precedent or between the parties."[4]

Accordingly, in S.R. Bhagwat v. State of Mysore,[5] a statutory provision was declared ultra vires the powers of the State Legislature "as it encroaches upon the judicial field and tries to overrule the judicial decision…"

What the Legislature can do however is to remove the defect which led to the invalidation of the law in question if the Legislature can do so under the Constitution.[6] What the Legislature can do is to enact a new law, amending the old law so as to remove the base on which the Court decision was founded.

The Court has explained the position thus in Bola:[7]

---

1. State of Gujarat v. Raman Lal Keshav Lal Soni, AIR 1984 SC 161 : (1983) 2 SCC 33; Motor General Traders v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1984 SC 121 : (1984) 1 SCC 222.

2. I.N. Saxena v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1976 SC 2250; Sundar Dass v. Ram Prakash, AIR 1977 SC 1201 : (1977) 2 SCC 662; Madan Mohan Pathak v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 803; Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 498, at 516 : (2000) 1 SCC 168.

3. Janapada Sabha v. C.P. Syndicate Ltd., AIR 1971 SC 57 : (1970) 1 SCC 509.
Also see, Comorin Match Industries (Pvt.) Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1996 SC 1916 : (1996) 4 SCC 281; B. Krishna Bhat v. State of Karnataka, AIR 2001 SC 1885, at 1890.

4. For Art. 141, see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I(e).

5. AIR 1996 SC 188 : (1995) 6 SCC 16.
Also see, In re Caurvery Water Disputes Tribunal, 1992 AIR SCW 1286; G.C. Kanungo v. Mysore, 1995 AIR SCW 2596 : (1995) 5 SCC 96; State of Maharashtra v. Tanuja, AIR 1999 SC 791 : (1999) 2 SCC 462; State of Haryana v. Karnal Coop. F.S. Ltd., AIR 1994 SC 1 : (1993) 2 SCC 363.

6. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. I.
Also see, Indian Aluminium Ltd. v. State of Kerala, (1996) 7 SCC 537.
The matter has been discussed in S.S. Bola v. B.D. Sardana, AIR 1997 SC 3127, 3172-3173 : (1997) 8 SCC 522, Ch. XXXIV.

7. Supra, footnote 6.

> "The consistent thread that runs through all the decisions of this Court is that the legislature cannot directly overrule the decision or make a direction as not binding on it but has power to make the decision ineffective by removing the base on which the decision was rendered, consistent with the law of the Constitution and the legislature must have competence to do the same".

Hence there is no interference with a "judicial Order" passed by a competent Court or a tribunal where a "policy decision" is taken by the State Government to abolish the State Administrative Tribunal allowing aggrieved litigants to approach appropriate authority or forum for ventilating their grievances.[8]

A statute will not be valid unless the defects pointed out are removed. Such removal of the defects must be done keeping in view the principle of legislative competence. Even Parliament could not validate an Act which was enacted without proper legislative competence. As the measure of tax levied led to the declaration of the law as invalid, being in truth and substance to be beyond the competency of the State Legislature by reason of the impugned Acts, the levy cannot be said to have been revalidated. They were required to be re-enacted but suchre-enactment must also be in tune with any or other entries made in List II of the Constitution.[9]

The Supreme Court has pointed out[10] that before the Legislature can validate a tax declared illegal by the Court, the Legislature must remove, if it can, the cause for ineffectiveness or illegality. It is not sufficient to merely declare that the decision of the Court shall not bind for that is tantamount to reversing the decision given in exercise of judicial power which the Legislature does not possess. "Validation of a tax so declared illegal may be done only if the grounds of illegality or invalidity are capable of being removed and are in fact removed and the tax is thus made legal".[11] The legislature can change the basis on which a decision of the Court was rendered. Legislative power could also be exercised even with retrospective effect to render that decision ineffective. Thus the enactment of H.P. Taxation (on Certain Goods Carried by Road) Act, 1991 specifically stating that the levy of tax was compensatory and pointing out the facts relevant thereto in the Statement of Objects and Reasons was held to be within the competence of the State legislature and did not amount to overruling of the decision in which High Court had held the previous Act to be unconstitutional.[12]

If an ordinance invalidated by a Court is reenacted into an Act the same would be liable to be annulled once again. The Supreme Court cannot strike down a legislation which it has on an independent scrutiny held to be within the legislative competence of the enacting legislature merely because the legislature has reenacted the same legal provisions into an Act which, ten years earlier, were incorporated in an Ordinance and were found to be unconstitutional in an errone-

---

8. M.P. High Court Bar Association v. Union of India, (2004) SCC 11 SCC 766 : AIR 2005 SC 4114.

9. State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.

10. Shri P.C. Mills v. Broach Municipality, AIR 1970 SC 192 : (1969) 2 SCC 283; State of Andhra Pradesh v. Hindustan Machine Tools Ltd., AIR 1975 SC 2037 : (1975) 2 SCC 274; Indira Gandhi Nehru v. Raj Narain, AIR 1975 SC 2299 : 1975 Supp SCC 1; Misrilal Jain v. State of Orissa, AIR 1977 SC 1686 : (1977) 3 SCC 212; See also P Venugopal v. Union of India, (2008) 5 SCC 1 : (2008) 7 SCALE 255.

11. Ibid., at 195. Also see, Ahmedabad Corporation v. New S.S. & Wvg. Co., AIR 1970 SC 1292 : (1970) 2 SCC 280.

12. State of H.P. v. Yash Pal Garg, (2003) 9 SCC 92 : (2003) 4 JT 413.

ous judgment of the High Court, and, before the error could be corrected in appeal, the Ordinance itself had lapsed. The Court pointed out by the impugned Act Parliament has not overruled the judgment of the High Court nor has it declared the same law to be valid which has been pronounced to be void by the Court and that the impugned Act was not liable to be annulled on the ground of violation of the doctrine of separation of powers.[13]

J. SUPREME COURT NOT BOUND BY ITS OWN DECISIONS

A principle of great significance which avoids stultification of the constitutional law, and helps in its continuous development through the process of judicial interpretation, is that the Supreme Court does not regard itself bound by its own previous decisions and feels free to overrule them if it thinks that to be necessary.

As early as 1955, in Bengal Immunity Co. v. State of Bihar,[14] the Court expressed the opinion that it was not bound by its earlier judgments; it could reconsider its own previous decisions; it possessed the freedom to depart from them, or even overrule them whenever it thought fit to do so to keep pace with the needs of changing times. There was nothing in the Constitution against such a course of action. Judicial opinions on constitutional questions are not immutable.

This is the first recorded instance of the Supreme Court considering the question whether it could overrule an earlier decision rendered by it. DAS, ACTING C.J., speaking for the majority on the Bench observed : "There is nothing in our Constitution which prevents us from departing from a previous decision if we are convinced of its error and its baneful effect on the general interests of the public."

The main reason for taking this view is that while errors of ordinary law could be corrected by ordinary legislative process, an error of constitutional law could be set right only by the difficult, dilatory and cumbersome process of constitutional amendment. A perpetuation of mistakes in constitutional matters would be harmful to public interests.

The Court has, however, emphasized that it would exercise its power to reconsider previous decisions with due care and caution and only to advance the public well-being. If on a re-examination of the question, the Court concludes that its previous decision was wrong and erroneous then it would be its duty to say so and not to perpetuate the mistake.

In Sajjan Singh,[15] the Court again expressed itself on this point thus: The Court would be prepared to review its earlier decision in the interest of public good; the doctrine of stare decisis should not be permitted to perpetuate erroneous decisions pronounced by it to the detriment of the general welfare; but it would depart from its previous decisions only when considerations of a substantial and compelling character make it necessary to do so.

The Supreme Court has several times overruled or modified its earlier views. In Bengal Immunity, the Court reconsidered, and departed from its ruling in, the

---

13. Dharam Dutt v. Union of India, (2004) 1 SCC 712 : AIR 2004 SC 1295.
14. AIR 1955 SC 661 : (1955) 2 SCR 603; Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(i).
15. Infra, Ch XLI.

United Motors case,[16] since this case was having an adverse effect on the consuming public by imposing a tax burden erroneously on the people, giving rise to a consequence "manifestly and wholly unauthorised". The Chief Justice observed further referring to United Motors:

> "It is not an ordinary pronouncement declaring the rights of two private individuals inter se. It involves an adjudication on the taxing powers of the States as against the consuming public generally. If the decision is erroneous, as indeed we conceive it to be, we owe it to the public to protect them against the illegal tax burdens which the States are seeking to impose on the strength of the erroneous recent decision."

The Court cautioned that "we should not lightly dissent from a previous pronouncement." But if the previous decision was plainly erroneous, the Court is duty-bound to say so and not perpetuate the mistake.

In Supdt. and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, West Bengal v. Corp. of Calcutta,[17] the Court overruled Director of Rationing v. Calcutta Corp.,[18] because the proposition laid down therein was inconsistent with the legal philosophy of the Constitution, inconsistent with the republican Indian polity and bristled with anomalies.

In Kalu Oghad,[19] the Court modified its view expressed in Sharma v. Satish.[20]

In Golak Nath,[21] the Court by a majority of 6 : 5 overruled its previous decisions in the Sajjan Singh and Shankari Pd. cases and, again, in Kesavananda Bharati overruled certain aspects of Golak Nath.[22]

A shift in judicial view can also be seen in the area of legislative privileges when reference is made to the Blitz, the Searchlight and the Keshav Singh cases.[23]

In Sambhu Sarkar, the Court overruled Gopalan as regards the interpretation of Art. 22(7)(a) saying that in a matter involving the right of personal liberty, the fact that a decision has held the field for long should not be a deterrent against its reconsideration.[24]

In the Bank Nationalization case, the Supreme Court changed its views on the inter-relation of Arts. 19(1)(f) and 31 and on justiciability of compensation as compared to its previously expressed views.[25]

In S.N. Sarkar v. State of West Bengal,[26] the Supreme Court overruled Gopalan[27] as regards the interpretation of Art. 22(7).[28] It was argued before the Court

---

16. Bombay v. United Motors (India) Ltd., AIR 1953 SC 252 : 1953 SCR 1069; Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(i).
17. Supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. G.
18. Ibid.
19. Supra, Ch. XXV, Sec. C.
20. Supra, Ch. XXV, Sec. C.
21. Infra, Ch. XLI
22. Ibid.
23. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L and VI, Sec. H.
24. Supra, Ch. XXVII, Sec. C(i)(a).
25. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C(iii).
26. AIR 1973 SC 1425, at 1435 : (1973) 1 SCC 856.
27. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. C.
28. Supra, Ch. XXVII, Secs. B(d) and (f).

that "the majority-decision in Gopalan has stood for such a long time that it should not be disturbed unless there are strong and manifest reasons to do so." Brushing aside the argument, the Court observed that "this Court would review its earlier decisions if it is satisfied of its error or of the baneful effect such a decision would have on the general interest of the public", or if it "is inconsistent with the legal philosophy of our Constitution", and that in constitutional matters, "this Court would do so more readily than in other branches of law as perpetuation of an error would be harmful to public interests."

More importantly, the Supreme Court overruled Gopalan in Maneka Gandhi as regards the interpretation of Art. 21.[29] This proved to be a significant turning point in the development of constitutional law as, thereafter, Art. 21 has assumed a totally new complexion and witnessed a great expansion in its range and scope.[30]

The Supreme Court thus acts as a self-correcting agency. The Court does not rigidly bind itself by the doctrine of stare decisis in constitutional matters because it recognises that the task of interpretation of the Constitution is not static but dynamic. The Constitution is an organic document and as the shape of problems continuously goes on changing in a progressive and developing society, the Constitution must keep pace with the newly emerging problems. The Court thus has scope for judicial creativity and can adapt the constitutional law to the changing needs of the society.

In the Constituent Assembly, the view was expressed that in order to ensure elasticity, to enable mistakes to be rectified, and to leave room for growth, the Supreme Court should not be bound by its own decisions and that it should be able to amend its own interpretations of law made by it previously to rectify the errors it might have committed earlier.[31]

The Supreme Court does not, however, lightly reconsider its earlier decisions. The Court feels that it is necessary that the nation's Constitution is not kept in constant uncertainty by judicial review every season because it paralyses, by perennial suspense, all legislative and administrative action on vital issues.[32] The Supreme Court has expressed its views on this question as follows:[33]

> "Enlightened litigative policy in the country must accept as final the pronouncements of this Court by a Constitution Bench unless the subject be of such Fundamental importance to national life or the reasoning is so plainly erroneous in the light of later thought that it is wiser to be ultimately right rather than to be consistently wrong. Stare decisis is not a ritual convenience but a rule with limited exceptions. Pronouncements by the Constitution Benches should not be treated so cavalierly as to be revised frequently. We cannot devalue the decisions of this Court to brief ephemerality."

The Court realises that, on the one hand, too frequent overruling by it of its past decisions will introduce uncertainty and confusion in the law. On the other

---

29. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. C.
30. Supra, Ch. XVI, Sec. J.
31. VIII CAD 386.
Also see, Union of India v. Raghubir Singh, AIR 1989 SC 1933 : (1989) 2 SCC 754.
32. Ambika Prasad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 1762 : (1980) 3 SCC 719.
But see, SEERVAI, THE POSITION OF JUDICIARY, supra, at 69-76, where the author says that the Court has changed its views too often on some questions.
33. Ganga Sugar Corp. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 286, 294 : (1980) 1 SCC 223.

hand, the Court feels that it should not hesitate to correct the error by overruling its decision if it is satisfied that it was clearly erroneous.[34]

Some of the circumstances when the Supreme Court can reconsider and overrule its own previous decision are:

(1) When the contextual values giving birth to the earlier view had altered substantially. The Supreme Court has observed in Maganlal :[35]

> "Some new aspects may come to light and it may become essential to cover fresh grounds to meet the new situations or to overcome difficulties which did not manifest themselves or were not taken into account, when the earlier view was propounded."

(2) When there were compelling and substantial reasons to do so.[36]

(3) When an earlier relevant statutory provision had not been brought to the notice of the Court.

The Court has stated the relevant considerations to be borne in mind by it when the Court can change its views expressed in an earlier case in Keshav Mills:[37]

> "What is the nature of the infirmity or error on which a plea for a review and revision of the earlier view is based? On the earlier occasion, did some patent aspects of the question remain unnoticed, or was the attention of the Court not drawn to any relevant and material statutory provision, or was any previous decision of this Court bearing on the point not noticed? Is the Court hearing such plea fairly unanimous that there is such an error in the earlier view? What would be the impact of the error on the general administration of law or on public good? Has the earlier decision been followed on subsequent occasions either by this Court or by the High Courts? And, would the reversal of the earlier decision lead to public inconvenience, hardship or mischief ?"

The Supreme Court has again considered the question in S.C. Advocates-on-Record Ass. v. Union of India.[38] The question before the Court was whether the earlier case S.P. Gupta v. Union of India[39] should be overruled on the question of appointment of Judges in the Supreme Court and the High Courts. While the Court realised that frequent overruling of its decisions was not desirable as it would make law uncertain and unpredictable, yet the Court felt that:

> "it is emphatically the province and essential duty of the superior Courts to review or reconsider its earlier decisions, if so warranted under compelling circumstances and even to overrule any questionable decision, either fully or

---

34. Keshav Mill Co. Ltd. v. CIT, AIR 1965 SC 1636 : (1965) 2 SCR 908; Maganlal Chhaganlal (P.) Ltd. v. Municipal Corp. of Greater Bombay, (1974) 2 SCC 402 : AIR 1974 SC 2009; S. Nagaraj v. State of Karnataka, (1993) Supp. (4) SCC 595; Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal, In re, (1993) Supp (1) SCC 96 (II); AIR 1992 SC 522; Union of India v. Raghubir Singh, (1989) 2 SCC 754 : AIR 1989 SC 1933.
Also see, supra, Ch. IV; Rupa Ashok Hurra v. Ashok Hurra, (2002) 4 SCC 388.

35. Maganlal Chagganlal (P.) Ltd. v. Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay, AIR 1974 SC 2009 at 2042 : (1974) 2 SCC 402.

36. Keshav Mills Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, AIR 1965 SC 1636 at 1644 : (1965) 2 SCR 908; Sajjan Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1965 SC 845; see, infra, next Chapter : (1965) 1 SCR 933.

37. Ibid.

38. AIR 1994 SC 268 : (1993) 4 SCC 441.

39. AIR 1982 SC 149.
Also see, S. Nagaraj v. State of Karnataka, (1993) 5 JT (SC) 27 : 1993 Supp (4) SCC 595.

> partly, if it had been erroneously held and that no decision enjoys absolute immunity from judicial review or reconsideration on a fresh outlook of the constitutional or legal interpretation and in the light of the development of innovative ideas, principles and perception along with the passage of time."[40]

The view of the Supreme Court that it has power to reconsider its own previous decisions is in line with the modern judicial thinking in other countries where courts discharge the function of judicial review.

In the U.S.A., a mechanical attitude to stare decisis is decried.[41] As Chief Justice HUGHES has warned, one must not expect from the Court "the icy stratosphere of certainty". The reason for this flexibility is that the Supreme Court is primarily a constitutional Court, and amendment of the U.S. Constitution being a very difficult process,[42] the Court reserves to itself the power to correct its own errors. For example, BRANDEIS, J.,[43] has stated : "Stare decisis is ordinarily, a wise rule of action. But it is not a universal, inexorable command".

In another case,[44] BRANDEIS, J., has stated :

> "Stare decisis is usually the wise policy, because in most matters it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled right. This is commonly true even where the error is a matter of serious concern, provided correction can be had by legislation. But in cases involving the Federal Constitution, where correction through legislative action is practically impossible, this Court has often overruled its earlier decisions. The Court bows to the lessons of experience and the force of better reasoning recognising that the process of trial and error, so fruitful in the physical sciences, is appropriate also in the judicial function."

The High Court of Australia reserves to itself the power to reconsider its own decisions. As BARTON, J., has observed in Inthe Tramways case:[45]

> "But the Court can always listen to argument as to whether it ought to review a particular decision, and the strongest reason for an overruling is that a decision is manifestly wrong and its continuance is injurious to the public interest."

Even in Britain, the House of Lords, which until recently regarded itself bound by its own previous decisions, has now changed its views in this matter. The House has now come to recognise that too rigid adherence to precedent may lead to injustice in a particular case and also unduly restrict the proper development of the law. Accordingly, while treating its former decisions as normally binding, the House would depart from a previous decision when it appears right to do so.[46]

---

40. AIR 1994 SC at 303.

41. MCWHINNEY, JUDICIAL REVIEW, passim.
Prof. FREUND states that movement in constitutional law is not to be foreclosed or made difficult by an absolute doctrine of stare decisis : A Supreme Court in a Federation, 53. Col. LR 614. Schwartz states that the American Supreme Court has now gone to the other extreme: AMERICAN CONST. LAW, 160.

42. Infra, next Chapter.

43. State of Washington v. Dawson and Co., (1923) 264 US 646.

44. David Burnet v. Coronado Oil and Gas Co., (1931) 285 US 393.

45. (1914) 18 CLR 54.

46. Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) issued by the House of Lords, (1966) 1 WLR 1234.
Taking advantage of this newly assumed power, the House of Lords in Conway v. Rimmer, (1968) 1 All ER 874, modified the law relating to, and restricted the ambit of, Crown Privilege regarding production of documents before the courts as laid down in Duncan v. Cammel Laird & Co., (1942) AC 624.
Also See, DE SMITH, JUDICIAL REVIEW OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION, 600-6 (1968).

In the practice statement issued on July 26, 1966, LORD GARDINER, L.C., stated:

> "Their Lordships nevertheless recognise that too rigid adherence to precedent may lead to injustice in a particular case and also unduly restrict the proper development of the law. They propose therefore to modify their present practice and, while treating former decisions of this House as normally binding, to depart from a previous decision when it appears right to do so."

The House of Lords has thus assumed a more creative and active role in the development of law. The High Court of Australia also reserves to itself the right to reconsider its own decisions.

It may be appreciated that the proposition that the Supreme Court is not bound by its previous decisions enables the Court to play a more creative and dynamic role in shaping and moulding constitutional law. This aspect becomes very evident from a study of the post 1978 constitutional cases.[47]

47. See, Ex p. Pinochet Ugarte (No. 2), [1999] 1 All ER 577.

CHAPTER XLI

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

SYNOPSIS

Times are not static. Times change and, therefore, the life of a nation is not static but dynamic, living and organic; its political, social and economic conditions change continuously. Social mores and ideals change from time to time creating new problems and altering the complexion of the old ones. It is, therefore, quite possible that a constitution drafted in one era, and in a particular context, may be found inadequate in another era and another context.

The ideas upon which a constitution is based in one generation may be spurned as old fashioned in the next generation. It thus becomes necessary to have some machinery, some process, by which the constitution may be adapted from time to time in accordance with contemporary national needs.

The modes of adapting the constitution from time to time to new circumstances may either be informal or formal. Informal methods are judicial interpretation and conventions; the formal method is the constituent process.

A. INFORMAL METHODS

(a) JUDICIAL INTERPRETATION

In this case, the constitutional text does not change, but its interpretation undergoes a change.[1] The words in the constitution having one meaning in one context may be given somewhat different meaning in another context. "While the language of the constitution does not change, the changing circumstances of a progressive society for which it was designed yield new and fuller import to its meaning."[2]

Judicial interpretation is a process of slow and gradual metamorphosis of constitutional principles, and is somewhat invisible, for the change has to be deciphered by an analysis of a body of judicial precedents. In this process, the courts play a dominant role, for it is their function to interpret the constitution.

The process is slow for it develops from case to case over a length of time and it may take long for a view to crystallise. It is also somewhat haphazard because the courts do not take the initiative; they interpret the constitution only when the question is raised before them and the course of interpretation depends on the nature of cases and constitutional controversies which are presented to the courts for adjudication.

Though the process of judicial interpretation goes on in every constitution to a greater or lesser extent, yet it assumes a crucial importance in a country in which the formal method of constitutional amendment is very tardy and difficult, and the language used in the constitution is general.

The best example where this process has been used effectively for adaptation of the constitution is the United States where the Supreme Court has from time to time given a new meaning to phrases and words in the constitution so as to make the 18th century, laissez faire era, document subserve the needs of a vast, expanding and highly industrialized civilization of the twentieth century without many formal amendments being effectuated in its text.

The U.S. Constitution being skeletal and brief and couched in general language, offers a vast scope for judicial creativity. For example, the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution guarantees freedom of speech in very broad terms.

---

1. Constitutional Interpretation, Ch. XL, supra; WHEARE, MODERN CONSTITUTIONS, 146-77 (1964).

2. Justices BLACK and FRANKFURTER, CONFLICT IN THE COURT, 57.

The Amendment says: "Congress shall make no law… abridging the freedom of speech or of the press". The provision lays down no limits or restrictions on the Fundamental Right to freedom of speech. But there can be no unlimited right. Therefore, the U.S. Supreme Court has taken upon itself to spell out the restrictions on this right.

To a limited extent, in Canada and Australia also, the judiciary has adapted the constitution to the changing circumstances.[3]

The process of judicial interpretation is in progress in India as well.[4] The Supreme Court by holding that it can reconsider its decisions from time to time has kept the way open for adjustments in constitutional interpretation so as to adapt the Indian Constitution to new situations. The Court has on several occasions changed its views about the significance and meaning of several constitutional provisions.[5]

Even though, due to the Indian Constitution being very detailed, and its language being rather specific, and not general, opportunities available to mould the Constitution by the judicial interpretative process are somewhat limited,[6] yet, there have been several outstanding judicial decisions which have had a deep impact on constitutional development. Since 1978, the interpretative process has entered a very dynamic phase because of judicial creativity. This aspect has already been discussed in detail in the last Chapter.[7]

(b) CONVENTIONS AND CONSTITUTIONAL USAGES

The operation of constitutional provisions may be modified by the growth of conventions, practices and observances. This is another process of slow metamorphosis, of imperceptible change, where the constitutional text retains its original form and phraseology, where there is no visible modification on the face, but where, underneath the surface, a change has come about so far as the working and operation of the provision is concerned.

The conventions and usages, though operating within the famework of the provisions of the constitution, nevertheless, do modify their content and effect. One way to distinguish between rules and conventions may be to say that while rules are made, conventions are not made. Conventions evolve out of practices followed over a period of time.[8]

Conventions operate in several ways.

One, a convention may nullify a constitutional provision in practice without formally abolishing it. A well known example of this is to be found in the fact that in some countries, the legal power of the Head of the State to veto a bill passed by the Legislature is never exercised by him except on the advice of the Ministry.

---

3. For the working of the judicial process in the area of legislative powers in these countries, see, supra. Chs. X and XI.
See also, Ch. XV on Commerce Clause.
4. Supra, Ch. XL.
5. Ibid.
6. Ibid.
7. Supra, Ch. XL.
8. Supra, Ch. I.

Two, a convention may work by transferring powers granted to one authority in the constitution to another authority. This is what usually happens in a country with a parliamentary form of government where legal powers formally vested in the Head of the State are effectively exercised by the Ministry.

Three, a convention may affect a constitution by supplementing a provision therein.[9]

Britain affords by far the best example of this process where conventions play a very important role in the constitutional process. Conventions have made it possible for a monarchical constitution to work on democratic lines. The prerogative power of the British Crown to veto a bill passed by Houses of Parliament has disappeared through desuetude.

The Indian Constitution is very detailed and comprehensive. Some of the conventions of the British Constitution have been expressly incorporated in the text of the Constitution.[10] Still, there remains scope for the growth of conventions. Reference may be made in this connection to the foregoing discussion on the following topics: Council of Ministers and the Prime Minister;[11] President's position vis-a-vis the Council of Ministers;[12] Cabinet;[13] a Minister's responsibility for his subordinates' actions;[14] summoning, prorogation and dissolution of Lok Sabha[15] and State Legislative Assembly;[16] Governor's relations with his Council of Ministers and with the Central Government;[17] assent by the President or the Governor to Bills passed by Parliament or the State Legislature respectively;[18] acceptance of the Finance Commission's recommendations by the Central Government.[19]

Under the stresses of planning, new conventions have arisen in India. To take only two examples: (1) the Planning Commission, an extra-constitutional non-statutory body, has come to have a good deal of control over Central-State policies:[20] (2) the National Development Council is another extra-constitutional body, the powers and functions of which are regulated not by law but by conventions.[21]

Conventions have often been characterised as 'non-legal rules'—'non-legal' because the courts do not apply them: 'rules' because they are regarded as 'binding' and are observed in practice. In this connection, it needs to be pointed out that there are cases where the courts have recognised conventions thus blurring the distinction, to some extent, between 'legal' and 'non-legal' rules.[22]

---

9. WHEARE, MODERN CONSTITUTIONS, 178-201 (1964); COLIN R. MUNRO, Laws & Conventions Distinguished, 91 LQR 218; K.J. KEITH, Courts & Conventions of the Const., 16 Int. & Comp LQ 542 (1967); O. HOOD PHILLIPS, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 77-91 (1973); G. MARSHALL, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS (1984).
10. Supra, Ch. I.
11. Supra, Chs. III, Sec. A(iii) and VII, Sec. A(ii).
12. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
13. Ibid; also, supra, Ch. VII, Sec. B.
14. Supra, Chs. III, Sec. B(f) and VII.
15. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G.
16. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. C.
17. Supra, Ch. VII, Secs. B and C.
18. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. J(c) and VI, Sec. F(i).
19. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. L.
20. Supra, Ch. XIV, Sec. G.
21. Ibid.
22. For example, see : U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi, AIR 1971 SC 1002; Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192. supra, Ch. XL.

Some Supreme Court Judges have even gone to the extent of denying that there is any distinction between "constitutional law" and an established "constitutional convention". For example, KULDIP SINGH, J., has observed:[23]

> "We are of the view that there is no distinction between the "constitutional law" and an established "constitutional convention" and both are binding in the field of their operation. Once it is established to the satisfaction of the Court that a particular convention exists and is operating then the convention becomes a part of the "constitutional law of the land and can be enforced in the like manner."

B. FORMAL METHOD

Practically every constitution has some formal method of constitutional amendment. This consists of changing the language of a constitutional provision so as to adapt it to the changed context of social needs.

In some countries, the process may be easier than in others, and, accordingly, the constitutions are sometimes classified into flexible or rigid. A flexible constitution is one in which amendment can be effected rather easily, as easily as enacting an ordinary law. The best example of such a constitution is the British Constitution which can be amended by an ordinary Act of Parliament, and there is, thus, no distinction between ordinary legislative process and constituent process.[24]

A rigid constitution is regarded as the fundamental law of the land in the sense that it lays down the basic principles for the country's governance which are considered to be of a permanent value. It is, therefore, thought that the method of constitutional amendment should ensure that the basic principles are changed only after thorough consideration and deliberation and that hasty and ill-considered changes under political pressures of the day are avoided. Accordingly, in such a constitution, the process of constitutional amendment is more elaborate and difficult than the enactment of ordinary legislation. There thus exists a distinction between legislative and constituent process; the former denotes making of an ordinary law; the latter denotes amendment of the constitution.

If a constitution is amendable easily by passing an ordinary law, then it will lose all permanence and supremacy. A written constitution usually is of the rigid type. A federal constitution has to be rigid, for it seeks to achieve a balance of powers between the Centre and the States, and it ensures that this balance is not disturbed lightly or unilaterally.

The terms 'rigid' or 'flexible' constitutions are somewhat relative, the difference being one of degree, because, in the ultimate analysis, a constitution which is incapable of adjustment and adaptation will fail to endure, and even a constitution of the flexible type may not be lightly amended owing to political repercussions apprehended, and the social values of the people. A constitution which may be prima facie rigid may, in practice, prove to be easily changeable, as has been the case in India so far.

---

23. S.C. Advocates on Record Association v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC at 405, Ch. IV, Sec. B(d); Ch. VIII, Sec. B(d), supra.

24. Supra, Ch. I.
Also see, infra.

Formal amendment is perhaps the most significant way of adapting the constitution to changing circumstances. The judicial interpretation may help to some extent in this respect but it cannot change the wordings of the basic law and certain desired changes may not be attainable without verbal changes in the constitutional text. Further, the judicial process is slow and a change may be desired early. At times, some principles laid down by the courts may appear to be against public mores and political needs and may need to be changed. An example of such a situation is furnished by the several amendments made in India to Art. 31 of the Constitution concerning the Fundamental Right to property to overcome inconvenient judicial interpretation thereof.[25]

Then there may be some constitutional provisions which do not usually figure before the courts and some adjustments therein may be needed and this can be effectuated by a formal amendment only. Similar reasons operate to make formal constitutional amendment a more effective instrument of constitutional change than conventions and constitutional usages.

A formal amending process is as important as the process of constitution-making and so it may rightly be characterised as the 'constituent' process. The amending provision in a constitution is of great importance as it enables the country to develop peacefully, the alternative to which may be stagnation and revolution. In the ultimate analysis, however, the process of constitutional amendment should neither be too rigid nor too easy. In the former case, the constitution may lag behind the societal needs; in the latter case, constitutional safeguards may be weakened by too frequent amendments.

The formal procedures to amend some foreign federal constitutions are as follows:

(a) U.S.A.

The process of constitutional amendment involves two separate stages: initiation and ratification.

An amendment may be proposed or initiated either—(i) by vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress; or (ii) by a constitutional convention called together by Congress on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States.[26] Hitherto, all amendments have been initiated by the first method and the second method has never been employed.

An amendment proposed as above may be ratified either—(i) by vote of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States; or (ii) by the constitutional conventions in three-fourths of the States. The choice of the method is wholly within the discretion of the Congress. After ratification, the constitutional amendment becomes effective.

---

25. Supra, Chs. XXXI and XXXII.

26. Art. V. of the US Constitution reads as follows:

> "The Congress whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the serveral States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution. When ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by convention in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress…."

A restriction imposed by the Constitution on the amending process is that no State can be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its consent.[27]

The procedure of the constitutional amendment in the U.S.A. has proved to be quite difficult. During its tenure of over 200 years, while several thousand constitutional amendments have been mooted, only thirty of them have been formally proposed by the Congress, of which only twenty-five have been actually effectuated. Of these, the first ten amendments, which constitute the Bill of Rights, were adopted within two years of the initiation of the Constitution. These constitutional amendments lay down the Fundamental Rights of the people. Many amendments have been killed because of non-ratification by the States. In the words of Finer: "It was intended to make change difficult; it has made change almost unattainable."[28]

Because of the rigidity of the formal process of constitutional amendment, the courts have had to play the role of adapting it by their interpretative process. On the whole, the courts appear to have discharged the function well. The courts have moulded the rigid U.S. Constitution to the growing and shifting needs of the nation through time. The judicial task has, of course, been facilitated by the fact that the Constitution is expressed in general terms which the courts could construe according to contemporary situations, demands and exigencies.[29]

(b) CANADA

That portion of the British North America Act relating to the Provincial Constitution only (excepting the office of the Lieutenant-Governor) could be amended by the Provincial Legislature itself in the ordinary legislative process. There was no provision in the B.N.A. Act for amendment of the other portion before 1982.

Being a statute of the British Parliament, it could be amended by the British Parliament itself. The Parliament did not, however, act in this behalf suo motu; it acted only on the request of the Canadian Government. A convention had grown that the British Parliament would pass an amendment, as a matter of course, if presented to it by a joint address of both Houses of the Canadian Parliament. Another convention which had come into existence was that the Canadian Government consulted the Provinces before requesting the British Parliament to amend the B.N.A. Act.[30]

For long it had been felt in Canada that it was anomalous and incongruous, and an infringement of Canadian sovereignty, that the constitutional amending power should vest in British Parliament and not in an agency within Canada. But it proved to be an intractable problem[31] to evolve an agreed amending formula because of the insistence of Quebec to have a veto on all future constitutional amendments.

---

27. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. B.

28. THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MODERN GOVT., 128 (1965).
Also see, CORWIN, UNDERSTANDING THE CONSTITUTION, 97 (1967).

29. Supra, Ch. XL.

30. E.R. ALEXANDER, A Constitutional Strait Jacket for Canada, 43 Can. B.R., 262.

31. In 1964, the Premiers of the Centre and the Provinces in Canada agreed that unanimous consent of Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures would be required for the most significant amendments to the Canadian Constitution. But this proposal was not effectuated.

In 1949, power was given to Parliament of Canada to amend that portion of the B.N.A. Act which related to matters concerning the Central Government alone, e.g., apportionment of seats in the House of Commons. But, with respect to that portion of the B.N.A. Act which concerned both the Centre and the Provinces, e.g., the distribution of powers, the amending power still vested in the British Parliament as there was no agreement in Canada on the alternative procedure to be followed for the purpose.

In 1982, the British Parliament enacted the Canada Act, 1982, on the request of the Canadian Parliament conferring amending power on the Canadian Parliament and Provincial Assemblies. The federal portions of the B.N.A. Act can now be amended by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons plus resolutions of 2/3 of the Provincial Legislative Assemblies having at least 50% of the population of all the Provinces. Each and every resolution is to be passed by a majority of members of each House if the amendment derogates from the legislative powers, proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a Province. Where an amendment applies to some but not all Provinces, it can be made by Senate, House of Commons and the Legislative Assembly of each Province to which the amendment applies.[32]

(c) AUSTRALIA

The process of constitutional amendment involves two stages: initiation and ratification.

An amendment to the Constitution may be proposed by an absolute majority of each House of Parliament, or by an absolute majority of one House in two votes taken at an interval of at least three months. Thereafter, the proposed amendment becomes effective on ratification at a referendum by a majority of electors voting both in a majority of States and in the Commonwealth and on receiving the assent of the Governor-General (this, of course, is purely a formal matter).[33]

No amendment diminishing the proportionate representation of a State in either House of the Federal Parliament, or the minimum number of representatives of a State in the Federal Lower House, or altering the limits of the States, can be adopted unless it is also approved by a majority of electors of the State concerned.

The constitution-amending process in Australia has proved to be very rigid in practice. Many amendments deemed essential by the Commonwealth Government have been rejected at the referenda. A learned author has said: "Constitutionally speaking, Australia is the frozen continent."[34]

Since 1900, when the Constitution came into force, only 9 amendments have been effectuated, although 37 referenda involving a number of amendments have been held.[35] The process of popular referendum has proved to be a difficult method to amend the Constitution. Some proposals though approved by a majority of the electorate throughout Australia, have failed to be effective because they

---

32. R.I. CHEFFINS, The Constitution Act, 1982 and the Amending formula in BELOBABA AND GERTNER, THE NEW CONSTITUTION AND THE CHARTER OF RIGHTS, 43-54 (1982).
33. Art. 128 of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, 1900.
34. SAWER, AUSTRALIAN FEDERALISM IN COURTS, 208.
35. COLIN HOWARD, AUSTRALIAN FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 565 (1985).

could not secure majorities in four of the six States. No proposal has failed so far because it has secured approval in a majority of States but has not secured an over-all majority throughout Australia.[36]

C. FORMAL CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT IN INDIA

Different degress of rigidity attach to different portions of the Constitution, depending on their importance and significance. The Constitution, accordingly, provides for the following three classes of amendments of its provisions:

(1) Constitutional provisions of comparatively less significance can be amended by the simple legislative process as is adopted in passing ordinary legislation in Parliament;

(2) those provisions which are material and vital are made relatively stable as these can be amended only by following the rule of special majority as laid down in Art. 368;

(3) there are certain constitutional provisions relating to the federal character, which may be characterised as the 'entrenched provisions, which need for their amendment, in addition to the passage of the amending Bill by the special majority in the two Houses of Parliament, ratification by half of the State Legislatures. This procedure is also laid down in Art. 368.

The more elaborate procedure of referendum or constitutional convention has been avoided in India. The constitution-makers thus sought to find a via media between the two extremes of flexibility and rigidity so that the Constitution may keep pace with social dynamism in the country.

(a) CATEGORY (1)

Several Articles of the Constitution make provisions of a tentative nature, and Parliament has been given power to make laws making provisions different from what these Articles provide for. Such a law can be made by the ordinary legislative process, and is not to be regarded as an amendment of the Constitution and is not subject to the special procedure prescribed in Art. 368. In most of the cases, the constitutional text remains intact but Parliament makes different provisions. These Articles of the Constitution are as follows:

(1) When Parliament admits a new State under Art. 2, it can effect consequential amendments in Schedules I and IV defining territory and allocating seats in the Rajya Sabha amongst the various States respectively.[37]

(2) Under Art. 11, Parliament is empowered to make any provision for acquisition and termination of, and all other matters relating to, citizenship in spite of Arts. 5 to 10.[38]

---

36. BOWIE AND FRIEDRICH, STUDIES IN FEDERALISM, 830 (1954); WHEARE, FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, 222-5 (1947); WHEARE, MODERN CONSTITUTIONS, 121-45 (1964).

37. Supra, Ch. V, Sec. B.

38. Supra, Ch. XVIII, Sec. A.

(3) Article 73(2) retains certain executive powers in the States and their officers until Parliament otherwise provides.[39]

(4) Arts. 59(3),[40] 75(6),[41] 97,[42] 125(2),[43] 148(3),[44] 158(3)[45] and 221(2)[46] permit amendment by Parliament of the Second Schedule dealing with salaries and allowances of certain officers created by the Constitution.

(5) Art. 105(3)[47] prescribes parliamentary privileges until it is defined by Parliament.

(6) Art. 124(1)[48] prescribes that Supreme Court shall have a Chief Justice and seven Judges until Parliament increases the strength of the Judges.

(7) Art. 133(3)[49] prohibits an appeal from the judgment of a single Judge of a High Court to the Supreme Court unless Parliament provides otherwise.

(8) Art. 135[50] confers jurisdiction on the Supreme Court (equivalent to the Federal Court), unless Parliament otherwise provides.

(9) Under Art. 137,[51] Supreme Court's power to review its own judgments is subject to a law made by Parliament.

(10) Art. 171(2)[52] states that the composition of the State Legislative Council as laid down in Art. 170(3) shall endure until Parliament makes a law providing otherwise.

(11) Art. 343(3)[53] provides that Parliament may by law provide for the use of English even after 15 years as prescribed in Art. 343(2).

(12) Art. 348(1)[54] establishes English as the language to be used in the Supreme Court and the High Courts and of legislation until Parliament provides otherwise.

(13) Schedules V and VI deal with administration of the Scheduled Areas and Scheduled Tribes and Tribal Areas in Assam which may be amended by Parliament making a law.[55]

There are certain other Articles in the Constitution which make tentative provisions until a law is made by the Parliament by following the ordinary legislative process, but before Parliament can act, the States have to take some action.

---

39. Supra, Chs. III, Sec. D(iii) and XII, Sec. A.
40. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i).
41. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
42. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. H and III, Sec. A(i)(f); Sec. A(ii)(b).
43. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. B(i).
44. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(s).
45. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. A(i).
46. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(l).
47. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(v).
48. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. B(a).
49. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(iv)(c).
50. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I(b).
51. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. H.
52. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(i).
53. Supra, Ch. XVI, Sec. B.
54. Supra, Ch. XVI, Sec. B; Sec. C(a).
55. Paras 7 and 21 of the V & VI Schedules respectively; supra, Ch. IX, Sec. C.

Thus, Art. 3 provides for the re-organisation of the States. Parliament may pass a law for the purpose and effect consequential amendments in the I and IV Schedules.[56] Before doing so, however, it is necessary to ascertain the views of the States concerned.

Under Art. 169, Parliament may abolish a State Legislative Council, or create one in a State not having it, if the State Legislative Assembly passes a resolution to that effect by a majority of its total membership and by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting. The Parliamentary law enacted for the purpose may contain such provisions amending the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to it, and it is not to be regarded as an amendment of the Constitution for the purposes of Art. 368.[57]

Corresponding to Arts. 75(6) and 105(3), there are Arts. 164(5) and 194(3) which make tentative provisions until a State Legislature makes other provisions. They relate respectively to salaries of Ministers in a State[58] and privileges of the Houses.[59] These are the only Articles in the Constitution which enable a State Legislature to make provisions different from what the Constitution prescribes in the first instance.

(b) CATEGORIES (2) AND (3)

The process to amend and adapt other provisions of the Indian Constitution is contained in Art. 368. The phraseology of Art. 368 has been amended twice since the inauguration of the Constitution. However, the basic features of the amending procedure have remained intact in spite of these changes. These basic features are:

(i) An amendment of the Constitution can be initiated only by introducing a Bill for the purpose in either House of Parliament.

(ii) After the Bill is passed by each House by a majority of its total membership, and a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members of that House present and voting, and after receiving the assent of the President, the Constitution stands amended in accordance with the terms of the Bill.

(iii) To amend certain constitutional provisions relating to its federal character, characterised as the 'entrenched provisions', after the Bill to amend the Constitution is passed by the Houses of Parliament as mentioned above, but before being presented to the President for his assent, it has also to be ratified by the legislatures of not less than one-half of the States by resolutions.

The 'entrenched provisions' which are given this additional safeguard are:

(a) The manner of election of the President: Arts. 54 and 55.[60]

---

56. Supra, Ch. V, Sec. B.
57. Supra, Ch. VI.
For discussion on Art. 368, see, infra, this Chapter.
58. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. A(ii).
59. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. H.
60. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i)(a).

(b) Extent of the executive power of the Union and the States: Arts. 73[61] and 162.[62]

(c) The Supreme Court[63] and the High Courts:[64] Arts. 124-147 and 214-231.

(d) The scheme of distribution of legislative, taxing and administrative powers between the Union and the States: Arts. 245-255.[65]

(e) Representation of the States in Parliament.[66]

(f) Art. 368 itself.

The procedure to amend the 'entrenched provisions' is in conformity with the federal principle which requires the consent of the State Legislatures also to any amendment which vitally affects federalism in which both the Centre and the States are interested.

A point of some constitutional significance came up before the Mysore Legislature with respect to Art. 368. The Constitution (Third Amendment) Bill was passed by Parliament in October, 1954. Under Article 368, it needed ratification by one-half of the State Legislatures before the President could give his assent. The Bill was circulated to all States and two days before the Mysore Legislative Assembly was to meet, the President gave his assent as one-half of the State Legislatures had ratified the measure. The Mysore Legislature had not discussed the amendment at all by then, as all the papers were not received by the time the last session was adjourned, and the President's assent was given before the Legislature met in the next session.

Now a question was raised whether the President could give his assent to an Amendment Bill even though some of the State Legislatures had not actually discussed the measure. Since the Article says that the Amendment must be ratified by one-half of the State Legislatures before it is presented to the President for assent, it may not, in the strict legal sense, be unconstitutional for the President to give his assent after ratification by one-half of the State Legislatures had been received. But the actual result may be to deprive some State Legislatures of an opportunity to consider the proposed amendment before it becomes effective. To announce the President's assent even while the process of ratification by the State Legislatures is going on, simply because one-half of the State Legislatures have already agreed to the amendment, seems like announcing a decision even while the process of counting of votes is going on. It is suggested that since the President is not obligated to give his assent as soon as one-half of the State Legislatures have ratified the Bill, a convention may be developed to postpone Presidential assent till all the State Legislatures desiring to discuss the measure have had an adequate opportunity to do so.

An unsolved question under Art. 368 is whether the 'special' majority rule applies to every stage, or only at the final stage, of passing a constitution amending bill. Since 1950, a view has been taken that this rule should be applied to all

---

61. Supra, Chs. III, Sec. D(iii) and XII, Sec. B.
62. Supra, Chs. VII and XII.
63. Supra, Ch. IV.
64. Supra, Ch. VIII.
65. Supra, Chs. X, XI and XII.
66. Supra, Ch. II, Secs. B and C.

stages. On the other hand, a view may plausibly be taken that the word 'passed' in Art. 368 refers to passing at the final stage only.

When an amendment bill seeks to amend more than one Article of the Constitution, each clause of the bill has to be passed by the special majority. Under Rule 158 of the Lok Sabha Rules, 'total membership' means the total number of members comprising the House irrespective of any vacancies or absentees at any moment.

Originally, the marginal note to Art. 368 read as: "Procedure for amendment of the Constitution". In 1971, this was changed to "Power of Parliament to amend the Constitution and Procedure therefor".[67]

A clause was added to Art. 368 saying that "Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, Parliament may in exercise of its constituent power amend by way of addition, variation or repeal any provision of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in this Article." It was now clarified that after the Bill was passed by Parliament by the prescribed special majority, it would be obligatory on the President to give his assent to it. Finally, a new clause was added to Art. 368 saying that nothing in Art. 13 shall apply to any amendment made under Art. 368. Correspondingly, a clause was added to Art. 13 saying that nothing in Art. 13 shall apply to any amendment of the Constitution made under Art. 368. The rationale of, and the background to, these modifications introduced in Art. 368, and the effect thereof, are explained later.[68]

In 1976, the following two clauses were added to Art. 368 by the Forty-second Amendment of the Constitution:

> "(4) No amendment of this Constitution (including the provisions of Part III) made or purporting to have been made under this article whether before or after the commencement of S. 55 of the Constitution (Forty-second) Amendment Act, 1976,[69] shall be called in question in any Court on any ground."
>
> (5) For the removal of doubts it is hereby declared that there shall be no limitation whatever on the constituent power of Parliament to amend by way of addition, variation or repeal the provisions of this Constitution under this article."

The rationale of, the background to, and the effect of, these amendments have been explained below.[70]

D. AMENDABILITY OF THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION

Since 1951, questions have been raised about the scope of the constitutional amending process contained in Art. 368.

The basic question raised has been whether the Fundamental Rights were amendable so as to dilute or take away any Fundamental Right through a constitutional amendment? Since 1951, a number of amendments have been effectu-

67. See, infra, Sub-Sec. (d).
68. Infra, Sub-Sec. (d).
69. S. 55 means this very clause which was being added by the Amendment in question.
70. Infra, Sub-Sec. (d).

ated in the Fundamental Rights. The cumulative effect of these amendments has been to curtail, to some extent, the scope of some of these rights.

The worst affected Fundamental Right has been the right to property contained in Art. 31 which has been amended several times. The basic trend of these amendments has been to immunize, to some extent, state interference with property rights from challenge under Arts. 14, 19 and 31 as well as to seek to exclude the question of compensation for acquisition or requisitioning of property by the state from judicial purview.[71] The constitutional validity of these amendments has been challenged a number of times before the Supreme Court.

(a) SHANKARI PRASAD SINGH

In Shankari Prasad Singh v. Union of India,[72] the first case on amendability of the Constitution, the validity of the Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951, curtailing the right to property guaranteed by Art. 31 was challenged.[73] The argument against the validity of the First Amendment was that Art. 13 prohibits enactment of a law infringing or abrogating the Fundamental Rights,[74] that the word 'law' in Art. 13 would include any law, even a law amending the Constitution and, therefore, the validity of such a law could be judged and scrutinised with reference to the Fundamental Rights which it could not infringe.

Here was thus posed a conflict between Arts. 13 and 368. Adopting the literal interpretation of the Constitution,[75] the Supreme Court upheld the validity of the First Amendment. The Court rejected the contention and limited the scope of Art. 13 by ruling that the word 'law' in Art. 13 would not include within its compass a constitution amending law passed under Art. 368. The Court stated on this point: "We are of the opinion that is the context of Art. 13 law must be taken to mean rules and regulations made in the exercise of ordinary legislative power and not amendments to the Constitution made in the exercise of constituent power with the result that Art. 13(2) does not affect amendments made under Art. 368".

The Court held that the terms of Art. 368 are perfectly general and empower Parliament to amend the Constitution without any exception. The Fundamental Rights are not excluded or immunized from the process of constitutional amendment under Art. 368. These rights could not be invaded by legislative organs by means of laws and rules made in exercise of legislative powers, but they could certainly be curtailed, abridged or even nullified by alterations in the Constitution itself in exercise of the constituent power.

The Court insisted that there is a clear demarcation between ordinary law, which is made in exercise of legislative power, and constitutional law, which is made in exercise of constituent power.

Both Arts. 13 and 368 are widely phrased and conflict in operation with each other. To avoid the conflict, the principle of harmonious construction[76] should be applied. Accordingly, one of these Articles ought to be read as being controlled and qualified by the other. In the context of Art. 13, it must be read subject to

---

71. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C..
72. AIR 1951 SC 458.
73. Infra, Ch. XLII; Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. B.
74. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. C.
75. See, supra, Ch. XL, Sec. D(a).
76. Supra, Ch. XL, Sec. F.

Art. 368. Therefore, the word 'law' in Art. 13 must be taken to refer to rules and regulations made in exercise of ordinary legislative power, and not to constitutional amendments made in the exercise of the constituent power under Art. 368 with the result that Art. 13(2) does not affect amendments made under Art. 368.

The Court, thus, disagreed with the view that the Fundamental Rights are inviolable and beyond the reach of the process of constitutional amendment. The Court, thus, ruled that Art. 13 refers to a 'legislative' law, i.e., an ordinary law made by a legislature,[77] but not to a constituent' law, i.e., a law made to amend the Constitution. The Court thus held that Parliament could by following the 'procedure' laid down in Art. 368 amend any Fundamental Right.

(b) SAJJAN SINGH

For the next 13 years following Shankari Prasad, the question of amendability of the Fundamental Rights remained dormant.

The same question was raised again in 1964 in Sajjan Singh v. Rajasthan,[78] when the validity of the Constitution (Seventeenth Amendment) Act, 1964,[79] was called in question. This Amendment again adversely affected the right to property. By this amendment, a number of statutes affecting property rights were placed in the Ninth Schedule and were thus immunized from Court review.[80]

In the instant case, the Court was called upon to decide the following questions:

> (1) Whether the amendment of the Constituion insofar as it purported to take away or abridged the Fundamental Rights was within the prohibition of Art. 13(2); and
>
> (2) Whether Articles 31A and 31B (as amended by the XVIIth Amendment) sought to make changes to Arts. 132, 136 and 226, or in any of the Lists in the VIIth Schedule of the Constitution, so that the conditions prescribed in the proviso to Art. 368 had to be satisfied?

One of the arguments was that the amendment in question reduced the area of judicial review (as under the Ninth Schedule, many statutes had been immunized from attack before a Court); it, thus, affected Art. 226 and, therefore, could be made only by following the procedure prescribed in Art. 368 for amending the 'entrenched provisions', that is, the concurrence of at least half of the States ought to have been secured for the amendment to be validly effectuated.[81]

Such an argument had also been raised in the Shankari Pd. case but without success. The Supreme Court again rejected the argument by a majority of 3 to 2. The majority ruled that the 'pith and substance'[82] of the Amendment was only to amend the Fundamental Right so as to help the State Legislatures in effectuating the policy of the agrarian reform. If it affected Art. 226 in an insignificant manner, that was only incidental; it was an indirect effect of the Seventeenth

---

77. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. J(i) and VI, Sec. F(i).
78. AIR 1965 SC 845.
79. Supra, Chs. XXXI and XXXII; infra, next Chapter.
80. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C.
81. Supra, Sec. C(b).
82. Supra, Ch. XL, Sec. H.

Amendment and it did not amount to an amendment of Art. 226.[83] The impugned Act did not change Art. 226 in any way.

The conclusion of the Supreme Court in Shankari Pd. as regards the relation between Arts. 13 and 368 was reiterated by the majority. It felt no hesitation in holding that the power of amending the Constitution conferred on Parliament under Art. 368 could be exercised over each and every provision of the Constitution. The majority refused to accept the argument that Fundamental Rights were "eternal, inviolate, and beyond the reach of Art. 368."

The Court again drew the distinction between an 'ordinary' law and a 'constitutional' law made in exercise of 'constituent power' and held that only the former, and not the latter, fell under Art. 13.

However, the minority consisting of HIDAYATULLAH and MUDHOLKAR, JJ., in separate judgments, expressed some reservations on the question whether Art. 13 would not control Art. 368. "I would require stronger reasons than those given in Shankari Prasad's case", observed HIDAYATULLAH, J., "to make me accept the view that Fundamental Rights were not really fundamental but were intended to be within the powers of amendment in common with the other parts of the Constitution and without concurrence of the States," because, "the Constitution gives so many assurances in Part III that it would be difficult to think that they were play-things of a special majority."

MUDHOLKAR, J., felt reluctant "to express a definite opinion on the question whether the word 'law' in Art. 13(2) of the Constitution excludes an Act of Parliament amending the Constitution and also whether it is competent to Parliament to make any amendment at all to Part III of the Constitution." But MUDHOLKAR, J.'s argument was set in a much broader frame. His basic argument was that every constitution has certain fundamental features which could not be changed.

As will be seen, Golak Nath, the next case, was based on HIDAYATULLAH, J.'s argument of non-amendability of Fundamental Rights, but Kesavananda was based on MUDHOLKAR, J.'s view of basic features.[84]

(c) GOLAK NATH

Perhaps, encouraged by the above stated remarks of the two Judges, the question whether any of the Fundamental Rights could be abridged or taken away by Parliament in exercise of its power under Art. 368 was raised again in Golak Nath in 1967.[85] Again, the constitutional validity of the Constitution (Seventeenth Amendment) Act was challenged[86] in a very vigorous and determined manner. Eleven Judges participated in the decision and they divided 6 to 5.

The majority now held, overruling the earlier cases of Shankari Prasad and Sajjan Singh, that the Fundamental Rights were non-amendable through the constitutional amending procedure set out in Art. 368, while the minority upheld the line of reasoning adopted by the Court in the two earlier cases.

The majority now took the position that the Fundamental Rights occupy a "transcendental" position in the Constitution, so that no authority functioning

---

83. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D.
84. Infra, Sec. D(e).
85. L.C. Golak Nath v. State of Punjab, AIR 1967 SC 1643 : 1967 (2) SCR 762.
86. See, supra, Ch. XXXII; Infra, next Chapter.

under the Constitution, including Parliament exercising the amending power under Art. 368, would be competent to amend the Fundamental Rights. The majority was worried at the numerous amendments of the Fundamental Rights which had taken place since 1950. It apprehended that if the courts were to hold that Parliament had power to take away or abridge the Fundamental Rights, a time might come when these rights are completely eroded and India would gradually and imperceptibly pass under a totalitarian regime. This fear coloured and conditioned the approach of the majority to the question of amendability of the Fundamental Rights. The majority thus sought to make the Fundamental Rights inviolable by constitutional amendment by ruling that Parliament could not, under Art. 368, amend any Fundamental Right.

SUBBA RAO, C.J., speaking on behalf of himself and four other Judges, equated Fundamental Rights with natural rights and characterised them as "the primordial rights necessary for the development of human personality": He then raised the poser that when Parliament could not affect Fundamental Rights by enacting a Bill in its ordinary legislative process even unanimously, how could it then abrogate a Fundamental Right with only a two-third majority? While Articles of less significance require consent of the majority of the States, can Fundamental Rights be amended without such a consent?

The Chief Justice developed the following line of argumentation to reach the conclusion that the Fundamental Rights could not be amended. Art. 368 (as it existed at that time) merely laid down the procedure for constitutional amendment and did not by itself confer a substantive power to amend. For this argument, the Chief Justice referred to the marginal heading of Art. 368.[87] The power to amend the Constitution was to be found in the residuary legislative power of Parliament contained in Art. 248,[88] because such a power was not expressly conferred by any article or any legislative entry in the Constitution. Accordingly, amendment to the Constitution would be a 'law' for purposes of Art. 13.

Overruling the position adopted by the Court in Shankari Prasad and Sajjan Singh, it was now ruled that the term 'law' in a comprehensive sense would include constitutional law as well. Art. 13(2) gives an inclusive definition of 'law' which would take in even constitutional law. The Court formulated its position as follows: "an amendment of the Constitution is law within the inclusive definition of law under Article 13(2) of the Constitution and, as the entire scheme of the Constitution postulates the inviolability of Part III thereof, Article 368 shall not be so construed as to destroy the structure of our Constitution".

Under Art. 368, a constitutional amendment is to be enacted by following a procedure which is very similar to the procedure for making laws. The fact that a larger majority, and in case of amendment of some Articles even ratification by State Legislatures, are provided for, would not make the constitutional amendment any the less a 'law'. Therefore, the amendment made under Art. 368 is 'law' and is subject to Art. 13. The Constitution Amendment Act in question was thus held void inasmuch as it abridged the Fundamental Right. Thus, the majority ruled that the Fundamental Rights would fall outside the amendatory process if the amendment sought to abridge or take away any of these rights.

---

87. Supra, 2318.
88. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. I; Ch. XI, Sec. G.

At this stage, the five Judges took recourse to the doctrine of 'prospective overruling' because of two reasons.[89] First, the power of Parliament to amend the Fundamental Rights, and the First and the Seventeenth Amendments specifically,[90] had been upheld previously by the Supreme Court in Shankari Pd. and Sajjan Singh. Secondly, during 1950 to 1967, a large body of legislation had been enacted bringing about an agrarian revolution in India. This legislation was based on the premise that Parliament had authority to amend Fundamental Rights. If the Supreme Court were now to give effect, to its view of non-amendability of Fundamental Rights with retrospective effect and were to hold the Seventeenth Amendment void, it would affect the constitutional validity of this legislation, introduce chaos and unsettle conditions in the country. Therefore, the present decision was not to invalidate the amendmentsmade so far to the Fundamental Rights. But, in future, Parliament would have no power to take away or abridge any of the Fundamental Rights.

HIDAYATULLAH, J., in a separate judgment, held that because of Art. 13, there was no power to amend Fundamental Rights as there was no difference between legislative and amending processes. He refused to disturb the past amendments because they had stood for long and people had acquiesced in them.

Also, it was argued that the fact that the Fundamental Rights were not mentioned among the entrenched provisions meant that they were regarded as non-amendable. "It would attribute unreasonableness to the makers of the Constitution" if "while articles of less significance would require consent of the majority of States, Fundamental Rights can be dropped without such consent."[91]

To make Fundamental Rights non-amendable, the majority refused to accept the thesis that there is any distinction between 'legislative' and 'constituent' processes. It went even further and asserted that the amending process in Art. 368 is merely 'legislative' and not 'constituent' in nature. This was the crux of the whole argument. If a Constitution Amendment Act could be regarded as just an ordinary law then it could plausibly be caught by Art. 13. To bolster this position, the majority went to the extent of saying that Art. 368 did not confer any amending power but merely laid down the procedure therefor.

The majority located the amending power in Art. 248 which only grants legislative power with a view to annihilate the distinction between 'legislative' and 'constituent' power.[92] The majority found countenance to its argument from one anomalous feature of Art. 368, viz., that the procedure laid down therein is very similar to the ordinary legislative process. The provision for Presidential assent is also similar to that of ordinary legislative process.

The five minority Judges delivered three separate opinions, and upheld the power of Parliament to amend Fundamental Rights. Their fear was that the Constitution would become static if no such powers were conceded to Parliament. The formalistic arguments adopted by these Judges were as follows: Art. 368 itself contains the power to amend the Constitution; such a power is not to be found in Art. 248 which confers only legislative power and that, too, 'subject to the provisions of the Constitution'; the Constitution being the fundamental law,

89. Supra, Ch. XL, Sec. G.
90. Infra, Ch. XLII.
91. AIR 1967 SC 1643, 1658 : 1967 (2) SCR 762.
92. Art. 248 refers to the residuary power of Parliament. Supra, Chs. X, Sec. I and XI, Sec. G.

no law passed under the legislative power could effect a change in the Constitution itself. An amendment to the Constitution is an exercise of constituent power, while passing of an ordinary law constitutes an exercise of ordinary legislative power which is different from the constituent power.

Although the procedure laid down in Art. 368 does very much correspond with legislative process, yet the quality and nature of what is done under Art. 368 is very much different from ordinary legislation. What is done under Art. 368 is amending the Constitution and not the passage of an ordinary law. What Parliament does under Art. 368 is not subject to Art. 13(2); Art. 13 places no limitation on the amending power and, accordingly, any provision of the Constitution, even a Fundamental Right, could be amended under Art. 368. The word 'law' in Art. 13 does not include an amendment of the Constitution. Art. 368 does not use the word 'law' at all; it studiously avoids the use of the word 'law'.

The power of amendment is not subject to any express or implied restrictions. If the constitution-makers had wanted to make the Fundamental Rights unamendable, they could have easily made an express provision in the Constitution to that effect. These Judges also refused to accept the doctrine of prospective overruling as enunciated by SUBBA RAO, C.J., in his judgment.[1]

The following four major propositions can be drawn from the majority opinion in Golak Nath:

(1) The substantive power to amend is not to be found in Art. 368, this Article only contains the procedure to amend the Constitution;

(2) A law made under Art. 368 would be subject to Art. 13(2) like any other law;[2]

(3) The word 'amend' envisaged only minor modifications in the existing provisions but not any major alterations therein;

(4) To amend the Fundamental Rights, a Constituent Assembly ought to be convened by Parliament.

The majority opinion in Golak Nath emanated from the premise that Fundamental Rights are fundamental and need to be protected. The majority was afraid of a possible erosion of the Fundamental Rights if the process of amendment of these rights continued unabated and was not halted. The majority set up the major premise that these rights are transcendental and must not, therefore, be allowed to be whittled down by Parliament.[3]

It is true that far reaching amendments had been made to some of these rights, and, at times, in a hurry and not always after a cool and mature consideration, and so the majority genuinely apprehended that these rights might be completely eroded in future. Nevertheless, what the Court laid down in Golak Nath was unprecedented, and its logic could not stand a close scrutiny.

---

1. Supra, Ch. XL, Sec. G.
2. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. C.
3. AIR 1967 SC 1643, 1664.
For discussion on this point see: D. CONRAD, Limitation of Amendment Procedures and the Constituent Power, Indian Year Book of International Affairs (1966-67), 377-430.

An amending process is a recognised part of every written constitution. Howsoever rigid the amending process may be in a constitution, in no constitution any of its parts is regarded as non-amendable. Even in the U.S.A., it has not been argued that the guaranteed civil rights are beyond the reach of the amending process. In fact, they were added to the U.S. Constitution through such a process. It is difficult to imagine that the constitution-makers were not cognisant of the need to amend the Constitution in course of time and, therefore, it is inconceivable that they would have left the power to amend the constitution to be inferred from the residuary power of Parliament under Art. 248,[4] and not directly from the specific and direct provision like Art. 368. In fact, the historical evidence establishes that the members of the Constituent Assembly wanted neither a too flexible nor a too rigid constitution.[5]

It is also difficult to believe that the constitution-makers would have left such a significant point as the non-amendability of the Fundamental Rights to be inferred by a circuitous process of argumentation. Had they wished for such a result, they could have easily declared in specific terms that these rights would be non-amendable. Then, taking into consideration the totality of the constitutional process, many other portions of the Constitution like adult suffrage, parliamentary form of government, etc., are in no way less significant than the Fundamental Rights , but these parts were not held to be non-amendable in Golak Nath.

The apprehension entertained by the Judges regarding the introduction of a totalitarian regime by eliminating all the Fundamental Rights in course of time, could materialize, to some extent, by abolishing Art. 226, or doing away with adult suffrage, etc. Therefore, if the argument of fear were to be taken to its logical end, then not only the Fundamental Rights but many other provisions of the Constitution would have to be declared to be non-amendable. But the majority opinion in Golak Nath was an example of judicial creativity and policy-oriented approach by the Judges—the judicial policy being to make Fundamental Rights inviolable so as to avoid the emergence of a totalitarian regime in future. The majority Judges were prompted to adopt such judicial approach in view of the manifold amendments made to the Fundamental Rights by the ruling party since 1950.

It is true that Art. 368 suffers from an anomaly. While for amending certain provisions, characterised as the 'entrenched clauses', consent of at least half of the State Legislatures is stipulated in addition to the special majority in Parliament, it is not so with respect to the Fundamental Rights.

The majority did not assert that these rights were beyond the reach of any amending process whatsoever. What in fact it said was that such a result could not be achieved by following the procedure under Art. 368. The majority suggested the setting up of a constituent assembly to reach that result. Parliament could use its residuary power under Art. 248, to convene a constituent assembly to make a new constitution or radically changing the existing one.[6]

---

4. Supra, Chs. X, Sec. I and XI, Sec. G.
5. See AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION, 255-64.
6. For discussion on this point see, infra.

An interesting academic question having a bearing on the scope, range, depth and pervasiveness of Art. 368 was raised and discussed in Golak Nath. Art. 368 uses the word 'amendment'. Now, can this word be stretched to the point of abrogation of the Constitution, its complete rewriting, or even drastically changing some of its basic tenets like the parliamentary executive, federalism, democratic processes, etc.?

The majority in Golak Nath did not give a categorical answer to this poser. It merely said that there was considerable force in the argument that Art. 368 does not confer such a drastic power. Even the minority cast doubts whether such a drastic power as the power of abrogating the Constitution and substituting it by a new one could be read in Art. 368. Short of that, the minority had no doubt that the amending power would include the power to add, alter, substitute, or delete any provision in the Constitution without any limitation.[7] As events showed, this argument assumed crucial significance later in Kesavananda.[8]

Commenting on Golak Nath, this author had observed in the second edition of this book:

> "What can, therefore, be said with some definiteness is that Art. 368 does not permit an entire rewriting of the Constitution. If ever that is deemed necessary some other method will have to be thought of. What that method will be, is not clear at present. Even calling of a constituent assembly for the purpose, as has been suggested by the majority, has this logical flaw that such a body could be called only by Parliament and if the source, or the parent body, viz., Parliament, cannot do something by itself, can its creature, i.e., the constituent assembly, do the same?[9] A law passed by Parliament authorising the constituent assembly to rewrite the Constitution could plausibly be challenged on the ground of excessive delegation. Also how can the Assembly have a broader basis of franchise than the adult suffrage on which Parliament is elected? Perhaps, a very broad consensus, if achieved, could show the way, if and when it is felt necessary, to undertake the exercise of rewriting the Constitution. Short of that, the power of amendment can be used to effect modifications in the Constitution, subject to the poser as to how far Parliament alone or along with State Legislatures could go in this direction. For, it does appear to remain open to the Supreme Court to interpret the word 'amendment' in Art. 368 narrowly and cry a halt to the amending process if it feels at a particular moment that things are going too far in subverting the basic tenets of the Constitution on the ground that what is being done exceeds the bounds of the word 'amendment' and, thus, of the amending power contained in Art. 368."[10]

Golak Nath raised an acute controversy in the country. One school of thought applauded the majority decision as a vindication of the Fundamental Rights, while the other school criticised it as creating hindrances in the way of enactment

---

7. Ibid.
8. Infra, Sec. D(e).
9. A demand for convening a constituent assembly for rewriting the Constitution was rejected by the Central Government: Rajya Sabha Debates, May 15, 1970.
10. JAIN, Indian Constitutional Law, at 790.

of socio-economic legislation required to meet the needs of a developing society.[11]

Golak Nath threw a great responsibility on the courts for, if the Fundamental Rights were to be unamendable in a formal manner, then it would be for the courts to so interpret the relevant constitutional provisions as to cause minimum hindrance in the way of enactment of legislation designed to ameliorate the condition of the poor masses. In such a context, the institution of judicial review as a method of adapting and adjusting the constitutional text to the contemporary socio-economic needs of the country would assume a far greater significance than it had ever commanded hitherto when the Fundamental Rights could have been formally amended with ease. That the courts could have coped with such a demand on them is very aptly illustrated by the history of the judicial review in the U.S.A., particularly, in the post New Deal era,[12] as well as in India after the year 1978.

(d) AMENDMENT OF ART. 368 : TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT

To neutralise the effect of Golak Nath, Nath Pai, M.P., introduced a private member's bill in the Lok Sabha on April 7, 1967, for amending Art. 368, so as to make it explicit that any constitutional provision could be amended by following the procedure contained in Art. 368. The proposed bill was justified as an assertion of the "Supremacy of Parliament" which principle implied "the right and authority of Parliament to amend even the Fundamental Rights."[13]

Nath Pai's bill did not however make much headway in Parliament. It was criticised as "an effront to the dignity of the Supreme Court" and as placing the Fundamental Rights at the "mercy of a transient majority in Parliament." There was also a feeling that the bill when enacted would itself be subject to a challenge in the courts and could be declared unconstitutional if the Supreme Court were to reiterate its Golak Nath ruling.

In the 1971 general election, the Congress Party was returned with a huge majority in the Lok Sabha and the party was placed in the position of undoing the effect of Golak Nath. Accordingly, in 1971, Parliament enacted the Constitution (Twenty-fourth) Amendment Act introducing certain modifications in Arts. 13 and 368 to get over the Golak Nath ruling and to assert the power of Parliament, denied to it in Golak Nath, to amend the Fundamental Rights.[14] Thus, an attempt was now made to undo the effect of Golak Nath.

---

11. For a jurisprudential discussion on these cases see: A.R. BLACKSHIELD, Fundamental Rights and the Economic Viability of the Indian Nation, X JILI 1 (1968), and Fundamental Rights and The Institutional Viability of the Indian Supreme Court, 8 JILI 139 (1966); UPEN BAXI, The Little Done, the Vast Undone, 9 JILI 323 (1967).

For analytical comments on Golak Nath see, SEERVAI, THE POSITION OF THE JUDICIARY, 137 et seq. and CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF INDIA, 1095, 1109 (1967); SATHE, FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND AMENDMENT OF THE INDIAN CONST. (1968); Int of Const. & Parl. Studies, PARLIAMENT & CONST. AMENDMENT (1970); GAJENDRAGADKAR, THE INDIAN PARLIAMENT AND THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS (1972); D.D. BASU, LIMITED GOVT. AND JUDICIAL REVIEW, 498 et seq. (1972); RAJEEV DHAWAN, THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA AND PARLIAMENTARY SOVEREIGNTY (1976); HARI CHAND, AMENDING PROCESS IN THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION.

12. Supra, Ch. XL, Sec. A.

13. Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the Bill.

14. See, infra, Ch. XLII.

The rationale underlying the various clauses enacted by the Twenty-fourth Amendment was as follows.

The majority judgment in Golak Nath had taken the view that the word "law" in Art. 13 included a constitutional amendment as well, and, therefore, a Fundamental Right could not be curtailed or diluted.[15] To undo the effect of this pronouncement, the following changes were sought to be made in Arts. 13 and 368:

(a) It was now clarified that Art. 13 would not stand in the way of any constitutional amendment made under Art. 368. This was sought to be achieved by adding a clause to Art. 13 declaring that Art. 13 shall not apply to any constitutional amendment made under Art. 368.[16]

(b) As a matter of abundant caution, a clause was added to Art. 368 declaring that Art. 13 shall not apply to any constitutional amendment made under Art. 368.

(c) The marginal note to Art. 368 was changed from "Procedure for Amendment of the Constitution" to "Power of Parliament to amend the Constitution and Procedure therefor".

The majority in Golak Nath had asserted, by reference to the phraseology of the marginal note to Art. 368, that Art. 368 provided only the procedure for constitutional amendment and did not confer the power therefor.[17] The change in the marginal note was now made to clarify that Art. 368 conferred the power of constitutional amendment and did not lay down merely the procedure therefor.

(d) A clause was added to Art. 368 saying that "Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, Parliament may in exercise of its constituent power amend by way of addition, variation or repeal any provision of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in this Article".

The addition of the clause was designed to make an express grant of power to Parliament to amend any part of the Constitution including Fundamental Rights. It had been argued by Chief Justice SUBBA RAO in Golak Nath that since Art. 368 did not expressly authorise the curtailment of Fundamental Rights, such curtailment must be out of reach of the amending process. The Amendment now excluded such an inference being drawn by expressly including the Fundamental Rights within the scope of the amending process.

(e) A view had been expressed in Golak Nath that there was no difference between an ordinary law made under legislative process, and constitutional amendment made under constituent power. To prove this point, it had been pointed out that the Presidential power to assent, or not to assent, was similar in both cases—an ordinary law as well as a law passed under Art. 368.[18]

To meet this argument, it was now clarified that once a Constitution Amendment Bill is passed by both Houses of Parliament by the requisite majority in accordance with the procedure laid down in Art. 368, the President would have no option but to give his assent to it.

---

15. Supra, Sec. D(c).
16. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. C.
17. Supra, 2318, 2322.
18. Supra, Ch. II, , Sec. J(c).

In case of an ordinary law, the President does enjoy a choice either to give or refuse to give his assent, or to refer it back to Parliament for reconsideration.[19] In case of a bill amending the Constitution, it would be obligatory on the President to give his assent thereto. Thus, a differentiation was now sought to be made between an ordinary law and a law to amend the Constitution.

Along with the Twenty-fourth Amendment was also enacted the Twenty-fifth Amendment of the Constitution, the salient features of which, as discussed earlier,[20] were as follows:

(i) The word "amount" was substituted for the word "compensation" in Art. 31(2). This was done to remove any contention that the Government was bound to give adequate compensation for any property acquired by it;

(ii) Art. 19(1)(f) was delinked from Art. 31(2);

(iii) a new provision, Art. 31C, was added to the Constitution[21] saying—

(i) that Arts. 14, 19 and 31 would not apply to a law enacted to effectuate the policy underlying Arts. 39(b) and (c), and

(ii) that a declaration in the law that it was enacted to give effect to the policy under Arts. 39(b) and (c) would immunize the law from such a challenge in the Court.[22]

A State law could claim immunity from challenge only after receiving the assent of the President.

The effect of this clause was quite far reaching. Hitherto, Directive Principles had been treated as subservient to Fundamental Rights. Now this relationship was sought to be reversed; Directive Principles contained in Arts. 39(b) and (c) were now sought to be given precedence over Fundamental Rights contained in Arts. 14, 19 and 31. The Twenty-fifth Amendment thus further diluted the right to property.

(e) KESAVANANDA BHARATI

As could be expected, the constitutional validity of both the Amendments, viz., XXIV and XXV, was challenged in the Supreme Court through an Art. 32 writ-petition in Kesavananda Bharati v. State of Kerala,[23] by Swami Kesavananda Bharati, a mutt chief of Kerala. The matter was heard by a bench consisting of all the 13 Judges of the Court because Golak Nath, a decision by a Bench of 11 Judges was under review.

Wide ranging arguments were advanced before the Court for over 60 days both for and against the validity of the Amendments. Eleven opinions were delivered by the Judges on April 24, 1973.

(a) The Court now held that the power to amend the Constitution is to be found in Art. 368 itself. It was emphasized that the "provisions relating to the

---

19. Ibid.
20. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C(iii).
21. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. D.
Also see, infra, Ch. XLII.
22. For Arts. 39(b) and (c), see, supra, Ch. XXXIV, Secs. D(e) and (f).
23. AIR 1973 SC 1461.

amendment of the Constitution are some of the most important features of any modern Constitution".

HEGDE and MUKHERJEA, JJ., found it difficult to believe that the constitution-makers had left the important power to amend the Constitution hidden in Parliament's residuary power. On this point, therefore, the views expressed in Shankari Prasad and Sajjan Singh were endorsed and the view expressed in Golak Nath that the power to amend the Constitution was not to be found in Art. 368 was overruled.

(b) Further, the Court recognised that there is a distinction between an ordinary law and a constitutional law.

HEGDE and MUKHERJEA, JJ., stated in this connection: "An examination of the various provisions of our Constitution shows that it has made a distinction between 'the Constitution' and 'the laws'."[24] It was asserted that the constitution-makers did not use the expression "law" in Art. 13 as including "constitutional law". This would thus mean that Art. 368 confers power to abridge a Fundamental Right or any other part of the Constitution. To this extent, therefore, Golak Nath was now overruled.

(c) But Kesavananda did not concede an unlimited amending power to Parliament under Art. 368. The amending power was now subjected to one very significant qualification, viz., that the amending power cannot be exercised in such a manner as to destroy or emasculate the basic or Fundamental Features of the Constitution. A constitutional amendment which offends the basic structure of the Constitution is ultra vires.

(d) Some of the features regarded by the Court as fundamental and, thus, non-amendable are:[25]

(i) Supremacy of the Constitution:

(ii) Republican and democratic form of government;

(iii) Secular character of the Constitution;

(iv) Separation of powers between legislative, executive and the judiciary;

(v) Federal character of the Constitution.

(e) This, therefore, means that while Parliament can amend any constitutional provision by virtue of Art. 368, such a power is not absolute and unlimited and the courts can still go into the question whether or not an amendment destroys a fundamental or basic feature of the Constitution. If an amendment does so, it will be constitutionally invalid.

The justification for this judicial view is that the expression 'amend' in Art. 368 has a restrictive connotation and could not comprise a fundamental change in the Constitution. The words "amendment of the Constitution" in Art. 368 could not have the effect of destroying or abrogating the basic structure of the Constitution". The 2/3rd majority in Parliament may not represent majority of the votes of the people in the country. This means that there are inherent or implied limitations on the power of amendment under Art. 368.

---

24. Ibid.

25. For further discussion on this point, see, infra, Sec. F.

(f) What is a fundamental feature of the Constitution is a moot point. The list given above is not final or exhaustive of such features. It is for the courts to decide as and when a question arises whether a particular amendment of the Constitution affects any 'basic' or "fundamental" feature of the Constitution or not. The question of basic feature has to be considered in each case in the context of the concrete problem.

Kesavananda ruling can be regarded to be an improvement over the formulation in Golak Nath, in at least two significant respects:

(i) It has been stated earlier[26] that there are several other parts of the Constitution which are as important, if not more, as the Fundamental Rights, but Golak Nath formulation only confined itself to Fundamental Rights and did not cover these parts. This gap has been filled by Kesavananda by holding that all 'basic' features of the Constitution are non-amendable.

(ii) Golak Nath made all Fundamental Rights as non-amendable. This was too rigid a formulation. Kesavananda introduces some flexibility in this respect. Not all Fundamental Rights en bloc are now to be regarded as non-amendable but only such of them as may be characterised as constituting the "basic" features of the Constitution.

According to Kesavananda, even a Fundamental Right can be amended or altered provided the basic structure of the Constitution is not damaged in any way. It is for the Court to decide from case to case as to which Fundamental Right is to be treated as a 'basic' feature. The right to property has not been treated as such and so the Fundamental Right to property has been abrogated.[27]

Theoretically, Kesavananda is, therefore, a more satisfactory formulation as regards the amendability of the Constitution than Golak Nath which gave primacy to only one part, and not to other parts, of the Constitution.

(g) Kesavananda also answers the question left unanswered in Golak Nath, namely, can Parliament, under Art. 368, rewrite the entire Constitution and bring in a new Constitution?[28] The answer to the question is that Parliament can only do that which does not modify the basic features of the Constitution and not go beyond that.

The immediate application of the Kesavananda principle as regards the amendability of the Constitution was made to assess the constitutional validity of the Twenty-Fourth and Twenty-Fifth Amendments. The entire Twenty-Fourth Amendment was held valid. From one point of view, overruling of Golak Nath restored the status quo ante making the amendment unnecessary and restoring the power of amending the Fundamental Rights to the constituent body. As some Judges pointed out, the Twenty-Fourth amendment made explicit what was already implicit in the unamended Art. 368. Parliament could amend a Fundamental Right subject, however, to the over-all restriction of non-amendability of a basic feature of the Constitution.[29]

---

26. See, supra.
27. Supra, Chs. XXXI, Sec. C and XXXII, Sec. E.
Also see, Raghunath Rao v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 1267, infra, Sec. E.
28. Supra, Sec. D(c).
29. Supra.

As regards the Twenty-Fifth Amendment, it was upheld subject to the following qualifications:

(i) Although 'amount' was not the same concept as 'compensation', and while the courts could not go into the question of adequacy of 'amount' payable for property acquired or requisitioned, yet the 'amount' could not be 'illusory' or 'arbitrary'. The 'amount' need not be the market value of the property acquired, but it should still have some reasonable relationship with the value of the property in question. Thus, a limited judicial review of the amount payable for property acquired was still possible.[30]

(ii) The non-application of Art. 19(1)(f) to a law enacted under Art. 31(2) was held to be constitutionally valid. In a way, the Amendment only restored the status quo ante before Golak Nath when the Supreme Court had regarded Arts. 31(2) and 19(1)(f) as mutually exclusive.[31]

(iii) The first part of Art. 31C was upheld chiefly on the basis that it identified a limited class of legislation and exempted it from the operation of Arts. 14, 19 and 31. Hence no delegation of amending power was required. But the second part of Art. 31C was held to be invalid. The purport of this ruling is that while a law enacted to implement Arts. 39(b) and 39(c) may not be challenged under Arts. 14, 19 and 31, nevertheless, the courts shall have the power to go into the question whether the impugned law does in fact achieve the objectives inherent in Arts. 39(b) and (c) or not.

(iv) A legislative declaration to this effect cannot be conclusive. No legislature by its own declaration can make a law challenge-proof. When a law is challenged, the courts will have the power to consider whether the law in question can reasonably be described as one to give effect to the policy of the state towards the said objectives.[32]

In spite of the fact that it is possible to find some conundrums from the logical point of view on an analysis of the arguments adopted in the various opinions delivered in Kesavananda,[33] the end result of the case on the whole was satisfactory, balanced and reasonable. Parliament was now conceded power to amend any part of the Constitution subject to the ultimate restriction that the Fundamental Features of the Constitution should not be abrogated. This formulation gives a lot of leeway to Parliament to make necessary adjustments in the Constitution from time to time in furtherance of the country's socio-economic programme.

The restriction on Parliament that it should not subvert the fundamental features of the Constitution is more notional than real for no Parliament would seek to do that, and the courts will have enough manoueverability to decide whether any fundamental feature of the Constitution has been abrogated or not by a par-

---

30. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C(iii).
31. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. B.
32. Supra, Chs. XXXII, Sec. D and XXXIV.
33. For various analytical comments on the Kesavananda case see: JOSEPH MINATTUR, The Ratio in the Kesavananda Bharati case, (1974) 1 SCC (JI.) 73; P.K. TRIPATHI, Kesavananda Bharati v. State of Kerala: Who Wins? (1974) 1 SCC (JI.) 3; H.M. SEERVAI, The Fundamental Rights Case; At the Cross Roads, 74 Bom LR (JI.) 47 (1973); UPEN BAXI, The Constitutional Quicksands: Bharati and the Twenty-fifth Amendment, (1974) 1 SCC (JI.) 45; MORGAN, The Indian Essential Features case, 30 Int'I and Comp LQ 307.

ticular amendment. The two phrases 'fundamental features' and 'abrogation' are quite vague furnishing a good deal of scope of interpretation to the Courts.

By upholding the first limb of Art. 31C, legislatures in the country have been given power to implement the socialist socio-economic programme. It is a welcome feature of the judgment that the second limb of Art. 31C was invalidated. This avoided the possibility of the State Legislatures immunizing all sorts of laws from judicial scrutiny. To permit each and every State to enact review-proof legislation in the name of Arts. 39(b) and 39(c), could have led to socio-economic chaos in the country. The Central Government should be thankful to the Supreme Court for saving it from an embarrassment which it would have faced had it said 'no' to an arbitrary State law enacted in the name of furthering the socialist programme.

Kesavananda illustrates judicial creativity and the policy-making role of the Supreme Court of a very high order. The majority judges sought to protect and preserve the basic features of the Constitution against the onslaught of transient majorities in Parliament. An unqualified amending power could mean that a political party with a two-thirds majority in Parliament, for a few years, could make any changes in the Constitution, even to the extent of establishing a totalitarian State,[34] to suit its own political exigencies.

It was a conscious 'policy' decision on the part of the Supreme Court to read implied limitations on the amending power in order to preserve basic, core, constitutional values against the onslaught of a transient majority in Parliament. In Kesavananda, several Judges felt convinced that certain values and ideals embedded in the Constitution should be preserved and not destroyed by any process of constitutional amendment. The Constitution deriving its strength and sanction from the national consensus, and enacted in the name of the "People of India"[35] should not be amendable merely by a 2/3 vote in Parliament when the truth is that 2/3 of the Lok Sabha does not represent a very broad national consensus, as only nearly 40% of the registered voters cast their votes in the general election, and these votes are divided among several political parties contesting the general election to the Lok Sabha, and Rajya Sabha has no popular mandate as, in effect, it consists of the nominees of the various political parties elected by the various State Legislatures.[36]

The basic philosophy underlying the doctrine of non-amendability of the basic features of the Constitution, evolved by the majority in Kesavananda has been beautifully explained by HEDGE and MUKHERJEE, JJ., as follows:[37]

> "Our Constitution is not a mere political document. It is essentially a social document. It is based on a social philosophy and every social philosophy like every religion has two main features, namely, basic and circumstantial. The former remains constant but the latter is subject to change. The core of a religion always remains constant but the practices associated with it may change. Likewise, a constitution like ours contains certain features which are so essential that they cannot be changed or destroyed."

---

34. PALKHIVALA characterises Kesavananda as "one of the milestones in the history of jurisprudence": PALKHIVALA, OUR CONSTITUTION DEFACED AND DEFILED, 147.
35. See, the Preamble to the Constitution, Chs. I, Sec. E(c) and XXXIV, Sec. A.
36. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. B.
37. AIR 1973 SC 1461, at 1624.

In retrospect, it would appear that the Supreme Court adopted the technique of literal interpretation of the Constitution in Shankari Prasad and Sajjan Singh and, thus, concluded that there was no restriction on the amending power. Things however changed when Chief Justice SUBBA RAO, a great protagonist of the Fundamental Rights, took over the leadership of the Court and had an opportunity to preside over the Bench deciding the Golaknath case.

It needs to be emphasized that the decision on the question whether the amending power should be restricted or not involved a high policy-making function on the part of the judiciary. It was not a question which could be decided merely by resorting to logical arguments, as arguments could be found on both sides of the line.

In course of time, the doctrine of basic or fundamental features of the Constitution has become very well entrenched in India. Since Kesavananda, the doctrine has been applied by the Supreme Court in quite a few cases. Kesavananda constitutes the high water mark of Judicial creativity.[38]

(f) INDIRA NEHRU GANDHI

The next case in which the Supreme Court had occasion to apply the Kesavananda ruling regarding the non-amendability of the basic features of the Constitution was Indira Nehru Gandhi v. Raj Narain.[39]

Here was involved the question of the validity of Cl. 4 of the Constitution (Thirty-ninth Amendment) Act, 1975. The background to this amendment has been explained earlier.[40]

This Amendment sought to do three things: one, generally, to withdraw the election of the Prime Minister and a few other Union officials from the scope of the ordinary judicial process; two, more specifically, to void the High Court decision declaring Indira Gandhi's election to the Lok Sabha as void; and, three, to exclude the Supreme Court's jurisdiction to hear any appeal.

Cl. 4 of the Amendment was challenged as destroying the basic feature of the Constitution insofar as it constituted a gross interference with the judicial process.[41] The contention was that the clause in question wiped out not merely the High Court's judgment, but even the election petition and the law relating thereto. The constituent power had discharged a judicial function in deciding the election dispute against the Prime Minister and in doing this it had followed no procedure and applied no law. Thus, the Kesavananda ruling was directly invoked.

The Supreme Court upheld the contention and declared Cl. 4 as unconstitutional. The first part of Cl. 4 was regarded to violate three "essential features" of the Constitution. According to MATHEW, J., it destroyed an essential democratic feature of the Constitution, viz., the resolution of an election dispute "by ascertaining the adjudicative facts and applying the relevant law for determining the real representative of the people". In the words of MATHEW, J., again: "If Art. 329(b) envisages the resolution of an election dispute by judicial process by a 38. See, supra, Ch. XL, Sec. D, on "Judicial Creativity".

39. AIR 1975 SC 2299 : 1975 Supp SCC 1; supra.
40. Supra, Ch. XIX, Sec. F; infra, next Chapter.
41. For Cl. 4 see, infra, Ch. XLII.

petition presented to an authority as the appropriate legislature may by law provide,[42] a constitutional amendment cannot dispense with the requirement without damaging an essential feature of democracy, viz., the mechanism for determining the real representatives of the people in an election as contemplated by the Constitution". Democracy could function only when there are free and fair elections. This principle was vitiated by the amendment in question.

According to CHANDRACHUD, J., Cl. 4 violated the principle of separation of powers to the extent incorporated in the Constitution, viz., a purely judicial function being exercised by the legislature. CHANDRACHUD, J., also opined that 'equality of status and opportunity' being an "essential feature" of the Constitution, the same was being violated by Cl. 4 as there was no rational reason for creating a privileged regime for the election of the Prime Minister.

The Court took exception to the voiding of a judicial pronouncement and declaring it ineffective by the second part of Cl. 4. While it was possible for Parliament to amend the pre-existing law and thus knock out the basis of the judicial decision in question, a judicial decision by itself could not, however, be voided by Parliament.[43]

A more substantial ground against the proposed Amendment was that the decision of a specific election dispute was a judicial function. When the constituent body declared that the election of the Prime Minister would not be void, it discharged a judicial function. As emphasized by MATHEW, J. ".... the resolution of an election dispute by the amending body could not be regarded as 'law'." It was either "a judicial sentence or a legislative judgment like a Bill of Attainder."

A judicial power has to be exercised according to some procedure and by following some law. In the instant case, in enacting the Amendment in question, the amending body exercised judicial power in violation of the principle of natural justice or audi alteram partem as it gave no hearing to the person challenging the Prime Minister's election. It was not clear what norms of law, if any, had been applied by the constituent body to determine the dispute. The election law which had been in existence on the date of the enactment of the Amendment in question was excluded as regards the specific election petition. As emphasized by MATHEW, J.: "If the amending body evolved new norms for adjudging the validity of the particular election, it was the exercise of a despotic power and that would damage the democratic structure of the Constitution."

It was agreed generally that democracy was a basic feature of the Constitution. The amending body, under Art. 368, was not competent to pass an ordinary law with retrospective effect to validate the election. It could only amend the Constitution by passing a law of the same rank as the Constitution. If the amendment were taken to hold that there was no election dispute, and that the election petition in question was non est, it would sound the death knell of the democratic structure of the Constitution.

There was nothing on the face of the Amendment to show that the amending body ascertained the facts of the case. Adjudicative facts cannot be gathered by legislative process behind the back of the parties; facts can be gathered only by

---

42. Supra, Ch. XIX, Sec. F.

43. See, supra, Ch. II, on this point, Sec. M.
Also see, supra, Ch. XL, Sec. I(b).

judicial process. In the instant case, the constituent body made no attempt to ascertain facts by resorting to judicial process.

RAY, C.J., emphasized that insofar as the validation of the election in the instant case was without applying any law, the principle of rule of law, which was a basic feature of the Constitution, was offended. The constituent body can exercise judicial power but it has to apply some law for the purpose. KHANNA, J., stated: "To put a stamp of validity on the election of a candidate by saying that the challenge to such an election would not be governed by any election law and that the said election in any case would be valid and immune from any challenge runs counter to accepted norms of free and fair elections in all democratic countries."

Another significant point which emerged from the various opinions in the instant case was that the principle of the 'basic features' was applicable only to a constitutional amendment and not to an ordinary legislation. As CHANDRACHUD, J., explained, the amending power and the ordinary law-making power "operate in different fields and are, therefore, subject to different limitations". A constitutional amendment is a law of a higher status and so it cannot damage the basic feature of the Constitution. The amending power under Art. 368 is subject to this over-all restriction but not the ordinary legislative power. An ordinary law has to be tested on the touchstone of competence of the enacting legislature and whether it infringes any other specific constitutional interdiction.

On this point, RAY, C.J., stated: "The theory of basic structures is an exercise in imponderables. Basic structures or basic features are indefinable. The legislative entries are the fields of legislation. The pith and substance doctrine has been applied in order to find out legislative competency, and eliminate encroachment on legislative entries.[44] If the theory of basic structures or basic features is applied to legislative measures it will denude Parliament and State Legislatures of the power of legislation and deprive them of laying down legislative policies. This will be an encroachment on the separation of powers."

But this argument of the Judges seem to be illogical. If an amendment of the Constitution (which is a higher law made in the exercise of the constituent power) cannot affect the basic features of the Constitution, then it stands to reason as to how a simple law (which is of a lower order as made in the exercise of the legislative power) can be allowed to affect the basic features of the Constitution.

It was also stated by several Judges in Indira Nehru Gandhi that judicial review was not a basic feature of the Constitution and that a constitutional amendment could exclude judicial review of a matter. The same is true of the principle of equality embodied in Arts. 14, 15 and 16. But these propositions have now been overruled. Both judicial review as well as equality are regarded as the basic features of the Constitution.

(g) AMENDMENT OF ART. 368 : 42ND AMENDMENT

The Central Government did not relish the Supreme Court's pronouncement in the Indira Nehru Gandhi case declaring Cl. 4 of the Thirty-ninth Amendment invalid. The Government very much desired to ensure that never in future, the courts should have the power to pronounce a constitutional amendment invalid. Accordingly, Art. 368 was again amended by the Forty-Second Amendment enacted in 1976.

---

44. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iv).

A major argument advanced by the Law Minister in favour of such an Amendment was that the supremacy of the Parliament must be asserted in the area of constitutional amendment, and that a constitutional amendment should be taken out of judicial purview. Many adverse comments were made by him in the Houses of Parliament during the course of discussion on the Amendment Bill on the Supreme Court pronouncements in Golak Nath and Kesawnanda. The doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court in Kesavananda Bharati that Parliament in the exercise of its constituent power could not amend the basic features of the Constitution was much criticised by the Law Minister. It was asserted by the Law Minister that there was no basic feature of the Constitution which Parliament as the constituent power could not amend.

The Forty-Second Amendment sought to ensure that a constitutional amendment may not be challenged before any Court on any ground whatsoever. To achieve this objective, two new clauses were added to Art. 368.[45]

These clauses were very broadly worded and were designed to make it clear to the judiciary that there should be no limitation whatsoever on Parliament's constituent power under Art. 368.[46] Clause 4, mentioned above, even went to the extent of reviving the constitutional amendments held invalid by the Supreme Court earlier, viz.: the second limb of Art. 31C in Kesavananda[47] and a few clauses of the Thirty-ninth amendment in Indira Nehru Gandhi.[48] Originally, Clause 4 permitted a challenge to a constitutional amendment on the ground that "it has not been made in accordance with the procedure laid down by this article", viz., Art. 368. But that part of the clause was dropped by Parliament and the idea appeared to be that a constitutional amendment should not be challengeable in a Court on any ground whatsoever.

It was however doubtful whether the new Amendment had given quietus to all the controversies regarding the amending power. For example, the question could still arise whether an Amendment of the Constitution made without the two-thirds of votes of the members present and voting in each of the two Houses of Parliament can be regarded as a 'constitutional amendment' under Art. 368, or will it be covered by the words "purporting to have been made" in Clause 4 and thus be non-challengeable. To take the latter view will be to nullify the procedure laid down in Art. 368 for a constitutional amendment.

There also remained the fundamental question whether the Supreme Court will reverse its position in Kesavananda and accept an unfettered constituent power in Parliament as constitutional. For, if the Supreme Court were to stick to its views as expressed in Kesavananda as regards the scope of Art. 368, then these amendments to Art. 368 made under Art. 368 itself could not be valid. If, however, the amendments to Art. 368 were to be held valid then the only restraint on Parliament in this matter would be political and moral. It meant that Parliament would only be restrained in the matter of constitutional amendment by the exi-

---

45. Supra, 2318.
46. Supra.
47. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. D.
48. Supra, Sec. D(f).

gencies of periodic elections, the internal composition of the Houses of Parliament, public opinion and the commitment of the members of Parliament to the ideals of democracy and constitutionalism.

In justification of the new Amendments to Art. 368, the Law Minister had claimed that—(i) there was no basic feature of the Constitution which needed to be protected from amendment; and (ii) the supremacy of Parliament ought to be established in the area of constitutional amendment. The Law Minister was wrong on both these premises.

As regards the first assertion of the Law Minister, it needs to be emphasized that there are certain values inherent in the Constitution which are worth preserving, which ought not be sacrificed even at the altar of the so-called economic development or political expediency, and without which the Constitution will be reduced to merely an empty shell with no substance. Can any one deny that constitutionalism, democracy, secularism, rule of law, Federalism are not values inherently imbibed in the constitution? What is point of having a constitution if it is devoid of all values?

As regards the second assertion, mentioned above, it needs to be pointed out that the argument of parliamentary supremacy is, in effect, only a 'myth' or a 'fiction'. In the context of the practical working of the parliamentary system, supremacy of Parliament actually boils down to supremacy of the executive government of the day, because parliamentary powers are at the disposal of the government of the day which enjoys a majority support in the House. The members in the Houses vote as per the dictates of the government. The result is that a government backed by 2/3rd of the members in the two Houses could carry out any constitutional amendment it desires. When a government shouts from the housetop to uphold "sovereignty of Parliament", what, in effect, it is seeking is to have complete, uncontrolled, freedom of action itself to do what it likes to do as it knows that the majority in Parliament would always support it. The existence of a written constitution by its very nature envisages a restriction on the power of Parliament and in other written constitutions it has been thought advisable not to vest ultimate control over the constitution in the legislature alone. This is the essence of the doctrine of constitutionalism.[49] Can an uninhibited uncontrolled amending power be left with the kind of Parliament which churns out such amendments as XXXIX and XLII without any compunction?

There was a lot of criticism of the majority rulings in Golak Nath and Kesavananda. Most of this criticism emanated from a literal approach to Art. 368, but the Supreme Court was taking recourse to a purposive, and not a literal, approach. It was argued that the constitution-makers desired a constitution which could be amended. But these critics forgot that the constitution-makers sought to design a 'controlled' constitution and not an 'uncontrolled' constitution, and the Indian Constitution, in effect, became 'uncontrolled' in practice and most of the constitutional amendments were a result not of any broad consensus on a national basis but of brute majority of the ruling party in Parliament. The situation has been described by ex-Justice HEGDE (who participated in the majority decision in Kesavananda but then later resigned from the Court) in the following words:

49. See, supra, Ch. I, Sec. B.

> "Because of Congress's unbroken dominance at the Centre and in almost all the State Governments, India is for practical purposes a one-party State. Within the Congress Party, democracy is at a premium and power is unduly concentrated. The standard of political morality is low. The press is free only to praise .... the radio is controlled by the government. The vast majority of the people are apathetic and badly informed; the Constitution is certainly too abstract to be on their cognitive maps. In these circumstances, it is up to the Supreme Court to defend it. The Supreme Court is the last bulwark of democracy."

It was this judicial policy which led the majority Judges to rule in favour of a limited power of constitutional amendment.

The decisions of the Supreme Court of India on the question of amendability of the Indian Constitution involve a high policy-making function on the part of the judiciary. It was a conscious decision on the part of the Indian Supreme Court in Golak Nath and then in Kesavananda to read implied limitations on the amending power in order to preserve what the Court thought to be the basic, central, core of the Constitution against the onslaught of the transient majority in Parliament. Some of the Supreme Court Judges participating in the Kesavananda decision felt convinced in their minds that there are certain ideals or values inherent in the Constitution and these ideals or values should be preserved and protected and not destroyed by any process of constitutional amendment.

And, as the life of law is experience and not logic, the Supreme Court's approach was more than vindicated when the 39th and 42nd Amendments[50] were enacted. These Amendments represent an abuse of the amending power and laid bare the dangers of an unlimited and uninhibited power to amend the Constitution. It was then rudely realised that such a power could be misused to usher in an undemocratic regime and denude the people of their rights and many critics of the Supreme Court then became convinced of the sagacity and the rightness of the Court's approach.[51]

The Court had tried in Kesavananda to adopt a purposive interpretation of Art. 368 so as to make the Constitution 'controlled' which had become practically 'uncontrolled' because of political vagaries. During the period 1981 to 1984, there were many straws in the wind to amend the Constitution in several directions which might have distorted the Constitution out of recognition, but the Government felt shy of moving these amendments as it was not sure of the response of the Supreme Court. It is a safe assumption that the 'basic features' theory has protected the Constitution from being mutilated out of recognition at the altar of political expediency. The doctrine of 'basic features' has proved to be a shield to protect and preserve certain fundamental values inherent in the Constitution.

In future, amendment of the Constitution on a purely party basis may possibly become more and more difficult unless an amendment represents a broad national consensus, because the ruling party may lose its two-thirds majority in the Houses of Parliament and many State Legislatures may come to have majorities of other political parties. An amendment of the Constitution can then take place only when a national consensus emerges. That is as it should be. A constitution is national heritage and not the property of one single party howsoever mighty it

---

50. For provisions of this Amendment see, infra, next Chapter.

51. SEERVAI, EMERGENCY, FUTURE SAFEGUARDS, HABEAS CORPUS case, 139 (1978).

may be and no single party has thus a right to institute amendments in the Constitution merely in party interest, rather than in national interest.[52]

E. LATER DEVELOPMENTS

(a) MINERVA MILLS

In Minerva Mills Ltd. v. Union of India,[53] the scope and extent of the doctrine of basic structure was again considered by the Supreme Court. The Court again reiterated the doctrine that under Art. 368, Parliament cannot so amend the Constitution as to damage the basic or essential features of the Constitution and destroy its basic structure.

In the instant case, the petition was filed in the Supreme Court challenging the taking over of the management of the mill under the Sick Textile Undertaking (Nationalisation) Act, 1974, and an order made under s. 18-A of the Industrial (Development and Regulation) Act, 1951. The petition challenged the constitutional validity of clauses (4) and (5) of Art. 368, introduced by s. 55 of the 42nd Amendment. If these clauses were held valid then the petitioners could not challenge the validity of the 39th Amendment which had placed the Nationalisation Act, 1974, in the IX Schedule.[54]

As already noted, S. 55 of the Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act, 1976, inserted sub-sections (4) and (5) in Art. 368.[55] In Minerva, this section was held to be beyond the amending power of the Parliament and void since it sought to remove all limitations on the power of Parliament to amend the Constitution and confer a power on Parliament to amend the Constitution so as to damage or destroy its basic or essential features or its basic structures. The true object of these clauses was to remove the limitations imposed on Parliament's power to amend the Constitution through the Kesavananda case.[56]

The newly introduced clause 4 in Art. 368 sought to deprive the courts of their power to call in question any amendment of the Constitution.[57] The Court stated in this connection:

> Our Constitution is founded on a nice balance of power among the three wings of the state, namely, the Executive, the Legislature and the Judiciary. It is the function of the Judges, nay their duty, to pronounce upon the validity of laws.

Depriving the courts of the power of judicial review will mean making Fundamental Rights "a mere adornment," as they will be rights without remedies. A 'controlled' Constitution will become 'uncontrolled'.[58]

---

52. It has been declared in the Preamble to the Constitution : "We, the people of India… in our Constituent Assembly… do hereby adopt, enact and give to ourselves this Constitution." See, Ch. I, supra.
53. AIR 1980 SC 1789 : (1980) 3 SCC 625.
54. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. B.
55. Supra, 2318.
56. Kesavananda Bharati v. State of Kerala, supra, , Sec. D(e).
57. For the text of this clause, see, supra, 2318.
58. AIR 1980 SC 1789 at 1799.

The newly added Cl. 5 of Art. 368 sought to demolish the very pillars on which the preamble rests by empowering the Parliament to exercise its constituent power without any limitation whatever. This clause even empowered Parliament to "repeal the provisions of the Constitution."[59] Parliament can thus abrogate democracy and substitute for it a totally antithetical form of government. That can most effectively be achieved, without calling a democracy by any other name, by a total denial of social, economic and political justice to the people, by emasculating liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship and by abjuring commitment to the magnificent ideal of a society of equals.

"The power to destroy is not a power to amend." The Constitution confers only a limited power on Parliament to amend the Constitution; Parliament cannot therefore by exercising that limited power enlarge that very power into an absolute power. "The donee of a limited power cannot by the exercise of that power convert the limited power into an unlimited one."[60]

A limited amending power is indeed one of the basic features of the Constitution. Therefore, the limitations on that power cannot be destroyed. In other words, Parliament cannot, under Art. 368, expand its amending power so as to acquire for itself the right to repeal or abrogate the Constitution or to destroy its basic and essential features.

The 42nd Amendment also amended the Preamble. By this Amendment, the 'sovereign democractic republic' becomes a 'sovereign socialist secular democratic republic' and the resolution to promote the 'unity of the nation' was elevated into a promise to promote the 'unity and integrity of the nation'.[61] No exception could be taken to this Amendment, as it furnishes "the most eloquent example of how the amending power can be exercised consistently with the creed of the Constitution". This amendment offers "promise of more"; it does not "scuttle a precious heritage."[62]

S. 4 of the 42nd Amendment amended Art. 31C as well. As already stated, the unamended Art. 31C was upheld in Kasavananda up to an extent.[63] To that extent, Art. 31C would remain valid. But the new amendment vastly expanded the scope of Art. 31C[64], and this extension was now declared to be invalid as being beyond the amending power of Parliament since it destroyed the basic or essential features of the Constitution, insofar as it totally excluded a challenge in a Court to any law on the ground that it was inconsistent with, or took away or abridged any of the rights conferred by, Art. 14 or 19, if the law was for effectuating any of the Directive Principles.

The majority Judges insisted that Fundamental Rights occupy a unique place in the lives of civilized societies; they constitute the 'ark' of the Constitution. ".... the Indian Constitution is founded on the bedrock of the balance between Parts III and IV.[65] To give absolute primacy to one over the other is to disturb the har-

---

59. For the text of this clause, see, supra, 2318.
60. AIR 1980 SC 1789 at 1798.
61. Supra, Chs. I and XXXIV, Sec. D.
62. AIR 1980 SC 1789 at 1799.
63. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. D.
64. For this change see, supra, Chs. XXXII, Sec. D(ii)(iii) and XXXIV, Sec. C.
65. Part III of the Constitution contains the Fundamental Rights; Part IV contains the Directive Principles of State Policy.

mony of the Constitution. This harmony and balance between Fundamental Rights and Directive Principles is an essential feature of the basic structure of the Constitution."

The Court pointed out that the goals set out in Part IV of the Constitution (i.e., Directive Principles)[66] must be achieved without the abrogation of the means provided for by Part III viz., Fundamental Rights. In this sense, Fundamental Rights and Directive Principles both together constitute the core of the Indian Constitution and combine to form its conscience. "Anything that destroys the balance between the two parts will ipso facto destroy an essential element of the basic structure of the Constitution."[67]

The Amendment sought to abrogate Arts. 14 and 19 in regard to laws described in Art. 31C. A bulk of modern legislation can easily be justified as having been passed for effectuating the policy of the State towards securing some principle or the other laid down in the Directive Principles. Such laws will cover an extensive gamut of the relevant legislative activity. In respect of all such laws, Arts. 14[68] and 19[69] would stand wholly withdrawn. Arts. 14 and 19 confer rights which are elementary for the proper and effective functioning of a democracy. They are universal as becomes evident from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. If Arts. 14 and 19 were put out of operation in regard to bulk of legislation, Art. 32[70] would be drained of much of its life blood. The nature and quality of the amendment were such that "it virtually tears away the heart of basic fundamental freedoms."[71] The State Legislatures were given "an almost unfettered discretion to deprive the people of their civil liberties".

BHAGWATI, J., expressed the minority view. He agreed with the majority in holding amendments to Art. 368 as invalid and unconstitutional on the ground of damaging the basic structure of the Constitution. In his view, Cl. (4) of Art. 368 was unconstitutional as the consequence of excluding judicial review of constitutional amendments would be to enlarge the amending power of Parliament contrary to the decision in Kesavananda, and destroy the basic structure of the Constitution. Cl. (5) could not remove the doubt which did not exist, and so it was outside the amending power of Parliament. The two clauses, (4) and (5) were interlinked. BHAGWATI, J., failed to appreciate "how Parliament, which has only a limited power of amendment and which cannot alter the basic structure of the Constitution, can expand the power of amendment so as to confer upon itself the power to repeal or abrogate the Constitution or to damage or destroy its basic structure; or "to convert it into an absolute and unlimited power."

BHAGWATI, J., also commented adversely on the attempt made to exclude judicial review of the Constitutional amendments. He explained:

> "It is a cardinal principle of our Constitution that no one however highly placed and no authority however lofty can claim to be the sole judge of its power under the Constitution or whether its action is within the confines of such power laid down by the Constitution. The judiciary is the interpreter of the

66. Supra, Ch. XXXIV.
67. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. C.
68. Supra, Ch. XXI.
69. Supra, Ch. XXIV.
70. Supra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A.
71. Supra, Chs. XXXIII, Sec. A and XXXIV, Sec. A.

> Constitution and to the judiciary is assigned the delicate task to determine what is the power conferred on each branch of government, whether it is limited, and if so, what are the limits and whether any action of that branch transgresses such limits. It is for the judiciary to uphold the constitutional values and to enforce the constitutional limitations. That is the essence of rule of law…."

But the Amendment to Art. 31C was held valid by BHAGWATI, J., subject to the gloss put by him thereon. He argued that where protection was claimed for a statute under the amended Art. 31C, the Court would first determine whether there is a "real and substantial connection" between the law and a Directive Principle and that the predominant object of the law is to give effect to such Directive Principle. If the answer to this question turns out to be 'yes', the Court would then consider which provisions of the law are basically and essentially necessary for effectuating the directive principles and only such provisions would be protected under Art. 31C. If the Court finds that a particular provision is subsidiary or incidental or not essentially and integrally connected with the implementation of the Directive Principle or is of such a nature that though seemingly a part of the general design of the main provisions of the statute, its dominant objective is to achieve an unauthorised purpose, it would not be protected under Art. 31C. In this formulation, the Court would have discharged a much more overt policy-making role which the courts do not usually relish.

The following observation of BHAGWATI, J., is worth taking note of:

> "It is possible that in a given case, even an abridgement of a fundamental right may involve violation of the basic structure. It would all depend on the nature of the fundamental right, the extent and depth of the infringement, the purpose for which the infringement is made and its impact on the basic value of the Constitution. Take for example, right to life and personal liberty enshrined in Article 21. This stands on an altogether different footing from other fundamental rights. I do not wish to express any definite opinion, but I may point out that if this fundamental right is violated by any legislation, it may be difficult to sustain a Constitutional amendment which seeks to protect such legislation against challenge under Act. 21."

(b) WAMAN RAO

In the instant case, the Supreme Court considered the constitutional validity of the Maharashtra Agricultural Lands (Ceiling on Holdings) Act, 1961. The Act imposed ceiling on agricultural holdings in the State. As the Act had been placed in the IX Schedule,[72] the constitutional validity of Arts. 31A, 31B and the unamended Art. 31C (as it existed before the 42nd Amendment) was also challenged on the ground of damaging the "basic structure" of the Constitution.

The proposition that Parliament cannot, under Art. 368, so amend the Constitution as to destroy its basic features was again reiterated and applied by the Supreme Court in Waman Rao v. Union of India.[73] Accordingly, the Court ruled that the First and the Fourth Amendment Acts introduced in 1951 and 1955 did not damage any basic or essential feature of the Constitution or its basic structure and were thus valid and constitutional being within the constituent power of the

---

72. For IX Schedule, see, supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. 31B.
73. AIR 1981 SC 271; supra, Sec. E(b).

Parliament. The First Amendment was aimed at removing social and economic disparities in the agricultural sector.[74]

The First Amendment introduced Art. 31A into the Constitution with retrospective effect as well as Art. 31B.[75] The Fourth Amendment amended the First Amendment.[76] Art. 31A(1) obliterates Arts. 14, 19 and 31 totally and completely for the laws falling within its scope.[77] In this connection, the Court stated:

> ".... every case in which the protection of a fundamental right is withdrawn will not necessarily result in damaging or destroying the basic structure of the Constitution. The question as to whether the basic structure is damaged or destroyed in any given case would depend upon which particular Article of Part III is in issue and whether what is withdrawn is quintessential to the basic structure of the Constitution."[78]

About Art. 31A, the Court said:

> ".... if Art. 31A were not enacted, some of the main purposes of the Constitution would have been delayed and eventually defeated and that by the 1st Amendment, the constitutional edifice was not impaired but strengthened."[79]

The First and the Fourth Amendments, according to the Court, "were made so closely on the heels of the Constitution that they ought indeed to be considered as a part and parcel of the Constitution itself."[80] These Amendments were passed to effectuate Art. 39 clauses (b) and (c).[81] The Court concluded that the First and Fourth Amendments strengthened rather than weakened the basic structure of the Constitution. They made the ideal of equal justice a living truth. The First Amendment aimed at removing social and economic disparities and it therefore did not damage or destroy the basic structure of the Constitution.

Article 31B contains a device for saving laws from challenge on the ground of violation of Fundamental Rights. Art. 31B is to be read along with the Ninth Schedule.[82] Art. 13(2) of the Constitution invalidates a law inconsistent with a Fundamental Right. Art. 31B extends a protective umbrella to such a law if it is included in the IX Schedule. Art. 31B is, in substance and reality, a constitutional device employed to protect State laws from being declared void under Art. 13(2). Parliament can insert a State Law in Schedule IX by passing a constitutional amendment under Art. 368.[83]

The Court declared in Waman Rao that all Acts and Regulations included in the Ninth Schedule uptil the land-mark case of Kesavananda (April 24, 1973) will receive the full protection of Art. 31B. Since the IXth Schedule is a part of the Constitution, no additions or alterations can be made therein without complying with the restrictive provisions governing amendments to the Constitution. Therefore, the Acts and Regulations included in the IXth Schedule after Kesa-

---

74. Supra, Ch. XXXII; supra; infra, Ch. XLII.
75. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C; infra, Ch. XLII.
76. Ibid.
77. Ibid.
78. AIR 1981 SC at 279.
79. AIR 1981 SC at 283-284.
80. Ibid, at 284.
81. Supra, Chs. XXXII, Sec. B; XXXIV and XLII.
82. Ibid.
83. Sasanka Sekhar v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 522.

vanand (i.e., on or after April 24, 1973) will not receive the protection of Art. 31B for the plain reason that in the face of the Kesavananda judgment, there is no justification for making additions to the IX Schedule with a view to conferring a blanket protection on the laws included therein. "The various constitutional amendments, by which additions were made to the IX Schedule on or after April 24, 1973, will be held valid only if they do not damage or destroy the basic structure of the Constitution."

These laws would not receive the protection of Art. 31B ipso facto. Each law has to be examined individually for determining whether the constitutional amendment by which it has been put in the IX Schedule damages or destroys the basic structure of the Constitution in any manner. If however any such Act is protected by Art. 31A or 31C (as it stood prior to the 42nd Amendment) then the Act will be valid.

Article 31C as it stood prior to the 42nd Amendment made in 1976 is valid to the extent its constitutionality has been upheld in the Kesavananda case.[84] Laws passed truly and bona fide for giving effect to the Directive Principles in Cls. (b) and (c) of Art. 39 "will fortify that structure". The Court expressed a hope that Parliament would utilise to the maximum its potential to pass laws genuinely and truly related to the principles contained in Clauses (b) and (c) of Art. 39.[85]

However, in Sanjeev,[86] the Supreme Court has dissented from Minerva[87] as regards the validity of Art. 31C. as amended by the 42nd Amendment. But the Sanjeev ruling is more in the nature of an obiter dicta as the Act in question pertained to Arts. 39(b) and (c) and could be held valid under the original Art. 31C as held valid in Kesavananda.

(c) RAGHUNATH RAO

In Raghunath Rao v. Union of India,[88] the Supreme Court has reiterated the proposition that the basic features of the Constitution cannot be amended by following the procedure laid down in Art. 368. The Court has observed that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land and all organs of government—executive, legislative and judiciary derive their powers and authority from the Constitution.

The Courts are entrusted with the important constitutional responsibilities of upholding the supremacy of the Constitution. The amendment of the Constitution is only for the purpose of making the Constitution "more perfect, effective and meaningful." An amendment should not result in "abrogation or destruction of its basic structure or loss of its original identity and character and render the Constitution unworkable."

The Court is not concerned with the wisdom behind or propriety of the constitutional amendment because these are the matters for consideration of those who have the power to make constitutional amendments. All that the Court is concerned with are:—(1) whether the procedure prescribed by Art.

---

84. Supra, Chs. XXXII, Sec. D and XXXIV, Sec. D(e).
85. AIR 1981 SC at 292.
86. Sanjeev Coke Mfg. Co. v. Bharat Coking Coal Ltd., AIR 1983 SC 239; Supra, Chs. XXXII, Sec. C and XXXIV.
87. Supra, , Sec. E(a).
88. AIR 1993 SC 1267, 1287 : 1933 (1) JT 374.

368 is strictly complied with; and (2) whether the amendment has destroyed or damaged the basic structure or the essential features of the Constitution.

If an amendment transgresses its limits and impairs and alters the basic structure or essential features of the Constitution then the Court has power to undo that amendment. "An amendment of a Constitution becomes ultra vires if the same contravenes or transgresses the limitations put on the amending power because there is no touchstone outside the Constitution by which the validity of the exercise of the said powers conferred by it can be tested."[89]

The Supreme Court has stated that "unity and integrity of India" and the principle of equality contained in Art. 14 constitute the basic structure of the constitution.

(d) APPLICATION OF THE RULE OF SEVERABILITY TO A CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT ACT

The Anti-defection law is contained in the X Schedule to the Constitution[90] which was added to the Constitution by the Constitution (Fifty-second) Amendment Act, 1985.[91] A member of a Legislature defecting form his party to another party becomes disqualified from membership of the Legislature. The question of disqualification because of defection is to be decided by the Chairman/Speaker of the House and "his decision shall be final." There is a privative clause saying that "no Court shall have any jurisdiction in respect of any matter connected with the disqualification of a member of a House under this Schedule."[92] The question of disqualification is to be decided by the Speaker of the House concerned and his decision is final.

The Constitutional validity of the 52nd Amendment was challenged in Kihota Hollohan v. Zachillu.[93]

The first question was whether the constitutional amendment disqualifying a member of a Legislature from membership on defection from his original party to another party was valid. The Court maintained that although there is no specific enumerated substantive limitation on the power in Art. 368, but as arising from very limitation on the amending power such that the amendment does not alter the basic structure or destroy the basic features of the Constitution.

The object of the Amendment in question is to curb the evil of political defections motivated by lure of office which endanger the foundations of democracy in India. The Amendment, the Court has held by a majority of 3:2, is salutary as it seeks to strengthen the fabric of Indian parliamentary democracy by curbing unprincipled and unethical political defections. The argument that the amendment violates the basic structure of the Constitution was rejected by the Court.

The second question which was raised in Kihoto, was like this: The finality clause does not completely exclude the jurisdiction of the courts but it does have

---

89. Also see, R.C. Poudyal v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 1804; Supra, Ch. V; Infra, next Chapter.

90. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. F and VI, B(iv).
Infra, Ch. XLII.

91. Ibid.

92. Ibid.

93. AIR 1993 SC 412 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651, supra, Ch. II, Sec. F(a).

the effect of restricting the power of judicial review conferred on the Supreme Court and the High Courts under Arts. 136, 226 and 227. Accordingly, under Art. 368(2),[1] the constitutional amendment ought to have been approved by one-half of the State Legislatures before being presented to the President for his assent. In the instant case, this essential formality had not been gone through. Therefore, the question raised was whether the whole of the Amendment Act would be invalid, or whether the rule of severability could be applied to the Amendment Act so that the invalid part, i.e., the finality clause could be severed and the rest of the Act held valid as it did not need State ratification.

The Supreme Court divided 3:2 on this issue. The majority took recourse to the rule of severability, discussed earlier,[2] and held the rest of the Amendment Act valid after severing therefrom the invalid finality clause.

The Court stated that the principle of severability can be applied to a composite amendment which contains—(i) amendments in provisions which do not require ratification by the States, as well as (ii) amendments in provisions which require such ratification. By applying the doctrine of severability, the amendments in category (i) can be upheld and amendments falling in category (ii) may be struck down failing ratification by the States.

However, the test of severability can be applied if the Legislature would at all have enacted the law if the severed part would not be the part of the law, and whether after severance what survives can stand independently and is workable. In the instant case, the majority ruled, that the constituent body would have still enacted the X Schedule to curb the evil of defection, and the finality clause was only incidental. Even if this clause is found unconstitutional and is thus severed, the rest of the provisions in the X Schedule can stand on their own.

On the other hand, the minority judges [VERMA and SHARMA, JJ.] took a more rigid stand on this issue. They took the view that under Art. 368(2), the Constitution Amendment Bill could not have been presented to the President for his assent unless the Bill had been approved by half of the State Legislatures. Therefore, the Presidential assent given to the Bill without such ratification was non est and so the whole Constitution Amendment Act was still born. The rule of severability could not apply as the whole of the Act was unconstitutional.

(e) A.K. ROY

A question of great importance as regards the amending power was considered by the Supreme Court in A.K. Roy v. Union of India.[3]

S. 1(2) of the 44th Amendment says: "It shall come into force on such date as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint, and different dates may be appointed for different provisions of this Act."

The 44th Amendment Act has made several modifications in Art. 22[4] liberalising its provisions but the same have not yet been effectuated because the Government has not issued any notification under S. 1(2). In Roy, S. 1(2) was chal-

---

1. Supra, Sec. C(b).
2. Supra, Chs. XX, Sec. H and XL.
3. AIR 1982 SC 710 : (1982) 1 SCC 271.
4. Supra, Ch. XXVII, Sec. B.
Also, infra, Ch. XLII.

lenged on the ground that by conferring an unreasonable, arbitrary and unguided power on the executive, it violated Arts. 14 and 21 which are an integral part of the basic structure of the Constitution. The failure of the Government to issue the notification was also challenged as mala fide. It was also argued that the Government was obligated to bring the whole of the 44th Amendment into force within a reasonable time since the executive cannot veto or nullify or negate a constitutional amendment. It was argued that "the executive cannot defer or postpone giving effect to a constitutional amendment for policy reasons of its own which are opposed to the policy of the constituent body as reflected in the constitutional amendment".

By majority of 3 to 2, the Court rejected these arguments and sustained the validity of S. 1(2) of the 44th Amendment arguing that the power to issue a notification for bringing into force the provisions of a constitutional amendment "is not a constituent power of the Parliament because it does not carry with it the power to amend the Constitution in any manner." Parliament can therefore vest in an outside agency the power to bring a constitutional amendment into force. The Supreme Court cannot compel the Government to do that which lies in its discretion to do when it considers it opportune to do. If the Parliament considers that the executive has betrayed its trust by not bringing the amendment into force, it can censure the executive.

GUPTA, J., in a dissenting judgment argued that S. 1(2) could not be construed to mean that Parliament left it to the unfettered discretion of the Central Government when to bring into force the provisions of the 44th Amendment. The Central Government is obligated to bring them into operation within a reasonable time: "The Central Government could not in its discretion keep it in a state of suspended animation for any length of time it pleased". There is no practical or administrative difficulty in effectuating the amendments to Art. 22.

GUPTA, J., was in favour of issuing mandamus to the Government directing it to issue a notification under S. 1(2) of the 44th Amendment effectuating the amendments to Art. 22 for S. 1(2) does not empower the executive to scotch an amendment of the Constitution duly enacted. TULZAPURKAR, J., also agreed with GUPTA, J., on this point.It is submitted that the minority view is more sound than the majority view because the executive ought not to be permitted to set at naught the will of the constituent power. The executive cannot annihilate the constitutional amendment by the simple expedient of not bringing it into force. The power given to the executive to bring the amendment into force can only mean within reasonable time needed to make the necessary administrative arrangements to give effect to the law. Delaying the enforcement of the amendment for an long as 22 years goes against the intention of the constituent power. The Court should therefore assess the bona fides and reasonableness of the executive action if it unduly delays the bringing into force of a constitutional amendment.

In the opinion of the author, S. 1(2) of the 44th Amendment Act ought to have been held constitutionally invalid as it amounts to delegation of constituent power which Parliament is not authorized to do. The power to issue the notification to bring a constitutional amendment into force cannot but be characterized as the constituent power, for, without such a notification, the Constitutional Amendment in question cannot be effectuated.

The best thing to do will be for the constituent power either to bring the amendment into force straightaway, or fix a ceiling on time-limit within which it should be brought into force and not leave the matter to the unfettered discretion of the executive. Further, the executive should not seek to thwart the wish solemnly expressed by the constituent authority through an amendment of the Constitution giving safeguards to the people against violation of their personal liberty.

(f) THE CONSTITUTION (FORTY-FIFTH) AMENDMENT BILL, 1978

Article 368 relating to the power of Parliament to amend the Constitution was again sought to be amended by the 45th Constitution Amendment Bill (CB 45).[5]

In Kesavanada, the Supreme Court, by a majority, had propounded the view that the fundamental or basic features of the Constitution could not be amended by Parliament under Art. 368. But the Court did not lay down conclusively as to what the basic features of the Constitution were. Some illustrations were given by some of the Judges but it was also stated that these were not exhaustive categories.[6] Also, it was not clear as to how these features could be amended if any amendment therein became absolutely necessary at any time.

The 42nd Amendment (CA 42) sought to amend Art. 368 with a view to give Parliament an unrestrained power to amend the Constitution including its basic features.[7] But the constitutional validity of CA 42 in this respect remained a matter of doubt. It remained a moot point whether the Supreme Court would overrule its view expressed in Kesavananda and accept the validity of amendments introduced in Art. 368 by CA 42. The odds were that the Court would reiterate its stand and declare Cls. (4) and (5) of Art. 368 (added by CA 42) unconstitutional.[8]

To cope with these various difficulties in the process of amendment of the Constitution, CB 45 proposed to amend Art. 368 so as to introduce therein the procedure of referendum to amend certain features of the Constitution. It was proposed to lay down a few features in Art. 368 and to provide that any amendment of any of these stated features of the Constitution would require approval of the people of India at a referendum. Thus, any amendment having the effect of—(a) impairing the secular or democratic character of the Constitution, or, (b) abridging or taking away the rights of citizens under Part III (i.e., Fundamental Rights), or (c) prejudicing or impeding free and fair elections to the Lok Sabha or the State Legislative Assemblies on the basis of adult suffrage, or, (d) compromising the independence of the judiciary—was required to be approved by the people at a referendum.

Any amendment seeking to modify or omit the requirement as to such referendum was also required to be approved at such a referendum. The referendum was to be through a poll at which all voters for the Lok Sabha election were to be eligible to vote. An amendment was to be deemed to have been approved by the

---

5. CB 45 is the abbreviation used in the text for the Constitution (Forty-fifth Amendment) Bill, which later became the Constitution (Forty-fourth Amendment) Act.
For its provisions, see, infra, next Chapter.

6. See, supra, Sec. D(e).

7. Supra; infra, Ch. XLII.

8. The Supreme Court ultimately declared this Amendment as unconstitutional in Minerva Mills, Sec. D(a).

people if approved by a majority of the voters at such poll at which at least fifty-one per cent eligible voters voted. The management of the referendum was to vest in the Election Commission. The result of the referendum as declared by the Election Commission was not to be called in question in any Court. Subject to these constitutional provisions, Parliament could make provisions with respect to all matters relating to the referendum. CB 45 also proposed to delete Cls. (4) and (5) introduced in Art. 368 through CA 42.[9]

The proposed amendments in Art. 368 were very wholesome. Referendum is a democratic process as it involves people's participation. Any constitutional amendment approved by the people at a referendum would signify approval of the amendment through national consensus. This could have been regarded as reiteration of the declaration in the Preamble that the Constitution of India has been adopted and enacted by the people of India.

For long, the Constitution had been the plaything of political parties having transient majority in Parliament, and amendments had often been introduced because of political expediency at the time. With the proposed amendments in Art. 368, this would have ceased and constitutional amendments would be mooted only when absolutely necessary.

These amendments would have also scotched the heresy that Parliament created by a written constitution was sovereign and could mutilate the Constitution in any way it liked. The proposed amendment would have made it impossible for a transient majority in Parliament to effectuate amendments in certain basic features of the Constitution including the Fundamental Rights. At the same time, no part of the Constitution was to be beyond amendment in theory. The provision for referendum would have deterred amendments being lightly introduced in some of the significant aspects of the Constitution. The role of the courts would have become confined to deciding, if a question were raised, whether a proposed amendment belonged to that category mentioned in Art. 368 which needed the procedure of referendum for being enacted. The Constitution would have come to enjoy that deep emotional respect in the hearts of the people which had been lacking so far because of its too frequent constitutional amendments.

Unfortunately, the Rajya Sabha where the Congress Party had a majority did not approve of these proposals although the Lok Sabha had passed the same by the requisite majority.

F. BASIC FEATURES OF THE CONSTITUTION

It is necessary to identify the basic features of the Constitution which are non-amendable under Art. 368. The question has been considered by the Court from time to time, and several such features have been identified, but the matter still remains an open one; no exhaustive list of such features has yet emerged and the Court has to decide from case to case whether a constitutional feature can be characterised as basic or not.

In the seminal Kesavananda case,[10] SIKRI, C.J., mentioned the following as the "basic foundation and structure" of the Constitution:

---

9. Supra, Sec. D(g).
10. Supra, Sec. D(e).

(1) Supremacy of the Constitution;

(2) Separation of Powers between the legislature, the executive and the judiciary;[11]

(3) Republican and democratic form of Government;

(4) Secular character of the Constitution.

(5) Federal Character of the Constitution.

SIKRI, C.J., maintained that the above features are easily discernible not only from the Preamble but the whole scheme of the Constitution.

Other Judges mentioned in addition to the above three more basic features:

(6) The dignity of the individual secured by the various Fundamental Rights and the mandate to build a welfare state contained in the directive principles;

(7) The unity and integrity of the nation.[12]

(8) Parliamentary system.[13]

The above features have been mentioned as only illustrative and the list is not by any means exhaustive. Whether a feature of the Constitution is 'basic' or not is to be determined from time to time by the Court as and when the question arises.

Since Kesavananda, the matter has been considered by the Supreme Court in several cases and the Court has had occasion to declare several features of the Constitution as fundamental features or basic structures of the Constitution.

It is generally agreed that all Fundamental Rights do not constitute basic features. For example, in Kesavananda itself it has been held that the right to property does not pertain to the basic structure of the Constitution.[14] Now that Art. 31 has been repealed, and Art. 300A included in the constitution, right to property has ceased to be a Fundamental Right,[15] as well as basic feature of the Constitution. It is merely a constitutional right.[16]

In Kihoto Hollohon,[17] the Supreme Court has declared: "Democracy is a basic feature of the Constitution" and Election conducted at regular prescribed intervals is essential to the democratic system envisaged in the Constitution. So is the need to protect and sustain the purity of the electoral process. That may take within it the quality, efficiency and adequacy of the machinery for resolution of electoral disputes."

Again, in the same case, VERMA, J., in his minority opinion has declared: Democracy is a part of the basic structure of our Constitution; and the rule of law, and free and fair elections are basic features of democracy. One of the postulates

---

11. Also see, State of Bihar v. Bal Mukund Shah, AIR 2000 SC 1296 : (2000) 4 SCC 640.
12. Raghunath Rao v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 1267; supra, Sec. E(c).
13. AIR 1973 SC at 1535, 1603, 1628 and 1860.
14. Also see, Jilubhai Nanbhai Khachar v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1995 SC 142 : (1955) Supp (1) SCC 596.
15. See, Ch. XLII, infra, under Forty-fourth Amendment, supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. E.
16. J.N. Khachar v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1995 SC 154; Waman Rao v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 271; supra, Sec. E(b).
17. AIR 1993 SC 412; supra, Chs. II, Sec. F, III; VI, Sec. B(iv) and VII.

of free and fair elections is provision for resolution of election disputes as also adjudication of disputes relating to subsequent disqualifications by an independent authority.

In Bommai,[18] SAWANT and KULDIP SINGH, JJ., have observed: "Democracy[19] and Federalism are essential features of our Constitution and are part of its basic structure." This view is supported by RAMASWAMI, J., who has observed: "Federalism envisaged in the Constitution of India is a basic feature."[20]

In the same case, the Supreme Court has ruled that secularism is a basic or an essential feature of the Constitution. The concept of secularism is embedded in the Constitution. The concept means that the State is to accord equal treatment to all religions and religious sects and denominations.[21]

Secularism is also regarded as a facet of equality. How can the concept of equality be promoted if the state prefers and promotes one particular religion, race or caste which necessarily means being less favourable to other religious groups, sects or castes.[22]

In Indira Gandhi v. Rajnarain,[23] the Supreme Court has unequivocally ruled that the Preamble to the Indian Constitution guarantees equality of status and of opportunity and that the Rule of law is the basic structure of the Constitution.

The concept of equality which is the basic rule of law and that which is regarded as the most fundamental postulate of republicanism are both embedded in Art. 14. The doctrine of equality enshrined in Art. 14 of the Constitution, which is the basis of the Rule of law, is the basic feature of the Constitution.[24] Art. 16(1) is a facet of Art. 14. This point has been re-emphasized by the Court in Indra Sawhney (II):[25] "The Preamble to the Constitution of India emphasizes the principle of equality as basic to our Constitution."

In a plethora of cases,[26] the Supreme Court has asserted that independence of judiciary is a basic feature of the Constitution as it is the sine qua non of democracy; it is the most essential characteristic of a free society. This means that the judiciary ought to be kept free from the influence of political considerations and, therefore, judicial appointments cannot be left to the absolute discretion of the executive.[27]

---

18. AIR 1994 SC 1918, at 1976 : (1994) 3 SCC 1.
19. Indira Nehru Gandhi v. Raj Narain, AIR 1975 SC 229 : (1975) 3 SCC 34; supra, Ch. XIX; supra, this Chapter.
20. AIR 1994 SC 1918 at 2045.
Also see, Shri Kumar v. Union of India, (1992) 2 SCC 428 : AIR 1992 SC 1213.
21. See, supra, Ch. XXIX, Sec. A, under 'Freedom of Religion'.
22. See, S.R. Bommai v. Union of India, supra. M. Ismail Faruqui v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 605 : (1994) 6 SCC.
23. AIR 1975 SC 2299 : 1975 Supp SCC 1.
24. Nachane, Ashwini Shivram v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1998 Bom 1; Raghunath Rao v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 1267; supra, Sec. E(c).
25. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India (II), AIR 2000 SC 498, at 517 : (2000) 1 SCC 168.
26. BHAGWATI, J., in Union of India v. Sankal Chand Himmatlal Sheth, AIR 1977 SC 2328 : (1977) 4 SCC 193 and the Gupta case, AIR 1982 SC 149 at 197, 198; supra, Ch. VIII; Kumar Padma Prasad v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 1213 : (2000) 4 SCC 640; supra, Ch. IV, Sec. K, Ch. VIII, Sec. F; State of Bihar v. Bal Mukund Shah, AIR 2000 SC 1296.
27. Supreme Court Advocates-on-Record Assn. v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 268; supra, Chs. IV, Sec. B(d) and VIII, Sec. B(d).

(a) JUDICIAL REVIEW

Several Articles in the Constitution, such as, Arts. 32, 136, 226 and 227, guarantee judicial review of legislation and administrative action.[28] It can be appreciated that protection of the institution of judicial review is crucially interconnected with the protection of Fundamental Rights, for depriving the Court of its power of judicial review would be tantamount to making Fundamental Rights non-enforceable, "a mere adornment", as they will become rights without remedy. In the absence of judicial review, the written constitution will be reduced to a collection of platitudes without any binding force. Accordingly, judicial review has been declared to be a basic feature of the Constitution. KHANNA, J., has emphasized in Kesavananda:[29]

> "As long as some fundamental rights exist and are a part of the Constitution, the power of judicial review has also to be exercised with a view to see that the guarantees afforded by those rights are not contravened.…judicial review has thus become an integral part of the constitutional system."

In Minerva Mills,[30] CHANDRACHUD, C.J., speaking on behalf of the majority observed:

> "It is the function of the Judges, nay their duty, to pronounce upon the validity of laws. If courts were totally deprived of that power, the fundamental rights conferred on the people will become a mere adornment because rights without remedies are as writ in water. A controlled constitution will then become uncontrolled."

In the same case, BHAGWATI, J., has observed:

> "It is for the judiciary to uphold the constitutional values and to enforce the constitutional limitations. That is the essence of the rule of law, which inter alia requires that the exercises of powers by the government whether it be the legislature or the executive or any other authority, be conditioned by the Constitution and the law. The power of judicial review is an integral part of our constitutional system and without it, there will be no Government of laws and the rule of law would become a teasing illusion and a promise of unreality. I am of the view if there is one feature of our Constitution which, more than any other, is basic and fundamental to the maintenance of democracy and the rule of law, it is the power of judicial review and it is unquestionably, to my mind, part of the basic structure of the Constitution."

BHAGWATI, J., however, went on to say that "effective alternative institutional mechanisms or arrangements" for judicial review can be made by Parliament. But he did emphasize that judicial review is a vital principle of the Constitution and if power of judicial review is taken away by a constitutional amendment, "it will be nothing short of subversion of the Constitution." But, according to BHAGWATI, J., it is not necessary to concentrate judicial review in the courts; if alternative tribunals are set up which are as efficacious and independent as the High Courts, then the power of judicial review can be transferred to such tribunals.

---

28. See, supra, Chs. IV, VIII, Secs. D and E; Sec. C(iv), XX, Sec. C; and XXXIII, Sec. A. Also see, supra, XL.
29. Supra, Sec. D(e).
30. Supra, Sec. D(a).

In Sampath Kumar,[31] Bhagwati, C.J., observed : "Judicial review is a basic and essential feature of the Constitution and no law passed by Parliament in exercise of its constituent power can abrogate it or take it away. If the power of judicial review is abrogated or taken away the Constitution will cease to be what it is."

In Subhesh Sharma v. Union of India,[32] the Supreme Court has asserted that "judicial review is a part of the basic constitutional structure and one of the basic features of the essential Indian Constitutional policy." This means that the independence of the judiciary ought to be safeguarded. This means that the Chief Justice of India should play the primary role in the appointment of the High Court and Supreme Court Judges and not the executive. The Court has expressed the view that "the primacy of the Chief Justice of India in the process of selection would improve quality of selection." Again, in the case noted below,[33] the Supreme Court has asserted that "the powers conferred on it under Articles 32, 136, 141 and 142 form part of the basic structure of the Constitution."[34]

Article 323A has been added to the Constitution by the 42nd Amendment.[35] The Constitutional provision makes it possible for Parliament to set up tribunals for adjudicating upon service matters pertaining to government servants. Under Art. 323A(d), Parliament may "exclude the jurisdiction of all courts, except the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under Art. 136, with respect to the disputes or complaints" assigned for decision to the service tribunal.

In pursuance of Art. 323A, Parliament enacted the Central Administrative Tribunal Act to set up a Central Administrative Tribunal to adjudicate upon disputes between the Central Government and its employees in service matters. Originally, the Tribunal was to be subject to the Supreme Court's jurisdiction under Art. 136. The Supreme Court's jurisdiction under Art. 32 and the High Court's jurisdiction under Arts. 226 and 227 were to be excluded. The constitutional validity of Art. 323A as well as that of the Administrative Tribunal Act came to be questioned before the Supreme Court in S.P. Sampath Kumar v. Union of India.[36]

The Court upheld both subject to certain modifications being introduced into the Act in question. The Supreme Court however made it clear at the earliest opportunity that it would not accept exclusion of its own jurisdiction under Art. 32 and, accordingly, Parliament suitably amended the Act to restore this jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court's jurisdiction remaining intact, the basic question which arose for the Supreme Court's consideration was whether the Constitutional Amendment providing for exclusion of the High Court's jurisdiction could be regarded as constitutionally valid in view of what was said in Minerva.[37] Did it not affect one of the basic or fundamental features of the Constitution?

---

31. S.P. Sampath Kumar v. Union of India, (1987) 1 SCC 124 : AIR 1987 SC 386.
32. AIR 1991 SC 631 at 646.
33. Delhi Judicial Service Association, Tis Hazari Court v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC 2176, at 2204 : (1991) 4 SCC 406
34. For these constitutional provisions, see, Chs. IV and XXXIII, supra.
35. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I..
36. AIR 1986 SC 386 : (1986) 1 SCC 23.
37. Supra, Sec. D(a).

RANGANATH MISRA, J., delivering the Court's judgment, pointed out how in the face of mounting pressure of work on the High Courts which resulted in delayed justice, it became necessary to provide some alternative modes of dispute settlement. Even in Minerva, it was envisaged that "effective alternative institutional mechanisms or arrangements for judicial review" could be made by Parliament. As, in the instant case, judicial review by the Supreme Court remains intact, "exclusion of the jurisdiction of the High Courts does not totally bar judicial review". It was thus possible to provide an alternative institution to perform judicial review instead of the High Courts. But the condition was that the proposed tribunal should be a "real substitute", a "worthy successor" of the High Courts in all respects. The Court then proceeded to make a few suggestions for amendment of the Act in question for removal of certain deficiencies in the composition of the proposed Administrative Tribunal so as to make it a real and effective substitute for the High Courts. In the words of RANGANATH MISRA, J.:

> "What, however, has to be kept in view is that the Tribunal should be a real substitute of the High Court—not only in form and de jure but in content and de facto. As was pointed out in Minerva Mills the alternative arrangement has to be effective and efficient as also capable of upholding the constitutional limitations."

In a separate but concurring judgment, BHAGWATI, C.J., agreed with the majority view. He observed in this connection:

> "... judicial review is a basic and essential feature of the Constitution and it cannot be abrogated without affecting the basic structure of the Constitution and it is equally clear from the same decision (Minerva) that though judicial review cannot be altogether abrogated by Parliament by amending the Constitution in exercise of its constituent power, Parliament can certainly, without in any way violating the basic structure doctrine, set up effective alternative institutional mechanisms or arrangements of judicial review."

And, the Chief Justice went on to state further:

> "The basic and essential feature of judicial review cannot be dispensed with but it would be within the competence of Parliament to amend the Constitution so as to substitute in place of the High Court, another alternative institutional mechanism or arrangement for judicial review, provided it is not less efficacious than the High Court. Then, instead of the High Court, it would be another institutional mechanism or authority, which would be exercising the power of judicial review with a view to enforcing the constitutional limitations and maintaining the Rule of Law."

Therefore, according to Sampat, a constitutional amendment transferring from the High Court the power of judicial review in any specific area to any other institution, may not be violative of the basic structure doctrine so long as the essential condition is fulfilled, viz., that the alternative institutional arrangement or mechanism or authority set up by parliamentary amendment is no less effective than the High Court.

Article 371-D was added to the Constitution in 1973 by the Thirty-Second Constitutional Amendment to make special provisions for the State of Andhra Pradesh for providing equitable opportunities and facilities to the people belonging to different parts of the State in such matters as education, public employment, etc.[38] Clause 3 of the above provision authorises the President to appoint an administrative tribunal to exercise jurisdiction, power and authority, including that exercised by any Court, except the Supreme Court, before the commencement of the 32nd Amendment Act, in respect of matters mentioned in Art. 371-D(3). According to Cl. 5, "the order of the Administrative Tribunal finally disposing of any case shall become effective upon its confirmation by the State Government or on the expiry of three months from the date on which the order was made, whichever was earlier." A proviso to this clause provided further that the State Government might, by a special order in writing and for reasons to be specified therein, "modify or annul" any order made by the Tribunal before it became effective and in such a case the order of the Tribunal would have effect only in such modified form or be of no effect as might be the case.

The constitutional validity of Clause 5 was challenged and in P. Sambamurthy v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[39] the Supreme Court struck it down, as being violative of the basic structure of the Constitution. BHAGWATI, C.J., delivering the Court's opinion, took objection to the power of the State Government to modify or nullify a Tribunal decision. The State Government would itself be a party in the dispute on which the Tribunal adjudicated. The Government could set at naught any Tribunal decision given against it. BHAGWATI, C.J., criticised this provision in the following words:

> "Such a provision is, to say the least, shocking and is clearly subversive of the principles of justice. How can a party to the litigation be given the power to override the decision given by the Tribunal in the litigation, without violating the basic concept of justice? It would make a mockery of the entire adjudicative process...We do think that this power conferred on the State Government is clearly violative of the basic concept of justice."

It was also held as "violative of the rule of law which is clearly a basic and essential feature of the Constitution." The Court also pointed out that for the validity of the constitutional provision authorising exclusion of the High Court's jurisdiction and vesting it in the Tribunal, it was necessary that the Tribunal "must be as effective an institutional mechanism or authority for judicial review as the High Court". "If the Administrative Tribunal is less effective and efficacious than the High Court in the matter of judicial review in respect of specified service matters, the constitutional amendment would fall foul of the basic structure doctrine." If the State Government, a party to the litigation before the Administrative Tribunal, had power to override Tribunal decision then the Tribunal would be deprived of its effectiveness and efficacy.

The power of judicial review vested in the High Court under Arts. 226 and 227 does not suffer from any infirmity of the character which the order of the Administrative Tribunal suffered in view of the provisions of Cl. (5) of Art. 371-D in as much as whatever the High Court decides is binding on the State Government and it cannot, for any reason, set at naught the decision of the High Court. But the decision of the Tribunal was, by reason of proviso to Cl. (5) of Art. 371-D, subject to the veto of the State Government. This made the Tribunal a less effective and efficacious institutional mechanism for judicial review. Hence BHAGWATI, C.J., observed:

---

38. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. B(e).
39. AIR 1987 SC 663 : (1987) 1 SCC 362.

> "....the conclusion is inescapable that the proviso to Cl. (5) of Art. 371-D by which power has been conferred on the State Government to modify or annul the final order of the Administrative Tribunal is violative of the basic structure doctrine since it is that which makes the Administrative Tribunal a less effective and efficacious institutional mechanism or authority for judicial review."

Therefore, the proviso to Cl. (5) was struck down as being outside the constituent power of Parliament. Not only that, the whole of Cl. 5 was struck down "as unconstitutional as being ultra vires the amending power of Parliament for if the proviso goes, Cl. 5 must also fall along with it" since it was closely interrelated with the proviso and could not have any rationale for existence apart from the proviso.[40]

But, then, the Supreme Court has reconsidered the ratio in the above cases and has changed its position in L. Chandra Kumar v. Union of India.[41] The Court has now ruled that the power of judicial review which is vested in the High Courts under Arts. 226 and 227 and the Supreme Court under Art. 32 of the Constitution, is an integral and essential feature of the Constitution, constituting part of its basic structure. Ordinarily, therefore, this power of the High Courts and the Supreme Court to test the constitutional validity of the legislation can never be ousted or excluded. Therefore, no constitutional amendment can exclude the power of the High Courts and the Supreme Court to test the constitutional validity of the legislation.

It is the function of the courts "to ensure that the balance of power envisaged by the Constitution is maintained and that the legislature and the executive do not, in the discharge of their functions, transgress constitutional limitations".[42] Accordingly, the Supreme Court has declared unconstitutional Cl. 2(d) of Art. 323A and Cl. 3(d) of Art. 323B,[43] to the extent these clauses exclude jurisdiction of the High Courts under Arts. 226 and 227 and of the Supreme Court under Art. 32. The Court has observed in this connection:[44]

> "The jurisdiction conferred upon the High Courts under Arts. 226/227 and upon the Supreme Court under Art. 32 of the Constitution is part of the inviolable basic structure of the Constitution. While this jurisdiction cannot be ousted, other courts and tribunals may perform a supplemental role in discharging the powers conferred by Articles 226/227 and 32 of the Constitution."

The Supreme Court has thus ruled that the writ jurisdiction vested in a High Court under Art. 226, and in the Supreme Court under Art. 32, as well as the power vested in the High courts to exercise judicial superintendence over the decisions of all courts and tribunals within their respective jurisdictions are all part of the basic structure of the constitution.

---

40. The rest of Art. 371(D) has been held to be constitutional : C. Surekha v. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 44; Fazal Gafoor v. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 48 : 1988 Supp SCC 794; S. Prakash Rao v. Commr. of Commercial Taxes, AIR 1990 SC 997 : (1990) 2 SCC 259; B Sudhakar Dr. v. Union of India, AIR 1995 AP 86.

41. AIR 1997 SC 1125, at 1149-50 : (1997) 3 SCC 261.
Also see, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.

42. AIR 1997 SC 1125 at 1150, 1156.
The Supreme Court has observed in S.S. Bola v. B.D. Sardana, AIR 1997 SC 3127 at 3167 : "Judicial Review, therefore, is an integral part of the Constitution as its basic structure."

43. For discussion on these provisions, see, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.

44. AIR 1997 SC 1125 at 1156.

The Supreme Court has thus ensured that judicial review in an inseparable part of the Constitution, and that it cannot be excluded even by a constitutional amendment. Therefore, the position now is that while tribunals can be created to adjudicate upon various matters, the jurisdiction of the High Courts under Arts. 226/227 and that of the Supreme Court under Art. 32 cannot be excluded even by a constitutional amendment. Subject to these constitutional provisions, the tribunals may perform a supplementary role.

A finality clause in an Article in the Constitution conferring finality on the actions or decisions of an authority does not totally exclude judicial review of the actions and decisions of the concerned authority. A finality clause may however restrict to some extent the scope of judicial review. The broad categorisation is that actions falling within the jurisdiction of the authority are non-reviewable, but those falling outside its jurisdiction are reviewable by the courts. The category of 'outside jurisdiction' is quite broad. An action or decision of the authority falls outside its jurisdiction if—

(i) it is in contravention of a provision of law conferring power on the authority;

(ii) it is vitiated by mala fides or is colourable exercise of power based on extraneous or irrelevant considerations;

(iii) there is failure of natural justice;

(iv) it is based on no evidence.

This matter falls more appropriately within the realm of Administrative Law. According to modern judicial thinking, the category 'outside jurisdiction' is an expanding category. The above grounds are not exhaustive but rather illustrative.[45]

(b) NON OBSTANTE CLAUSES

Some provisions of the Constitution have non obstante clauses to the effect: "Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution…." For example, Cl. (2) of Art. 371 says: "Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution the President may by order…" And then, Cl. (10) of Art. 371D says: "The provisions of this Article and of any order made by the President thereunder shall have effect notwithstanding anything in any other provision of this Constitution…"

The question has been raised whether such a non obstante clause comes in the way of testing the provision against the touchstone of violation of the basic features of the Constitution. The Supreme Court has answered such a question in the negative. The Court has ruled that in spite of such a clause, the principle that no constitutional amendment can be made so as to damage any basic feature of the Constitution will prevail. Accordingly, in Sambamurty,[46] Art. 371D(5) was declared unconstitutional in spite of the presence of Cl. 10 of Art. 371D.[47]

---

45. State of Rajasthan v. Union of India, AIR 1977 SC 1361 : (1977) 3 SCC 592; Union of India v. Jyoti Prakash Mitter, AIR 1971 SC 1093 : (1971) 1 SCC 396; Kihoto Hollohon v. Zachillu, AIR 1993 412 at 450-51 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651; M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, II.

46. See, supra, footnote 39.

47. For discussion on these provisions, see, supra, Ch. IX, Sec. B(e).

Article 371F opens with the words "Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution…"[48] The validity of Cl. (f) of Art. 371F was questioned. It was argued that since Art. 371F opens with a non obstante clause, other provisions of the Constitution cannot limit the power of Parliament to impose conditions under Cl. (f). But the Supreme Court rejected the contention and observed in R.C. Poudyal v. India:[49]

> "But Art. 371-F cannot transgress the basic features of the Constitution. The non obstante clause cannot be construed as taking Clause (f) of Article 371-F outside the limitations on the amending power itself. The provisions of clause (f) of Article 371-E and Article 2[50] have to be construed harmoniously consistent with the foundational principles and basic features of the Constitution…"

In Nachane,[51] the Bombay High Court has held that the non obstante clause in Art. 371(2), as mentioned above, cannot come in the way of assessing the constitutionality of an order made by the President under Art. 371, vis-à-vis Art. 14. The Court has observed:[52]

> "…. the power of judicial review vested in the High Courts under Art. 226 of the Constitution is a part of the basic and essential feature of the Constitution constituting part of its basic structure. By virtue of the non obstante clause appearing at the beginning of Article 371 of the Constitution, this Court is not precluded from considering the validity of a rule made by the State Government…"

To sum up, it may be stated that the Supreme Court has made a very great contribution to the cause of constitutionalism in India by enunciating the doctrine of inviolability of the basic features of the Constitution. The doctrine is the result of a feeling among the judges that certain values and ideals embedded in the Constitution should be preserved and not destroyed by any process of constitutional amendment. The doctrine places an embargo on the erosion of basic features, but a constitutional amendment seeking to promote, strengthen and enlarge a basic feature would be most welcome. Undoubtedly, the doctrine has deterred the ruling party having a majority in both Houses of Parliament from effecting ill considered constitutional amendments, such as, the infamous 39th Amendment. The doctrine seeks to preserve the basic, core, constitutional values against the onslaught of a transient' majority in Parliament. The Constitution is not a party manifesto which can be amended by the party at its will to suit political expediency, but a national heritage which ought to be amended only when there is a broad national consensus favouring a specific amendment.

---

48. See, supra, Ch. IX, Sec. D.
Also infra, Ch. XLII.
49. Ibid.
50. For Art. 2, see, supra, Ch. V.
51. Nachane Ashiwni Shivram v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1998 Bom 1.
52. Ibid, at 22.

CHAPTER XLII

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

SYNOPSIS

During its career of nearly fifty years, the Indian Constitution has undergone a number of amendments. It may be helpful to have a brief resume of the salient features of these amendments and to understand the factors and forces which led to their enactment.

FIRST AMENDMENT: 1951

The Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951, was enacted within a year of the commencement of the Constitution. The First Amendment made several modifications in a few Fundamental Rights.

It added the following three more heads to Art. 19(2): 'public order', "friendly relations with foreign states', and 'incitement to an offence'. Thus, the legislature became entitled to restrict the freedom of speech and expression in respect of these three heads also in addition to the heads originally mentioned in Art. 19(2)[1].

The phrase 'friendly relations with foreign states' was needed to curb propaganda against Pakistan which was then going on in a rather virulent form.

Addition of the expressions 'public order' and 'incitement to an offence' were deemed necessary as the courts had held that 'security of state' was a restricted concept as compared with 'public order' and 'public safety' so that freedom of speech could not be curtailed merely for maintaining 'public order' and 'public safety' unless the 'security of state' was also threatened. On this basis, several laws were declared ultra vires as they restricted the freedom of speech for maintaining 'public order' and not 'security of state'.[2]

The Patna High Court in the Shailabala case[3] had ruled that only incitement to commit political assassinations, or murders, or crimes of violence intending to overthrow the state could affect 'security of state', but not incitement to commit any crime, and so the former and not the latter, could be restrained under the rubric 'security of state'. Although, simultaneously, the Madras High Court had decided in Srinivasa v. State of Madras[4] that even incitement of a single case of murder, or cognisable offence involving violence, might have a tendency to overthrow the state and thus affect its security, the Shailabala verdict had already gone home to the Central Government. Hence, Art. 19(2) was amplified to enable the legislature to make laws to restrict freedom of speech in the interests of 'public order' or put a restraint upon 'incitement to violence'.

In 1952, the Supreme Court overruled the Shailabala[5] case and, thus, much of the misunderstanding which the case had generated was cleared, and much of the justification for amending Art. 19(2) was removed, but the Supreme Court's decision came too late as the Amendment had already been effectuated.

In one respect, Art. 19(2) was improved by the First Amendment. Originally, Art. 19(2) did not contain the word 'reasonable' before the word 'restrictions', and so the courts could not assess the reasonableness of the restrictions imposed on the right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a). Art. 19(2) thus differed from Arts. 19(3) to 19(6) in which the expression 'reasonable restrictions' had been used. The word 'reasonable' was now introduced in Art. 19(2) thus making restrictions on the freedom of speech and expression justiciable.[6] This was a major gain.

The Amending Act added a clarificatory clause to Art. 19(6) to make it clear that the freedom of trade and commerce guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(g) was not to invalidate any scheme of nationalisation undertaken by the state. The need for this amendment was felt because of certain remarks made by the Judges of the Allahabad High Court in Motilal v. State of Uttar Pradesh which arose out of nationalisation of motor transport.[7]

---

1. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Secs. C and D.
2. Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, AIR 1950 SC 124 : 1950 SCR 594; Brij Bhusan v. Delhi, AIR 1950 SC 129 : 1950 SCR 605; supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. D.
3. AIR 1951 Pat 12.
4. AIR 1951 Mad 70.
5. Supra, footnote 3.
6. Supra, Ch. XXIV. Also, XII Parl, Deb., II, 9010.
7. AIR 1951 All 257; supra, Ch. XXIV, Secs. I and J.

The First Amending Act curtailed the Fundamental Right to property guaranteed by Art. 31 with a view to achieve quick implementation of important measures of agrarian reform passed by the State Legislatures by immunizing the same against attack in the courts. This amendment added two new Articles, 31A and 31B, and the Ninth Schedule, so as to make laws acquiring zemindaris unchallengeable in the courts.[8]

The Patna High Court had declared the Bihar legislation unconstitutional under Art. 14,[9] while the High Courts of Allahabad and Nagpur had held similar laws valid. Before, however, the Supreme Court could give its verdict on the validity or otherwise of this type of legislation, the Central Government under Nehru became restive at the delay being caused by litigation in furthering the programme of agricultural land reform, and thought of short circuiting the judicial process. Nehru was an ardent supporter of agrarian reform which he regarded as a process of social reform and social engineering. The Centre wanted to remove any possibility of such laws being declared invalid by the courts and hence the amendment.

The Ninth Schedule was an interesting innovation in the area of constitutional amendment. A new technique of by-passing judicial review was initiated. Any Act incorporated in the Schedule became fully protected against any challenge in a court of law under any Fundamental Right. Even an act declared invalid by a court becomes valid retrospectively after being incorporated in the Schedule.

To begin with, only Acts abolishing zamindari were included in the Schedule. Thus, only thirteen State Acts named therein were put beyond any challenge in courts for contravention of Fundamental Rights. But Schedule IX has swelled and swelled in course of time as all kinds of statutes have been included therein to protect them from judicial review so much so that to-day the Schedule contains as many as 284 entries.[10]

Art. 15(4) was added to the Constitution under circumstances already explained earlier.[11]

Arts. 85 and 87 were amended so as to do away with the summoning of Parliament twice a year and the requirement of the President addressing the two Houses at the commencement of each session. Now, the provision is that not more than six months are to elapse between the last day of one session and the first day of the following session. The Houses are now prorogued only once a year and the President addresses the Houses of Parliament only at the commencement of the first session each year.[12]

Corresponding amendments were also made in Arts. 174[13] and 176[14] for the State Legislatures.

A few other minor amendments were made by the First Amendment in Arts. 341, 342, 372, which it is not necessary to detail here.[15]

---

8. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C.
9. Kameshwar v. State of Bihar, AIR 1951 Pat 91; supra, Chs. XXI, XXXI and XXXII.
10. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C.
11. Supra, Ch. XXII, Sec. C.
12. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(b).
13. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. C.
14. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. C(b).

As has already been stated earlier, the constitutional validity of the First Amendment was challenged in the Supreme Court. The Court upheld the validity of the amendment in the famous Shankari Prasad case.[16]

SECOND AMENDMENT : 1952

The Constitution (Second Amendment) Act was passed in 1952.

Originally, Art. 81(1)(b) required that Lok Sabha would have not less than one member for every 7,50,000, and not more than one member for every 5,00,000, of the population. The strength of the Lok Sabha was fixed at 500 and at the rate of one member for every 7.5 lakhs of people, the formula became unworkable the moment the population reached 37.5 crores. The Amending Act, therefore, dropped the minimum requirement of one member for every 7.5 lakhs of people in Art. 81(1)(b). Only the maximum requirement was retained.[17]

Corresponding changes were effectuated in Art. 170(2) relating to the State Legislatures.[18]

This Amendment would not have been necessary had the constitution-makers taken into consideration the population trends in the country.

THIRD AMENDMENT : 1954

The Constitution (Third Amendment) Act enacted in 1954 amended the original entry 33 of List III, expanded its scope and gave it its present shape.

The Amendment somewhat changed the federal balance of power in favour of the Centre.

The factors leading to the Amendment and its impact on federalism in India have already been discussed earlier.[19]

FOURTH AMENDMENT : 1955

The Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, again amended Art. 31 in several respects.

In the first place, Art. 31(2) was modified.[20] Secondly, a new Article 31(2)(A) was added, the genesis and effect of which have been explained earlier.[21] The purpose of these amendments was to restate more precisely the State's power of compulsory acquisition and requisitioning of private property and to distinguish it from deprivation of property by the operation of regulatory or prohibitory laws. The amendments made it clear that it is only for the former, and not for the latter, that compensation becomes payable.

---

15. For Arts. 341 and 342 see, supra, Ch. XXXV, Secs. B and C.
Art. 372 being of a temporary nature has exhausted itself: supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. F.
16. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. D(a).
17. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. C.
18. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(ii).
19. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
20. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C.
21. Ibid.

Another purpose of amending Art. 31(2) was to make the amount of compensation non-justiciable. For this purpose a new clause (2A) was added to Art. 31. This was done to get over the effect of the Supreme Court's decision in State of West Bengal v. Bella Banerjee. This point has also been explained earlier.[22]

To justify the necessity of the Fourth Amendment, so far as Art. 31(2) was concerned, an argument advanced by the Central Government was that the judiciary had held that compensation was payable for 'any deprivation of property' even by a purely regulatory law. The actual position, however, was somewhat different from the one this statement sought to make out. What the Supreme Courts had held was that compensation was payable in case of 'substantial dispossession' or 'serious impairment' of the property right.[23] However, the Centre was not satisfied even with this and wanted to restrict payment of compensation only to a situation when there was acquisition involving transfer of ownership, or requisitioning involving transfer of the right to possession, to the State. The right to private property, therefore, became very much circumscribed by the Fourth Amendment and much came to depend on the goodwill of the Legislature.

Art. 31(2), as it stood prior to the Fourth Amendment, did not in so many words provide that no acquisition of property could be made save for a public purpose. By a verbal amendment of Art. 31(2), the Fourth Amendment now brought out more specifically than before that no private property was to be compulsorily acquired or requisitioned except for a 'public purpose'.

Before the Fourth Amendment, the point was implicit and the Supreme Court had already held in State of Bihar v. Kameshwar Singh that according to universal juristic notions, 'public purpose' was a prerequisite of 'eminent domain'.[24] The change therefore did not add much to the already existing legal position, but made explicit what was implicit earlier.

The Constitution (First Amendment) Act had added Art. 31A to protect the zamindari abolition laws from being challenged under Arts. 14, 19 and 31. Art. 31A was now expanded in scope with a view to extend the same immunity to other types of social welfare and regulatory legislation affecting private property.[25]

While sponsoring the Fourth Amendment, the Central Government claimed that the Amendment clarified and brought the Constitution in line with what its makers had intended. Prime Minister Nehru stated in the Lok Sabha (April 11, 1955) that according to the Constitution, as put forward before the Constituent Assembly, and as it emerged from there, it was made quite clear that the quantum of, or the principles governing, compensation were to be decided by the legislature. "It was obvious that those who framed the Constitution failed to give expression to their wishes accurately and precisely and thereby the Supreme Court and some other courts have interpreted it in a different way." The Amendment, it was claimed, was to word the Constitution precisely in accordance with what the framers of the Constitution at that time had envisaged, meant and openly said.

---

22. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C.
23. State of West Bengal v. Subodh Gopal, AIR 1954 SC 92 : 1954 SCR 587; Dwarkadas Shrinivas v. Sholapur Spinning Co., AIR 1954 SC 119 : 1954 SCR 674; Saghir Ahmad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 728 : (1955) 1 SCR 707; supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C.
24. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C(iv).
25. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. B.

It is correct that Nehru and others in the Constituent Assembly had thought that the original Art. 31(2) made the legislature the final arbiter of the quantum of compensation which could not be challenged in a court except when there was a fraud on the Constitution or a fraudulent exercise of the power so given. To the extent the Fourth Amendment made compensation non-justiciable, it could be said to accord with the intentions of some of the constitution-makers. But the Amendment did not stop at that. It had a much broader coverage. Arts. 31A and 31B were much more extensive in scope than what the framers had ever thought of. The Amendment was made to serve certain purposes which the constitution-makers had not dreamt of. Social welfare legislation and regulatory legislation had only recently been thought of. The Amendment in effect reconstituted original Art. 31 in a every fundamental manner.[26]

The Fourth Amendment also added a few more Acts to the Ninth Schedule thus immunizing these Acts from attacks under Fundamental Rights. These Acts covered a wide canvass as they related to such matters as land acquisition for rehabilitation of refugees, insurance, railway companies, taking over of management of industrial undertakings under the provisions of the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act: land development and planning.

The Fourth Amendment also redrafted Art. 305, the necessity for which has already been explained earlier.[27] The main purpose of this exercise was to protect laws creating State monopolies or nationalising any undertaking from the operation of Art. 301. This Amendment was undertaken to neutralize the impact of Saghir Ahmad v. State of Uttar Pradesh[28] in which it was ruled that a law providing for a state monopoly would have to be justified as being in the public interest under Art. 301 or as amounting to a "reasonable restriction under Art. 304(b). It was thought to be necessary that Art. 305 should be amended to make this clear.[29]

FIFTH AMENDMENT : 1955

The Constitution (Fifth Amendment) Act enacted in 1955 amended Art. 3.

This Article envisaged that before Parliament passed an Act to re-organise the States, the Bill for the purpose should be referred by the President to the State Legislatures concerned for expression of their views thereon. A defect in the original Art. 3 was that it did not lay down a time-limit within which the States concerned were to express their views. The absence of any such limit could cause delay or even hold up Parliamentary Legislation for the purpose.[30]

The Government of India was anxious to expedite re-organisation of the States on a linguistic basis and it apprehended that an aggrieved State might forestall the passage of the necessary legislation by Parliament merely by non-expression of its views for any length of time. The Amending Act therefore made it possible for the President to set a time-limit within which a State must express

---

26. See, H.C.L. Merrillat, Compensation for the Taking of Property : A Historical Footnote to Bela Banerjee's case, 1 JILI 375.
27. Supra Ch. XV, Secs. H and I.
28. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. I(b).
29. Supra Ch. XV, Sec. I.
30. Supra, Ch. V, Sec. B.

its views. On the expiry of the prescribed time-limit, Parliament could proceed with the matter without waiting for the views of the State concerned.

SIXTH AMENDMENT : 1956

The Constitution (Sixth Amendment) Act, 1956, sought to remove some of the difficulties arising in the area of sales taxation by the States. The Amendment was passed to do away with multiple taxation of sale or purchase of goods in interstate trade and commerce by the States on the basis of territorial nexus.[31]

The Amendment emanated out of the recommendations of the Taxation Enquiry Commission which can be summarised as follows: while sales tax must continue to be a State source, the power and responsibility of the States must come to an end, and that of the Centre should begin, when the sales tax of one State impinges administratively on the dealers and fiscally on the consumers of another State. Therefore, interstate sales tax should be the concern of the Centre, but the revenue should devolve on the States.

Further, some restrictions should be placed on the State power to tax intrastate sale of raw materials produced therein, otherwise, the cost of the manufactured articles, whether manufactured in the State producing the raw materials, or in another State, would increase. Since manufactured goods are consumed mostly outside the State producing the raw materials, an increase in their cost due to State taxation is of direct concern to the consumers in other States, and, therefore, it is necessary that such intrastate sales be brought under the Central control. The matter had assumed importance after the Supreme Court's decisions in State of Bombay v. United Motors and Bengal Immunity Co. v. State of Bihar.[32]

The Amending Act made taxation of interstate sales a Central matter by introducing entry 92A in List I,[33] and making entry 54 in List II,[34] regarding sales taxation by the States, subject to entry 92A of List I. This change placed taxes on inter-State sales and purchases under the exclusive domain of the Centre's Legislative and executive power. The revenue thereby was to be distributed among the States.

There was some difficulty in finding out—(i) what was a sale 'outside' a State, or (ii) 'in the course of import and export', or (iii) 'in the course of inter-State trade and commerce' so as to debar a State from taxing any such sale.[35] Therefore, Art. 286 was modified so as to enable Parliament to define these concepts.

The Amending Act also added Art. 286(3) which was designed to enable Parliament to restrict States' power to tax important raw materials.[36]

Art. 269 was also amended by adding clause (g) thereto so as to assign the revenue arising from Central taxation of inter-State sales to the States.[37]

---

31. For 'Territorial Nexus', see, supra, Ch. X, Sec. A.
For 'Sales Taxation', see, supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(i).
32. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(i).
33. Ibid.
34. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. C; Sec. J(i)(b).
35. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(i)(a).
36. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J(i)(d).
37. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. K(i).

The cumulative result of the Sixth Amendment of the Constitution was to add to the power of the Centre and to place the States' power to levy sales tax under Central Government's control and regulation in several ways. This was done in the interests of discouraging the creation of trade barriers by the States in the way of, and avoiding multiple taxation of, interstate trade which might affect the emergence of the country into one single economic unit.

Further, the Constitution permits sufficient flexibility by leaving "to Parliament, instead of doing so itself or leaving it to the Courts as hitherto, the defining of such concepts as 'outside sale', 'sale in the course of inter-State trade and commerce.' 'sale in the course of import and export', and 'declaration of goods special importance in inter-State trade".[38] The Centre has passed the Central Sales Tax Act, 1956.

SEVENTH AMENDMENT : 1956

The Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, 1956, was necessitated primarily because of the re-organisation of the States on a linguistic basis as a result of the report of the States' Re-organization Commission. The opportunity was however utilised to effect modifications in several provisions of the Constitution.[39]

The scheme of States' re-organisation involved not only changes in the boundaries of several of the existing States, but also the abolition of the pre-existing classification of the States into those of Part A, Part B and Part C. By this Amendment, the States of Part A and Part B were placed on an equal footing while the States of Part C were now designated as Union Territories.[40] These various changes were effectuated by modifying Art. 1, substitution of Schedule I by a new Schedule,[41] and modifying Arts. 239, 240 and to 241 to provide for the administration of the newly formed Union Territories.[42]

Consequential amendments were effected in Art. 80 which were of a formal nature, but Schedule IV,[43] dealing with allocation of seats in the Rajya Sabha, was completely revised.

Arts. 81 and 82[44] dealing with the division of the States into constituencies for the purpose of election of members of the Lok Sabha (which had been modified by the Second Amendment)[45] were also completely revised because provision had to be made for Union Territories and also because the provision in the pre-existing Art. 81 for grouping of States for formation of constituencies for Lok Sabha became redundant as each of the newly formed States was large enough to be divided by itself into a number of constituencies. The stipulation of not more than one member in Lok Sabha for every 5 lakh of population was also dropped.[46]

---

38. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J.
See ILI, INTER-STATE TRADE BARRIERS AND SALES TAX LAWS IN INDIA (1962).
39. Supra, Ch. V, Sec. B.
40. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. A.
41. Supra, Ch. V, Sec. A.
42. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. B.
43. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. B.
44. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. C.
45. Supra.
46. See Amendment II, supra.

Art. 131 defining the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court[47] was revised because the States of Part B had now disappeared.

Art. 153[48] was modified so as to make it possible to appoint one person as the Governor of two or more States and, consequently, Art. 158 was amended so as to provide for the apportionment of salary of the common Governor among the States concerned.

Art. 168 was modified for providing Legislative Councils in a few more States,[49] and Art. 171 was revised so as to increase the strength of the Upper Houses in the States.[50] Art. 170[51] dealing with the composition of State Legislative Assemblies was revised so as to be brought in line with Art. 81 as revised as stated above.

In the case of High Courts, the following amendments were made:

(1) From Art. 216, the proviso requiring the President to fix the maximum strength of the Judges of each High Court was dropped because it was of little practical significance as the number once fixed could be changed by the President whenever he liked.[52]

(2) Art. 224 was modified so as to make provision for appointment of additional and acting Judges in the High Courts and, consequently, Art. 217 was also amended to clarify that the tenure of these Judges would be temporary and not up to 62 years as in case of permanent Judges.[53]

(3) Art. 220 was revised so as to permit a retired High Court Judge to practice in the Supreme Court and in any High Court other than the one in which he was a permanent Judge; this provision was made to attract talent to the High Courts.[54]

(4) Art. 222 was amended so as to make provision for transfer of a Judge from one High Court to another.[55]

(5) Arts. 230 and 231 were completely revised with a view to establishing common High Courts for two or more States and to extend to a Union Territory the jurisdiction of a High Court or exclude it therefrom, and, as a consequence, Art. 232 was omitted.[56]

(6) Salaries of the Judges of all High Courts were equated by amending the Second Schedule and the distinction previously maintained between High Courts of States of Part A and Part B in this respect was now abolished.

Art. 239 was re-drafted so as to provide for the administration of Union Territories.[57]

Art. 258A was added to enable a State to entrust its functions to the Centre.[58]

---

47. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(iii)(b)(c)(d).
48. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. A(i)(b).
49. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(i).
50. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(i).
51. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(ii).
52. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(a).
53. Ibid.
54. Ibid.
55. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(m).
56. Ibid.
57. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. A.
58. Supra, Ch. XII, Sec. B(e).

Art. 298 was revised and amplified to clarify that the executive power of the Centre and the States extended to the carrying on of any business or industry, holding property and entering into contracts.[59]

Arts. 350A and 350B were inserted to implement one of the recommendations of the States' Re-organisation Commission to afford safeguards to the linguistic minorities.[60]

Art. 371 was revised so as to provide for regional committees for Andhra and Punjab.[61]

The pre-existing three entries, 33 of List I, 36 of List II, and 42 of List III, relating essentially to the single subject of acquisition and requisitioning of property by the government, gave rise to unnecessary technical difficulties in legislation. To avoid difficulties and simplify the constitutional provision, entries in List I and List II were omitted and entry 42 in List III was revised.[62]

Some slight modifications were also effected in Art. 49, entry 67, List I, entry 12, List II, entry 40, List III (taken in one group)[63] and in entry 24, List II.[64]

A few other minor amendments made to other Articles are not mentioned here.[65]

EIGHTH AMENDMENT : 1959

The Constitution (Eighth Amendment) Act, 1959, amended Art. 334, so as to extend the duration of the reservation of seats in Lok Sabha and State Legislative Assemblies for the Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and Anglo-Indians, originally fixed for ten years, to twenty years, from the commencement of the Constitution.[66]

NINTH AMENDMENT : 1960

The Constitution (Ninth Amendment) Act modified the description of boundaries, contained in the First Schedule to the Constitution, of the States of Assam, Punjab, West Bengal and the Union Territory of Tripura.

The Amendment had to be undertaken in the wake of the Berubari case.[67] The amendment of the First Schedule was effected to cede some Indian territory to Pakistan as envisaged in the Indo-Pakistan Agreement.

---

59. Supra, Ch. XII, Sec. C.
60. Supra, Chs. XVI, Sec. C(c) and XXXV, Sec. F(a).
61. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. B(e).
62. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
63. In entries 67 in List I, 12 in List II, 40 in List III and Art. 49, for the words "declared by Parliament by law", the words "declared by or under law made by Parliament" were substituted: supra, Ch. X.
64. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
65. Art. 290A was added to charge some money on the Consolidated Funds of Kerala and Madras for payment to a Travancore religious fund, supra.
A transitional provision, Art. 372A, was added conferring power on the President to adapt laws in conformity with the newly amended Constitution.
66. Supra, Chs. II, , Sec. C; VI, Sec. B(ii) and XXXV, Secs. B, C and D.
67. Supra, Ch. V, Sec. C.

TENTH AMENDMENT : 1961

The Constitution (Tenth Amendment) Act, 1961, made Dadra and Nagar Haveli (formerly under the Portuguese possession), a constituent unit of the Indian Union and gave it the status of a Union Territory.[68] Necessary changes were made in Art. 240(1) and the First Schedule.

ELEVENTH AMENDMENT : 1961

The Constitution (Eleventh Amendment) Act, 1961, was enacted to prevent election of the President or the Vice-President from being challenged on the ground of any vacancy existing at the time of election in the appropriate electoral college. The circumstances leading to the amendment have already been discussed.[69]

TWELFTH AMENDMENT : 1962

By this Amendment, the territory of Goa, Daman and Diu, formerly a Portuguese colony, was integrated into India as a Union Territory.[70]

THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT : 1962

The Constitution (Thirteenth Amendment) Act, 1962, was enacted to effectuate an agreement between the Government of India and the leaders of the Naga Peoples' Convention to constitute a separate State of Nagaland within the Indian Union.

A new provision, Art. 371A, was added to the Constitution so as to make certain special provisions for the governance of the State of Nagaland.[71]

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT : 1962

The Constitution (Fourteenth Amendment) Act, 1962, integrated the French establishments of Pondicherry, Karikal, Mahe and Yanam formally as a Union Territory of Pondicherry.[72]

Opportunity was taken to effect some changes with respect to the administration of the Union Territories. It was thought advisable to create Legislatures and Council of Ministers in some of the Union Territories, and, for this purpose, necessary legislative power had to be conferred on the Union Parliament. Accordingly, a new provision, Art. 239A, was added to the Constitution.[73]

The regulation-making power of the President under Art. 240 was extended to Pondicherry as well, but a proviso was also added to Art. 240 to make it clear

---

68. Supra, Chs. V and IX, Sec. A.
69. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i) and (ii).
70. Supra, Chs. V and IX.
71. For details see, supra, Ch. IX, Sec. B(b).
72. Supra, Chs. V and IX.
73. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. A.

that the President's regulation-making power would come to an end when a Legislature was established in a Union Territory.[74]

FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT : 1963

The Constitution (Fifteenth Amendment) Act, 1963, was an omnibus constitutional amendment as it effected modifications in several constitutional provisions.

Art. 217(1) was amended to raise the retirement age of the High Court Judges from 60 to 62 years.[75] It partially gave effect to the recommendation of the Law Commission that the retirement age of the High Court Judges be raised to 65 years.

Two factors weighed with the Law Commission in making this recommendation; first, there was a marked rise in the life expectancy in India; secondly, many High Court Judges, after their retirement, were engaged in active work (like practice etc.) even at the age of 65. The Central Government did not go as far as the Law Commission had suggested, and stopped at 62 years for the High Court Judges with a view to keep avenues open for younger people. However, Art. 224A was added so as to enable a retired High Court Judge to sit and act as the Judge of the same court.[76]

Art. 128 was modified so as to make it possible for the retired High Court Judges to sit and act as ad hoc Judges of the Supreme Court. Previously, only retired Judges of the Supreme Court and the Federal Court could sit as such, but there were not many of such Judges, and, therefore, provision was made for retired High Court Judges as well to act as ad hoc Judges of the Supreme Court.[77]

Arts. 124 and 217 were amended so as to make a specific provision empowering the President to determine the correct age of the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts, whenever a question is raised in that regard. This was necessitated by the protracted litigation pursued by Justice Mitter of the Calcutta High Court. There was a discrepancy in the age of Justice Mitter as accepted at the time of his appointment to the High Court and his age as recorded in his matriculation certificate. He was retired in accordance with the age shown in the certificate and this was challenged by Justice Mitter in the courts. It was to avoid such litigation in future that Arts. 124 and 217 were amended. Thus, two new provisions were added for the purpose : Art. 124(2A) to Art. 124 and Art. 217(3).[78]

It was considered desirable in public interest that Judges should be transferred from one High Court to another. Such transfer imposed additional financial burden on the Judge who would be so transferred. In order to provide an incentive to the Judges to accept transfers, Art. 222 was modified so as to pay to such a Judge some compensatory allowance in addition to his salary.[79]

---

74. Ibid.
75. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(q).
76. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(j).
77. Ibid.
78. Supra, Chs. IV, Sec. B(l) and VIII, Sec. B(q).
79. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(o).

A significant modification made by the XV Amendment was in respect of Art. 226. Before the Amendment, only the Punjab High Court could issue writs under Art. 226 to the Central Government offices located at New Delhi.[80] This involved considerable hardship to litigantsfrom distant places. Therefore, a new provision, Art. 226(2), was added to Art. 226 to remove this limitation. The scope of the newly added clause has already been explained.[81]

The Calcutta High Court declared in Paramath Nath v. Chief Justice[82] that the expression 'organisation' occurring in entry 78 of List I did not include 'vacations'. Accordingly, the entry was amended to clarify that the expression 'organisation' would include 'vacations' as well.[83]

The words 'continental shelf' were added to Art. 297. This was to assert rights of India under International Law over the sea-bed and sub-soil of the continental shelf adjoining its territory and beyond the territorial waters.[84]

The Fifteenth Amendment also made some adjustments in Arts. 316 and 311 concerning public services. Art. 316 originally made no express provision for the appointment of an acting chairman for a public service commission in case of vacancy in the post of the chairman on account of leave or otherwise. The Amending Act removed this lacuna.[85]

The Amending Act substituted a new provision in the place of Art. 311(2) with a view to somewhat circumscribe the second opportunity of hearing given to civil servants in matters of dismissal, removal or reduction in rank. The implications of the new clause have already been stated earlier.[86]

SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT : 1963

The Constitution (Sixteenth Amendment) Act, 1963, was brought forward with a view to give effect to the recommendations made by the Committee on National Integration and Regionalism in November, 1962.

The Committee had recommended that—

(1) Art. 19 be so amended that adequate powers become available for the preservation and maintenance of the integrity and sovereignty of the Union;

(2) every candidate for membership of Parliament or State Legislatures, and every aspirant to, and incumbent of, a public office should pledge himself to uphold the Constitution and to preserve the integrity and sovereignty of the Union; and

(3) forms of oath in the Third Schedule to the Constitution should be suitably amended for the purpose.

---

80. Originally, a High Court could not issue a writ against a person or authority residing or located outside its territorial jurisdiction : Election Commission v. Saka Venkata Rao, AIR 1953 SC 210; Khajoor Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1961 SC 532 : (1961) 2 SCR 828.
81. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D(b).
82. AIR 1961 Cal 545.
83. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. H.
84. Supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. D.
85. Supra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. K.
86. Supra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. G(a).

These recommendations were effectuated by the Sixteenth Amendment by amending Arts. 19(2), (3) and (4) for enabling the state to make a law imposing reasonable restrictions on the exercise of rights conferred by Arts. 19(1)(a), (b) and (c) in the interests of the sovereignty and integrity of India.[87]

Arts. 84 and 173 and the forms of oath contained in the Third Schedule were modified.[88] Every candidate for membership of Parliament, or a State Legislature, Union and State Ministers, members of Parliament and State Legislatures, Judges of the Supreme Court and, the High Courts and the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India have to take an oath to uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India.

The amendment thus conferred adequate powers on the government to impose restrictions against those individuals or organisations who want to make secession from India or disintegration of India as political issues for the purpose of fighting elections.

SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT : 1964

The Constitution (Seventeenth Amendment) Act, 1964, again circumscribed property rights guaranteed in Art. 31. This was the third amendment in the series, the earlier ones being the First and the Fourth.

The Kerala Agrarian Relations Act, 1961, was struck down by the Supreme Court in its application to ryotwari lands, as well as by the Kerala High Court in relation to lands other than 'estates' in the Malabar area on the ground that it transgressed Arts. 14, 19 and 31, because the protection of Art. 31A was not available to the lands in question as those were not 'estates'. Under Art. 31A, as it stood at the time, protection of Art. 31A was available only in respect of such tenures as were 'estates' on the 26th January, 1950, when the Constitution came into force.

The expression 'estate' bore different meanings in different States, and sometimes in different parts of the same State. Moreover, many of the land reform enactments related to lands which were not included in an estate. It thus became necessary to expand the scope of the word 'estate' so as to protect all this legislation. Accordingly, the Seventeenth Amendment was undertaken. It changed the definition of the word 'estate' by bringing within its scope ryotwari lands as well as other lands in respect of which provisions are normally made in land reform enactments. Therefore, Art. 31A(2)(a) was redrafted so as to give it its existing form.[89]

As a counterpoise to expanding the concept of 'estate', the same amendment also prohibited the State from acquiring any self-cultivated land within the ceiling fixed by law until compensation not less than the market-value was provided.[90]

The Ninth Schedule was further expanded by including therein forty-four State enactments with a view to immunize them from any attack in a court of law

---

87. Supra, Ch. XXIV, Secs. D, E and F.
88. Supra, Chs. II and VI.
89. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. B.
90. Ibid.

on the ground of breach of any Fundamental Right.[91] Schedule IX thus came to have 64 Acts inscribed therein which could not be challenged under any Fundamental Right. These Acts covered a very wide field, e.g., ceiling on agricultural holdings, abolition of certain types of tenures, acquisition of land belonging to religious and charitable endowments, fixation of rent, protection of tenants from eviction, etc.

As has already been stated earlier, the constitutional validity of the XVII Amendment was challenged and upheld in Sajjan Singh v. State of Rajasthan[92]

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT : 1966

The Constitution (Eighteenth Amendment) Act, 1966, added two explanations to Art. 3 clarifying that the term 'State' in that Article would include a Union Territory as well.[93] This facilitated re-organisation of States and Union Territories by Parliament as and when necessary.

The Amendment also clarified that the power under Art. 3(a) includes power to form a new State or Union Territory by uniting part of a State or Union Territory to another State or Union Territory.

The Amendment was undertaken to facilitate re-organization of the State of Punjab and the Union Territory of Himachal Pradesh.

NINETEENTH AMENDMENT : 1966

Hitherto, election disputes were settled by election tribunals. The Constitution (Nineteenth Amendment) Act, 1966, modified Art. 324 so as to terminate the jurisdiction of election tribunals to decide election disputes. The Amendment withdrew from the Election Commission the power of setting up election tribunals.[94]

Thus, election tribunals were abolished. Later on, the Representation of the People Act, 1951, provided that election petitions were to be heard by the High Courts.[95]

TWENTIETH AMENDMENT : 1966

The Constitution (Twentieth Amendment) Act, 1966, was enacted to overcome the difficulties created in the functioning of the subordinate judiciary in the State of Uttar Pradesh as a result of the Supreme Court pronouncement in Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh.[96]

The case laid down certain norms for the appointment of district judges. This meant that all appointments of district judges made otherwise than according to these norms were illegal.

The Amendment added a new provision, Art. 233A, to the Constitution legalising these appointments. The Amendment also validated the judgments, de

---

91. Ibid.
92. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. D(b).
93. Supra, Ch. V, Sec. B.
94. Supra, Ch. XIX, Sec. F.
95. Ibid.
96. AIR 1966 SC 1987 : (1967) 1 SCR 77; supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G(b)(c)(d).

crees, orders and sentences passed or made heretofore by all such district judges whose appointments had been declared to be invalid by the Supreme Court.[1]

TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT : 1967

The Constitution (Twenty-first Amendment) Act, 1967, amended the Eighth Schedule to the Constitution by including 'Sindhi' therein.[2]

TWENTY-SECOND AMENDMENT : 1969

The Constitution (Twenty-second Amendment) Act, 1969, conferred legislative power on Parliament for the purpose of creating an autonomous Hill State within the State of Assam. For this purpose, a new provision, Art. 244A, was introduced in the Constitution.

Art. 371B, a new provision, was also added to provide for the constitution of a committee of Assam Legislative Assembly consisting of the members of the Assembly elected from Part A tribal areas and such other members as the President may notify for the purpose.

Accordingly, Parliament passed the Assam Re-organisation (Meghalaya) Act, 1969, to set up the State of Meghalaya within the State of Assam. This was a new experiment to meet regional aspirations within a State.[3]

TWENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT : 1969

The main purpose of the Constitution (Twenty-third Amendment) Act, 1969, was to extend the safeguards granted by the Constitution to the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes by ten more years. Therefore, the operation of Art. 334 (which had already been amended once earlier by the Eighth Amendment in 1959) was extended by a further period of ten years.[4]

Art. 333 was also amended so as to provide that the Governor of a State could appoint one member of the Anglo-Indian community to the State Assembly. Formerly, there was no such restriction, and the Governor could appoint as many members of the community as he considered appropriate to give it proper representation in the State Legislature.[5]

The State of Nagaland came into being in 1963. More than ninety percent of its population is tribal. It would, therefore, seem anomalous to reserve seats for tribals in the State of Nagaland. Accordingly, Arts. 330 and 332 were amended to discontinue any reservation for the Scheduled Tribes of Nagaland both in the Lok Sabha as well as in the State Legislature.[6]

TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT : 1971

In Golak Nath[7], the Supreme Court had ruled that a constitutional amendment under Art. 368 which "takes away or abridges" a Fundamental Right would be void.

---

1. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G(b)(c)(d).
2. Supra, Ch. XVI, Sec. E.
3. Supra, Chs. V and IX, Sec. B(c).
4. Supra, Chs. II, VI and XXXV, Secs. B and C.
5. Supra, Chs. II, VI and XXXV, Sec. D.
6. Supra, Chs. II, V, IX, Sec. B(b) and XXXV, Sec. C.
7. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. D(c).

As a counter to this pronouncement, Parliament enacted the Constitution (Twenty-Forth Amendment) Act, 1971, to claim power to amend any part of the Constitution including the Fundamental Rights. The Amendment added clause (4) to Art. 13 saying that this article would not apply to an amendment of the Constitution made under Art. 368. Article 368 was also amended as discussed earlier.[8]

TWENTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT : 1971

The Constitution (Twenty-Fifth Amendment) Act, 1971, made many changes in Art. 31 following the Bank Nationalisation case.[9]

The word 'compensation' was replaced by 'amount'. No law was to be called in question on the ground that the amount fixed for property acquired was not adequate.

A new clause 31C was added declaring that a law giving effect to the state policy towards securing the Directive Principles contained in Arts. 39(b) or (c) would be held void because of its inconsistency with Arts. 14, 19 and 31. Further, a declaration in the law that it was enacted to give effect to the policy towards securing these Directive Principles would render the law immune from being challenged in any court on the ground that it did not give effect to such policy.[10]

The Amendment was widely criticized at several fora as an attack on the Fundamental Rights guaranteed by the Constitution. The Amendment gave rise to the famous Kesavananda case which has already been discussed earlier.[11]

TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT : 1971

To get over the Supreme Court ruling in Madhav Rao Scindia v. Union of India,[12] the Constitution (Twenty-sixth Amendment) Act was enacted in 1971.

By this Amendment, the anomaly of having 'rulers' in a democratic set-up was done away with. The Amendment terminated the privileges and privy purses of the ex-rulers of the former Indian States.

Art. 291 providing for the payment of privy purses, and Art. 362 guaranteeing personal rights, privileges and dignities of the princes were omitted.[13] A new provision, Art. 363A, abolishing the institution of rulership and privy purses payable to them, was added to the Constitution. On the commencement of the Amendment, the recognition granted to the rulers of the Indian States was to cease.

Art. 366(22) was now recast. The term 'ruler' was to mean the 'ruler' recognised as such by the President before the enactment of the Amendment in question.

Also see, infra.

8. Supra, Ch. XX, Sec. C and Ch. XLI, Sec. D(c).
9. Supra, Chs XXXI, Sec. C(iii).
10. Supra, Chs. XXXII, Sec. D, Ch. XXXIV.
11. Supra, Ch. XLI. , Sec. D(e)
12. Supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. E.
13. Ibid.

The constitutional validity of this Amendment was challenged but the Supreme Court upheld the same in Raghunath Rao v. Union of India[14]. The Court ruled that Amendment XXVI did not infringe any basic structure or essential feature of the Constitution.

TWENTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT : 1971

The Constitution (Twenty-seventh Amendment) Act, 1971, was enacted to implement the decision to establish the Union Territory of Mizoram.[15] It empowered Parliament to create a legislature and a council of ministers for the new Territory. This was achieved by adding Mizoram to Art. 239A.

A new Article 239B, was also added so as to confer power on the Administrators of Goa, Daman and Diu, Pondicherry and Mizoram to promulgate ordinances.[16]

TWENTY-EIGHTH AMENDMENT : 1972

Art. 314 guaranteed to the members of the ICS (Indian Civil Service which was in existence before the Independence) the same conditions of service as they were entitled to before the commencement of the Constitution. Art. 314 thus kept intact the privileges of the members of this service.

The Constitution (Twenty-eighth Amendment) Act, 1972, was enacted adding Art. 312A so as to enable Parliament to vary the conditions of service of the members of the Indian Civil Service who continued to serve the Government of India or a State after the commencement of the Constitution. Parliament was also empowered to vary the pension rights of the members of this service who had retired earlier. Art. 314 which gave security to the I.C.S. personnel in some respect was repealed.[17]

TWENTY-NINTH AMENDMENT : 1972

By the Constitution (Twenty-ninth Amendment) Act, 1972, two Kerala Acts dealing with land reforms were included in the IX Schedule to the Constitution.[18] These Acts thus received the protection of Art. 31B.

THIRTIETH AMENDMENT : 1972

Before 1972, under Art. 133, an appeal lay to the Supreme Court in any case involving the subject-matter of Rs. 20,000/- or more. Thus, appeals could be filed in the Supreme Court if the valuation test was satisfied whether it had any merit or not.

By the Constitution (Thirtieth Amendment) Act, 1972, Art. 133 was recast so as to redefine the civil appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Valuation test

---

14. AIR 1993 SC 1267, at 1287; supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. E(c).
15. Supra, Chs. V and IX, Sec. E.
16. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. A.
17. For Art. 314, see, M.P. JAIN, INDIAN CONST. LAW (II ed., 1970), 692.
18. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. B.

was now dropped; an appeal now lies to the Supreme Court, if the High Court certifies that the case involves a substantial question of law which needs to be decided by the Supreme Court. This matter has been discussed earlier.[19]

The result of this Amendment is that while any case involving an important question of law can reach the Supreme Court by way of appeal, a case howsoever large the amount involved therein but involving no substantial point of law, would fail to reach the Supreme Court.

THIRTY-FIRST AMENDMENT : 1973

By the Constitution (Thirty-first Amendment) Act, 1973, the strength of the Lok Sabha was increased from 525 to 545 members.[20] This was done to accommodate the increase in population as revealed by the 1971 census. Accordingly, Art. 81(1)(a) was suitably amended.

The allocation of Lok Sabha seats among the States and the Union Territories after this Amendment was as follows: Andhra Pradesh, 42; Assam, 14; Bihar, 54; Gujarat, 26; Haryana, 10; Himachal Pradesh, 4; Jammu & Kashmir, 6; Karnataka, 28; Kerala, 20; Madhya Pradesh, 40; Maharashtra, 48; Manipur, 2; Meghalaya, 2; Nagaland, 1; Orissa, 21; Punjab, 13; Rajasthan, 25; Sikkim, 1; Tamil Nadu, 39; Tripura, 2; Uttar Pradesh, 85; West Bengal, 42; Andaman & Nicobar, 1; Arunachal Pradesh, 2; Chandigarh, 1; Dadra & Nagar Haveli, 1; Delhi, 7; Goa, Daman and Diu, 2; Lakshadweep, 1; Mizoram, 1; Pondicherry, 1; Total, 542.

Of these, 78 members belonged to the Scheduled Castes and 38 to the Scheduled Tribes.

THIRTY-SECOND AMENDMENT : 1973

The Constitution (Thirty-second Amendment) Act, 1973, was enacted to make a few special provisions for the State of Andhra Pradesh to satisfy the aspirations of the people of the Telengana region. These provisions have been noted earlier.[21]

THIRTY-THIRD AMENDMENT : 1974

The Constitution (Thirty-third Amendment) Act, 1974, amended Arts. 101 and 190.[22]

Before the Amendment, the resignation of a member of a State Legislature/Parlia-ment became effective the moment it was tendered. The Speaker/Chairman had no option as the element of acceptance of the resignation was absent and the member's seat became automatically vacant even when his

---

19. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(iv)(c).
20. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. C.
21. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. B(e).
22. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. E(b) and VI, Sec. B(v)(b).

resignation may not be voluntary and may have even been induced by force or threats.[23]

This position was now changed. A resignation becomes effective only after it has been accepted by the presiding officer of the House concerned. He may refuse to accept the resignation if he is satisfied after making such inquiry as he thinks fit that the resignation is not voluntary or genuine. This precautionary provision appeared to be necessary to avoid the members of Parliament or of State Legislatures being forced to resign.

THIRTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT : 1974

By the Constitution (Thirty-fourth Amendment) Act, 1974, twenty State Acts concerning land ceiling and land tenure reforms were added to the Ninth Schedule to the Constitution, so as to put them under the protection of Art. 31B.[24] These laws have thus been given immunity from challenge in the courts on the ground of violation of Fundamental Rights.

THIRTY-FIFTH AND THIRTY-SIXTH AMENDMENTS : 1974-75

The Constitution (Thirty-fifth Amendment) Act, 1974, introduced an innovation in the Indian Constitution by conferring on Sikkim the status of an associate in the Indian Union. This was done in pursuance of the wishes of the people of Sikkim with a view to strengthen Indo-Sikkim co-operation and inter relationship.

For this purpose, a new schedule (X Schedule) was added to the Constitution setting out the terms and conditions for association of Sikkim with India. The XXXV Amendment also provided for the representation of Sikkim in the Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha.

This however proved to be a short-lived experiment. The people of Sikkim desired to be an integral part of India. Accordingly, the Constitution (Thirty-sixth Amendment) Act was enacted in 1975 to confer fullfledged statehood on Sikkim.[25]

A new Article (Art. 371F) has been added to the Constitution making special provisions for Sikkim in regard to such matters as the State Legislative Assembly, High Court, responsibility of the Governor for peace and social and economic advancement of different sections of the population of Sikkim etc.

Cl. (f) of Art. 371F runs as follows :

> "Parliament may, for the purpose of protecting the rights and interests of the different sections of the population of Sikkim make provision for the number of seats in the Legislative Assembly of the State of Sikkim which may be filled by candidates belonging to such sections."

The constitutional validity was attacked on the ground that it went against the basic feature of the Constitution as it violated the principle of 'one person one

---

23. See, M. Kunjukrishnan Nadar v. Speaker, Kerala Leg. Ass., AIR 1964 Ker. 194; Surat Singh Yadava v. Sudama Pd., AIR 1965 All. 536.
24. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C.
25. Supra, Chs. V and IX, Sec. D.

vote'. By majority, the Supreme Court rejected the contention in R.C. Poudyal v. Union of India[26] holding that the provision in question did not depart so much as to negate fundamental principles of democracy.

The Court also ruled that Art. 2 which permits accession of new States to the Indian Union does not confer power on Parliament to override the constitutional scheme.[27]

THIRTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT : 1975

The Constitution (Thirty-seventh Amendment) Act, 1975, upgraded the status of Arunachal Pradesh as a Union Territory.

Arts. 239A and 240 were amended so as to authorise Parliament to create for Arunachal Pradesh a legislature and a council of ministers. After the legislature was established, the President ceased to have power to make regulations for the Union Territory.[28]

THIRTY-EIGHTH AMENDMENT : 1975

The Constitution (Thirty-eighth Amendment) Act, 1975, was enacted during the emergency (1975-1977) to make certain modifications in the emergency provisions.

Amendments were made in Art. 352 with a view to make the proclamation of emergency of 1975 beyond any question although it was issued when the proclamation of emergency on the ground of external aggression had already been in operation since 1971.[29]

The presidential 'satisfaction' to issue a proclamation was declared to be 'final and conclusive'.[30]

The amendment of Art. 352 became necessary because contentions were made in some writ petitions filed in the High Courts to the effect that while one proclamation of emergency under Art. 352 was in operation, another proclamation of emergency could not be made. Art. 352 was thus amended so as to make it clear that the President could issue different proclamations of emergency on different grounds whether or not there was already a proclamation in existence and in operation.

A clarificatory clause was added to Art. 356(1) so as to make presidential 'satisfaction' to issue a proclamation thereunder as 'final and conclusive' which 'shall not be questioned in any court on any ground.'[31]

A new clause was added to Art. 359 to bring its phraseology in line with that of Art. 358. This aspect of the matter has already been explained.[32]

---

26. AIR 1993 SC 1804; supra, Ch. V, Sec. B; Ch. IX, Sec. D.
27. Also see, Mangal Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1967 SC 944 : (1967) 2 SCR 109; supra, Ch. V, Sec. B.
28. Supra, Chs. V, Sec. A; IX, Sec. A.
29. See, supra, Chs. XIII, Sec. B(a) and XXXIII, Sec. F.
30. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B(a).
31. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. E.
32. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. D(c).

The Presidential 'satisfaction' under Art. 360 was also made 'final and conclusive'.[33]

This Amendment also declared that the 'satisfaction' of the President and a State Governor to issue ordinances [Arts. 123 and 213] would be 'final and conclusive' and 'shall not be questioned in any court on any ground.'[34] These provisions were made as a matter of abundant caution because the courts in several pronouncements had already taken the position that "the necessity of immediate action and of promulgating an ordinance is a matter purely for the subjective satisfaction of the Governor. He is the sole judge as to the existence of the circumstances necessitating the making of an ordinance. His satisfaction is not a justiciable matter. It cannot be questioned on the ground of error of judgment or otherwise in court."[35]

The 'satisfaction' of the Administrator of a Union Territory to issue an ordinance under Art. 239B was also made 'final and conclusive.'[36]

It hardly needs to be pointed out that the 'satisfaction' of the head of the state is only formal; the effective power in this respect lies with the council of ministers.[37]

In Pran Nath v. Union of India,[38] the Delhi High Court held the 38th Amendment valid although it excluded judicial review of the 'satisfaction' of the President to declare emergency under Art. 352(1). The court argued that judicial review was not a basic feature of the Constitution and that, in specified fields, lack of judicial review might not affect any basic feature of the Constitution. The Constitution itself from the very beginning recognised certain areas where there might not be judicial review, e.g., election.

As against this reasoning of the High Court, it needs to be mentioned that reading the Constitution as a whole, one will get the impression that judicial review is regarded as an integral part of the total constitutional scheme as a number of Articles in the Constitution provide for judicial review.

KHANNA, J., emphasized upon the importance of judicial review in Kesavananda.[39] In Indira Nehru Gandhi, the Supreme Court emphasized upon the role of the judiciary as a dispute resolving machinery. [40] The concepts of constitutionalism and Rule of Law cannot be preserved without a robust judicial system.[41]

The fundamental features mentioned by the various Judges in Kesavananda involved judicial review. However, in course of time, it has become established

---

33. Ibid.
34. Art. 123, supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(d); Art. 213, supra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).
35. S.K.G. Sugar v. State of Bihar, AIR 1974 SC 1533 : (1974) 4 SCC 827; supra, Chs. III, Sec. D(ii)(d) and VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).
36. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. A.
37. Supra, Chs. III, Sec. B and VII, Sec. B.
38. AIR 1977 Del 167.
39. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. D(e).
For Judicial Review, see, Ch. XL, Secs. A and C.
40. Supra, XLI, Sec. D(f).
41. Supra, Ch. I, Secs. B and C.

that judicial review is a basic feature of the Constitution which cannot be eroded by an amendment of the Constitution made under Art. 368.[42]

THIRTY-NINTH AMENDMENT : 1975

The voiding of the election to Lok Sabha of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi by the Allahabad High Court in 1975 on the petition of Raj Narain led to the enactment of the Constitution (Thirty-ninth Amendment) Act, 1975.[43] The Amendment introduced changes in the method of deciding election disputes relating to the four high officials of the Country, viz., President, Vice-President, Prime Minister and the Speaker of Lok Sabha.

As regards the President and Vice-President, the basic change introduced was that jurisdiction was taken away from the Supreme Court to decide any doubts and disputes arising in connection with their election.[44] Under the new Art. 71(2), Parliament by law was to establish some 'authority' or 'body' for deciding such disputes, and its decision was not to be challengeable in any court.[45]

Elections of the Prime Minister and the Speaker to the Parliament were also taken out of the election-dispute settling mechanism envisaged in Art. 329.[46] Art. 329A dealt with election to either House of Parliament of a person who held the office of the Prime Minister at the time of such election, or was appointed as Prime Minister after such election, and to the House of People of a person who held the office of the Speaker at the time of such election, or who was chosen as the Speaker after such election.

The election of any such person was not to be called in question, except before such 'authority' or 'body', and in such manner, as was to be provided for by or under any law made by Parliament. Such an authority would not be the one as was referred to in Art. 329(b). The law of Parliament could provide for all other matters relating to doubts and disputes in relation to such election including the grounds on which such election could be questioned.

This law of Parliament was to be subject to clause (1) of Art. 102 except sub-clause (e).[47] This meant that parliamentary law could not remove the following disqualifications for election to Parliament as contemplated by sub-clauses (a) to (d) of Art. 102(1) : holding an office of profit; being of unsound mind; being an undischarged insolvent; not being a citizen of India; voluntarily acquiring the citizenship of a foreign State, or being under any acknoweldgement of allegiance or adherence to a foreign State.

The Parliamentary law would not however be controlled by Art. 102(1)(e) which lays down that a person shall be disqualified for being chosen as, and for being a member of, any House of Parliament if he is so disqualified by or under any law made by Parliament. Thus, Parliament could remove the disqualification envisaged in Art. 102(1)(e).

---

42. Supra, XLI, Sec. F(a).
43. Supra, Chs. XIX, Sec. F; XLI, Sec. D(f).
44. Supra, Chs. III, Sec. A(i)(b) and IV, Sec. C(iii)(a).
45. Ch. IV, supra.
46. Supra, Ch. XIX, Sec. F.
47. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. D.

Under Art. 329A(2), the validity of a parliamentary law envisaged in Art. 329A(1), and the decision of any authority or body under such law could not be called in question in any court.

The effect of clauses (1) and (2) of the new Art. 329A thus was that the election of the Prime Minister and the Speaker to a House of Parliament or Lok Sabha respectively would be governed by one law, while election of the other members of Parliament would be governed by another law.

The Thirty-ninth Amendment did not stop here. It went further and sought to nullify the High Court decision voiding the election of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi and declare it to be valid. The main provision made for this purpose was clause 4 in Art. 329A which consisted of four parts:

1. No law made by Parliament before the commencement of the Constitution (Thirty-Ninth Amendment) Act, 1975, insofar as it related to the election petitions was to apply, or be deemed ever to have applied, to the election of the Prime Minister or the Speaker to Parliament.

2. Such election was not to be deemed to be void, or ever to have become void, on any ground on which such election could be declared to be void, or has been declared to be void under any such law.

3. Notwithstanding any court order declaring such election to be void, it was to continue to be valid in all respects;

4. Any such order and any finding on which such order was based was to be deemed always to have been void and of no effect.

This part of Art. 329A validating an election already held void by the High Court was declared to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in Indira Nehru Gandhi v. Raj Narain.[48] The Court criticised the 39th Amendment as negation of rule of law, anti-democratic, lawless and one which denied equality before law.

No one can imagine a greater misuse of the power to amend the Constitution than what is represented by the XXXIX Amendment when just to validate the election of one person, the Constitution was drastically amended. The Supreme Court rendered a yeoman service to the Constitution by vetoing such a distorted law.

The case provides sterling testimony to the worth of the doctrine that the fundamental features of the Constitution could not be amended. There always lurks the danger that the ruling party with the help of its majority in the two Houses of Parliament may introduce distortions in the Constitution to suit its own political agenda. It may be remembered that to keep-herself in power, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi even imposed the emergency on the country in 1975.[49]

On merits, however, the Supreme Court accepted the appeal of the Prime Minister against the High Court's judgment and held her election to Lok Sabha to be valid.

The Thirty-ninth Amendment also extended immunity to a number of statutes from judicial purview on the ground of infringement of Fundamental Rights by including them in the Ninth Schedule.[50]

---

48. Art. 1975 SC 2299 : 1975 Supp SCC 2; supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. D(f).
49. See, supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F; XLI, Sec. D(f).
50. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C.

FORTIETH AMENDMENT : 1976

The Constitution (Fortieth Amendment) Act, 1976, extended immunity to 64 Central and State statutes by including them in the IX Schedule. These statutes pertained to land reform, urban ceiling, and prevention of publication of objectionable matter.[51]

This Amendment also substituted a new Art. 297 for the old one with a view to enlarge the scope of India's sovereign rights over sea wealth and include therein the concept of exclusive economic zone. All resources in the exclusive economic zone have been vested in the Union. This aspect of the matter has already been explained earlier.[52]

FORTY-FIRST AMENDMENT : 1976

The Constitution (Forty-first Amendment) Act, 1976, raised the age of retirement of the chairman and members of State Public Service Commissions from 60 to 62.[53] This brought the age of retirement of these persons in line with that of the High Court Judges.[54]

FORTY-SECOND AMENDMENT : 1976

The Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act, 1976, is the most controversial and debatable piece of constitutional amendment ever undertaken in India since 1950.[55] The Amendment Act was primarily the handiwork of the Congress Party and comprised mostly the proposals made by a Committee of the party headed by Swaran Singh. It was an omibus measure introducing modifications in a number of constitutional provisions. This Amendment amended the Preamble to the Constitution, 40 Articles and the Seventh Schedule, and added 14 new Articles to the Constitution.

A fundamental objection against this Amendment Act is that it was undertaken during the emergency period when most of the members of the opposition were detained in preventive detention and when a free, frank and fair discussion of the arguments for and against the proposed modifications was not possible. The two Houses of Parliament consisted of an overwhelming majority of the members of the ruling Congress Party and so it became more or less a party affair rather than a product of national consensus.

The Amendment Act introduced a number of changes in the Constitution, some of which happened to be of great significance in so far as they sought to tilt the balance of power in favour of the executive and away from the judiciary and the legislature and, thus, the control-mechanism over the executive was sought to be weakened. The dominant thrust of the Amendment Act in question was to reduce the role of the courts, particularly, that of the High Courts, in the coun-

---

51. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C.
52. Supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. D.
53. Supra, Ch. XXXVI.
54. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(q).
55. This Act received the assent of the President on December 18, 1976. Some of the provisions became operative on Jan. 3, 1977, while others were enforced from Feb. 1, 1977.

try's judicial and constitutional process. It also sought to strengthen Parliament in various ways which in effect added to the power of the Central Government. Besides, the powers of the Central Government were enhanced in several other directions.

In the area of federalism, the centralising tendency was further strengthened in several directions at the cost of the States. Above all, the importance of Fundamental Rights was greatly devalued. Thus, the whole complexion of the Constitution was sought to be changed so as to reduce the element of constitutionalism therein. No wonder, then, that with the lifting of the emergency in 1977, there was a strident public demand that the 42nd Amendment be scrapped. The new Janata Government was committed to the removal of the objectionable features of this Amendment, and it did redeem its pledge to a large extent by enacting the 44th Amendment to undo most of the objectionable provisions of the 42nd Amendment.[56]

The main reasons stated by the Law Minister on behalf of the then Central Government in justification of the various modifications being effectuated in the Constitution by the 42nd Amendment Act were: the supremacy of the Parliament should be asserted, especially in respect of its constituent power under Art. 368 which should be uncontrolled and subject to no judicial review; hurdles and obstacles in the way of enactment of socio-economic legislation should be removed so that the pace of improvement of the condition of the masses may be accelerated and this could be achieved by declaring that the Directive Principles override the Fundamental Rights; the sense of confrontation between the judiciary and Parliament should be removed and to achieve this, powers of the courts need to be curtailed somewhat and jurisdiction of the courts redefined with greater precision.

The several amendments made in the Constitution by the 42nd Amendment Act [hereinafter designated as CA 42] are noted below in the order in which the various topics have been discussed in the body of the book.

PREAMBLE

Constitutional Amendment 42 has made two changes in the Preamble.

First, the characterisation of India as "sovereign democratic republic" has been changed to "sovereign socialist secular democratic republic". Thus, the concepts of 'socialism' and 'secularism' which were implicit in the Constitution were now made explicit and India's commitment to these ideals was further underlined and strengthened.[57]

Secondly, the words "unity of the nation" in the clause in the Preamble explaining 'Fraternity' were changed to "unity and integrity of the nation". This change was made to lay emphasis on indivisibility of the country along with the unity of the nation.[58]

---

56. Infra, eq. seq., Sec. E(c).
57. Supra, Ch. I, Sec. E(c) and Ch. XXXIV, Sec. A, for Preamble.
For secularism see, supra, Ch. I, Sec. E(f) and Ch. XXIX, Sec. A, for socialism.
58. Supra, Ch. I and XXXIV, Sec. A.

PARLIAMENT AND STATE LEGISLATURES

The Constitution provided for readjustment in constituencies for election to Lok Sabha,[59] and State Legislative Assemblies,[60] after every census held at an interval of ten years. This process was frozen by CA 42 at the point of 1971 census till the holding of the first census after the year 2000. The idea is to give a fillip to the family planning programme in the country. A State can neither claim an increase in, nor will it lose any, seat in the Lok Sabha with the increase or decrease in its population. This is expected to provide a better motivation to the States to intensify family planning programmes.

The fixation of the number of seats for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes in Lok Sabha and State Legislative Assemblies was also frozen by CA 42 at the level of the 1971 census until the first census to be held after the year 2000.[61]

Hitherto, the quorum in a House of Parliament, or a State Legislature, was fixed by the Constitution at 1/10 of the total members of the House, but this could be changed by law.[62] CA 42 changed this position. It left the quorum to be fixed by the rules of each House.[63]

Thus, quorum ceased to be a substantive matter and became merely a procedural matter. A House has power to suspend its rules of procedure and so it can suspend the rule relating to quorum as well any time it likes, and transact any business without a quorum. Because of the principle of internal autonomy of the House, the validity of anything purported to have been done by the House without the requisite quorum would not be challengeable in a court.[64] This becomes all the more evident from the repeal of Arts. 100(4)[65] and 189(4).[66] Under these repealed clauses, the presiding officer of a House was obligated, in the absence of the quorum, to suspend the meeting of the House till there was a quorum.

The life of the Lok Sabha and State Legislative Assemblies was extended from five to six years.[67]

A person holding an 'office of profit' is disqualified from membership of Parliament or a State Legislature. Until CA 42, it was for the courts to declare what was an office of profit. The courts had evolved certain indices to decide whether an office was an 'office of profit'. A law could however be made to declare what offices would not disqualify, otherwise the disqualification arose automatically as soon as a member came to hold an office of profit.[68]

CA 42 changed this position. Henceforth, Parliament was to lay down through law what offices would be regarded as 'offices of profit' so as to disqualify their holders from membership of a House of Parliament or a State Legislature. There

---

59. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. C.
60. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(ii).
61. For Arts. 330, 332 and 334, see, supra, Ch. XXXV, Secs. B and C; also see, Chs. II, Sec. C and VI, Sec. B(ii).
62. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. G(d) and VI, Sec. C(d).
63. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L(c) and VI, Sec. H(c), for rule-making.
64. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L(d) and VI, Sec. H(d).
65. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(d).
66. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. C(d).
67. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. I(c) and V, Sec. E.
68. Ibid.

would not be any automatic disqualification on this account and the courts were to lose power to declare whether an office was an office of profit or not. This change brought the position in India in line with that in Britain on this matter.[69] Clause (1)(a) of Article 102 provides that a person shall be disqualified for being chosen as, and for being, a member of either House of Parliament if he holds any office of profit under the Government of India or the Government of any State, other than an office declared by Parliament by law not to disqualify its holder. What is an office of profit has been considered by a 3 Judge Bench of the Supreme Court.[70] Referring to earlier decisions, the Court reiterated the implications of the expression in these words :-

> "It is well settled that where the office carries with it certain emoluments or the order of appointment states that the person appointed is entitled to certain emoluments, then it will be an office of profit, even if the holder of the office chooses not to receive/draw such emoluments. What is relevant is whether pecuniary gain is 'receivable' in regard to the office and not whether pecuniary gain is, in fact, received or received negligibly"

It is worth nothing that prior to CA 42, a State Legislature also had power to declare what offices would not disqualify their holders from its membership.[71] But now the power was vested in Parliament to prescribe what offices would disqualify. So, the power in this area moved away from the State Legislatures and the courts to Parliament.

Until the enactment of CA 42, under Art. 103, the question whether a member of Parliament had become subject to a disqualification or not was to be decided by the President but he was bound in this matter to follow the opinion of the Election Commission.[72] CA 42 changed this position insofar as the President was not to be bound by the opinion of the Election Commission. He was to consult the Commission but, thereafter, he was to be free to take his own decision. This meant that ultimately he was to act on ministerial advice in this area. The final word in respect of disqualification of members of Parliament thus passed from an autonomous impartial body like the Election Commission to a political body like the Council of Ministers which was not desirable.

Before CA 42, a member became automatically disqualified when he was held guilty of committing a corrupt practice at an election to the House.[73] Henceforth, this question was also to be decided by the President in the same way as a question of disqualification arising on other grounds and as mentioned above.

A similar change was effected in Art. 192 applicable to the State Legislatures.[74] The question of disqualification of a member of a State Legislature was to be decided by the President in consultation with the Election Commission as in case of Parliament. Till now, this function was vested in the Governor who was bound in this matter by the advice of the Election Commission. The power in this regard was thus transferred from the State Government to the Central Government. The reason was that formerly the effective decision lay with the Election Commission and the function of the Governor was rather mechanical. But now

---

69. Ibid.
70. Jaya Bachchan v. Union of India, (2006) 5 SCC 266 : AIR 2006 SC 2119.
71. Ibid.
72. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. D(d).
73. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. D(d).
74. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(iii)(b).

the effective decision was taken away from the Election Commission and vested in the Central Government, though nominally in the President. This was undesirable as a legal question became a political question. On the whole, the effect of the above changes was to increase the power of the Central Executive vis-a-vis Parliament and State Legislatures.

PRIVILEGES OF PARLIAMENT AND STATE LEGISLATURES

Prior to CA 42, under Art. 105(3), privileges of Parliament, and, under Art. 194(3), the privileges of the State Legislatures, were to be the same as those enjoyed by the House of Commons on January 26, 1950,[75] the day the Constitution came into force. These constitutional provisions were amended by CA 42 so as to drop any reference to the House of Commons.

After CA 42, the privileges of a House or its members were to be those as existing at the commencement of CA 42 and as were to be 'evolved' by the House from time to time. This meant that the existing privileges were to continue. Until a House evolved its own privileges, reference to the privileges of the House of Commons was to continue to be made as 'existing' privileges. This means that though there was a verbal change in the relevant constitutional provisions, no change in effect was made.

There was one restriction placed on the State Legislatures in this respect, viz. A State Legislative Assembly was to evolve its privileges, "so far as may be", in accordance with those of the Lok Sabha; and the Legislative council was to evolve its privileges, "so far as may be", in accordance with those of the Rajya Sabha.

However, the word 'evolved' used in Arts. 105(3) and 194(3) was very vague and ambiguous. What would be the evidence of a privilege having been 'evolved' by a House? Over how long a period of time was a privilege to be claimed or exercised by a House before it could be regarded as having been evolved? Was a claim by a House or its Committee of Privileges to be sufficient to concede a privilege to it? Under the amended constitutional provisions, it was possible that each House could evolve its own distinct privileges and, thus, the various Houses of Parliament and of State Legislatures could come to have their own separate privileges. This would have made the situation as regards the law of legislative privileges very confusing. This was a far cry from codification of legislative privileges, the demand for which had been insistently made in the past.[76]

EXECUTIVE

CA 42 clarified that no change would be made in respect of the weightage of votes of members of the State Legislatures for presidential election after the census of 1971 until the first census was held after the year 2000.[77]

CA 42 barred the courts from requiring production of rules of business framed by the Central and State Governments under Arts. 77 and 166 respectively.[78] This was designed to adversely affect judicial review of administrative action to some extent. At times, the courts looked into these rules to ascertain whether the im-

75. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L(ii) and VI, Sec. H.
76. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L(v) and VI, Sec. H(f).
77. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i)(a).
78. Supra, Chs. III, Secs. B and E and VII, Sec. B.

pugned order was made by an officer having necessary authority under the Business Rules.

In some cases, courts had quashed administrative action when it was found to have been taken by an officer who did not have the requisite authority to do so.[79] CA 42 sought to bar any judicial probe into the question whether the officer making a decision had or had not the requisite authority to do so.

CA 42 amended Art. 74 to state explicitly that the President shall act in accordance with the advice of the Council of Ministers in the discharge of his functions.[80] In a way, this merely restated the position which already had been in existence,[81] and which the courts had already recognised in several cases. Therefore, by and large, the legal position had crystallised before CA 42 that the President was bound by the advice of the Council of Ministers.

It may be noted that no such provision was made by CA 42 as regards the State Governors. Thus, the position of Governors became sharply differentiated from that of the President. A Governor has certain discretionary functions to discharge in respect of which he is not bound by ministerial advice.[82]

JUDICIARY

Before the enactment of CA 42, India's judiciary was unified and the High Courts and the Supreme Court could adjudicate upon the constitutional validity of Central or State legislation without any differentiation.[83] This position was sought to be changed by CA 42 so that the question of constitutional validity of the Central law would fall exclusively within the purview of the Supreme Court, and that of the State law within the purview of the High Courts, though appeals from the High Courts to the Supreme Court were to continue to lie as usual. Thus, a new provision, Art. 32A, was added, after Art. 32, so as to deny to the Supreme Court power to consider the constitutional validity of a State law under Art. 32 unless the constitutional validity of a Central law was also in issue.[84] It meant that the question of constitutional validity of a State law vis-a-vis Fundamental Rights was to be raised before the High Court under Art. 226.[85]

Another new provision, Art. 131A, was added saying that henceforth only the Supreme Court, and no other court, would have exclusive jurisdiction to determine questions relating to the constitutional validity of a Central law. A High Court was obligated to refer to the Supreme Court all cases pending before it or the subordinate courts involving questions of constitutional validity of a Central law, or of a Central law and a State law. Besides, on the application of the Attorney-General, the Supreme Court could itself require a High Court to refer to it any case pending before it or a subordinate court involving questions of constitutional validity of a Central law, or of both Central and State laws.[86]

---

79. Fonseca (P) Ltd. v. L.C. Gupta, AIR 1973 SC 563 : (1973) 1 SCC 480. Also, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, II.
80. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(a).
81. For a discussion on the constitutional position of the President, see supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(a).
82. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. C.
83. Supra, Chs. IV and VIII.
84. Supra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A.
85. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D.
86. Supra, Ch. IV, for Art. 131, Sec. C(iii)(b).

Art. 226A, a new provision, declared that a High Court would not consider the constitutional validity of a Central law in any proceedings under Art. 226.[87]

Art. 131A extended the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court because any matter involving constitutionality of a Central law was to be brought straight before the Supreme Court.[88]

Art. 228A declared that a High Court was not to have jurisdiction to declare any Central law to be constitutionally invalid. A High Court (subject to Art. 131A) could determine questions as to the constitutional validity of State laws. The change was justified on the ground that doubts about the constitutional validity of Central laws would now be disposed of expeditiously, and that if before a number of High Courts gave differing judgments as regards the validity of a Central law, its implementation became difficult and such a situation would now be avoided.

The fact however remained that demarcation of functions between the Supreme Court and the High Courts diluted, to some extent, the concept of a unified judiciary and introduced in India some elements of the U.S. model of dual judiciary.[89] However, it may be noted that all questions under the Central legislation, other than the question of its constitutionality, were to continue to be decided by the High Courts as before.

For the purposes of these Articles, 'Central law' meant any law other than a 'State law', but did not include any amendment of the Constitution under Art. 368. A 'State law' meant an Act of the State Legislature, Governor's ordinance, delegated legislation, any order having the force of law and any other law (including any usage or custom having the force of law) with respect to a matter in the State List.

New Articles, 144A and 228A, made further innovations in the area of judicial review of the constitutionality of legislation. Art. 144A required that the minimum number of Judges of the Supreme Court who would sit to decide a question of constitutional validity of a Central or State law was to be seven, and that a law was not to be declared to be constitutionally invalid by the Court unless a majority of not less than two-thirds of the Judges sitting to decide the matter held it to be so. Till now, a Bench of five Judges could decide such a question by a simple majority.[90]

In case of a High Court, under Art. 228A, the minimum number of Judges for deciding the constitutionality of a State law was to be five and the same two-thirds majority rule was to prevail there also.

These provisions were designed to make declaration of legislation constitutionally invalid very difficult for, in the Supreme Court, 5 out of 7 Judges, and in a High Court, 4 out of 5 Judges on the Bench must hold the law to be invalid. Hitherto, a law could be held invalid by a simple majority of Judges sitting on the Bench. Some of the most famous cases in the area of Indian Constitutional Law have been decided in the past by a closely divided court,[91] while there also

---

87. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D.
88. For original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(ii).
89. Supra, Chs. I, Sec. E(k) and IV, Sec. A.
90. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I(h).
91. For example, Golak Nath and Kesavananda Bharati, supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. D(c).

have been cases in which laws have been held invalid by a big majority.[1] The former type of decisions were no longer to be effective. This would have affected, to some extent, the character not only of Fundamental Rights but also of Indian Federalism as State laws challenged on the ground of trespassing into Central field could be held invalid with great difficulty. The rules regarding 2/3rd majority led to the absurd result that the effective decision making power was transferred to minority judges. In a Bench of 13 judges, 5 minority judges would have prevailed against the majority of eight judges holding the Act to be unconstitutional.

The rules made for a High Court having less than five Judges were very harsh. Here, all the Judges were to sit to consider the question of constitutional validity of a State law, and all the Judges were to hold it invalid. Thus, only a unanimous decision could hold the law to be constitutionally invalid in case of a High Court with less than five Judges.

However, other questions, apart from those of constitutionality of legislation, were not affected by Arts. 144A and 228A and were to continue to be decided as usual. One can see an anomaly in Arts. 144A and 228A insofar as while five Judges of a High Court could consider a question of constitutionality of a State law, in the Supreme Court, a bench of seven Judges had to sit for the same purpose.

HIGH COURTS

A few significant changes were introduced in the composition of the High Courts.

In future, it was to be possible to appoint a 'distinguished jurist' as a High Court Judge. Till CA 42, while there was such a provision in respect of the Supreme Court, there was no such provision for the High Courts.[2]

Further, it would now be possible to appoint as High Court Judges those advocates who had been members of tribunals, or had held government posts requiring special knowledge of law, for ten years. A defect in this provision was that this would have opened the way for appointment of government servants to high judicial posts in the country.

Another significant change made in the jurisdiction of the High Courts was the repeal of the proviso to Art. 225. The result of this was to re-impose on the original jurisdiction of the High Courts restriction regarding matters concerning revenue or acts done in collection thereof. This was to bring back the pre-1950 restriction on the original jurisdiction of the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay which had been in abeyance for the last 25 years.[3] This indeed was a retrograde step taking things back to the pre-Constitution age.

A new provision, Art. 139A, provided that—

(i) if, on an application made by the Attorney-General, the Supreme Court was satisfied that cases involving substantially the same questions of law were pending before it and one or more High Courts, or

---

1. For example, The Bank Nationalisation case, supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C(iii); Romesh Thappar, supra; Brij Bhushan; Benett Coleman v. Union of India, supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. C(e).
2. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. B(h).
3. Supra, Ch. VIII; JAIN, INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, Ch. XIX.

before two or more High Courts, and if such questions were 'substantial questions of general importance,' then the Supreme Court could transfer those cases to itself;

(ii) the Supreme Court could transfer any case from one High Court to another if it deemed expedient to do so for the ends of justice. Art. 139A thus effected some diminution in the powers of the High Courts.

POWER TO ISSUE WRITS

A major change was brought about in the powers of the High Courts to issue writs under Art. 226.[4]

Prior to CA 42, a High Court could issue writs, under Art. 226, for 'enforcement of Fundamental Rights' or 'any other purpose'. While the power of the High Court to enforce Fundamental Rights remained untouched, several restrictions were imposed on its power to issue writs 'for any other purpose'.

The words "for any other purpose" now disappeared from new Art. 226, and the High Court's power to issue writs was spelled out in some detail. Henceforth, a High Court could issue a writ—

(i) for the redress of any injury of a substantial nature by reason of the contravention of any other provision of the Constitution, or an enactment or ordinance or any order, rule, regulation, bye-law or other instrument made thereunder; or

(ii) for the redress of any injury by reason of any illegality in any proceedings by or before any authority under any provision referred to in the above clause where such illegality has resulted in substantial failure of justice.

The new Art. 226 introduced two new concepts: "injury of a substantial nature" and "substantial failure of justice". The contours of these concepts were not clear. However, the question whether there was "injury of a substantial nature" or "substantial failure of justice" had to be decided in relation to the aggrieved person; "it must be looked at from the perspective and interests of the aggrieved person."

An injury might appear to some to be of insignificant nature, but the court had to examine whether the injury complained of by a person was substantial to him or not. Even a mere threat to take an action against a person could cause substantial injury to him, depending upon the circumstances of each case.[5] For example, the petitioner was superseded by another employee appointed in breach of statutory rules. The petitioner was held entitled to file a writ petition as he had suffered substantial injury.[6]

The concepts "injury of a substantial nature" or "substantial failure of justice" increased the discretionary element of the courts in the matter of giving a remedy. A court could refuse togive a remedy even if the administrative action was unlawful if it felt that no substantial injury or injustice had resulted.

---

4. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D.
5. Ahmedabad Cotton Mfg. Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1977 Guj 113; Govt. of India v. National Tobacco Co., AIR 1977 AP 250.
6. Harinath v. State of Bihar, AIR 1977 Pat 305.

This created uncertainty. It made rule of law a matter of judicial discretion. A cleavage could appear in judicial opinion as to how the judicial discretion ought to be exercised in various factual situations. Another fundamental objection to the new formula was that it changed the principle of legality upon which the Indian Administrative law derived from the English common law was based.

Ordinarily, under (i) above, a writ could be issued against a breach of law (constitutional or statutory) or of any order, rule, regulation, bye-law or other instrument made under any provision of the Constitution or statute if there was substantial injury. The words 'other instrument' included schemes, warrants, licences etc. made under a constitutional or statutory provision.

The term "illegality in any proceedings" used in (ii) above included breach of a mandatory procedural norm. It also included denial of natural justice. There was no reason to interpret the word 'illegality' in this clause in a narrow sense.

Art. 226(3) barred a writ-petition if "any other remedy for such redress was provided for by or under any other law." This bar applied to a writ petition not for enforcement of a Fundamental Right but only in respect of one falling within the above two clauses.

The bar arose only if the 'remedy' was 'real', and not illusory, and was truly and really capable of giving to the aggrieved person similar redress as was contemplated by the above clauses. In the words of the Gujarat High Court commenting on this provision: "... 'any other remedy' has to be for the redress of the injury for which this writ jurisdiction is conferred and, therefore, it must be equally adequate or efficacious so that qualitatively or quantitatively the same relief would be given for redress of the injury to the petitioner."

The High Court also asserted that this alternative remedy could never be the general remedy of a civil suit under the C.P.C., and that where the order was a nullity (e.g. when it was ultra vires), the question of exhausting alternative remedy could hardly arise as the petitioner could straightaway seek remedy of judicial review.[7]

The Industrial Disputes Act provided a clear remedy for adjudication of labour disputes and, therefore, a writ petition would not lie for this purpose.[8] The Indian Registration Act provided a remedy against refusal of the sub-registrar to register a document. A writ petition was therefore not maintainable for the purpose.[9]

A High Court's power to issue an interim order (for enforcement of Fundamental Rights or otherwise) was very much restricted. Such an order (whether by way of injunction or stay or in any other manner) could not be made unless the copies of the petition along with supporting documents were furnished to the opposing party and an opportunity of being heard was given to it.

The High Court could however waive these requirements and issue an interim order as an 'exceptional measure' if it was satisfied, for reasons to be recorded in writing, that it was necessary to do so for preventing any loss being caused to the petitioner which could not be adequately compensated in money.

---

7. National Tobacco, supra.
8. Ibid.
9. Ramautar v. State of Bihar, AIR 1977 Pat 295.

Such an order was to cease to have effect after 14 days unless the necessary formalities were fulfilled in the meantime and the High Court continued the order in operation.

No interim order could be issued if it was to have the effect of delaying any inquiry into a matter of public importance, or any inquiry into an offence punishable with imprisonment, or any action for the execution of any work or project of public utility, or the acquisition of any property for such execution, by government or any corporation owned or controlled by the government.

The avowed object of the changes effected in Art. 226 was to weaken judicial supervision of administrative action. The scope of new Art. 226 was uncertain as much would have depended on how the expressions 'injury of substantial nature' or 'substantial failure of justice' were interpreted by the courts. Then, if 'any remedy' was available, writ was not to be issued.

Hitherto, the Courts did follow the principle, a kind of self-imposed restriction, that if an 'alternative adequate remedy' was available, a writ would not be issued. But this was a flexible rule.[10]

The question under the new provision would be whether 'any remedy' meant 'an adequate remedy' or just any remedy. The answer to this question would have vitally affected the scope of writ jurisdiction of the High Courts. If the courts were to take the view that the existence of a remedy, howsoever inadequate or inefficacious it could be, would be a bar to the issue of writ, then effective relief in many situations of administrative maladministration could not be possible. However, the words 'any other remedy' were qualified by the words, 'for such redress'. This could be interpreted to mean that the remedy available must be effective to give such redress as he could get through the writ. This could mean an 'adequate' remedy and not 'any' remedy. The High Courts could have interpreted the new provision in the light of the pre-CA 42 case law on this point.

TRIBUNALS

Another retrograde innovation made by CA 42 was to withdraw 'tribunals' from Art. 227. This meant that the High Courts would no longer have superintendence over tribunals until the law provided for the same.[11]

However, CA 42 also opened the possibility for the proliferation of the tribunal system in the country. Under Art. 323A, Parliament was empowered to establish service tribunals. This matter has already been discussed earlier.[12]

Art. 323B empowered the appropriate legislature to provide, by law, for adjudication or trial by tribunals of any disputes and offences with respect to several matters mentioned therein. Art. 323B has already been discussed earlier.[13]

A notable feature of Art. 323B is that tribunals established under it can authorise to try certain categories of criminal offences and thus impose penal sanctions as distinguished from merely administrative sanctions. This is an innovation which raises several critical issues of which two may be mentioned here:

---

10. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D(g).
11. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. C(iv).
12. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.
13. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.

(i) in a criminal trial appraising of evidence against the accused and finding facts are very important for which legal training is necessary but the tribunals may not necessarily be manned by lawyers. This thus puts into back gear the trend of separating the executive from the judiciary.[14]

(ii) The tribunals do not follow the normal rules of evidence as contained in the Evidence Act. In criminal courts, an accused is presumed to be innocent till he is proved guilty beyond any reasonable doubt. It is not so in case of a tribunal which can convict a person on evidence which may not be of sufficient probative value for a court to convict.

As the Supreme Court has observed: "A finding of fact recorded by the tribunal cannot be challenged on the ground that the relevant and material evidence adduced before the tribunal is insufficient or inadequate to sustain a finding. The adequacy or sufficiency of evidence led on a point and the inference of fact to be drawn from the said finding are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Tribunal."[15]

The legislature concerned can, if it so likes, free the tribunals established under Arts. 323A and 323B from judicial control except that exercised by the Supreme Court under Art. 136. Much of the success of the tribunal system will depend upon the legislation which may be passed, the type of people who are appointed to sit in these tribunals and the procedure prescribed for them. Although these tribunals can be freed from the control of the High Courts, it is suggested that the legislatures should not do so in every case, especially in case of tribunals imposing penal sanctions, for it will not be possible for many persons to go to the Supreme Court in appeal against tribunal decisions, and that may amount to a denial of justice to them.

The justification for introducing the tribunal system in India was stated as follows in the Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the Bill:

> "To reduce the mounting arrears in High Courts and to secure the speedy disposal of service matters, revenue matters and certain other matters of special importance in the context of the socio economic development and progress, it is considered expedient to provide for administrative and other tribunals for dealing with such matters while preserving the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in regard to such matters under article 136 of the Constitution".

It may be pointed out that in L. Chandrakumar Kumar v. Union of India,[16] Cl. 2(d) of Art. 323A and Cl. 2(d) of Art. 323B have been declared unconstitutional. These clauses authorised the exclusion of all judicial review of tribunal decisions except that under Art. 136.[17] The Supreme Court has ruled that the power of the High Court under Art. 226/227[18] and of the Supreme Court under Art. 32[19] being

---

14. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.
15. State of Andhra Pradesh v. C.V. Rao, AIR 1975 SC 2151, 2155 : (1975) 2 SCC 557.
Aslo see, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D(i) and XXXIII, Sec. A on this point.
16. AIR 1997 SC 1125 : (1997) 3 SCC 261.
17. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. D.
18. Supra, Ch. VIII, Secs. C(iv), D.
19. Supra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A.

"essential features" of the Constitution even an amendment of the Constitution could not abrogate the same.[20]

FEDERALISM

CA 42 introduced several notable changes in the area of Centre-State relationship, the inevitable thrust of which was to strengthen the Centre vis-a-vis the States in several respects, and, thus, to make Indian Federalism more centralised.[21]

Art. 257A, a new provision, enabled the Centre to deploy any armed force of the Union, or any other force under its control, for dealing with any grave situation of law and order in any State. Any such force had to act subject to the control and directions of the Centre and not of the concerned State Government.

This provision could be justified in the light of the difficulties described in the body of the book,[22] as well as under Art. 355,[23] which obligates the Centre to protect the States against internal disturbance.

Under Art. 257A, the Centre could act without the concurrence of the concerned State Government. However, the Law Minister gave an assurance in Parliament that the power under Art. 257A would be used only in 'exceptional' situations and in consultation with the concerned State Government.[24]

To give full effect to Art. 257A, a few changes were made in the relevant entries. The following new entry was added to the Union List:

> "2A. Deployment of any armed force of the Union or any other force subject to the control of the Union or any contingent or unit thereof in any State in aid of the civil power; powers, jurisdiction, privileges and liabilities of the members of such forces while on such deployment."[25]

Consequently, entry I in the State List,[26] was redrafted as follows:

> 1. "Public order but including the use of naval, military or air force or armed forces of the Union or of any other force subject to the control of the Union or of any contingent or unit thereof."

And, entry 2 in List II was redrafted as follows:[27]

> "2. Police (including railway and village police) subject to the provisions of entry 2A of List I."

The administration of justice below the High Courts has now been shifted from the exclusive State control to the concurrent area. Therefore, from entry 3, List II, the following words have been eliminated: "Administration of justice; constitution and organisation of all courts, except the Supreme Court and the High Court."

---

20. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. F.
21. Supra, Chs. X-XVII.
22. Supra, Ch. XII.
23. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. C.
24. Rajya Sabha Debates, Nov. 10, 1976.
For this provision, see, supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. C; Ch. X, Sec. G(iii)(f).
25. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. D(a).
26. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E(a).
27. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E(a).

To achieve this objective, provision was made for the creation of an all-India judicial service.[28]

The following entries were eliminated from the State List[29]:

(12) Education;

(19) Forests;

(20) Protection of wild animals and birds; and

(29) Weights and measures.

These matters were placed in the Concurrent List.[30] The new entries in List III are:

(11A) Administration of justice : constitution and organisation of all courts, except the Supreme Court and the High Courts;

(17A) Forests;

(17B) Protection of wild animals and birds;

(20A) Population control and family planning;

(33A) Weights and measures except establishment of standards;

(25) Education, including technical education, medical education and universities, subject to the provisions of entries 63, 64, 65 and 66 of List I; vocational and technical training of labour.

The result of shifting the several entries from the State to the Concurrent List is to enable Parliament also to legislate in these areas along with the State Legislatures. The question of transferring 'education' to the Concurrent List had been before the country for quite some time.[31] Wild life, forests and family planning have been placed in the Concurrent List because increasing importance is going to be attached to these programmes in future. For this purpose, Art. 48A adds a new Directive Principle.[32]

EMERGENCY

Prior to CA 42, the President could declare emergency under Art. 352 throughout the country and not only in a part of the country. This lacuna was filled by suitably amending Art. 352.[33]

Another change made in Art. 352 was to authorise the President to vary proclamation of emergency. Hitherto, the President could revoke, but could not vary, a proclamation issued under Art. 352. The proclamation varying an earlier proclamation had to undergo the same process in Parliament (of being laid and approved) as a fresh proclamation under Art. 352.

Consequent upon the change in Art. 352, providing for proclamation of emergency in a part of the country, necessary changes were made in Arts. 353, 358

---

28. Supra, Ch. XII, Sec. G; Ch. VIII; Sec. G(g).
Also, under Government Services, Ch. XXXVI.
29. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
30. Supra, Ch. X, Secs. F(c), (e), (f).
31. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. G(iii)(d).
32. Supra, , Ch. XXXIV, under Directive Principles.
33. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.

and 359.[34] The purpose of these amendments was to clarify that when emergency operated in a part of India, necessary action (by way of legislation or executive action) could be taken in other parts of India as well in so far as the security of India was threatened by activities in or in relation to the area under emergency.

Slight changes were made in Arts. 356 and 357.[35] Before CA 42, the proclamation of emergency under Art. 356 in respect of a State needed parliamentary approval to operate at the end of every six months. This period was now extended to one year. Henceforth, presidential proclamation under Art. 356 was to come before Parliament for approval after a year and not six months.

Another change in Art. 357 ensured that the laws made for a State when it was under Art. 356 emergency was not to come to an end automatically after the emergency was over, but would continue in operation until the State Legislature made changes therein or repealed them.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

One significant change made by CA 42 was in Art. 31C. An attempt was made to give primacy to all Directive Principles over the Fundamental Rights. This aspect has already been discussed earlier.[36] The Supreme Court declared this amendment unconstitutional [37] and restricted the primacy of Directive Principles as was laid down in Amendment XXV[38] and upheld in Kesavananda.[39]

While no verbal changes were made by CA 42 in the text of the various Articles dealing with Fundamental Rights, certain changes were made with a view to dilute the over-all efficacy of these rights.

A new provision, Art. 31D, was added to enable Parliament to make a law to prevent or prohibit 'anti-national activities' or the formation of 'anti-national associations.' The expression 'anti-national activity' was defined broadly. An 'anti-national association' was also defined broadly. No such law was to be void on the ground that it was inconsistent with, or took away or abridged any of the rights conferred by Arts. 14, 19 or 31. The law under Art. 31D was to be made by Parliament. No such law could be made by a State Legislature.

Art. 31D threw a great responsibility on Parliament to see that a law to suppress anti-national activities had proper safeguards so that while such activities were duly suppressed, legitimate activities of individuals or groups were not unduly obstructed.

The expression 'anti-national activity' was to mean any action:

(i) which was intended to bring about, on any ground whatsoever, the cession or secession of a part of the Indian territory, or which incited any individual or association to bring about cession or secession;

(ii) which questioned or threatened or was intended to threaten or disrupt the sovereignty and integrity of India or the security of the state or the unity of the nation;

---

34. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B(b).
35. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. D.
36. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. D.
37. Supra, Chs. XXXII, Sec. D(ii)(iii); XXXIV, Sec. C and XLI, Sec. E(a).
38. Supra, Chs. XXXII, XXXIV, Sec. E(a) and XLI; supra, this Chapter.
39. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. D(e).

(iii) which was intended to overthrow by force the government as by law established;

(iv) which was intended to create internal disturbance or disruption of public services;

(v) which was intended to threaten or disrupt harmony between different religious, racial, language or religious groups or castes or communities.

An 'anti-national association' meant an association:

(i) which had for its object any anti-national activity;

(ii) which encouraged or aided persons to undertake or engaged in any anti-national activity;

(iii) the members of which undertook or engaged in any anti-national activity.

The expression 'anti-national activity' was very broadly defined as was clear from such phrases as 'internal disturbance, 'disrupt harmony' between various groups, 'disruption of public services' etc. It was not only an activity which in fact resulted in any of the prohibited results but even an activity which was 'intended' to achieve such a result which was illegal.

In Art. 31D, the word used was 'law' and not 'reasonable law'. Thus, the courts could not adjudge the reasonableness of a law passed to prevent or prohibit anti-national activities or associations. Parliament could thus impose any restrictions it liked on the Fundamental Rights guaranteed by Arts. 14, 19 or 31 through a law made under Art. 31D. If Parliament were to confer an absolute discretion on the Executive to declare unlawful any association which, in its opinion, was engaged in an unlawful activity, the courts could not declare the law to be unreasonable or invalid.

The only role left for the courts under Art. 31D was to adjudicate whether or not a law enacted by Parliament fell within the scope of Art. 31D, for a law falling outside Art. 31D could not claim protection from Arts. 14, 19 or 31. But, in view of the extensive phraseology used in Art. 31D, it was doubtful whether any law could he held to fall outside the scope of Art. 31D.

It may be noted that the Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act, 1967, seeks to bar an activity which is intended to bring about the secession of a part of the Indian territory or which disclaims or disputes the sovereignty and territorial integrity of India. The Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 1972, makes illegal any activity inciting disharmony against any religious, racial, language or regional group or caste or community. Under these laws, an association could be declared unlawful if it has for its object the activities declared illegal.

Art. 31D added three more ingredients for declaring activities and associations unlawful which were not to be found in these Acts, viz.: (i) overthrowing the government by force; (ii) creating internal disturbance; (iii) disrupting public services. However, the significant point to note is that the two Acts enacted prior to Art. 31D are subject to the Fundamental Rights in Arts. 14, 19 and 31. Thus, under Art. 19(1)(c), the procedure to declare an association unlawful has to be reasonable.[40] Consequently, under these Acts, the government order declaring an association unlawful is subject to review by a tribunal consisting of a High Court Judge and, under Art. 136, there could be an appeal to the Supreme Court from the tribunal.[41] But, now, under Art. 31D, the power of Parliament was to be free from any such restraints and safeguards.

During the course of parliamentary discussion at the time of enactment of Art. 31D, several members expressed apprehensions at the breadth of the provision, the possibility of misuse of power under it by the bureaucracy, and the possibility of Art. 31D being used to curb legitimate trade union activity, or the democratic activity of the common man, or formation of associations by the minorities. It was suggested that internal disturbance might be caused by a variety of causes but under Art. 31D any kind of internal disturbances might be termed as 'anti-national'. Who was to decide whether an internal disturbance was anti-national or not? It was therefore emphasized that there should be provisions for review by a tribunal or High Court of the question whether an association was engaged in anti-national activity or not. The Law Minister however assured the members that it was not the intention of the Government to prohibit legitimate trade union activity, or formation of associations by the minorities. He stated that Art. 31D only gave power to Parliament to make a law and the question of safeguards should be raised as and when Parliament proceeded to legislate under it. Art. 31D thus placed a great power in the hands of Parliament to affect the rights of the people.

DIRECTIVE PRINCIPLES

CA 42 added a few more Directive Principles, viz., Art. 39A,[42] Art. 43A,[43] Art. 48A.[44]

Art. 39(f) was redrafted so as to widen the state obligation towards children.[45] Thus, the range of state obligations towards society had become more extensive through the new Directive Principles.

But a major change that was made by CA 42 was to give primacy to all Directive Principles over the Fundamental Rights contained in Arts. 14, 19 or 31.[46] To achieve this objective, Art. 31C was amended so as to say that no law giving effect to any of the Directive Principles was to be deemed to be void on the ground of its inconsistency with any of the rights conferred by Arts. 14, 19 or 31.[47]

By this amendment, the wheel had turned a full circle. The Directive Principles started as being subservient to the Fundamental Rights.[48] Now, some of the significant Fundamental Rights were made subservient to the Directive Principles.

This change was justified on the ground that the rights of the community must precede over the rights of the individual. But, as already stated, the Supreme

---

40. State of Madras v. Row, supra, Ch. XXIV, Sec. F.
41. For Art. 136, see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. E.
42. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D(j).
43. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D(o).
44. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D(w).
45. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D(h).
46. Supra, Chs. XXI, XXIV, XXXI, XXXII, XXXIV and XLI.
47. Ibid.
48. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. C.

Court refused to accept such a drastic change in the mutual relationship between the Directive Principles and the Fundamental Rights.[49]

However, Art. 37 was left untouched. This meant that the Directive Principles were not enforceable in any court.[50] Therefore, there is no legal way in which the state can be compelled to implement the Directive Principles and the sanction underlying these principles still remains mainly political. But, as has been discussed earlier,[51] in course of time, the Supreme Court by reading the Directive Principles along with the Fundamental Rights, has made the Directive Principles enforceable to a large extent.

FUNDAMENTAL DUTIES

CA 42 laid down fundamental duties of the Indian citizens.[52] A new article, Art. 51A, was added to the Constitution for this purpose.

GOVERNMENT SERVICES

Till 1976, under Art. 311(2), a government servant could not be dismissed, removed or reduced in rank without being given a reasonable opportunity of being heard at two stages :

first, at the time of inquiry into the charges against him;

secondly, when after the inquiry, it was proposed to impose any of the aforesaid punishments on him.[53]

CA 42 amended Art. 311(2) so as to eliminate the second stage. Thus, a government servant was denied the opportunity to make a representation at the second stage of inquiry against the punishment proposed to be imposed on him in a disciplinary proceeding.

Art. 312 was amended to enable Parliament to create an all-India judicial service.[54] This service was not to include any post inferior to that of a district judge.[55] The parliamentary law creating such a service could make necessary amendments in Arts. 233 to 237,[56] and such a law would not be regarded as an amendment of the Constitution for purposes of Art. 368. This is a consequence of transferring 'administration of justice' from the exclusive State control to the concurrent area.[57]

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

CA 42 made some modifications in Art. 368. Two new clauses, Arts. 368(4) and (5), were added to the Constitution.

Cl. (4) sought to provide that no amendment to the Constitution "shall be called in question in any Court on any ground". Cl. 5 declared "for removal of

---

49. Minerva Mills Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 1789 : (1980) 3 SCC 625; supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. E(a).
50. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. B.
51. Supra, Chs. XXVI, Sec. J and XXXIV, Sec. C.
52. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. E.
53. Supra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. G.
54. Supra, Chs. XII, Sec. G and XXXVI, Sec. B.
55. The term has been defined in Art. 236, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G.
56. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G.
57. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. F.

doubts", that "there shall be no limitation on the constituent power of Parliament" to amend the Constitution.

These newly added clauses have made no difference to the stance of the Supreme Court that the basic features of the Constitution are inviolable by any constitutional amendment. This position has been reiterated by the Supreme Court in a number of cases after 1975. This matter has been discussed earlier.[58]

FORTY-THIRD AMENDMENT : 1977

The sixth general election to the Lok Sabha took place in March, 1977, after the emergency imposed in 1975 was revoked. As the Indian people were very angry at what had happened during the period of emergency, the Congress Party which had held power for the last nearly 30 years was defeated at the polls and the Janata Party won a decisive majority and formed the government.

The Janata Party had made an election pledge that it would repeal the 42nd Amendment and restore the status quo ante. The Constitution (Forty-Third Amendment) Act enacted in December, 1977, partially redeemed this pledge.

Although the Janata Government had the requisite majority in Lok Sabha to enact a constitutional amendment, it lacked the same in Rajya Sabha where the Congress Party still had the majority and, therefore, the Janata Government could not hope to have a constitutional amendment effectuated without the concurrence of the Congress Party. Therefore, only such amendments as were agreed upon between the Janata and the Congress Parties could be enacted.

The 42nd Amendment had inserted a number of provisions in the Constitution to curtail both directly and indirectly the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the High Courts to review the constitutionality of legislation. Some of these provisions were now repealed. These provisions were: Arts. 32A, 131A, 144A, 226A, 228A and 31D.[59]

Art. 32A barred the Supreme Court from considering the constitutional validity of any State law in proceedings for enforcement of Fundamental Rights. Art. 131A gave to the Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction to decide the constitutional validity of a Central law. Art. 144A required a bench of seven Judges in the Supreme Court to consider the Constitutional validity of a law, and also required a special majority of two-thirds for the invalidation of such law. Art. 226A barred the High Courts from considering the constitutional validity of a Central law in their writ jurisdiction. Art. 228A barred the High Courts from declaring a Central law to be constitutionally invalid and also required a bench of at least five Judges and a special majority of two-thirds to hold a state law invalid.

The reasons given for repealing these provisions were as follows.[60] Arts. 32A, 131A and 228A caused hardship to persons living in distant parts of India. Art. 32A would lead to multiplicity of proceedings for the cases relating to the validity of a State law must now be heard first by a High Court and then come before the Supreme Court by way of appeal. The rule requiring a special bench to consider the constitutional validity of a law resulted in valuable judicial time being

---

58. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. F.
59. Supra, 1957 et seq.
60. See the Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the Bill.

lost for such a bench must be constituted however unsubstantial the challenge to a law might be.

The Supreme Court itself in Misrilal Jain v. State of Orissa[61] had taken occasion to comment adversely on Art. 144A and expressed the hope that Art. 144A would be amended by Parliament so as to leave to the Court itself the duty to decide how large a bench should sit to consider any particular case.

Art. 31D empowered Parliament to enact certain laws in respect of anti-national activities and associations. These powers were of a sweeping nature and were capable of abuse, and so Art. 31D was repealed.[62]

FORTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT : 1978

The 42nd Amendment undertaken during the emergency (1975-77) had been the most controversial amendment in the whole Indian Constitutional History. It had a number of obnoxious features, and had introduced a number of distortions in the Constitution; it was regarded as an attempt to institutionalize emergency in the country for ever.

One of its most debatable features was to curtail the power of the High Courts and the Supreme Court to review legislation and give redress to the individual against administrative excesses. Another feature was dilution of Fundamental Rights. Also, the Central powers vis-a-vis those of the States were increased and Art. 368 was sought to be amended to make Parliament's amending power beyond judicial review. There was so much public sentiment against the 42nd Amendment that one of the election issues in the sixth general election was the repeal of the 42nd Amendment. The Janata Party won the election and it redeemed its pledge by enacting the 43rd and the 44th Amendments to the Constitution to undo most of the provisions of the 42nd Amendment.

The Constitution (Forty-Fourth Amendment) Act, passed in 1978, removed most of the aberrations and distortions introduced into the Constitution by the Forty-Second Amendment of the Constitution.[63] Not only this, the 44th Amendment also sought to amend a few other provisions of the Constitution so as to achieve the following major objectives:[64]

(i) to ensure that Fundamental Rights were not restricted or taken away by a transient majority in Parliament, it was necessary to provide adequate safeguards against recurrence of such a contingency in the future and to ensure to the people themselves an effective voice in determining the form of government under which they were to live;

(ii) to take the controversial property right out of the category of Fundamental Rights and make it an ordinary legal right;

(iii) to ensure that the power to proclaim an emergency under Art. 352, which virtually has the effect of amending the Constitution by converting it to a unitary state and suspending the right of the citizen to

---

61. AIR 1977 SC 686.
62. For comments on Art. 31D see, supra, 2400-2402.
63. Supra, 2386-2404.
64. The Statement of Objects and Reasons annexed to the Bill.

enforce Fundamental Rights,[65] was used properly and after due consideration and deliberation and was not misused for personal or partisan ends;

(iv) to ensure that the fundamental and basic features of the Constitution were not lightly interfered with by Parliament in exercise of its power of constitutional amendment under Art. 368.

The salient features of CA 44 are as follows.

PARLIAMENT AND STATE LEGISLATURES

(i) CA 42 had extended the life of Lok Sabha and State Legislative Assemblies from five to six years. CA 44 reduced the term again to five years and, thus, restored the status quo ante.[66]

(ii) Status quo was also restored in respect of the quorum in the Houses of Parliament as well as the State Legislatures. CA 42 had reduced the question of quorum from a substantive to a merely procedural matter.[67] Changes made in this area by CA 42 were cancelled and the original Articles 100(3) and (4) and 189(3) and (4) were restored by CA 44.[68]

(iii) CA 42 had amended Art. 103 as regards the procedure to decide the question of disqualification of a member of Parliament.[69] CA 44 amended Art. 103 again so as to restore the position to what it was before the passage of CA 42. Henceforth, the question of disqualification of a member of a House of Parliament is to be decided by the President in accordance with the opinion of the Election Commission.[70]

A similar change was introduced in the case of the members of the State Legislatures. Henceforth, the question of disqualification of a member of a State Legislature is to be decided by the Governor in accordance with the opinion of the Election Commission.[71]

(iv) CA 44 added a new Article 361A to the Constitution so as to ensure that no one was held liable to any civil or criminal proceedings in a court in respect of the publication in a newspaper of a substantially true report of any proceedings of either House of Parliament or a State Legislature unless the publication was proved to have been made with malice. This immunity would not apply to publication of any report of the secret proceedings of a House. The same immunity would also apply to broadcasts or wireless.[72]

To begin with, this immunity was given under a law of Parliament in respect of publication of parliamentary proceedings.[73] During the 1975 emergency, this

---

65. In the discussion which follows, the following abbreviations have been used : CA 42 for the Forty-Second Amendment Act; CB 45 for the Forty-Fifth Amendment Bill and CA 44 for the Constitution (Forty-Fourth Amendment) Act, 1978.
66. Supra, also see, Chs. II, Sec. I(c) and VI, Sec. (d) supra.
67. Supra, 2388.
68. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. I(c) and VII, supra.
69. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(d), Ch. VI, Sec. C(d).
70. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. D(d).
71. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(iii)(b).
72. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(i)(b).
73. The Parliamentary Proceedings (Protection of Publication) Act, 1956.

law was repealed, but was re-enacted after the emergency.[74] Art. 361A put the immunity on a firmer foundation. It also extended the same immunity to publication of proceedings of a State Legislature.

(v) Art. 102(1)(a) regarding "office of profit" as it stood originally prior to CA 42 has been restored.[75] The change made therein by CA 42 taking away from the courts the power to declare what was an "office of profit" was cancelled by CA 44.[76] The courts get back the power to decide whether an office is an "office of profit." A similar change was made as regards the State Legislatures.[77]

(vi) Arts. 105 and 194 dealing with the privileges of Parliament and of the State Legislatures[78] had been amended by CA 42 so as to drop partially the reference to the House of Commons.[79] CA 44, in the first place, cancelled the amendments made by CA 42 and then amended Articles 105(3) and 194(3) so as to drop completely any reference to the House of Commons in future. The privileges enjoyed by a House of Parliament or State Legislature, or any of its committees of members, would henceforth be the same as existing immediately before the coming into force of CA 44.[80]

EXECUTIVE

(i) CA 39 had deprived the Supreme Court of its jurisdiction to decide disputes concerning election of the President and the Vice-President.[81] CA 44 cancelled this amendment and restored to the Supreme Court its original jurisdiction in this respect.[82] CA 44 thus restored the status quo obtaining before CA 39.

(ii) CA 42 had amended Art. 74 so as to make ministerial advice binding on the President.[83] The President was left with no option except to act in accordance with the ministerial advice. This provision was not changed by CA 44, but to somewhat relax the rigours of this provision, a new proviso was added to Art. 74(1) saying that the President could require the Council of Ministers to reconsider its advice given to him, either generally or otherwise, and the President should act in accordance with the advice tendered after such reconsideration. This means that while the President remains bound by ministerial advice, he now gets a limited right to refer the matter back to the Council of Ministers for reconsideration. The provision supplements Art. 78(c).[84]

(iii) CA 42 barred the courts requiring production of Business Rules made by the Central or a State Government.[85] For this purpose, clause (4) was added to Arts. 77 and 166 of the Constitution. CA 44 repealed the new clause (4) and thus enabled the courts to require the government to produce its Rules of Business, if

---

74. The Parliamentary Proceedings (Protection of Publication) Act, 1977.
75. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. D(a).
76. Ibid.
77. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(iii)(a).
78. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L and VI, Sec. H.
79. Supra, 2389-2390.
80. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. L and IV, Sec. H.
81. Supra, 2384.
82. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i)(b).
83. Supra, 2390.
84. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
85. Supra, 2390.

necessary, to decide a controversy before them as they could do prior to the enactment of CA 42.[86]

(iv) CA 38 had added clause (4) to Articles 132 and 213 so as to make the satisfaction of the President or the Governor to issue ordinances "final and conclusive"[87] CA 44 now repealed the clause. Thus, the position as existing prior to CA38 in this respect was restored.[88] In this way, the discretion/satisfaction of the President/Governor to issue an ordinance was made open to judicial review.

(v) Art. 239B(4) added by CA 38 declaring satisfaction of the Administrator of a Union Territory to issue Ordinances "final and conclusive" was also withdrawn by CA 44.[89]

HIGH COURTS AND THE SUPREME COURT

(i) CA 42 had added Art. 139A so as to enable the Supreme Court, in certain circumstances, to withdraw cases from the High Courts and decide them itself.[90] CA44 continued this provision subject to some modifications. Previously, the Court could do so only on the application of the Attorney-General. Now, CA 44 enabled the Court to do so additionally either suo motu or on the application of a party to any such case.

The Supreme Court would decide the question of law involved in the case withdrawn and thereafter would send the case back to the High Court concerned for disposal.[91]

(ii) CA 44 inserted a new Article 134A and made consequential verbal changes in Arts. 132, 133 and 134(1)(c).

The underlying purpose of these amendments was to cut down any element of delay in the Supreme Court hearing appeals from the High Courts.[92] Art. 134A laid down the procedure for the grant of certificate of fitness by the High Courts for appeal to the Supreme Court. Art. 134A makes it obligatory on the High Court to consider the question of granting certificate immediately on the delivery of the judgement.

(iii) Formerly there was Art. 132(2) authorising the Supreme Court to grant special leave to appeal if the High Court refused to grant the necessary certificate. CA 44 repealed Art. 132(2) as, in such a case, the Supreme Court could consider grant of special leave to appeal under Art. 136.[93]

(iv) CA 42 had made provision for appointment of distinguished jurists as Judges of the High Courts.[94] This provision was repealed by CA 44.

(v) CA 42 had amended Art. 225 so as to re-impose on the original jurisdiction of the High Courts restrictions regarding matters concerning revenue or acts done

---

86. Supra, Chs. III, Sec. E and VII, Sec. B.
87. Supra, 2383.
88. Supra, Chs. III, Sec. D(ii)(d) and VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).
89. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. A.
90. Supra, 2394.
91. Supra, Ch. VIII.
92. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I(a).
93. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. E.
94. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(e).

in collection thereof.[1] CA 44 again amended Art. 225 so as to remove this bar on the High Courts' original jurisdiction. Thus, the position as it obtained prior to CA 42 has been restored in this respect.[2]

(vi) CA 42 had brought about a major change in the jurisdiction of the High Courts to issue writs under Art. 226.[3] The avowed purpose of this change was to curtail the writ jurisdiction of these courts and to curtail judicial review of administrative action. This constituted a serious encroachment of individual's right to seek redress against the administration in case he was adversely affected by its action.

CA 44 amended Art. 226 again so as to restore the position as it obtained prior to CA 42.[4]

(vii) The provisions as to the issue of interim orders introduced by CA 42 in Art. 226 were also repealed. Instead, a simple new provision, Art. 226(3), was introduced. It seeks to provide that where an interim order is passed against a party without giving him an opportunity of being heard, that party may apply to the Court for the vacation of such an order and that such an application should be disposed of by the High Court within two weeks. If not so disposed of, the interim order will lapse automatically after two weeks.[5]

(viii) CA 42 had amended Art. 227 so as to divest the High Courts of their power of superintendence over the tribunals. [6] Art. 227 was amended again by CA 44 so as to restore it to the form in which it stood prior to CA 42. [7] The High Courts thus got back their power of superintendence over the tribunals existing within their territorial jurisdiction.

FEDERALISM

Art. 257A was omitted.[8]

EMERGENCY

Art. 352 was amended by CA 44 so as to introduce a number of safeguards therein against abuse of power regarding proclamation of emergency.[9] The idea underlying these amendments was to make practically impossible the repetition of the 1975 situation when an emergency was declared without adequate cause on the ground of "internal disturbance".[10] These amendments made in Art. 352 have been mentioned earlier.[11]

(i) Clause 5 of Art. 352, which had been inserted by CA 38,[12] and which made the 'satisfaction' of the President as to the existence of a grave emergency neces-

---

1. Supra, 2393.
2. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. C(ii).
3. Supra, 2394-2396.
4. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D.
5. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D(r).
6. Supra, 2396.
7. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. C(iv).
8. Supra, Ch. X.
9. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
10. The Shah Commission held that there was no evidence of circumstances which could warrant the declaration of an emergency in 1975. There was no unusual event or even a tendency in that direction to justify the imposition of emergency. There was no threat to the well-being of the nation from sources external or internal.
11. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
12. Supra, 2383.

sitating the issue of a proclamation of emergency 'final', was withdrawn by CA 44.

(ii) As a further check against misuse of the emergency provisions, and to put the right to life and liberty on a secure footing, Art. 359[13] was now amended so as to provide that the presidential power to suspend the right to move the court for the enforcement of a Fundamental Right cannot be exercised in respect of the Fundamental Rights guaranteed by Arts. 20 and 21.[14] Thus, it will no longer be possible to suspend the right to life and personal liberty guaranteed by Art. 21, and the right to protection in respect of conviction for offences guaranteed by Art. 20.

This amendment will obviate in future the situation which arose in the Shukla case.[15]

Making Art. 20 inviolate during an emergency means that the government could not harass people during an emergency by making acts punishable retroactively.[16]

It has also been provided further that the suspension of the enforcement of any Fundamental Right under Art. 359 shall not apply in relation to any law which does not contain a recital to the effect that such law is 'in relation to' the proclamation of emergency in operation when it is made, or to any executive action taken otherwise than under a law containing such a recital. Thus, law other than those passed for the specific purpose of the emergency will no longer be protected by the presidential order issued under Art. 359.[17]

(iii) The scope of Art. 358 was also restricted.[18]

First, under Art. 358, Art. 19 can be suspended in future only in case of a proclamation of emergency issued on the ground of war or external aggression, and not in the case of a proclamation of emergency issued on the ground of armed rebellion.

Secondly, a new clause has been added to Art. 358 laying down that Art. 358 will not apply to any law which does not contain a recital saying that it is a law in relation to the proclamation of emergency in operation when it is made, or to any executive action taken otherwise than under a law containing such a recital. This makes it clear that only a law enacted in relation to the emergency, but no other law, would be immune from being challenged under Art. 358 during an emergency.

(iv) Changes were made in Art. 356 so as to make its scope somewhat restrictive.[19] Henceforth, the proclamation would remain in force for six months (instead of one year)[20] from the date of its approval by the Houses of Parliament. This change restored the position as it obtained prior to CA 42.

---

13. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B(b).
14. Supra, Chs. XXV and XXVI.
15. Supra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.
16. Supra, Ch. XXV, Sec. A.
17. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B(b).
18. Ibid.
19. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. E.
20. The period of one year was substituted for six months by CA42, supra, 2399.

Art. 356(5) added by CA 38 making satisfaction of the President under Art. 356(1) 'final and conclusive' was now withdrawn.[21] Instead, a new clause was added imposing certain conditions on the Parliament seeking to pass a resolution approving continuance of the emergency beyond one year.[22]

(v) Art. 360 concerning financial emergency was also amended so as to include some more safeguards therein. For this purpose, Art. 360(2) was replaced by a new clause. The new Art. 360(2) has been mentioned earlier.[23]

Further, Art. 360(5), which was inserted by CA 38, and which made presidential 'satisfaction' as to the matter mentioned in Art. 360(1) 'final and conclusive', was dropped.[24]

PREVENTIVE DETENTION

Art. 22 containing provisions regarding preventive detention[25] was amended so as to introduce a few more safeguards therein as follows:

(i) The maximum period for which a person may be detained without obtaining the opinion of the advisory board has been reduced from 3 to 2 months. In all cases of preventive detention beyond two months, advisory board is to be consulted. There will be no preventive detention beyond two months unless the advisory board reports that there is in its opinion sufficient cause for such detention.

(ii) In future, an advisory board is to consist of a chairman and not less than two other members, the chairman being a serving Judge of the appropriate High Court and the other two members being the serving or retired High Court Judges.

The board is to be constituted in accordance with the recommendations of the Chief Justice of the appropriate High Court. These changes in the composition of the advisory board are designed to make it independent of the executive so that it may be able to look at a case of preventive detention objectively.

(iii) No person is to be kept in preventive detention beyond the maximum period prescribed by any law made by Parliament.

These changes have not yet been notified and so have not been effectuated so far. The old Art. 22 still operates. Reference may be made in this connection to A.K. Roy v. India, mentioned earlier.[26]

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

CA 44 removed the right to property from the category of Fundamental Rights and made it a right which can be regulated by ordinary law.[27] With a view to achieve this objective, the following changes were introduced in the Constitution.

(i) Art. 19(1)(f) was deleted.[28]

---

21. Supra, 2383.
22. Supra, Ch. XIII, Secs. D and E.
23. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. F.
24. Infra.
25. Supra, Ch. XXVII, Sec. B.
26. Supra, Chs. XXVII, Sec. B and XLI, Sec. E(e).
27. Supra, Chs. XXXI and XXXII.
28. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. B.

(ii) Art. 31 was omitted.[29]

(iii) Art. 31(1) became Art. 300A saying that no person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law.[30]

(iv) The safeguard contained in Art. 31(2) relating to acquisition of property of an educational institution established and administered by a minority is now sought to be incorporated in Art. 30. Thus, a new clause (1A) has been added after Art. 30(1).[31]

Art. 31D was repealed by CA 44.[32]

DIRECTIVE PRINCIPLES

A new Directive Principle was inserted by adding a new clause to Art. 38 to the effect that the state shall strive to minimise inequalities in income and endeavour to eliminate inequalities in status, facilities and opportunities not only amongst individuals but groups of people residing in different areas or engaged in different vocations.[33]

ELECTIONS

Art. 329A inserted by CA 39 making special provisions regarding elections to Parliament of the Prime Minister and the Speaker was now omitted.[34]

CONCLUDING REMARKS

CA 44 thus negatived most of the distortions introduced into the Constitution by CA 42. However, CA 44 did not go so far as CB 45[35] ("the Bill which on enactment became CA 44) proposed to go.

CB 45 contained a few more significant provisions but which were absent from CA 44. The reason was this: the Janata Government had a large majority in the Lok Sabha but it was in a minority in the Rajya Sabha. While the Lok Sabha passed CB 45 as a whole, a few clauses had to be omitted therefrom in the Rajya Sabha which were voted down by the Congress Party. The following provisions in CB 45 were finally dropped before CA 44 could be passed by the two Houses.

(i) CA 42 had introduced into the Preamble to the Constitution the terms 'secular' and 'socialist' without however defining or explaining the significance of these terms. [36]

CB45 sought to define these two terms. "Secular republic" was defined to mean a "republic in which there is equal respect for all religions". "Socialist republic" was to mean "a republic in which there is freedom from all forms of exploitation, social, political and economic". This definition clause did not appear in CA 44.

---

29. Supra, Ch. XXXI, Sec. C.
30. For comments on Art. 300A, see, supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. E.
31. Supra, Ch. XXX, Sec. C(k).
32. For Art. 31D see, supra.
33. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. D(b).
34. Supra, 2384-2386.
35. The Constitution (Forty-fifth) Amendment Bill.
36. On preamble to the Constitutions, supra, Chs. I, Sec. E(c) and XXXIV, Sec. A.

(ii) CA 42 had added two new Articles 323A and 323B for purposes of establishing some new tribunals in India.[37] CB45 proposed to eliminate the new Articles, but this proposal did not succeed in the Rajya Sabha with the result that Arts. 323A and 323B continue to stay in the Constitution.[38]

(iii) CA 42 had introduced a number of changes in the area of federalism in the Constitution, the inevitable result of which was to tilt the balance somewhat in favour of the Centre. For example, Education and Forests were transferred from the State List to the Concurrent List.[39] CB45 sought to restore the status quo ante by retransferring these two entries back to the State List, but the proposal failed in the Rajya Sabha.[40]

(iv) CB 45 sought to amend Art. 31C so as to restrict its scope to what it was before CA 42.[41] It was thus proposed that in future only a law effectuating the policy of the state towards securing Art. 39(b) and (c) would be subservient to Arts. 14 and 19. However, the Rajya Sabha did not accept this proposal. Art. 31C stays in the Constitution as amended by CA 42. Ultimately, the Supreme Court restricted the scope of Art. 31C to what it was prior to the enactment of CA 42.[42]

(v) CB 45 sought to eliminate the last portion of Art. 31C, viz. "no law containing a declaration that it is for giving effect to such policy shall be called into question in any court on the ground that it does not give effect to such policy."[43] The clause had been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in Kesavananda Bharati.[44] This proposal did not get through in the Rajya Sabha. But the clause cannot be effective in view of the Supreme Court's ruling in Kesavananda.

(vi) Finally, the proposal made in CB 45 to introduce referendum as a part of the constitutent process failed in the Rajya Sabha. This has already been explained earlier.[45]

The proposal was that changes in the Constitution impairing its democratic or secular character, abridging or taking away Fundamental Rights, prejudicing or impeding free and fair elections on the basis of adult suffrage and compromising the independence of judiciary, can be made only if they are approved by the people of India by a majority of votes at a referendum in which at least 51% of the electorate participate. The proposal fell because of the opposition of the Congress Party.

FORTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT : 1980

The Constitution (Forty-Fifth) Amendment Act, 1980, was enacted with the purpose of continuing reservation of seats for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in the Lok Sabha and the State Assemblies for another ten years. Accord-

---

37. Supra, 2396.
38. Supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.
39. Supra, 2398-2399.
40. Supra, Ch. X, Sec. E.
41. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. D.
42. See, supra, Ch. XLI., Sec. E(a), Minerva Mills.
43. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. D(ii) and (iii).
44. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. D(e).
45. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. E(f).

ingly, in Art. 334, for the words "thirty years", the words "forty years" were substituted.

The same concession was extended to the Anglo-Indians who could have representation by nomination in these chambers.

Thus, reservation for these classes in Parliament and State Legislatures was extended upto the year 1990.[46]

FORTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT : 1982

Before the enactment of this Amendment, tax on the mere consignment of goods in the course of interstate trade and commerce fell outside entry 54, List II. The matter thus fell outside the legislative competence of the States, but fell within the area of legislative competence of the Centre because of Art. 248 and the residuary Entry 97, List I.[47]

The Constitution (Forty-sixth Amendment) Act was passed in 1982. This Amendment was designed to improve the financial position of the States. The purpose of the Amendment was to enable Parliament to levy and collect tax on the consignment of goods taking place in the course of inter-State trade or commerce. The proceeds of the tax so levied were to be assigned to the States. The new tax was complimentary to the tax on inter-State sales.

Accordingly, to achieve the purpose, a new Entry 92B was added to List I in the Seventh Schedule; Art. 269 and the Union List were amended and Art. 366 was amended by adding a clause (29A) after clause (29) to expand and clarify the meaning of the phrase "tax on the sale or purchase of goods".[48]

As a result of these amendments, the field of taxation on the consignments in course of inter-state trade and commerce falls within the legislative competence of Parliament.

The Amendment also empowers the States to levy a tax on the supply of food and drink.[49]

Many controversies had arisen in connection with the levy of sales tax by the States. For example, hire-purchase transactions could not be subject to sales tax as there was no transfer of property in goods. The idea underlying the Forty-Sixth Amendment was to put an end to all these controversies by defining the expression "tax on sale or purchase of goods" in a comprehensive manner.

The Amendment was undertaken on the basis of the recommendations made by the Law Commission in its 61st report. The whole matter has been explained earlier.[50] The Commission had pointed out that the provisions of the existing Central Sales Tax Act were insufficient to tax the consignment transfers from one branch to another as it was not a sale.

---

46. Supra, Chs. II, Sec. C; VI, Sec. B(ii) and XXXV, Secs. B, C, D.
47. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. C.
48. Ibid, Sec. K(i).
49. K. Damodarasamy Naidu & Sons v. State of Tamil Nadu, (2000) 1 SCC 521 : AIR 1999 SC 3909.
50. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. J.

FORTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT : 1984

The Constitution (Forty-seventh Amendment) Act was passed in 1984. This Amendment adds 14 State Acts dealing with land to the IX Schedule.[51]

FORTY-EIGHTH AMENDMENT : 1984

The Constitution (Forty-eighth Amendment) Act was passed in 1984. It dealt with the situation prevailing in Punjab at the time.

The purpose of the Amendment was to extend the President's rule under Art. 356 in Punjab to two years. The proclamation under Art. 356 was issued by the President on the 6th October, 1983. Under Art. 356(5), President's rule could last in a State for a maximum period of one year.[52] But the conditions in Punjab were not conducive to holding of fresh elections and, accordingly, extension of the President's rule became imperative. Art. 356(5) was accordingly amended to make this possible.

FORTY-NINTH AMENDMENT : 1984

The Constitution (Forty-ninth Amendment) Act was passed in 1984. The purpose of this Amendment is to take out the Tribal areas of Tripura from Schedule V and put them in Schedule VI.[53]

FIFTIETH AMENDMENT : 1984

The Constitution (Fiftieth Amendment) Act, was passed in 1984. This Amendment substitutes an expanded Art. 33 for the old Article.

The old Art. 33 applied only to the members of the armed forces or the forces charged with the maintenance of public order. The new Article 33 applies to two more categories of services.

By the new Art. 33, Parliament is authorised to curtail the Fundamental Rights of the members of the armed forces, forces charged with the maintenance of public order, intelligence organisations, or telecommunication systems set up for any force or intelligence bureau, with a view to ensure the proper discharge of duties by, and maintenance of discipline among, these persons in the interest of country's security.[54]

FIFTY-FIRST AMENDMENT : 1984

The Constitution (Fifty-first Amendment) Act, 1984, effectuates some changes in Arts. 330 and 332 with a view to provide for reservation of seats in the Lok Sabha for Scheduled Tribes in Meghalaya, Arunachal Pradesh, Nagaland and Mizoram, as well as in the Legislative Assemblies of Nagaland and Meghalaya.[55]

---

51. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C.
52. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. D.
53. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. C.
54. Supra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. E.
55. Supra, Ch. IX.
Also see, supra, Ch. XXXV, for Arts. 330 and 332.

The Amendment was undertaken to satisfy the aspirations of the local tribal population. Even though these States are predominantly tribal areas, the purpose of the Fifty-first Amendment is to ensure that the members of the Scheduled Tribes in these areas do not fail to secure a minimal representation because of their inability to compete with the advanced sections of the society.

FIFTY-SECOND AMENDMENT : 1985

The Constitution (Fifty-second Amendment) Act, passed in 1985, popularly known as the 'Anti-Defection' Law, is designed to prevent the scourge of defection of members of Parliament and State Legislatures from one political party to another, and destabilizing governments in the process.[56]

It was stated in the Statement of Objects and Reasons: "The evil of political defections has been a matter of national concern. If it is not combated, it is likely to undermine the very foundations of our democracy and the principles which sustain it."

In Art. 102, which lays down disqualifications for membership of Parliament,[57] the following new clause has been added:

"A person shall be disqualified for being a member of either House of Parliament if he is so disqualified under the Tenth Schedule."

A similar clause has been added to Art. 191 which lays down disqualifications for membership of the Houses of State Legislature.[58]

A new Schedule (X Schedule) has been added to the Constitution containing the following provisions:

(i) A member of a House belonging to any political party becomes disqualified for being a member of the House—

(a) if he voluntarily gives up his membership of such political party; or

(b) if he votes or abstains from voting in such House contrary to any direction issued by the political party to which he belongs without obtaining prior permission of such party, and such act has not been condoned by the concerned political party within 15 days from the date of such voting.

(ii) An elected member of a House belongs to the political party by which he was set up as a candidate for election. An independent member of a House (elected without being set up as a candidate by any political party) shall become disqualified to remain a member of the House if he joins any political party.

(iii) The disqualification on the ground of defection does not apply when there is a split in the concerned political party and he belongs to a faction arising out of such split and such group consists of not less than 1/3 members of the party.

(iv) Similarly, no disqualification arises when his party merges with another political party.

---

56. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. F; Ch. VI, Sec. B(iv).
57. Ibid; Ch. II, Sec. D.
58. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(iii).

(v) Any question regarding disqualification arising out of defection is to be decided by the Chairman or the Speaker of the House as the case may be, and his decision shall be final.

(vi) The courts do not have any jurisdiction in such a matter.

The underlying idea is that if a member of Parliament or a State Legislature seeks to quit the party on whose ticket he was elected then he will have to resign his seat and recontest. This will put an effective curb on the propensity of members to change parties with a view to get some immediate political gain. This phenomenon was causing unstability in the body politic.[59]

Till recently, the Constitution had not expressly referred to the existence of political parties. By the 52nd Amendment, for the first time, there is a clear recognition of the political parties by the Constitution. The Schedule now acknowledges the existence of political parties.

FIFTY-THIRD AMENDMENT: 1986

The Constitution (Fifty-third Amendment) Act enacted in 1986, inserts a new provision in the Constitution, Art. 371-G, making special provisions regarding the State of Mizoram.[60]

The Amendment provides that notwithstanding anything contained in the Constitution, no Act of Parliament in respect of the following matters—

(a) religious or social practices of the Mizos;

(b) Mizo customary law and procedure;

(c) administration of civil and criminal justice involving decisions according to Mizo customary law; and

(d) ownership and transfer of land shall apply to the State of Mizoram unless the State Legislative Assembly so decides by passing a resolution.

This restriction would not apply to any Central law which may be in force in the State at the commencement of the 53rd Amendment. Further, the Amendment fixes the strength of the State Legislative Assembly at a minimum of forty members.

The special provisions made by the Amendment emerged as a result of an agreement between the Central Government and the leaders of Mizoram.

FIFTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT: 1986

The purpose underlying the Constitution (Fifty-fourth Amendment) Act, 1986, is to increase the salaries of the Supreme Court and High Court Judges. The salaries of these Judges had remained static since 1950 despite high inflation. This Amendment practically doubles the salaries of the Judges.

The Amendment makes changes in Arts. 125 and 221 as well as in the Second Schedule.

---

59. For an essay on defection see: Mian Bashir Ahmad v. J & K, AIR 1982 J & K 26.
60. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. E.

Formerly the salaries for these Judges were mentioned in the Second Schedule which could be amended only by following the procedure prescribed for a constitutional amendment. Things have changed now. While the increased salaries are still mentioned in the Second Schedule, provision has been made now for amending this Schedule by Parliament by passing an ordinary law. Thus, Art. 125(2) has now been amended so as to provide that Parliament may determine the salaries of the Supreme Court Judges by law and until it so determines, the salaries of these Judges shall be those as specified in Schedule II.

Art. 221(1) concerning the salaries of the Judges of the High Court has also been amended on similar lines.[61]

The increase in the salaries of the Judges was long over due and the Constitutional Amendment now meets the long felt need.

FIFTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT : 1986

The Constitution (Fifty-fifth Amendment) Act, 1986, has been enacted to confer statehood on Arunachal Pradesh.[62]

Because of the sensitive location of the State, the State Governor has been given special responsibility with respect to law and order in the State. The Amendment adds a new provision, Art. 371-H, to the Constitution. It provides that in the discharge of the special responsibility, the Governor, after consulting the Council of Ministers, ultimately exercises his own individual judgment. If any question arises with respect to a matter whether it is or it is not one falling within the Governor's special responsibility, the decision of the Governor is final. The validity of anything done by him cannot be called in question on the ground that he ought or ought not to have acted in the exercise of his individual judgment.

It is further provided that if the President either on receipt of a report from the Governor or otherwise is satisfied that it is no longer necessary for the Governor to have any such special responsibility with respect to law and order in the State, he may by order direct that the Governor shall cease to have any such responsibility with effect from such date as may be specified by him in the order.

The strength of the State Legislative Assembly has been fixed at a minimum of thirty members.

FIFTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT : 1987

The Constitution (Fifty-sixth Amendment) Act, 1987, inserts a new constitutional provision, Art. 371-I, which contains a special provision regarding the State of Goa. The strength of the Goa State Legislative Assembly has been fixed at a minimum of 30 members.[63]

---

61. Supra, Chs. IV, Sec. B(i) and VIII, Sec. B(l).
62. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. F.
63. Supra, Ch. IX.

FIFTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT : 1987

The Constitution (Fifty-seventh Amendment) Act, 1987, seeks to reserve seats for the Scheduled Tribes in the Legislative Assemblies of the States of Arunachal Pradesh, Meghalaya, Mizoram and Nagaland. This Amendment adds Clause 3A to Art. 332.[64]

The Amendment now provides that in the Legislative Assemblies of these four States, seats shall be reserved for the Scheduled Tribes on the following basis:

(a) if all the seats in the State Legislative Assembly in existence on the date of the coming into force of this Amendment are held by members of the Scheduled Tribes, all the seats except one;

(b) in any other case, such number of seats as bears to the total number of seats, a proportion not less than the number of members belonging to the Scheduled Tribes in the existing Assembly.

It is further clarified that these amendments to Art. 332 shall not affect any representation in any of these Legislative Assemblies until dissolution.

Amendment Fifty-Seventh was enacted to implement the Fifty-first Amendment passed earlier. Amendment Fifty-first could not be fully implemented unless paralled action was taken to determine the seats which were to be reserved for the Scheduled Tribes in these States.

FIFTY-EIGHTH AMENDMENT : 1987

The Constitution (Fifty-eighth Amendment) Act, 1987, has inserted the words "Authoritative Text in Hindi" in the heading of Part XXII. The Amendment adds a new Article 394A, saying that the President shall cause to be published under his authority—

(a) the translation of the Constitution of India in the Hindi language signed by the members of the Constituent Assembly, with such modifications as may be necessary to bring it in conformity with the language, style and terminology adopted in the authoritative texts of Central Acts in the Hindi language, and incorporating therein all the amendments of the Constitution made before such publication; and

(b) the translation in the Hindi language of every constitutional amendment made in the English language.

Cl. (2) of Art. 394A provides that the translation of the Constitution and its amendments as published under cl. (1) shall be construed to have the same meaning as the original thereof and if any difficulty arises in so construing any part of such translation, the President shall cause the same to be revised suitably.

Under cl. (3), the translation of the Constitution and of every amendment thereof published under this Article "shall be deemed to be, for all purposes, the authoritative text thereof in the Hindi language".[65]

---

64. Supra, Ch. IX.
Also see, supra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. C.

65. Supra, Ch. XVI.

The reason for passing this Amendment is as follows: The Constituent Assembly adopted the English text of the Constitution. A Hindi version of the Constitution, signed by the members of the Constituent Assembly was published in 1950 under the authority of the President of the Constituent Assembly. It had become necessary to update this Hindi version of the Constitution by incorporating therein all the subsequent amendments, and to have an authoritative text of the Constitution in Hindi.

This Amendment gives constitutional recognition to the authoritative text of the Constitution in Hindi.

FIFTY-NINTH AMENDMENT : 1988

The principal raison d'etre for enacting the Constitution (Fifty-ninth Amendment) Act, 1988, was to control the terrorist escalation in Punjab. The Amendment made a number of changes in the emergency provisions in the Constitution by introducing Art. 359A in the Constitution. The application of this Article was limited to Punjab.

Art. 359A empowered the President, if satisfied that a grave emergency exists whereby the integrity of India is threatened by internal disturbance in the whole or any part of Punjab, to declare emergency in Punjab.

It may be noted that under the existing Art. 352, an emergency can be declared in India only when there is war, or external aggression or armed rebellion in any part of the country. Thus, Art. 359A brought back the old Art. 352 (as it existed before the 44th Amendment) which authorised declaration of emergency on the ground of internal disturbance; but the old provision was resurrected only in relation to Punjab and not for the rest of India.

Art. 359 was also amended by Art. 359A. The President was authorised, on a proclamation of emergency having been made, by order to declare that the right to move any court for the enforcement of all or any of the Fundamental Rights (except Art. 20),[66] as might be mentioned in the order, would remain suspended. The access to court was thus barred even when the right to life and personal liberty guaranteed by Art. 21 was suspended.

Art. 358 was also amended by Art. 359A. It was now provided that Art. 19 would remain suspended when emergency was declared in Punjab on the ground of internal disturbance.

By a new proviso to Art. 356, the operation of Art. 356(5) was excluded in relation to the proclamation issued on 11th May, 1978, for Presidential take-over of the Punjab Government. Thus, the proclamation could remain in force for three years, as provided for in the first proviso to Art. 356(4), without being controlled by Art. 356(5).[67]

Undoubtedly, Art. 359A brought back the draconian law of emergency in Punjab as it prevailed in India before the 44th Amendment which led to the now infamous case of A.D.M., Jabalpore v. Shivkant Shukla.[68]

---

66. Supra, Chs. XIII and XXXIII, Sec. F.
67. Supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. D; see, 63rd Amendment, Sec. F infra.
68. Supra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.

SIXTIETH AMENDMENT : 1988

The Constitution (Sixtieth Amendment) Act, 1988, amends Art. 276(2) of the Constitution.[69]

The States are now permitted to levy tax on profession, trades or callings and employments up to Rs. 2,500/- instead of Rs. 250/- as hitherto. This is to enable the States to collect more revenue under this head. Also, the maximum ceiling of Rs. 250/- had made the profession tax regressive in effect as even people with high salaries had to pay only Rs. 250/- per annum. The higher ceiling now fixed will enable the States to levy the tax on a progressive basis.

SIXTY-FIRST AMENDMENT : 1988

The Constitution (Sixty-first Amendment) Act, 1988, amends Art. 326 to lower the age for voting in elections to Parliament and State Legislatures from 21 to 18 years.[70]

The Amendment thus makes democracy in India much more pervasive. The present-day youth are literate, enlightened and politically conscious, and the lowering of the voting age enables them to participate in the political process in the country.

SIXTY-SECOND AMENDMENT : 1989

The Constitution (Sixty-second Amendment) Act, 1989, amends Art. 334 and extends reservation of seats for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, and representation of the Anglo-Indian community in Lok Sabha and State Legislative Assemblies by ten more years, i.e., up to January 25, 2000.[71]

SIXTY-THIRD AMENDMENT : 1989

The Constitution (Sixty-third Amendment) Act, 1989, repeals the changes made in Art. 356 by the 59th Constitutional Amendment in relation to Punjab. Thus, the proviso to Art. 356(5) has now been repealed as well as Art. 359A is omitted from the Constitution.

Punjab was thus brought at par with the other States as the Central Government felt that there was no longer any need for any special powers in regard to the proclamation of emergency in Punjab as was envisaged in the 59th Amendment.

SIXTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT : 1990

The Constitution (Sixty-fourth Amendment) Act, 1990, amended Clauses (4) and (5) of Art. 356 so as to enable the Central Government to extend the proclamation of emergency issued for Punjab on May 11, 1987, for some time more.[72]

---

69. Supra, Ch. XI, Sec. D.
70. For Art. 326, see, supra, Ch. XIX, Sec. B.
71. For Art. 334, see, supra, Chs. II, VI and XXXV.
Also see, Forty-fifth Amendment, 1980, supra.
72. For Art. 356, see, supra, Ch. XIII, Sec. D.

Ordinarily, the proclamation would have come to an end in three years, i.e, May 10, 1990. But the Central Government took the view that the conditions in Punjab were not conducive to holding elections to the State Legislative Assembly. Consequently, in Art. 356(4), after the second proviso, another proviso was added making it possible to keep the said proclamation in force in Punjab for three years and six months instead of three years as provided for in the second proviso for all other States. In Art. 356(5), a proviso was added to exclude the operation of cl. 5 in relation to the proclamation mentioned above in relation to Punjab.

By the Sixty-seventh Amendment enacted in 1990, the period of three and half years was increased to four years for the validity of the same proclamation. The reason was that the situation in Punjab was still not conducive to revoking the proclamation and holding free and peaceful elections in the State.

SIXTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT : 1990

This Amendment enlarges the scope of Art. 338 which deals with constitutional safeguards for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.[73]

Prior to this Amendment, Art. 338 provided for the appointment of a Special Officer for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes to investigate all matters in relation to safeguards provided for these sections of the population. It was felt that instead of the Special Officer, a more effective arrangement for the purpose would be to have a high level multi-member Commission to guarantee constitutional safeguards for these people. Accordingly, Art. 338 has been amended to provide for the appointment of a Commission consisting of a chairperson, vice-chairperson and five other members. Subject to any law made by Parliament, the conditions of service and tenure of office of these persons will be determined by rules made by the President of India.

The Commission shall investigate all matters relating to the safeguards provided for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, and also inquire into specific complaints with respect to deprivation of any rights and safeguards to these people, etc.

The Commission is to make recommendations as to the measures to be taken by the various Governments for the effective implementation of these safeguards and other measures for the protection, welfare and socio economic development of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.

The Commission is to make an annual report to the President. It can also make a report as and when it thinks necessary. These reports are to be placed before each House of Parliament along with a memorandum by the Government as to the action taken or proposed to be taken on the recommendations made by the Commission.

Any report of the Commission pertaining to a State Government is to be forwarded to the State Governor and is to be placed before the State Legislature with a Government memorandum explaining the action taken or proposed to be taken on these recommendations.

---

73. Supra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. G(a).

The Commission has been given power of a civil court to summon witnesses etc., while investigating any matter as mentioned above.

SIXTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT : 1990

The Constitution (Sixty-sixth Amendment) Act, 1990, was enacted to put a number of statutes passed by the State Legislatures, mostly in relation to land reforms, in the IX Schedule.[74]

The total number of statutes now included in this Schedule stands at 257. All these statutes stand immunized from being challenged on the ground of infringement of any Fundamental Right.

SIXTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT : 1990

See above under the 64th Amendment. The Constitution (Sixty-seventh Amendment) Act was enacted in 1990 in relation to Punjab as stated above.

SIXTY-EIGHTH AMENDMENT : 1991

The Constitution (Sixty-eighth Amendment) Act, 1991, was enacted to keep in force the proclamation issued under Art. 356 in relation to Punjab on May 11, 1987, and which was due to end on May, 1991, under Amendment 67th, for sometime more beyond four years as had been provided by the 67th Amendment as stated above. The terrorist violence was still continuing in Punjab, and free, fair and peaceful elections to the Punjab Legislature were not yet possible.

Accordingly, Art. 356(4) was again amended to keep the said proclamation in force for five years from the date of its issue, i.e., until May 10, 1992.

SIXTY-NINTH AMENDMENT : 1991

The Constitution (Sixty-ninth Amendment) Act, 1991, has added two Articles to the Constitution, viz., 239AA and 239AB after Art. 239A. The purpose of the Amendment is to give a special status to the National Capital of Delhi—a Union Territory.[75]

According to Art. 239AA, the Union Territory of Delhi is henceforth to be called as the National Capital Territory (NCT). The Administrator of the Territory is to be designated as the Lt. Governor. There shall be a Legislative Assembly for the NCT, the members of which are to be elected directly by the people from territorial constituencies.

Barring a few entries, the Legislature shall have power to make laws with respect to all matters enumerated in the State and the Concurrent Lists.[76] But this is not to derogate from the powers of Parliament to make a law with respect to any matter for a Union Territory. In case of repugnancy between a Central law and a law made by the Legislative Assembly, the former shall prevail.

There shall also be a Council of Ministers but in case of difference of opinion between the Lt. Governor and the Ministers, the matter is to be referred to the Presi-

---

74. See, supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C, for the Ninth Schedule.
75. See, Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. A(f).
76. Supra, Ch. X, Secs. D and E.

dent. The Chief Minister and other Ministers are to be appointed by the President and are to hold office during the pleasure of the President. The Council of Ministers is to be collectively responsible to the Assembly.

According to Art. 239AB, in case of breakdown of the constitutional machinery in the NCT, the President may suspend the operation of any or all provisions of Art. 239AA.

SEVENTIETH AMENDMENT : 1992

The Constitution (Seventieth Amendment) Act, 1992, provides for the inclusion of the members of the Legislatures of National Capital Territory and the Union Territory of Pondicherry in the electoral college for the election of the President.[77]

Hitherto, Art. 54 provided for an electoral college for election of the President consisting only of the elected members of Parliament as well as of the State Legislative Assemblies and not of the Union Territories. To this effect, Art. 54 has been suitably amended.

Also, according to newly added Art. 239AA,[78] Parliament has to make provisions for giving effect to the provisions of Art. 239AA regarding the establishment of a democratic system in the National Capital Territory. It is now clarified that any law made by Parliament for the purpose would not be treated as an amendment of the Constitution for the purpose of Art. 368.[79]

SEVENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT : 1992

The Constitution (Seventy-first Amendment) Act, 1992, adds Konkani, Manipuri and Nepali to the list of languages in the VIII Schedule.[80]

SEVENTY-SECOND AMENDMENT : 1992

The Constitution (Seventy-second Amendment) Act, 1992, has been enacted to provide for reservation of seats for Scheduled Tribes in the Legislative Assembly of Tripura.[81]

The constitutional validity of the Constitutional Amendment has been upheld by the Supreme Court in Subrata Acharjee v. Union of India.[82]

SEVENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT : 1993

The Constitution (Seventy-third Amendment) Act, 1992, came into effect after having been passed by both Houses of Parliament and ratified by the State Legislatures as required by Art. 368.[83]

---

77. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i)(a).
78. See 69th Amendment, supra.
79. For Art. 368, see, supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. C.
80. Supra, Ch. XVI, Sec. E.
81. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. G.
82. (2002) 2 SCC 725.
See, supra, Ch. IX, Sec. G, for details.
83. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. C.

The main feature of the Amendment is to introduce panchayat system at the grass roots level. Hitherto, the panchayat system had been based purely on State Legislation and its functioning had been very sporadic. The Amendment seeks to strengthen the panchayat system by giving it a constitutional base.

A new Part, Part IX, has been added to the Constitution consisting of Arts. 243 to 243-O. A new Schedule, viz. Eleventh Schedule, has also been added. Panchayats are proposed to be established at the village, intermediate and district levels and will be directly elected by electorate from territorial constituencies in the respective panchayat area. The detailed provisions are to be made by the States subject to the constitutional provisions contained in Part IX.

The underlying idea is to make panchayats as vibrant units of local administration in the rural area. The Amendment is regarded as historic as it is designed to establish strong, effective and democratic local administration which may lead to rapid implementation of rural development programmes.[84]

The Amendment has been passed in pursuance of the Directive Principle contained in Art. 40, which lays down that the State shall take steps to organise village panchayats and endow them with such powers as may enable them to function as units of self-government.[85]

Following its earlier decision[86] it has been held that Part IX of the Constitution or Article 243 makes no change in the essential feature of the Panchayat Organization. It was pointed out that what was sought to be done by the Seventy-third Amendment which inserted Part IX was to confer constitutional status on District Panchayat, Taluka Panchayat and Village Panchayats as instruments of local self government.[87]

In Kishan Singh[88] a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court considered object and purpose of insertion of Part IXA in the Constitution. It noted that the object of introducing part IXA was the improper working of the local bodies in many states, timely election not being held and nominated bodies were continued for long period, elected bodies had been superseded or suspended without adequate justification. The insertions was made with a view to restore rightful place of the local bodies in political governance. The considerations made it necessary to provide a constitutional status to such bodies and to ensure regular and fair Conduct of elections.[89]

SEVENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT : 1992

The Constitution (Seventy-fourth Amendment) Act, 1992, seeks to strengthen the system of municipal bodies in the urban areas. The idea is to place the local self-government in urban areas on a sound and effective footing. Both this and the Seventy-third Amendments represent measures for decentralization of power and greater participation of people in self-rule.

A nagar panchayat is to be established in a place in transition from rural to urban area. A municipal council is to be established for a smaller urban area and a municipal corporation for a larger urban area.

---

84. Supra, Ch. IX, Sec. H.
85. Supra, Ch. XXXIV, Sec. C(k).
86. Kishansingh Tomar v. Municipal Corporation of City of Ahmedabad, (2006) 8 SCC 352 : AIR 2007 SC 269.
87. Gujarat Pradesh Panchayat Parishadn v. State of Gujarat, (2007) 7 SCC 718 : (2007) 9 JT 503.
88. (2006) 8 SCC 352 : AIR 2007 SC 269.
89. Gujarat Pradesh Panchayat Parishad v. State of Gujarat, (2007) 7 SCC 718 : (2007) 9 JT 503.

These bodies are to be directly elected. The Amendment adds a new Part IXA to the Constitution after Part IX. Part IXA contains Arts. 243P to 243ZG. A new Schedule XII is also added to the Constitution. This Schedule lists the functions which a State Legislature may by law assign to the municipalities.

Provision is also made for the appointment of a finance commission by a State to review the financial position of the municipalities and to recommend division of financial resources between the States and the municipalities within the State.

Hitherto, the institution of municipal bodies has not been functioning very effectively in the States. The 74th Constitutional Amendment seeks to make these institutions as effective instruments of administration.[90] Art. 243 (q) cannot be applied where the area of one description (such as Municipal Council) is converted into an area of another description (such as Municipal Corporation).[91]

Both the 73rd and 74th Amendments seek to decentralise decision-making power from top to bottom and thus strengthen democracy at the grass roots level. The Supreme Court had the occasion to consider the 74th amendment in a case from Haryana. The Haryana Municipal Act, 1973 faithfully adopted the constitutional mandate enshrined in Part IX-A, for carrying out the purpose of the Constitution (Seventy-fourth Amendment) Act, 1992. The Rules there-under were made for carrying out the purposes of the enactment and the purpose of the Act was to ensure that at least minimum number of persons belonging to the specified categories got elected. Accordingly, Part IX-A came to be inserted by the Constitution (Seventy-fourth Amendment) Act, 1992 w.e.f. 1-6-1993. It specifically provides for devolution by the State Legislature of powers and responsibilities upon municipalities with respect to preparation of plans for economic development and social justice, and for the implementation of development schemes as may be required to enable them to function as institutions of self-government. It was felt that economic development and implementation of schemes securing social justice may not be possible without providing for adequate representation to the weaker sections of the society. Its paramount objective was to empower the vulnerable sections of the society who were hitherto precluded from participating in the local self-government institutions for various historical reasons due to which the constitutional objective of securing social justice remained unfulfilled.[92]

SEVENTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT : 1994

The Constitution (Seventy-fifth Amendment) Act, 1994, sought to amend Art. 323B. The Amendment introduces sub-clauses (h), (i) and (j) in cl. (2) of Art. 323B. Thus, the Legislature has been authorised to set up tribunals for deciding disputes relating to—

(h) rent, its regulation and control and tenancy issues including the right, title and interest of landlords and tenants;

(i) offences against laws with respect to any of the matters specified in sub-clauses (a) to (h) and fees in respect of any of those matters.

(j) any matter incidental to any of the matters specified in sub-clauses (a) to (i).

---

90. See, Ch. IX, Sec. I, supra.
91. State of Maharashtra v. Jalgaon Municipal Council, (2003) 9 SCC 731 : AIR 2003 SC 1659.
92. Bihari Lal Rada v. Anil Jain (Tinu), (2009) 4 SCC 1 : (2009) 2 JT 455.

An avowed objective underlying the Amendment is to expedite decision of cases relating to rent control legislation.[93]

SEVENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT : 1994

The Constitution (Seventy-sixth Amendment) Act, 1994, added the Tamil Nadu Backward Classes, Scheduled Castes, and Scheduled Tribes (Reservation of Seats in Educational Institutions and or appointments or posts in Services under the State) Act, 1993, enacted by the Tamil Nadu Legislature, to the IX Schedule so as to give protection to the State Act under Art. 31B.[94]

This followed the decision of the Supreme Court in Indra Sawhney case fixing total reservations under Art. 16(4) to not more than 50%. The State forwarded the Act to the Centre under Art. 31C.[95]

SEVENTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT : 1995

In Indra Sawhney v. Union of India,[96] the Supreme Court interpreting Art. 16 ruled that the word 'employment' would not include 'promotion' and reservation in promotion upheld in Rangachari[97] and followed in other subsequent cases was not valid. Reservation in promotion was declared unconstitutional and those cases were thus overruled. The Court, however, made the suggestion to enact a suitable law. Accordingly, the Constitution (77th Amendment) Act, 1995, has been enacted.

The Amendment introduces Art. 16(4A). This Article expressly empowers the state to make any provision for reservation in matters of promotion in any class or classes of posts in the service under the state in favour of S/Cs and S/Ts which, in the opinion of the state, are not adequately represented in the services under the state.[98]

SEVENTY-EIGHTH AMENDMENT : 1995

The Constitution (Seventy-eight Amendment) Act, 1995, adds a few State Acts to the IX Schedule.[99] To day the Schedule contains 284 statutes.

SEVENTY-NINTH AMENDMENT : 1999

The Constitution (Seventy-ninth Amendment) Act, 1999, has come into force on the 25th January, 2000.

By virtue of this Amendment, reservation of seats and special representation for S/Ts and S/Cs in the House of People and State Legislative Assemblies have been extended for another 10 years. Thus, the words "fifty years" used in Art. 334 have been changed to 'sixty years' from the commencement of the Constitution.

---

93. For detailed discussion on Art. 323B, see, supra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.
94. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C.
95. For discussion on these various constitutional provisions and Indra Sawhney, see, supra, Chs. XXIII, Sec. G, XXXII, Sec. D and XXXV.
96. Supra, Chs. XXIII, Secs. G and H and XXXV.
97. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. D(c).
98. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. H.
Also see, Ch. XXXV, supra.
99. For discussion on the IX Schedule, see, supra, Chs. XXXII, Sec. C and XLI, Sec. E(b).
Also see, the Amendments adding State statues to the IX Schedule.

Similarly the representation of the Anglo-Indian community in the Lok Sabha and in the Legislative Assemblies of the States by nomination has been extended for another ten years.[1]

These reservations would not now end on January 25, 2001, but would now last upto January 25, 2011.[2]

EIGHTIETH AMENDMENT : 2000

The Constitution (Eightieth Amendment) Act, 2000, seeks to restructure the financial relationship between the Centre and the States following the recommendations of the Finance Commission.[3]

In the first place, Art. 269 has been amended. Clauses (1) and (2) thereof have been substituted by new clauses, the purport of these clauses being to—

(1) empower the Centre to levy taxes on the sale or purchase of goods in inter-State trade or commerce and on the consignment of goods in inter-State trade or commerce;

(2) to assign the revenue arising from these taxes to the States after 1st April, 1996.

The principles for distribution of the revenue among the States are to be formulated by Parliament.

In the second place, Art. 270 has been replaced by a new Article with effect from 1st April, 1996. The new Article seeks to achieve the following:

(1) A percentage of all Central taxes and duties shall be distributed among the States.

(2) The following levies are exempted from the divisible pool—

(a) Duties and taxes referred to in Arts. 268 and 269;

(b) surcharge on taxes and duties referred to in Art. 271; and

(c) any cess levied for specific purposes under any law made by Parliament.

(3) The percentage, manner and form of distribution are to be prescribed by the President after considering the recommendations of the Finance Commission.[4]

(4) Art. 272 has been omitted.[5]

EIGHTY-FIRST AMENDMENT : 2000

The Constitution (Eighty-first Amendment) Act, 2000, adds the following clause as cl. (4B) after cl. (4A) in Art. 16:

> "(4B) Nothing in this article shall prevent the State from considering any unfilled vacancies of a year which are reserved for being filled up in that year in accordance with any provision for reservation made under cl. (4) or clause

---

1. See, supra, Chs. II, VI and XXXV, Sec. D.
2. Ibid.
3. For discussion on Centre-State Financial Relationship, see, supra, Ch. XI, Sec. K(i)(c).
4. For Finance Commission, see, supra, Chs. XI, Sec. L and XIV, Sec. G.
5. The genesis and effect of this Amendment have been discussed earlier, see, supra, Ch. XI, Sec. K(c).

(4A) as a separate class of vacancies to be filled up in any succeeding year or years and each class of vacancies shall not be considered together with the vacancies of the year in which they are being filled up for determining the ceiling of fifty per cent reservation on total number of vacancies of that year."[6]

EIGHTY-SECOND AMENDMENT : 2000

The Constitution (Eighty-second Amendment) Act, 2000, adds a proviso to Art. 335.

According to the newly added proviso, it becomes possible for the government to make any provision in favour of S/Cs and S/Ts for relaxation in qualifying marks in any examination or lowering the standards of evaluation, for reservation in matters of promotion to any class or classes of services or posts in connection with the affairs of the Union or of a State.[7]

EIGHTY-THIRD AMENDMENT : 2000

The Constitution (Eighty-third Amendment) Act, 2000, adds the following clause after Art. 243M(3):

> "(3A) Nothing in article 243D, relating to reservation of seats for the Scheduled Castes, shall apply to the State of Arunachal Pradesh."[8]

EIGHTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT : 2001

The Constitution originally envisaged allocation of seats in Lok Sabha for the States on population basis as ascertained at the census after every ten years. [Arts. 81 and 82]. The Forty-second Amendment in 1976 made a change in this scheme, viz. No fresh adjustment of seats in Lok Sabha as fixed on the basis of the Census figures of 1971 was to be made till after the year 2001. This meant that the number of seats for each State of Lok Sabha fixed on the basis of the Census of 1971 was frozen till 2001. By the Eighty-fourth Amendment of the Constitution 2001, this freeze is to last till 2026. No change in the number of seats for each State in Lok Sabha is to be made till after the first Census held after 2026.

The underlying reason for this provision made by the 83rd Amendment is this: some States have implemented the family planning programme more vigorously than others. Accordingly, the population in these States has stabilised while in the other States the population has increased. If now seats in Lok Sabha were to be reallocated among the States on population basis, the States implementing the family planning programme would lose some seats. This may cause set back to the family control programme. Hence it has been decided to extend the freeze on Lok Sabha seats till the year 2026 as a motivational measure to enable the State Governments to pursue the programme of population stabilisation.[9]

---

6. For discussion on Art. 16(4B), see, supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. H(c).
7. For discussion on the implications of this Amendment, see, supra, Chs. XXIII, Sec. H(b) and XXXV, Sec. C(c).
8. For discussion on these various Articles, see, supra, Ch. IX, Sec. F.
9. See, Ch. II, Sec. C, supra.

But, the readjustment of territorial constituencies within a State for purposes of election to Lok Sabha is a different matter. This has to be undertaken by the Delimitation Commission on the basis of population figures of the Census of 1991. [see, Art. 81 Proviso; Art. 82 Proviso]

The Eighty-fourth Amendment also effects some changes in Art. 170 dealing with the composition of the State Legislative Assemblies. Art. 81 has been amended so as to provide that each State is to be divided into territorial constituencies for election to the State Legislature on the basis of the population figures of the 1991 Census. This arrangement would continue until the Census is held after the year 2026.[10]

Arts. 330 and 332 has been amended so as to provide that the number of seats reserved for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes in Lok Sabha and in each State Legislative Assembly has to be fixed on the basis of the 1991 Census figures and that no change is to be effectuated therein till the Census is taken after the year 2026.[11]

EIGHTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT : 2001

The Constitution (Eighty-fifth Amendment) Act, 2001, modifies Cl. 4A of Art. 16. It now reads as follows:

> "Nothing in this article shall prevent the State from making any provision for reservation in matters of promotion with consequential seniority of any class or classes of posts in the services of the State in favour of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes which in the opinion of the State are not adequately represented in the services under the State."[12]

Clause 4A in Art. 16 was introduced in the Constitution by the 77th Amendment. Now the words italicized have been introduced by the 85th Amendment. In effect, the purport of both the Amendments is to undo the effect of the rulings of the Supreme Court in Indra Sawhney and later cases on the question of reservations in promotions and the seniority of the promotees on the basis of reservation.[13]

EIGHTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT : 2002

The Constitution (Eighty-sixth Amendment Act 2002) inserted three amendments to provide for the education and welfare of children.

First, Article 21A casts obligation upon the State to provide free and compulsory education to all children of the age of 6 to 14 years in such manner as the State may, by law, determine. This amendment was inspired by the Directive Principles contained in Article 45 of the Constitution which provided that the "State shall endeavour to provide childhood care and education for all children until they complete the age of 6 years". To achieve this objective in

---

10. Ch. VI, Sec. B(ii), supra.
11. Ch. XXXV, Secs. B and C, supra.
12. Supra, Ch. XXIII, Sec. H(a).
13. For discussion on this aspect, see, Ch. XXIII, Sec. G, supra.

the Directive Principles the statement of objects and reasons of this amendment acknowledge that in spite of strenuous efforts made to fulfill this objective, the ultimate goal of providing universal and quality education remain unfulfilled. The amendment bill was introduced in Parliament in 1997. It was scrutinized by the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Human Resources Development and this subject was also dealt with by the Law Commission of India (165th Report).

Secondly, the 86th amendment also substituted a new article for Article 45 which provides that the State shall endeavour to provide early childhood care and education for all children until they complete the age of 6 years.

Thirdly, the amendment also added a further clause in Article 51A which enjoins a parent or guardian to provide opportunities for education to his child or, as the case may be, ward between the age of 6 and 14 years.

The 86th amendment received the assent of the President on 12th December, 2002 and was published in the gazette of India dated 13th December, 2002.

THE CONSTITUTION (EIGHTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT) ACT, 2003

An Act to amend the Constitution of India

Be it enacted by Parliament in the Fifty-fourth Year of the Republic of India as follows:—

S. 1. Short title.—This Act may be called the Constitution (Eighty-seventh Amendment) Act, 2003.

S. 2. Amendment of Article 81.—In article 81 of the Constitution, in clause (3), in the proviso, in clause (ii), for the figures "1991", the figures "2001" shall be substituted.

S. 3. Amendment of Article 82.—In article 82 of the Constitution, in the third proviso, in clause (ii), for the figures "1991", the figures "2001" shall be substituted.

S. 4. Amendment of Article 170.—In article 170 of the Constitution,—

(i) in clause (2), in the Explanation, in the proviso, for the figures "1991", the figures "2001" shall be substituted;

(ii) in clause (3), in the third proviso, in clause (ii), for the figures "1991", the figures "2001" shall be substituted.

S. 5. Amendment of Article 330.—In article 330 of the Constitution, in the Explanation, in the proviso, for the figures "1991", the figures "2001" shall be substituted.

THE CONSTITUTION (EIGHTY-EIGHTH AMENDMENT) ACT, 2003

[15th January, 2004]

An Act further to amend the Constitution of India.

BE it enacted by Parliament in the Fifty-fourth Year of the Republic of India as follows:—

S. 1. Short Title and Commencement.—(1) This Act may be called the Constitution (Eighty-eighth Amendment) Act, 2003.

(2) It shall come into force on such date as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint.

S. 2. Insertion of new Article 268A.—After article 268 of the Constitution, the following article shall be inserted, namely:—

"268A. Service tax levied by Union and collected and appropriated by the Union and the States.—(1) Taxes on services shall be levied by the Government of India and such tax shall be collected and appropriated by the Government of India and the States in the manner provided in clause (2).

(2) The proceeds in any financial year of any such tax levied in accordance with the provisions of clause (1) shall be—

(a) collected by the Government of India and the States;

(b) appropriated by the Government of India and the States, in accordance with such principles of collection and appropriation as may be formulated by Parliament by law".

S. 3. Amendment of Article 270.—In article 270 of the Constitution, in clause (1), for the words and figures "articles 268 and 269", the words, figures and letter "articles 268, 268A and 269" shall be substituted.

S. 4. Amendment of Seventh Schedule.—In the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution, in List I—Union List, after entry 92B, the following entry shall be inserted, namely:—

"92C. Taxes on services.".

NOTES

The Constitution (88th Amendment of 2003) was made after extensive study and consultation between the Central Government and the States. The purpose was to give effect to the unanimous decision of the States to replace their existing sales tax system with the system of Value Added Tax (VAT) from 1st April, 2003. The States, with a view to widening their tax base, suggested that they should be enabled to collect the appropriate tax on services. Tax on services was not a specific legislative field in the 7th Schedule—although the Parliament took recourse to the residual field in Entry 97 and periodical tax on certain services. Parliament was of the view that the 88th amendment would pave the way for eventual inclusion of services within the purview of State level VAT. To give effect to this felt necessity the 88th amendment inserted Article 268A as above and also the 7th Schedule by providing that after 92B, the following entry shall be inserted viz.—"92C: Taxes on services". It will be noticed that Article 268A empowered the Government of India to levy such tax but to collect and appropriate by the Government of India and the States in the manner provided.

THE CONSTITUTION (EIGHTY-NINTH AMENDMENT) ACT, 2003

[28th September, 2003]

An Act further to amend the Constitution of India.

BE it enacted by Parliament in the Fifty-fourth Year of the Republic of India as follows:—

S. 1. Short title and commencement.—(1) This Act may be called the Constitution (Eighty-ninth Amendment) Act, 2003.

(2) It shall come into force on such date as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint.

S. 2. Amendment of article 338.—In article 338 of the Constitution,—

(a) for the marginal heading, the following marginal heading shall be substituted, namely:—

"National Commission for Scheduled Castes.";

(b) for clauses (1) and (2), the following clauses shall be substituted, namely :—

"(1) There shall be a Commission for the Scheduled Castes to be known as the National Commission for the Scheduled Castes.

(2) Subject to the provisions of any law made in this behalf by Parliament, the Commission shall consist of a Chairperson, Vice-Chairperson and three other Members and the conditions of service and tenure of office of the Chairperson, Vice-Chairperson and other Members so appointed shall be such as the President may by rule determine.";

(c) in clauses (5), (9) and (10), the words "and Scheduled Tribes" wherever they occur, shall be omitted.

S. 3. Insertion of new Article 338A.—After article 338 of the Constitution, the following article shall be inserted, namely:—

"338A. National Commission for Scheduled Tribes.—(1) There shall be a Commission for the Scheduled Tribes to be known as the National Commission for the Scheduled Tribes.

(2) Subject to the provisions of any law made in this behalf by Parliament, the Commission shall consist of a Chairperson, Vice-Chairperson and three other Members and the conditions of service and tenure of office of the Chairperson, Vice-Chairperson and other Members so appointed shall be such as the President may by rule determine.

(3) The Chairperson, Vice-Chairperson and other Members of the Commission shall be appointed by the President by warrant under his hand and seal.

(4) The Commission shall have the power to regulate its own procedure.

(5) It shall be the duty of the Commission—

(a) to investigate and monitor all matters relating to the safeguards provided for the Scheduled Tribes under this Constitution or under any other law for the time being in force or under any order of the Government and to evaluate the working of such safeguards;

(b) to inquire into specific complaints with respect to the deprivation of rights and safeguards of the Scheduled Tribes;

(c) to participate and advise on the planning process of socio-economic development of the Scheduled Tribes and to evaluate the progress of their development under the Union and any State;

(d) to present to the President, annually and at such other times as the Commission may deem fit, reports upon the working of those safeguards;

(e) to make in such reports recommendations as to the measures that should be taken by the Union or any State for the effective implementation of those safeguards and other measures for the protection, welfare and socio-economic development of the Scheduled Tribes; and

(f) to discharge such other functions in relation to the protection, welfare and development and advancement of the Scheduled Tribes as the President may, subject to the provisions of any law made by Parliament, by rule specify.

(6) The President shall cause all such reports to be laid before each House of Parliament along with a memorandum explaining the action taken or proposed to be taken on the recommendations relating to the Union and the reasons for the non-acceptance, if any, of any of such recommendations.

(7) Where any such report, or any part thereof, relates to any matter with which any State Government is concerned, a copy of such report shall be forwarded to the Governor of the State who shall cause it to be laid before the Legislature of the State along with a memorandum explaining the action taken or proposed to be taken on the recommendations relating to the State and the reasons for the non-acceptance, if any, of any of such recommendations.

(8) The Commission shall, while investigating any matter referred to in sub-clause (a) or inquiring into any complaint referred to in sub-clause (b) of clause (5), have all the powers of a civil court trying a suit and in particular in respect of the following matters, namely:—

(a) summoning and enforcing the attendance of any person from any part of India and examining him on oath;

(b) requiring the discovery and production of any document;

(c) receiving evidence on affidavits;

(d) requisitioning any public record or copy thereof from any court or office;

(e) issuing commissions for the examination of witnesses and documents;

(f) any other matter which the President may, by rule, determine.

(9) The Union and every State Government shall consult the Commission on all major policy matters affecting Scheduled Tribes.".

NOTES

The 89th amendment of 2003 deals with the establishment and constitution of a commission for the Scheduled Castes to be known as "The National Commission for Scheduled Castes as well as a National Commission for Scheduled Tribes". Article 338A enumerates the duties of the Commission and among the most important being its duty to investigate and monitor all matters relating to the safeguarding of the Constitutional provisions or the Statutory provisions relating to such safeguarding and to evaluate the working of such safeguards and to inquire into specific complaints with respect to the deprivation of rights and safeguards of the Scheduled Tribes.

CONSTITUTION (NINETIETH AMENDMENT) ACT, 2003

[28th September, 2003]

An Act further to amend the Constitution of India.

BE it enacted by Parliament in the Fifty-fourth Year of the Republic of India as follows:—

S. 1. Short title.—This Act may be called the Constitution (Ninetieth Amend-ment) Act, 2003.

S. 2. Amendment of article 332.—In Article 332 of the Constitution, in clause (6), the following proviso shall be inserted, namely:—

"Provided that for elections to the Legislative Assembly of the State of Assam, the representation of the Scheduled Tribes and non-Scheduled Tribes in the constituencies included in the Bodoland Territorial Areas District, so notified, and existing prior to the constitution of the Bodoland Territorial Areas District, shall be maintained.".

CONSTITUTION (NINETY-FIRST AMENDMENT) ACT, 2003

[1st January, 2004]

An Act further to amend the Constitution of India.

BE it enacted by Parliament in the Fifty-fourth Year of the Republic of India as follows:—

S. 1. Short title.—This Act may be called the Constitution (Ninety-first Amendment) Act, 2003.

S. 2. Amendment of Article 75.—In article 75 of the Constitution, after clause (1), the following clauses shall be inserted, namely:—

"(1A) The total number of Ministers, including the Prime Minister, in the Council of Ministers shall not exceed fifteen per cent. of the total number of members of the House of the People.

(1B) A member of either House of Parliament belonging to any political party who is disqualified for being a member of that House under paragraph 2 of the Tenth Schedule shall also be disqualified to be appointed as a Minister under clause (1) for duration of the period commencing from the date of his disqualification till the date on which the term of his office as such member would expire or where he contests any election to either House of Parliament before the expiry of such period, till the date on which he is declared elected, whichever is earlier.".

S. 3. Amendment of Article 164.—In article 164 of the Constitution, after clause (1), the following clauses shall be inserted, namely:—

"(1A) The total number of Ministers, including the Chief Minister, in the Council of Ministers in a State shall not exceed fifteen per cent. of the total number of members of the Legislative Assembly of that State:

Provided that the number of Ministers, including the Chief Minister, in a State shall not be less than twelve:

Provided further that where the total number of Ministers, including the Chief Minister, in the Council of Ministers in any State at the commencement of the Constitution (Ninety-first Amendment) Act, 2003 exceeds the said fifteen per cent. or the number specified in the first proviso, as the case may be, then, the total number of Ministers in that State shall be brought in conformity with the provisions of this clause within six months from such date as the President may by public notification appoint.

(1B) A member of the Legislative Assembly of a State or either House of the Legislature of a State having Legislative Council belonging to any political party who is disqualified for being a member of that House under paragraph 2 of the Tenth Schedule shall also be disqualified to be appointed as a Minister under clause (1) for duration of the period commencing from the date of his disqualification till the date on which the term of his office as such member would expire or where he contests any election to the Legislative Assembly of a State or either House of the Legislature of a State having Legislative Council, as the case may be, before the expiry of such period, till the date on which he is declared elected, whichever is earlier.".

S. 4. Insertion of new Article 361B.—After article 361A of the Constitution, the following article shall be inserted, namely:—

'361B. Disqualification for appointment on remunerative political post. A member of a House belonging to any political party who is disqualified for being a member of the House under paragraph 2 of the Tenth Schedule shall also be disqualified to hold any remunerative political post for duration of the period commencing from the date of his disqualification till the date on which the term of his office as such member would expire or till the date on which he contests an election to a House and is declared elected, whichever is earlier.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this article,—

(a) the expression "House" has the meaning assigned to it in clause (a) of paragraph 1 of the Tenth Schedule;

(b) the expression "remunerative political post" means any office—

(i) under the Government of India or the Government of a State where the salary or remuneration for such office is paid out of the public revenue of the Government of India or the Government of the State, as the case may be; or

(ii) under a body, whether incorporated or not, which is wholly or partially owned by the Government of India or the Government of a State and the salary or remuneration for such office is paid by such body, except where such salary or remuneration paid is compensatory in nature.'.

S. 5. Amendment of the Tenth Schedule.—In the Tenth Schedule to the Constitution,—

(a) in paragraph 1, in clause (b), the words and figure "paragraph 3 or, as the case may be," shall be omitted;

(b) in paragraph 2, in sub-paragraph (1), for the words and figures "paragraphs 3, 4 and 5", the words and figures "paragraphs 4 and 5" shall be substituted;

(c) paragraph 3 shall be omitted.

NOTES

The 10th Schedule of the Constitution (commonly known as Anti-Defection Law) came in for intensive criticism to the effect that although the Schedule contained provisions for individual defections as illegal, it did not do so in the case of bulk defections. It was also noticed that there were abnormally larger Councils of Ministers being constituted by various governments at the Centre as well as the States. The amendment addressed the problem in relation to the 10th Schedule by inserting Article 361B dealing with the problem of the 10th Schedule and also amending articles 75 and 164 by restricting the sizes of the Councils of Ministers both at the Central and State levels respectively.

CONSTITUTION (NINETY-SECOND AMENDMENT) ACT, 2003

[7th January, 2004]

An Act further to amend the Constitution of India.

BE it enacted by Parliament in the Fifty-fourth Year of the Republic of India as follows:—

S. 1. Short title.—This Act may be called the Constitution (Ninety-second Amendment) Act, 2003

S. 2. Amendment of Eighth Schedule.—In the Eighth Schedule to the Constitution,—

(a) existing entry 3 shall be re-numbered as entry 5, and before entry 5 as so re-numbered, the following entries shall be inserted, namely:—

"3. Bodo.

4. Dogri.";

(b) existing entries 4 to 7 shall respectively be re-numbered as entries 6 to 9;

(c) existing entry 8 shall be re-numbered as entry 11 and before entry 11 as so renumbered, the following entry shall be inserted, namely:—

"10. Maithili.";

(d) existing entries 9 to 14 shall respectively be re-numbered as entries 12 to 17;

(e) existing entry 15 shall be re-numbered as entry 19 and before entry 19 as so renumbered, the following entry shall be inserted, namely:—

"18. Santhali.";

(f) existing entries 16 to 18 shall respectively be re-numbered as entries 20 to 22.

CONSTITUTION (NINETY-THIRD AMENDMENT) ACT, 2005

[20, Januanry 2006]

An Act further to amend the Constitution of India.

BE it enacted by Parliament in the Fifty-sixth Year of the Republic of India as follows:—

S. 1. Short title and commencement.—(1) This Act may be called the Constitution (Ninety-third Amendment) Act, 2005.

(2) It shall come into force on such date as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint.

S. 2. Amendment of article 15.—In article 15 of the Constitution, after clause (4), the following clause shall be inserted, namely:—

"(5) Nothing in this article or in sub-clause (g) of clause (1) of article 19 shall prevent the State from making any special provision, by law, for the advancement of any socially and educationally backward classes of citizens or for the Scheduled Castes or the Scheduled Tribes in so far as such special provisions relate to their admission to educational institutions including private educational institutions, whether aided or unaided by the State, other than the minority educational institutions referred to in clause (1) of article 30.".

CONSTITUTION (NINETY-FOURTH AMENDMENT) ACT, 2006

[12th June, 2006]

An Act further to amend the Constitution of India.

BE it enacted by Parliament in the Fifty-seventh Year of the Republic of India as follows:—

S. 1. Short title.—This Act may be called the Constitution (Ninety-fourth Amendment) Act, 2006.

S. 2. Amendment of article 164.—In article 164 of the Constitution, in clause (1), in the proviso, for the word "Bihar", the words "Chhattisgarh, Jharkhand" shall be substituted.

NOTES

The 90th (2003), 92nd (2003), 93rd (2005) and 94th (2006) amendments speak for themselves and no separate commentary is called for.

CHAPTER XLIIA

CONCLUDING REMARKS

SYNOPSIS

Some of the Constitutional Amendments have been of minor significance.[1] Some of the amendments have been rather major and of an omnibus character, as one amending Act may make a number of changes in a large number of constitutional provisions. As for example, the 7th Amendment, the 42nd Amendment and the 44th Amendment affected several provisions of the Constitution rather drastically.

The cumulative general effect of the various amendments of the Constitution has mainly been:

(1) to restrict the scope and ambit of some of the Fundamental Rights, particularly, the right to property;[2]

(2) to give greater safeguards to the Minorities and Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes;[3]

(3) to create new States and to admit certain foreign possessions into the Indian Union;[4]

(4) In the area of Federalism, the amendments have achieved the following results—

(i) to give greater powers to the Centre vis-à-vis the States;

(ii) to remove distinctions among the States and place them all on the same footing;

(iii) to reorganise the States on linguistic basis;

(iv) to strengthen safeguards in emergency provisions.[5]

So many amendments made to the Constitution in a short span of 59 years cannot be regarded as a happy situation. While some of the amendments can be regarded as inevitable, e.g., amendments changing some details which needed to

---

1. For example, II, V, XI, XIII Amendments.
2. For example I, IV, XVII, XI, XLII and XLIV.
3. I, VII, VIII, XXI, XXII, XXIII, XXVII, XXXII, LIII, LVII, LXXXII.
4. X, XII, XIV, LV, LVI.
5. Amendment XXXXIV.

be changed with the lapse of time, some were not necessary at all as they were an attempt to change the balances originally incorporated into the Constitution by its framers.

It needs to be emphasized that the Constitution should be treated with great respect and not made into a play thing by political parties. A stable constitution gives stability to the country's constitutional process. For example, in the U.S.A., during nearly over 200 years, only 30 amendments have been made and the U.S.A. has progressed tremendously under an old Constitution.

The purpose of the constitution is to regulate administrative and political processes in the country and it is not proper to change the constitution to suit transient political expediency. Majority in Parliament in a democracy is only transient; it is not permanent, but constitution is more permanent in nature. Parliament under a written constitution ought not to regard itself as omnipotent and seek to mutilate the Constitution in any way it likes. If one party in majority changes the Constitution today, another party in majority will change it tomorrow and the Constitution will then cease to claim respect of the people on which it depends for its efficacy and survival.

The procedure to amend the Constitution as laid down in Art. 368, though different from the ordinary legislative process (where the rule of only simple majority operates), has, in practice, been found to be not so rigid as in America or Australia. This is evident from the fact that since its inception in 1950, the Constitution has been amended so many times.

A major factor contributing to the facile way in which the Constitution could be amended so far has been that the Congress Party has enjoyed an overwhelming majority in both the chambers of Parliament at the Centre as well as in the State Legislatures. Therefore, when once the Central leadership of the Party has made up its mind to effect an amendment, it has not found it difficult to muster the requisite majority in the two Houses of Parliament as well as in the State Legislatures whenever their ratification was required.

But the political life in India has now become fragmented; political parties have proliferated and the Congress Party has lost its predominant position. No single political party now enjoys 2/3rd majority in the two Houses of Parliament. Therefore, it may no longer be possible to predicate with any certainty whether a particular proposal to amend the Constitution would get the necessary votes in both Houses of Parliament as well as in the States to become effective. For example, in 1970, the bill to abolish privy purses of the erstwhile rulers failed to get the requisite votes in the Rajya Sabha in spite of the fact that it had got the requisite majority in the Lok Sabha and received a wide measure of support from several sections of Parliament as well as the government. This is one example of the failure of a constitutional amendment initiated by the government.[6] Another

---

6. Supra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. E.

The Bill received 339 out of 493 votes in Lok Sabha. In Rajya Sabha, it received 149 out of 224 votes which was less than 2/3rd votes by a fraction. A joint session of the two Houses of Parliament is not envisaged to break an inter-House deadlock in case of a Constitution Amendment Bill. Under Art. 368, such a Bill has to be passed by a special majority in each House. The use of the phrase 'each House' rules out the technique of a joint session when such a Bill has been passed by one House by the requisite majority but not by the other, as the rule of special majority in 'each House' cannot possibly be fulfilled at a joint session.

[Footnote 6 Contd.]

example is that certain provisions of the Forty- fifth Constitution Amendment Bill though passed by Lok Sabha were not passed by Rajya Sabha.[7]

Quite a few Amendments, such as VII, VIII, X, XII, XIV, XXI, XXII, XXIII, etc. had a wide measure of consensus behind them. Quite a number of other Amendments, such as, those admitting foreign possessions to the Union, or ceding Berubari to Pakistan (Amendment IX) were rather inevitable. Some of the amendments, such as, II, a part of XIV, etc., had to be undertaken because the Constitution contains too many details which need to be modified from time to time to meet the changing situation. Some amendments, such as, II, V, XI, XII, are of minor significance.

Most of the Amendments did not raise any sharp reaction but Amendments I, IV, XVII, XXIV, XXV and XLII raised quite a good deal of controversy in the country. These Amendments were criticised not only on the ground that they adversely affected the Fundamental Rights, but also that they constituted ostensible attempts to negative some of the tenets of the judicial pronouncements on the Constitution which the ruling political party regarded as coming in the way of enacting its projected socio-economic legislation or which gave a wide ambit to a Fundamental Right.

Nevertheless, there is no denying the fact that the Amendments regarding property rights can be justified, to some extent, except Schedule IX,[8] on the ground that the views of the judiciary regarding payment of compensation for agricultural property acquired could not just be fully implemented in the Indian context.[9] But the addition of Schedule IX immunizing as many as 284 State Acts from judicial scrutiny does not seem to be warranted. To begin with, it was envisaged that Schedule IX would be used to give immunity only to land laws, but, in course of time, all kinds of State Laws have been added to the Schedule and granted immunity from judicial review. A significant question to be considered in this regard is : How far the concept of IX Schedule is compatible with the thesis that Judicial review is an essential feature of the Constitution? Prima facie, there

---

[Footnote 6 Contd.]

The idea to have a joint session in such a situation may find support from some observations made by the majority of the Judges of the Supreme Court in Golak Nath refusing to distinguish between the legislative process and the constituent process. But these observations were made with reference to Art. 13 only and cannot be taken to obliterate entirely, for all purposes, the difference between the two processes. An ordinary Bill is passed by a simple majority in a House where the quorum is very small.

Thus, an ordinary Bill can be passed in a House by merely a few members present at a sitting. That cannot be done with respect to a Constitution Amendment Bill which must have at least 272 votes in its favour in the Lok Sabha, as the strength of the House is 542. In addition, 2/3 of the members present and voting should also support such a Bill. There is thus an essential difference between legislative and constituent processes. Since Kesavananda, such a difference has been judicially recognised. Also the XXIV Amendment amended Art. 368 in such a manner as to underline the distinction between legislative and constituent processes.

7. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. E(f).

8. Supra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. C.

9. Blackshield in his article, Fundamental Rights and the Economic Viability of the Indian Nation, 10., JILI., 183 (1968), makes the point that these amendments were not really necessary and the purpose in view could have been achieved by proper legislative drafting. Also see, Ramaswami, the Indian Constitutional Amendments, (1963) Indian Yr. Book of Int. Affairs, 161.

is no compatibility between the two as Schedule IX has been conceived primarily to keep Judicial review of the protected laws at bay.

The most controversial Amendments in the whole constitutional history of India have been the 39th and the 42nd Amendments because of their content as well as the manner and the circumstances in which these Amendments were carried out. These Amendments very much alienated public opinion which resulted in a change of government after the election. The 39th Amendment was declared to be invalid by the Supreme Court.

The 42nd Amendment had a number of the obnoxious features and sought to make the Central Executive very potent and the courts comparatively weaker. It was an attempt to drastically re-write the Constitution and denude it of its many liberal and democratic features. In fact, critics have asserted that this Amendment sought to institutionalise the emergency for good in India. It proved to be the most ill-advised and controversial constitutional Amendment ever undertaken in the country. It was inevitable that with the change in government, CA 42 should undergo a drastic change sooner than later and the status quo ante restored to a large extent. Accordingly, most of the controversial provisions of the 42nd Amendment were neutralised by the 43rd and the 44th Amendments.[10]

Because of the fact that inconvenient judicial pronouncements touching upon the Fundamental Rights could be nullified rather easily through the process of constitutional amendment, the institution of judicial review has not been able to play that pervasively creative role in shaping and moulding the Indian Constitution as it has been able to play in the U.S.A. But, if formal amendments of the Constitution become difficult to accomplish under Art. 368, in course of time, the judiciary may be able to make its impact felt more and more on the development of the Constitution to meet the contemporary socio-economic exigencies. Such a development has already taken place, to some extent, from 1978 onwards when the Judiciary has been able to play a very creative role in shaping and moulding constitutional process in the country. The most outstanding examples of judicial creativity have been the expansion of the scope and range of Art. 21,[11] and the enunciation of the doctrine of non-amendability of the basic structures and fundamental features of the Constitution.[12]

Lastly, it needs to be said that the facile way in which it has been possible to amend the Constitution so far has not promoted in the minds and hearts of the people a deep emotional respect for the Constitution as a symbol having sanctity and permanence. Such a sentiment can take root only when the Constitution is not tampered with whenever the government encounters the least difficulty in putting through its programme. It is extremely important for the endurance of the Constitution and promotion of constitutionalism in the country that people respect it and have confidence in it. Such a sentiment can be promoted only when the Constitution is regarded as something sacrosanct and not to be tinkered or trifled with lightly but only as a last resort when there is no other viable alternative available to meet a national situation.

---

10. Supra, 2404, 2405-2413.
11. Supra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. J.
Also see, supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. C.
12. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. D(e).

To achieve this laudable objective, it seems absolutely necessary that the constitutional amending process be rigidified and made more difficult so that an Amendment can be made to the Constitution only when there is broad national consensus favouring the same. The truth remains that 2/3 of Lok Sabha hardly represents a broad national consensus as it is common knowledge that not more than 45% of the eligible voters cast their votes at the general election for the House. Rajya Sabha has no popular mandate whatsoever. It also needs to be realised that the basic purpose of the constitution is to control power—legislative as well as executive. This is the idea inherent in the term "constitutionalism".[13] Therefore, the government cannot rush to amend the constitution the moment it feels any constitutional difficulty in executing its policies. If that is done too often, then, all constitutional restraints on the government will come to an end and we shall be left with an uncontrolled, arbitrary, government.

The Janata Government through CB 45 had proposed to lay down the process of referendum to amend certain specified features of the Constitution.[14] This was a very wholesome proposal and although approved by Lok Sabha, unfortunately, it could not get the requisite votes in Rajya Sabha because of the intransigence of certain political groups, especially, the Congress Party.

If referendum appears to be too complicated a procedure in a country like India, another alternative to consider may be to require ratification of all constitutional amendments by 2/3 of all the State legislative assemblies, each assembly passing the requisite resolution by the same voting rule as prevails in Parliament for a constitutional Amendment. After all, it is illogical that while many constitutional provisions need State ratification to amend, Fundamental Rights which affect the individual so vitally can be amended by Parliament alone. The proposed procedure will ensure a broad public participation on national level in the constitutional amending process.

13. See, supra, Ch. I, Sec. B.
14. Supra, Ch. XLI, Sec. E(f).