PART I

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTORY

SYNOPSIS

A. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

A state is defined in International Law as "an independent political entity" "occupying a defined territory" "the members of which are united together for the purpose of resisting external force and preservation of internal order."

This statement lays stress on what may be called 'police functions' of the state, viz., preservation of law and order and defence of the country from external aggression. It needs to be emphasized however that no modern state today rests content with such a limited range of functions. A modern state does not rest content with being merely a 'police' or 'law and order' state. It is much more than that. It tends to become a social welfare state.

The significant point however is that in order to carry out its activities and functions, whatever may be their range, it becomes necessary for any state to establish certain basic organs or agents or instrumentalities which act on its behalf and through which the state can function and operate. All the people in a state cannot combine and operate all together all the time to achieve the desired goals. Thus, certain fundamental organs become necessary. This creates the need for Constitutional Law. If there is need for certain organs through which the state acts, there must be some law to lay down how these organs are to be established? How these organs are to function? What their powers are going to be? What is to be their mutual relationship with each other? A state cannot govern itself on an ad hoc basis without their being some norms to regulate its basic institutions. There must be a predictable body of norms and rules from which the governmental organs must draw their powers and functions. The purpose of having a Constitution is to have a frame-work of government which is likely to endure through the vicissitudes of a nation. This purpose does not appear to have been achieved in India. There have been nearly 300 amendments to the Constitution.

The Legal System of a country is divisible into—(i) Law governing the state; (ii) Law by which the state governs or regulates the conduct of its members. Laws like Contracts, Torts, Property, Criminal Law fall in the second category. Constitutional Law, Administrative Law and Public International Law fall in the first category. These are laws which seek to govern the state. Laws governing the state fall in the category of Public Law. Laws governing the affairs of the citizens fall in the category of Private Law.

Speaking generally, the Constitution of a country seeks to establish its fundamental or basic or apex organs of government and administration, describe their structure, composition, powers and principal functions, define the interrelationship of these organs with one another, and regulate their relationship with the people, more particularly, the political relationship.[1] And even about these basic institutions, only the basic norms are inscribed in the Constitution. All and sundry rules are not brought into discussion under the rubric of Constitutional Law. It may be noted that the term "Constitutional law" is broader than the term "Constitution", as it comprises of the "Constitution", relevant statutory law, judicial decisions and conventions.

Traditionally, the structure of a country's government is divided into three institutional components; (1) Legislature to make laws; (2) Executive to implement and execute laws; and (3) Judiciary to interpret the laws and administer justice. Thus, the Constitution deals with such questions as: How is the Legislature structured, composed and organised? What are its powers and functions? Similar questions are to be asked about each of the other two organs as well. Some other questions which the Constitution has to answer are: What is the mutual relationship between the Legislature and the Executive? Or, between the Executive and the Judiciary? Or, between the Legislature and the Judiciary? What is the relationship between these organs and the people? Does the Constitution guarantee any rights for the people?

While these three organs are basic in any country, and the Constitution does invariably deal with them, the Constitution may also create any other organ

---

1. Wade & Phillips, Const. & Adm. Law, 1, 5 (IX Ed., ed Bradley); K.C. Wheare, Modern Constitutions, 1 (1971); O Hood Phillips, Const. And Adm. Law, 5 (1987).

which it may regard as significant and fit for inscription in the Constitution. For example, the Indian Constitution provides for the creation of a Finance Commission every five years to settle the financial relationship between the Centre and States and it also establishes on a permanent footing an Election Commission to ensure free and fair elections. In Chander Hass[2] a two judge Bench of the Supreme Court citing Montesquieus has unqualifiedly stated the Montesquieus view of separation of powers and the dangers involved in deviating from his view was an apt warning for the Indian Judiciary which has been "rightly criticized for 'overreach' and encroachment in the domain of the other two organs" i.e., the Parliament and the Executive. The Bench seems to have broken down in the face of intensely adverse criticism launched principally against the Supreme Court's 'activist' role by the legislators as well as the Executive.[3] All the observations of the Court relating to separation of powers was wholly uncalled for since the real question in controversy was whether the Punjab and Haryana High Court could direct creation of posts to accommodate daily wage earners who, according to the High Court, ought to have been regularized. This issue had been answered in the negative by a long line of cases and, therefore, the law was well settled on the issue. In fact the sudden attack on the Judiciary by the Judiciary finds place in the judgment after the Court, having considered the merits concluded:

> "Consequently, this appeal is allowed and the judgment and order of the High Court as well as that of the first appellate court are set aside and the judgment of the trial court is upheld. The suit is dismissed. No costs".

Then they said:

> "Before parting with this case we would like to make some observations about the limits of the powers of the judiciary. We are compelled to make these observations because we are repeatedly coming across cases where judges are unjustifiably trying to perform executive or legislative functions. In our opinion this is clearly unconstitutional. In the name of judicial activism judges cannot cross their limits and try to take over functions which belong to another organ of the State."

What followed covering about 7 pages of the report is not only obiter but betrays a constitutional fundamental that the judges cannot convert the courts into hustings. Uninformed, obiter of the Supreme Court can attract media attention to the Judges who author such obiter but tends to lower reputation of the Court amongst the right thinking members of the society and shake the confidence of the people in an institution charged by the Constitution to enforce the rule of law.[4] These observations are not 'law declared' within the meaning of Art. 141 of the Constitution.

A significant aspect of the relationship between the government and the people is the guaranteeing of certain Fundamental Rights to the people. Modern Constitutions lay a good deal of emphasis on people's Fundamental Rights. The underlying idea is that there are certain basic rights which are inherent in a human

---

2. Divisional Manager, Aravali Golf Club v. Chander Hass, (2008) 1 SCC 683 : (2007) 12 SCR 1084 : (2008) 3 JT 221.

3. Significantly, while condemning what is currently referred to as judicial activism the Bench displayed an amazing lack of courage in pointing out any particular precedent when the Courts have exceeded their jurisdictions and usurped the powers of the other two organs of the State.

4. It will be out of place to go into the question at greater length in a book like this.

being and which no government should seek to take away either by legislation or by executive action. The judiciary is endowed with the function of protecting these rights and acting as the guardian thereof. If the legislature passes any law or the executive takes an action, so as to infringe any of the Fundamental Rights, then the courts may declare such a law or action as unconstitutional. Some of these basic rights are: freedom of the person, freedom of speech, right to equality, freedom of conscience and religion, etc.

The Constitution of a country may be federal or unitary in nature. In a federal Constitution there is a Central Government having certain powers which it exercises over the entire country. Then there are regional governments and each of such governments has jurisdiction within a region. All kinds of relations arise between the Central Government and the Regional Governments. India is an example of a federal Constitution. Some other federal Constitutions are: U.S.A., Canada, Australia, Malaysia, Germany, etc.

A federal Constitution is a much more complicated and legalistic document than a unitary Constitution which has one Central Government in which all powers of government are concentrated and which can delegate such of its powers to such of its agencies as it likes. A federal Constitution must settle many details (like distribution of powers between the Central Government and the regional governments) which a unitary Constitution is not concerned with. Britain, Sri Lanka, Singapore have unitary Constitutions.

The Constitutional law of a country consists of both 'legal' as well as 'non-legal' norms. 'Legal' norms are enforced and applied by the courts and if any such norm is violated, courts can give relief and redress. On the other hand, 'non-legal' norms arise in course of time as a result of practices followed over and over again. Such norms are known as conventions, usages, customs, practices of the Constitution. There may be nothing in the Constitution sanctioning them, nevertheless, they exist. In the words of Jennings: "Thus within the framework of the law there is room for the development of the rules of practice, rules which may be followed as consistently as the rules of law which determines the procedure which the men concerned with Government follow."[5]

According to KEETON, the conventions of the Constitution are 'the unwritten principles which, though they could never be enforced as law in the courts are nonetheless rules since in fact the players of the constitutional game do observe them, for if they are not observed, the constitutional game would immediately degenerate into a political fracas or, worse still, a bloody revolution.[6]"

The sanction behind conventions is mostly political or public opinion. As AHMADI, C.J., has observed about the growth of conventions: "Conventions grow from long-standing accepted practice or by agreement in areas where the law is silent and such a convention would not breach the law but fill the gap."[7] Constitutional conventions provide the flesh which clothes the dry bones of the law.

---

5. W.I. Jennings, Law and the Constitution.

6. KEETON, THE UNITED KINGDOM, COMMONWEALTH SERIES, I, 36-37 (1955).

7. S.P. Anand v. H.D. Deve Gowda, AIR 1997 SC 272, 279 : (1996) 6 SCC 734. For discussion on this case, see, Ch. III, infra.

On conventions, also see, Ch. XL, infra.

Conventions play a more significant role in an unwritten Constitution than in a written Constitution but to have a full picture of a country's Constitutional law, reference needs to be made not only to 'legal' but to 'non-legal' norms as well. Britain is a very good example of a country where conventions play a very active role. In India, conventions operate in several areas, the most significant of which is the relationship between the Executive and the Legislature. Reference to conventions is made at several places in the following pages.[8]

Generally, it is said that conventions may not lead to any court case and are not enforceable by the courts. But there are instances of conventions being recognised, and even applied by the Courts in India as well as abroad. Reference may be made in this connection inter alia to the following cases : Carltona Ltd. v. Commissioners of Works;[9] Madzimbamuto v. Lardner-Burke;[10] Att. Gen. v. Jonathan Cape Ltd.,[11] Adegbenx v. Akintola,[12] Re Amendment of the Constitution of Canada[13], Ram Jawaya v. State of Punjab;[14] U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi;[15] Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab[16]. These examples show that constitutional conventions do influence judicial decisions to some extent. With the judicial recognition of conventions, the distinction between law and conventions has become blurred in course of time.

It may also be noted that even some legal rules may be characterised as 'directory' and not 'mandatory'. This may especially be so with respect to procedural rules contained in the Constitution.[17]

The Constitution is a source of, and not an exercise of, legislative power.[18]

A Constitution may be written or unwritten. A written Constitution is one which is written down in the form of a Constitutional document. The British Constitution is characterised as 'unwritten' because it is not embodied in one comprehensive Constitutional document. It is interspersed in several statutes which define some Constitutional principles; in court decisions; in common law principles and in conventions and usages. The central doctrine of the British Constitution is Sovereignty of Parliament which means that Parliament can make or unmake any law and no distinction is drawn between an ordinary law and the Constitutional law. The cornerstone of the British Constitution, the principle of Sovereignty of Parliament, is in itself nothing more than a concept based on tradition which is recognised and enforced by the courts. Characterising this as the "formlessness of the British Constitution", KEETON goes on to observe:

> "The absence of a written Constitution deprives us of a fundamental starting point from which all Constitutional law can be derived. We have no grundnorm

---

8. See, for example, Chs. III, VII and XL.
9. [1943] 2 All ER 560.
10. [1969] 1 AC 645.
11. (1976) Q.B. 752 (known as the Crossman Diaries case).
12. (1963) A.C. 614.
13. (1981) 123 DLR (3rd) (Canada).
14. AIR 1955 SC 549 : (1955) 2 SCR 225; Ch. III, infra.
15. AIR 1971 SC 1002 : (1971) 2 SCC 63; Ch. III, infra.
16. AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831.
Also see, infra, Chs. III, VII and XL.
17. S.A. de Smith, Constitutional and Administrative Law, 44-62, 99-108, 144-172 (1977).
An example of a "directory" rule in India is to be found in Art. 77 of the Constitution, see, Ch. III, infra. Also see, "Directive Principles", Ch. XXXIV, infra.
18. Pratap Singh v. State of Jharkhand, (2005) 3 SCC 551 : AIR 2005 SC 2731.

from which the individual norms of Constitutional law can receive their validity."

Most of the modern Constitutions are of the written type. The U.S.A. wrote its Constitution in 1787, Canada in 1867, and Australia in 1900. The U.S. Constitution is a brief, compact and organic instrument which shuns details.[19] Even in Britain, many voices can be heard now that it ought to write down its Constitution and that Fundamental Rights should be guaranteed therein.[20] However, even a written Constitution generates some conventions and customs which help in bringing the Constitution in conformity with the constantly changing social and economic conditions. Also, no written Constitution can contain all the detailed rules needed for the working of various bodies and institutions in the country. Therefore, subject to the Constitution, a number of statutes may have to be enacted laying down the detailed working rules for many purposes.

The difference between a written and unwritten Constitution is somewhat basic. A written Constitution is the formal source of all Constitutional law in the country. It is regarded as the supreme or fundamental law of the land, and it controls and permeates each institution in the country. Every organ in the country must act in accordance with the Constitution.

This means that the institutions of government created by the Constitution have to function in accordance with it. Any exercise of power outside the Constitution is unconstitutional. The government being the creature of the Constitution, Constitution delimits the powers of governmental organs and any exercise of power beyond the constitutional parameters becomes unauthorized. Therefore, any law made by the Legislature, any action taken by the Executive, if inconsistent with the Constitution, can be declared unconstitutional by the courts[21].

The Constitution is an organic living document. Its outlook and expression as perceived and expressed by the interpreters of the Constitution must be dynamic and keep pace with the changing times. Though the basics and fundamentals of the Constitution remain unalterable, the interpretation of the flexible provisions of the Constitution can be accompanied by dynamism and lean, in case of conflict, in favour of the weaker or the one who is more needy.[22]

The courts are regarded as the interpreters as well as the guardian of the Constitution. It is for the courts to scrutinize every act of the government with a view to ensure that it is in conformity with the Constitution. If a law passed by the legislature or an act done by the executive is inconsistent with a constitutional provision, the court will say so, and declare the law or the act as unconstitutional and void.

It is the obligation of the judiciary to see that the Constitution is not violated by any governmental organ and hence the judiciary is called as the guardian

---

19. "The Constitution of the United States is not a prolix document. Words are sparingly used; and often a single phrase contains a vast arsenal of power." Douglas, From Marshall To Mukherjea, 146 (Tagore Law Lectures, 1956).

20. Leslie Scarman, English Law—The New Dimension.
A debate was held on this issue in the House of Lords: See, The Times, Nov. 30, 1978. Also see, Lord Hailsham's Richard Dimbleby Lecture in The Times, Oct. 15, 1976. Lord Hailsham has characterised the present-day government in Britain as "elective dictatorship". Also see, infra, Ch. XX.

21. For further discussion on this point, see, Chs. IV, VIII, XX, XXXIII and XL, infra.

22. State of W.B. v. Kesoram Industries Ltd., (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.

and protector of the Constitution. Judicial review has come to be regarded as an integral part of a written Constitution.[23] The courts thus play a much more creative role under a written Constitution than they do under an unwritten Constitution. In a written Constitution, courts not only interpret ordinary laws and do justice between man and man, they also give meaning to the cold letter of the Constitution and this may, at times, vitally affect the Constitutional process in the country.

What do the words used in a constitutional document actually mean? Whenever such a question arises, it is ultimately for the courts to decide. In the ultimate analysis, the word of the Apex Court as to what the Constitution means prevails. The role of the judiciary in the U.S.A. has been underlined in the following words by HUGHES who later became the Supreme Court Chief Justice: "We are under a Constitution but the Constitution is what the judges say it is". DOWLING emphasizes the judicial role in the U.S.A. by saying: "The study of Constitutional law... may be described in general terms as a study of the doctrine of judicial review in action".[24] These statements do reveal the truth although they give a much more exaggerated picture of the courts' role than what it truly is.

Another significant feature of a written Constitution is the need of special procedure to amend it. This procedure is more complicated and rigorous than passing an ordinary law and is characterised as the constituent process as distinguished from ordinary legislative process.[25] Thus, a written Constitution is often characterised as rigid as contrasted with an unwritten Constitution, which is called flexible, as it can be changed by an ordinary legislation. It can be appreciated that if the written Constitution is not rigid, if it can be amended easily, and if it is not deemed to be the fundamental law of the country, then it ceases to effectively limit and restrain power.

It is also to be noted that a Parliament functioning under a written Constitution cannot claim for itself unlimited power to do what it likes. It has become fashionable for politicians in India to say that Indian Parliament is sovereign, meaning it can do whatever it desires. Such an assertion is not realistic. Parliament is sovereign to the extent that India is a sovereign country and that it is not subject to any external power. But Indian Parliament is not sovereign if it means that it has uncontrolled power to do what it likes. Since Parliament functions under a written Constitution, it has to observe the restrictions imposed on it by the Constitution. It can do what the Constitution permits it to do but cannot do what the Constitution prohibits.[26] Similar is the position of the Executive.[27] Thus, a written Constitution may seek to put formal restraints upon the abuse of power. This may be lacking in an unwritten Constitution.

All the points mentioned above will become clear as we go along through the following pages.

---

23. See, Ch. XL, infra.
24. DOWLING, CASES AND MATERIALS ON CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 19 (1965).
25. See, Ch. XLI, infra.
26. See, Ch. II, Sec. M, infra.
Also, Ch. XL, infra.
27. See, Ch. III, infra.

B. CONSTITUTIONALISM

Besides the concept of the Constitution, there is also the all-important concept of 'Constitutionalism'.

Modern political thought draws a distinction between 'Constitutionalism' and 'Constitution'. A country may have the 'Constitution' but not necessarily 'Constitutionalism'. For example, a country with a dictatorship, where the dictator's word is law, can be said to have a 'Constitution' but not 'Constitutionalism'.

The underlying difference between the two concepts is that a Constitution ought not merely to confer powers on the various organs of the government, but also seek to restrain those powers. Constitutionalism recognises the need for government but insists upon limitations being placed upon governmental powers. Constitutionalism envisages checks and balances and putting the powers of the legislature and the executive under some restraints and not making them uncontrolled and arbitrary.

Unlimited powers jeopardise freedom of the people. As has been well said: power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely. If the Constitution confers unrestrained power on either the legislature or the executive, it might lead to an authoritarian, oppressive government. Therefore, to preserve the basic freedoms of the individual, and to maintain his dignity and personality, the Constitution should be permeated with 'Constitutionalism'; it should have some in-built restrictions on the powers conferred by it on governmental organs.

'Constitutionalism' connotes in essence limited government or a limitation on government. Constitutionalism is the antithesis of arbitrary powers.[28] 'Constitutionalism' recognises the need for government with powers but at the same time insists that limitations be placed on those powers. The antithesis of Constitutionalism is despotism. Unlimited power may lead to an authoritarian, oppressive, government which jeopardises the freedoms of the people. Only when the Constitution of a country seeks to decentralise power instead of concentrating it at one point, and also imposes other restraints and limitations thereon, does a country have not only 'constitution' but also 'constitutionalism'.

'Constitutions spring from a belief in limited government'.[29] According to SCHWARTZ, in the U.S.A., the word Constitution means "a written organic instrument, under which governmental powers are both conferred and circumscribed". He emphasizes that "this stress upon grant and limitation of authority is fundamental".[30] As PROFESSOR VILE has remarked:[31]

> "Western institutional theorists have concerned themselves with the problems of ensuring that the exercise of governmental power, which is essential to the realisation of the values of their societies, should be controlled in order that it should not itself be destructive of the values it was intended to promote."

The idea of Constitutionalism is not new. It is embedded deeply in human thought. Many natural law philosophers have promoted this idea through their writ-

---

28. CHARLES H. MCILWAIN, CONSTITUTIONALISM : ANCIENT AND MODERN, 21; S.A. DE SMITH, CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 34 (1977); GIOVANNI SARTORI, Constitutionalism : A Preliminary Discussion, (1962) 56 Am. Pol. SC Rev., 853

29. WHEARE, op. cit., 7.

30. SCHWARTZ, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW : A TEXT BOOK, 1 (1972).

31. M.J.C. VILE, CONSTITUTIONALISM AND THE SEPARATION OF POWERS, 1

ings. Some of these philosophers are: ACQUINAS, PAINE, LOCKE, GROTIUS AND ROUSSEAU.[32] The Magna Carta (1215) strengthened the traditional view that law is supreme. As observed by ARTHUR SUTHERLAND, "The Great Charter was obviously a cherished standard, a welcome assurance that people could set some limitation on the arbitrary power of the king."[33]

A written Constitution, independent judiciary with powers of judicial review, the doctrine of rule of law and separation of powers, free elections to legislature, accountable and transparent democratic government, Fundamental Rights of the people, federalism, decentralisation of power are some of the principles and norms which promote Constitutionalism in a country.

C. RULE OF LAW

A few words may be said here about the concept of Rule of Law as other ideas and concepts relating to Constitutionalism will be discussed in due course in the following pages.

The doctrine of Rule of Law is ascribed to DICEY whose writing in 1885 on the British Constitution included the following three distinct though kindered ideas in Rule of Law:[34]

(i) Absence of Arbitrary Power : No man is above law. No man is punishable except for a distinct breach of law established in an ordinary legal manner before ordinary courts. The government cannot punish any one merely by its own fiat. Persons in authority in Britain do not enjoy wide, arbitrary or discretionary powers. Dicey asserted that wherever there is discretion there is room for arbitrariness.

(ii) Equality before Law : Every man, whatever his rank or condition, is subject to the ordinary law and jurisdiction of the ordinary courts. No man is above law.

(iii) Individual Liberties : The general principles of the British Constitution, and especially the liberties of the individual, are judge-made, i.e., these are the result of judicial decisions determining the rights of private persons in particular cases brought before the courts from time to time.

DICEY asserted that the above-mentioned features existed in the British Constitution.

The British Constitution is judge-made and the rights of the individual form part of, and pervade, the Constitution. The rights of the individuals are part of the Constitution because these are secured by the courts. The British Constitutional

---

32. FRIEDMANN, LEGAL THEORY; Dias and Hughes, JURISPRUDENCE; Lloyd, INTRODUCTION TO JURISPRUDENCE.

33. CONSTITUTIONALISM IN AMERICA, 13.

34. DICEY, A.V., INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF THE LAW OF THE CONSTITUTION, Ch. 4 (X ed.). For discussion on DICEY'S views see COSGROVE, THE RULE OF LAW, 66-113 (1980). WADE & PHILLIPS, CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 86 (ed, Bradley, IX Ed.); O' HOOD PHILLIPS, CONST. AND ADM. LAW, 33-39 (1987); S.A. DE SMITH, op. cit., 35, JAIN, M.P. A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, 17-23.

Law is not the source, but the consequence, of the rights of the individuals as defined by the courts.

DICEY was thinking of the common law freedoms, such as, personal liberty, freedom of speech, public meeting, etc. What DICEY was saying was that certain Constitutions proclaim rights but do not provide adequate means to enforce those rights. In the British Constitution, on the other hand, there is inseparable connection between the means of enforcing a right and the right to be enforced.

Referring in particular to the Habeas Corpus Act, DICEY said that it was "worth a hundred Constitutional articles guaranteeing individual liberty." DICEY however accepted that there was rule of law in the U.S.A., because there the rights declared in the Constitution could be enforced, and the Constitution gave legal security to the rights declared.

The third principle is peculiar to Britain. In many modern written Constitutions, the basic rights of the people are guaranteed in the Constitution itself. This is regarded as a better guarantee for these rights and even in Britain there exists at present strong opinion that basic rights should be guaranteed.

DICEY'S thesis has been criticised by many from various angles but, the basic tenet expressed by him is that power is derived from, and is to be exercised according to law. In substance, DICEY'S emphasis, on the whole, in his enunciation of Rule of Law is on the absence of arbitrary power, and discretionary power, equality before Law, and legal protection to certain basic human rights, and these ideas remain relevant and significant in every democratic country even to-day.

It is also true that dictated by the needs of practical government, a number of exceptions have been engrafted on these ideas in modern democratic countries, e.g., there is a universal growth of broad discretionary powers of the administration[35]; administrative tribunals have grown[36]; the institution of preventive detention has become the normal feature in many democratic countries[37]. Nevertheless, the basic ideas are worth preserving and promoting.

The concept of Rule of Law has been discussed in several international forums.[38] The effort being made is to give it a socio-legal-economic content and a supranational complexion.[39]

Rule of Law has no fixed or articulate connotation though the Indian courts refer to this phrase time and again. The broad emphasis of Rule of Law is on absence of any centre of unlimited or arbitrary power in the country, on proper structurisation and control of power, absence of arbitrariness in the government. Government intervention in many daily activities of the citizens is on the increase creating a possibility of arbitrariness in State action. Rule of Law is useful as a counter to this situation, because the basic emphasis of Rule of Law is on exclusion of arbitrariness, lawlessness and unreasonableness on the part of the government.

---

35. For a detailed discussion on Discretionary Powers, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, Chs. XVII-XIX*;* JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, III, Ch. XVI.
36. For Tribunals, see JAIN, TREATISE, Ch. XIII; CASES, II, Ch. XII; infra, Ch. VIII.
37. Infra, Ch. XXVII.
38. INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION OF JURISTS, DELHI DECLARATION, 1959.
39. WADE & PHILLIPS, 93-5.

Rule of Law does not mean rule according to statutory law pure and simple, because such a law may itself be harsh, inequitable, discriminatory or unjust. Rule of law connotes some higher kind of law which is reasonable just and non-discriminatory. Rule of Law to-day envisages not arbitrary power but controlled power. Constitutional values, such as constitutionalism, absence of arbitrary power in the government, liberty of the people, an independent judiciary etc. are imbibed in the concept of Rule of Law.

The Indian Constitution by and large seeks to promote Rule of Law through many of its provisions. For example, Parliament and State Legislatures are democratically elected on the basis of adult suffrage.[40] The Constitution makes adequate provisions guaranteeing independence of the judiciary.[41] Judicial review has been guaranteed through several constitutional provisions.[42] The Supreme Court has characterised judicial review as a "basic feature of the Constitution"[43] Art. 14 of the Constitution guarantees right to equality before law.[44] This Constitutional provision has now assumed great significance as it is used to control administrative powers lest they should become arbitrary.[45]

The Supreme Court has invoked the Rule of Law several times in its pronouncements to emphasize upon certain Constitutional values and principles. For example, in Bachan Singh,[46] Justice BHAGWATI has emphasized that Rule of Law excludes arbitrariness and unreasonableness. To ensure this, he has suggested that it is necessary to have a democratic legislature to make laws, but its power should not be unfettered, and that there should be an independent judiciary to protect the citizen against the excesses of executive and legislative power.

In P. Sambamurthy v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[47] the Supreme Court has declared a provision authorising the executive to interfere with tribunal justice as unconstitutional characterising it as "violative of the rule of law which is clearly a basic and essential feature of the Constitution."[48]

In Wadhwa,[49] the Supreme Court has again invoked the Rule of Law concept to decry too frequent use by a State Government of its power to issue ordinances as a substitute for legislation by the Legislature.[50]

In Yusuf Khan v. Manohar Joshi,[51] the Supreme Court has laid down the proposition that it is the duty of the state to preserve and protect the law and the

---

40. Infra, Chs. II, VI and XIX.
41. Infra, Chs. IV and VIII.
42. Infra. Chs. IV, VIII, XXIII, XL and XL.
43. Minerva Mills Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 1789 : (1980) 2 SCC 591.
For discussion on the doctrine of Fundamental Features of the Constitution, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
44. Infra, Ch. XXI.
45. Ibid. Also see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, Ch. XVIII; M.P. JAIN, INDIAN ADM. LAW—CASES & MATERIALS, II, Ch. XV.
46. Bachan Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 SC 1325 : (1982) 3 SCC 24; infra, Ch. XXVI.
47. AIR 1987 SC 663 : (1987) 1 SCC 362.
48. Infra, Ch. IX.
49. D.C. Wadhwa v. State of Bihar, AIR 1987 SC 579 : (1987) 1 SCC 378; infra, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(d) and Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).
50. On Ordinance-Making Power, see, infra, Ch. III and Ch. VII.
51. (1999) SCC (Cri) 577.

Constitution and that it cannot permit any violent act which may negate the rule of law.

The two great values which emanate from the concept of Rule of law in modern times are:

(1) no arbitrary government; and

(2) upholding individual liberty.

Emphasizing upon these values, KHANNA, J., observed in A.D.M. Jabalpur v. S. Shukla.[52]

> "Rule of law is the antithesis of arbitrariness...Rule of law is now the accepted norm of all civilised societies...Everywhere it is identified with the liberty of the individual. It seeks to maintain a balance between the opposing notions of individual liberty and public order. In every state the problem arises of reconciling human rights with the requirements of public interest. Such harmonizing can only be attained by the existence of independent courts which can hold the balance between citizen and the state and compel governments to conform to the law".

A significant derivative from 'Rule of Law' is judicial review. Judicial review is an essential part of Rule of Law. Judicial review involves determination not only of the constitutionality of the law but also of the validity of administrative action. The actions of the state public authorities and bureaucracy are all subject to judicial review; they are thus all accountable to the courts for the legality of their actions. In India, so much importance is given to judicial review that it has been characterised as the 'basic feature' of the Constitution which cannot be done away with even by the exercise of the constituent power.[53]

D. HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

The Constitution of India, the precursor of the new Indian renaissance, became effective on January 26, 1950.[54] Before the advent of the Constitution, India was governed under the Government of India Act, 1935, which became effective in 1937. India was then a part of the British Empire; sovereignty of the British Crown prevailed over the country and it was in the exercise of this sovereignty that the British Parliament had enacted the Act of 1935.

Only two major features of the Act need be mentioned here. First, the Act conferred only a very limited right of self-government on the Indians. The executive authority in a Province was vested in the Governor appointed by the Crown. He was to act ordinarily on the advice of the Ministers who were to be responsible to the Provincial Legislature which was elected on a limited franchise. But the Governor could exercise certain functions 'in his discretion' or 'individual judgment' in which case he was not bound by the ministerial advice and was subject to the control of the Governor-General.

---

52. AIR 1976 SC 1207, at 1254, 1263 : (1976) 2 SCC 521; see, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.

53. State of Bihar v. Subhash Singh, AIR 1997 SC 1390 : (1997) 4 SCC 430. Also see, infra, Ch. XLI.

54. However, a few provisions of the Constitution, viz., Arts. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 60, 324, 366, 367, 379, 380, 388, 391, 392, 393 and 394, came into force on November 26, 1949.

The executive authority at the Centre was vested in the Governor-General appointed by the Crown. Though ordinarily the Governor-General would act on ministerial advice, he could discharge certain functions 'in his discretion' or 'individual judgment' in which case he was not bound by ministerial advice but was subject to the control of the Secretary of State for India who was a member of the British Cabinet. Defence and external affairs, among others, fell in this category.

Secondly, the Act of 1935 sought to change the character of the Indian Government from unitary to federal. The Indian Federation was to consist of the Provinces in which British India was divided, and the States under the native princes.

The federal scheme, however, never became fully operative as the princes did not join the Federation; the federal concept was implemented partially in so far as the relationship between the Centre and the Provinces was ordered on this basis. Further, the ministerial form of government, as envisaged by the Act of 1935, could not also be introduced at the Centre which continued to function under the Government of India Act, 1919. Accordingly, the Central Government consisted of the Governor-General and a nominated Executive Council. In this structure, the Governor-General occupied the key position as he could overrule his Council on any point if in his opinion the safety, tranquility or interests of British India were materially affected.[55]

In short, before 1947, the effective power and control over the Indian Administration lay with the Secretary of State, the Governor-General and the Governors; Indian participation in the governmental process was minimal and naturally the Indians never felt reconciled to such a dispensation.

There thus arose an insistent demand for independence which resulted in the setting up of a Constituent Assembly for drafting a Constitution for a free India. The Assembly formally commenced its task of Constitution-making from December 9, 1946, when it held its first meeting but could not make much headway because of the political impasse arising from a lack of understanding between the two major political parties, the Indian National Congress and the Muslim League. The political deadlock was resolved in 1947 when the British Parliament enacted the Indian Independence Act which partitioned the country into two independent units—India and Pakistan. The Constituent Assembly then embarked on its work in right earnest, and after three years' hard labour finalised and adopted the Constitution of India on November 26, 1949.

E. SALIENT FEATURES OF THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION

(a) MODERN CONSTITUTION

The fact that the Indian Constitution was drafted in the mid-twentieth century gave an advantage to its makers in so far as they could take cognisance of the various constitutional processes operating in different countries of the world and thus draw upon a rich fund of human experience, wisdom, heritage and traditions in the area of governmental process in order to fashion a system suited to the political, social and economic conditions in India.[56] In the end result, the Indian Constitution has turned out to be a very interesting and unique document.

---

55. For details see, KEITH, CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF INDIA, 331-357 (1937); GLEDHILL, THE REPUBLIC OF INDIA, 17-42 (1964); M. RAMASWAMY, CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENTS IN INDIA, (1955) Stanford Law Review, 326.

One could discern in it the impact of several Constitutions. As for instance, the Indian Federalism is influenced by the American, Canadian and Australian Federalism. Fundamental Rights in India owe a great deal to the American Bill of Rights; the process of Constitutional amendment adopted in India is a modified version of the American system.

The influence of the British Constitutional Law, theories and practices on the Indian Constitution is quite pervasive. As for example, the parliamentary form of government in India closely follows the British model in substance; the system of prerogative writs which plays a crucial role in protecting peoples' legal rights and ensuring judicial control over administrative action is Britain's contribution to India. Australia's experiences have been especially useful for ordering the Centre-State financial relationship, and for promoting the concept of freedom of trade and commerce in the country. Inspiration has come from the Irish Constitution in the shaping of the Directive Principles of State Policy.

The Government of India Act, 1935, which preceded the Indian Constitution, has furnished not only administrative details, but also the verbatim language of many provisions of the Constitution.

It will, however, be wrong to suppose that the Indian Constitution is just a carbon copy of other Constitutions and contains nothing new and original. While adopting some of the principles and institutions developed in other democratic and federal countries, it yet strikes new paths, new approaches and patterns, in several directions. It makes bold departures in many respects from the established Constitutional norms and introduces many innovations. For example, in the area of Centre-State relationship, with a view to achieve the twin objectives of promoting the unity of India and reducing rigidity inherent in a federal system, the Indian Constitution makes several provisions which are original in conception as nothing parallel to these is to be found in any other federal Constitution and, to this extent, it makes a distinct contribution to the development of theories and practices of federalism in general.

(b) WRITTEN CONSTITUTION

India's Constitution is a lengthy, elaborate and detailed document. Originally it consisted of 395 Articles arranged under 22 Parts and eight Schedules. Today, after many amendments, it has 441 Articles and 12 Schedules. It is probably the longest of the organic laws now extant in the world.

---

56. The Draft Constitution was criticized on the floor of the Constituent Assembly on the ground that most of it had been borrowed from other constitutions and that it could claim very little originality. In reply to this, AMBEDKAR observed:

"One likes to ask whether there can be anything new in a Constitution framed at this hour in the history of the world. More than hundred years have rolled over when the first written Constitution was drafted. It has been followed by many other countries reducing their Constitutions to writing. What the scope of a Constitution should be has long been settled. Similarly, what are the fundamentals of a Constitution are recognised all over the world. Given these facts, all Constitutions in their main provisions must look similar. The only new things, if there can be any, in a Constitution framed so late in the day are the variations made to remove the faults and to accommodate it to the needs of the country."

See, VII CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY DEBATES (hereinafter cited as CAD), 35-56.

Several reasons contributed to its prolixity. First, the Constitution deals with the organisation and structure not only of the Central Government but also of the States. Secondly, in a federal Constitution, Centre-State relationship is a matter of crucial importance. While other federal Constitutions have only skeletal provisions on this matter, the Indian Constitution has detailed norms. Thirdly, the Constitution has reduced to writing many unwritten conventions of the British Constitution, as for example, the principle of collective responsibility of the Ministers, parliamentary procedure, etc.

Fourthly, there exist various communities and groups in India. To remove mutual distrust among them, it was felt necessary to include in the Constitution detailed provisions on Fundamental Rights, safeguards to minorities, Scheduled Tribes, Scheduled Castes and Backward Classes.

Fifthly, to ensure that the future India be based on the concept of social welfare, the Constitution includes Directive Principles of State Policy.

Lastly, the Constitution contains not only the fundamental principles of governance but also many administrative details such as the provisions regarding citizenship, official language, government services, electoral machinery, etc. In other Constitutions, these matters are usually left to be regulated by the ordinary law of the land. The framers of the Indian Constitution, however, felt that unless these provisions were contained in the Constitution, the smooth and efficient working of the Constitution and the democratic process in the country might be jeopardised.

The form of administration has a close relation with the form of the Constitution, and the former must be appropriate to, and in the same sense as, the latter. It is quite possible to pervert the Constitutional mechanism without changing its form by merely changing the form of the administration and making it inconsistent with, and opposed to, the spirit of the Constitution. Since India was emerging as an independent country after a long spell of foreign rule, the country lacked democratic values. The Constitution-makers, therefore, thought it prudent not to take unnecessary risks, and incorporate in the Constitution itself the form of administration as well, instead of leaving it to the legislature, so that the whole mechanism may become viable.

It would, however, be wrong to suppose that the Indian Constitution with all its prolixity finally settles all problems of government. It leaves a number of matters to be taken care of by ordinary legislation. It also provides scope, though not so much as in Britain, for the growth and development of conventions.[57] Thus, the relationship between the President or the State Governor and his Council of Ministers, the concept of ministerial responsibility for acts of the officials, the relationship between the Prime Minister or the Chief Minister in a State and his Council of Ministers, the appointment of a State Governor, dissolution of the Lok Sabha or of a State Legislative Assembly by the President or the Governor respectively, the relations between the President and the Governor, are some of the matters which are left to be evolved by conventions.[58]

It is not correct to assume that the conventions of the British Constitution would operate suo motu in India wherever relevant and applicable. In course of time, some of these conventions have been questioned, and new conventions are in the process of emergence. This is mainly because most of the conventions of the British Constitution have been evolved in the context of a two-party system, while in India, a multiparty system is envolving. More will be said on this subject in later pages.

57. Supra, pp. 4-5.
58. See, Chs. III and VII, infra.

(c) PREAMBLE

Unlike the Constitutions of Australia, Canada or the U.S.A., the Constitution of India has an elaborate Preamble. The purpose of the Preamble is to clarify who has made the Constitution, what is its source, what is the ultimate sanction behind it; what is the nature of the polity which is sought to be established by the Constitution and what are its goals and objectives?

The Preamble does not grant any power but it gives a direction and purpose to the Constitution. It outlines the objectives of the whole Constitution. The Preamble contains the fundamentals of the Constitution. It serves several important purposes, as for example:

(1) It contains the enacting clause which brings the Constitution into force.

(2) It declares the great rights and freedoms which the people of India intended to secure to all its citizens.

(3) It declares the basic type of government and polity which is sought to be established in the country.

(4) It throws light on the source of the Constitution, viz. the People of India.

The words in the Preamble, "We the people of India...in our Constituent Assembly...do hereby adopt, enact and give to ourselves this Constitution", propound the theory that the 'sovereignty' lies in the people, that the Constitution, emanates from them; that the ultimate source for the validity of, and the sanction behind the Constitution is the will of the people; that the Constitution has not been imposed on them by any external authority, but is the handiwork of the Indians themselves.

Thus, the source of the Constitution are the people themselves from whom the Constitution derives its ultimate sanction. This assertion affirms the republican and democratic character of the Indian polity and the sovereignty of the people. The People of India thus constitute the sovereign political body who hold the ultimate power and who conduct the government of the country through their elected representatives.

The claim that the People of India have given to themselves the Constitution is in line with similar claims made in several other democratic Constitutions, such as those of the U.S.A.,[59] Ireland, etc.

---

59. "That the people have original right to establish, for their future government, such principles, as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness is the basis on which the whole American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a great exertion; nor can it, nor ought it, to be frequently repeated. The principles, therefore, so established, are deemed fundamental. And as the authority from which they proceed is supreme and can seldom act, they are designed to be permanent."
MARSHALL, C.J., in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cr. 137.
"India and the United States both recognise that the people are the basis of all sovereignty." DOUGLAS, supra, at 6.

As regards the nature of the Indian Polity, the Preamble to the Constitution declares India to be a 'Sovereign Socialist Secular Democratic Republic'. The term 'Sovereign' denotes that India is subject to no external authority and that the state has power to legislate on any subject in conformity with constitutional limitations.[60] The term 'democratic' signifies that India has a responsible and parliamentary form of government which is accountable to an elected legislature. The Supreme Court has declared 'democracy' as the basic feature of the Constitution.[61] The term 'Republic' denotes that the head of the state is not a hereditary monarch, but an elected functionary.

As to the grand objectives and socio-economic goals to achieve which the Indian Polity has been established, these are stated in the Preamble. These are: to secure to all its citizens social, economic and political justice; liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship; equality of status and opportunity, and to promote among them fraternity so as to secure the dignity of the individual and the unity and integrity of the Nation.

Emphasizing upon the significance of the three concepts of liberty, equality and fraternity used in the Preamble, Dr. Ambedkar observed in his closing speech in the Constituent Assembly on November 25, 1949 : "The principles of liberty, equality and fraternity are not to be treated as separate items in a trinity. They form a union of trinity in the sense that to divorce one from the other is to defeat the very purpose of democracy. Liberty cannot be divorced from equality, equality cannot be divorced from liberty. Nor can liberty and equality be divorced from fraternity. Without equality liberty would produce the supremacy of the few over the many. Equality without liberty, would kill individual initiative".[62]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the words "fraternity assuring the dignity of the individual" have "a special relevance in the Indian context" because of the social backwardness of certain sections of the community who had in the past been looked down upon.[63]

To give a concrete shape to these aspirations, the Constitution has a Chapter on Fundamental Rights which guarantee certain rights to the people, such as, freedom of the person, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, etc.[64]

According to the Supreme Court, "The Constitution envisions to establish an egalitarian social order rendering to every citizen, social, economic and political justice in a social and economic democracy of the Bharat Republic."[65] The Constitution thus ensures economic democracy along with political democracy.

The goals and objectives of the Indian Polity as stated in the Preamble are sought to be further clarified, strengthened and concretised through the Directive Principles of State Policy.[66] Therefore, it is essential that the Preamble be read

---

60. Synthetics v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1990) 1 SCC 109 : AIR 1990 SC 1927.
Also see, Charan Lal Sahu v. Union of India, (1990) 1 SCC 613 : AIR 1990 SC 1480.
61. See, infra, Ch. XLI; S.R. Bommai v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 1918 : (1994) 3 SCC 1.
62. B. SHIVA RAO, THE FRAMING OF INDIAN CONSTITUTION : SELECT DOCUMENTS, Vol. IV, 944.
63. Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 477 : 1992 Supp (3) SCC 217.
For a fuller discussion on this case, see, infra, under Art. 16; Ch. XXII.
64. See, infra, pp. 22-23; Chs. XX-XXXIII, infra.
65. Samatha v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1997 SC at 3326 : (1997) 8 SCC 191.
66. See below under "Welfare State", p. 20; Ch. XXXIV, infra.

along with the Directive Principles which lay down certain goals for the government to achieve so as to maximize social welfare of the people.

The Constitution is thus an instrument to achieve the goal of economic democracy along with political and social democracy. This aspect was emphasized upon by Dr. Ambedkar in his concluding speech in the Constituent Assembly:

> "Political democracy cannot last unless there lies at the base of it social democracy. What does social democracy mean? It means a way of life which recognises liberty, equality and fraternity..."

Ordinarily, Preamble is not regarded as a part of the statute, and, therefore, at one time, it was thought that the Preamble does not form part of the Constitution.[67] But that view is no longer extant. The majority of the Judges constituting the Bench in Kesavananda have laid down that the Preamble does form part of the Constitution. These Judges have bestowed great respect on the Preamble to the Constitution. For example, SIKRI, C.J., has observed in Kesavananda Bharati v. Union of India.[68]

> "It seems to me that the Preamble to our Constitution is of extreme importance and the Constitution should be read and interpreted in the light of the grand and noble vision expressed in the Preamble."

SHELAT and GROVER, J.J., have observed in the same case:[69]

> "Our Court has consistently looked to the Preamble for guidance and given it a transcendental position while interpreting the Constitution or other laws".

The Supreme Court has referred to the Preamble several times while interpreting constitutional provisions.[70]

The Preamble lays emphasis on the principle of equality which is basic to the Indian Constitution. The principle of equality is a basic feature or structure of the Constitution which means that even a constitutional amendment offending the basic structure of the Constitution is ultra vires. A legislature cannot transgress this basic feature of the Constitution while making a law.[71]

(d) SOCIALIST STATE

The word "socialist" was not there originally in the Preamble. It was added to the Preamble by the 42nd Amendment of the Constitution in 1976.[72] Thus, the concept of "socialism" has been made explicit and India's commitment to this ideal has been underlined and strengthened.

The term "socialist" has not been defined in the Constitution. It does not however envisage doctrinaire socialism in the sense of insistence on state ownership

---

67. In re Berubari Union and Exchange of Enclaves, AIR 1960 SC 845 : (1960) 3 SCR 250; infra, Ch. V.
68. AIR 1973 SC 1461 at 1506 : (1973) 4 SCC 225.
69. Ibid at 1578.
70. See, for example : In re : Berubari Union, AIR 1960 SC 845 : (1960) 3 SCR 250; Behram Khurshid Pesikaka v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 123 : (1955) 1 SCR 613; Basheshar Nath v. Commr. I.T., AIR 1959 SC 149 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 528; In re Kerala Education Bill, 1957, AIR 1958 SC 956 : 1959 SCR 995; Kesavananda Bharati v. State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC 1461 : (1973) 4 SCC 225.
71. See, infra, Ch. XLI.
72. See, Chs. XXXIV and XLII, infra.

as a matter of policy. It does not mean total exclusion of private enterprise and complete state ownership of material resources of the Nation.

In India, there has always been emphasis on mixed economy, i.e., along with a public sector, the private sector also has a role to play. The government accepts the policy of mixed economy where both public and private sectors co-exist side by side. However, the private enterprises has so far been rigorously controlled by the government[73], but signs are appearing on the horizon that in future the private enterprise is going to play a much more important economic role than it has played so far.

The Supreme Court has in a number of decisions referred to the concept of socialism and has used this concept along with the Directive Principles of State Policy[74] to assess and evaluate economic legislation. The Court has derived the concept of social justice and of an economically egalitarian society from the concept of socialism. According to the Supreme Court, "the principal aim of socialism is to eliminate inequality of income and status and standards of life, and to provide a decent standard of life to the working people."[75]

Democratic socialism aims to end poverty, ignorance, disease and inequality of opportunity. Socialistic concept of society should be implemented in the true spirit of the Constitution.[76] In Samatha v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[77] the Supreme Court has stated while defining socialism : "Establishment of the egalitarian social order through rule of law is the basic structure of the Constitution."[78]

The Court has laid emphasis on social justice so as to attain substantial degree of social, economic and political equality. Social justice and equality are complimentary to each other.[79]

Another idea propounded by the Court is that socialism means distributive justice so as to bring about the distribution of material resources of the community so as to subserve the common good.[80]

By reading the word 'socialist' in the Preamble with the Fundamental Rights contained in Arts. 14 and 16, the Supreme Court has deduced the Fundamental Right to equal pay for equal work and compassionate appointment.[81]

---

73. See, infra, under Art. 19(1)(g), Ch. XXIV, and Art. 301, Ch. XV.
Also see, Ch. XXXIV, infra.

74. See, Ch. XXXIV, infra.

75. D.S. Nakara v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 130 : (1983) 1 SCC 305. Also see, Minerva Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 1789 : (1980) 2 SCC 591; Randhir v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 879 : (1982) 1 SCC 618; S.R. Bommai v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 1918 : (1994) 3 SCC 1.

76. G.B. Pant University of Agriculture & Technology v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2000) 7 SCC 109 : AIR 2000 SC 2695; HSEB v. Suresh, (1999) 3 SCC 601 : AIR 1999 SC 1160.

77. AIR 1997 SC 3297, 3330 : (1997) 8 SCC 191.

78. For discussion on the concept of "Basic Structure of the Constitution", see infra, Ch. XLI.
For further discussion on the concept of socialism, see, Ch. XXXIV, infra, under Directive Principles.

79. Air India Statutory Corp. v. United labour Union, AIR 1997 SC 645 : (1997) 9 SCC 377.

80. For further discussion on this theme, see, Ch. XXXIV, infra, under "Directive Principles."

81. See, infra, Chs. XXI and XXIII; Balbir Kaur v. Steel Authority of India, AIR 2000 SC 1596 : (2000) 6 SCC 493.
Also see, Ch. XXXIV, infra.

(e) WELFARE STATE

The Indian Constitution has been conceived and drafted in the mid-twentieth century when the concept of social welfare state is the rule of the day. The Constitution is thus pervaded with the modern outlook regarding the objectives and functions of the state. It embodies a distinct philosophy of government, and explicitly declares that India will be organised as a social welfare state, i.e., a state which renders social services to the people and promotes their general welfare. In the formulations and declarations of the social objectives contained in the Preamble,[82] one can clearly discern the impact of the modern political philosophy which regards the state as an organ to secure the good and welfare of the people.

This concept of a welfare state is further strengthened by the Directive Principles of State Policy which set out the economic, social and political goals of the Indian Constitutional system. These directives confer certain non-justiciable rights on the people, and place the government under an obligation to achieve and maximise social welfare and basic social values like education, employment, health, etc.

In consonance with the modern beliefs of man, the Indian Constitution sets up a machinery to achieve the goal of economic democracy along with political democracy, for the latter would be meaningless without the former in a poor country like India.[83]

(f) SECULAR STATE

India is a country of religions. There exist multifarious religious groups in the country but, in spite of this, the Constitution stands for a secular state of India.

The word 'secular' was not present originally in the Preamble. It was added thereto by the 42nd Constitutional Amendment in 1976.[84] What was implicit in the Constitution until then became explicit. Even before 1976, the concept of secularism was very much embedded in the Indian constitutional jurisprudence as many court cases of this era would testify.[85]

The concept of "secularism" is difficult to define and has not thus been defined in the Constitution. Secularism has been inserted in the Preamble by reason of the Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act, 1976. The object of insertion was to spell out expressly the high ideas of secularism and the compulsive need to maintain the integrity of the nation which are subjected to considerable stresses and strains, and vested interests have been trying to promote their selfish ends to the great detriment of the public good.[86] The concept is based on certain postulates. Thus, there is no official religion in India. There is no state-recognised church or religion. Several fundamental rights guarantee freedom of worship and religion as well as outlaw discrimination on the ground of religion

---

82. See above (c) under "Preamble".
83. For Directive Principles, see Ch. XXXIV, infra.
84. See Ch. XLII, infra.
85. See, Ch. XXIX, infra.
86. M. P. Gopalakrishnan Nair v. State of Kerala, (2005) 11 SCC 45 : AIR 2005 SC 3053.

and, thus, by implication prohibit the establishment of a theocratic state. The state does not identify itself with, or favour, any particular religion. The state is enjoined to treat all religions and religious sects equally. No one is disabled to hold any office on the ground of religion. There is only one electoral roll on which are borne the names of all qualified voters.[87]

The essential basis of the Indian Constitution is that all citizens are equal, and that the religion of a citizen is irrelevant in the matter of his enjoyment of Fundamental Rights. The Constitution ensures equal freedom for all religions and provides that the religion of the citizen has nothing to do in socio-economic matters. "Though the Indian Constitution is secular and does not interfere with religious freedom, it does not allow religion to impinge adversely on the secular rights of citizens or the power of the state to regulate socio-economic relations."[88]

The Supreme Court has declared secularism as the basic feature of the Indian Constitution.[89] The Court has further declared that secularism is a part of fundamental law and an unalienable segment of the basic structure of the country's political system.[90] It has explained that secularism is not to be confused with communal or religious concepts of an individual or a group of persons. It means that the State should have no religion of its own and no one could proclaim to make the State have one such or endeavour to create a theocratic State. Persons belonging to different religions live throughout the length and breadth of the country. Each person, whatever be his religion, must get an assurance from the State that he has the protection of law freely to profess, practise and propagate his religion and freedom of conscience. Otherwise, the rule of law will become replaced by individual perceptions of one's own presumptions of good social order. Religion cannot be mixed with secular activities of the State and fundamentalism of any kind cannot be permitted to masquerade as political philosophies to the detriment of the larger interest of society and basic requirement of a Welfare State. The Court noted disturbing trends. It noted that lately, vested interests fanning religious fundamentalism of all kinds, and vying with each other, are attempting to subject the Constitutional machineries of the State to great stress and strain with certain quaint ideas of religious priorities.

(g) RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT

To give reality and content to the democratic ideals propounded in the Preamble, the Constitution establishes parliamentary form of government both at the

---

87. Ch. XIX, infra.

88. I.L.I., SECULARISM : ITS IMPLICATIONS FOR LAW AND LIFE IN INDIA, 4-5(1966); Also, V.P. LUTHRA, CONCEPT OF THE SECULAR STATE IN INDIA (1964); J.M. SHELAT, SECULARISM, PRINCIPLES AND APPLICATION, (1972); SRIVASTAVA, RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IN INDIA (1982).

89. Kesavananda v. State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC 1461 : (1973) 4 SCC 225; infra, Ch. XLI; S.R. Bommai v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 1918 : (1994) 3 SCC 1; infra, Chs. XIII and XXIX.

90. State of Karnataka v. Praveen Bhai Thogadia, (2004) 4 SCC 684 : AIR 2004 SC 2081.

Centre and the States, in which the executive is responsible to an elected legislature.

This system differs fundamentally from the presidential system prevailing in America. Whereas the American system is based on the doctrine of separation of powers between the executive and the legislative organs, the Indian system is based on the principle of co-ordination and co-operation of the two organs.[1]

The popular Houses at the Centre and the States are elected on the basis of adult suffrage.[2] The President, the Head of the Indian Union, is elected by the elected members of Parliament and the State Legislative Assemblies. This system of election ensures that the President is the choice of the people throughout the country and that he represents both the Centre and the States.[3]

The executive power though formally vested in the President, is in effect exercised by the Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister and responsible to the Lok Sabha.[4] The President is more of a symbol, a high dignitary having ceremonial functions. The same pattern has been duplicated in the States with some modifications.[5]

The head of a State is the Governor who is a nominee of the Centre and, though largely a symbol like the President, yet has some functions to discharge as a representative of the Central Government. Effective power in a State, like the Centre, lies in the Council of Ministers headed by the Chief Minister and responsible to the elected House of the State Legislature.[6]

Details of the relationship existing between the President or the Governor and the respective Council of Ministers are not fully set out in the Constitution. This is an area, therefore, where conventions play a significant role.[7]

(h) FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

The Indian Constitution guarantees to the people certain basic human rights and freedoms, such as, inter alia, equal protection of laws, freedom of speech and expression, freedom of worship and religion, freedom of assembly and association, freedom to move freely and to reside and settle anywhere in India, freedom to follow any occupation, trade or business, freedom of person, freedom, against double jeopardy and against ex post facto laws. Untouchability, the age old scourge afflicting the Hindu Society, has been formally abolished.[8]

A person can claim Fundamental Rights against the state subject to the state imposing some permissible restrictions in the interests of social control. The grounds for impositing these restrictions on Fundamental Rights are expressly mentioned in the Constitution itself and, therefore, these rights can be abridged only to the extent laid down.

---

1. For discussion of the Presidential System, see, infra, Ch. III.
2. See, Chs. II, VI and XIX, infra.
3. See, Ch. III, infra.
4. See, infra, Ch. III.
5. See, Ch. VII, infra.
6. See, infra, Ch. VII, under State Executive.
7. See, supra, pp. 4-5.
8. For Fundamental Rights see, infra, Chs. XX-XXXIII.

These rights, in substance, constitute inhibitions on the legislative and executive organs of the state. No law or executive action infringing a Fundamental Right can be regarded valid. In this way, the Constitution de marcates an area of individual freedom and liberty wherein government cannot interfere.

The Constitution provides an effective machinery in Arts. 32 and 226 for the enforcement of these Rights.[9] Without due enforcement, these Rights will be of not much use. The judiciary ensures an effective and speedy enforcement of these rights.

Since the inauguration of the Constitution, many significant legal battles have been fought in the area of Fundamental Rights and, thus, a mass of interesting case-law has accumulated in this area. On the whole, the Supreme Court has taken the position that the Fundamental Rights should be interpreted broadly and liberally and not narrowly. As the Court has observed in Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India:[10]

> "The attempt of the Court should be to expand the reach and ambit of the Fundamental Rights rather than to attenuate their meaning and content by a process of judicial construction".

The Constitution-makers decided to incorporate Fundamental Rights in the Constitution because of several reasons, such as, consciousness of the massive minority problem in India; memories of the protracted struggle against the despotic British rule; acknowledgement of the Gandhian ideals; the climate of international opinion and the American experience.

These Fundamental Rights have been conceived in a liberal spirit and seek to draw a reasonable balance between individual freedom and social control. These rights constitute a counterpart of the American Bill of Rights and though there are quite a few signs of resemblance between the two, the Fundamental Rights in India cover a much wider ground and are expressed in much greater detail than is the case in the U.S.A. The Bill of Rights in the U.S.A. has served as a bulwark against abuse of authority by the organs of government and has made a tremendous contribution to the promotion of a regime of freedom and liberty. The Fundamental Rights also play a similar role and promote rule of law in India.[11]

One of the most notable developments which has taken place in the Indian Constitutional jurisprudence since 1978 has been that the Supreme Court has declared that Fundamental Rights can even be implied over and above those which have been expressly stated in the Constitution. The Supreme Court does not follow the rule that unless a right is expressly stated as a Fundamental Right, it cannot be treated as one. Overtime, the Court has been able to imply, by its creative interpretative process, several Fundamental Rights out of the ones expressly stated in the Constitution. Thus, the range and coverage of the Fundamental Rights can go on expanding as a result of judicial interpretation of the Constitution in tune with the needs of a developing socio-economic society.[12]

---

9. See, Chs. IV, VII and XXXIII, infra.

10. AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248. For a detailed discussion on this case, see, Ch. XXVI, infra.

11. See, infra, Ch. XL, on "Constitutional Interpretation".
Also, Chs. XX-XXXIII, infra.

12. For discussion on this aspect, see, infra, Chs. XXVI, XXXIV and XL.

(i) MINORITIES AND BACKWARD CLASSES

The Indian society lacks homogeneity as there exist differences of religion, language, culture, etc. There are sections of people who are comparatively weaker than others—economically, socially and culturally—and their lot can be ameliorated only when the state makes a special effort to that end. Mutual suspicion and distrust exists between various religious and linguistic groups.

To promote a sense of security among the Minorities, to ameliorate the conditions of the depressed and backward classes, to make them useful members of society, to weld the diverse elements into one national and political stream, the Constitution contains a liberal scheme of safeguards to Minorities, Backward Classes and Scheduled Castes. Provisions have thus been made, inter alia, to reserve seats in the Legislatures,[13] to make reservations in services,[14] to promote the welfare of the depressed and Backward Classes[15] and to protect the language and culture of the minorities.[16] No weightage or special privilege has, however, been accorded to any section in the matter of representation in the legislatures.[17]

The Constitution also sets up an effective institutional machinery to oversee that these safeguards are properly effectuated by the various governments in the country. This machinery has now been strengthened by statutory bodies.[18]

(j) ELECTIONS

India has adopted adult suffrage as a basis of elections to the Lok Sabha and the State Legislative Assemblies. Every citizen, male or female, who has reached the age of 18 years or over, has a right to vote without any discrimination.[19]

It was indeed a very bold step on the part of the Constitution-makers to adopt adult suffrage in a country of teeming millions of illiterate people, but they did so to make democracy broad-based and to base the system of government on the ultimate sanction of the people.

To introduce any property or educational qualification for exercising the franchise would have amounted to a negation of democratic principles, as such a qualification would have disenfranchised a large number of depressed and poor people. Further, it cannot be assumed that a person with a bare elementary education is in a better position to vote than a labourer or a cultivator who knows what his interests are and will choose his representatives accordingly.[20]

Several general elections have been held so far on the basis of adult franchise, and from all accounts, the step taken by the framers appears to have been well-advised.

To ensure free, impartial and fair elections, and to protect the elections from being manipulated by the politicians, the Constitution sets up an autonomous

---

13. Chs. II, VI and XXXV, infra.
14. Ch. XXIII, infra.
15. Chs. XXII, XXXIV and XXXV, infra.
16. Chs. XVI and XXX, infra.
17. JAIN, Safeguards to Minorities: Constitutional Principles, Policies and Framework in I.L.I., MINORITIES AND THE LAW (1972). Also see, infra, Chs. XIX and XXXV.
18. See, infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. F.
19. See, Ch. XIX, infra.
20. ALLADI K. AYYAR, CONSTITUTION AND THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS, 6; XI CAD 835.

Election Commission to supervise and conduct elections to Parliament and State Legislatures.[21]

(k) JUDICIARY

A notable feature of the Constitution is that it accords a dignified and crucial position to the judiciary.[22]

A well-ordered and well-regulated judicial machinery has been introduced in the country with the Supreme Court at the apex. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is very broad. It is the general court of appeal from the High Courts, the ultimate arbiter in all Constitutional matters and also enjoys an advisory jurisdiction.[23] It can hear appeals from any court or tribunal in the country and can issue writs for enforcing the Fundamental Rights.[24] There is thus a good deal of truth in the assertion that the Supreme Court of India has wider powers than the highest court in any other federation.

There exists a High Court in each State. The High Courts have wide jurisdiction and have been constituted into important instruments of justice. They are the general Court of appeal from the Courts subordinate to them. The most significant aspect of their jurisdiction is the power to issue writs[25]. The writ-jurisdiction of the High Courts is invoked very commonly to enforce Fundamental Rights and to control administrative process.

Although the Indian and the American Constitutions are both federal in nature, the Indian judicial system differs from that of the U.S.A., inter alia, in one very significant respect, viz., whereas the U.S.A. has a dual system of courts—a federal judiciary with the Supreme Court at the top along with a separate and parallel judicial system in each State—India has a unified and not a dual system of courts. The Supreme Court, the High Courts and the Lower Courts constitute a single, unified, judiciary having jurisdiction over all cases arising under any law whether enacted by Parliament or a State Legislature.

The unified judicial system avoids diversity in remedial procedures and confusing jurisdictional conflicts between the two parallel judicial systems such as arise in the U.S.A. The Indian system thus has the advantage of simplicity over its American counterpart. As Justice DOUGLAS observes, "The dual system is in many respects cumbersome, expensive and productive of delays in the administration of justice," and that "it has presented difficulties and perplexities that the other federal systems have not experienced".[26]

The judiciary in India has been assigned a significant role to play. It has to dispense justice not only between one person and another, but also between the state and the citizens. It interprets the Constitution and acts as its guardian by keeping all authorities—legislative, executive, administrative, judicial and quasi-judicial—within bounds. The judiciary is entitled to scrutinise any governmental action in order to assess whether or not it conforms with the Constitution and the valid laws made thereunder. The judiciary supervises the administrative process

---

21. Ch. XIX, infra.
22. For details of the Judicial System see, infra, Chs. IV and VIII.
23. See, infra, Ch. IV, for details.
24. See, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A, infra.
25. See, infra, Chs. VIII and XXXIII.
26. DOUGLAS, op. cit., 86-7.

in the country, and acts as the balance-wheel of federalism by settling inter-governmental disputes.

The judiciary has power to protect people's Fundamental Rights from any undue encroachment by any organ of the government. The Supreme Court, in particular, acts as the guardian and protector of the Fundamental Rights of the people. A person complaining of breach of his Fundamental Right can straight away invoke the Court's writ jurisdiction under Art. 32 of the Constitution.[27] In the words of the Court itself, it acts "as a sentinal on the qui vive to protect Fundamental Rights"[28]. While interpreting the Fundamental Rights and other Constitutional provisions, at times, the Supreme Court has displayed judicial creativity of a very high order. The Court accepts that it has to play a law-creative role.[29]

To enable the Supreme Court and the High Courts to discharge their functions impartially, without fear or favour, the Constitution contains provisions to safeguard judicial independence. The Judges of these Courts are appointed by the Central Executive on the advice of the Judges themselves. Once appointed, the Judges hold office till they reach the age of superannuation as fixed by the Constitution and, thus, their tenure is independent of the will of the executive. A special procedure has been laid down for removing the Judges on the ground of incapacity or misbehaviour.[30]

The Constitutional provisions establishing an independent judiciary, having the power of 'judicial review' go a long way in establishing within the country a government according to law. As already stated, 'judicial review' has been declared to be a basic feature of the Indian Constitution.[31]

(l) FEDERAL CONSTITUTION

India's Constitution is of the federal type. It establishes a dual polity, a two tier governmental system, with the Central Government at one level and the State Government at the other. The Constitution marks off the sphere of action of each level of government by devising an elaborate scheme of distribution of legislative, administrative, and financial powers between the Centre and the States. A government is entitled to act within its assigned field and cannot go out of it, or encroach on the field assigned to the other government.

India is a member of the family of federations, of which the better known members are the U.S.A., Canada and Australia. The Indian Federalism has been designed after a close and careful study of the contemporary trends in these federations. Consequently, the Indian federal scheme while incorporating the advantages of a federal structure, yet seeks to mitigate some of its usual weaknesses of rigidity and legalism.[32] It does not, therefore, follow strictly the conventional or orthodox 27. Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A, infra.

---

28. Pathumma v. State of Kerala, AIR 1978 SC 771, at 774 : (1978) 2 SCC 1. See, infra, Chs. XXXXIII.

29. See, infra, Ch. XL.

Some of the cases to which reference can be made in this connection are : Golak Nath, AIR 1967 SC 1643 : (1967) 2 SCR 762; Kesavananda, AIR 1973 SC 1461 : (1973) 4 SCC 225; Maneka Gandhi, AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248; Unni Krishnan, AIR 1993 SC 2178 : (1993) 1 SCC 645.

30. See Chs. IV and VIII, infra, for details of the process of judicial appointments.

31. See, Ch. XLI, infra; supra, footnote 53, on page 12.

32. For a detailed discussion on Federalism, see, infra, Chs. X-XVII.

federal pattern. Along with adopting some of the techniques developed in other federations for making the federal fabric viable, it also breaks much new ground and develops some novel expedients and techniques of its own, and is thus characterised by several distinctive features as compared with other federal countries.

Instead of the word "federation" the word "Union" was deliberately selected by the Drafting Committees of the Constituent Assembly to indicate two things viz. (a) that the Indian Union is not the result of an agreement by the states and (b) the component states; have no freedom to secede from it. Though the country and the people may be divided into different States for convenience of administration, the country is one integral whole, its people a single people living under a single imperium derived from a single source.[33]

Within a federal framework, the Indian Constitution provides for a good deal of centralisation. The Central Government has a large sphere of action and thus plays a more dominant role than the States. There is a long Concurrent List containing subjects of common interest to both the Centre and the States. The emergency provisions provide a simple way of transforming the normal federal fabric into an almost unitary system so as to meet national emergencies effectively.[34]

In certain situations, Parliament becomes competent to legislate even in the exclusive State field, and the process of amending the Constitution is not very rigid. India's Federalism is thus a flexible mechanism. The Constitution devises several structural techniques to promote intergovernmental co-operation and thus India furnishes a notable example of co-operative federalism.

India is a dual polity but has only a single citizenship, viz., the Indian citizenship, and there is no separate State citizenship.[35] This is in contrast to the American pattern of dual citizenship—the citizenship of the U.S.A and that of each State. This creates the problem that a State may, in certain cases, discriminate in favour of its own citizens in some matters, such as, the right to hold a public office, to vote, to obtain employment, or to secure licences for practising such professions as law or medicine in the State. The concept of one citizenship in India seeks to avoid some of these difficulties. By and large, an Indian enjoys practically the same political and civil rights of citizenship throughout the country no matter in which State he resides.

While each State of the U.S.A is free to draft its own Constitution covering matters within its competence, it is not so in India where the Constitution is a single frame which applies to the Centre as well as the States, from which neither can get out and within which each must work. India has achieved, and seeks to maintain, uniformity in basic civil and criminal laws. In other federations, duality of government produces a diversity of laws. This diversity may be alright up to a point as being an attempt to accommodate the laws to local needs and circum-

---

33. Hinsa Virodhak Sangh v. Mirzapur Moti Juresh Jamat, (2008) 5 SCC 33 : AIR 2008 SC 1892.

34. "All federal systems including the American are placed in a tight mould of federalism. No matter what the circumstances, it cannot change its form and shape. It can never be unitary. On the other hand, the (Indian) Constitution can be both unitary as well as federal according to the requirements of time and circumstances. In normal times, it is framed to work as a federal system. But in times of war it is so designed as to make it work as though it was a unitary system".
AMBEDKAR, VII CAD 34-35.

35. On Citizenship, see, infra, Ch. XVIII.

stances. But then, beyond a certain point, it may cause confusion to the people. It may also retard movement of people from one place to another because something which is lawful in one State may be regarded as unlawful in another State. Such a situation has been largely avoided in India. Before 1935, India was governed as a unitary state, and a uniform system of laws had been established in many areas like civil procedure, criminal procedure, crimes, evidence, transfer of property, marriage, divorce, inheritance.[36] The Constitution places these subjects in the Concurrent List so that uniformity may be preserved in these laws which are at the basis of civil and corporate life without impairing the federal system.

Under the impact of wars, international crises, scientific and technological developments, and the emergence of the political philosophy of social welfare state, the whole concept of federalism has been undergoing a change; centralising tendencies have become manifest, and strong national governments have emerged in practically every federation. Taking note of these developments, and keeping in view the practical needs of the country, the Constitution-makers designed for India a federal structure, not with a view to its conformity with some static or theoretical pattern, but to subserve the needs of a vast and diverse country like India.

The Indian Constitution-makers were swayed not by any theoretical or a priori, but by pragmatic, considerations in designing federalism. The Constitution initiates a few new trends in the area of federalism. The scholars have characterised the Constitution in various ways, e.g., quasi-federal, unitary with federal features, federal with unitary features, centralised federation, etc. The fact, however, remains that though the Centre in India is strong, and utmost intergovernmental co-operation is sought to be promoted within the Constitutional frame-work, yet the States are not agents of the Centre; they exist under the Constitution and not at the sufferance of the Centre; they enjoy large amount of autonomy in normal times; their powers are derived from the Constitution and not from the Central laws; and the federal portion of the Constitution can be amended not unilaterally by the Centre alone but only with the co-operation of the Centre and the States.[37] These aspects constitute the elements and essence of federalism and these are all present in the Indian Federation. Federalism has been declared to be an essential feature of the Constitution and a part of its basic structure.[38]

F. FUNDAMENTAL LAW

The Constitution of India being written constitutes the fundamental law of the land. This has several significant implications. It is under this fundamental law that all laws are made and executed, all governmental authorities act and the validity of their functioning adjudged. No legislature can make a law, and no governmental agency can act, contrary to the Constitution. No act, executive, legislative, judicial or quasi-judicial, of any administrative agency can stand if contrary to the Constitution. The Constitution thus conditions the whole governmental process in the country. The judiciary is obligated to see that the provisions

---

36. For a discussion on the process of development of laws in India see, JAIN, OUTLINES OF INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, XXIV-XXVIII (1990).
37. On the Constitution Amendment Process, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
38. See, Ch. XLI, infra.

of the Constitution are not violated by any governmental organ. This function of the judiciary entitles it to be called as the 'guardian' of the Constitution and it can declare an Act of a legislature or an administrative action contrary to the Constitution as invalid.[39] A Constitutional right cannot be thwarted by any concession of counsel.[40]

Since Britain has no written Constitution, courts there interpret the law but not the Constitution. The Indian courts, on the other hand, are also entrusted with the task of rendering an authoritative interpretation of the Constitution, and because of this arbitral function, they assume the character of vital instruments of government and policy-making.[41] Further, the Constitution is amendable not by ordinary legislative process, but by a special and elaborate procedure and, therefore, the constituent process differs from the ordinary legislative process. The Indian Constitution can, therefore, be characterised as rigid as distinguished from the British Constitution which is of the flexible type as it can be amended by the ordinary legislative process.[42]

Though rigid, the Indian Constitution contains within itself elements of growth, dynamism, expansion and flexibility. It does not seek to impose on the country any particular economic philosophy or social order. It establishes a democratic process of government for over 1000 million people and for that reason India is characterised as the biggest democracy in the world. The founding fathers have given to the people of India a Constitutional fabric which is in line with the world's most democratic concepts and which the people can use to organize a social structure according to their genius and needs following the path of rule of law.

39. For Judicial Interpretation of the Constitution, see, Ch. XL, infra.
40. Election Commission of India v. St. Mary's School, (2008) 2 SCC 390 : AIR 2008 SC 655..
41. See, infra, Ch. XL. Also see, UPENDRA BAXI, THE INDIAN SUPREME COURT AND POLITICS (1980)
42. For Amending Process, of the Constitution, see, infra, Ch. XLI.

PART II

THE UNION [OR LESS FORMALLY] OF INDIA AS A CONSTITUTIONAL ENTITY

Structurally, the Union may be resolved into three institutional components: (a) Legislative as represented by Parliament; (b) Executive as represented by the President and the Council of Ministers; and (c) Judicial as represented by the Supreme Court of India.

The composition, structure and powers of these three components, and their relationship inter se with each other, are discussed in the following few Chapters.

Articles 53 to 151 of the Constitution deal with the Union. Of these, Arts. 52 to 78 and 123 deal with the composition and powers of the Central Executive, Arts. 79 to 122 and 148-151 lay down the composition, powers and procedures of Parliament, and Arts. 124 to 147 deal with the Constitution and powers of the Supreme Court.

CHAPTER II

PARLIAMENT

SYNOPSIS

A. CONSTITUTION OF PARLIAMENT

India's Parliament is bicameral. The lower House is designated as the 'House of the People' or Lok Sabha, and the Upper House as the 'Council of States' or Rajya Sabha. The two Houses along with the President constitute Parliament [Art. 79]. All these three organs are essential to the process of legislation by Parliament.[1]

The President does not sit or participate in the deliberations in any House but he is a constituent part of Parliament in the sense that he has certain important functions to discharge in relation thereto, as for example, he summons the Houses, dissolves the Lok Sabha, prorogues the meetings of the Houses, gives assent to the Bills passed by the two Houses, etc.[2]

In Britain, Parliament consists of the Crown, the House of Commons and the House of Lords. India thus follows the British model in making the President, a counterpart of the British Crown, a constituent part of Parliament. In the United States, the central legislature, known as the Congress, consists of the Senate and the House of Representatives. Unlike India or England, the President is not regarded as a constituent part of the Congress because of the doctrine of separation of powers.[3]

The two Houses of Parliament in India differ from each other in many respects. They are constituted on entirely different principles, and, from a functional point of view, they do not enjoy a co-equal status.

Lok Sabha is a democratic chamber elected directly by the people on the basis of adult suffrage. It is thus designed to reflect the popular will and in this lies its strength. It is to Lok Sabha that the Council of Ministers is responsible[4] and it has the last word in such matters as taxation and expenditure of public money[5].

Rajya Sabha, on the other hand, is constituted by indirect elections. Constitutionally the Council of Ministers is not responsible to it. Because of these rea-

---

1. See. J., infra.
2. See, infra, under "Meeting of Parliament", Sec. G.
3. Infra, Chapter III, Sec. E.
4. See, infra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
5. Infra, this Chapter, Sec. J(ii).

sons, the role of Rajya Sabha in the country's affairs is somewhat secondary to that of Lok Sabha, and this is so in spite of the fact that there are a few powers in the arena of Centre-State relations which can be exercised only by the Rajya Sabha and not by the Lok Sabha[6].

Rajya Sabha is designed to fulfil a number of purposes. First, it has been envisaged as a forum to which seasoned and experienced public men might get access without undergoing the din and bustle of a general election which is inevitable for finding a seat in the Lok Sabha. In this way, senior public men are enabled to apply their mature judgment and wisdom to solving the problems facing the country. The value of the Upper House, therefore, lies in the talent, experience and knowledge which it can harness to the service of the country which might be lost otherwise.

Secondly, Rajya Sabha serves as a debating chamber to hold dignified debates and acts as a revising chamber over the Lok Sabha which, being a popular chamber, may at times be swayed to act hastily under pressure of public opinion or in the heat of passions of the moment. The existence of two debating chambers means that all proposals and programmes of the government are discussed twice and that these will be adopted after mature and calm consideration, and thus precipitous action may be prevented. As a revising chamber, the Rajya Sabha may also help in improving Bills passed by the Lok Sabha.

Lastly, the Rajya Sabha is designed to serve as a chamber where the States of the Union of India are represented as States in keeping with the federal principle. The House has, therefore, been given some federal functions to discharge in its character of a House representing the States.[7] In practice, however, the Rajya Sabha does not act as a champion of local interests, or as a battle ground between the Centre and the States. Even though elected by the State Legislatures, the members of the Rajya Sabha vote not at the dictate of the State concerned, but according to their own views and party affiliation. Rajya Sabha has thus emerged as a forum where problems are discussed and considered from a national rather than a local perspective.

Demands are made now and then to abolish the Rajya Sabha. The Lok Sabha discussed a private member's resolution to this effect on March 30, 1973, but the general view was in favour of its retention.

B. COMPOSITION OF RAJYA SABHA

The maximum strength of Rajya Sabha has been fixed at 250 members. Of these, up to 238 members are the elected representatives of the States and the Union Territories [Art. 80(1)(b)], and twelve members are nominated by the President from amongst those who have special knowledge or practical experience of such matters as literature, science, art and social services [Arts. 80(1)(a) and 80(3)].

The seats in the House are allotted among the various States and the Union Territories on the basis of population, the formula being one seat for each million of population for the first five millions and thereafter one seat for every two million population or part thereof exceeding one million. A slight advantage is thus given to the States with smaller population over the States with bigger population. Proportionately larger representation has been given to the Union Territory of Delhi in view of the fact that it has no local legislature of its own and Parliament itself functions as such.

6. See, infra, Ch. X.
7. See, under "Federalism", infra, Ch. X.

In the Constituent Assembly, a view was propounded that, on the analogy of the American Senate,[8] the States in India should have equal representation in the Rajya Sabha irrespective of their differences in area or population. This view, however, did not prevail and the distribution of seats in the House came to be fixed on a population basis with a slight weightage in favour of comparatively less populous States. The allocation of seats in the House among the States and the Union Territories is as follows [Art. 80(2) and the Fourth Schedule]:

Andhra Pradesh, 18; Assam, 7; Bihar, 16; Goa, 1; Chhattisgarh, 5; Gujarat, 11; Haryana, 5; Jharkhand, 6; Kerala, 9; Madhya Pradesh, 11; Maharashtra; 19; Karnataka, 12; Orissa, 10; Punjab, 7; Rajasthan, 10; Tamil Nadu, 18; Uttar Pradesh, 31; Uttaranchal, 3; West Bengal, 16; Jammu and Kashmir, 4; Nagaland, 1; Delhi, 3; Himachal Pradesh, 3; Manipur, 1; Pondicherry, 1; Tripura, 1; Meghalaya, 1; Mizoram, 1; Arunachal Pradesh, 1; Sikkim, 1; Total 233.

The representatives of a State in Rajya Sabha are elected by the elected members of the State Legislative Assembly in accordance with the system of proportional representation by means of a single transferable vote [Arts. 80(1)(b) and 80(4)]. This method of election ensures that only such members are chosen for Rajya Sabha as are cognisant with the needs and attitudes of the State concerned. It also underlines the idea that Rajya Sabha represents the States as such.

However, in order to be eligible to be elected to the Council of States, a person need not be a representative of the State beforehand nor an elector or a voter registered nor a resident in the State itself. It is only when he is elected to represent the State that he becomes a representative of the State. Therefore, the word "representative" simply means a person chosen by the people or by the elected Members of the Legislative Assembly to represent their several interests in one of the Houses of Parliament.[9]

The system of proportional representation helps in giving due representation to minority groups as well. As all the Union Territories do not have Legislatures of their own, the method of electing members of Rajya Sabha from a Union Territory has been left to be prescribed by Parliament by law [Art. 80(5)].

As regards the nominated members, objection was taken in the Constituent Assembly to the nominative principle on the ground that it fundamentally mars the principle of election; that it militates against the symmetry of the Constitution of our legislative bodies; and that the presidential nominations might be criticised on the ground of favouritism. But the objection did not prevail and the nominative principle was adopted with a view to give representation to certain non-political interests which might not otherwise get any representation in Parliament.[10]

In making nominations to Rajya Sabha, the President acts on the advice of the Council of Ministers. Further, the Courts do not interfere with the presidential

---

8. See, infra, p. 37.
9. Kuldip Nayar v. Union of India, (2006) 7 SCC 1, at page 88 et seq : AIR 2006 SC 3127.
10. VII CAD 1200, 1221; AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION; CORNERSTONE OF A NATION, 156-163 (1966).

power to make nominations.[11] There is no difference of status between the elected and the nominated members of Rajya Sabha, except that the former do, and the latter do not, participate in the election of the President of India.[12]

Rajya Sabha is a continuing body and is not subject to dissolution [Art. 83(1)] One-third of its members retire every two years [Art. 83(1)], and their seats are filled up by fresh elections and presidential nominations. This rotational system ensures continuity of Rajya Sabha while still enabling each State Legislative Assembly to elect periodically a few members to the House so that the prevailing party strength and contemporary views and attitudes in the State are reflected therein. Consequently, Rajya Sabha does not get stale and remains in touch with the current problems of the community due to the periodic infusion of fresh blood.

It will be illuminating to compare the composition of Rajya Sabha with that of the upper chambers in England and some federations.

(a) HOUSE OF LORDS

The House of Lords is one of the oldest chambers of the world. Its composition is not, however, particularly rational as there is no elective or popular element involved in it. It consists mostly of hereditary peers created by the Crown on the advice of the Ministers, and had been characterised as the 'common fortress of wealth' as most of its members were either landlords or leaders of trade and industry, who inherit the 'peerage' and the right to sit in the House from their ancestors.

Nowadays, peerage is also conferred for 'political and public service' on retired Ministers and former members of the House of Commons who wish to take leave of active politics but do not wish to snap their relationship with Parliament completely. Due to this factor, the traditional aristocratic character of the House is being gradually diluted. Because of its preponderantly hereditary composition, and lack of responsibility to the electorate, the House was regarded as an "indefensible anachronism," in the modern democratic era.[13] It was logically indefensible, and an anachronism that a House consisting primarily of unelected hereditary peers should have a significant role to play in democratic government.

A few steps have been taken to rationalise its structure to some extent. With the passing of the House of Lords Act, 1999 the number of members who are hereditary life peers has been considerably reduced. Currently, the number is 92 out of a total membership of 721. The old rule barring a woman peeress from sitting in the House has been abrogated. Provision has been made to confer life peerage. Life peers can sit and vote in the House. A life peerage may be conferred on a woman. This had made it possible to strengthen the House of Lords by nominating politicians and statesmen as life peers, without swelling the ranks of hereditary peers. The Peerage Act, 1963, enables a hereditary peer to renounce his title.

---

11. See, infra, GOVERNOR'S POWER TO MAKE NOMINATIONS TO STATE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, Ch. VI.
12. See, infra, Ch. III.
13. FINER, THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MODERN GOVERNMENT, 407-8 (1956); JENNINGS, PARLIAMENT, 381-453 (1970); DE SMITH, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 287, 300 (1977); MARRISON, GOVERNMENT AND PARLIAMENT, 187 (1954); LASKI, PARLIAMENTARY GOVERNMENT IN ENGLAND, 111-138 (1959).

The House is a permanent body in the sense that dissolution of Parliament does not involve the Lords to lose their seats in the House, for they sit under a hereditary or life title and represent no constituency.

As will be seen, Rajya Sabha is composed on an entirely different basis. There is no hereditary principle involved in its composition. It is elected, though indirectly, and thus represents, to some extent, the current public opinion. Its membership is not for life but for six years. Needless to say, an institution like the House of Lords, has no place in a modern democracy.[14]

(b) FEDERATIONS

In some federal countries, the Upper House has been designed so as to reflect the interests or views of the constituent States and provide a means of protecting the States or their inhabitants against improper federal measures.[15]

In the United States, the Senate is composed on, what is known as the federal principle. Each constituent State, irrespective of its size or population, sends two Senators and thus has an equality of representation in the House. On the other hand, the House of Representatives is constituted on population basis.

This 'partly federal, partly national, character of the U.S. Congress resulted from a dispute between the smaller and bigger States at the time of Constitution-making. The smaller States, fearing that they would be overwhelmed by the more populous States, demanded equal representation in the federal legislature. The bigger States saw in equal suffrage the possibility of dominance by a minority of the population. Further, all the States whether big or small shared a common apprehension that the federal centre might unduly encroach on their interests and authority. The final solution was thus a practical compromise : in one House, equality of representation to the constituent States and, in the other, representation according to population. Equal representation in the Senate gives some security to the smaller States that the Central Government would not exercise its powers only in the interests of a few big States.

The Senators are elected by the popular vote of the people in their States. The tenure of a Senator is six years. The Senate is a continuing body and one-third of its members retire every two years.

With the passage of time, the original role of the Senate of guarding the interests of the States as political units has largely disappeared. It now functions more as a national institution rather than as a champion of local interests. This transformation has taken place due to several factors, such as, direct election of the Senators by the people on a State wide franchise, development of strong political parties advocating national programmes, development of a national consciousness and national integration. The Senate is a powerful body and equal representation here gives to the smaller States a voice much greater than what they could otherwise hope to have in federal affairs.

Similarly, in Australia, the thinly populated agricultural States, concerned at the prospect of domination by the larger commercial States, insisted on an upper chamber having an equal number of Senators from each State regardless of its size or population. Thus, each State sends 10 Senators who are elected by means of proportional representation. This ensures that Senate membership will reflect party popularity in the country. A State is treated as a single constituency.

---

14. LORD CHORLEY, HOUSE OF LORDS CONTROVERSY, 1958 Public Law, 216; WADE & PHILLIPS, 184-6 (IX Ed.)

15. BOWIE & FRIEDRICH, op. cit., 4, 7, 8, 55, 62, 71; WHEARE, FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, 87 (1964); SCHWARTZ, AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 53-55 (1955).

The term of the Senators is six years and half of them rotate every three years. The Senate is subject to dissolution. Because of the growth of strong national parties cutting across State loyalties, the Senate has lost much of its value as a protector of the smaller States and now tends to reflect party views rather than regional interests.

In Canada, Senate is composed on an entirely different principle. Each Province is assigned a fixed, although unequal, number of Senators. Provinces are grouped into regions and there is regional, rather than provincial, parity in the House. The Senators are appointed until the age of 75 by the Governor-General on the advice of the Federal Prime Minister. These appointments are made on party lines in order to ensure Senate approval of government programme. The allegiance of the Senators is usually to the party which appoints them. The fact that the Senate consists of political appointees has made it almost ineffective. The appointive nature of the Senate necessarily makes its role subordinate to the elective House.[16]

Rajya Sabha resembles the American Senate insofar as it is also a continuing body, is not subject to dissolution, and is based on the principle of rotation of members. Rajya Sabha, however, differs from its American counterpart in so far as its members are not elected directly by the people in the States and there is no equality of representation of the constituent States. Rajya Sabha has much larger membership than the Senate.

Rajya Sabha resembles the Australian Senate in so far as both are based on the principle of rotation. But the two Houses differ from each other in several respects. Rajya Sabha is a continuing body and is not subject to dissolution but the Australian Senate can be dissolved to resolve a deadlock between the two Houses; members of the Rajya Sabha are not elected directly by the people in the States as is done in Australia; States do not have parity of representation in the Rajya Sabha whereas each State in Australia has equal representation in the Senate; and Rajya Sabha has a much larger membership than the Australian Senate.

The only common elements between the Canadian Senate and the Rajya Sabha is that in none of these the constituent units have uniform representation, and none is subject to dissolution. In other respects, the two Houses differ radically. In Canada, members are appointed by the Executive; in India, they are elected for six years by the State Legislative Assemblies. The Indian House is bigger than the Canadian House.

The upper chambers in the federations surveyed here have exhibited one common tendency, viz., with emergence of national consciousness and national political parties, they have lost much of their assigned role of acting as the protectors of the State rights and by and large they now function as national institutions.

---

16. HOGG, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF CANADA, 9-14 (1997).

C. COMPOSITION OF LOK SABHA

Lok Sabha is the popular chamber and is elected directly by the people.

The maximum strength of Lok Sabha has been fixed at 550 members, of whom not more than 530 are elected by the voters in the States, and not more than 20 represent the Union Territories [Art. 81(1)(a) and (b)] . Members from the States are elected by the system of direct election from territorial constituencies on the basis of adult suffrage [Art. 81(1)(a)].

Every citizen of India who is not less than 18 years of age on a date fixed by Parliament and does not suffer from any disqualification as laid down in the Constitution, or in any law on the ground of non-residence, unsoundness of mind, crime, or corrupt or illegal practice, is entitled to vote at an election for the Lok Sabha [Art. 326][17].

Seats in the House are allotted to each State in such a way that, as far as practicable, the ratio between the number of seats allotted to a State and its population is the same for all the States [Arts. 81(2)(a) and Art. 81(3)]. This provision does not apply to a State having a population of less than six millions [Proviso to Art. 81(2)].

Up to the year 2026, for purposes of Art. 81(2)(a), the 1971 census figures will be used to ascertain the population of a State. This means that the allocation of seats to the States in the Lok Sabha has been frozen at the level of 1971. No revision is to be made therein until the first Census is taken after the year 2026.[18]

Each State is divided into territorial constituencies in such a manner that the ratio between the population of a constituency and the number of seats allotted to it, so far as practicable, is the same throughout the State [Art. 81(2)(b)]. After each census, a readjustment is to be made, by such authority and in such manner as Parliament may by law prescribe, in allocation of seats to the various States in the Lok Sabha as well as in the division of each State into territorial constituencies [Art. 82].

Accordingly, Parliament has enacted the Delimitation Commission Act, 2002, for this purpose.[19] The idea is that the commission will demarcate each state into single member constituencies equal in number to the seats allotted to the State in Lok Sabha. For this purpose, the commission is to use the census figures of the Census of 2001. But, as stated above, there is to be no readjustment of seats among the States in Lok Sabha till the year 2026.[20]

Also, any such re-adjustment will not affect representation in the House until the existing House is dissolved. Further, such readjustment shall take effect from the date specified by the President by order. Until such readjustment becomes effective, election may be held to the House on the basis of territorial constituencies existing before such readjustment [Proviso to Art. 82].

---

17. See, Infra, Ch. XIX, under 'Elections'.

18. Proviso to Art. 81(3).
See, the 84th Amendment of the Constitution, Constitutional Amendments, infra, Ch. XLII.

19. For details see, infra, under 'Elections', Ch. XIX.

20. Proviso to Arts. 80(3) and 82 as amended by the Constitution (Eighty-seventh Amendment) Act, 2003 w.e.f. 22.6.2003.

It is for Parliament to prescribe by law the manner in which members to the Lok Sabha are to be chosen from the Union Territories [Art. 81(1)(b)][21]. Provision has been made for reservation of seats in the Lok Sabha for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.[22] The President can nominate not more than two members of the Anglo-Indian Community if in his opinion this community is not adequately represented in the House. [Art. 331].

Lok Sabha has been organised on practically similar lines as the lower chambers in Britain, U.S.A., Canada and Australia. The House of Commons in Britain, like the Lok Sabha, is elected directly by the people for five years by adult suffrage. In Australia, the House of Representatives is elected directly by the people for three years from single-member constituencies by preferential vote. All citizens without disabilities have a right to vote and voting is compulsory.[23] Seats in the House are distributed among the States according to population, with a minimum of five to each State.

In Canada, representation in the House of Commons is based on provincial population with some weightage in favour of the smaller Provinces. There is universal suffrage. The normal life of the House is five years.[24] In the U.S.A., the House of Representatives is elected directly by the people for two years. Seats are apportioned among the several States by the Congress on the basis of population.

The U.S. Constitution does not prescribe any voting qualification for election to the House. The regulation of suffrage for the House is within the control of each State subject to the stipulation that this should be the same as that requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and that none is to be excluded from voting on the grounds of sex, colour or previous condition of servitude.[25] This pattern differs from that in India where adult suffrage has been prescribed by the Constitution.[26]

D. PARLIAMENTARY MEMBERSHIP—QUALIFICATIONS AND DISQUALIFICATIONS

Only a citizen of India is qualified to be chosen a member of a House of Parliament [Art. 84(a)]. He should not be less than 30 years of age for Rajya Sabha, and 25 years for Lok Sabha [Art. 84(b)]. He should make and subscribe to the prescribed oath or affirmation before a person authorized by the Election Commission for this purpose [Art. 84(a)][27]. He should also possess such other qualifications as Parliament may by law prescribe for this purpose [Art. 84(c)]. He should not suffer from any disqualification prescribed either by the Constitution or a law made by Parliament [Art. 102(1)(e)].

Parliament has prescribed the necessary qualifications and disqualifications for parliamentary membership in the Representation of the People Act, 1951. Thus, a

---

21. See, infra, , Ch. V, under "Union Territories."
22. Infra, under "Safeguards to Minorities", Ch. XXXV.
23. BOWIE and FREIDRICH, op. cit., 30.
24. HOGG, op. cit., 149.
25. SCHWARTZ, op. cit., 54.
26. See, infra, Ch. XIX.
27. The form of the oath is set out in the Third Schedule to the Constitution.

person is not qualified to be chosen as a member of Rajya Sabha unless he is an elector for a parliamentary constituency in the concerned State or the Union Territory. To be a member of Lok Sabha, a person should be an elector for some parliamentary constituency in India. Also, he should be a member of any Scheduled Caste or Scheduled Tribe in any State, if he wants to contest a seat reserved for them. A person belonging to the Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes is not, however, disqualified for being elected to a seat not reserved for these castes or tribes. Disqualifications laid down in the Act, stated briefly, are:

(1) corrupt practice at an election;

(2) conviction for an offence resulting in imprisonment for two or more years, or for an offence under certain provisions of the Indian Penal Code [Ss. 153A, 171E and 171F, 505(2) or 505(3)], or of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 [Ss. 125, 135 or 136 (2)(a)], or under the Protection of Civil Rights Act, 1955 or the Commission of the Sati (Prevention) Act, 1987 (3 of 1988); or the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1988 (49 of 1988); or The Prevention of Terrorism Act, 2002 (15 of 2002) or conviction for contravening a law providing for the prevention of hoarding or profiteering or of adulteration of food and drugs and sentenced to imprisonment for not less than six months;

(3) failure to lodge an account for election expenses;

(4) having a subsisting contract for supply of goods to, or execution of any works undertaken by, the government;

(5) being a managing agent, manager or secretary of a corporation in which government has not less than 25 per cent share;

(6) dismissal from government service for corruption or disloyalty to the state.

Some of these disqualifications subsist only for a period of 3 to 6 years[28], but the Election Commission is authorised to remove or reduce this period. Detention of a person under any law pertaining to preventive detention is not a disqualification for membership of Parliament[29] nor is a Member expelled by the legislature ipso facto disqualified for re-election.[30]

However, when an electoral candidate is convicted of a criminal offence and the High Court grants stay of such conviction before the last date of filing nomination, the stay would render the order of conviction non-operative from the date of stay and consequently the disqualification arising out of conviction would also cease to operate.[31]

Under Art. 102(1), a person is disqualified from being chosen as, and from being, a member of a House of Parliament if—

(i) a competent court has declared him to be of unsound mind [Art. 102(1)(b)]; or

---

28. V.C. Shukla v. Purshottam Kaushik, AIR 1981 SC 547 : (1981) 2 SCC 84.

29. Baboolal v. Kankar Mujare, AIR 1988 MP 15. For discussion on Preventive Detention, see, infra, Ch. XXVII.

30. Raja Ram Pal v. Hon'ble Speaker, Lok Sabha, (2007) 3 SCC 184, at page 392 : (2007) 2 JT 1.

31. Ravikant S. Patil v. Sarvabhouma S. Bagali, (2007) 1 SCC 673 : (2006) 10 JT 578.

(ii) he is an undischarged insolvent [Art. 102(1)(c)]; or

(iii) he is not a citizen of India, or has voluntarily acquired the citizenship of a foreign State, or is under any acknowledgement of allegiance or adherence to a foreign State [Art. 102(1)(d)];[32] or (iv) he holds an office of profit under the Central or the State Government [Art. 102(1)(a)].

(a) OFFICE OF PROFIT

Dependence of a large number of members of Parliament on government patronage would weaken the position of Parliament vis-à-vis the Executive; for, such members may be tempted to support the government without considering any problem with an open mind. The rationale behind the Constitutional provision [Art. 102(1)(a)] which debars a holder of an office of profit under the government from being elected to a House of Parliament, is that, as explained by the Supreme Court,[33] there should not be any conflict between the duties and the interests of an elected member and to see that the elected member carries on his duties freely and fearlessly without being subjected to government pressure.

The provision is thus designed to protect the democratic fabric of the country from being corrupted by Executive patronage. It ensures that Parliament does not contain persons who may be obligated to the government, and be amenable to its influence, because they are receiving favours and benefits from it. The provision secures independence of members of Parliament from the influence of the government and thus seeks to reduce the risk of conflict between duty and self-interest in them so that they may discharge their functions and criticise the government, if necessary, without fear or act under governmental pressure.

A similar restriction is imposed by Art. 191(1)(a) in respect of membership in a State Legislature, Art. 243F in respect of Panchayats and Art. 243V in respect of Municipalities.[34] Most of the cases cited below have arisen under Art. 191(1)(a), but these cases are being taken note of here as these are fully relevant to Art. 102(1)(a) as well as both these constitutional provisions are practically identical and in pari materia.

The disqualification arises when a person holds an 'office of profit' under the 'Central' or 'State Government'. The expression 'office of profit' has not been defined in the Constitution. It is, therefore, for the courts to explain the significance and meaning of this concept and decide in the context of specific factual situations whether a person is disqualified or not under the above mentioned constitutional provisions.

An 'office of profit' ordinarily means an 'office' capable of yielding some profit to the holder of the office. The disqualification arises when a person—

(i) holds an office;
(ii) the office is under the Central or State Government; and
(iii) the office is one of profit.

---

32. On Citizenship, see, infra, Ch. XVIII.
33. Ashok Kumar Bhattacharya v. Ajoy Biswas, AIR 1985 SC 211, 215 : (1985) 1 SCC 151. Also, Satrucharla Chandrasekhar Raju v. Vyricherla Pradeep Kumar Dev., AIR 1992 SC 1959 : (1992) 4 SCC 404.
34. For discussion on "State Legislature", see, infra, Ch. VI.

Thus, if a person does not hold an 'office' he is not disqualified even if he is making a profit. For example, a lawyer engaged by the government to appear in a case on its behalf and paid fees by it[35], a person holding a permit to ply buses, or a licensed stamp vendor or deed writer,[36] or a shareholder in a company transporting postal articles and mail bags,[37] holds no 'office' and is thus not disqualified to seek election to a House.

Further, the 'office' should be such to which some pay, salary, or allowance is attached. The word 'profit' connotes the idea of pecuniary gain. If there is really a gain, its quantum or amount is not material; but the amount of money receivable by a person in connection with the office he holds may be material in deciding whether the office really carries any 'profit'. Thus, a member of a government appointed committee, who draws a fee to meet his out-of-pocket expenses to attend committee meetings does not hold an office of profit, as what is paid to him is not by way of profit but only as a compensatory allowance.[38]

In Jaya Bachchan v. Union of India[39] it was held that the decisive factor in determining whether one is holding an office of profit or not, is whether the office is capable of yielding a profit or pecuniary gain and not whether pecuniary gain is in fact received or received negligibly by the individual holding that office,

In Divya Prakash v. Kultar Chand,[40] the Supreme Court ruled that the post of Chairman of the Board of School Education, Himachal Pradesh, as such, was an office of profit under the State Government as the post carried remuneration. But, as the holder of the office was appointed in an honorary capacity without any remuneration, he was not holding an office of profit and so was not disqualified to be a member of the State Legislature.

Hegde, a member of the Karnataka State Legislative Assembly, was appointed as the Deputy Chairman of the Planning Commission. He drew no salary but only allowances, e.g., travelling allowance, daily allowance, conveyance allowance, house rent allowance, etc. A question arose whether Hegde became subject to disqualification. The High Court ruled that Hedge was not disqualified. Though he held an office under the Central Government, it was not one of 'profit' as he was not getting any salary but only allowances. The Court also ruled that Hegde was not disqualified because of the Karnataka Legislature (Prevention of Disqualification) Act, 1956.[41]

The Supreme Court has rationalised this approach as follows in Madhukar:[42]

---

35. Kanta Kathuria v. Manak Chand, AIR 1970 SC 694 : (1969) 3 SCC 268.

36. Yugal Kishore Sinha v. Nagendra Prasad Yadav, AIR 1964 Pat. 543; Banomali Behera v. Markanda Mahapatra, AIR 1961 Ori 205.

37. Satya Prakash v. Basir Ahmed Qureshi, AIR 1963 MP 316. Also, Brahma Dutt v. Paripurna Nand, AIR 1972 All 340.

38. Ravanna Subanna v. Kaggeerappa, AIR 1954 SC 653; Shivamurthy Swami Inamdar v. Agadi Sanganna Andanappa, (1971) 3 SCC 870.

39. (2006) 5 SCC 266 : AIR 2006 SC 2119.

40. AIR 1975 SC 1067 : (1975) 1 SCC 264.

41. Ramakrishna Hegde v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1993 Kant 54; infra, footnote 90, p. 56.
Under Art. 191(1)(a) [equivalent to Art. 102(1)(a)], the State Legislature can declare by law that an office would not disqualify its holder to be a member of a House of State Legislature. Parliament also has a similar power : see, infra, p. 51.

42. Madhukar v. Jaswant, AIR 1976 SC 2283 : (1977) 1 SCC 70.

> "After all, all law is a means to an end. What is the legislative end here in disqualifying holders of 'offices of profit under government'? Obviously, to avoid a conflict between duty and interest, to cut out the misuse of official position to advance private benefit and to avert the likelihood of influencing government to promote personal advantage. So this is the mischief to be suppressed. At the same time we have to bear in mind that our Constitution mandates the State to undertake multiform public welfare and socio-economic activities involving technical persons, welfare workers, and lay people on a massive scale so that participatory government may prove a progressive reality. In such an expanding situation, can we keep out from elective posts at various levels many doctors, lawyers, engineers and scientists, not to speak of an army of other non-officials who are wanted in various fields, not as full-time government servants but as part-time participants in people's projects sponsored by government? For instance, if a National Legal Services Authority funded largely by the State comes into being, a large segment of the legal profession may be employed part time in the ennobling occupation of legal aid to the poor. Doctors, lawyers, engineers, scientists and other experts may have to be invited into local bodies, legislautres and like political and administrative organs based on election if these vital limbs of representative government are not to be the monopoly of populist politicians or lay members but sprinkled with technicians in an age which belongs to technology. So, an interpretation of 'office of profit' to cast the net so wide that all our citizens with specialities and know-how are inhibited from entering elected organs of public administration and offering semi-voluntary services in para-official, statutory or like projects run or directed by government or Corporation controlled by the State may be detrimental to democracy itself. Even athletes may hesitate to come into Sports Councils if some fee for services is paid and that proves their funeral if elected to a panchayat. A balanced view even if it involves 'judicious irreverence' to vintage precedents is the wiser desideratum".

However the view expressed by the Karnataka High Court in Ramakrishna Hegde's case[43] does not appear to be good law in view of the recent pronouncement of the Supreme Court in Jaya Bachchan where it was held that "payment of honorarium, in addition to daily allowances in the nature of compensatory allowances, rent free accommodation and chauffeur driven car at State expense, are clearly in the nature of remuneration and a source of pecuniary gain and hence constitute profit"[44].

For purposes of disqualification, the office in question must be under the government. If the office is not under the government, no disqualification will arise. To determine whether a person holds an office under the government, the several tests which are ordinarily applied are:

(i) whether the government makes the appointment;
(ii) whether the government has the right to remove or dismiss the holder of the office;
(iii) whether the government pays the remuneration;
(iv) whether the functions performed by the holder are carried on by him for the government and
(v) whether the government has control over the duties and functions of the holder.[45]

---

43. (2006) 5 SCC 266 : AIR 2006 SC 2119.
44. (2006) 5 SCC 266 at page 270 : AIR 2006 SC 2119.
45. Biharilal Dobray v. Roshan lal Dobray, AIR 1984 SC 385 : (1984) 1 SCC 551; see, infra, footnote 64.

Whether an office to be characterised as one under the government should satisfy all, or one or more of these tests may be decisive of its true nature, has been the subject matter of a number of judicial pronouncements, but no decision lays down conclusively the characteristics of an office under the government. The courts determine from case to case whether the specific office involved may be characterised as an office under the government having regard to its various features. As the Supreme Court has observed in Ashok Kumar v. Biswas:[46]

> "For determination of the question whether a person holds an office of profit under the government each case must be measured and judged in the light of the relevant provisions of the Act".

The power of appointment, dismissal and control exercised by the government is an important consideration to determine whether the person is holding an office under the government. The fact that he is being paid not out of the government revenues is by itself a 'neutral', and not a decisive, factor as regards the nature of the office. It has been judicially emphasized that payment from a source other than the government revenues is not always a decisive factor as to the nature of the office. The mere fact of appointment to an office by the government may not make the office as one under the government. A person was appointed by the government as chairman of a statutory board. The Supreme Court refused to hold the office as being one 'under' the government as the government did not pay the remuneration and the holder of the office performed no functions for the government.[47]

A government servant is disqualified to be a member of a House. A government servant filed his nomination paper after being relieved from his service. The Supreme Court ruled that he was not disqualified to be a member of Lok Sabha as he was no longer a government servant at the time he submitted his nomination paper.[48]

A Minister either in the Central or State Government is not regarded as holding an office of profit.[49] The term 'Minister' includes a 'Deputy Minister".

A member of Parliament receives such salaries and allowances as may be determined by Parliament by law [Art. 106]. Nevertheless, he does not hold an office of profit under the government. The membership of Parliament is not an office under the government. Accordingly, a sitting member of Lok Sabha is not disqualified from contesting the next general election for Lok Sabha.[50]

A hereditary village office under the Mysore Village Offices Act, 1908, has been held to be an office of profit under the government because, though the office is hereditary to which the eldest heir in the eldest branch of the last holder is entitled to succeed, yet he would not get the office till appointed by the government; and he is removable by, and he works under the control and supervision of the government, and government lands are allotted to the office by way of 46. AIR 1985 SC 211 at 217 : 1985 (1) SCC 151. See also Som Lal v. Vijay Laxmi, (2008) 11 SC 413.

---

47. Surya Kant Roy v. Imamul Hak Khan, AIR 1975 SC 1053 : (1975) 1 SCC 531.

48. Sitaram v. Ramjibhai, AIR 1987 SC 1293 : (1987) 2 SCC 262.
Also, State of Gujarat v. Raman Lal Keshav Lal Soni, AIR 1984 SC 161 : (1983) 2 SCC 33.

49. Explanation to Art. 102(1).
Also, explanation to Art. 191(1) for State Legislatures : Shriram Haribhau Mankar v. Madhusudan Atmaram Vairale, AIR 1968 Bom 219.

50. Bhagwati Prasad v. Rajeev Gandhi, AIR 1986 SC 1534 : (1986) 4 SCC 78.

emoluments for services rendered, and some cash allowance is also paid out of the government funds.[51]

The Vice-Chancellor of a University appointed by the Governor in his capacity as the Chancellor of the University,[52] or a member of a State Legislature,[53] or pramukh of a zila parishad,[54] does not hold an office of profit under the government as in none of these cases government has power to appoint or dismiss.

The Jharkhand Area Autonomous Council was created by an Act of the State Legislature. The Chairman of the Council was held to hold an office of profit under the State Government in Shibu Soren v. Dayanand Sahay.[55] He was appointed to the post by the State Government and he held his office during the "pleasure of the State". This meant that he could be removed or dismissed by the State. He was receiving an honorarium of Rs. 1750/- p.m. plus daily allowance, rent free accommodation and a car with a driver. All this could not be regarded as compensatory allowance; it amounted to salary and so the office was one of profit. As the person concerned was a member of the Rajya Sabha, the disqualification could be removed only by Parliament,[56] and not by the State Legislature.[57]

An office held under some body juridically distinct from, and independent of, the government is not regarded as an office under the government and so does not attract the disqualification under discussion. If, however, the government exercises control over the concerned body, the office held under it may or may not be regarded as an office under the government depending on how much control the government exercises over it. Is the concerned body still autonomous, or is it merely an instrumentality of the government? A few examples will illustrate the point.

The accountant-in-charge of a municipality was held not to be disqualified from being a member of the legislature. He was appointed and could be removed by the municipality but, in both cases, subject to the sanction of the government; he was paid out of the municipal funds which the municipality was competent to raise.[58] The government did exercise some control and supervision over the municipality, but still the municipality enjoyed a lot of autonomy. On this point, the Supreme Court observed:

> "Government controls various activities in various spheres and in various measures. But to judge whether employees of any authority or local authorities under the control of the government become government employees or not or holders of office of profit under the government the measure and nature of the control exercised by the government over the employee must be judged in the light of the facts and circumstances in each case so as to avoid any possible conflict between his personal interests and duties and of the government."[59]

It may be pointed out that in case of election of President or Vice-President, the Constitution specifically provides that the candidate is disqualified if he is

---

51. Ramappa v. Sangappa, AIR 1958 SC 937 : 1959 SCR 1167.
52. Joti Prasad v. Kalka Prasad, AIR 1962 All 128.
53. Ram Narain v. Ram Chandra, AIR 1958 Bom 25.
54. Umrao Singh v. Yeshwant Singh, AIR 1970 Raj 134.
55. AIR 2001 SC 2583 : (2001) 7 SCC 425.
56. See, infra, p. 51.
57. See, infra, Ch. VI.
58. Ashok Kumar v. Ajoy Biswas, AIR 1985 SC 211 : (1985) 1 SCC 151. Also see, Surya Kant Roy v. Imamul Hak Khan, AIR 1975 SC 1053 : (1975) 1 SCC 531.
59. Ashok Kumar, ibid.

holding an office of profit under a local or any other authority under the control of the Central or the State government.[60] But in case of election as a member of a House of Parliament or a State Legislature, no such disqualification is specifically laid down in the Constitution.[61]

The Durgah Committee is a statutory body, being a body corporate with perpetual succession. Its members are appointed, and are removable, by the government of India. The manager of a school run by the Durgah Committee was held to be not holding an office of profit under the government. The members of the Durgah Committee, the Supreme Court held, were not government servants; the manager was neither appointed, nor was removable, by the government, nor was he paid out of the government revenues. He was holding an appointment under a statutory body and was paid out of the Durgah funds and, therefore, he could not be regarded as holding an appointment under government control.[62]

A teacher in a government aided school does not hold an office under the government, for the school, though under government's control and supervision, still has its own separate personality, property and funds.[63]

But an assistant teacher employed in a basic primary school run by the Board of Basic Education constituted by an Act of the Legislature was held disqualified from being a member of the State Legislature. The Court said : "Even though the incorporation of a body corporate may suggest that the statute intended it to be a statutory corporation independent of the Government, it is not conclusive on the question whether it is really so independent. Sometimes the form may be that of a body corporate independent of the Government but in substance it may be just the alter ego of the Government itself."

The rules framed under the Act laid down that the appellate authority in case of disciplinary proceedings in respect of the teachers in the basic schools were the State Government or government officers depending upon the nature of the posts. Almost the entire financial needs of the Board were met by the Government. After considering the provisions of the Act and the rules made thereunder, the Supreme Court concluded that the Government had direct control over the board and that it was not truly independent of the Government; the board had no separate personality of its own and that every employee of the Board was in fact holding his office under the Government. The subordination of the Board and its employees to the Government was writ large on the face of the Act and the Rules made thereunder. The Act discharged an important responsibility of the Government to provide primary education in the State. The Act empowered the State Government to take over all basic schools being run by the local bodies in the State and to manage them under the Act; as also to administer all matters pertaining to the entire basic education in the State through the Board. The teachers and other employees were to be appointed in accordance with Rules by government appointed officials. The disciplinary proceedings in respect of the employees were subject to the final decision of the State Government. In these circumstances, the post of a teacher under the U.P.

---

60. See, infra, Ch. III, Sec. A.
61. See, supra, p. 42. See also Shrikant v. Vasantrao, AIR 2006 SC 918 : (2006) 2 SCC 682. Also see, infra, Ch. VI.
62. Abdul Shakur v. Rikhab Chand, AIR 1958 SC 52 : 1958 SCR 387.
63. Govinda Kurup v. S.A. Paul, AIR 1961 Ker 242.

Basic Education Act was held to be an office of profit under the Government. In the words of the Court:

> "The Board for all practical purposes is a department of the Government and its autonomy is negligible".

Accordingly, the Court ruled that considering the high purposes underlying Art, 191(1)(a), the respondent assistant teacher was holding an office of profit under the State Government and so was disqualified for being chosen as a member of the State Legislative Assembly.[64]

In the case noted below,[65] the facts were as follows: the appellant was appointed as a single teacher in a primary school run by the Integrated Tribal Development Agency (ITDA) by its project officer who was the district collector. The ITDA was a society registered under the Societies Registration Act. The government had some control over the composition of its governing body and the sanctioning of posts. Funds for the activities of the society came from the government and some government officers were ex officio members of ITDA. Its object was to provide compulsory education in tribal areas. The appellant was suspended by the tribal welfare officer for some irregularities. The appellant was thereafter elected to the State Legislative Assembly. In an election petition filed against him, the High Court ruled that he was holding an office of profit under the government and so he was disqualified under Art. 191(1)(a) to be elected as a member of the State Legislature. The High Court took the view that although the society appeared to be independent of the state government, in substance, and for all practical purposes, its activities were controlled by government officials—the society's chairman and the project officer were government officials; a majority of the members of its governing body were government officials, society's funds came from government grants. The society was providing free and compulsory primary education to children which was the responsibility of the State Government and the society's teachers were subjected to the Civil Service (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules of the State Government. But, on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the High Court. The Supreme Court ruled that the government may have some control over the society which is the appointing authority, but government has no direct control over the teachers themselves. The whole scheme has been set up for the welfare of the tribals. In such a situation, felt the Supreme Court, the question of any conflict between the duties and interests of an elected member of a legislature does not arise since "it cannot be said that he, as a teacher, can be subjected to any kind of pressure by the government which has neither the power to appoint him nor to remove him from service. The Court said, "The right to appoint and right to remove the holder of the office in many cases becomes an important and decisive test."

Distinguishing Biharilal Dobray, the Supreme Court has held that the emphasis ought to be "on the nature of the post held and the possibility of conflict between duty and interest of an elected member and to appreciate the same the test is whether the government has power to appoint or dismiss the employee who is being chosen as a legislator".

---

64. Biharilal Dobray v. Roshanlal Dobrary, AIR 1984 SC 385 : (1984) 1 SCC 551. Also see, supra, footnote 45.

65. Satrucharla Chandrasekhar Raju v. Vyricherla Pradeep Kumar Dev., AIR 1992 SC 1959 : (1992) 4 SCC 404.

To apply a "strict and narrow" construction will amount to shutting off many prominent and other eligible persons to contest the elections which forms the fundamental basis for the democratic set-up.

In Satrucharla, the Supreme Court has summarised as follows the tests or principles which emerge from the previous case-law to determine whether or not a person holds an office of profit under the government:

(i) The power of the government to appoint a person in office or to revoke his appointment at its discretion.

The mere control of the government over the authority having the power to appoint, dismiss or control the working of the officer employed by such authority does not disqualify the concerned officer from being a candidate for election as a member of Parliament/State Legislature.

(ii) The payment from out of the government revenue.

Payment from a source other than the government revenue is not always a decisive factor.

(iii) The incorporation of a body corporate and entrusting the functions to it by the government may suggest that the statute intended it to be a statutory corporation independent of the government.

But it is not conclusive on the question whether it is really so independent. Sometimes, the form may be that of a body corporate independent of the government, but, in substance, it may be the just after ego of the Government itself.

(iv) The true test of the determination of the said question depends upon the degree of control, the government has over it, the extent of control exercised by very other bodies or committees, and its composition, the degree of its dependence on the government for its financial needs and the functional aspect, namely, whether the body is discharging any important governmental function or just some function which is merely optional from the time of view of the government.

A company has its own separate identity. In modern times, many corporations and government companies are created to carry on multifarious activities, like the Life Insurance Corporation, State Trading Corporation, etc.[66] Usually, the government contributes most of its share, capital and appoints its directors. The government also enjoys power to issue directions relating to the company's working and has over-all control over it. Still, such a body is not a government department and has a distinct personality of its own and has a good deal of autonomy in its day to day working. Therefore, a servant in such a body does not hold an office 'under' the government because the power to appoint and dismiss him and control over his work vest in the company or the corporation itself and not in the government, and the government control is not direct but only indirect.[67] Even the power to determine the question of remuneration payable to the employee was not vested in the government.

---

66. For a fuller discussion on Public Sector Undertakings, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, II; Jain & Jain, PRINCIPLES OF ADM. LAW, Ch. XXXV (Reprint 1993).

67. D.R. Gurushantappa v. Abdul Khuddus, AIR 1969 SC 744 : (1969) 1 SCC 466.

The indirect control of the government arising out of its power to appoint the managing director of the company and to issue directions to the company in its general working does not bring the employees of the company directly under government control.

A person was appointed as part-time chairman by the transport corporation of the State. The government had no power to appoint or remove him from office. He was given a compensatory allowance by the corporation from out of its own funds and not out of government funds. It was held that he did not hold an office of profit.[68]

But the auditor of a government company (in which the government held 100 per cent shares) was held to hold an office of profit under the government. Although the company was a separate entity from the government, yet it was government company in which the government held 100% shares. The auditor was appointed, and was removable, by the government; he performed his functions under the control of the Comptroller and Auditor-General who himself is appointed, and whose administrative powers are controlled by the rules made by the President.

An office of profit under the government does not necessarily mean service of government. For holding an 'office of profit' under the government, a person need not be in the service of the government and there need not be any relationship of master and servant between him and the government. The fact that the auditor's remuneration was paid not out of the public revenues but by the company which had an entity apart from the government, was held to be not decisive of the question.[69] As the Court emphasized, what needs to be considered is the substance and not the form of the matter.

The Supreme Court has emphasized in Biharilal Dobray v. Roshanlal Dobray,[70] that merely because a body is incorporated, it is not conclusive of the question whether the body is really independent of the government. Sometimes, the form may be of a body corporate independent of the government but in substance it may just be the 'alter ego' of the government itself. "The true test for determination of the said question depends upon the degree of control the government has over it, the extent of control exercised by the several other bodies or committees over it and their composition, the degree of its dependence on government for its financial needs and the functional aspect, namely, whether the body is discharging any important governmental function or just some function which is merely optional from the point of view of government".

The Bokaro Steel Plant is under the management and control of the Steel Authority of India Ltd.—a company incorporated under the Companies Act and its shares are owed by the Central Government. Its Chairman and the Board of Directors are appointed by the President of India. The power of appointment and removal of workers vest in the Steel Authority of India Ltd. which also determined their remuneration. The Steel Authority as well as the Bokaro Plant perform non-governmental functions such as manufacturing steel. In this context, the Supreme Court has ruled that the Khalashis or meter readers employed by the Bokaro Plant are not subject to the control of the government which neither exercised the power of appointment nor of removal of these persons. Control over the work of these employees is exercised by the Steel Authority and not by the Central Government. Accordingly, these employees could not be regarded as holding an office of profit under the Central Government.[71]

68. K. Prabhakara Rao v. M. Seshagiri Rao, AIR 1981 SC 658 : (1982) 2 SCC 78.
69. Gurugovinda Basu v. Sankari Prasad, AIR 1964 SC 254 : (1964) 4 SCR 311.
70. AIR 1984 SC 385 at 395 : (1984) 1 SCC 551; supra, footnotes 45 and 64.

A clerk employed in Coal India Ltd. has been held to be not disqualified under Art. 102/193 from contesting an election. Coal India is a private limited company incorporated under the Companies Act with 100% share capital owned by the Central Government. It is thus a government company. The President can issue directions to the company as may be considered necessary. The day to day management of the company however vests in a Board of Directors. The company has power to appoint, remove or dismiss its employees who are paid their salaries from the company's funds. The Government exercises no control on appointment, removal, service conditions and functioning of the employee concerned.[72]

A disqualification may arise under a statute outside the Constitution. Thus, the Representation of the People Act debars a person, who holds the office of a managing agent, manager or secretary of a company or corporation in the capital of which a government holds not less than 25% share, from being chosen as a member of the Legislature to which that Government is responsible. Further, a corporation may itself frame a regulation under statutory authority debarring its employees from standing at an election of a legislative body and this constitutes a disqualification.

(b) THE PARLIAMENT (PREVENTION OF DISQUALIFICATION) ACT, 1959

Parliament has power to declare the offices of profit the holders of which would not be disqualified for its membership [Art. 102(1)(a)]. Accordingly, Parliament has enacted the Parliament (Prevention of Disqualification) Act, 1959, which lists the various categories of offices the holders of which would not be disqualified for membership of Parliament.

The Act does not define the term 'office of profit' for the obvious reason that the term occurs in the Constitution and its final interpretation rests with the courts and not with Parliament. In case of an office other than those exempted under the Act, the final word on whether it is an 'office of profit' or not rests with the courts.

In Britain, there is no general theory that a disqualification arises from holding an office of profit under the Crown. There disqualifications are specific and disqualification arises only when a person holds a disqualifying office so declared under a parliamentary legislation.[73] The House of Commons Disqualification Act, 1975, lists the offices the holders of which are disqualified from membership of the House. The position is, however, different in India as there prevails a general disqualification under the Constitution, but specific exemptions may be granted from it under a law of Parliament.[74]

The power of Parliament to grant exemptions has on occasions been exercised to operate with retrospective effect. The Parliamentary (Prevention of Disquali-

---

71. Aklu Ram Mahto v. Rajendra Mahto, AIR 1999 SC 1259 : (1999) 3 SCC 541.
72. Pradyut Bordoloi v. Swapan Roy, AIR 2001 SC 296 : (2001) 2 SCC 19.
73. J.A.G. GRIFFITH'S comments in 20 Modern L.R., 52, 492 (1957); WADE AND PHILLIPS, op. cit,. 154.
74. See infra p. 53.

fication) Amendment Act, 2006 excludes 45 posts held by Members of Parliament from the operation of Article 102 with retrospective effect from 1959. Now by virtue of the amendment, earlier judicial decisions to the extent that particular offices of profit (now excluded) would disqualify a member of the House, are no longer good law. But judicial pronouncements on the characteristics of an office of profit for the purposes of Article 102 will continue to operate.

Challenge to the constitutionality of the amendment by way of a petition under Article 32 has been repelled. The petitioners contended that a legislation retrospectively removing the disqualification will help a person to continue to be a Member, only if he/she had continued as a Member and his/her seat had not fallen vacant on the reasoning that in instances where the seat had already become vacant on account of incurring a constitutional disqualification, any legislative attempt to revive the membership of the Member whose seat had become vacant, would violate Article 102(1) read with Article 101(3)(a) of the Constitution was rejected.[75] The court held that when the amending Act "retrospectively removed the disqualification with regard to certain enumerated offices, any Member who was holding such office of profit, was freed from the disqualification retrospectively. As of the date of the passage of the Amendment Act, none of the Members who were holding such offices had been declared to be disqualified by the President. Section 4(2) was not attracted and consequently they continued as Members."

In 2004, an Election Petition was filed challenging the election of a candidate who was elected to the Delhi Legislative Assembly in 2003 on the ground that the elected candidate was the Chairman of the Delhi Wakf Board when he was elected. While the challenge was pending decision by the High Court, in 2006, the Wakf Act 1995 was amended by inserting a provision which effectively exempted the office of the Chairperson from being a disqualification for election as a member of the Legislative Assembly. The dismissal of the petition by the High Court was affirmed in appeal.[76]

(c) JOINT COMMITTEE ON OFFICES OF PROFIT

Every day government appoints committees and sets up statutory or non-statutory bodies. The membership of such bodies does not entail a disqualification if the member does not get any remuneration but only a compensatory allowance. As new and new bodies are created daily, the question as to the membership of which of these bodies would or would not be a disqualification for parliamentary membership is a matter demanding constant review. To meet this need, a Joint Committee on Offices of Profit has been constituted.

The Committee consists of ten members from the Lok Sabha and five members from the Rajya Sabha. The function of the Committee inter alia is to undertake a continuous scrutiny of composition and character of various government appointed bodies and report to both Houses as to the membership of which of these bodies ought or ought not to disqualify a person for membership of Parliament. The Committee generally applies two tests in deciding whether a member of a body ought to be exempted from disqualification—

---

75. Consumer Education and Research Society v. U.O.I., (2009) 9 SCC 648.
76. Mohd. Akram Ansari v. Chief Election Commissioner, (2008) 2 SCC 95 : (2007) 14 Scale 30.

(i) what are the emoluments or allowances attached to the membership;

(ii) what is the nature of the functions of the body?

If a member of a body gets only a compensatory allowance and the body exercises merely an advisory function, then no disqualification would arise. But if the allowance given is more than compensatory allowance, and/or the body exercises executive and financial powers and is in a position to wield influence and patronage, then its membership would not be exempted from disqualification.

From time to time, the Joint Committee has submitted reports to both Houses giving its recommendations on proposals to nominate a member of the House to a particular office namely whether a nomination would fall foul of Article 102. The role of the Committee is only advisory and the recommendations do not give protection from disqualification under the law until the recommendations are given statutory effect by amending the Parliament (Prevention of Disqualification) Act, 1959. However, the Joint Committee was not consulted before the Act was amended by the Parliamentary (Prevention of Disqualification) Amendment Act, 2006.

Recently, a Joint Committee of both Houses has been set up to examine the constitutional and legal provisions relating to an office of profit.[77]

(d) DECISION ON DISQUALIFICATION

A disqualification for parliamentary membership may either exist when a person seeks to become a member of a House, or may arise after he has become a member. He is not entitled to be chosen as a member of a House in the former case and will cease to be a member in the latter case. If a disqualified person is elected, the Constitution lays down no procedure to declare the election void. That is a matter which can be dealt with by a law of Parliament. Section 100(1)(a) of the Representation of People Act, 1951, enables the High Court to declare an election void if a disqualified candidate is elected.

The constitutional scheme is that a person shall be disqualified from continuing as a Member of Parliament if he/she holds any disqualifying office of profit. Such a disqualification can result in the vacation of his/her seat when the Member admits or declares that he/she is holding the disqualifying office of profit. However, if he/she does not make a voluntary declaration about the same, the question of whether he/she is disqualified or not, if raised, shall have to be referred for a decision by the President of India and the same will be made after obtaining the opinion of the Election Commission of India. The question as to whether a particular Member has incurred a disqualification can be referred for the decision of the President by any citizen by means of making an application to the President. It is only after the President decides that the Member has incurred an alleged disqualification that the particular Member's seat would become vacant.[78]

The words "if any question arises as to whether a Member of either House of Parliament has become subject to any disqualifications" conclusively show that the question of whether a Member has become subject to any disqualification

---

77. See Raja Ram Pal v. Speaker, Lok Sabha, (2007) 3 SCC 184, 462 : (2007) 2 JT 1.
78. Consumer Education and Research Society v. UOI, (2009) 9 SCC 648.

under clause (1) of Article 102 has to be decided only by the President. Such a question would of course be a mixed question of fact and law. The Constitution provides the manner in which that question is to be decided. The Court was of the view that it is only after such a decision is rendered by the President, that the seat occupied by an incumbent member becomes vacant. The question of a person being disqualified under Article 102(1) and the question of his seat becoming vacant under Article 102(3)(a) though closely interlinked, are distinct and separate issues.[79]

Article 103 [Art. 192 in case of a State Legislature][80] lays down a procedure for dealing with the situation when a sitting member of a House becomes subject to a disqualification mentioned in Art. 102(1) [Art. 191(1) in case of a State Legislature]. When such a question arises, it is referred to the President [or the Governor in case of a State Legislature] and his decision is final.

However, in deciding the matter, the President [or the Governor] neither consults his Council of Ministers, nor decides the matter himself. He has to forward the question to the Election Commission for its opinion and act according to the opinion received.[81] In effect, therefore, the matter is decided by the Election Commission though the decision is announced in the name of the President [or the Governor]. The Commission holds a proper enquiry before giving its opinion.[82]

A member found to have become disqualified, ipso facto ceases to be a member of the House and his seat becomes vacant [Art. 101(3)(a)]. Art. 103 applies to a case of a sitting member becoming subject to a disqualification after his election, and under it the President [or the Governor] and the Election Commission have no jurisdiction to enquire into a member's disqualification existing prior to his election.

When a person who has incurred a disqualification offers himself/herself as a candidate and is subsequently elected and if no one objects and if the Returning Officer accepts the nomination and if no election petition is filed challenging the election, then he/she would continue as a Member in spite of the disqualification.[83]

In respect of the disqualification on the ground of holding an office of profit, the vacancy of the seat would become operative only when the President decides the issue on the subject of the alleged disqualification and declares that a particular Member has incurred the same. Such a decision may be made either on the basis of an adjudication where the question is disputed, or on the basis of an admission by the Member concerned.[84]

Upon a proper construction of the provisions of Articles 101 to 103, it is evident that a declaration by the President under Article 103(1) in the case of a disqualification under Article 102(1) and a declaration by the Speaker or the Chairman under Para 6 of the Tenth Schedule in the case of a disqualification under Article 102(2) is a condition precedent for the vacancy of the seat. If Article

---

79. Consumer Education and Research Society v. U.O.I., (2009) 9 SCC 648.
80. Infra, Ch. VI.
81. For discussion on "Election Commission", see, infra, Ch. XIX.
82. Brundaban v. Election Commission, AIR 1965 SC 1892 : (1965) 3 SCR 53; Election Commission v. N.G. Ranga, AIR 1978 SC 1609 : (1978) 4 SCC 181.
83. Consumer Education and Research Society v. U.O.I., (2009) 9 SCC 648.
84. Consumer Education and Research Society v. U.O.I., (2009) 9 SCC 648.

101(3)(a) is interpreted otherwise, it will lead to absurd results thereby making it impossible to implement or enforce the relevant provisions of the Constitution or the RP Act.[85]

In Saka Venkata Rao,[86] the respondent was convicted and sentenced to a term of seven years rigorous imprisonment in the year 1942. He was released on the occasion of celebration of the Independence Day on August 15, 1947. He contested election for the State Assembly in 1952. Being disqualified for five years, he appealed to the Election Commission for waiver of his disqualification.

Pending the decision of the Election Commission, he was elected. Thereafter the Election Commission rejected his appeal. The Speaker then referred to the Governor the question of his disqualification. The Supreme Court decided that Arts. 190(3) and 192(1) [Arts. 101(3) and 103(1)] go together and provide a remedy when a member incurs a disqualification after he is elected as a member. Art. 192(1) contemplates only a sitting member incurring the disability while so sitting. Art. 190(3) does not apply to the pre-existing disqualification. The Supreme Court thus rejected the contention that Arts. 190(3) and 192(1) include within their scope the pre-existing disqualification as well. In the instant case, as Venkata Rao was already disqualified prior to his nomination for election, no action could be taken against him under Art. 192.

The Supreme Court has clarified the legal position obtaining under Arts. 103(1) and (2) as well as under Arts. 192(1) and (2). The language of both these provisions is verbatim except that in Art. 102, the decision is to be made by the President in relation to a member of a House of Parliament, and in case of a member of a State Legislature, it is the Governor who has to make the decision.

In Brundaban Nayak, the question was regarding the interpretation of Art. 192 which applies ipso facto to Art. 103. The appellant was elected to the Orissa Assembly and was appointed as a Minister. The respondent (No. 2) applied to the Governor alleging that the appellant had incurred a disqualification subsequent to his election. The Governor forwarded the complaint to the Election Commission for opinion.

The appellant sought quashing of the inquiry by the Election Commission on the ground that it was incompetent and without jurisdiction. The Supreme Court ruled that under Art. 192(1) what was required was that a question should arise and how it arises or by whom it is raised or in what circumstances it is raised, are not relevant for the purpose of the application of the clause. All that is relevant is that a question of this type mentioned by the clause should arise. It is not necessary that the question be raised on the floor of the House. Such a question as is contemplated by Art. 192(1) "shall be decided by the Governor and Governor alone; no other authority can decide it nor can the decision of the said question as such fall within the jurisdiction of the courts.

The stipulation in Art. 103(2) and Art. 192(2) that the President/Governor "shall act" according to such opinion leaves no room for doubt that the President/Governor has no discretion in the matter but to act according to the opinion of the Election Commission.[87] The decision on the question raised under Art. 192(1) or 103(1) has no doubt to be pronounced by the Governor/President, but that decision has to be in accordance with the advice of the Election Commission. The opinion of the Election Commission is a sine que non for the President/Governor to give a decision on the question whether a member of a House has incurred a disqualification. On this point, the Supreme Court has recently observed:[88]

---

85. Consumer Education and Research Society v. U.O.I., (2009) 9 SCC 648.
86. Election Commission v. Saka Venkata Rao, AIR 1953 SC 210 : 1953 SCR 1144.

> "It is thus clear on a conjoint reading of the two clauses of Art. 192 that once a question of the type mentioned in the first clause is referred to the Governor, meaning thereby is raised before the Governor, the Governor and the Governor alone must decide it but this decision must be taken after obtaining the opinion of the Election Commission and the decision which is made final is that decision which the Governor has taken in accordance with the opinion of the Election Commission. In effect and substance the decision of the Governor must depend on the opinion of the Election Commission and none else, not even the Council of Ministers. Thus, the opinion of the Election Commission is decisive since the final order would be based solely on that opinion".

In an earlier case,[89] the Supreme Court had observed in the context of Art. 103(2) that the President was bound to seek and obtain the opinion of the Election Commission and only thereafter decide the issue in accordance therewith. In other words, it is the Election Commission's opinion which is decisive. The opinion of the Election Commission is a sine qua non for the Governor or the President, as the case may be, to give a decision on the question whether or not the concerned member of the House of the Legislature of the State or either House of Parliament has incurred a disqualification.

It was argued in Ramakrishna Hegde v. State,[90] that since the order in question was made by the Governor acting without the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers, the order could not be questioned because of Art. 361.[91] The Governor could not be impleaded as a party to the writ petition as his action could not be challenged because of the immunity enjoyed by him and the opinion of the Election Commission became merged with the Governor's opinion. Rejecting the argument, the High Court ruled that in effect the decision was made by the Election Commission although the formal order was made by the Governor. The decision of the Election Commission is a sine qua non for the Governor to give a decision on the question of disqualification of a member of the State Legislature. The Election Commission was the second respondent to the writ petition.

The High Court referred to Brundaban Nayak v. Election Commission,[92] where the Supreme Court had said that the decision of the Election Commission was "in substance decisive" in such a matter. Under Art. 192, though the decision on the question raised is to be pronounced by the Governor, he actually acts according to the opinion of the Election Commission. The decision of the Governor de-

---

87. Brundaban Nayak v. Election Commission of India, AIR 1965 SC 1892 : (1965) 3 SCR 53; Election Commission of India v. N.G. Ranga, AIR 1978 SC 1609 : (1978) 4 SCC 181.
88. Election Commission of India v. Dr. Subramaniam Swamy, AIR 1996 SC 1810 : (1996) 4 SCC 104.
89. Election Commission of India v. N.G. Ranga, supra, footnote 87.
90. Supra, footnote 41.
91. See, infra, Ch. III and Ch. VII.
92. Supra, footnote 87.
Also see, Election Commission v. Ranga, AIR 1978 SC 1609 : (1978) 4 SCC 181.

pends on the opinion of the Election Commission and none else, not even that of the Chief Minister. Thus, it is the Election Commission which decides the matter though the decision is announced formally in the Governor's name.[93] The Governor has no choice but to pass the order in accordance with the opinion of the Election Commission. The Court, therefore, ruled that the writ petition could be maintained even in the absence of the Governor being a party to the proceedings when the Election Commission was itself before the court.

Further, the Supreme Court has ruled in Election Commission v. Subramanian Swamy,[94] that the Election Commission acts in a quasi-judicial capacity while adjudicating upon the disqualification of a sitting member of a House of State Legislature or Parliament. This means that the Election Commission has to follow the principles of natural justice. One of these principles is the rule against bias.[95] Therefore, if one of the members is disqualified because of the rule against bias, he should not participate in the decision.

In Swamy, a complaint of disqualification filed by Subramaniam Swamy against Jayalalitha, a member of the Tamil Nadu Assembly, was referred to the Election Commission by the Governor. The Chief Election Commissioner, Seshan, was held to be disqualified to participate in the decision because Swamy's wife, a lawyer, was engaged as counsel in a case filed by Seshan. The Supreme Court therefore ruled that the Chief Election Commissioner should call a meeting of the Commission and then recuse himself from participating in the decision, leaving the two other members, to decide the case. If the two Commissioners reach a unanimous verdict, that will be the decision of the Commission to be communicated to the State Governor. If, however, the two members fail to reach such a decision, then the Chief Election Commissioner will have to give his opinion on the basis of the ground of necessity. The majority decision would then be conveyed to the Governor.[96]

A significant question which remains unanswered so far as regards Art. 192 [as well as Art. 103] is that when the Governor [or the President, as the case may be] receives a representation against a member of the State Legislature [or Parliament] that he has become subject to a disqualification, is the Governor [or the President] obliged to refer the same to the Election Commission for its opinion, or the Governor [or the President] can exercise some discretion in the matter and can scrutinize for himself whether there is a prima facie case against the member or not?

This question arose in Tamil Nadu.[97] Subramaniam Swamy submitted a representation to the Governor to the effect that the Chief Minister had become subject to a disqualification as a member of the State Legislature. The Governor kept the representation pending for nearly four months without taking any action thereon.

Swamy then filed a writ petition in the Supreme Court to issue a writ directing the Governor to refer the representation to the Election Commission. Before the Court could hear the matter and decide one way or the other, the Governor suo

---

93. Also see, K. Haja Shareff v. Governor of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1985 Mad 55.
94. AIR 1996 SC 1810 : (1996) 4 SCC 104.
95. For a detailed discussion on this Rule, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, 405-447 (1996); JAIN, CASES Ch. X.
96. AIR 1996 SC 1810 at 1817 : (1996) 4 SCC 104.
97. Election Commission v. Subramaniam Swamy, AIR 1996 SC 1810 : (1996) 4 SCC 104.

motu referred the representation to the Election Commission for inquiry and report. Had the Governor waited for some time more, the Court would have had occasion to decide the question about the Governor's actual role in the matter.

It seems that under Art. 192 [or Art. 103], the effective decision-making power has been given to the Election Commission, and, therefore, it should be for the Election Commission itself to decide whether the representation is frivolous or not, or whether any inquiry is called for or not. The Governor's role is confined only to seeking the advice of, and acting on, the advice of the Election Commission. His role is, therefore, merely formal. He has a discretion coupled with a duty. This is as it should be. Otherwise, if decision-making power is left to the Governor, the decision will be subject to political pressures.

From the observations made by the Supreme Court in the above mentioned cases, it becomes rather clear that the Court regards it as obligatory on the part of the Governor/President to seek the advice of the Election Commission whenever a question is raised, and brought to his notice, about the disqualification of a sitting member of the Legislature/Parliament. The use of the words "shall obtain" in Arts. 103(2) and Art. 192(2) means that it is obligatory for the President/Governor to obtain the opinion of the Election Commission. "Obtaining the opinion of the Election Commission is, therefore imperative. It is equally imperative for the Governor to act according to such opinion."[1]

The Supreme Court has clarified that the power conferred on the President under Art. 103 (as well as of the Governor under Art. 192)[2] is not to be regarded as the power to remove a member of Parliament (State Legislature in case of the Governor) The function of the President (Governor) under Art. 103 is adjudicatory in nature. If the President (Governor) holds, onthe advice of the Election Commission, that a member has become subject to a disqualification, the member is treated as having ceased to be a member of the House on the date when he became subject to such disqualification.[3]

It is evident from the decision in P.V. Narasimha Rao,[4] that when the President adjudicates on the subject of whether a Member was disqualified or not and gives a finding that he/she is disqualified, he/she is merely deemed to have ceased being a Member from the date that he/she had incurred the disqualification. It follows that a Member continues to be one until the decision of the President and when the outcome of the decision is that he/she is disqualified, it relates back to the date when the said disqualification was incurred. If the President holds that the Member has not incurred the disqualification, the person continues as a Member.[5]

It has been stated above that Art. 103 or 192 does not apply when a disqualified person gets elected to a House of Parliament or the State Legislature. The remedy in such a case, as discussed later,[6] is filing an election petition against the person concerned. But what happens if his election is not questioned through an

---

1. Ibid, at 1815.
2. See, infra, Ch. VI.
3. P.V. Narasimha Rao v. State (CBI/SPE), (1998) 4 SCC 626 : 1998 SCC (Cri) 1108. Also see, infra, Sec. L.
4. P.V. Narasimha Rao v. State, (1998) 4 SCC 626 : 1998 SCC (Cri) 1108.
5. Consumer Education and Research Society v. U.O.I., (2009) 9 SCC 648.
6. Infra, Ch. XIX under Elections.

election petition within the statutory limitation period. Such a situation arose in K. Venkatachalam v. A. Swamickan.[7]

A person who was disqualified was elected to the Tamil Nadu Assembly. No election petition was filed against him and the limitation period for the purpose expired. Thereafter, a writ petition was filed in the High Court under Art. 226 for declaration of his election as invalid. The Supreme Court ruled that the High Court could declare his election void as he had no basic constitutional and statutory qualification. There was no other mechanism available for the purpose. Action could not be taken against him under Art. 192 [Art. 103] as he incurred the disqualification prior to his election. Art. 226 is couched in the widest possible terms.[8] The Court also directed the State Government to recover from him penalty under Art. 193 [Art. 104] according to which he is liable to pay a penalty of Rs. 500 a day on which he sits and votes.[9]

(e) CRIMINALISATION OF POLITICS

The increasing nexus between criminals and politics threatens the survival of any true democracy. In India, the Election Committee's official publication 'Electoral Reforms (Views and Proposals)' highlighted the need to amend the Representation of the People Act, 1951 to debar antisocial and criminal elements making inroads into the electoral and political fields. It said that the criminalization of politics had reached a stage where the law breakers had become law makers.

The view was reiterated by the Law Commission in its 179th Report which also recommended an amendment of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 by providing that framing of charges for offences punishable with death or life imprisonment, should disqualify a candidate for five years or until acquittal, whichever event happens earlier. It also recommended that a candidate seeking to contest an election must furnish details regarding any pending criminal case, including a copy of the FIR/Complaint and also furnish details of all assets possessed whether by the candidate, spouse or dependent relations. No action was taken on the recommendation by the Government because of a lack of consensus amongst the political parties.

It is in this environment of inaction of the government, Parliament and political parties, the matter was first brought before the Delhi High Court through a PIL writ petition. Basing itself on the thesis that under Art. 19(1)(a) of the Constitution,[10] guaranteeing freedom of speech and expression, the right to get information is also guaranteed. The right to information is an integral part of the freedom of speech and expression. Accordingly, the High Court ruled that a candidate while filing his nomination for election to Lok Sabha or a State Legislature should give full information in an affidavit about his past criminal record, financial status etc.[11]

The Central Government appealed to the Supreme Court against the High Court verdict. On appeal, the Supreme Court has more or less reiterated what the

---

7. AIR 1999 SC 1723 : (1999) 4 SCC 526.
8. See, infra, Ch. VIII, Secs. D and E for discussion on Art. 226.
Also see, infra, Ch. XIX, under "Elections".
9. Infra, p. 61.
10. See, infra, Ch. XXIV.
11. AIR 2001 Del 126.

Delhi High Court has said. The Supreme Court has ruled that the Election Commission should call for information from each candidate on affidavit regarding his past criminal record, his financial assets (including those of his spouse or dependants), his liabilities to public sector bodies and educational qualifications.[12] It may be noted that these are not in any disqualifications of the candidate. The idea underlying the direction is that if the electors have full information about the antecedents of a candidate, they will be in a better position to decide as to whom to give vote. Subsequent to the decision of the Supreme Court in Association of Democratic Reform [supra], the Representation of the People Act, 1951 was amended[13] by inserting Section 33-A which requires a candidate to furnish information whether he is accused of any offence punishable with imprisonment of two years or more in a pending case in which charges have been framed by a Court of competent jurisdiction and whether he has been convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for one year or more. Failure to file an affidavit, filing a false affidavit or concealing information is punishable under Section 125-A. As far as the declaration of assets is concerned, Parliament chose to partially implement the decision of the Supreme Court by requiring an elected and not a candidate standing for election, to declare his assets.[14] Section 33-B provided that a candidate was not liable to disclose or furnish any such information, in respect of his election, which was not required to be disclosed or furnished under the Act or the rules made thereunder notwithstanding anything contained in any judgment, decree or order of any court or any direction, order or any other instruction issued by the Election Commission. In other words, a candidate is not required to disclose (a) the cases in which he is acquitted or discharged of criminal offence(s); (b) his assets and liabilities; and (c) his educational qualification. The section was held to be unconstitutional in People's Union for Civil Liberties (PUCL) v. Union of India,[15] on the ground that the voter had a fundamental right under Art. 19(1)(a) to be aware of the antecedents of his candidate.

E. OTHER PROVISIONS REGARDING PARLIAMENTARY MEMBERSHIP

(a) SIMULTANEOUS MEMBERSHIP

No person can be a member of both Houses of Parliament at one and the same time. Parliament is authorised to provide by law for vacation by a person, who is chosen a member of both the Houses, of his seat in one House [Art. 101(1)].[16]

---

12. Union of India v. Association of Democratic Reforms, (2002) 5 SCC 294 : AIR 2002 SC 2112.
13. The Representation of the People (Third Amendment) Act, 2002 (Act 72 of 2002).
14. Sec. 75A of The Representation of the People Act, 1951.
15. (2003) 4 SCC 399, at page 433 : AIR 2003 SC 2363.
16. The Representation of the People Act, 1951, provides that a person so chosen who has not taken his seat in either House may intimate the Election Commission within ten days from the publication of the later of the results as to the House he desires to serve in, and thereupon his seat in the other House falls vacant. In default of such an intimation, his seat in the Rajya Sabha becomes vacant. A sitting member of the Lok Sabha or Rajya Sabha vacates his seat when he is chosen a member of the Rajya Sabha or Lok Sabha respectively.

No person can be a member of Parliament and a State Legislature simultaneously. If a person is so elected, then at the expiry of such period as the President may by rules specify, his seat in Parliament becomes vacant, unless he has previously resigned his seat in the State Legislature [Art. 101(2)].[17]

Parliament has also provided that if a person is elected to more than one seat in a House then unless he resigns within the prescribed period all but one of the seats, all the seats become vacant.[18]

(b) TERMINATION OF MEMBERSHIP

A member of the Rajya Sabha may resign his seat by writing to the Chairman, and that of the Lok Sabha, by writing to the Speaker. The seat falls vacant when the resignation is accepted by the Chairman/Speaker who is not to accept the resignation if he is satisfied that it is not voluntary or genuine [Art. 101(3)(b)].

A House of Parliament may declare a seat vacant if a member absents himself from all its meetings for a period of sixty days without its permission, no account being taken of any period during which the House is prorogued or adjourned for more than four consecutive days [Art. 101(4)].

(c) COMMITTEE ON ABSENCE OF MEMBERS

Lok Sabha has a Committee on Absence of Members to consider all applications from members for leave of absence from sittings of the House, to examine every case when a member has been absent for sixty or more days from the sittings of the House and to report whether the absence should be condoned, or the seat of the member declared vacant by the House. Rajya Sabha has no such committee, but the seat of a member becomes vacant because of his absence when the House passes a motion for the purpose.

The seat of a member in a House does not become vacant automatically by his absence, but the House has power to declare it vacant. This is different from the case of a member becoming subject to a disqualification when his seat becomes vacant automatically.

(d) TAKING OF OATH

A member of a House of Parliament, before taking his seat in the House, has to make and subscribe an oath or affirmation before the President, or a person appointed by him for this purpose. Until a duly elected candidate takes the oath, he cannot participate in the proceedings of the House as he is not regarded a member thereof [Art. 99].[19]

(e) PENALTY

A person is liable to a penalty of Rs. 500 for each day he sits or votes as a member in a House :

(i) before taking the prescribed oath; or

(ii) when he knows that he is not qualified to be a member of the House, or is disqualified for being its member; or

---

17. Also see, The Prohibition of Simultaneous Membership Rules, 1950.
18. Sec. 70 of the R.P. Act, 1951.
19. Also see, Third Schedule to the Constitution.

(iii) when he knows that he is prohibited from sitting or voting in the House by virtue of any law made by Parliament [Art. 104].

(f) SALARY

Members of a House of Parliament are entitled to receive such salaries and allowances as may be determined by Parliament by law [Art. 106][20]

F. ANTI-DEFECTION LAW

The politics of defection has been the bane of the parliamentary system in India. The vice of defection has been rampant in India for quite some time, especially at the state level. Defection means floor-crossing by a member of one political party to another party.

Defection causes government instability, for a government may be toppled over due to the defection of some of its supporters to the opposition party converting it from a minority into a majority party. Defection is undemocratic as it negates the electoral verdict. A party which fails to get majority in the House through election may yet be able to manoeuvre a majority in the House and form the government by inducing defections from other parties. Thus, the party which may have won a majority through election, and got the mandate from the people to form the government, may yet fail to do so because a few of its members defect from the party.

It is one thing for a member to change his political affiliation out of conviction because he may conscientiously disagree with the policies of the party to which he belongs. In such a case, if he leaves the party with whose support he has been elected to the House, he ought to resign his membership of, and seek fresh election to, the House. But such principled defections are rare. Most of the defections take place out of selfish motives as the defectors hope to be appointed ministers in the Council of Ministers to be formed with their support. This is very well illustrated by the jumbo size Kalyan Singh government installed in 1997 in Uttar Pradesh formed by the BJP with the support of defectors from the Congress Party and the Bahujan Samaj Party. Almost all the defectors were appointed as ministers and, thus, the Council of Ministers had 94 Ministers, which was an unprecedented event in itself. Such unprincipled defections are morally wrong, opportunist and indicative of lust for power. It involves breach of faith of the electorate.

It was realized that if the evil of political defection was not contained, it would undermine the very foundations of democracy in India and the principles which sustain it. It was therefore thought necessary to enact a law to suppress the vice of defection.

The Constitution (Fifty-second Amendment) Act[21] changed four Articles of the Constitution, viz. 101(3)(a), 102(2), 190(3)(a) and 191(2), and added the Tenth Schedule thereto. This Amendment is often referred to as the anti-defection law.

Under Art. 102(2),[22] a person is disqualified to be a member of either House of Parliament if he is so disqualified under the Tenth Schedule.

---

20. Also see, The Salaries and Allowances of Members of Parliament Act, 1954.
21. For provisions of the Constitution Amendment Act, see, infra, Ch. XLII.
22. Supra, Sec. D.

Under Para 2 of the X Schedule, if a member voluntarily gives up his membership of, or votes or abstains from voting, in the House against the direction[23] issued by, the party on whose symbol he or she was elected, then he or she would be liable to be disqualified from membership.

In view of Explanation (a) to para 2(1) of Schedule X, the member concerned would be deemed to belong to the Indian National Congress Party by which he was set up as a candidate for contesting the election of MLC in the year 1998. On facts the Supreme Court held that it could not be said that the finding arrived at by the Chairman of the Legislative Council that he gave up the membership of the Indian National Congress Party to which he belonged is one which could not reasonably and possibly have been arrived at.[24]

The nature and degree of inquiry required to be conducted for various contingencies contemplated by para 2 of Schedule X may be different. Under para 2(1)(a) the inquiry would be a limited one. But the inquiry required for the purpose of para 2(1)(b) may, at times, be more elaborate involving several factual aspects.[25]

On the plain language of para 2 of Schedule X, the disqualification comes into force or becomes effective on the happening of the event. Under para 6, the final authority to take a decision on the question of disqualification of a member of the House vests with the Chairman or the Speaker of the House. Their role is only in the domain of ascertaining the relevant facts. Once the facts gathered or placed show that a member of the House has done any such act which comes within the purview of para 2(1) (2) or (3) of the Schedule, the disqualification will apply and the Chairman or the Speaker of the House will have to make a decision to that effect. Para 7 of Schedule X excludes the jurisdiction of the court in respect of any matter connected with disqualification of a member of a House under the Schedule. That provision being in the Constitution itself, unlike a statutory provision, affects the power of judicial review conferred on the High Courts and the Supreme Court under Article 226, respectively.[26]

Since the Speaker is involved in an adjudicating process, fairness demands that generally the member in fault should be given some opportunity of explaining his position. However, the complaint of violation of natural justice will not succeed if the member concerned has not suffered any prejudice. For example, in Mahachandra Prasad Singh,[27] the Chairman, Legislative Council who belonged to Indian National Congress was alleged to have incurred disqualification under para 2(1)(a) of the Tenth Schedule by contesting a parliamentary election as an

---

23. In Kihota Hollohan, see below, the Supreme Court has adopted a restrictive view of the 'direction' issued by a party "the violation of which may entail disqualification". Such a direction should pertain to two matters, viz., (1) a vote on motion of confidence or no confidence in the government; (2) where the motion under consideration relates to a matter which is an integral policy and programme of the political party on the basis of which it approached the electorate. This has been done with a view to maintain freedom of speech of the members in the House guaranteed by Arts. 105(1) and 194(1).
See, infra, Sec. L, under "Parliamentary Privileges".

24. Mahachandra Prasad Singh v. Chairman, Bihar Legislative Council, (2004) 8 SCC 747 : AIR 2005 SC 69.

25. Mahachandra Prasad Singh v. Chairman, Bihar Legislative Council, (2004) 8 SCC 747: AIR 2005 SC 69.

26. Mahachandra Prasad Singh v. Chairman, Bihar Legislative Council, (2004) 8 SCC 747: AIR 2005 SC 69.

27. Mahachandra Prasad Singh v. Chairman, Bihar Legislative Council, (2004) 8 SCC 747: AIR 2005 SC 69.

independent candidate. The Chairman took into consideration a letter from the leader of Indian National Congress in the Legislative Council to the effect that the said MLC had ceased to be a member of the said party for violating party discipline by contesting the parliamentary election as an independent candidate. The petitioner did not dispute the facts but rather admitted them in his writ petition. In such circumstances, non supply of copy of the said letter to the MLC held caused no prejudice to the Member of Legislative Council and hence, was not violative of any principles of natural justice.

Under Para 3, no disqualification is incurred in cases where a split from, or merger of a party in, another party is claimed. In the event of a split, at least one-third of its members must decide to quit or break away. In the case of a merger, the decision should have the support of not less than two-thirds of the party members.

Paragraph 3 of the Tenth Schedule clearly states that from the time of the split, the breakaway faction will be deemed to be a separate political party for purposes of the anti-defection law. All that the Speaker is required to do is to ascertain whether the group consists of not less than one-third of the members of the legislature party. If this requirement is fulfilled, the Speaker is bound to hold that the members concerned cannot be disqualified.[28]

Paragraph 3 of the Tenth Schedule as it originally stood provided that no disqualification would be incurred in cases where there is a split of at least one third of the members of the original party. The entire paragraph has been omitted from the Tenth Schedule by The Constitution (Ninety-first Amendment) Act, 2003.[29] Paragraph 4 protects mergers of parties provided that the decision to merge is supported by not less than two thirds of a merging party.

The question of disqualification under Sch. X is to be determined by the Speaker of the Lok Sabha, or the Chairman of the Rajya Sabha, as the case may be, but he is to take notice of an alleged defection not suo motu, but only when a petition in writing is received from a member. Para 6 of the Xth Schedule renders the decision of the Speaker as final.

In terms of para 2 of the Tenth Schedule the act of disqualification occurs on a member voluntarily giving up his membership of a political party or at the point of defiance of the whip issued to him.The date of disqualification is the date on which the act takes place and not the date on which the Speaker takes a decision in that regard.[30]

Under para 7 of the Schedule, no Court has jurisdiction to decide the question of disqualification of a member of a House under Sch. X.

Para 8 authorises the Chairman/Speaker of a House to make rules for "giving effect to the provisions of Schedule X. Rule 7(7) provides that the procedure to

---

28. In Rajendra Singh Rana v. Swami Prasad Maurya (supra), the Supreme Court construing para 3 held that the scheme of Articles 102 and 191 and the Tenth Schedule, does not permit the determination of the question of split or merger separately from a motion before the Speaker seeking a disqualification of a member or members concerned nor does the Speaker have an independent power to decide that there has been a split or merger of a political party as contemplated by paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Tenth Schedule to the Constitution.

29. See infra.

30. Rajendra Singh Rana v. Swami Prasad Maurya, (2007) 4 SCC 270 : AIR 2007 SC 1305.

be followed by the Speaker shall be the same as adopted in privilege cases by the Committee of Privileges.[31] A reasonable opportunity must be allowed to the member against whom a complaint has been made to represent his case, and to be heard in person. At times, the Speaker may refer a case of defection to the Committee of Privileges for inquiry. This process takes quite some time and, therefore, defection does not have any immediate effect. The jurisdiction of the courts is barred in matters connected with the disqualification of members.

(a) KIHOTA HOLLOHON

Explaining the rationale underlying the X Schedule, the Supreme Court has stated that the provisions of the X Schedule give recognition to the role of the political parties in the political process. A political party goes before the electorate with a particular programme; it sets up candidates at the election on the basis of such programme; a candidate is therefore elected on the basis of the party programme. The underlying premise of the X Schedule is that political propriety and morality demand that if a member of a legislature, after the election, changes his political affiliation and leaves the political party which had set him up as a candidate at the election, then he should give up his seat in the legislature and contest election again under the banner of the new party adopted by him.

The constitutionality of the Anti-Defection law has been upheld by the Supreme Court in a 3 : 2 decision in Kihota Hollohon v. Zachilhu[32]. But, at the same time, the Court has ruled that the Speaker's order under the law disqualifying a member of the legislature on the ground of defection is subject to judicial review.

The majority view is that the main provisions of the X Schedule are intended to provide a "remedy for the evil of unprincipled and unethical political defections." Para 7 of the X Schedule barring judicial review affects Articles 136, 226 and 227 of the Constitution[33] and, thus, is required to be ratified by half the State Legislatures in accordance with Art. 368(2) of the Constitution.[34] As it has not been so ratified, it would be constitutionally invalid. But, para 7 contains a provision which is independent of, and stands apart from, the X Schedule's main provisions. The remaining provisions of the X Schedule are severable from para 7 as they could stand independently of para 7 and are complete in themselves, workable and not truncated, by excision of para 7.[35]

The majority has upheld the validity of para 2 of the 52nd Amendment. This provides for disqualification on defection of a member from one political party to another. These provisions, the majority has ruled, do not violate any rights or freedoms guaranteed to the legislators under Arts. 105 and 194 of the Constitution.[36] In the words of the majority Judges:[37]

---

31. See, infra, Sec. L(ii)(h).
32. AIR 1993 SC 412 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651. The majority consisted of M.N. VENKATACHALIAH, K.J. REDDY, and S.C. AGRAWAL, JJ. The minority was constituted by L.M. SHARMA and J.S. VERMA, JJ.
33. For discussion on these Articles, see, Chs. IV and VIII, infra. These constitutional provisions deal with judicial review.
34. For Art. 368(2), see, Infra, Ch. XLI, under "Amendment of the Constitution".
35. For the doctrine of severability, see, Chs. XX and XL.
36. For Art. 105, see, Sec. L, infra; for Art. 194, see, infra, Ch. VI.
37. AIR 1993 SC at 436 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651.

> "The provisions are salutary and are intended to strengthen the fabric of Indian parliamentary democracy by curbing unprincipled and unethical political defections."

While rejecting the contention that the entire Xth Schedule, even after the exclusion of para 7, would be violative of the basic structure of the Constitution[38] in so far as the provisions in the Schedule affect the democratic rights of the elected members of the legislatures and, therefore, of the principles of parliamentary democracy, the majority Judges have ruled that the Speaker/Chairman acts as a 'tribunal' adjudicating upon rights and obligations and his decision in a defection case would thus be open to judicial review under Arts. 136, 226 and 227, and that the finality clause in para 6 of the Schedule does not exclude the jurisdiction of the courts under these Articles of the Constitution. However, judicial review would not cover any stage prior to the making of a decision by the Speaker/ Chairman. "The only exception for any interlocutory interference being cases of interlocutory disqualifications or suspensions which may have grave, immediate and irreversible repercussions and consequences."

The majority has affirmed that the Speaker's order would be open to judicial review on the grounds of jurisdictional errors based on violation of constitutional mandate, mala fides, non-compliance with rules of natural justice and perversity. The Judges have also rejected the contention that the investiture of adjudicatory functions in the Speaker/Chairman is by itself invalid on the ground of political bias and lack of impartiality. The majority view on this point is:[39]

> "The Chairmen or Speakers hold a pivotal position in the scheme of parliamentary democracy and are guardians of the rights and privileges of the House. They are expected to and do take far reaching decisions in the functioning of parliamentary democracy. Vesture of power to adjudicate questions under the Xth Schedule in such constitutional functionaries should not be considered exceptionable".

VENKATACHALIAH, J., observed in this connection :

> "It would, indeed be unfair to the high traditions of that great office to say that the investiture in it of this jurisdiction would be vitiated for violation of a basic feature of democracy. It is inappropriate to express distrust in the high office of the Speaker, merely because of the Speakers are alleged, or even found, to have discharged their functions not in keeping with the great traditions of the high office..."

The minority view, on the other hand, was that the assent of the President to the 52nd Amendment was non est, null and void as the Bill needed to be ratified by half the States and that has not been done. The Bill ought to have been presented to the President only after such ratification. As the Constitution has not been amended in accordance with Art. 368(2), the doctrine of severability could not apply to the 52nd Amendment.[40] Further, the Speaker cannot be given the role of the 'sole' arbiter in the defection cases as it would be against the basic structure of the Constitution. The Speaker depends continuously on the support

---

38. For discussion on the doctrine of 'Basic Features' or 'Basic Structure' of the Constitution, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
39. AIR 1993 SC at 453.
40. On this question, see, infra, Ch. XLI.

of the majority party in the House, and so he cannot be regarded as an independent adjudicatory authority. On this aspect, the minority Judges have observed:[41]

> "Democracy is a part of the basic structure of the Constitution and free and fair elections with provision for resolution of disputes relating to the same as also for adjudication of those relating to subsequent disqualification by an independent body outside the House are essential features of the democratic system in our Constitution. Accordingly, an independent adjudicatory machinery for resolving disputes relating to the competence of members of the House is envisaged as an attribute of this basic feature."

Therefore, according to the minority judgment, all the decisions rendered by the several Speakers hitherto must also be declared a nullity and liable to be ignored.

An outstanding feature of the majority decision is to introduce judicial review of a Speaker's decision in a defection matter under Schedule X. The Supreme Court has stated on this point as follows:[42]

> "This Court has held that the Speaker while deciding the question of disqualification of a Member of the State Legislative Assembly [or of Parliament] under the Tenth Schedule to the Constitution acts as a statutory authority, in which capacity the Speaker's decision is subject to judicial review by the High Court and this Court."

But this also opens the way for Legislature-Court confrontation which breaks out from time to time between the Courts and State Legislatures on the question of legislative privileges.[43]

(b) SUBSEQUENT DEVELOPMENTS

The purpose underlying the Anti-Defection law is to curb defections, but, at the same time, not to come in the way of democratic realignment of parties in the House by way of merger of two or more parties, or a split in an existing party. The Anti-Defection Law has been hailed as a bold step to clean public life in India, but, in course of time, certain defects therein have become apparent which have very much compromised the effectiveness of the law to achieve its objectives.

The law as it stood originally was not able to prevent defections in toto. Bulk defections and splits which were permitted and in a sense encouraged by paragraph 3 of the Tenth Schedule, destabilised governments. The decision whether there was a split or not was left to the Chairman or the Speaker of the House whose view in the matter was final under paragraph 6. Apart from the very real possibility of the Chairman or Speaker being politically biased, defections and splits took place not because of a change of ideology but because of a lust for power and to serve selfish interests. In almost all cases defectors were rewarded with ministerships.

In October 1997, 22 members of the Congress party and 12 members of the Bahujan Samaj Party defected from their Parties and supported the confidence

---

41. AIR 1993 SC at 457 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651.
42. I. Manilal Singh v. H. Borobabu Singh, AIR 1994 SC 505, 506 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 718, Mahachandra Prasad Singh v. Chairman, Bihar Legislative Council, 2004 (8) SCC 747, 757.
43. See, infra, Sec. L. Also, Ch. VI, infra.

motion in the BJP (Bhartiya Janta Party) Government to give it a majority in the U.P. Legislative Assembly. Later, all the defectors were made Ministers and the Council of Ministers came to have 94 members. The leader of BSP complained to the Speaker that the 12 MLAs who had defected from the Party ought to be disqualified from membership of the House. The Speaker procrastinated and ultimately decided that there was a split in BSP and that 1/3rd members of the Party (numbering 23 MLAs) had split and hence the defecting MLAs (12 in number) had not incurred the disqualification. The fact is that the claim that 23 and not 12 MLAs had split from BSP was never substantiated but the Speaker took recourse to some technical procedural arguments and came to his conclusion. It may be noted that the Speaker belonged to BJP. The Speaker's decision was appealed from before the Supreme Court.[44] The appeal was heard by a Bench of three Judges. Of the three Judges, THOMAS, J. held that the decision of the Speaker was perverse and that there was in fact no split within the meaning of paragraph 3 of the Tenth Schedule. Consequently the defecting members stood disqualified without any scope for the Speaker being asked to take a fresh decision. SRINIVASAN, J. on the other hand upheld the decision of the Speaker saying that all relevant material had been considered and that at best it could be said that two conclusions were possible and the Speaker had chosen one of them. Although it was not necessary for SRINIVASAN, J. to decide the issue of remand for fresh disposal by the Speaker, he held that if the decision of the Speaker is set aside as a result of judicial review, the matter must be left to the Speaker to redecide the issue. Punchhi, CJ did not voice any final view but opined that the matter should be referred to the Constitution Bench for decision. The difference of opinion was left unresolved by the Constitution Bench which disposed of the appeal finally as infructuous in November, 2004. Following the Mayawati decision, in 1999 the Law Commission of India in its 170th Report on "Reform of Electoral Laws" recommended omission of paragraph 3 of the Tenth Schedule. The same view was expressed by the National Commission to Review the Working of the Constitution (NCRWC) which additionally recommended that a defector should be penalized by debarring him/her from holding any public office as a Minister or any other remunerative political post for at least the duration of the remaining term of the existing legislature or until the next election whichever is earlier. Both recommendations were accepted by Parliament. By the Constitution (Ninety-first Amendment) Act, 2003 paragraph 3 of the Tenth Schedule was omitted. Article 164 was amended by the introduction of clause (1B) disqualifying defectors from being appointed as Ministers for the period recommended by NCRWC. Art. 361B was also introduced by the 2003 Amendment Act, disqualifying defectors from holding any remunerative political post for the same period.

In 2007, another Constitution Bench in Rajendra Singh Rana v. Swami Prasad Maurya,[45] in effect upheld THOMAS J.'s view. In that case the Speaker had decided that certain members were not disqualified on the ground of defection. The Supreme Court set aside the decision as unconstitutional, inter alia, because it was based on no evidence. The Court did not remand the matter for a fresh decision by the Speaker but itself decided the issue and because the term of the Assembly was yet to expire, issued a declaration that the concerned members stood disqualified with effect from 27 August, 2003.[46]

44. Mayawati v. Markendeya Chand, AIR 1998 SC 3340 : (1998) 7 SCC 517.
45. (2007) 4 SCC 270 : AIR 2007 SC 1305.

In this context, the Supreme Court has considered an important question.[47] A person set up by a political party as a candidate gets elected to a House of legislature and is thereafter expelled by the party for any reason. He thus becomes an "unattached" member. If thereafter he joins another political party, will he incur disqualification under the X Schedule. The Supreme Court has answered the question in the affirmative. The Court has ruled that there is nothing like an "unattached" member under the X Schedule. "Such an arrangement and labelling has no legal bearing so far as the X Schedule is concerned". If such a member were to escape the rigour of the law, it will defeat the very purpose underlying the X Schedule, viz. to curb the evil of defection which has polluted the Indian democratic system.

Whether a disqualification event has occurred has to be determined by the Speaker on the basis of material placed before him. A mere claim that there has been a split would not be enough.[48]

The same yardstick is applied to a person who is elected as an independent candidate, i.e. a member elected without being set up as a candidate by any political party, and who wishes to join a political party after the election.[49]

When an independent Member is alleged to have joined a political party, the test to be applied is whether the member has given up his independent character on which he was elected by the electorate. This has to be determined on appreciation of material on record and conduct of the member by the Speaker. No hard and fast rule can be laid down when the answer is dependent on facts of each case. The substance and spirit of anti-defection provisions are the guiding factors.[50]

It seems that the Anti-Defection Law has stirred up more controversies than it has been able to solve. For example, the Meghalaya Speaker suspended the voting rights of five independent members before the House was due to take up no confidence motion against the government. Later the Speaker disqualified five members of the opposition and even ignored the stay order which these members had obtained from the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court asked the State Governor to include the disqualified members in the trial of strength in the House. The stage was thus set for a confrontation between the Court and the Legislature. The situation was however saved by the imposition of the President's rule in the State and the dissolution of the State Legislature.[51]

A sorry state of affairs in Goa is disclosed by the factual situation in Dr. Kashinath G. Jalmi v. The Speaker.[52] Naik assumed office of the Chief Minister of 46. Ibid page 305.

---

47. G. Viswanathan v. Speaker, T.N. Legislative Assembly, AIR 1996 SC 1060 : (1996) 2 SCC 353. See also Mahachandra Prasad Singh v. Chairman (Supra).
48. Jagjit Singh v. State of Haryana, (2006) 11 SCC 1 : AIR 2007 SC 590.
49. Jagjit Singh v. State of Haryana, 2006 (13) Scale 335, 369 : AIR 2007 SC 590 : (2006) 11 SCC 1.
50. Jagjit Singh v. State of Haryana, (2006) 11 SCC 1 : AIR 2007 SC 590.
51. On this point see, infra, Ch. XIII.
52. AIR 1993 SC 1873 : (1993) 2 SCC 703. See, JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, II, 1410-1412.

Goa on 25-1-91. On 15-2-91, Speaker Sirsat disqualified Naik from the membership of the House on the ground of defection. On 4-3-91, Sirsat was removed from Speakership and the Deputy Speaker functioning as Speaker reviewing the order earlier made by Sirsat set aside the order. In the instant case, the Supreme Court quashed the order made by the Deputy Speaker on the ground that there was no inherent power of review vested in the Speaker.

There arose a very bad case of confrontation between the Supreme Court and the Speaker of the Manipur Assembly. The Speaker disqualified several MLAs' under the Anti-Defection Law. On the application of one of the aggrieved MLAs', the Supreme Court invalidated the Speaker's order. The Speaker refused to obey the Court order arguing that he was immune from the Court process being the Speaker. Ultimately, contempt of Court proceedings were initiated against him. The Court sent him notice to appear before it, but he refused to appear before the Court. After several adjournments, at last, on February 5, 1993, the Court directed the Central Government to produce the Speaker before it even by using minimum force against him, if necessary. The Court held as "totally misconceived" the contention of the Speaker that he was immune from the Court process. The Court observed in this connection:

> "It is unfortunate that a person who holds the constitutional office of a Speaker of Legislative Assembly has chosen to ignore the constitutional mandate that this country is governed by the rule of law and what the law is, is for this Court to declare in discharge of its constitutional obligation which binds all in accordance with Art. 141 of the Constitution[53] and Art. 144 then says that all authorities are to act in aid of the orders made by this Court[54] .....the contemner has chosen to ignore the obvious corollary of rule of law."

Ultimately, the Speaker was made to appear before the Court and, thereafter, the Court dropped the matter against him.

These unsavoury incidents which have occurred in the wake of the Anti-Defection Law show that there is need to review the law as there are several lacunae therein. It is necessary to review the law so that the lacunae therein may be removed and the malady of defection may be effectively rooted out from the body polity. It is high time that the law is revised suitably so as to take care of the many questions which need clarification.

While there is need to have a law to root out the malady of defection from the body polity, there is also need to ensure that the question of disqualification arising as a result of defection be decided objectively, on merits, without any political considerations, and expeditiously. It should also be clearly laid down that the decision-maker would be subject to the ultimate control of the Supreme Court so as to rule out any argument that the Speaker is subject to no one in this matter and that he can decide the question as he likes according to his whims and fancies. Law must be made certain on the several questions which have been thrown up during the several years of the working of the law.

The difficulty in implementing the law has been that the Speakers have not always exercised their power to decide whether or not a member has earned disqualification or not as a result of 'defection' objectively and impartially. The reason for this malady was rightly diagnosed by the minority Judges in Kihota as the

---

53. See, infra, Ch. IV.
54. Ibid.

Speakers' depend continuously on the majority support in the House. Therefore, if a member defects from a smaller party to a bigger party, and the Speaker belongs to the bigger party, an impartial adjudication on the defecting member's disqualification becomes extremely improbable. There has been suspicion in the public mind that the power is at times exercised by the concerned Speaker keeping in view political expediency. The majority judges placed the Speaker on a high pedestal but generally and subject to certain notable exemption[55] this does not accord with the real facts of political life in India.

A very serious question to think about is whether the power to disqualify a member on the ground of defection should continue to vest in the Speaker, or should it be vested in some independent body outside the House. It appears from the tenor of the Supreme Court's decisions that it may not accept vesting of such decision-making power solely in the Speaker. Some sort of judicial review is called for of the Speaker's decision because it has been proved again and again that a Speaker is a political creature and may not always be able to deal with the situation in an objective manner.[56]

In Jagjit Singh a challenge to the decision of the Speaker to disqualify a member for defection without complying with the principles of natural justice in as much as the member was not granted sufficient time to file a reply to meet the case against him was repealed. This was a case specific decision. But it appears that the Supreme Court proceeded on the basis that the principles of natural justice would apply as otherwise the Court ought to have rejected the argument and not explore whether on facts sufficient time had been given to the member or not.[57]

The Speaker of the Legislature is a political creature and therefore, generally he is not impartial. Most of the times he takes a view which is in the interest of the party to which he belongs. Suggestions have, therefore, been made that the Act should be amended to bar all defections—individual or group—and that the function to decide upon the question of disqualification arising out of defection should be taken away from the Speakers and be vested in the Election Commission which is an autonomous, non-political, non-partisan body.

As mentioned above, the minority view in Kihota Hollohon was that as the Speaker depends for his tenure on the majority in the Legislature, he does not satisfy the requirement of an "independent adjudicatory authority". Subsequent events in various legislatures have proved this assertion of the minority Judges right. The high ethical standard which was set up by the majority Judges in Kihota Hollohon is seldom reached by the Speakers in India. The confidence placed by the majority Judges in the "high traditions" of the "high office of the Speaker" have, in practice, been found to be misplaced.

This situation can be rectified, and the Anti-Defection Law made more effective, if the adjudicatory function is vested in the Election Commission. On the lines of Arts. 102 and 192,[58] the President in case of Parliament, and the Governor in case of a State Legislature, may refer the matter to the Election Commis-

---

55. See below under section H(a).
56. Jagjit Singh v. State of Haryana, 2006 (13) SCALE 335, 370-371.
57. Jagjit Singh v. State of Haryana, (2006) 11 SCC 1 : AIR 2007 SC 590.
58. See, supra, Sec. D. for Art. 102; for Art. 192, see, infra, Ch. VI, Sec. B.

sion. This seems to be the only way to avoid politically motivated decisions by the Speakers when members defect from one party to another.

A number of other related issues also need clarification as they have a bearing on the question of defection. Some of these questions are: whether defiance of the party whip may be regarded as 'dissent' or 'defection' in a parliamentary democracy? It has been argued that in case of conflict between the interests of the nation or loyalty to the electorate or the party principles and the legislature party boss's directive, the member's duty is the former.

The Anti-Defection Law and the rules framed thereunder do not provide for the expulsion of a member from his party for his activities outside the House. A practice has, however, grown to declare such a member which is expelled from a party as 'unattached', but he continues to be a member of the House notwithstanding the Anti-Defection Law.

Proceedings in respect of disqualification of a Member are comparable neither to a trial in a court of law nor departmental proceedings for disciplinary action.[59]

Defection is not only anti-democratic but even a form of corruption for underlying motivation is personal gain and not any conscientious change of heart on the part of the defecting legislator. At the election, people vote for a particular candidate on the basis of the party he belongs to at the time of his election. It is reasonable to contend that if the legislator seeks to change his political affiliation after election, he must resign his membership of the legislature and seek fresh endorsement by the voters on the basis of his newly chosen platform.

One aspect of the Anti-Defection Law needs to be noted. Until 1985, there was no explicit reference in the Constitution to political parties although they have always been existence in the country. The X Schedule introduced in 1985 acknowledges the existence of the political parties and seeks to protect their integrity by banning defection from one party to the other.

There is no provision in the Tenth Schedule to the effect that until a petition which is signed and verified in the manner laid down in CPC for verification of pleadings is made to the Chairman or the Speaker of the House, he will not get the jurisdiction to give a decision as to whether a member of the House has become subject to disqualification under the Schedule. There is no lis between the person moving the petition and the member of the House who is alleged to have incurred a disqualification. It is not an adversarial kind of litigation where he may be required to lead evidence. Even if he withdraws the petition it will make no difference as a duty is cast upon the Chairman or the Speaker to carry out the mandate of the constitutional provision viz. the Tenth Schedule.[60]

G. MEETING OF PARLIAMENT

(a) SUMMONING

The power to summon a House of Parliament to meet is formally vested in the President [Art. 85(1)]. In actual practice, however, the decision to convene a

---

59. Jagjit Singh v. State of Haryana, (2006) 11 SCC 1 : AIR 2007 SC 590.
60. Mahachandra Prasad Singh v. Chairman, Bihar Legislative Council, (2004) 8 SCC 747.

House is taken by its Leader in consultation with his Cabinet colleagues, the Speaker, and probably the leaders of the opposition groups.[61]

A notification convening a House is issued under the President's signature in the Official Gazette and summons to individual members are issued by its Secretary.

Each House is to meet in such a way that six months do not intervene between its last sitting in one session and its first sitting in the next session [Art. 85(1)]. This means that Parliament must meet at least twice a year. However, the period of six months does not apply in the event of premature dissolution of the Lok Sabha.[62]

(b) PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS

At the commencement of the first session of Parliament, whether after the general election to the Lok Sabha, or every year, the President addresses both Houses of Parliament assembled together and informs Parliament of the causes of its summons [Art. 87(1)].

The President's address fulfils two functions. First, it underlines responsibility of the Government to Parliament for it consists of the Government's review of the international and internal situation and a statement of its general policy together with an indication of its legislative programme for the ensuing session. Secondly, it provides a solemn yet simple ceremony with which the session of a House begins.

The practice of the President addressing Parliament has been adopted in India from Britain where the Monarch addresses a new session of Parliament.[63]

The President's speech is prepared by the Cabinet and announces in outline Government's plans for the principal business of the ensuing session. The President's address is thus in reality the Government's address delivered through the President.[64]

Each House has to make provision by its rules of procedure for allotment of time for discussing the matters referred to in the Presidential address [Art. 87(2)]. In this discussion, members may raise any question of general policy, public administration and political situation. This discussion provides an opportunity for a general discussion of national affairs. The great merit of the debate on the Address from the point of view of the private members is that the field of argument

---

61. For details of Parliamentary Procedure, see, KAUL AND SHAKDHAR, PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE OF PARLIAMENT, (ed. G.C. Malhotra, V Ed.); SUBHASH KASHYAP, PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE, (2000).

62. In re Special Reference No.1 of 2002 : (2002) 8 SCC 237, 284 : AIR 2003 SC 87.

63. MORRISON, GOVERNMENT AND PARLIAMENT, 75

64. Shri R. VENKATARAMAN (former President of India) in his memoires criticises the practice of Presidential address in the following words :

"I had always held the view that the address by the President and Governors (see, infra, Ch. VI) at the commencement of the first session of the legislature every year was a British anachronism. First, the address was prepared by the government and contained only its views and the President and the Governors were mere mouth pieces. While this is a fact, very often the President or Governors were criticized on the contents of the address, creating a wrong public impression about these dignitaries. Further, disorderly behaviour during these addresses marred the dignity of the high offices...During Rajiv Gandhi's time, I had written to him to amend the Constitution deleting this meaningless formality."

R VENKATARAMAN, MY PRESIDENTIAL YEARS, 476.

is virtually unlimited, and one can talk about anything under the sun and yet be in order.

According to the rules of the two Houses, the debate on the President's speech is held in the House on a motion of thanks to the President for his speech. Amendments can be moved to this motion. The motion of thanks is regarded as a motion of confidence in the Government. If the motion is defeated, or amended, in spite of the Government's opposition, it may be regarded as a vote of no-confidence in the Council of Ministers resulting in its resignation.

The constitutional provision requiring the President's address at the first session of Parliament is mandatory and Parliament cannot be said to have met, and it cannot transact any business, until this preliminary formality has been gone through.[65] Apart from his obligation to address the first session of Parliament, the President may address either House or both Houses assembled together any time and to require the attendance of the members for that purpose [Art. 86(1)].

(c) POWER TO SEND MESSAGES

The President can send messages to a House whether with respect to a Bill pending in Parliament or otherwise [Art. 86(2)]. The House to which any such message is sent is obligated to consider with all convenient despatch any matter required by the message to be taken into consideration.

The above provision appears to have been taken from America where the President may send messages to Congress. The provision has a utility in that country because of the separation between the Executive and the Congress; President's advisers are not members of the Congress and, therefore, Presidential messages constitute a means of communication between the Executive and the Legislative wings.[66]

But the purpose of the provision enabling the President to send messages to Parliament in India is not clear because the President acts on the advice of the Ministers who are always present in the House and can, therefore, say whatever is necessary for the Government to say.

A view has, however, been expressed that the founding fathers intended this power to be an instrument whereby the President could carry out his constitutional duty to see that the Constitution is obeyed and that the kind of Government it contemplates is continued; that he should be able, when given advice that he cannot in conscience accept, to appeal to Parliament and, incidentally, to the nation. The possibility and the threat of such action by the President is calculated to deter Ministers from tendering improper advice.[67]

This view is not tenable as the action of the President to approach Parliament over the head of the Prime Minister is bound to create a constitutional crisis. It would also be extremely embarrassing for the President if the Lok Sabha sides with the Council of Ministers and does not accept what he suggests in his message. On the whole, therefore, barring an extreme situation, President's power of sending messages to the Houses is not going to be of much use and, in practice, would lie dormant.

---

65. Syed Abdul Mansur v. Speaker, W.B. Leg. Ass., AIR 1966 Cal 363.
66. See, Ch. III, Sec. E, infra.
67. GLEDHILL, op. cit., 117-8.

(d) QUORUM

The quorum of each House has been fixed at one-tenth of its total membership. Parliament may, however, vary this rule by enacting a law [Art. 100(3)]. If at any time during the course of a meeting of a House there is no quorum, the presiding officer is obliged either to adjourn the House or to suspend the meeting until there is a quorum [Art. 100(4)].

The British Parliamentary practice is somewhat different in this respect. No notice of lack of quorum is taken there till the lack of quorum is challenged by a member and only then a meeting of the House may be adjourned. In India, on the other hand, it is the constitutional duty of the occupant of the chair to suspend or adjourn the sitting if there is no quorum. The British practice has this advantage over the Indian practice that formal business can be transacted there without quorum.

It may, however, be noted that if some business is transacted in a House without quorum, its validity may not be open to attack in the courts because of the principle of internal autonomy of the House [Art. 122(1)].[68] The rule regarding quorum is regarded as procedural and so directory and not mandatory.[69]

(e) DECISIONS

Matters are decided in a House by an ordinary majority of votes of the members present and voting at a sitting excluding the Speaker or the Chairman or the person acting as such, who does not vote in the first instance, but has a casting vote in case of an equality of votes [Art. 100(1)].

The Constitution lays down a rule of special, instead of ordinary, majority for certain matters, viz.:

Amendment of the Constitution (Art. 368);[70]

Impeachment of the President (Art. 61);[71]

Passing of an address for the removal of a Judge of the Supreme Court [Art. 124(4)];[72]

Removal of a Judge of the High Court [Art. 217(1)(b)];[73]

Removal of the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India [Art. 148(1)],[74]

Removal of the Chief Election Commissioner, [Proviso to Art. 324(5)];[75]

Removal of the Chairman or the Deputy Chairman of the Rajya Sabha [Arts. 67(b) and 90(c)][76];

Removal of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker of the Lok Sabha [Art. 94(c)];[77]

---

68. See under 'Privileges of Parliament', infra., Sec. L.
69. Ruling of the Speaker on April 11, 1955.
70. Infra., Ch. XLI.
71. Infra. Ch. III.
72. Infra, Ch. IV.
73. Infra. Ch. VIII.
74. Infra, Sec. J(ii).
75. Infra, Ch. XIX.
76. Infra, Sec. H.
77. Infra, Sec. H.

Passing of a resolution in the Rajya Sabha to create All-India Services (Art. 312)[78]

For authorising Parliament to legislate on matters in the State List (Art. 249).[79]

(f) VACANCY IN A HOUSE

A vacancy in the membership of a House does not render it incapable of acting and discharging its functions. A House has power to act notwithstanding any vacancy in its membership. Proceedings of a House remain valid even though it is discovered later that some person, not qualified or entitled to do so, sat or voted or otherwise participated in the proceedings [Art. 100(2)].

(g) LANGUAGE

The business of Parliament is to be transacted in Hindi or English. This provision is subject to Art. 348 [Art. 120(1)].[80] With the permission of the presiding officer, a member who cannot adequately express himself in either of these languages may address the House in his mother tongue [Proviso to Art. 120(1)].[81]

Art. 120(2) Provides:

> "Unless Parliament by law otherwise provides, this article shall, after the expiration of a period of fifteen years from the commencement of this Constitution, have effect as if the words 'or in English' were omitted therefrom".

Thus, it is up to Parliament to continue use of English in Parliament as long as it likes.

(h) WHO CAN PARTICIPATE IN THE PROCEEDINGS OF A HOUSE?

Only a member of the House can participate in its proceedings. However, every Minister or the Attorney-General has a right to speak and otherwise take part, in the proceedings of either House, a joint sitting of the two Houses, and any parliamentary committee of which he is appointed a member, without being entitled to vote [Art. 88].

A right to vote in a House accrues only to its members. The idea underlying the above provision is that a Minister, though member of one House, can participate in the work of the other House without enjoying a right to vote. Further, in India, a person can remain a Minister for six months without being a member of any House [Art. 75(5)].[82] Such a Minister can participate without voting in the proceedings of both the Houses of Parliament.

H. OFFICERS OF PARLIAMENT

(a) SPEAKER/DEPUTY SPEAKER

The Speaker is the chief officer of the Lok Sabha. He presides at its sittings. His authority and power arise from the fact that his powers are the powers of the House which the House has committed to him for convenience and practical purposes.

---

78. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.
79. Infra, Ch. X.
80. See, infra, Ch. XVI.
81. Also see, infra, Ch. XVI, Official Language.
82. See, Ch. III, Sec. A(iii), infra.

The Speaker and the Deputy Speaker are chosen by the House itself from amongst its members [Art. 93]. The Deputy Speaker performs the duties of the Speaker's office when it is vacant. In case the Deputy Speaker's office is also vacant, the Speaker's duties are to be performed by such member of the House as the President may appoint for the purpose till any of the offices is filled by election by the House [Art. 95(1)].

The Deputy Speaker acts as the Speaker when the latter is absent from the House. When both the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker are absent from the House, such person as may be determined by the rules of procedure of the House, and if no such person is present, such other person as may be determined by the House, acts as the Speaker [Art. 95(2)].

The Speaker and the Deputy Speaker remain in office so long as they are members of the House and they vacate their offices as soon as they cease to be its members [Art. 94(a)]. When Lok Sabha is dissolved, the Speaker does not vacate his office until immediately before the first meeting of the House after dissolution [Proviso II to Art. 94]. The Speaker or Deputy Speaker may resign his office by writing to each other [Art. 94(b)].

Any one of them may be removed from his office by a resolution passed by a majority of all the then members of the House [Art. 94(c)]. Such a resolution can be moved only after at least a fourteen days' notice has been given of the intention to move it [Proviso I to Art. 94]. When such resolution is under consideration against the Speaker, he does not preside at the sittings of the House though he may be present. He can, however, participate in the proceedings of the House at such a time and even vote in the first instance though not when there is an equality of votes [Arts. 96(1) and (2)]. Similar is the position of the Deputy Speaker when a resolution against him is under consideration of the House.

The Speaker and the Deputy Speaker are paid such salaries and allowances as are fixed by Parliament by law, and until such a provision is made, as specified in the Second Schedule to the Constitution [Art. 97].

The office of the Speaker enjoys great prestige, position and authority within the House. He has extensive powers to regulate the proceedings of the House under its rules of procedure. The ordinary interpretation of the procedural laws, rules and customs of the House is his function and he allows no debate or criticism of his rulings except on a formal resolution. He is responsible for the orderly conduct of its proceedings and maintains discipline and order in the House.

The Speaker has power to decide finally whether a Bill before the House is a Money Bill or not [Art. 110(3)][83]. The Speaker is not expected to give his rulings on questions of constitutionality of laws as such questions are to be decided finally by the courts.

The Speaker is much more than merely a presiding officer of the House. He is the representative and spokesman of the House in its collective capacity and is the chief custodian of its powers and privileges. According to the majority opinion in Kihota:[84]

---

83. Infra, Sec. J(ii)(c).
84. AIR 1993 SC at 452 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651. Also see, supra, Sec. F.

> "The office of the Speaker is held in the highest esteem and respect in Parliamentary traditions. The evolution of the institution of Parliamentary democracy has as its pivot the institution of the Speaker. The Speaker holds a high, important and ceremonial office... The Speaker is said to be the very embodiment of propriety and impartiality".

A few constitutional provisions ensure the impartiality and independence of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker. Their salaries and allowances are to be fixed by Parliament by law [Art. 97], are not subject to the annual vote of Parliament, and are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India [Art. 112(3)(b)].[85] There is thus no special opportunity to criticise their work and conduct in Parliament. Further, none of them can be removed from office except by a resolution passed by the House itself.

In Britain, at one time, it was a practice that the re-election of the former Speaker at a general election was not opposed, but in recent years this practice has weakened and the Labour and Liberal candidates have stood against the Speaker. It is customary for the previous Speaker to be re-elected even though his party may no longer be in power.[86] Such a practice is not followed in India.[87]

Owing to the great importance of his office, the Speaker is expected to maintain his impartiality. So, it is a convention in Britain that the Speaker divests himself of his party character by resigning from the party to which he belonged before his election.[88] This convention is not followed strictly in India where the Speaker remains a member of the party though he does not attend or participate in any party meeting except on ceremonial or social occasions.[89]

The position of the Speaker was brought into sharp focus in 2008. Somnath Chatterjee, a member of the Communist Party of India (Marxist)(CPM) was appointed as the Speaker of the Lok Sabha after the Congress led coalition, which was supported by the Left parties, formed the Government at the Centre in 2004. The Left withdrew their support to the Government in 2008 and called upon the Speaker to resign his post. When he did not, the CPM expelled the Speaker from the party. Constitutionally, the Speaker is chosen by the House and does not represent any party. Additionally had the Speaker resigned on the say so of his party, the impartiality of his decisions as Speaker would have been rendered suspect. By not resigning from the Speaker's post even though Left parties had withdrawn support to the government, it was demonstrated that the Speaker's post is above party politics, a position reflecting the British Convention referred to in the preceding paragraph.

(b) CHAIRMAN OF RAJYA SABHA

The presiding officer of Rajya Sabha is known as the Chairman. The Vice-President of India is the ex officio Chairman of the House [Art. 89(1)]. The House also elects a Deputy Chairman from amongst its members [Art. 89(2)] who vacates his office as soon as he ceases to be a member of the House [Art.

---

85. See, infra, Sec. J(ii)(h).
86. WADE & PHILLIPS, 165 (IX Ed.).
87. The Speakers' Conf., Oct. 5, 68, suggested that the political parties accept a convention that the Assembly seat of the Speaker would not be contested by any party.
88. LORD CAMPION, PARLIAMENT—A SURVEY, 17 (1955); JENNINGS, op. cit., 65
89. MUKHERJEA, PARL. PROCEDURE IN INDIA, 48 (1967). The Speakers' Conf., Oct. 5, 68, suggested that the Speaker should sever his connections with his party.

90(a)]. He may resign his office by writing to the Chairman [Art. 90(b)]. He may be removed from his office by a resolution passed by a majority of all the then members of the House. Such a resolution, however, cannot be moved unless at least a fourteen days' notice has been given of the intention to move it.[90]

The Deputy Chairman performs the duties of the Chairman when that office is vacant, or when the Vice-President is acting as the President of India [Art. 91(1)]. If the office of the Deputy Chairman is also vacant, then the duties of the Chairman are performed by such member of the Rajya Sabha as the President may appoint for the purpose till any of these offices is filled. In the absence of the Chairman from a sitting of the House, the Deputy Chairman, and if he is also absent, such person as may be determined by the rules of procedure of the House, or, if no such person is present, such other person as may be determined by the House, acts as the Chairman [Art. 91(2)].

The Vice-President of India cannot preside over a sitting of Rajya Sabha as its Chairman when a resolution for his removal is under consideration. He has, however, a right to speak and otherwise participate in the proceedings of the House, but cannot vote at such a time [Art. 92].[91] Similarly, the Deputy Chairman cannot preside over a sitting of the House when a resolution for his removal is under consideration [Art. 92], though he has a right to vote and participate in the proceedings.[92]

The salaries and allowances payable to the Chairman and Deputy Chairman are fixed by Parliament by law and, until so fixed, are to be as specified in the Second Schedule to the Constitution [Art. 97]. Under the Rules of Procedure of the House, the Chairman enjoys powers to regulate the proceedings of the House similar to those enjoyed by the Speaker in relation to the Lok Sabha.

(c) PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIAT

Each House has separate secretarial staff of its own though there may be some posts common to both the Houses. The terms of recruitment and conditions of service of persons appointed to the secretarial staff of a House may be regulated by law by Parliament. Until so regulated, the President of India may, after consultation with the Speaker of the Lok Sabha, or the Chairman of the Rajya Sabha, as the case may be, make rules for the purpose. The rules so made have effect subject to the provisions of any law which Parliament may make [Art. 98].

I. TERMINATION OF PARLIAMENT

(a) PROROGATION

Prorogation puts an end to a session of the House but not to its existence and the same House meets again after prorogation. Prorogation only means that the House ceases to function for a particular period of time.

The power to prorogue a House is vested formally in the President [Art. 85(2)(a)], but he acts in this matter on the advice of the Prime Minister. A Bill or any other business, whether pending in the House or pending the assent of the 90. Art. 90(c) and proviso.

---

91. For procedure to remove the Vice-President, see Ch. III, Sec. A, infra.
92. Art. 92.

President, does not lapse by the prorogation of the House [Art. 107(3)].[1] Contempt of the House committed in one session can be punished by it in another session.[2]

Several questions have arisen regarding the exercise of power of prorogation of the House by the State Governors[3] and the principles emerging therefrom may be relevant to the prorogation of the House of Parliament by the President.

(b) ADJOURNMENT

An adjournment terminates a sitting of the House. Unlike dissolution or prorogation, it is the act of the House itself.

A House may adjourn for such time as it pleases, and it is in exercise of this power that a House adjourns its sitting from day to day and sometimes over the holidays intervening in the course of the session. A House may also be adjourned sine die, that is without naming a day for reassembly. An Adjournment does not affect the incomplete work before the House which may be resumed when the House meets again after adjournment.[4]

(c) DISSOLUTION

Dissolution puts an end to the life of the House. It leads to the election of a new House.

Rajya Sabha is a continuing chamber; it never comes to an end; it is not subject to dissolution and one-third of its members rotate every two years [Art. 83(1)].[5]

Lok Sabha, on the other hand, is not a continuing chamber. Its normal life is five years from the date of its first meeting after the general elections, and the expiry of this period ipso facto operates to dissolve the House [Art. 83(2)].[6]

During an emergency, Parliament can make a law to extend the life of Lok Sabha for a year at a time. Such a law may be passed repeatedly each time extending the life of the House for a year, subject to the overall condition that the life of Lok Sabha cannot be extended beyond a period of six months after the emergency comes to an end [Proviso to Art. 83(2) and Art. 352][7]. The idea is that the House may continue for the entire duration of the emergency as it may not be expedient to distract the attention of the nation by parliamentary elections at such a time. But, then, within six months of the emergency coming to an end the House is to be re-elected.

Elections may be held to constitute a new Lok Sabha before the existing Lok Sabha completes its term or is dissolved. The newly elected House would not, of course, start functioning till the existing House comes to an end. Elections for the

---

1. Purushottam Nambudri v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 694 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 753. In the matter of Special Reference No 1 of 2002 (Gujarat Assembly Election matter) : AIR 2003 SC 87, (2002) 8 SCC 237, 278-279. However, all pending notices other than those for introducing Bills, lapse on prorogation.
2. M.S.M. Sharma v. S.K. Sinha, AIR 1960 SC 1186 : (1961) 1 SCR 96, infra,.
3. Ch. VI, infra, for details.
4. See, infra, Ch. VI. Also see, H. Siddaveerapa v. State of Mysore , AIR 1971 Mys 200.
5. Supra, pp. 35-36.
6. Supra, pp. 39-40.
7. See, infra, Ch. XIII, for Emergency.

new House are held so that it may start functioning as soon as the existing House comes to an end. The life of the new House will start running from the date of its first meeting which will naturally be fixed after termination of the old House.[8]

The power to dissolve Lok Sabha is vested formally in the President [Arts. 83(2) and 85(2)(b)]. This is a significant power, for, by virtue of this power, a new House can be brought into being which may even result in a change of government. When, on what considerations, and under what circumstances can the power to dissolve Lok Sabha be exercised? These questions are of great importance, but, on these points, the Constitution is silent and lays down no norms. The framers of the Constitution thought it better to leave the matter open and lay down no rigid rules so that, as and when the question of dissolution arises, it might be decided in accordance with the circumstances prevailing at the time, and the constitutional conventions operative in the countries with the parliamentary form of government.

Guidance on this question may be sought from Britain where also the Crown has the formal power to dissolve the House of Commons. The position in Britain in this respect, though not entirely free from doubt, appears to be somewhat as follows. It is a well-settled convention that the Crown would not dissolve the House suo motu, on his own initiative, without the advice of the Prime Minister. This is in accordance with the principle of responsible government according to which the Crown functions on ministerial advice. The responsibility for dissolution rests with the Prime Minister though he may consult some of his colleagues if he so likes.[9]

When the Council of Ministers enjoys the confidence of the House of Commons, a dissolution is usually asked for before the House runs out its full term. Usually, the House is dissolved sometime in the fifth year and general elections held. The Prime Minister thus has a right to go to the polls at a time most favourable to his party politically, when its stock with the electorate is high, without his having to wait for the efflux of the full term of the House. The Prime Minister thus has it within his power to select the most favourable and opportune moment for dissolving the House and holding a fresh poll.

If the Prime Minister's overall majority in the House is very slender, and he finds it difficult to push his programme through the House, he may ask for dissolution of the House in the hope that his party position would improve after fresh elections. Dissolution may also be resorted to if the Prime Minister feels that he should seek a mandate from the electors on some important matter of policy on which he wishes to embark, but such dissolutions are now rare.

If a Ministry enjoying majority support in the House is defeated on any major issue of policy, it can either resign or seek an endorsement of its policies from the electorate by suggesting dissolution of the House and holding fresh elections. It

---

8. Bholanath Srivastava v. Union of India, AIR 1963 All 363.

9. JENNINGS, CABINET GOVERNMENT, 412-28 (III ed. 1969).

Till, 1918, the practice appears to have been that the advice to dissolve the House of Commons was submitted by the Prime Minister on the decision of the Cabinet. Since 1918, however, the view has come to be held that the responsibility for dissolution must rest with the Prime Minister though he may consult a few of his colleagues, if he so likes, but he is not bound to do so. No dissolution since 1918 has been brought before the Cabinet and each Prime Minister since Lloyd George has assumed a right to give the advice himself : Ibid., 417-19.

appears to be a settled convention that the Crown will grant a dissolution in such a situation even if it were possible to find an alternative Ministry. The justification for this convention is that in modern times a Ministry is the direct result of general elections and that its defeat in the House automatically entitles it to appeal once again to the people.

There have been a number of constitutional precedents to this effect. The nineteenth century in Britain was a period of parliamentary instability when only on one occasion (1868-1873) Parliament ran for its full course. Between 1832 to 1868, defeat of the government in the House led to its dissolution five times and to resignation of the Ministry eight times. In 1859 and 1868, dissolutions were granted even when Parliament was only two to three years old and alternative Cabinets were ready to take office.[10] Lord Melbourne got a dissolution of the House earlier and led a minority ministry. Lord Palmerstone got a dissolution of the House in 1857; Lord Derby in 1859; Disraeli in 1868, and all these Prime Ministers headed minority governments. In 1910, the House of Commons was dissolved just within a year of its electionafter its dissolution earlier in 1909. Thus, there was a double dissolution of the House within a year. In 1923, 1924, 1931, 1951 and 1979, Parliament was dissolved, for political reasons, long before the normal period expired.

Is the Crown bound to grant a dissolution of the House on the request of a Ministry which never had a clear majority, and which is defeated in the House on a major policy matter? The answer to this question is somewhat debatable and is not free from doubt. In 1924, King George V granted dissolution to the Labour Prime Minister, Ramsay Macdonald. There were three parties in the House, Labour, Liberal and Conservative. Their strength was as follows ; Conservatives 261; Labour, 191; Liberal, 155; Others, 8. Although the Conservative Party was numerically the largest party, the King invited Ramsay Macdonald to lead a minority Labour Government. Thus, Labour took office without a majority but with the support of Liberals who subsequently withdrew their support. Liberals and Conservatives were not willing to combine to form government and hence the House was dissolved.[11]

Similarly, Prime Minister James Callaghan's request for dissolution of Parliament was granted by the Queen, despite the fact that he headed a minority government.[12] The type of embarrassment which might be caused to the Crown, if dissolution is refused in such a situation, may be represented by the typical case of Lord Byng, the Governor-General of Canada. At the general election of 1925 in Canada, the Conservative Party secured a small lead over the Liberal Party, but the Liberal Government in office at the time thought that it could carry on with the aid of smaller groups in the House. Threatened by a vote of censure nine months later, the Liberal Prime Minister asked for a dissolution, but Byng refused to oblige on the ground that the Conservative Party could form the government. The Prime Minister thereupon resigned. The Conservatives took office,

---

10. KEITH, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 51-52 (1939).

11. In such a state of parties, according to FINER, the question arose what is the rule for dissolution? "When there is no certainty that a majority government is attainable, ought the minority in office to advise the Crown to dissolve in order to escape from parliamentary difficulties and perhaps improve its electoral position?"
FINER, THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MODERN GOVERNMENT, 393 (1965).

12. HILAIRE BARNETT : CONSTITUTIONAL & ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, (5th Edn.) (2004).

but they were defeated in the House within a week and they themselves asked for a dissolution which Byng granted. At the general elections, the Liberal Party obtained a majority and again assumed office and Byng came in for a lot of criticism at his handling of the situation.[13]

If the Prime Minister requests for dissolution and the King refuses it, the Prime Minister may decline to remain in office. The King then must find a new Prime Minister. It is then for the House to decide the question, because if the House refuses to support the new Prime Minister, the King would then be compelled to agree to dissolve the House and this may cause damage to the institution of monarchy in the process.

The question of dissolution has been widely discussed by many scholars in Britain, but, as De Smith says there is no consensus of opinion on the conventional power of the Monarch to require a dissolution of Parliament, or to refuse a request for dissolution.[14] While the general view is that it may be politically expedient for the Crown to accept the advice whenever tendered by the Prime Minister to dissolve the House, yet not a single constitutional lawyer appears to assert unequivocally that the Crown's discretion or prerogative to grant or refuse dissolution has been atrophied by disuse, or been lost irrevocably.[15] Although, for over a hundred years, the Sovereign has never rejected, but has consistently acceded to, the Prime Minister's request to dissolve the House, nevertheless, there has been a persistent tradition, and the view is still propounded, that the Crown may refuse if the circumstances so demand.[16]

The idea is expressed in various ways e.g., that no Constitution can stand a diet of dissolutions which means that successive dissolutions may be refused and, thus, a Ministry which having been defeated in the House asks for and gets a dissolution, and then is defeated at the polls, should not again ask for another dissolution. It has been asserted that the convention that the Monarch would not refuse to grant dissolution is dependent on another convention that there would not be an unreasonable demand for dissolution, implying thereby that the Crown can refuse to grant dissolution if it regards the request unreasonable. Similarly, it is maintained that there is no convention which prevents the Crown from refusing dissolution in exceptional circumstances.[17]

Mackintosh asserts that a request for dissolution will never be refused if the Prime Minister can claim that an election will reveal a definite change of temper among the electorate, or that the government is likely to be strengthened, but dissolution can be refused when an election would neither change party representation in the House of Commons to any appreciable extent nor aid the government in any way. He goes on to illustrate his point by taking an example of there being

---

13. EDWARD MCWHINNEY, The Head of State in the Commonwealth Countries, 4 Vyavahara Nirnaya, 120 (1955). HOGG: Constitutional Law of Canada (2003) 9.6(d).

14. S.A. DE SMITH, CONST. AND ADM. LAW, 51, 102-5, (1977).

15. It is interesting to note that Queen Victoria claimed an unlimited power in this respect. She wrote in a letter, "There was no doubt of the power and prerogative of the sovereign to refuse a dissolution. It was one of the very few acts which the Queen of England could do without responsible advice". LETTERS OF THE QUEEN VICTORIA, first series, ed. Benson & Esher, III 364-5 (1907); Keir, THE CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF MODERN BRITAIN, 489.

16. E.A. FORSEY, THE ROYAL POWER OF DISSOLUTION IN THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH; B.S. MARKESINIS, THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT; WADE & PHILLIPS, op. cit. 226-8; JENNINGS, op. etc., 427.

17. LAWSON & BENTLEY, CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 107 (1961).

in the House three well-balanced parties, A, B, C, out of which A forms the government relying on the support of B. If later the stock of the government declines and it has no chance of winning an absolute majority in a division in the House, and if the two other parties B and C are not eager to go to the country but are prepared to combine in support of an agreed Cabinet, the Crown would be entitled to refuse dissolution on the request of A, and to commission a new Prime Minister having the support of B and C.[18] Similarly, a doubt has been raised whether the convention as to the right of a Prime Minister defeated in the House on a major issue to get a dissolution would survive the presence of three parties, each with a fair proportion of seats.[19]

JENNINGS takes the view that while the royal prerogative is maintained in theory, and that the Monarch can refuse to accept the Prime Minister's advice in the matter of dissolution, such a royal power can hardly be exercised in practice,[20] and he also fails to see what those circumstances can be when the Monarch may refuse to dissolve except that if the major political parties break up, the whole balance of the Constitution would be altered, and then possibly, the royal prerogative may become important.

O. Hood Phillips also maintains that the opinion which allows a "limited personal prerogative' to the Sovereign, appears to be the better one. He says : "It is more in consonance with the traditions of British parliamentary government".[21]

The underlying idea in this cautious approach of the scholars is that while the Crown, speaking generally, should act on the advice of his Prime Minister, the political situation being extremely varied and diversified, no one can foresee all the situations and be sure that a moment may never arise when the Crown may have to refuse dissolution in the interest of saving the democratic constitutional fabric. However, there are enormous difficulties in the way of the Crown to refuse dissolution when so advised by the Prime Minister. As JENNINGS says: "Thus while the Queen's personal prerogative is maintained in theory, it can hardly be exercised in practice." If the advice is refused, the Prime Minister would have no option but to resign, and the Crown would have no option but to turn to the opposition to form the government. This may involve the Crown in partisan party politics which may injure the Crown as an impartial institution, free from the current political controversies and manoeuvres. In sum, the position appears to be that in Britain the Crown would accept ministerial advice to dissolve the House except, perhaps, in a very exceptional situation.

---

18. MACKINTOSH, THE BRITISH CABINET, 18 (1977). See also HILAIRE BARNETT, CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW (5th Edn.) p. 136.

19. Also see, infra, Chs. VI and VII.
For discussion on Lok Sabha, see, V JI., of Inst. of Constitutional & Parliamentary Studies, 295-376 (1971).

20. JENNINGS, CABINET GOVERNMENT, 412-28.

21. O. HOOD PHILLIPS, CONST. AND ADM. LAW, 155 (1987).
For a fuller discussion on the Sovereign's power to dismiss, see, ibid., 152-155. He mentions the following factors that would have to be taken into account before the Sovereign could properly refuse a dissolution : (i) the time that had elapsed since the last dissolution; (ii) whether the last dissolution took place at the instance of the present Opposition; (iii) whether the question in issue is of great political importance; (iv) the supply position; (v) whether Parliament is nearing the end of its maximum term; (vi) whether the Prime Minister is in a minority in the Cabinet; (viii) whether there is a minority government; (viii) and perhaps, whether there is a war on.

Dissolution is in effect an appeal to the supreme constitutional authority, namely, the people, and is, thus, the most democratic procedure to determine as to which government will be in office. Dissolution has been characterised as a 'big stick' which the government wields to keep its majority in the House intact. The power can also be used to discipline the opposition. In a multi-party system when parliamentary government is unstable, successive dissolutions of the popular chamber may help in consolidation of parties and ultimate evolution of fewer parties by eliminating the lesser ones.

When the House is dissolved, the Government continues in office; it vacates office when, after the election, it loses its majority in the House. In such an eventuality; it must resign.[22]

On the basis of the above, it may perhaps be safe to say that, normally speaking, the President will grant a request for dissolution of Lok Sabha as and when made by the Prime Minister enjoying majority support in the House.

In theory, it may be asserted that a Prime Minister defeated in the Lok Sabha ought to be granted dissolution irrespective of his party position and be permitted to seek the verdict and mandate from the people to whom ultimately the government is responsible and who in the last resort decides as to which government should rule. Refusal to dissolve the House at a time when no government is stable, leads to all kinds of combinations and permutations amongst the various political parties. It is quite possible that several dissolutions of the Lok Sabha may help in consolidation of parties and evolution of two or three national parties. Multiple political parties make parliamentary form of government unstable.

But, in India, from a practical point of view, it remains a moot question whether a Prime Minister defeated in the House would be granted dissolution irrespective of his party position. On the whole, there prevails a feeling in India that frequent elections ought not to be held because of the expense involved. There is inherent resistance to mid-term dissolution of the Lok Sabha. Not only the people do not want to go to the polls often, but even the members of the Legislature do not want to lose their privileges before the full five-year term is over.

During the last thirty years, Lok Sabha has witnessed several premature dissolutions, the reason being that no political party has been able to secure a stable majority in the House. In November, 1969, the ruling Congress Party broke up. Consequently, the Government lost its majority. On the advice of the Prime Minister, on December 27, 1970, the President dissolved the Lok Sabha elected in February, 1967. The Lok Sabha was thus dissolved fourteen months before its full term would have run out.

Several interesting features of this dissolution may be noted. First, the request to dissolve the Lok Sabha was made by the Cabinet, of course, on the initiative of the Prime Minister and not by the Prime Minister alone. Secondly, the Prime Minister was heading at the time a minority government, but it had not been defeated in the Lok Sabha on any question. The Government, to start with, had a small majority but because of a split in the party it lost that majority. The Prime Minister asserted that the sole consideration to make the request was government's desire to seek a fresh mandate from the people to enable the Government to effectively implement its programme. Lastly, the opposition parties had contended that the head of a minority government had no right to recommend dissolution of the Lok Sabha but the President rejected this contention.

22. For further discussion on this point, see, infra, Ch. III.

In 1975, emergency was imposed in India under Art. 352. The emergency was revoked in 1977 and elections were held to the Lok Sabha. The Congress Party which was responsible for imposing the emergency was routed. Morarjee Desai, leader of the United Front, a coalition of several parties, which secured a majority in the House became the Prime Minister. He resigned in July, 1979, when the United Front broke away and Charan Singh, leader of the breakaway group, became the Prime Minister in 1979.

In 1979, Lok Sabha was dissolved after only two years of its existence on the advice of a Prime Minister [Chaudhury Charan Singh][23] who headed a minority government from the very beginning and who never faced the House.[24] He was installed in office with the outside support of the Congress Party. When the Congress Party withdrew its support, Lok Sabha was dissolved. When elections were held to Lok Sabha in 1980, a stable government did emerge at the Centre.[25]

In 1990, the V.P. Singh Government was defeated on the floor of Lok Sabha on a confidence motion. In anticipation of the impending defeat of the government on the floor of Lok Sabha, a question was hotly debated in public, viz., would the President be bound to accept the advice of the defeated Prime Minister to dissolve the House? However, no conclusive answer emerged to this question as the Prime Minister resigned, without seeking dissolution of the House, as the public mood in the country at the time was against such a step.[26]

Thereafter, the Chandra Shekhar Ministry was installed in office in November, 1990. Chandra Shekhar headed a minority party but managed a majority in Lok Sabha with the help of the Congress Party. After four months, in March, 1991, the Congress withdraw its support and, consequently, Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar resigned his office, and the House was dissolved on the advice of the Prime Minister. There was the added circumstance at the time that no viable alternative government could possibly be installed.[27]

---

23. See, next Chapter, for discussion on the appointment of Chaudhary Charan Singh as the Prime Minister.

24. Also see, infra, Chs. VI and VII. For discussion on the dissolution of Lok Sabha, see, V JI. of Inst. of Constitutional & Parliamentary Studies, 295-376 (1971).

25. For full facts, see, infra, Ch. III, Sec. I(c).

26. Shri R. VENKATARAMAN, who was the President at the time, refers to this episode in his memories entitled MY PRESIDENTIAL YEARS, at 431. He observes: "It was becoming increasingly clear that V.P. Singh would lose the vote of confidence. I therefore started consulting legal experts regarding the courses open to me after the vote. One immediate possibility was a recommendation for the dissolution of the House by the Prime Minister. Whether the advice of a defeated Prime Minister is binding on the Crown in England, is not free from doubt."

He mentions that in England for nearly a hundred years, the Crown has never refused to accept the advice of the Prime Minister before or after his defeat in the House if he wanted to appeal to the people. VENKATARAMAN then refers to the scholastic opinion in Britain according to which the Crown may refuse to accept the advice for dissolution under certain circumstances. Finally he says : "It appeared to me that it was safer to go with the British precedent of accepting the Prime Minister's recommendation rather than rely on erudite and eminent textbook writers."

27. See, R. VENKATARAMAN, op. cit., 491.

He observes : "I did not base the dissolution of the Lok Sabha solely on recommendation of the outgoing Prime Minister but on the other factor also, namely, that no political party had come forward to form a government..."

Then, again, as a result of the general election held in May, 1996, no party emerged in majority in the Lok Sabha. The House was badly fractured and split three ways as follows : United Front, 177 seats; Congress, 140 seats and Bhartiya Janta Party, 162 seats. With the help of the Congress support, the leader of the United Front took office in 1996.

On 4th December, 1997, the House was dissolved within two years of its election, as Prime Minister Gujaral lost his majority support in Lok Sabha. Gujaral headed a minority government but it stayed in office with the support of the Congress Party from outside. The Prime Minister resigned and the Government fell when the Congress Party withdrew its support to the Government. The outgoing Cabinet recommended that Lok Sabha be dissolved and a fresh mandate be obtained from the people. Again, there was the added circumstance that there was no prospect of installing an alternative government at the time.

President Narayanan did not accept the advice of the Prime Minister straightaway but explored the possibility of installing an alternative government, and dissolved the House only when he realised that there was no such possibility.[28]

In the communique issued by the President dissolving Lok Sabha, it was stated that the President had gone through the arduous exercise of consulting the leaders and representatives of major political parties including the ruling party with a view to explore the possibility of forming a government which was "lawful, viable and enjoy a reasonable prospect of stability." But it became clear that "no political combination in the Lok Sabha" was in a position to form such a government. The communique also stated that the recommendation made by the Council of Ministers "converged with the President's own process of deduction."

The communique thus makes it amply clear that the decision to dissolve Lok Sabha was based not merely on the advice of Council of Ministers but also on the President's own appraisal of the situation as well. The President considered the matter from all angles. It thus becomes amply clear that in the matter of dissolution of Lok Sabha, the advice of the outgoing Ministry to dissolve the House is not binding on the President. He will try to explore the possibility of having an alternative stable government.[29]

Again, in 1997, the elections resulted in a hung Parliament as no party secured a clear majority in Lok Sabha. A coalition government of several parties, of which BJP was the major component, was installed in office in March, 1998. This government being a coalition of several parties could not be characterised as a stable government because of the internal pulls and pressures of its component units. This government fell in April, 1999, as it was defeated in Lok Sabha on a vote of no confidence by one vote. The President sought to explore the possibility of an alternative government but when he failed in this enterprise, Lok Sabha was dissolved and fresh elections held. Thereafter, a new coalition government took office in October, 1999, under Shri Atal Behari Vajpayee as the Prime Minister. That government remained in power till the next general elections five years later. The government which was formed in 2004 was also a coalition under the

---

28. The Presidential Order dissolving the House was challenged through a writ petition in the Andhra Pradesh High Court, but it was dismissed : D.S.N.V. Prasad Babu v. Union of India, AIR 1998 AP 140.

29. A writ petition challenging the dissolution of Lok Sabha was dismissed by the Andhra High Court in D.S.N.V. Prasad Babu v. Union of India, AIR 1998 AP 140.

Prime Ministership of Manmohan Singh. The 2009 General Elections has also resulted in a coalition Government at the Centre, albeit with different political partners.

Thus, in India, it remains doubtful at present whether frequent elections to Lok Sabha may result in one single political party securing a majority in the House in the forseeable future. Perhaps, for some time to come, India is destined to have coalition government rather than a single party government. It remains a moot point whether the clause that the President 'shall act" on the advice of the Council of Ministers binds the President to dissolve the House as and when the Prime Minister requests for it. On the whole, on the basis of the practice followed so far, it may be said that, dissolution will not be granted automatically on the advice of the Prime Minister who has lost confidence of the House. The President will first explore if there is a possibility of formation of an alternative government. The public mood is against frequent elections in the country. Only when no alternative government is possible, Lok Sabha will be dissolved.

(d) EFFECT OF DISSOLUTION ON BUSINESS PENDING IN THE HOUSE

When the Lok Sabha is dissolved :

(1) a Bill pending in Rajya Sabha which has not been passed by the Lok Sabha does not lapse [Art. 107(4)];

(2) a Bill pending in the Lok Sabha lapses [Art. 107(5)];

(3) a Bill passed by the Lok Sabha but pending in the Rajya Sabha lapses [Art. 107(5)], but it would not lapse if in respect of it a joint session of the two Houses has already been called by the President [Art. 108].[30]

A joint sitting of the two Houses may still be held in spite of the dissolution of Lok Sabha, if it has been convened already before Lok Sabha stands dissolved.[31]

(4) A Bill passed by both Houses but pending assent of the President does not lapse with the dissolution of the Lok Sabha.[32]

(5) Dissolution of the House does not wipe out contempt proceedings in the House. The new House constituted after election can punish for contempt of the House dissolved.[33]

J. FUNCTIONS OF PARLIAMENT

Parliament is a deliberative and a legislative body. Its functions are multifarious which are divisible under the following heads :

(i) Legislation;

(ii) Control of Public Finance;

(iii) Deliberation and Discussion;

(iv) Control of the Executive;

---

30. For a joint session see, infra, Secs. J(i)(b) and K(i).
31. Ibid.
32. Purushottam Nambudri v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 694 : (1962) Supp (1) SCR 753; In re Special Reference No. 1 of 2002 : (2002) 8 SCC 237; AIR 2003 SC 87.
33. A.M. Paulraj v. Speaker, T.N. Legislative Assembly, infra, Ch. VI.

(v) Removal of certain high Officials; and (vi) the Constituent function.

Heads (i), (ii) and (iii) are discussed below. As to head (iv), in a parliamentary form of government, the Executive being responsible to Parliament, an important function of Parliament is to control the Executive, criticise, supervise administration, and influence governmental policies. Practically, every activity of Parliament, whether legislative or deliberative, is oriented towards this end. This aspect is discussed in the next Chapter.

As to head (v), Parliament has power to impeach the President [Art. 61][34] and remove from office the Vice-President of India [Art. 67, proviso (b)],[35] Judges of the Supreme Court[36] and the High Courts,[37] the Chief Election Commissioner [Art. 324(5)][38] and Comptroller and Auditor-General of India [Art. 148(1)].[39] All these matters are discussed at the proper places.

The Constituent function of Parliament is discussed later in this book.[40]

(i) LEGISLATION

Making laws is Parliament's major pre-occupation. Changing and complex socio-economic problems constantly demand new laws and, thus, Parliament spends a good deal of its time on legislative activity.

(a) PROCEDURE

An ordinary Bill, i.e., a Bill other than a Money or a Financial Bill, may originate in either House of Parliament [Art. 107(1)]. It becomes an Act when it is passed by both Houses and is assented to by the President [Arts. 111(1) and 107(2)].

The procedure for passage of a Bill in a House is contained in the rules of procedure of each House. Usually, a Bill passes through three stages, popularly known as readings, in a House.

The first is the introduction stage. By convention no discussion takes place at this stage unless the Bill is very controversial, e.g., this convention has been broken when the Preventive Detention Bill has been introduced. Then comes the consideration stage which has two parts—one, a general discussion of the principles and provisions of the Bill (details of the Bill are not discussed at this stage); two, its clause by clause consideration. The general discussion takes place on a motion either that the Bill be taken into consideration; or, that it may be referred to a select committee; or, that it be circulated for eliciting public opinion.

An important Bill is usually referred to a select committee of the House or to a joint select committee of both Houses. After the report of the committee is presented to the House, the Bill is discussed clause by clause. Amendments to

---

34. Ch. III, Sec. A(i)(h), infra.
35. Ch. III, Sec. A(ii), infra.
36. Art. 124(2), Proviso (b); Ch. IV, infra.
37. Art. 217(1), Proviso (b); Ch. VIII, infra.
38. Ch. XIX, infra.
39. See, infra, p. 108 et seq.
40. See, Ch. XLI, infra, under "Amendment of the Constitution".

clauses may be moved at this stage. At the final or the third reading stage, after a brief general discussion, the Bill is finally passed.

After its passage in one House, the Bill is transmitted to the other House where it undergoes more or less a similar procedure.

(b) JOINT SESSION

In the area of ordinary legislation, the two Houses of Parliament enjoy co-ordinate power. A Bill has to be passed by the two Houses in an identical form before it can be submitted to the President for his assent [Art. 107(2)].

If a Bill passed by one House is amended by the other House, the amended Bill is sent back to the originating House for its concurrence with the amendments so made. Usually, the two Houses agree and finally pass the Bill in the same form.

It may, however, happen at times that the two Houses do not agree on a Bill and a deadlock may ensue between them. Such a deadlock is resolved through a joint session of the two Houses. Thus, when a Bill passed by one House and transmitted to the other House:

(i) is rejected there; or

(ii) the two Houses disagree as to the amendments to be made to the Bill; or

(iii) if the other House does not pass it for more than six months, the President may summon a joint session of both the Houses [Art. 108(1)]. While reckoning the period of six months, no account is to be taken of any period during which the House to which the Bill has been sent is prorogued or adjourned for more than four consecutive days [Art. 108(2)].

After the President notifies his intention to summon a joint session of the two Houses, none of the Houses can proceed further with the Bill [Art. 108(3)]. No joint session can be called if the Bill has already lapsed by the dissolution of the Lok Sabha as discussed above [Arts. 108(1) and 107(5)][41]; but the joint session may be held if the Lok Sabha is dissolved after the President has notified his intention to summon such a session [Art. 108(5)].

If the Bill passed by one House is not passed by the other House with amendments and returned to the originating House, no amendments can be proposed to the Bill at a joint session other than those which might have become necessary by the delay in the passage of the Bill [Art. 108(4), proviso (a)]. If, on the other hand, the Bill has been passed by the other House with amendments and returned to the originating House, then only such amendments, and in addition, such other amendments as are relevant to the matters with respect to which the Houses have not agreed, may be proposed at the joint sitting [Art. 108(4), proviso (b)]. In all cases, the decision of the presiding officer as to what amendments are admissible at the joint sitting is final [Art. 108(4)].

At the joint sitting, the Speaker of the Lok Sabha, or in his absence, such person as may be determined by rules of procedure, is to preside [Art. 118(4)]. The rules of procedure with respect to joint sittings of the two Houses are to be made by the President after consulting the Chairman of the Rajya Sabha and the Speaker of the Lok Sabha [Art. 118(3)][42]. A Bill passed with or without amendments, by a majority of all the members present and voting in the joint session, is deemed to have been passed by both the Houses [Art. 108(4)].

41. Supra, Sec. I(c).

Since the commencement of the Constitution, the provision regarding the joint session of the two Houses has been invoked only a few times. The first joint session of the two Houses was held on May 6 and 9, 1961, to pass the Dowry Prohibition Bill regarding certain provisions of which there was disagreement between the two Houses. The Congress Party was in majority at the time in both the Houses. Being a social measure, the Government did not take a definitive stand on the points in controversy and left the matter to the judgment of the members, hence the deadlock. Had the Government given guidance on the Bill, no deadlock would have ensued as the members do usually accept Government leadership. It is for this reason that the provision for joint session has been so rarely invoked so far.

Another joint session of the two Houses of Parliament was held on May 16, 1978 to enact the Banking Service Commission (Repeal) Bill. The political complexion of the two Houses differed very sharply at the time. In the general election held for Lok Sabha in 1977, the Congress Party was routed and the Janata Party enjoyed a majority in Lok Sabha . But the Congress Party still dominated the Rajya Sabha. The Bill had earlier been passed by the Lok Sabha but was later rejected by the Rajya Sabha and so a joint session had to be called to override the inter-House difference of opinion as regards the Bill. The Bill was approved in joint session. The third joint session was held on March 26, 2002. The Prevention of Terrorism Bill, 2002 was approved by Lok Sabha by a margin of more than 100 votes but it was defeated in Rajya Sabha by 15 votes. The joint session was held to break the inter-House deadlock on the Bill and it was passed in the joint session.

(c) PRESIDENT'S ASSENT

Parliament cannot legislate without the concurrence of all its parts, and, therefore, in addition to the two Houses, assent of the President is also required for a Bill to become law, for the President is a part of Parliament [Art. 79]. When a Bill passed by both Houses is sent to the President for assent—

(i) he may either give or withhold his assent therefrom [Art. 111], or,

(ii) may send it back to the Houses for reconsideration and for considering the desirability of introducing such amendments as he may suggest [Proviso to Art. 111].

When a Bill is so returned, it is the duty of each House to reconsider it accordingly, and if it is passed again by the Houses with or without amendments, and presented to the President for assent, the President 'shall not withhold assent therefrom' [Proviso to Art. 111].

Thus, if the President refuses to give his assent to a Bill in the first instance, there is no way to override his veto and the Bill will be dead. If, however, he does not veto the Bill but refers it to the Houses for reconsideration, his power of veto is gone.

---

42. Also see, Appendix I to the Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business in Lok Sabha (1957).

These are formal powers of the President which he exercises on ministerial advice.[43] The President may veto a Bill on ministerial advice but it is inconceivable that a government would wish to veto a Bill for the passage of which it has been responsible and, therefore, the President rarely exercises his veto power. In a parliamentary democracy, consent of the Head of the State to a Bill passed by Houses of Parliament is deemed to be a mere formality. A similar power held by the British Crown has not been used for a very long time and is now regarded as having fallen into disuse.

The Presidential power to refer a Bill back to the Houses for reconsideration is meant to be used in a situation where, after the passage of a Bill by the two Houses, some important developments take place necessitating amendments in the Bill as passed, or where the Ministry finds later that some unwanted provisions have crept into the Bill, or if the government finds that due to haste or oversight, a Bill passed by the two Houses contains some provision which goes contrary to the intention of Parliament. In such a situation, President's power to refer a Bill back to the Houses enables the Houses to reconsider the Bill and effect necessary modifications therein according as the situation demands.

Constitutional history was made in India when the President returned a Bill to the government unsigned with the suggestion that its flaws be rectified. This was the first time after the Constitution came into force that a Bill was received back by the government without the President's assent. The Bill to amend the Post Office Act was passed by both Houses of Parliament in 1986. The Bill contained a provision authorising the Central or State Government, or any authorised officer, if satisfied that it was necessary to do so in the interests of public safety or tranquility, the sovereignty or integrity of India, the security of the state, friendly relations with foreign states or public order or for preventing incitement to the commission of any offence, or on the occurrence of any public emergency, to intercept or detain any mail. Objection to this clause was widespread in the country. The clause was too sweeping in nature as it undermined the Fundamental Rights of the people. The clause sought to vest the government with wide and sweeping powers in the matter of interception of the mail. Fears had been expressed that the power could be used for political purposes. Even the Law Commission had expressed its views against such a broad power of interception of mail.[44] The clause in question appeared to come in conflict with Art. 19(2).[45] The clause was too broad, too vague, and too drastic. There was strong public reaction against this clause which was characterised as draconian. The President under the Constitution had two options; (1) to give assent to the Bill; (2) to send it back to Parliament with a message to reconsider the Bill. Parliament would have then reconsidered the Bill. In adopting either of these options the President would have acted against the advice of the Council of Ministers which was a party to the passage of the Bill in the two Houses. Instead of following these constitutional options, the President sent the Bill to the Law Ministry seeking certain clarifications. In a formal sense, the action of the President, though unique, did not amount to the withholding of the assent as envisaged in Art. 111. In that case, he would have sent the Bill back to Parliament with a message to reconsider it. Instead, the President sent the Bill back to the Government so that the Government might reconsider

43. Infra, Ch. III.
44. LAW COMMISSION, REPORT, (1986).
45. Infra, Ch. XXIV.

the matter and move to suitably amend the Bill. The President acted in this matter on his own initiative and not on the advice of the Council of Ministers as envisaged by Art. 74(1).[46] In course of time, taking into consideration the public protests against the Bill, the Government allowed the Bill to lapse without bringing it before the Houses for reconsideration.[47]

A different outcome took place with regard to the Parliament (Prevention of Disqualification) Amendment Bill, 2006. The Bill was passed in the background of a challenge to the appointment of Jaya Bachchan, a cinema artist and Member of the Rajya Sabha on the ground that she held an office of profit as she had been appointed Chairperson of the Uttar Pradesh Film Development Council by the government of that State. The Challenge was upheld and Ms.Bachchan was disqualified by the President on the basis of the opinion of the Election Commission under Art. 103(2). Her plea to the Supreme Court challenging the disqualification was rejected.[48]

This led to a spate of complaints against other members of the Houses of Parliament including persons who belonged to the ruling coalition. While the complaints were pending the opinion of the Election Commission, the Parliament (Prevention of Disqualification) Amendment Bill, 2006, which in effect sought to render the complaints before the Election Commission substantially infructuous, was passed by both Houses and sent to the President, Abdul J. Kalam, for his assent. The President returned the Bill to Parliament under Article 111 raising various points and requesting that the Bill be reconsidered. There was heated debate both publicly and within Parliament on the appropriateness of the Bill. Nevertheless, the Bill was passed again without any changes by the majority and re-sent to the President for his assent under the proviso to Art. 111. The President gave his assent to the Bill on 18th August, 2006.[49]

(d) PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS

An important characteristic of the parliamentary system is that the Cabinet is predominant and virtually monopolizes business in Parliament. So long as the Cabinet holds a majority in the Lok Sabha, the government is in control of the House. It is the government which determines what shall be discussed in each House, when shall it be discussed, how long the discussion shall take place and what the decision shall be. Practically, all Bills which ultimately pass through Parliament are sponsored by Ministers who are under the constant pressure of organised opinion of all kinds seeking redress or relief through legislation.

A private member, i.e., a member who is not a Minister, though theoretically authorised to sponsor a private member's Bill in the House, in practice, there is little chance of its passage without government's support. The powers of private members are thus rigidly limited and not much scope is left for their individual enterprise and initiative. Most of the parliamentary time is occupied by government Bills. In the Lok Sabha, private members have only two and a half hours on each Friday at their disposal. In the Rajya Sabha, the whole of Friday is reserved for this business unless the Chairman directs otherwise.

---

46. See, Infra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
47. See, R. VENKATARAMAN, MY PRESIDENTIAL YEARS, 42, 84, 335.
Also, MEMOIRS OF GIANI ZAIL SINGH, (VII President) 276-279 (1997).
48. Jaya Bachchan v. Union of India, (2006) 5 SCC 266 : AIR 2006 SC 2119.
49. See supra pages 53, 54.

There is a practical reason for the passing of the initiative from the private member to the government in matters of legislation. The problem before a modern government is a problem of time. Therefore, the time of Parliament has to be used to the best advantage which needs planning of work. There are always a number of government Bills waiting for passage by Parliament. Consequently, the private members' Bills have been downgraded to afford priority to government business. It is felt that if a matter is important enough to be embodied in a Bill, then the responsibility for its passage should rest with government.

A private member's Bill can originate in any House and after its passage in both Houses it needs President's assent to become law. Under its rules of procedure, Lok Sabha has a Committee on Private Member's Bills and Resolutions consisting of 15 members nominated by the Speaker for a year. The function of the committee, generally speaking, is to examine the private members' Bills after they have been introduced in the House and classify them according to their nature, urgency and importance and allocate time for their discussion.

(ii) CONTROL OF PUBLIC FINANCE

(a) FOUR PRINCIPLES

A government cannot exist without raising and spending money. Parliament controls public finance which includes granting of money to the administration for expenses on public services, imposition of taxes and authorisation of loans. This is a very important function of Parliament. Through this means Parliament exercises control over the Executive because whenever Parliament discusses financial matters, government's broad policies are invariably brought into focus. The Indian Constitution devises an elaborate machinery for securing parliamentary control over finances which is based on the following four principles.

The first principle regulates the constitutional relation between the Government and Parliament in matters of finance. The Executive cannot raise money by taxation, borrowing or otherwise, or spend money, without the authority of Parliament.

The second principle regulates the relation between the two Houses of Parliament in financial matters. The power of raising money by tax or loan and authorizing expenditure belongs exclusively to the popular House, viz., Lok Sabha. Rajya Sabha merely assents to it. It cannot revise, alter or initiate a grant. In financial matters, Rajya Sabha does not have co-ordinate authority with Lok Sabha which has the real control in this area. Thus, financial powers have been concentrated in Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha plays only a subsidiary role in this respect.

The third principle imposes a restriction on the power of Parliament to authorize expenditure. Parliament cannot vote money for any purpose whatsoever except on demand by Ministers.

The fourth principle imposes a similar restriction on the power of Parliament to impose taxation. Parliament cannot impose any tax except upon the recommendation of the Executive.

Each of these principles is discussed below.[50]

---

50. See, MAY, THE LAW, PRIVILEGES, PROCEEDINGS AND USAGES OF PARLIAMENT, 700(1976); LLBERT, PARLIAMENT, 76, 77 (1953); MORRISON, BRITISH PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY, 60-94(1961); KAUL AND SHAKDHER, PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE IN PARLIAMENT, Ch. XXIX (2000).

(b) NO TAX WITHOUT AUTHORITY OF LAW

The principle that the Executive has no power to impose any levy upon the people without the sanction of the Legislature is contained in Art. 265 which states: "No tax shall be levied or collected except by authority of law". This constitutional provision applies both to the Central as well as the State spheres.

Art. 265 forbids the state from making any unlawful levy. The bar imposed by Art. 265 is absolute. Art. 265 protects the citizen from any unlawful levy.

The word 'tax' has been used in Art. 265 in a comprehensive sense as including any impost—general, special or local.[51] A tax cannot be levied or collected merely by an executive fiat or action without there being a law to support the same.[52]

Art. 265 uses two words "levy" and "collect". "Levy" means the assessment or charging or imposing tax. "Collect" means physical realisation of the tax which is levied or imposed. The stage of collection of tax comes after the levy of the same.

There appears to be a difference of opinion among the High Courts regarding the exact significance of the word 'law' in this Article. One view is that 'law' means a statutory law, i.e., an Act of Legislature and, therefore, a levy or collection of tax by usage is ruled out. The other view is that 'law' does not mean statute law alone and that a customary levy is not ruled out, e.g., a levy on land imposed under a custom as an incident of the possession of any property or holding an office.[53] But a customary collection in respect of goods taken out of a village, or brought within, for purposes of sale, is not valid as it is not related to the holding of some land or office.[54] It will be seen that under the second view some customary levies may be held valid while these would not be valid under the first view.

A mere resolution of a House is not sufficient to impose a tax. For this purpose, the Legislature has to enact a law. A law for levying a tax may be made with retrospective effect.[55] Under Art. 265, not only the levy but also the collection of a tax must be sanctioned by law. A tax may have been validly levied, but it can be collected only in accordance with the law. The procedure to impose the liability to pay a tax has to be strictly complied with, otherwise the liability to pay tax cannot be said to be according to law.[56]

Article 265 also gives protection against executive arbitrariness in the matter of tax collection. Arbitrary assessment of a tax does not amount to collection of tax by authority of law.[57] The imposition cannot exceed what the statute authorises. The tax imposed must fall within the four corners of the law. Therefore, where the statute authorises levy of a tax on the basis of trade, assessment of the tax on the total income of the assessee is unjustified.[58]

---

51. Art. 366(28).
52. State of Kerala v. Joseph, AIR 1958 SC 296 : 1958 KLT 362.
53. Wadhwani v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1958 Raj 138.
54. Guruswami Nadar v. Ezhumalai Panchayat, AIR 1968 Mad 271.
55. Shri Prithvi Cotton Mills v. Broach Borough Municipality, AIR 1970 SC 192 : (1969) 2 SCC 283.
56. Khurai Municipality v. Kamal Kumar, AIR 1965 S C 1321 : (1965) 2 SCR 653.
57. M. Appukutty v. STO, AIR 1966 Ker 55.
58. Phani Bhushan v. Province of Bengal, 54 CWN 177; Union of India v. Bombay Tyre International Ltd., AIR 1984 SC 420; State of Rajasthan vs. Rajasthan Chemist Association. AIR 2006 SC 2699 : (2006) 6 SCC 773.

The Constitution imposes several limitations on the power of Parliament and the State Legislatures to levy taxes. A tax levied by a law infringing any of these restrictions will be a tax without the authority of law and hence invalid. The term 'law' in Art. 265 means a "valid law". Art. 265 thus gives protection against imposition and collection of a tax except by authority of a valid law.[59] A law imposing a tax should be within the legislative competence of the legislature concerned; it should not be prohibited by any provision of the Constitution or hit by a Fundamental Right.[60]

In India, the Executive is empowered to issue ordinances. An ordinance has the same effect as a law of the Legislature.[61] It is possible therefore to levy a tax through an ordinance, but it is very much deprecated and, in practice, use of an ordinance to levy tax is rare.[62]

The right conferred by Art. 265 can be enforced through proper court proceedings. Therefore, if a tax-payer is made to pay an unconstitutional tax, he can recover the amount paid by bringing a civil suit. The writ jurisdiction of the High Court can also be invoked if a tax is sought to be levied without a valid law or without following the mandatory provisions of law.[63]

When a tax is held to be void as being unconstitutional or illegal on any ground, ordinarily speaking, the tax collected by the state would become refundable.[64] The state cannot retain an unconstitutional tax as the levy would be without the authority of law and contrary to Art. 265 of the Constitution. But there are several Supreme Court cases[65], discussed later,[66] where the Court in exercise of its discretionary power to mould relief,[67] may hold the tax invalid prospectively and not retrospectively. This means that while the state can retain the proceeds of the tax already collected before the date of the judgment of the court, the state could not collect the tax thereafter. The court may also refuse refund of tax if the tax-payer has already reimbursed himself by passing the tax burden to a third party.[68] Acknowledging the complexities the court observed that where the re-

---

59. Firm Ghulam Hussain Haji Yakoob v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1963 SC 379 : (1963) 2 SCR 255.

60. Chhotabhai Jethabhai v. Union of India, AIR 1962 SC 1006 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 1.
For discussion on Fundamental Rights, see, infra, Chs. XX-XXXIII.

61. Zila Parishad, Moradabad v. Kundan Sugar Mills, (1968) I SCJ 641 : (1968) 1 SCR 1 : AIR 1968 SC 98.

62. See, infra, Chs. III and VII for discussion on the power of the government to issue ordinances.

63. Poona City Municipal Corp. v. Dattatraya N. Deodhar, AIR 1965 SC 555 : (1964) 8 SCR 178; B.K. Bhandar v. Dhamangaon Municipality, AIR 1966 SC 249 : (1965) 3 SCR 499; U.P. Pollution Control Board v. Kanoria Industrial Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 787 : (2001) 2 SCC 549. On the power of the High Courts to issue writs, see, infra, Ch. VIII.

64. See, U.P. Pollution Control Board, supra, note 16.
Also see, HHM Ltd. v. Administrator, Bangalore City Corp., AIR 1990 SC 47. Salonah Tea Co. Ltd. v. Superintendent of Taxes, Nowgong, AIR 1990 SC 772 : (1988) 1 SCC 401.

65. See, Synthetics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1927 : (1990) 1 SCC 109; Belsund Sugar Col Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 3125 : (1999) 9 SCC 620; Somaiya Organics (India) Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 2001 SC 1723 : (2001) 5 SCC 519.

66. See, infra, Ch. XL, under "Prospective Overruling" and "Unconstitutionality of a Statute".
Also see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, II, under "Restitution".

67. Infra, Chs. IV and XXXIII.
On "Moulding Relief", also see, Ch. VIII, infra.

68. Mafatlal Industries Ltd. v. Union of India, (1997) 5 SCC 536 : (1996) 11 JT 283.

cipient of the refund need not necessarily be the taxpayers the court is faced with the difficulty in refunding a huge amount to a large number of persons who suffered illegal taxation and are not identifiable or where there is a finding of unjust enrichment, the court may direct the body which has made such illegal collection to hand over equivalent amount to a voluntary or a charitable organization.[69]

(c) MONEY BILLS

From the point of view of parliamentary procedure, the Constitution distinguishes between (i) Money Bill, (ii) Financial Bill and (iii) an ordinary Bill involving expenditure.

A Money Bill is a Bill which contains only provisions dealing with the following matters : (a) the imposition, abolition, remission, alteration or regulation of any tax; (b) the regulation of the borrowing of money or the giving of any guarantee by the Government of India or the amendment of the law with respect to any financial obligations undertaken by that Government; (c) the custody of the Consolidated Fund or the Contingency Fund of India, the payment of moneys therein or withdrawal of moneys therefrom; (d) the appropriation of money out of the Consolidated Fund of India; (e) the declaring of any item of expenditure as being a charge on the Consolidated Fund of India, or increasing any such amount; (f) the receipt of money on account of the Consolidated Fund of India or the Public Account of India, or the custody or issue of such money or the audit of the accounts of India or of a State; or (g) any matter incidental to any of the matters specified above [Art. 110(1)]. A Bill is a Money Bill when it deals only with the matters specified above, and not with any other extraneous matter. Thus, a notification issued by the Ministry of Environment and Forests in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (3) of Section 3 of the Environment (Protection) Act, 1986 constituting an authority for the purpose of management of money received towards compensatory afforestation and other monies recoverable by the Central Government for non-forestry uses of forest land is not a Money Bill under either Art. 110 or Art. 199.[70]

A Bill which makes provisions for any of the above-mentioned matters, and additionally with any other matter, is called a Financial Bill [Art. 117(1)]. A Financial Bill is thus really a Money Bill to which some other matter has also been tacked on.

Further, a Bill is neither a Money Bill nor a Financial Bill if it deals only with—(i) the imposition of fines or other pecuniary penalties; or, (ii) the demand of payment of fees for licences or fees for services rendered, or (iii) imposition, abolition, remission, alteration, or regulation of any tax by any local authority or body for local purposes [Arts. 110(2) and 117(2)]. The last clause excludes all municipal taxation from the scope of a Money or Financial Bill.[71]

As regards the exclusion of 'licence fee' from the purview of a Money or a Financial Bill, it is necessary to interpret the term 'licence-fee', somewhat restrictively, for there are examples of taxes being collected through licences, e.g., ex-

---

69. State of Maharashtra v. Swanstone Multiplex Cinema Private Limited, (2009) 8 SCC 235 : AIR 2009 SC 2750.

70. T.N. Godavarman Thirumulpad (87) v. Union of India, (2006) 1 SCC 1 at page 28 : AIR 2005 SC 4256.

71. Corporation of Calcutta v. Liberty Cinema, AIR 1965 SC 1107 : (1965) 2 SCR 477.

cise duties. It cannot be the purpose of the Constitution to exclude a tax-measure from the definition of a Money or a Financial Bill merely because the tax is sought to be collected or levied in the form of licence-fees. Therefore, the expression 'licence-fee' would mean only a 'fee' collected through a licensing system and not a 'tax'.[72]

(d) PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE IN MONEY BILLS

A Money Bill originates in Lok Sabha only; it cannot be introduced in Rajya Sabha [Art. 109(1)]. It cannot be introduced or moved except on the recommendation of the President [Art. 117(1)]. However, Presidential recommendation is not necessary for moving an amendment providing for reduction or abolition of any tax.

After its passage in Lok Sabha, the Money Bill is transmitted to Rajya Sabha for its consideration and recommendations. Rajya Sabha is allowed a period of 14 days for this purpose from the date it receives the Bill [Art. 109(2)]. If Rajya Sabha fails to return a Money Bill with its recommendations within 14 days allowed to it, the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses at the expiry of that period [Art. 109(5)].

Lok Sabha is free to accept or reject any recommendation made by Rajya Sabha relating to the Money Bill. If Lok Sabha accepts any recommendation, the Bill is then deemed to have been passed by both the Houses in the modified form. If Lok Sabha rejects all recommendations of Rajya Sabha, the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses in the form originally passed by Lok Sabha without any change [Arts. 100(3) and (4)]. In financial matters, therefore, the powers of Rajya Sabha are only recommendatory, and the final word rest with the Lok Sabha because it is elected by the people and so it represents the people.

The decision of the Speaker of Lok Sabha is final on the question whether a particular Bill is a Money Bill or not [Art. 110(3)]. While sending a Money Bill to Rajya Sabha for consideration, or presenting it to the President for assent, the Speaker endorses on it a certificate that it is a Money Bill [Art. 110(4)]. The certificate is conclusive of the question that a Bill is a Money Bill.

Two incidents are common between a Money and a Financial Bill. First, both originate only in Lok Sabha and not in Rajya Sabha. Secondly, neither can be introduced without the recommendation of the President [Art. 117(1)]. In all other respects, a Financial Bill is treated like any other ordinary Bill by both Houses; Rajya Sabha has full power to effect amendments in it and a deadlock between the two Houses will have to be resolved through the procedure of the joint session.[73] Thus, Lok Sabha has much greater control over a Money Bill than a Financial Bill.

The stipulation that a Financial Bill should not originate in Rajya Sabha is necessary to safeguard the position of Lok Sabha, for, otherwise, it would have been quite possible for Rajya Sabha to originate a Bill, in essence a Money Bill, by adding something else to it so as to save it from being labelled as a Money Bill; and Lok Sabha's control over finance would thus have been greatly weakened.

---

72. For a discussion on the difference between a 'tax' and a 'fee' see, infra, Ch. XI.
73. Supra, Sec. J(i)(b).

The distinction between a Money Bill and a Financial Bill is also necessary to protect the position of Rajya Sabha. Rajya Sabha does not possess co-ordinate power with Lok Sabha in case of a Money Bill. Lok Sabha could possibly bypass Rajya Sabha even in case of an ordinary Bill by adding some financial clauses to it and thereby characterising it as a Money Bill. It is, therefore, stipulated that a Money Bill ceases to be so if some other matter is added to it in which case it becomes necessary for both Houses to agree to it.

It will be seen that the procedure for passing a Money Bill differs substantially from that used to pass an ordinary Bill. Whereas an ordinary Bill can be introduced in any House, a Money Bill can be introduced only in Lok Sabha. Then, while consent of Rajya Sabha is not necessary for passage of a Money Bill, it is necessary for passing an ordinary Bill. Lastly, a Money Bill can be introduced only on the President's recommendation while this is not so in case of an ordinary Bill.

An ordinary Bill, though not a Money or a Financial Bill, may yet, if enacted and put into effect, involve expenditure from the Consolidated Fund of India. Such a Bill is to be passed by the two Houses as an ordinary Bill, the only difference being that it cannot be passed by a House unless the President recommends it to the House for consideration [Art. 117(3)]. Under the rules of the two Houses, a financial memorandum is to accompany a Bill involving expenditure drawing attention to the clauses involving expenditure.

(e) PRESIDENT'S ASSENT

Presidential assent is necessary to make a Money Bill or a Financial Bill legally effective after its passage in the two Houses. The position in this connection is much the same as in case of an ordinary Bill, except that the President has no power to refer a Money Bill back to the Houses for reconsideration [Art. 111].[74]

It has been contended that the President cannot withhold assent from a Money Bill.[75] But this opinion does not appear to be sound in view of the phraseology of Art. 111.

(f) EXECUTIVE'S RESPONSIBILITY IN FINANCIAL MATTERS

A leading tenet of parliamentary control of finances is that money is granted by Lok Sabha only on demand by the Executive, and that no proposal for imposing a tax, or for appropriating public revenue, can be made in the House without the recommendation of the Executive. Nor can amendments to government's proposals be in order if they have the effect of increasing a tax or imposing an additional charge on the revenue.

There are several reasons underlying this rule which places the responsibility for suggesting measure of taxation and expenditure on the government. If the privilege to suggest expenditure is given to private members, there is a danger that they may suggest expenditure so as to benefit the particular interests of the constituents they represent in Parliament, and the allocation of funds may take place on a sectional, rather than national, basis. Being both the collector and

---

74. See, supra, Sec. J(i)(c).
75. SEERVAI, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF INDIA, 834.

spender of money, the Executive is in a much better position to allocate the available resources among competing needs on an integrated and planned national basis.

This rule making the Executive responsible for proposing measures of taxation and spending is concretised through several constitutional provisions. Thus, no demand for a grant can be made except on the President's recommendation [Art. 113(3)]. Lok Sabha may refuse any demand or reduce its amount but cannot increase it [Art. 113(2)]. A Financial Bill or a Money Bill, or an amendment thereto, is not to be moved without the President's recommendation, but no such recommendation is necessary to move an amendment to reduce or abolish any tax [Proviso to Art. 117(1)]. Further, a Bill which when enacted and put into operation would involve expenditure from the Consolidated Fund of India[76] is not to be passed by a House unless the President has recommended its consideration to that House [Art. 117(3)].

(g) PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL ON APPROPRIATIONS

CONSOLIDATED FUND

No expenditure can be incurred by the Government without the sanction of Parliament.

The pivot, the foundation stone, of parliamentary control over appropriations is the Consolidated Fund of India out of which all government expenditure is met. Parliamentary control over appropriations is ensured by the rule that money cannot be withdrawn from the Consolidated Fund without an Appropriation Act [Art. 114(3)]. No moneys can be appropriated out of the Consolidated Fund except in accordance with law and for the purposes and in the manner provided in the Constitution [Art. 266(3)].

The idea of Consolidated Fund arose in Britain sometime around 1787. Originally Parliament voted taxes to the King leaving him free to collect and spend it on such purposes as he liked. Often money was spent for purposes other than those for which the King had asked it. Parliament retained no control after having voted the taxes. At a later stage, Parliament started to follow the procedure of levying a tax and appropriating its proceeds to a specific purpose. The result was that when it came to passing the Budget, practically no money was left for general purpose, as all taxes had been appropriated to specific purposes. To avoid this situation, it became necessary to collect into one fund all revenues raised by taxes or received in other ways, without being appropriated to any particular purpose, so that when Parliament came to decide upon the Budget, it had with it a fund which it could disburse.

A Consolidated Fund is thus necessary in order to prevent the proceeds of taxes from being frittered away by laws made by Parliament for specific purposes without regard to the general needs of the people. The Consolidated Fund is single unified account for all government departments. It is like a reservoir, a national till, into which all government receipts flow.

In India, the Fund is formed of all revenue receipts of the Central Government; all loans raised by it by issuing treasury bills, loans or ways and means

---

76. For explanation of Consolidated Fund, see, below.

advances : all moneys received by the Central Government in repayment of its loans [Art. 266(1)], and any fees or other moneys taken by the Supreme Court [Art. 146(3)]. Thus, practically, all moneys raised by the Central Government for its expenditure form part of the Fund. From the Fund are excluded the sums payable into the Contingency Fund,[77] and the receipts from taxes and duties which have been assigned wholly or partly to the States for their expenditure.[78]

Parliament is empowered to regulate by law such matters as the custody of the Consolidated Fund, payment of moneys therein and withdrawal of money therefrom. Till Parliament enacts a law for the purpose, these matters may be regulated by rules made by the President [Art. 283(1)].

PUBLIC ACCOUNT

Besides the Consolidated Fund of India, there is the Public Account of India in which are credited all public moneys, other than those put in the Consolidated Fund, received by or on behalf of the Government of India [Art. 266(2)]; all moneys received by or deposited with any officer employed in connection with the affairs of the Union, in his capacity as such, other than revenues or public moneys raised or received by the Government of India [Art. 284(a)], and all moneys received or deposited with the Supreme Court to the credit of any cause, matter, account or persons [Art. 284(b)].

Matters like the custody of public moneys, other than those credited to the Consolidated Fund and the Contingency Fund, received by or on behalf of the Government of India, their payment into the Public Account of India and the withdrawal of such moneys from that Account, may be regulated by Parliament by law, and until such a law is made, by rules made by the President [Art. 283(1)].

No Appropriation Act is needed to withdraw money from the Public Account. The reason being that none of the moneys placed in this Fund really belongs to the Central Government and the payments made into this Fund are largely in the nature of banking transactions.

(h) EXPENDITURE CHARGED ON THE CONSOLIDATED FUND

Public expenditure is divided into two distinct categories, namely,

(1) expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund; and

(2) charges granted by Parliament on an annual basis.

The former category comprises charges of a permanent nature, or charges which it is desirable to keep above controversial party politics. Parliamentary control over these items is very limited as these can be discussed, but not voted upon, in Parliament. An estimate of the charged expenditure is presented to Parliament but no demands for grants are made for them. These items are incorporated in the Appropriation Act.

The following items of expenditure are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India [Art. 112(3)]:

---

77. For explanation of this term, see, infra, p. 106.
78. Ch. XI, infra.

(a) the emoluments and allowances of the President and other expenditure relating to his office;

(b) the salaries and allowances of the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman of the Rajya Sabha and the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker of the Lok Sabha;

(c) debt charges for which the Indian Government is responsible;

(d) the salaries allowances and pensions payable to or in respect of Judges of the Supreme Court;

(e) the pensions payable to the Judges of the Federal Court; and

(f) the Judges of the High Courts;

(g) any sum of money needed to satisfy any judgment, decree or award of any court or arbitral tribunal;

(h) the salary, allowances and pensions payable to the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India;

(i) any other expenditure declared by this Constitution or by Parliament by law to be so charged [Art. 112(3)(g)]. Thus Parliament may by law declare any other expenditure to be charged on the Consolidated Fund of India.

Several other constitutional provisions have charged several items of expenditure on the Consolidated Fund of India, viz.:

(a) the administrative expenses of the Supreme Court including all salaries, allowances and pensions payable to or in respect of officers and servants of the Court [Art. 112(3)(d)(i) and Art. 146(3)];

(b) the administrative expenses of the office of the Comptroller and Auditor-General, including all salaries, allowances and pensions payable to or in respect of persons serving in that office [Art. 112(3)(e) and Art. 148(6)][79]

(c) sums prescribed by law by Parliament as grants-in-aid for States in need of assistance [Art. 275(1)],[80]

(d) sums of money required for making loans to the States [Art. 293(2)]; and

(e) the expenses of the Union Public Service Commission including any salaries, allowances and pensions payable to its members or staff [Art. 322].[81]

In addition to the above, Parliament may by law declare any other expenditure to be charged on the Consolidated Fund of India [Art. 275(3)(g)].

(i) ANNUAL APPROPRIATIONS

An important mechanism for securing parliamentary control over appropriations is the principle of annuality. Most of the appropriations made by Parliament are on an annual basis. The Executive thus comes before Parliament every year to ask for grants for the ensuing year so that Parliament gets an opportunity of reviewing, criticising and discussing the activities and policies pursued by the Government during the preceding year.

79. Infra, p. 108.
80. See, infra, under Federalism, Ch. XI.
81. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.

The parliamentary process to make annual appropriations passes through several stages. The first stage is the presentation of an annual financial statement, popularly known as the Budget.[82] The formal obligation to cause the annual financial statement to be laid before both Houses has been cast on the President [Art. 112(1)]. The Budget is presented by the Finance Minister on the last working day in February every year. It is the statement of the estimated receipts and expenditure of the Government of India for the following year (April 1 to March 31). The Expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund of India is shown separately from other expenditure, and expenditure on revenue account is distinguished from all other expenditure [Art. 112(2)].

In Britain, the Budget is presented only to the House of Commons and not to the House of Lords. In India, it is presented to Lok Sabha and is laid before Rajya Sabha. A general discussion is held on the Budget in each House. Members may discuss the Budget as a whole or any question of principle involved therein. At this stage no motion is moved nor is the Budget submitted to the vote of the House.

Then comes the stage of submitting demands for grants to the Lok Sabha for approval. The estimates of expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund of India are open to discussion but not to a vote in Parliament [Art. 113(1)].[83] All other items of expenditure contained in the Budget are submitted to the Lok Sabha in the form of demands for grants.

Lok Sabha has power to assent to, reject or reduce, but not to increase, the amount of any demand [Art. 113(2)]. Also, as already noted, no demand for grant can be made except on the recommendation of the President, which, in effect, means that only a Minister may move a demand in Lok Sabha. Thus, a member can neither suggest any new expenditure, nor propose an increase in a demand over and above what the government suggests [Art. 113(3)][84]. A member has, therefore, very limited opportunity to distort the Budget. He can only move cut motions to reduce the amount of a demand and through such motions he may criticise the Government, discuss policy questions, criticise the administration, discuss the conduct of the Executive and suggest economy in government expenditure.[85]

---

82. A separate Railway Budget is presented by the Minister of Railways a few days before the General Budget.

83. Supra, p. 101.

84. Supra, pp. 99-100.

85. There are three kinds of cut motions:

(i) Disapproval of Policy Cut—its form is 'That the amount of the demand be reduced to Re. 1-.' It represents disapproval of Policy underlying the demand under consideration. In this way, the whole policy of the Ministry to which the grant relates can be discussed and members may even advocate alternative policies.

(ii) Economy Cut—its form is 'That the amount of the demand be reduced by a specified amount', the amount being equivalent to the economy which the member moving the cut thinks may be effected. By moving such a cut, ways and means to effect economy in the expenses of a Ministry can be discussed.

(iii) Token Cut—its form is 'That the amount of the demand be reduced by Rs. 100.' This kind of cut motion is used to ventilate a specific grievance.

KAUL AND SHAKDHAR, PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE OF PARLIAMENT, 713 (2000).

Cut motions though freely moved by members when demands for grants are being considered in Lok Sabha, are seldom pressed to the point of voting, for the government would always use its majority to defeat such a motion, the reason being that acceptance of a cut motion would amount to expressing lack of confidence in the government and would almost inevitably involve the resignation of the government. Cut motions are used only as a device to raise discussion on the conduct and policies of the Executive and the demands moved by government are invariably accepted by the House after a discussion.

The demands for grants are discussed, but not voted upon, in Rajya Sabha and no 'cut motions' are moved there. It is the exclusive privilege of Lok Sabha to grant money demanded by government. The process of discussing the demands in the Houses is very useful as in this way the whole area of the government activities can be probed into by the members of Parliament and thus the concept of responsible government becomes a reality to some extent.

Since 1993, with a view to make parliamentary control over government expenditure more effective, a number of departmentally related standing committees are constituted. Each committee considers the demands for grants of the concerned ministry and makes a report to the House which then considers the demands for grants in the light of these reports.[86]

(j) APPROPRIATION ACT

No money can be withdrawn from the Consolidated Fund of India without an Appropriation Act being passed in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Constitution for the purpose [Arts. 114(1), (2) and (3)]. The sanction given by Lok Sabha to the demands for grants does not by itself authorise expenditure without the passage of an Appropriation Act. Therefore, after the demands have been discussed in both Houses of Parliament, and have been assented to in Lok Sabha, an Appropriation Bill is introduced in Lok Sabha.

The Appropriation Bill provides for appropriation out of the Consolidatd Fund of all moneys required to meet the grants assented to by Lok Sabha and the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund, and in no case the amount under each head can exceed what was shown previously in the Budget [Art. 114(1)(b)]. No amendment can be proposed to this Bill in any House of Parliament so as to vary the amount or alter the destination of any grant previously agreed to by Lok Sabha or to vary the amount of an expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund. The decision of the presiding officer as to whether an amendment is admissible or not under this clause is final [Art. 114(2)]. The idea behind these restrictions is that the grants already voted upon in the Lok Sabha should not be disturbed later.

The Appropriation Bill goes before both Houses of Parliament for consideration, but being a Money Bill, the power of Rajya Sabha to deal with it is very restricted.[87] The passing of the Appropriation Bill completes the parliamentary process of authorisation of expenditure. The Appropriation Act plays an important role in the parliamentary control of public finance. It authorises the issue of money from the Consolidated Fund of India for the expenditure of the Central Government and limits the expenditure of each department to the sums set out

86. KAUL AND SHAKDHER, op. cit., 706.
87. Supra, p. 98.

therein, thus ensuring not only that the expenditure does not exceed the sum voted but that it is incurred only for the purposes authorised.

(k) FINANCE ACT

The last stage in the chain of annual parliamentary financial procedure is reached when Parliament enacts the Finance Act to effectuate government's taxation proposals for the ensuing year.

The taxes imposed in India are partly permanent and partly temporary. Only a few taxes are levied on a permanent basis and their renewal every year is not necessary. In order to maintain parliamentary control over the Executive, some of the important taxes are imposed on a yearly basis, as for example, the income tax which is the most fruitful source of revenue is renewed every year. The Finance Act seeks to renew the annual taxes, impose new taxes and make necessary adjustments in the permanent taxes with a view to raise revenue necessary to meet the appropriations made out of the Consolidated Fund of India for the ensuing financial year.

The government's taxing proposals are first contained in the Budget. The Finance Bill embodying these proposals is introduced in the Lok Sabha immediately after the conclusion of the Finance Minister's Budget speech. The Bill is not proceeded with immediately but is kept pending till the passage of the Appropriation Act. A motion may then be made in the Lok Sabha for referring the Finance Bill to a select committee and the debate ensuing thereon generally covers a very wide ground. The Bill is taken up for consideration after the select committee has made its report.

The Finance Bill may be a Money Bill or a Financial Bill according as it deals with the matters of taxation exclusively or with some other matters also.[88] The passage of the Finance Act is essential to raise the necessary revenue because of Art. 265.[89] Ordinarily, the taxes sought to be levied by the Finance Act can be collected only after its enactment, but, in order to avoid leakage of revenue, the Government is empowered, under the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act, 1931, to start collection of duty of customs and excise at the new proposed rates immediately from the date the Finance Bill is introduced in the Lok Sabha.[90]

(l) VOTES ON ACCOUNT

No expenditure can be incurred out of the Consolidated Fund without parliamentary authorization expressed through an Appropriation Act. It usually becomes difficult to go through the various stages—from the presentation of the Budget to the passage of Appropriation Act—in Parliament before the new financial year starts on April 1.

Each financial year is a watertight compartment and, therefore, just after a financial year ends, and till the new Appropriation Act is passed for the ensuing year, funds are needed to carry on the administration. This situation is met by taking recourse to votes on account,[91] i.e., Parliament allows a lump sum grant to the Executive to cover expenditure for a short period of two to three months, so

---

88. For distinction between a 'Money Bill' and a 'Financial Bill', see, supra, p. 97.
89. Supra, p. 95.
90. Albert David Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1966 Cal 101.
91. 4 Jl. Parl. Inf., 125 (1958); Art. 116(1)(a).

that Parliament may discuss the Budget and pass the Appropriation Act without being unduly rushed.

(m) VOTES OF CREDIT

In addition, votes of credit may be used in times of emergency when Parliament may vote a lump sum without allocating it to any particular object. Lok Sabha has power to make a grant for meeting an unexpected demand upon the resources of India when on account of the magnitude or indefinite character of the service, the demand cannot be stated with usual details [Art. 116(1)(b)].

(n) EXCEPTIONAL GRANT

Lok Sabha is also authorised to make an exceptional grant which forms no part of the current service of any financial year [Art. 116(1)(c)]. After the Lok Sabha assents to any of these grants, Parliament has to enact a law to withdraw moneys from the Consolidated Fund. In making these grants and passing the law, the procedure prescribed for making annual appropriations is to be followed [Art. 116(2)].

(o) SUPPLEMENTARY GRANTS

It may be that during a financial year, the money sanctioned by the Annual Appropriation Act for a particular service may prove to be inadequate, or that supplementary or additional expenditure is needed on some new service not contemplated at the time when the Budget was presented, or, that money has been spent on a service in excess of the amount granted for the year. In such cases, supplementary grants are made by Parliament before the end of the financial year.

The Finance Minister places before Parliament a statement showing the estimated amount of that expenditure or a demand of such excess. The demands are discussed in both Houses and such of them as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund of India are then assented to in Lok Sabha. Thereafter, a supplementary Appropriation Act containing the demands sanctioned by Lok Sabha as well as the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund is passed. The procedure outlined above in relation to annual demands and appropriations applies to supplementary demands and appropriations as well [Art. 115].

(p) CONTINGENCY FUND

It may become necessary during a financial year to spend some money on a service which was not foreseen at the time of presentation of the Budget. There may not be enough time to convene Parliament to secure its sanction for incurring the expenditure. The Contingency Fund is meant to be used in such a contingency. This Fund is in the nature of an imprest and is used to defray expenditure pending, and in anticipation of, Parliamentary sanction. Money is spent from this Fund without prior parliamentary approval; later, ex post facto parliamentary sanction is secured for the expenditure incurred, and an equal amount of money is transferred to this Fund from out of the Consolidated Fund.

It is for Parliament to establish the Contingency Fund and to determine the sums which may be paid into it from time to time. The Fund is placed at the disposal of the President so that advances may be made out of it for the purpose of meeting unforeseen expenditure pending parliamentary authorization of the same. The Contingency Fund of India Act, 1950, has created the Fund with a sum of 50 crores of rupees, and has vested its custody in a Secretary of the Ministry of Finance on behalf of the President.

The existence of this Fund in no way exonerates the Executive from submitting all excess expenditure to Parliament for sanction, nor does it commit Parliament to approving the expenditure simply because it has been met out of the Contingency Fund. Parliamentary control over the expenditure is thus not diluted by the creation of the Fund.

(q) PARLIAMENT'S POWER TO REGULATE FINANCIAL PROCEDURE

Each House of Parliament has power to make rules for regulating its financial procedure and conduct of business subject to the provisions of the Constitution [Art. 118(1)]. In addition, Parliament may for the purpose of timely completion of financial business make a law to regulate the procedure of, and the conduct of business in, each House of Parliament in relation to any financial matter, or in relation to any Bill for the appropriation of moneys out of the Consolidated Fund of India [Art. 119]. Any such law will prevail over, in case of inconsistency with, any rule made by a House under its rule-making power.

(r) BORROWING

It is not always possible for the Government to find through taxation all the money needed for public expenditure. It may have to resort to borrowing from time to time. Art. 292 empowers the Central Government to borrow money upon the security of the Consolidated Fund of India within such limits, if any, as Parliament may fix from time to time by law and the Government may give guarantees for its loan within the limits so fixed.

This constitutional provision is of a permissive nature as it does not obligate the Executive to obtain statutory authorization from Parliament to borrow funds, but it gives the necessary power to Parliament, if it so desires, to control borrowing activities of the Central Government by fixing quantitative limit thereon. This power has not been exercised by Parliament so far. The position, therefore, is that the Central Government today borrows money entirely on its executive authority without seeking a mandate from Parliament for the purpose.

The practice in the U.K., however, differs from that in India. Whenever the British Government desires to borrow money, a resolution authorising the Treasury to issue the loan is passed by the House of Commons. No such specific resolution is needed in India.

The power to raise funds by borrowing is an important weapon in the hands of the Central Government and if parliamentary control over public finance is to be complete, it is essential for Parliament to take suitable action to define the limits and conditions subject to which loans can be raised by the Central Government. The Government does not, however, favour this course of action. Because of planning, Government has to resort to borrowing and deficit financing extensively. If a ceiling is placed on borrowing, it will make things rigid as the ceiling cannot be crossed without amending the law and this may delay matters.

All borrowings during the year are shown in the Budget and approval of the Budget by Parliament might be regarded as approval of the Government's borrowing programme as well. The money borrowed by the Government becomes part of the Consolidated Fund of India out of which appropriations are made only by Parliament by law.

(s) COMPTROLLER AND AUDITOR-GENERAL

The Comptroller and Auditor-General (C.A.G.) is appointed by the President, i.e., the Central Executive [Art. 148(1)]. He takes a prescribed oath before assuming his office [Art. 148(2)]. His salary and other conditions of service have now been prescribed in an Act of Parliament.[1]

Neither his salary nor his rights in respect of leave of absence, pension, or age of retirement can be varied to his disadvantage after his appointment [Art. 148(3)]. He can be removed from his office in the same way as a Judge of the Supreme Court [Art. 148(1)].[2] He is not eligible to hold any office under the Central or any State Government after he ceases to hold the office of the Comptroller and Auditor-General [Art. 148(4)]. The administrative expenses of his office, including all salaries, allowances and pensions payable to him or in respect of persons serving in his office, are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India.[3]

The President may make rules, after consultation with Comptroller and Auditor-General, regulating the conditions of service of persons serving in the Indian Audit and Account Department. This rule-making power is, however, subject to the "Constitution and any law made by Parliament [Art. 148(5)]." Interpreting the scope of the rule-making power, the Supreme Court has ruled that these rules cannot be made with retrospective effect.[4]

Adequate precautions have thus been taken to render the Comptroller and Auditor-General independent of, and immune from, the influence of the Executive. It was very necessary to do so in order to enable him to discharge his important functions without fear or favour.

The Constitution does not specifically prescribe his functions but leaves the matter to be dealt with by Parliament. He is to perform such duties and exercise such powers in relation to the accounts of the Union and the States and of any other authority or body as may be prescribed by law by Parliament [Art. 149].

Under the Act of 1971,[5] Parliament has prescribed two types of functions for him. As an accountant, he compiles the accounts of the Union and the States. These accounts are to be kept in such form as the President may prescribe on the advice of the Comptroller and Auditor-General [Art. 150]. As an auditor, he audits all the receipts and expenditure of the Union and State Governments and ascertains whether moneys disbursed were legally available for, and applicable to, the service or purpose to which they have been applied and whether the expenditure conforms to the authority which governs it.

Audit plays an important role in the scheme of parliamentary financial control. Parliament appropriates specific sums for specific purposes. Audit ensures that the Executive keeps within the sums allotted and the purposes authorised. It is

---

1. The Comptroller and Auditor-General (Duties, Powers and Conditions of Service) Act, 1971, fixes his salary equal to that of a Supreme Court Judge. The tenure of his office is fixed at six years.
2. For the procedure to remove a Judge of the Supreme Court, see, infra, Ch. IV, Sec. B.
3. Arts. 112(3)(e) and 148(6); supra, p. 102.
4. Accountant-General v. S. Doraiswamy, AIR 1981 SC 783 : (1981) 4 SCC 93.
5. Supra, footnote 1.

absolutely necessary that some independent person should scrutinise the government spending and check whether it has been in accordance with parliamentary intentions. In the absence of such a scrutiny parliamentary control over appropriations may be frustrated. He also satisfies himself on behalf of Parliament as to the wisdom, faithfulness and economy of the expenditure.

Audit is, therefore, directed towards discovering waste or extravagance. He can disallow any expenditure violating the Constitution or any law and he thus upholds the Constitution and the laws in the field of financial administration. It is his duty to challenge any improper exercise of discretion by authorities and comment on the propriety of the sanctions and expenditure.[6]

The Comptroller and Auditor-General performs a very useful function. He secures the accountability of the Executive to Parliament in the field of financial administration. He helps in making legislative control over the Executive more effective by a sort of retrospective, an ex post facto, examination of the expenses incurred. It is because of the great importance of his functions that the Comptroller and Auditor-General has been given a status comparable to that of a Judge of the Supreme Court. He submits his reports to the President or the Governor in case of the Central or State accounts respectively. These reports are placed before Parliament or the concerned State Legislature [Art. 151].

In Britain, this officer performs a dual function. As Auditor-General, he audits and examines the Government accounts to ensure that each payment has been applied to the purpose for which it was appropriated by Parliament and not to any other purpose. The audit reports prepared by him are presented direct to the House of Commons and not to the government and so he is regarded as an officer of the House. He is appointed by the Crown on an address by the House of Commons which is moved by the Prime Minister with the agreement of the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee.

As Comptroller, he controls issue of money out of the Consolidated Fund by ensuring that nothing is taken out of it without due parliamentary authority. He would not allow issue of money for an unauthorised purpose; any excesses over parliamentary grants are prevented, and parliamentary control is thus made more effective.[7]

In India, this aspect of the Comptroller's functions has not yet been developed. Here he acts mainly as an auditor and points out the irregularities after the expenses have been incurred. He does not have that preliminary control over the issue of public money as his British counterpart has. Audit only constitutes a post-expenditure check.

The Constitution has left it to Parliament to enact a law to strengthen the position of the Comptroller and Auditor-General and equate him with his British counterpart. But this has not been done so far. Another weakness of the Indian system is the combination of the dual functions of Audit and Accounts in the same hands. Such a combination lessens the responsibility of the Administration

---

6. MUKHERJEA, PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE IN INDIA, 326; A.K. CHANDA, INDIAN ADMINISTRATION, 239(1967).

7. WADE AND PHILLIPS, op. cit., 273; WHEARE, GOVERNMENT BY COMMITTEE, 129 (1955); SHAKDHER, COMPTROLLER AND AUDITOR-GENERAL OF INDIA AND THE U.K., 4. JI. of Parl. Inf., 102; O. Hood Phillips, CONSTITUTIONAL & ADM. LAW, 226 (VII Ed., 1887).

to render accounts. Accounting is essentially an executive function and must be under the control of the Executive head of the department. Auditing is a kind of quasi-judicial function, which involves a checking of the financial transactions of the executive authorities. A combination of these two essentially distinct functions involves a kind of contradiction, for the officer compiling the accounts has also to certify as to their correctness.

The prevalent system was introduced by the British in the pre-Independence days on grounds of economy and expediency. It is out of tune with the modern context and can be justified no longer. Although opinions have been expressed from time to time to dissociate the two functions,[8] nothing has been done in this direction and status quo has been maintained so far.

(t) PARLIAMENTARY FINANCIAL COMMITTEES

In addition to all the institutional and procedural apparatus which the Constitution creates for ensuring parliamentary control over the Executive in financial matters, the Lok Sabha further has created two committees under its rules.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

The Public Accounts Committee in India is a close replica of the British model.[9] It consists of fifteen members elected by Lok Sabha every year from amongst its members. A Minister cannot be its member. Seven members of the Rajya Sabha are also associated with the committee. A member of the opposition acts as its chairman.

The committee examines the accounts showing the appropriations of the sums granted by Parliament for government's expenditure. The committee also examines the accounts of the government corporations and autonomous and semi-autonomous bodies. The committee has power to hear officials or take evidence connected with the accounts under examination. The reports made by the Auditor-General would not be of much use if the Houses were to have no organ to examine these reports. It is with this in view that the Public Accounts Committee has been instituted. The committee functions on the basis of the audit reports made by the Comptroller and Auditor-General.

The basic purpose of the committee is to see that the grants made to the various departments are used only for the purposes set out in the estimates. The committee thus reviews the transactions of the departments after the Budget has been executed with a view to ensure that money is spent as Parliament intended, that due economy is exercised and that no waste or extravagance or losses occur in expenditure.

The committee is not an executive body, and has no power to disallow any item or to issue an order. Its reports are technically made to Prliament. The reports have no force in themselves but they carry great weight and influence and the government usually accepts its recommendations. A beneficial result of the activities of the committee is that it reminds the officials that their actions are subject to scrutiny on behalf of Parliament and this is a great check on the slackness, negligence or absolutism of the Executive.

---

8. Third Report of the Public Accounts Committee, 1952-53.
9. MUKHERJEA, op. cit., 312; O. HOOD PHILLIPS, supra, footnote 7, at 227.

ESTIMATES COMMITTEE

The Estimates Committee consists of 30 members elected by Lok Sabha for one year from amongst its members. A Minister cannot be its member. Unlike the Public Accounts Committee, members of Rajya Sabha are not associated with the Estimates Committee.

The committee is authorised to take evidence connected with the estimates under examination. The committee presents its reports to the House. The committee, like its counterpart in Britain, examines the details of the estimates presented to Lok Sabha in the Budget with a view to secure economy and efficiency in administration, but it does not go so much into the policy which is regarded as government's responsibility. However, it can suggest alternative policies with a view to ensure efficiency and economy in the administration.

GENERAL FEATURES OF THE TWO COMMITTEES

The two committees, mentioned above, make parliamentary control of public finance more effective. Because of its large membership, pressure of work and inexpert character, Lok Sabha is hardly in a position to go into minute details and exert effective financial control over government. The committees being smaller bodies can scrutinise the government expenditure and estimates more thorougly than the House could ever do. Another advantage of the committees is that they directly contact the executive officers who spend money. They can call for evidence and documents. Discussion in these committees cuts across party lines.

After submitting their recommendations, the committees insist on a statement from the government showing which of these have been implemented, and to give its reasons for those not implemented. On the basis of the government's statements, the committees issue a second report discussing whether the action taken on their recommendations is adequate or not. The reports of these committees are of great value in checking laxity of administration and irregularity in expenditure. Though these reports are not discussed or formally adopted by the House, nevertheless, these reports carry the same weight and authority as if they have been so adopted.[10]

(iii) DELIBERATION AND DISCUSSION

The Houses of Parliament are constantly engaged in discussion, deliberation, debating public issues, shaping and influencing government policy and ventilating public grievances. This is constantly done through legislation, control of public finance, and debate on the President's address.[11] Debates of real value take place during discussion on appropriations when every branch of government administration runs the gauntlet of parliamentary criticism.[12]

Members of Parliament put questions to Ministers to obtain information on matters of public importance. Parliamentary questions provide a check on the day

---

10. WADE & PHILLIPS, op. cit., 192; JENNINGS, op. cit., 303-316, 332-7; MAY, op. cit., 672, 675; WHEARE, op. cit. 205, et seq; MUKHERJEA, op. cit., 305, 312; SHAKDHER, Two Estimates Committees 6 JI. of PARL. Inf., 76 (1960); CHANDA, op. cit., 170, 180: R.N. AGGARWAL, FINANCIAL COMMITTEES OF THE INDIAN PARLIAMENT (1966); B.B. JENA, PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES IN INDIA, 125-198 (1966).

11. Supra, pp. 73, 89, 94.

12. Supra, pp. 103, 104.

to day administration and help in securing redress of individual grievances. Stressing the importance of this procedure, ILBERT observes: "There is no more valuable safeguard against maladministration, no more effective method of bringing the searchlight of criticism to bear on the action or inaction of responsible Ministers and their subordinates. A Minister has to be constantly asking himself not merely whether his proceedings and the proceedings of those for whom he is responsible are legally or technically defensible, but what kind of answer he can give if questioned about them in the House and how that answer will be received."[13]

In addition, the rules of each House provide for many other procedural techniques for raising discussion on public issues in the House. A discussion may be raised by a member moving in the House a resolution on a matter of general public interest; by raising half an hour discussion on a matter of sufficient public importance which has been the subject of a recent question in the House and the answer to which needs elucidation on a matter of fact; by raising a discussion on a matter of urgent public importance for short duration. From time to time, Ministers make statements of policy in the Houses. Specific aspects of government policy are debated from time to time.

An adjournment motion, i.e. a motion for adjournment of the business of the House, may be moved by a member in the Lok Sabha for discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. If the Speaker holds the motion in order and 50 members of the House support it, theordinary time table of the day is suspended, and a full debate is held on the subject. Such a motion is very rarely admitted by the Speaker for it involves an element of censure of the government. The advantage of the procedure is that once the Speaker agrees that the matter raised is definite and urgent, a debate is almost assured for howsoever overwhelming the government majority in the House may be, it cannot prevent a discussion as even the weakest opposition may muster at least 50 votes.

In Rajya Sabha, the procedure by way of an adjournment motion is not available but a similar purpose is served through a motion for papers.[14]

Elaborate discussion may take place in Lok Sabha on a motion of no confidence in the Council of Ministers. Such a motion cannot be discussed in Rajya Sabha, for according to Art. 75(3), the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible only to Lok Sabha.[15]

Petitions may be submitted to a House on a Bill introduced there; and to, Lok Sabha, in addition, on any other matter connected with pending business or on a matter of general public importance. Each House has a Committee on Petitions to which petitions are forwarded for consideration and report.

(iv) PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES

Under its rules of procedure and conduct of business, each House has instituted an elaborate committee system with a view to better organize its work and discharge its functions effectively. The committee system helps in conserving the

---

13. ILBERT, PARLIAMENT, 98.
14. KAUL AND SHAKDHER, PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE OF PARLIAMENT, Ch. III (2000).
15. Ch. III, infra.

time of the House, increasing expertise and enables the House to exert some control over the government.

Parliament discusses policy, but it is in the committees that details can be discussed, administrators made to give evidence and matters examined thoroughly. On the floor of the House, discussions are on party lines. In a committee, the atmosphere is informal and business-like almost free of party politics.

Lok Sabha has the following committees:—

(i) Committee on Private Members' Bills and Resolutions;[16]

(ii) Committee on Petitions;[17]

(iii) Committee on Public Accounts;[18]

(iv) Committee on Estimates;[19]

(v) Committee on Leave of Absence from Sittings of the House;[20]

(vi) Committee of Privileges;[21]

(vii) Committee of Subordinate Legislation;[22]

(viii) Business Advisory Committee is nominated by the Speaker and has 15 members including the Speaker who is its chairman. Its main function is to recommend the allocation of time for discussion of various stages of such government Bills and other government business as may be referred to it by the Speaker in consultation with the Leader of the House.

The committee consists of members from all sections of the House. Its decisions are reported to the House which may accept them by passing a motion to that effect. The committee helps in better planning of work of the House. As it arrives at agreed decisions, wastage of the time of the House in unnecessary wrangling over allocation of time is avoided.

(ix) Committee on Government Assurances: Its function is to scrutinise the assurances given by the Ministers in the House from time to time and to report to what extent these assurances have been implemented and whether the implementation has taken place within the minimum time necessary for the purpose.

The committee consists of 15 members nominated by the Speaker. A Minister cannot become its member. Its report is presented to the House.

The committee has sprung up because of the desire of the members to keep a check on the promises which Ministers usually make on the floor of the House. The committee reports on the gap between prom-

16. Supra, pp. 93, 94.
17. See above.
18. Supra, p. 110.
19. Supra, p. 111.
20. Supra, p. 61.
21. Infra, Sec. L.
22. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, 142-52.

ise and fulfilment and is a manifestation of the parliamentary mood of watchfulness over the government, and thus plays an important role.

(x) Rules Committee considers matters of procedure in Lok Sabha, and recommends amendments to its Rules. It consists of 15 members nominated by the Speaker who is its ex officio Chairman.

(xi) General Purposes Committee: The Speaker is its ex officio Chairman. Its function is to advise on such matters concerning the affairs of the House as the Speaker may refer to it from time to time.

(xii) House Committee is nominated by the Speaker. Its function is advisory and it deals with all questions relating to residential accommodation for members of Lok Sabha.

(xiii) Committee on Public Undertakings examines the working of the public undertakings mentioned in a schedule to the Rules of the House.

Besides the above, select committees are appointed by the House on an ad hoc basis from time to time to scrutinise the provisions of important Bills. A select committee can hear expert evidence and representatives of various interests affected by the Bill and suggest amendments to it. Its report is placed before the House. A select committee performs a very useful function as it thoroughly scrutinises the Bill and discusses the underlying policy in an informal atmosphere away from the public gaze.

Lok Sabha may constitute a committee for any other specific purpose. A committee of Lok Sabha has power to send for persons, papers and records and to take evidence on any matter. The government, however, has the privilege to decline to produce a document before the committee on the ground that its disclosure will be prejudicial to the safety or interest of the state.

Rajya Sabha also has several committees, viz., Business Advisory Committee, Committee on Petitions,[23] Committee of Privileges,[24] Rules Committee, Committee on Subordinate Legislation,[25] all practically similar to their counterparts in Lok Sabha.

Besides, Rajya Sabha also appoints select committees on Bills and may appoint any other committee for any other purpose.

There are some Joint committees consisting of members of both the Houses, such as, Library Committee, Committee on the Welfare of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes[26], Committee on Empowerment of Women[27]. From time to time, joint select committees for scrutinising Bills are appointed by the two Houses.

Besides, some parliamentary committees are appointed under statutory provisions, as for example, a joint committee functions under the Salaries and Allowances of Parliament Act, 1954, for the purpose of making rules under the Act.[28] Reference has already been made to the Joint Committee of the two Houses on Offices of Profit.[29]

---

23. Supra, p. 113.
24. Infra, Sec. L.
25. Supra, footnote 22.
26. Infra, Ch. XXXV.
27. Ibid.
28. Supra, p. 61.
29. Supra, pp. 52, 53.

K. INTERRELATION OF THE HOUSES

The fact that Parliament is bi-cameral gives rise to the problem of inter-relationship between the two Houses. This topic can be considered under the following several heads:

(i) LEGISLATIVE PROCESS (OTHER THAN MONEY BILLS)

The two Houses enjoy co-ordinate power in this area.[30] A deadlock between them in respect of a Bill is resolved through their joint session. This method recognises in theory the equality of the two Houses.

As a hypothesis, Lok Sabha with 545 members can always have its way in a joint session over Rajya Sabha with its 250 members but, in practice, this may not always be so. Lok Sabha can prevail over Rajya Sabha only if most of its members support its stand in the joint session. But, as both the Houses are divided into political parties, usually, members of one political party in both Houses may be expected to go by the party loyalty and vote in one way irrespective of their loyalty to the House to which they belong. It may so happen that the combined strength of the ruling party in the two Houses may be less than that of the Opposition parties, and in such an eventuality the result of a joint session may be quite embarrassing to the government.

The device of joint session to resolve the inter-House deadlock has been adopted in India, with some adaptation, from Australia. In Australia, an ordinary Bill needs the assent of both Houses to become a law. If a Bill is passed twice by the Lower House, and rejected twice by the Upper House, a deadlock ensues. Both Houses are then dissolved and if the deadlock persists even after fresh elections, a joint session of both Houses is summoned.

The position in India differs from that in Australia in two respects: (1) after deadlock, the Houses in India are not dissolved but are continued in operation; and (2) a Bill does not have to be passed by Lok Sabha and rejected by Rajya Sabha twice before a joint session is called.

In Britain, it needs the assent of both Houses to pass a Bill (other than a Money Bill). In case of difference of opinion between the two Houses, it is the House of Commons which ultimately prevails. The House of Lords has only a suspensory veto over public Bills for a maximum period of one year.

The procedure to resolve the inter-House deadlock in India differs from that in Britain. While India has the procedure of the joint session, in Britain the efflux of time resolves the differences between the two Houses.

In the United States, the two Houses enjoy co-equal legislative powers, and one House cannot override the other House. Legislation can originate in any House but the consent of both Houses is necessary before a Bill becomes law. The U.S. Constitution has no provision for breaking an inter-House deadlock. The practice is for each House to appoint a committee and the two committees then negotiate and reach a compromise which each House invariably accepts.

In Canada, there is a formal equality between two Houses in matters of legislation, and both Houses should agree before a Bill can become a law. In case of a deadlock, the Executive may appoint four or eight new Senators. But this provision has never been utilised because of the compliant attitude of the Senate.[31] Being a nominated body, it is largely insignificant and a political non-entity. Rajya Sabha, however, is much more of a living organism.

30. Supra, Sec. J(i).

(ii) FINANCIAL LEGISLATION

In financial matters, the effective power rests with the Lok Sabha. The reason for this inequality between the two Houses is that Lok Sabha being directly elected, it represents the people who provide the money through taxation, whereas Rajya Sabha is not such a representative body. Lok Sabha has full control over a Money Bill which can become law without Rajya Sabha's concurrence, and, therefore, no deadlock can arise between the two Houses in this case.[32]

Similar is the position in Britain. The House of Lords has no effective power to interfere with taxation or financial matters. The House of Commons has complete control over a Money Bill.

In the U.S.A., both Houses are co-equal in financial matters except that a bill to raise revenue originates in the House of Representatives and not in the Senate. The Senate, however, has power to amend such a Bill, while Rajya Sabha does not have any such power.

In Australia, assent of both Houses is needed to pass a Money Bill though it may originate only in the Lower House. The Senate has power to reject a Money Bill, but cannot amend it, though it may request the Lower House to amend it and the House may or may not accept any of the Senate's recommendations. In practice, however, Senate's power to reject Money Bills, and submit requests for amendments now seem almost equivalent to the power to amend since the Lower House, when faced with the alternative of rejection of a Money Bill by the Senate, or accepting its requests for amendments, would generally prefer the latter course. In case of a deadlock, the usual provision of double dissolution applies. In India, Rajya Sabha cannot reject a Money Bill and there cannot be a deadlock between the Houses in this regard.

In Canada, the Lower House has exclusive power to initiate tax and appropriation measures but the Senate has power to amend such bills. In case of a deadlock, the usual provision available in case of ordinary legislation applies.

(iii) OTHER AREAS

(a) IMPEACHMENT

In Britain, the Commons can impeach any person before the Lords for any crime or political misdemeanour, but this institution has now fallen into disuse with the emergence of the concept of ministerial responsibility.[33]

In the U.S.A., an impeachment is tried by the Senate on charges preferred by the House of Representatives; the President, Vice-President and civil officers including federal judges can be impeached for treason, bribery and other high crimes. Thus, in U.K. and U.S.A., the power to initiate proceedings for impeachment lies with the popular chamber, and impeachment is tried in the Upper Chamber.

---

31. DAWSON, GOVERNMENT OF CANADA, 282, 295 (1970).
32. Supra, Sec. J(ii).
33. WADE AND PHILLIPS, op. cit., 97-8.

There is no provision for impeachment in Canada and Australia.

In India, on the other hand, the resolution to impeach the President may be moved in either House and the impeachment will be tried in the other House and, thus, both Houses enjoy co-equal status in this respect.[34]

(b) REMOVAL OF A JUDGE OF THE SUPREME COURT OR A HIGH COURT

Both Houses enjoy co-equal power in this respect as a resolution to dismiss a Judge is to be passed by each House [Arts. 124 and 217][35].

(c) ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT:

An elected member of each House of Parliament has the same number of votes for election of the President.[36]

(d) ELECTION OF VICE-PRESIDENT

He is elected by members of both Houses assembled in a joint meeting [Art. 66(1)].[37]

(e) REMOVAL OF THE VICE-PRESIDENT

The resolution to remove the Vice-President is to be passed by both Houses though there is a slight difference in their respective roles.

The resolution should first be passed by Rajya Sabha, whose Chairman the Vice-President is, by a majority of all its then members; it becomes effective when later Lok Sabha agrees to it by a simple majority [Art. 67].[38]

(f) CONTROL OF THE EXECUTIVE

While both Houses control the Executive through criticism and discussion, etc., it is the Lok Sabha which plays a predominant role in this respect.[39]

The same is the case in Britain, Australia and Canada. In America, the form of government being presidential, no question of its direct responsibility to any House arises.[40]

(g) AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

Both Houses have co-equal power in the matter of passing a Bill to amend the Constitution. The Constitution has no provision to break an inter-House deadlock over a proposed constitutional amendment [Art. 368][41].

(h) DECLARING A STATE MATTER AS BEING OF NATIONAL IMPORTANCE

Lok Sabha has absolutely no power in this respect [Art. 246(1)]. Only Rajya Sabha can pass a resolution to this effect. Presumably, the power has been given to the Rajya Sabha in its character of a House representing the States.[42]

---

34. Infra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i).
35. Chs. IV and VIII, infra.
36. Infra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i).
37. Infra, Ch. III, Sec. A(ii).
38. See, infra, Ch. III, Sec. A(ii).
39. Ch. III, Sec. B, Infra.
40. Ch. III, Sec. E, infra.
41. Infra, Ch. XLI.
42. Supra, Sec. A, Ch. X, infra.

(i) PRESIDENTIAL ORDINANCE

President's ordinance is laid before both Houses and it lapses if both Houses pass a resolution disapproving it [Art. 123(2)].[43] The power of the two Houses is therefore co-ordinate in this matter.

(j) DECLARATION OF AN EMERGENCY

A declaration of emergency is laid before both Houses and it cannot remain in force for more than one month unless, before the expiry of that period, it is approved by both Houses [Art. 352(2)].[44]

(k) FAILURE OF CONSTITUTIONAL MACHINERY IN A STATE:

A proclamation of failure of constitutional machinery in a State is laid before both Houses and it ceases to operate after two months if in the meantime it is not approved by both Houses [Art. 356(3)].[45]

(iv) ASSESSMENT OF THE ROLE OF RAJYA SABHA

From the above, it is clear that Rajya Sabha is not a non-entity and is very much of a living organism. In some matters, its powers are inferior to, but in many other matters, it stands pari passu with, Lok Sabha. In the matter of declaring a State subject as being of national importance it has even an exclusive power. However, in the context of the totality of the government process in the country, Rajya Sabha is less powerful than Lok Sabha.[46]

Because of the fact that the Executive is responsible to Lok Sabha and not to Rajya Sabha, power seeks to gravitate to Lok Sabha. A majority of Ministers belong to Lok Sabha and government is more sensitive to the criticism made and views expressed in that House. Lok Sabha has the effective financial power. It is elected by the people directly on adult franchise and thus it reflects in a more representative manner the current public opinion. Rajya Sabha, on the other hand, being based on a very restricted franchise, does not command so much of public appeal and representative character as does the Lok Sabha.

However, the status of Rajya Sabha is comparatively superior to that enjoyed by the Upper Chamber in Britain and Canada. Because the Senate in Australia has substantial powers in financial matters, it may be said to occupy a more significant position than does Rajya Sabha.

The strongest Upper Chamber is the Senate in the U.S.A., because, in addition to its practically co-ordinate powers with the Lower House in financial and other legislation (without there being a method to break an inter-House deadlock except negotiation), it also has certain powers which the other House does not possess, viz., the power to approve treaties and high appointments made by the President.

The existence of two chambers having co-ordinate authority in several matters does create the possibility of complex constitutional situation arising at 43. Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(d) infra.

---

44. See, infra, Ch. XIII.
45. See, infra, Ch. XIII.
46. Ch. III, Sec. B, infra.

times. In India, however, not many complications have arisen so far, and the relationship between the two Houses has been, on the whole, smooth. The Indian parliamentary system will work well if one political party has majority in both Houses.

So long as the Congress Party enjoyed majority in both Houses, the system worked without much difficulty. But, now, that the government has majority in Lok Sabha and not in Rajya Sabha, where the opposition enjoy majority support, stresses and strains between the two Houses arise from time to time. Such a situation arises because while all the members of Lok Sabha are elected at one and the same time, all the members of Rajya Sabha are not elected at one time. Nearly 1/3 members of Rajya Sabha retire every two years. This means that while Lok Sabha reflects the present day public mood, it taken six years for Rajya Sabha to fully adjust to the present public mood and political realities. In the meantime, the situation may cause political embarrassment to the government if on a specific measure, Lok Sabha supports it, but Rajya Sabha refuses to support it.

What will the government do if the two Houses do not agree on a matter in which both Houses enjoy co-ordinate power? Rajya Sabha is not subject to dissolution; the government cannot act till both Houses agree and it is responsible to the Lower House and not to the Upper House. Except legislation and money matters, the Constitution does not prescribe any machinery to break the deadlock between the Houses. The only practical way out for the government would be to seek to promote some sort of a compromise between the two Houses. This phase appeared for a while during the Janata Government regime when the government enjoyed majority in Lok Sabha but was in a minority in the Rajya Sabha.

The present-day coalition government has a majority in Lok Sabha but not in Rajya Sabha. This is a source of embarrassment to the government at times. For example on the 12th February, 99, the President issued a proclamation under Art. 356 [see head (XI) above] for the State of Bihar. The Government in the State was dismissed and presidential rule was imposed. This proclamation was approved by Lok Sabha but the Central Government did not place it in Rajya Sabha as the Government did not have majority in that House and it became clear that the House would not approve the proclamation. Consequently, the Central Government revoked the proclamation on March 8 resulting in the restoration of the former Government in office in the State.

L. PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES

With a view to enabling Parliament to act and discharge its high functions effectively, without any interference or obstruction from any quarter, without fear or favour, certain privileges and immunities are attached to each House collectively, and to the members thereof individually.

Members of Parliament have been given somewhat wider personal liberty and freedom of speech than an ordinary citizen enjoys for the reason that a House cannot function effectively without the unimpeded and uninterrupted use of their services. Privileges are conferred on each House so that it may vindicate its authority, prestige and power and protect its members from any obstruction in the performance of their parliamentary functions.[47] Legislative privileges are deemed to be essential in order to enable the House to fulfil its constitutional functions, to conduct its business and maintenance of its authority.

In India, parliamentary privileges are available not only to the members of a House but also to those who, though not members of a House, are under the Constitution entitled to speak and take part in the proceedings of a House or any of its committees. These persons are Ministers and the Attorney-General.[48]

The privileges of a House have two aspects—(i) external, and (ii) internal. They refrain anybody from outside the House to interfere with its working. This means that the freedom of speech and action are restricted to some extent. The privileges also restrain the members of the House from doing something which may amount to an abuse of their position.[49]

Article 105 defines the privileges of the two Houses of Parliament. This constitutional provision does not exhaustively enumerate the privileges of the two Houses. It specifically defines only a few privileges, but, for the rest, it assimilates the position of a House to that of the House of Commons in Britain. The endeavour of the framers of the Constitution was to confer on each House very broad privileges, as broad as those enjoyed by the House of Commons which possesses probably the broadest privileges as compared to any other legislature in the world.

It may be noted that under Art. 194, in the matter of privileges the position of State Legislatures is the same as that of the Houses of Parliament. Therefore, what is said here in the context of Art. 105 applies mutatis mutandis to the State Legislatures as well.[50] Questions regarding legislative privileges concerning State Legislatures have been raised frequently before the courts and these judicial pronouncements are as relevant to Art. 105 as to Art. 194 and a number of these cases are cited here.

(i) PRIVILEGES EXPRESSLY CONFERRED BY THE CONSTITUTION

(a) FREEDOM OF SPEECH

The essence of parliamentary democracy is a free, frank and fearless discussion in Parliament. For a deliberative body like a House of Parliament, freedom of speech within the House is of utmost significance. To enable members to express themselves freely in the House, it is essential to immunize them from any fear that they can be penalised for anything said by them within the House.

---

47. For a detailed study of Parliamentary Privileges, see : MUKHERJEA, PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE IN INDIA, 350-407 (1967); Privileges Digest (Lok Sabha Secretariat); Journal of Parliamentary Information; HIDAYATULLAH, PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES : PRESS AND THE JUDICIARY, 2 JI. of Constitutional and Parl. Studies, I (April-June, 1968); Report of the Select Committee on Parliamentary Privilege (House of Commons, 1967); DE SMITH, CONSTITUTIONAL & ADMN. LAW, 316-332 (1971); CAMPBELL, PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE IN AUSTRALIA (1966); ERSKINE MAY, PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE; JAIN, M.P., PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES AND THE PRESS, (1984); see also P. Sudhir Kumar v. Speaker, A.P. Legislative Assembly, (2003) 10 SCC 256 : (2002) 2 Scale 254.

48. Arts. 88, 105(4); supra, 61.

49. See SAMARADITYA PAL—LAW OF CONTEMPT (2006); JAGDISH SWARUP—CONSTITUTION OF INDIA, 2nd Edn., Vol. 2, Ed.L.M. SINGH (2006).

50. Ch. VI, infra.

The rule of freedom of speech and debate in Parliament became established in Britain in the 17th century in the famous case of Sir John Eliot.[51] Eliot was convicted by the Court of King's Bench for seditious speeches made in the House of Commons. The House of Lords reversed this decision on the ground inter alia that the words spoken in Parliament should only be judged therein. Finally, the Bill of Rights, 1688, laid down that the freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place outside Parliament. A member may thus say whatever he thinks proper within the House and no action can be brought against him in any court for this.

In India, the freedom of speech in Parliament has been expressly safeguarded by Arts. 105(1) and (2). Art. 105(1) says: "Subject to the provisions of this Constitution and to the rules and standing orders regulating the procedure of Parliament, there shall be freedom of speech in Parliament". The corresponding constitutional provision for the State Legislatures is Art. 194(1).[52]

Article 105(1) secures freedom of speech in Parliament to its members. This freedom is "subject to the provisions of this Constitution". These words have been construed to mean subject to the provisions of the Constitution which regulate the procedure of Parliament.[53], i.e. Arts. 118 and 121.

Article 105(2) confers immunity in relation to proceedings in courts. It says that no member of Parliament is liable to any 'proceedings' in any court "in respect of" anything said, or any vote given in Parliament, or a committee thereof. The word 'proceedings' means any proceeding civil, criminal or even writ proceedings.[54] Nothing said within a House is actionable or justiciable.

This freedom is, however, subject to the provisions of the Constitution. A constitutional restriction imposed by Art. 121 on this freedom is that no discussion can take place in any House with respect to the conduct of a Supreme Court or a High Court Judge in the discharge of his duties except when a motion for his removal is under consideration. This provision is very essential to protect the integrity of the judiciary so that it can function without being subjected to political pressures and criticism which it cannot meet or answer publicly. However, the question whether a member has contravened Art. 121 while speaking in the House is one for determination by the presiding officer of the House and not for the court.[55]

Further, the rules of procedure of a House somewhat curtail the members' freedom of speech so that the freedom may not degenerate into an unrestrained licence of speech. There, however, prevails an absolute immunity from any court action against a member for anything said within the House. If a member exceeds the limits imposed on this freedom by the Constitution or the rules of procedure of the House, he can be dealt with by the Speaker, or the House itself, but not by a court. A person aggrieved by a speech of a member in the House has no remedy

---

51. 3 State Trials, 294.
52. See, Ch. VI, infra.
53. See, M.S.M. Sharma v. Sinha (1) AIR 1959 SC 395, 408-9 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 806; Keshav Singh's case, AIR 1965 SC 745, 76.
54. A.K. Subbiah v. Karn. Leg. Council, infra, footnote 57, infra.
55. Ibid.
The corresponding provision for the State Legislatures is Art. 194(2).

in the courts.[56] A statement made in the House derogatory to the High Court does not amount to its contempt even though in making the statement the provision of the Constitution is infringed.[57]

The Rajya Sabha has decided that a Parliament member cannot be questioned in any court or any place outside Parliament for any disclosure he makes in Parliament. The reason is that if such questioning is permitted, it would amount to interference with his freedom of speech in Parliament.[58] The Lok Sabha Committee on Privileges has held on August 12, 1970 that it amounts to contempt of the House and a breach of its privilege if a person were to file a suit for damages in a court against a member of Parliament for what he says on the floor of the House.

The principle underlying Arts. 105(1) and 105(2), can be illustrated by reference to Tej Kiran.[59] The plaintiffs were disciples of Jagadguru Shankaracharya. In March, 1969, at the World Hindu Religious Conference held at Patna, Shankaracharya made certain remarks concerning untouchability. On April 2, 1969, a discussion took place in Lok Sabha in which certain derogatory words were spoken against Shankaracharya. His disciples filed a suit for damages against six members of the House. The High Court rejected the plaint and the plaintiffs came before the Supreme Court by way of appeal.

The Supreme Court dismissed the appeal. Referring to Art. 105(1), the Court emphasized that whatever is said in Parliament, i.e. during the sitting of Parliament and in the course of the business of Parliament, is immunized. "Once it was proved that Parliament was sitting and its business was being transacted, anything said during the course of that business was immune from proceedings in any court".[60] It is of the essence of parliamentary democracy that people's representatives should be free to express themselves without fear of legal consequences. The members are only subject to the discipline of the Speaker and the House in the matter. The courts have no say in the matter and should really have none.

Two very significant questions concerning parliamentary privileges have been decided by the Supreme Court in P.V. Narsimha Rao v. State.[61] These questions arose in the following factual context. The Narsimha Rao Government at the Centre did not enjoy majority in Lok Sabha in 1993. A vote of no-confidence was moved against the Government by the opposition parties. To avert defeat on the floor of the House, certain members of the ruling party gave large sums of money to a few members of the Jharkhand Mukti Morcha (JMM) to vote against the motion on the floor of the House. Consequently, the no-confidence motion was defeated in the House with 251 for and 265 against. Two questions arose for the consideration of the Supreme Court in the instant case:

(a) whether by virtue of Arts. 105(1) and 105(2), a member of Parliament can claim immunity from prosecution before a criminal court on a charge of bribery in relation to the proceedings in Parliament?

---

56. Jagdish Gandhi v. Leg. Council, Lucknow, AIR 1966 All. 291.
57. Surendra v. Nabakrishna, AIR 1958 Ori. 168; A.K. Subbiah v. Karnataka Leg. Council, AIR 1979 Kant. 24.
58. XII Report of the Committee of Privileges, Rajya Sabha, Dec. 6, 68; R.S. Debates, Dec. 20, 68.
59. Tej Kiran Jain v. Sanjiva Reddy, AIR 1970 SC 1573 : (1970) 2 SCC 272; AIR 1971 Del 86.
60. AIR 1970 SC at 1574. Also see, Church of Scientology v. Johnson-Smith, [1972] 1 Q.B. 522.
61. AIR 1998 SC 2120 : (1998) 4 SCC 626.

(b) whether a member of Parliament is a 'public servant' under the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1988?

The five Judge Bench deciding the case split 3 : 2

On the first point, the majority view is that ordinary law does not apply to acceptance of bribery by a member of Parliament in relation to proceedings in Parliament. The Court gave a very broad interpretation to Art. 105(2). On behalf of the majority, BHARUCHA, J., has stated :

> "Broadly interpreted, as we think it should be, Art. 105(2) protects a Member of Parliament against proceedings in Court that relate to, or concern, or have a connection or nexus with anything said, or a vote given, by him in Parliament"[62]

The majority has ruled that while the bribe-givers (who are also members of Parliament) can claim no immunity under Art. 105(2), the bribe-takers stand on a different footing. The alleged bribe-takers are said to have received monies "as a motive or reward" for defeating the no-confidence motion and, thus, the nexus between the bribe and the non-confidence motion is explicit. The majority Judges have insisted that to enable members to participate fearlessly in Parliamentary debates, members need the wider protection of immunity against all civil and criminal proceedings that "bear a nexus to their speech or vote".

The reason for such a broad view is that otherwise a member who makes a speech or cast a vote that is not to the liking of the powers that be may be troubled by a prosecution alleging that he has been paid a bribe for the purpose. But a member who is alleged to have accepted bribe but has not voted cannot enjoy immunity under Art. 105(2). Also, the members of the House who have given the bribe do not enjoy any immunity from prosecution. On this view, the majority held that the four JMM members who had taken the money and voted against the motion were not guilty of corruption. But one member (Ajit Singh) who had taken the money but did not vote was held liable to be prosecuted.

But the minority Judges expressed the view, (per S.C. AGRAWAL, J.) narrowly interpreting Art. 105(2), that the immunity under the Article which can be claimed is "the liability that has arisen as a consequence of the speech that has been made or the vote that has been given in Parliament'.[63]

The minority Judges have argued that the criminal liability incurred by a Member of Parliament who has accepted bribe for speaking or giving his vote in Parliament in a particular manner arises independently of the making of the speech or giving of vote by the member and such liability cannot be regarded as a liability "in respect of anything said or any vote given in Parliament".[64]

---

62. Ibid, at 2182.
63. Ibid, at 2147.
64. In 1972, in the U.S.A., the Supreme Court has decided in U.S. v. Brewster, (1972) 33 L.Ed, 2d. 507, by majority (6:3) that the charter of absolute freedom given to the members of the Congress cannot be regarded as a charter for corruption. It amounts to preventing the basic concept behind the charter of freedom. Members cannot sell themselves. On the other hand, the minority took the view that if such freedom was not guaranteed to the members of the legislatures, then they may feel constrained in the matter of speaking or voting on the floor of the House. The threat of prosecution may have a chilling effect on the right of free speech in the House. The Brewster case was widely referred to by the Judges in the Narsimha opinion. The majority in Narsimha followed the minority opinion in Brewster whereas the minority in Narsimha went by the majority view in Brewster.

In the view of the author, the minority view is preferable to the majority view which may open the gate for corruption among members of Parliament (or of the State Legislatures). When a member casts a vote after accepting money it is a travesty of a free vote. Nothing which promotes corruption in any sphere of life ought to be given constitutional protection.

It is true that the House can hold a member accepting bribe for voting in a particular manner guilty of its contempt, but the House has very limited penal power (see below). Another difficulty is that with the present politicisation in the country, any action against a guilty member will become politicised, dividing the House on political lines.

The members of Parliament who represent the people must set a very high standard of rectitude than ordinary people. A much more serious aspect of the matter is that since the life of the government depends on the majority support in the House, any government may be destablised by interested persons by bribing the MPs.

On the second question mentioned above, all the Judges are agreed that a member of Parliament or a State Legislature is a 'public servant' under S. 2(c) of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1988, because he holds an office and he is required and authorised to carry out a public duty, viz., effectively and fearlessly representing his constituency.

Under S. 19(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act, a public servant cannot be prosecuted for certain offences without the sanction of the competent authority, i.e., the authority competent to remove him from office. In case of a member of Parliament/State Legislature, there exists no such authority capable of removing him.[65] Therefore, the majority view is that a member can be prosecuted for such offences without such sanction, but after obtaining the permission of the Chairman/Speaker of the concerned House, as the case may be.

This part of the ruling is not palatable. Speaker is a political creature and it is difficult to visualise that he would use this power in an objective, impartial and a non-partisan manner.

The minority view is that a member cannot be prosecuted for such offences for which sanction of the competent authority is needed. In any case, all judges have urged Parliament to make suitable provision for the purpose and remove the lacuna in the law.

In a recent decision the Supreme Court held that a special Judge exercising jurisdiction under the provisions of the West Bengal Criminal Law Amendment (Special Courts) Act, 1949, cannot take cognizance of an offence against a member of the State Legislative Assembly when he had ceased to be an MLA, though the offence was alleged to have been committed when he was a sitting MLA.[66]

WORDS SPOKEN OUTSIDE A HOUSE

A member is protected for what he says within the House, but not for words spoken outside the House except when these are spoken in the essential performance of his duty as a member, e.g., a conversation on parliamentary business in a Minister's private house.

65. See, supra, note 53; Election Commission v. Subramaniam Swamy, AIR 1996 SC 1810.
66. State of W.B. v. Shyamadas Banerjee, (2008) 9 SCC 45, at page 47.

This view arises out of an extended meaning given to the term "proceedings in Parliament" used in the Bill of Rights.[67] Though the relevant Article in the Constitution confers the freedom of speech in Parliament, or a committee thereof, yet it may be possible to claim the freedom on an extended basis on the analogy of the House of Commons. But letters written by M.P.s to Ministers are not privileged.[68]

A member who publishes outside Parliament a slanderous speech made by him within Parliament is not protected from a court action.[69]

(b) PUBLICATIONS UNDER PARLIAMENTARY AUTHORITY

In Britain, in Stockdale v. Hansard,[70] a book containing defamatory matter against the plaintiff published under the authority of the House of the Commons, was held to enjoy no privilege and damages were awarded to the plaintiff against the publisher. As a consequence thereof, the Parliamentary Papers Act, 1840, was passed which made the publication of any reports, papers, votes, or proceedings of a House of Parliament, ordered by the House, completely privileged whether the publication was only for the use of the members of Parliament, or for a wider circulation.

On the same basis, in India, under Art. 105(2), no person is to be liable to any proceedings in any court in respect of the publication of any report, paper, votes or proceedings by or under the authority of a House of Parliament. Thus, all persons connected with the publication of proceedings of a House are protected if the same is made under the authority of the House itself. This Article does not protect publications made without the authority of the House.

To explain the true scope of Arts. 105(1) and 105(2), reference may be made to the Supreme Court case Dr. Jatish Chandra Ghosh v. Hari Sadhan Mukerjee.[71] A member of the State Legislature gave notice of his intention to ask certain questions in the Assembly. The Speaker disallowed the questions. Nevertheless, the member published the disallowed questions in a local journal. A government servant filed a complaint (under Ss. 500 and 501, I.P.C.) against the member as well as the editor, printer and publisher of the journal that the member concerned had published false and scandalous imputations against him with a view to harming his reputation. The matter ultimately came before the Supreme Court.

The Court ruled that the said publication did not fall within the scope of Art. 194(2) [equivalent to Art. 105(2)][72] as it was neither under the authority of the House nor "anything said or vote given by a member of the Assembly." Immunity of a member of a House for speeches made by him in the House does not extend to publication thereof by him outside the House. A member has an abso-

---

67. DE SMITH, PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS, 21 Mod. L.R., 477-82 (1958).
68. The Strauss case, 2. Privileges Dig., 107-41 (1958).
69. Jatish Chandra v. Hari Sadhan Mukherjee, AIR 1961 SC 613 : (1961) 3 SCR 486.
70. (1839) L.J. (N.S.) Q.B. 294.
71. Supra, footnote 60.
72. Art. 194 defines the privileges of the State Legislatures, see, infra, Ch. VI. Arts 105 and 194 are similar in phraseology.

lute privilege in respect of what he says within the House but has only a qualified privilege in his favour even in respect of what he says himself in the House if he causes the same to be published in the public press. The Court left open the question whether disallowed questions can be said to form part of the proceedings of a House of Legislature.

A wider privilege is however available in Britain. In the course of a debate in the House of Lords, allegations disparaging to the character of the plaintiff were spoken. A faithful report of the debate was published in the Times. The plaintiff sued the Times for libel. In Wason v. Walter,[73] the court dismissed the action saying that the advantage to the community from publication of the proceedings of a House "is so great, that the occasional inconvenience to individuals arising from it must yield to the general good". Therefore, a fair and faithful report of the proceedings of a House is not actionable in Britain. Publication of a garbled or partial report, or of detached parts of proceedings, with intent to injure an individual, is not entitled to protection.

Article 105(2) does not confer such a protection. A newspaper not being a publication authorised by the Legislature was not protected if it published a faithful report of a debate in a House which contained matter disparaging to the character of an individual, or amounting to the contempt of court.[74]

Reference may be made in this connection to Suresh Chandra Banerji v. Punit Goala.[75] A member made a speech in the W.B. Legislative Assembly. A newspaper published a report of the proceedings of the House including the speech. The complainant filed a complaint before the chief presidency magistrate against the newspaper alleging that the said speech contained matter highly defamatory to him and the newspaper by publishing the speech had defamed him. The Calcutta High Court ruled that the member who had made the speech in the House could not be prosecuted for uttering the words complained of . But as the reports of the said speech in the newspaper were not published by or under the authority of the State Assembly, Art. 194(3) [Art. 105(3) in case of Parliament] had no application whatsoever. The High Court refused to apply Wason v. Walter principle to India. The Court stated : "We have to apply the criminal law of the land and unless reports of the proceedings in a Legislative Assembly are given a privilege by Indian Law then we cannot possibly extend the principle of Wason v. Walter... to proceedings in this country". The offence of defamation is dealt with under Ss. 499 and 500 of the Indian Penal Code.

This state of law came to be regarded as unsatisfactory as it was felt that many advantages would accrue to the community if the newspapers were enabled to publish reports of proceedings of Parliament in good faith. Accordingly, Art. 361-A now enacts that no person shall be liable to any proceedings, civil or criminal, in any court in respect of the publication in a newspaper of a substantially true report of any proceedings of either House of Parliament or the Legislative Assembly, unless the publication is proved to have been made with malice.[76]

---

73. LR 4 QB 73 (1868).
74. Jatish Chandra v. Hari Sadhan, AIR 1956 Cal. 436; Surendra v. Nabakrishna, AIR 1958 Ori 168.
75. AIR 1951 Cal 176.
76. C.K. Daphtary v. O.P. Gupta, AIR 1971 SC 1132.

This immunity does not apply to the publication of any report of the proceedings of a secret sitting of any House of Parliament or of the State Legislature.

A similar immunity is extended to broadcast on the air. The protection is available only to the newspapers and air broadcasts and not to any other type of publication like a pamphlet or booklet.[77] It may be noted that the immunity extends only to a 'report' of the proceedings of the House and not to an 'article' or 'comment' on the proceedings.

(c) RULE-MAKING POWER

Each House of Parliament in India is authorised, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, to make rules for regulating its own procedure and conduct of business. A rule made by a House is not valid if it infringes any provision of the Constitution [Art. 118(1)].

The procedure of a House is thus regulated by—(1) the provisions of the Constitution; (2) rules of procedure and conduct of business made by the House; (3) directions issued by the Speaker/Chairman from time to time under those rules, and (4) conventions, traditions or past practices of the House.

(d) INTERNAL AUTONOMY

It is very necessary for the proper working of Parliament that each House is able to discharge its functions without any outside interference. In Britain, the courts do not interfere with what takes place inside the House.[78] The House has an exclusive right to regulate its own internal proceedings and to adjudicate upon matters arising there. It enjoys complete autonomy within its own precincts. "What is said or done within the walls of Parliament cannot be enquired into in a court of law."[79] But, it was also stated by STEPHEN, J. : "I know of no authority for the proposition that an ordinary crime committed in the House of Commons would be withdrawn from the ordinary course of criminal justice".

On the other hand, this immunity has been taken to such an extent that in R. v. Graham Campell,[80] the court refused to convict members of the Kitchen Committee for breach of the licensing law for selling liquor without a licence in the precincts of the House of Commons saying that a tribunal would feel "an invincible reluctance to interfere" in a matter within the area of the internal affairs of the House.

On the same basis, under Art. 122(1), internal autonomy has been conferred on the House of Parliament in India as well. The validity of any proceedings in Parliament cannot be called in question on the ground of any alleged irregularity of procedure. A House has absolute jurisdiction over its own internal proceedings. Further, under Art. 122(2), no officer of Parliament who is empowered by or under the Constitution—

(i) to regulate the procedure or conduct of business, or

---

77. An Act was first enacted in 1956, but was repealed in 1976 to curb the freedom of the press in the wake of the emergency declared in 1975. The Act was re-enacted in 1977 after the emergency came to an end in March, 1977. Now it is a constitutional provision. For Emergency Provisions, see, infra, Part IV, Ch. XIII.

78. WADE AND PHILLIPS, op. cit., 204, 206.

79. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Bradlaugh v. Gossett, 12 QBD 271 (1884).

80. (1935) 1 KB 594.

(ii) to maintain order in Parliament, is subject to the jurisdiction of any court in respect of the exercise by him of those powers. Thus, each House of Parliament has freedom from judicial control in its working.

The validity of proceedings within a House cannot be called in question in a court even if the House deviates, or does not strictly follow, or suspends its own rules of procedure. Each House reserves to itself the power to suspend any rule of procedure in its application to a particular business before it.[81]

The courts do not interfere with the functioning of the Speaker inside the House in the matter of regulating the conduct of business therein by virtue of powers vested in him.[82] For example, the Speaker cannot be sued for damages for wrongful arrest by a person who is arrested on his warrant to answer a charge of contempt of the House, but is later released by the court, as the Speaker acts in this matter in performance of his duties connected with internal affairs of the House.[83]

A High Court would not issue prohibition to restrain the Committee of Privileges to consider a privilege matter.[84] A High Court would not issue a writ under Art. 226 to a House of Parliament or the Speaker or any of its officers, to restrain the House from enacting any legislation even if it may be ultra vires Parliament. The courts would not interfere with the legislative process in a House either in the formative stages of law-making, or with the presentation of the bill as passed by the Houses of Parliament to the President for his assent.[85]

A member of a House cannot be restrained from presenting any bill, or moving a resolution in the House.[86] It is only when a bill becomes a law that the courts would adjudicate upon its constitutional validity. The immunity available to a House from judicial process also applies to a committee of the House, for a committee is only an agency or instrument through which the House functions.[87]

While the courts do not interfere with the working of a House on the ground of irregularity of procedure, they may scrutinize the proceedings of the House on the ground of illegality or unconstitutionality.[88]

In In re under Art. 143 of the Constitution of India[89] commenting on Art. 212(1) applicable to the State Legislatures [which is equivalent to the present Article 122(1)],[90] the Apex Court has stated:

---

81. M.S.M. Sharma v. Sinha, AIR 1960 SC 1186 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 806; Jai Singh v. State of Haryana, AIR 1970 P&H 379; K.A. Mathialagan v. P. Srinivasan, AIR 1973 Mad. 371; S.V. Sirsat v. Legislative Assembly of State of Goa, AIR 1996 Bom. 10.

82. Surendra v. Nabakrishna, AIR 1958 Ori. 168.

83. Homi D. Mistry v. Nafisul Hassan, ILR 1957 Bom. 218.

84. C. Subramaniam v. Speaker, Madras Legislative Ass., AIR 1969 Mad. 10.

85. Bihar v. Kameshwar, AIR 1952 SC 252; K.P. K. Thirumulpad v. State of Kerala, AIR 1961 Ker. 324; Ramachandra Rao v. A.P. Regional Comm., AIR 1965 AP 306; L.N. Phukan v. Mohendra Mohan, AIR 1965 Ass. 74; Jagdish Gandhi v. Leg. Council, AIR 1966 All. 291.

86. Hem Chandra v. Speaker, Legislative Ass., AIR 1956 Cal. 378.

87. Ramchandra Rao v. A.P. Regional Committee, supra, footnote 85.

88. A.J. Faridi v. Chairman, U.P. Legislative Council, AIR 1963 All. 75; Syed Abdul v . State of W.B. Leg. Ass., AIR 1966 Cal. 363; Ram Lal Chauhan v. T.S. Nagi, ILR 1979 H.P. 371; Om Parkash Chautala v. State of Haryana, AIR 1998 P&H 80; S. Ramachandran, M.L.A. v. Speaker, T.N. Legislative Assembly, AIR 1994 Mad. 332.

89. Keshav Singh's case, AIR 1965 SC 745; see, infra, p. 147 et seq.

90. Infra, Ch. VI.

> "Art. 212(1) seems to make it possible for a citizen to call in question in the appropriate court of law, the validity of any proceedings inside the legislative chamber, if his case is that the said proceedings suffer not from mere irregularity of procedure, but from an illegality. If the impugned procedure is illegal and unconstitutional, it would be open to be scrutinised in a court of law, though such scruntiny is prohibited if the complaint against the procedure is not more than this that the procedure was irregular".

It is the duty of the courts to keep the Executive and the Legislative within the confines of the powers conferred on them by the Constitution.

In State of Punjab v. Sat Pal Dang,[91] a ruling given by the Speaker adjourning the House, when he was powerless to do so because of an Ordinance, was declared to be "null and void" and of "no effect" as the Speaker had acted contrary to law and constitutional injunction. The Supreme Court held as unfounded the claim that whatever the Speaker's ruling may be, it must be treated as final. Points of order can be raised in the House only in relation to interpretation and enforcement of procedural matters. Speaker's ruling on the validity of the Ordinance could not be regarded as final and binding. A Speaker cannot act contrary to law and constitutional injunctions.

The validity of the proceedings of a House of Parliament cannot be challenged on the ground that a number of members were in preventive detention. This question relates to the validity of the proceedings of the House and pertains to the internal domain of the House and is thus non-justiciable.[92]

Many provisions in the Constitution lay down procedure to be followed by the Houses of Parliament in several matters. Some of these provisions may be regarded by the courts as merely directory and not mandatory, the breach of which would amount only to procedural irregularity (curable under Art. 122) which would not vitiate the action taken by the House. Thus, the provision that the certificate that a bill is a Money Bill is to be granted by the Speaker, is only directory and if the certificate is granted by the Deputy Speaker who presides over the House, and the Upper House acting on it proceeds with the bill as a Money Bill, the resultant Act is not bad constitutionally.[93] Similarly, a Money Bill passed without following the procedure laid down for passing a Money Bill [Art. 109] cannot be questioned on the ground of irregularity of procedure.[94]

(ii) OTHER PRIVILEGES

The above-mentioned specific privileges have been expressly conferred on the Houses of Parliament by the Constitution. But the Constitution does not exhaustively enumerate all the privileges of Parliament.

Originally Art. 105(3) said that other powers and privileges of a House, its members or Committees would be the same as those of the House of Commons in Britain on the date of the commencement of the Constitution. The constitutional provision was so framed deliberately because the privileges of the House

---

91. AIR 1969 SC 903.
92. Indira Nehru Gandhi v. Raj Narain, AIR 1975 SC 2299, 2343 : 1975 Supp SCC 1.
93. State of Punjab v. Dang, AIR 1969 SC 903.
94. Mangalore Ganesh Beedi Works v. State of Mysore, AIR 1963 SC 589 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 275.
For procedure to pass a Money Bill, see, supra, pp. 97-99.

of Commons could not be exhaustively catalogued.[1] On this basis, the two Houses of Parliament came to enjoy a number of privileges.

In course of time, a feeling grew in the country that it was anomalous for the Constitution of a sovereign country to contain explicit references to a foreign country. Accordingly, Art. 105(3) has now been amended by the 44th Amendment of the Constitution in 1978[2]. Art. 105(3) as it stands now has two aspects, viz.:

(1) The powers, privileges and immunities of each House of Parliament, its members and committees "shall be such as may from time to time be defined by Parliament by law."

(2) Until so defined, "shall be those of that House, and of its members and committees immediately before the coming into force of section 15 of the Constitution (Forty Fourth Amendment) Act, 1978".

This means that all the privileges available to a House on that date will continue until Parliament makes a law. The 44th Constitutional Amendment came into force on the 20th June, 1979.[3]

Although a direct reference to the House of Commons has been dropped from the second part of Art. 105(3), indirectly it may still be relevant to refer to its privileges, whenever a question arises about parliamentary privilege in India. For to find out what were the privileges of the House at the date of enforcement of the 44th Amendment, it would still be necessary to find out what were the privileges of the House of Commons on January 26, 1950. This position can change only when Parliament enacts a law defining its present privileges.

The privileges at present enjoyed by a House by virtue of Art. 105(3) are as follows.

(a) FREEDOM FROM ARREST

A member cannot be arrested on a civil proceeding within a period of 40 days before and 40 days after a session of the House. The object of this privilege is to secure the safe arrival and regular attendance of members on the scene of their parliamentary duties. The privilege extends only to civil arrest and not to arrest on a criminal charge,[4] or for contempt of court, or to preventive detention.[5] The reason to exempt preventive detention from the scope of parliamentary privilege is that privileges of Parliament are granted for the service of the country and not to endanger its security.

A detenu has no right to attend meetings of Parliament.[6] A House of Parliament, however, has a right to receive immediate information about the arrest of

---

1. See, VIII CAD 149.
2. See, infra, Ch. XLII.
3. See, infra, Ch. XLII, for further details of this Amendment.
4. Goudy v. Duncombe, 74 R.R. 706; May, op. cit., 103-6.
5. Captain Ramsay's case, The Committee of Privileges of House of Commons (1940). Also, Ansumali v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1952 Cal. 632, 636.
6. Ananda v. Chief Secretary, Government of Madras, AIR 1966 SC 657 : (1966) 2 SCR 406. Also, the Dasrath Deb case and the Deshpande case, Reports of the Committee of Privileges, Lok Sabha (1952). The Privilege Committee of the House of Commons has ruled in 1970 that a member of the House imprisoned for a criminal matter has no right to attend a meeting of the House.

any of its members, or about the offence and conviction, if any, of the member after trial. According to the Lok Sabha Rules, when a member is arrested on a criminal charge or sentenced to imprisonment by a court, or detained by an executive order, the committing judge, magistrate or executive authority should immediately intimate to the Speaker the fact of arrest, conviction or detention, its reasons, and the place of detention or imprisonment.

The fact of release of the arrested member after conviction on bail pending an appeal or otherwise, is also to be notified to the Speaker. The Speaker reads out in the House the communications received by him under these rules. Failure to intimate to the House the detention of one of its members amounts to a breach of the privilege of the House.[7]

A member of the Legislature arrested or detained has a right to correspond with the Legislature, to make representations to the Speaker and the Chairman of the Committee of Privileges, and the executive authority has no right to withhold such correspondence.[8] The House may also obtain information about the condition of the member under detention, the treatment meted out to him and other facilities afforded to him by putting questions to the government.[9]

(b) INQUIRIES

A House has power to institute inquiries and order attendance of witnesses, and in case of disobedience, to bring witnesses in custody to the bar of the House.

A person charged with contempt and breach of privilege, can be ordered to attend to answer it, and if there is a wilful disobedience of the order, the House has power to take the person into custody, and the House alone is the proper judge when these powers are to be exercised.[10]

A committee of the House also has power to send for persons, papers and records and to administer an oath or affirmation to a witness examined before it. To present any obstruction to the inquiring function of the House, the following are treated as breach of its privilege : to tamper with a witness in regard to the evidence to be given before the House or a committee; to deter or hinder any person from appearing as a witness; molestation of any witness on account of his evidence, etc.

(c) DISCIPLINARY POWERS OVER MEMBERS

A House of Parliament has power to enforce discipline, to punish its members for their offending conduct in the House, or to expel a member who conducts himself in a manner unfit for membership or for unbecoming behaviour whether inside or outside the House.[11]

Expulsion vacates the seat of the member but does not disqualify him from being re-elected. The House may reprimand or suspend a member from the House and use such force as may be absolutely necessary for the purpose.

---

7. In re Anandan, AIR 1952 Mad 117.
8. 12 Privilege Dig., 101 (1967).
9. Deshpande and Dasrath Deb cases (1952), supra, footnote 6.
10. Howard v. Gossett. 10 Q.B. 359 (1846).
For the position in the U.S.A. on this point see, CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS UPON INVESTIGATING POWER OF THE U.S. CONGRESS, JI. of Parl. Inf., 33 (1958) .
11. WADE AND PHILLIPS, op. cit., 205; MAY, op. cit., 139 (20th Ed.).

The jurisdiction of the House over its members, and its right to impose discipline within its walls, is absolute and exclusive.

The Courts do not interfere with a resolution of the House directing expulsion or suspension of a member.[12] Mudgal, a member of Lok Sabha, used to receive monetary benefits in exchange for services rendered as a member of the House such as putting questions in the House, moving amendments to bills and arranging interviews with the Ministers, etc. This conduct was regarded as derogatory to the dignity of the House and inconsistent with the standards which Parliament was entitled to expect from its members. Accordingly, Prime Minister Nehru moved a resolution in the House to expel Mudgal. While the resolution was being discussed, Mudgal resigned from the House. The House thereafter adopted an amended resolution declaring that Mudgal had deserved expulsion.[13]

Rajya Sabha expelled Subramanian Swamy on the 15th November, 1976, for conduct "derogatory to the dignity of the House and its members, and inconsistent with the standards which the House expects from its members…."

Suspension of members from the House is a matter of daily occurrence. Members are often suspended by a House for persistently flouting the authority of the Speaker, or for casting reflections on the impartiality of the Chair, or for defiance of the Chair. The Speaker/Chairman has power to suspend a member from the House for a day for grossly disorderly conduct. If a member disregards the authority of the Chair, or abuses the rules of the House by persistently and wilfully obstructing its business, the Speaker/Chairman may name the defaulting member, and then by a motion of the House the member is suspended for a specified number of days which may not exceed the rest of the session.[14] The House has power to terminate suspension when it so desires.[15]

Giving of wrong information deliberately to the House is regarded as a breach of discipline by the member concerned. There have been occasions when the Speaker has reprimanded the members for indulging in undignified conduct, like a walk-out from the House on the occasion of the ceremonial opening of Parliament by the President.[16]

---

12. Bradlaugh v. Gossett, supra, footnote 79; Jai Singh v. State of Haryana, AIR 1970 P.H. 379; Yogenara Nath v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1967 Raj, 123; Yeshwant Rao v. State of Madhya Pradesh Leg. Ass., AIR 1967 MP 95; K. Anbazhagan v. Secretary, T.N. Legislative Assembly, infra; Om Parkash Chautala v. State of Haryana, AIR 1998 P&H 80.

But see, Hardwari Lal v. Election Comm., I.L.R. 1977 (2) P. & H. 269, where the Punjab and Haryana High Court ruled that a State Legislature has no power to expel its members from the House. This judicial view is untenable.

13. MORRIS-JONES, op. cit., 251; 12 Privileges Dig., 54.

Also see, ENID COMPBELL, Expulsion of Members of Parliament, 21 UTLJ 15 (1971).

14. Lok Sabha suspended Maniram Bagri for seven days in its session in March 1983.

15. Walk-outs, raising of slogan on the floor of Lok Sabha, and disruption of its proceedings have become matters of daily occurrence. This has lowered the dignity of the House in the public eyes. To preserve its dignity and maintain decorum in the House, a code of conduct for the Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha members has been evolved. The code contains the do's and do'nts for the members. A violation of the code by a member will subject him to such punishment as admonition, reprimand, censure, directing him to withdraw from the house, or his suspension.

The Times of India, dt. Nov. 26, 2001, p-1, The Hindustan Times, dt., Nov. 28, 2001, p. 1.

16. L.S. DEB., February 18, 1963; L.S. DEB., February 28, 1968; 9 Jl. of Parl. Inf., 20-25 (1963).

Indira Gandhi was held guilty of breach of privilege of Lok Sabha on the charge that while she was the Prime Minister she caused "obstruction, intimidation, harassment" to, and caused false cases instituted against, some officials who were collecting facts about Sanjay Gandhi's Maruti Ltd. to enable the Minister to reply to a question tabled in the House. She was expelled from the House as well as sentenced to imprisonment which ended with the prorogation of the House a week later. She again became the Prime Minister in 1980. On May 7, 1981, the Lok Sabha rescinded its earlier resolution characterising it as politically motivated.

The propriety of this resolution is not beyond a shadow of doubt. In adjudicating on privilege matters, the House acts in a judicial capacity and sanctity and finality should attach to a judicial decision. This concept has been undermined by this resolution. Lok Sabha has undermined its own dignity and prestige by showing that the House treats its own decisions on privilege matters as of a political nature.

In Raja Ram Pal,[17] the Supreme Court had to again deal with the question of powers, privileges and immunities of the Legislatures and in particular the power to expel a Member of Parliament (MP). The case related to a telecast by a TV channel of a programme on 12th December, 2005 based on sting operations conducted by it depicting 10 MPs of the Lok Sabha and one of the Rajya Sabha accepting money, directly or through middlemen, as consideration for raising certain questions in the House or for otherwise espousing certain causes for those offering the lucre. The Presiding Officers of both the Houses made enquiries through separate committees. The report of the inquiry concluded that the evidence against the 10 MPs was incriminating. The report was laid on the table of the House, a motion was adopted by Lok Sabha resolving to expel the 10 MPs and notification was issued by the Lok Sabha notifying the expulsion of the 10 MPs. Similar process was also followed in the Rajya Sabha. It was contended on behalf of the MPs that the expulsion was malafide and the result of a predetermination of the issue and for this purpose relied on the declaration made by the Speaker on the floor of the House that 'nobody would be spared". The MPs also argued that the circumstances do not warrant the exercise of the power of expulsion.

In the above context the Supreme Court framed three questions which arose for decision in the case:—

1. Does the Supreme Court, within the constitutional scheme, have the jurisdiction to decide the content and scope of powers, privileges and immunities of the legislatures and its Members ?
2. If the first question is answered in the affirmative, can it be found that the powers and privileges of the legislatures in India, in particular with reference to Article 105, include the power of expulsion of its Members ?
3. In the event of such power of expulsion being found, does the Supreme Court have the jurisdiction to interfere with the exercise of the said power or privilege conferred on Parliament and its Members or committees and, if so, is this jurisdiction circumscribed by certain limits ? In other words if the power of expulsion exists, is it subject to judicial review and if so, the scope of such judicial review ?

17. Raja Ram Pal v. Hon'ble Speaker, Lok Sabha , (2007) 3 SCC 184 : (2007) 2 JT 1.

In answering these questions the Constitution Bench went into the history of the parliamentary privileges in England as well as the application of the principles decided by the Supreme Court in U. P. Assembly case.[18] The Court explained the difference between disqualification and expulsion by saying that while disqualification strikes at the very root of the candidate's qualification and renders him or her unable to occupy a Member's seat, expulsion deals with a person who is otherwise qualified, but in the opinion of the House is unworthy of membership. The Court rejected the submission that the provisions of Article 101 or 102 restrict in any way the scope of Article 105(3). After a close analysis of the Articles 102, 103, 104 and 105, and several English authorities and texts, the majority after perusal of the enquiry report found that there was no violation of any of the fundamental rights in general and Articles 14, 20 or 21 in particular. The majority was of the view that proper opportunity to explain and defend had been given to the MPs. These observations and findings imply that the Court has affirmed the justiciability issue and consequently its power of judicial review]

(d) FREEDOM FROM JURY SERVICE

Members of Parliament are exempted from jury service. Members may decline to give evidence and appear as a witness in a court of law when Parliament is in session. These privileges are founded on the paramount right of the House to the attendance and service of its members.

(e) PRIVACY OF DEBATES

A House of Parliament has a right to exclude strangers from its proceedings and hold its sittings in camera. This power may be used by the House to go into secret session for reasons of national security. The Speaker/Chairman may, whenever he thinks fit, order the withdrawal of strangers from any part of the House.

(f) PUBLICATION OF PROCEEDINGS

There was a time when the House of Commons used to prohibit publication of its proceedings by passing resolutions. Even as late as 1762, the House of Commons characterised in a resolution the publication of its proceedings as "a high indignity to and a notorious breach of the privilege of this House."

The reasons for this attitude was that there was no adequate protection against arbitrary kings, and members of the House could come to grief for doing plain speaking in the House. In such a situation, secrecy of parliamentary debate was considered necessary not only for the due discharge of the responsibilities of the members but also for their personal safety. This object could be achieved by prohibiting publication of any report of the debates and proceedings of the House and also by excluding strangers from the House and holding debates behind closed doors.

In course of time, the House gave up this practice, and even encouraged publication of its proceedings as it became conscious of the advantages to be derived from a full and clear account of its debates. In 1836, the House of Commons provided for the publication of parliamentary papers and reports, which led to the famous case of Stockdale v. Hansard. But, as the old resolutions were not rescinded, it was still technically a breach of privilege to publish a report of any proceeding of the House or any of its committees.

18. AIR 1965 SC 745.

The House did not, however, entertain any complaint in respect of publication of any of its proceedings except when such proceedings were conducted within closed doors, or when such publication was expressly prohibited by the House or by any committee, or in case of wilful misrepresentation, or any other offence in relation to such publication. Breach of privilege of the House was occasionally raised in case of misreporting or publication of inaccurate or garbled versions of speeches in the press.

On July 16, 1971, the House of Commons passed a resolution waving its privilege as regards the publication of its proceedings. Such publication is no longer to be regarded as a breach of privilege of the House except when the proceedings have been conducted within closed doors or in private, or when such publication has been expressly prohibited by the House.

In India, however, the position in this respect remains as it was in Britain before 1971. The Houses of Parliament in India still enjoy the same power as the House of Commons did before 1971 in this respect.

In the Searchlight case,[19] the Supreme Court has ruled that publication of inaccurate or garbled version of speeches delivered in the House, or misreporting the proceedings of the House amounts to a breach of privilege of the House.

The Court has also held that publication by a newspaper of a portion of a member's speech in the House which the Speaker had ordered to be expunged would amount to breach of privilege of the House for which it can take action against the offending party. The effect in law of the order of the Speaker to expunge a portion of the speech of a member may be as if that portion had not been spoken. A report of the whole speech in such circumstances, though factually correct, may, in law, be regarded as perverted and unfaithful report of a speech, i.e, publishing the expunged portion in derogation of the orders of the Speaker passed in the House may, prima facie, be regarded as constituting a breach of privilege of the House.

Besides the above, the Houses in India have claimed a few more privileges with respect to the publication of their proceedings. Following constitute breach of privilege of a House.

(i) Disclosing the proceeding of a secret session of the Parliament.

(ii) Misrepresentation of a report of a parliamentary committee by a newspaper.

(iii) Misreporting or misrepresenting the speech of a member of a House of Parliament.

(iv) Misreporting or misrepresentation of the proceedings of the House.

(v) Report or the conclusions of a committee of the House ought not to be publicized, disclosed or referred to by anyone before the same are presented to the concerned House.

---

19. M.S.M. Sharma v. Sinha, AIR 1959 SC 395 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 806; also, 12 Privileges Dig., 35.

(vi) No document, or paper presented to a committee should be published before the committees report is presented to the House.

Reference may be made in this connection to Phukan.[20] There a case of breach of privilege of the House arose because the newspaper published the report of the enquiry commission when it was under the active consideration of a committee of the House.

Had the report of the enquiry commission been published before it reached the committee, no case of breach of privilege would have arisen because the enquiry commission cannot be regarded as an organ of the House as it is appointed by the government under an Act of Parliament—The Commissions of Inquiry Act, 1952.

(vii) Premature publication of proceedings of a committee of a House, or the report, or the conclusions arrived at by the committee, or the proceedings of a meeting thereof before the committee completes its task and presents its report to the House.

(viii) Premature publication of motions tabled before the House.[21]

It may be observed that the above legislative privileges do somewhat adversely affect the freedom of the press as the press is not free to publish the proceedings of a House freely; the press has to take care not to publish anything which may amount to a breach of privilege of any House. This results in substantial restriction on the freedom of the press.

(g) POWER TO PUNISH FOR CONTEMPT

A House has power to punish a person, whether its member or outsider, for its 'contempt' or 'breach of privilege'. A House can impose the punishment of admonition, reprimand, suspension from the service of the House for the session, fine and imprisonment.[22]

This power to commit for contempt is truly described as the 'keystone of parliamentary privilege' for it is used by the House to protect its privileges, punish their violation, and vindicate its authority and dignity.

The grounds on which a person can be held guilty of contempt of the House are vague, uncertain and indefinite as these have not been defined anywhere. The scope of the phrases 'contempt of the House' and 'breach of privilege' is very broad and covers a variety of situations when the House can take action. Generally speaking, a case of contempt of House arises when any act or omission obstructs or impedes it in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of the House in the discharge of his duties, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results.[23]

There is no closed list of classes of offences punishable as contempt of the House as new ways of obstructing a House or its Members in performing their

---

20. L.N. Phukan v. Mohendra Mohan, AIR 1965 A&N 75.
21. For a detailed discussion on these privileges, see, M.P. JAIN, PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES AND THE PRESS, Ch. 7.
22. Hardwari Lal v. Election Commission of India, ILR (1977) 2 P&H 269.
23. WADE AND PHILLIPS, op. cit.; 206; MAY, op. cit., 136; Report of Press Commission, 418-431 (1954); 12 Privileges Digest, 31-40, 105; Report of the Select Committee, 95-108.

functions may manifest themselves.[24] Comments in newspapers or statements made by individuals casting reflections on the proceedings of the House, or, on the character or conduct either of the members collectively, or of individual members, and thereby lowering their prestige in the eyes of the public;[25] comments on the officers of the House casting reflections on them; comments tending to bring Parliament into disrespect and disrepute; premature publication of a report of a meeting of a committee of the House before it is presented to the House;[26] any attempt by improper means, e.g., intimidation, threats or coercion, to influence members of the House;[27] misreporting or misrepresentation of the proceedings of the House or of the speech of a member in the House[28]; deliberately telling a lie or misleading the House by a member[29], are some of the instances of what have been regarded as amounting to contempt of the House.

It is for the House to decide whether any particular factual situation amounts to its contempt or not. The right of the House to punish for its contempt is analogous to the right of a superior court to punish for its contempt,[30] and in fact was justified in early days in Britain by a reference to the mediaeval concept of Parliament being the highest court in the land.

In modern times, however, the phrase 'breach of privilege' is very much in vogue, as it is more flexible and broader a concept than the phrase 'contempt of the House'. 'Breach of privilege' means not only breach of a recognised and accepted privilege of the House but also any action, which though not breach of a specific privilege, yet undermines the dignity or authority of the House[31], or tends to obstruct the House or an individual member thereof, in the discharge of the constitutional functions. The main advantage of the term 'breach of privilege' lies in the fact that it enables the House to uphold its dignity, defend itself against disrespect and affronts which could not be brought, or could be brought, only by implication under any accepted specific privilege.

Questions of breach of privilege are invoked every day in the Houses. A few cases may be mentioned here to illustrate the point. Publishing an article undermining the very foundations of parliamentary system of government[32], casting aspersions on the impartiality of the Speaker[33], attributing mala fides to him in the discharge of his duties in the House in a writ petition before a High Court[34], ridiculing a member of a House for a speech delivered by him in the House,[35] constitute breach of privilege of the House. To characterise Parliament as star

---

24. Report of the Select Comm., 97 (1967).
25. The Sinha case, Lok Sabha (1952).
26. The Sundarayya case, Lok Sabha (1952). While a committee of Parliament is holding its sittings from day to day, its proceedings should not be published nor any document or papers presented to the committee or the conclusions to which it may have arrived at referred to in the Press. Also, 12 Privileges Dig. 17.
27. 12 Privileges Dig., 6.
28. Ibid, 13, 99, 110.
29. Ibid, 33.
30. On Contempt of Court, see, Chs. IV and VIII, infra.
31. The case of John Junor, JI of Parl. Inf., 75 (1957).
32. Ibid, 185.
33. The Blitz case, ILR 1957 Bom 239; 12 Privileges Digest, 30.
34. Committee of Privileges (Third Lok Sabha), IV and VII Reports; 12 Privileges Digest, 1-5 (1967).
35. The Times of India, Aug. 20, 61, 1.

chamber amounts to a gross breach of privilege as it casts grave reflection on the institution of Parliament.[36]

In 1964, during discussion in the Maharashtra Legislative Assembly, a few members severely criticised the Bombay Municipal Corporation. The Corporation passed an adjournment motion to record its strong resentment against the speeches made in the Assembly. The Assembly held that the Corporation had committed a breach of privilege and contempt of the House since the tone and the content of the speeches made by the councillors as also the passing of the adjournment motion affected the dignity and authority of the House. The freedom of speech of the members of the Assembly being an important right, any interference with this right constitutes a breach of privilege. The House therefore decided to levy a fine of Rs. 10,000 on the Corporation if it did not rescind its offending resolution. The councillors who had participated in the discussion on the adjournment motion in the Corporation were to be admonished unless they apologised unconditionally to the House.[37]

On December, 9, 1970, the Speaker of the Lok Sabha admonished a senior government servant for "having deliberately misrepresented the facts and given false evidence before the Public Accounts Committee."

The punishments which a House may impose on non-members for its contempt or breach of privilege are admonition, reprimand, imprisonment and fine. The punishment by way of 'reprimand' or 'admonition' to the offending party is more commonly resorted to. In such a case, the Speaker of the House summons the wrongdoer to the bar of the House and admonishes or reprimands him.

The House of Commons does not enjoy the power to impose fines, though the Select Committee has suggested that it should have this power because at times a mere rebuke might appear to be an inadequate penalty whilst imprisonment might be too harsh, and also because this is the only penalty which can be imposed on corporations.[38] In India, the position is not clear though, as stated above, the Maharashtra Legislature did impose a fine on the Bombay Corporation for breach of its privilege.

Members of the House may, in addition, be suspended or expelled from the House as noted earlier.[39] Imprisonment for contempt of the House can be imposed by a House but it can only be till the close of the existing session, and the prisoner is entitled to be released automatically when the House is prorogued or dissolved. If the House passes an order detaining a person for its contempt for a fixed term, the unexpired portion of the sentence would lapse as soon as the session during which the order was made comes to an end by prorogation or dissolution.[40] The punishment of imprisonment for breach of privilege or contempt of the House is awarded very rarely and only in extreme situations when the privilege offence is regarded to be very serious.

The Select Committee of the House of Commons has accepted that the complaint of 'uncertainty' made against the power of the House to commit for its

---

36. Committee of Privileges (Fourth Lok Sabha), IV Report, 205.
37. The Case of Bombay Municipal Corporation, Report of the Privileges Committee, II Maharashtra Leg. Ass., April, 1966.
38. Report, xlviii.
39. Supra, p. 132.
40. Sushanta Kumar Chand v. Speaker, Orissa Legislative Assembly, AIR 1973 Ori. 111.

contempt is 'justified', and to mitigate this, the Committee has emphasized that Parliament should use its power as sparingly as possible and only to protect itself, its members and its officers, to the extent absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers.[41] Consequently, the Committee has suggested that in an ordinary case where a Member has a remedy in the courts he should not be permitted to invoke the penal jurisdiction of the House in lieu of that remedy. Further, the House should be reluctant to use its penal powers to stifle criticism, however strong or unjustified the criticism may appear to be, as such criticism is the life and blood of democracy. But the House would be justified in using its penal powers if the criticism is liable to become an improper obstruction to the functioning of Parliament.

Usually, the House drops the action against a person infringing its privileges if he apologies to the House and accepts his mistake. A House is not vindictive; it uses its powers only to vindicate its dignity and honour, or to protect the dignity and honour of its members, or protect them against vilification as members. If a satisfactory apology is not forthcoming from the guilty party, then the House may proceed to punish him.

Prorogation of the House does not put an end to a privilege matter pending before it. The House can again take up the matter when it meets after prorogation. The Supreme Court has argued that prorogation is not dissolution; the House remains the same; only the sessions of the House are interrupted by prorogation.[42]

It is also beyond doubt now that a matter of breach of privilege of the House could be raised, after the dissolution of the House; in the next House. The point came into sharp focus in Lok Sabha in November, 1977, when a privilege motion was raised in the Sixth Lok Sabha against Indira Gandhi for her conduct in the Fifth Lok Sabha. The Privileges Committee ruled that the motion could be raised. "The dissolution of Lok Sabha does not imply discontinuity of the institution of Parliament...the Lok Sabha possesses the power to punish a breach of privilege and contempt of the earlier Lok Sabha." The House agreeing with the recommendation of the committee decided to imprison Indira Gandhi till the prorogation of the House and also expelled her from the membership of the House.[43]

(h) COMMITTEE OF PRIVILEGES

Each House of Parliament has a Committee of Privileges to advise it in matters affecting its powers, privileges and immunities as well as those of its members and committees.[44] The Lok Sabha Committee consists of fifteen members nominated by the Speaker; the Rajya Sabha Committee has ten members nominated by the Chairman.

The necessary reference may be made to the committee either by the Speaker or the Chairman suo motu, or by the House upon a motion of a member.

The function of the Committee is to examine every question referred to it and to determine with reference to the facts of each case whether a breach of privilege is involved. If so, what is its nature and what are the circumstances leading to it? It can call for oral and documentary evidence. The committee may administer oath or affirmation to a witness examined before it.

---

41. Report of Select Committee of Parliamentary Privileges, viii, ix (Dec. 1967).
42. M.S.M. Sharma v. Shree Krishna Sinha, AIR 1960 SC 1190 : 1959 (Supp) 1 SCR 806.
43. Also see, KAUL & SHAKHDHER, PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE OF PARLIAMENT, 941-51 (1978).
44. JENA, PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES IN INDIA, 58-71.

The committee may make such recommendations as it may deem fit. It may also state in its report the procedure to be followed by the House in giving effect to the committee's recommendations.[45] The report of the committee is presented to the House concerned which takes appropriate action on it. The recommendation of the committee is not binding on the House which may accept, modify or even reject the same.

The Committee of Privileges exercises an essentially adjudicatory function. This committee has a special obligation to discharge its functions objectively with a judicial approach and in a non-political or non-partisan manner because, in a way, in deciding whether its privilege has been infringed or not, the committee is acting as a judge in its own cause. The procedure of the committee ought to conform with the canons of natural justice. Whenever some one is arraigned before the committee for breach of parliamentary privilege, it is necessary that he be given a full and fair opportunity to defend himself and explain his conduct. In this connection, the comment made by the Second Press Commission may be taken note of.[46]

> "We are of the view that the rules of business of the House of Parliament and State Legislatures in India dealing with the procedure for taking action against alleged breaches of privilege, etc. should be reviewed and necessary provisions incorporated therein to provide for a reasonable opportunity to alleged contemners to defend themselves in the proceedings for breach of privilege..."

(iii) PRIVILEGES AND FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

There has been some confusion on the question whether the Fundamental Rights[47] control in any way the privileges which the Houses enjoy under Art. 105(3). Which is to prevail in case of a conflict between such a privilege and a Fundamental Right?

This question arose for the first time in Gunupati.[48] In one of its issues, the Blitz published a news item casting derogatory aspersions on the Speaker of the U.P. Legislative Assembly. The Speaker referred the matter to the Committee of Privileges of the House for investigations and report. The committee summoned D.H. Mistry, editor of the Blitz, to appear before it to clarify the position. Mistry neither appeared before the committee nor did he send any reply. Thereafter, the Assembly adopted a resolution authorising the Speaker to issue an arrest warrant against Mistry with a view to enforcing his presence before the House to answer the charge of breach of privilege. Accordingly, the Speaker issued the warrant and, consequently, Mistry was arrested in Bombay on the charge of committing contempt of the U.P. Legislative Assembly. He was brought to Lucknow and was lodged in a hotel for a week without anything further being done in the matter. In the meantime, a petition for a writ of habeas corpus was moved in the Supreme Court on his behalf on the ground that Mistry's Fundamental Right under Art. 22(2) had been violated. Art. 22(2) envisages that a person arrested must be produced before a magistrate within 24 hours of his arrest. The Supreme Court accepted the contention that as Mistry had not been produced before a magistrate,

---

45. Rules 314 and 315 of the Rules of procedure of the Lok Sabha.
46. Second Press Comm. Report, I, 58 (1982).
47. Arts. 12 to 35 of the Constitution; See, infra, Chs. XX-XXXIII.
48. Gunupati Keshavram Reddy v. Nafisul Hasan, AIR 1954 SC 636 : 1954 Cri LJ 1704. For further discussion on this case, see, infra, Ch. VI.

his Fundamental Right under Art. 22(2) was infringed and, accordingly, the Court ordered his release.[49]

This pronouncement created the impression that the Fundamental Rights would control parliamentary privileges. However, in the Searchlight case,[50] the Supreme Court held by a majority that the privileges enjoyed by a House of Parliament under Art. 105(3) [or a House of State Legislature under Art. 194(3)], were not subject to Art. 19(1)(a) and, therefore, a House was entitled to prohibit the publication of any report of its debates or proceedings even if the prohibition contravenes the Fundamental Right of Speech and Expression of the publisher under Art. 19(1)(a).[51]

The ruling in Gunupati was held not binding as it was not 'a considered opinion' on the subject. The Court argued that Art. 105(3) [or Art. 194(3)] was not declared to be 'subject to the Constitution', and, therefore, it was as supreme as any provision of the Constitution including the Fundamental Rights. Any inconsistency between Arts. 105(3) [or Art. 194(3)] and 19(1)(a) could be resolved by 'harmonious construction' of the two provisions, and Art. 19(1)(a) being of a general nature must yield to Art. 105(3) [or Art. 194(3)] which was of a special nature.

The factual situation in Searchlight was as follows: A member of the Bihar Legislature made a speech on the floor of the House. The Speaker ordered certain portions of the speech to be expunged. The Searchlight however published the entire speech containing the expunged portion as well. The House referred the question of breach of its privilege by the newspaper to its Committee of Privileges. When the committee summoned the editor of the Searchlight to answer the charge of breach of privilege, he moved a writ petition in the Supreme Court under Art. 32 claiming that the said notice and the proposed action by the committee infringed his Fundamental Right to freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(a). But, as stated above, the Supreme Court rejected the Editor's contention.[52]

The petitioner also contended that the proceedings before the Committee of Privileges threatened his Fundamental Right under Art. 21 as well.[53] According to Art. 21, no person can be deprived of his personal liberty otherwise than in accordance with the procedure established by law. The editor's contention was that the proceedings before the Committee of Privileges violated Art. 21. The Court also rejected this contention. The Court argued that the House can make rules under Art. 118 in case of a House of Parliament, or Art. 208 in case of a House of the State Legislature.[54] Therefore, the rules made by the House regulating the procedure for enforcing its powers, privileges and immunities would fulfil the requirement of Art. 21.

After the above decision, the Committee of Privileges proceeded to consider the case of breach of privilege against the editor of the Searchlight. Again, the

---

49. For discussion on Art. 22(2), see, infra, Ch. XXVII.
For writ of habeas corpus, see, infra, Ch. VIII.
50. M.S.M. Sharma v. Sinha (I), AIR 1959 SC 395 : 1959 Supp(1) SCR 806.
51. For discussion on Art. 19(1), see, infra, Ch. XXIV.
52. For discussion on Art. 32, see, Ch. XXXIII.
53. For discussion on Art. 21, see, infra, Ch. XXVI.
54. For Rule-making power of a House, see, supra, p. 127.

editor came before the Supreme Court under Art. 32 in effect seeking a reconsideration of its earlier decision. He again repeated his argument that the State Legislature could not claim a privilege contrary to Art. 19(1)(a) which included the freedom of publication and circulation. He also claimed that the privileges conferred on the Assembly under Art. 194(3) [Art. 105(3) in case of a House of Parliament] were subject to Art. 19(1)(a). Thus, Searchlight II[55] raised substantially the same questions as had been agitated in Searchlight I. The Court however refused to reconsider its earlier decision. Thus, the Court in a way reaffirmed the propositions of law laid down by it in Searchlight I .

Though the Supreme Court in the Searchlight cases was concerned specifically with the question of applicability of Art. 19(1)(a) to the area of legislative privileges, an impression got around, because of certain observations made by the Court and the way the Court treated the earlier case of Gunupati that, perhaps, all Fundamental Rights were so inapplicable. Reconsidering the question of mutual relationship between the Fundamental Rights and legislative privileges in the Keshav Singh case[56], the Supreme Court held that the Searchlight case excluded only Art. 19(1)(a), and not other Fundamental Rights, from controlling the legislative privileges.[57] The Court held that Art. 21 would apply to parliamentary privileges and a person would be free to come to the Court for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that he had been deprived of his personal liberty not in accordance with law but for capricious or mala fide reasons. The Court argued in this connection : Art. 226 confers on the High Court the power to issue a writ of habeas corpus. A person may complain, under Art. 21, that he has been deprived of his personal liberty not in accordance with law but for malicious or mala fide reasons. The Court will then be bound to look into the matter. Therefore, an order of the House punishing a person for its contempt cannot be final and conclusive. The court can go into it.

The Supreme Court left open the question whether any other Fundamental Right would apply to legislative privileges as it was not pertinent to the issues in hand.

Later, disposing of the Keshav Singh case, the Allahabad High Court held that when the Legislature acts under the rules framed by it laying down the procedure for enforcing its power to commit for contempt, that would be compliance of Art. 21 requiring procedure to be laid down by law for deprivation of personal liberty. It was also held that Art. 22(2) has no application when a person has been adjudged guilty of contempt of the House and has been detained in pursuance of such an adjudication.[58]

---

55. M.S.M. Sharma v. S.K. Sinha, II, AIR 1960 SC 1186 : 1959 (Supp) 1 SCR 806.

56. AIR 1965 SC 745.
For further discussion on this case, see, infra.

57. The Chief Justice observed on this point:
"Therefore, we do not think it would be right to read the majority decision as laying down a general proposition that whenever there is a conflict between the provisions of the latter part of Art. 194(3) [Art. [105(3)] and any of the provisions of the fundamental rights..., the latter must always yield to the former. The majority decision, therefore, must be taken to have settled that Art. 19(1)(a) would not apply, Art. 21 would".
See, AIR 1965 SC at 765.

58. Keshav Singh v. Speaker, Leg. Assembly, AIR 1965 All. 349. Also see, infra, footnote 86.

Thus, the position appears to be that it is wrong to suppose that no Fundamental Right applies to the area of legislative privileges. Some Fundamental Rights, like Art. 19(1)(a), do not apply. Perhaps, Arts. 19(1)(b) to 19(1)(g) would also not apply. On the other hand, some Fundamental Rights, e.g., Art. 21 do apply, while the position with regard to others, e.g., Arts. 22(1) and 22(2), is not clear.

There is, however, no doubt that if Parliament were to enact a law defining its privileges,[59] as is envisaged by Art. 105(3), then such a law would not be free from the controlling effect of the Fundamental Rights. Such provisions of the law as contravene Fundamental Rights would be invalid.[60]

The Supreme Court has specifically accepted this position in Searchlight I[61], viz., that if a law were to be made by Parliament or a State Legislature under Art. 105(3) or Art. 194(3) to define its privileges then such a law would be subject to Art. 19(1)(a). Such law would be one made in exercise of its ordinary legislative powers under Art. 246. Consequently, if such a law takes away or abridges any of the Fundamental Rights, it will contravene the peremptory provisions of Art. 13(2),[62] and, thus, such a law would be void to the extent of such contravention.

(iv) PRIVILEGES AND THE COURTS

The question of Parliament-court relationship often arises in privilege matters. This involves several postulates:

(1) Who, whether the court or the legislature, decides whether a particular privilege claimed by a House exists or not?

(2) When a privilege is held to exist, is a House the final judge of how, in practice, that privilege is to be exercised?

(3) Can the courts go into the question of validity or propriety of committal by a House for its contempt or breach of privilege?

(4) Can the courts interfere with the working of the Committee of Privileges?

In Britain, there has been a good deal of controversy and animosity in the past between the House of Commons and the courts on these questions. Difficulties arose because the parliamentary privileges are largely uncodified and are based on the non-statutory common law. There was a time in the British History when the position of the House of Commons had not been stabilised as it had to fight against the Monarch as well as the House of Lords for its recognition, and the judges at times gave opinions which the House did not like. Therefore, controversies arose between the House and the courts.

In 1689, the House of Commons called two judges of the King's Bench to its bar to explain their conduct and later these judges were ordered to be imprisoned. Their fault was that, seven years earlier, they had ordered Jay to be released from the custody of the Sergeant at arms of the House.[63]

---

59. Art. 246, Entry 74, List I, infra, Ch. X; Searchlight case, supra; Keshav Singh's case, supra.

60. See, further under "Codification of Privileges".
Also see, C. Subramaniam v. Speaker, L.A., AIR 1969 Mad. 10.

61. Supra, p. 141.

62. For discussion on Art. 13, see, infra, Ch. XX.

63. Jay v. Topham, 12 St. Tr. 821.

The most notable controversy between the House of commons and the courts in a privilege matter was Stockdale v. Hansard in the early nineteenth century.[64]

The era of legislative–judiciary conflict in matter of privileges is now past in Britain. A balance between the two institutions has now been established along the following lines:

(1) The courts recognise the common law privileges;

(2) A new privilege can be created for the House only by a law passed by Parliament and not merely by a resolution of one House;

(3) Whether a particular privilege claimed by a House exists or not is a question for the courts to decide. The courts have the right to determine the nature and limits of parliamentary privileges, should it be necessary to determine the same;[65]

(4) When a privilege is recognised as being existent, the question whether it has been infringed or not in a particular set of circumstances is a question for the House to determine. The courts do not interfere with the way in which the House exercises its recognised privileges.

The position, therefore, is that while the courts deny to the House of Commons the right to determine the limits of its own privileges, they allow it exclusive jurisdiction to exercise its privileges within the established limits.

As regards committal by the House of Commons for its 'contempt' or 'breach of privilege', the present position appears to be that if the House mentions specific grounds for holding a person guilty of its contempt or breach of privilege, and the warrant ordering imprisonment is a speaking warrant, then the courts can go into the question whether in law it amounts to a breach of privilege; whether the grounds are sufficient or adequate to constitute "contempt" or "breach of privilege" of the House. But if the warrant putting the contemner under arrest mentions contempt in general terms, but does not mention the specific grounds on which the House has held that its contempt has been committed, then the courts have nothing to go into, and they cannot question the same in any way. To this extent, therefore, the powers of the House would appear to be autocratic. The point was clearly established in the case of Sheriff of Middlesex.[66] The House of Commons confined the sheriff into custody: the warrant did not mention the facts constituting the contempt of the House. The court refused to issue the writ of habeas corpus to discharge the Sheriff from imprisonment saying that "if the warrant merely states a contempt in general terms, the court is bound by it." A very striking case of assertion of parliamentary power to commit for contempt occurred in Australia in 1955. The proprietor and the editor of the 'Banstown Observer' were imprisoned for breach of privilege of the Australian House of Representatives. The High Court of Australia refused to issue the writ of habeas corpus saying that it was not entitled to look behind the warrant which was conclusive of what it stated, namely, that a breach of privilege had been committed. The Privy Council characterised the High Court decision as "unimpeachable".[67] The House of Commons has power to commit any person for its contempt and if it issues a general warrant which does not state the grounds on which it regards its

64. Supra.
65. Stockdale v. Hansard, (1839) 9 Ad. & E. 1; Supra, p. 125.
66. (1840) 11 Ad. & E. 273. Also, Bradlaugh v. Gossett, supra, footnote 12.
67. Queen v. Richards, 92 C.L.R. 157, 164, 171.

contempt having been committed, the courts would be helpless to do anything about the matter. The House of Commons thus has practically an absolute power to commit a person for its contempt, since the facts constituting the alleged contempt need not be stated by it on its warrant of committal and the courts would not go behind the same.[68]

The right of committal through a general warrant can be used by the House to punish a person for its contempt for infringing what it regards as its privilege, even though the courts may not have accepted the same as such. This, thus, means that ultimately it is the view of the House that will prevail in the matter of its privileges. It is thus quite possible that there may be two views as to a privilege of the House. The House may act upon one view while regulating its own proceedings and committing some one for contempt, while the courts may act upon another view when privileges arise in civil disputes.[69]

In the words of KEIR and LAWSON, by conceding to the House of Parliament "the right of committing for contempt without cause shown, the courts have really yielded the key of the fortress, by giving them the power of enforcing against the world at large their own views of the extent of their privileges."[70]

The reason why the courts in Britain have not interfered with the House of Commons in privilege matters is that they have treated the House as a court and its warrant as that of a superior court. But the practice has been that a return has always been made when a person imprisoned under orders of the House has moved a petition for habeas corpus. The House accepts the summons from the courts and is represented there.

When the return sets out the general warrant of commitment issued by the House, the courts do not go behind the same as orders of the superior courts are never re-examined. Also, since 1689, there has not been a case of the House taking action against a party, his counsel, or a judge for moving or entertaining a habeas corpus petition. Under the Habeas Corpus Acts, the courts are bound to entertain petitions for habeas corpus, but the courts respect the general warrant of the House and treat it as conclusive answer to the rule nisi.[71]

So far as India is concerned, a House of Parliament may claim a privilege if—(i) the Constitution grants it specifically; or, (ii) it has been created by a law of Parliament; or (iii) it was enjoyed by the House under Art. 105(3). This naturally brings the courts into the area of parliamentary privileges. When a question arises whether a particular privilege exists or not, it is for the courts to give a definitive answer by finding out whether it falls under any of the sources mentioned above.

Parliament has not passed any law defining its privileges, and the Constitution specifically grants only a few privileges. Therefore, in the main the question which arises is whether the privilege claimed by the House is one which was enjoyed by the House of Commons on January 26, 1950. This envisages that any privilege claimed by the House of Commons in the remote past but which has later fallen into disuse, cannot be claimed by any House in India, nor can it claim

---

68. MAY, op. cit, 200; Select Comm. Report, 95 (1967).
69. WADE and PHILIPS, op cit, 209.
70. KEIR and LAWSON, CASES IN CONST. LAW, 255 (1979).
71. HIDAYATULLAH, op. cit., 27, 32.

any new privilege which may be conferred on the House of Commons after January 26, 1950.

In a number of cases the courts have decided the question whether a particular privilege claimed by a House exists or not on the basis whether the House of Commons had enjoyed the same on January 26, 1950[72]. Thus, in Keshav Singh[73] the Allahabad High Court did assert that it was its duty to find out whether the privilege claimed by the House was a privilege enjoyed by the House of Commons on the date of commencement of the Constitution.

The matter was put in the right perspective by the Supreme Court in Searchlight I.[74] On the one hand, the Court decided the general question whether a breach of privilege occurs when a newspaper prints a report on a member's speech including the portions ordered to be expunged by the Speaker. The Court answered the question in the affirmative. But, on the other hand, when the question arose whether the expunged portion had been printed by the newspaper or not, the Court refused to express any opinion on this controversy saying that "it must be left to the House itself to determine whether there has, in fact, been any breach of its privilege". Of course, when once it is held that a particular privilege exists, then it is for the House to judge the occasion and the manner of its exercise and the courts would not sit in judgment over the way the House has exercised its privilege.

Each House of Parliament in India has power to commit a person for its contempt. But the position remains vague on the question whether such committal is immune from judicial scrutiny or not.

The question whether courts can interfere with the power of a House to commit for its contempt arose most dramatically in 1964 in the Keshav Singh case,[75] where the U.P. Legislative Assembly claimed an absolute power to commit a person for its contempt and a general warrant issued by it to be conclusive and free from judicial scrutiny.

The question however arises whether such a claim can be accepted in India in view of the fact that, unlike England, India has a written Constitution containing Fundamental Rights, and the doctrine of judicial review of legislative action forms a part of the country's constitutional jurisprudence. Keshav Singh's case may be regarded as the high-water mark of legislative-judiciary conflict in a privilege matter in which the relationship between the two was brought to a very critical point,[76] and the whole episode was reminiscent of the conflict between

---

72. The Searchlight case, supra; Yeshwant Rao v. State of M.P. Leg. Ass., AIR 1967 M.P. 95; Yogendra Nath v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1967 Raj. 123.

73. AIR 1965 All 349; supra, footnote 58.

74. Supra, footnote 50.

75. AIR 1965 SC 745.

76. A sort of controversy arose between Lok Sabha and the Supreme Court in 1969. Some remarks were made in the Lok Sabha against the Sankaracharya. A suit for damages against the members was filed in the Delhi High Court but was dismissed. An appeal was then filed in the Supreme Court. Notice of lodgement of the appeal was sent to the concerned members and the Speaker. This was debated in the Lok Sabha in Aug. 1969. The Speaker advised the members concerned not to appear before the Court. The Court later explained the position saying that the notice of lodgement of an appeal was not a summons to appear before it.
Tej Kiarn Jain v. Sanjiva Reddy, AIR 1970 S.C. 1573 : (1970) 2 SCC 272; supra.

the House of Commons and the judiciary in Britain in 1689 when two Judges were committed by the House.[77]

Keshav Singh printed and published a pamphlet against a member of the State Legislative Assembly. The House adjudged him guilty of committing its contempt and sentenced him to be reprimanded. On March 16, 1964, when the Speaker administered a reprimand to him, he behaved in the House in an objectionable manner. Accordingly, the House directed that he be imprisoned for seven days for committing contempt of the House by his conduct in the House at the time of his being reprimanded by the Speaker. On March 19, 1964, Advocate Solomon presented a petition under Art. 226 to the Allahabad High Court for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Keshav Singh alleging that his detention was illegal as the House had no authority to do so; he had not been given an opportunity to defend himself and that his detention was mala fide and against natural justice. The Court passed an interim bail order releasing Keshav Singh pending a full hearing of the petition on merits. Instead of filing a return to Keshav Singh's petition, the House resolved pre-emptorily that Keshav Singh, Advocate Solomon and the two Judges of the High Court who had passed the interim bail order, had committed contempt of the House and that they be brought before it in custody.

The Judges moved petitions under Art. 226 in the High Court asserting that the resolution of the House was wholly unconstitutional and violated the provisions of Art. 211 [Art. 121 in case of Parliament];[78] that in ordering release of Keshav Singh on the habeas corpus petition, the Judges were exercising their jurisdiction and authority vested in them as Judges of the High Court under Art. 226. A full Bench consisting of all the 28 Judges of the High Court ordered stay of the implementation of the resolution of the House till the disposal of the said petition.

Thereafter, the House then passed a clarificatory resolution saying that its earlier resolution had given rise to misgivings that the concerned persons would be deprived of an opportunity of explanation; that it was not so and that the question of contempt would be decided only after giving an opportunity to explain to the Judges. The warrants of arrest against the two Judges were withdrawn, but they were placed under an obligation to appear before the House and explain why the House should not proceed against them for its contempt. The High Court again granted a stay order against the implementation of this resolution. Thus, there emerged a complete legislative-judiciary deadlock.

At this stage, the President of India referred the matter to the Supreme Court for its advisory opinion under Art. 143[79]. By a majority of 6 to 1, the Court held

---

77. Supra, footnote 63.

78. For Art. 226, see, infra, Ch. VIII.

79. Infra, Ch. IV.

The Presidential reference framed the following five questions for the Court's advisory opinion.

(i) The first question in substance was whether the High Court was competent to entertain and deal with a petition for habeas corpus, and to issue bail, when the petitioner had been committed to imprisonment by the assembly for the infringement of its privileges and for its contempt.

(ii) The second question in substance was whether by ordering release of Keshav Singh on bail the judges had committed contempt of the Assembly.

[Footnote 79 Contd.]

that the two Judges had not committed contempt of the legislature by issuing the bail order. The judges had jurisdiction and competence to entertain Keshav Singh's petition and to pass the orders as they did. The Assembly was not competent to direct the custody and production before itself of the advocate and the judges. The keynote of the Court's opinion is the advocacy of harmonious functioning of the three wings of the democratic state, viz., Legislature, Executive and the Judiciary. The Court emphasized that these three organs must function "not in antinomy nor in a spirit of hostility, but rationally harmonisouly." Only a harmonious working of the three constituents of the democratic state will help the peaceful development, growth and stabilisation of the democratic way of life in this country.

The Court pointed out that Art. 211 debars the State Legislatures [Art. 121 in case of Parliament][80] from discussing the conduct of a High Court Judge. Therefore, on a party of reasoning, one House, a part of the Legislature, cannot take any action against a High Court Judge for anything done in the discharge of his duties. The existence of a fearless and independent Judiciary being the basic foundation of the constitutional structure in India, no Legislature has power to take action under Art. 194(3) or 105(3) against a Judge for its contempt alleged to have been committed by the Judge in the discharge of his duties. The Court also held that the right of the citizens to move the judicature and the right of the advocates to assist that process must remain uncontrolled by Art. 105(3) or Art. 194(3). It is necessary to do so for enforcing the Fundamental Rights and for sustaining the Rule of Law in the country. Therefore, a House could not pass a resolution for committing a High Court Judge for contempt. The Court rejected the contention of the Assembly that it had absolute power to commit a person for its contempt and a general warrant issued by it would be conclusive and free from judicial scrutiny. The Court declared that the House of Commons enjoyed the privilege to commit a person for contempt by a non-justiciable general warrant, as a superior court of record in the land and not as a Legislature. Therefore, Parliament and the State Legislatures in India, which have never been courts, cannot claim such a privilege.

Even if the House of Commons has this privilege as a legislative organ, Parliament and the State Legislatures in India cannot still claim it because of the existence of the Fundamental Rights and the doctrine of judicial review, particularly, Art. 32, which not only empowers the Supreme Court but imposes a duty on it to enforce Fundamental Rights,[81] and Art. 226 which empowers the High

---

[Footnote 79 Contd.]

(iii) The Third question was whether it was competent for the Assembly to direct the arrest of the Judges and their production before the House for rendering explanation for its contempt.

(iv) The fourth question was whether the full bench of the Allahabad High Court was competent to pass interim orders restraining the Speaker and others, from implementing the orders of the Assembly against the Judges and the advocate.

(v) Whether a High Court Judge dealing with the petition challenging the order of a House of the State Legislature imposing punishment for contempt thereby commits contempt of the Legislature. And, also, whether in case it is held that the Judge does commit contempt in the aforesaid situation, is the Legislature competent to take proceedings against such Judge and punish him for contempt?

80. Supra, p. 121.

81. For discussion on Art. 32, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII.

Courts to enforce these rights.[82] Thus, a court can examine an unspeaking warrant of the House to ascertain whether contempt had in fact been committed.[83] The legislative order punishing a person for its contempt is not conclusive. The court can go into it. The order can be challenged, for instance, under Art. 21, one of the Fundamental Rights which is applicable to the area of a legislative privileges, on the ground that the act of the legislature is mala fide, capricious or perverse.[84]

The Keshav Singh case represents the high-water mark of legislature-judiciary conflict in a privilege matter in India. The relationship between the two institutions was brought to a very critical point. However, the Supreme Court's opinion in Keshav Singh seeks to achieve two objectives.[85] First and foremost it seeks to maintain judicial integrity and independence, for if a House were to claim a right to question the conduct of a judge, then judicial independence would be seriously compromised; the constitutional provisions safeguarding judicial independence largely diluted and the Rule of Law neutralized. The Constitution has sought to preserve the integrity of the judiciary, and by no stretch of imagination could this be compromised in any way. The Supreme Court has sought to promote this value through the Keshav Singh pronouncement. In the second place, the Court seeks to concede to the House quite a large power to commit for its contempt or breach of its privilege for, even though the judiciary can scrutinise legislative committal for its contempt, in actual practice, this would not amount to much as the courts could interfere with the legislative order only in very extreme situations.

As has already been seen, Fundamental Rights guaranteed by Arts. 19(1)(a) to 19(1)(g) do not control legislative privileges. Art. 21 also is not of much importance for the proceedings before the Committee of Privileges of a House are held under the rules of procedure made by the House under its rule-making powers and this would be considered as procedure established by law. It appears doubtful if the courts would interfere when the rules of the House specifically deny a hearing to the person charged for contempt in certain situations, e.g., when the contempt or breach of privilege is committed in the actual view of the House (as happened in Keshav Singh's case) for the rules will be applied as procedure established by law under Art. 21.

As a matter of practice, the Committee of Privileges invariably conducts an inquiry and gives the party concerned an opportunity to defend himself before it decides the matter. The charge of mala fides against the House is extremely difficult to substantiate and later the Allahabad High Court disposing of Keshav

---

82. For discussion on Art. 226, see, infra, Ch. VIII.
83. Supra, footnote 66.
84. For discussion on Art. 21, see, infra, Ch. XXVI.
85. For comments on this case, see D.C JAIN, JUDICIAL REVIEW OF PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES; FUNCTIONAL RELATIONSHIP OF COURTS AND LEGISLATURES IN INDIA, 9 JILI 205 (1967); P.K. TRIPATHI, MR. JUSTICE GAJENDRAGADKAR AND CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION, 8 JILI 479, 532 (1966); D.N. BANERJEE, SUPREME COURT ON THE CONFLICT OF JURISDICTION BETWEEN THE LEG. ASS. AND THE HIGH COURT OF U.P., AN EVALUATION (1966); FORRESTER, PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE—AN INDIAN CONSTITUTIONAL CRISIS, 18 Parl. Affairs 196 (64-65); IRANI, COURT AND THE LEGISLATURES IN INDIA, 14 International and Comparative Law Quarterly, 950; M.P. JAIN, CONTROVERSY BETWEEN THE JUDICIARY AND THE LEGISLAUTURE, 1 Conspectus, 47 (1965); SEERVAI, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF INDIA, 1175-1184 (1976).

Singh's case[86] refused to infer mala fides in the Assembly merely from the fact that the person charged belonged to a political party different from the majority party in the House. Also, the High Court held, dismissing Keshav Singh's petition on merits, that whether there had been contempt of the House or not in a particular situation is a matter for the House to decide and the court would not go into the question of propriety or legality of the commitment. Nor would the court go into the question whether the facts found by the Legislature constitute its contempt or not and the court cannot sit in appeal over the decision of the House committing a person for its contempt.

The High Court, however, did go into the question whether the act of the House in the specific situation was mala fide or whether there was an infringement of Art. 21, and held in the negative. The sum and substance of the discussion is that although the judiciary has asserted its power to interfere with a legislative committal of a person for its contempt, yet in practice, the grounds on which the judiciary can do so are extremely narrow and restricted. In effect, therefore, it is difficult to get much of a relief from the court when a person is committed by a House for its contempt.

The Supreme Court's opinion in the Keshav Singh case, it was suggested by the Speakers of the State Legislatures and Lok Sabha, denied to a House the power to punish for its contempt. This, however, is not a correct view to take of the Supreme Court opinion. It does nothing of the kind. It only denies to a House a power to commit the judges for its contempt; it also denies that a House is free from all Fundamental Rights in a matter of privilege.

These are unexceptionable principles. The first is necessary to maintain the integrity of the judiciary. The second can be justified on the ground that if a law of the Legislature is not immune from the Fundamental Rights, why should an act of only one part of the Legislature claim such an immunity. But, even in this respect, as discussed above, courts have been very circumspect for the susceptibilities of the Legislatures and have held a number of Fundamental Rights inapplicable to privilege matters.

Under Art. 21, courts can scrutinise the legislative action on the ground of mala fides or perversity, but these grounds are very difficult to substantiate. The courts are very reluctant to interfere with the internal working of the Legislatures.[87] It appears difficult to argue that even such an extreme ground should not be available to challenge a legislative action. There may be an exceptional case in which a House has exercised its powers not to uphold its dignity but with an ulterior motive, and if it can be established then the courts should be able to say so. After all, a House is a politically oriented organ; it is fragmented in various political parties and there is a possibility, howsoever remote, that the power of the House may be used by the majority party for political aggrandizement.

As the law relating to legislative privileges stands today, a House has power to decide whether or not its contempt has been committed; courts would not interfere with its internal working, or when it imposes a punishment short of imprisonment; in case of imprisonment, courts would interfere only in case of mala fides or perversity. On the whole, powers of the House are so broad as to even enable it to enforce its own views regarding its privileges. The courts have exhibited an extreme reluctance to interfere with the proceedings of a House in privilege issues. The review power claimed by the Supreme Court in Keshav Singh is extremely restrictive and it would be extremely difficult in practice to get much of a relief from the courts in case of committal by a House for its contempt.

86. Keshav Singh v. Speaker, Legislative Assembly, AIR 1965 All. 349; see, supra, footnote 58.
87. Supra, p. 127.

Even in the Keshav Singh case, the Allahabad High Court considering the petition on merits, after the Supreme Court's opinion, threw it out and refused to interfere with the judgment of the House.[88] The High Court rejected the argument that the facts found by the Assembly against the petitioner did not amount to contempt of the Assembly. The court refused to go into the question of the "correctness, propriety or legality of the commitment". The court observed :

> "This court cannot, in a petition under Art. 226 of the Constitution, sit in appeal over the decision of the Legislative Assembly committing the petitioner, for its contempt. The Legislative Assembly is the master of its own procedure and is the sole judge of the question whether its contempt has been committed or not".[89]

The High Court ruled that neither there was violation of Art. 21 nor of natural justice because the legislature had formulated the rules of procedure to investigate complaints of breach of privileges.

The petitioner had also argued that his committal by the Assembly was mala fide as the Assembly was dominated by the Congress party which was hostile to the Socialist Party of which the petitioner was a leading member. The High Court refused to infer mala fides from these facts. There was nothing on the record to establish mala fides on the part of the Assembly in committing the petitioner. "The mere fact that the person committed for contempt belongs to the party other than the majority party in the Legislature is no indication of the fact that the Assembly acted mala fide."[90]

The above observation shows how reluctant the courts are to impute mala fides to the Legislative Assembly in the matter of committal by it of a person for its contempt. Reference may also be made in this connection to Searchlight I.[91] In that case, an allegation of mala fides was raised by the petitioner against the Committee of Privileges. The Supreme Court ruled that the charge was not made out. The Court observed on this point.[92]

> "The Committee of Privileges ordinarily includes members of all parties represented in the House and it is difficult to expect that the Committee, as a body, will be actuated by any mala fide intention against the petitioner. Further the business of the Committee is only to make a report to the House and the ultimate decision will be that of the House itself. In the circumstances, the allegation of bad faith cannot be readily accepted".

The Courts have taken the view that as a House has power to initiate proceedings for breach of its privileges, it must be left free to determine whether in fact breach of its privileges has occurred or not. The courts have thus refused to give

---

88. Supra, footnote 86.
89. Supra, footnote 86 at 355.
90. Ibid, at 356.
91. Supra, footnote 50.
92. AIR 1959 SC at 412.

any relief at the inquiry stage in a privilege matter by the Privileges Committee of a House.[1]

The Courts do not like to interfere with the proceedings of the House, or the Committee of Privileges in the matter of adjudication whether the privilege of the House has been infringed. Thus, in Searchlight I,[2] the Committee of Privileges, Bihar Legislative Assembly, served a notice on the petitioner calling upon him to show cause why appropriate action should not be recommended against him for breach of privilege of the Speaker and the Assembly. The petitioner came to the Supreme Court under Art. 32 seeking a writ of prohibition against the committee restraining it to proceed further in the matter. The Court rejected the petition holding that it was for the House to decide on the advice of the Committee of Privileges whether there was a breach of privilege or not in the circumstances of the case.

Again, in Subramanian,[3] the Madras High Court refused to issue a writ of prohibition against the Committee of Privileges. In pursuance of a resolution passed by the Assembly, the Speaker had issued a notice to Subramanian to show cause why he should not be held to have committed contempt of the House. Subramanian filed a petition in the High Court under Art. 226 for the issue of a writ of prohibition restraining the Speaker from proceeding further in the matter. Refusing to interfere in the matter at this stage saying that the court was concerned, "purely and simply, with a notice to the petitioner to show cause..." "[I] it is clearly premature, and even impossible, to judge now, upon the matter of the alleged contempt itself."[4] The petitioner was asking the court to issue prohibition restraining the Speaker from proceeding further virtually on the "ground of absence of an ab initio jurisdiction". This was merely the state of assumption of jurisdiction. Therefore, the court refused to issue the writ as Art. 194(3) [or Art. 105(3)] invests the Speaker empowered by a resolution of the legislature, "with the right to call upon a third party, like the petitioner, to show cause why he should not be held to have committed a breach of the privilege of the Legislature, by way of contempt."[5] A writ of prohibition need not be issued to stifle the very exercise of that jurisdiction.[6]

There have been frequent conflicts between the courts and the legislatures in the matter of privileges. This has happened much more frequently in the case of the State Legislatures rather than in the case of Houses of Parliament. These cases are taken note of in the discussion under Art. 194.[7] One or two cases may however be mentioned here to illustrate the point.

In Tej Kumar Jain, a suit for damages was filed in the Delhi High Court against some members of Lok Sabha for remarks made by them on the floor of the House against Sankaracharya, but the court dismissed the suit. Thereafter, an appeal was filed in the Supreme Court against the High Court decision. A notice of lodgement of the appeal was sent to the concerned members and the Speaker

---

1. Jagdish Gandhi v. Legislative Council, AIR 1966 All. 291. L.N. Phukan v. Mohendra Mohan, AIR 1965 Ass. 75.
2. M.S.M. Sharma v. S.K. Sinha, AIR 1959 SC 395 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 806; supra, footnote 50.
3. C. Subramanian v. Speaker, Madras Legislative Assembly, AIR 1969 Mad. 10.
4. Ibid, at 12.
5. Ibid, at 13.
6. For Writ of Prohibition, see, infra, Ch. VIII.
7. See, infra, Ch. VI, Sec. H.

advising them to appear before the Supreme Court either in person or by an advocate. At this stage, a question of privilege was raised in the House and the matter was debated in Aug., 1969. The Speaker advised the members concerned not to appear before the Supreme Court otherwise they may themselves be guilty of breach of privilege of the House. Later while delivering its decision in the case, the Court explained the position. The Court stated that as the suit for damages was for Rs. 26,000, an appeal lay to the Supreme Court under Art. 133 on the High Court granting a certificate for the purpose.[8] The appellant has to take out a notice of lodgement of appeal to inform the respondents so that they may take action considered appropriate or necessary. Thereafter, the Court could proceed to hear the appeal. "The notice which is issued is not a summons to appear before the Court. It is only an intimation of the fact of the lodgement of the appeal. It is for the party informed to choose whether to appear or not".[9]

A summons is different from such a notice. If a summons is issued to a defendant and he does not appear, the Court may proceed ex parte and may even regard the plaintiff's claim to be admitted. This consequence does not flow in case of notice of lodgement of appeal.[10]

After this clarification, the matter was discussed again by the House. The Speaker then ruled that whether the Court issued a summons or a notice, it made no difference, as ultimately the privileges of the House were involved.

This shows how jealously the House seeks to defend its own privileges and to be the final judge thereof and does not brook any judicial interference in this respect. In the States, the Houses have often asserted that they are the sole judge of their privileges. For example, in Keshav Singh, to which a reference has already been made, when hearing was being held before the Supreme Court on the presidential reference under Art. 143, the Assembly, whose claim to the privilege was sub-judice, did not want to submit to the Court's jurisdiction on the plea that the House, and not the Court, is the final judge of its own privileges. The U.P. Legislative Assembly made it clear to the Supreme Court that by appearing in the hearing on the reference, the House was not submitting to the Jurisdiction of the Court in respect of the area of controversy and that it was not submitting "its powers, privileges and immunities" for the opinion and decision of the Supreme Court. The House asserted that it was the sole and exclusive judge of its own powers, privileges and immunities and its decisions were not examinable by any other court or body; and whatever the Court may say would not preclude the House from deciding for itself the points referred to the Court under reference. The House maintained : "It is the privilege of the House to construe the relevant provisions of Art. 194(3) and determine for itself what its powers privileges and immunities are".

(a) When the question arises whether a recognised and established privilege of the House has been breached or not in the context of the specific factual situation, it is for the House to decide the question. The courts do not interfere with such a decision of the House except in the rare case of mala fides etc.

---

8. See, infra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(iv) for Appellate Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.
9. AIR 1970 SC at 1575.
10. Ibid.

(b) But when the question is whether a privilege exists or not, then it appears that it is a matter for the courts to decide, for a privilege is claimed by a House under a constitutional provision. It is the constitutional function of the Supreme Court and the High Courts to interpret constitutional provisions.[11] No legislature can claim any such power.

(c) A House cannot claim an entirely new privilege even in Britain, this position is recognised. India is different from Britain as in India legislative privileges flow from the written Constitution, whereas in Britain, the same flow from common law.

(d) In Britain, the rule that the House is the final judge of its privileges arose when the House of Commons was locked in a struggle with an arbitrary Monarch, and had little confidence in the judges who then held office during the Crown's pleasure. That period was very different from the present position prevailing in India when legislative privileges are claimed mostly against the people, especially, the press. A democratic House functioning under a written Constitution cannot claim uncontrolled power to be a judge in its own cause.

(e) In a written Constitution, the interpretation of the Constitution is ultimately in the hands of the courts. In Britain, the House of Commons always files a return in the court whenever committal by it is in question.[12] While the House has not relinquished expressly its claims to be the sole judge of the extent of its privileges, in practice, judicial rulings on these matters are treated as binding.[13]

(f) A democratic legislature and an independent judiciary are two pillars of a democratic system. Both have to function in co-operative spirit to further the cause of Rule of Law in the country.

(v) CODIFICATION OF PRIVILEGES

In the wake of Keshav Singh's case, two rather inconsistent ideas were brought into bold relief. On the one hand, the Speakers wanted the Constitution to be amended so as to concede an absolute power to a House to commit any one for its contempt. On the other hand, there arose a demand for codification of legislative privileges.

As to the first, considering the matter dispassionately there is hardly any justification for changing the status quo in favour of the Legislatures. The ambit of their power to commit for contempt is quite broad, and their functioning has not been hampered in the past in the absence of any broader power. The U.S. Congress does not enjoy any such power; a case of contempt of a House is

11. See, Ch. XL, infra, under "Constitutional Interpretation".
12. ENID CAMPBELL, PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES IN AUSTRALIA, 9 (1966).
13. Ibid, 6.

tried by the courts under ordinary law, but this has not obstructed the Congress in its working.[14]

The demand for absolute power to commit a person for breach of privilege of a House raises several significant questions. In a democratic country having Rule of Law, should any forum, howsoever august it may be, have an unrestricted power to infringe the rights and liberties of the common man? Why should a popularly elected democratic legislature be hyper-sensitive to public criticism? When a law made by the legislature as a whole is subject to judicial review, why should not an act of only one House (which is only a part of the Legislature) be exempt from judicial review?

A legislative privilege is usually exercised against a member of the public.

While the case for enlarging the powers of the Houses has not been substantiated, there are a few very serious objections against doing so. In a democracy, no forum, howsoever august, should have an unrestricted power to infringe people's freedom. The comparison between courts and legislatures in this regard is not to the point. It is the judiciary's traditional function to protect people's rights. While the courts are non-political, a legislature is essentially a political body, being fragmented into a number of political parties; and may at times be tempted to act on political considerations. One could even raise the spectre of an intolerant majority in a House becoming oppressive and using the power of the House to commit for its contempt to stifle criticism of the government.

The democratic process of government is based on freedom of speech and expression and no House needs to be oversensitive to public criticism. Legislative privileges adversely affect the rights of the people and, therefore, such privileges must be kept within a very narrow bound. If a House could order the arrest of a High Court Judge, it could as well order the arrest of a Supreme Court Judge, or of a Central Minister, on the allegation of its contempt and one can only imagine the results when the Centre and the States are controlled by different, often antagonistic, political parties. The House of Commons invokes its penal power very sparingly, and when it does so, it rarely goes beyond admonishing the offending persons.

On the other hand, a strong case has been made out for codifying legislative privileges, especially the circumstances which constitute contempt of the House. This area at present suffers from too much ambiguity and lacks precision and articulation. The press has often complained against the exercise of penal powers by the legislatures, and it has been particularly insistent on the codification of privileges as too often it has to bear the brunt of legislative displeasure.[15]

---

14. Marshall v. Gordon, 243 U.S. 521 (1917).

The House has been conceded the power of 'self-preservation', i.e. "the right to prevent acts which, in and of themselves, inherently obstruct or prevent the discharge of legislative duty or the refusal to do that which there is an inherent legislative power to compel in order that legislative functions may be performed". Ibid. at 542. Undoubtedly, the scope of legislative privileges in the U.S. is extremely limited and scope of judicial review much broader than in the U.K. or India.

15. According to the Press Commission, some of the privilege cases disclose oversensitiveness on the part of the legislatures to even honest criticism, Report, 425-431. The Press Council has stated that the present undefined state of the law of privileges has placed the press in an unenviable position in the matter of comments on the proceedings of the legislatures; Second Annual Report; 28 (1967).

Also see, First Press Commission Report, I, 421 (1954); Report of the Second Press Commission, I, 53.

Keshav Singh's case itself represents a conflict between the citizen's freedom of speech and legislative privileges. Often members of the Legislatures use their freedom of speech to make allegations on the floor of the House against outsiders who have no remedy to vindicate their reputation. An outsider cannot refute the allegations on the floor of the House, nor can he bring a court action against the member concerned.[16] The point is that while the rights and privileges of the M.P.s are important and should be upheld, the rights of the ordinary citizens should also be safeguarded. To some extent, legislative privileges are an anachronism in a democratic society.

Another trend is to use privilege motions by members of the opposition as a technique for achieving the political purpose of harassing the Ministers and damaging their image in the public eyes. Motions for breach of privilege are raised on the technical ground that a particular Minister has given wrong information to the House and has thus sought to mislead it.[17] Though most of these motions are thrown out by the House, the discussion usually assumes a political complexion and becomes a matter of trial of strength between the ruling and the opposition parties. Privilege motions are also moved at times against officials on the ground that they behaved disrespectfully towards members of the House. There thus exists a lot of flexibility, vagueness and uncertainty regarding what actually constitutes, and new grounds are invoked every day for alleging, a breach of privilege or contempt of the House.

Theoretically, codification of privileges appears to offer several advantages: it will make things certain and one can know surely and exactly what the privileges of the Houses are in India. Codification in the area is advocated to remove ambiguity so that the press is not unduly stifled in saying what it thinks needs to be said. In a democracy, free discussion should be the norm, and its restriction only an exception.

JUSTICE SUBBA RAO in Searchlight I[18] has strongly pleaded for codification of privileges instead of keeping "this branch of law in a nebulous state, with the result that a citizen will have to make a research into the unwritten law of privileges of the House of Commons at the risk of being called before the bar of the Legislature."

The clear emphasis of Art. 105(3), as well as of Art. 194(3), is on the legislature defining its privileges through law. The framers of the Constitution were anxious to confer plenary powers on the Houses in India in this respect. They felt that legislative privileges should be definitised not in a hurry but after giving some thought to the matter. The power was thus left to the Legislatures to define their privileges through their own legislation. The supporters of codification argue that if legislative power to punish for contempt of the House is carefully defined in respect of such matters as grounds constituting contempt, procedure and persons against whom such power may be exercised, it will be a safeguard against any misuse of power and will promote the Rule of Law.

---

16. Lok Sabha Deb., Feb. 15, 1968; Tej Kiran Jain, supra.

17. The Speaker of the Lok Sabha has ruled that the mere fact that a minister has made an incorrect statement does not constitute a breach of privilege. A breach of privilege arises only when he makes a statement in the House which he knows to be false.
12 Privileges Digest 8 (1967). Also see, XXVI Privileges Digest, 8, 18 (1981).

18. Supra, Sec. L(iii).

While codification of legislative privileges, especially of the circumstances which constitute contempt of a House, is eminently desirable from the point of view of the press and the people, it has a few snags from the point of view of the Legislatures. It will place restriction on the power of a House to deal with privilege matters in the way it likes and it would lose its present-day flexibility of approach. It will be difficult to define all situations when questions of contempt of a House or breach of its privilege may occur as new situations arise every day.

While the legislative privileges at present are not subject to many Fundamental Rights, a statute enacted to define them would be subject to judicial review with respect to its compatibility with the Fundamental Rights.[19] While, at present, by and large, the courts are excluded from the area of legislative privileges, the law defining the same would inevitably draw the courts into picture as questions of statutory interpretation will have to be decided by them.

Under Art. 19(1)(a), read with Art. 19(2), no restriction can be imposed on the freedom of speech and expression with respect to 'contempt of the legislature', as in Art. 19(2) while the term 'contempt of courts' occurs, the term 'contempt of legislature' is missing. The difficulty can be got round by making 'contempt of legislature' a criminal offence, but to do so would be to bring the courts into the picture as they would try and punish the crime. To make a Legislature itself a judge in the privilege cases, it appears necessary to amend Art. 19(2) and add 'contempt of the legislature' therein.[20]

Because of these factors, Parliament and the State Legislatures are extremely reluctant to codify their privileges and the prospect of codification is thus extremely dim. Short of codification, an effort may be made to definitise privileges through declaratory resolutions. This course of action would remove some uncertainty from the area while at the same time the Houses would not lose their flexibility of approach. It is also necessary that the Houses use their penal powers with restraint and circumspection and review and tighten up their rules of procedure so as to discourage unsubstantial privilege motions from being moved, and also to guarantee adequate procedural safeguards to those against whom privilege cases are enquired into. This much each House owes to itself and to the public.

In this connection, it may be illuminating to take note of some developments in Britain in the area of parliamentary privileges. In 1965, the whole range of parliamentary privileges, their need, justification, present form and scope, was brought under examination by a Select Committee of the House of Commons which reported in 1967.[21]

The Committee's approach was to remove the uncertainty from the area of parliamentary privileges and also to balance the interests of the citizen and the Press with those of the House, its members and officers. It recommended abolition of

---

19. The Supreme Court has asserted in Searchlight I that a law defining legislative privileges would be subject to the Fundamental Rights and such a law contravening any Fundamental Right would be void to the extent of such contravention. See, supra.
A similar assertion has been made by the Supreme Court in its advisory opinion in Keshar Singh, supra. Also, C. Subramanian v. Speaker, Madras Legislative Assembly, AIR 1969 Mad. 10, 12.

20. Infra, for a discussion on Art. 19(1)(a), Ch. XXIV.

21. SILLS, Report of the Select Committee on Parliamentary Privileges, 31 Mod. L.R. 435 (1968).

obsolete and out of date rules, such as, immunity of members from civil arrest[22] and old resolutions of the House prohibiting reporting of its proceedings.[23] It suggested relaxation of the rules against reporting of proceedingsbefore parliamentary committees about which the general principle should be that the proceedings should be open and reportable unless the public interest clearly requires otherwise. It also suggested a restricted use of its penal jurisdiction by the House to punish for its contempt.[24]

The Committee accepted that "there is justice in the criticism that some members have in the recent past been over-sensitive to criticism and ever ready to invoke the penal jurisdiction of the House in respect of matters of relative triviality or which could as effectively be dealt with by the exercise of remedies open to the ordinary citizen,"[25] yet the Committee rejected the suggestion that the "categories of contempt" be codified, since "new forms of obstruction, new functions and new duties may all contribute to new forms of contempt," and the House should not be inhibited in its power to deal with them. However, the committee suggested that the House should give effect to the basic principles regarding its contempt by adopting by resolution a set of rules as guidance for the future exercise of its penal jurisdiction so that much of the uncertainty and confusion of the present day could be removed.

As regards investigation of complaints of contempt, the Committee suggested that the person against whom a complaint is being investigated should be entitled as of right to attend proceedings of the Privilege Committee, to be represented by a lawyer, to call witnesses, and be paid for legal aid, if necessary. The Committee further suggested that the House should have power to impose imprisonment for a fixed term and to impose fines because in certain cases admonition may be less, and imprisonment may be more, than what the needs of the case may call for and in case of corporations, fines are the only form of punishment which can be imposed.

In the light of the above, it may be worthwhile for a Parliamentary Committee to study the privileges of the Legislatures in India and formulate some norms and guidelines for being followed by the various Houses in this area.[26]

M. SUPREMACY OF THE INDIAN PARLIAMENT

SUPREMACY OF BRITISH PARLIAMENT

The keystone, the dominant characteristic, of the British Constitution is the doctrine of 'sovereignty' or 'supremacy' of Parliament. This means that Parlia-

---

22. Supra, p. 130.
23. Supra, pp. 134, 135.
24. Report, at ix and x.
25. In order to curtail the exercise of its privilege jurisdiction, the House of Commons decided on 6 February, 1978, to follow the rule "that its penal jurisdiction should be exercised (a) in any event as sparingly as possible, and (b) only when the House is satisfied that to exercise it is essential in order to provide reasonable protection for the House, its members or its officers, from such improper obstruction or attempt or threat of obstruction as is causing or is likely to cause substantial interference with the performance of their respective functions."
See, Committee of Privileges, First Report, H.C. (U.K.) 376 (1977-78); XXV Jl. of Parl. Inf. 227 (1979).
26. For further comments on this aspect, see, Jain, PARLIMENTARY PRIVILEGES & THE PRESS, 102-112.

ment has the 'right to make or unmake any law whatever;' that it can "legally legislate on any topic whatever which, in the judgment of Parliament, is a fit subject for legislation," that no person or body in Britain has a right to override or set aside a law of Parliament, that courts have no jurisdiction to declare an Act of Parliament void, ultra vires or 'unconstitutional', and that there is "no power which, under the English Constitution, can come into rivalry with the legislative sovereignty of Parliament."[27] Parliament is not regarded as a delegate of the people and it is not legally bound by any mandate. The British Constitution is not written and there is nothing like a fundamental law of the country. Therefore, the power of Parliament to legislate is legally unrestricted, and it can change even a constitutional principle by the same ordinary process as it enacts an ordinary law.

Politically, however, Britain has a responsible government with an elected House of Commons which reflects contemporary public opinion, social morality or consciousness. Parliament does not therefore ordinarily do anything which a large number of people oppose.[28] But from a legal, and not political, point of view there is no fetter or restraint on the British Parliament to make any law. Whatever Parliament enacts as law is law and its validity is not subject to any higher principles or morality, national or international law.

Britain has no doctrine of unconstitutionality of parliamentary legislation and a law enacted by Parliament cannot be questioned or challenged in a court on any ground. The function of the courts is primarily to interpret the law enacted by Parliament and apply it to the factual situations coming before them for adjudication. The courts are not to scrutinise a law with reference to any fundamental norm, although, in the process of statutory interpretation, the courts do bring in certain concepts of their own and interpret the law accordingly. When the courts are faced with several alternative interpretations of a statutory provision, they would adopt the view which appears to them to be fair and just and it may be that, at times, the judicially-adopted alternative may not accord with what Parliament wanted to enact. While the courts do not enjoy the power to declare an Act of Parliament to be invalid they certainly have the power to interpret the same[29]

EFFECT OF EUROPEAN COMMUNITY LAW

It may however be observed that the entry of Britain in the European Common Market has somewhat compromised the traditional concept of sovereignty of

---

27. DICEY: LAW AND THE CONSTITUTION, 39-40, 70 (1965); JENNINGS, LAW AND THE CONSTITUTION, 57, 144 (1959); HEUSTON, ESSAYS IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 1 (1964); SCHWARTZ, AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 49 (1965); WADE and PHILLIPS, op. cit., 65-83; DE SMITH, CONSTITUTIONAL & ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 63-93 (1977).

28. In the modern state there exist organized interest groups reflecting the views of every trade, profession or business. This has led to the practice of prior consultation before a measure is introduced in Parliament. Neither Government nor Parliament can disregard organised public opinion in promoting legislation and thus the political supremacy of Parliament, distinct from its legal omni-competence, as a law making organ, has become more and more unreal. All legislation is a compromise of conflicting interests. JENNINGS observes, "Parliament passes many laws which many people do not want. But it never passes any law which any substantial section of the population violently dislikes."
JENNINGS, op. cit., 148. Also, DE SMITH, op. cit., 90; WADE, INTRODUCTION TO DICEY'S LAW OF THE CONSTITUTION, lxvii, ixx.

29. JENNINGS. PARLIAMENT, 1-12 (1970); KEIR and LAWSON, CASES IN CONST. LAW, 1 (1979); CF. GRAY, 'SOVEREIGNTY OF PARLIAMENT TO-DAY, 10 *Univ. of Toronto L.*J., 54 (1053-54).
Also see infra, Ch. XL.

Parliament. The British Parliament has enacted the European Communities Act, 1972, making European Community Law automatically applicable in Britain even in the face of any law to the contrary. "The general effect of the European Communities Act is to override existing domestic law sofar as is inconsistent therewith, and to impose a presumption of interpretation that future statute law is to be read subject to Community Law for the time being in force. Parliament is expected to refrain from passing legislation inconsistent with Community Law."[30]

POSITION IN INDIA

The Indian Parliament differs from its British counterpart in a substantial manner. Politically speaking, the Indian and British Parliaments are both subject to similar restraints as both have parliamentary form of government. But, legally speaking, whereas the power of the British Parliament is undefined that of the Indian Parliament is defined, fettered and restrained. India's Constitution is written; it is the fundamental law of the land; its provisions are enforceable by the courts and it cannot be changed in the ordinary legislative process. The Indian Parliament has therefore to function within the constraints of the Constitution from which its legislative powers emanate.

By Art. 245(1), the legislative power of Parliament has been specifically made 'subject to the provisions of the Constitution'.[31] The fundamental law contains many rules and restrictions which Parliament has to observe in its working. For example, there are restrictions regarding the subjects on which Parliament can legislate, and a law made beyond the assigned subjects is bad;[32] there are Fundamental Rights guaranteed to the people of India, and a law made in contravention thereof is unconstitutional.[33]

Parliament exercises sovereign power to enact laws. No outside power or authority can issue a direction to enact a particular piece of legislation.[34]

The doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty as it obtains in England does not prevail here except to the extent and in the fields provided by the Constitution. The entire scheme of the Constitution is such that it ensures the sovereignty and integrity of the country as a republic and the democratic way of life by parliamentary institutions based on free and fair elections.[35]

Parliament may delegate legislative power up to a point and beyond that limit, delegation will not be valid;[36] constitutional provisions guaranteeing freedom of trade and commerce also impose some restrictions on the parliamentary legislative power.[37] In addition, parliamentary taxing power is subjected to a few more

---

30. O. HOOD PHILLIPS, CONST. & ADM. LAW, 72 (1987).
In several cases, the British courts have ruled that Community law prevails over the local statutes made by the British Parliament. See, for example, Garland British Rail Engineering Ltd., [1983] 2 AC 751; McCarthys v. Smith, [1979] I.C.R. 785.

31. Infra, Ch. X.

32. Infra, Ch. X.

33. Art. 13(2); Part V, infra, Chs. XX to XXXIII.

34. Union of India v. Prakash P. Hinduja, (2003) 6 SCC 195 : AIR 2003 SC 2612.

35. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 399 : AIR 2003 SC 2363.

36. See. Sec. N., infra.

37. Arts. 301-307; infra, Ch. XV.

restrictions, e.g., under Art. 289, property and income of a State are exempt from Union taxation.[38]

The Indian Parliament is the creature of the Constitution. Therefore, a parliamentary law to be valid must conform in all respects with the Constitution. It is for the courts to decide whether an enactment is constitutional or not and they have the power to declare a parliamentary enactment void if it is inconsistent with a provision of the Constitution. The courts would refuse to give effect to any unconstitutional law.[39] There are procedures laid down in the Constitution through which courts may be invited to scrutinise legislation and ascertain if a constitutional restriction has been transgressed by Parliament in enacting a law.[40]

Contrasting the British Parliament with a legislature like the Indian Parliament, DICEY called the former as "sovereign" and the latter as "subordinate" or non-sovereign.[41] These terms are misleading as they create a false impression that the Indian Parliament is subordinate to some external authority or that India is not yet an independent country. A much better way to characterise the constitutional position of the Indian Parliament is to say that it is "sovereign within its powers".[42] Though its freedom of action is controlled by the Constitution, yet within the sphere and limits allowed to it, its powers are plenary, and it may pass laws of any sort.

Parliament has been assigned a place of importance in the governmental structure of the country. It is the source of all central legislation because legislative power of the Union has been assigned to it. If parliamentary legislation does not infringe any constitutional limit, then the function of the courts is only to interpret and apply the law; courts cannot then go into the policy or wisdom of legislation. The courts cannot declare a statute unconstitutional simply on the ground of unjust or harsh provisions, or because it is supposed to violate natural, social or political rights of citizens unless it can be shown that such injustice is prohibited, or such rights are protected, by the Constitution.

A Court does not declare an Act void because in its opinion it is opposed to the spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution but not so expressed in words. Legislative power is restricted only by the Constitution and not by any promise which the government may have undertaken, Parliament is fully competent to legislate no matter whether it would be contrary to the guarantee given, or any obligation undertaken, by the government.[43]

It is difficult on any general principles to limit the omnipotence of the sovereign legislative power by judicial interposition except in so far as the Constitution gives that authority.[44] It will thus be correct to say that within the permissible limits, the Indian Parliament is as omni-competent as the British Parliament. If no fetter is to be found in the Constitution itself, Parliament is competent to make a law even if it is contrary to the guarantee given, or obligation undertaken, by the government.[45]

---

38. Ch. XI, infra.
39. Ch. XL, Infra.
40. Chs. IV and VIII, infra.
41. DICEY, op. cit., 87-137.
42. See JENNINGS, CONSTITUTIONAL LAWS OF THE COMMONWEALTH, Vol I, 49 (1957).
43. Umeg Singh v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 540 : (1955) 2 SCR 164.
44. MAHAJAN, J., in the Gopalan case, AIR 1950 SC 27, 80 : 1950 SCR 88.
45. Umeg Singh v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 540 : (1955) 2 SCR 164; State of Kerala v. Gwalior Rayon Silk Mfg. Co., (1973) 2 SCC 713 : AIR 1973 SC 2734; also, IRANI, COURTS AND LEGISLATURES IN INDIA, 14 Int. and Comp. L.Q., 950 (1965).

Article 245(2) specifically provides that no law made by Parliament is to be invalid on the ground of its extra-territorial operation.[46] Nor is there any restriction on its power to amend, delete or obliterate a statute, or to give it prospective or retrospective effect,[47] or even to levy a tax retrospectively,[48] except in so far as it is banned by Fundamental Rights like Arts. 20(1), 14 or 19 (1)(g).[49] A tax law not contravening a constitutional prohibition, such as, Art. 14, cannot be declared invalid merely because it imposes double taxation,[50] or that it is confiscatory or expropriatory in nature, as such a power is "incidental to the power to levy the tax."[51]

If a law is struck down by the courts as being invalid for an infirmity, Parliament can cure the same by passing another law by removing the infirmity in question.[52] A law cannot however overrule a court decision.[53] As is discussed later, the courts have developed certain techniques by which they can by-pass the question of adjudicating the constitutionality of statutes.[54]

A law passed by Parliament can neither be invalidated on the ground of non-application of mind nor that of mala fides. Mala fides or ulterior motives attributed to Parliament in making a law within its competence can never make such law unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has observed: "The legislature, as a body, cannot be accused of having passed a law for an extraneous purpose... Even assuming that the executive, in a given case, has an ulterior motive in moving a legislation, that motive cannot render the passing of the law mala fide. This kind of 'transferred malice' is unknown in the field of legislation."[55]

While the courts can declare a statute unconstitutional when it transgresses constitutional limits, they do not enquire into the propriety of exercising the legislature power. It is assumed that the legislative discretion has been properly exercised. The courts do not scrutinise the motives of the legislature in passing a

---

46. Infra, Ch. X.

47. See, Rashid Ahmed v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1979 SC 592 : (1979) 1 SCC 596; K. Nagaraj v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 550 : (1985) 1 SCC 523; Dahiben v. Vasanji Kevalbhai, (1995) Supp. (2) SCC 295 : AIR 1995 SC 1215; State of Tamil Nadu v. Arooram Sugar Ltd., AIR 1997 SC 1815 : (1997) 1 SCC 326.

48. India v. Madan Gopal, AIR 1954 SC 158 : 1954 SCR 541; Udai Ram Sharma v. Union of India, AIR 1968 SC 1138.

49. For a discussion on these Articles, see, Fundamental Rights, Chs. XXV, XXI and XXIV, infra.

50. Avinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1979 SC 321, Govt. of A.P. v. Hindustan Machine Tools, AIR 1975 SC 2037.

51. Sundarajan and Co. v. State of Madras, AIR 1956 Mad. 298, at 300. But, see, under Art. 14, infra, Ch. XXI.

52. Rai Ramkrishna v. State of Bihar, AIR 1963 SC 1667; Jaora Sugar Mills v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1966 SC 416; Shri Prithvi Cotton Mills Ltd. v. Broach Borough Municipality, AIR 1970 SC 192; Tirath Ram v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 405 : (1973) 3 SCC 585; M/s Hindustan Gum & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1985 SC 1683 : (1985) 4 SCC 124 : AIR 1992 SC 522. Also see, Ch. XL, infra.

53. In re the Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal, 1992 AIR SCW 119 : AIR 1992 SC 522; infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. E; G.C. Kanungo v. State of Orissa, AIR 1995 SC 1655 : (1995) 5 SCC 96; S.R. Bhagwat v. State of Mysore, AIR 1996 SC 188 : (1995) 6 SCC 16.
For further discussion on this point, see, Ch. XL, infra.

54. Infra, under 'Constitutional Interpretation', Ch. XL.

55. K. Nagaraj, supra, footnote 47, at 566. Also, G.C. Kanungo v. State of Orissa, AIR 1995 SC 1655 : (1995) 5 SCC 96.
For discussion on the concepts of "non-application of mind" and "mala fides", see, JAIN, A TREATISE OF ADM. LAW, I, Ch. XIX, 890-928, 959-963; CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADMN. LAW, III, 2306-16; 2068-2135. Also, infra, Ch. XL.

statute.[56] The propriety, expediency and necessity of a legislative act are for the determination of the legislative authority concerned and are not for determination by the courts.[57]

COMPARISON WITH AMERICAN CONSTITUTION

In this respect the Indian Parliament corresponds with the American Congress. Each country has a written Constitution which is the fundamental law of the land. Each is a federation and in each Fundamental Rights have been guaranteed to the people. Thus, the American Congress, like the Indian Parliament, cannot enact a law which is against the Bill of Rights or which contravenes the scheme of distribution of powers or other constitutional provisions. The written Constitution is supreme and, therefore, a law made by the Congress, in order to be valid, must be in conformity with its provisions. If it is not so, the courts will intervene and declare the law to be unconstitutional and void. In practice, however, it is only rarely that the courts in India or the U.S.A. would hold a statutory provision to be unconstitutional.

N. DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER

This topic falls more appropriately under Administrative Law. Here the topic is discussed in bare outlines.

NECESSITY

In every democratic country, in modern times, relatively only a small part of the total legislative output is enacted by the legislature. A large bulk of legislation is issued as delegated legislation, in the form of rules, regulations or bye-laws. These are made by various administrative authorities under powers conferred on them by the legislature. In such a case, the authority acts as the delegate of, and within the framework of the power conferred by, the Legislature. In India, as elsewhere, the mechanism of delegated legislation is used extensively. Practically, every statute passed by Parliament or a State Legislature confers rule-making power on the government or on some other administrative agency.

Many reasons have contributed to this development. The role of the state has undergone a change over time. The laissez-faire state of the 19th century has given place to the welfare state. Vast technological developments have taken place. This has enormously increased the work of government necessitating a mass of legislation. Consequently, legislatures are faced with a great load of work as they have on the anvil many more bills than what they can conveniently dispose of.

To save its time, the legislature concentrates on defining the essential principles and policies in the legislation and leaves the task of enunciation of details to the administration. Besides, many socio-economic schemes undertaken by government are very technical and complicated; the Legislature is hardly competent to work out their details and so the matter has necessarily to be left to the professional administrators.

The mechanism of delegated legislation permits a certain amount of flexibility and elasticity in the area of legislation. It is much easier to make necessary adjustments in delegated legislation if circumstances so demand, than to secure an amendment of the statute through the legislature. Moreover, many serious situations arise frequently like labour disputes precipitating strikes and lockouts, internal commotion and external aggression, epidemics and floods. To meet such situations, it becomes necessary to keep the government armed with powers, including those of legislation, so that it may take effective action without loss of time.[58]

---

56. Gurudevdatta VKSSS Maryadit v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 2001 SC at 1986-87 : (2001) 4 SCC 534.

57. T. Venkata Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 724, 731 : (1985) 3 SCC 198.

LIMITS

An important question to consider in this area is whether under the Indian Constitution, there is any limit on the power of Parliament, or a State Legislature, to delegate its legislative power to the executive. No such question arises in Britain because of the doctrine of 'Sovereignty of Parliament.'[59] As the British Parliament can pass any legislation it thinks necessary and proper, it can delegate any amount of its law-making power. The position in the U.S.A. is different. The Congress functions under a written Constitution and so its powers are not uncontrolled. Also, the doctrine of Separation of Powers which operates there stands in the way of a mix up of legislative and executive powers.[60] But realities of the situation have asserted themselves and delegated legislation has come into vogue. The American courts have evolved the principle that the Congress can delegate legislative powers to the executive subject to the stipulation that it lays down the policies and establishes standards while leaving to the administrative authorities the making of subordinate rules within the prescribed limits.

The operation of this principle may be illustrated by reference to two cases, one, in which delegation was held bad and the other where it was held good. In Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan,[61] the Supreme Court held the delegation invalid because "the Congress has declared no policy, has established no standards, has laid down no rule. There is no requirement, no definition of circumstances and conditions in which the transportation is to be allowed or prohibited." In Yakus v. U.S.,[62] on the other hand, the Supreme Court held the delegation valid because the Congress had prescribed sufficiently definite standards to guide the discretion of the delegate. The pivot around which the whole delegation problem hinges in the U.S.A. is whether the 'legislative standard' is to be found in the delegating statute. In practice, however, it does not amount to much of a restriction on the Congress for, many a time, courts have held even 'vague' and 'general' standards to be sufficient to uphold delegations. A practical utility of the rule, however, is that courts have the last word and can declare the delegation excessive or unwarranted if they feel it to be so in a statute. In Britain, the last word rests with Parliament and not with the courts.

In India, on the question of delegation of its legislative power by a legislature to the executive, the position is very much similar to that in the U.S. A. The prevailing

---

58. WADE PHILLIPS, op. cit., 29, 605-612; REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MINISTERS' POWERS, (1931); H.W.R. WADE, ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 847-893 (1988). JAIN & JAIN, PRINCIPLES OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 25-101 (1979); JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Ch. IV (1996); JAIN, INDIAN ADM. LAW-CASES & MATERIALS, I, Ch. III (1994). This book is cited herein after as CASES I.
59. Supra, Sec. M.
60. Infra, Ch. III, Sec. E.
61. 293 US 388, CASES, I, 30.
62. 321 US 414; CASES, I, 35.

principle is that essential powers of legislation, namely, the function of laying down legislative policy in respect of a measure and its formulation as a rule of conduct, cannot be delegated. The legislature must declare the policy of the law and the legal principles which are to control any given cases and must provide a standard to guide the officials or the body in power to execute the law.[63]

The application of this principle to concrete fact situations can be illustrated with reference to some cases on both sides. In Raj Narain v. Chairman, Patna Administration Committee,[64] was involved Section 3(1)(f) of the Patna Administration Act which authorised the Bihar Government to "extend to Patna, provisions of any section of" Bihar and Orissa Municipal Act, 1922, "subject to such restrictions and modifications" as the government might think fit. The government picked out the section relating to the assessment of taxes from the Act and applied it to Patna in a modified form. The Supreme Court held Section 3(1)(f) valid subject to the stipulation that when a Section of an Act was selected for application, whether it was modified or not, it must be done so as not to effect any change of policy in the Act regarded as a whole. The notification in question was held invalid as it effected a radical change in the policy of the Act which was that no municipality competent to tax could be thrust upon a locality without giving its inhabitants a chance of being heard and objecting to it. This policy, the Court held, could not be changed by the delegated authority.[65]

In Devi Das Gopal Krishan v. State of Punjab,[66] a provision enabling the government to lavy sales tax at such rates as it deemed fit was held bad, but another provision enabling government to levy sales tax at rate not exceeding 2% was held valid.

The Minimum Wages Act has been enacted with a view to provide for fixing minimum wages in employments mentioned in a schedule annexed to the Act. Section 27 authorises the State Government to add to this schedule any other employment in respect of which the government thinks that the minimum wages should be fixed. The provision contains no principle on which the government is to select the industries for applying the Act. Yet, the Supreme Court held Section 27 valid in Edward Mills v. Ajmer[67] saying that the legislative policy was apparent on the face of the enactment, which was fixation of minimum wages with a view to obviate the chance of exploitation of labour in such industries where by reason of unorganised labour, or want of proper arrangements for effective regulation of wages, or for other causes, the wages of the labourers were very low. It is interesting to note that the test for selecting industries to be included in the schedule, which the Court propounded, was nowhere mentioned in the Act but was formulated by the Court itself to uphold the Act.[68]

---

63. In re Delhi Laws Act case, AIR 1951 SC 332 : 1951 SCR 747 ; Cases, I, 39; Gwalior Rayon Mills v. Asstt. Commr. of Sales Tax, AIR 1974 SC 1660 : (1974) 4 SCC 98; Jain, Cases, I, 48.

64. AIR 1954 SC 569; Cases, I, 101.

65. Also see, Lachmi Narain v. Union of India, AIR 1976 SC 714 : (1976) 2 SCC 953; Ramesh Birch v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 560 : 1989 Supp (1) SCC 430.

66. AIR 1967 SC 1895 : (1967) 3 SCR 557; Cases, 95; Also, V. Nagappa v. Iron Ore Mines Cess Commr., AIR 1973 SC 1374 : (1973) 2 SCC 1.

67. AIR 1955 SC 25, 32 : (1955) 1 SCR 735; Cases, I, 106.

68. The same principle has been applied in Mohmed Ali v. Union of India, AIR 1964 SC 980; Cases, I, 117; Jalan Trading Co. v. Mill Mazdoor Union, (1966) Labour L.J., 546; Cases, I, 118.

In Bhatnagars & Co. v. Union of India,[69] Section 3(1)(a) of the Imports and Exports (Control) Act, 1947, which authorises the Central Government to prohibit or restrict the import or export of goods of any specified description, was held valid. Curiously, however, the Supreme Court found the policy not in the Act itself but in its predecessor which was no longer operative. The Act states no policy, but it is an extremely important piece of legislation by which the whole of India's foreign trade is regulated. In its anxiety, therefore, to uphold the Act, the Court took recourse to the fiction of finding the policy in the repealed Act. Through this process, though the Act was saved, yet the efficacy of the principle requiring a delegating statute to contain a policy was very much diluted.

In Banarsi Das v. State of Madhya Pradesh,[70] a provision enabling the government to levy a tax on those items which the Act had exempted was held valid. It was argued against the provision that it was a matter of policy as to what goods should be taxed or exempted from taxation which the legislature alone could decide and not leave it to a delegate. The Court, however, stated that it was not unconstitutional for the legislature to leave it to the executive to determine details relating to the working of taxation laws, such as the selection of persons on whom the tax is to be levied, the rates at which it is to be charged in respect of different classes of goods and the like.

As regards delegation of legislative power on municipal bodies, the courts take a very liberal view. Broad delegations of powers to them have been upheld, the ground being that they are representative bodies. For instance, in G.B. Modi v. Ahmedabad Municipality,[71] the Supreme Court has upheld a provision conferring power on municipal corporations to levy tax on lands and buildings even though no maximum rate at which the corporation could tax was fixed. In welfare legislation, too, the courts favour a wider delegation of legislative power.[72]

Some statutes which directly established bodies corporate e.g. Major Port Trusts Act, 1963 confers power on the Central Government to issue binding directions to the Board of Trustees. It has been held that such a power does not extend to amend the regulations made by Port Authorities when statute itself confers powers on the Port authorities to make regulation relating to specified matters. The rule making power of the Central Government under Section 111 is to be exercised by the Central Government only in regard to the administration of the Port Trusts and such power must be construed strictly.[73]

CONCLUSION ON DELEGATION

It is no use multiplying cases on delegation of legislative power, as the topic is discussed more extensively and elaborately in the area of Administrative Law.[74] It is sufficient to state here that delegated legislation has come to stay. It is rec-

---

69. AIR 1957 SC 478 : 1957 SCR 701; CASES, I, 59.
70. AIR 1958 SC 909 : 1959 SCR 427; CASES, I, 70.
71. AIR 1971 SC 2100. Also see, Avinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1979 SC 321; Corporation of Calcutta v. Liberty Cinema, AIR 1965 SC 1107; CASES, I, 124; Municipal Corporation of Delhi v. Birla Cotton Spinning and Weaving Mills, AIR 1968 SC 1232 : (1968) 3 SCR 251; CASES, I, 132.
72. Registrar, Co-op. Societies v. K. Kunjabmu, AIR 1980 SC 350, 352 : (1980) 1 SCC 340; CASES, I, 77.
73. A. Manoharan v. Union of India, (2008) 3 SCC 641 : (2008) 2 SCALE 616.
74. See JAIN & JAIN, op. cit., 29-55. Also, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, Ch. IV; JAIN, INDIAN ADM. LAW, CASES & MATERIALS, Ch. III (1994).

ognised on all hands that the modern complex socio-economic problems cannot be met adequately without resorting to delegated legislation. The courts invariably reiterate the principle that the power delegated should not be unguided and uncontrolled and that the Legislature must lay down legislative policy and principles subject to which the delegate is to exercise its power.[75]

But it is only rarely that a statutory provision is declared invalid on the ground of excessive delegation,[76] and the judicial insistence on policy is more symbolic than real or effective. Usually, the courts lean in favour of the validity of the delegating legislation, and have upheld very broad delegations. Instead of looking at the legislation with a critical eye to find out the 'policy', the courts have adopted a liberal attitude and have at times themselves supplied or articulated the policy if one is not discernible on the face of the statute.[77] Even broad delegations of taxing power have been upheld.[78] For long, in democratic countries, taxation has been regarded a close preserve of the legislature, but by conceding broad delegations even in this area legislative responsibility has been eroded to some extent.

While it is inevitable that legislatures be allowed to delegate legislative powers on the executive,[79] and that is perhaps the only way in which modern complex socio-economic problems can be tackled successfully, yet the important consideration should not be lost sight of that if the delegate is given too broad power, he may use it in a way not contemplated by the legislature. The reason behind the judical insistence that the Legislature should state the policy while delegating legislative power is the anxiety that the delegate be kept within limits, that the delegate should function only to further the policy of the legislature and not supplant or modify it himself which will amount to usurping the function of the legislature. To effectuate this idea, it is necessary that, as far as possible, the legislature states the policy in clear and articulate terms so that it may be easy for the courts to ascertain whether the delegate is acting within, or exceeding, the scope of authority conferred on him. If the legislature uses very wide language to delegate power then it becomes difficult to control the delegate.

CONTROL OF DELEGATED LEGISLATION

The practice of the Legislature delegating to the Executive power to make rules or regulations, though inevitable in a modern state, nevertheless, is open to a few serious objections. It entails, to some extent, an abandonment of its legislative function by the Legislature. The so-called details which are left to executive determination are often matters of principle. Many a time, the legislature delegates powers without mentioning clearly the standards subject to which those

---

75. See, Gwalior Rayon, supra, note 88; See also Consumer Action Group v. Tamil Nadu, (2000) 7 SCC 425, 438 : AIR 2000 SC 3060.
Also see, The Quarry Owners Association v. State of Bihar, AIR 2000 SC 2870 : (2000) 8 SCC 655.

76. Harakchand v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1453 : (1969) 2 SCC 166, is one example of a delegation being held excessive; and so invalid, Cases, I, 97.

77. Bhatnagars, supra, note 69.

78. See, N.C.J. Mills Co. v. Asstt. Collector, Central Excise, AIR 1971 SC 454.

79. The Supreme Court has reiterated the inevitable need of delegated legislation in Tata Iron & Steel Co. v. Workmen, AIR 1972 SC 1917 : (1972) 2 SCC 383.

powers are to be exercised; sometimes standards mentioned are extremely vague and, thus, for all practical purposes, executive assumes uncontrolled and unguided power. In practice, the Legislature is not in a position to supervise effectively the use of delegated powers by the delegate. Sometimes, delegation is indulged in such broad and general terms that the courts become helpless to afford any relief against harsh or unreasonable executive action.

The system of delegated legislation adds considerably to the powers of the executive and correspondingly weakens the status of the legislature. Lastly, promulgation of rules by the executive lacks that publicity, discussion and consideration which usually accompany the passage of legislation through the legislature in a democratic country, and thus is lost that safeguard of liberty which depends upon the law-making power being exercised by the elected representatives of the people who will be affected by the laws that are made. Self-government is endangered when the representatives of the public do not effectively control the making of the laws which the people must obey. The basic problem in the area of delegated legislation therefore is that of controlling the delegate in exercising its legislative powers.

The most effective method to control delegated legislation is through the doctrine of ultra vires which means that a court can declare delegated legislation ultra vires if it falls outside the limits of the power to make delegated legislation which may have been conferred on the delegate. Delegated legislation is thus subject to judicial control.[80]

Another method of exercising this control is through the delegating legislature itself and for this purpose legislatures have established committees on subordinate legislation. Each House of Parliament has such a committee.[81] This is in recognition of the fact that as the legislature delegates power on the Administration, it is for it to ensure that the power is exercised properly. But this matter falls more appropriately within the area of Administrative Law rather than under the Constitutional Law.[82]

80. Kunj Behari Lal v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 2000 SC 1069 : (2000) 3 SCC 40.
For detailed discussion on the doctrine of ultra vires, see, JAIN, TREATISE, I, infra, footnote 82, Ch. V, 93-135; Jain, Cases, I, Ch. IV.

81. For details see, JAIN and JAIN, op. cit., 69-79; M P. JAIN, PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL OF DELEGATED LEGISLATION, 1964 Public Law, 33, 152.
Also see : The Quarry Owners Ass. v. State of Bihar, AIR 2000 SC 2870 : (2000) 8 SCC 655.

82. See, M.P. JAIN, EVOLVING INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 8-43 (1983); JAIN, A TREATISE OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, Ch. VI, 142-150; JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, Ch. IV.

CHAPTER III

CENTRAL EXECUTIVE

SYNOPSIS

Articles 52 to 78 of the Constitution deal with the Central Executive.

The Central Executive consists of the President and the Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister. It is of the parliamentary type in so far as the Council of Ministers is responsible to the Lok Sabha.

The President is the head of the State and the Formal Executive. All Executive action at the Centre is expressed to be taken in his name. According to Art. 53(1) : "The executive power of the Union shall be vested in the President and shall be exercised by him directly or through officers subordinate to him in accordance with this Constitution".[1]

The Constitution formally vests many functions in the President but he has no function to discharge in his discretion, or in his individual judgment. He acts on ministerial advice and, therefore, the Prime Minister and the Council of Ministers constitute the real and effective executive.

The structure of the Central Executive closely resembles the British model which functions on the basis of unwritten conventions. In India, however, some of these conventions have been written in the Constitution[2], e.g., provisions regarding appointment, tenure and collective responsibility of the Ministers. But some matters are left to conventions, as for example, the Cabinet, and the concept of Minister's responsibility for the acts of his subordinates.

A. ADMISSION TO THE EXECUTIVE ORGANS

(i) PRESIDENT

(a) ELECTION

In the Preamble to the Constitution,[3] India is declared to be a "Sovereign Socialist Secular Democratic Republic". Being a republic, there can be no hereditary monarch as the head of State in India, hence the institution of the President.

The President is elected not directly by the people, but by the method of indirect election. The constitution-makers were faced with the question whether the President should be elected directly by the people or not. Ultimately, they chose the indirect elective procedure so as to emphasize the ministerial character of the executive that the effective power resides in the Ministry and not in the President as such.

It would have been anomalous to have the President elected by adult suffrage directly by the people and not to give him any real and substantive power. Also

---

1. For comments on Art. 53, see, infra, Sec. B.
2. On conventions, see, Ch. I.
Reference to conventions has been made at several places in this Chapter.
Also see, Ch. XL, infra.
3. Supra, Ch. I.
Also see, Ch. XXXIV, infra.

the method of direct election would have been very costly and energy consuming. There was also the fear that a directly elected President may emerge, in course of time, as a centre of power in his own right. Therefore, the framers of the Constitution thought that it would be adequate to have the President elected indirectly. On the other hand, the framers of the Constitution did not want the President to be elected merely by Parliament alone as that would have been a very narrow basis, and Parliament being dominated by one political party would have invariably chosen a candidate from that party.[4] In that case, the President would not have commanded national consensus by an electoral college, consisting of the elected members of both Houses of Parliament and of the State Legislative Assemblies [Art. 54],[5] in accordance with the system of proportional representation by means of single transferable vote by secret ballot [Art. 55(3)].[6] The votes cast by all members of the electoral college are not of uniform value. Votes are apportioned amongst them according to the following two principles:

(1) As far as practicable, there is uniformity in the scale of representation of the different States at the presidential election [Art. 55(1)]. To achieve this result, a member of the electoral college from a State Legislative Assembly has as many votes as are obtained by the following formula [Art. 55(2)(a)]:

$$\frac{\text{State Population}}{\text{Total Number of elected members in the State Legislative Assembly}} \times \frac{1}{1{,}000}$$

This formula secures to a member of a State Legislative Assembly votes in the ratio of the population of the State and, thus, a smaller State having a relatively larger Legislature cannot swamp the votes of a larger State,[7] having comparatively a smaller legislature.

---

4. IV CAD, 713, 733-736.
Also see, AUSTIN, The Indian Constitution, 121 (1966).

5. Originally, the elected members of the Legislative Assemblies of Union Territories were not included in the electoral college to elect the President. In S.K. Singh v. V.V. Giri, AIR 1970 SC 2097, the Supreme Court had ruled that the term 'State' in Art. 54 did not include Union Territories.
After the above pronouncement, the Constitution (Seventieth Amendment) Act, 1992, added an explanation to Art. 54 saying that the term "State" in Arts. 54 and 55 includes the National Capital Territory of Delhi and the Union Territory of Pondicherry. Thus, the elected members of the Legislative Assemblies of Delhi and Pondicherry now have become part of the electoral college.
For explanation of the term "Union Territories", see, infra, Chs. V and IX.
For the Constitution Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.

6. The system of proportional representation ensures that the successful candidate is returned by an absolute majority of votes. If there are more candidates than two, it may be that by the simple majority rule, the person getting less than 51 per cent of votes cast, in the election may be declared elected; whereas, on the principle of proportional representation by the system of transferring votes, a candidate is finally declared elected by an absolute majority: IV CAD 880.
For a comment on the system of electing the President, see, BALKRISHNA, Election of the President of India, VII, Jl of Constitutional and Parliamentary Studies, (JCPS), 33 (1973).

7. Up to the year 2026, the figures of the State Population ascertained in the 1971 census will be taken for this purpose. Thus, increase in State population after 1971 is not going to increase its votes at the election of the President. See, S. 2 of the Constitution (Eighty-Fourth Amendment) Act, 2001.
If after taking the multiples of 1000, the remainder is not less than 500, then the vote of each member is increased by one [Art. 55(2)(b)].

(2) There is a parity of votes between the elected members of the Houses of Parliament, and of the State Legislative Assemblies, so that the former command the same number of votes in the electoral college as the latter. This result is achieved by the following formula which gives the number of votes available to a member of Parliament in the electoral college [Art. 552)(c)]:[8]

$$\frac{\text{Total number of votes assigned to the members of the State Legislative Assemblies in the Electoral College}}{\text{Total number of elected members of the two Houses of Parliament}}$$

In its advisory opinion in In re, Presidential Poll,[9] the Supreme Court has ruled that the election of the President can be held when a State Assembly has been dissolved under Art. 356 and its members are unable to participate in the election.[10]

Article 71(4) protects President's election from being challenged on the ground of the existence of any vacancy for whatever reason among the members of the electoral college electing him. The language of this provision is wide enough to cover vacancies arising in the electoral college because a State Assembly is dissolved.

(b) DISPUTES CONCERNING PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

All doubts and disputes arising in connection with the election of the President are to be decided by the Supreme Court whose decision is final [Art. 71(1)].

The Supreme Court has held that it would not entertain any petition challenging the Presidential election before the completion of the election process and declaration of the result.[11] The reason for this stand is that if a doubt or dispute arising in connection with the election of a President is brought before the Court before the whole election process is concluded, then conceivably, "the entire election may be held up till after the expiry of five years' term which will involve a non-compliance with the mandatory provisions of Art. 62."[12]

Under Section 14 of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential Elections Act, an election can be called into question either by a candidate at such election or by 10 or more electors. The Supreme Court has therefore held that a person who is neither a candidate nor an elector could not file a petition to challenge the Presidential election.[13]

If the election of a person as President is declared void by the Supreme Court, acts done by him in exercise and performance of the powers and duties of that office before the Court's decision are not invalidated [Art. 71(2)].

---

8. A fraction exceeding one-half is counted as one and a fraction less than one-half is to be disregarded [Art. 55(2)(c)].

9. AIR 1974 SC 1682 : (1974) 2 SCC 33. For advisory opinion of the Supreme Court, see, infra, Ch. IV, Sec. F.

10. For Art. 356, see, infra, Ch. XIII.

11. N.B. Khare v. Election Commission, AIR 1957 SC 694 : 1957 SCR 1081.

12. For Art. 62, see, infra, pp. 173, 174.

13. N.B. Khare v. Election Commission, AIR 1958 SC 139 : 1958 SCR 648.
For other challenges to the election of the President see, Babu Rao Patel v. Zakir Hussain, AIR 1968 SC 904 : (1968) 2 SCR 133; S.K. Singh v. V.V. Giri, AIR 1970 SC 2097 : (1970) 2 SCC 567.

(c) THE PRESIDENTIAL AND VICE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS ACT, 1952

Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, Parliament is empowered to enact legislation to regulate any matter connected with the election of the President [Art. 71(3)]. Accordingly, Parliament has enacted the Presidential and Vice-Presidential Elections Act, 1952 to carry out the purposes of Art. 71(1).

The Act lays down that a candidate can be nominated when at least 10 voters propose him and ten voters second him and he deposits a sum of Rs. 2500. These provisions have been held to be not inconsistent with Art. 58 which deals only with qualifications for the eligibility of a candidate. Art. 58 has nothing to do with nomination of a candidate.[14] These provisions are completely covered by Art. 71(1).[15]

A petitioner must come within the four corners of the Act to have locus standi to challenge the Presidential election and to be able to maintain the petition.[16]

(d) QUALIFICATIONS FOR PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

A candidate for the President's office should be a citizen of India, of at least thirty five years of age, and qualified to be elected as a member of the Lok Sabha [Art. 58(1)].

Further, he should not be holding any office of profit under the Central or State Government, or under any local or other authority subject to the control of any of these governments. The President or Vice-President of India, or the Governor of a State, or a Minister in the Central or State Government, is not disqualified to stand for the office of the President on the ground that he holds an office of profit [Art. 58(2)].

This restriction is broader than that under Art. 102,[17] as it even disqualifies the holder of an office of profit under a local or other authority which may be subject to governmental control from contesting for the President's office. In the case of Parliament, the disqualification extends only to the holding of an office of profit under the Central or State Government,[18] and not to the holding of office of profit under local or other authority.

A person who is or has been the President is eligible for re-election to that office if he fulfils the necessary conditions for this purpose as mentioned above [Art. 57].

(e) WHEN TO HOLD PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

Election to the President's office must be held before the expiry of the tenure of the President in office [Art. 62(1)].

---

14. For Art. 58, see below.
15. See above for Art. 71(1).
16. Charan Lal Sahu v. N. Sanjeeva Reddy, AIR 1978 SC 499 : (1978) 2 SCC 500.
Also see, Charan Lal Sahu v. Fakruddin Ali Ahmed, AIR 1975 SC 1288 : (1975) 4 SCC 832. Charan Lal Sahu v. Giani Zail Singh: (1984) 1 SCC 390: Charan Lal Sahu v. K.R.Narayanan, (1998) 1 SCC 56; AIR 1998 SC 1506*; Charan Lal Sahu v. A.P.J. Abdul Kalam,* (2003) 1 SCC 609 : AIR 2003 SC 548.
17. Supra, Ch. II.
18. Abdul Shakur v. Rikhab Chand, AIR 1958 SC 52 : 1958 SCR 387; Gurushanthappa v. Abdul, AIR 1969 SC 744; see supra, Ch. II., Sec. D(a).

If the office falls vacant by death, resignation or removal or otherwise, then election to fill the vacancy should be held within six months from the date of the occurring of the vacancy. The person so elected as the President is entitled to remain in office for the full term of five years from the date he assumes charge of his office [Art. 62(2)].

(f) OTHER CONDITIONS OF THE PRESIDENT'S OFFICE

Before entering upon his office, the President has to subscribe to an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form in the presence of the Chief Justice of India, or in his absence, of the senior-most Judge of the Supreme Court available at the time [Art. 60].

The President cannot hold any other office of profit [Art. 59(2)]. He cannot be a member of a House of Parliament or a State Legislature and if a member at the time of election, he automatically vacates his seat as soon as he assumes charge of the President's office [Art. 59(1)].

The President is entitled to the free use of his official residence and also to such emoluments, allowances and privileges as Parliament may determine by law [Art. 59(3)].[19]

The allowances and emoluments of the President cannot be diminished during his term of office [Art. 59(4)].

(g) TENURE

The normal tenure of the President is five years from the date on which he enters upon his office [Art. 56(1)], but he continues to hold office even thereafter till his successor enters upon his office [Art. 56(1)(c)].

The President may resign his office before the expiry of his normal tenure of five years by writing to the Vice-President [Art. 56(1)(a)]. The Vice-President has to communicate the President's resignation to the Speaker of the Lok Sabha [Art. 56(2)].

(h) IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT

The President may be removed from his office, before the expiry of his term, for "violation of the Constitution" by the process of impeachment [Art. 56(1)(b); Art. 61(1)]. The procedure for impeachment is as follows.

For impeachment, the charge against him may be preferred by either House of Parliament [Art. 61(1)].

The proposal to prefer the charge is to be put in the form of a resolution of the House. Such a resolution can be moved only after giving at least fourteen days' written notice signed by not less than one-fourth of the total number of members of the House [Art. 61(2)(a)]. The resolution must be passed by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the total membership of the House [Art. 61(2)(b)].

When one House thus prefers a charge, it becomes incumbent on the other House to investigate the same. Investigation may be made either by the House

---

19. Until so prescribed, he will get the emoluments etc. as laid down in the Second Schedule to the Constitution. Parliament has enacted the President's Emoluments and Pension Act, 1951.

itself or by some other agency as the House may direct. The President has the right to appear and be represented at such investigation [Art. 61(3)].

If after investigation, the House passes a resolution by a majority of not less than 2/3 of its total membership declaring that the charge preferred against the President has been sustained, it would have the effect of removing the President from his office from the date on which the resolution is so passed [Art. 61(4)].

There is however only a remote possibility of this provision being invoked because the President acts on the advice of his Ministers who are responsible to Parliament.[20] So long as he acts in this manner, the majority in Parliament need not invoke the provision regarding impeachment as it can easily remove the Council of Ministers. Nevertheless, the provision is salutary. Being otherwise immune from parliamentary and judicial control—he has a fixed term of office; his emoluments cannot be curtailed or diminished by Parliament during his term; he has immunity from judicial process[21] and the courts are barred from probing into the relationship between the President and the Council of Ministers [Art. 74(2)],[22] the fear that he may be impeached will keep the President within the framework of the Constitution and he will not dare to violate it.

The power to impeach might possibly be invoked in the event of the President acting independently of, or contrary to, ministerial advice, or for "treason, bribery or other high crimes or misdemeanours."[23] Impeachment is a political instrument; what constitutes 'violation of the Constitution' is a matter to be decided by the House which tries the charge and the House is essentially a political organ. There is no difficulty in the House interpreting the phrase 'violation of the Constitution' in a wider sense and regard a violation of the conventions, usages and spirit of the Constitution as violation of the Constitution. When forms are maintained and the spirit is sapped away the Constitution is violated.[24]

The idea of impeachment seems to have been borrowed from the U.S. Constitution.[25] According to Art. II, section 4 of the U.S. Constitution, the President can be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanours. According to Art. I, section 3, all impeachments are tried solely by the Senate and when the President is being impeached, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is to preside. To convict the President, concurrence of two-thirds of the members present is needed.[26]

Though the idea of impeachment has been borrowed from the U.S.A., it has been given an entirely new orientation in India, as will be clear from the following features:

(1) The President in India can be impeached only for violation of the Constitution and not for any criminal offence.

---

20. See, infra, Sec. B(a), on this point.
21. See below under Presidential Privileges : Art. 361.
22. See, infra, Sec. B(a).
23. See, infra, under "President—A Titular Head", Sec. B(a).
24. Also see infra, Ch. XIII; B.C. DAS, Impeachment of India's President: A Study of the Procedure, V JCPS 245 (1971).
25. See, infra, Sec. F.
26. In the U.S.A., the process of impeachment of the President (Andrew Johnson) was invoked in 1868 but it failed by one vote in the Senate. The procedure has been put into motion again recently to impeach President Clinton, but, ultimately, it failed because of lack of 2/3 votes in the Senate to convict the President.

(2) In India, impeachment can be tried by either of the two Houses of Parliament, and not necessarily by the Upper House [Rajya Sabha].

(3) There is no provision for the Chief Justice of India to preside at such sittings of the House when the charge against the President is being investigated.

(4) For conviction, in the U.S.A., votes of 2/3 of the members of the Senate present are needed, whereas, in India, votes of at least 2/3 of the total membership of the House is required. Therefore, in India, conviction on impeachment is more difficult.

(i) PRESIDENTIAL PRIVILEGES

The office of the President is very august and the Constitution attaches to it many privileges and immunities. He is not answerable to any court for the exercise and performance of the powers and duties of his office, or for "any act done or purporting to be done by him" in the exercise and performance of those powers and duties [Art. 361(1)].

The ambit of this immunity is very extensive. No court can compel the President to exercise or not to exercise any power, or to perform or not to perform any duty, nor can a court issue any writ in respect of the President's official acts or omissions. He is not amenable to any mandate, writ or direction from any court. No court can compel him to show cause or defend his action. In the case of official acts, an absolute immunity from the process of the court is given to the President.

The immunity extends to acts or omissions which may be incidental to, as well as to any act 'purporting to be done' by the President in, the exercise and performance of the powers and duties of his office. The words "purporting to be done" are of very wide scope. Even though the act is outside, or in contravention of, the Constitution, the President is protected so long as the act is professed to be done in pursuance of the Constitution.[27]

The immunity is, however, personal to the President. It does not place the action as such beyond court scrutiny in suitable actions or proceedings. Appropriate proceedings can be brought against Government of India [Proviso to Art. 361(1)]; only the President personally is not amenable to a court-process with reference to the act in question. It is axiomatic that lack of bona fides unravels every transaction yet when a question arises whether in a given situation the President has acted rightly or wrongly it may be decided only against the Government of India without questioning the President's conduct.[28]

When any official act of the President is challenged on the ground of mala fides, the immunity under Art. 361 extends to him and he cannot be called upon personally to defend himself against such an allegation. Nevertheless, the validity of the act can be questioned and the Government has to defend it.

---

27. Biman C. Bose v. H.C. Mookerjee, 56 CWN 651.
Also see, Satwant v. State of Punjab, AIR 1960 SC 266; Dhananjoy v. Mohan, AIR 1960 SC 745; Prabhakar v. Shankar, AIR 1969 SC 686 (688) : (1969) 2 SCR 1013.

28. Rao Birinder Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1968 Punj, 441; Madhav Rao Scindia v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 530 : (1971) 1 SCC 530: Bijayanand v. President of Union of India, AIR 1974 Ori. 52; K.A. Mathialagam v. The Governor, AIR 1973 Mad. 198.
Also see infra, Ch. XIII.

Government orders are issued in the name of the President as Art. 77(1) requires[29] all executive actions of the Central Government to be expressed in the name of the President. But such an order does not become an order passed by the President personally. It remains basically and essentially an order of the Minister on whose advice the "President" acted and passed the order. That being so, the order carries with it no immunity granted to the President under Art. 361. The Supreme Court has observed on this point.[30]

> "Being essentially an order of the Government of India, passed in exercise of its executive functions, it would be amenable to judicial scrutiny and, therefore, can constitute a valid basis for exercise of power of judicial review by this court. The authenticity, validity and correctness of such an order can be examined by this court in spite of the order having been expressed in the name of the President. The immunity available to the President under Art. 361 of the Constitution cannot be extended to the orders passed in the name of the President under Art. 77(1) or 77(2) of the Constitution."

Further, it is now a very well settled proposition that if the President appoints a disqualified person to a constitutional office, the discretion of the President to do so cannot be questioned because of Art. 361. But that would confer no immunity on the appointee himself. His qualification to hold the office can be challenged in quo warranto proceedings.[31] If the appointment is contrary to constitutional provisions, it can be quashed.[32]

A House of Parliament is not debarred from calling into question any act of the President in impeachment proceedings and for this purpose the House may appoint any court, tribunal or other body to investigate into a charge against the President [Proviso to Art. 361(1)].

No criminal proceeding whatsoever can be instituted against the President in [Art. 361(2)], and no process for the arrest or imprisonment of the President can issue from, any court during his term of office [Art. 361(3)]. Thus, no criminal proceedings can be taken against the President even for acts done in his personal capacity.

No civil proceedings claiming relief against the President in respect of any act done or purporting to be done by him in his personal capacity can be instituted during his term of office until a two months' notice in writing has been served on him stating the nature of the proceedings, the cause of action, the name, description and residence of the party taking legal proceedings and the relief claimed [Art. 361(4)].

In civil cases, a distinction is drawn between the President's official or personal acts. In respect of his official acts, an absolute bar has been created against a court action; in respect of his personal acts, there is only a partial bar in so far as a two months' notice needs to be given to him prior to the institution of civil proceedings.

---

29. See, infra, Sec. B(a), for this Article.

30. Common Cause, A Registered Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979 at 2991 : (1999) 6 SCC 667.

31. For a writ of quo warranto, see, Ch. VIII, infra.

32. See, Kumar Padma Prasad v. Union of India, infra, Chs. IV and VIII, under "Appointment of Judges".

Also, B.R. Kapur v. State of Tamil Nadu, JT 2001 (8) SC 40 : (2001) 7 SCC 231 : AIR 2001 SC 3435; infra, Ch. VII.

(ii) VICE-PRESIDENT

There is a Vice-President of India [Art. 63]. He is the ex-officio chairman of the Rajya Sabha [Art. 64]. In case the office of the President falls vacant due to death, resignation, removal or otherwise, the Vice-President acts as the President till the new President-elect enters upon his office [Art. 65(1)]. The Vice-President also discharges the functions of the President when he is unable to act owing to illness, absence or any other cause until the President is able to resume his duties [Art. 65(2)].

When the Vice-President acts as, or discharges the functions of, the President, he enjoys all powers and immunities enjoyed by the President. He is entitled to such emoluments, allowances and privileges as may be determined by Parliament by law. Until such a law is made, he receives such emoluments, allowances and privileges as are specified in the Second Schedule to the Constitution. [Art. 65(3)].

While acting as the President, the Vie-President ceases to act as the Chairman of the Rajya Sabha and he is not entitled to any salary or allowance payable to him in that capacity [Proviso to Art. 64].

Parliament is empowered to make such provisions as it thinks fit for the discharge of the President's functions in any other contingency not mentioned above [Art. 70]. In pursuance of this provision, Parliament has enacted the President (Discharge of Functions) Act, 1969. It provides that when vacancies occur in the offices of both the President and the Vice-President, the Chief Justice of India or, in his absence, the senior-most Judge of the Supreme Court available, is to discharge the President's functions until a new President or Vice-President enters upon his office.

(a) HOW ELECTED?

The Vice-President of India is elected by the members of an electoral college consisting of the members of both Houses of Parliament assembled in a joint meeting in accordance with the system of proportional representation by means of single transferable vote by secret ballot [Art. 66(1)].

The functions of the President extend both to the Central and the State spheres and, therefore, State representatives participate in his election along with the members of Parliament. The normal function of the Vice-President, on the other hand, is to preside over the Rajya Sabha. Only rarely, and that, too, only temporarily he may officiate as the President. That being so, it was not thought necessary by the framers of the Constitution to invite members of the State Legislative Assemblies to participate in the Vice-Presidential election.[33]

Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, Parliament is empowered to enact legislation to regulate any matter relating to the election of the Vice-President [Art. 71(3)].

All doubts and disputes arising out of, or in connection with, the election of the Vice-President are to be decided by the Supreme Court whose decision is final [Art. 71(1)]. The position in this connection is the same as discussed earlier in relation to the election of the President [Art. 71(1)].[34]

33. VII Constitutional Assembly Debates, 1001.

The election of the Vice-President also cannot be called in question on the ground that any vacancy exists in the electoral college electing him [Art. 71(4)]. If the Court declares the election of a person as Vice-President void, the acts done by him while in office before the Court's declaration are not invalidated [Art. 71(2)].

A candidate for the Vice-President's office should be a citizen of India, of at least thirty-five years of age, and qualified to be elected as a member of the Rajya Sabha [Art. 66(3)]. He should not be holding any office of profit under the Central or State Government or under any local or other authority subject to the control of any such government [Art. 66(4)]. However, the President or the Vice-President or a State Governor, or a Minister in the Central or a State Government, is not disqualified to contest election to this office [Expl. to Art. 66(4)].

Election to fill the Vice-President's office is to be completed before it falls vacant by efflux of the incumbent's term [Art. 68(1)]. In case vacancy arises for any other reason, election to fill the same is to be held as soon as possible after the vacancy occurs [Art. 68(2)]. The person thus elected is entitled to serve as Vice-President for the full term of five years from the date on which he enters upon his office [Art. 68(2)].

(b) OTHER CONDITIONS OF THE VICE-PRESIDENT'S OFFICE

Before entering upon his office, the Vice-President has to subscribe to, before the President or someone appointed by him for this purpose, an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form [Art. 69]. He cannot hold any other office of profit [Art. 64]. He cannot be a member of any House of Parliament or of a State Legislature and, if a member at the time of election, he automatically vacates his seat on the date he enters upon his office [Art. 66(2)].

As Chairman of the Rajya Sabha, the Vice-President is entitled to get such salary and allowances as may be fixed by Parliament by law, and until so fixed, as specified in the Second Schedule to the Constitution. [Art. 97]. He does not get any salary as Vice-President.

(c) TENURE

The normal tenure of the Vice-President's office is five years from the date on which he enters upon his office [Art. 67]. He would however continue to hold office even thereafter until his successor enters upon his office [Proviso (c) to Art. 67].

He may resign his office by writing to the President [Proviso (a) to Art. 67]. He may also be removed from office by a resolution passed by a majority of all the then members of the Rajya Sabha, and agreed to by the Lok Sabha. Such a resolution can be moved only when at least fourteen days' notice has been given of the intention to move it [Proviso (b) to Art. 67].

The above provision means that while in the Rajya Sabha there should be an absolute majority of the total membership (excluding those whose seats are vacant) of the House supporting the resolution to remove the Vice-President, a simple majority is sufficient in the Lok Sabha. Also, the resolution to remove the Vice-President is to be passed in the Rajya Sabha first, and then it is to be agreed to by the Lok Sabha. The preponderant voice in this matter has thus been given to the Rajya Sabha, the reason obviously being that he is its Chairman and is thus one of its officers.[35]

---

34. Supra, Sec. A(i)(b).

The procedure for removing the Vice-President is much simpler than that prescribed for removing the President. The President is removable by impeachment, but no such formal procedure is necessary to remove the Vice-President and only a resolution of both Houses is sufficient. The President can be removed only for violation for the Constitution, by a 2/3 vote in both Houses and after an enquiry into the charges against him. The Vice-President, on the other hand, can be removed on any ground, without a 2/3 vote in the two Houses, and without enquiry into the charges against him.

(iii) COUNCIL OF MINISTERS

Articles 74 and 75 which deal with the composition and status of the Council of Ministers are sketchy and very generally worded. The framers of the Indian Constitution left these matters undefined so that these may be regulated by practices and conventions.

The conventions operating in Britain, where a similar pattern of government prevails, are very relevant to India and can be adapted suitably to meet the conditions prevailing here. The Supreme Court has emphasized upon the importance of conventions to interpret these constitutional provisions in the following words:[36]

> "It was said that we must interpret Article 75(3) according to its own terms regardless of conventions that prevail in the United Kingdom. If the words of an article are clear, notwithstanding any relevant convention, effect will no doubt be given to the words. But it must be remembered that we are interpreting a Constitution and not an Act of Parliament, a constitution which establishes a Parliamentary system of Government with a cabinet. In trying to understand one may well keep in mind the conventions prevalent at the time the constitution was framed."

According to Art. 74(1), there shall be a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at its head to aid and advise the President who shall, in the exercise of his functions, act in accordance with such advice.

The provision that "there shall be a Council of Ministers" is mandatory and at no point of time can the President dispense with this body. The Council of Ministers remains in office even when the Lok Sabha is dissolved.[37] The Supreme Court has refused to accept the contention in U.N.R. Rao that during the dissolution of the Lok Sabha, there need be no Council of Ministers and that the President can rule with the help of advisers.

This argument was based on the hypothesis that when there is no Lok Sabha, the responsibility of the Council of Ministers to this House cannot be enforced

---

35. Supra, (ii).
36. U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi, AIR 1971 SC 1002, 1005 : (1971) 2 SCC 63.
On conventions, see, Ch. I, and also, supra, Ch. XL, infra.
37. Ibid.

and so there need be no Council of Ministers when there is no House[38]. The Supreme Court rejected the argument that, in the context, the word "shall' in Art. 74(1) should be read as "may". Just as Art. 52 ("there shall be a President of India") is mandatory so is Art. 74(1).

The Constitutent Assembly did not choose the Presidential System of Government.[39] Accepting the argument that Art. 74(1) is not mandatory would change the whole concept of the Executive. It would mean that the President need not have a Prime Minister and Ministers to aid and advise him in the exercise of his functions. In the absence of the Council of Ministers, nobody would be responsible to the Lok Sabha. The President would be able to rule with the aid of advisors till he is impeached. Therefore, the Court ruled that the word "shall" in Art. 74(1) sought to be read as meaning "shall" and not "may". Accordingly, "the President cannot exercise the executive power without the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers." It is thus clear that the President cannot function without a Council of Ministers at any time.

It may be noted that the Supreme Court has emphasized upon the theme of responsible government in India in a number of cases.[40] Thus, the Supreme Court has made a sterling contribution towards the promotion and strengthening of parliamentary system of government in the country.

Functions are conferred on the President by constitutional and statutory provisions. According to Art. 74(1) all these functions are to be discharged by the President on the advice of the Council of Ministers.

Under Art. 53(1), executive powers vested in the President are to be exercised by him either directly or through officers subordinate to him.[41] When the President acts directly, he acts on the advice of the Council of Ministers. Instead of the whole Council of Ministers, advice may be tendered to the President by one Minister. Advice tendered by one Minister is regarded as advice tendered by the Council of Ministers in view of the principle of collective responsibility[42] of the Council of Ministers. When a decision is taken by an official himself, he acts under the Rules of Business framed by the President under Art. 77(3).

What is the legal sanction behind the provision making ministerial advice binding on the President? Prima facie, the provision is cast in mandatory terms as the use of the word "shall" act in accordance with the advice of Council of Ministers would seem to indicate. But, legalistically speaking, the provision is at best merely of a directory nature because it is not legally enforceable through a court action.

No action can be brought against the President personally because of the ban placed on such legal actions by Art. 361.[43] Further, according to Art. 74(2), the

---

38. On dissolution of Lok Sabha see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(c).
On the question of accountability of the Council of Ministers to the Lok Sabha, see, infra, under "Collective Responsibility," Sec. B(d).

39. For discussion on the Presidential System, see, infra, Sec. F.

40. Reference may be made to the following cases in this connection : Ram Jawaya v. State of Punjab, AIR 1955 SC 549 : (1955) 2 SCR 225; A. Sanjeevi Naidu v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102 : (1970) 1 SCC 443; Samsher v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831; S.R. Bommai v. Union of India, (1994) 3 SCC 1 : AIR 1994 SC 1918.

41. Infra, Sec. B.

42. The principle of collective responsibility is discussed later in this book. See, infra, Sec. B.

43. Supra, under "Presidential Privileges," Sec. A(i)(i) courts are barred from enquiring into what advice, if any, has been given by the Ministers to the President.[44] Whatever advice the Cabinet or a Minister has given to the President is confidential, and the courts can neither take any cognisance thereof nor enquire as to what advice has been given by the Ministers to the President. The courts are, therefore, helpless in the matter in view of this constitutional provision. Thus, the matter lies outside the purview of the courts and any relief through the courts in such a situation does not seem to be possible.

The only sanction behind the provision would thus seem to be political, and, ultimately, there is the fear of impeachment of the President if he violates Art. 74(1) on a crucial matter by not acting on ministerial advice.[45] This may be regarded as "violation of the Constitution" in terms of Art. 56(b). But, as has already been discussed above, impeachment is a very complicated and cumbersome procedure, and it can be resorted to only by a very strong government having majority in one House and support of 2/3rd of total membership in another House. The Constitution stipulates that to remove the President from office it is necessary to pass the motion by not less than 2/3rd of the total membership of the House.

For all these reasons, the only conclusion is that that part of Art. 74(1) which makes the ministerial advice binding on the President is merely directory in nature. In Britain, it is a convention that the monarch acts on the advice of the Ministers. In India, an attempt has been made to codify this convention, but, in effect, it still remains a convention, and does not become a legally enforceable injunction.

(a) NON-JUSTICIBAILITY OF CABINET ADVICE

The next question is : what is the scope of the provision in Art. 74(2) which bars the courts from embarking upon an inquiry as to whether any, and if so what, advice was tendered by the Council of Ministers to the President.

The reasons which may have weighed with the Council of Ministers in giving the advice also form part of the advice and so are protected from judicial scrutiny. The notings of the officials which lead to the cabinet note leading to the cabinet decision also form part of the advice tendered to the President.[46] All this material is protected from disclosure under Art. 74(2).[47] Thus, the courts would be barred, because of Art. 74(2), from inquiring, for example, into the grounds which might have weighed with the Council of Ministers in advising the President to issue a proclamation under Art. 356.[48] However this rule has been whittled away in subsequent decisions.[49]

But the courts can compel production of the materials on which the decision of the Council of Ministers is based as such material does not form part of the ad-

---

44. See, below.
45. On Impeachment of the President, see, supra.
46. Harsharan Verma v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 1969 : 1987 Supp SCC 310.
47. Rao Birinder Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1968 P.H. 441, 450; State of Punjab v. Sodhi, AIR 1961 SC 493 : (1961) 2 SCR 371.
48. See, State of Rajasthan v. Union of India, AIR 1977 SC 1361 : 1977 (2) SCC 592, per BEG, C.J., at 1392; CHANDRACHUD, J., at 1420, and FAZL ALI, J., at 1440-41.
For discussion on Art. 356, see, infra, Ch. XIII.
49. See infra and Rameshwar Prasad (VI) v. Union of India, (2006) 2 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 980.

vice.[50] Therefore, the correspondence between the Chief Justice of India, the Chief Justice of the concerned High Court and the Central Government—which constitutes the material forming the basis of the Central Government's decision to continue or discontinue a High Court Judge—falls outside the exclusionary rule contained in Art. 74(2).[51]

The Supreme Court has clarified the implications of Art. 74 (2) in S.R. Bommai v. Union of India[52]. No court is concerned with what advice was tendered by the Minister to the President. The court is only concerned with the validity of the order and not with what happened in the inner councils of the President and the Minister. An order cannot be challenged on the ground that it is not in accordance with the advice tendered by the Minister or that it is based on no advice. If, in a given case, the President acts without, or contrary to, the advice tendered to him, it may be a case warranting his impeachment, but so far as the court is concerned, it is the act of the President.

Article 74(2) protects and preserves the secrecy of the deliberations between the President and his Council of Ministers. Its scope is limited. It does not immunize orders and acts done by the President in exercise of his functions. Art. 74(2) cannot override the basic provisions of the Constitution relating to judicial review. When any action taken by the President in exercise of his functions is challenged, it is for the Council of Ministers to justify the same, since the President acts under Art. 74(1).

Article 74(2) does not mean that the Government need not justify the act of the President taken in exercise of his functions. When act or order of the President is questioned in a court, it is for the Council of Ministers to justify the same by disclosing the material which formed the basis of the act/order.

The Court will not inquire whether such material formed part of the advice tendered to the President, or whether the material was placed before him, or what advice was tendered to the President, what discussions took place between the President and the Ministers and how was the ultimate decision arrived at. "The court will only see what was the material on the basis of which the requisite satisfaction is formed and whether it is relevant to the action taken".

The Court will not go into the correctness or adequacy of the material. The material placed before the President by a Minister does not become part of the advice. Advice is what is based upon the said material. Material is not advice. The material only because it was placed before the President in support of the advice does not become advice itself. It is difficult to appreciate how does the supporting material become part of the advice.[53] The Court disagreed in this respect with the reasoning of its own earlier decision in State of Rajasthan v. Union

---

50. Kartar Singh v. State of Punjab, JT (1994) 2 SC 423 : (1994) 3 SCC 569; R.K. Jain v. Union of India, (1993) 4 SCC 119 : AIR 1993 SC 1769.

51. S.P. Gupta v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 149 : 1981 Supp SCC 87, per BHAGWATI, J., at 230. This view overrules the view of GAJENDRAGADKAR, C.J., in State of Punjab v. Sodhi Sukhdev Singh, AIR 1961 SC 493, giving a broad meaning to the parallel provision in Art. 163(3), infra, Ch. VII.
Also see, R.K. Jain v. Union of India, (1993) 4 SCC 119 : AIR 1993 SC 1769.
For discussion on S.P. Gupta, see, infra, Ch. VIII.

52. AIR 1994 SC 1918 : (1994) 3 SCC 1. For further discussion on this case, see, Ch. XIII, infra.

53. Ibid., at 2073. All other Judges participating in this decision substantially agreed with this view.

of India.[54] The view expressed in Bommai's case was affirmed and extended in Rameshwar Prasad(VI) v. Union of India[55] and the views to the contrary in State of Rajasthan v. Union of India,[54] were held to be no longer the law. The majority held that Article 74(2) does not bar scrutiny by courts of the factual existence and relevance of the material on the basis of which advice is given by the Ministers to the President. The onus of proving the preconditions for the exercise of the President's power was on the Union of India. The mere ipse dixit of the Governor's report would not do. The courts can also scrutinise the reasons for such advice.[56]

The Court, in Bommai's case, also mentioned that while privilege in respect of presenting documents in the court may not be claimed under the constitutional provision in Art. 74(2), it may, nevertheless, be possible to claim privilege under S. 123, Evidence Act.[57] The field and purpose of S. 123 is entirely different and distinct from Art. 74(2). Art. 74(2) and S. 123 cover different and distinct areas. While justifying the government action in court, the Minister or the concerned official may claim a privilege under S. 123 and the court will decide the claim on its merits.[58]

This clause is designed to safeguard the confidentiality and secrecy of cabinet deliberations as well as of the advice tendered to the President by the Cabinet. The Supreme Court has ruled in Doypack[59] that "it is duty of this court to prevent disclosure where Art. 74(2) is involved." The Court has also ruled that "the notings of the officials which lead to the Cabinet note leading to the Cabinet decision formed part of the advice tendered to the President." Cabinet papers also include papers brought into existence for the purpose of preparing submission to the Cabinet.

This clause excluding the courts from the area of the President-Cabinet relationship also means that if the President refuses to act on the advice of the Cabinet in any particular instance, the courts are barred from compelling the President to act according to the cabinet advice, because the courts are barred from compelling production of the advice tendered by the Council of Ministers.

(b) APPOINTMENT OF PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister is appointed by the President [Art. 75(1)]. This is one act which the President performs in his discretion without the advice of the Council of Ministers or the Prime Minister. The question of appointment of a new Prime Minister usually arises either after holding a fresh election to Lok Sabha, or when the incumbent Prime Minister dies or resigns. In such a contingency, the President cannot act on the advice of any Prime Minister in the matter of selection and appointment of the Prime Minister.

While the Constitution prima facie appears to confer an unfettered discretion on the President to appoint whomsoever he likes as the Prime Minister, in practice, it is not so. A few conventions, and a few constitutional provisions indirectly, restrict his choice of a Prime Minister.

---

54. AIR 1977 SC 1361 : 1977 (2) SCC 592.
55. (2006) 2 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 980.
56. Ibid at pp. 119 and 124.
57. For discussion on S. 123, Evidence Act, see Jain & Jain, Principles of Adm. Law, Ch. XIX. Also see, R.K. Jain v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 1769 : (1993) 4 SCC 119.
58. Also see, A.K. Kaul v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1403, 1414-1415 : (1995) 4 SCC 73.
59. Doypack Systems v. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 782 : (1988) 2 SCC 299.

To keep the fabric of parliamentary government in proper working order, it is necessary that the Council of Ministers, of which the Prime Minister is the head, enjoys the confidence of the Lok Sabha. It is thus laid down that the Council of Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha [Art. 75(3)].[60]

It is, therefore, essential that the President appoints a person as the Prime Minister who has the support and confidence of a majority of the members of the Lok Sabha, otherwise he will not be in a position to form a stable Ministry and carry the House with him in his policies and programmes and the government cannot function. This means that the leader of the majority party in the Lok Sabha should invariably be invited to become the Prime Minister. This is the principal limitation in practice on the President's choice. As IVOR JENNINGS has asserted in the context of Britain: "If a party secures a majority and that party has a leader, that leader must become Prime Minister".

A well established convention in Britain has been that the Prime Minister should belong to the House of Commons.[61] The justification for the convention is not far to seek. The House of Commons is elected on the popular basis, reflects the public opinion more truly and faithfully than does the House of Lords, and plays a decisive role in the governmental process. The Cabinet is responsible to it; it controls the strings of the purse and thus it is here that the maintenance of party organization matters vitally. To carry on the government effectively, the Prime Minister cannot afford to be out of touch with the House of Commons. In the very nature of things, therefore, it is necessary that the Prime Minister should belong to the House of Commons so that he may carry the House along with him.

There is neither any specific provision in the Indian Constitution nor a mandatory convention debarring a member of the Rajya Sabha from becoming the Prime Minister. For example, Mrs. Indira Gandhi, a member of the Rajya Sabha, became the Prime Minister in 1966. But the fact that she was elected to the Lok Sabha soon thereafter also shows that it is considered desirable that the Prime Minister should belong to the Lok Sabha. Rajya Sabha is not a hereditary chamber like the House of Lords, and has contact with the contemporary public opinion as one-third of its members are indirectly elected every two years.

Also, a Minister who is a member of the Rajya Sabha has a right to participate in the proceedings of the Lok Sabha and vice versa [Art. 88].[62] Such is not the case in Britain where a Lord, even though a Minister, cannot participate in the proceedings of the House of Commons. In view of these circumstances, there may not be as much objection to a member of the Rajya Sabha becoming the Prime Minister as there is in the case of a peer becoming the Prime Minister in Britain. In fact, the present Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh, was appointed as such in 2004 when he was a member of the Rajya Sabha and in a departure with earlier convention he did not seek re-election to the Lok Sabha after resigning from the Rajya Sabha. But, keeping the best democratic traditions in view, and also to ensure smooth working of the governmental machinery, it is preferable that a member of the Lok Sabha rather than that of the Rajya Sabha should

---

60. See, infra, Sec. B(d).

61. WADE AND PHILLIPS, op. cit, 244 (IX Ed.).
LORD HOME renounced his peerage in Oct., 63, to become the Prime Minister.

62. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(h).

be the Prime Minister. In any case, a member of the Rajya Sabha on becoming the Prime Minister should seek election to the Lok Sabha at the earliest opportunity.

In the matter of appointment of the Prime Minister, the President thus enjoys some marginal discretion his discretion being limited to choosing a person who is qualified to be a member of Parliament under Article 84 and not disqualified under Article 102, who is either a member of Parliament or has the potentiality to be so elected within six months of his appointment and who can command the support of the majority of the members of the Lok Sabha.[63] In a recent decision, the Supreme Court held that there was no requirement under the Constitution which required a person elected to the Rajya Sabha to either be a voter or a resident in the State which the person is chosen to represent.[64] At critical moments, the choice of the Prime Minister by the President may prove to be extremely crucial. When a party has a clear majority in the Lok Sabha, the President has to induct the acknowledged leader of the party into the Prime Minister's office, and the President's power in such a case is merely formal. If, however, the political situation is not clear and no party has a clear majority, then the President will have some scope to exercise his own judgment as to who amongst the several aspirants to the office has the best chance of forming a stable Ministry and secure confidence of the Lok Sabha.

But even here it may be desirable to have some agreed conventions for the guidance of the President, e.g., that he may invite the leader of the largest party in the Lok Sabha to form the government. In the ultimate analysis, however, the President's choice of a Prime Minister is controlled, in practice, by the will of the majority in the Lok Sabha.

Even a minority government may remain in office for sometime with the parliamentary support of some other parties for its policies. For example, towards the end of 1969, Indira Gandhi's Government, though numerically in a minority in the Lok Sabha remained in power for quite some time. There were several occasions when the Gandhi Government was challenged on the floor of the House, but the opposition motions were defeated with wide margins.

If two or more parties enter into a coalition and thus secure a majority in the Lok Sabha, then again the President would have no option but to induct the acknowledged leader of the coalition into the Prime Minister's office. In 1977, the Janata Party, a combination of several parties, secured a majority. The leader of the Janata Party was appointed as the Prime Minister. After the break of this party, in 1979, Chaudhury Charan Singh, leader of a faction of the Janata Party, was appointed as the Prime Minister as he was being supported by the Congress Party from outside, i.e. without participating in the Council of Ministers.

Although he did not command an absolute majority in the Lok Sabha, he, nevertheless, enjoyed support of more members than Morarji Desai who had just resigned as the Prime Minister.[65] The President at the time expressed the wish that "in accordance with the highest democratic traditions and in the interest of establishing healthy conventions", the Prime Minister should seek a vote of confidence in the Lok Sabha at the earliest. Within a few days, the Congress Party withdrew its support and Charan Singh was reduced to a minority in the Lok Sabha. The House was then prorogued by the President on the advice of the new Prime Minister. Charan Singh could not seek a vote of confidence from the House. Incidentally, he was the only Prime Minister who remained in office for a while without obtaining a vote of confidence from, and without ever facing, the Lok Sabha.

63. Ashoke Sen Gupta v. Union of India, 1996 (II) CHN 292, 297.
64. Kuldip Nayar v. Union of India, (2006) 7 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 3127.
65. To assess the support enjoyed by each leader in the House, the President asked them both to submit lists of their supporters.

A petition was moved in the Delhi High Court for the issuance of a writ of quo warranto challenging the appointment of Charan Singh as the Prime Minister. The Court however rejected the petition.[66] The Court rejected the argument that it is only after a member of the Lok Sabha secures the vote of confidence of the Lok Sabha that he should be appointed as the Prime Minister. The Court argued that to accept this contention would virtually amount to saying that it is not the President but the Lok Sabha who should select the Prime Minister. Under the Constitution, such a function is to be performed by the President.[67] He has, of course, to respect the constitutional conventions in choosing the Prime Minister.

The Court argued further that the existence of the Council of Ministers precedes, in order of time, the vote of confidence or no confidence in the Council of Ministers by the Lok Sahba. It is not possible to expect the Council of Ministers to seek the approval of the House immediately on appointment.[68] The Court also held it proper and constitutional in the circumstances to prorogue the House.[69] The President exercised his discretion after considering the advice of the Council of Ministers and in a difficult and extraordinary situation. The legal status of the new government under Charan Singh as the Prime Minister being according to the conventions and the Constitution, the President could accept its advice to prorogue the House.

After some time, Charan Singh Ministry resigned and advised the President to dissolve the House and hold fresh election to the Lok Sabha.[70] The President, accordingly, dissolved the House and asked the Ministry to remain in office till other arrangements could be made. At this stage, another petition for quo warranto[71] was moved in the Calcutta High Court to show cause under what authority the Prime Minister and his colleagues resolved to advise the President to dissolve the Lok Sabha and also to show cause as to why Charan Singh should not be removed from the office of the Prime Minister.

After a review of the relevant cases[72] and the conventions prevailing in Britain,[73] the Court in Madan Murari v. Chaudhury Charan Singh,[74] rejected the petition. The Court observed that despite the 42nd Amendment,[75] the President acts in his own discretion in choosing the Prime Minister. In making his assessment

---

66. Dinesh Chandra v. Chaudhuri Charan Singh, AIR 1980 Del. 114.
67. Supra, under "Council of Ministers", Sec. A(iii).
68. Infra.
69. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(a).
70. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(c).
71. Infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. E.
72. Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831; infra, Sec. B; U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi, AIR 1971 SC 1002 : (1971) 2 SCC 63; supra.
73. Supra, under "Council of Ministers"; infra, under "Collective Responsibility."
74. AIR 1980 Cal 95.
75. Infra, Ch. XLII.

as to who as the Prime Minister will enjoy the confidence of the Lok Sabha he is not fettered in his choice except by his own assessment, and the court could not sit in judgment on the political assessment of the President. Whether he was politically justified or not in appointing the Prime Minister is not a matter for the court to determine.

Thus, in the facts and circumstances of the case, the President was legally and constitutionally justified in calling upon Charan Singh to form the Ministry. Once the Ministry was formed it was competent constitutionally and legally to function and aid and advise the President in terms of Art. 74(1) until the Cabinet resigned on the 20th August, 1979.

It was constitutionally within the discretion of the President to accept the Cabinet's advice to dissolve the Lok Sabha. The President was not bound to accept that advice; he was free to accept or not to accept that advice. The President did not act unconstitutionally in accepting that advice. After the Prime Minister and the Council of Ministers tendered their resignation, their continuance in office until alternative arrangements could be made as directed by the President was mandatory and an imperative obligation for them as they held their office during President's pleasure.

The Court however expressed the view that the government should now function only as a caretaker government and carry out only day to day administration and defer all policy questions which could await disposal by a Council of Ministers responsible to the Lok Sabha. This was so because the government had never proved its responsibility to Parliament; it resigned before facing a vote of confidence and it was an unprecedented situation that such a government should give advice to the President which would be binding on him.

Accordingly, the President could refuse to accept any advice which went beyond the day to day administration. This no doubt would give powers to the President not expressly conferred on him by the Constitution, but having regard to the basic principle behind the Constitution, in the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case, that "is the only legitimate, legal and workable conclusion that can be made."

Needless to say, Chaudhury Charan Singh episode constituted an unprecedented situation. Here was a Council of Ministers which never faced the Lok Sabha for a single day, never proved its responsibility to the House, which resigned before facing a vote of confidence, and which was aiding and advising the President in the discharge of his functions. The whole episode cannot be regarded as being in the best traditions of constitutionalism and the Parliamentary system.

In 1985, when Prime Minister Indira Gandhi was assassinated, the Congress Party, which had a majority in the Lok Sabha, had no acknowledged leader. The calling of a meeting of the Congress Legislature Party would have taken a few days, but it was necessary to appoint the Prime Minister immediately. At this critical moment, President Zail Singh immediately appointed her son Rajiv Gandhi as the Prime Minister without waiting for his being formally elected as the leader of the Congress Party. It was only after his appointment as the Prime Minister that he was elected as the leader of the majority party.

In 1989, V.P. Singh was appointed as the Prime Minister even though his party had no clear majority as the party had only 176 members in a House of 520.

The BJP promised to support V.P. Singh from outside without itself participating in the government. V.P. Singh succeeded in getting a vote of confidence from the House.[76] After some time, BJP withdrew support. Though V.P. Singh was reduced to minority in the House, yet the President did not ask him to vacate his office immediately but gave him time to prove his majority in the House. V.P. Singh resigned when he failed to secure the vote of confidence from the House.

In November, 1990, Chandra Sekhar was appointed as the Prime Minister. Though he led a minority group, he was promised support from outside by the Congress Party and was thus able to muster a majority support in the Lok Sabha.[77] After some time, the Congress Party withdrew support, and, consequently, Chandra Sekhar resigned and recommended dissolution of the House and holding of fresh elections.

In 1991, fresh elections were held for the House. Again, no party emerged with a clear-cut majority in Lok Sabha. Narasimha Rao, leader of the Congress Party, was appointed as the Prime Minister. Though he had no majority support, he was the leader of the largest party. The party position in Lok Sabha at the time was that the Congress Party had 251 members in a House of 528 members and, thus, it was short by 14 members for a simple majority. No other party at the time staked its claim to form the government. The President asked Rao to establish his majority in the Lok Sabha in four weeks.[78] Not only was Rao able to do so but, in course of time, he succeeded in mustering a majority in the House and was thus able to stay as the Prime Minister for a full five year term.

In 1996, Lok Sabha was dissolved at the end of its term of five years and general elections held which resulted in a Parliament with no party having a majority in the Lok Sabha. The Congress Party which was the ruling party before the elections (1991-1996) could secure only 135 seats in a House having 520 members. The Bhartya Janata Party (BJP) secured 162 seats. The United Front (Leftist Parties along with Janta Dal and a few other regional parties) secured 178 seats and the rest of the seats went to Independents and small groups. The President invited the leader of the BJP which was the single largest party to form the government with the stipulation that it should secure a vote of confidence in the Lok Sabha within 15 days. Prime Minister Atal Beharee Vajpayee having failed to secure such a vote resigned just after 13 days.

The President then invited the leader of the United Front which had been promised support from outside (without participation in the government) by the Congress Party. The President appointed Deve Gowda, who was not a member of either the Rajya or the Lok Sabha and did not belong to any political party but had the support of the majority of the members. This Government lasted for nearly two years (with a change of leadership in between). It resigned in December, 1997 when the Congress Party withdrew support.

---

76. The President had imposed a condition on him to get a vote of confidence from the Lok Sabha. See, R. VENKATARAMAN, MY PRESIDENTIAL YEARS, 324 (1994).

77. When Chandra Shekhar was appointed as the Prime Minister, the President was satisfied prima facie that he had the strength to form a viable government. Nevertheless, the President stipulated that the Prime Minister should prove his majority in the Lok Sabha. See, VENKATARAMAN, op. cit. 443.

78. Venkataraman, op. cit., 553.

The House was dissolved and fresh elections were held in March, 1998. Again, no majority party emerged in the Lok Sabha. Atal Behari Vajpayee, the leader of the BJP (being the largest single party having 162 members as against 141 members belonging to the Congress Party), was able to form a coalition with several small regional parties and having thus got a majority was invited to form the government. Atal Behari Vajpayee became the Prime Minister again and was able to win a vote of confidence in the Lok Sabha. In the general elections held in 2004 and 2009, the government in the centre was formed by the Congress, which emerged as the largest single party, with the support of other political parties.

It is clear from the above events that the President seeks to put in office a Prime Minister who is able to muster majority support in the House. This accords with the view expressed by S.A. de Smith as regards Britain that when "no party has an overall majority in the House", the Queen will have to decide who has "a reasonable prospect" of maintaining himself in office. "That person will normally, but not invariably, be the leader of the largest party in the House of Commons".

At times, a Deputy Prime Minister is appointed though no such office is created by the Constitution. A question has been raised whether the taking of oaths as the DPM is constitutionally valid as there is no separate oath prescribed for the DPM. The Supreme Court has ruled that the DPM is just a Minister and he takes the same oath as a Minister does. Though described as the DPM, such description does not confer on him any of the powers of the Prime Minister.[79]

(c) APPOINTMENT OF MINISTERS

A Minister should, normally speaking, be a member of a House of Parliament. It is a well established convention in all countries having the Parliamentary system[80] but not, an absolute rule; even a non-member may be appointed as a Minister, but he must sooner than later become a member of a House.

In India, the same practice prevails. If, however, a non-member is appointed as a Minister, he cannot hold the office for longer than six months without becoming a member of a House of Parliament in the meantime. A Minister who for a period of six consecutive months is not a member of a House of Parliament ceases to be a Minister at the expiry of that period [Art. 75(5)].

This provision ought to be read along with Art. 88[81] which permits a Minister to participate in the proceedings of a House of which he is not a member. This means that a Minister who is not a member of any House can speak in, and participate in the proceedings of, any House, but he does not have a right to vote in any House. Thus, the Minister can function effectively even though not a member of any House.

The rule that Ministers should be members of Parliament is, indeed, essential to the smooth and proper working of parliamentary form of government. Their presence in Parliament makes a reality of their responsibility and accountability

---

79. K.M. Sharma v. Devi Lal, AIR 1990 SC 528 : (1990) 1 SCC 438.

80. SIR IVOR JENNINGS, CABINET GOVERNMENT, 60 (IIIrd ed.); WADE & BRADLEY, CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 268; PETER W. HOGG, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF CANADA, 243 (4th ed.); State of South Wales v. Commonwealth of Australia, 108 ALR 577.

81. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(h).

to Parliament, and facilitates co-operation and interaction between them and Parliament, both these features being vital to parliamentary government.

To appoint a non-member of the Parliament as a Minister does not militate against the constitutional mechanism or democratic principles embodied in the constitution. A non-member can remain a Minister only for a short period of six months and as a minister he is collectively responsible to Lok Sabha. There are several reasons for permitting a non-member to be appointed as a Minister for a short duration. A person who may be competent to hold the post of a Minister may be defeated in the election. There is no reason why he cannot be appointed as a Minister pending his election to the House.

There is no condition that only a member of a House of Parliament can be appointed as the Prime Minister. A non-member, even a member of a State Legislative Assembly, may be appointed as the Prime Minister. However, his appointment as the P.M. would remain valid if within six months, he becomes a member of a House of Parliament and resigns his seat in the Legislative Assembly.

Under Art. 75(5)[82], a person who is not a member of any House of Parliament can be appointed as a Minister. He has to become a member of either House within six months otherwise he ceases to be the Minister. The term 'Minister' in Art. 75(5) includes the Prime Minister. The Supreme Court has repudiated the suggestion that appointment of a non-member as the Prime Minister is anti-democratic. Only a person who, the President thinks, commands the confidence of the Lok Sabha is appointed as the Prime Minister. The Council of Ministers of which he is the head is collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha. Therefore, even though the Prime Minister is not a member of Parliament, he is the one who commands the support of a majority of members of the Lok Sabha and he becomes answerable and accountable to the House and this ensures the smooth functioning of the democratic process.

Shri Sitaram Kesari was appointed as a Minister of State in the Central Cabinet. His appointment was challenged in a writ petition on the ground that he was not a member of either House of Parliament at the time of his appointment and so he could not be appointed as a Minister. The writ petition was dismissed as under Art. 75(5), a person not being a member of a House could be appointed as a Minister upto a period of six months.

Reading Arts. 75(5) and 88 together,[83] the Supreme Court has reiterated in Harsharan Verma v. Union of India:[84]

> "The combined effect of these two Articles is that a person not being a member of either House of Parliament can be a Minister up to a period of six months. Though he would not have any right to vote, he woud be entitled to participate in the proceedings thereof."

Shri H.D. Deve Gowda, who was not a member of either House of Parliament was appointed as the Prime Minister of India. His appointment was put in issue.[85]

---

82. Supra.

83. For Art. 88; see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(h). According to Art. 88, a Minister, even though a non-member, can participate in the proceedings of a House without vote.

84. AIR 1987 SC 1969 : 1987 Supp SCC 310.

85. S.P. Anand v. H.D. Deve Gowda, AIR 1997 SC 272 : (1996) 6 SCC 734.
Also see, Janak Raj Jai (Dr.) v. H.D. Deve Gowda, (1997) 10 SCC 462.

The Supreme Court upheld the appointment. The Court also repelled the argument that if a non-member is appointed as the Prime Minister, it would be against national interest. Once appointed as the Prime Minister, he becomes responsible and answerable to the House. The Court observed:

> "Even if a person is not a member of the House, if he has support and confidence of the House, he can be chosen to head the Council of Ministers without violating the norms of democracy and the requirement of being accountable to the House would ensure the smooth functioning of the democratic process."

The Supreme Court has made a pronouncement of great constitutional significance in S.R. Chaudhuri v. State of Punjab.[86] The question which arose in the instant case was as follows : a person who is not a member of a House of Parliament is appointed as a minister. He resigns after six months, as required by Art. 75(5), as he fails to become a member of a House of Parliament in the meantime. Can he be re-appointed as a minister for another term of six months? Can a person be appointed repeatedly as a minister for a period of six months at a time even though he is not a member of a House of Parliament?

Although Art. 75(5) does not specifically bar such a practice, if a literal view is adopted thereof, the Supreme Court has banned it in Chaudhuri characterising it as "undemocratic"; it would be "subverting the Constitution" to allow such a practice. The Court has observed further : "The practice would be clearly derogatory to the constitutional scheme, improper, undemocratic and invalid." Art. 75(5) is in the nature of an exception to the normal rule that only members of Parliament can be appointed as ministers. "This exception is essentially required to be used to meet very extraordinary situation and must be strictly construed and sparingly used."[87] This means that within the life time of Parliament for five years, a person who is not a member of a House of Parliament, can be appointed as a minister only once and that too for a short period of six months.

The Chaudhuri case arose the State of Punjab under Art. 164(4) which applies to the appointment of ministers in a State and is in pari materia with Art. 75(5). Therefore, whatever is said in relation to Art. 164(4) applies to Art. 75(5) as well and vice versa.[88]

In a very significant pronouncement, viz. B.R. Kapur v. State of Tamil Nadu,[89] the Supreme Court has read a significant restriction in Art. 75(5). The Supreme Court has ruled that under Art. 75(5), a person who is not a member of a House of Parliament can be appointed as the Prime Minister or a Minister only if he has the qualifications for membership of Parliament as prescribed by Art. 84[90] and is not disqualified from the membership thereof by reason of the disqualifications set out in Art. 102.[91]

---

86. AIR 2001 SC 2707 : (2001) 7 SCC 126.
87. Ibid, at 2720.
88. For Art. 164(4) and a detailed discussion on the Chaudhuri case, see, Ch. VII, infra.
89. JT 2001 (8) SC 40 : (2001) 7 SCC 231 : AIR 2001 SC 3527. The case arose under Art. 164(4) but the principle is equally applicable to Art. 75(5) as both the provision are similar in phraseology.
For further discussion of this issue, see, infra, Ch. VII.
90. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. A(iii)(c).
91. Ibid.

The Ministers are appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister [Art. 75(1)]. In effect, therefore, Ministers are the nominees of the Prime Minister. The President depends entirely on the Prime Minister's advice in this matter; he does not have much of a choice in the matter and his function in this respect is purely formal.

The Constitution does not contain any restriction on the Prime Minister's choice of his colleagues. In practice, his choice is governed by many considerations, such as party standing, capacity, educational skill, willingness to carry out a common policy, regional representation and representation of backward or scheduled classes and minorities. However, since 2004, the total number of Ministers including the Prime Minister cannot exceed 15% of the total number of members in the Lok Sabha [Article 75(1B)][1]

The President administers to a Minister, before he enters upon his office, the prescribed oaths of secrecy and office [Art 75(4)].

It is for Parliament to prescribe salaries and allowances of Ministers from time to time by law [Art. 75(6)]. The Salaries and Allowances of Ministers Act, 1952, has been passed for this purpose.

(d) MINISTERIAL TENURE

On this question, two constitutional provisions, viz., Art. 75(2) and 75(3) come into play. Ex facie these provisions seem to be inconsistent with each other but, in practice, it is not so and these provisions can be reconciled.

The Council of Ministers remains in office so long as it enjoys the confidence of the Lok Sabha and a majority of members in that House back and support it. It should resign when it is unable to command this confidence. This is the inevitable result of Art. 75(3) which requires the Council of Ministers to be collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha. The provision brings into existence responsible government. It means that the tenure of the Ministry is determined by the House. However, Art. 75(3) operates only when the Lok Sabha is not dissolved. When the Lok Sabha is dissolved, the Council of Ministers naturally cannot enjoy the confidence of the House.[2]

Another constitutional provision having a bearing on the question of ministerial tenure is Art. 75(2), according to which, Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the President. Prima facie it would mean that the ministerial tenure is within the President's discretion and that a Minister may legally be dismissed by him as and when he likes. Ex facie, there appears to be an inconsistency between Arts. 75(2) and 75(3), but, in practice, this is not so. Reading Arts. 75(2) and 75(3) together, the position seems to be that the President's power to dismiss the Ministry is subject to democratic controls.

The President's power of dismissal is conditioned by the need to keep in office a Ministry able to command the confidence of the Lok Sabha and, therefore, he is not expected to dismiss a Ministry so long as it enjoys this confidence.[3] The reasons for the proposition are not difficult to discern. It is mandatory for the Presi-

---

1. Inserted by the Constitution (Ninety-first Amendment) Act, 2003 with effect from 2-1-2004.
2. U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi, supra, under "Council of Ministers".
3. M. RAMASWAMY, "The Constitutional Position of the President of the Indian Republic," 28 Can. B.R. 648 (1950); infra, Sec. B(d).

dent to have a Council of Ministers. If, therefore, the President acts in a high handed manner and dismisses from office a ministry enjoying the confidence of the House, the alternative Ministry which he installs will be a minority Ministry. Such a Ministry will find it practically impossible to carry on government because the majority in the House will not support it. The Ministry cannot carry out its policy; legislation desired by it will not be passed and the House may even refuse funds to it. The President's position itself becomes vulnerable as the majority party whose Ministry has been dismissed by the President may even move for his impeachment.[4]

In view of these dangers, it may be safely assumed that the power of the President to dismiss a Ministry is more formal than substantial. It is to be used by him to throw a Ministry out of office, not when it enjoys, but when it forfeits, the confidence of the Lok Sabha. Ordinarily, a Ministry losing the confidence of the House will itself resign, or seek a dissolution of the House[5]. But in case it sits tight and takes no action one way or the other, the President will use his power, dismiss the Ministry and install into office another Ministry able to command the confidence of the House.

The President's power, therefore, is a reserve power to be used by him in case of a clear manifestation of lack of Parliament's confidence in the Ministry. This power is to be used to support, and not to thwart, the Constitution and the institution of representative government in the country. 'During pleasure' does not mean that the 'pleasure' shall continue notwithstanding the fact that the Ministry has lost the confidence of the majority.

A President who dismisses Ministers would be regarded as the ally of the opposition, and as such be made the subject of attack. His function is to see that the Constitution functions in the normal democratic manner. It is for the electors and not the President to decide between competing parties. The power of dismissal of the Ministry is the ultimate weapon, a recourse of last resort "which is liable to destroy its user."[6]

This position is in accord with the conventions prevailing in Britain. A similar power vested in the Crown in Britain has become practically obsolete. Since 1783, no Ministry enjoying the confidence of the Commons has been dismissed in Britain.[7] The scholarly opinion however is that the Monarch can dismiss the Ministers if they are purporting to subvert the democratic basis of the Constitution, such as, prolonging the life of Parliament in order to avoid defeat at a General Election; obtaining majority by duress, or fraudulent manipulation of the poll etc.

It may be worthwhile to take note of the dismissal of the Labour Government in Australia in 1975 by the Governor-General. The Government had a majority in the Lower House but not in the Senate. The Lower House passed the annual appropriation bill but the Senate refused to approve the same making the running of government difficult. In Australia, assent of the Senate to financial legislation is required. There was a danger that the whole governmental machinery may come

---

4. Supra.
5. For discussion on Lok Sabha, see, supra, Ch. II.
6. DE SMITH, CONSTITUTIONAL & ADM. LAW, 102 (1977).
7. KEITH, BRITISH CABINET SYSTEM, 8 (1952); JENNINGS, THE CABINET GOVT., 403-412 (1969).

to a halt if the appropriation bill was not passed, because no money could then be withdrawn from the government treasury.

To resolve the crisis, the Governor-General dismissed the Government and invited the leader of the opposition to form the new government. The new Prime Minister who formed a minority government got the appropriation bill passed by the Senate and then recommended to the Governor-General to dissolve the Parliament and hold fresh elections. This recommendation was accepted by the Governor-General and both the Houses were dissolved and fresh elections to the Houses were held. In the subsequent elections, this Government won a majority in the Lower House. However, the action of the Governor-General gave rise to a bitter public controversy in the country.

The President's power of dismissal under Art. 75(2) may however be invoked by the Prime Minister to get rid of a Minister who has lost his confidence. Since a Minister is appointed on the advice of the Prime Minister, so he can get rid of any Minister. Although, technically, the ministers hold office during the "pleasure" of the President, the acknowledged democratic convention is that on the advice of the Prime Minister, the President has to dismiss the Ministers. If the Prime Minister has the power to make his Ministers, it is also his constitutional right to unmake them. The identity of the Ministers is not known without the Prime Minister.

Ordinarily, a Minister whom the Prime Minister no longer wants in the Council of Ministers will himself resign when asked by the Prime Minister to do so. But in an extreme situation, when such a Minister ignores the wishes of the Prime Minister, the latter may request the President to dismiss the undesirable Minister from office. The President thus acts on the advice of the Prime Minister and uses his power to maintain the integrity and solidarity of the government without which the Council of Ministers cannot function effectively.[8]

Accordingly, President's power to dismiss a Minister is only meant to be used to keep the parliamentary form of government functioning smoothly, to promote collective responsibility among Ministers,[9] and to protect the Ministry from disruption. In a healthy democratic polity, where democratic traditions have taken roots, the President's power may never be called into action. It is only the ultimate resort, to be invoked in an exceptional situation, and that, too, to uphold, support and maintain democratic and parliamentary traditions.

B. WORKING OF THE EXECUTIVE

(a) PRESIDENT—A TITULAR HEAD

The supreme command of the defence forces of the Union is vested in the President but the exercise of the supreme command is to be regulated by law [Art. 53(2)]. This provision seeks to bring the defence forces subject to the civilian authority.

The executive power of the Union is vested in the President [Art. 53(1)]. This power is to be exercised in accordance with the Constitution [Art. 53(1)]. Though formally vested in the President, the idea could never be that he should personally exercise this power, or take every decision himself. That would be a task physically impossible for him to discharge. It will also be constitutionally undesirable for in a parliamentary system effective powers vest in the Ministers. The Constitution therefore seeks to create a mechanism by which the responsibility for decision making may be passed from the President to others.

8. Infra, Sec. B(d), under "Collective Responsibility."
9. Ibid.

First, the Constitution provides that the President can exercise his functions either directly or through officers subordinate to him [Art. 53(1)]. This provision permits exercise of executive power vested in the President by the Ministers and other officials. For this purpose, a Minister is regarded as an officer subordinate to the President and, therefore, the President can exercise his executive authority through the Ministers.[10]

Secondly, the President is to make Rules for the more convenient transaction of the business of the Government of India and for the allocation of work among the various Ministers [Art. 77(3)]. The Rules of Business confer power on the Ministers to carry on the administration and take decisions in their departments. When an order is made in accordance with the Rules of Business made under Art. 77(3), it cannot be challenged on the ground that the President had not personally applied his mind to the matter.[11]

The idea underlying Art. 77(3) is that while the actual administration is run by the Ministers, and not by the President who is a constitutional head, a Minister cannot, in the very nature of things, take every decision by himself. A Minister is not expected to burden himself with the day to day administration in his department. Minister's primary function is to lay down policies and programmes of his Ministry. Therefore, under the Rules of Business, officials in the department can take decisions and when a civil servant takes a decision, he does so on behalf of the government. The officers designated by the Rules of Business or the standing Orders[12] can take decisions on behalf of the Government[13].

Thirdly, Parliament may by law confer any function on authorities other than the President [Art. 53(3)(b)]. When Parliament does so, the officer concerned can act in his own name.

Fourthly, although, executive power of the Union is vested in the President, actually, in practice, it is carried on by the Ministers and other officials and the President's personal satisfaction is not necessary in every case.[14]

There is however the over-all condition, viz., the executive power is to be exercised "in accordance with this Constitution". This clause opens the way to judi-

---

10. King-Emperor v. Sibnath Banerji, AIR 1945 PC 163; S.N. Ghosh v. B.L. Cotton Mills, AIR 1959 Cal. 552.
For further discussion, see, infra, under "State Executive,", Ch. VII.

11. For a detailed discussion on the scope and effect of the Rules of Business, see, M.P. JAIN, A Treatise on Administrative Law, Vol. II, Ch. XXI.
For further discussion on Rules of Business, see, infra, Sec. E.

12. Standing Orders are made by the Minister for his department.

13. See, A. Sanjeevi Naidu v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102 : (1970) 1 SCC 443; Laxim Udyog Rock Cement Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 2001 Ori. 51.
Also see, Ch. VII, infra.

14. Bijoya Cotton Mills v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1967 SC 1145 : (1967) 2 SCR 406; A. Sanjeevi v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102 : (1970) 1 SCC 443; Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, infra, note 20.
For further discussion on this point, see, infra.

cial review of executive action vis-à-vis the Constitution. The court can strike down an unconstitutional act, i.e., an act infringing a constitutional provision. "Any exercise of the executive power not in accordance with the Constitution will be liable to be set aside"[15]

The formal vesting of executive power in the President does not also envisage that he should personally sign all the executive and administrative orders passed by the Central Government. The wheels of government would stop if it were to be mandatory for the President to sign all such orders. In actual practice, the President signs only a few crucial orders, and all other orders are promulgated by subordinate officers without reference to him. This result is achieved by Article 77.

According to Art. 77(1), all executive action of the Central Government is to be expressed to be taken in the name of the President.

Article 77(1) prescribes the mode in which executive action of the Central Government is to be expressed. This provision is however merely directory and not mandatory and its non-compliance does not render the order a nullity as it does not preclude proof by other means that the order or instrument in question was made by the President. This provision does not lay down how an executive action of the Government of India is to be performed; it only prescribes the mode in which such act is to be expressed.[16] However, even if an executive action of the Central Government is not formally expressed to have been taken in the name of the President, it would not render the action invalid under Article 77. [17]

Further, Art. 77(2) lays down the manner in which the order of the Central Government is authenticated. Art. 77(2) says that orders and other instruments executed in the President's name are to be authenticated in such manner as may be specified in the rules made by the President,[18] and the validity of any document so authenticated cannot be called into question on the ground that it is not an order or instrument made or executed by the President.

This provision immunizes an order from being challenged on one ground only, viz., that it has not been made by the President. It does not oust the jurisdiction of the courts to examine the validity of the order on any other ground. Thus, the correctness of the recitals in the order as to the facts which are essential for its validity can be questioned.[19] Nor can any policy decision be taken under Articles 77 or 162 which would contravene constitutional or statutory provisions. [20]

---

15. U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi, AIR 1971 SC 1002, 1004 : (1971) 2 SCC 63; supra, Sec. A(iii).
Also, Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 597 : (1978) 1 SCC 248.

16. The terms of Art. 77(1) are equivalent to Art. 166(1) which operates in the State sphere.
For a detailed discussion on Art. 77(1), see, infra, Chapter VII.

17. Air India Cabin Crew Assn. v. Yeshaswinee Merchant, (2003) 6 SCC 277/ 312: AIR 2004 SC 187. The observation in Draupadi Devi v. Union of India, (2004) 11 SCC 425, 451: AIR 2004 SC 4684, to the effect that a decision not taken in the manner contemplated by Article 77,"would only mean that there was no decision" was made without reference to the decision in Air India Cabin Crew Assn.

18. The President has promulgated the Authentication (Order and Other Instruments) Rules, 1958. Rule 2 thereof provides that orders and other instruments made and executed in the name of the President shall be authenticated by the signatures of the Secretary, Joint Secretary, Deputy Secretary, Under Secretary or Assistant Secretary to the Government of India.
For a detailed discussion on Art. 77, see, supra, JAIN, footnote 11.

19. Supra, footnote 10.

20. Post Master General v. Tutu Das , (2007) 5 SCC 317, 322 : 2007 (6) JT 340.

Article 77 gives effect to the provisions of Article 53 which permit the President to exercise his authority through others. When an order issued in the President's name is duly authenticated by the authorised officer, it cannot be impeached on the ground that the matter has not been personally considered by the President or that he has not applied his mind to it.

The implications of Arts. 77(1) and (2) are as follows : Arts. 77(1) and 77(2) are only directory.[21] If an order is issued in the name of the President, and is duly authenticated in the manner prescribed by Art. 77(2), there is an irrebuttable presumption that the order is made or executed by the President. Even if an order is not issued in strict compliance with the provisions of Art. 77(1), it can be established by evidence aliunde that the order has been made by the appropriate authority.

An order not in strict compliance with the provisions of Arts. 77(1) and (2), is not invalid per se, but the irrebuttable presumption in its favour cannot be drawn. The party concerned can prove by other evidence that, as a matter of fact, the order has been made by the appropriate authority. For example, in Barsay,[22] an order issued by the Deputy Secretary to the Government on behalf of the Central Government was held valid. Under the Prevention of corruption Act, a public servant can be prosecuted for certain criminal offences only after the Central Government gives its sanction for the purpose. In the instant case, the sanction was given in the name of the Central Government by its Deputy Secretary. It was not an authenticated order but one issued by the Deputy Secretary in his own right. Although the order did not comply with Arts. 77(1) and 77(2), nevertheless, it was held valid because the Deputy Secretary was competent to accord sanction in his own right. The order was made by the Deputy Secretary on behalf of the Central Government in exercise of the power conferred on him under the Rules of Business.[23]

The expressions "executive power" and "executive action" in the context mean the power and action of the executive. Therefore, all orders made by the executive, whether administrative or legislative in nature, can be authenticated under Art. 77(2).[24] It is not true to say that under Art. 77(2) only executive orders, and not legislative orders, can be authenticated.

Before 1976, Art. 74(1) merely said that the Council of Ministers is to 'aid and advise' the President in the exercise of his functions. Art. 74(2) declares that no court can inquire into the question whether any, and if so what, advice was tendered by the Ministers to the President.[25] Art. 74(2) thus expressly makes advice tendered by the Ministers to the President non-justiciable. Originally there was no provision in the Constitution to make ministerial advice binding on the President, but , for all practical purposes, this was so. The position by and large had crystallised before 1976 that the President was more or less a titular head of the executive and was bound by the advice of the Ministers. The real head of the ex-

---

21. See, Dattatraya Moreshwar v. State of Bombay, AIR 1952 SC 181 : 1952 SCR 612. For a further discussion on the point, see, Ch. VII, infra.
22. Major E.G. Barsay v. State of Bombay, AIR 1961 SC 1762 : (1962) 2 SCR 195.
23. See, infra, Sec. E.
24. D.S. Sharma v. Union of India, AIR 1970 Del. 250.
25. Supra, Sec. A(iii).

ecutive was the Prime Minister. This author had summed up the position as follows:[26]

> "Whatever the formal constitutional provisions may be, in effect, however, the totality of the executive power at the Centre vests not in the President alone, but in the President and the Council of Ministers. The President is the head of the State and only a formal executive. In all functions vested in him, he acts on the advice of the Ministers. The President is more of a symbol used to formalize the decisions arrived at by the Ministers and the Cabinet. The effective executive power lies with the Prime Minister and the Ministers who constitute the real executive carrying on the entire burden of conducting the administration of the Union."

The Supreme Court had, in a number of decisions, expressly accepted this constitutional position of the President. In Ram Jawaya v. State of Punjab,[27] MUKHERJEA, C.J., speaking on behalf of the Supreme Court stated that our Constitution has adopted the British system of a parliamentary executive, that the President is only "a formal or constitutional head of the executive" and that "the real executive power are vested in the Ministers or the Cabinet." MUKHERJEA, C.J., further observed:

> "Our Constitution…. is modelled on the British Parliamentary system where the executive is deemed to have the primary responsibility for the formulation of governmental policy and its transmission into law though the condition precedent to the exercise of this responsibility is its retaining the confidence of the legislative Branch of the State... In the Indian Constitution, therefore, we have the same system of Parliamentary executive as in England and the Council of Ministers consisting, as it does, of the members of the legislature is like the British Cabinet, 'a hyphen which joins, a buckle which fastens', the legislative part of the State to the executive part. The cabinet enjoying, as it does, a majority in the legislature concentrates in itself the virtual control of both legislative and executive functions…."

In U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi,[28] the Supreme Court emphasized that the conventions operating in Britain governing the relationship between the Crown and the Ministers are very pertinent to the Indian Constitution as well, and the formal provisions of the Indian Constitution should be read in the light of those conventions. The Court observed:

> "The Constituent Assembly did not choose the Presidential system of Government."[29]

In R.C. Cooper v. Union of India,[30] the Supreme Court said: "Under the Constitution, the President being the constitutional head, normally acts in all matters including the promulgation of an ordinance on the advice of his Council of Ministers."[31]

---

26. See the last edition of this book at 94.
27. AIR 1955 SC 549 : (1955) 2 SCR 225.
28. AIR 1971 SC 1002 : (1971) 2 SCC 63.
29. Ibid, at 1005.
For discussion on the Presidential System, see, infra, Sec. F.
30. AIR 1970 SC 564 : (1970) 1 SCC 248.
31. On the power to issue ordinances, see, infra, Sec. D(ii)(d).
Also see, Ch. VII, infra.

In Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab,[32] the Supreme Court stated that it was not correct to say that the President is to be satisfied personally in exercising the executive power. The President is only a formal or constitutional head who exercises the power and functions conferred on him by or under the Constitution on the aid and advice of his Council of Ministers. Whenever the Constitution requires the 'satisfaction' of the President for the exercise by him of any power or function, it is not his 'personal satisfaction', but, in the constitutional sense, the 'satisfaction of the Council of Ministers'.

The President's "opinion, satisfaction or decision is constitutionally secured when his Ministers arrive at such opinion, satisfaction or decision." "The decision of any Minister or officer under the Rules of Business [made under Art. 77(3)][33] is the decision of the President".[34] Any argument that an order could not be made by a Minister without reference to the President is thus untenable. Describing the nature of the government, the Court observed:[35]

> "It is a fundamental principle of English constitutional law that Ministers must accept responsibility for every executive act. In England, the sovereign never acts on his own responsibility. The power of the sovereign is conditioned by the practical rule that the Crown must find advisers to bear responsibility for his action. Those advisers must have the confidence of the House of Commons. This rule of English constitutional law is incorporated in our Constitution. The Indian Constitution envisages a parliamentary and responsible form of Government at the Centre and in the States and not a Presidential form of Government."

The Court then said that whatever the function vested in the President/Governor, whether executive, legislative or quasi judicial in nature and whether vested by the Constitution, or by a statute, may be discharged according to the Rules of Business, unless the contrary is clearly provided for by such constitutional or statutory provisions. The Court stated in this regard as follows:

> "The President as well as the Governor is the Constitutional or formal head. The President as well as the Governor exercises his powers and functions conferred on him by or under the Constitution on the aid and advice of his Council of Ministers, save in spheres where the Governor is required by or under the Constitution to exercise his functions in his discretion. Whenever the Constitution requires the satisfaction of the President or the Governor for any exercise by the President or the Governor of any power or function, the satisfaction required by the Constitution is not the personal satisfaction of the President or Governor but the satisfaction of the President or the Governor in the constitutional sense in the cabinet system of government, that is, satisfaction of his Council of Ministers on whose aid and advice the President or the Governor generally exercises all his powers and functions. The decision of any Minister or Officer under rules of business made under any of these two Articles 77(3) and 166(3) is the decision of the President or the Governor respectively. These Articles did not provide for any delegation. Therefore, the decision of Minister

---

32. AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831. Pu Myllai Hlychhlo v. State of Mizoram , (2005) 2 SCC 92 : AIR 2005 SC 1537. Also see, infra, under State Executive, Ch. VII.
33. See, supra; infra, Sec. D(iii).
34. See, G.D. Zalani v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1178 : (1995) Supp (2) SCC 512; B.L. Wadehra v. Union of India, AIR 1998 Del. 436.
35. AIR 1974 SC at 2199 : (1974) 2 SCC 831.

or officer under the rules of business is the decision of the President or the Governor."

Under Art. 352, the President of India can proclaim an emergency in the country in certain situations.[36] Thereafter, under Art. 359 (1), the President may by order suspend the operation of any Fundamental Right.[37] The proclamation of emergency is issued in the name of the President under his own signature.[38]

In the instant case, orders suspending Arts. 14, 21 and 22[39] were issued under Art. 359(1) in the name of the President but were signed by an Additional Secretary to the Government of India. Rejecting the argument that it could not be said whether the President was personally satisfied about the orders or not, the Supreme Court ruled in Nambiar[40] that in view of Art. 77, President's personal satisfaction is not essential for issuing such an order. A properly authenticated order signed by the Additional Secretary to the Government of India issued under Art. 359(1) could not be questioned on the ground that it was not an order made and executed by the President.

The National Mineral Development Corporation (NMDC) an autonomous public sector undertaking transferred the mining lease of an iron mine to a joint venture company. The transfer was approved by the Ministry of Steel. Under the Memorandum and Articles of Association, the Corporation could transfer property only with the sanction of the President.

The Delhi High Court ruled that the sanction given to the transfer by the Minister was valid. It was not necessary for the President to personally give the sanction. In the cabinet system, the 'satisfaction' of the President does not mean his 'personal satisfaction' but the satisfaction of the President in the constitutional sense, i.e. the satisfaction of the Council of Ministers on whose aid and advice the President exercises all his powers and functions. The decision of a Minister or an officer under the Transaction of Business Rules is regarded as the decision of the President.[41]

Thus, the President/Governor does not exercise the executive functions personally. He acts on the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers in all matters which vest in the executive whether those functions are executive or legislative in character.

In Union of India v. Sripati Ranjan,[42] the respondent was dismissed from service by the Collector of Customs. He preferred an appeal to the President as was provided for in the Service Rules. The Minister of Finance rejected the appeal without any reference to the President. The question was whether the Minister could have himself decided the appeal or should the President have decided the matter personally because the rule in question said that the appeal lay to the President.

---

36. Infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. A.
37. Ibid.
38. Ibid.
39. See, infra, Chs. XXI, XXVI and XXVII.
40. K. Anada Nambiar v. Government of Madras, AIR 1966 SC 657 : (1966) 2 SCR 406.
41. B.L. Wadehra v. Union of India, AIR 1998 Del 436.
42. AIR 1975 SC 1755 : (1975) 4 SCC 699.
Also see, A. Sanjeevi v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102 : (1970) 1 SCC 443; supra, footnote 12.

The Supreme Court ruled that the appeal had been validly disposed of by the Minister. The Court asserted that the Constitution 'conclusively contemplates' a constitutional President and any reference to the President under any rule made under the Constitution must need be to the President as the constitutional head acting with the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers. Thus, in the instant case, the principle laid down in Samsher Singh has been extended to a quasi-judicial function as well vested in the President by a statutory provision.

It may be pointed out that Arts. 74[43] and 77[44] are in a way complimentary to each other, though they may operate in different fields. Art. 74(1) deals with the acts of the President done "in exercise of his functions". Art. 77 speaks of the executive action of the Government of India which is taken in the name of the President of India. As regards the executive action of the Government of India, it has to be taken by the Minister/Officer to whom the said business is allocated by the Rules of Business under Art. 77(3). The allocation of business has been construed as merely directory by the Bombay High Court.[45] However, recently the Supreme Court has taken a contrary view in NDMC v. Tanvi Trading and Credit (P) Ltd.,[46] Guidelines relating to the Lutyens' Bungalow Zone in Delhi had been issued by the Ministry of Urban Development at the instance and initiative of the Prime Minister's Office. The Court held that these guidelines cannot be ignored by the Court and any relaxation in the guidelines under the Government of India (Transaction of Business) Rules, 1961 would require the approval of the Prime Minister's Office. Therefore, although the subject-matter of the guidelines fell within the scope of the Minister of Urban Development, a relaxation, without the approval of the Prime Minister could not be granted by any other authority, other than the Prime Minister's Office.

An order issued in relation to the executive action of the government has to be authenticated by the officer empowered under the Rules of Authentication under Art. 77(2). Many such orders do not reach the President and so there is no occasion in such cases for any aid and advice being tendered to the President by the Council of Ministers. These acts though executed in the name of the President are really the acts of the government. They are distinct from the acts of the President "in the exercise of his functions" which he discharges on the aid and advice of his Ministers.

The Constituent Assembly had consciously adopted the British pattern of government.[47] Therefore, the relevant conventions operating in Britain governing the relationship between the Crown and the Ministers are very pertinent to the Indian Constitution as well. In Britain, following a centuries-old tradition, the formal position is that the King, who had gradually lost legislative, judicial, and finally executive powers, is still the supreme formal agency in whose name action is taken. According to the British convention, the Sovereign has "the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn" the Ministers.[48] The term

---

43. Supra, Sec. B.
44. Supra, Sec. B.
45. Crawford Bayley & Co v. Union of India, 2003 AIHC 3372 (Bom). The view was affirmed by the Supreme Court in (2006) 6 SCC 25, 34 : AIR 2006 SC 2544.
46. (2008) 8 SCC 765 : (2008) 10 JT 109.
47. AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION : CORNERSTONE OF A NATION, 116-143 (1966).
48. BAGHEOT, THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION, 111 (Fontana Ed.)

'Crown' represents the sum-total of governmental powers and is synonymous with the executive.[49]

Accordingly, the term 'President' has been used in most of the constitutional provisions in India as denoting the Central Executive, i.e., the President acting on the advice of the Ministers, and not the President acting personally. The Constitution-framers never envisaged that the powers and functions vested in the President should be exercised by him on his own responsibility without the consent of the Ministers. The framers of the Indian Constitution had no doubt in their minds that what they were seeking to create was a President to act merely as a constitutional head without having any discretionary or prerogative powers. Pandit Nehru while moving the report of the Committee on Principles of the Union Constitution stated:[50]

> "Power really resided in the Ministry and in the Legislature and not in the President as such. At the same time, we did not want to make the President just a mere figure-head like the French President. We did not give him any real power, but we have made his position one of authority and dignity."

The point was very clearly elucidated by several stalwarts in the Constituent Assembly that what was being introduced in India was the British model of the parliamentary government, and that the President, like the British Crown, would be a mere constitutional head. Thus, ALLADI K. AYYAR observed that "the word 'President' used in the Constitution merely stands for the fabric responsible to the Legislature."[51] AMBEDKAR said in the same vein that "the President is merely a nominal figure-head", that he "represents the nation but does not rule the nation. He is the symbol of the Nation" and that "he has no discretion and no powers of administration at all," and that he "occupies the same position as the King under the English Constitution."[52] "His place in the administration is that of a ceremonial device on a seal by which the nation's decisions are made known" and "the President of the Indian Union will be generally bound by the advice of his Ministers. He can do nothing contrary to their advice nor can he do anything without their advice."[53]

The President's role as a constitutional-head is reflected in his indirect election. If he were to be elected directly by adult franchise, then it might have been anomalous not to give him any real powers and it was feared that he might emerge as a centre of power in his own right. Since the power was really to reside in the Ministry and in the Legislature, and not in the President, it was thought adequate to have him elected indirectly.[54] It is also pertinent to note that in the Government of India Act, 1935, phrases like 'discretion' and 'individual judgment' were used to denote the areas where the Governor-General could act without, or independent of, the advice of the Ministers. No such phrases were adopted in the Constitution in relation to the President.

---

49. WADE & PHILLIPS, op. cit., 216.
Also, Town Investment Ltd. v. Dept. of Environment, (1978) A.C. 359.
50. IV CAD, 734.
51. VII CAD, 337; IV CAD, 12, 909.
52. IV CAD, 1036; VIII CAD, 724.
53. VII CAD, 32.
54. NEHRU, IV CAD, 6, 713, 734; AUSTIN, op. cit., 121; GHOSH, THE CONSTITUTION OF INDIA: HOW WAS IT FRAMED. 140 (1966). Also see, supra, 133.

A question may be asked that if the framers of the Constitution were so definite in their minds regarding the constitutional status of the President, then why did they not categorically incorporate any provision in the Constitution that the President would be bound by ministerial advice? The Drafting Committee did examine this question but dropped the idea of putting any such provision as it thought it better to leave the matter to conventions. Such a provision could not have been enforced legally and the remedy could only have been political and that remedy exists even now. The relationship of the President with the Cabinet is based on the system of responsible government functioning in Britain. There the system of parliamentary government based on conventions has been working for long and it could be expected that a similar system would also work reasonably well in India.

Further, President's part in assent of Bills has already been defined in the Constitution.[55] In matters of dissolution of the Lok Sabha,[56] appointment of the Prime Minister[57] and dismissal of the Ministry,[58] there may be a marginal use of discretion by the President in certain grave and exceptional situations, and so in such matters some flexibility appeared to be necessary to meet any unforeseen contingencies. As conventions in Britain around the powers of the King in his relationship with the Cabinet 'are sufficiently strong', there could be no danger of misuse of these powers by the President.

No exact rules could be laid down for the exercise of these reserve powers as threats to the Constitution may be infinite in variety and, therefore, it was not possible to put in the Constitution precisely what the President must do in these extremely exceptional situations or what the Prime Minister can ask him to do and where the President can use his judgment.[59]

The power of the Prime Minister in Britain has been progressively increasing and his advice is now regarded as paramount.[60]

Nor does the matter rest entirely on conventions. There are a few safeguards woven into the fabric of the Constitution itself because of which critical situations may arise if the President ever ignores ministerial advice. The Council of Ministers is responsible to the Lok Sabha and this principle necessarily leads to the gravitation of effective power into the hands of the Prime Minister and the Ministers.[61]

If the President ever takes it into his head to override the Ministry on any matter, it may resign en bloc and thus create a constitutional crisis. It is obligatory on the President to always have a Council of Ministers[62] and so it follows that when a Ministry resigns, the President must at once seek to have an alternative Ministry which may be capable of commanding the confidence of the House and justifying to Parliament, and securing its approval of, the presidential action in refusing the advice of the previous Ministry. The President may find this very

---

55. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(i)(c).
56. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. (I)(c).
57. Supra, Sec. A(iii).
58. Ibid.
59. XI CAD, 956. See, AUSTIN, op. cit, 132-6.
60. See, infra, under "Prime Minister".
61. Infra, see under "Collective Responsibility".
62. Supra, Sec. A(iii).

difficult in a situation where the previous Ministry enjoying the confidence of the House had to resign due to his own conduct, as the majority of members, who supported the previous Ministry, would refuse to support any other Ministry.

Parliament has supreme power of legislation, taxation and appropriation of funds. No appropriations from the Consolidated Fund can be made, and no tax can be levied by the Executive, without parliamentary sanction.[63] President's ordinance-making power is meant for use only for a short duration and is ultimately subject to parliamentary control.[64] The President cannot carry on the administration of the country without the co-operation of Parliament as no more than six months could elapse between two parliamentary sessions.[65] The President's power to declare an emergency is also subject to the approval of the two Houses of Parliament.[66]

All the above-mentioned constitutional provisions lead inevitably to one result : that there should be in office a Ministry which is in a position to secure parliamentary approval, sanction and finance for its policies and programme. A Ministry lacking the confidence of the Lok Sabha will find it impossible to carry on the administration with a non co-operative, or even hostile, House facing it. It is therefore absolutely essential for the President to maintain in office a Council of Ministers enjoying the confidence of the Lok Sabha and to act on its advice.

Further, if a Ministry having the solid support of the Lok Sabha is dislodged by the President, the majority party may even move for his impeachment for violation of the Constitution.[67] The President may be impeached if he seeks to disregard the rule of parliamentary government by ignoring the underlying basic conventions, as the phrase 'violation of Constitution' in the constitutional provision relating to Presidential impeachment is flexible enough to include not only the formal provisions of the Constitution but also the conventions operating thereunder.[68] This, therefore, should serve as a sanction to make the President observe the convention of acting on the advice of the Council of Ministers.

On the other hand, the 'activist' theory of the President has many snags for the President himself as well as for the Constitution. The President is not elected for his political views or programme. It is the programme of the political party, emerging as the majority party at the polls, which may be regarded as having been endorsed by the electorate and the Council of Ministers is there to implement the same.

The 'activist' theory will result in the negation of the parliamentary system. If the President vetoes a Bill passed by the two Houses, he will be setting himself against the majority in Parliament. He will thus become controversial and partisan and be drawn into the vortex of political controversy and public criticism which will do irreparable damage to the dignity, prestige and neutrality of the President's office.

An activist President is going to face sooner or later a confrontation with the Cabinet. There is no way to hold the President responsible except the extreme

---

63. Supra, Ch. II.
64. Infra, Sec. D(ii)(d).
65. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G.
66. Infra, Ch. XIII.
67. Supra, Sec. A(i)(h).
68. X CAD, 7, 269, 270; AUSTIN, op cit., 138 .

step of impeachment. Two co-ordinate decision-making authorities acting independently of each other would be the negation of good government as well as that of responsible and parliamentary form of government. What would happen to the theory of collective responsibility of the Ministers, specifically stated in the Constitution, with an activist President? Will the Ministers defend the actions of the President in Parliament or criticise the same as having been taken against their advice? Such a situtation is bound to injure the parliamentary system irreparably.

The working of the Constitution since 1950 has conclusively established that the President is a figure head while the Council of Ministers wields the real executive power. There has not been a single case when the President might have vetoed a Bill passed by the two Houses or refused to accept ministerial advice on any point. Nehru, the First Prime Minister of India, made the position clear repeatedly by asserting that the responsibility for any policy was entirely that of the government which was responsible to Parliament, which in turn was responsible to the people and that the President was a constitutional head who did not oppose or come in the way of anything.[69]

It is however true that controversies regarding the President's constitutional position did arise from time to time in the past but each time it ended in confirming the position that the President was a constitutional, and not an effective, head of the State.

Within a few months of the Constitution coming into operation, President Rajendra Prasad, in a note to Prime Minister Nehru, expressed the desire to act solely on his own judgment, independently of the Council of Ministers, in the matter of giving assent to the Bills and sending messages to Parliament. This view was based on a literal reading of Articles 111 and 86 ignoring the underlying conventions.[70] Nehru consulted Attorney-General Setalvad and Ayyar, a member of the Drafting Committee of the Constituent Assembly, and they both expressed the view that the President had no discretion in this matter and that it would be constitutionally improper for him not to seek, or not to be guided, by the advice of his Ministers as Art. 74 was all pervasive in character and the Council of Ministers was to aid and advise the President in all his functions. The matter was not however precipitated as President Prasad relented and did not force his views.[71]

The controversy erupted again in 1960. On November 28, 1960, while laying the foundation-stone of the Indian Law Institute building, President Prasad said that it was generally believed that like the Sovereign of Great Britain, the President of India was also a constitutional head and had to act according to the advice of his Council of Ministers. But there were in the Constitution many provisions which laid down specific duties and functions of the President and, therefore, the question which needed to be studied and investigated was the extent to which, and the matters in respect of which, the powers and functions of the President differed from those of the British Sovereign. Further, it might also be considered

---

69. Press Conf., July 7, 1959; The Hindustan Times, July 8, 59, p.1.

70. Art. 86 enables the President to send messages to the Houses of Parliament. Art. 111 refers to Presidential assent to Bills. See, supra, Ch. II.

71. AUSTIN, op. cit., 140-143. Also SETALVAD, My Life, Law and Other Things, 170-2 (1970). See, MUNSHI, PILGRIMAGE TO FREEDOM, I, 568-75, (1967), for President's note and Setalvad's opinion.

if the procedure by which the President was elected and was liable to be removed or impeached introduced any difference, constitutionally speaking, between the President and the British Monarch. The President also posed the wider question as to how far the conventions of the unwritten British Constitution could be invoked and incorporated into the written Indian Constitution by interpretation.[72]

This speech naturally brought into forefront the question of President's relationship with his Council of Ministers, but the matter was set at rest by Nehru declaring at the Press Conference on December 15, 1960, that the President's remarks were only "casual," and that politically and constitutionally, the President's position conformed to that of the British Crown and that the President was a constitutional head and had always acted as such.[73]

For the third time, a similar controversy was raised in 1967. As a result of the Fourth General Elections held in March, 1967, the Congress monopoly of power in the States was broken as in some States non-Congress governments took office. When the question of electing a new President arose in May, 1967, the parties opposed to the Congress set up their candidate as against the Congress candidate, and one of the arguments that was put forth by these parties in soliciting support for their candidate was that the President was not a figure-head and that he had a constructive and meaningful role to play in the affairs of the country, especially, that he should act as a sort of mediator between the Centre and the States.

This last idea became rather important in the newly emerging political pattern of some States being under non-Congress governments while the Centre was under the Congress control, and, thus, seeds of Centre-State conflict, tensions and stresses were inherent in this situation. But the controversy was laid at rest with the election of the Congress candidate as the President, for the Congress Party had fought the election specifically on the basis that the President was merely a constitutional head and this was vindicated by the election of its candidate.[74]

Again, in 1969, the presidential election brought forth the same issue, but again the issue was settled in favour of the view that the President is a constitutional head and performs no activist role.

Thus, in 1976 the position was quite clear. Even without any words in the Constitution making ministerial advice binding on the President, the President, in effect, acted only as the titular head of the executive while the Prime Minister was the real head. The phrase 'aid and advice' used in Art. 74(1) was a masterly understatement of the real position enjoyed by the Council of Ministers for, in

---

72. THE HINDUSTAN TIMES, November 29, 1960, p. 1.

73. Ibid., Dec. 16, 1960, p. 6.

74. MUNSHI in THE PRESIDENT UNDER THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION (1963), argued that the Indian President's position was not the same as that of the British Crown. He based himself partly on a literalistic reading of the Constitution and argued that conventions could not override written constitutional provisions—obviously, an untenable argument, see, infra, Ch. XL, under "Constitutional Interpretation". Partly, his argument was political, as what he would like the position to be.

It is, however, interesting to note that in the Constituent Assembly, as a member of the Drafting Committee, he had assured the members that the President would be a constitutional head.

VII CAD. 984. Also, MUNSHI, PILGRIMAGE, op. cit., 276-290.

practice, most of the decisions were made and implemented by the Ministers themselves without reference to the President.

It was recognised that the Ministers and not the President bore the responsibility of the governmental action and in whatever matter the President acted, he invariably did so on ministerial advice. There was no aspect of his functioning which was free of ministerial advice, and that the President exercised no discretion himself except the marginal discretion in such matters as appointing the Prime Minister etc. It was widely recognised that the Constitution embodied generally the parliamentary or the cabinet system on the British model where the monarch never acts on his own responsibility; he has ministers to bear the responsibility for his actions and that the constitutional relationship existing between the President and the Council of Ministers was substantially analogous to that subsisting between the British Crown and the Cabinet.

In spite of this, in 1976, by the Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act, 1978,[75] Art. 74(1) was amended so as to state explicitly that the President shall act in accordance with the advice of the Ministers in the exercise of his functions.

This amendment did not effect any real or significant change in the pre-existing position of the President vis-a-vis the Council of Ministers but it did make explicit what had been implicit at that time. The constitutional amendment only reiterates the position as it had come to be by then. The purpose of the amendment however was to remove any doubt on this point and clarify the position once and for all.

The Forty-Fourth Constitution Amendment[76] introduced a new proviso to Art. 74(1) authorising the President to require the Council of Ministers to reconsider the advice given by it, and the President shall act in accordance with the advice tendered after such reconsideration. And, further, that "the question whether any, and if so what, advice was tendered by Ministers to the President shall not be inquired into in any Court" [Art. 74(2)].[77]

The present position therefore is that the President has to act on ministerial advice. The only right the President has is to ask the Council of Ministers to reconsider the matter. But the President is bound by the advice given thereafter [Proviso to Art. 74(2)]; He must act in accordance with this advice. In 2006 a potential confrontation was avoided in connection with the "office of profit" amendment.[78]

At times, the "reconsideration clause" may prove to be of crucial significance and may result in avoidance of hasty action on the part of the Council of Ministers. In October, 1997, the Gujral Government recommended imposition of the President rule in Uttar Pradesh under Art. 356 of the Constitution,[79] but the President sent it back to the Cabinet for reconsideration. The reason was that the U.P. Government had just won a vote of confidence in the Assembly. The Cabinet then relented and decided not to pursue the matter further.[80]

---

75. For the Amendment, see, infra, Ch. XLII.
76. Ibid.
77. Ibid.
78. See supra p.76
79. For discussion on Art. 356, see, infra, Ch. XIII.
80. THE TIMES OF INDIA, dated 23/10/1997, p. 1.

History repeated itself in 1998 when the B.J.P. Government recommended imposition of the President's rule in Bihar under Art. 356, but the President again sent back the recommendation to the Cabinet for reconsideration, but the Cabinet decided to keep the matter pending and not pursue it. This happended on September 25, 1998. But, on February 12, 1999, the Cabinet reconsidered the matter and reiterated its earlier recommendation to impose President's rule in Bihar and this time the President accepted the Cabinet recommendation according to the proviso to Art. 74(2).

More recently, while affirming that the satisfaction of the President under Article 356 to direct dissolution of the Legislative Assembly is the satisfaction of the Council of Ministers, the Supreme Court set aside the order dissolving the Assembly because the Council of Ministers had wrongly advised the President.[81]

In this connection, reference may also be made to Art. 78 which empowers the President to be informed about the country's affairs. Thus, the Prime Minister is obligated to communicate to the President all decisions of the Council of Ministers relating to the administration of the affairs of the Union and the proposals for legislation [Art. 78(a)]. The Prime Minister is also under a duty to furnish such information relating to the administration of the affairs of the Union and proposals for legislation as the President may call for [Art. 78(b)].

As the constitutional head of the Union Executive, he has at least the right to be informed and to call for any information that he may desire. Further, the President may require the Prime Minister to submit for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister alone without consulting the Council of Ministers [Art. 78(c)]. This provision is designed in effect to enforce the principle of collective responsibility among the Ministers.[82] In all these matters, obviously, the President acts on his own responsibility without any ministerial advice because no Ministry is going to advise the President to seek information from it or ask it to reconsider its earlier decision.

From the phraseology of Art. 78(b), it becomes obvious that the right of the President to seek information is not governed by Art. 74. Arts. 74 and 78 are not mutually restrictive or contradictory. To call for information, the President does not have to act on the advice of the Council of Ministers. Denial of information to the President will amount to violation of the Constitution.

It is the duty of the Prime Minister to communicate the decision of the government to the President to enable him to know and to bring his influence to bear on the working of the government. It is also the duty of the Prime Minister to furnish such information relating to the administration of the affairs of the Union as the President calls for. If the President feels that a decision taken by a Minister requires reconsideration by the Council of Ministers, he can require the Prime Minister to place it before the Council of Ministers. It will therefore be wrong to assume that the President is merely a non-effective symbol.

In addition to what has been said above, the President can exercise a persuasive influence on the Ministers and help them with his advice and experience.

---

81. Rameshwar Prasad v. Union of India (UOI), (2006) 2 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 980. For further discussion see infra, Chapter VII.

82. On "Collective Responsibility", see, infra.

Like the British Sovereign, the role of the President is "to advise, encourage and warn Ministers in respect of the recommendations which they make."[83]

The influence of the President, however, depends on his personality. A man of character and ability can really exert a potent influence on the affairs of the government with his advice, help and persuasion, by using his knowledge, experience and disinterestedness to arrive at sound decisions on matters affecting the well-being of the people and not by his dictating any particular course of action to his Ministers.

In the ultimate analysis, it is the Council of Ministers which will prevail and not the President. His role is at best advisory; he may act as the guide, philosopher and friend to the Ministers, but cannot assume to himself the role of their master—a role which is assigned to the Prime Minister. The Constitution intends that the President should be a centre from which a beneficent influence should radiate over the whole administration, and not that he should be the focus or centre of any power.

While the new provision makes explicit what had generally been regarded as already being the position, there may possibly arise some difficulties in practice in some situations as a result of this explicit statement. Before 1976, in exceptional and abnormal situations, the President enjoyed some marginal discretion in certain matters, as for example, appointment of the Prime Minister (when the Lok Sabha is split with no majority party), or dissolution of the Lok Sabha, or the removal of the Council of Ministers from office. What is the position in these matters now after 1976? What is the impact of the new constitutional provision on these matters? What happens when the Prime Minister's party loses the election and a new Prime Minister is to be appointed? Is the President to seek, and is he bound by, the advice of the defeated Prime Minister regarding whom to appoint as the new Prime Minister or can he take his own decision in the matter?

Suppose the Council of Ministers is defeated on the floor of the House and the Prime Minister seeks dissolution of the House even though it may be possible to install an alternative ministry in office. Should the President automatically follow the Cabinet advice and dissolve the House, or should he seek to find a new Prime Minister and avoid fresh election? Or, again, the Prime Minister loses the confidence of the Lok Sabha and the Prime Minister neither resigns nor seeks dissolution of the House to hold fresh elections? Is the President to watch the situation helplessly because he cannot act without Prime Minister's advice, or can he act on his own and take suitable action? The crucial question is whether in such crucial questions the President is left with any discretion?

The true position seems to be that in the crucial areas mentioned here, the President has to depend on his own judgment. In the matter of appointment of the Prime Minister, as the court cases concerning appointment of Chaudhary Charan Singh as the Prime Minister clarify,[84] the President is to depend on his own assessment. He is not required to seek the advice of anyone in this matter.

Similarly, in matters of taking action when the Council of Ministers is defeated in the House, the President cannot be immobilisd merely because the Prime Minister does not advise him to take any action. Perhaps the constitutional provision binding the President to ministerial advice may be read as meaning that the advice of the Ministers is binding on the President only so long as the Council of Ministers enjoy the confidence of the House.[85]

83. WADE AND PHILLIPS, op, cit., 222.
84. Supra.

It may be argued that Arts. 74(1) and 75(3) ought to be read together. Art. 74(1) comes into play so long as Art. 75(1) is being fulfilled, i.e., the Council of Ministers retains the confidence of the Lok Sabha. Similarly, in the matter of dissolving the Lok Sabha, he may have to exercise his own judgment in some situations.[86] In critical constitutional situations, any one of these matters may assume great importance and the President's decision may have a profound impact on the country's destiny and in spite of the amended Art. 74(1), it cannot be interpreted so as to take away all discretion from the President to act suitably in difficult situations. The President continues to have marginal discretion in these matters although, in normal times, he acts on the advice of the Prime Minister even in some of these matters.

In Rameshwar Prasad (VI) v. Union of India,[87] the Supreme Court relied on the recommendations of the Sarkaria Commission relating to the discretionary powers of the Governor when faced with a fractured electoral mandate. Given the element of subjectivity involved in the Governor's taking decisions in controversial circumstances, including the appointment of the Chief Minister, or in ascertaining the majority, or in dismissal of the Chief Minister or in dissolving the legislative assembly, the Supreme Court emphasised that it was necessary to ensure that the decisions were objective and politically unbiased.

A question has been raised about the relation between the President and the Council of Ministers which has resigned on losing majority support in the Lok Sabha, but which remains in office pending alternative arrangements being made. If the House is dissolved, then such a Ministry may remain in office for a few months pending fresh elections to the Lok Sabha.[88] This happened when Charan Singh resigned in 1979, or when Chandra Sekhar resigned in 1991, or Gujral resigned in 1997. In each of these cases, the Ministry lost majority support in the Lok Sabha, so it resigned. As no alternative Ministry could be formed, the Lok Sabha was dissolved[89] and fresh elections held. The question is: Is the President bound to act on the advice of such a Ministry?

Article 74(1) draws no distinction between a Ministry enjoying confidence of the House and the one which remains in office after losing confidence of the Lok Sabha. Theoretically, therefore, it can be argued that the President remains bound by the advice of such a Ministry. But, on the other hand, it may also be argued that Art. 74(1) is pre-conditioned by Art. 75(2). However, a view has been expressed that such a Ministry should only act as a care-taker government and take routine decisions and not policy decisions or make heavy financial commitments binding the future government.[90] This means that the President has to monitor Cabinet decisions and refuse to accept any policy decision by a care-taker gov-

---

85. Reference may be made to what happended in Australia in 1975 : see, supra.
86. On dissolution of Lok Sabha, see, Ch. II, supra.
87. (2006) 2 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 980.
88. This arrangement has been validated by the Supreme Court in U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi, supra, Sec. A(iii).
89. On dissolution of Lok Sabha, see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(c)(d).
90. R. VENKATARAMAN (former President), Relations with the Cabinet, The Hindustan Times, dated Feb. 24, 98, p. 13; VENKATARAMAN, MY PRESIDENTIAL YEARS, 504.

ernment. To do so would amount to an exception to the rule contained in Art. 74(1) that the President acts in accordance with the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers.

It can also be argued that so far as the Constitution is concerned, it draws no distinction between a care-taker and a normal government. The term care-taker government has not been used anywhere in the Constitution. The term came in vogue to denote a government in office after dissolution of the Lok Sabha pending fresh elections and installation of a new government. The question lies basically in the realm of practices and conventions. Perhaps, in course of time, some conventions will emerge to regulate the relationship between the President and the Ministry holding office while the Lok Sabha is dissolved.

This question came to the forefront rather acutely during the period April to October, 1999. The Vajpayee Government, a coalition of several parties headed by the BJP was in office at the time. A constituent party (AIADMK) withdrew support and doubt arose whether the Government enjoyed a majority support in the Lok Sabha. The President advised the Government to seek a vote of confidence. On April 17, 1999, the Government lost by one vote (in favour, 269; against, 270). As the opposition failed to come together to form an alternative government, the President dissolved the Lok Sabha on April 26, '99, on the advice of the Cabinet, and asked the Vajpayee Government to remain in office till a new government assumed office after fresh elections which were scheduled to be held in September, 99. Thus, the new government could assume office only in October.[91]

The question arose how should the Vajpayee Government behave during the period from April to October, a period of about 6 months. The opposition parties insisted that the Government should act as a care-taker government and take only routine administrative decisions and no policy decision. On the other hand, the Government's view was that it was not a care-taker, but a full-fledged, government. In practice, the Government did take several policy decisions. The most important task performed by the Government was to throw out Pakistani intruders from Kargil, and this involved taking a number of policy decisions. The Government could not have taken the stand that being a caretaker government, it would not take such decisions. Such a stand would have been against national interest.

In such a situation, therefore, a relevant question does arise : can a government remain in limbo for six months? At the end of the day, the question seems to be one of propriety rather than of legality. Perhaps, in normal circumstances, it may be proper to avoid taking policy decisions, and bind the discretion of the future

---

91. This episode raises some serious questions having a bearing on the working of parliamentary form of government in India. One, should a government in office be required to seek a vote of confidence whenever a doubt arises about its majority support in Lok Sabha? The opposition parties always have at their disposal the technique of bringing a vote of no-confidence against the government, especially when the Parliament is in session. Besides, many occasions arise when the government majority can be tested on the floor of the House. Two, should the opposition parties vote out a government in office when they themselves are not in a position to form an alternative government? In the view of the author, the opposition parties owe to the people that they should behave with a sense of responsibility.

In Britain, a minority government has remained in office when the opposition parties, though in majority, are not in a position to form government. Why cannot this happen in India as well?

government, except when it becomes absolutely necessary to take such a decision. The matter falls more in the domain of conventions rather than of law.

The fact, however, remains that the working and viability of the parliamentary system depends upon a disciplined party system. If there are multiple loosely knit parties then the marginal discretion of the President in matters of appointing the Prime Minister and dissolution of Lok Sabha may be of crucial and decisive significance.[1] But the President may not have much scope to exercise his judgment if there is a strong and cohesive party system.

In normal times, the Prime Minister and his colleagues hold their offices not as a gift from, or as a matter of grace of the President, but because they have a majority support behind them. So long as this position holds, the President has no activist role to play. There can be no conflict between his will and that of Parliament. But when fissures appear in the party system, and it becomes fluid, then the President will have opportunity to exercise his marginal discretion. In any case, the Constitution envisages not a dictatorial but a democratic President who uses his judgment to keep the democratic and representative government functioning and not to thwart or to subvert the same.

The relationship between the President and the Council of Ministers is based on political sanctions and any error of judgment on the part of the President may well prove to be his graveyard.[2] Nevertheless, the President can exert a lot of constructive and beneficial influence on the functioning and processes of the government of the day through his sagacious, objective, non-partisan and non-political advice. He may not rule but he certainly may reign and seek to keep parliamentary system on an even keel.[3] This is in line with the tradition in Britain where the Queen "has the right to offer, on her own initiative, suggestions and advice to her Ministers even where she is obliged in the last resort to accept the formal advice tendered to her".[4]

(b) PRIME MINISTER

In the mechanism of the parliamentary form of government, the Prime Minister occupies a crucial position.[5] JENNINGS describes him as the 'keystone of the

---

1. See, Dinesh Chandra v. Chaudhuri Charan Singh, AIR 1980 Del. 114, supra, Sec. A(iii), where the court has said that the President enjoys discretion in the matter of appointment of the Prime Minister.
2. The question of the constitutional position of the President has been discussed too often in India. See, for example, HENRY W. HOLMES JR., Powers of President : Myth or Reality, 12 J.I.L.I. 367 (1970); V.S. DESHPANDE, The President, His Powers and their Exercise, 13 J.I.L.I 326 (1971); HARISH KHARE, The Indian Prime Minister—A Plea for Institutionalization of Powers, V JCPS 22 (1971).
3. Some time back, some letters exchanged between President Sanjeeva Reddy and Prime Minister Indira Gandhi (period 1981) were released. It seems from these letters that the President did communicate his views on urgent public matters to the Prime Minister and urged her to take remedial action. Other Presidents have also adopted a similar course. Apart from personal discussion, Presidents do use the vehicle of letters to communicate their views to the Prime Ministers. See, CHALAPATI RAO & AUDINARAYANAN REDDY, FROM FARM HOUSE TO RASHTRAPATI BHAWAN: BIOGRAPHY OF PRESIDENT SANJEEVA REDDY, (1989).
   One will gather the same impression after reading the memories of the former President of India, (1987-1992), R. VENKATARAMAN under the title MY PRESIDENTIAL YEARS, (1994).
4. S.A. DE SMITH, CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 99 (III Ed. 1977).
5. On the question of appointment of the Prime Minister, see, supra, Sec. A(iii).

Constitution'.[6] He further observes : "All roads in the Constitution lead to the Prime Minister". Earlier, Joh Morley had described him as the "keystone of the cabinet arch".

The Prime Minister is the leader of the majority party in the Lok Sabha. He is the head of the Council of Ministers. He co-ordinates government policy. He is the channel of communication, the only link, between the President and the Council of Ministers. In this connection, reference may be made to the provisions of Art. 78.[7]

He is responsible for the appointment of the Ministers and allocation of work among them.[8] He can compel the resignation of a Minister and invoke the presidential power to dismiss an unwanted Minister, and, therefore, all Ministers hold office at his discretion.[9] A Minister who is not prepared to accept his leadership must tender his resignation.

The Prime Minister is the principal spokesman of the Cabinet and its defender in Parliament. He can obtain dissolution of the Lok Sabha.[10] He is the Chairman of the Cabinet, summons its meetings and presides over them. His resignation would automatically amount to a resignation of all Ministers who compose the government.

Therefore, the Prime Minister's position is one of great power, influence and prestige. He keeps the fabric of the parliamentary form of government in working order. The entire constitutional machinery would appear to revolve around his personality. He has therefore, been described as 'the keystone of the Cabinet arch,' who is 'central to its formation, central to its life, and central to its death.'[11]

---

6. JENNINGS, CABINET GOVT., 173 (1969). Also see, BYRAM CARTER, THE OFFICE OF PRIME MINISTER; JENNINGS, PARLIAMENT, 73-79 (1970); MACKINOSH, THE BRITISH CABINET, 428-58 (1977).

7. Supra, p. 209.

8. Supra, Sec. A(iii).

9. Ibid.

10. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. (I)(c).

11. S.A. DE SMITH, CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 146 et seq; LASKI, PARLIAMENTARY GOVERNMENT IN ENGLAND, 228; A.H. BROWN, Prime Ministerial Power, 1968 Public Law, 228; O. HOOD PHILLIPS, CONSTITUTIONAL & ADM. LAW, 3-325 (1993).

In Britain, the position of the Prime Minister has been described in various ways. "The Prime Minister", said JOHN MORLEY, "is the keystone of the cabinet arch". JENNINGS describes him as "the keystone of the Constitution". IVOR JENNINGS in the CABINET GOVERNMENT states that the Prime Minister is not merely the first among equals, he is not merely a moon among lesser stars, he is rather "a sun around which planets revolve".

NEHRU also underlined the primacy of the Prime Minister's office: THE HINDUSTAN TIMES, June 17, 1954, p. 5. Again, in a Press Conference on Nov. 7, 1958, he emphasized that the whole basis of parliamentary system of government is based on a homogeneous Cabinet of which the keystone is the Prime Minister and that if a Minister could not co-operate with him, it was difficult for him to carry on—either the Prime Minister goes or he goes,' and that it would be rather absurd if Ministers functioned in a way opposed to the Prime Minister; The Hindustan Times, Nov. 8, 1958, p. 1.

Similarly, the President of the ruling party, the Congress, stated that if after discussions and consultation, the Ministers do not agree with the Prime Minister, he after assessing the situation in the light of discussions may finally make it clear to his Ministers, his own view and those who do not agree with him will have to decide whether they will vote with him or against him. If they vote against him, then the Prime Minister would be justified in calling for their resignations; THE HINDUSTAN TIMES, Jan. 19, 1959. p. 12.

However, no Prime Minister can govern without the aid of colleagues. He thus functions under one important limitation—that of keeping a government in office which constantly enjoys the confidence of the majority in the Lok Sabha. The selection of the Prime Minister is itself the result of compromises of various forces within the political party concerned and, therefore, the Prime Minister has also to seek constantly the support of the political party to which he belongs. If the Prime Minister is heading a coalition government, his freedom of action becomes much more limited because he has to carry with him not only his own party but also the several parties in the coalition.

The Prime Minister cannot, therefore, act as an autocrat or despot; he cannot afford to disregard the views of his colleagues and party organs always. He depends on his colleagues for support and too many resignations from the Cabinet may ultimately lead to his downfall.

Due to this reason, it has sometimes been suggested that the Prime Minister is primus inter pares among his colleagues.[12] But this does not depict the position of the Prime Minister aptly. Subject to the limitation of his commanding the confidence of the Lok Sabha, and the support of the political party, the Prime Minister's position is very much superior to that of other Ministers. Much, however, depends on the individual personality of the Prime Minister and a person like Nehru or Indira Gandhi could completely overshadow the whole Cabinet, and even the party machinery. In the words of KEITH, "the polite description of the Prime Minister as primus inter pares" is "inadequate to describe the real position of the Prime Minister if by temperament he is willing to assert to the full position which he can assert if he so desires."[13]

In this connection, DE SMITH observes:[14]

> "But the most significant fact is that nearly all commentators regard the cabinet as being in some degree subordinate to the Prime Minister. Hardly any one today will make out a case for the proposition that the Prime Minister is merely primus inter pares, the first among the equals.."

The Constitution makes no mention of the office of the Deputy Prime Minister, but, on occasions such appointments have been made. In 1990, when V.P. Singh was appointed as the Prime Minister, Devi Lal took oath mentioning himself as the Deputy Prime Minister. A question was raised through a writ petition before the Supreme Court whether the oath taken by Devi Lal was valid.

In K.M. Sharma v. Devi Lal,[15] the Court rejected the writ petition saying that an oath has two parts—(i) descriptive; (ii) substantial. So long as the substantial part of the oath is properly followed, a mere mistake or error in the descriptive part would not vitiate the oath.[16] On this basis, the Court ruled that though Devi Lal described himself as the Deputy Prime Minister, he was "just a Minister like other members of the Council of Ministers" and though he described himself as the Deputy Prime Minister, such description of him "does not confer on him any powers of the Prime Minister."

---

12. WADE AND PHILLIPS op. cit., 244.
13. THE BRITISH CABINET SYSTEM, 61 (1952); also, JENNINGS, CABINET GOVT., 227.
14. S.A. DE SMITH, CONST. AND ADMN. LAW, 147.
15. AIR 1990 SC 528 : (1990) 1 SCC 438.
16. Virjiram Sutaria v. Nathalal Premji Bhavadia, AIR 1970 SC 657 : (1969) 1 SCC 77.

(c) CABINET

Cabinet is the nucleus of the Council of Ministers. The Council of Ministers is usually a large body consisting of a number of Ministers of various ranks, e.g., Cabinet Minister, Ministers of State and Deputy Ministers. Within this large body, there exists a smaller inner body known as the Cabinet which is really the effective policy-making organ within the Council of Ministers.

Cabinet really is the driving and steering body responsible for the governance of the country.[17] It consists of the principal Ministers with whom rests the real direction of policy. The Council of Ministers as a whole never meets formally.

In Britain, Cabinet is based on no legal sanction and has no legal status; it is an organ of government which rests on understandings and conventions. Similar is the case in India. The Constitution makes reference to the Council of Ministers but makes no reference to the Cabinet. Cabinet is a conventional, an extra-constitutional, body but it is the ultimate policy-making and decision-making organ within the executive.

All members of the Council of Ministers are not members of the Cabinet. Its composition is flexible. It is for the Prime Minister to determine from time to time the composition of the Cabinet, though due to the relative importance of certain departments, their Ministers are invariably its members. The Cabinet Ministers are members of the Cabinet, while a Minister of State may attend a Cabinet meeting when matters pertaining to his department are to be discussed.

Cabinet decides major questions of policy. Its decisions are binding on all Ministers. The various government departments carry out the Cabinet's policy decisions by administering the law and devising measures for enactment as law by Parliament. A Minister may himself dispose of routine matters without reference to the Cabinet, but in all matters of major policy or of real political importance, a Minister seeks guidance from the Cabinet.

Cabinet is the central directing instrument of government in legislation as well as in administration. It coordinates administrative action and sanctions legislative proposals. It is the Cabinet which controls Parliament and governs the country. The primary function of the Cabinet is to formulate the policies of the government for the governance of the country, have it accepted by the Legislature and carry on the executive function of the state as per the Constitution and the laws.

In no other authority there is such a concentration of power and such a capacity for decisive action as that possessed by the Cabinet, provided always that it enjoys the support of majority in the House.[18] The Cabinet can be said to be the centre of gravity of the parliamentary system for the whole weight of government is, in a very real sense, concentrated at that point. However, views have been expressed recently that the Cabinet government has become transformed into Prime Ministerial government. This indicates the ascendancy of the Prime Minister at the expense of the Cabinet.[19]

---

17. R.K. Jain v. Union of India, (1993) 4 SCC 119, 147 : AIR 1993 SC 1769; S.R. Bommai v. Union of India, (1994) 3 SCC 1 : AIR 1994 SC 1918.

18. L.S. AMERY, The Nature of British Parliamentary Government, in PARLIAMENT—A SURVEY, (ed. Lord CAMPION), 59; DAWSON, op, cit., 167-192.

19. WADE AND PHILLIPS, Op. Cit., 242, 246

(d) COLLECTIVE RESPONSIBILITY

A notable principle underlying the working of parliamentary government is the principle of collective responsibility which represents ministerial accountability to the legislature. It means that the Government must maintain a majority in the Lok Sabha as a condition of its survival.

In Britain, the principle is not legal but conventional; in India, on the other hand, there is a specific provision in the Constitution to ensure the same. Art. 75(3) lays down that the Council of Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha.

Reference may also be made in this connection to Art. 78(c) which says that the President may submit a decision taken by a Minister for consideration by the Council of Ministers which really means the Cabinet. This provision further strengthens the principle of collective responsibility. When a Minister tenders any advice to the President, the matter not having been considered by the Cabinet, the President may submit it for consideration by the Cabinet.[20]

The principle of collective responsibility may be regarded as fundamental to the working of the parliamentary government, as it is in the solidarity of the Cabinet that its main strength lies. The principle of collective responsibility means that the Council of Ministers is responsible as a body for the general conduct of the affairs of the government. All Ministers stand or fall together in Parliament, and the government is carried on as a unity. The rule ensures that the Council of Ministers works as a team, as a unit, and as a body commands the confidence of the House, and that Cabinet's decisions are the joint decisions of all Ministers.[21] There has been for sometime and is at present a multitude of political parties in India. At present, 57 political parties are represented in Parliament and in the States. Without any particular party capable of forming a government on its own, there have been coalition governments at the Centre and in many States for about the last 30 years. The country has and is being run by a number of parties which not only do not represent the majority in the country but may not even represent the majority in their own state. With different political agendas there is often no consensus on major issues of policy. Threats of withdrawal of support unless a coalition partner's particular political agenda is met, has resulted either in a stalemate or in an individual minister in charge of the ministry taking decisions without consulting the Council or the Cabinet.[22]

The principle of collective responsibility secures the unity of the Cabinet and the Council of Ministers. Prime Minister Nehru took occasion to expound the principle as follows in the context of the State Governments. "A government af-

---

20. Supra (a).

21. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Bakshi Gulam Mohd., AIR 1967 SC 122 : 1966 Supp SCR 401.

See, KEETON, THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH, I, 55.

For a discussion on the Indian Cabinet at work, see, MICHAEL BRECHER, INDIA AND WORLD POLITICS, 234-253 (1968).

On collective responsibility, also see, Beg, C. J., in State of Karnataka v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 68 at 96-7 : (1977) 4 SCC 608; Common Cause, A Registered Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979, 2992 : (1999) 6 SCC 667; PU Myllai Hlychho v. State of Mizoram, (2005) 2 SCC 92 : AIR 2005 SC 1537.

22. See for exhaustive discussion : Bimal Jalan: India's Politics: A view from the Backbench (2007).

ter the parliamentary model, is one united whole. It has joint responsibility. Each member of the government has to support the others so long as he remains in the government. The Minister has to support his other Ministers and the other Ministers have to support each other and the Chief Minister. It is quite absurd for any Minister to oppose or give even the impression of opposing a colleague of his. Opinions may be freely expressed within the Cabinet. Outside, the government should have only one opinion. There is no question of a member of government being neutral in a controversial issue in which the government is concerned, except in the rare cases which we may consider as matters of conscience, where freedom is given."[23]

Collective responsibility envisages that each Minister assumes responsibility for cabinet decisions and action taken to implement the same. The policies and programmes of the Cabinet have to be supported by each Minister. Even if there may be differences of opinion within the Cabinet, once a decision has been taken by it, it is the duty of every Minister to stand by it and support it both within and outside the Legislature.

The decisions of the Cabinet are regarded as the decisions of the whole Council of Ministers and binding on all Ministers. A Minister cannot disown responsibility for any Cabinet decision so long as he remains a Minister. He cannot both remain a Minister and criticise or oppose a Cabinet decision or even adopt an attitude of neutrality, or oppose a colleague in public. A Minister who disagrees with a Cabinet decision on a policy matter, and is not prepared to support and defend it, should no longer remain in the Council of Ministers and should better resign.

There have been a number of resignations in the past because of differences with the Cabinet. Dr. Mathai resigned as a Finance Minister because he disagreed with the Cabinet on the question of scope and powers of the Planning Commission which was proposed to be set up then. C.D. Deshmukh resigned because he differed from the Cabinet on the issue of re-organisation of States, especially on the question of Bombay. On September 5, 1967, Foreign Minister Chagla resigned because of his differences with the Government's language policy, especially the place of English. Several other Ministers have resigned from the Central Council of Ministers owing to their differences with the Cabinet.[24] There is, however, a convention that a resigning Minister may, if he so wishes, may state the nature of his disagreement with the Cabinet in his letter of resignation and make a resignation speech in Parliament.

The principle of collective responsibility does not mean that every Minister must take an active part in the formulation of policy, or that he should be present in the committee room whenever a policy decision is taken. This is not possible because of the large size of the present-day Council of Ministers. The effective decision-making body is the Cabinet and not the entire Council of Ministers and, therefore, the obligations of a Minister may be passive rather than active when the decision does not relate to matters falling within his own sphere of responsibility.

---

23. NEHRU'S Letter, THE HINDUSTAN TIMES, June 17, 1954.
24. For details, see, VENKATESWARAN, CABINET GOVERNMENT IN INDIA, 73-93 (1967).

Collective responsibility ensures that the Council of Ministers presents a united front to Parliament. In the words of LASKI, "Cabinet is by nature a unity : and collective responsibility is the method by which this unity is secured." In the words of the Supreme Court of India, the principle of collective responsibility is that "for every decision taken by the Cabinet, each one of the ministers is responsible to the Legislature concerned."[25]

The principle of collective responsibility is both salutary and necessary. In S.P. Anand, Indore v. H.D. Deve Gowda,[26] it was held that even though a Prime Minister is not a member of either House of Parliament, once he is appointed he as also his Ministers become answerable to the House and the principle of collective responsibility governs the democratic process. On no other condition can a Council of Ministers work as a team and carry on the government of the country. It is the Prime Minister who enforces collective responsibility amongst the Ministers through his ultimate power to dismiss a Minister. The Supreme Court has ruled that the principle of collective responsibility is in full operation so long as the Lok Sabha is not dissolved. "But when it is dissolved the Council of Ministers cannot naturally enjoy the confidence of the House of People."[27]

The Gujarat High Court has described the principle of collective responsibility as follows:[28]

> "Collective responsibility means all Ministers share collective responsibility even for decisions in which they have taken no part whatsoever or in which they might have dissented at the meeting of the Council of Ministers. Collective responsibility means the members of Council of Ministers express a common opinion. It means unanimity and confidentiality."

According to the Supreme Court, collective responsibility means that "all members of a government are unanimous in support of its policies and would exhibit that unanimity on public occasions although while formulating the policies, they might have expressed a different view in the meeting of the Cabinet."[29]

It is to give effect to the principle of collective responsibility that the deliberations of the Cabinet are kept secret and confidential because preservation of a united front will become impossible if disclosures are permitted of the differences of opinion which emerged at a Cabinet meeting amongst its members.[30]

The consequences of this secrecy are far reaching. "Relying on this protection, Cabinet members are free to voice their opinions without reserve on all subjects which come up for discussion; the motives which have influenced the Cabinet in coming to its decision will not be disclosed: the dissentients can support the corporate policy without being themselves singled out for special attack or having the motives impugned."[31]

---

25. Karnataka v. Union of India, AIR 1978 SC 131. For further discussion on this case, see, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
26. 1996 (6) SCC 734 : AIR 1997 SC 272.
27. U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi, AIR 1971 SC 1002 : (1971) 2 SCC 63; supra, Sec. A(iii).
28. Dattaji Chirandas v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1999 Guj. 48, 59.
29. Common Cause—A Regd. Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979 at 2992 : (1999) 6 SCC 667.
30. WADE AND PHILLIPS, op. cit., 100.
31. DAWSON, op. cit., 185.

A Cabinet Minister may lose his office if he reveals the details of a Cabinet discussion to the press. The secrecy may at times be released partially when a Minister resigns his office. He is entitled to make a statement in Parliament so that he may reveal the reasons for his resignation.

How far can an ex-Cabinet Minister be legally obligated not to reveal Cabinet discussion? This question has been answered in Britain in Attorney-General v. Jonathan Cape Ltd.[32] Crossman was a Cabinet Minister for nearly six years (1964-1970). He maintained a detailed diary about the Cabinet proceedings. After he ceased to be a Minister, he began to collate his diaries with a view to their eventual publication. Crossman died in 1974. After his death, his diaries were due for publication. The Attorney General brought an action for injunction against Crossman's executors for restraining them to publish the diaries. His contention was that the Cabinet proceedings and Cabinet papers being secret, these could not be publicly disclosed. The confidentiality of Cabinet papers and proceedings emanate from "the convention of joint Cabinet responsibility" "whereby any policy decision reached by the Cabinet has to be supported thereafter by all members of the Cabinet whether they approve of it or not, unless they feel obliged to resign".

The Court laid down the proposition that "when a Cabinet Minister receives information in confidence the improper publication of such information can be restrained by the Court". The Court pointed out that the "Cabinet is at the very centre of national affairs and must be in possession at all times of information which is secret or confidential". To identify the Ministers who voted one way or another in a Cabinet meeting would undermine the doctrine of joint responsibility".

The Court, therefore, ruled that "the expression of individual opinions by Cabinet Ministers in the course of Cabinet discussion are matters of confidence, the publication of which can be restrained by the court when this is clearly necessary in the public interest". The Court also agreed that "the maintenance of the doctrine of joint responsibility within the Cabinet is in the public interest, and the application of that doctrine might be prejudiced by premature disclosure of the views of individual Ministers". But in the instant case, the Court refused to grant injunction because what was sought to be revealed was ten years old, as the Cabinet discussions held during the period 1964-1966 were sought to be published in 1975, and there would be no damage to public interest by the said publication.

As earlier noted, coalition governments have now become the order of the day in India, especially at the Centre. A number of disparate political parties come together to form the government as no single party has majority in the House. Experience has shown that inherently such governments are unstable as any constitutional party forming such a coalition government can withdraw its support anytime, thus, reducing the government to a minority. Another casualty of such an arrangement is the principle of collective responsibility, the reason being that the various parties lack a common programme and a common approach to national issues and so they speak in different voices. Further, the various parties constituting the government are more interested in pursuing their own party programme rather than a common national agenda. The coalition governments adversely affect the homogeneity and solidarity of the Cabinet.

---

32. [1976] QB 752.

To begin with, in Britain, the concept of collective responsibility was based on conventions. But, now, after Jonathan Cape, it cannot be regarded as a purely conventional concept because the court of Appeal has specifically recognised it. In India, the concept of collective responsibility has been specifically incorporated in a constitutional provision [Art. 75(3)], and it has been judicially recognised in several cases mentioned above.

(e) MINISTER'S INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY

All decisions are not taken by the Cabinet; many decisions are taken by the Ministers themselves without reference to the Cabinet, or by officials in the department without reference to the Minister.

Article 77(3), noted above, [33] envisages distribution of business among several Ministers. Even a Minister does not take all decisions himself, most of the decisions are taken by officials in the department under the Minister according to the Rules of Business. This is the effect of Art. 77(3). Therefore, along with the principle of collective responsibility, there also works the principle of the individual responsibility of each Minister to Parliament, which is more positive in character. Each Minister is personally accountable for his actions.

The Supreme Court has explained this principle in the following words: [34]

> "The Cabinet is responsible to the legislature for every action in any of the ministeries. That is the essence of joint responsibility. That does not mean that each and every decision must be taken by the Cabinet. The political responsibility of the Council of Ministers does not and cannot predicate the personal responsibility of the Ministers to discharge all or any of the governmental functions. Similarly, an individual Minister is responsible to the legislature for every action taken or omitted to be taken in his Ministry. This again is a political responsibility and not personal responsibility."

No Minister can retain office against the will of Parliament. Each Minister in his own sphere of responsibility bears the burden of speaking and acting for the government. He has to answer questions relating to the activities of his department and defend his policies and administration when the House discusses the same. He must answer for every act or neglect of his department, and he cannot throw this responsibility on any one else whether an official in his department or another Minister. Each Minister is personally liable and collectively responsible for his actions, acts and policies.

This positive liability of each Minister is essential if the Parliament is to effectively perform its role of criticising the Executive. But when a particular Minister is under fire in Parliament, the principle of collective responsibility ensures that other Ministers should come to his rescue and defend his actions.[35]

---

33. See, supra, Sec. B(a).
For a detailed discussion on this point, see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, II, Ch. XX.

34. A. Sanjeevi v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102 : (1970) 1 SCC 443.

35. The best example of this is provided by the discussion in Parliament on Kuo Oil Deal. When the then Petroleum Minister P.C. Sethi was being criticised for his error of judgment, his action was defended by the Shiv Shankar who was the Petroleum Minister at the time of the discussion. Sethi said nothing in his defence: See, THE HINDUSTAN TIMES (Int'l, ed.), Aug, 12, 82, p. 4.

By and large, a vote of no-confidence against one Minister may be treated as a vote of no-confidence against the entire Council of Ministers. This principle of responsibility of the entire Council of Ministers for the actions of one Minister is not, however, an absolute rule. Many a time, a Minister acts without reference to the Cabinet though on important issues of policy he would ordinarily seek the Cabinet's decision. If the Minister has taken the policy-decision in question with the Cabinet's approval, then, naturally, the principle of collective responsibility applies and each Minister is liable for it. But, some flexibility is noticeable in case a Minister takes an action without the Cabinet's approval.

Ordinarily, the Council as a whole would support him, but there have been instances when the erring Minister has been asked or allowed to go instead of the whole Council. The truth probably is that constitutional practice in this respect is not rigidly settled, but depends on the exigencies of the situation. On occasions, Cabinet may feel bound to back a Minister, but there are instances, when the Cabinet has decided to throw the offending Minister off. "Faced with the problem of what to do when an individual Minister's actions are likely to be criticised in Parliament, the Cabinet must decide which course will do the greater damage to the Government—to accept full responsibility and let the odium fall on the Government as a whole or suffer the shock of the amputation of the offending member. What the Cabinet cannot, however, do is to retain the Minister but contend that the responsibility is all his."[36]

The most outstanding example of a Minister going out instead of the whole Council of Ministers is that of Krishna Menon who resigned as the Defence Minister because of the debacle of the Indian arms in the face of the Chinese aggression in 1962. Many policies of the Cabinet going way back were responsible for India's unpreparedness, and not only what one Minister alone did or did not do, but still the brunt of public hue and cry fell on Menon. The truth appears to be that it is ultimately for the Prime Minister to decide whether he will drop a particular Minister or not because of criticism against him in Parliament. It appears to be most unlikely today that the House could force a Prime Minister to remove an individual Minister from his office.

When a Minister is guilty of some indiscretion, corruption, mala fides or a mistake of a personal nature, invariably he alone would go out instead of the whole Council of Ministers. For example, in 1963, K.D. Malaviya resigned after an inquiry by a Supreme Court Judge into some allegations against him, although the Judge's findings were kept confidential. In 1965, T.T. Krishnamachari, the Finance Minister, resigned because certain allegations were made against him which the Prime Minister wanted to be enquired into by a Supreme Court Judge. Krishnamachari, insisted that the Prime Minister should himself hold the inquiry and since the Prime Minister did not agree to this, he resigned as he felt that the Prime Minister had ceased to have confidence in him.[37]

When a commission of inquiry is appointed to probe into charges of corruption or misuse of power against an individual minister, there is no violation of the principle of collective responsibility discussed above. As the Supreme Court has

---

36. KEETON, op.cit., 56.

37. VENKATESWARAN, op. cit., 160.

Also see, WADE AND PHILLIPS, op. cit., 106-8; KEETON, op. cit., 56; S.A. DE SMITH, CONSTITUTIONAL & ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 161-167. Also see, infra, Ch VII.

observed in this connection in State of Karnataka v. Union of India,[38] it is difficult to accept that for "acts of corruption, nepotism or favouritism which are alleged or proved against an individual Minister, the entire Council of Ministers can be held collectively responsible to the legislature. If an individual Minister uses his office as an occasion or pretence for committing acts of corruption, he would be personally answerable for his unlawful acts and no question of collective responsibility of the Council of Ministers can arise in such a case." The principle of collective responsibility of the Cabinet does not exclude the individual responsibility of a Minister for his actions or decisions.

The Supreme Court has very explicitly spelt out the concept of the individual responsibility of a Minister in Secretary, Jaipur Development Authority v. Daulat Mal Jain.[39] The holder of a public office is empowered by virtue of his appointment to the office. The holder of the office, therefore, gets opportunity to abuse or misuse the office. Each Minister is personally and collectively responsible for the actions, acts and policies. He is accountable and answerable to the people. The legal and moral responsibility or liability for the acts done or omissions, duties performed and policy laid down rest solely on the Minister of the Department. Accordingly, he is indictable for his conduct or omission, or misconduct or misappropriation. The Council of Ministers is jointly and severally responsible to the legislature. The Minister/Council of Ministers is/are also publicly accountable for the acts or conducts in the performance of duties.

The Court has further asserted that the most elementary qualification which a Minister ought to possess is honesty and incorruptibility.[40]

The principle of individual responsibility is underlined by Art. 75(2) according to which "The Ministers shall hold office during the pleasure of the President". As stated above, the power to dismiss a Minister is to be exercised on the advice of the Prime Minister on whose recommendation a Minister is appointed. The Prime Minister can get rid of an undesirable minister by invoking the President's power under Art. 75(2). But, in practice, this power is invoked rarely for a Minister would ordinarily resign when asked to do so by the Prime Minister.[41]

Ministers or government employees also remain accountable to the courts for the legality of their actions. They may be held civilly or criminally liable, in their individual capacities, for tortious or criminal acts.[42] An unlawful order passed by a Minister or a civil servant can be quashed or declared unlawful on judicial review. In the case noted below,[43] the Supreme Court quashed the allotment of petrol pumps by the Central Minister for Petroleum in his discretion describing it as illegal, arbitrary and "atrocious". In another case,[44] allotment of shops/stalls by the Minister of Housing and Urban Development to her own relatives/employees/

---

38. AIR 1978 SC 131.
Also, Bakshi Ghulam Mohd. v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1967 SC 122 : 1966 Supp SCR 401.

39. (1997) 1 SCC 35.

40. Also see, Common Cause, A Registered Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979 : (1999) 6 SCC 667.

41. Supra, Sec. A(iii)(d).

42. See, State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Bakshi Gulam Mohd., AIR 1967 SC 122 : 1966 Supp SCR 401.

43. Common Cause A Registered Society v. Union of India, (I), AIR 1996 SC 3538 : (1996) 6 SCC 520; Common Cause v. Union of India, (II), AIR 1999 SC 2979 : (1999) 6 SCC 667.

44. Shiv Sagar Tiwari v. Union of India, (1996) 6 SCC 599; (1996) 6 SCC 558.

domestic servants out of the discretionary quote without following any policy or criteria was held by the Supreme Court to be "wholly arbitrary, mala fide and unconstitutional."

MISFEASANCE IN OFFICE

In course of time, a tort of misfeasance in public office has also come into existence.

The tort has been defined as "malicious abuse of power, deliberate maladministration and unlawful acts causing injury" to a person. The tort arises when there is deliberate abuse of power. The tort imposes, liability on a public officer who does an act which to his knowledge amounts to an abuse of his office and which causes damages. The element of "bad faith or malice" is the decisive factor in such a tort.[45] In Common Cause I (1996), the Supreme Court held that the Minister for Petroleum had committed the tort of "malfesance in public office" and imposed on him exemplary damages of Rs. 50 lacs payable to the Central Exchange. But, then, in Common Cause II (1999), the Court revised its earlier judgment and held that the Minister had not committed any such tort. The Minister's order was held to be simply "unlawful" and so it was quashed.[46]

(f) MINISTER'S RESPONSIBILITY FOR HIS SUBORDINATES

A Minister's responsibility extends not only to his own actions but also covers the actions of his subordinates who work under him.

A Minister cannot attend to every business in his department. Most of the decisions in the department are taken by civil servants at various levels. The function of the Minister is to lay down broad policies and programmes of his Ministry while the Council of Ministers settle the major policies and programmes of the government. A Minister is not expected to burden himself with day to day administration.[47]

An important convention followed in Britain is that a Minister is responsible for the acts of his subordinate civil servants in his Ministry. By tradition, individual civil servants are not the target for parliamentary criticism: for their shortcomings and mistakes the Minister must accept responsibility. For what an unnamed official does, or does not do, his Minister alone must answer in Parliament. A Minister is responsible for his department and is accountable for departmental errors even though the individual fault is to be found in his subordinates.

Again, the Supreme Court has pointed out that the functions of the government are carried out in the name of the President by the Prime Minister, Ministers and Civil Service. "Since the functions of the government are carried on by the Executive in the name of the President on the advice of the Ministers, they alone are answerable to the Parliament. The Civil Service as such has no constitutional personality or responsibility separate from the duly constituted government."[48]

---

45. Dunlop v. Woolahara Municipal Council, [1981] 2 WLR 693; Northern Territory v. Mengel, (1995) 69 Aus LJ 527; Lucknow Development Authority v. M.K. Gupta, AIR 1994 SC 787 : (1994) 1 SCC 243.

46. For further discussion on this tort, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, II.

47. A. Sanjeevi v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102 : (1970) 1 SCC 443.

48. Common Cause, A Regd. Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979 at 2989 : (1999) 6 SCC 667.

This principle has two advantages. First, the official who cannot defend himself publicly, is thus protected from attack. Secondly, it prevents the Minister from trying to evade criticism of his own actions by shifting the responsibility on to the subordinates. It would be a dangerous constitutional doctrine if a Minister were to shield himself by blaming the officials for the failure of his policies. No Minister can absolve himself by passing on the blame to someone else or saying that what was done had not been authorised by him. This positive liability of a Minister is essential if Parliament is to perform effectively its role of critic of the executive. In Britain, the classic case defining ministerial responsibility is the Crichel Down case in which the Minister of Agriculture resigned because of certain controversial transactions by his department without his personal knowledge.[49]

The principle of Minister's individual responsibility for the acts of his subordinate was reiterated in India rather dramatically in what is known as the Mundhra affair. The principal Finance Secretary in the Ministry of Finance negotiated the purchase of a large number of shares from an individual industrialist for the Life Insurance Corporation. This transaction was later found to be improper and against business principles. Dealing with the question whether the Finance Minister was in any way responsible for the acts of his Secretary, Justice Chagla enquiring into the transaction observed: "In any case, it is clear that constitutionally the Minister is responsible for the action taken by his Secretary with regard to this transaction. It is clear that a Minister must take the responsibility for actions done by his subordinates. He cannot take shelter behind them, nor can he disown their actions."

Further, Justice Chagla observed: "The doctrine of ministerial responsibility has two facets. The Minister has complete autonomy within his own sphere of authority. As a necessary corollary, he must take full responsibility for the actions of his servants. It is true that this may throw a very great burden on the Minister because it is impossible to expect that in a highly complicated system of administration which we have evolved the Minister could possibly know, leave alone give his consent to, every action taken by his subordinates. But it is assumed that once the policy is laid down by the Minister, his subordinates must reflect that policy and must loyally carry out that policy. If any subordinate fails to do so, he may be punished or dismissed, but, however vicariously, the responsibility of his action must be assumed by the Minister".

In conclusion, Justice Chagla held that in the instant case the Minister must fully and squarely accept the responsibility for what the Secretary did and "if the transaction is improper although the Secretary be actually responsible for the transaction, constitutionally the responsibility is that of the Minister."[50]

The convention of a Minister's responsibility for the acts of his subordinates was thus established in India. Writing to the Finance Minister, while accepting his resignation as a sequel, Prime Minister Nehru observed, "Whoever might be responsible for this ..... according to our conventions, the Minister has to assume responsibility, even though he might have had little knowledge of what others did and was not directly responsible for any of these steps."

---

49. Crichel Down Enquiry, Cmd. 9176 (1954).
50. The HINDUSTAN TIMES, Feb. 14, 1958, p. 13. P. M's letter, Ibid, at p. 7.

Later, the Prime Minister observed, in the course of a debate in Parliament on the Chagla Report, "The Government accepted the broad principles of ministerial responsibility in this matter but to say that the Minister was always responsible for all the actions of the officers working under him would be taking this much too far."

In the State sphere, where practically the same principles of ministerial responsibility apply as at the Centre, the Agriculture Minister of Madhya Pradesh resigned because information pertaining to his Ministry's budget demands in the Legislature leaked from his department. The Minister's responsibility in the matter of leakage could at best be regarded as vicarious.[51]

The principle of responsibility of a Minister for the acts of his subordinates has been specifically reiterated by the Supreme Court in the under mentioned case.[52] The Court has pointed out that the government functions through bureaucrats, who shape its social, economic and administrative policies to further the social stability and progress socially, economically and politically. Therefore, the actions of the individuals do reflect upon the actions of the government.

The Court has stated that a Minister is responsible not only for his own actions but also for the job of the bureaucrats who work under him. The government acts through its bureaucrats. The Minister owes the responsibility to the electors for all his actions taken in the name of the Governor in relation to the department of which he is the head.

No Minister can possibly get acquainted with all the detailed decisions involved in the working of his department. The ministerial responsibility, therefore, would be that the Minister must be prepared to answer questions in the House about the actions of his department and the resultant enforcement of the policies. Even for actions performed without his concurrence, he will be required to provide explanations and also bear responsibility for the actions of the bureaucrats who work under him. "Therefore, he bears not only moral responsibility but also in relation to all the actions of the bureaucrats who work under him bearing actual responsibility in the working of the department under his ministerial responsibility." Despite the de facto control that may be exercised by the Government either directly or through its appointees, ministers are, as yet, not responsible for the actions of autonomous statutory corporations. The laws setting up the Corporations do not expressly so provide and the issue is yet to be agitated before the Courts.

The principle of vicarious liability is in the highest traditions of parliamentary government, but in modern administration it is becoming more and more difficult to observe it in practice. Because of the vast expansion of administrative responsibilities of a Minister, chances of errors by his subordinates have very much increased and it cannot, therefore, be asserted that the Minister must resign for every lapse of his subordinates. The limits of this responsibility are hard to define. For example, Lal Bahadur Shastri resigned as the Railway Minister because of a railway accident caused by the negligence of some railway servants. In 1999, Nitish Kumar resigned as Railway Minister owning moral responsibility for the August 2 Gaisal rail disaster that claimed over 280 lives. These resignations are

51. See, infra, Ch. VII.
52. Secretary, Jaipur Development Authority, Jaipur v. Daulat Mal Jain, (1997) 1 SCC 35, 45 : (1996) 8 JT 387.

exceptional and have not served as precedents in other departments of government.

C. INTERACTION BETWEEN THE EXECUTIVE AND PARLIAMENT

India has parliamentary form of government at the Centre which implies a government not by Parliament itself but by Ministers responsible to Parliament. As ILBERT has stated: "Parliament does not govern, and is not intended to govern. A strong executive government, tempered and controlled by constant, vigilant and a representative criticism is the ideal at which Parliamentary institution aim."[53] The Constitution amply fulfils this ideal by fully underlining the responsibility of the Ministers to the Lok Sabha.

In the first place, a Minister must be a member of a House of Parliament.[54] Such membership ensures contact between the Executive and the Legislative wings, facilitates co-operation and interaction between them and makes parliamentary control over the Executive somewhat real.

In the second place, Ministers stay in office so long as they enjoy the support of a majority in the Lok Sabha.[55] This helps Parliament in calling the Ministers to account, keeping a watch on them, eliciting information from them on matters of public importance and influencing the policy-making process. Defeat of the Ministry in the Lok Sabha on a major question of policy is counted as an expression of want of confidence leading to the resignation of the Ministry. A motion of want of confidence in the Council of Ministers may be moved in the Lok Sabha though not in the Rajya Sabha as the Council of Ministers is not responsible to it.

Thirdly, both Houses of Parliament take a number of opportunities to discuss, question, criticise and debate government policy and conduct of administration. Legislation provides an opportunity for Parliament discussing the executive's programme as many policies of the executive need laws for effective implementation. Taxation and appropriations are not authorised without parliamentary law. Discussions on the annual budget, demands for grants, etc. provide a useful opportunity to the members of Parliament to review and criticise the policies and working of each department. Each House has a number of committees which constantly scrutinise several aspects of the working of the Executive.[56]

Fourthly, the Executive cannot ignore and by-pass Parliament because the Constitution enjoins that not more than six months should pass between the end of one session and the beginning of another. Therefore, sooner or later the Executive must face Parliament.

Lastly, a number of constitutional provisions assign to Parliament a role in certain matters pertaining to the Executive, e.g., Parliament is empowered to fix the emoluments, allowances and privileges of the President, Vice-President and the Ministers. Houses of Parliament may impeach the President for violation of the Constitution; the elected members of Parliament constitute an important seg-

---

53. ILBERT, PARLIAMENT, 103.
54. Sec. A(iii), (c), supra.
But for six months, a non-member can remain a Minister, supra.
55. Supra, Sec. B(d).
56. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(iv).

ment of the electoral college for electing the President; the Vice-President may be removed from his office by a resolution of the Rajya Sabha agreed to by the Lok Sabha; the Vice-President is elected by the members of both Houses of Parliament. Powers of the Executive to issue ordinances and declare an emergency are subject to parliamentary control.[57]

In the modern set up, however, in effect, more than Parliament controlling the Executive, it is the other way round, viz. the Executive controlling the Parliament.[58] Summoning, prorogation and dissolution of Houses lie in the hands of the Executive. The Executive also has a veto on legislation enacted by the Houses and, in financial matters, the executive plays a very important role. Practically, all legislation is sponsored by the Ministers. The Cabinet is in complete control of the Houses and virtually monopolises business therein.

The dominant role now played by the Cabinet in parliamentary affairs is the result of the emergence of party governments. There are well organised and disciplined political parties which solicit votes. The party securing majority in the lower House forms the Council of Ministers which consists of practically all the leading members of the party. The party members follow the lead given by the party leaders. The party members do not vote against the party Ministry.

Further, defeat of a Ministry in the House often leads to the dissolution of the Lower House resulting in a general election.[59] The power to dissolve the House is a potent weapon in the hands of the Prime Minister which he wields to control the House, for the M.Ps. do not want to undergo the ordeal of a general election until it is absolutely essential. For one thing, it is a very costly proposition to contest an election; for another, no one can be sure of the result of an election and it is possible that political power may pass to the opposing political party which no one likes. A modern election cannot possibly be contested without the support of a party. Therefore, a member of the majority party supports the government while in Parliament lest he should offend the party leaders and make it difficult for him to get the party nomination at the time of the next election.

The threat to dissolve results in promoting cohesion and discipline within the party. Not only this, the Cabinet's power of dissolution instils responsibility even in its political opponents who cannot create a crisis on every issue by defeating the Ministry, for they know that in that case the Ministry may appeal to the electorate and seek its verdict. The opposition has thus to select the issue very carefully to defeat the Ministry, for it should be such on which the risks and hazards of a general election are well worth taking.[60]

All these circumstances place an enormous amount of power in the hands of the Cabinet and the Prime Minister. Rarely will a Ministry lose office by an adverse vote so long as it holds its majority in Lok Sabha. The result is that while in

---

57. For discussion on the power to issue ordinances, see, infra, Sec. D(ii)(d); for emergency provisions, see, Ch. XIII, infra.

58. LORD HAILSHAM describes the British system as follows: "To a great and greater degree Parliament is becoming the House of Commons, the House of Commons is becoming the government majority and the government majority is a rubberstamp for government".
The Dilemma of Democracy, 107 (1978).
This is also true of India.

59. On dissolution of Lok Sabha, see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(c).

60. JENNINGS, PARLIAMENT, 7, 135, 136; KEETON, THE PASSING OF PARLIAMENT, 56-63 (1954); PARLIAMENT—A SURVEY, 89-120; BOWIE AND FRIEDRICH, STUDIES IN FEDERALISM, 15, 16.

theory Parliament is supreme in that it can make or unmake a Ministry, in practice, a Ministry once in power controls and leads the Parliament. This however is subject to this rider that as the Cabinet is dependent on the continuous support of a majority, it has to take into account the opinions of its supporters. "Just as Parliament must accept direction from the Government, so the Government must remember that Parliament represents the electorate. A Government which does not take care that its general policy retains the confidence of the public risks defeat either in Parliament or when it faces the electorate, which it must do at least every five years."

Behind the parliamentary scene, Ministers often meet their supporters and exchange views with them: party meetings are held to discuss matters of current importance and all these processes have an impact on the executive policy and decision-making. The truth, therefore, is that mutual controls and checks between the executive and the legislative organs generate mutual interdependence and co-operation, which is essential for the smooth operation of the parliamentary system.

D. FUNCTIONS AND POWERS OF EXECUTIVE

The Central Executive exercises very broad and varied functions. It exercises not only 'executive' functions but also, in a limited way, judicial and legislative functions as well.

(i) JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS

The Central Executive appoints the Judges of the Supreme Court[61] and the High Courts.[62] Whether a member of a House of Parliament has become subject to a disqualification or not is decided formally by the President, though, in effect, by the Election Commission.[63]

POWER OF PARDON

Article 72 empowers the President to grant pardon, reprieve, respite or remission of punishment, or to suspend, remit or commute the sentence of any person convicted of any offence in all cases—

(a) where the punishment or sentence is by a court martial;

(b) where the punishment or sentence is for an offence against a law relating to a matter to which the Union's executive power extends; and

(c) of a death sentence.[64]

---

61. Art. 124(2); infra, Ch. IV.
62. Art. 217(1); infra, Ch. VIII.
63. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. D(b).
64. Reprieve means stay of the execution of sentence; respite denotes postponement of execution of a sentence; pardon means to forgive, to excuse; remission reduces the amount of a sentence without changing its character and commutation is changing the sentence to a higher penalty of a different form.

A pardon is an act of grace which releases a person from punishment for some offence. A pardon may be either full, limited or conditional. A full pardon wipes out the offence in the eyes of law; a limited pardon relieves the offender from some but not all the consequences of the guilt and a conditional pardon imposes some condition for the pardon to be effective.

This, however, does not affect the power conferred by law on any officer of the Union armed forces to suspend, remit or commute a sentence passed by a court martial, as well as the power exercisable by the State Executive to suspend, remit or commute a death sentence.[65]

The President acts in this matter on the advice of the Home Minister.

The offences relating to currency and coinage included in Ss. 489-A to 489-D of the Indian Penal Code are matters exclusively within the legislative competence of Parliament and the executive power of the Central Executive extends to these matters.[66] Accordingly, the Central, and not the State, Government is the appropriate Government competent to remit the sentence passed in relation to such offences.[67]

The question whether the power of pardon can be exercised when the Court has sentenced the contemnors to imprisonment or imposed any other penalty has not yet been decided. It is arguable that since the power of the Courts to punish for contempt is derived from the Constitution,[68] the phrase "offence against any law relating to a matter to which the Executive power of the Union extends" in Article 72 (1), would not cover such punishments.[69]

The scope of the power conferred on the President by Art. 72 is very extensive. It extends to the whole of India. The power to grant pardon may be exercised either before conviction by amnesty to the accused or under-trial prisoner or after conviction.[70]

This power is practically similar to that in America or Britain. The American President has power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences committed against the United States except in cases of impeachment. In Britain, the Crown enjoys a prerogative to grant a pardon to any criminal; but the prerogative is exercised on ministerial advice.

As regards the nature of the power of pardon vested in the President by Article 72, the Supreme Court has propounded the American, rather than the British, view. In Britain, the power is regarded as the royal prerogative of pardon exercised by the Sovereign. It is regarded as an act of grace issuing from the Sovereign. On the other hand, in the U.S.A., a pardon by the President is regarded not as a private act of grace but as a part of the constitutional scheme.[71] The Supreme Court of India, in Kehar Singh v. Union of India,[72] has preferred to adopt the view propounded by HOLMES, J., in the context of India. PATHAK, CJ, has observed on behalf of a unanimous Court:

> "The power to pardon is a part of the constitutional scheme, and we have no doubt, in our mind, that it should be so treated also in the Indian Republic. It has

---

65. Infra, Ch. VII, Sec. C.
66. Infra, Chs. X and XII.
67. G.V. Ramaniah v. Supdt., Central Jail, AIR 1974 SC 31 : (1974) 3 SCC 531.
68. Articles 129 and 215.
69. The power of the Union and the States to legislate is concurrent (Entry 14; List III; Seventh Schedule) and expressly excludes contempt of the Supreme Court.
70. In re Channugadu, AIR 1954 Mad 511, See, BALKRISHNA, Presidential Power of Pardon, 13 J.I.L.I, 103.
71. MR. JUSTICE HOLMES, in WI Biddle v. Vuco Perovich, 71 L Ed 1161.
72. AIR 1989 SC 653 : (1989) 1 SCC 204. See also Epuru Sudhakar v. Govt. of A.P. (2006) 8 SCC 161, 172, 190 : AIR 2006 SC 3385.

> been reposed by the people through the Constitution in the Head of the State, and enjoys high status. It is a constitutional responsibility of great significance, to be exercised when occasion arises in accordance with the discretion contemplated by the context."

The reason for taking this view is, as explained by PATHAK, CJ., earlier in the judgment that 'to any civilized society, there can be no attributes more important than the life and personal liberty of its members'. In most civilised societies, 'the deprivation of personal liberty and the threat of the deprivation of life by the action of the State' is regarded seriously, and, therefore, recourse is provided to the judicial organ for its protection. But there is always remaining the possibility of 'fallibility of human judgment' even in 'the most trained mind', and it has been considered appropriate that in the matter of life and personal liberty, 'the protection should be extended by entrusting power further to some high authority to scrutinise the validity of the threatened denial of life or the threatened or continued denial of personal liberty. The power so entrusted is a power belonging to the people and reposed in the highest dignitary of the State'.

In Kehar Singh, the fact situation was as follows: Kehar Singh was convicted under S. 120B read with S. 302, IPC, for the assassination of Indira Gandhi, the then Prime Minister of India, and was sentenced to death. His appeal to the Supreme Court was dismissed. His son then presented a petition before the President of India for grant of pardon to his father under Art. 72. The President rejected the petition. Kehar Singh's request for a personal hearing was rejected by the President on the ground of not being in conformity with the "well established practice in respect of consideration of mercy petitions". In response to a communication by the counsel on behalf of Kehar Singh, the President stated that "he cannot go into the merits of a case finally decided by the highest court of the land".

Thereafter, Kehar Singh's son filed a writ petition in the Delhi High Court seeking an order restraining the Central Government from executing the death sentence on Kehar Singh. On this petition being dismissed by the High Court, a special leave appeal under Art. 136 was filed in the Supreme Court. A Bench of five Judges considered the matter and the judgment of the Court was delivered by PATHAK, C.J.

The most significant question considered by the Court was : To what areas does the President's power to scrutinise evidence extend in exercising his power to pardon? On this question, again, the Court exhibited the most liberal view. The Court expressed the view that it is open to the President in the exercise of the pardon power vested in him by Article 72 'to scrutinise the evidence on the record of the criminal case and come to a different conclusion from that recorded by the Court in regard to the guilt of, and sentence imposed on, the accused'. Explaining the matter, the Court observed:[73]

> "In doing so, the President does not amend or modify or supersede the judicial record. The judicial record remains intact, and undisturbed. The President acts in a wholly different plane from that in which the Court acted. He acts under a constitutional power, the nature of which is entirely different from the judicial power and cannot be regarded as an extension of it. And this is so, not> withstanding that the practical effect of the Presidential act is to remove the stigma of guilt from the accused or to remit the sentence imposed on him."

73. (1989) 1 SCC at 213 : AIR 1989 SC 653.

Thus, the Court took the view that in exercising his power of pardon, the President can go into the merits of the case notwithstanding the fact that it has been judicially concluded by the court. The President can examine the record of evidence of the criminal case and determine for himself whether the case is one deserving the grant of the relief falling within that power. As regards the plenitude of power conferred by Article 72 on the President, the Court observed:[74]

> "... The power under Article 72 is of the widest amplitude, can contemplate a myriad kinds and categories of cases with facts and situations varying from case to case, in which the merits and reasons of state may be profoundly assisted by prevailing occasion and passing time. And it is of great significance that the function itself enjoys high status in the constitutional scheme."

The Court asserted that 'the question as to the area of the President's power under Article 72 falls squarely within the judicial domain and can be examined by the court by way of judicial review'. The Court asserted that the function of determining whether the act of a constitutional or statutory functionary falls within the constitutional or legislative conferment of power, or is vitiated by self denial on an erroneous appreciation of the full amplitude of the power, is a matter for the court. In view of this clarification, the Court ruled in Kehar Singh that the petition of the petitioner invoking power under Art. 72 "shall be deemed to be pending before the President to be dealt with and disposed of afresh." After reconsideration of the matter in the light of Supreme Court's observations, Kehar Singh's mercy petition was again rejected by the President.

The exercise of this power over time has not been free from controversy. A number of questions have cropped up before the courts as regards the exercise of the power of pardon, as for example—

(i) Does the President exercise any personal discretion in the matter or does he act merely as a constitutional head?

(ii) Should he give a personal hearing to the convicted or his lawyer before disposing of the matter?

(iii) Is the power to pardon subject to any norms, e.g., Art. 14?[75]

(iv) Is the exercise of this power subject to any judicial review?

It has now been judicially clarified that though the power to pardon is formally vested in the President, he exercises this power, as he exercises any other power, as per Art. 74(1)[76], on the advice of the concerned Minister, i.e., the Home Minister. The Supreme Court clarified in Maru Ram v. Union of India[77] that it is not open to the President to take an independent decision or to direct release or refuse release of any one of his own choice. "It is fundamental to the Westminister system that the Cabinet rules and the Queen reigns being too deeply rooted as foundational to our system….." "The President is an abbreviation for the Central Government."

---

74. Ibid, 218.
75. For a full discussion on Art. 14, see, Ch. XXI, infra.
76. Supra, Sec. B(a).
77. AIR 1980 SC 2147 : (1981) 1 SCC 107.

In Kehar Singh, the Supreme Court has denied that there is any right in the condemned person to insist on an oral hearing before the President on his petition invoking his powers under Art. 72. The matter lies within the discretion of the President and it is for him to decide how he will deal with the case. The proceeding before the President is of an executive character[78] and when the petitioner files his petition it is for him to submit with it all the requisite information necessary for the disposal of the petition.

From time to time, the Supreme Court has considered the question whether there should be some guidelines for the exercise of power to pardon by the President. In Maru Ram, the Court expressed a view in favour of laying down some guidelines for the purpose of exercising power under Art. 72 in order to avoid any allegation of arbitrary exercise of power. The Court observed:

> "The proper thing to do, if the Government is to keep faith with the founding fathers, is to make rules for its own guidance in the exercise of the pardon power keeping, of course, a large residuary power to meet special situations or sudden developments. This will exclude the vice of discrimination such as may arise where two persons have been convicted and sentenced in the same case for the same degree of guilt but one is released and the other refused, for such irrelevant reasons as religion, caste, colour or political loyalty."

The matter again cropped up before the Court in Kuljeet Singh v. Lt. Governor,[79] In a writ petition, it was argued before the Supreme Court that under Art. 72, President's power is coupled with a duty and that it must be exercised fairly and reasonably. Has the Government formulated any uniform standard or guidelines by which the exercise of the constitutional power under Art. 72 is intended to be or is in fact governed? The Court said that the question was of far-reaching importance and that it was necessary that it be examined with care.

But, then, later the Court did not really examine this question and left it open and dismissed the writ petition on the ground that, in view of the circumstances in which murder was committed by the accused in the instant case, the only sentence which could possibly be imposed on him was death and there was no reason to interfere with that sentence. In the instant case, the Court opined that in refusing to commute the death sentence to a lesser sentence, the President did not in any manner transgress his discretionary power under Art. 72.[80] The question, therefore, of standards and guidelines for the exercise of the power under Art. 72 (as well as Art. 161)[81] remained an open one.

But in Kehar Singh, the Court has given a very broad ambit to this power and has also changed its stance on the question of laying down any guidelines. The Court has said that "there is sufficient indication in the terms of Art. 72 and in the history of the power enshrined in that provision as well as existing case-law, and specific guidelines need not be spelled out." In fact, the Court has now realised that it may not be possible to lay down any "precise, clearly defined and sufficiently channelised guidelines" as Art. 72 has very wide amplitude and contemplates "a myriad kinds and categories of cases with facts and situations varying

---

78. The Court has characterized the power to pardon as "executive" for two reasons : (i) There is no inherent right in the petitioner to claim an oral hearing; (2) the President acts in this matter on the advice of the concerned Minister. The author has however characterised the power as 'Judicial' because the power does involve interference with the Judicial process.

79. AIR 1981 SC 2239.

80. Kuljeet Singh v. Lt. Governor, AIR 1982 SC 774 : (1982) 1 SCC 417.

81. See, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. C.

from case to case, in which the merits and reasons of state may be profoundly assisted by prevailing occasion and passing time."[82]

A significant question which has cropped up before the Supreme Court several times has been whether there can be any judicial review of the exercise of the power of pardon by the President. The Court considered this question as early as 1976 in G. Krishna Goud v. State of Andhra Pradesh.[83] Two persons were sentenced to death for committing murder in implementing their ideology of social justice through terrorist technology. The President refused to commute the death sentence. Before the Supreme Court, it was argued on their behalf that their crime was of a political nature which merited different considerations. Rejecting the petition, the Supreme Court described the nature of the power as follows:

> "Article 72 designedly and benignantly vest in the highest executive the humane and vast jurisdiction to remit, reprieve, respite, commute and pardon criminals—on whom judicial sentences may have been imposed. Historically, it is a sovereign power; politically, it is a residuary power; humanistically, it is in aid of intangible justice where imponderable factors operate for the well-being of the community, beyond the blinkered court process."

But the Court pointed out that all public power—'all power, however, majestic the dignitary weilding it, shall be exercised in good faith, with intelligent and informed care and honestly for the public weal'. In the instant case, the Court had not been shown any demonstrable reason or glaring ground to consider the refusal of commutation' as 'motivated by malignity or degraded by abuse of power'.

In Maru Ram,[84] the Supreme Court insisted that although the power of pardon is very wide, 'it cannot run riot'. The Court emphasized that no constitutional power is to be exercised arbitrarily. Public power vested on a high pedestal has to be exercised justly. 'All public power, including constitutional power, shall never be exercisable arbitrarily or mala fide and, ordinarily, guidelines for fair and equal execution are guarantors of the valid play of power'. On this aspect, the Court stated further:

> "Article 14 is an expression of the egalitarian spirit of the Constitution and is a clear pointer that arbitrariness is anathema under our system. It necessarily follows that the power to pardon, grant remission and commutation, being of the greatest moment for the liberty of the citizen, cannot be a law unto itself but must be informed by the finer canons of constitutionalism."[85]

Although considerations for the exercise of power under Art. 72 (and the same goes for Art. 161)[86], may be "myriad and their occasion protean", and best be left to the government, yet, if in any case, the power to pardon, commute or remit is exercised on irrational, irrelevant, discriminatory or mala fide considerations, the courts could examine the case and intervene if necessary. There may be grounds, such as, political vendetta or party favouritism which may make the actual exer-

---

82. Also see, Ashok Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1792 : (1991) 3 SCC 498. In this case, the Court has reiterated the Kehar Singh ruling on the question of laying down guidelines for exercising power under Art. 72.

83. (1976) 2 SCR 73 : (1976) 1 SCC 157. Also see, Kuljeet Singh v. Lt. Governor, AIR 1982 SC 774 : (1982) 1 SCC 417.

84. AIR 1980 SC 2147 : (1981) 1 SCC 107.

85. For discussion on Art. 14, see, infra, Ch. XXI, Sec. B.

86. Infra, Ch. VII, Sec. C.

cise of the constitutional power vulnerable. 'The order which is the product of extraneous or mala fide factors will vitiate the exercise' and likewise 'capricious criteria will avoid the exercise'. Thus, the power under Article 72 is not to be exercised on 'wholly irrelevant, irrational, discriminatory or mala fide' considerations. 'Only in these rare cases will the Court examine the exercise.' The Court then went on to suggest:

> "The proper thing to do, if the Government is to keep faith with the founding fathers, is to make rules for its own guidance in the exercise of the pardon power keeping, of course, a large residuary power to meet special situations or sudden developments. This will exclude the vice of discrimination such as may arise where two persons have been convicted and sentenced in the same case for the same degree of guilt but one is released and the other refused, for such irrelevant reasons as religion, caste, colour or political loyalty."

But the Court resiled from the above approach in Kehar Singh[87] with the following observation :

> "It seems to us that there is sufficient indication in the terms of Art. 72 and in the history of the power enshrined in that provision as well as existing case law, and specific guidelines need not be spelled out."

The Court went on to say that it may indeed not be possible to lay down any "precise, clearly defined and sufficiently channelised guidelines", for the power under Art. 72 "is of the widest amplitude", and it can contemplate "a myriad kinds of and categories of cases with facts and situations varying from case to case, in which the merits and reasons of state may be profoundly assisted by prevailing occasion and passing time. And it is of great significance that the function itself enjoys high status in the constitutional status."

The Court later explained away the apparent contradiction between Maru Ram and Kehar Singh in a later case[88] by saying that what was said in Maru Ram was "a mere recommendation and not a ratio decidendi having a binding effect." In Satpal v. State of Haryana,[89] the Governor's order granting pardon was set aside on the ground that the Governor had not been advised properly with all the relevant materials.

In Kehar Singh, the Supreme Court has accepted the proposition laid down in Maru Ram as regards the exercise of pardon power by the President. The Court has expressed the view that the order of the President cannot be subjected to judicial review on its merits except within the strict limitations defined by the Court in Maru Ram. The Court has observed:

> "The function of determining whether the act of a constitutional or statutory functionary falls within the constitutional or legislative conferment of power, or is vitiated by self-denial on an erroneous appreciation of the full amplitude of the power is a matter for the court."

It will thus be noted from Kehar Singh and Maru Ram that while the Supreme Court has conceded to the President a wide plenitude scope to consider all facets of the matter to exercise his power, the President's power is not absolute and

---

87. AIR 1989 SC 653 : (1989) 1 SCC 204.
88. Ashok Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1792, 1803-1804 : (1991) 3 SCC 498.
89. (2000) 5 SCC 170 : AIR 2000 SC 1702; See also Dhananjoy Chatterjee @ Dhana v. State of West Bengal, (2004) 9 SCC 751 : AIR 2004 SC 3454.

completely beyond judicial purview. Of course, the courts will interfere only if the power is exercised mala fide or in an arbitrary or discriminatory manner.[90]

In Epuru Sudhakar v. Govt. of A.P.,[91] KAPADIA J.in a concurring judgment, held that considerations of religion, caste or political loyalty are irrelevant and prohibited. It was also held that the power of executive clemency is not only for the benefit of the convict, but while exercising such a power the President or the Governor, as the case may be, has to keep in mind the effect of the decision on the family of the victim and society and the precedent it sets for the future.[92]

The U.S. Supreme Court has justified the existence of the power of clemency in the executive in Grossman[93] in the following words:

> "Executive clemency exists to afford relief from undue harshness or evident mistake in the operation or enforcement of the criminal law. The administration of justice by the courts is not necessarily always wise or certainly considerate of circumstances which may properly mitigate guilt. To afford a remedy, it has always been thought essential in popular Governments, as well as in monarchies, to vest in some authority other than the court, power to ameliorate or avoid particular judgments…Our Constitution confers this discretion on the highest office in the nation in confidence that he will not abuse it."

The Law Commission of India has also justified the existence of the prerogative of mercy in the executive.[94] The Commission has observed in this connection:

> "There are many matters which may not have been considered by the courts. The hands of the court are tied down by the evidence placed before it. A sentence of death passed by a court after consideration of all the materials placed before it may yet require reconsideration because of: (i) facts not placed before the court; (ii) facts placed before the court but not in the proper manner; (iii) facts discovered after the passing of the sentence; (iv) events which have developed after the passing of the sentence, and (v) other special features. Nor can one codify and select these special features which would be too numerous to lend themselves to codification. For these reasons, we do not recommend any change in the scope of these powers".

The Supreme Court has ruled in State of Punjab v. Joginder Singh[95] that the power under Art. 72 "is absolute and cannot be fettered by any statutory provision such as Ss. 432, 433 and 433A of the Criminal Procedure Code. This power cannot be altered, modified or interfered with in any manner whatsoever by any statutory provisions or Prison Rules.". A decision of the President of India on a petition under Art. 72 is subject to judicial review but on very limited grounds.[96]

Under Art. 161, a parallel power to grant pardon vests in the State Governors. There have been cases where the exercise of the power by the Governors has

---

90. See Bikas Chatterjee v. Union of India, (2004) 7 SCC 634 : (2004) 10 Scale 190.
91. (2006) 8 SCC 161 at 163 : AIR 2006 SC 3385.
92. Ibid at pp. 190-191. For further discussion see under Note Chapter VII (infra).
93. Ex parte, Grossman, 267 US 87 (1925).
94. Report on Capital Punishment, 317-18 (1967).
95. AIR 1990 SC 1396, 1400 : (1990) 2 SCC 661. Also, Ashok Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 1792 : (1991) 3 SCC 498; State Government of NCT of Delhi v. Premraj, (2003) 7 SCC 121: (2003) 8 JT 17.
96. Bikas Chatterjee v. Union of India, (2004) 7 SCC 634 : (2004) 10 Scale 109.

been quashed by the Supreme Court on the ground of misuse of power by the concerned Governor.[1]

(ii) LEGISLATIVE FUNCTIONS

Legislative power of the Central Executive can be discussed under the following heads:

(1) participation of the Executive in the legislative process;

(2) power of rule-making under the Constitution;

(3) power to proclaim an emergency; and (4) power to make ordinances.

(a) PARTICIPATION

The Council of Ministers being an integral part of Parliament participates intimately in the legislative process, and discharges several important functions in relation to Parliament. This concept is underlined by making President a component part of Parliament.[2]

The Executive's power to convene and prorogue Parliament, to dissolve Lok Sabha,[3] presentation of Bills to Parliament and the requirement of Presidential assent for transforming a Bill passed by the two Houses into an Act,[4] are some of the indicia which denote the intimate role played by the Executive in relation to the legislative process.

Because the government enjoys majority support in Lok Sabha, no bill is passed by the House unless the government supports it. Therefore, a private members's bill has no chance of getting through the House without government support. In practice, government monopolises legislative process in Parliament. Practically, all bills passed by the House of Parliament are those presented by the government.

Then, the Central Executive also participates, to some extent, in the legislative process in the States. Its consent is needed for certain types of State legislation: in some cases, before a Bill is introduced in the State Legislature, like a Bill imposing restrictions on freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse within the State,[5] and in some cases, after a Bill is passed by a State Legislature.[6] Thus, State Bills falling under Art. 288(2) do not become law unless approved by the Central Executive.[7]

Besides, as already stated, the President may address any or both Houses of Parliament,[8] and send messages to either House with respect to a Bill pending in Parliament or otherwise.[9]

---

1. For these cases, see, Ch. VII, infra.
2. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. A.
3. Supra, Ch. II, Secs. G and I.
4. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(i)(c).
5. Art. 304(b); infra, Ch. XV.
6. See, Art. 31A Proviso; infra, Ch. XXXII, Sec. A*;* Art. 200, infra, Ch. VI, Sec. D.
7. Infra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
8. Art. 86(1); Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(b).
9. Art. 86(2); Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(c).

Further, several provisions in the Constitution require prior recommendation of the President for introducing legislation on some matters in a House of Parliament. As for example—

(i) President's recommendation is required to introduce in either House a Bill for the formation of new States or alteration of areas boundaries or names of existing States [Art. 3].[10]

(ii) A Money Bill cannot be introduced without the recommendation of the President [Art. 117(1)].[11]

(iii) President's recommendation is required for consideration by a House of a bill involving expenditure from the Consolidated Fund of India [Art. 117(3)].[12]

(iv) Prior recommendation of the President is required for introducing in either House of Parliament any bill affecting any tax in which States are interested [Art. 274].[13]

It may however be noted that because of Art. 255(c), an Act of Parliament, or any provision is not to be regarded invalid on the ground that previous sanction was not obtained, if assent to that Bill is eventually given by the President.

(b) RULE MAKING

Several constitutional provisions confer rule-making powers on the Central Executive enabling it to prescribe detailed provisions for several matters, as for example:

(a) authentication of orders and instruments made and executed in the name of the President [Art. 77(2)];[14]

(b) the more convenient transaction of the government's business [Art. 77(3)];[15]

(c) conditions of services etc. of Audit and Accounts Department [Art. 148(5)],[16] Chairman and Members of the Union and Joint Public Service Commissions [Art. 318],[17] Secretariat and staff of Houses of Parliament [Art. 98(3)];[18]

(d) consultation with the U.P.S.C. regarding appointment of officials of the Supreme Court [Art. 146(1)];[19]

(e) dual membership of Parliament and State Legislatures [Art. 101(2)];[20]

(f) procedure to be followed at the joint sittings of the two Houses of Parliament [Art. 118(3)];[21]

---

10. See, infra, Ch. V.
11. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(c).
12. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(a).
13. See, infra, Ch. XI, Sec. D.
14. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(a),
15. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(a),
16. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(s).
17. Infra, Part V, Ch. XXXVI.
18. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. H(c).
19. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.
20. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. E(a).
21. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(i)(b).

(g) regulating the requirements and conditions of service of persons appointed to services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Union [Proviso to Art. 309].[22]

(c) DECLARATION OF EMERGENCY

In certain contingencies, the Central Executive has power to proclaim emergency. The declaration of an emergency effects several important changes in the normal working of the Constitution. This matter has been discussed in detail later in this book.[23]

(d) ORDINANCE-MAKING POWER

The Central Executive has power to issue ordinances and thus promulgate laws for a short duration. The technique of issuing an ordinance has been devised with a view to enabling the Executive to meet any unforeseen or urgent situation arising in the country when Parliament is not in session, and which it cannot deal with under the ordinary law.[24]

Ordinarily, under the Constitution, the President is not the repositary of the legislative power of the Union. This power belongs to Parliament. But, with a view to meet extraordinary situations demanding immediate enactment of laws, the Constitution makes provision to invest the President with legislative power to promulgate ordinances. An ordinance is only a temporary law. The executive in Britain or the U.S.A. enjoys no such power.

Article 123 empowers the President to promulgate such ordinances as the circumstances appear to him to require when—

(1) both Houses of Parliament are not in session; and

(2) he is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action.

The provision confers the power formally on the President; but, as already stated, he acts in this matter, as he does in other matters, on the advice of the Council of Ministers and, therefore, the ordinance-making power is vested effectively in the Central Executive. As the Supreme Court has stated: "The Ordinance is promulgated in the name of the President and in a constitutional sense on his satisfaction: it is in truth promulgated on the advice of his Council of Ministers and on their satisfaction."[25]

The power to issue an ordinance is legislative power. An ordinance issued by the President partakes fully of the legislative character and is made in the exercise of legislative power.[26]

---

22. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.

23. Ch. XIII, infra.

24. AMBEDKAR, VIII CAD, 213. See also, PANDEY, Hundred Years of Ordinance in India, 10 JILI 259 (1968).

Reference may also be made to the discussion on Ordinance-making power of the State Governors, see, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).

25. R.C. Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 564, 587 : (1970) 1 SCC 248. Also see, R.K. Garg v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 2138, 2144 : (1981) 4 SCC 675; A.K. Roy v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 710 : (1982) 1 SCC 271; Venkata v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 724; Nagaraj v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 551.

26. A.K. Roy v. Union of India, op. cit.

An ordinance is to be promulgated when the 'President', or rather the Central Executive, is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary to take immediate action. Whether or not circumstances exist which make the promulgation of an ordinance necessary is a matter to be decided by the Executive in its subjective satisfaction. Whether this satisfaction is non-justiciable or subject to judicial review on any ground still remains an open question.

Section 72 of the Government of India Act, 1935, authorised the Governor-General to make and promulgate ordinances for the peace and good government of British India 'in cases of emergency'. Discussing this provision in Bhagat Singh v. King-Emperor,[27] LORD DUNEDIN observed: "Who is to be judge of whether a state of emergency exists? A state of emergency is something that does not permit of any exact definition. It connotes a state of matters calling for drastic action which is to be judged as such by someone. It is more than obvious that someone must be the Governor-General and he alone. Any other view would render utterly inept the whole provision. Emergency demands immediate action, and that action is prescribed to be taken by the Governor-General. It is he alone who can promulgate the ordinance." In Lakhi Narayan v. State of Bihar,[28] the Federal Court had observed that whether the requisite circumstances existed for promulgating the ordinance was a 'matter which is notwithin the competence of courts to investigate. The language of the provision shows clearly that it is the Governor and Governor alone who has got to satisfy himself as to the existance of circumstances necessitating the promulgation of an ordinance. The existence of such necessity is not a justiciable matter which the courts could be called upon to determine by applying an objective test..." In King-Emperor v. Benoari Lal,[29] the Privy Council emphasized that the Governor-General was not required by the constitutional provision to state that there was an emergency, or what the emergency was, either in the text of the ordinance or at all, and assuming that "he acts bona fide and in accordance with his statutory powers it cannot rest with the courts to challenge his view that the emergency exists".

The above cases arose under the Government of India Act, 1935. A few cases have arisen under the Constitution as well.

In S.K.G. Sugar Ltd. v. State of Bihar[30] the Supreme Court stated as regards Governor's satisfaction to make an ordinance under Art. 213 (which is similar to Art. 123) that "the necessity of immediate action and of promulgating an ordinance is a matter purely for the subjective satisfaction of the Governor. He is the sole judge as to the existence of the circumstances necessitating the making of an ordinance. His satisfaction is not a justiciable matter. It cannot be questioned on the ground of error of judgment or otherwise in a court." Thus, on the basis of these cases,[31] it could be asserted that an enquiry into the question of satisfaction of the President as to the need for promulgating an ordinance is not a justiciable matter.

---

27. 58 I.A. 169, 172.
28. AIR 1950 FC 59. The case referred to the State (at that time, a Province), see, infra, Ch. IX.
29. 72 I.A. 57. Also, Lakhi Narayan v. State of Bihar, AIR 1950 FC 59.
30. AIR 1974 SC 1533 : (1974) 4 SCC 827.
31. Also see, Prem Narain v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1960 All. 205; Sarju Prasad v. State of U.P., AIR 1970 All. 571; Kalyan Bhadra v. Union of India, AIR 1975 Cal. 72; Fathima v. Ravindranathan, AIR 1975 Ker. 202.

But in the Bank Nationalisation case,[32] the constitutional validity of the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Ordinance, 1969, was challenged. By this ordinance, the Central Government nationalised a number of private banks. It was argued that the Ordinance was invalid because the condition precedent to the exercise of the power under Art. 123 did not exist. It was argued that Art. 123 does not make the President as the final arbiter of the exercise of the conditions on which the power to promulgate an ordinance may be exercised. On the other hand, the Government's argument was that "the condition of satisfaction of the President" "is purely subjective" and the Government was "under no obligation to disclose the existence of, or to justify the circumstances of the necessity to take immediate action". But as the Ordinance had been replaced by an Act of Parliament, the Supreme Court left the question open saying that the question had become 'academic'.[33]

The Court expressed no opinion on the extent of the Court's jurisdiction to examine, whether the condition relating to satisfaction of the President was fulfilled in the instant case. RAY, J., (minority opinion) however ruled that "the satisfaction of the President is subjective" and the only way in which the exercise of power by the President can be challenged in by establishing "bad faith or mala fide and corrupt motive".[34]

To remove any doubt on this point, in 1975, the 38th Amendment of the Constitution had added Art. 123(4) making satisfaction of the President to issue an ordinance non-justiciable.[35] In spite of Art. 123(4), the Supreme Court suggested that presidential satisfaction under Art. 123(1) could still be questioned on the ground of mala fides.[36]

However, in 1978, the 44th Amendment deleted this provision, and restored the status quo ante.[37] Again, in A.K. Roy v. Union of India,[38] the question of judicial review of the President's satisfaction to promulgate the National Security Ordinance, 1980, providing for preventive detention was raised. The Supreme Court left the question open whether the satisfaction of the President under Art. 123(1) is justiciable or not. The Court did say however that it was arguable that "judicial review is not totally excluded in regard to the question relating to the President's satisfaction." As to whether the preconditions to the exercise of power under Art. 123 have been satisfied or not cannot be regarded as a purely political question and kept beyond judicial review. In the instant case, since the Ordinance in question had been replaced by an Act of Parliament, the Court felt no need to go into the question of the President's satisfaction to issue the Ordinance in question. Further, the Court felt that the material placed before it was not sufficient to enable it to reach any conclusion one way or another on this question. The Court also pointed out that a prima facie case must be established by the petitioners as regards the non-existence of the circumstances necessary for the promulgation of the Ordinance before the burden can be cast on the President

---

32. Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 564 : (1970) 1 SCC 248.
33. Ibid, at 588.
34. Ibid, at 644.
35. See, infra, Ch. XLII.
36. State of Rajasthan v. Union of India, AIR 1977 SC 1361 : 1977 (2) SCC 592 : 1978 (1) SCR 1; see, infra, Ch. XIII.
37. See, infra, Ch. XLII.
38. AIR 1982 SC 710 : (1982) 1 SCC 271.

to establish those circumstances. A passing and a casual challenge to the existence of the circumstances leading to the President's satisfaction to issue the ordinance in question cannot be entertained by the Court. The Court did however observe that the power to issue ordinances is not meant to be used recklessly or under imaginary state of affairs or mala fide against the normal legislative process.

This argument is further strengthened after the Supreme Court has ruled in Bommai,[39] that a proclamation by the President under Art. 356 can be challenged on the ground of mala fides, or that it is based on wholly extraneous and irrelevant grounds. Repeal of the 38th Amendment by the 44th Amendment of the Constitution also indicates that the argument of mala fides is not foreclosed to challenge an ordinance.

In T. Venkata Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[40] the Supreme Court has ruled that since the power to make an ordinance is legislative and not executive power, its exercise cannot be questioned on such grounds as improper motives, or non-application of mind[41], or on grounds of its propriety, expediency and necessity. An ordinance stands on the same footing as an Act. Therefore, "an ordinance should be clothed with all the attributes of an Act of legislature carrying with it its incidents, immunities and limitations under the Constitution. It cannot be treated as an executive action or an administrative decision". The courts can declare a statute unconstitutional when it transgresses constitutional limits, but they cannot inquire into the propriety of the exercise of legislative power. It has to be assumed that the legislative discretion is properly exercised. The Court has observed:[42]

> "The motives of the legislature in passing a statute is beyond the scrutiny of the courts. Nor can the courts examine whether the legislature had applied its mind to the provisions of a statute before passing it. The propriety, expediency and necessity of a legislative act are for the determination of the legislative authority and are not for the determination of the courts."

Similarly, the Supreme Court has observed in Nagaraj: [43]

> "It is impossible to accept the submission that the ordinance can be invalidated on the ground of non-application of mind. The power to issue an ordinance is not an executive power but is the power of the executive to legislate... This power is plenary within its field like the power of the State Legislature to pass laws and there are no limitations upon that power except those to which the legislative power of the State Legislature is subject. Therefore, though an ordinance can be invalidated for contravention of the constitutional limitations which exist upon the power of the State Legislature to pass laws it cannot be declared invalid for the reason of non-application of mind, any more than any other law can be. An executive act is liable to be struck down on the ground of non-application of mind. Not the act of a Legislature".

---

39. See, infra, Ch. XIII.
40. AIR 1985 SC 724 : (1985) 3 SCC 198.
41. For explanation of these grounds, see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I. Ch. XIX.
42. AIR 1985 SC at 731 : (1985) 3 SCC 198.
For further discussion on this topic, see, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).
Also see, Ch. II, Sec. M.
43. K. Nagaraj v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 551, 565 : (1985) 1 SCC 523.

In these cases, the Supreme Court seems to have gone too far in immunizing an ordinance from judicial review. In the view of the author, it does not seem to be correct to treat an ordinance on all fours with an Act passed by Parliament. While it is one thing to say that a validly made ordinance has the same effect as an Act of Parliament, the two—an ordinance and an Act—are not the same in all respects. The essential difference between the two is that while legislation through Parliament, an elected body, is open and transparent and is subjected to criticism on the floor of the House and even outside the House, making and promulgating an ordinance is purely an executive decision, neither transparent nor open nor subject to any open discussion in any forum.

It is the legislative act of the executive but not the act of the legislature. Therefore, challenging the executive decision on the ground of mala fides should always remain a possibility so that the executive is deterred from using its power to issue an ordinance in an improper manner.

Recently the Constitutional Bench of the Supreme Court[44] has disapproved the view expressed in State of Rajasthan v. Union of India (supra) and reaffirmed the ratio in Bommai's case that the subjective satisfaction of a Constitutional authority including the Governor, is not exempt from judicial review. It was said that " it is open to the Court, in exercise of judicial review, to examine the question whether the Governor's report (recording his satisfaction) is based upon relevant material or not; whether it is made bona fide or not; and whether the facts have been duly verified or not". No doubt the opinion was expressed in connection with executive action under Article 356 which was not legislative in character, nevertheless it indicates an assertion that unless specifically barred every executive action is subject to judicial review.

The Delhi High Court has observed on this point :[45]

> "It is settled law that it is for the petitioner to make out a prima facie case that there could not have existed any circumstances whatsoever necessitating the issuance of ordinances before the Government could be called upon to disclose the facts which are within its knowledge. Every casual challenge to the existence of such circumstances would not be enough to shift the burden of proof to the Executive to establish those circumstances."

A single Judge of the Karnataka High Court in Hasanahba[46] declared an ordinance promulgated by the State Governor as being mala fide. The learned Judge maintained that "an ordinance is an emergency or a stop gap measure and the power is required to be used for purposes of sub-serving conserving and enhancing the constitutional process and should not be and cannot be used for purposes of bypassing it." He also referred to the Bommai case in support of his approach. But, on appeal, a bench of two judges reversed the single judge's judgment and ruled that the power to make an ordinance being legislative in nature, the concept of mala fides cannot apply thereto.[47] The court said that mala fides cannot be attributed to the legislature as a body and the governor acts as the substitute of the Legislature while making the ordinance. The court said :

---

44. Rameshwar Prasad v. Union of India, (2006) 2 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 980.
45. Gyanendra Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1997 Del 58, 61.
46. B.A. Hasanahba v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1998 Kant. 91.
47. State of Karnataka v. B.A. Hasanahba, AIR 1998 Kant 210.

> "The mala fides in making the law or passing the ordinance could not make such law unconstitutional".

The Court depended on Nagaraj for support and did not at all refer to Bommai. This author commends the approach of the single judge mentioned above rather than the division bench approach which has taken recourse to a mythical argument in preference to a realistic argument. It is beyond comprehension as to how can an executive body be treated as a "substitute" for the legislature. This amounts to taking recourse to a fiction in preference to reality.

An ordinance cannot be promulgated when both Houses of Parliament are in session. [Art. 123(1)]. Accordingly, an ordinance made when the two Houses are in session is void. It may, however, be made when only one House is in session, the reason being that a law can be passed by both Houses and not by one House alone, and, thus, it cannot meet a situation calling for immediate legislation and recourse to the ordinance-making power becomes necessary.

The House in session may, however, regard it as a discourteous act on the part of the government if it promulgates an ordinance without consulting it. What, therefore, may be done in such a situation is that a Bill embodying the necessary provisions may be got passed by the House in session and the same may then be promulgated as an ordinance. The Bill as passed by one House may later be passed by the other House and the ordinance revoked. This was done in 1957 when the Central Government servants threatened to go on strike. The Lok Sabha but not the Rajya Sabha was in session. A Bill was passed by the Lok Sabha to provide for maintaining essential services and the Essential Services Maintenance Ordinance was then issued embodying the provisions thereof.

The executive's ordinance-making power is not unrestrained. An ordinance can remain in force only for a short duration and is brought under the parliamentary scrutiny at the earliest possible opportunity. The scheme of Art. 123 is to place the ordinance-making power subject to the control of Parliament rather than that of the courts.

The ordinance is to be laid before each House of Parliament when it reconvenes after the making of the ordinance [Art. 123(2)(a)]. The ordinance shall cease to operate at the expiry of six weeks from the assembly of Parliament [Art. 123(2)(a)]. When the two Houses of Parliament assemble on different dates, the period of six weeks is to be reckoned from the later of the two dates.[48] It means that Parliament must pass a law to replace the ordinance within six weeks of its assembling. Thus, the maximum duration for which an ordinance may last is 7½ months as under Art. 85, six months cannot intervene between two sessions of Parliament, and the ordinance would cease to operate six weeks after the Parliament meets.

An ordinance may cease to have effect even earlier than the prescribed six weeks, if both Houses of Parliament pass resolution disapproving it [Art. 123(2)(a)]. It may be withdrawn by the Executive at any time [Art. 123(2)(b)]. Parliament's control over the Central Executive's ordinance-making power is thus ex post facto, i.e. it is exercised after the ordinance has been promulgated and not before.

---

48. Explanation to Art. 123(2)(a).

To ensure that the Executive uses the ordinance-making power only when circumstances are such as admit of no delay, rules of both Houses provide that a Bill seeking to replace an ordinance should be introduced in the House along with a statement explaining the circumstances which made immediate legislation by an ordinance necessary.

If the provisions made through the ordinance are to continue even after the ordinance comes to an end, Parliament has to enact a law incorporating the provisions made through the ordinance. Since the government enjoys majority in the Lok Sabha, there is no difficulty in the House passing the Act. But situation in Rajya Sabha may be different. If the government does not have majority in that House, passage of the Act by that House may become a problem.

The normal democratic legislative process involves the people's representatives in the two Houses openly enacting a law after a full consideration and discussion. An ordinance seeks to circumvent this process for it is drafted secretly in government chambers and is promulgated without an open discussion. The ordinance-making power should therefore be invoked not lightly but only when it is absolutely necessary to do so, and the situation cannot otherwise be met effectively. However, an ordinance partakes of legislative character; it is made in exercise of legislative power and is subject to the same limitations as an Act passed by Parliament.[49]

The Supreme Court has held that the power to make ordinance is not antidemocratic even though the power is vested in the Executive and not the legislature. An ordinance is promulgated on the advice of the Council of Ministers which remains answerable to the Parliament. If the executive misuses or abuses its power, the House of Parliament may not only disapprove the ordinance but may also pass a vote of no confidence against the Council of Ministers.[50]

An ordinance has the same force and effect as an Act of Parliament [Art. 123(2)]. An ordinance comes to an end in the following situations—

(a) Resolutions disapproving the ordinance are passed by both Houses of Parliament;

(b) if the ordinance is not replaced by an Act within the stipulated period;

(iii) the executive lets it lapse without bringing it before the Houses of Parliament;

(iv) if it is withdrawn by the Government at any time.

The power of the President to issue ordinances is co-extensive with the legislative power of Parliament.[51] The President's power to promulgate ordinances is no higher and no lower than the power of Parliament to make laws.[52] An ordinance cannot make a provision which Parliament is not competent to enact [Art. 123(3)]. Conversely, an ordinance can make any provision which Parliament can enact, except that an appropriation from out of the Consolidated Fund cannot be made by an ordinance [Art. 114(3)].[53] Thus, an ordinance may make provision with respect to a matter in Lists I and III, but not in List II, except when procla-

---

49. A.K. Roy, infra, footnote 59.
50. R.K. Garg v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 2138 : (1981) 4 SCC 675.
51. Satpal & Co. v. Lt. Governor of Delhi, AIR 1979 SC 1550.
52. See, infra, Ch. X.
53. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(j).

mation of emergency is in operation.[54] Further, like a law made by Parliament, an ordinance is also subject to Fundamental Rights.[55]

Again, in A.K. Roy v. Union of India, the Supreme Court has emphasized that an ordinance is law and is a product of exercise of legislative power. It is 'law' for the purposes of Art. 21. The Court has rejected the contention in R.K. Garg v. Union of India[56] that under Art. 123, the President has no power to issue an ordinance amending or altering the tax laws. An ordinance has the same force and effect as an Act of Parliament. There is no qualitative difference between an ordinance and an Act passed by Parliament. President's legislative power under Art. 123 is co-extensive with Parliament's power to make laws and, therefore, no limitation can be read into the legislative power of the President so as to make it ineffective to alter or amend tax laws. Conversely, it would also mean that an ordinance cannot do what Parliament could not do by enacting an Act.[57]

Prima facie it can be said that an ordinance which signifies law-making by the executive is an undemocratic instrument. But an analysis of Art. 123 would show that the power to make ordinances has been given only to deal with unforeseen or urgent matters, and it is subject to proper parliamentary controls. In the first place, the power is exercised by a government accountable to Parliament. In the second place, it is to be exercised when Parliament is not in session. In the third place, the ordinance has to be placed before both Houses which can disapprove the ordinance if they so like. If the executive misuses its power, the Lok Sabha can pass a vote of no confidence to remove the government from office. However, all said and done, it cannot be denied that a government enjoying majority support in the House can misuse or abuse this power. It can use this power to bypass Parliament and enact a law through an ordinance which it feels would raise controversies on the floor of the House.[58]

Under Art. 123, an ordinance can be issued to deal with the emergent situation which might arise as a result of a law being declared unconstitutional by a court. There is no inhibition on the ordinance-making power that it shall not deal with a matter already covered by a law made by Parliament.[59]

In Union of India (UOI) v. C. Dinakar, I.P.S.[60] the C.B.I. (Senior Police Posts) Recruitment Rules, 1996 framed under Proviso to Article 309 of the Constitution of India specifically provided for the grade from which promotion to the post of Director, CBI was to be made. In Vineet Narain v. Union of India,[61] directions were issued by the Supreme Court regarding the procedure for appointment of the Director, CBI. An Ordinance was subsequently promulgated by the President of India known as the Central Vigilance Commission Ordinance, 1998 which came into force on or about 25.8.1998 and which provided for the process of selection to the post of Director CBI. Parliament then incorporated the provisions

---

54. Chs. X, XI and XIII, infra.
55. For discussion on Fundamental Rights, see infra, Chs. XX-XXXIII.
56. AIR 1981 SC 2138 : (1981) 4 SCC 675.
57. Garg v. Union of India, supra.
58. On this aspect also see the discussion under Governor's power to make ordinance, infra, Ch. VII.
59. A.K. Roy v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 710 at 725 : (1982) 1 SCC 271.
Also see, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c) for discussion on Misuse of Power to Promulgate Ordinances.
60. (2004) 6 SCC 118 : AIR 2004 SC 2498.
61. (1998) 1 SCC 226 : AIR 1998 SC 889.

of the said Ordinance by enacting the Central Vigilance Commission Act, 2003. The selection process adopted by the Central Government in appointing the Director was challenged on the ground that the same was contrary to and inconsistent with the directions of the Court in Vineet Narain's case (supra). The court negatived the submission holding that the 1996 Rules being subordinate legislation ceased to exist as soon as the Ordinance came into force and that the directions issued by the Court were to operate only till legislation was passed in that regard.

At times, the government may misuse its ordinance-making power by repeatedly reissuing an ordinance over and over again without placing it before the legislature. This aspect of the ordinance-making power was brought to the notice of the Supreme Court in Wadhwa, as regards the State of Bihar.[62] The Court trenchantly criticised this practice characterising it as anti-democratic. The Court insisted that the government cannot by-pass the legsilature and keep ordinances alive indefinitely without enacting their provisions into Acts of legislature. Wadhwa's case has been taken note of in the discussion on the ordinance-making power of the State Governments [Art. 213] which is on all fours with the ordinance-making power of the Centre.

In Gyanendra,[63] a similar situation was presented to the Delhi High Court concerning the Central Government. Several ordinances had been reissued over and over again during the period Oct. 95 to March, 96 without being brought before Parliament. For example, the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Ordinance, was issued on 11/10/95; it was re-issued on 5/1/96 and again on 27/3/96. Ordinarily, such a practice would be characterised as unconstitutional within the Wadhwa ruling, but in the instant case the court desisted from declaring the ordinances invalid accepting the government plea that Parliament had been very busy with urgent and emergent public business and so it could not find sufficient time to enact the laws to replace the ordinances. In such a situation, repromulgation of the ordinance could not be regarded as unconstitutional or illegal. In fact, in Wadhwa, the Supreme Court has itself recognised such a contingency.[64]

The ordinance comes into effect as soon as it is promulgated. If later the ordinance comes to an end for any reason, the ordinance does not become void ab initio. It was valid when promulgated and whatever transactions have been completed under the ordinance cannot be reopened when the ordinance comes to an end.

In Venkata Reddy,[65] in 1984, the State Government promulgated an ordinance abolishing posts of part-time village officers in the State. The ordinance was not replaced by an Act of the Legislature though it was succeeded by 4 ordinances. It was argued that the ordinance having lapsed as the Legislature did not pass an Act in its place, the posts which had been abolished should be deemed to have been revived and the issue of successive ordinances, the subsequent one replacing the earlier one did not serve any purpose. The Supreme Court rejected the argument. The Court argued that an ordinance comes into effect as soon as it is promulgated. If later the ordinance comes to an end for any reason, the ordinance

---

62. See, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).
63. Gyanendra Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1997 Del. 58.
64. See, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).
65. T. Venkata Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 724 : (1985) 3 SCC 198.

does not become void ab initio. It is valid when promulgated and whatever transaction has been completed under the ordinance cannot be reopened when the ordinance comes to an end. Art. 123 or 213 does not say that the ordinance shall be void from the commencement on the Parliament/State Legislature disapproving it. It says that it shall cease to operate. It only means that the ordinance should be treated as being effective till it ceases to operate.

The ordinance in question in the instant case abolished the posts of part-time village officers. Therefore, because of the ordinance, all posts of part-time village officers stood abolished and these officers ceased to be employees of the State Government. This was an accomplished matter. Therefore, even if the ordinance ceased to operate later, what had been accomplished became irreversible. The abolition of the posts having become completed events, "these is no questions of their revival."

Elections were held for the Cuttack Municipality and 27 councillors were declared elected. A defeated candidate challenged these elections and the High Court voided them on the ground that the electoral roll had not been prepared according to law. Apprehending that on this ground, elections to municipalities other than those of the Cuttack Municipality, might also be declared void, the State Government promulgated an ordinance validating the electoral rolls, and all elections held on the basis of these rolls were declared to be valid "notwithstanding any judgment to the contrary." Later, the ordinance lapsed and no Act was enacted to replace it.

Thereafter, a writ petition was filed questioning the elections. It was argued that the ordinance being temporary in nature, the invalidity in the elections stood revived as soon as the ordinance lapsed. But the Supreme Court rejected the argument in Orissa v. Bhupendra Kumar Bose.[66] The Court ruled that the validation of the elections was not intended to be temporary in nature and the same did not come to an end as soon as the ordinance expired. Having regard to the object of the ordinance, and to the rights created by its provisions, "it would be difficult to accept the contention that as soon as the ordinance expired, the validity of the elections came to an end and their invalidity was revived."

An ordinance was promulgated by the President in 1996 declaring a section of the population of Assam as Scheduled Tribes. The same ordinance was repeated several times and ultimately it lapsed without Parliament passing an analogous Act. The High Court of Gauhati ruled in Maitreyee Mahanta v. State of Assam[67] that as Parliament did not pass the necessary law, the ordinance would lapse and, accordingly, the rights vested in the communities by the ordinance would also lapse.

(iii) EXECUTIVE FUNCTIONS

The Central Executive is entitled to exercise executive functions with respect to all those subjects which fall within the legislative sphere of Parliament [Art. 73].[68] It can also exercise such executive functions as are exercisable by the Government of India under any treaty or agreement.

---

66. AIR 1962 SC 945 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 380.
67. AIR 1999 Gau. 32.
68. See, Chs. X and XI, infra.

A few provisions in the Constitution confer on the President, i.e., the Central Executive, some specific executive powers, such as inter alia:

(i) the power to appoint various high officials like the Attorney-General [Art. 76(1)][69], Comptroller and Auditor-General [Art. 148(1)],[70] a State Governor [Art. 155],[71] Members of the Union Public Service Commission [Arts. 315-323],[72] Election Commissioners [Art. 324(2)],[73] etc.; The Constitutional scheme, is that when a Constitutional post is required to be filled up by a person having the qualification specified therefor, he alone would perform the duties and functions, be it Constitutional or statutory, attached to the said office. The Constitution does not envisage that such functions be performed by more than one person. The office of the Advocate General is a public office. He not only has a right to address the Houses of Legislature under Art. 177 but also is required to perform other statutory functions in terms of Section 302 of Cr. P.C.

The question of interpretation of a Constitution would arise only in the event the expressions contained therein are vague, indefinite and ambiguous as well as capable of being given more than one meaning. If by applying the golden rule of literal interpretation, no difficulty arises in giving effect to the constitutional scheme, the question of application of the principles of interpretation of a statute would not arise. Thus the state in exercise of its jurisdiction under Article 162 is competent to appoint a lawyer of its choice and designate him in such manner as it may deem fit and proper. Once it is held that such persons who are although designated as Additional Advocates General are not authorised to perform any constitutional or statutory functions, indisputably, such appointments must be held to have been made by the State in exercise of its executive power and not in exercise of its constitutional power.[74]

(ii) the power to appoint Commissions, like Inter-State Council [Art. 263],[75] Finance Commission [Art. 280],[76] Commission for Scheduled Tribes [Art. 339(1)];[77], and Backward Classes [Art. 340(1)];[78] Official Language Commission [Art. 344(1)];[79]

(iii) power to enter into contracts on behalf of the Indian Union [Art. 299];[80]

(iv) power to issue directions to the States in certain circumstances.[81]

Besides the above, Art. 53 confers executive power on the President in a general way. Thus, under Art. 53, the Central Executive has a large unspecified reservoir of powers and functions to discharge. The Constitution makes no attempt to define 'executive power', or to enumerate exhaustively the functions to be exercised by the Executive, or to lay down any test to suggest as to which activity

---

69. Infra, Sec. G.
70. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii).
71. Infra, Ch. VII, Sec. A.
72. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.
73. Infra, Ch XIX.
74. M. T. Khan v. Govt. of A.P., (2004) 2 SCC 267 : AIR 2004 SC 2934.
75. Infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. C.
76. Infra, Ch. XI, Sec. L.
77. Infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. G.
78. Infra, Ch. XXXV, Sec. G.
79. Infra, Ch. XVI, Sec. B.
80. Infra, Ch. XXXIX, Sec. C.
81. Arts. 256, 257, 339(2); See further on this point, Chs. XII, XIII.

or function would legitimately fall within the scope of the executive power. The truth is that the executive power of a modern state is not capable of any precise or exhaustive definition.

The government in exercise of its executive power is charged with the duty and the responsibility of carrying on the general administration of the state. The scope of the executive power may be said to be residual, that is to say, any function not assigned to Parliament or the Judiciary may be performed by the Executive[82], or governmental functions that remain after the legislative and judicial functions are taken away.[83]

The Supreme Court has observed in Madhav Rao : "The functions of the state are classified as legislative, judicial and executive; the executive function is the residue which does not fall within the other two functions."[84] To the same effect is the following observation of MUKHERJEA, C.J., in Ram Jawaya:[85]

> "It may not be possible to frame an exhaustive definition of what executive function means and implies. Ordinarily the executive power connotes the residue of governmental functions that remain after legislature and judicial functions are taken away."

A primary function of the Executive is to administer and execute the laws enacted by Parliament and maintain law and order. But executive function is not limited only to this. A modern state does not confine itself to a mere collection of taxes, maintaining law and order and defending the country from external aggression. It engages in multifarious activities. The Executive operates over a very large area and discharges varied and complex functions.

In a parliamentary type government, the Council of Ministers enjoys a majority support in the Legislature, and even controls the same to a large extent. It directs foreign policy; it enters into treaties with foreign countries;[86] it carries on and supervises general administration; promotes socio-economic welfare of the people. It formulates and executes policies, and changes policies from time to time to suit changing circumstances;[87] it initiates legislation. In such a context, the Executive is not confined to discharging only those functions which have been specifically conferred on it by the Legislature or the Constitution.

Nor can it be said that before the Executive can act there ought to be a law to back it and that it cannot do anything except administering the law. So long as the Executive enjoys the majority support in the Legislature, it can go on discharging its policies and no objection can be taken on the ground that a particular policy has not been sanctioned by legislation. This, however, is subject to some limitations, e.g., the Executive cannot ignore a constitutional prohibition or provision.[88] Executive power must be exercised in accordance with the Constitution.[89] Thus, it cannot spend money from the Consolidated Fund without an Ap-

---

82. Jayantilal Amarathlal v. F.N. Rana, AIR 1964 SC 648 : (1964) 5 SCR 294.
83. Chandrika Jha v. State of Bihar, AIR 1984 SC 322 : (1984) 2 SCC 41.
84. Madhav Rao Scindia v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 530, 565 : (1971) 1 SCC 85.
85. Rai Sahib Ram Jawaya Kapur v. State of Punjab, AIR 1955 SC 549 : (1955) 2 SCR 225.
86. Maganbhai v. Union of India, AIR 1969 SC 783 : (1970) 3 SCC 400; Satwant Singh v. Asstt. Passport Officer, AIR 1967 SC 1836 : (1967) 3 SCR 525.
87. A.S. Sangwan v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 1545 : 1980 Supp SCC 559.
88. Wazir Chand v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 415 : (1955) 1 SCR 408.
89. U.N.R. Rao v. Indira Gandhi, AIR 1971 SC 1002 : (1971) 2 SCC 63.

propriation Act,[90] or impose a tax without law: it cannot encroach upon the sphere assigned to any other instrumentality like Parliament or the Judiciary.[91]

The Executive cannot act against a statute or exceed its statutory powers;[92] if there exists a law on a particular matter, the Executive must act in accordance with it.[93] Also, the Executive cannot infringe the rights of private individuals without legal sanction. Where rights of a private person are affected prejudicially, executive action could be taken only if supported by law. Thus, a restriction requiring a person to reside in a specified place cannot be imposed merely by an executive order without the backing of the law.[94]

The State of Uttar Pradesh amended Section 24 of the Code of Criminal Procedure so that the State was not required to consult the High Court before appointing a Public Prosecutor for the High Court. The amendment was made on the ground that similar provisions exist in the Legal Remembrancer Manual. The Supreme Court held that the Legal Remembrancer Manual is merely a compilation of executive orders and is not a 'law' within the meaning of Article 13 of the Constitution of India and that "a law cannot be substituted by executive instructions which may be subjected to administrative vagaries".[95]

If to pursue a policy, the Executive needs some additional powers over what it already possesses generally under the prevailing law or the Constitution, then a specific law will be needed for the purpose. But, apart from such matters, it cannot be said that in order to undertake any function, such as, entering into any trade or business, the Executive must obtain prior legislative sanction.

This question regarding the scope of the executive power has been elaborately discussed by the Supreme Court in Ram Jawaya v. State of Punjab.[96] The recognised schools in Punjab used only such text books as were prescribed by the Education Department. In 1950, the Government embarked on the policy of nationalising text books and, thus, took over the work of printing and publishing them. The author of the book selected by the Government for the purpose by contract vested the copyright of the book in the Government in lieu of royalty. The scheme was challenged on the ground, inter alia, that the Executive could not engage in any trade or business activity without any law being passed for the purpose.

The Supreme Court negatived the contention saying that the expenses necessary to carry on the business of publishing text books had been approved by the Legislature in the Appropriation Act. The Government required no additional power to carry on the business as whatever was necessary for that purpose, it could secure by entering into contracts with authors and other people. No private right was being infringed as the publishers were not being debarred from publishing books. In the circumstances, the carrying on of the business of publishing

---

90. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(g).
91. Pratap Singh v. State of Jharkhand, (2005) 3 SCC 551 : AIR 2005 SC 2731.
92. Madhav Rao v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 530 : (1971) 1 SCC 85; A Sanjeevi Naidu v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102 : (1970) 1 SCC 443.
93. Guruswamy v. State of Mysore, AIR 1954 SC 592 : (1955) 1 SCR 305.
94. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bharat Singh, AIR 1967 SC 1170; Kharak Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1963 SC 1295 : (1964) 1 SCR 332; Hindustan Times v. State of UP, 2003 (1) SCC 591 : AIR 2004 SC 3800.
95. State of U.P. v. Johri Mal, (2004) 4 SCC 714 : AIR 2005 SC 2731, 96. AIR 1955 SC 549 : (1955) 2 SCR 225. See, supra.

text books without a specific law sanctioning the same was not beyond the competence of the Executive.[1]

Following Ram Jawaya, the Supreme Court has held that the government can prescribe text books for schools in the exercise of its executive power so long as it does not infringe the rights of any one.[2]

In a number of cases, courts have reiterated the principle that the Executive can engage in several activities in exercise of its executive powers without any prior legislation. In fact, the Executive is competent to represent the State in all matters international and may by agreement, convention or treaties incur obligations which in international law are binding on the State. But the obligations are not by their own force binding upon Indian nationals. In 1969, the Supreme Court, in keeping with the classical dualist view, said "[I]n India the making of a law by Parliament is necessary when the treaty or agreement operates to restrict the rights of citizens or modifies the laws of the State."[3]

That the Government can engage in trading activities, is made clear by Article 298.[4] By virtue of Art. 298, the executive power also includes—(a) the carrying on of trading opera-tions; (b) the acquisition, holding and disposing of property; and (c) the making of contracts for any purpose.[5]

The Government can make appointments under its executive power without there being a law or rule for that purpose.[6] However, if rules have been made under Art. 309, then the government can make appointments only in accordance with the rules. Having made the rules, the executive cannot then fall back upon its general executive power under Art. 73.[7]

The Government can also issue administrative directions to regulate promotions to selection grades.[8] The Government cannot amend or supersede statutory rules, if any, by administrative instructions, but if the rules are silent on any particular point, the Government can fill up the gaps and supplement the rules and issue instructions not inconsistent with the rules already framed.[9] "The executive power could be exercised only to fill in the gaps but the instructions cannot and should not supplant the law but would only supplement the law."

In Union of India v. Naveen Jindal[10] the prohibition to fly the National flag under the Flag Code was held to be unconstitutional on two grounds. First, the field was already occupied by The Emblems and Names (Prevention of Improper

---

1. Also see, Sarkari Sasta Anaj Vikreta Sangh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 2030 : (1981) 4 SCC 471; Bishambar v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 SC 33 : (1982) 1 SCC 39.

2. Naraindas Indurkhya v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 1232 : (1974) 2 SCC 788.

3. Maganbhai v. Union of India, (1970) 3 SCC 400 : AIR 1969 SC 783. See also Union of India v. Azadi Bachao Andolan, (2004) 10 SCC 1, 23 : AIR 2004 SC 1107.

4. Infra, Ch. XII, Sec. C. Also see, Jayantilal v. Rana, AIR 1964 SC 648 : (1964) 5 SCR 294.

5. See, infra, Ch. XXXIX, Sec. C.

6. B.N. Nagarajan v. State of Mysore, AIR 1966 SC 1942 : (1966) 3 SCR 682. Also see, infra, Ch. XXXIV.

7. J.K. Public Service Commission v. Narinder Mohan, AIR 1994 SC 1808 : (1994) 2 SCC 630.

8. Sant Ram v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1967 SC 1910 : (1968) 1 SCR 111.

9. Fernandez, G.J. v. State of Mysore, AIR 1967 SC 1753 : (1967) 3 SCR 636.
Also see, infra, under Mandamus, Ch. VIII, Sec. E and Ch. XXXVI, Sec. B.
For a detailed discussion on directions, see, JAIN & JAIN, Principles of Administrative Law, Ch. III.

10. (2004) 2 SCC 510 : AIR 2004 SC 1559.

Use) Act, 1950 and the Prevention of Insults to National Honour Act, 1971and could not be supplanted by the Flag Code which only contains the executive instructions of the Central Government and second, the right to fly the National flag was a fundamental right under Article 19(1)(a); the Flag Code is not a law within the meaning of Article 13(3)(a) of the Constitution of India for the purpose of Clause (2) of Article 19 and as such could not restrictively regulate the free exercise of the right of flying the National Flag.

Thus, it is not always necessary to have a law before the Executive can function nor are its powers limited merely to the carrying out of the laws. However, once a law is passed to cover any area of the activities of the Executive, the executive power can then be exercised only in accordance with such a law insofar as it goes.

Article 73 defines the extent of the executive power of the Centre. "Subject to the provisions of the constitution", the executive power of the Centre extends to—

(i) the matters with respect to which Parliament has power to make laws;

(ii) the exercise of such rights, authority and jurisdiction as are exercisable by the Government of India by virtue of any treaty or agreement.

The principle underlying (i) above is that executive power is co-extensive with legislative power. So, the extent of the executive power of the Centre is co-extensive with Parliament's legislative power. But in the concurrent area, where both Parliament as well as the State Legislatures can make laws, Centre's executive power extends to this area only when either the Constitution or a law made by Parliament expressly provides for.[11] The expression "agreement' in the second clause of Article 73 has been held as referable to Article 299.[12]

It may not be out of place to mention here that to-day, by law, multifarious functions of all types—administrative, quasi-judicial, legislative—are being conferred on the executive-administrative organs, and such is the plethora of functions exercised by these organs that a whole branch of law, known as the Administrative Law, has now come into existence. The primary purpose of this newly developing jurisprudence is to study the functions of the Executive, the manner in which, and subject to what controls, are these exercised, and what safeguards are available to those whose rights may be infringed by administrative action.[13]

E. RULES OF BUSINESS

The essence of collective responsibility is that the Cabinet is responsible to the Parliament for all acts of the Ministers. But that does not mean that the Cabinet itself can attend to numerous matters that come up before the government or that the Cabinet itself ought to take each and every decision. As the Supreme Court has observed : "The political responsibility of the Council of Ministers does not and cannot predicate the personal responsibility of the Ministers to discharge all

---

11. The matter has been discussed further in Ch. XII, infra.

12. Sharma Transport v. Govt. of A.P., (2002) 2 SCC 188 : AIR 2002 SC 322.

13. M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW; M.P. JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW.

or any of the governmental functions."[14] The main function of the Council of Ministers is to settle the major policies and programmes of the government.

Similarly, an individual Minister is responsible to the Parliament for every action taken or omitted to be taken in his Ministry. This again is a political responsibility. The Minister is not expected to burden himself with day to day routine administration; he does not have to take each and every decision himself. His main function is to lay down policies and programmes of his ministry subject to which decisions in individual cases are taken by the officials in the Ministry.

Although under Art. 77(1), an order is issued in the name of the President, it does not mean that every order is passed by him personally. Even when a constutitonal or statutory provision specifically vests power in the President, the power is not to be exercised by the President himself.

Article 77(3) says inter alia : "The President shall make rules for the more convenient transaction of the business of the Government of India". This means that the decisions of the Government of India are not always taken personally by the President. The decision may be taken by the Minister concerned or even by the official authorised to take the decision under the Rules of Business made by the President under Art. 77(3). The decision taken by the officer authorised under the Rules of Business is regarded as the decision of the Government of India. The wheels of the government will stop grinding if all decision were required to be taken by the President or even by the Ministers.[15]

This also means that an order issued in the name of the President, not being his personal order, cannot claim immunity under Art. 361 from judicial review. As the Supreme Court has observed in Common Cause.[16]

> "The authenticity, validity and correctness of such an order can be examined by this Court in spite of the order having been expressed in the name of the President. The immunity available to the President under Art. 361 of the Constitution cannot be extended to the orders passed in the name of the President under Art. 77(1) or Art. 77(2) of the Constitution".

To smoothen the running of the administration, Art. 77(3) makes two crucial provisions :

(i) to authorise the President to make Rules for the more convenient transaction of the government business;

(ii) to allocate the said business among the Ministers.

The Rules made under (i) are known as the Rules of Business. These Rules are made by the Executive in the name of the President. These rules authorise officials in the department to take various decisions. Thus, most of the decisions within a Ministry are taken by the officials authorised by the Rules of Business. The Minister exercises over-all control over the working of his department; he can call for any file, pass an order or issue directions, but actual decisions in a large number of cases are taken by officials authorised by the Rules of Business on behalf of the government.

---

14. Sanjeevi v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102, 1106 : (1970) 1 SCC 443.

15. Ram Jawaya Kapur v. State of Punjab, AIR 1955 SC 549 : (1955) 2 SCR 225; Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831; G.D. Zalani v. Union of India, AIR 1995 SC 1178, 1189 : 1995 Supp (2) SCC 512; Common Cause, A Regd. Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979, 2990 : (1999) 6 SCC 667.

16. Common Cause, ibid., at 2991.

When a minister puts his signature with the endorsement file returned, such signature meant his approval.[17]

When a decision is taken by such an authorised officer, it becomes the decision of the government. The validity of any such decision taken cannot be challenged on the ground that it is not the decision of the Minister. As the Supreme Court has emphasized in Sanjeevi:[18] "When those officials discharge the functions allotted to them, they are doing so as limbs of the Government and not as persons to whom the power of the Government had been delegated". Similarly, in Samsher,[19] the Court has stated that the decision of any Minister or officer under the rules of business made under Art. 77(3) is the decision of the President for these rules do not provide for any delegation.

These rules have statutory force and are binding. Therefore, sanction for prosecution of an employee of the Central Government under the Prevention of Corruption Act was held not valid when it was granted by a Ministry other then the one authorised to do so under the Rules of Business.[20]

Under the Rules of Business of the Maharashtra Government, both the Home Secretary and the Home Minister can deal with a matter of preventive detention. The order of detention was made by the Secretary, but the representation of the detenu was considered and rejected by the Home Minister. There was nothing wrong in this as both the Secretary and the Minister could act on behalf of the State Government.[21]

The Supreme Court has ruled in State of Haryana v. P.C. Wadhwa[22] that the Business Rules cannot override a provision made by an Act or by any statutory rule.[23]

F. INDIAN V. U.S. FORMS OF GOVERNMENT

The functionary at the head of the Indian Union, like that of the U.S.A., is called the President, but India's form of government is very different from that of the U.S.A. India has parliamentary, and not presidential, form of government. India's form of government differs substantially from that of America. Beyond the identity of names between the Indian and the American Presidents, there is not much in common between them.

The position of the President of India is more akin to the British monarch rather than the American President. He is the head of the state and only a formal, not an effective, head of the Executive. The effective repository of the executive power is the Council of Ministers. On the other hand, the U.S. President is both

---

17. Tafcon Projects (I) (P) Ltd. v. Union of India, (2004) 13 SCC 788 : AIR 2004 SC 949.
18. Sanjeevi, supra, footnote 14, at 1107.
19. Samsher v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2194, 2198, 2202 : (1974) 2 SCC 831.
20. State of Rajasthan v. A.K. Datta, AIR 1981 SC 20.
21. Raverdy Marc Germain Jules v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1982 SC 311 : (1982) 3 SCC 135. Also, Smt. Masuma v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1981 SC 1753 : (1981) 3 SCC 566; Kavita v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1981 SC 1641 : (1981) 3 SCC 558; Sanwal Ram v. Addl. District Magistrate; AIR 1982 Raj 139 : (1987) 2 SCC 602; R.J. Singh v. Delhi, AIR 1971 SC 1552 : (1970) 3 SCC 451; infra, Chs. VII and XXVII.
22. AIR 1987 SC 1201 : (1987) 2 SCC 602. See also Union of India v. Naveen Jindal, 2004 (2) SCC 510 : AIR 2004 SC 1559.
23. For further discussion on the Rules of Business, see, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. B.

the head of the state as well as the effective head of the Executive. The system is known as the presidential form of government because the President is the chief executive. The administration of the country is vested in him.

The U.S. Constitution makes the President responsible for ensuring that the laws of the country are faithfully executed. He alone is vested with the power to appoint and remove executive officers and, thus, can effectively control the government departments.

The President has under him Secretaries of State in charge of different executive departments who are appointed by him and who are his personal advisers. He is not bound to accept the advice tendered by them; he enjoys ultimate power of decision and therefore, has complete political responsibility for all executive action. The President dominates the Cabinet completely as the Secretaries of State hold their offices entirely at his pleasure and are accountable to him. They are merely the instruments through whom the President's policy is carried out. As has been aptly said, "The cabinet is not a device for sharing responsibility among a group; it is a necessary result of the President's inability to supervise all affairs directly."[24]

The Indian President, on the other hand, acts generally on the advice of the Ministers. The U.S. President is free to dismiss any of his Secretaries as and when he likes. The President of India has a formal power to that effect but exercises it on the advice of the Prime Minister, or when the Cabinet has forfeited the confidence of the Lok Sabha. The Secretaries of State in the U.S.A., on the other hand, are neither responsible to Congress, nor are its members, nor do they function on the basis of collective responsibility. This is very different from the underlying principles on which the Executive functions in India.

The truth of the matter is that America hardly has a Cabinet corresponding to the classic idea of a Cabinet in the parliamentary form of government. "Because of his unfettered power of removal over them and the fact that his tenure of office is not in any way dependent upon the effect which his dismissal of the Cabinet members may have upon the Congress, the President is able to dominate his Cabinet to an extent which would be almost impossible in the case of a Prime Minister."[25]

The presidential form of government is based on the principle of Separation of Powers between the executive and the legislative organs. The doctrine of Separation of Powers, ascribed to Montesquieu, a Frenchman, exercised a potent influence on the public mind in the 18th century when the American Constitution was drafted. It envisaged that the legislative, executive and judicial functions in a state ought to be kept separate and distinct from each other. There ought to be separate organs for each, working together, but none of them should be dependent on, and discharge the function belonging to, the other, as for example, the Executive should have no legislative or judicial power.[26]

---

24. BOWIE AND FRIEDRICH, STUDIES IN FEDERALISM, 65.

25. SCHWARTZ, AMERICAN CONST. LAW, 111. Also see, Corwin, THE CONSTITUTIION & WHAT IT MEANS TO-DAY, 111-60 (1973); CORWIN, THE PRESIDENT, OFFICE AND POWERS.

26. JENNINGS, LAW AND THE CONST., App. 1., 280-304 (1959); FINKELMAN, SEPARATION OF POWERS, 2 Toranto L.J., 313; VANDERBITT, THE DOCTRINE OF SEPARATION OF POWERS; ILBERT, PARLIAMENT, 193; ROSSITER, AMERICAN PRESIDENCY.

Till recently, developments in the area of Administrative Law were progressively eroding the efficacy of the doctrine of Separation of Powers in the U.S.A. See Laurence Tribe : American Constitutional Law (2nd ed.) 18 (1988).

The thesis underlying the doctrine is that the merger of all powers in one body will lead to autocracy and negation of individual liberty. Basing itself on this doctrine, the American Constitution vests the executive power in the President who is elected for a fixed term of four years; legislative power is vested in the Congress, and the judicial power is vested in a system of courts with the Supreme Court at the apex.

An implication of the doctrine of Separation is that each of the three branches of government ought to be composed of different persons. Neither the President nor any of his Secretaries of State can be a member of the Congress. A member of the Congress can join the government only after resigning his membership therein.

While basically the U.S. Constitution is designed on the basis of the principle of Separation of Powers, the framers of the U.S. Constitution also introduced, to some extent, the principle of checks and balances. The framers adopted both these strategies with a view to ensure a weak government so that the government may not act in an arbitrary manner. The doctrine of Separation weakens the government by dividing its powers, for a divided government is intrinsically weaker than a government having all powers concentrated therein.

The principle of checks and balances further limits government power. The underlying idea is that if one organ of government is left free to exercise the power assigned to it without any control, it may run amok with its power and act arbitrarily in exercising its assigned power. For example, if the Congress is left free to make any law it likes, it may make harsh or unjust laws. Therefore, the doctrine of checks and balances envisages that one organ of government be controlled, to some extent, by the other two organs. For example, the President may veto a bill passed by the two Houses of Congress and, thus, the President controls the Congress so that it may not pass arbitrary or discriminatory legislation. But President's veto may be overridden by the two Houses passing the bill in question again by a 2/3 vote in each House. Also, the Supreme Court has power to declare an Act passed by the Congress as unconstitutional, but the Judges of the Supreme Court are appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate.

The Congress through its committees continuously probes into the functioning of the government departments. Similarly, the Secretaries of State are appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate. In the U.S.A., the Executive and Legislative organs are kept separate from each other.[27]

The parliamentary system, on the other hand, is based on an intimate contact, a close liaison, or co-ordination, between the Executive and the Legislative wings. India recognises no doctrine of Separation between them. As the Supreme Court has stated, there may be in India a differentiation and demarcation of functions between the Legislature and the Executive, and, generally speaking, the Constitution does not contemplate that one organ should assume the functions belonging essentially to the other organ, yet, nevertheless, there is no separation between them in its absolute rigidity.[28]

---

27. Also see, Delegation of Legislative Powers, supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.

28. Ram Jawaya v. State of Punjab, supra, footnote 15. Also see, In re, Delhi Laws Act, 1912, AIR 1951 SC 332 : 1951 SCR 747; supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.

The Indian Constitution itself does not indicate a separation of powers as is commonly understood. There is, to a large extent, a parallelism of power, with hierarchies between the three organs in particular fields. It is this balance of hierarchies which must be maintained by each organ subject to checks by the other two. To illustrate this is the requirement for the executive to fill the legislative vacuum by executive orders[29]. Where there is inaction even by the executive for whatever reason, the judiciary can step in and in exercise of its obligations to implement the Constitution provide a solution till such time as the legislature or the executive act to perform their roles either by enacting appropriate legislation or issuing executive orders to cover the field[30]. Similarly while the legislature and executive may reject a judicial decision by amending the law, the judiciary may in turn test that law against the touchstone of the Constitution.

The U.S. Executive does not depend for its survival on a majority in the Congress as the President has a fixed tenure of four years. He cannot be dismissed before the expiry of his term by an adverse vote in the Congress. He can be removed only by the rare process of impeachment. Correspondingly, the President has no power to dissolve the Congress. The House of Representatives has a fixed term of two years. The American system produces a stable government having a fixed tenure because it is independent of the legislative whim. It has happened often that the President may belong to one political party, but the majority in either House or both Houses, may belong to another political party.

Members of Congress enjoy a good deal of freedom to oppose or support the programme and policies proposed by the President even when the majority in the Houses of Congress may belong to the same party as the President. On the other hand, the distinctive feature of the parliamentary system is that the Cabinet depends on the majority in the Lok Sabha, and holds office so long as it enjoys the confidence of the majority in the House which can depose the Cabinet at its pleasure, but the Cabinet has the corresponding right to dissolve the House. In a parliamentary system, the government has no fixed tenure as it may have to go out any moment the majority in Parliament withdraws its support.

The parliamentary system works best with two strong and disciplined political parties with one party having a clear majority. If the Legislature is fragmented into many small groups, the Cabinet has to be based on a coalition of parties and the Cabinet becomes unstable as it is constantly exposed to the danger of disintegration due to disagreements amongst the members of the coalition, or the constantly changing alignments of various parties in the Legislature, or because of the danger of defection of members from one party to another, and even the Executive's power to dissolve the House may not be effective to create the necessary discipline for a stable government in such a situation.

The American Executive not being directly accountable to the Legislature, tends to become less responsible to it than the parliamentary government which has constantly to seek the majority support. In America, the responsibility of the

---

29. Articles 73 and 162.

30. Articles 32 and 226: Vineet Narain v. Union of India, (1998) 1 SCC 226 : AIR 1998 SC 889, "to fill the void in the absence of suitable legislation to cover the field..[i]t is the duty of the executive to fill the vacuum by executive orders…and where there is inaction even by the executive, for whatever reason, the judiciary must step in, in exercise of its constitutional obligations…to provide a solution till such time as the legislature acts to perform its role by enacting proper legislation to cover the field".

Executive is assessed by the electorate once in four years when election is held for the Presidential office. In India, on the other hand, the responsibility of the Executive is assessed daily by the Legislature through resolutions, questions, debates, etc., and periodically by the electorate through general elections.

Though the Executive in the U.S.A. is constitutionally not directly accountable to the Legislature, yet it will be wrong to suppose that the Legislature has absolutely no control over the Executive. The Congress can bring indirect pressure over the Executive through its powers to levy taxes, make appropriations for government expenses, enact legislation, investigate executive work and policies through its committees and the Senate's power to confirm treaties and appointments. On the other hand, the President also is not completely powerless in relation to Congress. Though he cannot dissolve the Congress yet he does exercise some influence over it through his power to send messages and veto legislation; the efficacy of his veto, however, is limited as it can be overridden by the vote of 2/3rd members in each House of Congress. On the whole, therefore, legislative control over the Executive and vice versa is much weaker in the U.S.A. than it is in India where the Legislature and the Executive can dissolve each other.

The executive-legislative relation is one of co-ordination in a parliamentary government.[31] All Ministers are members of Parliament and this creates an intimate relationship between the two organs. The Executive is in a strong position to carry the Legislature along with it in its programmes and policies. The executive-legislative conflict or deadlock is resolved soon, for in that case either the Cabinet must resign, or, the House be dissolved and fresh elections held. By its power to dissolve the lower House and submit the issue to the electorate, the Executive exercises a substantial check on frivolous disagreements amongst its own party members as well as those in the opposition. This power is an essential counter-weight to the power of the Legislature to force the resignation of the Cabinet. The Ministers effectively influence the deliberations of the Legislature; in fact, the Cabinet acts as an effective leader of the Legislature.

The position in the U.S.A. is entirely different where due to the doctrine of Separation of Powers,[32] formal means of co-ordination between the Executive and the Legislature are lacking. No member of the Executive participates immediately in the legislative process in the Congress. Party discipline in Congress is loose and members enjoy considerable freedom to oppose or support any proposal even though it may be a part of the President's programme. President's leadership of the Congress is much looser than that of the Prime Minister in a parliamentary system mainly because the President has no power to dissolve the Congress or to participate in legislative deliberations. He rarely has at his disposal the almost automatic legislative majority which is available to the government in a parliamentary system. He does not have the means available to the Prime Minister to enforce disciplined voting along party lines.

The President, unlike the Prime Minister, cannot directly ensure that the measures which he desires will be enacted by the Congress. This may happen even when the President and the majority in the Congress belong to the same political party. But lack of co-ordination between the Executive and the Legislature in the U.S.A. may be heightened if the President and the majority in the Houses belong to different political parties as happens quite often. Sometimes the impasse between the President and the Congress can be resolved only when fresh elections are held in due course of time.[33]

31. BROGAN in PARLIAMENT—A SURVEY, (ed. Campion) 74-75; SCHWARTZ, op. cit., 98.
32. See, supra, pp. 256-257 for discussion on this doctrine.

In the Constituent Assembly some members advocated presidential form of government for India. Their hypothesis was that the presidential form of government leads to a strong and stable government while a parliamentary government constitutes a weak, unstable and vaccilating government, the reason being that the Ministers depend on their party members for support. Ultimately, however, the choice was made in favour of the parliamentary form, mainly because Indians were somewhat familiar with the system as in some form or other, such a system had been in operation in the country during the pre-Constitution era.

Further, as Ambedkar emphasized, in combining stability with responsibility, the Constitution-makers preferred the system of daily assessment of responsibility to the other system of periodic assessment. They also wanted to avoid the Legislative-Executive conflicts and friction such as arise in the presidential system. The framers of the Constitution thought that an infant democracy could not afford to take the "risk of a perpetual cleavage, feud or conflict or threatened conflict" between the Executive or Legislative organs. They preferred a system where the Executive being a part of the Legislature is in a position to give guidance to it and where both co-operate with each other. There is 'confusion of responsibility' and 'not necessarily a clear direction of policy'[34] in the U.S.A., but this is not so in a parliamentary system.[35]

Should India adopt the Presidential system instead of the present-day Parliamentary system? This question has been debated from time to time. India is presently undergoing a phase of coalition governments at the Centre because no single party has a majority in the Lok Sabha, and a number of disparate parties have to come together to form a coalition to form the Cabinet.

With the advent of the phase of coalition governments, the trend of governmental instability has set in. A coalition government is intrinisically unstable because of contradictory policies of the parties coming together to form the coalition. During 1995-1998, three governments fell at the Centre. The parties do not have a common outlook and it becomes a herculean task for the Prime Minister to arrive at a consensus on any point. Frequent elections to Lok Sabha are also not possible in the context of India with its huge population. In this context, it has been suggested that India should opt for the presidential system.

It is indeed a very difficult choice as both systems have their advantages and disadvantages. A liberal and democratic presidential system (such as prevails in the U.S.A.) has the advantage of enabling the President to appoint experts as his Ministers; he can select persons of competence and integrity as his Ministers without political considerations for he will not be bound to appoint only members of Parliament as Ministers as happens in the parliamentary system. The Prime Minister has an extremely limited choice in the matter of appointing Ministers as

---

33. ALLEN, LAW AND ORDERS, 19; BERMAN, The Legislative Process in the U.S. Congress, II(2). JI of Constitution & Parl. Studies, 34 (1968).

34. GHOSH, supra; IV CAD, 544, 573, 580, 635, 968, 984 and 985; VII CAD, 32, 33, 243, 263, 266, 295; MORRIS-JONES, op. cit., 117; AUSTIN, THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION, 116.

35. LASKI, PARL. GOVT. IN ENG., 224 (1959).

he can only appoint members of Parliament as Ministers and there may not be many experienced and expert members in Parliament.

The presidential system may also be an answer to the present-day constitutionally and politically immoral system of defections to serve personal interests,[36] since in a presidential system the life of the Cabinet no longer depends on parliamentary majority. The President is elected directly by the people and holds office for a fixed tenure. This results in stability of the government.

In the presidential system, the President enjoys a fixed tenure and he does not depend on majority support in the Legislature, and this results in government stability. The President may be freer to adopt policies on their merits rather than adopt populist measures. The Legislature also has more say in the governance of the country and may have more control over the administration.

However the presidential system as it prevails in the U.S.A. has its own problems, the major problem being lack of co-ordination between the Executive and the Legislature resulting in fragmented policies. Also, in a Parliamentary system, different interests may have an opportunity to participate in the government.

The general public opinion (and even of political parties) by and large does not favour a change from parliamentary to the presidential system. If India seeks to adopt the presidential system, the system will have to be so devised as to promote better co-ordination between the Executive and the Legislature than what exists in the U.S.A. This means that the system has to incorporate some features of both the presidential and parliamentary systems. Then, there is another big problem to consider : should the presidential system be adopted at the Centre only or in the States as well?

Thus, before a change can be thought of, there are many delicate issues to be considered. A thorough study needs to be made of the various models of the presidential system functioning in the U.S.A., France, Switzerland and Sri Lanka. The touchstone should be to promote better, more effective and moral government, but less afflicted by narrow and parochial vested interests.

G. ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR INDIA

The President is to appoint a person who is qualified to be appointed a Supreme Court Judge to be the Attorney-General for India [Art. 76(1)]. He holds office during the President's pleasure, and receives such remuneration as may be determined by him [Art. 76(4)].

The Attorney-General gives advice to the Government of India upon such legal matters as may be referred, and performs such other duties of a legal character as may be assigned, to him by the President from time to time [Art. 76(3)]. He also discharges the functions conferred on him by or under the Constitution or any other law [Art. 76(3)].

According to the rules made by the President,[37] the Attorney-General, in addition, is required to appear on behalf of the Government of India in all cases in the Supreme Court in which the Government of India is concerned; also, he represents the Government of India in any reference made by the President to the Supreme Court under Art. 143.[38] The Government of India may also require him to appear in any High Court in any case in which the Government of India is concerned.

36. On Defections, see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. F.
37. See Notification, 1950, S.C. J.JI. Sec.

In the performance of his duties, the Attorney-General has the right of audience in all courts in India [Art. 76(3)]. He has the right to take part in proceedings of either House of Parliament, or their joint sitting, and any parliamentary committee of which he may be named as a member, but he does not have a right to vote under this provision [Art. 88].[39] He enjoys all the privileges which are available to a member of Parliament.[40]

In Britain, the appointment of the Attorney-General is 'political' in nature in the sense that it is conferred on a successful barrister who is a supporter of the party in power. He has sometimes been a member of the Cabinet though "it is generally regarded as preferable that he should remain outside the Cabinet as the Government's chief legal adviser."[41] O. Hood Phillips observes :[42]

> "The better opinion is that the Attorney-General should not be in the Cabinet because of his quasi-judicial functions with regard to prosecutions, and also because it is desirable to separate the giving of advice from those who decide whether to act on the advice. Indeed it must be open to question in view of his unfettered discretion to refuse to initiate proceedings and his power to terminate criminal proceedings whether the appointment should be non-political".

According to the practice followed in India so far, the Attorney-General is appointed on the basis of professional competence and not on political considerations. He is a non-party man, is appointed because of his competence as a lawyer and he is not a member of the Cabinet.

38. Infra, Ch. IV, Sec. F.
39. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(h).
40. Art. 105(3); supra, Ch. II, Sec. L.
41. WADE & PHILLIPS, op. cit., 333.
42. CONSTITUTIONAL & ADM. LAW, 332.

CHAPTER IV

SUPREME COURT

SYNOPSIS

A. INTRODUCTORY

In any country, the Judiciary plays the important role of interpreting and applying the law and adjudicating upon controversies between one citizen and another and between a citizen and the state. It is the function of the courts to maintain rule of law in the country and to assure that the government runs according to law. In a country with a written constitution, courts have the additional function of safeguarding the supremacy of the Constitution by interpreting and applying its provisions and keeping all authorities within the constitutional framework.

In a federation, the Judiciary has another meaningful assignment, namely, to decide controversies between the constituent States inter se, as well as between the Centre and the States. A Federal Government is a legalistic government,[1] a characteristic feature of which is the allocation of powers between the Centre and the States. Disputes usually arise between the Centre and the constituent units relating to distribution of powers and functions between them. An arbiter is, therefore, required to scrutinize laws to see whether they fall within the allotted legislative domain of the enacting legislature and this function is usually left to the Judiciary.

In India, in addition to the above, the judiciary also has the significant function of protecting and enforcing the Fundamental Rights of the people guaranteed to them by the Constitution. JUSTICE UNTWALIA has compared the Judiciary to "a watching tower above all the big structures of the other limbs of the state" from which it keeps a watch like a sentinel on the functions of the other limbs of the state as to whether they are working in accordance with the law and the Constitution, the Constitution being supreme".[2]

India has a unified Judicial system with the Supreme Court standing at the apex.[3] There are High Courts[4] below the Supreme Court, under each High Court there exists a system of subordinate courts.[5] The Supreme Court thus enjoys the topmost position in the judicial hierarchy of the country. It is the supreme interpreter of the Constitution[6] and the guardian of the people's Fundamental Rights.[7] It is the ultimate court of appeal in all civil and criminal matters and the final interpreter of the law of the land, and thus helps in maintaining a uniformity of law throughout the country.

Article 124(1) establishes the Supreme Court of India. The Chief Justice of the Court is designated as the Chief Justice of India. The Supreme Court sits at Delhi, or at such other place, as the Chief Justice of India may, with the approval of the President, appoint from time to time [Art. 130].

Explaining the purport of Art. 130, the Supreme Court has stated in Union of India v. S.P. Anand[8] that it is an enabling provision and does not cast a mandatory obligation on the Chief Justice of India to appoint any place other than Delhi as the seat of the Supreme Court. Whether the Supreme Court should sit at a place other than Delhi involves taking a policy decision by the Chief Justice of India which must receive the approval of the President of India.

---

1. DICEY Law of the Constitution, Ch. III, 175 (1956). Also, M.P. JAIN, Role of Judiciary in a Democracy, 6 J.M.C.L. 239 (1979).
2. Union of India v. Sankalchand Himatlal Sheth, AIR 1977 SC 2328 : (1977) 4 SCC 193; see, infra, Ch. VIII.
3. However the Supreme Court does not exercise administrative control over the High Courts.
4. For a discussion on the High Courts, see, infra, Ch. VIII.
5. Infra, Ch. VIII
6. Infra, Ch. XL, for discussion on 'Constitutional Interpretation'.
7. Infra, Ch. XX.
8. AIR 1998 SC 2615 : (1998) 6 SCC 466.

Thus, making of an order under Art. 130 of the Constitution providing for sitting of the Supreme court at a place other than Delhi requires, in the first place, a decision by the Chief Justice of India in that regard and, thereafter, the approval of the proposal of the Chief Justice of India by the President on the advice of the Council of Ministers.

To enable the courts to discharge their multi-faceted functions effectively, it is extremely important that the courts enjoy independence.[9] Therefore, independence of the judiciary becomes a basic creed in a democratic society. The need for judicial independence becomes all the more necessary in India as judicial review is regarded as the 'fundamental feature' of the Indian Constitution.[10]

B. COMPOSITION OF THE COURT

(a) STRENGTH OF THE COURT

Originally, under Art. 124(1), the strength of the Court was fixed at one Chief Justice and seven other Judges. But Parliament has been given power to increase the number of other Judges beyond seven [Art. 124(1)]. This number has been increased progressively to 25 by the enactment of the Supreme Court (Number of Judges) Act, 1956, amended in 1977 and again in 1986 and lastly in 2009.

(b) APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES

According to Art. 124(2), the Judges of the Supreme Court are appointed by the President. While appointing the Chief Justice, the President has consultation with such of the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts as he may deem necessary. In case of appointment of other Judges, the President is required to consult the Chief Justice of India though he may also consult such other Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts as he may deem necessary. [Proviso to Art. 124(2)].

(c) PROCEDURE TO APPOINT JUDGES IN THE UK AND USA

In Great Britain, the Judges are appointed by the Crown, which prior to 2005 meant the Executive of the day, without any restriction. The power of the Executive was curtailed in March 2005, by the Constitutional Reform Act, 2005 which established a Judicial Appointments Commission for England and Wales and a Judicial Appointments and Conduct Ombudsman. In the U.S.A., on the other hand, the President appoints the Supreme Court Judges with the consent of the Senate.

The framers of the Indian Constitution saw difficulties in both the methods prevailing at that time and so they adopted a middle course. The earlier English method appeared to give a blank cheque to the Executive while the American system is cumbersome and involves the possibility of subjecting judicial appointments to political influence and pressures. The Indian method, as laid down in Art. 124(2), as mentioned above, neither gives an absolute authority to the Executive nor does it permit Parliament to influence appointment of Judges. The Executive is required to consult persons who are ex hypothesi well-qualified to give proper advice in this matter.

---

9. For discussion on the concept of "Independence of the Supreme Court:, see, infra, Sec. K.

10. For discussion on the concept of "Fundamental Features of the Constitution, see, infra, Ch. XLI.

(d) APPOINTMENT OF SUPREME COURT JUDGES

POSITION before 1993

Before the year 1993, the President's power to appoint the Supreme Court Judges was purely of a formal nature, for, he would act in this matter, as in other matters, on the advice of the concerned Minister, viz., the Law Minister. The final power to appoint Supreme Court Judges rested with the Executive and the views expressed by the Chief Justice were not regarded as binding on the Executive.

For long, the practice in India had been to appoint the senior-most Judge of the Supreme Court as the Chief Justice whenever a vacancy occurred in that office. In 1958, the Law Commission criticised this practice on the ground that a Chief Justice should not only be an able and experienced Judge but also a competent administrator and, therefore, succession to the office should not be regulated by mere seniority.[11] The Government did not act upon this recommendation for long. It continued to appoint the senior-most Judge as the Chief Justice as it was afraid that it might be accused of tampering with judicial independence. A mechanical adherence to the rule at times resulted in the Chief Justice holding office only for a few months before he retired from the Court.

In 1973, the Government suddenly departed from this practice and appointed as Chief Justice a Judge [Justice A.N. RAY] who was fourth in the order of seniority. Thus, three senior Judges were by-passed, who then resigned from the Court in protest. This raised a hue and cry in the country and the Government was accused of tampering with the independence of the Judiciary.[12] Although the Government invoked the Law Commission's recommendation to support the step taken by it, no one believed that the seniority rule had been jettisoned only because of what the Law Commission had said a few years back.

The appointment of the new Chief Justice was even challenged in the Delhi High Court through a petition for quo warranto under Art. 226 on the ground that—(i) it was mala fide, (ii) it was against the rule of seniority inherent in Art. 124(2), and (iii) the mandatory consultative process envisaged in Art. 124(2) had not been resorted to.

The High Court dismissed the petition holding that the motives of the appointing authority are irrelevant in quo warranto proceedings. Without expressing any definitive opinion on points (ii) and (iii), the court ruled that even if these contentions were correct, any writ issued by the court would be futile as Justice RAY could immediately be reappointed, by following the requisite consultative procedure as he was now the senior-most Judge on the Bench.[13]

Again in 1976, the Government appointed Justice BEG as the Chief Justice bypassing Justice KHANNA who was senior to him at the time. Consequently, Justice KHANNA resigned in protest. However, after the retirement of Chief Justice BEG, the senior-most Judge, Justice CHANDRACHUD was appointed as the Chief

---

11. Law Comm., XIV Rep., I, 39-40 (1958).

12. For details of the controversy see, KULDIP NAYAR, SUPERSESSION OF JUDGES (1973); KUMARAMANGLAM, JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS (1973); PALKHIVALA, OUR CONSTITUTION DEFACED & DEFILED, 93-105 (1974), and A JUDICIARY MADE TO MEASURE.

13. P.L. Lakhanpal v. A.N. Ray, AIR 1975 Del. 66.
For Art. 226 and writ of quo warrants, see Ch. VIII, Secs. D and E, infra.

Justice. Since then again the rule of seniority has been followed in the matter of appointment of the Chief Justice of India.

In the context of India, it appears to be best to adhere to the convention of appointing the senior-most Judge as the Chief Justice. This will avoid any suspicion that the Government seeks to tamper with the judiciary. Also, when the Government has discretion to appoint the Chief Justice, there is no guarantee that the best man for the post will always be appointed and that considerations other than merit will not come into play. Appointment of a junior Judge invariably results in the resignation of Judges senior to him and thus the country loses the services of able and experienced Judges who could make significant contribution to the cause of law and justice. In India, the tradition so far has been to have a non-political Judiciary and it appears to be best to maintain that tradition. Since 1978, again, the practice has developed of appointing the senior-most judge as the Chief Justice.

POSITION AFTER 1993

The question of selection and appointment of the Judges is crucial to the maintenance of independence of the judiciary. If the final power in this respect is left with the executive, then it is possible for the executive to subvert the independence of the judiciary by appointing pliable judges.

The Constitution does not lay down a very definitive procedure for the purpose as it merely says that the President is to appoint Supreme Court Judges in consultation with the Chief Justice and "such" other Judges of the Supreme Court and of the High Courts as "the President may deem necessary". [Art. 124(2)]. It was not clear from this provision as to whose opinion was finally to prevail in case of difference of opinion among the concerned persons. This important question has been considered by the Supreme Court in several cases.

In 1991, in Subhash Sharma v. Union of India,[14] a three Judge Bench of the Supreme Court expressed the view that consistent with the constitutional purpose and process, as expressed in the Preamble to the Constitution, "it becomes imperative that the role of the institution of the Chief Justice of India be recognised as of crucial importance in the matter of appointments to the Supreme Court...."

As regards the word "consultation" in Art. 124(2), the Court said: "The constitutional phraseology would require to be read and expounded in the context of the constitutional philosophy of separation of powers to the extent recognised and adumbrated and the cherished values of judicial independence". The Bench suggested that this question be considered by a larger Bench. The Bench emphasized:[15]

> "An independent non-political judiciary is crucial to the sustenance of our chosen political system. The vitality of the democratic process, the ideals of social and economic egalitarianism, the imperatives of a socio-economic transformation envisioned by the Constitution as well as the Rule of law and great values of liberty and equality are all dependent on the tone of the judiciary. The quality of the judiciary cannot remain unaffected, in turn, by the process of selection of judges".

14. AIR 1991 SC 631, 641 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 574.
15. Ibid. at 640.

Subsequent to Subhash Sharma, the question of the process of appointing the Supreme Court Judges came to be considered by the Supreme Court in S.C. Advocates on Record Association v. Union of India.[16] A public interest writ petition was filed in the Supreme Court by the Lawyers' Association raising several crucial issues concerning the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts. The petition was considered by a bench of nine Judges.[17] The majority judgment was delivered by J.S. VERMA, J., on behalf of himself and YOGESHWAR DAYAL, G.N. RAY, A.S. ANAND and BHARUCHA, JJ.

The Court considered the question of the primacy of the opinion of the Chief Justice of India in regard to the appointment of the Supreme Court Judges. The Court emphasized that the question has to be considered in the context of achieving "the constitutional purpose of selecting the best" suitable for composition of the Supreme Court "so essential to ensure the independence of the judiciary, and, thereby, to preserve democracy."[18]

Referring to the 'consultative' process envisaged in Art. 124(2) for appointment of the Supreme Court Judges, the Court emphasized that this procedure indicates that the Government does not enjoy 'primacy' or "absolute discretion" in the matter of appointment of the Supreme Court Judges.[19]

The Court has pointed out that the provision for consultation with the Chief Justice was introduced because of the realisation that the Chief Justice is best equipped to know and assess the worth of the candidate and his suitability for appointment as a Supreme Court Judge, and it was also necessary to eliminate political influence.

The Court has also emphasized that the phraseology used in Art. 124(2) indicates that it was not considered desirable to vest absolute discretion or power of veto in the Chief Justice as an individual in the matter of appointments so that there should remain some power with the Executive to be exercised as a check, whenever necessary. Accordingly, the Court has observed:[20]

> "The indication is that in the choice of a candidate suitable for appointment, the opinion of the Chief Justice of India should have the greatest weight, the selection should be made as a result of a participatory consultative process in which the executive should have power to act as a mere check on the exercise of power by the Chief Justice of India, to achieve the constitutional purpose. Thus, the executive element in the appointment process is reduced to the minimum and any political influence is eliminated. It was for this reason that the word 'consultation' instead of 'concurrence' was used, but that was done merely to indicate that absolute discretion was not given to any one, not even to the Chief Justice of India as an individual."

Thus, in the matter of appointment of a Supreme Court Judge, the primary aim ought to be to reach an agreed decision taking into account the views of all the consultees giving the greatest weight to the opinion of the Chief Justice. When decision is reached by consensus, no question of primacy arises. Only when conflicting opinions emerge at the end of the process, the question of giving primacy

---

16. AIR 1994 SC 268 : (1993) 4 SCC 441.
17. For discussion on the concept of 'Public Interest Litigation', see, infra, Chs. VIII, Sec. D and XXXIII, Sec. B.
18. AIR 1994 SC at 425 : (1993) 4 SCC 441.
19. Ibid, at 429.
20. Ibid, at 430.

to the opinion of the Chief Justice arises, "unless for very good reasons known to the executive and disclosed to the Chief Justice of India, that appointment is not considered to be suitable."[21]

The Court has further clarified that "the primacy of the opinion of the Chief Justice of India" is, in effect, "primacy of the opinion of the Chief Justice of India formed collectively, that is to say, after taking into account the views of his senior colleagues who are required to be consulted by him for the formation of his opinion".

Emphasizing upon this aspect further, the Court has said that the principle of non-arbitrariness is an essential attribute of the Rule of Law and is all pervasive throughout the Constitution. An adjunct of this principle is "the absence of absolute power in one individual in any sphere of constitutional activity. Therefore, the meaning of the "opinion of the Chief Justice" is "reflective of the opinion of the judiciary" which means that "it must necessarily have the element of plurality in its formation". The final opinion expressed by the Chief Justice is not merely his individual opinion but "the collective opinion formed after taking into account the views of some other Judges who are traditionally associated with this function".[22] The Court has observed in this connection:[23]

> "Entrustment of the task of appointment of superior Judges to high constitutional functionaries; the greatest significance attached to the view of the Chief Justice of India, who is best equipped to assess the true worth of the candidates for adjudging their suitability; the opinion of the Chief Justice of India being the collective opinion formed after taking into account the views of some of his colleagues; and the executive being permitted to prevent an appointment considered to be unsuitable for strong reasons disclosed to the Chief Justice of India, provide the best method, in the constitutional scheme, to achieve the constitutional purpose without conferring absolute discretion or veto upon either the judiciary or the executive much less in any individual, be the Chief Justice of India or the Prime Minister."[24]

The Court also laid down the following propositions in relation to the appointment of the Supreme Court Judges:

(1) Initiation of the proposal for appointment of a Supreme Court Judge must be by the Chief Justice.

(2) In exceptional cases alone, for stated and cogent reasons, disclosed to the Chief Justice, indicating that the person who was recommended is not suitable for appointment, that appointment recommended by the Chief Justice of India may not be made. However, if the stated reasons are not accepted by the Chief Justice and other Supreme Court Judges who have been consulted in the matter, on reiteration of the recommendation of the Chief Justice of India, the appointment should be made as a healthy convention.

---

21. Ibid, at 430.
22. Ibid, 434.
23. Ibid, at 434-435.
24. KULDIP SINGH and PANDIAN, JJ., in separate opinions mainly concurred with the majority opinion.

(3) No appointment of any Judge to the Supreme Court can be made by the President unless it is in conformity with the final opinion of the Chief Justice formed in the manner indicated above.

(4) As the President acts on the advice of the Council of Ministers in the matter of appointment of a Supreme Court Judge, the advice of the Council of Ministers is to be given in accordance with Art. 124(2) as interpreted by the Supreme Court.

(5) All consultation with every one involved, including all the Judges consulted, must be in writing. Expression of opinion in writing is an inbuilt check on exercise of the power, and ensures due circumspection.

(6) Appointment to the office of Chief Justice of India ought to be of the senior-most Judge of the Supreme Court considered fit to hold the office. "The provision in Art. 124(2) enabling consultation with any other Judge is to provide for such consultation, if there be any doubt about the fitness of the senior-most Judge to hold the office, which alone may permit and justify a departure from the long standing convention", i.e., to appoint the senior-most Supreme Court Judge to the office of the Chief Justice of India.

(7) "Inter se seniority among Judges in their High Court and their combined seniority on all India basis" should be "kept in view and given due weight while making appointments from amongst High Court Judges to the Supreme Court. Unless there be any strong cogent reason to justify departure, that order of seniority must be maintained between them while making their appointment to the Supreme Court."

The main purpose underlying the law laid down by the Supreme Court in the matter of appointing Supreme Court Judges was to minimise political influence in judicial appointments as well as to minimise individual discretion of the Constitutional functionaries involved in the process of appointment of the Supreme Court Judges. The entire process of making appointments to high judicial offices is sought to be made more transparent so as to ensure that neither political bias, nor personal favouritism nor animosity play any part in the appointment of Judges.

Clarifying certain points arising out of the above judgment, the Supreme Court has now delivered an advisory opinion on a reference made by the President[25] under Art. 143[26]. In this opinion, the Court has laid down the following propositions in regard to the appointment of the Supreme Court Judges:

(1) In making his recommendation for appointment to the Supreme Court, the Chief Justice of India ought to consult four senior-most puisne Judges of the Supreme Court. Thus, the collegium to make recommendation for appointment should consist of the Chief Justice and four senior-most puisne Judges.

(2) The opinion of all members of the collegium in respect of each recommendation should be in writing.

---

25. In re: Special Reference, AIR 1999 SC 1 : (1998) 7 SCC 739.
26. For discussion on Art. 143, see, infra, section F.

(3) The views of the senior-most Supreme Court Judge who hails from the High Court from where the person recommended comes must be obtained in writing for the consideration of the collegium.

(4) If the majority of the collegium is against the appointment of a particular person, that person shall not be appointed. The Court has gone on to say that " if even two of the Judges forming the collegium express strong views, for good reasons, that are adverse to the appointment of a particular person, the Chief Justice of India would not press for such appointment."

(5) The following exceptions have now been engrafted on the rule of seniority among the High Court Judges for appointment to the Supreme Court:

(a) A High Court Judge of outstanding merit can be appointed as a Supreme Court Judge regardless of his standing in the seniority list. "All that needs to be recorded when recommending him for appointment is that he has outstanding merit".

(b) A High Court Judge may be appointed as a Supreme Court Judge for "good reasons" from amongst several Judges of equal merit, as for example, the particular region of the country in which his parent High Court is situated is not represented on the Supreme Court Bench.

Thus, the responsibility to make recommendations for appointment as Supreme Court Judges has been taken away from the Central Executive and has now been placed on a collegium consisting of the Chief Justice of India and four senior-most puisne Judges. The sphere of consultation has thus been broadened. Before this opinion was delivered, this collegium consisted of the Chief Justice and two senior-most Judges. The Court has now specifically stated that an opinion formed by the Chief Justice of India in any manner other than that indicated has no primacy in matter of appointments to the Supreme Court and the Government is not obliged to act thereon.[27] The process of consultation among the members of the collegium has now been formalized as every member Judge has to give his opinion in writing.

(e) PROPOSAL FOR SETTING UP A JUDICIAL COMMISSION

In its 121st report issued in 1987, the Law Commission has advocated the setting up of a Judicial Commission. In 1987, after the case of S.P. Gupta,[28] the executive came to wield overriding powers in the matter of selection and appointment of Judges. The Commission was unhappy with the situation prevailing at the time. Criticising the system prevailing in 1987, the Law Commission observes:

> "The present model… confers overriding powers on the executive in the matter of selection and appointment of judges and in dealing with the judiciary. The constitutional mandate all was to separate executive and judiciary in all its ramifications. The Constitution aims at ensuring independence of Judiciary, when translated in action, independence from executive."

---

27. Ibid, at 16.

28. S.P. Gupta v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 149 : 1981 Supp SCC 87. For discussion on this case, see, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(c), infra.

Accordingly, the Law Commission suggested that a National Judicial Commission be set up. But the Law Commission did not work out its composition and function. In this regard, the Law Commission said : "Composition and functions of such a National Judicial Service Commission will have to be worked out in meticulous detail." Tentatively, however, the Law Commission suggested the following composition: Chief Justice of India (Chairman); three seniormost judges of the Supreme Court; retiring Chief Justice of India; Three Chief Justices of the High Courts according to their seniority; Minister of Law and Justice, Government of India; Attorney-General of India, and an outstanding law academic.

The Law Commission issued its report in 1987. It is clear that it was primarily to dilute the executive power, and as a hedge against executive interference with the judiciary, that the Law Commission mooted the idea of a Judicial Commission. Since then things have changed drastically as a result of the two Supreme Court cases mentioned above. In fact, the 121st report of the Law Commission played a significant role in the Supreme Court decision in Advocates-on-Record case in 1994.

The rationale underlying the Report has now been overtaken by the two Supreme Court decisions viz., Supreme Court Advocates-on-Record Association v. Union of India and In re : Presidential Reference, as discussed above. As a result of these judicial pronouncements, the effective power to appoint Supreme Court and High Court Judges has come to vest in a collegium of Judges as mentioned above. Theoretically at least, this 'de facto' Judicial Commission ensured a freedom from executive interference and consequently guaranteed judicial independence. But actual freedom from political considerations and other pressures, turning as they do on the personal characteristics of selectors coupled with the absence of public scrutiny, has led to a recent rethinking on the issue. The National Commission to Review the Working of the Constitution in its report submitted in 2002 has opined that a National Judicial Commission should be constituted for making recommendations as to the appointments of judges of all superior courts other than the Chief Justice of India. It has expressed the view that the Vice President of India, the Chief Justice of India, the two senior most puisne judges of the Supreme Court and the Union Minister for Law and Justice should constitute the Judicial Commission. The Chief Justice of a High Court would also be associated as a Member of the Commission when considering the appointment of a judge of that High Court.

(f) ACTING CHIEF JUSTICE

The President can appoint a Supreme Court Judge as the acting Chief Justice in case the office falls vacant, or the Chief Justice is unable to perform his duties due to absence or otherwise [Art. 126].

(g) OATH

A person appointed as a Supreme Court Judge, before entering upon his office, has to make and subscribe before the President, or some person appointed by him for the purpose, an oath or affirmation in the form prescribed [Art. 124(6)].

(h) QUALIFICATIONS

A person to be appointed a Supreme Court Judge should be a citizen of India. In addition, he may have been—

(i) either a Judge of a High Court (or High Courts) for five years, or

(ii) an advocate of a High Court (or High Courts) for ten years, or,

(iii) may be, in the opinion of the President, a distinguished jurist [Art. 124(3)].

It is thus possible to appoint an eminent non-practising, academic lawyer to the Supreme Court. This provision has been inspired by the American example where distinguished law teachers have often been appointed to the Supreme Court and they have proved to be successful Judges.[29] At times, a non-practising laywer-judge might be in a better position, because of his breadth of outlook and freedom from a narrow and technical approach to law, to deal with problems of public law.[30] While there have been two appointments to the Supreme Court directly from the Bar till now, however, no jurist, as such, has been appointed as a Supreme Court Judge in India.

(i) SALARY

To begin with, the salary payable to a Supreme Court Judge was specified in the Constitution [Art. 125(1) and the Second Schedule].[31] But then by the Fifty-fourth Constitutional Amendment, Parliament has been given power to determine the salary payable to a Supreme Court Judge by law.

Parliament is also authorised to determine, from time to time, by law such questions as the privileges, allowances, rights in respect of leave of absence and pension for these Judges. None of these can, however, be varied by Parliament to the disadvantage of a Judge after his appointment to the Court [Art. 125(2) and the proviso]. All these matters are now regulated by the Supreme Court Judges (Salaries and Conditions of Service) Act, 1958.[32]

(j) AD HOC JUDGE

The Chief Justice may call a Judge of a High Court to act as an ad hoc Judge of the Supreme Court, for such period as may be necessary, if the quorum of the Supreme Court Judges is insufficient to hold or continue a session of the Court. The Judge so appointed should be qualified to act as a Supreme Court Judge.

Before making such an appointment, the Chief Justice of India has to consult the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned and also obtain the prior consent of the President [Art. 127(1)]. It is the duty of the High Court Judge so appointed, in priority to other duties of his office, to attend the sittings of the Supreme Court at such time and for such period for which his attendance is required there. While so attending the Supreme Court, an ad hoc Judge enjoys all the jurisdiction, powers and privileges of, and discharges all such duties like, any other Supreme Court Judges [Art. 127(2)].

---

29. VIII CAD 254; Law Commission of India, ibid., 36.

30. MC WHINNEY, JUDICIAL REVIEW, Passim (1969); FREUND, UMPIRING THE FEDERAL SYSTEM, 54 Col. L.R. 574.

31. The Schedule has been amended by the Fifty-Fourth Amendment of the Constitution enacted in 1986; see, infra, Ch. XLII.

32. This Act has been recently amended by the High Court and Supreme Court Judges (Salaries and Conditions of Services) Amendment Act, 2002.

(k) RETIRED SUPREME COURT JUDGE

A person who has held office as a Supreme Court Judge cannot plead or act in any court or before any authority in India [Art. 124(7)]. This disqualification has been placed on the ex-Judge with a view to preserving the dignity of the Supreme Court and also to avoid embarrassment to the tribunal or the court before whom he may appear.

However, the Chief Justice of India, with the previous consent of the President, may request any retired Supreme Court Judge to sit and act as a Judge of the Court. If he agrees to do so, then while so sitting and acting, he is entitled to such allowances as may be determined by an order of the President. He will also enjoy all the jurisdiction, powers and privileges of a Supreme Court Judge, but shall not otherwise be deemed to be a Judge of the Court.

The Chief Justice may similarly request a retired High Court Judge, who is duly qualified to be appointed as a Supreme Court Judge, to sit and act as a Judge of the Supreme Court [Art. 128].

(l) TENURE

A Judge of the Supreme Court may resign his office by writing to the President.[33] He holds office until he attains the age of 65 years.[34] If a question arises regarding his age, it is to be determined by such authority and in such manner as Parliament may by law provide.[35] Parliament has now laid down the procedure for the purpose.[36]

The Indian provision fixing a retiring age has this virtue that it ensures infusion of new talent from time to time and thus protects the Court from falling into a groove or getting out of tune with the contemporary social and economic philosophy and this aspect is important because of the Court's significant function of interpretation of the Constitution. On the other hand, an unfortunate result of the provision at times may be to remove some Judges untimely from the bench just when they may be beginning to find their feet as constitutional judges and approaching the period of their greater intellectual usefulness. It may therefore be advisable to extend the age of retirement of a Supreme Court Judge to 70 years.

(m) REMOVAL OF A JUDGE

The question of removal of a Judge before the age of retirement is an important one as it has a significant bearing on the independence of the judiciary. If a Judge of the Supreme Court could be removed by the Executive without much formality, then it can be imagined that the Court would lose its independence and become subject to the control of the Executive.

In every democratic country swearing by the Rule of Law, therefore, special provisions are made making removal of judges an extremely difficult exercise. In Britain, for example, Judges hold office during good behaviour and can be removed only on an address from both Houses of Parliament.[37] In the U.S.A., a Supreme Court Judge holds office for life and is removable only by the process

---

33. Art. 124(2), proviso (a).
34. Art. 124(2).
35. Art. 124(2A).
36. See, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. B(g), for details of the procedure.
37. S.A. de Smith, CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 353, 362 (1977).

of impeachment in case of treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanours.[38] Provision has however been made by law for voluntary retirement on full salary after ten years of service and attainment of the age of seventy.

The Constitution of India also makes a provision for the removal of a Supreme Court Judge.[39] He may be removed from office by the President on an address by both Houses of Parliament presented in the same session for proved misbehaviour[40] or incapacity. The address must be supported by a majority of the total membership in each House, and also by a majority of not less than two thirds of the members of each House present and voting.[41]

The word 'proved' in this provision indicates that the address can be presented by Parliament only after the alleged charge of misbehaviour or incapacity against the Judge has been investigated, substantiated and established by an impartial tribunal. The constitutional provision does not prescribe how this investigation is to be carried on. It leaves it to Parliament to settle and lay down by law the detailed procedure according to which the address may be presented and the charge of misconduct or incapacity against the Judge investigated and proved.[42]

In accordance with the above provision, Parliament has enacted the necessary law for the purpose. The Judges (Inquiry) Act, 1968, now regulates the procedure for investigation and proof of misbehaviour or incapacity of a Supreme Court Judge for presenting an address by the Houses of Parliament to the President for his removal.

The procedure for the purpose is as follows: A notice of a motion for presenting such an address may be given by 100 members of the Lok Sabha, or 50 members of the Rajya Sabha. The Speaker or the Chairman may either admit or refuse to admit the motion. If it is admitted, then the Speaker/Chairman is to constitute a committee consisting of a Supreme Court Judge, a Chief Justice of a High Court and a distinguished jurist. If notices for the motion are given on the same day in both the Houses, the Committee of Inquiry is to be constituted jointly by the Speaker and the Chairman.

The Committee of inquiry is to frame definite charges against the Judge on the basis of which the investigation is proposed to be held and give him a reasonable opportunity of being heard including cross-examination of witnesses. If the charge is that of physical or mental incapacity, the Committee may arrange for the medical examination of the Judge by a medical board appointed by the Speaker/Chairman or both as the case may be.

The report of the Committee is to be laid before the concerned House or Houses. If the Committee exonerates the Judge of the charges laid against him, then no further action is to be taken on the motion for his removal. If, however, the Committee finds the Judge to be guilty of misbehaviour, or suffering from an incapacity, the House can take up consideration of the motion. On the motion being adopted by both Houses according to Art. 124(4), noted above, an address

---

38. SCHWARTZ, AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 135; Art. II(4) of the U.S. Constitution.
39. Art. 124(2), proviso (b); Art. 124(4) and Art. 124(5).
40. Even if a Judge commits errors, even gross errors, it does not amount to misbehaviour on his part: C.K. Daphtary v. O.P. Gupta, AIR 1971 SC 1132. See further under 'Power to Review'.
41. Art. 124(2), proviso (b) and Art. 124(4).
42. Art. 124(5).

may be presented to the President for removal of the Judge. Rules under the Act are to be made by a committee consisting of 10 members from the Lok Sabha and 5 members from the Rajya Sabha.

It can be seen that the constitutional provision in India for the removal of a Supreme Court Judge is modelled on the English provision, though the former is somewhat more rigid than the latter insofar as—(i) it requires a special majority in both Houses whereas in England no special majority is prescribed; (ii) while in India the grounds have been specified on which an address for the removal of a Judge can be presented, there is no such provision in England; (iii) in India, there is provision for investigation and proof of the grounds before presenting an address, no such provision exists in England. Therefore, it appears that the provision in England for the removal of Judges is more flexible than that in India.

The procedure outlined above for the removal of a Supreme Court Judge was activated in 1991. For the first time since the Constitution came into force, the above-mentioned procedure to remove a Supreme Court Judge was put in motion in 1991. Steps were initiated to remove a Supreme Court Judge on charges of misconduct prior to his appointment when he was the Chief Justice of a High Court. 108 members of the Ninth Lok Sabha gave notice to the Speaker of a motion for presenting an address to the President for removal of Justice V. Ramaswami of the Supreme Court.

The charge against him was that he committed financial irregularities while he was the Chief Justice of Punjab and Haryana High Court. The Speaker of the Lok Sabha admitted the motion on 12th March, 1991, and proceeded to constitute an Enquiry Committee consisting of Justice P.B. SAWANT, a sitting Judge of the Supreme Court, Chief Justice DESAI of the Bombay High Court and Mr. CHINNAPPA REDDY, a retired Supreme Court Judge as a distinguished jurist. This was done by the Speaker in terms of S. 3(2) of the Judges (Inquiry) Act, 1968. Before the Committee could present its report, Lok Sabha was dissolved.[43]

In Sub-Committee of Judicial Accountability v. Union of India,[44] the Supreme Court was called upon to consider the question whether dissolution of the Lok Sabha put an end to the motion for removal of the concerned Supreme Court Judge. The Court's response to this question was that the motion for removal of a Judge under Art. 124 of the Constitution does not lapse with the dissolution of the House. The motion having been submitted to the Speaker, its validity would in no way be impaired by the dissolution of the House. The Court reached this conclusion as a result of interpretation of Ss. 3(1) and 6 of the Judges (Inquiry) Act. Referring to these statutory provisions, the Court observed:[45]

> "The effect of these provisions is that the motion shall be kept pending till the Committee submits its report and if the Committee finds the Judge guilty, the motion shall be taken up for consideration".

The Court ruled that the Committee of Inquiry appointed by the Speaker was a body outside Parliament and a statutory body under the Judges (Inquiry) Act, and till it furnishes its findings to the House, the Committee maintains its own separate identity.

---

43. On dissolution of Lok Sabha, see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(c).
44. AIR 1992 SC 320 : (1981) 4 SCC 399.
45. AIR 1992 SC at 344 : (1981) 4 SCC 399.

The Court ruled further that whether a motion has lapsed or not because of the dissolution of the House is not solely for the House to decide. In the Court's opinion, because of the written Constitution, "the usual incidents of parliamentary sovereignty do not obtain and the concept is one of 'limited Government'".[46] Judicial review is an inevitable part of a written Constitution which is the fundamental law of the land. The Court ruled accordingly:[47]

> "The interpretation of the laws is the domain of the courts and on such interpretation of the constitutional provisions as well as the Judges (Inquiry) Act, 1968, it requires to be held that under the law such a motion does not lapse and the courts retain jurisdiction to so declare."

Interpreting Arts. 121 and 124, the Supreme Court ruled that the constitutional process for the removal of a Judge up to the point of admission of the motion, constitution of the Committee and the recording of findings by the Committee are not, strictly speaking, proceedings of the House of Parliament. This part is covered by the enacted law. The Speaker is a statutory authority under the Judges (Inquiry) Act up to that point and the matter cannot be said to remain outside the Court's jurisdiction. Till this stage, the matter cannot be discussed on the floor of the House because of the bar placed by Art. 121.[48]

The Speaker while admitting a motion and constituting a committee to investigate the alleged grounds of misbehaviour or incapacity does not act as part of the House. The House does not come into the picture at this stage. The Parliament comes in the picture only when a finding is reached by that machinery that the alleged misbehaviour or incapacity has been proved.

Prior proof of misconduct in accordance with the law made under Art. 124(5) is a condition precedent for the lifting of the bar under Art. 121 against discussing the conduct of a Judge in Parliament. Art. 124(4) really becomes meaningful only with a law made under Art. 124(5). Without such a law having been made, the constitutional scheme and process for removal of a Judge remain inchoate. The Judges (Inquiry) Act, 1968 is, therefore, constitutional and intra vires Parliament.

When the Speaker admits the motion under S. 3 of the Judges (Inquiry) Act, the Judge concerned is not, as a matter of right, entitled to any notice or hearing. Also, there is no legal provision under which the Court has power to interdict the Judge from attending to judicial work in the Court pending enquiry against him. It may, however, be advisable to do so if so advised by the Chief Justice.

The Chief Justice is expected to find a desirable solution in such a situation to avoid embarrassment to the Judge and to the institution in a manner which is conducive to the independence of the judiciary. Should the Chief Justice be of the view that in the interests of the institution of judiciary it is desirable for the Judge to abstain from judicial work till the final outcome under Art. 124(4), he would advise the Judge accordingly. The Judge would ordinarily abide by the advice of the Chief Justice.

The Court also ruled that the petitioner, being a Committee of the Bar, has locus standi to move a writ petition in the Court to raise these matters concerning the removal of a Supreme Court Judge.

---

46. Ibid., at 345.
47. Ibid., at 346
48. Supra, Ch. II; Sec. L(i)(a) infra.

Soon after the Inquiry Committee started proceedings, a Congress M.P., Shri M. Krishnaswami, filed a petition in the Supreme Court challenging the Committee's functioning. His complaint was that Justice Ramaswami had not been given a fair hearing and also that the Judge was entitled to a copy of the report. The Supreme Court dismissed the petition on the ground that the petitioner had no locus standi. If Justice Ramaswami wanted a copy of the report, he would have to appeal to the Court himself.[49]

Next, a writ petition was filed in the Supreme Court on behalf of Justice Ramaswami by his wife claiming a copy of the report of the Inquiry Committee before its being submitted to the Speaker so that the Judge may take recourse to judicial review in case he was found guilty by the Committee. In Sarojini Ramaswami v. Union of India,[50] the Supreme Court considered several important questions arising out of the writ petition, viz.:

(1) Whether the concerned Judge has a right of judicial review of the order of removal made by the President under Art. 124(4)?

(2) Is the Inquiry Committee a tribunal and thus subject to the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction under Art. 136?

(3) Does the concerned Judge have a right to get a copy of the report before its submission to the Speaker?

A five-Judge Bench considered the issues involved; three opinions were filed. The majority opinion (3 Judges) was written by VERMA, J.; a separate but concurring opinion was filed by KASLIWAL, J., and K. RAMASWAMY, J., filed a dissenting opinion. The following summary is based on the three Judge-opinion given by VERMA, J.

After reading the constitutional provisions and the provisions of the Judges (Inquiry) Act and the rules made thereunder, the Court pointed out that if the Inquiry Committee reaches the verdict of 'not guilty', either unanimously or by majority, the matter ends there and Parliament is not required to take up the motion of removal for consideration.

This means that the Inquiry Committee is "the sole and final arbiter on the question of removal of the Judge where the findings reached by the Committee, whether unanimously or by majority, is that the Judge is 'not guilty'[51]. This indicates that there can be no judicial review where the Inquiry Committee makes a finding that the Judge is 'not guilty' of any misbehaviour. In such a situation, no question arises of furnishing a copy of the report of the Committee to the concerned Judge.

In case, the Inquiry Committee finds the Judge guilty, then the matter goes to Parliament. The Supreme Court has come to the conclusion that under Art. 124(4), "a full consideration on merits, including correctness of the finding of 'guilty' made by the Inquiry Committee on the basis of the materials before the Parliament is contemplated during the Parliamentary part of the process of removal of a Judge."

---

49. Krishnaswami v. Union of India, (1992) 4 SCC 605.
50. AIR 1992 SC 2219 : (1992) 4 SCC 506.
51. Ibid., 2235.

This means that despite the finding of 'guilty' by the Committee, the Parliament may decide, after considering the matter, not to adopt the motion for removing the Judge. This leads to the conclusion that the concerned Judge should also have an opportunity to comment on the finding by the Inquiry Committee. For this purpose, therefore, the Speaker/Chairman of the House has to supply a copy of the Inquiry Committee's report to the concerned Judge while causing it to be laid before the Parliament under S. 4(3) of the Act.[52]

As regards judicial review, the Court has ruled that if Parliament does not adopt the motion for removal of the Judge, the process ends there with no challenge available to anyone. The judicial review of the finding of 'guilty' made by the Inquiry Committee may be permissible on limited grounds "pertaining only to the legality" but only after "the making of the order of removal by the President in case the Parliament adopts the motion by the requisite majority". "Resort to judicial review by the concerned Judge between the time of conclusion of the inquiry by the Committee and making of the order of removal by the President would be premature and is unwarranted in the constitutional scheme."[53]

The Supreme Court has ruled that the Inquiry Committee appointed under the Judges (Inquiry) Act cannot be treated as a 'tribunal' for the purposes of Art. 136 because the report finding the Judge guilty of misbehavour is "in the nature of recommendation for his removal which may or may not be acted upon by the Parliament". Since the Committee holding that the Judge is guilty of any misbehaviour is not "final and conclusive", "it is legally not permissible to hold that the Committee is a tribunal under Art. 136 of the Constitution."[54] This means that an appeal cannot be filed in the Supreme Court from the Inquiry Committee under Art. 136.[55]

This judgment has seeds of confrontation between the Supreme Court and Parliament. Ordinarily, after Parliament has taken a decision to remove the Judge, on the basis of the report of the Committee of Inquiry, the matter should come to an end. As the Court has said itself, if the Inquiry Committee report is favourable to the concerned Judge, the matter ends there and Parliament cannot take any further action in the matter. If, however, the report of the Inquiry Committee goes against the Judge, then, only Parliament can take action to remove him after giving him a hearing on the inquiry report.

Once Parliament has passed the resolution removing the Judge after following the due procedure and the President assents to the motion, the Judge stands removed and there appears to be no need for any judicial review thereafter. Otherwise, there is a chance of controversy arising between the Judiciary and Parliament. In any case, judicial review can only be on procedural grounds and not on the merits of the grounds of removal.

In the long and arduous process of removal of the Supreme Court Judge, the third stage was reached when the Inquiry Committee held the Judge guilty of wilful and gross misuse of office and moral turpitude by using public funds for private ends in several ways while he was the Chief Justice of the Punjab and Haryana High Court during Nov. 11, 1987 to Oct. 6, 1989. The Committee reported

---

52. Ibid., 2241–42.
53. Ibid., 2244.
54. Ibid., 2248.
55. For discussion on Art. 136, see, infra, Sec. D.

that acts committed by the Judge were of such a nature that his "continuance in office will be prejudicial to the administration of justice and public interest". The Committee said: "The acts constitute 'misbehaviour' within the meaning of Art. 124(4) of the Constitution."

The report of the Committee was tabled in Parliament on December 17, 1992.[56] Thereafter, the motion was debated in the Lok Sabha. A lawyer was allowed to appear before the House to defend Justice RAMASWAMI. Ultimately, the motion was put to vote in the House but was lost as it could not receive the requisite votes in the House because of the absence of the Congress Party members from the House.

As a sequel to the above episode, a writ petition was moved in the Supreme Court seeking a declaration that the motion of impeachment moved in the Lok Sabha for the removal of the Supreme Court Judge ought to be regarded to have been carried by construing the expression "supported by a majority" in Art. 124(4) as meaning that a member abstaining from voting should be deemed to have supported the motion. The Supreme Court rejected the contention. The Court argued that the expression "not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting" in Art. 124(4) implies that motion is to be deemed carried only when the requisite number of members express their support for the motion by casting votes in its favour. Abstention from casting vote cannot be construed as deemed support for the motion.[57]

The President cannot remove a Supreme Court Judge except in accordance with the procedure laid down in Art. 124(4). Thus, the President cannot remove a Judge unless each House of Parliament passes an address for the removal of the Judge supported by a majority of the total membership of the House and by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting on the ground of proved misbehaviour and incapacity. Unless such an address is presented to the President in the same session by the two Houses, the President is not empowered to remove a Judge.[58]

The second time in the history of Indian Judiciary, the CJI recommended the impeachment of Justice, SOUMITRA SEN of the Calcutta High Court. Justice Sen allegedly misappropriated funds while acting as a Receiver prior to his appointment as a Judge. The further allegation was that the funds were not returned or accounted for till several years after his elevation and only pursuant to a judicial order of the Court. The Chief Justice of the High Court's request that he should resign or retire prematurely was refused. The three-judge committee set up by the Chief Justice of India to enquire into the matter reported that Justice Sen was guilty of misconduct. On August 4, 2008, the Chief Justice of India wrote a letter to the Prime Minister recommending impeachment proceedings against Justice Sen under Article 217(1) read with Article 124(4) of the Constitution. About 60 Rajya Sabha MPs have filed a petition before the Chairman of the Upper House demanding the impeachment of Justice Sen. The debate in Parliament is pending.

The word 'misbehaviour' used in Art. 124(4), "is a vague and elastic word and embraces within its sweep different facets of conduct as opposed to good conduct". Literally 'misconduct' means wrong conduct or improper conduct. Guarantee

---

56. THE HINDU, dated December 26, 1992, p. 12.
57. Lily Thomas v. Speaker, Lok Sabha, (1993) 4 SCC 234.
58. K. Veeraswami v. Union of India, (1991) 3 SCC 655 : (1991) SCC (Cri) 734.

of tenure to a Judge, and its protection by the Constitution does not mean giving sanctuary for corruption or grave misbehaviour. But, at the same time, every action or omission by a Judge in the performance of his duties which may not be a good conduct necessarily, may not be regarded 'misbehaviour' for purposes of Art. 124(4) indictable by impeachment.[59] Error in judgment, however gross, cannot amount to 'misbehaviour'.[60]

In December 2006, a Bill to amend the 1968 Act was introduced in the Lok Sabha. It seeks to effect far reaching reforms in the action permissible against a judge for "misbehaviour" or "incapacity". Both words are defined. Provisions are also sought to be introduced for the setting up of a National Judicial Council to enquire into allegations of misbehaviour or incapacity of a judge. The proposed Council is to consist of the Chief Justice of India as the Chairperson, the two senior most judges of the Supreme Court and two Chief Justices of High Courts. If the Chief Justice of India is the object of the inquiry, the President may appoint the senior most judge of the Supreme Court to discharge the functions of the Chairperson. In a sharp departure from the provisions of the 1968 Act, the Bill seeks to allow complaints to be filed by any person to the Council apart from the procedure earlier followed, namely by way of a reference by the Speaker of the Lok Sabha or the Chairman of the Rajya Sabha. If after inquiry, the complaint is found established by the Council, it may, if the charge is serious, advise the President accordingly, who is required to place the advice before both Houses of Parliament so that the Constitutional process for removal of the judge can commence. If the charges established are not serious and do not warrant the removal of the judge, the Council may issue advisories or warnings to the judge concerned or withdraw judicial work or censure or admonish the judge privately or publicly or request the judge to voluntarily retire. The Bill, if enacted, would meet the need for accountability in judges, transparency in the system and allow for some punitive action against a judge found guilty of misbehaviour or incapacity without resorting to the long drawn and uncertain political outcome of impeachment.

C. JURISDICTION AND POWERS

The Supreme Court is a multi-jurisdictional Court and may be regarded as the most powerful Apex Court in the World.

The Constitution confers very broad jurisdiction on the Court. The jurisdiction of the Court may be put under the following heads:

(i) The Court has power to commit a person for its contempt [Art. 129].

(ii) The Court has original jurisdiction to decide inter-governmental disputes [Art. 131].

(iii) The Court has appellate jurisdiction. It is the highest court of appeal in the country in all matters, civil or criminal [Arts. 132 to 134].

(iv) The Court has a very extensive appellate jurisdiction under Art. 136 from any court or tribunal in the country in matters not falling under heading (iii).

---

59. C. Ravichandran Iyer v. Justice A.M. Bhattacharjee, (1995) 5 SCC 457 : 1995 SCC (Cri) 953.

60. Daphtary v. Gupta, AIR 1971 SC 1132 : (1971) 1 SCC 626.

(v) The Apex Court has power under Art. 32 to enforce Fundamental Rights. [Art. 32][61]

(vi) The Court has advisory jurisdiction. [Art. 143]

(vii) The Court has power to review its own decisions. [Art. 137]

(viii) The Court has power to make any order necessary for doing complete justice in any case. [Art. 142]

All the above provisions are discussed below except Art. 32 which is discussed later in the book.[62]

(i) COURT OF RECORD

(a) CONTEMPT OF SUPREME COURT

The Supreme Court is a 'court of record'[63] and has all the powers of such a court including the power to punish for its contempt. A court of record has—

(1) power to determine its own jurisdiction, and

(2) it has power to punish for its contempt.

On the first question, the Supreme Court has asserted:[64]

> "In the absence of any express provision in the Constitution the Apex Court being a court of record has jurisdiction in every matter and if there be any doubt, the court has power to determine its jurisdiction."

On the question of contempt of court, the Supreme Court has a summary jurisdiction to punish contempt of its authority. This is an extraordinary power and is exercised only when the public interest so demands. Such a power is very necessary to prevent interference with the course of justice, to maintain the authority of law as administered in the court, and thus to protect public interest in the purity of the administration of justice.

The Supreme Court has emphasized upon the need for the concept of contempt of court in the following words.[65]

> "Availability of an independent judiciary and an atmosphere wherein judges may act independently and fearlessly is the source of existence of civilisation in society. The writ issued by the court must be obeyed. It is the binding efficacy attaching with the commands of the court and the respect for the orders of the court which deter the aggrieved persons from taking the law in their own hands because they are assured of an efficacious civilised method of settlement of disputes being available to them wherein they shall be heard and their legitimate grievances redeemed. Any act or omission which undermines the dignity of the court is therefore viewed with concern

---

61. For discussion on Fundamental Rights, see, Chs. XX-XXXIII, infra.

62. See, Ch. XXXIII, infra.

63. A court of record is a court whereof the acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled for a perpetual memory and testimony, the records of which are admitted to be of evidentiary value and are not to be questioned when produced before any court. A court of record as such has power to punish for its contempt.

64. Naresh Shridhar Mirajkar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1967 SC 1 : (1966) 3 SCR 744; Ganga Bishan v. Jai Narain, AIR 1986 SC 441 : (1986) 1 SCC 75; Delhi Judicial Service Association v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC at 2005.

65. Om Prakash Jaiswal v. D.K. Mittal, AIR 2000 SC 1136 : (2000) 3 SCC 171.

> by the society and the court treats it as an obligation to zealously guard against any onslaught on its dignity."

The Supreme Court exercises this power to punish an act which tends to interfere with the course of administration of justice. The following inter alia have been held to constitute contempt of court:[66]

(a) insinuations derogatory to the dignity of the Court which are calculated to undermine the confidence of the people in the integrity of the Judges;

(b) an attempt by one party to prejudice the Court against the other party to the action;

(c) to stir up public feelings on the question pending for decision before the Court and to try to influence the Judge in favour of himself;

(d) an attempt to affect the minds of the Judges and to deflect them from performing their duty by flattery or veiled threat;

(e) an act or publication which scandalises the Court attributing dishonesty to a Judge in the discharge of his functions;

(f) wilful disobedience or non-compliance of the Court' order.[67]

The Supreme Court directed the Delhi Development Authority to constitute a committee of inquiry to look into several allegations of irregularities committed in the allotment of plots in the Naraina Warehousing Scheme. The DDA took no action in the matter. Holding DDA guilty of committing contempt of court, the Court observed:[68]

> "Public bodies like, DDA, which are trustees of public properties, and are to carry out public functions, in our view, cannot escape their accountability for their failure to carry out the orders of this court made in public interest. The officers of the DDA who are guilty of inaction, in our view, should be proceeded against in contempt action."

However, in the instant case, instead of imposing any punishment, the Court gave to the DDA one more chance to comply with the Court order.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that in a government of laws and not of men, such as exists in India, the Executive branch of government bears a grave responsibility for upholding and obeying judicial orders.[69] Cases usually arise where government officials are found guilty by the Supreme Court of contempt of court for disregarding, not obeying, deliberately disobeying or not imple-

---

66. Hira Lal Dixit v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 743 : (1955) 1 SCR 677; Brahma Prakash v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 10 : 1953 SCR 1169; C.K. Daphtary v. O.P. Gupta, AIR 1971 SC 1132 : (1971) 1 SCC 626; Pritam Pal v. High Court of M.P., AIR 1992 SC 904 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 529.

67. Rajiv Choudhary v. Jagdish Narain Khanna, (1996) 1 SCC 508; Vineet Kumar Mathur v. Union of India, (1996) 7 SCC 714; Indian Airports Employees Union v. Ranjan Chattergee, AIR 1999 SC 880 : (1999) 2 SCC 537. See also Sunkara Lakshminarasamma v. Sagi Subba Raju, (2009) 7 SCC 460 : (2009) 11 JT 264; swearing of false affidavit, punishment by ordering exemplary costs. Also see, infra, under Art. 144, Sec. I(e).

68. M/s. Shorilal & Sons v. Delhi Development Authority, AIR 1995 SC 1084, 1088 : (1995) 3 SCC 320.

69. *Mohd. Aslam v. Union of India, (1994) 6 SCC 442 : AIR 1995 SC 548; Bihar Finance Service House Construction Coop. Society Ltd. v. Gautam Goswami, (*2008) 5 SCC 339, at page 348 : AIR 2008 SC 1975.

menting court orders.[70] Punishment by way of imprisonment for a month has been imposed on a Minister in charge of a department as well as the Principal Secretary of the department, who were found guilty of a wilful violation of an order of the Supreme Court.[71]

In several cases, private parties violating or flouting Supreme Court orders have been held guilty of contempt of court.[72] Gomti River water was being polluted due to discharge of effluents from the distillery of a company. The Supreme Court ordered the company to remove deficiencies in the effluent treatment plant by a certain date. The company failed to do so and yet kept on running its plant. The Court ruled that violation of the Court order by the company was deliberate and pre-planned indicating a defiant attitude on its part. The Court imposed a fine of Rs. 5 lacs on the company which amount was to be utilised for cleaning of the Gomti River.[73]

The Managing Director and Director of a Company held liable for contempt, were sentenced to undergo six months' and three months' imprisonment respectively in Maruti Udyog Ltd. v. Mahinder C. Mehta[74] .

As the Court has observed in Duda:[75] "Any publication which was calculated to interfere with the due course of justice or proper administration of law would amount to contempt of court. A scurrilous attack on a judge, in respect of a judgment or past conduct has in our country the inevitable effect of undermining the confidence of the public in the judiciary; and if confidence in judiciary goes administration of justice definitely suffers."

In Hiralal Dixit,[76] the Supreme Court has observed that it is not necessary that there should be an actual interference with the course of administration of justice. It is enough if the offending act or publication tends in any way to so interfere. If there are insinuations made which are derogatory to the dignity of the court and are calculated to undermine the confidence of the people in the integrity of the judges, the conduct would amount to contempt.

In Daphtary, the Court refused to accept the contention that after the case is decided, even if it is criticised severely and unfairly, it should not be treated as contempt of court. The Court observed:

---

70. See, for example, Mohd. Aslam v. Union of India, (1994) 6 SCC 442 : AIR 1995 SC 548; Manilal Singh v. H. Borobabu Singh, AIR 1994 SC 505 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 718; J. Vasudevan v. T.R. Dhananjaya, (1995) 6 SCC 249 : AIR 1996 SC 137; Mohd. Quiser v. L.K. Sinha, 1995 Supp (4) SCC 283 : (1995) 9 JT 133; T.R. Dhananjaya v. J. Vasudevan, (1995) 5 SCC 619 : AIR 1996 SC 302; T.M.A. Pai Foundation v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1995 SC 1938 : (1995) 4 SCC 1; Vineet Kumar Mathur v. Union of India, (1996) 1 SCC 119, In re, M.P. Dwivedi, AIR 1996 SC 2299 : (1996) 4 SCC 152.

71. T.N.Godavarman Thirumalpad v. Ashok Khot, (2006) 5 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 2007; See also Anil Ratan Sarkar v. Hirak hosh, JT 2002(2) SC 602 : (2002) 4 SCC 21; Indra Sawhney v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 498 : (2001) 1 SCC 168; Abhijit Tea Co. (P.) Ltd. v. Terai Tea Co. (P.) Ltd., (1996) 1 SCC 589.

72. Rajiv Choudhary v. Jagdish Narian Khanna, (1996) 1 SCC 508; Delhi Development Authority v. Skipper Consruction Co. (P.) Ltd., AIR 1996 SC 2005 : (1996) 4 SCC 622.

73. Vineet Kumar Mathur v. Union of India, (1996) 7 SCC 714 : 1996 (1) JT 454.

74. (2007) 13 SCC 220, at page 230.

75. P.N. Duda v. P. Shiv Shankar, AIR 1988 SC 1208, 1226 : (1988) 3 SCC 167 . See also C. Elumalai v. A.G.L. Irudayaraj, (2009) 4 SCC 213.

76. Hira Lal Dixit v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 56 743 : (1955) 1 SCR 677; see, supra, footnote 66.

> "We are unable to agree.... that a scurrilous attack on a Judge in respect of a judgment or past conduct has no adverse effect on the due administration of justice. This sort of attack in a country like ours has the inevitable effect of undermining the confidence of the public in the judiciary. If confidence in the judiciary goes, the due administration of justice definitely suffers."[77]

An article in a daily, criticising a Supreme Court decision, atrributing improper motives to the Judges and seeking to create an impression in the public mind that the Supreme Court Judges act on extraneous considerations in deciding cases has been held to constitute Court's contempt. The Court has stated that if an impression were created in the public mind that the Judges in the highest court act on extraneous considerations in deciding cases, public confidence in the administration of justice would be undermined and no greater mischief than that could possibly be imagined.[78]

Contempt of court is committed when a court is scandalised by casting "unwarranted, uncalled for and unjustified aspersions on the integrity, ability, impartiality or fairness of a judge in the discharge of his judicial functions as it amounts to an interference with the due course of administration of justice".[79] Charging the judiciary as "an instrument of oppression", and the judges as "guided and dominated by class hatred" "instinctively favouring the rich against the poor" has been held to constitute contempt of court as these words weaken the authority of law and law courts, and have the effect of lowering the prestige of judges and courts in the eyes of the people.[80]

A fair, reasonable, temperate and legitimate criticism of the Judiciary, or of the conduct of a Judge in his judicial capacity is permissible.

A distinction is drawn between a mere libel or defamation of a Judge personally and what amounts to a contempt of the court. A mere defamatory attack on a Judge is not actionable but it becomes punishable when it is calculated to interfere with the due course of justice, or the proper administration of law by the court. Alternatively the test is whether the wrong is done to the Judge personally, or it is done to the public.[81]

The power to punish for contempt, large as it is, is not invoked very frequently, and as the Court has itself observed, it should be exercised "cautiously, wisely and with circumspection."[82] On occasion, factors which have been considered sufficient to warrant a lesser punishment, in one case have not drawn a similar response in another. Thus, even when criminal contempt was found established and the contemnor had "not shown any repentance or regret or remorse", a "symbolic" punishment of imprisonment for one day and a fine of Rs. 2000/- was imposed "keeping in mind that the respondent was a woman"[83]. In a later case however, a woman who was found guilty of contempt was sentenced to

---

77. C.K. Daphtary v. O.P. Gupta, AIR 1971 SC 1132, 1144 : (1971) 1 SCC 626.
78. In the matter of the Editor, Printer and Publisher, Times of India (Daily) Bombay, Delhi, AIR 1953 SC 75.
79. Jaswant Singh v. Virender Singh, (1995) Supp (1) SCC 384 : AIR 1995 SC 520; Chetak Construction Ltd. v. Om Prakash, AIR 1998 SC 1855 : (1998) 4 SCC 577.
80. E.M.S. Namboodiripad v. T.N. Nambiar, AIR 1970 SC 2015 : (1970) 2 SCC 325.
81. Rustom Cawasjee Cooper v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1318 : (1970) 2 SCC 298; Perspective Publications v. Maharashtra, AIR 1971 SC 221; C.K. Daphtary v. O.P. Gupta, supra, note 77.
82. In re under Art. 143 (Keshav Singh's case), AIR 1965 SC 745; infra, Sec. F.
83. Arundhati Roy, In re, (2002) 3 SCC 343 : AIR 2002 SC 1375.

undergo imprisonment for 1 year and to pay costs of Rs. 50,000/- for having conducted herself in a manner "which illegitimately affect(ed) the presentation of evidence in…courts"[84]. The Court can punish its contempt by fine or imprisonment.[85] The Court does not use its power to punish for contempt unless there is real prejudice which can be regarded as 'substantial interference' with the due course of justice.[86]

A news item was published in The Times of India regarding a document containing a "vituperous attack" upon the Supreme Court's decision during the emergency in the Skukla case.[87] Contempt proceedings were initiated against the editor of the paper but these were dropped later by the majority decision. The minority view (BEG C.J.) was that the attack on the decision was "primarily irrational and abusive".[88]

Contempt of court is characterised either as civil or criminal. Any wilful disobedience of a court order to do or abstain from doing any act is a civil contempt. Civil contempt arises when the power of the court is invoked or exercised to enforce obedience to court orders.[89] On the other hand, criminal contempt is criminal in nature. It includes outrages on judges in open court, defiant disobedience to the judges in the court, libels on judges or courts or interfering with the course of justice or any act which tends to prejudice the course of justice.

A person is guilty of criminal contempt when his conduct tends to bring the authority and administration of law into disrespect or tends to interfere with or prejudice litigants during the litigation.[90] A government official while filing an affidavit on behalf of his department cast aspersions on, and attributed motives to, the Court. The Supreme Court came to the conclusion that the accusations, attributions and aspersions made in the affidavit were not only deliberately calculated to malign the Court but also to undermine its authority and to deter it from performing its duty. It was an intentional attempt to obstruct the course of justice and, thus, amounted to criminal contempt of the Court.[91] Threat by a lawyer representing a litigant to file prosecution against the Judge in respect of the judicial proceedings conducted by him in his own court amounts to a positive attempt to interfere with the due course of administration of justice.[92] A witness who takes inconsistent stands before courts in the course of a trial has also been held guilty of contempt.[93]

---

84. Zahira Habibullah Sheikh v. State of Gujarat: (2006) 3 SCC 374 : AIR 2006 SC 1367.
85. On contempt of court also see, In re S. Mulgaokar, AIR 1978 SC 727.
86. Rizwan-ul-Hasan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1953) SCR 581 : AIR 1953 SC 185; Shareef v. Judges, (1955) 1 S.C.R. 767 : AIR 1955 SC 19.
87. Additional District Magistrate, Jabalpore v. S. Shukla, AIR 1976 SC 1207. See, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.
For Emergency Provisions in the Constitution, see, Ch. XIII, infra.
88. In re, Sham Lal, AIR 1978 SC 489 : (1978) 2 SCC 479.
89. Delhi Development Authority v. Skipper Construction, (1995) 3 SCC 507.
90. DDA v. Skipper Construction, ibid.; Ram Avtar Sharma v. Arvind Sharma, (1995) Supp 2 SCC 130; Dhananjay Sharma v. State of Haryana, AIR 1995 SC 1795 : (1995) 3 SCC 757; D.C. Saxena v. Chief Justic of India, AIR 1996 SC 2481 : (1996) 5 SCC 216. In Re : Bineet Kumar Singh, AIR 2001 SC 2018 : (2001) 5 SCC 501; In Re Arundhati Roy, (2002) 3 SCC 343 : AIR 2002 SC 1375.
91. In re Sanjiv Datta, Dy. Secy., Ministry of Information & Broadcasting, (1995) 3 SCC 619.
92. Re Ajit Kumar Pandey, (1996) 6 SCC 510. Also see, D.C. Saxena v. Chief Justice of India, AIR 1996 SC 2481.
93. Zahira Habibullah Sheikh (5) v. State of Gujarat, (2006) 3 SCC 374 : AIR 2006 SC 1367.

A newspaper published a news item that two sons of a Supreme Court Judge had been allotted petrol pumps by the Minister out of his discretionary quota. However, on verification the news was found to be incorrect. The Court held the printer, publisher, editor and the reporter guilty of the contempt of the court. None of them took the necessary care in evaluating the correctness and credibility of the information published by them as a news, item in the newspaper in respect of the allegation of a very serious nature causing an embarrassment to the Court.[1]

The Court can take cognisance of its contempt suo motu.[2] An advocate of the Court can also bring to the notice of the Court any contempt of the court. In Daphtary,[3] a pamphlet published and circulated by the respondent was alleged to contain statements amounting to contempt of the Court. The President of the Supreme Court Bar chose to bring the matter to the Court's notice. The Court ruled that it could issue a notice suo motu and the President of the Supreme Court Bar was perfectly entitled to bring to the notice of the Court any contempt of the Court.

Under section 14 of the Contempt of Courts Act, in case of a criminal contempt of the Supreme Court, the Court may take action in either of the three ways: (1) on its own motion; (2) on the motion of the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General; or (3) any other person with the consent of the Attorney-General/Solicitor-General. If, therefore, a citizen wants to initiate proceedings for contempt of court, he must first seek the consent in writing either of the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General. If any of these refuses to give consent, the matter can be brought before the Court for judicial review of the refusal. The Court has ruled in Duda[4] that if the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General refuses to give permission to a person to move the Court for its contempt, the non-granting of the consent is a justiciable matter. The Court has observed in this connection:[5]

> "Discretion vested in law officers of this Court to be used for a public purpose in a society governed by rule of law is justiciable."

Another option may be that when a person draws the Court's attention to commission of contempt by some one, and he has not been given permission either by the AG or the SG, the Court may take cognisance of the complaint suo motu. The party which brings the contumacious conduct of the contemnor to the notice of the court, whether a private person or the subordinate court, is only an informant and does not have the status of a litigant in the contempt of court case. The case of contempt is not stricto-sensu a cause or a matter between the parties inter se. It is a matter between the Court and the contemner.[6] It is not tried as an adversarial litigation. However, in Bal Thackeray v. Harish Pimpalkhute,[7] the Court dismissed an application alleging criminal contempt on the ground that it did not comply with section 15 of the Contempt of Courts Act, 1971. The decision, which appears to be contrary to earlier decisions on the subject, can be justi-

---

1. Re Harijai Singh, (1996) 6 SCC 466.
2. Delhi Development Authority v. Skipper Construction, (1995) 3 SCC 507.
3. C.K. Daphtary v. O.P. Gupta, AIR 1971 SC 1132 : (1971) 1 SCC 626; supra, note 77.
4. P.N. Duda v. P.N. Shivshankar, AIR 1988 SC 1211 : (1988) 3 SCC 167; supra, note 75.
5. Ibid., 1225.
6. Supreme Court Bar Association v. Union of India, (1998) 4 SCC 409 : AIR 1998 SC 1895.
7. (2005) 1 SCC 254 : AIR 2005 SC 396.

fied, if at all, on the narrow ground that there was no prayer in the petition for taking suo motu action against the alleged contemnor.[8]

The decision illustrates the reluctance of Courts to exercise the power to act suo motu in matters which otherwise require the Attorney-General to initiate proceedings or at least give his consent to such initiation.

In Daphtary, the pamphlet in question ascribed bias and dishonesty to a Judge of the Supreme Court while acting in judicial capacity. This was made the basis of contempt proceedings against the respondent. Examining the scope of the concept of contempt of court, the Supreme Court stated that the test was whether the impugned publication was a mere defamatory attack on the Judge or whether it would interfere with the due course of justice or proper administration of law by the Court. On this test, the Court found that the pamphlet contained scurrilous remarks about a Supreme Court Judge which amounted to gross contempt of the Judge and of the Court itself. The Court laid down the following general propositions regarding the scope of the concept of contempt of court.

(1) There is no excuse whatsoever for imputing dishonesty to a Judge even if it were to be assumed that the judgment contained numerous errors.

(2) No evidence other than affidavits is allowed to justify allegation amounting to contempt of court.

(3) In trying contempt of court, the Court can deal with the matter summarily and adopt its own procedure. However the procedure must be fair. The Code of Criminal Procedure does not apply in matters of contempt.

(4) When the charge against the contemner is simple and clear, there is no need to draw up a formal charge by the Court.

(5) The President of the Supreme Court Bar Association can bring to the notice of the Court any contempt of court as the Bar is vitally concerned in the maintenance of the dignity of the courts and the proper administration of justice.

The Court has also ruled in Nahata[9] that a contempt petition cannot be withdrawn by the petitioner as a matter of right. The matter is primarily between the Court and the contemner. It is, therefore, for the Court to allow or refuse withdrawal in the light of the broad facts of the case and more particularly whether respect for judicial process would be enhanced or reduced by the grant or refusal of withdrawal. It is for the Court to determine whether the act complained of tending to scandalize the Court if viewed with certain severity with a view to punishing the person would in the larger interest of the society enhance respect for the judicial process, or too sensitive attitude in such matter may even become counter-productive. The power to commit for contempt of court has to be exercised with the greatest caution.

Shri Shiv Shankar, Minister for Law, Justice and Company Affairs, in a speech delivered before the Bar Council of Hyderabad made certain statements

---

8. SAMARADITYA PAL: THE LAW OF CONTEMPT (4th edn. 2006 pp. 438-439).
9. Amrit Nahata v. Union of India, (1985) 3 SCC 382, 385-87 : AIR 1986 SC 791.

which were derogatory to the dignity of the Supreme Court. He attributed to the Court partiality towards economically affluent sections of the people.

A practising lawyer brought the speech to the notice of the Supreme Court and thus contempt proceedings were initiated against the Minister. Dismissing the action in P.N. Duda v. P. Shiv Shankar,[10] the Court adopted the following words spoken by LORD ATKIN in Ambard v. A. G. for Trinidad and Tobago:[11] "Justice is not a cloistered virtue; she must be allowed to suffer the scrutiny and respectful, even though outspoken, comments of ordinary men." The Court went on to observe (as per SABYASACHI MUKHARJI, J.):

> "Administration of justice and judges are open to public criticism and public scrutiny. Judges have their accountability to the society and their accountability must be judged by their conscience and oath of their office, that is, to defend and uphold the Constitution and the laws without fear and favour. This the judges must do in the light given to them to determine what is right."

And also:

> "In the free market place of ideas criticisms about the judicial system or the Judges should be welcomed, so long as criticisms do not impair or hamper the administration of justice."[12]

Contempt of court arises when criticism about the judicial system or the Judges hampers the administration of justice or which erodes the faith in the objective approach of Judges and brings administration of justice into ridicule. Judgments can be criticised but motives should not be attributed to the Judges as "it brings the administration of justice into deep disrepect". Applying this test to the Minister's speech, the Court ruled that there was no imminent danger of interference with the administration of justice, or of bringing administration of justice into disrepute. In that view of the matter, the Court held the Minister not guilty of its contempt.

Again, the Supreme Court has emphasized that contempt of court is not committed if a person publishes any fair comment on the merits of any case which the Court has heard and decided finally. But, in the guise of criticising a judgment, personal criticism of the Judge is not permissible. "Courts like any other institution do not enjoy immunity from criticism as long as the criticism is fair, reasonable and temperate and does not accuse Judges of discharging their duties for improper motives or on extraneous consideration."

The rationale underlying this proposition is that to ascribe motives to a Judge is to sow the seed of distrust in the minds of the public about the administration of justice as a whole. Nothing can be more pernicious in its consequences than to prejudice the minds of public against Judges of the Court who are responsible for implementing the law. Judges do not defend their decisions in public.[13] With the introduction of truth as a valid defence to an allegation of contempt, by an amendment to the Contempt of Courts Act, 1971 in 2006,[14] a judge may have to do just that if the judgment is claimed to have been prompted by improper motives.

---

10. AIR 1988 SC 1212 : (1988) 3 SCC 167.
11. AIR 1936 PC 141.
12. AIR 1988 SC at 1214 : (1988) 3 SCC 167.
13. J.R. Parashar v. Prasant Bhushan, JT 2001 (7) 189 at 195 : (2001) 6 SCC 735 : AIR 2001 SC 3395.
14. Contempt of Courts Act (Amendment) Act, 2006

The Supreme Court also clarified the point that under the law, in case of contempt in the face of the Supreme Court (criminal contempt), the Supreme Court may take action either on its own motion, or on a motion by the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General, or any other person with the consent of the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General. If, therefore, a citizen wants to initiate proceedings for contempt he has first to seek the consent in writing of the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General. The Court further ruled that "Discretion vested in law officers of this Court to be used for a public purpose in a society governed by rule of law is justiciable".

The Supreme Court has clarified the relationship between Art. 129 and the Contempt of Courts Act, 1971, in Pallav Sheth v. Custodian.[15]

(b) CONTEMPT OF SUBORDINATE COURTS

In Delhi Judicial Service Association v. State of Gujarat,[16] the Supreme Court has given a broad and expansive interpretation to Art. 129 and has thus made a significant contribution towards maintaining the integrity and independence of subordinate courts by taking them under its protective umbrella. The Court has ruled that under Art. 129, it has power to punish for contempt not only of itself but also of High Courts and of the lower courts. This is the inherent power of the Court as 'a court of record' as laid down in Art. 129. Explaining the reasons for taking such a liberal view of its contempt power, the Supreme Court has observed:[17]

> "The subordinate courts administer justice at the grass root level. Their protection is necessary to preserve the confidence of people in the efficacy of courts and to ensure unsullied flow of justice at its base level."

The Court claimed that under Art. 136, it has a very wide and effective power to correct judicial orders of the subordinate courts. Thus, the Supreme Court has a wide power of judicial superintendence overall courts in India. Accordingly, the Court stated:[18]

> "Since this Court has power of judicial superintendence and control over all the courts and tribunals functioning in the entire territory of the country, it has a corresponding duty to protect and safeguard the interest of inferior courts to ensure the flow of the stream of justice in the courts without any interference or attack from any quarter. The subordinate and inferior courts do not have adequate power under the law to protect themselves, therefore, it is necessary that this Court should protect them…. . We therefore hold that this Court being the Apex Court and a superior court of record has power to determine its jurisdiction under Art. 129 of the Constitution and ..... it has jurisdiction to initiate or entertain proceedings for contempt of subordinate courts."

What happened in this case was extremely deplorable. In the State of Gujarat, the police authorities in a district falsely implicated the Chief Judicial Magistrate in a criminal case, misbehaved with him and handcuffed him. The Supreme Court took a very serious view of the misbehaviour of the police authorities and

---

15. AIR 2001 SC 2763 : (2001) 7 SCC 549.
For this case, see, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. C(i). Ram Preeti Yadav v. Mahendra Pratap Yadav, (2007) 12 SCC 385, at page 389.

16. AIR 1991 SC 2176. See also Daroga Singh v. B.K. Pandey, (2004) 5 SCC 26 : AIR 2004 SC 2579.

17. Ibid., at 2200.

18. Ibid., at 2204, 2205.

initiated contempt of court proceedings against them, held them guilty of contempt of court, and awarded them suitable punishments. The Court observed in this connection:[19]

> "The Chief Judicial Magistrate is head of the Magistracy in the District who administers justice to ensure, protect and safeguard the rights of citizens. The subordinate courts at the district level cater to the need of the masses in administering justice at the base level. By and large the majority of the people get their disputes adjudicated in subordinate courts, it is in the general interest of the community that the authority of subordinate courts is protected....."

The Supreme Court acted in this matter under Art. 129. The concerned police officials disputed the authority of the Supreme Court to act in this matter and take cognisance of it, but the Supreme Court ruled that under Art. 129 the Court has been declared to be a court of record and, thus, it has authority to punish not only for its own contempt but also of subordinate courts. The Supreme Court has wide power of judicial supervision over all courts in the country. The jurisdiction and power of a superior court of record to punish contempt of subordinate courts is founded on the premise of its judicial power to correct the errors of the subordinate courts.[20]

(c) CONTEMPT OF HIGH COURTS

A question was raised in In re: Vinay Chandra Mishra[21] whether under Art. 129, the Supreme Court can take cognisance of the contempt of a High Court. It was argued that the Supreme Court cannot do so for two reasons: (1) Art. 129 vests the Supreme Court with the power to punish only for the contempt of itself and not of the High Courts; (2) the High Court is itself a court of record having power to punish for its own contempt under Art. 215.[22] The Supreme Court however rejected the contention and ruled that it was empowered to take cognisance of the contempt of a High Court under Art. 129.

The Court has argued that Art. 129 vests power in the Supreme Court not only as the highest court but also as a court charged with appellate and superintending powers over the lower courts and tribunals. To discharge its obligations, the Court "is inherently deemed to have been entrusted with the power to see that the stream of justice in the country remains pure, that its course is not hindered or obstructed in any manner, that justice is delivered without fear or favour and for that purpose all the courts and tribunals are protected while discharging their legitimate duties. To discharge this obligation, this Court has to take cognizance of the deviation from the path of justice in the tribunals of the land, and also of attempts to cause such deviations and obstruct the course of justice".[23] The Court invoked the authority of Delhi Judicial Service Association v. State of Gujarat.[24]

(d) CONTEMPT OF ADJUDICATORY BODIES

The Supreme Court has ruled that under Art. 129, it has jurisdiction to take cognisance of the contempt of the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal which performs

---

19. Ibid., at 2207.
20. Ibid., at 2201.
21. (1995) 2 SCC 584.
22. See, Ch. VIII, Sec. C(a) infra.
23. (1995) 2 SCC, at 603.
24. Supra, footnote 16. Also see, Re Ajay Kumar Pandey, (1996) 6 SCC 510.

judicial functions and is subordinate to the High Court. The Tribunal has Benches in different parts of the country and is thus a national tribunal and its functioning affects the entire country. Appeals from the Tribunal lie ultimately to the Supreme Court. The Court can take suo motu cognisance of the contempt of the Tribunal. In the instant case, the Secretary, Ministry of Law, wrote a letter to the President of the Tribunal adversely commenting on a Tribunal decision in a specific case characterising it as disclosing "judicial impropriety of highest order". The Secretary was held guilty of committing contempt of the Tribunal as he questioned the bona fides of the members of the Tribunal in deciding a specific case and asked them to explain the judicial order which they had passed. Thus, he unfairly tampered with the judicial process and interfered with judicial decision-making.[25]

The Court characterized the letter "as an attempt to affect their (tribunal members) decision making" and "a clear threat to their independent functioning". "The letter also tends to undermine confidence in the judicial functioning of the Tribunal".

The decision will go a long way towards ensuring independence of the tribunals. The executive's responsibility is only administrative supervision and control but not controlling or questioning specific tribunal decisions as such.

(e) SUPREME COURT'S POWER CANNOT BE CONTROLLED BY A STATUTE

Entry 77, List I, states: "Constitution, organisation, jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court (including contempt of such court), and the fees taken therein; persons entitled to practice before the Court".[26]

Explaining the power of Parliament to enact a law with regard to the contempt of the Supreme Court under entry 77, the Court has observed that such a law may prescribe the procedure to be followed and it may also prescribe the maximum punishment which could be awarded and it may provide for appeal and for other matters. But Parliament has no legislative competence "to abridge or extinguish the jurisdiction or power conferred on this Court under Art. 129 of the Constitution". Parliament's power to legislate in relation to law of contempt relating to Supreme Court is limited.[27] The Court has further observed in this connection:

> "… the power to punish for contempt being inherent in a court of record it follows that no Act of Parliament can take away that inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Record to punish for contempt and the Parliament's power of legislation on the subject cannot, therefore, be so exercised as to stultify the status and dignity of the Supreme Court and/or the High Court…"[28]

The Supreme Court has ruled that its contempt jurisdiction under Art. 129 is "independent of the statutory law of contempt enacted by Parliament under Entry 77 of List I of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution." The jurisdiction to take cognizance of the contempt as well as to award punishment for it is "constitutional" and, therefore, it cannot be controlled or restricted by any statute. The

---

25. Income-tax Appellate Tribunal v. V.K. Agarwal, AIR 1999 SC 452 : (1999) 1 SCC 16.
26. See, infra, Ch. X.
27. Delhi Judicial Service Assoication, Tis Hazari Courts v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC 2716 at 2199.
28. Supreme Court Bar Ass. v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 1895 at 1901 : 1998 (4) SCC 409.

constitutionally vested right under Art. 129 cannot be either abridged, abrogated or cut down, by any legislation, such as, the Contempt of Courts Act or the Code of Civil Procedure.[29]

The Court has also asserted reading Arts. 129 and 142[30] together that there is no restriction or limitation on the nature of punishment that the Supreme Court may award while exercising its contempt jurisdiction including suspension of the license to practice of a lawyer held guilty of committing contempt of court. In the instant case, a senior lawyer was found guilty of the offence of the criminal contempt of the court for having interfered with, and obstructed the course of justice "by trying to threaten, overawe and overbear the court by using insulting, disrespectful and threatening language". He was awarded a suspended sentence of simple imprisonment for six weeks as well as his practice licence was suspended for three years.[31]

Later, in the following case,[32] the Court has revised its view as expressed in Vinay Chandra and has ruled that under Art. 129, it has no power to suspend the practice licence of an advocate held guilty of contempt of the court. An advocate held guilty of contempt of court may also be guilty of professional misconduct. Action against the advocate may be taken by the Bar Council under the provisions of the Advocates Act, 1961.

(ii) ORIGINAL JURISDICTION

(a) ENFORCEMENT OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

The Supreme Court has been constituted as the guardian of the Fundamental Rights. Art. 32 empowers the Court to issue writs for enforcement of Fundamental Rights. Art. 32 has been discussed later in the book.[33]

The High Courts can also enforce Fundamental Rights by issuing writs under Art. 226.[34]

(iii) EXTRAORDINARY ORIGINAL JURISDICTION

(a) ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT

As noted earlier,[35] disputes concerning election of the President or Vice-President are decided exclusively by the Supreme Court and no other court.

(b) INTER-GOVERNMENTAL DISPUTES

Under Art. 131, the Supreme Court has exclusive original jurisdiction in any dispute between—

(i) the Centre and a State;

---

29. Pritam Pal v. High Court of M.P., AIR 1992 SC 904 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 529; In re Vinay Chandra Mishra, (1995) 2 SCC 584 : AIR 1995 SC 2348; Re Ajay Kumar Pandey, (1996) 6 SCC 510 : AIR 1996 SC 260.
30. For discussion on Art. 142, see, infra, Sec. G.
31. Also see, Lalit Mohan Das v. Advocate General, Orissa, AIR 1957 SC 250 : 1957 SCR 167.
32. Supreme Court Bar Association v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 1895 : 1998 (4) SCC 409.
33. For discussion on Art. 32, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A.
34. For discussion on Art. 226, see, infra, Ch. VIII, Sections C and D.
35. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i)(b).

(ii) the Centre and a State on one side, and a State on the other side;

(iii) two or more States.

A dispute to be justiciable by the Supreme Court under Art. 131 should involve a question, whether of law or fact, on which the existence or extent of a legal right depends. Thus, questions of a political nature not involving any legal aspect are excluded from the Court's purview.

The Supreme Court's jurisdiction under Art. 131 is subject to two limitations, viz., (i) as to the parties; (ii) as to the subject-matter.

In exercise of powers under Art.145 of the Constitution, the Supreme Court framed the Supreme Court Rules, 1966, Part III Orders 22 to 34 which prescribes the procedure to be followed in connection with the filing, hearing and disposal of proceedings under Article 131. Execution of decrees and orders has been provided for by the Supreme Court (Decrees and Orders) Enforcement Order, 1954 issued by the President under Article 142(1) of the Constitution.

PARTIES

The Indian Constitution sets up a federal polity[36] where intergovernmental disputes often arise. It therefore becomes necessary to set up a forum for resolving such disputes. Art. 131 does so by authorising the Supreme Court to settle intergovernmental disputes. As BHAGWATI J., has observed in State of Karnataka v. Union of India:[37] "The article is a necessary concomitant of a federal or a quasi-federal form of government and it is attracted only when the parties to the dispute are the Government of India or one or more States arranged on either side".

The State of Mysore contested a demand, under the Central Excise Act, for payment of excise duty on agricultural implements manufactured in the factory belonging to the State. The State took the matter to the highest appellate tribunal under the law, viz., the Government of India, which rejected the same. The State then filed a writ petition in the High Court against the Central Government's decision. The High Court rejected the argument that being a dispute between a State and the Centre, the matter lay within the exclusive original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. It took the view that the Central Government had disposed of the matter as a tribunal and so it was not a party to the dispute, and that for Art. 131 to apply, a dispute must directly arise between the State and the Central Government as the repository of the executive power of the Union.[38]

This judgment of the High Court was affirmed by the Supreme Court on the ground that Government of India acted only as a tribunal and that there was no dispute between the Centre and the States.[39] But there is another aspect of the case which the Court did not refer to. The claim for excise was made by the Central Excise Department and, thus, it could be said that there was a dispute between the Centre and the State.

---

36. On Federalism, see, infra, Chs. X-XV.
37. AIR 1978 SC at 143.
Also see, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. C.
38. State of Mysore v. Union of India, AIR 1968 Mysore 237.
39. Union of India v. State of Mysore, AIR 1977 SC 127.

Under Art. 131, the Supreme Court cannot take cognisance of a suit brought by a private individual against a Government. The State of Bihar filed a suit in the Supreme Court under Art. 131 against the Union of India as the owner of Railways, and the Hindustan Steel Ltd., a government company, claiming damages for short supply of iron and steel ordered by the State in connection with the Gandak Project. The Court held that the suit did not lie under Art. 131, because its phraseology excludes the idea of a private citizen, a firm or a corporation, figuring as a disputant either alone or along with a government. "The most important feature of Art. 131 is that it makes no mention of any party other than the Government of India or any one or more of the States who can be arrayed as a disputant."[40] No private party, be it a citizen, or a firm or corporation, can be impleaded as a party in a suit under Art. 131, along with a state either jointly or in the alternative.[41]

It was argued that Hindustan Steel could be regarded as a "State" under Art. 12.[42] But the Court said that the enlarged definition of the "state" given under Art. 12 could not be applied under Art. 131, and Hindustan Steel could not be regarded as a "State" for that purpose.

This means that only inter-governmental disputes can be brought into the Supreme Court under Art. 131, and a State cannot sue under Art. 131 a government company belonging to the Central Government even though it may be deemed to be a 'state' under Art. 12. As to the nature of the dispute which can be brought under Art. 131, the Court stated that the "dispute must arise in the context of the Constitution and the Federalism it sets up," and that "the disputes should be in respect of legal right and not disputes of a political character."

The Court was justified in rejecting the argument based on Art. 12. To accept it would have meant that any dispute between a government and an administrative agency, of which there are numerous, could be brought before the Supreme Court, which would have placed an impossible burden on it. It was well, therefore, that the Court restricted Art. 131 to such disputes as arise between the constituent units of the Indian Union and the Central Government.

Writ petitions filed by individuals and agents of the State of Sikkim and Meghalaya challenging the prohibition of 'on line and internet lottery' had been dismissed by the Karnataka High Court on the basis of Article 131. The Supreme Court reversed the decision of the High Court saying:

> "It is no doubt true that had the State of Sikkim or the State of Meghalaya intended to sue the State of Karnataka independently; in terms of Article 131 of the Constitution the only forum where the dispute between them could have been resolved is this Court alone but when such a lis is brought by the State jointly with their agents who had also independent cause of action and had a legal right to maintain writ application questioning the legality and/or validity of the said notification issued by the State, a suit in terms of Article 131 of the Constitution would not have been maintainable."[43]

---

40. State of Bihar v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1446, at 1448.
41. Ibid, at 1452.
42. For discussion on Art. 12, see, infra, Ch. XX, Sec. D.
43. Tashi Delek Gaming Solutions Ltd. v. State of Karnataka, (2006) 1 SCC 442, at page 457 : AIR 2006 SC 661.

Art. 131 provides a mechanism for settling inter-governmental disputes quickly and at the highest judicial level. There is a recurring possibility of such disputes arising in a Federal country like India which has a Central Government and a number of State Governments. Thus, the dispute ought to be one between two governments, and not between one government and a private party or an agency or authority of the other government.

DISPUTES

Under Art. 131, the Supreme Court can take cognisance of a dispute involving "any question (whether of law or fact) on which the existence or extent of a legal right depends." Thus, the dispute must involve assertion or vindication of a legal right of the Government of India or a State. "It is not necessary that the right must be a constitutional right. All that is necessary is that it must be a legal right."[44]

Further, the dispute should be in respect of legal rights and not disputes of a political character.[45] "The purpose of Art. 131 is to afford a forum for the resolution of disputes which depend for their decision on the existence or extent of a legal right. It is only when a legal, not a mere political, issue arises touching upon the existence or extent of a legal right that Art. 131 is attracted."[46]

The requirement of Art. 131 is that the dispute must involve a question whether of law or fact, on which the existence or extent of a legal right depends. It is this qualification which provides the true guide for determining whether a particular dispute falls within the purview of Art. 131. As BHAGWATI, J., has observed in State of Karnataka v. Union of India:[47]

> "The only requirement necessary for attracting the applicability of Article 131 is that the dispute must be one involving any question "on which the existence or extent of a legal right" depends, irrespective whether the legal right is claimed by one party or the other and it is not necessary that some legal right of the plaintiff should be infringed before a suit can be brought under that Article".

Further, BHAGWATI, J., has observed in State of Karnataka v. Union of India defining the scope of Art. 131.[48]

> "What has, therefore, to be seen in order to determine the applicability of Art. 131 is whether there is any relational legal matter involving a right, liberty, power or immunity qua the parties to the dispute. If there is, the suit would be maintainable but not otherwise."

The Supreme Court has power to give whatever reliefs are necessary for the enforcement of the legal right claimed in the suit if such legal right is established.[49] Art. 142 of the Constitution can also be invoked for the purpose.[50]

---

44. BHAGWATI, J., in State of Rajasthan v. Union of India, AIR 1977 SC at 1402 : (1977) 3 SCC 592.

45. State of Bihar v. Union of India, AIR 1970 SC 1446, 1448. For discussion on the dichotomy between a legal dispute and a political dispute for purposes of justiciability and judicial review, see, infra, Ch. XL, under "Constitutional Interpretation".

46. State of Rajasthan v. Union of India, AIR 1977 SC 1361, 1395 : (1977) 3 SCC 592.

47. AIR 1978 SC 68 : (1977) 4 SCC 608.
See, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. C, for further discussion on this case.

48. AIR 1978 SC at 131 : (1977) 4 SCC 608.

49. State of Rajasthan v. Union of India, op. cit.

50. For Art. 142, see, infra, Sec. G.

Not many cases have been filed under Art. 131. The significant cases filed so far have raised problems of constitutional law pertaining to federalism.

State of West Bengal v. Union of India

In State of West Bengal v. Union of India,[51] the State of West Bengal filed a suit against the Centre seeking a declaration that a Central law was unconstitutional, but the Court upheld the validity of the impugned law.[52]

State of Rajasthan v. Union of India

In State of Rajasthan v. Union of India,[53] arose the question whether the term 'state' in Art. 131(a) includes within its scope "State Government". There were general elections in the country for Lok Sabha in 1977 in which the Congress Party was badly defeated. At this time, there were Congress Ministries in several States. The Home Minister, Government of India, through a communication advised the Chief Ministers of these States to advise their Governors to dissolve the State Assemblies under Art. 174(2)(b) of the Constitution,[54] and seek a fresh mandate from the people.

These State Governments filed suits in the Supreme Court against the Central Government under Art. 131 seeking injunctions against dissolution of the State Legislative Assemblies under Art. 356 and holding fresh elections in the States because the ruling party had been defeated in the elections for the Lok Sabha in these States.

The Central Government raised several preliminary objections to the maintainability of the suit, viz.:

(1) Art. 131 covers disputes only between the Government of India and a 'State'. There is a distinction between a State and a "State Government";

(2) Art. 131 covers special kinds of disputes in which States, as such, may be interested and not merely Government of a State which may come and go;

(3) There was no denial of any constitutional right to any State.

(4) There was no legal point involved in the case which was based purely on political factors.

(5) The dispute related to the question whether the State Assemblies should be dissolved which did not involve any question on which the existence or extent of a legal right depended.

The Supreme Court rejecting all these contentions held that the matter fell within Art. 131. The Court refused to give a restrictive meaning to Art. 131. It ruled that Art. 131 includes a dispute between Central and State Governments involving a legal right. In the words of CHANDRACHUD J.: "The true construction of Art. 131(a), true in substance and true pragmatically, is that a dispute must arise between the Union of India and a State".[55]

---

51. AIR 1963 SC 1241.
52. For fuller discussion on this case, see, infra, under Federalism, Ch. XI, Sec. J(ii).
53. AIR 1977 SC 1361 : (1977) 3 SCC 592.
54. See, infra, Ch. VI, Sec. E, for discussion on this Article.
55. AIR 1977 SC at 1395 : (1977) 3 SCC 592.

The dispute between the Union of India and a State cannot but be a dispute which arises out of the differences between the Government in office at the Centre and the Government in office in a State. It is not necessary for attracting Art. 131 that the plaintiff must assert a legal right in itself. Art. 131 contains no such restriction. It is sufficient for attracting Art. 131 that the plaintiff questions the legal or constitutional right asserted by the defendant, be it the Government of India or any other State. Such a challenge brings the suit within the terms of Art. 131 for, the question for the decision of the Court is not whether this or that particular legislative assesmbly is entitled to continue in office but whether the Government of India, which asserts the constitutional right to dissolve the assembly on the grounds alleged, possesses any such right.

A State has the locus and interest to contest and seek an adjudication of the claim set up by the Union Government. In a federation, the States are vitally interested in defining the powers of the Central Government, on the one hand, and their own, on the other.

In the instant case, asserted the Court, the States through their suits under Art. 131 had, directly and specifically, questioned the constitutional right of the Central Government to issue a directive to the State Governments to render a certain advice to the Governors. The States also questioned the constitutional right of the Central Government to dissolve State Legislatures under Art. 356.[56]

Accordingly, the Supreme Court ruled that "a legal, not a political issue" squarely arose "out of the existence and extent of a legal right" and, therefore, the suits filed by the State governments against the Central Government could not be thrown out as falling outside the purview of Art. 131.

In so far as the dispute related to the exercise of the Centre's power under Art. 356 vis-a-vis the State Legislature, it raised a question of legal right. The Court also clarified that under Art. 131, it would have power to give whatever reliefs are necessary for enforcement of the legal right claimed in the suit if such legal right is established.[57]

State of Karnataka v. Union of India

A question of interpretation and applicability of Art. 131 also arose in State of Karnataka v. Union of India.[58] The Government of India appointed a commission of inquiry under the Commissions of Inquiry Act, to inquire into certain allegations of corruption and misuse of power by the Chief Minister and a few other Ministers. The State of Karnataka brought a suit against the Centre under Art. 131 for issue of a declaration that the notification appointing the commission was illegal and ultra vires.

The main contention of the State was that the Commissions of Inquiry Act does not authorise the Central Government to constitute a commission of inquiry in regard to matters falling exclusively within the State's legislative and executive power. The crucial question thus raised was whether the Central Government

---

56. See, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. D, for discussion on this Article.

57. This was the majority view of four Judges; BEG, C.J. and CHANDRACHUD, BHAGWATI and GUPTA, JJ.
GOSWAMI, UNTWALIA and FAZL ALI, JJ., took a restrictive view of Art. 131. Their view accorded more or less with that of the Central Government.

58. AIR 1978 SC 68.

could appoint a commission to inquire into the conduct of the Chief Minister and other Ministers of a State in the discharge of their governmental functions. Needless, to say, the question had an intimate bearing on Centre-State relationship and, thus, on Indian Federalism.[59]

The Union of India raised a preliminary objection against the maintainability of the suit, viz., the dispute was not one between the Centre and the State; the inquiry was against the misdeeds of the State Ministers which does not affect the State as such as the Ministers and the State were distinct entities.

By a majority of 4 : 3, the Supreme Court ruled that the suit under Art. 131 by the State was competent and maintainable. The majority Judges were not prepared to take too restrictive a view of Art. 131. They were not prepared to distinguish between the 'State' and its 'Government'. The majority view was that there exists an intergal relationship between the State and its Government and what affects the Government or the Ministers in their capacity as Ministers raises a matter in which the State would be concerned. In the words of CHANDRACHUD, J.:

> "The object of Art. 131 is to provide a high-powered machinery for ensuring that the Central Government and the State Governments act within the respective spheres of their authority and do not trespass upon each other's constitutional functions or powers."

BHAGWATI, J., explained that the State Government is the agent through which the State exercises its executive powers. Therefore, any action which affects the State Government or the Ministers as Ministers, would raise a matter in which the State would be concerned. BHAGWATI, J., thus ruled:

> "...when any right or capacity or lack of it is attributed to any institution or person acting on behalf of the State, it raises a matter in which the State is involved or concerned."

It was also clarified that under Art. 131, it is not necessary that the plaintiff should have some legal right of its own to enforce, before it can file a suit. What is necessary is that the dispute must be one involving any question "on which the existence or extent of a legal right" depends. The plaintiff can bring the suit so long as it has interest in raising the dispute because it is affected by it, even if no legal right of it is infringed provided, of course, the dispute is relateable to the existence or extent of a legal right.

Therefore, a challenge by the State Government to the authority of the Central Government to appoint a commission of inquiry to inquire into the allegations against the State Ministers as regards the discharge of their functions in the State clearly involved a question on which the existence of extent of the legal right of the Central Government to appoint such a commission depended and that was enough to sustain the proceedings brought by the State under Art. 131.[60]

State of Bihar v. Union of India

The State of Bihar filed a suit against the Union of India claiming compensation from the railways for non-delivery of certain goods consigned by the State.

---

59. For discussion on Commission of Inquiry, see, M.P. JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, III, 2465-2644; JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I.

60. For further discussion on this case, see, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. C., under "Emergency Provisions".

The Court ruled that this was a matter which did not fall under Art. 131 as it was not a dispute arising "in the context of the Constitution and the federalism it sets up. The matter arose out of the legal rights of a private consignor/consignee of goods and thus fell outside Art. 131 and was cognisable by a subordinate court."[61]

Union of India v. State of Rajasthan

A similar question arose again when the State of Rajasthan filed a suit in the ordinary civil court claiming damages for loss suffered by the State on account of damage caused to the goods transported through the railways. The Union of India was impleaded as a party. It was just a commercial contract under which an officer of the State of Rajasthan was entitled to claim delivery of goods consigned as any ordinary consignee. The Court ruled that the claim was one against the Railway Administration and was cognisable by ordinary courts. The Union of India was impleaded as a party only because it was the owner of the railways. It was not a matter to be decided exclusively by the Supreme Court under Art. 131.

The Court pointed out that Art. 131 is attracted only when a dispute arises between or amongst the States and the Union in the context of the constitutional relationship that exists between them and the powers, rights, duties, immunities, liabilities, disabilities, etc. flowing therefrom. "It could never have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution that any ordinary dispute of this nature would have to be decided exclusively by the Supreme Court."[62]

State of Karnataka v. State of Andhra Pradesh

A suit filed by the State of Karnataka against the State of Andhra Pradesh under Art. 131 raising a dispute relating to non-implementation of the binding decision rendered by the Krishna Water Disputes Tribunal constituted under s. 4 of the Inter-State Water Dispute Act, 1956, has been held to be maintainable.[63]

State of Haryana v. State of Punjab

The State of Haryana filed a case under Art. 131 against the State of Punjab and the Union of India seeking a mandatory injunction requiring completion of the Sutlej-Yamuna link canal pursuant to agreement between the two states for division of river waters.

It was argued that the suit was not maintainable in view of Art. 262.[64] But the court rejected the contention saying that there was no water dispute under Art. 262 as the states had already agreed to share river water.

The court issued a mandatory injunction directing the State of Punjab to complete the canal and make it functional within a year. The court also directed the Central Government to discharge its own constitutional obligation to ensure that the canal is completed as expeditiously as possible.[65]

---

61. State of Bihar v. Union of India, supra, footnote 40.
62. Union of India v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1984 SC 1675.
63. State of Karnataka v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 2001 SC 1560.
Also see, Ch. XIV, Sec. E., infra.
64. See, infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. E.
65. State of Haryana v. State of Punjab, (2002) 2 SCC 507 : AIR 2002 SC 685; See also State of Haryana v. State of Punjab, (2004) 12 SCC 673 : (2004) 5 JT 72.

(c) OTHER FEATURES OF ART. 131

In the context of Art. 131, the phrase "cause of action" used in Order 23 Rule 6(a) of the Supreme Court Rules 1966, means that the dispute between parties referred to in clauses (a) to (c) of Art. 131 must involve a question on which the existence or extent of a legal right depends,[66] and a plaint which does not disclose such a "cause of action" or is ex facie barred by law, is liable to be rejected under Order 23 Rule 6(b) of those Rules.[67]

The Supreme Court observed in State of Bihar v. Union of India[68] that the distinguishing feature of Art. 131 is that the Court is not required to adjudicate upon the disputes in exactly the same way as ordinary courts of law are normally called upon to do for upholding the rights of the parties and enforcement of its orders and decisions. The Court is only concerned to give its decision on questions of law or of fact on which the existence or extent of a legal right claimed depends. Once the Court comes to its conclusion on the cases presented by any disputants and gives its adjudication on the facts or the points of law raised, the function of the Court under Art. 131 is over.

Article 131 does not prescribe that a suit must be filed in the Supreme Court for complete adjudication of the dispute envisaged therein, or the passing of a decree capable of execution in the ordinary way as decrees of other courts are. It is open to an aggrieved party to present a petition to the Supreme Court containing a full statement of the relevant facts and praying for the declaration of its rights as against other disputants. Once that is done, the function of the Supreme Court under Art. 131 is at an end.

This statement seemed to suggest that the only remedy which the Supreme Court could grant under Art. 131 was a declaration. This view was held to be erroneous in State of Rajasthan v. Union of India. It has now been held that the Supreme Court has power to grant whatever relief may be necessary for enforcement of the legal right claimed in the suit if such legal right is established.[69] The Court has ruled in State of Karnataka v. State of Andhra Pradesh that under Art. 131, the Court can pass any order or direction as may be found necessary to meet the ends of justice.[70]

In State of Haryana v. State of Punjab,[71] the Supreme Court issued a mandatory injunction directing the State of Punjab to complete the construction of a canal and make it functional within one year. If it did not do so, the Union of India was to get it done through its own agency.

(d) EXCLUSION OF ART. 131 JURISDICTION

Art. 131 opens with the words "subject to the provisions of this Constitution". Thus, the jurisdiction under Art. 131 may be excluded by other provisions of the Constitution.

The Constitution excludes the exclusive original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under Art. 131 in the following matters:

---

66. State of Haryana v. State of Punjab, (2004) 12 SCC 673, at p.690 : (2004) 5 JT 72.
67. Ibid at p. 703, 706.
68. Supra, footnote 61.
69. AIR 1977 SC at 1403.
70. See, supra, footnote 50.
71. (2002) 2 SCC 507 : AIR 2002 SC 685.

(1) According to the proviso to Art. 131, as mentioned above, the Court's jurisdiction does not extend to a "dispute arising out of any treaty, agreement, covenant, engagement, sanad or other similar instrument which having been entered into or executed before the commencement of the Constitution, continues in operation after such commencement or which provides that the said jurisdiction shall not extend to such a dispute."[72]

Reference may also be made in this connection to Art. 363 which excludes the above-mentioned disputes from the jurisdiction-original or appellate—of the Supreme Court and all other courts.[73]

The President may, however, refer any dispute excluded from the Court's jurisdiction under Art. 131 to the Supreme Court for its advisory opinion under Art. 143.[74]

(2) Under Art. 262(2), Parliament may by law exclude Supreme Court's jurisdiction in adjudication of any dispute or complaint with respect to use, distribution or control of the waters in any inter-State river or river valley.

Parliament has enacted the Inter-State Water Disputes Act, 1956.[75] Sec. 11 of the Act provides that neither the Supreme Court nor any other court shall have jurisdiction in respect of any water dispute which could be referred to a Tribunal under the Act.

A Tribunal was appointed under the Act to decide upon the apportionment of Krishna River Water. The Tribunal evolved two schemes. The State of Andhra Pradesh filed a suit under Art. 131 against the States of Karnataka and Maharashtra and the Union of India for proper implementation of the schemes evolved by the Tribunal. It was objected that as the suit related to 'water disputes' it was barred under Art. 262(2) read with the Water Disputes Act. The Supreme Court overruled the objection saying that the suit did not relate to the settlement of a 'water dispute' but enforcement of the decision of the Tribunal. The suit was held maintainable under Art. 131.[76]

(iv) APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The Supreme Court is primarily a court of appeal and enjoys extensive appellate jurisdiction. This jurisdiction may be discussed under the following heads:

(a) CONSTITUTIONAL MATTERS

Under Art. 132(1), an appeal lies to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order, whether in a civil, criminal or other proceeding, of a High Court if it certifies that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution.

---

72. State of Seraikella v. Union of India, AIR 1951 SC 253 : 1951 SCR 474; Umeg Singh v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 SC 540 : (1955) 2 SCR 164; Jagannath v. Harihar, AIR 1958 SC 239 : 1958 SCR 1067.

73. For discussion on Art. 363, see, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. E, infra.

74. For discussion on Art. 143, see, infra, Sec. F.

75. See, Ch. XIV, Sec. E, infra, under the heading "River Water Disputes".

76. State of Andhra Pradesh v. State of Karnataka, (2000) 6 JT 1 70 : AIR 2001 SC 1560 : (2000) 9 SCC 572*;* See also Haryana v. State of Punjab, (2002) 2 SCC 507 : AIR 2002 SC 685; *State of Haryana v. State of Punjab, (2004) 12 SCC 673 : (2004) 5 JT 72;* See also *Atma Linga Reddy v. Union of India, (*2008) 7 SCC 788, at page 790 : AIR 2009 SC 436.

According to Art. 132(3), where such a certificate is given, any party in the case may appeal to the Supreme Court on the ground that any such question has been wrongly decided.

A very broad power is thus conferred on the Supreme Court to hear appeals in constitutional matters. No difficulty will be felt in bringing a constitutional controversy before the Court which has been made the final authority in the matter of interpretation of the Constitution.[77]

When the appeal is not competent under Art. 132, the Supreme Court will not hear it even if the High Court has granted the necessary certificate.[78]

The implication of Art. 132(3) is that the appellant who comes before the Supreme Court under this Article is not entitled to challenge the propriety of the decision appealed against on a ground other than that on which the High Court granted the certificate. If, however, on appeal, a question is sought to be raised before the Supreme Court, other than the one on which the High Court has granted the certificate, it is necessary to seek the permission of the Supreme Court.[79]

This means that the appellant should ordinarily confine himself to the constitutional law point involved.[80] Such a restriction is necessary so that the facility with which appeals in constitutional matters can reach the Supreme Court may not be misused by the appellant raising all sorts of extraneous pleas once his appeal has come before the Court on the ground that it involves a substantial question of constitutional law.[81]

This Article symbolises the Supreme Court as the final court of constitutional interpretation.[82] Questions of constitutional interpretation are thus placed in a special category irrespective of the nature of the proceedings in which they arise. Such questions can always be taken in appeal to the Supreme Court so that this Court may have the last say. As divergent interpretations of a constitutional provision by various High Courts would create difficulties for the people, it is desirable that such questions are decided authoritatively as soon as possible. Hence Art. 132 provides a machinery for this purpose. The Supreme Court has commented on Art. 132 as follows:[83]

> "The principle underlying the Article is that the final authority of interpreting the Constitution must rest with the Supreme Court. With that object the Article is freed from other limitations imposed under Arts. 133 and 134 and the right of the wildest amplitude is allowed irrespective of the nature of the proceedings in a case involving only a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution."

An appeal lies to the Supreme Court after a High Court grants a certificate. Such a certificate can be granted if the following conditions are fulfilled:

---

77. On 'Constitutional Interpretation', see, infra, Ch. XL.
78. Syedna Taher v. State of Bombay, AIR 1958 SC 253, 255 : 1958 SCR 1010.
79. Darshan Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1953 SC 83 : 1953 SCR 319; Thansingh Nathmal v. Supdt. of Taxes, AIR 1964 SC 1419, 1422 : (1964) 6 SCR 654; State of Mysore v. Chablani, AIR 1969 SC 325, 327.
80. State of Bombay v. Jagmohandas, AIR 1966 SC 1418 : (1966) 2 SCR 277.
81. Also see, Hamdard Dawakhana v. Union of India, AIR 1965 SC 1167 : (1965) 2 SCR 192; Ajodhya Bhagat v. State of Bihar, AIR 1974 SC 1886 : (1974) 2 SCC 501.
82. On Constitutional Interpretation, see, Ch. XL, infra.
83. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Ganga Singh, AIR 1960 SC 356, 359.

(1) An appeal lies only from "any judgment decree or final order" of a High Court. No appeal lies from an interim order of a High Court. According to the explanation appended to Art. 132, the expression 'final order' includes an order deciding an issue which, "if decided in favour of the appellant, would be sufficient for the final disposal of the case".[84]

A person had a mining lease from the Orissa Government. The State Government cancelled the lease. The lessee could not file a suit against the Government immediately to establish his rights because under s. 80, CPC, he was required to give a two months' notice to the Government before filing the suit. He, therefore, filed a writ petition in the High Court. Without going into the merits of the case, the High Court ordered the Government to desist from disturbing the lessee's possession for three months. For the purpose of appeal under Art. 132, the Supreme Court treated the High Court order as 'final' as it finally disposed of the writ petition and the fact that the order was to operate for a limited duration would not make it other than a final order for the purpose of Appeal under Art. 132 against such order.[85]

(2) Article 132(1) uses the expression "civil, criminal or other proceeding". The purpose of referring to "other proceeding" is to emphasize that adjudications made in proceedings which cannot be included in the description of 'civil' or 'criminal' would still fall under Art. 132(1) in case they raise a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution.

There are certain proceedings which may be regarded as neither civil nor criminal, e.g., proceeding for contempt of court; for exercise of disciplinary jurisdiction against lawyers or other professionals, such as, chartered accountants.

Proceedings relating to taxation laws are not excluded. The object of taxation laws is to collect revenue for the state and such laws directly affect the civil rights of the taxpayers. If a tax is levied by the State not in accordance with law, any proceeding to obtain relief would be regarded as a civil proceeding.

Article 132 excludes no decision if it involves a substantial question of constitutional interpretations provided that the decision may be characterized as a "judgment, decree, or final order".[86]

(3) The case ought to involve a question of law as to interpretation of the Constitution. It means that decision on the question of constitutional law should be necessary for the proper decision of the case.

The question of interpretation can arise only if two or more possible constructions are sought to be placed on a constitutional provision—one party suggesting one construction and the other a different one. But where

---

84. See, Prem Chand v. State of Bihar, AIR 1951 SC 14; Jethanand & Sons v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1961 SC 794 : (1961) 3 SCR 754; Syedna Taher v. State of Bombay, supra.

85. State of Orissa v. Madan Gopal, AIR 1952 SC 12 : 1952 SCR 28. See also Tamilnadu Mercantile Bank Shareholder Welfare Assn. (2) v. S.C. Sekar, (2009) 2 SCC 784 : (2008) 13 JT 49.

86. Narayan Row v. Ishwarlal, AIR 1965 SC 1818; Ramesh v. Govindlal Motilal Patni, AIR 1966 SC 1445, 1447.

the parties agree on the true interpretation of a constitutional provision, or do not raise any question in respect thereof, it is not possible to hold that a question of interpretation of the Constitution has arisen.[87]

(4) The question involved must be a "substantial question". A question is not 'substantial' when the law on the subject has been finally and authoritatively settled by the Supreme Court, and what remains to be done by the High Court is only to apply that interpretation to the facts before it.[88]

A 'substantial' question does not mean a question of general importance but a question regarding which there is a difference of opinion.

(b) OTHER FEATURES OF ART. 132

(1) Technically, the Supreme Court can hear an appeal under Art. 132(1) from the decision of a single High Court Judge on grant of the necessary certificate by him. But the Supreme Court has emphasized that this should be done "in very exceptional cases where a direct appeal is necessary and in view of the grave importance of the case an early decision of the case must in the larger interest of the public or similar reasons be reached".[89]

In ordinary circumstances, an appeal from a single judge should first be taken to a Division Bench of the High Court and then an appeal can be brought before the Supreme Court on grant of the necessary certificate by the Division Bench.

(2) If the High Court refuses to grant the necessary certificate, under Art. 132, the Supreme Court can still hear the appeal under Art. 136.[90]

(c) CIVIL MATTERS

Under Art. 133(1), an appeal lies to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order in a civil proceeding of a High Court if it certifies—

(a) that the case involves a substantial question of law of general importance; and

(b) that in the opinion of the High Court, the said question needs to be decided by the Supreme Court.

Before 1972, there was a right of appeal to the Supreme Court from a decision of a High Court if the subject-matter involved in the dispute was valued at Rs. 20,000 or more. This has now been changed. The change has been effected because valuation test is not a true yardstick for the right to appeal to the Supreme Court.

On the one hand, it is not necessary that important questions of law must be involved in every case valuing Rs. 20,000 or more. On the other hand, an impor-

---

87. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Ganga Singh, AIR 1960 SC 356, 359.

88. See, T.M. Krishnaswami Pillai v. Governor-General in Council, AIR 1947 FC 37; State of Mysore v. Chablani, AIR 1958 SC 325; Bhagwan Swarup v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1965 SC 682 : (1964) 2 SCR 378.

89. Union of India v. Jyoti Prakash Mitter, AIR 1971 SC 1093, 1100 : (1971) 1 SCC 396.
Also see, R.D. Agrawala v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 299 : (1970) 1 SCC 708.

90. See, infra, Sec. D., for discussion on Art. 136.

tant question of law can arise in any case whatsoever may be the value of the subject-matter involved. Now, an appeal may go to the Supreme Court in any case involving an important question of law even though the value of the subject-matter involved may not be large.

Article 133 discards the distinction between appellate and original jurisdictions of the High Court. Art. 133 deliberately uses words which are as wide as language can make them. It includes all judgments, decrees and orders passed in the exercised of appellate or ordinary original civil jurisdiction.

No appeal in a civil matter lies to the Supreme Court as a matter of right. An appeal can lie only on a certificate of the High Court which is issued when the above two conditions are satisfied.

Under Art. 133(2), any party appealing to the Supreme Court under Art. 133(1), may urge as a ground that a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution has been wrongly decided.

Under Art. 133(3) unless Parliament provides otherwise, no appeal lies to the Supreme Court from the judgment, decree or final order of a single High Court Judge.

For purposes of Art. 133(1), the proper test to determine whether a question of law is substantial or not is whether it is of general public importance, or whether it directly and substantially affects the rights of the parties, and if so, whether it is either an open question in the sense that it is not finally settled by the highest court, or is not free from difficulty, or calls for discussion of alternative views.

A question of law which is fairly arguable, or when there is room for difference of opinion on it, or when the court thinks it necessary to deal with that question at some length and discuss alternative views, would be regarded as a substantial question of law. But, it would not be so if the question is practically covered by the decision of the highest court, or the general principles to be applied in determining the question are well-settled, and the only question is that of applying these principles to the particular facts of the case.[91]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that for grant of the certificate, the question, howsoever important and substantial, should also be of such pervasive import and deep significance that in the High Court's judgment it imperatively needs to be settled at the national level by the highest court, otherwise the Apex Court will be flooded with cases of lesser magnitude.[92]

The High Court must specify in the certificate the substantial question of law requiring determination by the Supreme Court and the reasons in support of issuance of the certificate.

A certificate on a question of law by the High Court is not bad because it does not specify the substantial question of law to be decided by the Supreme Court. The Court can hear the appeal if it is satisfied that the appeal involves substantial questions of law of great importance.[93]

---

91. Nathoo Lal v. Durga Prasad, AIR 1954 SC 355 : (1955) 1 SCR 51; Chunnilal Mehta v. Century Spinning & M. Co. Ltd., AIR 1962 SC 1314 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 549; Khas Busra Coal Concern v. Ram Nagina Singh, AIR 1968 Cal. 391; M. Gopaiah v. SMSLC Coop. Soc., AIR 1981 AP 182; Durga Associates, Raipur v. State of U.P., AIR 1982 All. 490.

92. State Bank of India v. N. Sundara Money, AIR 1976 SC 1111 : (1976) 1 SCC 822.

93. State of Kerala v. Attesee (Agro Industrial Trading Corp.), AIR 1989 SC 222 : 1989 Supp (1) SCC 733.

The certificate granted by the High Court does not obligate the Supreme Court to hear the case, and it is entitled to determine whether the certificate was rightly granted, and whether the conditions pre-requisite to the grant were satisfied.

The grant of the certificate is within the discretion of the High Court but the discretion is a judicial one and it must be judicially exercised. Therefore, the certificate must show on its face that the High Court's discretion was invoked and exercised. If on the face of a High Court's order, it is apparent that the Court has misdirected itself and considered that its discretion was fettered when it was not, or that it had no discretion, then the Supreme Court will either remit the case to the High Court, or treat it as falling under Art. 136.[1]

When there is no justification for issuing the certificate by the High Court, the Supreme Court can always revoke it. In Express Newspapers Ltd. v. State of Madras,[2] the SupremeCourt revoked the certificate granted by the High Court as, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, on facts, no substantial question of law was involved.[3]

When the High Court has given such a certificate then the appeal before the Supreme Court is not limited only to the specific question of law, but the entire appeal will be before the Court.[4] In an appeal to the Supreme Court under Art. 133, a question of constitutional law may also be raised [Art. 133(2)].

No appeal lies to the Supreme Court, under Art. 133, from the decision of a single Judge of the High Court, but Parliament has power to provide otherwise [Art. 133(3)].

In exercising its jurisdiction under Article 133, the Supreme Court does not ordinarily interfere with findings of fact and it is all the more reluctant to do so when there are concurrent findings of the two courts below.[5] This, however, is not an absolute rule. The Court may interfere if findings of fact are unsupported by evidence on record, or are based on a misreading of evidence, or on non-advertence to material evidence bearing on the question and to the probabilities of the case, or where the appreciation of evidence by the court below has resulted in miscarriage of justice.[6]

---

1. Nar Singh v. State of U.P., AIR 1954 SC 457 : 1955 (1) SCR 238; Ahmedabad Mfg. and Calico Printing Co. v. Ramtahel, AIR 1972 SC 1598 : 1972 (1) SCC 898; Biswabani Pvt. Ltd. v. Santosh Kumar, AIR 1980 SC 226 : (1980) 1 SCC 185.

2. AIR 1981 SC 968 : (1981) 2 SCC 479. Also see, M. Satyanarayana v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1986 SC 1162 : (1986) 2 SCC 512.

3. M. Satyanarayana v. State of Karnataka, AIR 1986 SC 1162; Biswani Pvt. Ltd. v. S.K. Dutta, AIR 1980 SC 226 : (1980) 1 SCC 185; M.M.Gupta v. State of J&K, AIR 1982 SC 1579 : 1983 (3) SCC 412.

4. V.T.S. Chandrasekhar Mudaliar v. Khulandaivelu Mudaliar, AIR 1963 SC 185 : 1963 (2) SCR 440; Raghavamma v. Chenchamma, AIR 1964 SC 136 : (1964) 2 SCR 933; Balai Chandra v. Shewdhari Jadav, AIR 1978 SC 1062.

5. Rajinder Chand v. Mst. Sukhi, AIR 1957 SC 286 : 1956 SCR 889; T.P. Daver v. Lodge Victoria, AIR 1963 SC 1144 : 1964 (1) SCR 1; Union of India v W.P. Factories, AIR 1966 SC 395 : 1966 (1) SCR 580; Ram Sharan Yadav v. Thakur Muneshwar Nath Singh, AIR 1985 SC 24 : 1984 (4) SCC 649; Bhupinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1988 SC 1011 : 1988 (3) SCC 513; State of Andhra Pradesh v. Kalva Suryanarayana, AIR 1992 SC 797 : 1992 (2) SCC 732; State of Himachal Pradesh v. Maharani Kam Sundri, AIR 1993 SC 1162. Gafar v. Moradabad Development Authority, (2007) 7 SCC 614, at page 621 : (2007) 10 JT 196.

6. D.C. Works Ltd. v. Saurashtra, AIR 1957 SC 264; Nathan v. S. V. Marthu Rao, AIR 1965 SC 430; Catholics v. Paulo Aviro, AIR 1959 SC 31; Ramji Dayawala & Sons Ltd. v. Invest Import, AIR 1981 SC 2085 : (1981) 1 SCC 80; Ganga Bishan v. Jai Narain, AIR 1986 SC 441 : (1986) 1 SCC 75; Kamu v. M. Muthayya, AIR 1993 SC 1689 : 1993 Supp (2) SCC 135.

Except for exceptional circumstances, the Supreme Court would not allow a plea or a question to be raised for the first time before it, if the same has not been raised earlier in the courts below,[7] especially if it is a question of fact,[8] or a mixed question of law and fact,[9] but the Court may allow the contention to be raised if it goes to the root of the jurisdiction and authority of the concerned body.[10]

A new plea on a pure question of law not involving any investigation into facts may be raised for the first time in the Supreme Court.[11] Nor does the Supreme Court interfere with the discretion of the High Court unless the court has acted on some wrong principle, or committedsome error of law, or has failed to consider matters which demand consideration, or has ignored various relevant considerations.[12]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that judicial discretion is to be exercised according to the well established judicial principles, according to reason and fair play, and not according to whim and caprice. Judicial discretion means sound discretion governed by law. It must not be arbitrary, vague and fanciful.[13]

When the appellant/respondent applies for a larger relief, the Supreme Court has power to mould the relief and grant a smaller relief than what is prayed for.[14]

WHAT IS A CIVIL PROCEEDING?

Article 133 covers all civil proceedings. The term 'civil proceeding' includes all proceedings affecting civil rights which are not criminal.

Proceedings under Art. 226 are regarded as civil proceedings for purposes of Art. 133.

Does an appeal lie to the Supreme Court under Art. 133 from a decision of the High Court on a writ petition under Art. 226 pertaining to a revenue matter? It was argued, in the first place, that the writ proceeding before the High Court is not a 'civil proceeding' within the meaning of Art. 133. In the second place, even if a proceeding for the issue of a writ under Art. 226 may be characterised as a

---

7. K. Chettiar v. A.S.P.A Chettiar, AIR 1967 SC 1395 : (1967) 1 SCR 275; M.R.S.T Corp. v. S.T. Authority, AIR 1972 SC 2110 : (1973) 4 SCC 222; Bombay Municipality v. Advance Builders, AIR 1972 SC 793 : (1971) 3 SCC 381; Dalpat Abasaheb Solunke v. B.S. Mahajan, AIR 1990 SC 434 : (1990) 1 SCC 305; State Bank of Travancore v. E.J. Joseph, AIR 1993 SC 1265 : 1993 Supp (2) SCC 530; Kurukshetra University v. Jyoti Sharma, AIR 1998 SC 3385 : (1998) 6 SCC 763.

In Asstt. Collector of Central Excise, Guntur v. Ramdev Tobacco Company, AIR 1991 SC 506 : (1991) 2 SCC 119, the Supreme Court entertained a pure question of law even if it was not raised before the High Court.

8. M.O.H. Uduman v. M.O.H. Aslum, AIR 1991 SC 1020 : (1991) 1 SCC 412.

9. Shibji Khetshi Thacker v. Commissioner of Dhanbad Municipality, AIR 1978 SC 836 : (1978) 2 SCC 167; Uduman v. Aslum, AIR 1991 SC 1020 : (1991) 1 SCC 412; M.P. Electricity Board v. Vijaya Timber Co., AIR 1997 SC 2364 : (1997) 1 SCC 68.

10. Municipal Board, Saharanpur v. Imperial Tobacco of India Ltd., AIR 1999 SC 264 : (1991) 1 SCC 566.

11. Bombay Municipality v. Advance Builders, AIR 1972 SC 793 : (1971) 3 SCC 381; State of Punjab v. R.N. Bhatnagar, AIR 1999 SC 647 : (1999) 2 SCC 380.

12. Devendra Pratap v. State of U.P., AIR 1962 SC 1334 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 315; Union of India v. Kamalabai, AIR 1968 SC 377 : (1968) 1 SCR 463; Ramji Dayawala, infra, footnote 13.

13. Ramji Dayawala & Sons (P.) Ltd. v. Invest Import, AIR 1981 SC 2085 : (1981) 1 SCC 80.

14. Divisional Level Committee v. Harswarup Drug Udyog, AIR 1999 SC 878 : (1999) 2 SCC 272.

'civil proceeding', it cannot be so treated when the aggrieved petitioner seeks relief against the levy of tax or revenue claimed to be due to the state.

The Supreme Court rejected the argument. The Court has defined a 'civil proceeding' as one in which a person seeks to enforce by appropriate relief the alleged infringement of his civil rights against another person or the state, and which, if the claim is proved, would result in the declaration-express or implied of the right claimed, and the relief, such as, payment of debt, damages, compensation, delivery of specific property, enforcement of personal rights, determination of status etc.

A proceeding for relief against infringement of a civil right of a person is a "civil proceeding" even if the infringement be in purported enforcement of a taxing statute. Through a writ petition, the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court to issue writs granting relief in special cases to persons aggrieved by the exercise of authority-statutory or otherwise-by public officers or authorities is invoked. The writ is "special and exclusive".

Where a revenue authority seeks to levy tax or threatens action in purported exercise of powers conferred by an Act relating to revenue, the primary impact of such an act or threat is on the civil rights of the party aggrieved. When relief is claimed in that behalf, it is a civil proceeding, even if a relief is claimed not in a suit but by resort to the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court to issue writs.[15]

(d) CRIMINAL MATTERS

The provisions in the Constitution (Art. 134) regulating criminal appeals to the Supreme Court are so designed as to permit only important criminal cases to come before it.

Article 134 confers a limited criminal appellate jurisdiction on the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court hears appeals only in exceptional criminal cases where justice demands interference by the Apex Court. It was necessary to restrict the flow of criminal appeals to the Supreme Court otherwise a large number of such appeals would have made it physically impossible for the Court to cope with them.

In the first place, under Art. 134(1)(a), an appeal lies to the Supreme Court from any judgment, final order or sentence of a High Court in a criminal proceeding if the High Court has, on appeal, reversed an order of acquittal of an accused person and sentenced him to death.

The word 'acquittal' in this provision has been interpreted rather broadly. 'Acquittal' does not mean merely that the trial should have ended in a complete acquittal but would also include a case where an accused has been acquitted of the charge of murder and convicted of a lesser offence, and, on appeal, the High Court reverses the decision of the trial court and convicts the accused of murder; it would amount to reversing an order of acquittal and the accused is entitled to appeal to the Supreme Court.

---

15. Narayan Row v. Ishwarlal, AIR 1965 SC 1818, 1822 : (1966) 1 SCR 190.
Also see, Arbind Kumar v. Nand Kishore, AIR 1968 SC 1227 : (1968) 3 SCR 322.

In Tarachand,[16] the accused was charged for murder under s. 302, IPC. The trial court convicted him under s. 304, IPC, instead of s. 302. On appeal, the High Court reversed the order of the trial court and convicted him under s. 302, IPC, and sentenced him to death. The Supreme Court held that the accused was entitled to appeal under Art. 134(1)(a) as the word "acquittal" therein does not mean complete acquittal.

No appeal would lie under this provision if the High Court reverses an order of conviction of an accused and acquits him. Under Art. 134(1)(a) an appeal lies as of right to the Supreme Court.[17]

In the second place, under Art. 134 (1)(b), an appeal lies to the Supreme Court if the High Court has withdrawn for trial a case from a lower court and sentenced the accused to death.

Thirdly, under Art. 134(1)(c), the Supreme Court can hear an appeal in a criminal case if the High Court certifies that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court.

Under Art. 134 (1)(c), prima facie, a High Court appears to enjoy an unqualified power to grant fitness certificates in criminal cases. But to control the flow of criminal appeals to itself, the Supreme Court has laid down certain guiding norms for the High Court to follow in granting such certificates. Generally, it is not to be granted as a matter of course on the mere ground that the impugned decision is erroneous. It is to be granted only when some exceptional or special circumstances exist, such as, infringement of essential principles of justice, or some difficult questions of law of great public or private importance, or when there has been in substance no fair trial.[18]

A certificate should be granted when a case involves a substantial question of law and not mere questions of fact.[19]

The Supreme Court has frequently impressed on the High Courts that they should exercise their discretion to grant the certificate not mechanically but judicially and after applying their mind.[20] The Supreme Court said in Babu v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[21] that the power under Art. 134(1)(c) conferred on the High Court is discretionary which is to be exercised on judicial principles.

The jurisdiction conferred on the Supreme Court is not that of an ordinary court of criminal appeal. Before granting a certificate, the High Court must be satisfied that it involves some substantial question of law or principle. The certificate itself should give an indication of what substantial question of law or principle is involved in the appeal to bring it within the scope of Art. 134(1)(c). The High Courts should exercise their discretion sparingly and with care.

---

16. Tarachand v. State, AIR 1962 SC 130 : 1962 (2) SCR 775.
17. Chandra Mohan Tiwari v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1992 SC 891 : (1992) 2 SCC 105.
18. Mohinder Singh v. State, AIR 1953 SC 415; State of Bihar v. Bhagirath, AIR 1973 SC 2198 : (1973) 3 SCR 937; Chittaranjan v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1963 SC 1696 : (1964) 3 SCR 237; Sidheswar v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1958 SC 143 : 1958 SCR 749.
19. Haripada Dey v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1956 SC 757 : 1956 SCR 639; Mohanlal v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1968 SC 733 : (1968) 2 SCR 685.
20. Narsingh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 457.
21. AIR 1965 SC 1467.

The grant of a certificate by a High Court does not preclude the Supreme Court from determining whether it has been properly granted or not. Where the Apex Court has found that the certificate is not in compliance with the requirements of Art. 134(1)(c), it has declined to accept the certificate.

In Baladin v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[22] the Allahabad High Court, at the end of the judgment, just recorded the order "Leave to appeal to Supreme Court granted." Refusing to accept the appeal, the Supreme Court held that the High Court had exercised its discretion mechanically and not 'judicially'. The High Court's order did not show what had induced it to grant this leave, or what points of outstanding importance required to be settled. It was not enough to say "leave to appeal is granted".

In State of Assam v. Abdul Noor,[23] the Supreme Court declined to accept the certificate as it did not indicate any reason as to why the High Court granted the certificate.[24]

Under Art. 134(1)(c), the jurisdiction of the Apex Court is attracted by reason of the certificate granted by the High Court. Where the Supreme Court declines to accept the certificate under Art. 134(1)(c), it may permit the appellant to apply under Art. 136 in proper cases.[25]

Article 134(1)(c) is there to meet only extraordinary cases; normal right to appeal has been given by the other two clauses of Art. 134 (1). Under Art. 134(1)(c), the Supreme Court does not act as a general court of criminal appeal. It does not, therefore, go into pure questions of fact and weigh and appraise evidence afresh unless there are circumstances which make the Court feel that there has been a miscarriage of justice.[26] The main function of the Court is to see that the accused gets a fair trial on proper evidence.[27]

Generally, the Supreme Court does not interfere with the finding of fact arrived at after proper appreciation of evidence by the courts below. However, if such a finding is perverse, based on no evidence or based upon such evidence which is inadmissible or is the result of imaginative hypothesis, conjectures, illegal assumptions and presumptions, the Supreme Court is entitled to reappreciate the evidence to ascertain the decision of the lower court.[28]

Where the two courts below came to different conclusions, the Supreme Court appreciated the entire evidence to see whether the findings of the trial court were so unreasonable and unrealistic as to call for interference therewith. The Supreme

---

22. AIR 1956 SC 181 : 1956 Cri LJ 345.
Also see, Sunder Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1956 SC 411 : 1956 Cri LJ 801; State of Assam v. Abdul Noor, AIR 1970 SC 1365 : (1970) 3 SCC 10.

23. AIR 1970 SC 1365, 1366 : (1970) 3 SCC 10.

24. Thakara v. State of Maharashtra, (1969) 3 SCC 369.

25. Baladin v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1956 SC 181; State of Assam v. Abdul Noor, AIR 1970 SC 1365 : (1970) 3 SCC 10.
For Art. 136, see, infra, Sec. D.

26. A.J. Peiris v. State of Madras, AIR 1954 SC 616 : 1954 Cri LJ 1638; Vijendrajit v. State of Bombay, AIR 1953 SC 247; Mohinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1965 SC 79.

27. Darshan Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1953 SC 83 : 1953 SCR 319.

28. Ramanbhai Naranbhai Patel v. State of Gujarat, (2000) 1 SCC 358 : 2000 SCC (Cri) 113; State of Punjab v. Jugraj Singh, (2002) 3 SCC 234 : AIR 2002 SC 1083. See also State of MP v. Dharkole, (2004) 13 SCC 308 : AIR 2005 SC 44.

Court restored the conviction recorded by the trial court as the High Court decision, based as it was on insignificant and flimsy reasons, was not sustainable.[29]

The Supreme Court is very reluctant to interfere with concurrent findings of fact save in most exceptional cases, as for example, when facts have been arrived at disregarding legal principles, or where the conclusion arrived at by the courts below is improper and perverse, or where the evidence is such that no tribunal could legitimately infer from it that the accused is guilty, or when the accused has been convicted even though evidence is wanting on a most material part of the prosecution.[30]

Where in a serious charge of murder, conviction of the accused was based solely on the evidence of an eye-witness, the Court may examine his evidence to satisfy itself as to whether the courts below were justified in placing reliance upon the said testimony. In the instant case, after examining the evidence of the eye witness the Supreme Court reversed the conviction of the appellant and set him free.[31]

In a case where both the courts below instead of dealing with the intrinsic merits of the evidence of the witnesses, have acted perversely by summarily disposing of the case, ignoring the manifest errors and glaring infirmities appearing in the case, the Court thought it fit to interfere.[32]

Under Art. 134(2), Parliament is authorised to enlarge the criminal appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Accordingly, Parliament has enacted the Supreme Court (Enlargement of Criminal Appellate Jurisdiction) Act, 1970, further authorising the Supreme Court to hear appeals from a High Court in the following two situations:

(1) If the High Court has on appeal reversed an order of acquittal of an accused and sentenced him to imprisonment for life or for a period of not less than 10 years. In such a situation, appeal to the Supreme Court lies even on facts and as a matter of right.[33]

(2) The High Court has withdrawn for trial before itself any case from a subordinate court and has convicted the accused and sentenced him to imprisonment for life or for a period of not less than 10 years.

---

29. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Vinod Kumar, AIR 1992 SC 1011. Also, State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ravindra Prakash Mittal, AIR 1992 SC 2045; Sukhchain Singh v. State of Haryana, (2002) 5 SCC 100 : 2002 SCC (Cri) 341.

30. Damodaran v. T.C., AIR 1953 SC 462 : 1953 Cr LJ 1928; Mathew v. T.C., AIR 1956 SC 241 : (1955) 2 SCR 1057; Badri Rai v. State of Bihar, AIR 1958 SC 953 : 1959 SCR 1141; Janak Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1972 SC 1853 : (1973) 3 SCC 50; Dadarao v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1974 SC 388 : (1974) 3 SCC 630; Ajaib Singh v. State of Haryana, (1992) Supp (2) SCC 338 : (1992) SCC (Cri) 941, State of Uttar Pradesh v. Vinod Kumar, AIR 1992 SC 1011 : (1992) 2 SCC 536; Sudama Pandey v. State of Bihar, (2002) 1 SCC 679 : AIR 2002 SC 293.

31. Mohanlal v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2000 SC 3441 : (1999) 9 SCC 209.

32. Narendra Pratap Narain Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1991 SC 1394 : (1991) 2 SCC 623.

33. Podda Narayana v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1975 SC 1252 : (1975) 4 SCC 153; Ram Kumar Pande v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1975 SC 1026 : (1975) 3 SCC 815; Chandra Mohan Tiwari v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1992 SC 891 : (1992) 2 SCC 105.

(e) ISSUE OF CERTIFICATE BY A HIGH COURT

Appeals to the Supreme Court in constitutional (Art. 132), civil (Art. 133), and criminal matters (Art. 134) lie on a certificate being granted by the concerned High Court. To facilitate the grant of such a certificate, and to reduce any delay in completing this formality, certain provisions have been made by Art. 134A.

A High Court may grant a certificate, if it deems fit to do so, on its own motion. In the alternative, an oral application can be made on behalf of the aggrieved party immediately after the judgment, decree, final order or sentence. The High Court can thereafter decide, as soon as may be, whether a certificate may be given in that case to take an appeal from its decision to the Supreme Court.[34]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that Art. 134A does not constitute an independent provision for issue of a certificate. Art. 134A has been enacted to make good the deficiencies in Arts. 132, 133 and 134 regarding the time and manner in which an application for a certificate under any of these Articles can be made before the High Court and as to the power of the High Court to issue a certificate suo motu under any of these Articles.

Article 134A is ancillary to Arts. 132(1), 133(1) and 134(1)(c). The High Court can issue a certificate only when it is satisfied that the conditions in Arts. 132, 133 or 134, as the case may be, are satisfied. A single judge granted a certificate under Art. 134A without referring to the article under which the appeal could be filed. The Supreme Court revoked the certificate as the case could fall under Art. 133(1), but such a certificate could not be granted because of the bar imposed by Art. 133(3). The Supreme Court however permitted the appellant to apply under Art. 136.[35]

D. APPEAL BY SPECIAL LEAVE : ART. 136

Over and above the constitutional provisions mentioned above regulating the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, Art. 136(1) empowers the Supreme Court to grant, in its discretion, special leave to appeal from any judgment, decree, determination, sentence or order in any cause or matter passed or made by any court or tribunal in the territory of India.[36]

Article 136 runs as follows:

> "Notwithstanding anything in this Chapter, the Supreme Court may, in its discretion grant special leave to appeal from any judgment, decree, determination, sentence or order in any case or matter passed or made by any court or tribunal in the territory of India."

Article 136(2) excludes from the scope of Art. 136(1) any judgement or order passed by a tribunal functioning under a law relating to the Armed forces.[37]

---

34. Keshava v. Ramachandra, AIR 1981 Kant. 97 holds that a party which fails to make an oral application cannot make a written application later.

35. State Bank of India v. S.B.I. Employees' Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 2203 : (1987) 4 SCC 370.

36. This, however, is subject to Art. 363; see, supra, Sec. C(iii)(d).
Also see, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. E., infra, for discussion on Art. 363. See generally The Supreme Court Rules, 1956, Order XVI.

37. The Supreme Court has suggested that appeals be provided for from courts martial to the courts. "Absence of even one appeal with power to review evidence, legal formulation, conclusion and adequacy or otherwise of punishment is a glaring lacuna in a country where a counterpart civilian convict can prefer appeal after appeal to hierarchy of courts", the Supreme Court has observed: see, THE HINDU (Int'l Ed.), Sept. 4, 1982 at p. 7.

Article 136 confers a special jurisdiction on the Supreme Court. It opens with a non-obstante clause, viz. "Notwithstanding anything in this chapter". This means that the power of the Supreme Court under Art. 136 is unaffected by Arts. 132, 133, 134 and 134(A).

The power given to the Supreme Court by Art. 136(1) is in the nature of residuary power. The power is plenary in the sense that there are no words in Art. 136 qualifying that power. It is a sweeping power, exercisable outside the purview of ordinary law to meet the pressing demands of justice. The Supreme Court has characterised its power under Art. 136 as "an untrammelled reservoir of power incapable of being confined to definitional bounds; the discretion conferred on the Supreme Court being subjected to only one limitation, that is, the wisdom and good sense of justice of the Judges".[38]

The Supreme Court has described the nature of its power under Art. 136 as follows:[39]

> "The exercise of jurisdiction conferred by Art. 136 of the Constitution on this Court is discretionary. It does not confer a right to appeal on a party to litigation; it only confers a discretionary power of widest amplitude on this Court to be exercised for satisfying the demands of justice. On the one hand, it is an exceptional power to be exercised sparingly, with caution and care and to remedy extraordinary situations or situations occasioning gross failure of justice; on the other hand, it is an overriding power whereunder the court may generously step in to impart justice and remedy injustice."

The Supreme Court has commented from time to time on the plenitude of its power under Art. 136. For example, in Durga Shankar v. Raghu Raj,[40] the Court has observed:

> "The powers given by Art. 136 of the Constitution however are in the nature of special or residuary powers which are exercisable outside the purview of ordinary law, in cases where the needs of justice demand interference by the Supreme Court of the land. The article itself is worded in the widest terms possible. It vests in the Supreme Court a plenary jurisdiction in the matter of entertaining and hearing appeals, by granting of special leave, against any kind of judgment or order made by a court or tribunal in any cause or matter and the powers could be exercised in spite of the specific provisions for appeal contained in the Constitution or other laws. The Constitution for the best of reasons did not choose to fetter or circumscribe the powers exercisable under this article in any way".

The power has been held to be plenary, limitless,[41] "adjunctive", and unassailable on the grounds of unconstitutionality.[42] A word of caution was sounded in M.C. Mehta v. Union of India[43] to the effect that judicial discretion has to be exercised in accordance with law and set legal principles. Also where an order was

---

38. Kunhayammed v. State of Orissa, AIR 2000 SC 2587, 2593 : (2000) 6 SCC 359.
39. Narpat Singh v. Jaipur Development Authority, (2002) 4 SCC 666, at 674 : AIR 2002 SC 2036. N. Suriyakala v. A. Mohandoss, (2007) 9 SCC 196 : (2007) 3 JT 266.
40. AIR 1954 SC 520 : (1955) 1 SCR 267.
41. Esher Singh v. State of A.P., (2004) 11 SCC 585, 603 : AIR 2004 SC 3030*; A.V. Papayya Sastry v. Govt. of Andhra Pradesh*, (2007) 4 SCC 221, 237 : AIR 2007 SC 1546.
42. Zahira Habibullah Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 5 SCC 353 : AIR 2004 SC 3467.
43. (2004) 6 SCC 588, 613 : AIR 2004 SC 4618. See also Ramakant Rai v. Madan Rai, (2003) 12 SCC 395, 403 : AIR 2004 SC 77; Aero Traders (P) Ltd.v. Ravinder Kumar Suri, (2004) 8 SCC 307 : AIR 2005 SC 15*; Esher Singh v. State of A.P. (Supra)* passed without jurisdiction by the Supreme Court, it was corrected in a subsequent SLP arising out of the same proceedings before the High Court.[44]

The Supreme Court has observed in Pritam Singh v. The State,[45] that the power under Art. 136—

> "is to be exercised sparingly and in exceptional cases only, and as far as possible, a more or less uniform standard should be adopted in granting special leave in the wide range of matters which can come up before it under this Article. By virtue of this Article, we can grant special leave in civil cases, in criminal cases, in income-tax cases, in cases which come up before different kinds of tribunals and in a variety of cases."

The Court has emphasized:

> "The only uniform standard which in our opinion can be laid down in the circumstances is that Court should grant special leave to appeal in those cases where special circumstances are shown to exist."

In conclusion, the Court has said:

> "Generally speaking, this Court will not grant special leave, unless it is shown that exceptional and special circumstances exist, that substantial and grave injustice has been done and that the case in question presents features of sufficient gravity to warrant a review of the decision appealed against."

Despite earlier pronouncements that the jurisdiction under Art. 136 should be utilized for determining only substantial questions of law and not for redeeming injustice in individual cases, the power has been utilized increasingly to determine individual controversies because a case has "failed to receive the needed care, attention and approach…and the conscience of this Court pricks it or its heart bleeds for imparting justice or undoing injustice".[46]This element of emotional subjectivity in the assessment of what constitutes an "injustice" would necessarily result in greater uncertainty in the outcome of a proceeding before the Supreme Court. Matters are disposed of "as a one time measure without laying down any law or creating precedent".[47] The Court has, on occasion, while setting aside the judgment of the High Court not interfered with the relief granted having regard to the circumstances of the case and in the interest of justice.[48] Recently, such "individualized justice" was deprecated by a Constitution Bench[49]as sending out confusing signals and ushering in judicial chaos "highlighting the statement, that equity tends to vary with the Chancellor's foot". More recently, the Court reiterated that "Circumspection and circumscription must…induce the Court to interfere with the decision under challenge only if the extraordinary flaws or grave injustice or other recognised grounds are made out".[50]

---

44. Neeraj Munjal v. Atul Grover, (III) (2005) 5 SCC 404 : AIR 2005 SC 2867.
45. AIR 1950 SC 169 : 1950 SCR 453.
46. Jamshed Hormusji Wadia v. Board of Trustees, Port of Mumbai, (2004) 3 SCC 214, 244 : AIR 2004 SC 1815.
47. Fokatlal Prabhulal Bhatt v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 12 SCC 445, 447 : (2005) 5 SCALE 594; Paramjit Gambhir v. State of M.P., (2003) 4 SCC 276 : AIR 2003 SC 1338.
48. State of Punjab v. Savinderjit Kaur, (2004) 4 SCC 58, 62 : AIR 2004 SC 1887*; Inder Prakash Gupta v. State of J&K*, (2004) 6 SCC 786, 799 : AIR 2004 SC 2523; ONGC Ltd. v. Sendabhai Vastram Patel, (2005) 6 SCC 454 : (2005) 7 JT 465.
49. Secy., State of Karnataka v. Umadevi, (2006) 4 SCC 1 26 : AIR 2006 SC 1806. See also under Art. 142 fn.
50. Shivanand Gaurishankar Baswanti v. Laxmi Vishnu Textile Mills, (2008) 13 SCC 323, at Page 347.

This means that once special leave is granted by the Court, and the matter is registered as an appeal, the Court does not take into cognisance all the points which may arise on appeal and decide them on merits.[51]

The Court has taken the stand that the discretionary power which is available to it at the stage of grant of special leave would be available to the Court even at the time of hearing the appeal. Thus, only those points can be urged at the final hearing of the appeal which were fit to be urged at the preliminary stage when leave to appeal was asked for. It would be illogical to adopt different standards at two different stages of the same case.[52] Even if leave is granted limited to a particular question, the Court is not bound to restrict itself to that question at the time of the final disposal of the appeal[53] provided notice of the additional questions to be determined is issued to the respondent who must also have been given an opportunity of being heard.[54]

Merely because a party has complied with the directions to give an undertaking as a condition for obtaining stay it cannot be presumed to create an impression on the other parties that he is, by such undertaking, giving up the statutory or constitutional remedies.[55]

The scope of Art. 136(1) is very comprehensive and it invests the Supreme Court with a plenary jurisdiction to hear appeals. Art. 136(1) is couched in the widest possible terms. Thus, where a criminal case arose out of a private dispute purely personal nature under commercial transaction and a settlement is arrived at by the parties to such transactions the Court was of the view that continuing the criminal proceedings would be a futile exercise and quashed the FIR and all consequent proceedings.[56] The broad and overriding nature of Art. 136 will be evident from its following features:

(1) Under Art. 136, in suitable cases, the Supreme Court can even disregard the limitations contained in Articles 132 to 134 on its appellate jurisdiction and hear appeals which it could not otherwise hear under these provisions.[57]

Arts. 132-134 provide for regular appeals from the High Courts to the Supreme Court. But there may still remain cases falling outside the purview of these Articles where it may appear necessary to hear appeals in the interest of justice. The power of the Supreme Court under Art. 136 is unaffected by Arts. 132, 133, 134 and 134A in view of the expression "notwithstanding anything in this Chapter" occurring in Art. 136.

(2) Articles 132 to 134 permit appeals only against decisions of the High Courts. Art. 136, on the other hand, does not impose any such restriction.

Art. 136 uses the phrase 'any court' and thus empowers the Supreme Court to hear appeals from judgments given not only by the High Courts but even by a subordinate court, if the situation demands that its order should be quashed or reversed even without going through the usual procedure of filing an appeal in

---

51. See infra.
52. Taherkhatoon v. Salambin Mohammad, AIR 1999 SC 1104 : (1999) 2 SCC 635.
53. Suresh Chandra v. State of UP, (2005) 6 SCC 130 : AIR 2005 SC 3120.
54. Punjab State Electricity Board v. Darbara Singh, (2006) 1 SCC 121 : AIR 2006 SC 387.
55. Southern Railway Officers Assn. v. U.O.I., (2009) 9 SCC 24; citing P.R.Deshpande v. Maruti Balaram Haibatti, (1998) 6 SCC 507 : AIR 1998 SC 2979.
56. Jadish Chanana v. State of Haryana, (2008) 15 SCC 704.
57. Delhi Judicial Service Assn. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC 2176 : (1991) 4 SCC 406.

the High Court. Thus, in Rajendra Kumar v. State,[58] the Supreme Court heard an appeal from the decision of the Chief Judicial Magistrate. The appellant did not go to the High Court but came straight to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court did however observe that it does not ordinarily entertain such petitions.

As the Supreme Court has stated in this connection:[59]

> "… the Court has special residuary power to entertain appeal against any order of any court in the country. The plenary jurisdiction of this Court to grant leave to hear appeals against any order of a court or tribunal, confers power of judicial superintendence over all courts and tribunals in the territory of India including subordinate courts of Magistrate and District Judge. This Court has, therefore, supervisory jurisdiction overall courts in India".

(3) The word 'order' in Art. 136(1) has not been qualified by the adjective 'final' as is the case in Arts. 132, 133 and 134. The Supreme Court thus has power to hear an appeal even from an interlocutory or an interim order. In practice, however, the Court does not ordinarily grant leave to appeal from an interlocutory order, but it can do so in an exceptional case.[60] Ordinarily, the parties are directed to approach the High Court for the recall, stay or modification of the interim order.[61]At times, the Supreme Court has, while dismissing such petitions requested the High Court to dispose of the matter preferably within a time frame. Use of imperative words such as "directed" and fixing a time frame within which the High Court "shall" dispose of a matter have, on occasion, led to a confrontation between the High Court and the Supreme Court.[62]

Where, for example, it appears prima facie that the order in question cannot be justified by any judicial standard, the ends of justice and the need to maintain judicial discipline require the Supreme Court to intervene.[63]

---

58. AIR 1980 SC 1510 : (1980) 3 SCC 435.
Also see, Usha K. Pillai v. Raj K. Srinivas, AIR 1993 SC 2090 : (1993) 3 SCC 208, where the Supreme Court heard an appeal directly from a Magistrate's order. See also Nawab Shaqafat Ali Khan v. Nawab Imdad Jah Bahadur, (2009) 5 SCC 162 : (2009) 3 JT 652.

59. Delhi Judicial Service Assn. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC 2176 at 2194 : (1991) 4 SCC 406.

60. Union of India v. Swadeshi Cotton Mills, AIR 1978 SC 1818 : (1978) 4 SCC 295; United Commercial Bank v. Bank of India, AIR 1981 SC 1426 : (1981) 2 SCC 766; Joginder Nath Gupta v. Satish Chander Gupta, (1983) 2 SCC 325; U.P. Rajya Krishi Utpadan Mandi Parishad v. Sanjiv Rajan, (1993) Supp. (3) SCC 483 : (1993) 2 LLJ 66; Baby Samuel v. Tukaram Laxman Sable, (1995) Supp (4) SCC 215; Southern Petrochemical Industries Corp. v. Madras Refineries Ltd., AIR 1998 SC 302 : (1998) 9 SCC 209; Godfrey Phillips India Ltd. v. Girnar Food and Beverages (P.) Ltd., (1998) 9 SCC 531. Hardesh Ores (P) Ltd. v. Timblo Minerals (P.) Ltd., (2004) 4 SCC 64 : AIR 2004 SC 1884.
See for example:Videocon Properties Ltd v. Bhalchandra Laboratories (Dr), (2004) 3 SCC 711, 718 : AIR 2004 SC 1787*; M. Gurudas v. Rasaranjan*, (2006) 8 SCC 367 : AIR 2006 SC 3275*; Deoraj v. State of Maharashtra*, (2004) 4 SCC 697 : AIR 2004 SC 1975; Atma Ram Properties (P) Ltd. v. Federal Motors, (2005) 1 SCC 705 : (2004) 10 JT 410*; M.P. Housing Board v. Anil Kumar Khiwani*, (2005) 10 SCC 796 : AIR 2005 SC 1863*; Kishor Kirtilal Mehta v. Lilavati Kirtilal Mehta Medical Trust*, (2007) 10 SCC 21 : (2007) 8 Scale 36; Prakash Harishchandra Muranjan v. Mumbai Metropolitan Region Development Authority, (2009) 3 SCC 432 : AIR 2009 SC 2082; AIADMK v. Govt. of Tamilnadu, (2009) 5 SCC 452 : (2007) 11 SCALE 607.

61. Reserve Bank of India v. Sharada Devi, (2005) 10 SCC 178.

62. Spencer & Co v. Vishwadarshan Distributors(Pvt.) Ltd., (1995) 1 SCC 259*; Tirupati Balaji Developers (P) Ltd. v. State of Bihar*, (2004) 5 SCC 1 : AIR 2004 SC 2351.

63. Union of India v. Era Educational Trust, (2000) 5 SCC 57 : AIR 2000 SC 1573.

(4) The term 'determination' in Art. 136 signifies an effective expression of opinion which ends a controversy or a dispute by some authority to whom it is submitted under a valid law for disposal.

The expression 'order' also has a similar meaning except that it need not operate to end the dispute.

Determination or order must be judicial or quasi-judicial: a purely administrative or executive direction cannot be the subject matter of appeal to the Supreme Court. As the Supreme Court has observed:[64]

> "The essence of the authority of this Court being judicial, this Court does not exercise administrative or executive powers, i.e. character of the power conferred upon this court original or appellate, by its constitution being judicial, the determination or order sought to be appealed from must have the character of a judicial adjudication…"[65]

(5) Article 136(1) does not define the nature of proceedings from which the Supreme Court may hear appeals, and, therefore, it could hear appeals in any kind of proceedings whether civil, criminal, or relating to income-tax, revenue or labour disputes, etc.

(6) Article 136(1) confers on the Supreme Court power to hear appeals from orders and determination of any tribunal other than a military tribunal. This aspect of Art. 136(1) is very significant and is discussed in detail below.[66]

(7) Under Art. 136(1), the Supreme Court may hear appeal even though the ordinary law pertaining to the dispute makes no provision for such an appeal.

(8) Being a jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution, it cannot be diluted or circumscribed by ordinary legislative process: it can be curtailed or modified only by constitutional process.

(9) The Supreme Court may hear an appeal even where the Legislature declares the decision of a court or tribunal as final. Thus, in Raigarh,[67] the Supreme Court heard an appeal from an order of the Railway Rates Tribunal, Madras, in spite of s. 46A of the Railways Act, 1890, laying down that the decision of the tribunal shall be final.

(10) Under Art. 136(1), the Supreme Court has plenary jurisdiction to grant leave and hear appeals against any order of a court or tribunal. This confers on the Supreme Court power of judicial superintendence over all courts and tribunals in India including subordinate courts of magistrate and district judge.[68]

---

64. Union of India v. Era Educational Trust, (2000) 5 SCC 57 : AIR 2000 SC 1573.

65. SHAH, J., in Jaswant Sugar Mills v. Lakshmi Chand, AIR 1963 SC 677 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 242.

66. Sec. E, infra.

67. Mahendra Saree Emporium (II) v. G.V. Srinivasa Murthy, (2005) 1 SCC 481 : AIR 2004 SC 4289. In Raigarh Jute Mills v. Eastern Rly., AIR 1958 SC 525 : 1959 SCR 236. Also see, Union Carbide Corporation v. Unon of India, (1991) 4 SCC 584 : AIR 1992 SC 248; Usha K. Pillai v. Raj K. Srinivas, AIR 1993 SC 2090 : (1993) 3 SCC 208; Prashant Ramachandra Deshpande v. Maruti Balaram Haibatti, (1995) Supp (2) SCC 539; Union of India v. West Coast Paper Mills, (2004) 2 SCC 747 : AIR 2004 SC 1596.

68. Delhi Judicial Service Assn. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC 2176 : (1991) 4 SCC 406. See, supra, under "Court of Record", Sec. C(i)(b).

(11) The scope of this special appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is very flexible. There are no words in Art. 136 itself qualifying the power of the Supreme Court. The matter lies within the complete discretion of the Supreme Court and the only limit upon it is the "wisdom and good sense of the Judges" of the Court.[69]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that Art. 136(1) does not confer on any one any right to appeal. It confers on the Supreme Court an overriding and extensive power to grant special leave to appeal which is in the discretion of the Court.[70] As the Supreme Court has stated: "By virtue of this article we can grant special leave in civil cases, in criminal cases, in income-tax cases, in cases which come up before different kinds of tribunals, and any variety of other cases."[71]

Under Art. 136(1), the Supreme Court can hear appeals in cases which fall outside the scope of Arts. 132, 133 and 134. The Supreme Court can hear appeal even when the High Court has refused to grant the certificate of fitness either under Arts. 132, 133 or 134.[72] Appeals on the basis of incompetent certification by the High Court under Articles 134(1)(c) and 134-A may be treated as a proceeding arising under Art. 136.[73]

(12) Art. 136 confers no right of appeal upon any party; it only vests a discretion in the Apex Court to intervene by granting leave to a petitioner to enter in its appellate jurisdiction not open otherwise and as of right.

Article 136 involves two steps, viz., (i) granting special leave to appeal; and (ii) hearing the appeal. A petition seeking grant of special leave to appeal and the appeal itself, though both these stages are dealt with by Art. 136, these are to distinctly separate stages. The first stage continues up to the disposal of prayer for special leave to file an appeal. The second stage commences if and when the leave to appeal is granted and special leave petition is converted into an appeal.

At the first stage, while hearing the petition for special leave to appeal, the Supreme Court considers the question whether the petitioner should be granted such leave or not. At this stage, the Court does not exercise its appellate jurisdiction; it merely exercises its discretionary jurisdiction to grant or not to grant leave to appeal. If the petition seeking leave to appeal is dismissed, it only means that the Court feels that a case for invoking its appellate jurisdiction has not been made out. If leave to appeal is granted, then the appellate jurisdiction of the Court gets invoked. The appeal is then heard on merits.

(13) A special leave petition can be filed under Art. 136 by a person who is a party to the decision against which the appeal is sought to be filed. But a person who is not a party to the case, but is adversely affected thereby may also file the special leave petition.[74] It is within the Court's discretion to grant leave to appeal

---

69. Balakrishna Iyer v. Ramaswami Iyer, AIR 1965 SC 195 : 1964 (7) SCR 838.
70. Municipal Board v. Mahendran, AIR 1982 SC 1493 : (1982) 3 SCC 331; Laxman Marotrao Navakhare v. Keshavrao, AIR 1993 SC 2596 : (1993) 2 SCC 270; Hari Singh v. State of Haryana, (1993) 3 SCC 114 : 1993 SCC (Cri) 631.
71. Pritam Singh v. State, AIR 1950 SC 169 : 1950 SCR 453.
72. Achyut v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1963 SC 1039 : (1963) 2 SCR 47; Manickchand v. Elias, AIR 1969 SC 751 : (1969) 1 SCC 206.
73. State of Gujarat v. Salimbhai Abdulghaffar Shaikh, (2003) 8 SCC 50, 54 : AIR 2003 SC 3224.
74. See for example:State of Uttaranchal v. Sehnaz Mirza,(2008) 6 SCC 726 : (2008) 7 JT 547.

to anyone. The Supreme Court has itself clarified the position in this respect in Arunachalam:[75]

> "Art. 136 of the Constitution neither confers on anyone the right to invoke the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court nor inhibits anyone from invoking the Court's jurisdiction. The power is vested in the Supreme Court but the right to invoke the Court's jurisdiction is vested in no one. The exercise of the power of the Supreme Court is not circumscribed by any limitation as to who may invoke it."

(13a) Generally, an appeal by a person who was not a party to the proceedings is not entertained.[76] However it has been held that a State has the locus standi to file an appeal even for the limited purpose of expunging adverse remarks made by the High Court against the Chief Minister.[77] An appeal by the son of the deceased victim against the order of acquittal of the accused has also been held to be maintainable.[78] So also an appeal by a person who is not a party as such in the proceeding but against whom an adverse remark is made has been entertained and the offending remarks deleted.[79]

(13b) The exercise of appellate jurisdiction under Art. 136 not being dependent on Order 41 of the Code of Civil Procedure,[80] it has been held[81] that the respondent cannot file a cross –objection on the ground that no rules have been framed by the Supreme Court governing its own practice and procedure. "If the judgment of the High Court was partly against the respondent, it ..(should) have filed an application seeking leave to appeal".

This appears to be contrary to an observation in an earlier part of the same judgment that a " person who has entirely succeeded before a court or tribunal below cannot file an appeal solely for the sake of clearing himself from the effect of an adverse finding or an adverse decision on one of the issues as he would not be a … 'person aggrieved' ".[82]

(14) In what circumstances will the Supreme Court grant leave to appeal under Art. 136 is a question to which no precise or definite answer can be given. Nor has the Court ever attempted to define its ambit meticulously or exhaustively.

In Dhakeswari,[83] the Court has stated in this connection: "It is not possible to define.... the limitations on the exercise of the discretionary jurisdiction vested in the Court by Article 136. The limitations whatever they may be, are implicit in the nature and character of the power itself. It being an exceptional and overriding power, naturally it has to be exercised sparingly and with caution and only in

---

75. Arunachalam v. P.S.R. Setharathnam, AIR 1979 SC 1284 at 1287 : (1979) 2 SCC 297. Also see, Food Corporation of India v. P.S.R. Setharathnam, AIR 1979 SC 1406, 1409.
76. Tirupati Balaji Developers (P) Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2004) 5 SCC 1 : AIR 2004 SC 2351.
77. State of Maharashtra v. Public Concern for Governance Trust, (2007) 3 SCC 587 : AIR 2007 SC 777.
78. Esher Singh v. State of A.P., (2004) 11 SCC 585, 604 : AIR 2004 SC 3030.
79. Samya Sett v. Sambhu Sarkar, (2005) 6 SCC 767 : AIR 2005 SC 3309 for a full discussion on the subject.
80. UBS AG V. State Bank of Patiala, (2006) 5 SCC 416, 424 : AIR 2006 SC 2250.
81. Jamshed Hormusji Wadia v. Board of Trustees, Port of Mumbai, (2004) 3 SCC 214, 244 : AIR 2004 SC 1815.
82. This is also contrary to the views expressed in other decisions on the expunging of adverse remarks. See Note (1B) under Note N.
83. Dhakeswari Cotton Mills Ltd. v. CIT, AIR 1955 SC 65 : 1955 (1) SCR 941.

special and extraordinary situations. Beyond that, it is not possible to fetter the exercise of this power by any set formula or rule."

What, however, the Court has stated is that it being a special power it is to be exercised only in those cases where special circumstances are shown to exist,[84] and that whenever there is an injustice done to a party in a proceeding before a court or tribunal, or there is a miscarriage of justice, or when a question of law of general public importance arises, or a decision shocks the conscience of the Court, this jurisdiction can always be invoked. Article 136 is the residuary power of the Supreme Court to do justice where the Court is satisfied that there is injustice.[85]

In Commr., Central Excise & Customs v. M/s. Venus Castings (P) Ltd.[86] the Supreme Court granted leave to appeal because of the uncertainty of law. The matter arose under the Central Excise Act, 1944, and the rules made thereunder. In the instant case, on the specific question of law, different High Courts had taken different views. Accordingly the Supreme Court observed : "when there is uncertainty as to the state of law, it is eminently proper for this court to grant leave in such a matter and settle the legal position."[87] Again an application which could have been dismissed on the ground that the appellant has no locus standi was entertained because the court felt that as a constitutional court "we felt it to be our duty to lay down the law correctly so that similar mistakes are not committed in future."[88] A point of law has been decided in an infructuous appeal because of the divergence of views expressed by different High Courts on the issue.[89] Again, an application which could have been dismissed on the ground that the appellant has no locus standi was entertained because the Court felt that as a Constitutional Court "we felt it to be our duty to lay down the law correctly so that similar mistakes are not commited in future".[90]

The Supreme Court is not only a court of law but a court of equity as well.[91]

The Court has stated in this connection:[92]

> "It is not the policy of this Court to entertain special leave petitions and grant leave under Article 136 of the Constitution save in those cases where some substantial question of law of general or public importance is involved or there is manifest injustice resulting from the impugned order or judgment".

It would be open to the Supreme Court to interfere with concurrent findings of fact, if the infirmity of excluding, ignoring and overlooking the abundant materials and the evidence, if considered in proper perspective would have led to a conclusion contrary to the one taken by courts below.[93]

---

84. Ibid.
85. C.C.E. v. Standard Motor Products, AIR 1989 SC 1298 : (1989) 2 SCC 303.
86. AIR 2000 SC 1568 : (2000) 4 SCC 206.
87. Ibid, at 1571.
88. Raju Ramsing Vasave v. Mahesh Deorao Bhivapurkar, (2008) 9 SCC 54, at page 74 : (2008) 9 JT 445.
89. State of Delhi v. Sanjeev, (2005) 5 SCC 181 : AIR 2005 SC 2080.
90. Raju Ramsing Vasave v. Mahesh Deorao Bhivarpurkar, (2008) 9 SCC 54 at page 74 : (2008) 9 JT 445.
91. Chandra Bansi Singh v. State of Bihar, AIR 1984 SC 1767 : (1984) 4 SCC 316.
92. Kunhayammed v. State of Kerala, AIR 2000 SC 2587, 2595 : (2000) 6 SCC 359. See also Central Bank of India v. Madhulika Guruprasad Dahir, (2008) 13 SCC 17 at page 175.
93. Dubaria v. Har Prasad, (2009) 9 SCC 346.

The reason for granting leave to appeal sparingly is that there is heavy backlog of cases in the Court and, therefore, it becomes necessary for the Court to restrict fresh intake of cases.

(15) A petition for grant of special leave to appeal may be rejected for several reasons, such as:

(i) the petition is time-barred;
(ii) defective presentation;[1]
(iii) petitioner lacks locus standi to file the petition;
(iv) conduct of the petitioner disentitles him to any indulgence by the court;[2]
(v) the question raised in the petition is not considered fit for consideration by the Court, or does not deserve to be dealt with by the Apex Court.

(16) Notwithstanding concurrent findings of trial court and High Court the lack of quality or credibility of evidence may call for interference.[3]

(17) After granting special leave to appeal under Art. 136, the Court can revoke the leave granted by it, if the respondent brings to the notice of the Court facts which would justify such revocation. The Court will do so in the interest of justice.[4]

(18) Generally speaking, under Art. 136, the Supreme Court hears an appeal from an adjudicatory order and not from an administrative order. An adjudicatory order is "an order that adjudicates upon the rival contentions of parties and it must be passed by an authority constituted by the state by law for the purpose in discharge of the State'' obligation to secure justice to its people."[5]

Accordingly, in the case noted below,[6] the court refused to hear appeal from an order made by the Chief Justice of India under S. 11 of the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996, appointing an arbitrator. The order was characterised as non-adjudicatory.

This view of the Court was subsequently held to be erroneous by the majority of a larger Bench in[7] which was of the opinion that the power of appointment was judicial and therefore susceptible to appeal under Art. 136. Apart from the fact that the decision appears to be contrary to the express provisions of the statute, it is not clear what remedy would be available to a litigant against an order of the Chief Justice of India.[8] Interestingly, a single judge in Chambers has held that in deciding an issue under section 11, the Rules framed by the Supreme Court for

---

1. State of Punjab v. Ashok Singh Garcha, (2009) 2 SCC 399 : (2009) 1 SCALE 367.
2. See for example Prestige Lights Ltd. v. SBI, (2007) 8 SCC 449, at page 462 : (2007) 10 JT 218.
3. A. Subair v. State of Kerala, (2009) 6 SCC 587 : (2009) 8 JT 415. See also State of Punjab v. Sohan Singh, (2009) 6 SCC 444 : AIR 2009 SC 1887, no interference if two views are possible and the one adopted by the High Court is plausible. See also Devaki Antharjanam v. Sreedharan Namboodiri, (2009) 7 SCC 798 : (2009) 5 SLT 374, no remand for re-determination of facts after 12 years on the Supreme Court approving executing court's determination.
4. Penu Balakrishna M. Ariya v. Ramaswami Iyer, AIR 1965 SC 195 : 1964 (7) SCR 49.
5. For further discussion on this point, see, Sec. E, infra.
6. Konkan Rly. Corpn. Ltd. v. Rani Construction Pvt. Ltd., (2002) 2 SCC 388 : AIR 2002 SC 778.
7. SBP & Co. v. Patel Engineering Ltd., (2005) 8 SCC 618 : AIR 2006 SC 450.
8. See minority view of C.K. THAKKER, J (Ibid, at page 687).

the hearing of matters by a bench of at least two judges did not apply as he was not functioning as a court.[9] The ratio in SBP has been distinguished in Punjab Agro Industries Corpn. Ltd. v. Kewal Singh Dhillon,[10] which said that the observation that against an order under Section 11 of the Act, only an appeal under Article 136 of the Constitution would lie, is only with reference to the orders made by the Chief Justice of a High Court or by the designate Judge of that High Court and do not apply to a subordinate Court functioning as designate of the Chief Justice. The distinction between "designates" has been made without reference to any legal principle and indicates perhaps that the decision in SBP requires reconsideration.

(17A) Although ordinarily the Supreme Court does not discuss the evidence, it may do so when it finds that crucial circumstances have escaped the notice of the courts below in order to prevent injustice being caused.[11]

(18) The Court has power to mould relief according to the circumstances of the case.[12]

(19) Generally the court after pointing out the legal error remands the matter back to the High Court, Tribunal or authority for ascertaining the facts or applying the law indicated by it to the ascertained facts. But this practice is not inflexible. Hence where a poor widow was fighting for about a decade to service benefits of her husband, the Supreme Court in order to give a quietus to the litigation decided the claim itself instead of remanding the matter to the High Court.[13]

(a) EFFECT OF DISMISSAL OF SPECIAL LEAVE PETITION

When a special leave petition is dismissed in limine by the Supreme Court, when the Court merely says "dismissed" without giving any reasons, all that the Court decides in such a situation is that it was not a fit case where special leave to appeal should have been granted under Art. 136; it would only mean that the court was not inclined to exercise its discretion in granting leave to file the appeal.[14] The Supreme Court says nothing about the merits of the case, or the correctness or otherwise of the order from which leave to appeal is sought. The requirement for appellate courts to give reasons when summarily dismissing an appeal, does not apply to the Supreme Court as it is the final court.[15]

This means that the order of the Apex Court creates no res judicata; it lays down no law for the purposes of Art. 141.[16] The mere rejection of special leave petition by the Supreme Court cannot by itself be construed as "the imprimatur"

---

9. Rodemadan India Ltd. v. International Trade Expo.Centre Ltd., (2006) 11 SCC 651 : AIR 2006 SC 3456.

10. (2008) 10 SCC 128, at page 131 : (2008) 9 JT 256.

11. Pannayar v. State of Tamil Nadu by Inspector of Police, (2009) 9 SCC 152.

12. Koluthara Exports Ltd. v. State of Kerala, (2002) 2 SCC 459 : AIR 2002 SC 973; Om Construction Co. v. Ahmedabad Municipal Corpn., (2009) 2 SCC 486 : AIR 2009 SC 1944.

13. Basanti Prasad v. Chairman, Bihar School Examination Board, (2009) 6 SCC 791 : (2009) 8 JT 243.

14. Saurashtra Oil Mills Assn. v. State of Gujarat, (2002) 3 SCC 202 : AIR 2002 SC 1130. Hemalatha Gargya v. CIT, (2003) 9 SCC 510 : (2002) Supp (4) SCR 382*; Narcotics Control Bureau v. Dilip Prahlad Namade,* (2004) 3 SCC 619 : AIR 2004 SC 2950.

15. Bolin Chetia v. Jogadish Bhuyan, (2005) 6 SCC 81 : AIR 2005 SC 1872. See also A. Rajendra Kumar v. Registrar, Supreme Court of India, (2005) 13 SCC 443.

16. For Art. 141, see, Infra, Sec. J.

of the Supreme Court on the correctness of the decision sought to be appealed against. As the Supreme Court has observed in the case mentioned below:[17]

> "It is true that the said Special Leave Petitions were dismissed summarily but that would not mean that this Court approved the view that was taken by the High Court".

When the Supreme Court summarily dismisses a special leave petition under Art. 136, by such dismissal, the Court does not lay down any law, as envisaged by Art. 141 of the Constitution, nor does it constitute a vinding precedent. [18]

The main High Court decision does not merge with the order of the Apex Court. The aggrieved party may pursue any statutory remedy which may be open to him to challenge the decision in question. For instance, he may move a writ petition in the High Court under Art. 226 to challenge the decision,[19] or may move a petition in the High Court to review its own decision.[20]

If the order of the High Court had been obtained by practising fraud on the Court, the High Court can recall that order despite the fact that the SLP against that order may have been dismissed.[21] If a special leave petition from an order is dismissed, no leave will be granted to challenge a refusal to review the original order. A subsequent petition challenging the refusal of the lower court to review its earlier order has also been held to be not maintainable.[22]

Benches of the Supreme Court are bound to respect earlier orders coordinate or "co-equal" benches and the summary dismissal of a Special Leave Petition by one bench concludes the issues raised in such petition inter partes,[23] but not as far as other similarly placed petitioners were concerned.[24]

The view expressed in Batiarani Gramiya Bank v. Pallab Kumar[25] that an earlier Special Leave petition in an identical matter being dismissed without be-

---

17. Commr. of Income Tax v. Manjunatheswar Packing Products and Champhor Works, AIR 1998 SC 1478 : (1998) 1 SCC 598.

18. For Art. 141, see, infra, Sec. J. See Union of India v. Jaipal Singh, (2004) 1 SCC 121 : AIR 2004 SC 1005.

19. Workmen of Cochin Port Trust v. Board of Trustees of the Cochin Port Trust, AIR 1978 SC 1283 : (1978) 3 SCC 119; Indian Oil Corporation v. State of Bihar, AIR 1986 SC 1780. Also see, infra, Ch. VIII, for Art. 226.

20. Indian Oil Corporation Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1986 SC 1780 : 1986 Supp SCC 527; M/s. Rup Diamonds v. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 674 : (1989) 2 SCC 356; Supreme Court Employees' Welfare Association v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 334 : (1989) 4 SCC 187; Yogendra Narayan Chowdhary v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 751 : (1996) 7 SCC 1; V.M. Salgaocar & Bros. v. I.T. Commr., AIR 2000 SC 1623; Kunhayammed v. State of Kerala, AIR 2000 SC 2587 : (2000) 6 SCC 359, Govt. of West Bengal v. Tarun K. Roy, (2004) 1 SCC 347, 510 : (2003) 9 JT 130.

The Court has overruled its earlier view expressed to the contrary in several cases e.g., Sree Narayana Dharma Sanghom Trust v. Swami Prakasananda, (1997) 6 SCC 78 : (1997) 5 JT 100; Maharashtra v. Prabhakar Bhikaji Ingle, AIR 1996 SC 3069 : (1996) 3 SCC 463.

For review power of the High Court, see, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. C.

21. A.V. Papayya Sastry v. Govt. of Andhra Pradesh, (2007) 4 SCC 221 : AIR 2007 SC 1546.

22. Shanker Motiram Nale v. Shiolalsingh Gannusingh Rajput, (1994) 2 SCC 753; M.N.Haider v. Kendriya Vidyalaya Sangathan, (2004) 13 SCC 677.

23. Satrucharla Vijaya Rama Raju v. Nimmaka Jaya Raju, (2006) 1 SCC 212 : AIR 2006 SC 543; See also Gurdev Singh v. State of Punjab, (2003) 7 SCC 258 : AIR 2003 SC 4187.

24. HMT Ltd. v. P. Subbarayudu, (2003) 10 SCC 156 : AIR 2004 SC 3280.

25. (2004) 9 SCC 100.

ing admitted, need not be mentioned in a subsequent Special Leave Petition,[26] appears to be inconsistent with this view.[27]

The situation is somewhat different when the special leave petition is dismissed through a reasoned or speaking order. Whatever the Supreme Court says in its dismissal order amounts to law for the purposes of Art. 141 and this is binding on the parties as well as the courts and tribunals below. [28]Beyond this, the Court gives no decision on merits and, therefore, the decision appealed against can be challenged through a writ petition, or a review petition in the High Court or the tribunal concerned. The Apex Court has observed in the Supreme Court Employees' Welfare Association:[29]

> "When Supreme Court gives reasons while dismissing a special leave petition under Article 136, the decision becomes one which attracts Article 141".

In another case,[30] the Court has observed:

> "An order refusing special leave to appeal may be a non-speaking order or a speaking one. In either case it does not attract the doctrine of merger. An order refusing special leave to appeal does not stand substituted in place of the order under challenge. All that it means is that the Court was not inclined to exercise its discretion so as to allow the appeal being filed".

Once a special leave petition filed against a High Court decision is withdrawn without obtaining leave from the Supreme Court to file another special leave petition, a fresh special leave petition against the same decision is not maintainable. The ban on filing a fresh special leave petition is based on public policy.[31] Similarly, when a special leave petition is dismissed by the Supreme Court, a second special leave petition for appeal is not maintainable. The principle of res judicata comes into play in such a context,[32] unless the earlier order of the Supreme Court is established to be contrary to an existing law.[33]

(b) COURT'S DISCRETION

It is a well established principle that even though the Court may grant special leave to appeal, the discretionary power vesting in the Court at that stage continues to remain with the Court even at the time of hearing the appeal on merits. This principle is applicable to all kinds of appeals admitted by special leave un-

---

26. Ibid at page 111.

27. See in this connection Union of India v. Shantiranjan Sarkar, (2009) 3 SCC 90 : (2009) 1 JT 467.

28. Union of India v. All India Services Pensioners Ass., AIR 1988 SC 501 : (1988) 2 SCC 580.

29. Supra, footnote 20.

30. Kunhayammed v. State of Kerala, AIR 2000 SC 2587, at 2600 : (2000) 6 SCC 359.
Also, K. Rajamouli v. A.V.K.N. Swamy, AIR 2001 SC 2316 : (2001) 5 SCC 37.

31. Upadhyay & Co. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1999) 1 SCC 81 : AIR 1999 SC 509; Union of India v. Sher Singh, AIR 1997 SC 1796 : (1997) 3 SCC 555; Yogendra Narain Chowdhury v. Union of India, AIR 1996 SC 751 : (1996) 7 SCC 1.

32. M.N. Haider v. Kendriya Vidyalaya Sangathan, (2004) 13 SCC 677. After dismissal of a special leave petition on merits by the Supreme Court, the High Court cannot review the self-same order. The court observed : "After the dismissal of the special leave petition by this Court, on contest, no review petition could be entertained by the High Court against the same order. The very entertainment of the review petitions, in the facts and circumstances of the case was an affront to the order of this Court."
Abhai Maligai Partnership Firm v. K. Santhakumaran, AIR 1999 SC 1486 : (1998) 7 SCC 386.

33. *Neeraj Munjal v. Atul Grover (III), (*2005) 5 SCC 404 : AIR 2005 SC 2867.

der Art. 136, irrespective of the nature of the subject-matter.[34] This means that only those points could be urged at the final hearing of the appeal which were fit to be urged at the preliminary stage when leave for appeal was asked for, as it would be illogical to adopt different standards at two different stages of the same case. Also, the Court after declaring the correct legal position, may still say that it would not exercise its discretion to decide the case on merits and that it would decide on the basis of equitable considerations in the fact situation of the case and "mould the final order".[35]

The Supreme Court has observed on this point in Taherakhatoon:[36]

> "… even though we are now dealing with the appeal after grant of special leave, we are not bound to go into merits and even if we do so and declare the law or point out the error—still we may not interfere if the justice of the case on facts does not require interference or if we feel that the relief could be moulded in a different fashion…"

In the instant case, the Supreme Court while pointing out the errors committed by the High Court in its decision, nevertheless, refused to interfere with the decree passed by the High Court. The Supreme Court declared that "in the peculiar circumstances referred to above, this is not a fit case for interference" and moulded relief in favour of the plaintiff.[37]

The width of the discretion may extend to a situation where although the appeals are found to be not maintainable, yet having regard to arguments being advanced at length including submissions on merit, the Supreme Court may decide on the merit of the appeals.[38]

In an appeal from an order condoning delay in preferring first appeal the Court awarded costs of Rs.10,000 while dismissing the appeal.[39]

(c) DISMISSAL OF APPEAL

After the Supreme Court grants leave to appeal, the Court hears the appeal on merits. After hearing the arguments of the parties, the Court gives its decision.

The Court may dismiss the appeal with or without giving reasons for the same, or the Court may pass an order of reversal, modification or merely affirmation of the decision of the lower court or tribunal. In any such situation, the decision appealed against gets merged with the decision of the Apex Court. This means that after the Supreme Court, the original decision appealed against cannot be challenged through a writ petition under Art. 226 in a High Court. Nor can the lower court or tribunal review its decision against which the Supreme Court has disposed of the appeal.[40]

---

34. See, Pritam Singh v. The State, AIR 1950 SC 169 : 1950 SCR 453; M/s. Bengal Chemical & Pharmaceutical Works Ltd. v. Their Workmen, AIR 1959 SC 633 : 1959 Supp (2) SCR 136.
35. Municipal Board, Pratapgarh v. Mahendra Singh Chawla, AIR 1982 SC 1493 : (1982) 3 SCC 331.
36. Taherakhatoon v. Salmabin Mohammad, AIR 1999 SC 1104, 1110 : (1999) 2 SCC 635.
37. See also ONGC Ltd. v. Sendhabhai Vastram Patel, (2005) 6 SCC 454 : (2005) 7 JT 465.
38. Villianur Iyarkkai Padukappu Maiyam v. U.O.I., (2009) 7 SCC 561 : (2009) 8 JT 339.
39. C.K. Prahalada. v. State of Karnataka, (2008) 15 SCC 577.
40. Kunhayammed v. State of Kerala, AIR 2000 SC 2587 : (2000) 6 SCC 359.

(d) RESTRICTIONS

Article 136 imposes no restriction or limitation on the power of the Supreme Court to hear appeals. The constitutional provision confers a plenary jurisdiction on the Court. Nevertheless, the Court has sought to impose on itself some restrictions in exercising this vast appellate jurisdiction. This has been done with a view to reduce the flow of appeals to itself so that it is not faced with a huge backlog of cases.

EXHAUSTION OF REMEDIES

The Court has imposed on itself a restriction that before invoking the jurisdiction of the Court under Art. 136, the aggrieved party must exhaust any remedy which may be available under the law before the lower appellate authority or the High Court.[41]

Ordinarily, the Supreme Court does not hear an appeal from the decision of a single judge of the High Court, as such an appeal ought to go to the Division Bench of the High Court. This, however, is a self-imposed restriction and not a matter ousting jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. When in a case, the High Court Judge committed patent error, the Supreme Court heard an appeal from the single judge.[42]

DELAY

An appeal must be filed without undue delay although Art. 136 prescribes no period of limitation for the purpose. But the Court does not like stale claims to be raked up.

The Court has power to condone delay in approaching it to enable it to do substantial justice to the parties concerned.[43] The Court shows a liberal attitude in condoning delay when the government is the appellant. One reason for such an approach is that bureaucratic delay is proverbial. Secondly, the Court feels that if the state is denied an opportunity to appeal because of delay, it may be the loss of the society as a whole.[44]

CONCILIATION

To curtail wasteful expenditure of public monies on litigation between the State and Public Sector Undertakings or between public sector undertakings inter se, the Supreme Court has directed the Government of India and the State Governments to set up a Committee to monitor disputes between them to ensure that no litigation comes to Court or to a Tribunal without the matter having been first

---

41. Nirma Ltd. v. Lurgi Lentges Energietechnik Gmbh (2002) 5 SCC 520 : AIR 2002 SC 3695. For a detailed discussion this point, see, infra.

42. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Harish Chandra, AIR 1996 SC 2173 : (1996) 9 SCC 309. Dipak Chandra Ruhidas v. Chandan Kumar Sarkar, (2003) 7 SCC 66 : AIR 2003 SC 3701*; Virender Kumar Rai v. Union of India,* (2004) 13 SCC 463.

43. Union of India v. Cynamide India Ltd., AIR 1987 SC 1802 : (1987) 2 SCC 720; Harsharan Varma v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 1969 : 1987 Supp SCC 310; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Rafiquddin, AIR 1988 SC 162; Madurai Kamraj University v. K. Rajayyan, AIR 1988 SC 385 : 1988 Supp SCC 97.

44. Chief G.M. Telecom v. G. Mohan Prasad, (1999) 6 SCC 67; State of Bihar v. Kameshwar Prasad Singh, AIR 2000 SC 2306 : (2000) 9 SCC 94.

examined by the Committee and cleared it for litigation. The Court has also directed that:

"It shall be the obligation of every Court and every Tribunal where such a dispute is raised hereafter to demand a clearance from the Committee in case it has not been so pleaded and in the absence of the clearance, the proceedings would not be proceeded with"[45] and further wherever appeals, petitions, etc. are filed without the clearance of the High-Powered Committee so as to save limitation, the appellant or the petitioner, as the case may be, shall within a month from such filing, refer the matter to the High-Powered Committee, After such reference to the High-Powered Committee is made, the operation of the order or proceedings under challenge shall be suspended till the High-Powered Committee resolves the dispute or gives clearance to the litigation. If the High-Powered Committee is unable to resolve the matter for reasons to be recorded by it, it shall grant clearance for the litigation.

The machinery contemplated is only to ensure that no litigation comes to court without the parties having had an opportunity of conciliation before an in-house committee and does not in any way efface the statutory remedies of the State or the statutory corporations.[46] It has recently been clarified that the emphasis on one month's time was only to show the urgency needed and merely because there is some delay in approaching the Committee that does not make the action illegal[47].

CONSISTENCY IN REVENUE APPEALS

If the Revenue accepts the decision on a point of law in the case of one assessee without challenging it further by way of an appeal, it is not open to the Revenue to challenge its correctness in the case of other assessees without just cause.[48]

(e) RELIEF

Under Art. 136, the Supreme Court can give whatever relief may be necessary and proper in the facts and circumstances of the specific case. The Court has power to mould relief according to the circumstances of the specific case.[49] The Court can also invoke its power under Art. 142 for this purpose.[50]

A few instances of moulding relief may be cited here.

A police officer was promoted to the post of Deputy Superintendent of Police in 1975 under directions issued by the High Court to that effect. The State ap-

---

45. Oil and Natural Gas Commission v. CCE, 1995 Supp (4) SCC 541 : (1992) 61 ELT 3.
46. Mahanagar Telephone Nigam Ltd. v. Chairman, Central Board, Direct Taxes, (2004) 6 SCC 431 : AIR 2004 SC 2434; Oil & Natural Gas Commission v. CCE, (2004) 6 SCC 437, at page 438 : (1994) 70 ELT 45.
47. CIT v. Oriental Insurance Co. Ltd., (2008) 9 SCC 349 : (2008) 10 SCALE 253.
48. Berger Paints India Ltd. v. CIT, (2004) 12 SCC 42, 47 : (2004) 4 JT 252; C.K. Gangadharan v. CIT, (2008) 8 SCC 739, 744 : (2008) 10 SCALE 426.
49. Collector of Customs & Central Excise v. Oriental Timber Industries, AIR 1985 SC 746 : (1985) 3 SCC 85; Dipak Kumar Biswas v. Director of Public Instruction, AIR 1987 SC 1422 : (1987) 2 SCC 252; Municipal Board of Pratabgarh v. Mahendra Singh Chawla, AIR 1982 SC 1493 : (1982) 3 SCC 331; Divisional Manager A.P. SRTC v. P. Lakshmoji Rao, (2004) 2 SCC 433, 441 : AIR 2004 SC 1503.
50. See, infra, under Art. 142: "Power to do Complete Justice", Sec. G.

pealed to the Supreme Court under Art. 136. In the year 2000, the Supreme Court ruled that the decision of the High Court was not sustainable. The Supreme Court however ruled that the benefit conferred on the concerned officer under the High Court direction should not be withdrawn.[51]

In Badrinath v. Govt. of Tamil Nadu,[52] the appellant was appointed in the junior scale in IAS in 1957 and was promoted to the selection grade in 1972. Thereafter, he was not promoted to the super-time scale. His appeal to the Government was rejected. He filed a writ petition is the High Court which was rejected. He then filed an appeal in the Supreme Court under Art. 136. The Court held that the refusal to promote him was not justified.

The Court then had to decide what relief to give him. Should the Court send the matter to the State Government for reconsideration in the light of its decision, or should the Court itself issue a mandamus to the State Government to promote him? In view of "the special and peculiar circumstances of the case", the Court itself issued mandamus to the State Government to promote the appellant to super-time scale with effect from the date his promotion was due.

The Court asserted that it can mould relief to meet the peculiar and complicated requirements of a case to enable it to reach justice wherever found necessary. "The power of this Court to mould relief in the interests of Justice in extraordinary cases cannot be doubted".[53]

The power has been used for various purposes such as issuing directions for recording/registering marriages[54] expunging adverse remarks made in the judgment against the subordinate courts[55] and imposing exemplary costs of Rs. 5 lakhs on the Union of India for having illegally retained possession of property for 32 years.[56]

(f) APPEALS IN CONSTITUTIONAL/CIVIL CASES

Under Article 136, the Supreme Court can hear appeal in a case involving substantial question of constitutional law if the High Court refuses to grant the necessary certificate under Art. 132.[57] Similarly, the Supreme Court may entertain appeal in a civil case where substantial question of law is involved but which is not covered by Article 133, as for example, when the High Court may have refused to grant a fitness certificate.[58]

Ordinarily, the Supreme Court does not entertain an appeal against an exercise of discretion by the court below if it has been exercised along sound judicial lines. But if the discretion is exercised arbitrarily or unreasonably, or is based on a misunderstanding of the principles that govern its exercise, or the order has been passed without jurisdiction, or if there is a patently erroneous interpretation of law by the High Court, the Supreme Court would intervene if there has been a

---

51. State of Bihar v. Kameshwar Prasad Singh, AIR 2000 SC 2306 : (2000) 9 SCC 94.
52. (2000) 8 SCC 395 : AIR 2000 SC 3243.
53. Ibid, at 434. For Mandamus, see, Ch. VIII, infra.
54. Seema v. Ashwini Kumar, (2005) 4 SCC 443 : (2005) 11 JT 97.
55. Kailasbhai Shukharam Tiwari v. Jostna Laxmidas Pujara, (2006) 1 SCC 524 : AIR 2006 SC 741.
56. Union of India v. Raja Mohd. Amir Mohd. Khan, (2005) 8 SCCC 696 : AIR 2005 SC 4383. See also Suman Kapur v. Sudhir Kapur, (2009) 1 SCC 422 at page 441 : AIR 2009 SC 589.
57. Supra, Sec. C(iv)(a).
58. Supra, Sec. C(iv)(e).

resultant failure of justice.[59] So also if the court below acts without jurisdiction, or in violation of principles of natural justice[60] or without a proper appreciation of material on record or the submissions made[61] interference under Art. 136 is warranted.

Ordinarily, the Supreme Court does not appreciate evidence, or go behind the findings of fact arrived at by the courts below, much less concurrent findings, unless there is sufficient ground for doing so.[62] The Court can, however, appreciate evidence on record to avoid miscarriage of justice.[63] If in giving the findings the lower court ignored or misread and misconstrued certain important pieces of evidence, and the Supreme Court comes to the conclusion that, on the evidence taken as a whole, no court could properly, as a matter of legitimate inference, arrive at the conclusion that the lower court has arrived,[64] or where the two lower courts of appeal were under a clear misapprehension as to the findings of fact by the trial court, or where the lower courts arrive at the findings not on proper consideration of the law on the subject, or where appreciation of evidence by the courts below on the face of it appears to be erroneous causing miscarriage of justice, the court would examine the evidence itself.[65] The position however is different if it is a mixed question of law and fact.[66]

Order XVI Rule 4(b) of the Supreme Court Rules which provides that

> "SLPs shall be confined only to the pleadings before the Court/Tribunal whose order is challenged. However, the petitioner may, with due notice to the respondent, and with the leave of the Court urge additional grounds, at the time of hearing".

Thus a new plea put forward for the first time in the form of written submissions after the hearing was concluded was not entertained.[67]

Neverthless the Supreme Court is extremely reluctant to entertain an entirely new plea, not raised earlier before the lower courts, but being raised for the first

---

59. Santosh v. Mul Singh, AIR 1958 SC 321 : 1958 SCR 1211: Baldota Bros. v. Libra Mining Works, AIR 1961 SC 100; Syed Yakoob v. Radhakrishnan, AIR 1964 SC 477 : 1964 (5) SCR 64; Ajit Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1967 SC 856 : 1967 (2) SCR 143.

60. National Organic Chemical Industries Ltd. v. Miheer H. Mafatlal, (2004) 12 SCC 356, 359 : AIR 2004 SC 3933*; Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala,* (2008) 3 SCC 542, at page 565 : AIR 2008 SC 1614.

61. Panchanan Mishra v. Digambar Mishra, (2005) 3 SCC 143 : AIR 2005 SC 1299.

62. Barsay v. State of Bombay, AIR 1961 SC 1762 : 1962 (2) SCR 195; Surasaibalini v. Phanindra Mohan, AIR 1965 SC 1364 : 1965 (1) SCR 861; Tatayya v. Jagapathiraju, AIR 1967 SC 647 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 324; Chettiar v. Chettair, AIR 1968 SC 915 : 1968 (2) SCR 897; Digvijay Singh v. Pratap Kumari, AIR 1970 SC 137; Parle Praducts v. J.P. & Co., AIR 1972 SC 1359 : (1972) 1 SCC 618; Banwari Lal v. Trilok Chand, AIR 1980 SC 419 : (1980) 1 SCC 349; Vasudha Srivastava v. Kamla Chauhan, AIR 1992 SC 1454 : (1992) 1 SCC 645; Union of India v. Rajeshwari & Co., AIR 1986 SC 1748 : (1986) 3 SCC 426.

63. Shashi Jain (SMT) v. Tarsem Lal (DEAD), (2009) 6 SCC 40 : AIR 2009 SC 2617.

64. White v. White, AIR 1958 SC 441; A.P. State Financial Corp. v. Vajra Chemicals, AIR 1997 SC 3059 : (1997) 7 SCC 76.

65. Heramba Brahma v. State of Assam, AIR 1982 SC 1595 : (1982) 3 SCC 351; D.V. Shanmugham v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1997 SC 2583 : (1997) 5 SCC 349.

66. Suresh Kumar Jain v. Shanti Swarup Jain, AIR 1997 SC 2291, at 2298 : (1997) 9 SCC 298.

67. State of Rajasthan v. H.V.Hotels (P) Ltd., (2007) 2 SCC 468, 475 : AIR 2007 SC 1122; K.A. Nagamani v. Indian Airlines, (2009) 5 SCC 515 : (2009) 4 JT 674.

time in appeal before it, especially when the new plea is founded on facts.[68] For example, the Supreme Court did not permit the plea of mala fides being raised before it for the first time as it being essentially a question of fact needed to be supported by relevant material.[69] Again whether there is a novation or alteration of a contract is a mixed question of law and fact and cannot be raised before the Supreme Court for the first time.[70] A document which is produced by the respondent for the first time at the stage of arguments can be considered if it forms the basis of the petitioner's claim.[71]

If, however, a point of fact plainly arises on the record, or a point of law is relevant and material and can be decided on the basis of material on record without any further evidence being taken,[72] or the plea was urged before the trial court and was rejected but was not then repeated before the High Court, or if it is a question of considerable importance likely to arise in similar suits, or if it goes to the jurisdiction of the lower court, the Supreme Court may permit the plea to be raised.[73] If it is a pure question of law going to the root of the case, the plea may be allowed to be raised with the permission of the Court.[74]

In one case, the Supreme Court permitted the question of constitutional validity of the relevant statute to be raised for the first time before it. Accordingly, the

---

68. R.J. Singh Ahluwalia v. Delhi, AIR 1971 SC 1552 : (1970) 3 SCC 451; Chinta Lingam v. Union of India, (1970) 3 SCC 768 : AIR 1971 SC 474. Deputy Custodian General of Evacuee Property v. Daulat Ram, AIR 1973 SC 1381 : (1973) 3 SCC 621; S.N. Mathur v. R.K. Mission, AIR 1974 SC 2241 : (1974) 2 SCC 730; Surendra Kumar Aggarwal v. Satya Varshneya, AIR 1981 SC 1234 : (1979) 4 SCC 750; K.L. Malhotra v. Smt. Prakash Mehra, AIR 1991 SC 99 : (1991) 4 SCC 512; State of Madhya Pradesh v. Nandlal Jaiswal, AIR 1987 SC 251 : (1986) 4 SCC 566.

69. Jindal Industries Ltd. v. State of Haryana, AIR 1991 SC 1832 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 587. Also, Bhandara Distt. Central Coop. Bank Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1993 SC 59 : 1993 Supp (3) SCC 259; Municipal Commr. Chinchwad New Township Municipal Council v. Century Enka Ltd., (1995) 6 SCC 152 : AIR 1996 SC 187. See also Ramesh Chand Ardawatiya v. Anil Panjwani, (2003) 7 SCC 350 : AIR 2003 SC 2508; State of Punjab v. Darshan Singh, (2004) 1 SCC 328 : AIR 2003 SC 4179; Sopan Sukhdeo Sable v. Asst. Charity Commr., (2004) 3 SCC 137, 151 : AIR 2004 SC 1801*; State. v. V. Jayapaul,* (2004) 5 SCC 223, 229 : AIR 2004 SC 2684*; Durgo Bai v. State of Punjab,* (2004) 7 SCC 144, 148 : AIR 2004 SC 4170*; CCE v. J.K. Udaipur Udyog Ltd.,* (2004) 7 SCC 344, 352 : AIR 2004 SC 4437*; Sidheshwar Sahakari Sakhar Karkhana Ltd. v. CIT,* (2004) 12 SCC 1, 24 : AIR 2004 SC 4716*; Vividh Marbles (P.) Ltd. v. Commercial Tax Officer,* (2007) 3 SCC 580, 586 : (2007) 4 JT 448.

70. Shakti Tubes Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2009) 7 SCC 673, 684 : (2009) 9 JT 386.

71. Ramashray Singh v. New India Assurance Co. Ltd., (2003) 10 SCC 664 : AIR 2003 SC 2877.

72. State of Rajasthan v. K.C. Thapar, AIR 1965 SC 913; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Anupam Gupta, AIR 1992 SC 932 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 594; Bhanwar Lal v. T.K.A. Abdul Karim, AIR 1992 SC 2166 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 626; National Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Swaranlata Das, AIR 1993 SC 1259. *M. Gurudas v. Rasasanjan, (*2006) 8 SCC 367 : AIR 2006 SC 3275.

73. B.K. Bhandar v. Dhamangaon Municipality, AIR 1966 SC 249 : 1965 (3) SCR 499; Chandrika v. Bhaiyalal, AIR 1973 SC 2391 : (1973) 2 SCC 474; Most Rev. P.M.A. Metropolitan v. Moran Mar Marthoma, AIR 1995 SC 2001 : 1995 Supp (4) SCC 286; Vasant Kumar Radhakisan Vora v. Board of Trustees of the Port of Bombay, AIR 1991 SC 14 : (1991) 1 SCC 761; Union of India v. Baleshwar Singh, (1994) Supp (2) SCC 587 : 1994 SCC (L&S) 1158.

74. Vimal Chandra Grover v. Bank of India, (2000) 5 SCC 122, at 134 : AIR 2000 SC 2181; Kunal Singh v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 524: AIR 2003 SC 1623*; Municipal Corpn. of Greater Mumbai v. Kamla Mills Ltd.,* (2003) 6 SCC 315 : AIR 2003 SC 2998*; Union of India v. Upper Ganges Sugar & Industries Ltd.,* (2005) 1 SCC 750 : AIR 2005 SC 778*; Ajit Kumar Nag v. General Manager (PJ) Indian Oil Corporation,* (2005) 7 SCC 764 : AIR 2005 SC 4217*; Pushpa Devi Bhagat v. Rajinder Singh,* (2006) 5 SCC 566, 575 : AIR 2006 SC 2628.

Supreme Court set aside the High Court's judgment and sent the matter back to it so that it may decide the question of constitutional validity of the Act.[75]

In a preventive detention case, the Court allowed a new plea to be raised, viz., non-consideration of detenu's representation by the government, because the plea was important as it was fatal to detention and it could be determined on the material available to the Court.[76]

(g) APPEALS IN CRIMINAL CASES

The Scope of Article 134 providing for appeals to the Supreme Court in criminal matters is limited. On the other hand, Article 136 is very broad-based and confers a discretion on the Court to hear appeals "in any cause or matter." Therefore, criminal appeals may be brought to the Supreme Court under Article 136 when these are not covered by Article 134,[77] or when the High Court refuses to grant a fitness certificate, or the certificate has not been granted properly, or when the matter falls outside the Act of Parliament extending criminal appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

It is in the area of criminal cases that the residuary jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is very frequently invoked. The Supreme Court, however, does not grant leave to appeal in criminal matters liberally. It does so only when exceptional and special circumstances exist, substantial and grave injustice has been done, and the case in question presents features of sufficient gravity to warrant a review of the decision appealed against, or there has been a departure from legal procedure such as vitiates the whole trial, or if the findings of fact "were such as were shocking" to the judicial conscience of the Court.[78]

As under Article 134(1)(c), so under Article 136, the Supreme Court does not act as an ordinary court of criminal appeal to which every High Court judgment in a criminal case can be brought up for scrutiny of its correctness. The Court does not, generally speaking, allow facts to be reopened, or act as a court to review evidence.[79] These rules are not, however, absolute; these rules constitute a self-imposed restriction by the Court, and may be relaxed whenever there has been a failure of justice.

If the trial is vitiated by some illegality or irregularity of procedure, if it "shocks the conscience of the Court," or if "by disregard to the forms of legal process or some violation of the principles of natural justice or otherwise" sub-

---

75. M/s Noorulla Ghazanfarulla v. Municipal Board of Aligarh, AIR 1981 SC 2176 : (1982) 1 SCC 484.

76. Harish Pahwa v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 1126 : (1981) 2 SCC 710. Also see, K.P.M. Basheer v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 1353 : (1992) 2 SCC 295.

77. Supra, Sec. C(iv)(d).

78. Pritam Singh v. State, AIR 1950 SC 169 : 1950 SCR 453; Sadhu Singh v. Pepsu, AIR 1954 SC 271 : 1954 Cr LJ 727; Haripada Dey v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1956 SC 757 : 1956 SCR 639; Ram Jag v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 606 : (1974) 4 SCC 201; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ballabh Das, AIR 1985 SC 1384 : (1985) 3 SCC 703; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ram Swarup, AIR 1988 SC 1028 : 1988 Supp SCC 262; State of U.P. v. Pheru Singh, AIR 1989 SC 1205 : 1989 Supp (1) SCC 288; Mahesh v. Delhi, (1991) Cr LJ 439; State of U.P. v. Anil Singh, AIR 1988 SC 1998 : 1988 Supp SCC 686.

79. Mohinder Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1965 SC 79 : 1965 (1) Cr LJ 112; Gokul v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1972 SC 209 : (1972) 4 SCC 812; Krishan Lal v. State of Haryana, AIR 1980 SC 1252 : (1980) 3 SCC 159; Sheonandan Paswan v. State of Bihar, AIR 1987 SC 877; Suresh Chandra Bahri v. State of Bihar, AIR 1994 SC 2420; Arjun v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1994 SC 2507.

stantial and grave injustice has been done, or there is no evidence to support the findings of fact, or the conclusions of the High Court are manifestly perverse, are based on surmises and conjectures and are unsupportable by evidence, the Supreme Court may go behind the findings of fact arrived at by the courts below.[80]

The Court does not interfere with concurrent findings "unless the findings are vitiated by errors of law, or the conclusions reached by the courts below are so patently opposed to well-established principles as to amount to miscarriage of justice," or where the interest of justice so requires.[81] In Mathura Prashad v. State of Madhya Pradesh,[82] the Supreme Court interfered with concurrent findings of fact of the courts below on the ground that the findings "suffer from the vice of perversity".

The Supreme Court does not permit a fresh plea, not raised before any court earlier, to be raised before it in a special appeal. But it may permit a jurisdictional point, or a point of pure law which goes to the root of the case, to be raised before it.[83] In R.J. Singh v. Delhi,[84] prosecution of the appellant under the Prevention of Corruption Act was sanctioned by the Ministry of Industrial Development. Under the Business Allocation Rules, it should have been sanctioned by the Home Ministry. The Supreme Court permitted challenge to the validity of the sanction even though it had not been raised earlier. The Court sustained the objection and, consequently, the prosecution failed.

The accused claimed for the first time before the Supreme Court that he was aged below 18 years on the date of occurrence of the offence and so he was entitled to the benefits of the State Children Act.[85] Ordinarily the Supreme Court would not entertain such a fact based new plea. But the Court deviated from this technical rule in the instant case having regard to the underlying intendment and beneficial provisions of the socially progressive statute read with Art. 39(b) of the Constitution.[86]

The Supreme Court does not interfere with the sentence passed by the lower courts unless there is an illegality in it, or it is harsh or unjust in the facts and cir-

---

80. Nihal Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1965 SC 26; Rahim Beg v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 343; Balak Ram v. State of U.P., AIR 1974 SC 2165; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Babul Nath, (1994) 6 SCC 29 : 1994 SCC (Cri) 1585; Dukhmochan Pandey v. State of Bihar, (1997) 8 SCC 405; Meena v. State of Maharashtra, (2000) 7 SCC 21 : 2000 CrLJ 2273.

81. Budhsen v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1970 SC 1321; State of U.P. v. Sheo Ram, AIR 1974 SC 2267; Dulichand v. Delhi Administration, AIR 1975 SC 1960; Rafiq v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 559; Indira Kaur v. Sheo Lal Kapoor, AIR 1988 SC 1074; Balak Ram v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1974 SC 2165; Lala Ram v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 1185; Nain Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1991) 2 SCC 432; Ranbir Yadav v. State of Bihar, AIR 1995 SC 1219; Lal Mandi v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1995 SC 2265; Ram Sanjiwan Singh v. State of Bihar, (1996) 8 SCC 552; S. Gopal Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1996 SC 2184; Nayudu Srihari v. State of Andhra Pradesh, (1996) 10 SCC 393; State of Punjab v. Jugraj Singh, JT 2002 (2) SC 147 : (2002) 3 SCC 234; Sukhbir Singh v. State of Haryana, (2002) 3 SCC 327 : AIR 2002 SC 1168.

82. AIR 1992 SC 49. Also see, State of Uttar Pradesh v. Dan Singh, AIR 1997 SC 1654; Ramanbhai Naranbhai Patel v. State of Gujarat, (2000) 6 SCC 359 : AIR 2000 SC 2587; Orsu Venkat Rao v. State of A.P., (2004) 13 SCC 243 : AIR 2004 SC 4961.

83. Sahib Singh Mehra v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1965 SC 1451; Asst. Collector v. N.T.Co. of India, AIR 1972 SC 2563; B.C. Goswami v. Delhi Administration, AIR 1973 SC 1457 : (1974) 3 SCC 85.

84. AIR 1971 SC 1552 : (1970) 3 SCC 451.

85. Gopinath Ghosh v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1984 SC 237 : 1984 Supp SCC 228.

86. For Art. 39(b), see, Ch. XXXIV, infra.

cumstances of the case, or it is unduly lenient, or it involves any question of principle, or where the High Court does not exercise its discretion judicially on the question of sentence.[87] Although the Court will not ordinarily make an order placing the appellant in a more disadvantageous position had the appeal not been preferred[88] in a criminal appeal by an accused against the sentence imposed by the High Court, the sentence was in fact enhanced.[89]

The Supreme Court does not interfere with the High Court's finding of acquittal unless that finding is clearly unreasonable, or unsatisfactory, or perverse, or manifestly illegal, or grossly unjust, or is vitiated by some glaring infirmity in the appraisal of evidence,[90] or the High Court completely misdirects itself in reversing the order of conviction by the trial court, or it results in gross miscarriage of justice.[91] The fact that another view could also have been taken of the evidence on record would not justify interference with the judgment of acquittal.[92] And though in criminal matters ordinarily the Court does not interfere with concurrent findings of fact but can in an appropriate case it may do so for the ends of justice.[93]

In Arunachalam v. P.S.R. Setharatnam ,[94] the Supreme Court considered an important question having a bearing on criminal appeals under Art. 136. A was acquitted of murder charge on appeal by the High Court. The State did not file an appeal against this decision, but the brother of the deceased got leave to appeal to the Supreme Court on appraisal of evidence, the Court set aside the order of acquittal and convicted A. Objections raised on behalf of the accused relating to the maintainability of the special leave petition under Art. 136 were rejected. CHINNAPPA REDDY, J., speaking for the Court laid emphasis on the plenary appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under Art. 136 and observed:

---

87. State of Maharashtra v. M.H. George, AIR 1965 SC 722 : 1965 (1) SCR 123; Nathusingh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1973 SC 2783 : (1974) 3 SCC 584; Kodavandi v. State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC 467 : (1973) 3 SCC 469.

88. Jamshed Hormusji Wadia v. Board of Trustees, Port of Mumbai, (2004) 3 SCC 214, 244 : AIR 2004 SC 1815.

89. Deo Narain Mandal v. State of UP, (2004) 7 SCC 257 : AIR 2004 SC 5150. See also Gir Prasad v. State of UP., (2005) 13 SCC 372 : (2006) 2 SCC (Cr) 250.

90. Deputy Chief Controller v. Kosalram, AIR 1971 SC 1283; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Sahai, AIR 1981 SC 1442 : (1982) 1 SCC 352; State of U.P. v. Hari Ram, AIR 1983 SC 1081 : (1983) 4 SCC 453; Rajesh Kumar v. Dharamvir, (1997) 4 SCC 496 : 1997 CRLJ 2242; Satbir v. Surat Singh, AIR 1997 SC 1160; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Abdul, AIR 1997 SC 2512 : (1997) 10 SCC 135; Anvaruddin v. Shakoor, AIR 1990 SC 1242 : (1990) 3 SCC 266; Gauri Shankar Sharma v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1990 SC 709 : 1990 Supp SCC 656; State of U.P. v. Banne, (2009) 4 SCC 271 : (2009) 3 JT 552. For Art. 39(b), see, Ch. XXXIV, infra.

91. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Ashok Kumar Srivastava, AIR 1992 SC 840 : (1992) 2 SCC 86; State of Rajasthan v. Narayan, AIR 1992 SC 2004 : (1992) 3 SCC 615; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Anil Singh, AIR 1988 SC 1998; Appabhai v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1988 SC 696.

92. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Harihar Bux Singh, AIR 1974 SC 1890 : (1975) 3 SCC 167; State of U.P. v. Jashoda Nandan Singh, AIR 1974 SC 753; Mohan Lal Hargovind Dass v. Ram Narain, AIR 1980 SC 1743; State of Andhra Pradesh v. P. Anjaneyulu, AIR 1982 SC 1598; Mool Chand v. Jagdish Singh Bedi, (1993) (2) SCC 714 : 1993 SCC (Cri) 767; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Dan Singh, AIR 1997 SC 1654 : (1997) 3 SCC 747; State of Maharashtra v. Ashok Chotelal Shukla, AIR 1997 SC 3111; State of Punjab v. Karnail Singh, 2003 11 SCC 271 : AIR 2003 SC 3609; Shri Gopal v. Subhash, (2004) 13 SCC 174, 180 : AIR 2004 SC 4900.

93. S.V.L.Murthy v. State represented by CBI, Hyderabad, (2009) 6 SCC 77.

94. AIR 1979 SC 1284 : (1979) 2 SCC 297.

> "It is now the well established practice of this Court to permit the invocation of the power under Art. 136 only in very exceptional circumstances, as and when a question of law of general public importance arises or a decision shocks the conscience of the Court. But, within the restrictions imposed by itself, this Court has undoubted power to interfere even with findings of fact, making no distinction between judgments of acquittal or conviction, if the High Court, in arriving at those findings, has acted "perversely or otherwise improperly".

Of special significance are the observations of the Court on the question whether a private party, distinguished from the state, could invoke the Court's jurisdiction under Art. 136. The Court observed on this point:

> "Appellate power vested in the Supreme Court under Art. 136 of the Constitution is not to be confused with ordinary appellate power exercised by appellate courts and appellate tribunals under specific statutes…. It is a plenary power 'exercisable outside the purview of ordinary law' to meet the pressing demands of justice… Art. 136 of the Constitution neither confers on anyone the right to invoke the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court or inhibits anyone from invoking the Court's jurisdiction. The power is vested in the Supreme Court but the right to invoke the Court's jurisdiction is vested in no one. The exercise of the power of the Supreme Court is not circumscribed by any limitation as to who may invoke it."

Therefore A moved a petition in the Supreme Court challenging the constitutional validity of these proceedings vis-a-vis Art. 21. In P.S.R. Sadhanantham v. Arunachalam,[1] the main question to consider was: Did the brother of the deceased have locus standi to file the appeal? The Supreme Court refused to hold that the brother of the deceased could be regarded as an "officious meddler" who had no business nor grievance when the commission of a grievous crime was going unpunished. Art. 136 is a "special jurisdiction"; it is a "residuary power" "extraordinary in its amplitude". The Court advocated a liberalisation of the traditional, narrow, rule of locus standi.

This case establishes the position that the powers of the Supreme Court in appeals under Art. 136 are not restricted by the appellate provisions contained in the Criminal Procedure Code, or any other statute. When exercising appellate jurisdiction, the Supreme Court has power to pass any order.[2]

The power has also been utilized suo motu to direct retrial and to transfer criminal trials outside a State [3]to transfer proceedings pending before the High Court to itself;[4]to transfer an undertrial prisoner to another jail;[5]to direct an enquiry by the Registrar General of the Supreme Court to assess whether a witness had been coerced into giving contradictory evidence and if so who coerced her.[6]While allowing the appeal of an accused, an order of acquittal was recorded in favour of a non- appealing co-accused[7] and in respect of a co-accused whose

---

1. AIR 1980 SC 856 : (1980) 3 SCC 141.
2. Delhi Judicial Service Association v. State of Gujarat, (1991) 4 SCC 2176 : (1991) 4 SCC 406; Chandrakant Patil v. State, AIR 1998 SC 1165 : (1998) 3 SCC 38.
3. Zahira Habibullah Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 4 SCC 158 : AIR 2004 SC 3114.
4. Kalyan Chandra Sarkar v. Rajesh Ranjan, (2005) 1 SCC 801 : 2005 SC (Cr) 449.
5. Ibid.
6. Zahira Habibullah Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2005) 4 SCC 292 : 2005 SCC (Cr) 931.
7. Gurucharan Kumar v. State of Rajasthan, (2003) 2 SCC 698; Pawan Kumar v. State of Haryana, (2003) 11 SCC 241 : AIR 2003 SC 2987*; Anjlus Dungdung v. State of Jharkhand*, (2005) 9 SCC 765 : AIR 2005 SC 1394.

special leave petition had been dismissed[8] and the sentence imposed had been undergone.[9]

E. APPEALS FROM TRIBUNALS UNDER ART. 136

An outstanding feature of Article 136(1) is that it empowers the Supreme Court to hear appeals not only from courts but also from tribunals in any cause or matter.

In the modern era of 'social welfare' state, there is a vast extension in governmental operations, activities and responsibilities so much so that it is known as the administrative age. Many functions undertaken by a modern government give rise to opportunities for adjudication and, thus, India along with other democratic countries has come to have a host of varied adjudicatory bodies outside the regular judicial hierarchy.[10]

Though the Indian Constitution makes provisions for a well-ordered and well-regulated judicial system, yet it will be wrong to assume that the courts monopolise the entire business of adjudication. Side by side with the courts, a plethora of bodies and officials also carry on adjudicatory functions under powers conferred on them by legislation and determine innumerable classes of applications, claims and controversies between the administration and individuals, or between the individuals themselves. Most of these adjudicatory bodies are characterised as "quasi-judicial", indicating thereby that these are not courts "pure and simple", butpartake of some features of both courts as well as the administration. 'Quasi-judicial' indicates a process which is both judicial as well as administrative at one and the same time.[11]

In this context, the use of the word 'tribunal' in Article 136 assumes a special significance, for it indicates that the Supreme Court can hear appeals from the decisions of such bodies as may not be courts in the traditional sense. The word 'tribunal' has been used in Art. 136 in contradistinction to 'courts'. While all courts are tribunals, all tribunals are not courts. As innumerable adjudicatory bodies function outside the judicial hierarchy, it is extremely desirable that there be some forum to correct any misuse of power or procedural irregularities committed by such bodies. This function is now discharged by the Supreme Court under Article 136. To leave these innumerable adjudicatory bodies outside the pale of any judicial control would be to create innumerable little despots which could misuse their powers, or exercise them improperly, and thus negate the concept of Rule of Law.

The statutes creating these bodies may at times provide for some form of judicial control over them, but many a time, the statutes provide for no such control; on the other hand, some statutes even go to the extent of declaring decisions by these bodies "final," thus barring a recourse to courts, under ordinary legal processes, by an individual suffering from a sense of grievance against a decision of

---

8. Akhil Ali Jehangir Ali Sayyed v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 708 : 2005 SCC (Cr) 931.

9. Lella Srinivasa Rao v. State of A.P., (2004) 9 SCC 713, 719 : AIR 2004 SC 1720.

10. On Administrative Adjudication, see, JAIN, TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, Ch. XIV; JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADMN. LAW, II, Ch. XIII.

11. For discussion on the Tribunal system in India, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMN. LAW, I, Ch. XIII; JAIN, INDIAN ADMN. LAW—CASES AND MATERIALS, II, Chs. XII.

such an adjudicatory body. The great merit of Article 136 is that, irrespective of any statutory provision to the contrary, the Supreme Court can control these adjudicatory bodies by hearing appeals from their decisions and pronouncements. Without some kind of judicial control there is a danger that tribunals might degenerate into arbitrary bodies, which would be foreign to a democratic constitution. This is the heart of the matter and the reason why the Supreme Court should exercise jurisdiction over tribunals.

(a) WHAT IS A TRIBUNAL?

Regarding the exercise of the Supreme Court's jurisdiction over tribunals, the first relevant question to answer is : what is a 'tribunal'?

Whether a body would be deemed to be a 'tribunal' or not under Art. 136, is a question full of difficulties. Definitive norms have not yet been laid down to answer the same with certainty, and the result has not always been rational. As for example, the Central Board of Revenue exercising appellate power under s. 190, and the Central Government exercising power under s. 191 of the Sea Customs Act have been held to be tribunals, but not the customs officers even though they also exercise some judicial powers.[12]

First and foremost, for a body to be a tribunal it should be a quasi-judicial body, exercising some judicial function. This in itself is quite a difficult question to answer and a full discussion on it can be had more properly under Administrative law.[13]

No body which is purely administrative or executive or legislative in nature without exercising any judicial functions would fall under the purview of Art. 136.[14]

For a body to fall under the purview of Art. 136, it does not have to be a fullfledged court; it is sufficient if it exercises quasi-judicial functions.[15] But then, while most of the quasi-judicial bodies may be held to be tribunals, it is not necessary that each and every such body may be so characterised.

The very first case which came before the Supreme Court calling for characterization of the term 'tribunal' in Art. 136 was Bharat Bank v. Employees of Bharat Bank.[16] The question which arose before the Supreme Court in the instant case was whether the Supreme Court could entertain an appeal under Art. 136 against an award of an industrial tribunal.

MUKHERJEA, J., who was in the minority expressed a negative view on this question. He took the view that the tribunal's function was merely an extended form of the process of collective bargaining and was more akin to administrative rather than to judicial functions. In his view, therefore, the Supreme Court could not grant special leave to appeal from an award of an industrial tribunal. On the other hand, the majority took an affirmative view. The majority view was that

---

12. Indo-China Steam Navigation v. Jasjit Singh, AIR 1964 SC 1140 : (1964) 6 SCR 594.
13. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMN. LAW, I, Ch. IX; JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, I, Ch. VIII. Also, infra, Ch. VIII under "Certiorari".
14. Bharat Bank v. Employees of Bharat Bank, supra; Express Newspapers v. Union of India, AIR 1958 SC 578 : 1959 SCR 12.
15. B.K. Bhandar v. Dhamangaon Manicipality, AIR 1966 SC 249 : 1965 (3) SCR 499; Chandrika v. Bhaiyalal, AIR 1973 SC 2391 : (1973) 2 SCC 474.
16. AIR 1950 SC 188 : 1950 SCR 459.

while the tribunal was not a court, its functions and duties, nevertheless, were of the same nature as those of a body discharging judicial functions. According to the tribunal rules, evidence is taken, witnesses are examined, cross-examined and re-examined.

According to MAHAJAN, J., the industrial tribunal has all the necessary attributes of a court of justice. It discharges no other function except that of adjudicating a dispute. Such a tribunal could be characterised as a quasi-judicial body because it is outside the regular judicial hierarchy. Nevertheless, it discharges functions which are basically judicial in nature. Accordingly, it was held that the Supreme Court could grant special leave to appeal under Art. 136 against an award of an industrial tribunal.

The Supreme Court observed in Bharat Bank:[17]

> "The intention of the Constitution by the use of the word 'tribunal' in the article seems to have been to include within the scope of Article 136 tribunals adorned with similar trappings as court but strictly not coming within that definition."

This was an epoch-making decision as it gave an expansive orientation to Art. 136 and at the same time brought the vast net-work of quasi-judicial bodies under judicial control which would promote Rule of Law in the country. It clarified that the expression "tribunal" as used in Art. 136 does not mean a court, but includes within its ambit all adjudicatory bodies, provided they are constituted by the state and are invested with judicial, as distinguished from purely administrative or executive, functions.

In Jaswant Sugar Mills v. Lakshmi Chand,[18] a conciliation officer acting under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1950, while granting or refusing permission to alter the terms of employment of the workmen at the instance of the employer, was held to be not a tribunal, although he acts in a quasi-judicial capacity in the matter. To be a tribunal, a body, besides being under a duty to act judicially, should be one which has been constituted by, and invested with a part of the judicial function of, the state. An order passed by the Chief Justice of the High Court at Allahabad transferring case from the Lucknow Bench to the Allahabad Bench was held to be a judicial order passed by a tribunal justifying interference under Art. 136.[19]

In deciding whether an authority acting judicially and dealing with the right of the citizens is a tribunal or not, the principal incident is the investiture of the 'trappings of a court', such as, authority to determine matters in cases initiated by parties, sitting in public, power to compel attendance of witnesses and to examine them on oath, duty to follow fundamental rules of evidence (though not the strict rules of the Evidence Act), provision for imposing sanctions by way of imprisonment, fine, damages, or mandatory or prohibitory orders to enforce obedience to their commands. The list is illustrative; some, though not necessarily all such trappings, will ordinarily make the authority which is under a duty to act judicially, a 'tribunal'.

---

17. AIR 1950 SC 188, 195 : 1950 SCR 459.
18. AIR 1963 SC 677 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 242.
19. Manju Varma (Dr.) v. State of U.P., (2005) 1 SCC 73 : (2004) 9 JT 569.

As regards the conciliation officer, no procedure is prescribed for the investigation to be made by him; he is not required to sit in public; no formal pleadings are tendered; he is not empowered to compel attendance of witnesses. He does not deliver a determinative judgment or makes an award affecting the rights and obligations of the parties. He is not constituted to adjudicate on industrial disputes. His order merely removes a statutory ban in certain eventualities laid upon the common law right of an employer to dismiss, discharge or alter the terms of employment according to contract between the parties. Thus, not invested with the judicial power of the state, a conciliation officer cannot be regarded as a 'tribunal'.

Similarly, the Court refused to hear an appeal from an arbitrator appointed under s. 10A of the Industrial Disputes Act. He has been held not to be a tribunal because he lacks the basic, the essential, the fundamental requisite of being a tribunal, viz., of being invested with the inherent judicial power of the state. The appointment of an arbitrator is based on the agreement of the parties concerned and he is, thus, a nominee not of the state but of private parties. To be a tribunal, the power of adjudication must be derived from a statute or statutory rule and not from an agreement of parties.[20]

Following Jaswant Sugar, the Supreme Court has ruled in Meenakshi,[21] that the appropriate Government or authority while granting or refusing permission for retrenchment of workmen under section 25-N of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, is not a tribunal. The power of the Government is not very different from that of a conciliation officer. The Court has also ruled that the decision taken by the Government under section 25-N permitting retrenchment of workers is not final as it could lead to an industrial dispute.

Whether a body is a 'tribunal' or not can be decided by applying several tests:

(i) it should not be an 'administrative' body pure and simple, but a 'quasi-judicial' body as well;

(ii) it should be under an obligation to act 'judicially';

(iii) it should have some 'trappings of a court';

(iv) it should be constituted by the state;

(v) the state should confer on it its inherent judicial power, i.e., power to adjudicate upon disputes.

These criteria are not exhaustive but 'illustrative'. A body does not have to fulfil all these criteria to be characterised as a tribunal. How much of each of these criteria should a body possess before being characterised as a 'tribunal' has been left vague and indefinite.

The fact is that many of the statements made by the Supreme Court in the two cases, viz. Jaswant Sugar Mills and Hind Cycles, describing the characteristics of a tribunal are tautological and circular, and some of the tests are overlapping, or of not much substance. For example, to insist that a body should not be 'administrative' but 'quasi-judicial' and, further, to insist that it should have inherent judicial power of the state, appear to be tautological, for how can a body be 'judicial' or 'quasi-judicial' without having the state's judicial power. The fact that a body is quasi-judicial and thus adjudicates upon disputes shows that it has some inherent judicial power. Similarly, to lay too much emphasis on 'trappings of a court' to judge whether a body has judicial power or not is to make external forms, rather than intrinsic nature of its function, determinative of the nature of the body.

20. Engineering Mazdoor Sabha v. Hind Cycles, AIR 1963 SC 874 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 625.
21. Workmen of Meenakshi Mills Ltd. v. Meenakshi Mills Ltd., AIR 1994 SC 2696, 2717 : (1992) 3 SCC 336.

In many cases cited above, e.g., Hari Nagar Sugar Mills and Indo-China Steam Navigation, the Central Government, or the Board of Revenue have been held to be 'tribunals' even though these bodies hardly exhibit any trappings of a court. And, in many cases, the Court has first decided whether the body is 'quasi-judicial' or not, and then proceeded to see whether it has followed principles of 'natural justice' or not.[22]

It is common knowledge that statutes create adjudicatory bodies without prescribing the procedure they have to follow and, in such cases, courts insist that these bodies follow natural justice which guarantees the minimal basic features of a judicial procedure. There is thus no need to insist, nor has it been done invariably in every case, that a body should follow a more elaborate procedure than natural justice to be called a tribunal.

Insisting too much on external features would result in a large number of adjudicative bodies becoming free from judicial review, resulting in a negation of the Rule of Law on which the Court itself has laid so much emphasis from time to time. Perhaps, it may be more rational and simpler to put the matter in a different perspective.

What the Court appears to be saying in substance in the Jaswant Sugar Mills case, shorn of all verbiage, is that a conciliation officer, although he follows a quasi-judicial procedure of hearing the parties, etc., before he makes some orders, is not actually performing an adjudicatory function, as he does not seek to decide on the rights and wrongs of a labour-management controversy. What he seeks to do is to bring the contesting parties together and iron out differences between them by the process of persuasion and negotiation. This implies that even though he acts in a non-partisan and impartial manner, and in some matters after hearing the parties concerned, in the totality of his functioning he is only seeking to promote a compromise between the parties and is not himself engaged in adjudication upon the dispute.

A distinction can certainly be drawn between a quasi-judicial adjudicatory body and one which, though following a quasi-judicial procedure, is non-adjudicatroy in nature. Looked at from this angle, Jaswant Sugar Mills case raises no difficulty.

As regards Hind Cycles, this author had said in a previous edition:[23]

> The ruling in the Hind Cycles case is somewhat difficult to support on logical grounds, apart from policy considerations (which the Court might have had), of discouraging questions of labour-management relations from coming to it very often. Essentially, an arbitrator under s. 10A of the Industrial Disputes Act, derives his powers from the state-made statute, performs the same task as an industrial tribunal, viz., that of adjudication (and not reconciliation), follows a quasi-judicial procedure and gives a binding and enforceable award. He does > not fundamentally differ from a labour tribunal, and the parties only decide as to 'who' should act as an arbitrator and on what matter would he adjudicate and for the rest he functions within the four walls of the Act. The Court has itself accepted that his position is higher than that of an ordinary arbitrator under the Arbitration Act. All these attributes are, therefore, sufficient to make him a tribunal.

22. Siemens Eng. & Mfg. Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1976 SC 1785 : (1976) 2 SCC 981.
23. JAIN, INDIAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 138 (1987).

Since then, in Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd. v. Its Mazdoor Union,[24] the Supreme Court has held that an arbitrator appointed under s. 10A of the I.D.A can be regarded as a 'tribunal' for purposes of s. 11A of the same Act. The Court has said that the arbitrator under s. 10A has power to bind even those who are not parties to the reference and the source of the force of the arbitrator's award derives from the parent statute. This ruling makes it possible to hold that such an arbitrator is a 'tribunal' for the purposes of Art. 136 as well.[25] Perhaps, one can say that Hind Cycles is no longer tenable in view of Gujarat Steel.

In the previous edition, this author had suggested:[26]

> It is, however, suggested that it would be simpler if the Court generally adopts the rule that it would hear appeals under Art. 136 from quasi-judicial bodies. Being a discretionary jurisdiction, the Court may refuse to grant leave to appeal in cases which raise no important issue, or may confine the appeal to such points as in its view need its thoughtful pronouncements. To draw a distinction between quasi-judicial bodies and tribunals, and that, too, by applying vague criteria, is only to make an already complicated law all the more difficult and uncertain.

The Supreme Court has now come very close to this position. Under Art. 324 of the Constitution read with the Election Symbols (Reservation and Allotment) Order, 1968, the Election Commission has power to adjudicate upon disputes with regard to recognition of political parties, or rival claims to a particular symbol for purposes of election. In A.P.H.L. Conference, Shillong v. W.A. Sangma,[27] the Supreme Court had to decide the question concerning the character of the Election Commission while adjudicating upon the dispute with regard to the recognition of political parties or rival claims to a particular symbol for purposes of election. The question was whether the Supreme Court could hear an appeal from the Election Commission while adjudicating upon such a dispute, which raised the question whether the Commission could be regarded as a 'tribunal' for purposes of Art. 136?

The Court answering in the affirmative pointed out that in previous decisions, several tests have been laid down to determine whether a particular body is a 'tribunal' or not for purposes of Art. 136. These tests are not exhaustive in all cases and not all these tests need be present in a given case. While some tests may be present others may be lacking. For a body to be a 'tribunal' it is absolutely necessary that it must be "constituted by the state" and it must be "invested" with "ju-

---

24. AIR 1980 SC 1896 : (1980) 2 SCC 593.
25. This appears to be implicit in Royal Education Society v. LIS (India) Construction Co. (P.) Ltd., (2009) 2 SCC 261 : AIR 2009 SC 1650 in which an award of an Arbitral Tribunal was modified.
26. JAIN, INDIAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 138 (1987).
27. AIR 1977 SC 2155 : (1977) 4 SCC 161.

dicial as distinguished from purely administrative or executive functions". This is an 'unfailing' test. According to the Court:[28]

> The principal test which must necessarily be present in determining the character of the authority as tribunal is whether that authority is empowered to exercise any adjudicating power of the state and whether the same has been conferred on it by any statute or a statutory rule.

The Court found that this test is fulfilled when the Election Commission is required to adjudicate a dispute between two parties. The Commission exercises a part of the State's judicial power which is conferred on it through Art. 324 and the rules made thereunder. In deciding this dispute, the Commission exercises a judicial function and has a duty to act judicially. Hence the Election Commission is a 'tribunal' while acting as such. Although the Commission has various administrative functions to discharge, but that does not mean that while adjudicating upon a dispute it does not exercise a judicial power conferred on it by the state.

It is not necessary for a body that the only function discharged by it ought to be adjudicatory before it can be characterised as a tribunal. A body may be regarded as administrative for certain purposes but quasi-judicial for other purposes. The question needs to be determined keeping in view the exercise of power with reference to the particular subject-matter although in some other matters the exercise of functions may be of a different kind. The Commission is created by the Constitution and is invested by law with not only administrative powers but also with certain judicial power of the state, however, fractional the same may be.[29]

The Supreme Court has held in Income-tax Commissioner, Calcutta v. B.N. Bhattacharya,[30] that the Settlement Commission established under the Income-tax Act is a 'tribunal' for the purpose of Art. 136. Its proceedings have been declared to be judicial as the Commission has considerable powers and its determinations affect the rights of the parties; its obligations are quasi-judicial. "When a body is created by statute and clothed with authority to determine rights and duties of partics and to impose pains and penalties on them it satisfies the test laid down in Associated Cement Co. case."[31]

Under Art. 136, the Supreme Court has heard appeals, among others, from the following adjudicatory bodies holding them to be tribunals:

(1) Industrial Tribunal functioning under the Labour Disputes Act, 1947;[32]

(2) Central Administrative Tribunal;[33]

(3) Election Commission and election tribunals;[34]

---

28. Ibid, at 2163.

29. For Election Commission, see, Ch. XIX, infra.
The main function of the Commission is to organise and supervise elections in the country which basically is an administrative function.

30. AIR 1979 SC 1724 : (1980) 3 SCC 54.

31. A.C. Companies v. P.N. Sharma, AIR 1965 SC 1595 : 1965 (2) SCR 366; see, footnote 44, infra.

32. Bharat Bank v. Employees of Bharat Bank, AIR 1950 SC 188 : 1950 SCR 459; J.K. Iron and Steel Co. v. Mazdoor Union, AIR 1956 SC 231 : 1955 (2) SCR 1315.

33. CSIR v. K.G.S. Bhatt, (1989) 4 SCC 635 : AIR 1989 SC 1972.

34. Durga Shankar v. Raghu Raj Singh, AIR 1954 SC 520 : 1955 (1) SCR 267.

(4) Railway Rates Tribunal;[35]

(5) Income-tax Appellate Tribunal[36] and Settlement Commission;[37]

(6) Custodian General acting under s. 27 of the Administration of Evacuee Property Act;[38]

(7) Authority under the Payment of Wages Act;[39]

(8) Central Government acting under section 111(3) of the Companies Act, 1956, while deciding a dispute regarding registration of shares between a company and the person who has purchased these shares;[40]

(9) Central Government exercising powers of revision under s. 30 of the Mines and Minerals (Regulation & Development) Act, 1957.[41]

(10) Central Government hearing appeals in customs matters;[42]

(11) State Government engaged in revisional proceedings under s. 7(F) of the U.P. (Temporary) Control of Rent and Eviction Act;[43]

(12) State Government acting under Rule 6(6) of the Punjab Welfare Officers Recruitment and Conditions of Service Rules, 1952, issued under the Factories Act, 1948;[44]

(13) Board of Revenue, Rajasthan.[45]

It can be seen from the above list that the Supreme Court has held that even the government while exercising adjudicatory powers under various statutes may be treated as a 'tribunal' and appeals heard therefrom.

At this stage, it is necessary to clarify one point. In Administrative Law, the term 'tribunal' is usually used for an adjudicatory body which is autonomous and independent of the Administration.[46]

But the significance attached to 'tribunal' in Art. 136 is much broader a concept as autonomy of the adjudictory body from the Administration is never an issue under Art. 136. This is evidenced by the fact that even the government acting in an adjudicatory capacity has been held to be a tribunal for purposes of Art. 136.

---

35. Raigarh Jute Mills v. Eastern Railway, AIR 1958 SC 525 : 1959 SCR 236; S.S. Light Railway Co. v. U.D. Sugar Mills Ltd., AIR 1960 SC 695 : 1960 (2) SCR 926.
36. Dhakeswari Cotton Mills Ltd. v. Commr. of Income-tax, AIR 1955 SC 65 : 1955 (1) SCR 941; Sovachand v. Commr., Income-tax, AIR 1959 SC 59.
37. CIT v. Bhattacharjee, AIR 1979 SC 1725 : (1979) 4 SCC 121.
38. Indira Sohan Lal v. Custodian, AIR 1956 SC 76; Purshotamlal v. Chamanlal, AIR 1961 SC 1371 : 1962 (1) SCR 297; Bishambhar Nath Kohli v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1966 SC 573 : 1966 (2) SCR 158.
39. Works Manager v. C.M. Pradhan, AIR 1959 SC 1226 : 1960 (1) SCR 137.
40. Harinagar Sugar Mills v. Shyam Sunder Jhunjhunwala, AIR 1961 SC 1669 : 1962 (2) SCR 339.
41. M.P. Industries Ltd. v. State of India, AIR 1966 SC 671; Shivji Nathubhai v. State of India, AIR 1960 SC 606 : 1960 (2) SCR 775.
42. Dunlop India Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1977 SC 597; Ahura Chemical Products v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 1782 : (1981) 4 SCC 277.
43. Shri Bhagwan v. Ram Chand, AIR 1965 SC 1767 : 1965 (3) SCR 218.
44. A.C. Companies v. P.N. Sharma, AIR 1965 SC 1595 : 1965 (2) SCR 366.
45. Delhi Cloth & General Mills v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1980 SC 1552 : (1980) 4 SCC 71.
46. See, footnote 13, cited on p. 338, supra.

The Speaker acting under the X Schedule to the Constitution (known as the Anti-Defection Law),[47] deciding a question of disqualification of a member of the Legislature arising as a result of his defection has been held to be a 'tribunal'.[48] But the Inquiry Committee under the Judges (Inquiry) Act[49] cannot be treated as a tribunal for the purposes of Art. 136 because the report of the Committee finding a Judge guilty of misbehaviour is merely in the nature of recommendation for his removal which may or may not be acted upon by Parliament. As the Committee's report holding that the Judge is guilty of any misbehaviour is not "final and conclusive", "it is legally not permissible to hold that the Committee is a tribunal under Art. 136." It is true that the Committee is to act judicially while investigating into the charges framed against the Judge. But its report is in the nature of a recommendation on which further action may or may not be taken by Parliament.[50]

The Court has maintained that one of the considerations to hold a statutory body as a tribunal under Art. 136 is 'finality' or 'conclusiveness' and the "binding nature of the determination by such authority".

On this basis, as discussed earlier, the committee appointed by the Speaker of the Lok Sabha/Chairman of the Rajya Sabha to inquire into the conduct of a Supreme Court Judge is not a tribunal for purposes of Art. 136.

The district judge has power to take disciplinary action against ministerial servants. It has been held that the High Court while exercising appellate power from the district judge does not act as a 'tribunal', but acts purely administratively since it does not resolve any dispute or controversy between two adversaries; it only exercises its power of control over the subordinate judiciary.[51] The Supreme Court has observed:

> "In certain matters even Judges have to act administratively and in so doing may have to act quasi-judicially in dealing with the matters entrusted to them. It is only where the authorities are required to act judicially either by express provisions of the statute or by necessary implication that the decision of such an authority would amount to a quasi-judicial proceeding. When Judges in exercise of their administrative functions decide cases it cannot be said that their decisions are either judicial or quasi-judicial decisions.... In the appeal before the High Court, the High Court was following its own procedure, a procedure not normally followed in judicial matters. The High Court was not resolving any dispute or controversy between two adversaries. In other words, while deciding this appeal there was no lis before the High Court. The High Court was only exercising its power of control while deciding this appeal...."[52]

It is submitted that the above observation is based on some confusion of ideas. According to the principles of Administrative Law, an administrative function discharged according to the principles of natural justice is characterised as quasi-judicial. There are many bodies which though do not decide any 'lis' yet act according to natural justice and are thus characterised as quasi-judicial. The High Court in hearing an appeal from district judge in disciplinary proceedings may

---

47. Supra, Ch. II.
48. Kihota Hollohon v. Zachilhu, AIR 1993 SC 412 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651.
49. Supra, Sec. B
50. Sarojini Ramaswami v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 2218, 2248 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 723; supra, Sec. B.
51. Infra, Ch. VIII, sec. F.
52. Dev Singh v. Registrar, Punjab & Haryana High Court, AIR 1987 SC 1629 : (1987) 3 SCC 169.

not follow the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, but it still has to follow natural justice.[53] There are any number of judicial pronouncements in which disciplinary proceedings against students, employees, government servants have been held to be quasi-judicial. Many bodies held to be tribunals (see the list above) do not decide any 'lis'. On this view, there is no reason why the district judge as well as the High Court in the above situation cannot be regarded as tribunals for purposes of Art. 136.

In contrast to the above, reference may be made to Commissioner of Police v. Registrar, Delhi High Court,[54] where the Supreme Court heard an appeal from a decision of the Administrative Committee of the Delhi High Court. The factual matrix in which the case arose was as follows: former Prime Minister Narasimha Rao was summoned to appear before a criminal court on a charge of bribing a few members of Parliament.[55] Narasimha Rao being entitled to proximate security under the Special Protection Group Act, 1988, the Commissioner of Police, Delhi, and the Director of the Special Protection Group applied to the Delhi High Court for permission to shift the venue of the trial from the Tis Hazari Complex to some other safe place in Delhi for security reasons. The Administrative Committee of five Judges of the High Court refused to concede the point. An appeal was then filed before the Supreme Court under Art. 136 read with Art. 142. The Court accepted the request of the Commissioner and quashed the decision of the High Court. Rejecting the objection that the kind of order passed by the Administrative Committee of the High Court being an administrative order, was not amenable to the Supreme Court's Jurisdiction under Art. 136,[56] the Court observed that its jurisdiction under Art. 136 "is plenary in nature and this Court can determine its own jurisdiction and its effort in that regard would be final." The Court also justified hearing the appeal in the instant case by stating that the appeal was filed not only under Art. 136 but under Art. 142 as well.

The case is an exception to the rule as here an acknowledged administrative decision has been held subject to an appeal to the Supreme Court under Art. 136. It is difficult to envisage what impact is this pronouncement going to have on the future growth of case-law in India under Art. 136. Will this case be treated, because of the delicacy of the matter involved, as a one time exception to the general rule that under Art. 136, the Supreme Court hears appeals only from quasi-judicial decisions, or will its lead to a relaxation of this rule, and give a new dimension to Art. 136 in the near future.

Then, the relevance of Art. 142 in this connection is not very clear. Art. 142 does not confer any additional appellate jurisdiction on the Supreme Court as such. Art. 142 enables the Court to make an order to do complete justice in the matter it is hearing in exercise of its jurisdiction. Art. 142 does not seem to expand the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. It does however enhance the power of the Court to give relief in a matter it is deciding. This means that the matter in question should otherwise fall within its jurisdiction.[57]

---

53. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, Chs. IX, XIII; JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, Chs. VIII, XII.
54. AIR 1997 SC 95.
55. See, Ch. II, supra, under "Parliamentary Privileges", Sec. L.
56. Reference was made in this connection to Dev Singh v. Registrar, P&H High Court, supra, footnote 52.
57. For discussion on Art. 142, see, infra, Sec. G.

Although the earlier view was that an order passed by the Chief Justice nominating an arbitrator under section 11 of the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996 was not appealable because the Chief Justice does not act as a tribunal[58], it has now been held that an order passed by the Chief Justice appointing an arbitrator is a judicial order[59] and hence is appealable[60].

(b) EXHAUSTION OF ALTERNATIVE REMEDIES

Another limitation imposed by the Supreme Court on itself is that it does not usually entertain appeals against an order of a tribunal unless the appellant has exhausted the alternative remedies provided by the relevant law. As for example, the Court has discouraged the practice, at times resorted to by the appellants, of seeking to move the Supreme Court straightaway from the tax tribunal without first taking recourse to the available technique of the tribunal making a reference to the High Court.[61]

The Court has imposed this restriction in view of the heavy rush of cases.

The rule of exhaustion of remedies, however, is not inflexible or rigid as it is a self-imposed restriction. This means that the Supreme Court may relax it if special circumstances are present.[62] Some examples of relaxation of this rule are given below:

(i) The Supreme Court heard an appeal from the C.T.O.'s order, without the appellant exhausting all his remedies. In the instant case, the C.T.O. instead of exercising his own judgment in the matter of assessment, followed, even against his own judgment, the instructions given to him by his superior officer. The assessee had not been given an opportunity to meet the point made against him by the superior officer. The assessment was thus made behind the assessee's back and there was thus breach of natural justice.[63]

(ii) The Supreme Court heard an appeal from the Income-tax Tribunal's order as there was breach of natural justice and the tribunal had refused to state a case to the High Court; the High Court had also refused to ask the tribunal to state a case to it.[64]

(iii) The Court heard an appeal from the Income-tax tribunal as the assessee had lost his remedy of reference to the High Court from the tribunal by one day's delay without his fault.[65]

---

58. Konkan Railway Corporation Lit. v. Rani constructions Pvt. Ltd., (2002) 2 SCC 388 : AIR 2002 SC 778.
59. SBP & Co. v. Patel Engg. Ltd., (2005) 8 SCC 618 : AIR 2006 SC 450.
60. Jain Studios Ltd. v. Shin Satellite Public Co Ltd., (2006) 5 SCC 501 : AIR 2006 SC 2686; See also Punjab Agro Industries Corpn. Ltd. v. Kewal Singh Dhillon, (2008) 10 SCC 128, at page 132 : (2008) 9 JT 256.
61. Ballabhdas v. State of Bihar, AIR 1966 SC 814 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 967; C.I.T. v. K.W. Trust, AIR 1967 SC 844 : 1967 (2) SCR 7.
62. Bal Ram Prasad Rawat v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 1575 : (1981) 3 SCC 249; S.G. Chemicals & Dyes Trading Employees' Union v. S.G. Chemicals & Dyes Trading Ltd., (1986) 2 SCC 624 : 1986 (2) SCR 126; M.V. "Vali Pero" v. Fernandeo Lopez, AIR 1989 SC 2206 : (1989) 4 SCC 671.
63. Mahadayal Premchandra v. C.T.O., AIR 1958 SC 667 : 1959 SCR 551.
64. Dhakeshwari Mills' case, AIR 1955 SC 65 : 1955 (1) SCR 941.
65. Baldeo Singh v. C.I.T., AIR 1961 SC 736. Also, C.I.T. v. National Finance, AIR 1963 SC 835 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 865.

(iv) The Supreme Court heard an appeal directly from the order of the Collector of Customs, without exhausting the statutory remedies available, as it raised some important points of law.[66]

(v) The Supreme Court granted special leave to appeal from the order of the Asst. Sales Tax Commissioner, without exhaustion of the remedies under the law. It would have been futile for the assessee to go to the High Court as on the point in issue it had already given a ruling in another case which was adverse to the assessee. The Supreme Court felt that it was one of those extraordinary cases where ends of justice would be better served by granting appeal and thus avoid a circuitry of action.[67]

(vi) It is not mandatory for an appellant under Art. 136 to have exhausted the remedy under Art. 226, the reason being that the High Court's jurisdiction under Art. 226 is discretionary and its scope is rather limited and so an appeal under Art. 136 cannot be thrown out on the ground that the appellant did not exhaust Art. 226.[68]

(vii) In the case mentioned below,[69] the Supreme Court heard an appeal directly against an assessment order made by the commercial tax officer without the assessee exhausting departmental remedies and the procedure by way of writ petition under Arts. 226 and 227.[70] The reason was that in another case, the High Court had already decided the law point against the assessee and there was, therefore, no point in again bringing the same law point before the High Court.

(c) GROUNDS FOR APPEAL

On what grounds does the Supreme Court hear appeals from the tribunals?

The matter has been considered by the Court in a large number of cases. While some general guidelines have been laid down in this connection, there emerges no specific general formula pertaining to it.

Art. 136(1) empowers the Supreme Court to grant special leave to appeal in its discretion. The provision is couched in very wide terms. The constitutional provision lays down no norms to regulate Court's discretion in the matter of hearing appeals. The Supreme Court's approach has been conditioned by two main considerations, viz.:

(i) the Court's power under Art. 136 is extraordinary and discretionary and should, therefore, be used in exceptional circumstances; and,

(ii) this power should be exercised whenever there is a miscarriage of justice.

Though wide and undefinable with exactitude is the power of the Court under Art. 136, yet the pre-requisites or its interference to set right the decisions of tribunals can generally be categorised as follows:

---

66. Indo-China Steam Navigation Co. v. Jasjit, AIR 1964 SC 1140 : 1964 (6) SCR 594.
67. Lakshmi Rattan Engg. Works v. Asst. Commr., (1968) II SCJ 1.
68. Master Construction Co. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1966 SC 1047 : 1966 (3) SCR 99; P.D. Sharma v. State Bank of India, AIR 1968 SC 985 : 1968 (8) SCR 91. For discussion on Art. 226, see infra, Ch. VIII, sec. C.
69. Onkar Nandlal v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1986 SC 2146 : (1985) 4 SCC 404.
70. For discussion on Arts. 226 and 227, see, Ch. VIII, infra.

(1) The tribunal acts in excess of its jurisdiction conferred on it by the parent law;

(2) The tribunal fails to exercise a patent jurisdiction;[71]

(3) The tribunal has acted illegally;[72]

(4) The tribunal has erroneoulsy applied well-accepted principles of jurisprudence;

(5) The order of tribunal is erroneous;[73]

(6) The tribunal acts against the principles of natural justice,[74] or has approached the question in a manner likely to result in injustice, e.g., if it has denied a hearing to a party, or has refused to record his evidence, or has acted in an arbitrary or despotic fashion, or has not given a fair deal to a litigant;[75]

(7) There is a patent error of law in the tribunal decision'[76]

(8) The tribunal order is unjust.[77]

These categories are not exhaustive but are merely illustrative. As the Court's jurisdiction under Art. 136 is discretionary, its parameters cannot be exhaustively defined. Generally, the main consideration on which the Supreme Court acts is that under Art. 136, it is its duty to see that injustice is not perpetrated or perpetuated by the tribunals.[78]

When an award of the industrial tribunal regarding bonus was challenged under Art. 136, the Court held that it would interfere only where the award passed by the tribunal was wholly unreasonable and was the result of the failure of the tribunal to take into account the necessary relevant facts.[79]

---

71. J.K. Iron & Steel Co. v. Mazdoor Union, AIR 1956 SC 231 : 1955 (2) SCR 1315; Clerks of C.T. Co. v. C.T. Co., AIR 1957 SC 78; D.C. Works v. Dharangdhara Municipality, AIR 1959 SC 1271 : 1960 (1) SCR 388. Chief Administrator-cum-Jt. Secretary, Govt. of India v. D.C. Dass, AIR 1999 SC 186 : (1999) 9 SCC 53.
For further discussion on this topic, see, infra, Ch. VIII, sec. D, under Certiorari.

72. Sangram Singh v. Election Tribunal , AIR 1955 SC 425 : 1955 (2) SCR 1.

73. Bhikaji Keshao v. Brij Lal Nandlal, AIR 1955 SC 610; Siemens Eng. & Mfg. Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1976 SC 1785 : (1976) 2 SCC 981.

74. Dhakeshwari Cotton Mills v. Commr. of Income-tax, AIR 1955 SC 65 : 1955 (1) SCR 941; Bhagat Ram v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 454; J.K. Iron and Steel Co. v. Iron & Steel Co. Mazdoor, AIR 1956 SC 231 : 1955 (2) SCR 1375; Clerks and Depot Cashiers of the Calcutta Tramways v. Calcutta Tramways, AIR 1957 SC 78 : 1956 SCR 772; H.H. Industries v. F.H. Lala, AIR 1974 SC 526; City Corner v. P.A. to Collector, AIR 1976 SC 143 : (1976) 1 SCC 124.
For further discussion on 'Natural Justice', see, infra, Ch. VIII under 'Certiorari'; JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW I, Chs. IX-XII; JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, I, Chs. VIII-XI.

75. Municipal Board v. State Transport Authority, AIR 1965 SC 458 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 373; Mohan Lal v. Bharat Electronics Ltd., AIR 1981 SC 1253 : (1981) 3 SCC 225.

76. Kays Concern v. Union of India, AIR 1976 SC 1525; Hindustan Antibiotics v. Workmen, AIR 1967 SC 948 : 1967 (1) SCR 652; Mohan Lal v. Management, Bharat Electronics, AIR 1981 SC 1253 : (1981) 3 SCC 225.
For discussion on the concept of 'Patent Error of Law' see, infra, Ch. VIII, sec. D, under 'Certiorari'.

77. Manoj Kumar Rai v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 882 : 1993 Supp (2) SCC 355.

78. D.C. Mills v. C.I.T., AIR 1955 SC 65 : 1955 (1) SCR 941; Mohan Lal v. Management, Bharat Electronics Ltd., AIR 1981 SC 1253 : (1981) 3 SCC 225.

79. Standard Vacuum Refining Co. v. Workmen, AIR 1961 SC 895 : 1961 (3) SCR 536.

In Dunlop India Ltd. v. Union of India,[80] the Supreme Court set aside a decision of the Appellate Collector of Customs holding that V.P. Latex be classified under item 39 of the Indian Tariff Act insead of under item 82(3), thus subjecting it to a much higher duty. The Collector's order was set aside under Art. 136 because "the order is ex facie based on an irrelevant factor....." The Collector had assessed the duty on the basis of the "ultimate use" of the commodity which is absolutely irrelevant. Under the Act, the taxing event is importing into or exporting from India, and the condition of the article at the time of import is a material factor to determine the classification of the head under which the duty would be leviable.

The Central Administrative Tribunal issued directions re-fixing seniority amongst officers in class A of the Indian Defence Services. The Government of India filed special leave to appeal to the Supreme Court against the tribunal decision, "not for sake of justice or injustice, legality or illegality of any provision but because it may have to pay few thousands, may be few lakhs more." The Supreme Court refused to interfere with the tribunal decision with the remark; "Effect of Tribunal's order is that it cured the injustice perpetrated due to absence of exercise of power by the Government [under the Rules]. Substantial justice being one of the guidelines for exercise of power by this Court the order is not liable to interference..... Justice is alert to differences and sensitive to discrimination. It cannot be measured in terms of money. The government of a welfare state has the gruelling task of being fair and just and so being justice oriented in its approach and outlook."[81]

The Supreme Court does not interfere with the conclusion arrived at by the Tribunal if it has taken all the relevant factors into consideration and there has been no misapplication of the principles of law.[82]

The Supreme Court invariably insists that the tribunal ought to give a reasonable opportunity of being heard to the parties concerned.[83] The State Administrative Tribunal cancelled the appointment of a person in a proceeding in which that person was not impleaded as a party. The Supreme Court set aside the tribunal order as it amounted to a grave error of law.[84]

The Court has spelled out of Art. 136 an obligation on tribunals to give reasons for their decisions on the plea that the Court could not effectively exercise its appellate jurisdiction if tribunals fail to give reasons for their orders. Therefore, in the absence of reasons, tribunal's order may be quashed and it may be directed to rehear the matter and dispose it according to law.[85]

The Court does not usually interfere with a tribunal's findings of fact.[86] The Court's attitude is to concern itself with seeing "whether a tribunal of reasonable

---

80. AIR 1977 SC 597 : (1976) 2 SCC 241.
81. India v. M.P. Singh, AIR 1990 SC 1098 : 1990 Supp SCC 701.
82. C.I.T. v. H. Hock Larsen, AIR 1986 SC 1695; D.C.M. v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 2414 : (1988) 1 SCC 86.
83. Municipal Board v. State Transport Authority, AIR 1965 SC 458; M.P. Industries v. Union of India, AIR 1966 SC 671; Bhagat Ram v. State of Himachal Pradesh, AIR 1983 SC 454 : (1983) 2 SCC 442. Also see, infra, under High Courts, Ch. VIII, sec. D.
84. J. Jose Dhanapaul v. S. Thomas, (1996) 3 SCC 587 : 1996 (2) LLJ 646.
85. Harinagar Sugar Mills v. Shyam Sunder, AIR 1961 SC 1669 : 1962 (2) SCR 339; Travancore Rayons v. Union of India, AIR 1971 SC 862 : 1969 (3) SCC 868.
86. Kays Constructions Co. v. Its Workmen, AIR 1959 SC 208 : 1958 (2) LLJ 660; Hindustan Antibiotics v. Workmen, AIR 1967 SC 948; Hansraj Gupta and Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1973 SC 2724 : (1973) 2 SCC 637; Chief Administrator-cum-Jt. Secretary to the Govt. of India v. Dipak Chandra Das, AIR 1999 SC 186.

and unbiased men could judicially reach such a conclusion".[87] It would, therefore, interfere with the findings of fact only if there are special circumstances, e.g., absence of all legal evidence to support the same;[88] the findings are based on irrelevant considerations;[89] the tribunal has spoken in two voices and has given inconsistent and conflicting findings;[90] the conclusion is pure speculation and not one which any reasonable mind could judicially reach on the data set out;[91] when the findings are perverse and that no reasonable person can come to such findings on the materials before the tribunal;[92] or inconsistent with the evidence on record;[93] or are tainted with serious infirmity;[94] or when the relief given by it is wrong.[95] It would not interfere with the tribunal's findings of fact merely on the ground that these are erroneous and based on a misappreciation of evidence.[96]

The Drug Controller found that the appellant's renewed license was forged and fabricated. The High Court affirmed the finding in a writ petition. In the appeal before the Supreme Court under Art. 136, the orders of the Drug Controller and that of the High Court were challenged as erroneous by producing a certificate by the licensing authority that the renewed certificate bore his signature. This certificate had not been produced before the Drug Controller or the High Court. The Supreme Court refused to take the certificate into consideration. The Court also refused to interfere with the findings of the Drug Controller "being essentially a finding of fact" based on material placed before him.[97]

Normally, in exercising its jurisdiction under Art. 136, the Supreme Court does not interfere with the findings of fact concurrently arrived at by the tribunal and the High Court unless there is a clear error of law or unless some important piece of evidence has been omitted from consideration.[98]

When a tribunal arrives at its decision in effect by considering material which is irrelevant to the inquiry, or bases its decision on material which is partly relevant and partly irrelevant, or bases its decision partly on evidence and partly on conjectures, surmises and suspicions then it raises an issue of law and the Supreme Court can go into this matter.[99]

---

87. Jamuna Pd. Mukhariya v. Lachhi Ram, AIR 1954 SC 686 : 1955 (1) SCR 608.
88. Workmen of the Motipur Sugar Factory v. Motipur Sugar Factory, AIR 1965 SC 1803 : 1965 (3) SCR 588; Bhagat Ram, supra; Shaw Wallace v. Workmen, AIR 1978 SC 977 : (1978) 2 SCC 45; Radhakrishna Dash v. Administrative Tribunal, AIR 1988 SC 674 : (1988) 2 SCC 229.
89. Dhirajlal Girdharilal v. I.T. Commr., AIR 1955 SC 271.
90. P.S. Mills v. P.S. Mills Mazdoor Union, AIR 1957 SC 95, 192 : 1956 SCR 872.
91. Jamuna v. Lachhi, supra; L. Michael v. Johnson Pumps Ltd., AIR 1975 SC 661 : (1975) 1 SCC 574.
92. National Engineering Industries v. Hanuman, AIR 1968 SC 33 : 1968 (1) SCR 54; Bank of India v. Degala Suryanarayana, AIR 1999 SC 2407 : (1999) 5 SCC 762.
93. Macropollo v. Macropollo, AIR 1958 SC 1012.
94. Oil & Natural Gas Commission v. Workmen, AIR 1 973 SC 968 : (1973) 3 SCC 535.
95. India v. K.N. Sivdas, AIR 1997 SC 3100 : (1997) 7 SCC 30.
96. Tata Iron & Steel v. Modak, AIR 1966 SC 380; National Seeds Corp. Ltd. v. Prem Prakash Jain, (1998) 8 SCC 500; Mohan Amba Prasad Agnihotri v. Bhaskar Balwant Aher, AIR 2000 SC 931 : (2000) 3 SCC 190.
97. Medimpex (India) Pvt. Ltd. v. Drug Controller-cum-Chief Licensing Authority, AIR 1990 SC 544 : 1989 Supp (2) SCC 665.
98. Mehar Singh v. Shri Moni Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee, AIR 2000 SC 492 : (2000) 2 SCC 97.
99. Dhiraj Láal Girdharilal v. C.I.T. AIR 1955 SC 271.

The Court does not also interfere with the exercise of discretion by a tribunal in a matter which falls within its discretion under the relevant law, unless there are some special reasons for such interference,[1] e.g., when a tribunal does not exercise its discretion thinking that it has none, or exercises discretion on irrelevant considerations.[2]

A question is not allowed to be raised for the first time in an appeal before the Supreme Court.[3] It would refuse a question to be developed before it when it had neither been urgedbefore the High Court nor before the Appellate Tribunal.[4] But if it is a question of law arising on admitted facts, the Court may allow it to be argued before it even if it was not raised before the court below.[5] In the following case, the Supreme Court set aside the award of the industrial tribunal on the ground that it "acted in total oblivion of the legal position as propounded by this Court in various judgments".[6]

The power of the Supreme Court to grant special leave to appeal under Art. 136(1) is not denuded even when it is declared in the parent statute under which the tribunal functions that its decision is final.[7]

It may be interesting to note that so far the Supreme Court has been rather liberal in granting leave to appeal from labour tribunals. In case of these tribunals, the Court has not confined itself to questions of jurisdiction, of natural justice or patent error of law, but has assumed somewhat wider fuction to settle important principles of industrial law.[8] The reasons for this approach have been that a large number of such tribunals function in the country to settle labour-management relations under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. The Legislature while laying down procedural norms has not yet codified the entire body of substantive legal principles applicable to these controversies, and has left the same to be developed from case to case. The labour tribunals thus enjoy enormous discretion to decide matters and they do not merely interpret a body of rules and apply the same to concrete factual situations, but also perform the much more creative function of building a corpus of rules, according to their notion of socioeconomic justice, and such a delicate task could not be left finally to industrial tribunals. There exists no provision for appeals to any court or tribunal from the decisions of the labour tribunals, and, therefore, the aggrieved parties usually invoke the Supreme Court's jurisdiction.

---

1. Registrar of Trade Marks v. Ashoka Chandra, AIR 1955 SC 558 : 1955 (2) SCR 252; Bishambar Nath v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1966 SC 573 : 1966 (2) SCR 158.
2. Sangram Singh v. Election Tribunal, AIR 1955 SC 425 : 1955 (2) SCR 1; N.E. Industries v. Workmen, AIR 1968 SC 538 : 1968 (1) SCR 779; Hindustan Steels Ltd. v. A.K. Roy, AIR 1970 SC 140 : (1969) 1 SCC 825.
3. U.C. Bank v. Secy., State of U.P. Bank Union, AIR 1953 SC 437; Nain Singh Bhakuni v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 622 : (1998) 3 SCC 348.
4. Bharat Fire & Gen. Ins. Ltd. v. C.I.T., AIR 1964 SC 1800; Moulin Rouge Pvt. Ltd. v. Commercial Tax Officer, AIR 1998 SC 219; Padmavati Jaikrishna v. Addl. C.I.T., AIR 1987 SC 1723 : (1987) 3 SCC 448.
5. State Bank, Hyd. v. V.A. Bhide, AIR 1970 SC 196; Asst. Collector, Central Excise v. N.T. Co., AIR 1972 SC 2563 : (1972) 2 SCC 560.
6. Workmen v. Management of R.B. Co. Ltd., AIR 1992 SC 504 : (1992) 1 SCC 290.
7. Durga Shankar Mehta v. Raghuraj Singh, AIR 1954 SC 520 : 1955 (1) SCR 267.
8. A.C.C. Ltd. v. Cement Workers Union, AIR 1972 SC 1552 : (1972) 4 SCC 23; The Management of Kirloskar Electric Co. v. Their Workmen, AIR 1973 SC 2119 : (1973) 2 SCC 247.

The Supreme Court has taken the view that certainty in the area of labour law is very essential as it is a significant factor in the socioeconomic development of the country. If the numerous labour tribunals are left free to interpret and apply the law, great uncertainty would arise as there is no central forum to introduce uniformity of approach amongst these bodies. So the Supreme Court has taken upon itself the task of defining, ascertaining, refining and laying down a uniform system of labour law. Though the Court takes the formal position that it does not sit as a regular court of appeal over labour tribunals,[9] yet the fact remains that, in practice, it has emerged as the supreme law-maker, and a senior policy-making partner, in the area of substantive industrial law.[10]

The Supreme Court has not played a similar role under Art. 136 with respect to any other branch of tribunal adjudication. It was because of the Supreme Court decision in Bharat Bank[11] that over time the Supreme Court has come to play such a significant role in adjudication of labour disputes. Had the Supreme Court refused to hear appeal from an industrial tribunal, the development of labour law might have taken an entirely different course.

F. ADVISORY JURISDICTION

The Supreme Court has been given an advisory jurisdiction as well.

According to Art. 143(1), when it appears to the President that a question of law or fact has arisen, or is likely to arise, which is of such a nature and of such public importance, that it is 'expedient' to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court upon it, he may refer it to the Court for its consideration. The Court then may, after such hearing as it thinks fit, report to the President its opinion thereon.

Under Art. 143(2), a matter which is excluded from the Supreme Court's jurisdiction under Art. 131 may be referred to it for opinion and the Court shall, after such hearing as it thinks fit, report to the President its opinion thereon.[12]

A report under the above provisions is to be made by the Court in accordance with an opinion delivered in open court [Art. 145(4)] with the concurrence of the majority of Judges [Art. 145(5)]. A Judge who does not concur has liberty to deliver a dissenting opinion [Art. 145(4)]. The reference is to be heard by a Bench of not less than five Judges [Art. 145(3)]. Thus, the procedure in respect of the exercise of the advisory jurisdiction has, as far as possible, been approximated to a judicial hearing.

The scope of Art. 143(1) is quite broad. There is no condition that the President can refer only such questions as pertain to his powers, functions and duties or those of the Central Government. The President can seek the opinion of the

---

9. The Court has stated in Shaw Wallace v. Workmen, AIR 1978 SC 977, that its jurisdiction under Art. 136. "can be invoked ordinarily only when there is a manifest injustice, fundamental flaw in law or perverse findings of fact."

In the instant case, the Court dismissed the special leave to appeal from the labour court decision as there was some basis, some material, to validate the award, and there was supportive testimony for findings of fact.

10. For a critique of this role of the Supreme Court see, Solomon E. Robinson, Supreme Court and s. 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, 3 JILI 161, 182; Law Commission, XIV Report, I, 50.

11. Supra, footnote 96 : AIR 1950 SC 188

12. On Art. 131, see, supra, under 'Original Jurisdiction', Sec. C (iii)(d).

Supreme Court on any question of law or fact which appears to him to be of such a nature and of such public importance that it is expedient to obtain the Court's opinion. Of course, in this matter, the President acts on the advice of the Cabinet. Thus, questions relating to constitutional validity of the proposed legislation,[13] or 'powers, privileges and immunities' of State Legislatures[14] have been referred to the Supreme Court for opinion.

It is not necessary that only a question which has actually arisen may be referred to the Court for its opinion. The President may make a reference even at an anterior stage, namely, when the question is likely to arise in future. It is a matter essentially for the President to decide whether the question is of such a nature and of such public importance that it is expedient to seek the Court's opinion thereon.

The President is entitled to refer to the Supreme Court for its opinion any question of law or fact whether or not it has any relation to the entries in Lists I and III,[15] or whether it falls in the Central sphere or in the State sphere. What Art. 143(1) requires is the President's satisfaction that—(i) a question of law or fact has arisen or is likely to arise, and (ii) the question is of such a nature and of such public importance that it is expedient to obtain the Court's opinion on it. The satisfaction of the President on both these counts would justify reference to the Supreme Court. Questions regarding the validity of a statute in force or a proposed Bill may be referred to the Court as Art. 143(1) contemplates reference of a question of law which is 'likely to arise'.

The phraseology of the constitutional provision is quite broad to cover all types of references. The Court has stated recently that it is "well within its jurisdiction to answer/advise the President in a reference made under Art. 143(1) of the Constitution of India if the questions referred are likely to arise in future or such questions are of public importance or there is no decision of this Court which has already decided the question referred:[16]

The Court has now clarified that it cannot be asked, under Art. 143(1) to reconsider any of its earlier decisions. The President can refer only such legal question as has not been decided by the Court earlier. The Court has reasoned that when in its adjudicatory jurisdiction, it has pronounced an authoritative opinion on a question of law, there neither remains any doubt about the question of law nor does it remain res integra so as to require the President to know what the true position of law on the question is. The Court can review its earlier decision only under Art. 137.[17]

The Supreme Court has rejected the contention that under Art. 143, the President can ask the court to reconsider any of its previous decisions. The Court has observed that under the Constitution, the Court enjoys no appellate jurisdiction over itself. The Court cannot convert its advisory jurisdiction into an appellate one. "Nor is it competent for the President to invest us with an appellate jurisdiction over the said decision through a Reference under Article 143 of the Constitution". To interpret Art. 143(1) as conferring on the executive power to ask

---

13. Re The Special Courts Bill, 1978, infra.
14. Re The Powers, Privileges and Immunities of State Legislatures, infra.
15. Infra, Chs. X and XI.
16. Gujarat Assembly Election Matter, (2002) 8 JT 389, 404, 405.
17. For discussion on Art. 137, see, infra, Sec. H.

the Supreme Court to revise its own decision, would cause a serious inroad into the independence of the judiciary.[18]

The Supreme Court has to confine itself to the questions referred to it by the President; it cannot travel beyond the reference. The circumstances that the President has referred only some questions regarding the validity of a Bill or an Act, and not others which also appear to arise, is no good reason for declining to entertain the reference.[19]

As has been stated by A.N. RAY, C.J., in Re Presidential Poll :[20]

> "This Court is bound by the recitals in the order of reference under Art. 143(1). We accept the statement of facts set out in the reference. The truth or otherwise of the facts cannot be enquired or gone into nor can this Court go into the question of bona fides or otherwise of the authority making the reference. This Court cannot go behind the recital. This Court cannot go into disputed questions of fact in its advisory jurisdiction under Art. 143(1)."

In Art. 143(1), the use of the word 'may' indicates that the Supreme Court is not obligated to express its opinion on the reference made to it. It has a discretion in the matter and may, in a proper case, for good reasons, decline to express any opinion on the question submitted to it. Such a situation may perhaps arise if purely socio-economic or political questions having no constitutional significance are referred to the Court, or a reference raises hypothetical issues which it may not be possible to answer without a full setting of facts in which the issues are to operate. It is to ensure against such a contingency that the Article uses the word 'may' and enables the Supreme Court to refuse to answer questions if it is satisfied that it should not express its opinion having regard to the questions and other relevant facts and circumstances.

The Court has emphasized that 'abstract' or speculative or hypothetical or too general questions should not be referred to it for advisory opinion. The Court has asserted that if a reference made to it is "vague and general", or if for any appropriate reason, the Court considers it "not proper or possible" to answer the reference, the Court may return it by pointing out the impediments in answering it. The Court has said that the plain duty and function of the Court is to consider the question on which the President has made the reference and report to the President its opinion. If for any reason, the Court considers it not proper or possible to answer the question, it would be entitled to return the reference by pointing out the impediments.[21]

The Court has refused to answer a reference in Special Reference No. 1 of 1993.[22]

However, in Art. 143(2), the use of the word 'shall' indicates that the Supreme Court has to give its opinion on a reference made thereunder.[23] There is a reason

---

18. In the Matter of Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal, AIR 1992 SC 522, 553, 554 : 1993 Supp (1) SCC 96(2).
Also see, infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. E.

19. In re The Kerala Education Bill, 1957, AIR 1958 SC 956 : 1959 SCR 995; see, infra, p. 357.

20. See, supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i)(a); also, infra, p. 359.

21. See, Re The Special Courts Bill, infra, p. 359.

22. (1994) 1 SCC 680. For details, see below.
Also see, M. Ismail Faruqui v. Union of India, (1994) 6 SCC 360 : AIR 1995 SC 605.

23. In re The Kerala Education Bill, 1957, AIR 1958 SC 956 : 1959 SCR 995; Keshav Singh's case. AIR 1965 SC 745 : 1965 (1) SCR 413.

for this dichotomy between Arts. 143(1) and 143(2). Whereas it may be possible to agitate before the courts the matters falling under Art. 143(1) by adopting suitable procedures and techniques, the matters referred to in Art. 143(2) are banned from judicial scrutiny of the Supreme Court, High Court or any other court because of the operation of Arts. 131 and 363[24] and there is no other way to get a judicial verdict on these matters, if it ever becomes necessary, except through the machinery of Art. 143(2). Hence the Supreme Court is constitutionally obligated to give its opinion if ever it is sought on the type of questions referred to in Art. 143(2).

Before the advent of the Supreme Court, the Federal Court exercised an advisory jurisdiction under s. 123 of the Government of India Act, 1935.[25] Art. 143(1) is a close replica of s. 213, one major difference being that while only a question of law could be referred to the Federal Court, both questions of law or of fact can now be referred to the Supreme Court for advice.

Some of the principles of constitutional interpretation which the Federal Court laid down in its advisory opinions in relation to the interpretation of the federal provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, have very well stood the test of time and remain valid and controlling even to-day in interpreting the Constitution.[26] Its opinion in In re Levy of Estate Duty,[27] has influenced the shaping and formulation of the entries regarding estate duty and succession duty in the Constitution.[28] Its opinion on the validity of the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, by interpreting it restrictively and confining its operations to such property as fell within the Central sphere, saved the great measure of social reform which had been achieved after years of hard toil on the part of the social reformers.[29]

During the last fifty years since the Constitution came into force, several references have been made to the Supreme Court under Art. 143(1), but none under Art. 143(2). These references are:

(1) In re the Delhi Laws Act, in 1951;[30]
(2) In re the Kerala Education Bill, in 1958;[31]
(3) In re Berubari, in 1960;[32]
(4) In re the Sea Customs Act, in 1962;[33]
(5) Keshav Singh's case in 1965;[34]
(6) In re Presidential Poll, in 1974;[35]
(7) In re the Special Courts Bill, in 1978;[36]

---

24. Supra, Sec. C(iii)(c) and (d); infra, Ch. XXXVII, Sec. F.
25. AIR 1960 SC 845 : 1960 (3) SCR 250; infra, Sec. I(b).
26. In re The C.P. Petrol Tax case, 1939 FCR 18; infra, Ch. X.
For federal Court, see, Sec. I(b), infra.
27. 1944 FCR 317.
28. Infra, Ch. XI.
29. In re The Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, 1941 FCR 12.
30. AIR 1951 SC 332; supra, Ch. II.
31. AIR 1958 SC 996; infra, Ch. X.
32. AIR 1960 SC 845; Ch. V.
33. AIR 1963 SC 1760; infra, Ch. XI.
34. AIR 1965 SC 745; supra, Ch. II, Sec. I.
35. AIR 1974 SC 1682; supra, Ch. III.
36. AIR 1979 SC 478, infra, Ch. XXI.

(8) Re In the matter of Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal, in 1992;[37]

(9) Re In the matter of Ram Janmabhoomi;[38]

(10) Reference on the Principles and Procedure regarding appointment of Supreme and High Court Judges in 1998.[39]

(11) Gujarat Assembly Election Matter.[40]

(12) In re the Gujarat Gas Act[41]

A brief description of each of these cases is given below:

(a) Delhi Laws Act

The Supreme Court's pronouncement in the Delhi Laws Act case gave timely guidance to the Central Executive regarding the scope and extent of its legislative power under the Delhi Laws Act.[42] It thus avoided embarrassment to the Central Government and difficulties to the people which might have arisen had any Act extended to Delhi or any other Part C State were to be declared ultra vires.

(b) Berubari

In re Berubari gave timely guidance to the Central Government as to how it should implement the Indo-Pakistan Boundary Agreement between the Prime Ministers of India and Pakistan. Had the agreement been implemented in the way the government was contemplating (through an Act of Parliament), great embarrassment would have been caused to it had the Act been declared unconstitutional later, as it was bound to be in view of the Supreme Court's opinion.[43]

(c) Kerala Education Bill

In re The Kerala Education Bill sought the Supreme Court's opinion on the constitutional validity of certain provisions of the Kerala Education Bill which had been reserved by the Governor for the President's consideration.[44] The public opinion in Kerala was greatly agitated because of the Bill. Reference of the matter to the Court saved the Central Government from political embarrassment as well as mollified public opinion and helped in the removal of the lacunae in the Bill which the Supreme Court pointed out in its opinion.[45]

In its advisory opinion in this case, the Court settled the following two significant points concerning the scope of Art. 143(1).

(1) The Court rejected the contention that what was referred to the Court for its opinion was not a statute already put into force, but a Bill which was yet to be enacted. The Court argued that Art. 143(1) does contemplate the reference of a question of law that is "likely to arise".

---

37. AIR 1992 SC 522. For details, see, infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. E.
38. (1993) 1 SCC 642; Ch. III, supra.
39. AIR 1999 SC 1; see, supra, Sec. B(d).
40. (2002) 8 SCC 237 : (2002) 8 JT 389.
41. In re Special Reference No. 1 of 2001:(2004) 4 SCC 489 : AIR 2004 SC 2657.
42. Supra, Ch. I, sec. K.
For detailed discussion on this case, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM., I, 61, 62; CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, I, 38-46.
43. For details of case, see, infra, Ch. V, under "Cession of Territory".
44. See, infra, Ch. VI, sec. D.
45. Infra, Chs. XXI and XXIX.

(2) It was argued that questions about the validity of some other provisions of the Bill also arose but these were not referred to the Court. Hence, the reference was an incomplete one and the Court should not entertain such a reference. The Court rejected the argument saying that "it is for the President to determine what questions should be referred and if he does not entertain any serious doubt on the other provisions it is not for any party to say that doubts arise also out of them" and the Court "cannot go beyond the reference and discuss those problems".

The circumstance that the President has not thought fit to refer other questions regarding constitutional validity of other provisions of the Bill cannot be a good or cogent reason for declining to entertain this reference and answer the questions touching matters over which the President does entertain some doubt.[46]

(d) Sea Customs

In re The Sea Customs Act, the President forwarded for the Supreme Court's opinion questions regarding the validity of provisions of a draft Bill seeking to amend certain provisions of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, and the Court was thus able to clarify a knotty problem of Centre-State relationship.[47]

(e) Keshav Singh

Keshav Singh's case fully justified the institution of advisory opinion. A complete deadlock was reached between the U.P. Legislature and the Allahabad High Court over the relative Court-Legislature role in the matter of legislative privileges. The matter could not go to the Supreme Court in appeal as the U.P. Legislature would not invoke the Court's appellate jurisdiction after having once taken the position that courts have nothing to do with the legislature's power to commit a person for its contempt.[48] Momentous issues had thus arisen threatening the very basis of the Constitution and resort to the advisory opinion technique proved a satisfactory way out of the impasse.

An objection was raised in Keshav Singh against the validity of the reference. It was argued that the questions referred to the Court did not relate to any entry in List I or List III and, as such, they did not concern with any of the persons, duties or functions conferred on the President. The Court rejected the argument saying that the words of Art. 143(1) are of wide amplitude to empower the President to forward to the Court for its advisory opinion any question which in his opinion is of such a nature or of such public importance that it is expedient to obtain the opinion of the Court thereon. "Prima facie, the satisfaction of the President on both these counts would justify the reference".[49]

The Court also expressed the view, referring to the use of the word 'may' in Art. 143(1) in contrast with the use of the word 'shall' in Art. 143(2), that under Art. 143(1), the Court is not bound to give advisory opinion in every case if it feels that it would be inadmissible for it to express its advisory opinion having regard to the nature of the questions forwarded to it and having regard to other relevant facts and circumstances. In the words of the Court:[50]

---

46. AIR 1958 SC at 965.
47. Infra, Ch. XI, Sec. C.
48. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. 1.
49. AIR 1965 SC at 756.
50. Ibid.

> "In other words, whereas in the case of reference made under Art. 143(2) it is the constitutional obligation of this Court to make a report on that reference embodying its advisory opinion, in a reference made under Art. 143(1) there is no such obligation. In dealing with this latter class of reference, it is open to this Court to consider whether it should make a report to the President giving its advisory opinion on the questions under reference."

(f) Presidential Poll

On April 29, 1974, the Central Government referred to the Court an important question for advice. The term of the President was coming to an end on August 24, 1974. The State of Gujarat was at this time under the presidential rule and its legislature had been dissolved.[51] The main question for consideration in In re Presidential Poll was whether the election of the President could be held in the absence of an elected State Assembly.[52]

The Central Government was of the opinion that on a true and correct interpretation of Arts. 54, 55, 56 and 71 of the Constitution, the election could be held. But, as a controversy had been raised on the question both within and outside Parliament, the Government thought it fit to seek the advice of the Supreme Court so that all doubts might be set at rest. It is for the Supreme Court to decide upon the validity of the election of the President. It was, therefore, advisable that the opinion of the Court be sought beforehand so that any future embarrassment could be avoided in case the Court later declared the President's election invalid on the ground of non-existence of a State Legislature.

(g) Special Courts

After the emergency during 1975-77,[53] the newly installed Janata Government decided to try certain persons holding high political offices during the emergency (1975-77), and to expedite their trial it decided to set up special courts. The Special Courts Bill was referred to the Court for advice on its constitutionality and the Court suggested that some modifications be made therein. These modifications were duly incorporated into the Bill when it was enacted in an Act later.[54]

During the hearing of the reference before the Court, the following several significant questions were raised regarding the scope of Art. 143(1) and the maintainability of the reference.

(1) The reference was hypothetical and speculative because the Bill was yet to become an Act.

Rejecting the contention, the Court argued that it was a fact that the Bill was pending before Parliament. There was nothing speculative about the existence of the Bill and there was nothing hypothetical about its contents. The Bill could undergo changes in course of time but that would not make it speculative. The Court observed in this connection:[55]

> "The Special Courts Bill is there in flesh and blood for anyone to see and examine. That sustains the reference, which is founded upon the satisfaction of the President that a question as regards the constitutional validity of the Bill is

---

51. On Emergency, see, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
52. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A.
53. On the Emergency of 1975-1977, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. F.
54. Infra, Ch. XXI.
55. AIR 1979 SC at 491.

likely to arise and that the question is of such a nature and of such public importance that it is expedient to obtain the opinion of this Court upon it."

In the past also references had been made in regard to contemplated legislation and not in regard to Acts which had been enacted.[56]

(2) The reference was vague, general and of an omnibus nature. The only question referred was whether the Bill was constitutional. This was a very broad question. The whole Bill had been referred without mentioning specifically which of the provisions of the Bill could be open to attack under the Constitution and on what grounds. Those specific points on which Court's advice was sought had not been mentioned.

The Court agreed that a reference in such broad and general terms would be difficult to answer because it gave no indication of the specific points on which the opinion of the Court was sought. "It is not proper or desirable that this Court should be called upon to embark upon a roving inquiry into the constitutionality of a Bill or an Act". It ought not to be expected of the Court that it would examine each constitutional provision to find out under which of these provisions could the validity of the Bill be challenged.

The Court said that in the beginning it was "so much exercised over the undefined breadth of the reference" that it was contemplating to return the reference to the President. But, then, after perusing the briefs presented to the Court by the lawyers of the various parties, and after listening to the oral arguments advanced by them, it was possible to narrow down the legal controversies surrounding the Bill, to crystallise the issues arising for the consideration of the Court, and to ascertain the points of dispute needing the opinion of the Court. The Court emphasized:[57]

> "We hope that in future, whenever a reference is made to this Court under Art. 143 of the Constitution, care will be taken to frame specific questions for the opinion of the Court.... the risk that a vague and general reference may be returned unanswered is real..."

(3) Since Parliament was seized of the Bill, it was its exclusive function to decide upon the constitutionality of the Bill.

The Court rejected this argument saying that under the Indian Constitution the power of reviewing the constitutionality of legislation was vested in the Supreme Court and the High Courts. The Court observed on this point:

> "The right of the Indian judiciary to pronounce a legislation void if it conflicts with the Constitution is not merely a tacit assumption but is an express avowal of our Constitution. The principle is firmly and wisely embedded in our Constitution that the policy of law and the expediency of passing it are matters for the legislature to decide while interpretation of laws and questions regarding their validity fall within the exclusive advisory or adjudicatory functions of Courts."[58]

(4) Since the Bill was pending in Parliament for consideration, it would affect Parliament's sovereignty, and it would be encroaching on the functions and

---

56. In the Estate Duty case, AIR 1944 SC 73; In the Kerala Education Bill case, AIR 1958 SC 956; supra; In the Sea Customs Bill, AIR 1963 SC 1760; supra.
57. AIR 1979 SC at 493.
58. Ibid, at 494.

privileges of Parliament, if the Court were to withdraw the question of validity of the Bill for its consideration.

The Court rejected the contention saying that in dealing with the reference, the Bill was not being withdrawn from Parliament. The Court was under a constitutional obligation to consider the reference made to it by the President under Art. 143(1) and report thereon. As the question of constitutional validity of the Bill fell within the Court's domain, no function or privilege was "wittingly or unwittingly" being encroached upon.

(5) The Court rejected the argument that the reference virtually abrogated Art. 32. The proceeding under Art. 32(1) were of an entirely different nature from the proceeding under Art. 143(1). If the Court were to pronounce on the question referred to it by the President, "there is neither supplanting nor abrogation of Art. 32".[59]

(6) It would be futile for the Court to pronounce on the constitutional validity of the Bill, for whatever view it might take, Parliament was free to pass the Bill or not as it pleased.

The Court rejected the argument saying that the argument was based on an unrealistic basis, "its assumption being that the Parliament will not act in a fair and proper manner". True, whatever the Court would say could not deter the Parliament from proceeding with the Bill as it pleased, and no Court would issue a writ or order restraining the Parliament from proceeding with the consideration of the Bill pending before it, yet it could not be assumed that if the Court were to hold the Bill to be unconstitutional "Parliament will proceed to pass it without removing the defects from which it is shown to suffer". The Court further observed on this point:[60]

> "Since the constitutionality of the Bill is a matter which falls within the exclusive domain of the courts, we trust that the Parliament will not fail to take notice of the Court's decision".

(7) The Court rejected the argument that the reference raised a purely political question. The question of constitutionality of the Bill was not a political question. The Court said: "The question referred by the President for our opinion raises purely legal and constitutional issues which is our right and function to decide". The President had not asked the opinion of the Court as to the desirability of passing the Bill, or the soundness of the policy underlying it or whether special Courts ought to be set up, or not, or whether political offenders should be prosecuted or not.

(8) It was argued that considering the repercussions of the exercise of advisory jurisdiction, the Court should "in the interest of expediency and propriety," refuse to answer the reference. The Court disagreed with this contention. The question referred to the Court raised a purely constitutional issue and it was neither difficult nor inexpedient to answer the reference.

In the end, the Court held the reference made by the President as maintainable and, accordingly, proceeded to report its opinion thereon.[61] During the course of

---

59. Ibid, at 495.
On Art. 32, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A.
60. Ibid, at 495.
61. For discussion on this case, see, infra, under Arts. 14 and 21, Chs. XXI and XXVI.

its opinion in the instant case, the Court also made the following comments on Art. 143:

(1) Art. 143(1) is couched in broad terms.

(2) Under Art. 143(1), the President is empowered to make a reference even on questions of fact provided the other conditions of the article are satisfied.

(3) It is not necessary that the question on which the opinion of the Supreme Court is sought must have arisen actually. The President may make a reference at an anterior stage, i.e., at the stage when the President is satisfied that the question is likely to arise.

(4) The satisfaction whether the question has arisen or is likely to arise and whether it is of such a nature and of such public importance that it is expedient to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court upon it, is a matter essentially for the President to decide.

(5) The duty and function of the Supreme Court under Art. 143(1) is to consider the question referred to it by the President and report its opinion to him, provided of course the question is capable of being pronounced upon and falls within the power of the Court to decide.

(6) If, for any appropriate reason, the Court considers it not proper or possible to answer the question, it would be entitled to return the reference by pointing the impediments in answering it.

(7) Even in matters falling under Art. 143(2) [which uses the word 'shall' and not 'may' as in Art. 143(1)], the Court may be justified in returning the reference unanswered if it finds for a valid reason that the question is incapable of being answered.[62]

On the question of the binding nature of an advisory opinion under Art. 143(1), the Court has expressed the view that while it is always open to the Supreme Court to re-examine the question already decided by it and to overrule, if necessary, in so far as all other courts are concerned they ought to be bound by it. Earlier the Supreme Court had expressed the view in some cases that the advisory opinions do not have the force of law. See, U.P. Legislative Assembly;[63] St. Xaviers College.[64] In St. Xaviers College, RAY, C.J., observed that even if an advisory opinion may not be binding, it is entitled to great weight. Some High Courts have taken the view that an advisory opinion is law declared by the Supreme Court within the meaning of Art. 141.[65]

(h) Cauvery Waters

In the matter of Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal, the main question referred to the Court for its advisory opinion was whether the Tribunal established under the Inter-State Water Disputes Act, 1956, has power to grant an interim relief to

---

62. This is in contrast with what the Court had observed earlier in Keshav Singh's case, see, supra.

63. AIR 1965 SC 745, 762, 763.

64. AIR 1974 SC 1389; infra, Ch. XXX.

65. See, Ram Kishore Sen v. Union of India, AIR 1965 Cal 282; Chhabildas Mehta v. Legislature Assembly, Gujarat State, (1970) 2 Guj LR 729.
For Comments on Art. 141, see, infra, Sec. J.

the parties to the dispute. The issues involved in this case are discussed later in this book.[66]

In this case again, the question whether the opinion given by the Supreme Court on a Presidential for Reference under Art. 143 is binding on all courts was debated. However, the Court refused to express any definitive opinion on the point for two reasons;

(1) the specific question did not form part of Presidential Reference in the instant case;

(2) any opinion expressed by the Court in the instant case would again be advisory.

Thus, the Court "leaves the matter where it stands" with, however, the following observation:[67]

> "It has been held adjudicatively that the advisory opinion is entitled to due weight and respect and normally it will be followed. We feel that the said view which holds the field today may usefully continue to do so till a more opportune time."[68]

(i) Ram Janmabhumi

In Special Reference No. 1 of 1993, the question referred to the Supreme Court for its advisory opinion was whether a Hindu temple or religious structure existed at a particular place in Ayodhya. The question referred to the Court was formulated as follows:[69]

"Whether a Hindu temple or any Hindu religious structure existed prior to the construction of the Ram Janma Bhumi—Babri Masjid.... in the area on which the structure stood."

The Supreme Court refused to give its opinion on this reference for several reasons. According to the majority opinion, the matter under reference was already the subject-matter of litigation in the lower courts, wherein the dispute between the parties would be adjudicated, and, therefore, the reference made under Art. 143(1) became superfluous and unnecessary.

Two of the Judges (AHMADI & BHARUCHA, JJ.) in a separate concurring opinion maintained that the Supreme Court could decline to answer a question referred to it under Art. 143 if it considers it to be not proper or possible to do so, but the Court must indicate its reasons. These learned Judges gave the following reasons for refusing to answer the reference in the instant case:

(1) The reference favoured one religious community and disfavoured another. The purpose of the reference was, therefore, opposed to secularism and was unconstitutional; the reference served no constitutional purpose.

(2) The Government proposed to use the Court's opinion as a springboard for negotiations. It did not propose to settle the dispute in terms of the Court's opinion.

---

66. For a fuller discussion on this case, see, infra, Ch. XIV, Sec. E.
67. AIR 1992 SC 552, at 558.
68. Also see, infra, Secs. F. and J. on this point.
69. (1993) 1 SCC 642.

(3) To answer the reference it would be necessary to take evidence of experts, such as, historians, archaeologists and have them cross-examined.

(4) The principal protagonists of the two stands would not appear in the reference. Any opinion expressed by the Supreme Court would be criticised by one or both sides. This would impair the Court's credibility and compromise the dignity and honour of the Court.

(j) Supreme Court/High Court Judges

The reference was made by the President in July, 1998.[70] In Advocates-on-Record Association v. Union of India,[71] the Supreme Court had laid down the procedural norms for the appointment of the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts. The decision was rendered by a Bench of 9 Judges and five judgments were delivered. As doubts arose about the interpretation of the law laid down by the Supreme Court in the above-mentioned case, the President made a reference to the Supreme Court under Art. 143(1) seeking clarification on certain points.

Nine questions were referred to the Court for its advisory opinion. These questions pertained to the following three main points:

(1) Consultation between the Chief Justice of India and other Judges in the matter of appointment of the Supreme Court and the High Court Judges;

(2) Transfer of High Court Judges and judicial review thereof;

(3) The relevance of seniority in making appointments to the Supreme Court.[72]

(k) Gujarat Assembly Election Matter

The reference under Art. 143(1) arose as a result of premature dissolution of the Gujarat Legislative Assembly. The main question raised in the reference was regarding the time-frame within which election to the Assembly must be held.[73]

(l) The Gujarat Gas Act

The Gujarat State Legislature passed an Act by name "the Gujarat Gas (Regulation of Transmission, Supply and Distribution) Act, 2001" ("the Gujarat Act"), which came into force w.e.f. 19-12-2000. The object of the enactment is to provide for regulation of transmission, supply and distribution of gas, in the interests of the general public and to promote gas industry in the State, and for that purpose, to establish a Gujarat Gas Regulatory Authority. The State Legislature passed the said enactment by tracing its legislative competence under Entry 25 of List II of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution. Parliament has passed various enactments under Entry 53 of List I dealing with the matters of petroleum and petroleum products. In re Special Reference No. 1 of 2001,[74] the following questions were referred to this Court under clause (1) of Article 143:

---

70. In re : Presidential Reference, AIR 1999 SC 1; see, supra, Sec. B(d).
71. Supra, Sec. B(d).
72. For detailed discussion on these points, see, supra, this Chapter, Sec. B and infra, Ch. VIII.
73. (2002) 8 SCC 237 : (2002) 8 JT 389.
For further discussion on this case, see, Ch. XIX, infra.
74. (2004) 4 SCC 489 : AIR 2004 SC 2647.

(1) Whether natural gas in whatever physical form including liquefied natural gas (LNG) is a Union subject covered by Entry 53 of List I and the Union has exclusive legislative competence to enact laws on natural gas.

(2) Whether States have legislative competence to make laws on the subject of natural gas and liquefied natural gas under Entry 25 of List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution.

(3) Whether the State of Gujarat had legislative competence to enact the Gujarat Gas (Regulation of Transmission, Supply and Distribution) Act, 2001.

The Court construed Entry 53 of List I, and held that Parliament has got power to enact legislation for regulation and development of oilfields, mineral oil resources; petroleum, petroleum products, other liquids and substances declared by Parliament by law to be dangerously inflammable. Natural gas product extracted from oil wells is predominantly comprised of methane and is not independent of other petroleum products. The Court therefore concluded that "natural gas" is included in Entry 53 of List I and regulation of oilfields and mineral oil resources necessarily encompasses the regulation as well as development of natural gas and the Union Government alone has got legislative competence to enact laws in that regard. The Court was of the opinion that Entry 25 of List II was limited to the gas manufactured and used in gasworks. In view of this and having regard to the specific nature of Entry 53 covering any petroleum and petroleum products, the Court answered the reference by holding that The Gujarat Gas (Regulation of Transmission, Supply and Distribution) Act, 2001, in so far as it related to natural gas or liquefied natural gas was without any legislative competence and the Act to that extent was ultra vires the Constitution.

(m) Advisory Opinions in the U.S.A., Australia and Canada

The U.S. Constitution has no specific provision like Art. 143(1) authorising the President to make a reference to the U.S. Supreme Court seeking its opinion on any question. The U.S. Constitution is based on the doctrine of Separation of Powers.[75] Art. III, s. 2(1) of the U.S. Constitution provides that the judicial power vested in the Supreme Court shall extend to "cases" and "controversies".

The U.S. Supreme Court has consistently refused to render advisory opinions on abstract legal questions as it does not wish to exercise any non-judicial function. Giving of such an advice, it has been feared, might involve the Court in too direct participation in legislative and administrative processes. The reluctance of the Court is formally based on the doctrine of separation of powers which forms one of the bases of the U.S. Constitution.

In 1793, when Secretary of State Jefferson enquired of the Supreme Court whether it would give advice to the President on questions of law arising out of certain treaties, the Court refused saying that there was no such provision in the Constitution, and that it was not proper for the highest Court to decide questions extra-judicially,[76] Again, in Muskrat v. U.S.,[77] the Court refused to give an advi-

---

75. See, Ch. III, Sec. F., supra.
76. DOUGLAS, MARSHALL TO MUKHERJEA, 25-26. Also, THAYER, LEGAL ESSAYS, 53 (1923).
77. 219 US 346.
Also, SCHWARTZ, THE SUPREME COURT, 142 (1957).

sory opinion arguing that under the Constitution its jurisdiction extends to a 'case or controversy' and so it cannot give an opinion without there being an actual controversy between adverse litigants. The Court has consistently refused to decide abstract, hypothetical or contingent questions.

Similar has been the approach of the High Court of Australia,[78] as the Australian Constitution has no provision parallel to Art. 143(1) of the Indian Constitution. However, to some extent, a similar purpose is served by permitting an Attorney-General to bring proceedings in the High Court to secure a determination of the validity of National or State legislation after its passage by the Legislature whether before or after it has come into force.[79]

In Canada, the Governor-General in Council is empowered to refer important questions of law touching on the validity or interpretation of the Dominion or Provincial legislation.[80] The practice of obtaining advisory opinions from the Judiciary has been very extensively used in Canada. It has almost become the normal strategy for determining constitutional issues. Protesting voices have, however, been raised against a too frequent use of this technique to settle constitutional controversies.[81]

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which functioned as the highest Court of appeal from India before Independence, is obligated under sec. 4 of the Judicial Committee Act, 1833, to tender advice to the Crown on any matter other than appeals presented to it.

(n) Evaluation of the System of Advisory Opinions

The practice of invoking advisory judicial opinions is not universally approved. A serious objection raised against it is that opinions are sought on hypothetical questions, in the absence of concrete factual situations, without there being a real controversy in existence, and that it is inexpedient and inconvenient for the courts to express their opinions in the absence of the factual situation within which a rule is to operate.

Many legal questions can properly be appreciated in the context of concrete factual situations; since a reference to the court seeking its advice does not present actual facts, the court is unable to see the problem in the background of an actual controversy between the litigants. The court depends upon assumptions and its advisory opinions, are, therefore, nothing more than 'speculative opinions on hypothetical questions.'[82] It is not possible for the judiciary to lay down a principle adequately and safely without understanding its relation to concrete facts to which it may be applied.

---

78. In re Judiciary and Navigation Acts, 29 CLR 25 (1921).

79. Attorney-Gen. for Victoria v. Commonwealth, 71 CLR 237 (1945); SAWER, The Supreme Court and the High Court of Australia, 6 Jl of Public Law, 482, 491 (1957).

80. See, s. 60 of the Canadian Supreme Court Act, 1960.

81. MACDONALD, The Privy Council and Canadian Const., 29 Can. B.R. 1020 (1951); DAVISON, The Constitutionality and Utility of Advisory Opinions, 2 Univ. of Toronto L.J., 347 (1950); RUBIN, The Nature, Use, and Effect of Reference Cases in Canadian Constitutional Law, 6 McGill L.J., 168 (1959-60).

82. EARL HALSBURY in Att. Gen. for Ontario v. Hamilton Street Rly., (1903) A.C. 524; FELIX FRANKFURTER, A Note on Advisory Opinions, 37 Harv. L.R. 1006; also his LAW AND POLITICS, 25 (1939); JACKSON, THE STRUGGLE FOR JUDICIAL SUPREMACY, 306 (1941); PYLEE, THE FEDERAL COURT OF INDIA, 276-287 (1966).

The great weakness of a decision without a true case is that, being rendered in vacuo, it is divorced from the real life of actual facts. Advisory opinions may thus move in an unreal atmosphere. The interests of future litigants may also be prejudiced by the Court laying down principles in the abstract.[83] It may be inconvenient for them to agitate the matter later when an actual controversy arises.[84] It is also argued that when an actual controversy comes before a court along with full facts, the court has a manoeuvrability and a flexibility of approach in deciding the issues raised but the same flexibility of approach is not available to the court when cut and dry questions are put to it for advice, for then it has to move within the framework of the questions, and its freedom of approach to legal issues is cabined and restricted by the way the questions are framed, and to safeguard itself from being misunderstood in future, the court may have to hedge its answers with all kinds of 'buts', 'ifs' and 'provideds'.

On the other hand, there are quite a few advantages of advisory jurisdiction: it can provide guidance to the government on questions of its legal powers and may promptly remove any cloud of uncertainty in the public mind, regarding the validity of any legislation or governmental action. An advance judicial opinion regarding the validity of a legislative measure may avoid inconvenience which may otherwise arise by its being declared invalid later.[85] Also, to depend solely on a real controversy for deciding a constitutional issue means that the court's jurisdiction depends on the whims of private litigants, and vital questions of constitutional law may remain clouded and unanswered by the highest Court for long till a suitable case arises and reaches the Court.

The ordinary court procedure is time-consuming and expensive as the case must pass through several courts before reaching the highest Court and for all this period a cloud of uncertainty would hang around the law, and the ultimate decision may very much depend on how and when a question is raised.

All these arguments for and against advisory opinions however lead to one conclusion: it is advisable that the highest Court has advisory jurisdiction but it should be invoked only sparingly and not frequently and only in such cases where factual situations are ripe, or where legal issues are capable of being formulated precisely and can be considered by the Court without much of a factual data, and political questions should not be referred to the Court for advice.

Most of the above objections are diluted by the safeguards subject to which only the Supreme Court in India may be consulted, viz.:

(1) It has an option to give or not to give its opinion on issues referred to it and, therefore, it can withhold its opinion inter alia if it feels that the reference suffers from prematurity or from lack of facts, or if the facts on which the reference is based are disputed, or if the reference is of a political nature etc.

---

83. Att. Gen. for Br. Col. v. Att. Gen. for Canada, (1914) A.C. 153, 162; In re Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada, (1932) A.C. 54, 66.

84. FREUND, Umpiring the Federal System, 54 Col. L.R. 561, 574; also, FREUND, A Supreme Court in a Federation, 53 Col. L.R. 597, 613.

85. BOWIE AND FRIEDRICH, STUDIES IN FEDERALISM, 107-111 (1954); SCHWARTZ, AMERICAN CONST. LAW, 149 (1955); MCWHINNEY, JUDICIAL REVIEW, 181 (1969).

(2) Judicial procedure is used in hearing the reference and opinion is delivered in open court so that the reasons on which it is based are subject to public scrutiny.

(3) Questions on which opinion is sought have to be framed by the Executive, for the Court is to give its opinion on problems of law or fact presented to it by the Executive in the reference.

Further, much depends as to how, in practice, the technique is used, and here the Indian experience cannot be said to be discouraging so far. On the whole, the institution of advisory opinions has functioned well in India and has proved to be creative in value so far as the constitutional interpretation is concerned. It has been used wisely and sparingly so far as is evident from the fact that over a period of 50 years only twelve references have been made to the Supreme Court of which the Court refused to entertain only one reference, viz., In the matter of Ram Janma Bhumi.

The reference procedure has been used in India so far only when substantial constitutional issues have been involved. Abstract and hypothetical questions have not generally been referred. References have been made only when issues have become clarified and crystallised by public discussion and were mature enough for judicial opinion.

Only in one or two references so far has the Court complained that it was handicapped by a lack of sufficient factual data to enable it to give its opinion. As for example, in In re Levy of Estate Duty, certain questions regarding future legislation on levy of estate duty were referred to the Federal Court for opinion, but no draft Bill was submitted. So, in answering the questions, the Judges had to make certain assumptions and reservations and they had no clear appreciation of the context in which the legal issues posed were to operate. In fact, one of the Judges hearing the reference, even refused to give his opinion, because the reference was enveloped in a 'thick fog of hypothesis' and 'uncertainties'. However, the two other Judges did give their opinion on the reference.

In the Kerala Bill case also, the Court pointed out that the questions referred had not arisen out of actual application of any specified section of the Bill to the facts of any particular case and so the questions were necessarily 'abstract or hypothetical' in nature. In the Kerala Bill case, though facts were absent, yet it differed from the Estate Duty case in so far as a Bill enacted by the State Legislature was before the Court and so it did not have to function in a complete vacuum.

The difficulties pointed out in these cases suggest that the reference, to elicit a meaningful judicial opinion, should be made, as far as possible, when the case is ripe and factual context and all relevant data are available. However, this much can be said for the Kerala reference that the Central Government had not much choice in the matter. Had it sought amendments in the Bill by the Kerala Legislature on its own accord, its political motives would have been questioned because the Central and the State Governments belonged to two different political parties. So, an objective assessment of the defects of the Bill by the Supreme Court was the best alternative available.

The controversy was set in legalistic and constitutional terms and the reference did not raise any political issue although the motivation behind the reference might have been political. On the whole, however, the full matter may be said to be the precursor of healthy conventions in the area of federalism insofar as even when the Centre could have vetoed the Bill, it did not do so without seeking an opinion of a forum whose objectivity and impartiality none could challenge.[86]

G. POWER TO DO COMPLETE JUSTICE : ART 142(1)

Under Art. 142(1), in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the Supreme Court is entitled to pass any decree, or make any order, as is necessary for doing complete justice in any cause or matter pending before it.[87] Therefore although the ambit of the power is wide it should "be limited to the short compass of the actual dispute before the court and not to what might reasonably be connected with or related to such matter".[88]

The expressions 'cause' or 'matter' include any proceeding pending in the Court and would cover almost every kind of proceeding in the Court including civil or criminal.

Article 142(1) confers very wide powers on the Supreme Court to do complete justice in any case. The Court has given a broad and purposive interpretation to this provision.

The jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court under Art. 142 are supplementary in nature and are provided for doing complete justice in any matter. In course of time, the Apex Court has given a much wider dimension and ambit to Art. 142, practically raising the provision to the status of a new source of substantive power for itself.

Article 142(1) contains no limitations regarding the causes or the circumstance in which the power can be exercised nor does it lay down any condition to be satisfied before such power is exercised. The exercise of the power is left completely to the discretion of the highest court. Referring to Art. 142(1), the Supreme Court in Supreme Court Bar Association v. Union of India, has characterised its own role in these words:[89]

> "Indeed the Supreme Court is not a court of restricted jurisdiction of only dispute-settling. The Supreme Court has always been a law-maker and its role travels beyond merely dispute-settling. It is a problem-solver in the nebulous areas…"

In the same case, the Court has described the nature of its power under Art. 142 as follows:

> "The plenary powers of the Supreme Court under Art. 142 of the Constitution are inherent in the Court and are complementary to those powers which are specifically conferred on the Court by various statutes though are not limited by those statutes. These powers also exist independent of the statutes with a view to do complete justice between the parties. These powers are of very wide amplitude and are in the nature of supplementary powers. This power exists as a separate and independent basis of jurisdiction apart from the statutes. It stands upon the foundation and the basis for its exercise, may be put on a different and perhaps even wider footing, to prevent injustice in the process of

86. Infra, Ch. X, Sec. K.
87. Delhi Electric Supply Undertaking v. Basanti Devi, AIR 2000 SC 43, 49 : (1999) 8 SCC 229.
88. Zahira Habibullah Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 5 SCC 353 : AIR 2004 SC 3467.
89. AIR 1998 SC 1895 : (1998) 4 SCC 409.

> litigation and to do complete justice between the parties. This plenary jurisdiction is, thus, the residual source of power which this Court may draw upon as necessary whenever it is just and equitable to do so and in particular to ensure the observance of the due process of law, to do complete justice between the parties, while administering justice according to law....."[90]

The Supreme court has exhibited a wavering attitude as regards the scope of Art. 142.

The nature of the power must lead the Court to set limits for itself within which to exercise those powers.

In some cases, the Court has laid down the restriction on itself with regard to Art. 142(1), viz., the Court does not exercise the power to override any express statutory provisions. The power is not to be exercised in a case where there is no basis in law to form an edifice for building up a superstructure.

Article 142 is curative in nature; the power under Art. 142 is meant to "supplement" and not to "supplant" substantive law applicable to the case under consideration. Substantive statutory provision dealing with the subject-matter of a given case cannot be altogether ignored by the Supreme Court while making order under Art. 142.

The Apex Court has ruled that though its power under Art. 142 is broad, it cannot be exercised against a Fundamental Right.[91] In Prem Chand,[92] the Court had suggested that its power under Art. 142(1) cannot be exercised against a definite statutory provision. It was observed in that case:[93]

> ".....The wide powers which are given to this Court for doing complete justice between the parties, can be used by this Court for instance, in adding parties to the proceeding pending before it, or in admitting additional evidence, or in remanding the case, or in allowing a new point to be taken for the first time. It is plain that in exercising these and similar other powers, this Court would not be bound by the relevant provisions of procedure if it is satisfied that a departure from the said procedure is necessary to do complete justice between the parties."

In A.R. Antulay v. R.S. Nayak,[94] the Supreme Court has observed in relation to Art. 142:

> "… however wide and plenary the language of the article, the directions given by the Court should not be inconsistent with, repugnant to, or in violation of the specific provisions of any statute".

But, then, there are a member of cases, where the Court has expressed the view that the scope of Art. 142, which is a constitutional provisions, cannot be cut down by a statutory provision. Accordingly, the Court has observed:

> "Indeed, these constitutional powers cannot, in any way, be controlled by any statutory provisions but at the same time these powers are not meant to be ex-

---

90. Also see, Delhi Electric Supply Undertaking v. Basanti Devi, AIR 2000 SC 43 at 49 : (1999) 8 SCC 229.
91. Prem Chand v. Excise Commr., infra, footnote 92.
92. Prem Chand v. Excise Commissioner, AIR 1963 SC 996 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 885.
93. Ibid., at 1003.
94. Also see, A.R. Antulay v. R.S. Nayak, AIR 1988 SC 1531 : (1988) 2 SCC 602.

> ercised when their exercise may come directly in conflict with what has been expressly provided for in statute dealing expressly with the subject".[95]

In Delhi Judicial Service Assn.,[96] the Supreme Court has observed that its power under Art. 142(1) to do complete justice is entirely of a different level and of a different quality and that any prohibition or restriction contained in ordinary laws can not act as a limitation on the constitutional power of the Supreme Court. Once the Court is in seision of a matter before it, "it has power to issue any order or direction to do 'complete justice' in the matter. This constitutional power of the Apex Court cannot be limited or restricted by provisions contained in statutory law." Thus, no enactment made by a legislature can limit or restrict the power of the Supreme Court under Art. 142, though the Court must take into consideration the statutory provisions regulating the matter in dispute.[97]

In Union Carbide,[98] the Court has taken a very broad view of Art. 142. The Court has observed in relation to the scope of its powers under Art. 142:

> "The proposition that a provision in any ordinary law irrespective of the importance of the public policy on which it is founded, operates to limit the powers of the Apex Court under Art. 142(1) is unsound and erroneous..... The [Court's] power under Article 142 is at an entirely different level and of a different quality. Prohibitions or limitations or provisions contained in ordinary laws cannot, ipso facto, act as prohibitions or limitations on the constitutional powers under Art. 142.... Perhaps, the proper way of expressing the idea is that in exercising powers under Art. 142 and in assessing the needs of 'complete justice' of a cause or matter, the Apex Court will take note of the express prohibitions in any substantive statutory provision based on some fundamental principles of public policy and regulate the exercise of its power and discretion accordingly. This proposition does not relate to the powers of the Court under Art. 142, but only to what is or is not 'complete justice' of a cause or matter and in the ultimate analysis of the propriety of the exercise of the power."

Under section 25 of the Delhi Special Police Establishment Act, 1946, Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) cannot investigate a cognizable offence committed within a State without the consent of the concerned State Government. But the Supreme Court has ruled that it can under Art. 142(1) direct CBI to investigate such an offence within a State without the consent of the concerned State Government. The Court has asserted that the exercise of its power under Art. 142(1) is not conditioned by any statutory power, because statutory provisions cannot override constitutional provisions. Art. 142(1) being a constitutional power cannot be limited or conditioned by any statutory provision. The Court has explained the scope of Art. 142 in the following words:

> "The constitutional plenitude of the powers of the Apex Court is to ensure due and proper administration of justice and is intended to be co-extensive in each case and to meeting any exigency. Very wide powers have been conferred

---

95. Supreme Court Bar Association v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 1895 : (1998) 4 SCC 409.

96. Delhi Judicial Service Assn. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC 2176, at 2210 : (1991) 4 SCC 406.

97. The Court has expressed this view in a number of cases. See, for example, State of Uttar Pradesh v. Poosu, AIR 1976 SC 1750 : (1976) 3 SCC 1; Ganga Bishan v. Jai Narain, AIR 1986 SC 441 : (1986) 1 SCC 75; Navnit R. Kamani v. R.R. Kamani, AIR 1989 SC 9 : (1988) 4 SCC 655; B.N. Nagarajan v. State of Mysore, AIR 1966 SC 1942 : (1966) 3 SCR 682; Harbans Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 SC 849 : (1982) 2 SCC 101.

98. Union Carbide Corpn. v. Union of India, (1991) 4 SCC 584, 634-35 : AIR 1992 SC 248, 278.

> on this Court for due and proper administration of justice and whenever the Court sees that the demand of justice warrants exercise of such powers, it will reach out to ensure that justice is done by resorting to this extraordinary power conferred to meet precisely such a situation."

The power under Art. 142(1) cannot be diluted merely because the Act in question stipulates that the State Government's permission will be necessary if the CBI is to investigate any offence committed within the territorial jurisdiction of a State Government. That may be a statutory obligation governing the relations between the Central Government and the State Government but it cannot control Supreme Court's power under Art. 142(1). The statute does not prohibit investigation by CBI but only requires certain formalities to be completed which has no relevance when the Apex Court makes an order in exercise of its power under Art. 142(1).[1]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the power given to it under Art. 142 is conceived to meet situations which cannot be effectively and appropriately tackled by the existing legal provisions. The Supreme Court has left the power under Art. 142 "undefined and uncatalogued" so that "it remains elastic enough to be moulded to suit the given situation".[2]

A 3-judge Bench of the Supreme Court rejected the contention that it could not with the aid of Art. 142 cancel mining leases as the power to do so was with the State Government under Mines & Minerals (Development & Regulation) Act, 1957.[3]

While holding that the appointments to the posts of clerks in the subordinate courts in Karnataka without consultation with the State Public Service Commission were not valid, the Supreme Court, nevertheless, exercising its power under Art. 142, ruled on humanitarian grounds not to remove them from service as they had put in more than 10 years of service. These persons deserved "justice ruled by mercy". Accordingly, the Court ruled that these persons be treated as "regularly appointed with all the benefits of the past service."[4]

In a recent case the appellant challenged an order of punishment imposed by departmental authorities. His statutory appeal and revisional application were dismissed. The suit filed by him was dismissed as well as the First and Second Appeals. The only issue before the Supreme Court was the failure of the High Court to frame a substantial question of law. The Supreme Court however went into the facts and found that the order of punishment was indeed unjustified. Instead of remanding the case to the High Court, in exercise of its jurisdiction under Article 142, it set aside the judgment of the High Court confirming the judgments of the two lower courts and decreed the suit in favour of the appellant.[5]

---

1. Mohd. Anis v. Union of India, (1994) Supp (1) SCC 145 : 1994 SCC (Cr) 248. Also, Maniyeri Madhavan v. Sub-Inspector of Police, AIR 1994 SC 1033 : (1994) 1 SCC 536.
2. Delhi Development Authority v. Skipper Construction Co., AIR 1996 SC 2005 : (1996) 4 SCC 622.
3. M.C.Mehta v. U.O.I., (2009) 6 SCC 142 : (2009) 6 JT 434.
4. H.C. Puttaswamy v. Hon'ble Chief Justice of Karnataka, AIR 1991 SC 295 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 421.
5. Man Singh v. State of Haryana, (2008) 12 SCC 331. See also Narendra Gopal Vidyarthi v. Rajat Vidyarthi, (2009) 3 SCC 287 : (2008) 13 JT 313.

The Supreme Court has again explained the plenitude of the power under Art. 142 and has emphasized in the case mentioned below[6] that the power of the Supreme Court under Art. 142 is "a constituent power transcendental to statutory prohibition". There are no limiting words in Art. 142 "to moulding of relief or taking of appropriate decision to mete out justice or to remove injustice". The expression "complete justice" engrafted in Art. 142(1) is of wide amplitude "couched with elasticity to meet myriad situations". In the ultimate analysis, "it is for the Supreme Court to exercise its power to do complete justice or prevent injustice arising from the exigencies of the cause or matter before it". The question of lack of jurisdiction or nullity of the order of the Supreme Court does not arise."

In exercise of its extra-ordinary jurisdiction the Court may set aside not only the order impugned, but another order if it is of the view that setting aside the order impugned would give rise to another illegality.[7]

In Vineet Narain v. Union of India,[8] the Supreme Court has ruled that ample powers are conferred on the Court under Arts. 32, 141, 142 and 144 to issue necessary directions to fill the vacuum till either the legislature steps in to cover the gap or discharges its role.

In Vishakha,[9] the Supreme Court has emphasized that it is the duty of the executive to fill the vacuum by executive orders because its field is coterminous with that of the legislature and where there is inaction even by the executive, for whatever reason, the judiciary must step in, in exercise of its constitutional obligations under the aforesaid provisions to provide a solution till such time as the legislature acts to perform its role by enacting proper legislation to cover the field.[10]

Similarly, the deserted wife of a tenant was held to be entitled to continue in occupation of the tenanted premises having regard to the "demands of social and gender justice" under Art. 142 until suitable amendment in the legislation takes place.[11]

Presumably exercising its power under Art.142, the court directed that although no disability pension was payable to an army personnel since the disability was not caused by military service, yet it directed that the amount paid to the legal representatives of the disabled was not to be recovered from them.[12]

In a case where the court found that a respondent was in fact rendering service for a long time in the post of UDC although he was strictly not entitled to be in the UDC grade, the court directed that he should not be reverted to LDC but his seniority should be counted from the date on which he joined in the UDC post.[13]

---

6. Ashok Kumar Gupta v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (1997) 5 SCC 201 : 1997 SCC (L&S) 1299.
7. Commissioner of Income Tax, Shimla v. Greenworld Corporation, Parwanoo, (2009) 7 SCC 69 : (2009) 8 JT 429.
8. AIR 1998 SC 889 : (1958) 1 SCC 226.
9. Vishakha v. State of Rajasthan, (1997) 6 SCC 241 : AIR 1997 SC 3011.
For further discussion on this case, see, Ch. XXVI
10. The Supreme Court has used its power to issue directions in a number of cases. For example, see, Lakshmi Kant Pandey v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 469 : (1984) 2 SCC 244; State of West Bengal v. Sampat Lal, AIR 1985 SC 195 : (1985) 1 SCC 317; Union Carbide Corp. v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 248 : (1991) 4 SCC 584; Advocate-on-Record Ass. v. Union of India, (1993) 4 SCC 441 : AIR 1994 SC 268; Vishakha, op. cit.
11. B.P. Achala Anand v. S.Appi Reddy, (2005) 3 SCC 313 : AIR 2005 SC 986.
12. Secretary, Ministry of Defence v. A.V.Damodaran (Dead) Through LRS., (2009) 9 SCC 140.
13. Union of India v. Muralidhara Menon, (2009) 9 SCC 304.

It is thus clear from the above discussion that the Supreme Court's power under Art. 142 is vastly broad based. There are only three restrictions on the exercise of this power:

(i) it can be exercised only when the Court is otherwise exercising its jurisdiction;

(ii) the order which the Court passes is necessary for doing complete justice in the cause or matter pending before it; and

(iii) an order made under Art. 142(1) cannot contravene a constitutional provision though it may by-pass substantive provisions of the relevant statutory laws, if the court feels it necessary.

As regards the power under Art. 142 to do complete justice, the Supreme Court has put the power at its highest in In re, Vinay Chandra Mishra,[14] where the Court declared that "statutory provisions cannot override the constitutional provisions" and "Art. 142(1) being a constitutional power it cannot be limited or conditioned by any statutory provision." No enactment made by Central or state legislature can limit or restrict the power of the Supreme Court under Art. 142, though the Court must take into consideration the statutory provisions regulating the matter in dispute. What would be the need of complete justice in a cause or matter, would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. The limited view of Art. 142 expressed in Premchand[15] was expressly overruled as being "no longer a good law".[16]

The main point which the Court was called upon to decide in Vinay Chandra was whether it could suspend an advocate from practice, reading Arts. 129 and 142(1) together, when he was held guilty of contempt of court.[17] It was argued that since the power to suspend an advocate had been vested exclusively in the State Bar Council and the Bar Council of India, the Supreme Court was denuded of its power to impose such punishment. But the Court rejected the argument and ruled that under Arts. 129 and 142(1), it had the power to suspend an advocate from practice for its contempt. The Court ruled that Advocates Act had nothing to do with the contempt jurisdiction of the Court. No statute could restrict or limit the Court's power to take action for contempt against an advocate. The Court observed:[18]

> ".....The disciplinary jurisdiction of the State Bar Councils and the Bar Council of India to take action for professional misconduct is different from the jurisdiction of the courts to take action against the advocates for the contempt of court. The said jurisdiction co-exists independently of each other. The action taken under one jurisdiction does not bar an action under the other jurisdiction".

Therefore, invoking its power under Art. 129 read with Art. 142, the Court awarded to the contemner advocate not only a suspended sentence of imprisonment for six weeks but also suspended him from practice for three years.

Following Vinay Chandra, the Court has observed in the case noted below:[19]

---

14. (1995) 2 SCC 621.
15. See, supra, footnote 92.
16. Also see, E.S.P. Rajaram v. Union of India, AIR 2001 SC 581 : (2001) 2 SCC 186.
17. See, supra, Sec. C(i)(a).
18. (1995) 2 SCC 621, at 624; supra.
19. Delhi Development Authority v. Skipper Construction Co. (P) Ltd., AIR 1996 SC 2005, 2011 : (1996) 4 SCC 622.

> "As a matter of fact, we think it advisable to leave this power undefined and uncatalogued so that it remains elastic enough to be moulded to suit the given situation."

Art. 142 is conceived to meet situations which cannot be effectively and appropriately tackled by the existing provisions of law. For example in R.K. Anand v. Registrar, Delhi High Court,[20] a 3-judge Bench appears to have expressed a contrary view holding that the High Court could, in appropriate cases, direct an Advocate who is found to be guilty of committing contempt to prohibit him from appearing in the High Court or lower courts subordinate to it. Thus, where an influential prisoner flouted all laws while in a particular jail, and it was imperative to transfer the prisoner out of the state, even though there was no provision in either the Jail Manual or The Transfer of Prisoners Act,1950, the "legislative vacuum" was filled and directions were given for his transfer to a jail outside the State.[21] Similarly, a decree for divorce on the ground of an irretrievable breakdown of marriage was granted although the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, under which the matter arose, does not recognize it as one of the grounds on which a court can direct dissolution of marriage.[22] The limited power of review in the Designated Authority under Rule 23 of the Customs Tariff (Identification, Assessment and Collection of Anti-dumping duty on Dumped Articles and for Determination of Injury) Rules, 1995 was extended under this Article.[23]

But the same question was re-agitated before the Supreme Court in Supreme Court Bar Association v. Union of India,[24] and this time the Court modified, and toned down, its views as expressed in Vinay Chandra. The Court has now ruled that it has no power to suspend an advocate from practice. He should be dealt with under the Advocates Act, 1961, which "contains a detailed and complete mechanism for suspending or revoking the licence of an advocate for his professional misconduct". Regarding Art. 142, the Court has observed:[25]

> "The power to do complete justice under Article 142 is in a way, corrective power, which gives preference to equity over law but it cannot be used to deprive a professional lawyer of the due process contained in the Advocates Act, 1961, by suspending his license to practice in a summary manner, while dealing with a case of contempt of court."

The Court has asserted that it is not a court of restricted jurisdiction of only dispute settling. The Supreme Court "has always been a law maker and its role travels beyond merely dispute settling. It is a problem solver in the nebulous areas". Nevertheless, imposing a self limitation on itself it has said:[26]

> "....The substantive statutory provisions dealing with the subject-matter of a given case, cannot be altogether ignored by this Court, while making an order

---

20. (2009) 8 SCC 106 : (2009) 10 JT 1.
21. Kalyan Ranjan Sarkar v. Rajesh Ranjan, (2005) 3 SCC 284 : AIR 2005 SC 972.
22. A. Jayachandra v. Aneel Kaur, (2005) 2 SCC 22 : AIR 2005 SC 534; See also Swati Verma v. Rajan Verma, (2004) 1 SCC 123 : AIR 2004 SC 161*; Jimmy Sudarshan Purohit v. Sudarshan Sharad Purohit,* (2005) 13 SCC 410 : (2004) 10 SCALE 362*; Sanghamitra Ghosh v. Kajal Kumar Ghosh,* (2007) 2 SCC 220 : (2006) 10 JT 288.
23. Designated Authority v. Indian Refractory Makers Assocn., 2003 (154) ELT 349 (SC) : (2003) 11 SCC 28
24. AIR 1998 SC 1895 : (1998) 4 SCC 409; supra.
25. Ibid, at 1907.
26. Ibid, at 1909. Also see, Bonkya v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1996 SC 257 : (1995) 6 SCC 447.

> under Article 142. Indeed, these constitutional powers cannot, in any way, be controlled by any statutory provisions but at the same time these powers are not meant to be exercised when their exercise may come directly in conflict with what has been expressly provided for in a statute dealing expressly with the subject."

Therefore, while "prohibitions or limitations in a statute" cannot come in the way of exercise of jurisdiction under Art. 142 to do complete justice between the parties, the Apex Court "will take note of the express provisions of any substantive statutory law and regulate the exercise of its power and discretion accordingly". The Court disapproved the proposition stated in Vinay Chandra[27] that "while exercising jurisdiction under Art. 142, this Court can altogether ignore the substantive provisions of a statute, dealing with the subject and pass orders concerning an issue which can be settled only through a mechanism prescribed in another statute."

On Art. 142, the Court has observed that "the power exists as a separate and independent basis of jurisdiction, apart from the statutes". "This plenary jurisdiction is, thus, the residual source of power which this Court may draw upon as necessary whenever it is just and equitable to do so and in particular to ensure the observance of the due process of law, to do complete justice between the parties, while administering justice according to law". The power conferred by Art. 142 being "curative in nature" cannot be construed as power authorising the Court to ignore "the substantive rights of a litigant" while dealing with a cause pending before it". The power conferred by Art. 142 has been held to be "complementary" to those powers specifically conferred on the Court by statutes. Thus in an appropriate case the Court can direct the Commissioner of Income tax to reopen an assessment under the Income Tax Act.[28]

The Court has further observed that it cannot use its power under Art. 142 to "supplant" substantive law applicable to the case or cause under consideration of the Court. Art. 142 cannot be used, even with the width of its amplitude, to build a new edifice where none existed earlier, by ignoring express statutory provisions dealing with a subject and thereby achieve something indirectly which cannot be achieved directly.

The Court has cautioned:

> "It must be remembered that wider the amplitude of its power under Art. 142, the greater is the need of care for this Court to see that the power is used with restraint."

Thus, the plenitude of power conferred on the Supreme Court under Art. 142 needs to be used with care as not to interfere with the performance of their statutory duties and functions by other authorities in accordance with law.

Hence the Court has said that in exercise of its jurisdiction under Art.142 and the High Courts under S. 482 of Criminal Procedure Code would not direct quashing of a case involving crime against society and more so when both trial

---

27. Supra, footnote 14.

28. Commissioner of Income Tax, Shimla v. Greenworld Corporation, Parwanoo, (2009) 7 SCC 69 : (2009) 8 JT 429.

court as also the High Court have found that a prima facie case has been made out against the accused.[29]

The court will not exercise the power to direct re-computation of tax based on law declared when the controversy was two decades old on the ground of extreme difficulty by reason of long lapse of time.[30]

To enable the exercise of discretion to be an informed one, the assistance of experts may be availed.[31]

In M.S. Ahlawat v. State of Haryana,[32] the Court has held that under Art. 142, it cannot altogether ignore the substantive provisions of a statute and pass orders concerning an issue which can be settled only through a mechanism prescribed in another statute.

Again, in M.C. Mehta v. Kamal Nath[33], the Court has stated that Art. 142 cannot be pressed into service in a situation where action under that article would amount to contravention of the specific provisions of the Act. In the instant case, the Court awarded damages against the respondent under the "Polluter Pays Principle". The further question was whether the Court could under Art. 142 impose pollution fine on the polluter under such statutes as the Water (Pollution and Control of Pollution) Act, 1974, the Environment (Protection) Act 1986, and the Air (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Act, 1981. The Supreme Court ruled that to impose punishment under any of these Acts, the polluter must be tried in a court and if the offence is proved then alone he can be punished. Art. 142 can not be pressed into aid in such a situation for to impose fine upon the polluter would amount to contravention of the specific statutory provisions.

However, while the law declared by the Supreme Court is presumed to be in operation from the inception, while declaring the law, in exercise of its powers to do complete justice, it may be direct the declaration to operate prospectively and save the transactions whether statutory or otherwise that were effected on the basis of the earlier law.[34]

Recently, there has been a reiteration of the "restrictive" approach. In State of Haryana v. Sumitra Devi,[35] the opinion was that no order can be passed under Art. 142 contrary to statute or statutory rules. .In another case an order passed under Art. 142 was corrected on review as it was passed contrary to a statutory provision.[36] The Constitutional Bench decision in Secy. State of Karnataka v.

---

29. Rumi Dhar (SMT) v. State of West Bengal, (2009) 6 SCC 364 : AIR 2009 SC 2195.
30. Commissioner of Income Tax, Faridabad v. Ghanshyam (HUF), (2009) 8 SCC 412 : (2009) 9 JT 445.
31. M.C. Mehta v. Union of India, (2007) 1 SCC 110 : AIR 2007 SC 1087.
32. (2000) 1 SCC 409 : AIR 2000 SC 1997.
33. (2000) 6 SCC 213, 223. However see Oriental Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Brij Mohan, (2007) 7 SCC 56, at page 64 : AIR 2007 SC 1971, Also see, infra, Ch. XXVI.
34. Golak Nath v. State of Punjab, AIR 1963 SC 1643. For a full discussion see Part VII Chapter XL Sec. G: Prospective overruling.
35. (2004) 12 SCC 322 : AIR 2004 SC 1050. See also Sarat Chandra Mishra v. State of Orissa, (2006) 1 SCC 638 : AIR 2006 SC 861.
36. Textile Labour Asscn v. Official Liquidator, (2004) 9 SCC 741 : AIR 2004 SC 2336.

Umadevi (3)[37] emphasized that "complete justice" under Art. 142 means justice according to law and not sympathy. It said that "equitable considerations or individualization of justice" have resulted in conflicting opinions leading to confusion and uncertainty in the law and that the Court would not grant a relief which would amount to perpetuating an illegality encroaching into the legislative domain.[38]

However the earlier liberal approach as propounded in Vinay Chandra also continues to be applied.[39]

The sum and substance of the above observations of the Apex Court seems to be that the scope of Art. 142 is extremely broad. Being a constitutional provision, it can override any statutory provision. But, in practice, the Court does not use its powers under Art. 142 in direct confrontation with any express statutory provision applicable to the case in hand. This is a self-imposed restriction but the Court can by-pass the same if the equitable considerations in a given case so demand.

A large number of cases have been disposed of by the Court invoking its power under Art. 142. From the conspectus of decided cases, it appears that the Court has invoked its power under Art. 142 in different types of cases involving different fact situations for doing complete justice between the parties. The observations of the Court in numerous cases spanning over 60 years also indicate that, at times, the Court has adopted a somewhat narrow view, and, at other times, an extremely broad view, of its power under Art. 142. Particular reliefs have been granted while providing that the case would not be treated as a precedent or by prefacing the direction with a phrase emphasizing the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case.[40]

The discussion above establishes that Art. 142 confers a plenary power on the Supreme Court which is free of any statutory limitations. Ordinarily, the Court does not by-pass statutory provisions under Art. 142, but, if in any situation, the Court feels it necessary to do complete justice to by-pass statutory provisions, it can do so. It can be said that the Supreme Court's power under Art. 142, theoretically speaking, is not conditioned by any statutory provisions, but, in practice, it

---

37. (2006) 4 SCC 1, 36 : AIR 2006 SC 1806.

38. (2006) 4 SCC 1, 18 : AIR 2004 SC 32. See also Teri Oat Estates (P) Ltd. v. U.T. Chandigarh, (2004) 2 SCC 130 : (2003) 10 SCALE 1016; A. Umarani v. Registrar, Cooperative Societies, (2004) 7 SCC 1, 18*; Govt. of W. Bengal v. Tarun K. Roy*, (2004) 1 SCC 347 : (2003) 9 JT 130*; National Aluminium Co. Ltd. v. Presssteel & Fabrications (P) Ltd.*, (2004) 1 SCC 540 : AIR 2005 SC 1514; Pramod Kumar Saxena v. Union of India, (2008) 9 SCC 685; U.P.STRC v. Commissioner of Police, (2009) 3 SCC 634 : (2009) 2 JT 553; Leila David v. State of Maharashtra, (2009) 4 SCC 578 : (2009) 11 JT 252.

39. Monica Kumar (Dr.) v. State of U.P., (2008) 8 SCC 781; Tamilnadu Mercantile Bank Shareholders Welfare Assn. (2) v. S.C. Sekar, (2009) 2 SCC 784.

40. See for example Pure Helium India (P) Ltd. v. Oil & Natural Gas Commission, (2003) 8 SCC 593 : AIR 2003 SC 4519; Pohla Singh v. State of Punjab, (2004) 6 SCC 126AIR 2004 SC 3329*; Bharat Petroleum Corpn Ltd. v. P. Kesavan*, (2004) 9 SCC 772 : AIR 2004 SC 2206; Swedish Match AB v. SEBI, (2004) 11 SCC 641 : AIR 2004 SC 4219; India Umbrella Manufacturing Co. v. Bhagabandei Agarwalla, (2004) 3 SCC 178 : AIR 2004 SC 1312*; Harigovind Yadav v. Rewa Siddhi Gramin Bank*, (2006) 6 SCC 145 : AIR 2006 SC 3596*; Hari Shankar Singhania v. Gaur Hari Singhania*, (2006) 4 SCC 679 : (2006) 4 SLT 551*; Hari Shankar Singhania v Gaur Hari Singhania*, (2006) 4 SCC 658 : AIR 2006 SC 2488; Hasham Abbas Sayyad v. Usman Abbas Sayyad, (2007) 2 SCC 355 : AIR 2007 SC 1077; State of Kerala v. Mahesh Kumar, (2009) 3 SCC 654, at page 660 : (2009) 3 JT 424.

would not disregard such provisions unless it is absolutely necessary to do so with a view to do justice between the parties.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE

In the area of criminal justice, under Art. 136 read with Art. 142, the Supreme Court is entitled to stay the execution of the sentence and to grant bail pending the disposal of the application for special leave to appeal.[41] Disposing of an appeal from an order refusing bail to the appellants who were charged inter alia with cheating several investors, in exercise of its powers under Art. 142, the Supreme Court granted bail and also issued several directions relating to the realization and disposal of the assets of the appellants to meet the demands of the various depositors.[42]

Under Art. 142(1) coupled with Arts. 32 and 136, the Supreme Court has jurisdiction to quash criminal proceedings if on admitted facts no charge is made out against the accused, or if the proceedings are initiated on concocted facts or false evidence, or if the proceedings are initiated for oblique purposes.[43] The power of the Court under Art. 142 insofar as quashing of criminal proceedings are concerned is not exhausted by ss. 320 or 321 or 482 Cr. P.C., or all of them put together.[44] Thus, while acquitting an accused of charges of rape he was directed to pay compensation to the complainant by way of damages for committing breach of promise to marry her.[45]

The Court can enhance the sentence awarded to the accused while hearing an appeal against his conviction.

In Chandrakant Patil v. State,[46] the Court has observed that "power under Article 142 of the Constitution is entirely of different level and is of a different quality which cannot be limited or restricted by provisions contained in statutory law. No enactment made by the Central or State legislature can limit or restrict the power of this Court under Article 142, though while exercising it the Court may have regard to statutory provisions." The Court has however cautioned that it will use its power under Art. 142 "only sparingly" and "not frequently".

In the instant case, the appellant was convicted under TADA and sentenced to 5 years' rigorous imprisonment. While hearing an appeal filed by the accused, the Supreme Court found the sentence to be inadequate and enhanced the sentence to 10 years' imprisonment to meet the ends of justice. The question was raised whether the Supreme Court could enhance the sentence as the Criminal Procedure Code has no such provision. The Court took the view that the Court could do so under its "wide and residual powers to deal with the situation like this, which are well enclosed in Article 142 of the Constitution". It may be noted

---

41. K.M. Nanavati v. State of Bombay, AIR 1961 SC 112, 120 : (1961) 1 SCR 497.
For inter-relation between Arts. 161 and 142, see, infra, under State Executive, Ch. VII.

42. Arvind Mohan Johri v. State of U.P., (2005) 4 SCC 634 : (2005) 11 JT 478.

43. Union Carbide Corpn. v. Union of India, (1991) 4 SCC 584 : AIR 1992 SC 248; Delhi Judicial Service Association v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC at 2210; Keshub Mahindra v. State of Madhya Pradesh, (1996) 6 SCC 129 : 1996 SCC (Cri) 1124.

44. R.S. Antulay v. Nayak, AIR 1988 SC 1531 : (1988) 2 SCC 602; Arvind Barsaul (Dr.) v. State of M.P., (2008) 5 SCC 794; Monica Kumar (Dr.) v. State of U.P., (2008) 8 SCC 781, at page 801 : AIR 2008 SC 2781.

45. Deelip Singh v. State of Bihar, (2005) 1 SCC 88 : AIR 2005 SC 203.

46. Chandrakant Patil v. State, AIR 1998 SC 1165 : (1998) 3 SCC 38.

that, in the instant case, appeal was filed in the Supreme Court under section 19 of TADA and not under Art. 136.

A young woman was murdered because she resisted being raped by the accused. The trial court acquitted the accused and the High Court concurred with the trial court. On an appeal being filed in the Supreme Court under Art. 136, the Court reversed the lower courts and held him guilty.

It was argued that according to s. 401(3), Cr. P.C., if the Supreme Court found that the acquittal of the accused was wrong, then the case be sent back to the lower court for retrial. The Supreme Court did not agree with this contention, and invoking its power under Art. 142, held the accused guilty and sentenced him to life imprisonment.

The Court argued that the power available to it under Art. 136, is not circumscribed by any limitation. In any case, power under Art. 142 is available to pass such order as may be deemed appropriate to do complete justice. Accordingly, the Court by passed the limitation imposed on it by s. 401(3), Cr. P.C., and itself sentenced the accused.[47]

H. POWER TO REVIEW

Under Art. 137, the Supreme Court has power to review any judgment pronounced or order made by it. But this special power is, however, exercisable in accordance with, and subject to any parliamentary legislation and rules made by the Court itself under its rule making power.

Under Art. 145(e), the Supreme Court is authorised to make rules as to the conditions subject to which the Court may review any judgment or order.[48] In exercise of this power, Order XL has been framed.

According to the rules of the Court, in a civil proceeding, review of a Court decision will lie on the following grounds:

(1) discovery of new and important matter of evidence;

(2) mistake or error apparent on the face of the record;[49]

(3) any other sufficient reason, e.g., that there are in the judgment certain unmerited observations against the petitioner.[50]

The expression, 'for any other sufficient reason' has been given an expanded meaning and a decree or order passed under misapprehension of true state of circumstances has been held to be sufficient ground to exercise the power.[51]

The Apex Court has clarified that a review is by no means an appeal in disguise.

The Court has justified review of its own judgment with the following remarks:[52]

---

47. Dharma v. Nirmal Singh Bitta, AIR 1996 SC 1136 : (1996) 7 SCC 471.
48. On the rule-making power of the Court, see, Sec. I(f), infra.
49. See, CST v. Pine Chemicals Ltd., (1995) 1 SCC 58; Devidayal Rolling Mills v. Prakash Chimanlal Parikh, AIR 1993 SC 1982 : (1993) 2 SCC 470.
50. Dayanand v. Nagaraj, AIR 1976 SC 2183 : (1976) 2 SCC 932.
51. S. Nagaraj v. State of Karnataka, infra, footnote 52.
52. S. Nagaraj v. State of Karnataka, (1993) Supp. 4 SCC 595.
Also see, Lily Thomas v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 1650 : (2000) 6 SCC 224.

> "Review literally and even judicially means re-examination or reconsideration. Basic philosophy inherent in it is the universal acceptance of human fallibility… Rectification of an order thus stems from the fundamental principle that justice is above all. It is exercised to remove the error and not for disturbing finality."

In Hindustan Sugar Mills v. State of Rajasthan,[53] the Court accepted the review petition because the assumption on which it made certain observations in the earlier decision was shown to be unfounded. These observations were, therefore, deleted from the judgment.

The Court has ruled that it is not precluded from recalling or reviewing its own order if it is satisfied that it is necessary to do so for the sake of justice,[54] or the previous decision suffers from an error apparent on the face of the record.[55]

Review is a serious matter; it is not rehearing of the appeal all over again. A judgment once delivered is final—this is the normal rule. A departure from that principle can be justified only when circumstances of a substantial and compelling character make it necessary to do so. A judgment is not reconsidered except "where a glaring omission or patent mistake or like grave error has crept in the earlier decision".[56] "The mere fact that two views on the same subject are possible is no ground to review the earlier judgment passed by a Bench of the same strength."[57]

As the Supreme Court has observed:[58]

> "It is well settled that a party is not entitled to seek a review of a judgment delivered by this Court merely for the purpose of a rehearing and a fresh decision of the case. The normal principle is that a judgment pronounced by the Court is final and departure from that principle is justified only when circumstances of a substantial and compelling character make it necessary to do so."[59]

For example, the Court will review its judgment if its attention was not drawn to a material statutory provision during the first hearing,[60] or if a manifest wrong has been done and it is necessary to pass an order to do full and effective justice.[61] "A review proceeding cannot be equated with the original hearing of the case, and the finality of the judgment delivered by the Court will not be reconsidered except where a glaring omission or patent mistake or like grave error has crept in earlier by judicial fallibility."[62]

---

53. AIR 1981 SC 1681 : (1980) 1 SCC 599.
54. S. Nagaraj v. State of Karnataka, (1993) Supp (4) SCC 595.
55. Sheonandan Paswan v. State of Bihar, AIR 1987 SC 877 : (1987) 1 SCC 288; Deo Narain Singh v. Daddan Singh, (1986) Supp SCC 530.
Also see, A.R. Antulay and Common Cause, infra.
56. Chandra Kanta v. Sheik Habib, AIR 1975 SC 1500 : (1975) 1 SCC 674; P.N. Eswara Iyer v. Registrar, Supreme Court of India, AIR 1980 SC 808; Avtar Singh Sekhon v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 2041 : 1980 Supp SCC 562.
57. Lily Thomas v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 1650 at 1663 : (2000) 6 SCC 224.
58. Northern India Caterers v. Lt. Governor of Delhi, AIR 1980 SC 674 : (1980) 2 SCC 167.
Also see, Sow Chandra Kante v. S.K. Habib, (1975) 1 SCC 674 : AIR 1975 SC 1500.
59. Sajjan Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1965 SC 845 : (1965) (1) SCR 973.
60. Girdhari Lal Gupta v. D.H. Mehta, AIR 1971 SC 2162 : (1971) 3 SCC 189; UCO Bank v. Rajinder Lal Capoor, (2008) 5 SCC 257 : AIR 2008 SC 1831.
61. O.N. Mohindroo v. Dist. Judge, Delhi, AIR 1971 SC 107 : (1971) 3 SCC 5.
62. Chandrakanta v. Shaikh Habib, AIR 1975 SC 1500 : (1975) 1 SCC 674; Northern India Caterers, supra, footnote 58; Lily Thomas v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 1650 at 1663 : (2000) 6 SCC 224.

Thus review of a judgment or order has been allowed if the order sought to be reviewed is based on a decision per incuriam,[63] or on an incorrect assumption of facts or law[64] or a non consideration of a contention made,[65] or if the judgment is inconsistent with the operative portion[66] or an interim order which was granted subject to the outcome of the appeal[67] or to clarify an ambiguity.[68]

The Court has described its review power as follows in Lily Thomas:[69]

> "… the power of review can be exercised for correction of a mistake and not to substitute a view. Such powers can be exercised within the limits of the statute dealing with the exercise of power. The review cannot be treated like an appeal in disguise. The mere possibility of two views on the subject is not a ground for review."

In this case, the Court refused to review its earlier judgment in Sarla Mudgal v. Union of India[70]as there was no error apparent on the face of the record; no new material had come to light after the judgment. The earlier judgment was held not violative of any of the fundamental rights guaranteed to the citizens. Review power cannot be exercised merely because there is possibility of taking a different view.[71]

The expression "error apparent on the face of the record" is an error which is based on clear ignorance or disregard of the provisions of the law. The error should be something more than a mere error; it must be one manifest on the face of the record. An error is not apparent on the face of the record if it is not self-evident and if it requires an examination or argument to establish it.[72]

But, recently, the Supreme Court has given an expansive scope to the Court's power of review. The Court has observed:[73]

> "… to maintain a review petition it has to be shown that there has been miscarriage of justice. Of course, the expression "miscarriage of justice" is all embracing."

In A.R. Antulay v. R.S. Nayak,[74] the Supreme Court has stated that it has, de hors Art. 137, inherent power ex debito justitiae to recall an order made by it

---

63. Vinod Kumar v. Prem Lata, (2003) 11 SCC 397 : AIR 2003 SC 3854.
64. Chairman SBI v. All Orissa State Bank Officers Assocn., (2003) 11 SCC 607 : AIR 2003 SC 4201; See also Tushar H. Shah v. Manilal Pitambardas, (2003) 9 SCC 184 : (2000) 8 SLT 722.
65. Indian Charge Chrome v. Union of India, (2005) 4 SCC 67 : AIR 2005 SC 2087; Noise Pollution (VI), In re, (2005) 8 SCC 794 : (2005) 8 SCALE 101; *National Insurance Co. Ltd. v Bommithi Subbhayamma*M (2005) 12 SCC 243 : (2006) 131 Com Cases 280.
66. J.P. Srivastava & Sons (Rampur) (P) Ltd. v. Gwalior Sugar Company Ltd., (2004) 7 SCC 193.
67. K.T.Venkatagiri v. State of Karnataka, (2003) 9 SCC 1 : AIR 2003 SC 1819.
68. Arvind Mohan Johri v. State of U.P., (2005) 5 SCC 131 : (2005) 5 SLT 516 (2).
69. Lily Thomas v. Union of India, AIR 2000 SC 1650 : (2000) 6 SCC 224.
70. See, infra, Ch. XXXIV, for this case.
71. Lily Thomas, supra, at 1666.
72. P.N. Eswara Iyer v. Registrar, Supreme Court of India, AIR 1980 SC 808 : (1980) 4 SCC 680; Chandra Kanta v. Sheikh Habib, AIR 1975 SC 1500 : (1975) 1 SCC 674; Sheonandan Paswan v. Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1125 : (1983) 4 SCC 104; State of Haryana v. Prem Chand, AIR 1990 SC 538; T.C. Basappa v. T. Nagappa, AIR 1954 SC 440 : 1955 (1) SCR 250; Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Ahmad Ishaque, AIR 1955 SC 233 : 1955 (1) SCR 1104.
For further discussion on the concept of "error apparent on the face of the record", see, Ch. VIII, infra.
73. Suthenthiraraja v. State, AIR 1999 SC 3700, at 3703 : (1999) 9 SCC 323.
74. AIR 1988 SC 1531 : (1988) 2 SCC 602.

earlier if it was made by the Court by mistake. The Supreme Court being the Apex Court, and there being no higher forum where one could question any of its decisions, it is not only appropriate but also the duty of the Court to rectify the mistake in any of its decisions.

The Court has emphasized that the basic fundamental of the administration of justice is that no man should suffer because of the mistake of the Court. Ex debito justitiae, the Court must do justice to him. If a man has been wronged, so long as it lies within the human machinery of administration of justice, the wrong must be remedied. Some of the situations where the Court may exercise such a power are: (1) violation of a fundamental right; (2) violation of the principles of natural justice; (3) mistake of the Court; (4) judgement was obtained by fraud; (5) the Court made the earlier order without jurisdiction.

In the instant case, the Court (Bench of 7 Judges) recalled by majority (5:2) an order made earlier by a Bench of five Judges in R.S. Nayak v. A.R. Antulay.[75]

In that case, the Court had transferred a case pending against Antulay in a special court under the Prevention of Corruption Act for trial to the Bombay High Court. The order was made in 1984. This direction was now challenged after four years before the Supreme Court on the ground of "non-perception of certain provisions and certain authorities which would amount to derogation of the constitutional rights of the citizen." The Court now took the view that it was proper for it to act ex debito justitiae in favour of the appellant whose fundamental rights have been infringed. The Court had given directions in the earlier case suo motu without observing the principle of audi alteram partem. This had deprived the appellant of a right of appeal to the High Court and thus he was prejudiced. The said direction had also violated the fundamental rights of the appellant guaranteed to him by Arts. 14 and 21.[76]

The Supreme Court also ruled that the directions given by it in 1984 were violative of the limits of the Court's jurisdiction since the Court could not confer jurisdiction on a High Court which by relevant law was exclusively vested in the Special Judge and the decision was given per incuriam.[77] The Court now recalled the direction given by it in 1984 and directed that the corruption case against Antulay be tried by the Special Judge appointed under the Prevention of Corruption Act.

Some of the observations made by the Court on its inherent right to correct its own mistakes may be taken note of here. SABYASACHI MUKHARJI, J, (majority view) observed in this connection:[78]

> "But the Superior Court can always correct its own error brought to its notice either by way of the petition or ex debito justitiae".

SABYASACHI MUKHARJI, J., observed at another place:[79]

---

75. AIR 1984 SC 684 : (1984) 2 SCC 183.

76. For Art. 14, see, Ch. XXI, infra; for Art. 21, see, Ch. XXVI, infra.

77. AIR 1988 SC at 1549.
Also see, In the matter of Cauvery Water Disputes Tribunal, AIR 1992 SC 522, 555.
The term 'per incuriam' has been explained by the Court in Antulay as follows (AIR 1988 SC at 1548):
"Per Incuriam" are those decisions given in ignorance or forgetfulness of some inconsistent statutory provision or of some authority binding on the court concerned".

78. AIR 1988 SC at 1547.

79. Ibid, at 1548.

> "In rectifying the error, no procedural inhibitions should debar this Court because no person should suffer by reason of any mistake of the Court".

And further:[80]

> "[T]he Court has power to review either under section [Art.] 137 or suo motu the directions given by this Court".

The learned Judge said at another place:[81]

> "But directions given per incuriam and in violation of certain constitutional limitations and in derogation of the principles of natural justice can always be remedied by the Court ex debito justitiae."

And, again, he said explaining the scope of the inherent power of the Supreme Court to review de hors Art. 137:

> "We are of the opinion that this Court is not powerless to correct its error which has the effect of depriving a citizen of his fundamental rights and more so, the right to life and liberty. It can do so in exercise of its inherent jurisdiction in any proceeding pending before it without insisting on the formalities of a review application. Powers of review can be exercised in a petition filed under Article 136 or Article 32 or under any other provision of the Constitution if the Court is satisfied that its directions have resulted in the deprivation of the fundamental rights of a citizen or any legal right of the petitioner."[82]

In Ahlawat,[83] the Supreme Court set aside the order passed by it earlier. The Court observed:

> "To perpetuate an error is no virtue but to correct it is a compulsion of judicial conscience"

The Court has asserted that if it is convinced that it has earlier passed a wrong order in a case, it has power to recall the same and set it aside.

In Common Cause,[84] on a review petition, the Court reversed its own earlier judgment[85] on the ground that it suffered from patent error of law resulting in serious miscarriage of justice. In the instant case, the petition of review was allowed.

In 1997, the Supreme Court had held a Central Minister guilty of committing the tort of "malfeasance in office" and imposed exemplary damages of Rs. 50 lacs payable by the Minister to the Central Government. But in its decision in 1999, the Court reversed its earlier decision. It ruled that though the conduct of the Minister was wholly unjustified, "it falls short of 'misfeasance in public office' which is a specific tort and the ingredients of that tort are not wholly met in the case." That being so, there was no occasion to award exemplary damages.

---

80. Ibid, at 1555.
81. Ibid, at 1549.
82. Ibid, at 1549.
83. M.S. Ahlawat v. State of Haryana, AIR 2000 SC 168 : (2000) 1 SCC 278. However a different view was expressed in Surendra Kumar Vakil v. Chief Executive Officer, (2004) 10 SCC 126 : AIR 2004 SC 3088, which held that a point that has been heard and decided will not be reviewed even if the decision is erroneous.
84. Common Cause-A Regd. Society v. Union of India, AIR 1999 SC 2979 : (1999) 6 SCC 667.
85. Common Cause-A Regd. Society v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 1203 : (1997) 3 SCC 433. For a detailed discussion on both these cases, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, II, JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, IV.

Therefore, the direction made by the Court in 1997 to pay Rs. 50 lacs as exemplary damages was now recalled by the court.[86] Nevertheless it has been held that a subsequent judgment of the Supreme Court is no ground for review[87] nor the fact that the earlier order was contrary to a matter of practice[88], nor will the Court re-appreciate the evidence.[89] A point not argued at the hearing of the appeal will not be permitted to be raised in review[90] and a second review petition against a reviewed judgment will not be entertained.[91]

According to the Court Rules, review petition is filed within 30 days from the date of the judgment or order sought to be reviewed [Order XL, r. 2]. Ordinarily, an application for review is disposed of by circulation without any detailed arguments unless otherwise ordered by the Court [Order XL, Rule 3].

To avoid the petition for review being disposed of by circulation, the petition is often couched as an application for clarification. This has been deprecated and has been visited with exemplary costs.[92]

According to the Rules made by the Supreme Court [Order XL of the Supreme Court Rules, 1966], a review in a criminal proceeding is available on the ground of an "error apparent on the face of the record" [Rule 1 of Order XL]. This rule has been broadly interpreted by the Court. As the Court has observed in Eswara[93] : "The substantive power is derived from Art. 137 and is as wide for criminal as for civil proceedings… We see no insuperable difficulty in equating the area in civil and criminal proceedings when review power is invoked from the same source."

In G.L Gupta v. D.N. Mehta,[94] the Supreme Court reviewed its earlier decision in a criminal appeal because a statutory provision [s. 23-C(2) of the Foreign Exchange Act, 1947], which had a vital bearing on the case, was not brought to its notice. The Court modified the sentence of imprisonment to fine.

CURATIVE PETITIONS

Even after a review petition filed under Art. 137 is rejected by the Court, that may not be the end of the road. The court may still review the case under its inherent power but on very restricted grounds. The court has recently ruled in Rupa Ashok Hurra v. Ashok Hurra[95] that while certainty of law is important in India, it cannot be at the cost of justice. The court has observed in this connection :

> "...this Court, to prevent abuse of its process and to cure a gross miscarriage of justice, may reconsider its judgments in exercise of its inherent power:"

---

86. Also see, Ch. III, supra.
87. State of M.P. v. Steel Authority of India, (2002) 10 SCC 144.
88. Devender Pal Singh v. State, (2003) 2 SCC 501 : AIR 2003 SC 886.
89. Kerala SEB v. Hitech Electrothermics & Hydropower Ltd., (2005) 6 SCC 651 : (2005) 7 JT 485.
90. Common Cause v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 222 : (2004) 9 SCALE 32*; Citibank N.A. v. Standard Chartered Bank*, (2004) 8 SCC 348 : AIR 2005 SC 94*; Govt of Tamil Nadu v. M. Anachu Asari*, (2005) 2 SCC 332 : AIR 2005 SC 1062.
91. Common Cause v. Union of India, (2003) 10 SCC 264 : (2002) 7 SCALE 22(1).
92. See Zahira Habibullah Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 5 SCC 353 : AIR 2004 SC 3467*; APSTRC v. Abdul Kareem*, (2007) 2 SCC 466 : (2007) 2 JT 532.
93. P.N. Eswara Iyer v. Registrar, Supreme Court of India, AIR 1980 SC 808; Suthenthiraraja v. State, AIR 1999 SC 3700 : (1999) 9 SCC 323. However see, Zahira Habibullah Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 5 SCC 353 : AIR 2004 SC 3467.
94. AIR 1971 SC 2162.
95. JT 2002(3) SC 609 : (2002) 4 SCC 388.

Such a curative petition under the Court's inherent power can be filed, seeking review of a decision which has become final after dismissal of a review petition under Art. 137, on very strong grounds, such as,

(1) variation of the principle of natural justice—the right to be heard, as for example, when the affected person was not served notice or not heard during the proceedings;
(2) a Judge who participated in the decision—making process did not disclose his links with a party to the case, i.e. the question of bias;
(3) abuse of the process of the court.

The above list of the grounds to move a curative petition is not exhaustive. The court has observed in this connection:

"It is neither advisable nor possible to enumerated all the grounds on which such a petition may be entertained."

While opening the channel of review by way of curative petitions, the court has imposed several severe conditions thereon, for example:

(1) The grounds stated in the curative petition must have been taken earlier in the review petition;
(2) A senior advocate must certify that the above requirements have been fulfilled;
(3) If at any stage of consideration of the curative petition, the bench holds that the petition is without any merit and is vexatious, exemplary costs may be imposed on the petitioner;
(4) The petition has first to be circulated to a bench of three senior-most judges and the judges who passed the judgement complained of. If a majority of these Judges conclude that the matter needs to be heard, it should be listed before the same bench (as far as possible).

This procedural precaution is necessary because "the matter relates to re-examination of a final decision of this court."[1] The requirements are stringently enforced and the jurisdiction to entertain such petitions though frequently invoked, is rarely exercised.[2]

I. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

(a) TRANSFER OF CASES

To facilitate quick disposal of cases, Art. 139A(1) provides that if cases involving substantially the same questions of law are pending before the Supreme Court and a High Court, or before two or more High Courts, the Supreme Court can withdraw the cases from the High Courts and decide them itself. Once the common issue of law is decided, the cases may be returned to the High Courts under the proviso to Art.139A (1) to decide individual cases in the light of the law so laid down.[3]

All issues which could be raised before the High Court including an objection to the maintainability of the proceeding would not be affected by an order of transfer.[4]

---

1. Ibid, at 632. See also Sanjay Singh v. UPSC, (2007) 3 SCC 720, 732 : AIR 2007 SC 950.
2. Gurdeep Singh v. State of Punjab, (2005) 10 SCC 468-470; See also Shaukat Hussain Guru v. State, (2008) 6 SCC 776, at page 779 : AIR 2008 SC 2419.
3. Gnaneshwar B. Pettukota v. Govt. of India, (2005) 12 SCC 447.
4. Tata Cummins Ltd. v. State of Jharkhand, (2005) 11 SCC 496.

The application for the purpose can be made by the Attorney-General or a party to any such case. The questions involved in the cases should be "substantial" and of "general importance".[5] However where an issue between the parties being decided by the Supreme Court is also the subject matter of proceedings between the same parties in the High Courts, transfer of all proceedings to the Supreme Court was directed.[6]

The Supreme Court has ruled that Art. 139A(1) is not exhaustive of the Supreme Court's power to withdraw a case to itself from a lower court. The Court can also act under Arts. 136 and 142(1). The Court has stated: "To the extent power of withdrawal and transfer of cases to the Apex Court is, in the opinion of the Court, necessary for the purpose of effectuating the high purpose of Arts. 136 and 142(1), the power under Art. 139A must be held not to exhaust the power of withdrawal and transfer."[7]

Under Art. 139-A(2), the Supreme Court may also transfer a case from one High Court to another if it deems it expedient to do so for meeting ends of justice.[8] This provision enables the litigants to approach the Apex Court for transfer of proceedings if the conditions envisaged therein are satisfied.[9] The Supreme Court can pass an order of transfer suo motu.[10]

As regards Art. 139A(2), the Supreme Court has observed that the power to transfer a case from one State to another is to be used by the Court with caution and circumspection. But if the ends of justice so demand in an appropriate case, the Court would not hesitate to act.

A suit for damages was filed in Punjab against the Union of India for loss of the gurdwara properties by its agents as a result of Blue Star Operation. On a petition by the Union of India, the Supreme Court transferred the case to the Delhi High Court in view of the unusual and sensitive nature of the suit and the extraordinary atmosphere prevailing in Punjab.[11]

A book contained adverse remarks against certain popular leaders of Tamil Nadu thereby hurting the sentiments of the people of that State. A number of political leaders filed suits in the Madras High Court against the author and the publisher. The High Court granted an ex parte interim order prohibiting the release of the publication and sale of the book in the State. In such circumstances, at the author's instance, envisaging that atmosphere in the T.N. High Court

---

5. For an example of transfer of cases from the High Court to the Supreme Court, see, Union of India v. M. Ismail Faruqui, (1994) 1 SCC 265. Also see, Punjab Vidhan Sabha v. Prakash Singh Badal, (1987) Supp SCC 610. See also State of A.P. v. National Thermal Power Corpn. Ltd., (2002)5 SCC 203 : AIR 2002 SC 1895*; Union of India v. Radhika Backliwal,* (2003) 2 SCC 316 : (2002) 6 Scale 163*; All India Motor Vehicles Security Association v. Association of Regn. Plates Mfg.,* (2003) 10 SCC 93*; Anil Kumar Srivastava v. State of U.P.,* (2004) 8 SCC 671 : AIR 2004 SC 4299.

6. International Finance Corpn. v. Bihar State Industrial Development Corpn., (2005) 10 SCC 179.

7. Union Carbide Corpn. v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 248, 273 : (1991) 4 SCC 584. See for example Commodore Vimal Kumar v. Ruchi Rastogi, (2008) 12 SCC 62 : (2008) 4 JT 596; Harbans Lal & Sons v. Ramson Cycles (P.) Ltd., (2009) 4 SCC 16.

8. For transfer of writ petitions pending before several High Courts to one High Court, see, Bank of Madura v. Jugal Kishore Vyas, (1995) Supp (4) SCC 110.

9. Union Carbide Corpn. v. Union of India, (1991) 4 SCC 584 : AIR 1992 SC 248; Continental Construction Ltd. v. Raj Kumar, (2004) 13 SCC 444.

10. Kartar Singh v. State of Punjab, (1994) 3 SCC 569 : 1994 Cr LJ 3139.

11. Union of India v. Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee, AIR 1986 SC 1896.

would not be congenial for a fair trial, the Supreme Court directed the suits to be transferred to the Andhra Pradesh High Court.[12]

A case may be transferred by the Supreme Court from one High Court to another if the petitioner has a "reasonable genuine and justifiable" apprehension that he would not get justice, Assurance of a fair trial in the first imperative of the dispensation of justice.[13]

In the wake of widespread communal riots in Gujarat, criminal prosecutions were launched. Several ended in acquittal of the accused. The acquittals were affirmed by the High Court. The appeals from the decisions of the High Court were allowed. Reinvestigation and retrial were directed and the cases were ordered to be transferred to a court of competent jurisdiction under the jurisdiction of the Bombay High Court as there was "ample evidence on record glaringly demonstrating subversion of justice delivery system with no congenial and conducive atmosphere still prevailing" in Gujarat.[14]

(b) FEDERAL COURT'S JURISDICTION EXERCISABLE BY THE SUPREME COURT

According to Article 135, the Supreme Court has jurisdiction and powers with respect to any matter to which the provisions of Article 134 do not apply, if the jurisdiction and powers in relation to that matter were exercisable by the Federal Court immediately before the commencement of the Constitution under any law then existing.

The Federal Court was established in India under the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935. The court was introduced as an essential element of the federal system which was introduced for the first time in India by the Act of 1935. This court remained in operation until it was replaced by the Supreme Court of India on January 26, 1950.[15] Appeals from the Federal Court lay to the Privy Council.

The purpose of this constitutional provision is to safeguard interests of those litigants who had a right of appeal to the Federal Court, before the advent of the new Constitution, but who might have lost this right by reason of the Supreme Court taking the place of the Federal Court. The provision is, therefore, merely of a transitory nature.

(c) POWER TO SUMMON WITNESSES

Subject to a law made by Parliament in this behalf, the Court is empowered to make, as regards the whole of India, any order for the purpose of securing the attendance of any person, the discovery or production of all documents, or the investigation or punishment of any contempt of itself [Art. 142(2)].

---

12. K. Govindan Kutty v. All India Anna Dravida Mannetra Khazagam, (1996) 7 SCC 68.
13. Maneka Sanjay Gandhi v. Rani Jethamalani, AIR 1979 SC 468 : (1979) 4 SCC 167; R. Balakrishna Pillai v. State of Kerala, AIR 2000 SC 2778, 2781 : (2000) 7 SCC 129. See also Leelawati v. Ramesh Chand, (2004) 9 SCC 63 : AIR 2004 SC 1488.
14. Zahira Habibullah Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 4 SCC 158, 202 : AIR 2004 SC 3114.
15. See, GADBOIS, Evolution of the Federal Court of India: An Historical Foot-Note, 5 JILI, 19: GADBOIS. The Federal Court of India: 1937-1950, 6 JILI, 253; PYLEE, The Federal Court of India (1966); JAIN, OUTLINES OF INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, 345-348 (1990).

(d) ENFORCEMENT OF DECREES

Under Art. 142(1), any decree passed, or order made, by the Supreme Court is enforceable, throughout India in such manner as may be prescribed by a law of Parliament, or, pending the enactment of such a law, by the Presidential order.[16]

(e) ALL AUTHORITIES BOUND BY COURT ORDERS

All authorities, civil and judicial, in India are under an obligation to act in aid of the Court [Art. 144].

The Court can hold any authority in contempt of Court if he disregards or disobeys any Court order.[17] The Supreme Court has emphasized that there should be meticulous compliance of the directions issued by the Court[18] and has on occasion constituted a monitoring committee to oversee and ensure compliance with its directions.[19] The judgment of the court must be respected and any time frame specified in such judgment must be adhered to by all concerned even if they were not parties to the original proceedings.[20]

Thus, in Prakash Singh v. Union of India[21], after noting the various reports of Commissions recommending the need to amend or replace the Indian Police Act, 1861 wholly insulating the police from any pressure so as to enable them to operate effectively, the Court constituted various bodies to effect the objective, to the Central Government, State Governments and Union Territories for compliance till framing of the appropriate legislation. The directions were to be complied with by the concerned Governments, on or before 31-12-2006 so that the bodies become operational from 2007. The Cabinet Secretary, Government of India and the Chief Secretaries of State Governments/Union Territories were directed to file affidavits of compliance by 3-1-2007[22].

Art. 144 covers not only the courts [Art. 141] but also other civil authorities as well. Art. 144 obligates the authorities to follow not only the law declared by the Court [Art. 141] but also its orders, decrees or directions. Therefore, the scope of Art. 144 is broader than Art. 141.[23]

An Army Public School was held to be bound to give effect in terms of Article 144 to the guidelines of the Supreme Court in Vishaka's case to provide a complaint mechanism to enquire into allegations of sexual harassment.[24]

---

16. See, The Supreme Court (Decrees and Orders) Enforcement Order, 1954 (C.O. 47). See further State of Haryana v. State of Punjab, (2004) 12 SCC 673, 709-711 : (2004) 5 JT 72.

17. See, M.L. Sachdev v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 311.

In this case, the Government of India was held guilty of contempt of court for its failure to comply with a mandatory direction issued by the Supreme Court.

In Dinesh Kumar v. Motilal Nehru Medical College, Allahabad, AIR 1990 SC 2031, the Supreme Court held that the Governments of Bihar and Uttar Pradesh had committed its contempt for not complying with its directions. The Court imposed exemplary costs against the State Governments. See also Palitana Sugar Mills (P) Ltd. v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 12 SCC 645, 665 : (2004) 9 JT 526*; Nair Service Society v. State of Kerala*, (2007) 4 SCC 1, 29.

18. See In re Lily, Thomas, AIR 1964 SC 855 : 1964 (6) SCR 229.

19. See for example M.C. Mehta v. Union of India, (2006) 3 SCC 429 : (2006) 3 SCALE 615.

20. Veer Kanwar Singh University Ad-hoc Teachers Association. v. The Bihar State University (C.C.) Service Commission, 2007 (4) Supreme 376.

21. (2006) 8 SCC 1, at page 6.

22. Ibid at page 17.

23. For Art. 141, see, infra, under "Stare Decisis", Sec. J.

24. D.S. Grewal v. Vimmi Joshi, (2009) 2 SCC 210 : (2009) 1 JT 400.

A piquant situation arose out of the Constitutional Bench decision in Commissioner of Central Excise v. Dhiren Chemical Industries.[25] Circulars issued by the Central Board of Excise &Customs under section 37-B of the Central Excise Act 1944, are, in terms of that section, binding on all excise officers and "all other persons employed in the execution of the Act"[26]. Circulars were issued by the CBEC construing an Exemption Notification. The Supreme Court construed it otherwise but said that regardless of the interpretation by the Court, if there were circulars interpreting the Notification otherwise, that interpretation would bind the Revenue. Divergent views were expressed on whether the Circulars could survive after the decision of the Court having regard to Articles 141 and 144[27]. The difference of opinion has been referred to a Constitution Bench[28] which disposed of reference saying:

> "Circulars and instructions issued by the Board are no doubt binding in law on the authorities under the respective statutes, but when the Supreme Court or the High Court declares the law on the question arising for consideration, it would not be appropriate for the court to direct that the circular should be given effect to and not the view expressed in a decision of this Court or the High Court."[29]

The Court appears to have misappreciated the question to be decided.The question was not whether the Courts are bound by the Circulars but whether the statutory authorities under the particular Act would have to abide by the Circular despite a decision to the contrary by a court. This question was left unresolved.

"In Spencer,[30] the Supreme Court has emphasized upon the obligation of a High Court to come to the aid of the Supreme Court "when it required the High Court to have its order worked out". All authorities, civil or judicial, are mandated by Art. 144 to come to the aid of the Supreme Court. A High Court is a judicial authority covered by Art. 144. "The language of request oftenly employed by this Court in such situations is to be read by the High Court as an obligation, in carrying out the constitutional mandate, maintaining the writ of this Court running large throughout the country".

(f) COURT'S RULE-MAKING POWER

The Supreme Court has been given a rule-making power for regulating generally its practice and procedure including such matters as persons practising before it, procedure for hearing appeals, conditions for reviewing its own judgment, fees, grant of bail, stay of proceedings etc.[31]

---

25. (2002) 2 SCC 127 : AIR 2002 SC 453*; CCE v. Dhiren Chemical Industries*, (2002) 10 SCC 64 : (2002) 143 ELT 19.

26. Similar provisions exist in the Income Tax Act, 1961 (s. 119) and the Customs Act. 1962 (s.151-A).

27. Commissioner of Customs v. Indian Oil Corporation, (2004) 3 SCC 488 : AIR 2004 SC 2799; Collector of Central Excise v. Maruti Foam, (2004) 6 SCC 722 : (2006) 144 STC 161; contra Kalyani Packaging Industry v. Union of India, (2004) 6 SCC 719 : (2004) 168 ELT 145.

28. CCE v. Ratan Melting & Wire Industries, (2005) 3 SCC 57 : (2005) 6 JT 77.

29. CCE v. Ratan Melting & Wire Industries, (2008) 13 SCC 1, at page 4 : (2008) 11 JT 412.

30. Spencer and Co. Ltd. v. Vishwadarshan Distributors Pvt. Ltd., (1995) 1 SCC 259 : (1995) 1 JT 113. See also Tirupati Balaji Developers (P.) Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2004) 5 SCC 1, 14 : AIR 2005 SC 2351; Hombe Gowda Educational Trust v. State of Karnataka, (2006) 1 SCC 430 : (2005) 10 JT 598; Deepak Mallik v. Rakesh Batra, (2005) 13 SCC 113 : (2003) 157 ELT 500.

31. Ex-Capt. Harish Uppal v. Union of India, (2003) 2 SCC 45 : AIR 2003 SC 739.

Rules made by the Court need the approval of the President and they are subject to any law made by Parliament [Art. 145].[32] The reason to make the Court's rule-making power subject to the President's approval is that the rules might impose considerable fiscal burden upon the revenues of the country. The matter of fees, for which the Court would make rules, relates to public revenues. These matters could not be left entirely to the Supreme Court; and President's approval is necessary for the burden is to be financed by Parliament and the Executive by imposing taxes.[33] It would appear that this requirement does not apply to the procedure to be adopted by Courts seeking reference of a difference of opinion with an earlier decision to a larger Bench[34].

The Supreme Court's rule-making power is also subject to Fundamental Rights.[35]

(g) OFFICERS AND SERVANTS OF THE SUPREME COURT

Appointment of officers and servants of the Supreme Court are to be made by the Chief Justice, or such other Judge or officer of the Court as the Chief Justice may direct, but the President may by rules direct that appointments are to be made after consultation with the Union Public Service Commission [Art. 146(1)].

Subject to any law made by Parliament, the conditions of service of officers and servants of the Court may be prescribed by rules made by the Chief Justice, or any other Judge or officer of the Court as the Chief Justice may authorise for the purpose. Any such rules, so far as they relate to salaries, allowances, leave or pension, require the approval of the President [Art. 146(2)].

The scheme of Art. 146(2) is that it is primarily the responsibility of Parliament to lay down conditions of service for officers and servants of the Supreme Court. However, so long as Parliament does not do so, the Chief Justice (or any other Judge or officer of the Court authorised by the Chief Justice) may make the rules for the purpose. The rules require the assent of the President to be effective insofar as they relate to salaries, allowances, leave or pensions. The reason for requiring presidential approval is that the rules concerning salaries, etc., place financial liability on the Government of India.

In the case mentioned below,[36] the Supreme Court has elaborately discussed the nature of the power conferred on the Chief Justice by Art. 146(2). The Court has ruled that it cannot issue a writ of mandamus directing the President to give or withdraw his approval to the rules made by the Chief Justice.[37] The President of India cannot be compelled to grant approval to the rules proposed by the Chief Justice relating to salaries etc. Nevertheless, when the Chief Justice submits the rules to the President for approval "it should be looked upon with respect and unless there is very good reason not to grant approval, the approval should always be granted." It was observed further:[38]

---

32. Dinesh Kumar v. Motilal Nehru Medical College, AIR 1990 SC 2030 : (1990) 4 SCC 627.
33. VIII CAD, 643-651.
34. Central Board of Dawoodi Bohra Community v. State of Maharashtra, (2005) 2 SCC 673 : AIR 2005 SC 752.
35. Prem Chand v. Excise Comm., AIR 1963 SC 996 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 885.
36. Supreme Court Employees Welfare Association v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 334 : (1989) 4 SCC 187.
37. For discussion on Mandamus, see, infra, Ch. VIII, sec. D.
38. AIR 1990 SC, at 354.

> "If the President of India is of the view that the approval cannot be granted, he cannot straightway refuse to grant such approval, but before doing so, there must be exchange of thoughts between the President and the Chief Justice of India."

The President acts in this matter on the advice of the concerned Minister. The Chief Justice has to apply his mind to the framing of the rules and the Government has to apply its mind to the question of approval of the rules relating to salaries, etc. This condition should be fulfilled and it should appear from the records that it has been fulfilled.

The application of mind will include exchange of thoughts and views between the Government and the Chief Justice and it is highly desirable that there should be a consensus between the two. The rules framed by the Chief Justice of India should normally be accepted by the Government and the question of exchange of thoughts and views will arise only when the Government is not in a position to accept the rules relating to salaries, allowances, etc.[39]

(h) BENCHES OF DECISIONS

At least five Judges are to sit on the Bench to decide a case involving a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution and for hearing a reference by the President under Art. 143 [Art. 145(3)].[40]

A substantial question of interpretation of a constitutional provision does not arise if the law on the subject has been finally and effectively decided by the Supreme Court; no reference to a Bench of five Judges need be made in such a case.[41]

In other matters, the rules made by the Supreme Court may fix the minimum number of Judges who are to sit for any purpose [Art. 145(2)]. Under the Supreme Court Rules [O. VII, Rule 1], subject to other provisions of these Rules, every cause, appeal or matter is to be heard by a Bench consisting of not less than two Judges. If the two Judge Bench considers that the matter ought to be heard by a larger Bench, it refers the matter to the Chief Justice who would constitute a larger Bench [O. VII, Rule 2].

The Supreme Court is required to deliver its judgment in the open court [Art. 145(4)]. No judgment or opinion is delivered by the Court except with the concurrence of a majority of the Judges present at the hearing of the case, though a Judge not agreeing with the majority view is entitled to deliver a dissenting judgment or opinion [Art. 145(5)].

Under Art. 145(5), the concurrence of a majority of Judges present at the hearing of a case is necessary for any judgment or order. When a Bench consists of two Judges, and they differ, the matter is to be referred to the Chief Justice for constituting a larger Bench.[42]

---

39. Ibid., at 355.
Also see discussion on the parallel provision Art. 229 concerning the High Courts, infra, Ch. VIII.

40. Supra, Sec. F.

41. State of Jammu & Kashmir v. Ganga Singh, AIR 1960 SC 356 : 1960 (2) 346; Bhagwan Swarup v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1965 SC 682 : 1964 (2) SCR 378.

42. Gaurav Jain v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 2848 : (1998) 4 SCC 270.

The practice of multiple opinions has the disadvantage that it creates confusion in the public mind regarding the law and it becomes difficult to appreciate the law laid down by the Supreme Court, for it is then difficult to extract a reasonably authoritative ratio decidendi. Multiple opinions tend to become diffused and repetitive. On the other hand, dissenting opinions stimulate reasoning and help in developing and building up the law.[43]

This aspect of the matter assumes all the greater importance when the Supreme Court does not strictly follow the doctrine of stare decisis and regards itself free to overrule its own decision.[44] When it does so, usually the minority opinion in the previous case would become the majority opinion in the subsequent case. Sometimes, Judges may agree in the result in a case but some of them may have some reservations on some principles or propositions, and may explain their point of view in separate concurring opinions.

In the beginning of the career of the Supreme Court, there was a tendency on the part of the Judges to place their individual views on record in matters of interpretation of the Constitution with the result that as many as seven opinions have been delivered in some earlier cases.[45] This tended to make the opinions repetitive and law uncertain. In course of time, however, this tendency has been very much mitigated and group opinions have come to take the place of individual opinions. Most of the time, the Court now delivers single unanimous opinion. In some cases, there may be a majority and a minority opinions. It is only in rare constitutional controversies of great importance that multiple opinions may be delivered.[46]

(i) ADDITIONAL JURISDICTION

Under Art. 138(1), Parliament may confer on the Supreme Court further jurisdiction and powers with respect to any of the matters in the Union List.[47]

Under this constitutional provision, a miscellany of laws enacted by Parliament confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court. For example, under the Income-tax Act [s. 257], the Supreme Court can hear an appeal from a High Court decision on a reference made to it by the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal.[48] Under section 38, Advocates Act, 1961, an appeal lies to the Supreme Court from a decision of the disciplinary committee of the Bar Council of India.[49]

Jurisdiction has been conferred on the Supreme Court under the Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1969, the Customs Act, 1962, the Central Excise and Salt Act, 1944 and a number of other Acts.

---

43. FREUND, A Supreme Court in a Federation, 53 Col LR 614 (1953).
Also, MCWHINNEY, JUDICIAL REVIEW, op. cit., and his article, Judicial Concurrence and Dissents, 31 Can. B.R. 595 (1953).

44. Infra, under Constitutional Interpretation, Ch. XL.
For the doctrine of Stare Decisis, see, infra, Sec. J.

45. See, for example, Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR 1959 SC 27; In re Delhi Laws Act case, supra, Ch. II, Sec. N.

46. Multiple opinions delivered in S.P. Gupta v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 149.
For discussion of this case see, infra, Ch. VIII.
Also see, infra, Ch. XL.

47. For this List, see, infra, Ch. X, Sec. D.

48. See, JAIN, INDIAN ADM. LAW, CASES & MATERIALS, II, Ch. XII.

49. See, JAIN, op. cit.

Jurisdiction is also conferred on the Supreme Court by several constitutional provisions, such as, Art. 317(1),[50] Arts. 323A and 323B.[51]

Under Art. 138(2), the Supreme Court shall have such jurisdiction and powers with respect to any matter as the Government of India and any State Government may by special agreement confer, if Parliament by law provides for the exercise of such jurisdiction and powers by the Supreme Court.

Under Art. 139, Parliament may by law confer on the Supreme Court power to issue directions, orders or writs, including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warrants and certiorari, or any of them, for any purposes other than those mentioned in Art. 32(2). Under Art. 32(2), the Supreme Court has power to issue these writs for purpose of enforcement of Fundamental Rights.[52] Under Art. 139, power to issue writs may be conferred on the Supreme Court for purposes other than enforcement of Fundamental Rights.

Under Art. 140, Parliament may by law make provisions for conferring upon the Supreme Court such supplemental powers not inconsistent with any provision of the Constitution as may appear to be necessary or desirable for the purpose of enabling the Court more effectively to exercise the jurisdiction conferred on the Court by or under the Constitution.

The Supreme Court has ruled in In re, Special Courts Bill, 1973,[53] that as regards conferring additional jurisdiction on the Supreme Court provisions from Arts. 124 to 147 of the Constitution are exhaustive and no more jurisdiction can be conferred on the Supreme Court outside those provisions. Parliament can confer additional jurisdiction on the Supreme Court while exercising its legislative power under Arts. 246(1) and (2).[54] Thus, Parliament can confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court beyond what Arts. 133(3), 134(2), 138(1), 138(2), 139 and 140 provide. These provisions are to be read in harmony and conjunction with, and not in derogation of other constitutional provisions. Thus, the Court has ruled:

> "The Parliament, therefore, has the competence to pass laws in respect of matters enumerated in Lists I and III not withstanding the fact that by such laws, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is enlarged in a manner not contemplated by or beyond what is contemplated by the various articles in Chapter IV, Part V".[55]

For example, preventive detention falls under entry 3 in List III. Parliament is competent while legislating on that topic under Art. 246(2) to provide under Art. 246(1) read with entry 77, List I, that an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from an order of detention passed under a preventive detention law.[56]

---

50. Infra, Ch. XXXVI.
51. Infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. I.
52. For discussion on Art. 32(2), see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. A.
53. See, supra, Sec. F.
54. For discussion on Art. 246, see, infra, Ch. X, Sec. B.
55. AIR 1979 SC at 500.
56. For discussion on 'Preventive Detention', see, infra, Ch. XXVII, Sec. B.

Similarly, Parliament can enact under entry 77, List I,[57] that an appeal shall lie as of right to the Supreme Court from any judgment or order of a Special Court both on fact as well as on law. The law relating to Special Courts can be enacted by Parliament under entry 11A of List III.[58]

Under Art. 138(2), the Supreme Court shall have such further jurisdiction as may be agreed between a State and the Central Government by special agreement, if Parliament by law provides for the exercise of such jurisdiction by the court.

Under Art. 134(2) Parliament may by law confer on the Supreme Court further powers to hear appeals from any High Court judgement in a criminal proceeding subject to such conditions as may be specified in such law.

J. DOCTRINE OF STARE DECISIS

The doctrine of stare decisis or precedents is the distinguishing characteristic of the English common law. It envisages that judicial decisions have a binding force for the future. It is not, however, the whole judgment that is deemed to be so binding. A judgment is authoritative only as to that part of it, called ratio decidendi, which is considered to have been necessary for the decision of the actual issues between the litigants. As KEETON suggests, "The ratio decidendi of a decision is the principle of law formulated by the Judge for the purpose of deciding the problem before him." In some cases, it may be quite difficult to extract a ratio, and the difficulty is enhanced when multiple opinions are delivered in a case.

On the other hand, obiter dicta are "observations made by the Judge, but which are not essential for the decision reached. There may be observations upon the broader aspect of the law relating to the problem arising for decision; they may be answers to hypothetical questions raised by the Judge or the counsel in the course of the hearing or they may be observations upon social or other questions, prompted by the facts of the case under consideration".[59]

In the course of the argument and decision of a case, many incidental considerations arise which may all be part of the legal process but which have different degrees of relevance to the central issue. Judicial opinions upon such matters may be merely casual, or wholly gratuitous, or of collateral relevance and are known as obiter dicta.[60]

The doctrine of stare decisis in Britain envisages that the lower courts are bound by the decisions of the higher courts and, thus, every court in Britain is bound by the decisions of the House of Lords. The Indian Judicial system is also characterised by a scheme of hierarchy of courts, the Supreme Court being the

---

57. This entry runs as: "Constitution, organisation, jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court (including contempt of such Court)....."

The Court has ruled: "A law which confers additional powers on the Supreme Court by enlarging its jurisdiction is evidently a law with respect to "jurisdiction and powers" of that Court."

For further discussion on entry 77, List I, see, infra, Ch. X, Sec. D.

58. Entry 11A, List III, runs as: "Administration of justice; constitution and organisation of all courts, except the Supreme Court and the High Court".

For further discussion on this entry, see, Ch. X, Sec. F., infra.

59. Elementary Principles of Jurisprudence, 106.

60. ALLEN, LAW IN THE MAKING, 248.

Apex Court and, therefore, the doctrine of binding precedent is the cardinal feature of the Indian Legal System.

The Indian Constitution specifically and unequivocally lays down this proposition in Art. 141 which says that "the law declared by the Supreme Court shall be binding on all courts within the territory of India."[61] Thus, all courts are bound to follow the decisions of the Supreme Court. The law declared by the Supreme Court is the law of the land.[62] Judgments of the Supreme Court constitute a source of law.[63]

Article 141 mandates every court subordinate to the Supreme Court to accept the law laid down by the Apex Court.[64] The Supreme Court has explained the rationale underlying Art. 141 as follows: "In the hierarchical system of courts" such as exists in India, "it is necessary for each lower tier", including the High Court, "to accept loyally the decisions of the higher tiers". The better wisdom of the court below must yield to the higher wisdom of the Court above. The Supreme Court has observed:[65]

> "It is inevitable in hierarchical system of courts that there are decisions of the supreme appellate tribunal which do not attract the unanimous approval of all members of the judiciary.... But the judicial system only works if someone is allowed to have the last word and that last word, once spoken, is loyally accepted."

The Supreme Court in State of Andhra Pradesh v. A.P. Jaiswal,[66] emphasizing upon the need for the courts to follow the principle of stare decisis, has observed:

> "Consistency is the cornerstone of the administration of justice. It is consistency which creates confidence in the system and this consistency can never be achieved without respect to the rule of finality. It is with a view to achieve consistency in judicial pronouncements, the courts have evolved the rule of precedents, principle of stare decisis etc. These rules and principles are based on public policy and if these are not followed by courts then there will be chaos in the administration of justice."

The Apex Court has impressed on the High Courts that they should follow the law laid down by the Supreme Court. Judicial discipline requires that clear pronouncements by the Supreme Court, about what the law on a matter is, must be treated as binding by all courts in India. Art. 141 is an imprimatur to all courts that the law declared by the Supreme Court is binding on them.[67] This is of course subject to the fundamental principle that an order obtained by fraud has to be treated as a nullity whether by the court of first instance or by the final court[68].

Article 141 gives a constitutional status to the theory of precedents in respect of law declared by the Supreme Court. Obviously, therefore, the ratio of a Su-

---

61. For further discussion on Art. 141, see, infra, under Constitutional Interpretation, Ch. XL.
62. Delhi Transport Corp. v. D.T.C. Mazdoor Congress, AIR 1991 SC 101 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 600.
63. All India Reporter Karamchari Sangh v. All India Reporter Ltd., AIR 1988 SC 1325 : 1988 Supp SCC 472.
64. Gauraya v. S.N. Thakur, AIR 1986 SC 1440 : (1986) 2 SCC 709.
65. C.C.E. v. Dunlop India Ltd., AIR 1985 SC 330 : (1985) 1 SCC 260.
66. AIR 2001 SC 499 : (2001) 1 SCC 748.
67. C.N. Rudramurthy v. K. Barkathulla Khan, (1998) 8 SCC 275; Suganthi Suresh Kumar v. Jagdeeshan, (2002) 2 SCC 420 : AIR 2002 SC 681.
68. A.V. Papayya v. Govt. of A.P., (2007) 4 SCC 221 : AIR 2007 SC 1546.

preme Court decision is binding on all courts below it.[69] Even the obiter dicta of the Supreme Court is regarded as binding by the courts below,[70] though the same cannot be said for those statements which are casual or which are neither clear nor definite.[71] Observations of the Supreme Court on points not argued before it but conceded by the counsel[72] or judgments rendered merely having regard to the facts[73] or directions issued under Art. 142,[74] or interim orders[75] are not binding on the courts below. Further, suggestions or guidelines addressed to the legislature are not binding law.[76]

Once the ratio of a Supreme Court decision is discovered, the case is not an authority for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it and the courts may refuse to extend the principle of a Supreme Court decision.[77] Observations by the Judges in the process of reasoning do not however amount to declaration of law as contemplated by Art. 141.[78] What is of the essence in a decision is its ratio and not every observation found therein nor what logically follows from the various observations in the Judgment.[79]

On this point, the Court has observed recently:[80]

> "A decision of this Court is an authority for the proposition which it decides and not for what it has not decided or had no occasion to express an opinion on".

---

69. Rajeshwar Pd. v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1965 SC 1887 : 1966 (1) SCR 178.

70. Veerappa v. I.T. Commr., AIR 1959 Mad. 56; I.T. Commr. v. Vazir Sultan, AIR 1959 SC 814; Sadhu Singh v. State, AIR 1962 All. 193; D.G. Viswanath v. Govt. of Mysore, AIR 1964 Mys. 132; Jaswantlal v. Nichhabhai, AIR 1964 Guj. 283. Nalu v. State, AIR 1965 Ori. 7; Municipal Committee v. Hazara Singh, AIR 1975 SC 1087; Union of India v. Rampur Distillery & Chemical Co. Ltd., AIR 1981 Del. 348; Sarwan Singh Lamba v. Unon of India, AIR 1995 SC 1729 : (1995) 4 SCC 546.

71. K.P. Doctor v. State of Bombay, AIR 1955 Bom. 220; Mohandas Issardass v. Sattanathan, 56 Bom LR 1156; Venkata v. Madras, AIR 1958 AP 173; Chunilal Basu v. Chief Justice, Cal HC AIR 1974 Cal 326; Municipal Corp. of Delhi v. Gurnam Kaur, AIR 1989 SC 38 : (1989) 1 SCC 101. See also Oriental Insurance Co. Ltd v. Meena Variyal, (2007) 5 SCC 428 : AIR 2007 SC 1609.

72. M.S.M. Sharma v. Shri Krishna Sinha, AIR 1959 SC 395 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 806; Suptdt. & Legal Remembrancer, State of West Bengal v. Corp. of Calcutta, AIR 1967 SC 997 : 1967(2) SCR 170; Kulwant Kaur v. Gurdial Singh Mann, (2001) 4 SCC 262 : AIR 2001 SC 1273; Municipal Corp. of Delhi v. Gurnam Kaur, (1989) 1 SCC 101 : AIR 1989 SC 38. See also Bihar School Examination Board v. Suresh Prasad Sinha, (2009) 8 SCC 483: (2009) 11 JT 541, relevance of facts and context to be considered.

73. U.P Brassware Corpn Ltd v. Uday Narain Pandey, (2006) 1 SCC 479, 491 : AIR 2006 SC 586.

74. State of U.P. v. Neeraj Awasthi, (2006) 1 SCC 667, 689 : (2006) 1 JT 19. See also State of Kerala v. Mahesh Kumar, (2009) 3 SCC 654 : (2009) 3 JT 424.

75. State of Assam v. Barak Upatyaka Karmachari Sanstha, (2009) 5 SCC 694 : AIR 2009 SC 2249.

76. Mohmed Amin Alias Amin Choteli Rahim Miyan Shaikh v. Central Bureau of Investigation (Through its Director), (2008) 15 SCC 49. See also Vishnu Dutt Sharma v. Manju Sharma, (2009) 6 SCC 379 : AIR 2009 SC 2254. Mere direction of a Court without considering the legal position is not a precedent.

77. I.T. Commr. v. Shirin Bai, AIR 1956 Bom. 586.

78. Ram Swarup v. State of U.P., AIR 1958 All. 119; Raval Co. v. K.G. Ramachandra, AIR 1974 SC 818 : (1974) 1 SCC 424.

79. Orient Paper and Industries Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1991 SC 672, 680 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 81.

80. General Manager, Northern Rly. v. Sarvesh Chopra, (2002) 4 SCC 45, at 52.

The Court has also clarified that "a decision which is not express and is not founded on reasons, nor which proceeds on consideration of the issues", cannot be deemed to be a law declared to have a binding effect under Art. 141.[81] When the Supreme Court summarily dismisses a special leave petition[82] on a technical ground, it does not constitute a binding precedent for purposes of Art. 141. When reasons are given, the Supreme Court decision attracts Art. 141; when no reasons are given, Art. 141 is not attracted.

A clarificatory order of the Supreme Court is not a precedent.[83]

Explaining the significance of Art. 141, the Supreme Court has observed in the case noted below:[84] The Court may itself record in its order that it will not operate as a precedent.[85]

> "When the Supreme Court decides a principle it would be the duty of the High Court or a subordinate court to follow the decision of the Supreme Court. A judgment of the High Court which refuses to follow the decision and directions of the Supreme Court or seeks to revive a decision of the High Court which had been set aside by the Supreme Court is a nullity."

No judgment is to be read as a statute. A word or a clause or a sentence in the judgment cannot be regarded as a full exposition of law.[86] When a general principle of law is laid down by the Supreme Court, it is binding on every body.[87] But a Supreme Court decision which is virtually a non-speaking order and which does not set out the facts or the reason for the conclusion or direction given cannot be treated as a binding precedent.[88]

The Court has advised that one of the principles to be followed while applying decisions of Supreme Court is to read it in consonance with the statute governing the field. The Court referred to its earlier decision in M.C.Mehta case[89] and explained that the purport of the decision was that if a transport vehicle overtook any other four-wheel motorized vehicle, it would be construed as a contravention of the conditions of the permit which could entail suspension/cancellation of the permit and impounding the vehicle and that such directions must be read in the light of the provisions of MV Act and not dehors the same.[90]

To promote consistency and certainty in the law laid down by the Supreme Court, the ideal situation would be that the entire Court should sit in all cases to decide questions of law. It is for that reason that the U.S. Supreme Court con-

---

81. S. Shanmugavel Nadar v. State of Tamil Nadu, (2002) 7 SCALE 29 : (2002) 8 SCC 361 : AIR 2002 SC 3484; Kalyan Chandra Sarkar v. Rajesh Ranjan, (2005) 2 SCC 42 : AIR 2005 SC 921.

82. Sec. D, supra.

83. P.P.C. Rawani (Dr.) v. U.O.I., (2008) 15 SCC 332.

84. In the matter of : Director of Settlements, H.P. v. M.R. Apparao, JT 2002 (3) SC 304, at 315 : (2002) 4 SCC 638 : AIR 2002 SC 1598. Official Liquidator v. Dayanand, (2008) 10 SCC 1, at page 52 : (2008) 11 JT 467.

85. Jyoti Prakash Rai Alias Jyoti Prakash v. State of Bihar, (2008) 15 SCC 223.

86. Union of India v. Dhanwanti Devi, (1996) 6 SCC 44; Union of India v. Major Bahadur Singh, (2006) 1 SCC 368 : (2005) 10 JT 127.

87. MSL Patil, Asstt. Conservator of Forests, Solarpur v. State of Maharashtra, (1996) 11 SCC 361.

88. Govt. of India v. Workmen of State Trading Corpn., (1997) 11 SCC 641 : AIR 1999 SC 1532.

89. (1997) 8 SCC 770 : AIR 1998 SC 186,

90. U.P. SRTC v. Commr. of Police (Traffic), (2009) 3 SCC 634 : (2009) 2 JT 553.

sisting of nine Judges sits as a whole to decide cases. But it is not feasible to do so in India. Because of the volume of work coming before the Supreme Court, it is necessary for the Court to sit in benches of two or three Judges.[1]

A Constitution Bench consists of five or more Judges.[2] It is therefore possible for different Division Benches to render inconsistent decisions on points of law from time to time.

To promote consistency and certainty in the development of law, a rule is followed that the statement of law by a Division Bench is considered binding on a Division Bench of equal or smaller number of judges.[3]

Accordingly, a two judge Bench ought to follow the earlier decision of a larger Bench. The law declared by a Division Bench of the Supreme Court is binding on another Division Bench of the same or smaller number of Judges.[4]The decision of the Constitution Bench is binding on all smaller Benches. The Supreme Court has ruled that "no co-ordinate Bench of this Court can even comment upon, let alone sit in judgment over, the discretion exercised or judgement rendered in a cause or matter before another coordinate Bench."[5]

A three-judge Bench decision cannot prevail over an earlier constitutional bench decision of a five-Judge Bench on the ground of being a later decision.[6]

If two decisions of the Supreme Court on the question of law cannot be reconciled, and one of them is of larger Bench while the other is of a smaller Bench, the decision of the larger Bench whether it is earlier or later in point of time should be followed.[7] A Constitution Bench after resolving conflicting views in different decisions, instead of overruling specific judgments, in a rather innovative step clarified that all decisions which ran counter to the principle settled by it would "stand denuded of their status as precedents".[8] If a Bench of two Judges concludes that an earlier judgment of three Judges is so very incorrect that in no circumstances can it be followed, it should not directly refer the matter directly to a five Judge Bench for reconsideration. The two Judge Bench should refer the matter to a three Judge Bench setting out the reasons why it cannot agree with the earlier judgment. If the three Judge Bench also comes to the conclusion that the

---

1. See, Art. 145, Cls. (2) and (3); Sec. I(h). Also, Union of India v. Raghubir Singh, (1989) 2 SCC 754.

2. Ibid.

3. John Martin v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1975 SC 775 : (1975) 3 SCC 836; Indira Nehru Gandhi v. Raj Narain, AIR 1975 SC 2299 : 1975 Supp SCC 1; Union of India v. Raghubir Singh, AIR 1989 SC 1933, 1945 : (1989) 2 SCC 754; N. Meera Rani v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1989 SC 2027; S.H. Rangappa v. State of Karnataka, (2002) 1 SCC 538; Chandra Prakash v. State of U.P., (2002) 4 SCC 234; Delhi Development Authority v. Ashok Kumar Behal, AIR 2002 SC 2940.

4. Union of India v. Raghubir Singh, (1989) 2 SCC 754 : AIR 1989 SC 1933 : (1989) 2 SCC 754; Chandra Prakash v. State of U.P., (2002) 4 SCC 234.

5. Sub-Committee of Judicial Accountability v. Union of India, (1992) 4 SCC 97.

6. John Martin v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1975 SC 775 : (1975) 3 SCC 836.

7. Poolpandi v. Supdt., Central Excise, AIR 1992 SC 1795 : (1992) 3 SCC 259; Pandit Munshi Ram v. Delhi Development Authority, AIR 2001 Del. 82; Laxman Thamappa Kotagiri v. G.M. Central Railway, (2007) 4 SCC 596 : (2005) 1 SCALE 600.

8. Secy. State of Karnataka v. Umadevi, (2006) 4 SCC 1, 42 : AIR 2006 SC 1806*; Fairgrowth Investments Ltd. v. Custodian*, (2004) 11 SCC 472, 482 : (2004) 9 JT 124.

earlier three Judge Bench decision is incorrect, then it can refer the matter to a five Judge Bench.[9]

The rule is one of practice based on convenience and judicial propriety, or as some judges have termed it, judicial discipline. Nevertheless, it has been generally followed and enforced except in exceptional circumstances. A judicially unprecedented procedure was adopted by the Court in Islamic Academy of Education v. State of Karnataka [10] by constituting a Bench of 5 judges to "interpret" the decision of 11 judges in T.M.A.Pai Foundation v. State of Karnataka[11]. Subsequently a Bench of seven judges was constituted to consider the correctness ofthe "interpretation"[12]. Again a larger Bench decision in India Cement Ltd. v. State of Tamil Nadu[13] was not followed by a bench of five judges[14] on the ground that the judgment contained "A doubtful expression…apparently by mistake or inadvertence'', that " the apparent error should be ignored' and that " A statement caused by an apparent typographical or inadvertent error in a judgment…should not be read as declaration of such law by the Court'.[15]

When a Division Bench thinks differently from a Bench of the same number of Judges, it should not decide on the correctness or otherwise of the view taken by the earlier Bench, but should refer the case to a larger Bench for decision.[16]

Views expressed by one Bench are binding on coordinate Benches.[17] When there are two conflicting decisions of the Supreme Court rendered by co-equal benches, the question arises which of these two decisions should the High Court follow. Earlier, a view was expressed that the decision of the later date should be followed.[18] But this view is not followed now as it is regarded as too mechanical. The view being propounded now is that the High Court ought to follow the decision which appears to it to state the law more elaborately and accurately.[19]

When the Court is divided, it is the majority judgment which constitutes the "law declared" by the Supreme Court and not the minority view.[20] However, in Virendra Kumar Srivastava v. U.P.Rajya Sabha Kalyan Nigam [21], the tests propounded in the majority and minority judgments were applied to determine

---

9. Pradip Chandra Parija v. Pramod Chandra Patnaik, (2002) 1 SCC 1 : AIR 2002 SC 296.
10. (2003) 6 SCC 697 : AIR 2003 SC 3724.
11. (2002) 8 SCC 481 : AIR 2003 SC 355.
12. P.A.Inamdar v. State of Maharashtra, (2005) 6 SCC 537 : AIR 2005 SC 3226. See further discussion under Art. 30.
13. (1990) 1 SCC 12 : AIR 1990 SC 85.
14. State of West Bengal v. Kesoram Industries, (2004) 10 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 1646.
15. Ibid. at Pp. 292, 297.
16. Union of India v. Godfrey Phillips India Ltd., AIR 1986 SC 806 : (1985) 4 SCC 369; Union of India v. Raghubir Singh, AIR 1989 SC, at 1945.
17. Aarti Gupta v. State of Punjab, AIR 1988 SC 481 : (1988) 1 SCC 258.
18. Mattu Lal v. Radhe Lal, AIR 1974 SC 1596 : (1974) 2 SCC 365; Basdeo v. Board of Revenue, AIR 1974 All. 337; Ganapati v. Waman, AIR 1981 SC 1956; Ram Parkash v. Surinder Sharma Smt., AIR 1981 P.H. 297; CST v. Pine Chemicals Ltd., (1995) 1 SCC 58; Arjun Sethi v. L.A. Collector, Cuttack, AIR 1998 Ori 34; Gopal Krishna Andley v. 5th Addl. District Judge, Kanpur, AIR 1981 All 300; P. Ramanujan v. D. Venkat Rao, AIR 1982 AP 227; Pandit Munishi Ram v. DDA, supra, footnote 7.
19. Amar Singh Yadav v. Shanti Devi, AIR 1987 Pat 191.
20. John Martin v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1975 SC 775 : (1975) 3 SCC 836; Harish Verma v. Ajay Srivastava, (2003) 8 SCC 69 : AIR 2003 SC 3371; Common Cause v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 222 : (2004) 9 SCALE 32.
21. (2005) 1 SCC 149 : AIR 2005 SC 411.

whether the respondent corporation was a "state" or not within the meaning on Art. 12.

As regards the binding nature of an advisory opinion, theoretically, it may be true to say that it is not binding as it does not amount to a proper judicial adjudication since there are no parties before the Court. But this is only a technical view to take. In practice, the lower courts regard it as having the same efficacy, authority and value as a judgment of the Supreme Court delivered by it in a case coming before it in the normal manner. As the law regarding several difficult constitutional points is declared by the Supreme Court in its advisory opinions, the lower Courts have to take note of that and apply the same.[22] The Federal Court has itself said that advisory opinions were not to be treated any the less binding on account of being advisory.[23] The matter has already been discussed earlier.[24]

In Union of India v. Kantilal,[25] the Supreme Court disapproved of the approach of the Central Administrative Tribunal where the tribunal did take notice of the Supreme Court's decision but, without mentioning any distinguishing features or facts of the case before it, failed to follow the same.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that it would amount to judicial impropriety on the part of subordinate courts and the High Court to ignore the well settled position in law as a result of its decision and to pass a judicial order which is clearly contrary to the settled position. The Court has observed: [26]

> "Such judicial adventurism cannot be permitted and we strongly deprecate the tendency of the subordinate courts in not applying the settled principles and in passing whimsical orders which necessarily has the effect of granting wrongful and unwarranted relief to one of the parties. It is time that this tendency stops."

The Supreme Court has ruled that it can initiate contempt of court proceedings against such High Court Judges as flout the order of the Supreme Court.[27]

When the Supreme Court gives reasons for dismissing a special leave petition under Art. 136,[28] the decision becomes one which attracts Art. 141 and, thus, becomes binding. When, however, the Court dismisses a special leave petition simpliciter but gives no reasons for summarily dismissing the petition or does not specifically affirm the reasoning in the order appealed against, the Court does not lay down any law under Art. 141. The effect of a non-speaking order dismissing a special leave petition must, by implication, be taken to be that the Supreme

---

22. Ramkishore v. Union of India, AIR 1965 Cal. 282.
23. Province of Madras v. Boddu Paidanna, AIR 1942 FC 33.
24. Supra, Sec. F.
25. This point has been discussed later : see, Union of India v. Kantilal Hematram Pandya, (1995) 3 SCC 17 : AIR 1995 SC 1349.
26. Dwarikesh Sugar Industries Ltd. v. Prem Heavy Engg. Works (P.) Ltd., AIR 1997 SC 2477, 2484 : (1997) 6 SCC 450. Also see, Shivaji Narayan Bachhav v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1983 SC 1014 : (1983) 4 SCC 129.
27. Spencer & Co. Ltd. v. Vishwadarshan Distributors (P.) Ltd., (1995) 1 SCC 259.
28. For discussion on Art. 136, see, supra, Sec. D.

Court thinks that the case is not a fit one where special leave to appeal should be granted.[29]

The Supreme Court has emphasized upon its law-creative function. The Court has emphasized that the "childish fiction" that the courts only find the law but do not make it must be done away with.[30] Under Art. 141, the law declared by the Supreme Court is of binding character and as commandful as the law made by the Legislature. The Court has further asserted that it is not merely an interpreter of the existing law but much more than that. As a wing of the state, the Court is by itself a source of law. The law is what the Court says it is.[31]

Consequently, the Supreme Court does not regard itself as absolutely bound by its own decisions, especially in the area of interpretation of the Constitution.[32] The words of Art. 141 "binding on all courts", though wide enough to include the Supreme Court, do not actually include the Supreme Court itself. The Court is thus not bound by its own decisions and is free to reconsider them in appropriate cases. This approach is necessary so that along with consistency and uniformity, development of law is not stultified with passage of time. Therefore, while the Supreme Court does usually follow its own decisions, it may, at times, find it necessary to differ from its own previous rulings in the interest of development of law and justice.[33] The Court has observed that if the subject-matter is of fundamental importance to national life, or the reasoning is so plainly erroneous in the earlier decision in the light of the later thought, then "it is wiser to be ultimately right rather than to be consistently wrong."[34] A later judgment will not be followed if it has ignored an earlier decision and was rendered per incuriam[35].

On the promulgation of the Constitution, the Federal Court, which functioned under the Government of India Act, 1935, ceased to exist and the Supreme Court was set up instead.[36] Appeals from the Federal Courts and the High Courts lay to the Privy Council which was the ultimate court of appeal from India. The Supreme Court has ruled that while the pre-Constitution decisions rendered by the 29. Mathura Prasad Bajoo Jaiswal v. Dossibai N.B. Jeejeebhoy, (1970) 1 SCC 613 : AIR 1971 SC 2355; Union of India v. All India Services Pensioners' Association, AIR 1988 SC 501 : (1988) 2 SCC 580; Indian Oil Corpn. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1986 SC 1780 : (1986) 4 SCC 146; Supreme Court Employees' Welfare Association v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 334 : (1999) 4 SCC 187; Ajit Kumar Rath v. State of Orissa, AIR 2000 SC 85, at 93 : (1999) 9 SCC 596.

---

See, supra, Sec. D(a).

30. See, further on this point, Ch. XL, infra.

31. Delhi Transport Corp. v. DTC, Mazdoor Union, (1991) Supp. (1) SCC 600 : AIR 1991 SC 101; Nandkishore v. State of Punjab, (1995) 6 SCC 614; BIC v. C.T.O., (1994) Supp. (1) SCC 310. See also M. Nagaraj v. Union of India, (2006) 8 SCC 212, 267 : AIR 2007 SC 71.
Also see, Ch. XL, infra.

32. Bengal Immunity Co. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1955 SC 661 : 1955 (2) SCR 603; Bachan Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1982 SC 1325 : (1982) 3 SCC 24.

33. Punjab Land Development and Reclamation Corpn. Ltd. v. Presiding Officer, (1990) 3 SCC 682.
For a fuller discussion of this theme, see, infra, Ch. XL. See also T.K. Rangarajan v. Govt. of Tamil Nadu, (2003) 6 SCC 581, 589 : AIR 2003 SC 3032.

34. Ganga Sugar Company v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1980 286, 294 : (1980) 1 SCC 223.

35. Babu Prasad Kaikadi v. Babu, (2004) 1 SCC 681 : AIR 2004 SC 754*; Mukesh Tripathi v. Senior Divisional Manager, LIC,* (2004) 8 SCC 387, 396 : AIR 2004 SC 4179.

36. Supra.

Privy Council and the Federal Court are entitled to great weight, those decisions are not binding on the Supreme Court which can take a different view.[37]

The Supreme Court has also insisted that tribunals also follow the doctrine of stare decisis . A tribunal is bound to follow the law laid down by the concerned High Court and the Supreme Court. A bench of a tribunal ought to follow the law laid down by an earlier bench. This is part of the judicial discipline. If a subsequent bench feels that the view taken by an earlier bench is incorrect, it ought to refer the matter to a larger bench. This step is necessary so as to avoid any difference of opinion between two co-ordinate benches of the same tribunal.[38]

The Supreme Court has also emphasized that a subordinate court is bound to follow the law as enunciated by the superior courts. This is in essence the doctrine of precedent or stare decisis.[39]

K. INDEPENDENCE OF THE SUPREME COURT

The concept of independence of the Judiciary took time to grow in England. Before 1701, the Judges held their office during the Crown's pleasure and, like any other Crown servant, he could be dismissed by the King at will. The Judges were thus subservient to the Executive. This subservience naturally led the Judges to favour the royal prerogative. The most typical example of such an attitude is to be found in the Hampden's case (the Ship Money case) in which seven out of twelve Judges gave an award in favour of the Crown's prerogative to collect money without parliamentary approval. One of the Judges even propounded the view that "Rex is Lex." In 1616, Coke was dismissed from the office of the Chief Justice of the King's Bench. The judicial independence was secured by the Act of Settlement, 1701, which declared the Judicial tenure to be during good behaviour, and that upon the address of both the Houses of Parliament it would be lawful to remove a Judge. This position regarding security of judicial tenure is now secured by statutes.[40]

An independent judiciary is the sine qua non of a vibrant democratic system. Only an impartial and independent Judiciary can stand as a bulwark for the protection of the rights of the individual and mete out even handed justice without fear or favour. The Judiciary is the protector of the Constitution and, as such, it may have to strike down executive, administrative and legislative acts of the Centre and the States. For Rule of Law to prevail, judicial independence is of prime necessity. Being the highest Court in the land, it is very necessary that the Supreme Court is allowed to work in an atmosphere of independence of action and judgment and is insulated from all kinds of pressures, political or otherwise.

---

37. Delhi Judicial Service Association v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC 2176, 2202 : (1991) 4 SCC 406. The Supreme Court did not follow the Federal Court decisions in State of Bihar v. Abdul Majid, AIR 1954 SC 245, 248-49 : 1954 SCR 786; Shrinivas Krishnarao Kango v. Narayan Devji Kango, AIR 1954 SC 379, 387-88 : 1955 (1) SCR 1.

38. S.I. Rooplal v. Lt. Governor through Chief Secretary, Delhi, 2000 AIR SCW 19; State of Andhra Pradesh v. A.P. Jaiswal, AIR 2001 SC 499 : (2001) 1 SCC 748. See also Ajay Kumar Bhuyan v. State of Orissa, (2003) 1 SCC 707 : (2002) 9 SCALE 56.

39. Ibid.

40. O. HOOD PHILIPS & PAUL JACKSON, CONST. OF ADM. LAW 28-29, 386-387 (1987). Also see, supra.

The members of the Constituent Assembly were very much concerned with the question of independence of the Judiciary and, accordingly, made several provisions to ensure this end.[41] The Supreme Court has itself laid emphasis on the independence of the judiciary from time to time. As the Court has observed recently in Thalwal:[42] "The constitutional scheme aims at securing an independent judiciary which is the bulwark of democracy".

The concept of "separation of powers between the legislature, the executive and the judiciary" and "independence of judiciary", a fundamental concept, has now been "elevated to the level of the basic structure of the Constitution and are the very heart of constitutional scheme."[43] The Court has rendered several decisions with a view to strengthen not only its own independence but that of the entire judicial system including the subordinate judiciary.[44]

As regards the relationship between Parliament and the Supreme Court, the basic pattern of the Court, its composition, powers, jurisdiction etc., the Constitution makes detailed provisions which cannot be touched by ordinary legislative process. But, within the constitutional framework, Parliament has some powers vis-a-vis the Court. The minimum number of its Judges is fixed by the Constitution but Parliament has authority to increase, not to decrease, this number.[45] The Constitution confers a security of tenure on the Judges subject to Parliament moving an address for removal of a Judge.[46] The power thus vested in Parliament cannot be misused owing to several safeguards, viz., charges of misbehaviour and incapacity against the Judge concerned have to be enquired and proved, and special majority is required in the two Houses for the motion to be carried;[47] the executive plays no role in this procedure.

The salaries of the Judges are fixed by Parliament by law but it cannot be reduced during the tenure of a Judge.[48] Parliament may prescribe the privileges, allowances, leave and pension of a Judge, subject to the safeguard that these cannot be varied during the course of tenure of a Judge to his disadvantage.[49]

In the area of the Court's jurisdiction, Parliament may provide that an appeal may lie to the Supreme Court in civil matters from the judgment, decree or final order of a single Judge of a High Court.[50] Parliament can enhance the appellate criminal jurisdiction of the Supreme Court by enabling it to entertain and hear appeal from any judgment, final order or sentence in a criminal proceeding in a High Court over and above those cases in which the Court can already hear appeals under Art. 134.[51] Parliament can provide that the Supreme Court shall not have jurisdiction and powers of the Federal Court beyond what it already has un-

---

41. AUSTIN, op. cit., 164.
42. A.C. Thalwal v. High Court of Himachal Pradesh, (2000) 7 SCC 1, 9 : AIR 2000 SC 2732.
43. State of Bihar v. Bal Mukund Sah, AIR 2000 SC 1296, 1317 : (2000) 4 SCC 640.
For comments on this case, see, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. F.
44. See, for example, S.C. Advocates on Record Ass. v. Union of India, supra; In re : Presidential Reference, supra. Also see, Ch. VIII, infra.
45. Supra, Sec. B(a).
46. Supra, Sec. B(m).
47. Supra, Sec. B(m).
48. Supra, Sec. B(i).
49. Ibid.
50. Art. 133(3); supra, Sec. C(iv)(c).
51. Art. 134(2); supra, Sec. C(iv)(d).

der Arts. 133 and 134.[52] Parliament can regulate the Supreme Court's power to review its own decisions and orders.[53] Parliament can confer further jurisdiction (quantitatively or qualitatively) on the Supreme Court regarding any matter in the Union or Concurrent List.[54] Parliament can provide that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction and powers with respect to any matter as the Government of India and the Government of a State may by special agreement seek to confer on it.[55] Parliament can confer on the Supreme Court power to issue directions, orders or writs, for any purpose other than those mentioned in Art. 32.[56] Parliament can confer supplementary powers on the Supreme Court so as to enable it to exercise its jurisdiction more effectively.[57]

It is clear from these provisions that what Parliament can do is to expand the jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court in several respects over and above what the Constitution confers. The effect of all these provisions, therefore, is that whereas the Constitution guarantees to the Supreme Court jurisdiction of various kinds, the matter has not been stereotyped into a rigid pattern for ever but is capable of expansion in the light of experience and the prevailing circumstances.

The rule-making power of the Supreme Court is subject to any law made by Parliament.[58] Parliament may regulate and prescribe the conditions of service of officers and servants of the Supreme Court;[59] may prescribe the manner in which a decree or order passed by the Supreme Court may be enforced;[60] may also pass a law to regulate the Court's power to make an order for securing the attendance of a person, discovery and production of documents or investigation or punishment of contempt of itself.[61] These are, however, procedural matters and do not affect the Supreme Court in any substantive manner.

To enable Parliament to make laws pertaining to the above-mentioned matters, Entry 77, List I, Sch. VII, confers on Parliament power to make law with respect to the constitution, organisation, jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court (including contempt of the Court) and the fees taken therein and also as to the persons entitled to practice before it.[62]

The Constitution insulates the Court from political criticism, and, thus, ensures its independence from political pressures and influence, by laying down that neither in Parliament nor in a State Legislature the conduct of a Supreme Court Judge in the discharge of his duties, can be discussed.[63] In the Keshav Singh case, the Supreme Court has taken opportunity to underline the significance of this provision. It protects a Judge of the Court from any contempt proceedings which may be taken against him in any House of Parliament or State Legislature for anything that the Judge may do in the discharge of his duties. The provision amounts to an absolute constitutional prohibition against any discussion in a

---

52. Supra, Art 135, Sec. I(b).
53. Art. 137, supra, Sec. H.
54. Art. 138(1), see, supra, Sec. I(i) and infra, Ch. X.
55. Art. 138(2), Sec. I(i), supra.
56. Art. 139; Infra, Ch. XXXIII; supra, Sec. I(i).
57. Art. 140; Sec. I(i), supra.
58. Art. 145; supra, Sec. I(f).
59. Art. 146(2); supra, Sec. I(g).
60. Art. 142(1), supra, Sec. I(d).
61. Art. 142(2); supra, Sec. I(c).
62. Infra, Ch. X.
63. Supra, Ch. II.

House, with respect to a Supreme Court Judge. Reading Arts. 121 and 211 together, it is clear that the conduct of a Supreme Court Judge cannot be discussed in a House except when a motion to remove him is before Parliament.[64]

Further, the Supreme Court's expenses are charged upon the Consolidated Fund of India, which means that this item is non-votable in Parliament although a discussion on it is not ruled out.[65] It is thus not possible for Parliament, howsoever annoyed it may be with the Court, to starve it of funds. And the possibility of Parliament getting annoyed with the Court is not just a figment of the imagination. That such occasions may arise is evidenced by the reaction to the Supreme Court's decision in the Golaknath case[66] or the Kesavanand Bharati case[67] and earlier in the property cases, which led to the First and the Third Amendments of the Constitution.[68] The extreme controversy between a State Legislature and the High Court concerned which occurred in the Keshav Singh case has already been referred to.[69] Therefore, making supply of money to the Supreme Court independent of parliamentary vote is a great step in ensuring the Supreme Court's independence from political pressures.

As regards the Central Executive-Supreme Court relationship, the effective power to appoint Supreme Court Judges has over the years passed from the Executive to the Judiciary itself which has greatly strengthened judicial independence.[70] The Executive has no power to remove a Judge without an address from the House of Parliament,[71] and cannot control the Court's jurisdiction in any manner. However, the rules made by the Supreme Court concerning its staff members are to be approved by the Executive because of the financial implications involved therein. Here, again, the Court has made consultation between the Executive and the Chief Justice compulsory.[72]

Recruitment of the Court's staff is outside the purview of the Executive except that it can by rules provide for consultation with the Union Public Service Commission.[73] Salaries and allowances of the officers and servants of the Supreme Court are to be approved by the Executive, the reason being that ultimately they are to be met out of the Public Exchequer which affects the tax-payer and, therefore, some governmental control over the Court's expenses is necessary.

From the above, it would appear that the constitutional position of the Supreme Court is very strong relatively to the other two organs of government. A reasonable security of tenure has been provided to the Judges which is an important condition to enable them to act in an atmosphere of independence. The Court has been reasonably immunized from the stresses and strains of contemporary politics in the country.

There is however a danger of the judicial independence being eroded somewhat by the prevailing practice of the government re-employing retired Supreme

---

64. Supra, Ch. II.
65. Supra, Ch. II.
66. Ch. XLI, infra.
67. Ibid.
68. Infra, Chs. XXXI, XXXII and XLII.
69. Supra, Ch. II; also see, Ch. VI, infra.
70. Supra, Sec. B.
71. Ibid.
72. Supra.
73. Supra.

Court Judges in various capacities. The only ban imposed by the Constitution on a Supreme Court Judge is that he should not plead or act in any Court or before any authority after retirement.[74]

In the Constituent Assembly, an attempt to put a restriction on re-employment of a retired Supreme Court Judge by the government did not succeed.[75] Ambedkar stated that the judiciary decided issues between citizens and rarely between citizen and the government and, consequently, the chances of the government influencing the conduct of a member of the Judiciary were very remote; in many cases employment of judicial talent in a specialized forum might be very necessary, as for example, the Income-tax investigation Commission; and that relations between Executive and Judiciary were so separate and distinct that the Executive had hardly any chance of influencing the judgment of the Judiciary.[76]

It is obvious that Ambedkar unduly minimised the importance of litigation in which government is a party. Today a very large chunk of the Supreme Court's work consists of deciding cases in which the government figures as a party. Also, the retired Judges are not always appointed, as Ambedkar envisaged, to quasi-judicial posts only. Many a time, they are appointed to pure and simple executive posts, for example, as Governors of States.[77]

The Law Commission has also criticised the prevailing practice of re-employing the retired Judges. "It is clearly undesirable that Supreme Court Judges should look forward to other government employment after their retirement. The government is a party in a large number of cases in the highest Court and the average citizen may well get the impression, that a Judge who might look forward to being employed by the government after his retirement, does not bring to bear on his work that detachment of outlook which is expected of a Judge in cases in which government is a party. We are clearly of the view that the practice has a tendency to affect the independence of the Judges and should be discontinued."[78]

The solution of the problem appears to lie in increasing the age of retirement of a Supreme Court Judge from 65 to 70 years, to make liberal pension provisions for the retired Judges, to put a legal ban on a Supreme Court Judge accepting an employment under any government after retirement, and to use his judicial talent in an honorary, and not in a salaried, capacity.

In Nixon M. Joseph v. Union of India,[79] a very pertinent and significant question was raised before the Kerala High Court through a public interest petition, viz. : should the retired Supreme Court and High Court Judges take any job, or contest election for the legislature. There is no specific bar in the Constitution against this. Nevertheless, K. NARAYANA KURUP J. has expressed a firm opinion

---

74. See, supra, Sec. B(h).
75. VIII CAD, 229-260.
76. Ibid, 259-260.
77. The dangers in accepting a political office, like that of a State Governor, are very tellingly revealed by a recent episode. Fatima Beevi, a retired Supreme Court Judge, was appointed the Governor of Tamil Nadu. She appointed Jayalalitha as the Chief Minister. Jayalalitha was at the time disqualified to be a member of the State Legislature. Annoyed by the action of the Governor, the Central Executive recalled her from her office. For details, see, Ch. VII, Sec. A(d), infra.
78. Law Comm., XIV Rep., I, 46.
79. AIR 1998 Ker. 385.

against this practice. To maintain the dignity and independence of the judiciary as well as public confidence in the judiciary, it is necessary that a Judge should now allow his judicial position to be compromised at any cost. Justice must not only be done but seen to be done. KURUP, J., has made the following pithy remarks:

> "The general public reposing absolute faith in the judiciary, see in it, justifiably an institution, that can rein in, if not eliminate, the rapacity, nepotism and corruption, especially at high places which have come to be associated with governance. The judiciary should continue to merit the exalted position it occupies in the minds and hearts of the people as the "saviour of democracy". It cannot be gainsaid that the one necessary condition for this is its independence. Independence in the sense free from the executive, meaning the bureaucracy and politicians interference and influence of every type. And fundamental to freedom from such influence and pressures on the judiciary is to eschew active politics and acceptance of positions by judges after retirement."

While the learned Judge was definitely of the opinion that judges be precluded from taking up jobs, or moving into active politics after retirement, he refrained from giving a definitive ruling in the case. As the matter is of national significance, the Judge dismissed the petition in limine and left the matter to the Central Government for consideration and necessary action.

In the past, at times, appointment of the Chief Justice raised controversy when a junior Judge was appointed as the Chief Justice by-passing the senior-most Judge.[80] This was regarded as an attempt to interfere with judicial independence. While a rule of automatic promotion of the senior-most Judge to the office of the Chief Justice might not always be satisfactory, by-passing him because his judicial views are not palatable to the government is to strike at the roots of judicial independence. It is hoped that such controversies will not arise in future because of the introduction of new procedure to appoint the Chief Justice.[81]

The Supreme Court of India enjoys far larger powers than any other Apex Court, e.g., House of Lords in Britain or the Supreme Court in the USA. The Court enjoys very extensive jurisdiction. It plays a very significant role in the administration of law and justice in the country. It is the final arbiter and interpreter of the Constitution.[82] Judicial review is the basic structure of the Constitution[83] and this places a special responsibility on the Supreme Court in the area of constitutional interpretation. It is the final court of appeal in matters of private law as well as public law,[84] and has a supervisory role vis-a-vis the tribunals[85] and enjoys advisory jurisdiction.[86]

The Supreme Court is at the apex of the national judicial system. It constitutes a constitutional balance wheel acting as countervailing power to the Executive and the Legislature. The Court has played an extremely creative role in keeping the responsible and the parliamentary system of government in proper working

---

80. Supra.
81. Supra.
82. See, infra, Ch. XL.
83. Ch. XLI, infra.
84. Supra.
85. Supra.
86. Supra.

order,[87] in maintaining the federal balance,[88] in protecting the fundamental rights of the people.[89] The Court has endeavoured to promote a welfare state in India.[90]

But the Court is faced with a serious problem, viz., load of work.[91] Because of the spate of legislative and executive activity, increase in population and explosion of economic activity, there has been an explosion in litigation in India. Creation of tribunals, like the Central Administrative Tribunal, has further added to the load of work on the Supreme Court as appeals from these tribunals lie directly to the Supreme Court.[92]

There seems to be no possibility that the work-load on the Court will decrease in future. On the other hand, it is possible that the load of work on the court may increase. It, therefore, appears to be necessary to think of ways and means to expedite disposal of cases by the Supreme Court.

One obvious step to meet the situation is to further increase the number of judges and to select persons of calibre, aptitude and industry for the purpose. At times, filling of judicial vacancies takes a long time. The Government should devise ways and means to cut-short this period. The Court may also think of establishing specialised Benches according to the major heads of litigation coming before it. If the same judges deal with the same subject-matter over and over again, there can be quick disposal of cases and also a uniformity in decisions making law more certain and thus reducing the number of appeals to the Supreme Court in the long run.

Another method may be to establish all India tribunals, or a Central Appellate Tribunal, to hear appeals from all the various tribunals in the country, leaving only an exceptional appeal to the Supreme Court on questions of law from such a Tribunal.

The Supreme Court itself has suggested setting up of a National Court of Appeal to entertain appeals by special leave from the decisions of the High Courts and tribunals in the country in civil, criminal, revenue and labour cases so that the Supreme Court may concern itself only with entertaining cases involving questions of constitutional law and public law.[93]

The important thing is that in a democratic country, to solve the problem of arrears of cases pending in the courts, the solution is not to deny justice to the people but to expand the judicial system in various ways so as to keep pace with the growth of litigation in the country.[94]

---

87. See U.N.R. Rao, supra, Ch. II; Samsher Singh, supra, Ch. III; S.R. Bommai v. Union of India, AIR 1994 SC 1918; see, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.

88. Chs. X, XI and XIV, infra.

89. See, infra, Chapters XX to XXXIII.

90. See, infra, Ch. XXXIV, infra.

91. R. DHAWAN, THE SUPREME COURT UNDER STRAIN: THE CHALLENGE OF ARREARS (I.L.I. 1978).

92. See, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. H.

93. Bihar Legal Support Society v. Chief Justice of India, AIR 1987 SC 38 : (1986) 4 SCC 767.

94. See, Law Commission, Fourteenth Report, 46-63 (1958); Forty-fourth Report (1971) and Forty-fifth Report (1971); Fifty-eighth Report on the Structure and Jurisdiction of the Higher Judiciary. Also see, JAIN, OUTLINES OF INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, 348-362 (Reprint 1997). As on 31st December, 2008, 49,819 cases were pending in the Supreme Court. Court Newa: Vol. III, Issue No. 3 (October-December, 2008). The Supreme Court (Number of Judges) Amendment Bill, 2008 has been introduced in Parliament to further amend the Supreme Court (Number of Judges) Act, 1956 by increasing the number of Judges in the Supreme Court from twenty-five to thirty, excluding the Chief Justice of India.

PART III

STATE GOVERNMENT

CHAPTER V

STATES AND UNION TERRITORIES

SYNOPSIS

A. TERRITORY OF INDIA

India has been characterised as a 'Union of States' [Art. 1(1)]. The territory of India comprises States, Union Territories and any other territory that may be acquired by the Government of India at any time [Art. 1(3)].

Today India has the following 27 States:[1] Andhra Pradesh; Assam; Bihar; Chattisgarh; Gujarat; Haryana; Jharkhand; Kerala; Madhya Pradesh; Tamil Nadu; Maharashtra; Karnataka; Orissa; Punjab; Rajasthan; Uttar Pradesh; Uttaranchal; West Bengal; Jammu & Kashmir; Nagaland; Himachal Pradesh; Manipur; Tripura; Meghalaya; Sikkim; Mizoram[2]; and Arunachal Pradesh.[3]

There are seven Union Territories as follows: Andaman and Nicobar Islands; Chandigarh; Delhi; Goa, Daman and Diu; Dadra and Nagar Haveli; Lakshadweep; and Pondicherry.[4]

---

1. Arts. 1(2), 4 and 152 and the First Schedule to the Constitution.
2. Mizoram was a Union Territory. The Constitution (Fifty-Third) Amendment Act, 1986, conferred statehood on Mizoram. For this Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.
3. The Constitution (Fifty-fourth) Amendment Act, 1986, conferred statehood on Arunachal Pradesh, another former Union Territory. For this Amendment, see, Ch. XLII, infra.
4. The First Schedule to the Constitution.

B. PARLIAMENT'S POWER TO REORGANISE STATES

(a) ADMISSION OF NEW STATES

Parliament is empowered to enact a law to admit into the Union, or establish, new States 'on such terms and conditions as it thinks fit' [Art. 2].

Under this provision, Parliament cannot admit or establish a new Union Territory. This can be done only by a constitutional amendment. Accordingly, constitutional amendments had to be passed under Art. 368 when Portuguese and French territories were taken over by the Government of India and admitted into the Indian Union as Union Territories of Goa, Daman and Diu, Dadra and Nagar Haveli and Pondicherry.[5]

The power to admit new States into the Union under Art. 2, as mentioned above, is very wide. In the very nature of the power it has to be wide. Its exercise is necessarily guided by political issues of considerable complexity many of which may not be judicially manageable. However, the words "on such terms and conditions as it thinks fit" used in Art. 2 do not confer on Parliament "an unreviewable and unfettered power immune from judicial scrutiny". The Supreme Court has observed in relation to Art. 2:[6]

> "The power is limited by the fundamentals of the Indian Constitutionalism and those terms and conditions which the Parliament may deem fit to impose, cannot be inconsistent and irreconcilable with the foundational principles of the Constitution and cannot violate or subvert the constitutional scheme. This is not to say that the conditions subject to which a new state or territory is admitted into the Union ought exactly be the same as those that govern all other States as at the time of the commencement of the Constitution."

Thus, under Art. 2, Parliament cannot over-ride the constitutional scheme. If a law goes beyond the constitutionally permissible latitudes that law can be questioned as regards its validity.[7] "The contention that the vires of the provisions and effects of such a law are non-justiciable cannot be accepted".[8]

In an earlier case,[9] the Supreme Court had observed that the power conferred on Parliament under Art. 2 "is not power to override the constitutional scheme."

(b) REORGANISATION OF STATES

Art. 3 enables Parliament to effect by law reorganisation inter se of the territories of the States constituting the Indian Union.

The reasons for drafting Art. 3 as it is are as follows. When this article was being drafted, the Princely States had not been fully integrated. There was also in the air the possibility of reorganising the States on linguistic basis. The Constituent Assembly foresaw that such reorganisation could not be postponed for long. Accordingly, Art. 3 was incorporated in the Constitution providing for an easy and simple method for reorganisation of the States at any point of time.

---

5. For discussion on Art. 368, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
6. R.C. Poudyal v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 1804, 1845 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 324.
7. For further discussion on this point, see, infra, Ch. IX, sec. B, under the heading "Sikkim".
8. Poudyal, AIR 1993 SC, at 1845.
9. Mangal Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1967 SC 944, 946 : (1967) 2 SCR 109.

Parliament is empowered to enact a law to reorganise the existing States by establishing new States out of the territories of the existing States, or by uniting two or more States or parts of States, or by uniting any territory to a part of any State; or by altering their boundaries, or by separating territory from, or increasing or diminishing the area of, or by changing the name of, a State [Art. 3].

The power of Parliament is exclusive and plenary[10]. That is why it has been said that "India is an indestructible Union of destructible units".[11]

The exercise of this power by Parliament is subject to the following conditions : (1) A Bill for any such purpose cannot be introduced in a House of Parliament except on the recommendation of the President.

(2) If the Bill affects the area, name or boundaries of a State, then before recommending its consideration to Parliament, the President has to refer the same to the State Legislature concerned for expressing its views on it within such time as he may fix [Proviso to Art. 3].

The term "State" in Art. 3 includes a 'Union Territory', but in case of a 'Union Territory', no reference need be made to the concerned Legislature to ascertain its views and Parliament can itself take any action it likes in the matter [Explanation I to Art. 3].

The purpose of the provision is to give an opportunity to the State Legislature concerned to express its views on the proposals contained in the Bill. Parliament is in no way bound by these views. All that is contemplated is that Parliament should have before it the views of the State Legislature affected by the proposals contained in the Bill, but the Parliament is free to deal with the matter in any manner it thinks fit and may accept or reject what the State Legislature says. Parliament is not bound to accept or act upon the views of the State Legislature.

If the State Legislature fails to express its views within the stipulated time, Parliament is free to proceed with the matter as it likes. If once a Bill has been referred to the State Legislature, it can later be amended by Parliament and no fresh reference to the State Legislature is required to ascertain its views on the proposed amendments.[12]

When Parliament acts, under the above-mentioned constitutional provisions, to admit or create new States, or to reorganise the existing States, it can also effect such amendments in the First and the Fourth Schedules to the Constitution as may be necessary to effectuate the new proposals [Art. 4(1)].[13]

Parliament may also make all consequential, supplemental and incidental provisions as may be necessary to effectuate the new proposals, such as representation of new units in Parliament, setting up of the legislative, executive and judicial organs of the State essential to the effective state administration under the Constitution, expenditure and distribution of revenue, apportionment of assets

---

10. Mullaperiyar Environmental Protection Forum v. Union of India, (2006) 3 SCC 643, 653 : AIR 2006 SC 1428; See also State of Orissa v. State of A.P., (2006) 9 SCC 591, 595.

11. Raja Ram Pal v. Speaker, Lok Sabha, (2007) 3 SCC 184, 248, 291 : (2007) 2 JT 1.

12. Babu Lal Parate v. State of Bombay, AIR 1960 SC 51 : 1960 (1) SCR 605.

13. The First Schedule to the Constitution contains the names of the States and the Union Territories and defines their territories and boundaries.

The Fourth Schedule to the Constitution lists the number of seats allotted to the various States and Union Territories in the Rajya Sabha, supra, Ch. II.

and liabilities, provisions as to services and other related matters. Any such law enacted under Arts. 2, 3 and 4 is not regarded as an amendment of the Constitution for the purposes of Art. 368 [Art. 4(2)].[14] This means that a law made by Parliament to reorganise the States would not be invalid even if it is inconsistent with any constitutional provision. Parliament thus has plenary and comprehensive powers to pass legislation to reorganise the States and Union Territories and to deal with all problems—constitutional, legal, administrative—arising as a result thereof.

Rejecting a challenge to the constitutional validity of section 108 of the States Reorganization Act, 1956, it was held in Mullaperiyar Environmental Protection Forum[15] that the power of Parliament to make law under Articles 3 and 4 is plenary and traverses over all legislative subjects as are necessary for effectuating a proper reorganization of States. Constitutional validity of a law made under Articles 3 and 4 cannot be questioned on the ground of lack of legislative competence with reference to the Lists of the Seventh Schedule and the power of the State to enact laws in List II of the Seventh Schedule is subject to parliamentary legislation under Articles 3 and 4.

Nevertheless, the power does not authorise Parliament to override the constitutional scheme. "No State can, therefore, be formed, admitted or set up by law under Art. 4 by the Parliament which has not effective legislative, executive and judicial organs."[16]

Article 170 fixes the minimum strength of a State Legislature Assembly at 60. When the Haryana State was established in 1966, the strength of the interim legislature was fixed at 54. The provision was challenged as being inconsistent with Art. 170, but the Supreme Court upheld it under Art. 4. Prima facie, the provision undoubtedly was an amendment of the Constitution but under Art. 4(2) it was not to be treated as such.[17]

Elucidating the scope of the power conferred upon Parliament by Arts. 2, 3 and 4, the Supreme Court has pointed out in Mangal Singh v. Union of India,[18] that the law referred to in Arts. 2 and 3 may alter or amend the First Schedule to the Constitution which sets out the names of the States and description of territories thereof, and the Fourth Schedule allotting seats to the States in the Rajya Sabha.

The law so made may also make supplemental, incidental and consequential provisions which would include provisions relating to setting up of the legislative, executive and judicial organs of the State essential to the effective state administration, expenditure and distribution of revenue, apportionment of assets and liabilities, provisions as to services and other related matters.[19]

Power conferred on Parliament by Arts. 2 and 3 is to establish new States conforming to the democratic pattern envisaged by the Constitution, and is not power to override the constitutional scheme.

---

14. Art. 368 lays down the formal procedure to amend the Constitution, See., Ch. XLI, infra.
15. Supra.
16. Mangal Singh, supra, note 9, at 946.
17. Ibid. See also Manohar S. Prabhu v. Union of India, 1987 (1) Bom CR 130.
18. AIR 1967 SC 944, 946.
19. State of Uttaranchal v Siddharth Srivastava, (2003) 9 SCC 336 : AIR 2003 SC 4062.

In Poudyal,[20] consequent on the conferment of full-fledged statehood on Sikkim within the Indian Union, and the enactment of Art. 371F for the purpose,[21] two crucial questions were raised for the consideration of the Supreme Court:

(1) Can a seat be reserved in the State Legislature for a representative of a group of religious institutions to be elected by them; and

(2) can seats be reserved in favour of a particular tribe far in excess of its population in the State?

Provisions to this effect made in Art. 371F and various enactments were challenged. Art. 371F was challenged on the ground that it was inconsistent with the basic features of the Constitution,[22] viz., equality and secularism.[23] The Court by a majority upheld these provisions in the light of historial, cultural and political background of Sikkim. The majority ruled that "the provisions in the particular situation and the permissible latitudes, cannot be said to be unconstitutional" and that:

> "the impugned provisions have been found in the wisdom of Parliament necessary in the admission of a strategic border-state into the Union. The departures are not such as to negate fundamental principles of democracy."[24]

Since the inauguration of the Constitution, Parliament has passed several Acts to reorganise the States and settle boundary disputes between one State and another. In 1956, an extensive reorganisation of the States was undertaken on a linguistic basis, and Parliament passed the States Reorganisation Act, 1956, for this purpose.[25]

In all, up-to-date Parliament has passed 23 Acts under Arts. 3 and 4 since 1950 to effect changes in the areas, boundaries and names of the States.[26]

In the U.S.A., the consent of the concerned State Legislature is essential before a State can be reorganised.[27] In Australia, in addition to the consent of the State Legislature, the consent of the electors in the affected State is also stipulated.[28] On the other hand, in India, what is needed is a mere reference of the proposals to the concerned State Legislature for expression of its views and, subject to this stipulation, the matter of State reorganisation rests solely with Parliament. But, in practice, it is one thing to have a formal or legal power and quite another thing to exercise it. Keeping the political realities in view, Parlia-

---

20. Supra, note 6.
21. For Art. 371F, see, Ch. IX, infra.
22. See, infra, Ch. XLI, for discussion on the Doctrine of Basic Features of the Constitution.
23. See, infra, Chs. XXI and XXIX for discussion on these concepts.
24. AIR 1993 SC at 1852.
25. Report of the States Reorganisation Commission, (1955).
Besides language and culture, the Commission also took into account such other factors as preservation and strengthening of the unity and security of India; financial, economic and administrative considerations; planning and promotion of the welfare of the people in each State as well as of the nation as a whole.
26. Report of the Sarkaria Comm., 73. A suit has been filed by Maharashtra in 2004 for transfer of certain Marathi-speaking areas in Karnataka. During its pendency, a petition has been filed in 2009 by Maharashtra in the Supreme Court challenging the Constitutional validity of certain provisions of the States Reorganisation Act, 1956 and the Bombay Reorganisation Act, 1960.
27. Art. IV, s. 3(1) of the U.S. Const.
28. Ss. 123 & 124 of the Australian Constitution Act, 1900.

ment is not free to act at its sweet will without some sort of public acceptance of, or acquiescence into, the proposed measure of reorganisation.

Hitherto, proposals for reorganisation have been implemented by Parliament in response to public clamour. Parliament has been given such an extensive power under the Constitution to re-organise the States because the demand for reorganisation of the States on a linguistic basis was already in the air at the time of Constitution-making and the Constitution-makers thought it advisable to devise a machinery to complete the task of reorganisation smoothly and without much difficulty as and when it was taken in hand in future. The consent of the States to reorganisation was not made mandatory as there was an apprehension that some States might not like the idea that parts of their territories be taken away to constitute new States or to be merged with other States.

A question being debated at present is whether there ought to be a few more States by breaking some colossal States existing at present. There are local agitations here and there for carving out a few more States.[29] In principle, there seems to be nothing wrong in having a few more States than the present 27. If the U.S.A., with a population of 27 crores can have 50 States, India with one billion people can also have more than 27 States. It is well known that a big State is administratively unwieldy and unmanageable. Comparatively speaking, a smaller State can be administered more efficiently.

Though India can very well afford to have a few more States, what is necessary is that the new States ought not to be carved out on an ad hoc basis in a piecemeal manner keeping only political expediency in view. A commission should be appointed to study the question of formation of States deeply in all its aspects keeping in view inter alia such factors as administrative convenience, geographic homogeneity, economic viability etc.

C. CESSION OF TERRITORY

The powers given to Parliament to reorganise States cannot be availed of by it to cede any Indian territory to a foreign country. This point was settled by the Supreme Court in an advisory opinion in 1960.[30]

To settle certain boundary disputes, India had agreed to transfer some territory to Pakistan. A question referred to the Supreme Court by the President for advice under Art. 143 was whether Parliament could cede Indian territory to a foreign country by making a law under Art. 3, or was an amendment of the Constitution under Art. 368 necessary?

The Supreme Court held that Art. 3, broadly stated, "deals with the internal adjustment inter se of the territories of the constituent States of the Indian Union". The authority of Parliament "to diminish the area of any State" envisages taking out a part of the area of a State and adding it to another State; the area diminished from one State must continue to be a part of India and it "does not contemplate cession of national territory in favour of a foreign country". Thus, Indian territory can be ceded to a foreign country only by enacting a formal

---

29. Demands for the creation of Telangana out of Andhra Pradesh and a separate "Bundelkhand" state from Uttar Pradesh, are some present instances.

30. In ref. on Berubari, AIR 1960 SC 845 : 1960 (3) SCR 250, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F.

amendment of the Constitution under Art. 368 to modify the First Schedule to the Constitution.

Explaining the above ruling later, the Supreme Court stated in Maganbhai v. Union of India,[31] that a constitutional amendment is necessary in a case where de jure and de facto Indian territory is ceded to a foreign country. But settlement of a boundary dispute between India and another country stands on a different footing. The settlement of a boundary dispute cannot be held to be cession of territory. This matter rests with the Executive.

The factual situation in the instant case was as follows. Hostilities broke out between India and Pakistan on a boundary dispute in Kutch. The matter was then referred by both countries to a tribunal for arbitration. The question arose whether the award of the tribunal could be implemented by an executive act, or was a constitutional amendment necessary? The Supreme Court ruled that it could be done by executive action as it involved no cession of territory, but amounted only to demarcation of the boundary line on the surface of the earth.[32]

31. AIR 1969 SC 783.
32. Also see, Union of India v. Sukumar Sengupta, AIR 1990 SC 1692 : 1990 Supp SCC 545.

CHAPTER VI

STATE LEGISLATURE

SYNOPSIS

Like the Central Government, a State Government also is of the parliamentary type and follows closely the model of the Central Government. Structurally the State Government may be resolved into three institutional components viz., the legislative, as represented by the State Legislature; the executive, as represented by the Governor and the Council of Ministers; and the judicial, as represented by the High Court and the subordinate courts.

Generally speaking, the basic structure of the State Government follows closely the pattern of the Central Government, but, in the nature of things, there are some significant differences as well.

A. CONSTITUTION OF A STATE LEGISLATURE

The State Legislature in Andhra Pradesh, Bihar, Maharashtra, Madhya Pradesh, Karnataka, and Uttar Pradesh is bi-cameral having two Houses. It is thus composed of the Governor, Legislative Council (Vidhan Parishad) and Legislative Assembly (Vidhan Sabha) [Art. 168].[1] In all other States, the State Legislature is unicameral having only one House and, therefore, it is composed of the Governor and Legislative Assembly (Vidhan Sabha).

Parliament may enact a law for either abolition or creation of Legislative Council in a State, if the Legislative Assembly therein passes a resolution to that effect by a majority of its total membership and by a majority of not less than two-thirds of its members present and voting [Art. 169(1)].

The Parliamentary law may contain such provisions to amend the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to it [Art. 169(2)], and it will not be deemed to be an amendment of the Constitution for the purposes of Art. 368 [Art. 169(3)].[2]

---

1. Also see, The Legislative Councils Act, 1957.
2. For Art. 368, See, Ch. XLI, infra.

Thus, Art. 169(1) confers on the States having a second chamber, the right to abolish the same, and on the States not having a second chamber, the right to create one.

The use of the word 'may', in Art. 169(1) seems to give a discretion to Parliament to accept or reject the resolution of the Legislative Assembly of a State for abolition or creation of Legislative Council therein.

The idea of having a second chamber in the States was criticised in the Constituent Assembly on the ground that it was not democratic as it was not representative of the people, that it delayed legislative process and that it was an expensive institution. The idea of a second chamber was supported, however, on the ground that it would check hasty legislation by the popular chamber.[3]

The continued existence of the Legislative Council in a State is made dependent on the wishes of the State Legislative Assembly. Legislative Councils in the States seem to be a dying institution. The Legislative Councils in Tamil Nadu, West Bengal and Punjab have since been abolished.[4]

The Legislative Council of Andhra Pradesh which had been abolished by the Andhra Pradesh Legislative Council Abolition Act, 1985 was created again by the Andhra Pradesh Legislative Council Act, 2005. The abolition was sought to be justified by the then Government on the ground that the Legislative Council was redundant and its continuance was a drain on the State exchequer. It is more probable that the abolition was dictated by political considerations since the Legislative Council was dominated by the opposition party, it posed an obstacle to the passing of controversial legislation and policies. Significantly, when the opposition party came to power, the Legislative Council was revived in the State.

B. COMPOSITION OF THE HOUSES

(i) LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

The total membership of a State Legislative Council cannot be less than 40, or more than one-third of the total membership in the Legislative Assembly [Art. 171(1)]. The Constitution thus fixes the minimum and the maximum limits regarding the strength of a Legislative Council. The actual strength of each House is however fixed by Parliament, which is as follows: Andhra Pradesh, 90; Bihar, 96; Maharashtra, 78; Madhya Pradesh, 90; Karnataka, 63; Uttar Pradesh, 108.[5]

"Until Parliament by law otherwise provides," a Legislative Council is composed as follows [Art. 171(3)]:

(a) 1/3 of its members are elected by electorates consisting of members of municipalities, district boards and such other local authorities in the State as may be specified by an Act of Parliament;

---

3. IV CAD, 670-688; VII CAD, 1303-1318; IX CAD, 31, 473-492; AUSTIN, op, cit., 158-163.
4. See, The Tamil Nadu Legislative Council Abolition Act, 1986; The West Bengal Legislative Council (Abolition) Act, 1969. See Ch. V (supra).
5. See section 10 read with Third Schedule of the Representation of People Act, 1950.

(b) 1/12 of its members are elected by electorates consisting of graduates of any University in India, of at least three years' standing, and residing within the State;[6]

(c) 1/12 of its members are elected by teachers of at least three years' standing in such educational institutions within the State, of a standard not lower than a secondary school, as Parliament may prescribe by law;

(d) 1/3 of its members are elected by the members of the State Legislative Assembly from amongst those who are not its member;

(e) the remainder, i.e., 1/6 of its members are nominated by the Governor from amongst those who have a special knowledge or practical experience of literature, science, art, co-operative movement and social service [Art. 171(3)(e) and 171(5)].

The members of a Legislative Council under heads (a), (b) and (c), mentioned above, are chosen in such territorial constituencies as Parliament may prescribe by law. These as well as the members under head (d) are elected in accordance with the system of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote [Art. 171(4)].

The purpose underlying the Governor's nominations under head (e) is to use the talents of such persons in the State as have achieved distinction in various fields and whose experience and advice may be of value to the State Legislature, but who have neither the time nor the inclination to contest elections.

All attempts hitherto made to bring the Governor's nominations within judicial purview have proved futile. A writ petition under Art. 226 by a member of the Assembly challenging the nomination of C. Rajgopalachari to the Madras Legislative Council in 1952 was rejected on the ground that the petitioner had no personal right "which can be said to have been infringed even in an indirect manner by nomination".[7]

In Biman v. Dr. H C. Mookherjee.[8] the Calcutta High Court dismissed an action brought personally against the Governor challenging nominations made by him to the Legislative Council because—

(1) under Art. 163,[9] except in cases where Governor is required to act in his discretion, he is to act on the advice of the Council of Ministers, and so it must be presumed that in making the nomination in question, he must have acted on the advice of the Council of Ministers;

(2) by reason of Art. 163(3), the advice tendered by the Ministers to the Governor cannot be enquired into by the Court;[10]

(3) by virtue of Art. 361,[11] the validity or invalidity of the nominations could not be inquired into by the court as this Article gives a complete protection to the Governor against a Court action.

---

6. Parliament may by law prescribe any other qualification as being equivalent to that of a graduate of a University.
7. In re P. Ramamoorthi, AIR 1953 Mad. 94.
8. 56 C.W.N. 651.
9. Ch. VII, infra.
10. Infra, Ch. VII; also, supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
11. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A.

In Vidyasagar v. Krishna Ballabha,[12] nominations were challenged on the ground that these had been made by the Chief Minister without referring the matter to the Governor. The Patna High Court rejected the contention. Under the Rules of Business,[13] it was not a matter which had to be referred to the Governor. The court could not go into the question of what advice was tendered to the Governor by the Council of Ministers.[14] The order of nomination had been properly authenticated. The court could not go into the question whether the members nominated had or had not the required qualifications under the Constitution.

In Har Sharan v. Chandra Bhan,[15] though the Allahabad High Court stated that the provision for nomination to the Legislative Council has not been made to enable a Minister to enter the Legislature by the backdoor, nevertheless, it refused to interfere, in the absence of an illegality as contrasted from impropriety. The Court however observed that although the Governor was not subject to its jurisdiction, a writ of quo warranto could yet be issued to the person nominated if his nomination was held to be illegal.[16]

It will thus be seen that membership of the Legislative Council is not on an elective basis by the people from territorial constituencies; it is by nomination, indirect election or by election from teachers' and graduates constituencies. The above-mentioned scheme of composition of a Legislative Council provides for representation in the House of a wide spectrum of interests. But this scheme is tentative in nature and Parliament may modify the same by law [Art. 171(2)]. Parliament may devise a different scheme for the composition of the upper houses in the States as may be thought necessary from time to time.

The Legislative Council is a continuing body. It is not subject to dissolution. As nearly as possible, one-third of its members retire every two years in accordance with the law of Parliament and their places are filled up by fresh elections or nominations, as the case may be. [Art. 172(2)].

(ii) LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

The Legislative Assembly is the popular chamber, elected directly by the people from territorial constituencies in the State on the basis of adult franchise once in five years. The House may be dissolved earlier. In an emergency, its life may be extended by Parliament by law [Art. 172(1)].[17]

Every citizen of India, not less than 18 years of age, and not suffering from any disqualification [Art. 326],[18] is eligible to be registered as a voter at an election for this House. Disqualifications arise either under the Constitution, or under a law passed by Parliament, or a State Legislature [Art. 326].[19]

---

12. AIR 1965 Pat. 321.
13. For "Rules of Business", see, Ch. VII, infra.
Also see, supra, Ch. III, Sec. E.
14. On this question, see, Ch. VII, infra.
15. AIR 1962 All 301.
16. For discussion on Quo Warranto, see, Ch. VIII, Sec. D, infra.
17. For Emergency Provisions, see, infra, Ch. XIII.
18. Also see, infra, Ch. XIX, under Elections.
19. See below.

The number of members in a Legislative Assembly may be 60 at the minimum and 500 at the maximum [Art. 170(1)].[20] To elect these members, the State is demarcated into territorial constituencies in such manner that the ratio between the number of members allotted to a constituency and the population therein, so far as practicable, is uniform throughout the State [Art. 170(2)].

Article 170(2) incorporates the principle of "fair and effective representation", or the broad democratic principle of "one person one vote". The constituencies ought to be, as far as possible of equal size although this principle cannot be applied with "arithmetical accuracy".[21]

Upon the completion of each census, the total number of seats in each Assembly, and the division of each State into territorial constituencies, are to be adjusted by such authority and in such manner as Parliament may by law prescribe [Art. 170(3)]. Such readjustment is not to affect representation in the Assembly until its dissolution. Provided that the readjustment shall take effect from such date as the President may, by order, specify.

Until such readjustment takes effect, any election to the Legislative Assembly may be held on the basis of the territorial constituencies existing before such readjustment. However, until the first census after the year 2026[22]. no readjustment of seats in the State Legislative Assembly or division of the State into territorial constituencies need be made [Proviso to Art. 170(3)]. This task is performed by the Delimitation Commission.[23]

Provisions have been made for reservation of seats in various Legislative Assemblies for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes [Arts. 332 and 334];[24] As regards the Anglo-Indian community, the Governor has authority to nominate one member of the community to the State Legislative Assembly of a State if he is of the opinion that the community needs representation in the Assembly and is not adequately represented therein [Art. 333].[25]

(iii) QUALIFICATIONS AND DISQUALIFICATIONS FOR MEMBERSHIP

A person to be qualified for being chosen as a member in the State Legislature should be a citizen of India, and he should make and subscribe to an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form.[26] He should not be less than 30 years of age in

---

20. For the strength of each Assembly, see, the Second Schedule to the Representation of People Act, 1951.

21. R.C. Poudyal v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 1804, 1848 : 1994 Supp (1) SCC 324.

22. Substituted for "2000" with effect from 2002 by the Constitution (Eighty-fourth Amendment) Act, 2003.

23. Supra, Ch. II; infra, Ch. XIX, under Elections.

24. Infra, Ch. XXXV.

25. infra, Ch. XXXV.

26. The form of the oath is given in the Third Schedule to the Constitution. The oath emphasizes that the candidate for the House shall "bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India as by law established" and that he "will uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India". The purpose underlying the oath is to ensure that only a person having allegiance to India is eligible for membership of the Legislature. The use of the expression "make and subscribe" does not imply that the candidate must either be literate or sufficiently educationally qualified so as to comprehend the Constitution. See infra Baljeet Singh v. Election Commission of India, AIR 2001 Del 1. The oath must be taken in the prescribed form otherwise it has to be assumed that the legislator has not taken the oath and has not duly entered upon the office. Thus an oath in the name of Sree Narayana Guru on the ground that he worshipped and considered Sree Narayana Guru as God does not conform to the constitutional mandate. Haridasan Palayil v. The Speaker, Kerala Legislative Assembly, AIR 2003 Ker 328 : 2003 (3) KLT 119 (DB).

case of the Legislative Council, and 25 years in case of the Assembly. In addition, he should also possess such other qualifications as are prescribed by the Constitution or a Parliamentary law [Arts. 173 and 191(1)(e)].

The necessary qualifications and disqualifications have been prescribed by Parliament in the Representation of the People Act, 1951. Thus, a person to fill an elective seat to a State Legislative Council has to be an elector for an Assembly constituency in that State, and to be qualified for the Governor's nomination, he should ordinarily be a resident in that State. For membership of the Assembly, he should be an elector for an Assembly constituency in the State. Also, he should be a member of a Scheduled Caste or Scheduled Tribe[27] if he wants to contest a seat reserved for such castes and tribes. A person belonging to such castes or tribes is not disqualified for being elected to a seat not reserved for them.

The grounds of disqualification laid down in the Act and the Constitution for membership of a State Legislature are similar to those laid down for Parliament.[28]

(a) OFFICE OF PROFIT

One such disqualification is holding of an office of profit, a concept which has already been discussed earlier [Art. 191(1)(a)].[29] It needs to be pointed out, however, that the spirit underlying this disqualification is being flouted in practice by the Chief Minister seeking to 'buy' dissidents in the party by appointing them to lucrative positions in public sector undertakings. As has already been discussed, technically, holding an office in such an autonomous undertaking is not regarded as holding an office under the State Government.

The office of the Chairman of Interim Council of Jharkhand Area Autonomous Council constituted by the State Government under the Jharkhand Area Autonomous Council Act, 1994, has been held to be an office of profit. The Government has complete control over the Council, the Chairman gets an honorarium of Rs. 1700/- per month and other allowances and perquisites.[30] He was getting more than compensatory allowance; Rs. 1700/- p.m. was pecuniary gain to the chairman.[31]

For the purpose of election of the Chairman to Rajya Sabha, the said disqualification could only be removed by Parliament by passing a law for the purposes.[32]

The chairman of one-man commission appointed by the Government of Karnataka was held to be holding an office of profit under Art. 191(1) as a provision

---

27. For further discussion on this topic, see, Ch. XXXV, infra.

28. *Supra.*Ch. II, Sec. D. A person who is disqualified would be conjointly disqualified for standing for election as well as for continuing as a member of the House to which he has been chosen. Raveendran Nair v. R. Balakrishna Pillai, High Court of Kerala O.P. Nos. 13013, 30001 and 34703 of 2001 and Election Petition No. 10 of 2001 Decided On: 01.03.2002 per B.N. SRIKRISHNA, C.J. AND G. SIVARAJAN, J).

29. See discussion under Art. 102(1)(a), Ch. II, Sec. D(a), supra. See also Achary: Law and Practice relating to Office of Profit (2006).

30. Daya Nand Sahay v. Shibu Soren, AIR 2001 Pat 79; Shibu Soren v. Dayanand Sahay, (2001) 7 SCC 425.

31. Divya Prakash v. Kultar Chand Rana, AIR 1975 SC 1067 : (1975) 1 SCC 264; Karbhari Bhimji Rohamare v. Shankar Rao Genuji Kolhe, AIR 1975 SC 575 : (1975) 1 SCC 252.

32. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. D(b).

for Rs. 5 lakhs was made in the State budget for defraying his expenses of pay and day to day expenses. This was much more than compensatory allowance.[33]

A clerk in Coal India Ltd. — a government owned company—does not hold an office of profit under the Government. The Government exercises no control on "appointment, removal, service conditions and functioning" of the person concerned.[34]

A teacher in a municipal school does not hold an office of profit under the State Government and so is not disqualified to contest election for the State Assembly.[35]

The State Legislature is authorised to declare by law that a particular office will not disqualify its holder from membership in the State Legislature [Art. 191(1)(a)].

The Haryana Legislature exempted the chairmen of improvement trusts, but not their members, from the disqualification of the office of profit. This was challenged. Rejecting the challenge, the Supreme Court said that Art. 191(1)(a) gives a wide power to the State Legislature to declare by law what office of profit shall not disqualify its holder from being a member of the Legislature, and "..... so long as this exemptive power is exercised reasonably and with due restraint and in a manner which does not drain out Art. 191(1)(a) of the real content or disregard any constitutional guarantee or mandate, the Court will not interfere".[36]

The legislature can retrospectively remove the disqualification arising because of holding of an office of profit.[37]

(b) DECISION ON DISQUALIFICATION

"If any question arises" whether a member of a House of a State Legislature has become subject to a disqualification or not, it is to be referred to the Governor whose decision thereon is final [Art. 192(1)]. Before giving his decision, however, the Governor is required to obtain the opinion of the Election Commission and is to act in accordance with it [Art. 192(2)].

The Supreme Court has emphasized in the case noted below[38] that under Art. 192(2), the opinion of the Election Commission is a sine qua non for the Governor to give a decision on the question whether or not the member concerned of a House of State Legislature has become subject to a disqualification. Under Arts. 191(1) and (2), once a question arises whether a member has incurred a disqualification, it is only the Governor who must decide it but only after taking the opinion of the Election Commission. It is the decision of the Governor taken in

---

33. M.V. Rajashekaran v. Vatal Nagaraj, (2002) 2 SCC 704 : AIR 2002 SC 742.

34. Pradyut Bordoloi v. Swapan Roy, AIR 2001 SC 296, 300 : (2001) 2 SCC 19.
Also see, Aklu Ram Mahto v. Rajendra Mahto, AIR 1999 SC 1259 : (1999) 3 SCC 541.

35. Patel Pandurang Venkanagouda v. H.B. Shivalingappa, AIR 2000 Knt. 78. See also Sultan Sadik v. Sanjay Raj Subba, (2004) 2 SCC 377 : AIR 2004 SC 1377.

36. Bhagwandas v. State of Haryana, AIR 1974 SC 2355 : (1975) 1 SCC 249. Also see, Hedge, supra.

37. N. Ibomcha Singh v. L. Chandramani Singh, AIR 1977 SC 682 : (1976) 4 SCC 291.

38. Election Commission of India v. Subramanian Swamy (Dr.), AIR 1996 SC 1810 : (1996) 4 SCC 104.
For comments on this case, see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. D(d).

accordance with the opinion of the Election Commission that is final. In effect and substance, the decision of the Governor must depend on the opinion of the Election Commission and none else, not even the Council of Ministers. Thus, in effect, the opinion of the Election Commission is decisive since the final order would be based solely on that opinion.[39] No Court has jurisdiction to interfere with this matter as it lies exclusively within the purview of the Governor and the Election Commission.[40]

The position is similar to that in case of Parliament. Therefore, whatever comments have been made earlier under Art. 103 are relevant to Art. 192.[41]

It may be noted that the above provision becomes applicable when a sitting member of the legislature becomes subject to a disqualification after his election.

If, however, a disqualified person is elected as a member of the State Legislative Assembly, his election can be challenged through an election petition in the High Court.[42] When a person is not qualified to be elected a member, there is no doubt that the election tribunal has got to declare his election to be void.

If a member becomes subject to a disqualification after election, then the procedure laid down in Art. 192 needs to be followed. But what happens when a person lacking in the basic and fundamental qualification, prescribed by the Constitution for membership of the State Legislative Assembly, is elected to the House and no election petition is moved against him challenging his election. The person in question knows that he is disqualified and yet he sits in the House and votes as a member. Under Art. 193, he is subject to a penalty of Rs. 500 per day for knowingly sitting in the House while being disqualified.[43] But the Constitution has prescribed no machinery to recover the penalty from him. In these circumstances, the Supreme Court has ruled that the High Court can, under Art. 226, declare that the concerned member is not entitled to sit in the House and restrain him from functioning as a member thereof.[44]

(iv) ANTI-DEFECTION LAW

Reference may be made to the discussion on Anti-Defection Law in Ch. II which applies not only to the membership of a House of Parliament but also to the membership of a House of State Legislature.[45]

The fact remains that the problem of defection has been much more rampant in the States leading to government instability. For example, the Committee of Governors, reporting in 1971, pointed out that in the States, defection became very widespread after the elections of 1967. From March 1967 to August 1970, there were 1240 defections in the States, and most of these defections took place because of the promise of reward of office, or were engineered by other "means

---

39. Also see, Brundaban v. Election Comm., AIR 1965 SC 1892 : 1965 (3) SCR 53; Election Commission of India v. N.G. Ranga, AIR 1978 SC 1609 : (1978) 4 SCC 181.
40. R. Sivasankara Mehra v. Election Commission, AIR 1968 Mad. 234.
41. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. D(d).
42. See, infra, Ch. XIX, Sec. D.
43. See, infra.
44. K. Venkatachalam v. A. Swamickan, AIR 1999 SC 1723 : (1999) 4 SCC 526.
On Writs and Election Matters, see, infra, Ch. XIX.
On Art. 226, see, Ch. VIII, Secs. D and E. infra.
45. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. F.

not too honourable". Many governments fell because of defections which denote selfish, unprincipled political manoeuvring on the part of the defectors. Ultimately, the Anti-Defection Law was passed to discourage defections both at the National as well as the State level.

But, as already stated, this law has not proved very effective in checking defections at the State level. The present law suffers from several weaknesses, e.g., its provisions regarding splits and mergers of the parties are defective because while individual defection is punished under it, collective defection is condoned in the name of split in the party; there is no provision in the law to cover the situation when a political party expels its member or members; Speakers in State Legislatures who have power to decide the question of defection usually play a partisan, rather than a neutral or an objective, role as the decision-maker under the law.[46]

Two members set up by AIADMK were elected to the TN Legislative Assembly in 1991. They were later expelled by the party and they, thus, became "unattached members" of the Assembly. They then joined another party, viz., MDMK. The Speaker declared these members as having incurred the disqualification under Schedule X and they thus ceased to be members of the House.

The members challenged the Speaker's decision but the Supreme Court rejected their contention. The Court held that if a person belonging to a political party which had set him up as a candidate gets elected to the House, and thereafter joins another political party for whatever reasons, either because of his expulsion from the party, or otherwise, he is deemed to have voluntarily given up his membership of the political party and he, thus, incurs the disqualification.

This would be so even if the candidate voluntarily leaves the party which supported his candidature for election and contests the election as an independent candidate.[47]

The term "unattached member" has no relevance or significance for purposes of Schedule X. An elected member continues to belong to that party by which he was set up as a candidate for election as such. This is so notwithstanding that he was thrown out or expelled from that party.[48] This proposition prevents the expelled member from escaping the rigour of the Anti-defection law.

When a person who has been thrown out or expelled from the party which set him up as a candidate and got elected, joins another party, it certainly amounts to his voluntarily giving up the membership of his original party.

(v) OTHER INCIDENTS OF MEMBERSHIP

(a) SIMULTANEOUS MEMBERSHIP

No one can be a member of both Houses of a State Legislature simultaneously. The State Legislature is authorised to enact a law to provide for the vaca-

---

46. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. F.

47. Mahachandra Prasad Singh (Dr.) v. Chairman, Bihar Legislative Council, (2004) 8 SCC 747 : (2004) 8 SCALE 549.

48. G. Viswanathan v. Speaker, T.N., Legislative Assembly, AIR 1996 SC 1060 : (1996) 2 SCC 353.
Also, W.N. Singh v. Speaker, Manipur Legislative Assembly, AIR 2002 Gau 58.

tion by a person, who is chosen a member of both Houses, of his seat in one of the Houses [Art. 190(1)].

No person can be a member of the Legislatures of two or more States simultaneously. If a person is so chosen, then, at the expiration of such period as may be specified in the rules made by the President, his seat in all the State Legislatures becomes vacant, unless he has previously resigned his seat in all but one of the Legislatures [Art. 190(2)].[49] This does not prevent persons who are Members of the Rajya Sabha from being elected to the State Legislative Assembly provided they are elected to the State Assembly within a period of six months of their election.[50]

No person can be a member of a State Legislature and of a House of Parliament simultaneously [Art. 101(2)].[51]

(b) TERMINATION OF MEMBERSHIP

A member of the Legislative Council may resign his seat by writing to the Chairman; and that of the Legislative Assembly by writing to the Speaker [Art. 190(3)(b)].

Before the Constitution (Thirty-third) Amendment Act, 1974, was enacted,[52] when a member tendered his resignation, the Speaker/Chairman had no option, and the member's seat fell vacant automatically.[53] But by XXXIII amendment, the position has been changed. The seat now falls vacant when the resignation is accepted by the Speaker/Chairman, and he cannot accept it, if from the information received or otherwise, and after making such inquiry as he thinks fit, the Speaker/ Chairman is satisfied that the resignation is not voluntary or genuine. Thus, if a member resigns under any pressure or duress, the resignation is not effective.

A House may declare a member's seat vacant if he absents himself from all its meetings for a period of sixty days, without the permission of the House. In computing this period of sixty days, no account is taken of any period during which the House is prorogued or adjourned for more than four consecutive days [Art. 190(4)].

A member vacates his seat in a House if he becomes subject to any disqualification [Art. 190(3)(a)]. This is a mandatory provision.[54]

(c) TAKING OF OATH

Before a member takes his seat in the House, he has to make and subscribe, before the Governor or some person appointed by him for this purpose, an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form [Art. 188].[55]

---

49. Cl. 3 of the Prohibition of Simultaneous Membership Rules, 1950, prescribes a time-limit of 10 days from the publication of the last of the results for this purpose; supra, Ch. II, Sec. E(a).
50. *Ashok Pandey v. K. Mayawati, (*2007) 10 SCC 16, at page 17 : AIR 2007 SC 2259.
51. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. E(a).
52. For this Amendment, See, infra, Ch. XLII.
53. Surat Singh Yadava v. Sudama Pd., AIR 1965 All 535.
54. See, under Art. 192, supra.
55. Supra; Gour Chandra v. Public Prosecutor, AIR 1963 SC 1198 : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 447.

The oath emphasizes that the member shall bear faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India as by law established and that he will uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India and further that he will faithfully discharge the duty as a member of the Assembly/Council as the case may be.

It is compulsory for a member to take an oath or make an affirmation. Without doing so, he cannot function as a member of the House.[56]

A candidate for election to Lok Sabha [Art. 84(a)] and for a State Assembly [Art. 173(a)] has to make and subscribe an oath or affirmation. Similarly, a member of any of these Houses, has to make and subscribe an oath or affirmation before taking his seat in the House [Arts. 99 and 188]. The Delhi High Court has refused to infer or imply from the words "make and subscribe" an oath or affirmation any educational qualification for membership of a House. The court has rejected the argument that these Articles must be read in a manner that persons who are unable to comprehend the requirement of making and subscribing the oath or affirmation are ineligible to become members of a House. The court negatived the argument.[57]

(d) PENALTY

A person becomes liable to a penalty of five hundred rupees for each day he sits or votes as a member of the State Legislature: (i) without taking the prescribed oath; or (ii) when he knows that he is not qualified, or is disqualified, to be a member of the House; or (iii) when he knows that he is prohibited from sitting or voting as a member by any law made by Parliament or the State Legislature.

The penalty so incurred by the person may be recovered as a debt due to the State [Art. 193].

(e) SALARIES FOR MEMBERS

Members of a State Legislature are entitled to receive such salaries and allowances as may from time to time be determined by the State Legislature by law [Art. 195].

C. MEETING OF STATE LEGISLATURE

(a) SUMMONING

The Supreme Court in Rameshwar Prasad (VI) v. Union of India[58] held that the constitution of any Assembly can only be under Section 73 of the Representation of People Act, 1951. Construing Article 188 of the Constitution it was held that the Assembly comes into existence even before its first sitting commences and is deemed to be duly constituted on issue of notification under Section 73 of the Representation of People Act, 1951.

Normally, the Government is formed by the party commanding the required majority in a State. However the issue has become more complex with the number of political parties in the fray. If a political party with the support of other political parties or other MLAs stakes claim to form a Government and satisfies the Governor about its majority to form a stable Government, the Governor cannot refuse formation of the Government and override the majority claim because of his subjective assessment that the majority was cobbled together by illegal and unethical means.[59]

56. K. Anbazhagan v. Secretary, T.N. Legislative Assembly, infra.
57. Baljeet Singh v. Election Commission of India, AIR 2001 Delhi 1.
58. (2006) 2 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 980.

The Governor summons a House to meet at such time and place as he thinks fit. It is now a well settled convention that the Governor summons the House not of his own accord but only when advised to do so by the Council of Ministers.[60]

It is the Council of Ministers which provides business for a session of the Legislature, and, therefore, it follows that for the Governor to act otherwise than in accordance with such advice in the matter of summoning a House of Legislature would be without purpose.

Six months should not intervene between the last sitting in one session of the House and the date for its first meeting in the next session [Art. 174(1)].[61]

(b) GOVERNOR'S ADDRESS

At the commencement of the first session of the Legislative Assembly after each general election, and each year thereafter, the Governor is required to address the Legislative Assembly, or both Houses assembled together if a State has two Houses, and inform the Legislature of the causes of its summons [Art. 176(1)].[62]

Like the President's address to Parliament, the Governor's address to the State Legislature also is prepared by the Cabinet.[63] Each House is obligated to provide in its rules of procedure for allotment of time for discussing the Governor's address [Art. 176(2)].[64]

Besides, the Governor is also authorised to address any House, or both Houses assembled together, any time and to require the attendance of the members for that purpose [Art. 175(1)].[65]

The constitutional provision, mentioned above, regarding the Governor's address to the first session of the Legislature has been held to be mandatory. Without the completion of this formality, the Legislature cannot be said to have legally met. The courts have emphasized that the Governor's speech is not an idle formality as its purpose is to announce the executive policies and the legislative programme and, therefore, it serves as a springboard for discussions in the Legislature, either for approval or disapproval of administrative policies.

The inaugural session of the Assembly is held to have begun from the day the Governor addresses it. But if the Governor comes to the Legislature and is not able to complete his speech because of disturbances within the House, and the speech is laid on the Table of the House and the Governor walks out of the House, or where the Governor, instead of reading the entire speech, reads some portions of it from the beginning and some from the end, and the House takes the

---

59. Ibid at page 130.
60. For discussion on "Council of Ministers" in a State, see, Ch. VII, infra.
61. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(a).
62. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(E).
63. Ibid.
64. Also See, Karpoori Thakur v. Abdul Ghafoor, AIR 1975 Pat 1.
65. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(b).

speech as read,[66] then the Governor having made due attempt to perform the duty cast on him, his failure to complete the speech only amounts to a procedural irregularity which is curable under Art. 212.[67]

The Constitution makes no provision to meet the contingency arising out of a Governor's unavoidable absence due to illness on the occasion of opening the Legislature. In such a situation, in 1967, the Speaker of the Andhra Pradesh Assembly read the Governor's address. The Speaker ruled that in situations for which the Constitution or the rules make no provision, it is necessary to create conventions, use discretion and wisdom as to what should be done. Simply because the address was read by the Speaker it did not cease to be the Governor's address.[68]

Apart from his right to address the Houses, the Governor also enjoys the right to send messages to any House. The House to which such a message is sent has to consider, with all convenient despatch, any matter required by the message to be taken into consideration [Art. 175(2)].

How the Governor's power to send messages to the House can be used is illustrated in K.A. Mathialagan v. P. Srinivasan.[69] The Governor convened the Assembly and in a message prescribed the agenda for the first meeting of the Assembly. This was, of course, done on the advice of the Ministry. The Speaker however permitted a censure motion to be moved against the Ministry. This was not an item within the periphery of the message sent by the Governor and so normally could not be taken up for discussion.

The Madras High Court held that the message of the Governor was a directive and a mandate as to the subjects to be discussed in the Assembly session, and it was "the primordial duty of the Speaker as the holder of office under the Constitution to obey such a mandate and act in accordance with the itemised agenda therein." He ought not to have allowed the no confidence motion against the Ministry to be moved at that stage before he began transacting the business as set out in the Governor's message.

(c) PROROGATION

The Governor may prorogue a House at any time [Art. 174(2)(a)].[70] The Governor exercises this power on the advice of the Council of Ministers.

State of Punjab v. Sat Pal Dang[71] is an extremely interesting case on the point.[72] On the eve of the adoption of the State Budget and passing of the Appropriation Bill, the Speaker adjourned the House for two months on the plea that there was disorder in the House. It was however suspected that the Speaker had done this to thwart a move to pass a vote of no-confidence against him. The adjournment led to a crisis because in the absence of the appropriations being made by the Legislature, the State Government could not withdraw any money from

---

66. Syed Abdul v. State of West Bengal Leg. Ass., AIR 1966 Cal. 363; Yogendra Nath v. State, AIR 1967 Raj 123.
67. Also, infra, Sec. H(d).
68. Jl. of Parl. Inf., 69 (1967).
69. AIR 1973 Mad. 371.
70. For effects of prorogation, See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(a).
71. AIR 1969 SC 903 : (1969) 1 SCR 478.
72. AIR 1969 SC 903 : 1969 (1) SCR 478.

the Consolidated Fund of the State, and there was thus a danger of the government machinery coming to a standstill. To set matters right, the Governor had to intervene. He prorogued the House and summoned it to meet a week later.

The action of the Governor in proroguing and summoning the House was challenged but the Supreme Court upheld the same. The Court pointed out that "Article 174(2)(a) which enables the Governor to prorogue the legislature does not indicate any restrictions on this power". The power is "untrammelled" by the Constitution, and that the Governor had exercised his power to get rid of the Speaker's adjournment order and to put back the constitutional machinery of the State into life. Governor's action was perfectly understandable as an emergency had arisen. There was no abuse of power by him and no mala fides on his part.

Implicit, however, in this remark of the Court is the suggestion that the Governor does not enjoy an absolute discretion to prorogue the House and there may be circumstances when prorogation may be questioned on the ground of want of good faith and abuse by him of his constitutional powers.

The Supreme Court refused to endorse the Madras High Court's observation in an earlier case[73] that the Governor can prorogue the Legislature at any time he pleases and there is nothing wrong in his proroguing the House with a view to issuing an ordinance. However, from a practical point of view, it will be difficult in a situation to prove want of bona fides on the part of the Governor for, as stated above, he acts in this matter on ministerial advice.[74]

In Mathialagan,[75] the Speaker adjourned the Assembly for three weeks but, in the meantime, the Governor prorogued the Assembly. The Speaker filed a writ petition in the Madras High Court challenging the Governor's order. Rejecting the petition, the court ruled that in proroguing the Assembly, the Governor is bound to act on the aid and advice tendered by the Chief Minister. Further, the court ruled that, in all the circumstances, the Governor, "far from being actuated by mala fides or lack of bona fides, prorogued the Assembly bona fide and duly, in order to get rid of such an adjournment". According to the Constitution, "the Governor is bound on the matter of prorogation by the advice of the Chief Minister."[76]

(d) MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

The quorum of a House has been fixed at 10 members, or 1/10th of its total number of members, whichever is greater. The State Legislature may make a law to change this rule. When there is no quorum in the course of a meeting, the presiding officer should either adjourn the House, or suspend its meeting until there is a quorum.[77]

Generally, matters are decided in a House by a majority of votes of the members present and voting at a sitting. The Speaker or the member presiding does not vote in the first instance, but has a casting vote in case of equality of votes

---

73. In re Veerabhadrayya, AIR 1950 Mad 243.
74. See, Bijayananda v. President of India, AIR 1974 Ori. 52; infra, under "Speaker", Sec. D.
75. K.A. Mathialagan v. Governor, AIR 1973 Mad. 198.
76. Ibid., at 220.
77. Arts. 189(3) & 189(4); also supra, Ch. II, Sec. G(d).

[Art. 189(1)].[78] However, a special, instead of the simple, majority is needed to decide a few matters, e.g., removal of the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker of the Assembly,[79] or the Chairman or the Deputy Chairman of the Council.[80]

A House is entitled to function in spite of any vacancy in its membership [Art. 189(2)]. Any proceedings in a House will be valid notwithstanding that a person not qualified or entitled to do so, sat or voted or otherwise participated in its proceedings [Art. 189(2)].

Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, a House is empowered to make rules for regulating its procedure and conduct of its business [Art. 208(1)].[81] Thus, a House has been given power to make rules to regulate its proceedings. But this power is subject to the Constitution. This means that a House cannot make any rule for regulating its procedure and for conduct of its business which may be inconsistent with the Constitution.

In a State having a bicameral Legislature, the Governor, after consulting the Speaker of the Assembly and the Chairman of the Legislative Council, may make rules regarding the procedure to be followed for communication between the two Houses [Art. 208(3)].

The business of a State Legislature is to be transacted in the official language or languages of the State, or in Hindi, or in English. With the permission of the presiding officer, a member, who cannot adequately express himself in any of these languages, may address the House in his mother-tongue [Art. 210(1)].

It has been provided in the Constitution that after 15 years of the commencement of the Constitution, English would drop out unless the State Legislature otherwise provides by law [Art. 210(2)]. For the States of Himachal Pradesh, Manipur, Meghalaya and Tripura, this time-limit has been fixed at 25 years. For the States of Arunachal Pradesh, Goa and Mizoram, this time limit has been fixed at forty years.[82]

Every Minister as well as the Advocate-General[83] has a right to speak in, and otherwise participate in the proceedings of, the Legislature, or any of its committees of which he may be named a member. He shall not, however, be entitled to vote under this provision [Art. 177].

D. OFFICERS OF STATE LEGISLATURE

(a) SPEAKER/DEPUTY SPEAKER

The position of the Speaker/Deputy Speaker vis-a-vis the State Legislative Assembly is similar to that of the Speaker/Deputy Speaker of the Lok Sabha.[84] As

---

78. History was made in the Kerala Legislature on February 9, 1982, when the Speaker used his casting vote 7 times in one day in favour of the Government—6 times to defeat opposition amendments to the motion of thanks to the Governor's address and once to get the motion passed by the House.
79. See below, Sec. D.
80. Ibid.
81. Also, supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(i)(c).
82. Also see, Ch. XVI, infra.
83. See, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. E.
84. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. H.

regards the office of the Speaker, the Madras High Court has observed as follows:[85]

> "The office of Speaker being obviously an office resulting from election or choice, the person so chosen holds the office during the pleasure of the majority. As a Speaker is expected to be a friend of every member and be circumspect in all respects, it is an office of reverence as total impartiality is the basic requisite of the office. The Speaker is undoubtedly a servant of the House, not its Master and the authority transmitted to him by the House is the authority of the House itself which he exercises in accordance with the mandates, interests and well being of the House....."

A State Legislative Assembly has a Speaker and a Deputy Speaker. Both are chosen by the House from amongst its members [Art. 178].

The Deputy Speaker performs the duties of the office of the Speaker when it is vacant. If, however, the office of the Deputy Speaker is also vacant at the time, the Speaker's duties are performed by a member of the House whom the Governor may appoint for the purpose till any of the offices is filled by election [Art. 180(1)].

The Deputy Speaker also acts as the Speaker when he is absent from the House. When both the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker are absent from the House, such person as may be determined by the rules of procedure of the House, and in the absence of such person, such other person as may be determined by the House, acts as the Speaker [Art. 180(2)].

The Speaker/ Deputy Speaker vacates his office as soon as he ceases to be a member of the House [Art. 179(a)]. If the House is dissolved, the Speaker does not vacate his office until immediately before the first meeting of the House after dissolution [Proviso to Art. 179]. The Speaker/Deputy Speaker may resign his office by writing to each other [Art. 179(b)].

The Speaker/Deputy Speaker may be removed from office by a resolution of the House passed by a majority of all the then members of the Assembly. Such a resolution can be moved only after at least 14 days' notice has been given of the intention to move it [Art. 179(c)].

When a no-confidence resolution is under consideration in the House against the Speaker/Deputy Speaker, he does not preside at such sitting of the House though he may be present [Art. 181(1)], but he has a right to speak and take part in the proceedings of the Assembly and he can even vote [Art. 181(2)]. Commenting on this constitutional provision, the Madras High Court has observed in Mathialagam:[86]

> "Eo instanti when such a resolution comes up for consideration there is a deemed vacancy under the provision of the Constitution and the Speaker even though he is physically present is said to be constitutionally absent and cannot therefore be the presiding officer of the Assembly from that moment."

The Gauhati High Court has ruled that under Arts. 179(c) and 181(2), noted above, the resolution for removing the Speaker has to be considered by the House and the Speaker has no power to reject such a motion. If the Speaker so desires,

---

85. K.A. Mathialagam v. P. Srinivasan, AIR 1973 Mad 371, 376.
86. Ibid, at 382.

he has the opportunity to defend himself in the House against the allegations made against him.[87]

The power to consider or reject such a motion vests in the Assembly and not the Speaker. The members of the Assembly have a constitutional right to move a motion for the removal of the Speaker of the Assembly from his office. By rejecting the motion, the Speaker exceeded his powers under the Constitution and violated the right of the members of the Assembly.

The Speaker/Deputy Speaker receives such salaries and allowances as may be fixed by the Legislature by law, and pending that, as specified in the Second Schedule to the Constitution [Art. 186]. The salaries etc. are not subject to the annual vote of the Legislature but are charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State [Art. 202(3)(b)][88].

The office of the Speaker is of great honour. He presides over the sittings of the House and represents the dignity of the House. The following provisions in the Constitution promote the independence and impartiality of the Speaker:

(1) Speaker's salary and allowances are charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State [Art. 202(3)(b)].[89]

(2) Speaker does not vote in the first instance whenever there is voting in the House. He only exercises a casting vote in the case of an equality of votes [Art. 189(1)].[90]

(3) He can be removed from office only by a resolution of the House passed by a special majority in the House [Art. 179(c)].[91]

At times, the Speaker's office in the States has become the focal point of controversy, because often the Speaker plays, not an impartial, but a partisan, role. This is illustrated by the following several episodes.

The Governor of Bengal dismissed the U.F. Ministry headed by Mukherjea and installed the Ghosh Ministry.[92] At the first sitting of the Assembly convened thereafter, the Speaker ruled that the new Ministry was unconstitutional. His argument was that the Assembly was the only competent authority to decide whether or not a Ministry can remain in office, only the Assembly can make or unmake the Ministry and that the Governor was only the registering authority. He, therefore, ruled that he could not recognise the new Ministry.

According to the Speaker, dismissal of the Mukherjea Ministry, appointment of the Ghosh Ministry and the summoning of the House on the advice of Chief Minister Ghosh were unconstitutional and invalid as these had been effected behind the back of the House. He adjourned the House sine die without permitting it to express its confidence, or lack of it, in the newly installed Ministry.

Undoubtedly, such a ruling is untenable and goes beyond the Speaker's jurisdiction as it is not for him, but for the House as a whole, to recognise or derognise the Ministry. There does not appear to be any instance in the parliamentary

---

87. Nipamacha Singh v. Secretary, Manipur Leg. Ass., AIR 2002 Gau 7.
88. See, infra, Sec. F(ii), under "Financial Procedure".
89. Ibid.
90. See, footnote 78, supra.
91. See, footnote 86, supra.
92. For details see, infra, Ch. VII.

history when a Speaker has taken upon himself the task of deciding whether a government is legal or not, or which government ought to be in office.

The Ministry neither derives authority from the Speaker nor it is answerable in any way to him. Formally, the Ministry derives its authority from the Governor who appoints it and, effectively, from the House to whom it is collectively responsible. The responsibility of the Ministry to the House can be effected only when the Assembly is allowed to function. It is a travesty of the situation that while, on the one hand, the Speaker insists that the House makes or unmakes the Ministry, on the other hand, he makes it impossible for the House to function and give it an opportunity to express its views on the matter.

The Speaker is an officer of the House; his function is to ensure smooth and orderly working of the House. He has no inherent power of his own under the Constitution and, therefore, he cannot arrogate to himself to do what, under the Constitution, is the function of the House. It is for the House, and not the Speaker, to recognise a Ministry or not. In this case, the Speaker was, in effect, seeking to paralyse the House and thwarting it from functioning.

It is a well accepted rule that the Speaker does not give a ruling upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law. Such questions are meant for decision in the courts and not on the floor of the Legislature.[1] The Speaker gives ruling only on procedural matters. But here he sought to decide a substantive question of constitutional law relating to the Governor's discretionary power[2] and not merely a procedural question. It is also a well established practice that the Speaker does not give a ruling unless the matter is raised on the floor of the House, but the Bengal Speaker gave the ruling suo motu without the matter having been raised by a member on the floor of the House.

To tide over the crisis created by the Speaker's action, the Governor prorogued the House and reconvened it after some time, but the Speaker adjourned the House again on the same plea. A constitutional deadlock was thus created which ultimately led to the imposition of the President's rule in Bengal.[3]

A similar constitutional deadlock was sought to be created by the Speaker in Punjab.[4] On the eve of transaction of financial business, the Speaker adjourned the House for two months and, thus, made it impossible to pass the budget. The Governor then prorogued the House, issued an ordinance banning its adjournment without completing the financial business pending before it, and reconvened the House. When the House met, the Speaker reiterated his earlier ruling, held the ordinance illegal, and sought to adjourn the House again. But the House did not disperse and continued its proceedings under the Deputy Speaker and transacted the financial business.

---

1. MUKHERJEA, PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE, 353.
In contrast to the Bengal Speaker, the Punjab Speaker displayed correct attitude when he ruled on December 6, 1967, in the House that he was not concerned with disputing the action of the Governor in appointing the Chief Minister and stated, "If it is felt that the Governor had misused his discretionary powers, the remedy lies with the President and not with the Speaker".

2. On Governor's Discretionary Powers, See, Ch. VII, Sec. C, infra.

3. Infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.

4. Supra.

When later the validity of the Appropriation Act was challenged, the Supreme Court held the Act to be constitutionally valid.[5] In the course of its judgment, the Court made certain pungent remarks against the behaviour of the Speaker. The Court characterised the Speaker's second attempt to adjourn the House as null and void. The Court held as unfounded the claim that whatever the Speaker's ruling, it must be treated as final. Points of order can only be raised in relation to interpretation and enforcement of procedural matters. His ruling on the validity of the ordinance could not to be regarded as final or binding. An ordinance can be set at naught by a resolution of the House disapproving it as the Constitution provides.[6] The Speaker was not competent to give such a ruling and it was "utterly null and void and of no effect". The Speaker "acted contrary to law and the injunction of the Constitution".

The above episodes bring in sharp focus the position of the Speaker. Being an officer of the House, he should help and not hinder its proper functioning. The Speaker is the servant and not the master of the House. He is only the spokesman of the House but could not arrogate to himself its powers and functions. The Speaker should not act in a manner so as to interfere with the rights either of the Executive or the Legislature. Such actions on the part of the Speakers make them politically controversial, their impartiality and neutrality questionable, and this injures not only the Speaker's office but the whole parliamentary edifice.

The main bone of contention is the scope of the Speaker's power to adjourn the House. In the Bengal and Punjab situations, the Speaker used this power to paralyse the working of the House. It is, therefore, necessary that suitable conventions be evolved to regulate the functioning of the Speakers as the Constitution, not envisaging that a Speaker would ever adopt an activist role and seek to paralyze the House on which he presides, contains only skeleton provisions concerning this office.

A Committee of the Speakers appointed by the Speaker of the Lok Sabha has said that the powers conferred on the Speaker are intended to enable him to function in the interest of the House. He should not so interpret his powers as to act independently of the House, or to override its authority, or nullify its decisions. "The Speaker is a part of the House, drawing his powers from the House for the better functioning of the House and, in the ultimate analysis, servant of the House not its master."[7] The Committee has suggested that the Speaker should not raise any matter on his own and give his decision on it; he should give his ruling only when a point of order has been raised on the floor of the House, and after he has heard the members, if necessary. The Committee has put the matter in the proper perspective.

Nevertheless, such controversies are not at an end even after the above report. The Speaker of the Tamil Nadu Assembly also sought to play an activist role in 1971 which led to his removal. A few members of the ruling D.M.K. Party crossed the floor. The Speaker advised the Chief Minister to resign and hold fresh elections to the House. The Chief Minister claimed that he was in a major-

---

5. State of Punjab v. Satpal Dang, AIR 1969 SC 903 : 1969 (1) SCR 478; supra.
6. See, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c), for discussion on this topic.
7. Reports of the Committee of Presiding Officers presented at the Speakers' Conference, October 6, 1968.

ity. Thereupon the Speaker adjourned the House for a few days to give time to the Chief Minister to consider his suggestion to dissolve the Assembly.

The Madras High Court in K.A. Mathialagan v. The Governor[8] characterised the adjournment as not "a proper or bona fide exercise of the power of adjournment" by the Speaker as the ruling party was in majority in the House and there was a good deal of work to be transacted. The Court rightly emphasized that the question of continued confidence of the people in a ruling party having a majority in the Assembly can be and is normally tested only on the floor of the Assembly itself.

(b) CHAIRMAN OF THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

The presiding officer of a State Legislative Council is known as the Chairman. There is also a Deputy Chairman. These two offices correspond to the offices of the Chairman/Deputy Chairman of the Rajya Sabha.[9]

The Chairman/Deputy Chairman are chosen from amongst the members of the Council [Art. 182], and get such salaries as are fixed by law. The Deputy Chairman performs the duties of the office of the Chairman when that office is vacant [Art. 184(1)]. He acts as Chairman when he is absent from any sitting of the Council [Art. 184(2)].

They vacate their offices when they cease to be members of the House [Art. 183(a)]. Any of them can resign his office by writing to the other [Art. 183(b)]. Each can be removed from his office by a resolution passed by the House by a majority of all its members. Such a resolution can be moved after giving at least 14 days' notice [Art. 183(c)]. In addition to these two conditions laid down in the Constitution, it is open to the House concerned to impose any other condition for moving such resolution. Therefore, it is valid for a House to lay down that such a resolution can be moved only if a certain number of members favour its being moved.[10]

The Chairman/Deputy Chairman does not preside over the sitting of the House when a resolution for his removal is under consideration [Art. 185(1)]. He can however speak and participate in the proceedings of the House and also vote in the first instance [Art. 185(2)].

(c) SECRETARIAT FOR THE LEGISLATURE

A House of the State Legislature has its separate secretarial staff. In a bicameral State, it is possible to have posts common to both Houses [Art. 187(1)]. The State Legislature may by law regulate the terms of recruitment and conditions of service of the Staff [Art. 187(2)]. Pending passage of such a law, the Governor may make rules for the purpose after consulting the Speaker, or the Chairman, as the case may be [Art. 187(3)].

E. DISSOLUTION OF THE HOUSE

The question of dissolution of the Lok Sabha has already been discussed earlier.[11] As regards the dissolution of a State Legislative Assembly, to a great ex-

---

8. AIR 1973 Mad 198.
For a note on "Powers of the Speaker" see, 16, J.I.L.I. 130 (1974).
9. Supra, Ch. II, sec. H(b).
10. A.J. Faridi v. Chairman, U.P. Leg. Council, AIR 1963 All 75, 78.
11. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(c).

tent, the position corresponds with the Lok Sabha, and much of what has been said earlier is relevant here also, but some divergences are also noticeable in the case of the State Assemblies.

Article 174(2)(b) merely says that the Governor may from time to time dissolve the Legislative Assembly. The Supreme Court has ruled that neither the Legislature nor its members have any constitutional right to have it undissolved till the expiry of the term specified in Art. 172(1), i.e., five years from the date it holds its first meeting.[12]

The Constitution is silent as to when, and in what circumstances, the Governor may dissolve the House. This matter is, therefore, to be regulated by conventions which might evolve in course of time.

The following two propositions appear to be well settled in this regard:

(1) The Governor may not dissolve the House suo motu, without ministerial advice to that effect.[13]

(2) The Governor does not automatically accept the advice of his Council of Ministers to dissolve the House. The matter falls within the area of discretion of the Governor.[14]

A Chief Minister having a majority support can get a dissolution of the House as and when he wants, but dissolution in such circumstances is rather uncommon for a Chief Minister in such a happy position would ordinarily want to enjoy his full term, except when he senses some dissatisfaction in his party and wants to have a show down with the dissidents by calling for fresh elections. But dissolution of the House in other situations raises problems, for example, it remains uncertain whether the Governor may dissolve the House on the advice of a Chief Minister who has lost his majority in the House. The position remains uncertain. There have been cases when dissolution has been refused in such a situation.

In 1953, in Travancore-Cochin (now Kerala), the House was dissolved following the defeat of the Congress Ministry. The Ministry remained in office as a caretaker government till fresh elections were held. But this precedent was not followed in 1955. There was a minority P.S.P. Ministry in office. The Congress Party supported it without participating in the Ministry. But when the Congress withdrew its support and the Ministry was defeated in the House, the Chief Minister sought a dissolution of the House but it was refused. The Congress was invited to form the Ministry. The refusal to dissolve the House was criticised by some political groups as being constitutionally improper and wrong. But, some people justified it on the ground that the Assembly had been elected only a year back, and that the outgoing Ministry from its inception was in a minority, having only 18 followers in a House of 118, and that there was a reasonable prospect of an alternative stable Ministry being formed.

Controversy on the question of dissolution became sharpened after 1967. Before 1967, the Congress Party enjoyed a monopoly of power both at the Centre and the States. In such a context, not many difficulties arose in the working of the Constitution as many problems were sorted out at party level. This state of affairs

---

12. State of Punjab v. Satya Pal, AIR 1969 SC 903, 911 : 1969 (1) SCR 478.
13. On this point, see, Ch. VII, Sec. C(c) infra.
14. On Governor's Discretion, see, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. C.

however underwent a sea-change when after the Fourth General Elections, the Congress Party lost its monopoly of power, and multi-party coalition governments were installed in many States. The coalition governments suffered from a lack of internal cohesion, from stresses and strains and instability, because the constituent parties had disparate programmes, policies and outlook.

The process of adjustment in the wake of the break of Congress monopoly of power would have been difficult in any case, but things became more difficult because of the distressing phenomenon of defection, people forswearing allegiance to their party and joining another party with the sole motive of becoming Ministers.[15] This made the State Governments all the more unstable. A question thus arose from time to time whether a Chief Minister, who had a majority to start with as the head of a coalition government, or one party government, but who found himself in a minority by reason of a few of his supporters changing their loyalty, could seek a dissolution of the State Assembly.

A good deal of public discussion has taken place on the question whether a defeated Chief Minister could seek a dissolution. There is a sizable body of opinion that the British conventions are irrelevant to India because of the peculiar phenomenon of defection which is unknown to England, and also because of the multi-party system in India as against a two party system in Britain.

Within a few days of the general elections in 1967, the Congress Ministries in Haryana and Uttar Pradesh lost their majority support because of defections, but both the Chief Ministers resigned without seeking dissolution of the House. After some time, the Congress Ministry in Madhya Pradesh was threatened by defections. The Chief Minister did toy with the idea of seeking dissolution of the House. A good deal of public discussion took place at the time on the question whether a Chief Minister who had lost his majority could seek a dissolution. On the basis of conventions prevailing in Britain, perhaps, the Chief Minister would have got a dissolution. But, as stated above, a sizable body of opinion, particularly the non-Congress parties, regarded the British conventions as irrelevant to India. However, the matter did not crystallise at the time as the Chief Minister resigned without formally asking the Governor to dissolve the House.

In 1967, the ruling alliance, a combination of Jan Sangh and Akali Dal, lost its majority in the Punjab Assembly because of defection of a few Akali members. The Governor refused to accept the advice of the outgoing Chief Minister to dissolve the House, and invited the leader of the defectors to form the government as he claimed that he had been assured support by the Congress and thus had a majority support in the Assembly. The Governor publicly asserted that he was not bound to accept the advice of the outgoing Chief Minister because it was tendered after he had lost majority support in the Assembly, and it was pointless to hold fresh elections and incur enormous expenditure when a stable ministry could be formed.

On the whole, therefore, the position in the State appears to be that the advice of a Chief Minister, who loses his majority, to dissolve the House is not binding on the Governor who would take into account the totality of circumstances and exercise his judgment and discretion and could refuse to dissolve the House if he feels that there is a good prospect for a stable alternative government being formed. It is only when the Governor is satisfied that no other party, or combination of parties, can possibly form a stable government that he would dissolve the House and keep the resigning Ministry in office as a caretaker government till fresh elections are completed. As an alternative, the Governor could recommend President's rule under Art. 356, in which case the Ministry would quit and the Governor would administer the State as the agent of the President,[16] and the legislature could either be dissolved, or kept in suspended animation pending the emergence of a new government. Usually, this is the expedient resorted to whenever a ministry falls, and no alternative ministry appears feasible. All political groups perfer this course of action as none of them wants that a caretaker ministry of one political party should remain in office during the election period.

15. S.C. KASHYAP, THE POLITICS OF DEFECTION (1969).

It is however open to question whether the practice as it has come to be is healthy? Should the Governor not be bound by the advice of the outgoing Chief Minister? Should the expedient of the President's rule be resorted to in such a situation? Dissolution is a democratic way to settle the complexion of the ministry. It may also serve as a disciplining technique for the members of the Legislature who may desist from defection if they know that the House would be dissolved and they would be required to seek re-election if the ministry falls.[17] This may, in the long run, result in governmental stability and the parliamentary system may be the better for it. To set up an alternative ministry by rewarding the defectors with ministerships amounts to putting a premium on defections which may ultimately damage the democratic fabric. On the other hand, there is the question of public apathy towards frequent elections. There is also the question of expenses on holding frequent elections.

Another question worth considering is whether the Chief Minister alone, or the Cabinet, should give advice for dissolution. The question assumes importance in the context of a coalition government comprising many parties. If dissolution is made a matter for the Cabinet to decide then it means that all partners in the government will have to agree for dissolution. This may make dissolution somewhat difficult as all parties in the coalition may not like to face mid-term poll. But if it is for the Chief Minister alone to recommend dissolution, then he may give advice without consulting others.

In Britain, the prerogative to advise dissolution vests in the Prime Minister alone. In India, however, it remains a moot point whether the Governor should accept the Chief Minister's advice without ascertaining the views of other parties in the Cabinet. In 1970, the Kerala Assembly was dissolved on the advice of the Chief Minister alone although he was heading a coalition ministry and he did not consult his other partners. The other parties were taken by surprise and they criticised the dissolution as unjustified. It is a moot point whether this can be taken as a precedent for the future.

The position regarding dissolution of the Assembly at the State level remains uncertain and, so far, it has been more a matter of political expediency. There is, therefore, need for proper conventions to take root in this area. A Committee of the Governors appointed by the President has reported on this question: "If a Chief Minister who enjoys majority support advises dissolution, the Governor must accept the advice, but if he advises dissolution after losing his majority, the

---

16. Infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
17. Supra, under "Anti-defection Law, Sec. B(iv); Ch. II, Sec. F."

Governor need accept the advice only if the Ministry suffers a defeat on question of major policy and the Chief Minister wishes to appeal to the electorate for a mandate on that policy. In the case of a Chief Minister heading a single party government which has been returned by the electorate in absolute majority, if the ruling party loses its majority because of defection by a few members, and the Chief Minister recommends dissolution so as to enable him to make a fresh appeal to the electorate, the Governor may grant a dissolution. The mere fact that a few members of the party have defected does not necessarily prove that the party has lost the confidence of the electorate. If there is a no-confidence motion against a Ministry, and the Chief Minister instead of facing the Assembly, advises the Governor to dissolve the Assembly, the Governor need not accept such advice, but should ask the Chief Minister to get the verdict of the Assembly on the no-confidence motion."[18]

The report maintains that in a multi-party system as it obtains in India, the Governor should weigh all the factors carefully before taking his decision. The position would however greatly improve if the curse of defection could be contained in some way.[19] As already observed,[20] even the Anti-Defection Law which applies to the States as well has failed to curb defections and needs to be strengthened.

On the whole, it may be said that there is reluctance to hold frequent elections as this is an expensive proposition and ordinarily dissolution of the House is refused if it is possible to install an alternative government. In October, 1997, when the Waghela Government in Gujarat lost its majority because of withdrawal of support by the Congress Party, the Governor refused to accept Chief Minister Waghela's advice to dissolve the House. Instead, the Governor gave him one week to prove his majority in the House. Ultimately Waghela resigned and a new government was installed under a new leader from Waghela's party and the Congress Party agreed to support it from outside without participating in the Government.

A contrary situation arose in Goa in 2000. When there was a likelihood of the BJP party losing its majority, the Council of Ministers advised the Governor to dissolve the House which he did. The dissolution was set aside by a learned single judge holding that the Governor was not obliged to accept the advice of the Council of Ministers for the mere asking and should have made an enquiry whether an alternative viable Government could be formed, the reasons for the Council of Ministers seeking dissolution and whether it was really necessary to put a heavy burden on the State Exchequer by holding another election mid-way in the life of the Assembly.[21]

The formal constitutional provisions regarding dissolution of the State Assembly and Lok Sabha are similar in phraseology. An interesting question to consider, therefore, is whether similar conventions should operate at both levels, or whether conventions for dissolution of State Legislatures may differ in some respects from the conventions operating at the Centre in this regard. For several

---

18. Report, (1971), 53-60.
19. See, Anti-Defection Law, supra, Ch. II, Sec. F., Sec. B(iv).
20. Ibid.
21. Jeetendra Deshprabhu v. The Governor of Goa, Raj Bhavan, Goa (Writ Petition Nos. 84 and 88 of 2002 decided on 8-5-2002 in The High Court of Bombay at Goa).

reasons, it may be said that exactly same conventions need not operate at both levels. There are several differences between the position of the Centre and the States, viz.:

(1) While the Governor has, the President does not have, any discretionary power.[22]

(2) Further, while the Governor is a nominee of, and is answerable to, the Central Government, the President is not answerable to any higher authority.

(3) Lastly, while a State can be placed under the President's rule, the Centre cannot be so placed and there a Council of Ministers must always remain in office.[23]

Therefore, it can plausibly be argued that the position of the President differs a great deal from that of the Governor in this respect.[24]

F. FUNCTIONS OF THE STATE LEGISLATURE

The State Legislature performs similar functions for the State as does Parliament for the whole of India. It makes laws, levies taxes, sanctions funds for the public expenditure and criticises and controls the State Executive.

(i) LEGISLATION

A Bill pending in the Legislature does not lapse because of prorogation of the House [Art. 196(3)].[25] When the Assembly is dissolved—

(i) a Bill pending in the Legislative Council, which has not been passed by the Legislative Assembly, does not lapse [Art. 196(4)];

(ii) a Bill pending in the Legislative Assembly, or which having been passed there is pending with the Legislative Council, lapses [Art. 196(5)];

(iii) a Bill passed by the Legislative Council and pending in the Assembly will lapse;

(iv) a Bill passed by the Legislative Assembly, when there is only one House, or passed by both Houses in a bi-cameral Legislature, and pending assent of the Governor or of the President does not lapse.[26]

In the area of Legislation, the procedure followed in a State Legislature is practically similar to that followed in Parliament.[27]

An ordinary Bill, other than a Money or Financial Bill, can originate in either House [Art. 196(1)]. In a bi-cameral Legislature, a Bill is passed only when both Houses agree to it [Art. 196(2)].

---

22. Infra, next Chapter; also see, Ch. III, supra.
23. See, Ch. III, Sec. A(iii), supra.
24. Infra, Chs. VII and XIII.
Also see, M.P. JAIN, Propriety of Dissolution of Lok Sabha, V JI. of. Const. & Parl. Studies, 302 (1971)
25. State of Bihar v. Kameshwar, AIR 1952 SC 252 : 1952 SCR 889.
26. Purushottam Nambudri v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 694.
27. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. G.

If a Bill passed by the Legislative Assembly is rejected by the Legislative Council; or, it does not pass it within three months from the date the Bill is laid before it; or, the Council passes it with certain amendments which the Assembly does not accept, then the Assembly may pass the Bill again, and transmit the same to the Legislative Council. If the Council rejects the Bill again, or does not pass it within one month from the date on which it is laid before it; or, it passes the Bill with amendments not acceptable to the Assembly, then the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses in the form in which it was passed by the Assembly for the second time with such amendments, if any, as have been made or suggested by the Council and have been agreed to by the Assembly [Art. 197(1) and (2)].

The Legislative Council thus acts as a revising chamber and can hold up legislation for a short time but ultimately the will of the Legislative Assembly prevails. The procedure to resolve differences between the two Houses in a State differs from the mechanism of joint session provided for in case of Parliament.[28] The State Legislative Council has thus been given much less importance than Rajya Sabha.

(a) GOVERNOR'S ASSENT

A Bill passed by the Assembly, or by both Houses in case of a bi-cameral Legislature, is presented to the Governor who has several alternatives:

(i) he may give his assent to the Bill; or

(ii) he may withhold his assent therefrom, or

(iii) he may return it to the Legislature for reconsideration, or

(iv) he may reserve it for the consideration of the President.

In case (iii), the Governor may request the Legislature to consider the desirability of introducing such amendments as the Governor might suggest. It is the duty of the Legislature to reconsider the Bill accordingly, and if it is passed again by the House, or both Houses, with or without amendments, and presented to the Governor again for assent, he "shall not withhold assent therefrom" [Art. 200, First Proviso]. This is similar to the provision dealing with Presidential assent to the Bills passed by Parliament.[29]

In accordance with the system of parliamentary democracy, in cases (i), (ii) and (iii), the Governor acts on the advice of his Cabinet[30]; only in case (iv), he acts in his discretion.[31]-[32]

---

28. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(i)(b).
29. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(i)(c).
30. On this point, see, Ch. VII, Sec. B, infra.
31. Ibid.
32. Between 2006 and 2007, several States sought to introduce similar amendments to the Freedom of Religion Act operative in their States. When the Amendment Bills were sent to the respective Governor of these States, they met with dissimilar responses. The Chhattisgarh Governor referred the Bill to the Attorney-General of India for his legal opinion. Similarly the advice of the Solicitor General of India was sought by the Governor of Madhya Pradesh on the Bill. The Governors of Himachal Pradesh and Orissa assented to the Bill without protest. The Governor of Gujarat returned the Bill to the Legislative Assembly for reconsideration. The Government then withdrew the Bill of 2006 in 2008.

The Constitution does not impose any time limit within which the Governor has to make any of the above-mentioned declarations. There is no means to compel the Governor to make a declaration if he keeps a Bill pending before him indefinitely. The scheme of Art. 200 shows that a Bill pending the assent of the Governor does not lapse as a result of the dissolution of the State Assembly.[33]

When the Governor reserves a Bill for Presidential consideration, the enactment of the Bill then depends on the assent or refusal of assent by the President. In case of a reserved Bill, the President may either assent to, or withhold his assent from, the Bill, or may return it back with a message to the Legislature for reconsideration and may even suggest amendments to be made therein. The Bill is then reconsidered within a period of six months from the date of receipt of the message, and if it is again passed by the Houses, or the House, with or without amendments, it is presented again to the President for his consideration [Art. 201].

Nothing is said as to what the President may do thereafter but, presumably, he may follow the same course as explained above. It does not appear that there is any obligation on the President to give his assent to the Bill sent to him after reconsideration. Art. 201 does not prescribe any time-limit within which the President has to come to his decision on a Bill referred to him for assent. The scheme of Art. 201 shows that a Bill reserved by the Governor for Presidential assent does not lapse as a result of the dissolution of the State Assembly. It goes without saying that the term 'President' used in Arts. 200 and 201 stands for the Central Government.

An example of this procedure is provided by the Kerala Agrarian Relations Bill. The Kerala Legislature passed the Bill in 1959, but the Governor reserved it for the President's assent.[34] Meanwhile, the Kerala Legislature was dissolved and fresh elections held. Thereafter, the President sent back the Bill for reconsideration by the Legislature in the light of amendments suggested by him. The Assembly passed the Bill incorporating the suggested modifications and thereafter it received the Presidential assent. This incident shows that a Bill pending assent of the Governor or the President does not lapse by dissolution of the State Legislature. A Bill passed by a Legislature can be reconsidered and amended by the successor Legislature.[35]

The Gujarat Legislature passed the Gujarat Secondary Education Bill In 1973. It was presented to the Governor for his assent. As the Bill provided for temporary take-over of the management of a school in public interest, the Governor reserved the Bill for the assent of the President. The Central Government felt that as the minority institutions were not exempted from the take-over clause, it came in conflict with Art. 30[36] The Central Government accordingly suggested modification of the Bill through an ordinance. The State Government forwarded the draft of the ordinance and the President gave his assent both to the Bill and the ordinance.[37]

---

33. P. Nambudiri v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 694, 701-702 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 753.
34. Supra.
35. P. Nambudiri v. State of Kerala, AIR 1962 SC 694 : 1962 Supp (1) SCR 753.
36. On Art. 30, see, infra, Ch. XXX, Sec. C.
37. See, Bharat Sevashram Sangh v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1987 SC 494 : (1986) 4 SCC 51.

Another model of giving of Presidential assent to a state Bill is furnished by the fact situation in In re The Kerala Education Bill.[38] The Bill had been reserved for Presidential assent by the Governor of Kerala. The President referred the Bill to the Supreme Court for an advisory opinion and then sent the Bill back to the State for necessary amendments in the Bill by the State Legislature in the light of the Supreme Court's opinion.[39]

Article 200 obligates the Governor to reserve a Bill for President's consideration if, in his 'opinion', it so derogates from the powers of the High Court as to endanger the position which that court is designed to fill by the Constitution. Several constitutional provisions require assent of the Centre to State Bills for their validation.

The circumstances in which a Bill may be reserved by the Governor for Presidential assent are discussed later.[40]

The power of the Governor to reserve a Bill for the President's consideration is discretionary. It is the Governor's discretion whether he should reserve the Bill for the consideration of the President. He can do so whenever he feels that the State Bill goes against the larger interests of the State, or the country as a whole. In this way, the Governor acts as a link between the Union and the States and thereby the Centre is able to keep some control over the functioning of the State Legislatures.[41]

Only a Bill passed by the State Legislature can be reserved for the President's consideration. The Governor cannot give his assent to a Bill passed by the Legislature and then reserve it for President's assent.[42] Similarly, on receiving the President's assent, the Bill becomes law and the Governor's assent is no longer required.[43] The Supreme Court has declared that "the assent of the President is not justiciable".[44]

(ii) FINANCIAL PROCEDURE

The scheme of Legislative control of finance in a State is a close replica of the system prevalent at the Centre.[45]

Under Art. 265, no tax can be levied except by authority of law. No appropriations can be made except by law passed in the prescribed manner. No money is granted, no tax is increased, and no Money or Financial Bill, or an amendment thereto, can be introduced or moved in the Legislature, except on the recommendation of the Governor [Art. 207(1)]. Governor's recommendation is not needed for moving an amendment for reducing or abolishing a tax. Because of Art. 255,

---

38. AIR 1958 SC 996; supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F.
39. Also see, infra, Ch. X, Sec. J.
40. See, Ch. VIII; Ch. X, Sec. K., infra. Also see, supra, Sec. F(i); infra, Ch. XXXII.
41. For discussion on the Governor's discretionary powers, see, infra, Ch. VII, Sec. C.
42. Salubai v. Chandu, AIR 1966 Bom. 194.
43. State of Bihar v. Kameshwar, AIR 1952 SC 252 : 1952 SCR 889.
44. Hoechst Pharmaceuticals Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1983 SC 1019 : (1983) 4 SCC 45; Bharat Sevashram Sangh v. State of Gujarat, supra, footnote 37.
45. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii).

if the Bill is passed without the Governor's recommendation, the defect is cured when the Governor later gives his assent to the Bill.[46]

In a uni-cameral Legislature, passage of a Money Bill does not present much difficulty. In a bi-cameral Legislature, the Legislative Assembly prevails over the Legislative Council in financial matters, e.g., Money Bill is introduced in the Assembly and not in the Legislative Council [Arts. 198(1) and 207(1)].

After the Money Bill is passed by the Assembly, it is sent to the Council for its consideration and recommendations. It has 14 days to do so from the date it receives the Bill. The Assembly is authorised to accept or reject these recommendations [Art. 198(2)]. If the Assembly accepts any recommendation, the Money Bill is deemed to have been passed in the modified form [Art. 198(3)]. If it rejects all recommendations [Art. 198(4)], or, if the Council fails to return the Bills to the Assembly within 14 days [Art. 198(5)], the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses in the form in which it was originally passed by the Assembly.

(a) MONEY BILL

A Money Bill is one which contains only provisions dealing with the following matters;

(a) the imposition, abolition, remission, alteration or regulation of any tax;

(b) the regulation of the borrowing of money or the giving of any guarantee by the State, or the amendment of the law with respect to any obligations undertaken by the State;

(c) the custody of the Consolidated Fund or the Contingency Fund, and payment of money into, or withdrawal from, these Funds;

(d) the appropriation of money out of the Consolidated Fund of the State;

(e) charging of any expenditure on the Consolidated Fund, or increasing the amount of any charged expenditure;

(f) the receipt of money on account of the Consolidated Fund, or the Public Account of the State, or the custody, or issue of such money; or

(g) any matter incidental to any of the above matters [Art. 199(1)].[47]

A Bill or amendment is not regarded as a Money Bill by reason only that it provides for the imposition of fines or other pecuniary penalties, or for payment of fees for licences or service rendered or deals with taxation by a local authority [Arts. 199(2) and 207(2)]. This clause makes it clear that a Bill imposing a 'fee' and not a 'tax' is a financial Bill and not a Money Bill.[48] The difference between a 'fee' and a 'tax' is discussed later.[49]

A Money Bill is not introduced in the Assembly without the Governor's recommendation [Art. 207(1)]. The decision of the Speaker on the question whether a particular Bill is a Money Bill or not is final [Art. 199(3)]. A certificate from 46. Balai Chand v. K.K. Chakrawarti, AIR 1966 Cal. 81.

47. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(c).
48. Kewal v. State of Punjab, AIR 1980 SC 1008 : (1980) 1 SCC 416.
49. See, infra, Ch. XI, Sec. H.

the Speaker is endorsed on a Money Bill to the effect that it is a Money Bill when it is transmitted to the Legislative Council and when it is presented to the Governor for assent [Art. 199(4)].

(b) SPEAKER'S CERTIFICATE

The Supreme Court has held in State of Punjab v. Sat Pal Dang[50] that the requirement of the Speaker's certificate on the Money Bill [Art. 199(4)] is directory and not mandatory, and, in the absence of the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker could grant the certificate.

In the instant case, the validity of the Appropriation Act was challenged on the ground inter alia that it bore the certificate from the Deputy Speaker and not the Speaker. The Court however held that in the absence of the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker validly acts as the Speaker of the Assembly;[51] that the constitutional provision regarding the Speaker's certificate is only directory and not mandatory and so the validity of the proceedings in the House could not be called into question as it was merely an irregularity of procedure.[52]

In the absence of the Speaker's certificate on a Money Bill, there appears to be no constitutional difficulty in treating it as an ordinary Bill and passing it through the Legislative Council accordingly. The Speaker's certificate entitles the Bill to receive a treatment different from what it would otherwise receive as an ordinary Bill in the Legislative Council and at the Governor's hands.

A Financial Bill, i.e., a Money Bill with something else added to it, can originate in the Legislative Assembly only. It is, however, to be passed like an ordinary Bill. A Money Bill, or a Financial Bill, or, an amendment thereto, except an amendment for reducing or abolishing a tax, cannot be moved or introduced without the Governor's recommendation [Art. 207].

(c) GOVERNOR'S ASSENT

Like an ordinary Bill, a Money Bill also needs Governor's assent to become a law. The position in this connection is the same as in case of an ordinary Bill, except that the Governor cannot refer back a Money Bill for reconsideration by the Legislature. He either assents, or refuses to assent, or reserves it for Presidential assent. Similarly, the President cannot refer it back for reconsideration by the Legislature. He either gives or refuses to give his assent to the Money Bill. A Financial Bill stands on the same level as an ordinary Bill in this respect [Arts. 200 and 201].

(iii) LEGISLATIVE CONTROL ON APPROPRIATIONS

(a) CONSOLIDATED FUND

Just as at the Centre, so in a State, legislative control on appropriations is secured through the Consolidated Fund.[53]

---

50. AIR 1969 SC 903 : 1969 (1) SCR 478; supra.
51. Supra, Sec. D.
52. Infra, Sec. H(d).
53. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii).

Money can be withdrawn from this Fund only under appropriations made by law, passed in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Constitution for this purpose [Arts. 204(3) and 266(3)].

The Consolidated Fund is formed of all revenue received and all loans raised by the State Government; all money received by the State Government in repayment of loans [Art. 266(1)], and any fees or other money taken by the High Court [Art. 229(3)]. The State Legislature may regulate by law all matters relating to the Fund [Art. 283(2)].

(b) PUBLIC ACCOUNT

All moneys, other than those placed in the Consolidated Fund, received by the State Government [Art. 266(2)], or an officer employed in connection with the affairs of the State, or by any court, are credited to the Public Account of the State [Art. 284].

(c) CONTINGENCY FUND

The State Legislature can also create a Contingency Fund by passing a law to that effect [Art. 267(2)].

(d) EXPENDITURE CHARGED ON CONSOLIDATED FUND

The following items of expenditure are charged on the Consolidated Fund [Art. 202(3)]:

(1) the emoluments and allowances of the Governor and other expenditure relating to his office;
(2) the salaries and allowances of the Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the Assembly, and those of the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman of the Council;
(3) debt charges for which the State Government is responsible;
(4) salaries and allowances of the High Court Judges;
(5) sums needed to satisfy any judgment, decree or award of any Court or arbitral tribunal;
(6) any other expenditure declared by the Constitution or the State Legislature by law to be so charged.

In the last category fall the following:

(a) the administrative expenses of the High Court, including all salaries, allowances and pensions payable to its officers and servants [Art. 229(2)];[54]

(b) expenses of the State Public Service Commission, including salaries, allowances and pensions payable to its members or staff [Art. 322].[55]

(e) ANNUAL APPROPRIATIONS

The stages and procedure in respect of annual appropriations for a State are similar to those laid down for Parliament.[56]

---

54. Infra, Ch. VIII.
55. Infra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. K.
56. For details see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii).

The first stage is the presentation of the Budget by the Executive [Art. 202(2)]. Next, demands for grants are submitted to the Assembly for approval. The estimates of expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund are open to discussion in the Legislature, but are not subject to vote [Art, 203(1)]. The House has power to assent, or to refuse to assent, or reduce any demand for grant [Art. 203(2)]. No demand for grant can be made except on the Governor's recommendation' {Art. 203(3)], which, in effect, means that only a Minister may move a demand for grant in the Assembly. Members may move cut motions. Demands are also discussed but not voted upon, in the Legislative Council.

After approval of the grants by the Assembly, a Bill is introduced to provide for the appropriation out of the Consolidated Fund of all money required to meet the grants, and the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund [Art. 204(1)]. The appropriations contained in the Bill cannot exceed the amount shown in the Budget. No amendment can be proposed to this Bill so as to vary the amount or alter the destination of any grant previously agreed to by the Assembly or to vary the amount of any expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund. The decision of the person presiding as to whether an amendment is admissible or not under this clause is final [Art. 204(2)].

In a State with a bi-cameral Legislature, the Appropriation Bill goes before both Houses. Being a Money Bill, however, the power of the Legislative Council to deal with it is restricted.

No tax can be levied or collected without due authority of the Legislature expressed in the form of an Act. Supplementary, additional or excess grants, votes on account, votes of credit and exceptional grants can be made by a State Legislature in the same way as by Parliament [Arts. 205 and 206].[57]

Any Bill which, on being brought into operation after enactment, involves an expenditure from the State's Consolidated Fund, is not to be passed by a House without the Governor recommending to the House the consideration of the Bill [Art. 207(3)]. This gives to the Council of Ministers control over expenditure.

A State Legislature may, for timely completion of financial business, regulate by law the procedure of the House or Houses of Legislature in relation to any financial matter [Art. 209]. The purpose of this provision is to speed financial business in the legislature so that any attempts to delay such business may be avoided. An ordinance prohibiting adjournment of a House, except on a motion passed by a majority in the House, until the completion of financial business has been held to be valid. The ordinance was necessary to undo the power of the Speaker to adjourn the House on the eve of the consideration of financial business and thus throwing the governmental machinery into confusion.[58]

(f) COMPTROLLER AND AUDITOR-GENERAL

Lastly, the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India exercises the same functions with respect to financial matters in a State as he does with respect to the Centre.[59]

---

57. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(b).
58. State of Punjab v. Satpal Dang, supra.
59. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii)(s).

The accounts of the State are to be kept in such form, as he may prescribe, with the Presidential approval. He submits the audit reports in relation to the State accounts to the Governor who then causes these reports to be laid before the State Legislature [Art. 151(2)].[60]

(iv) DELIBERATION AND DISCUSSION

Like Parliament, the State Legislature also performs the function of discussing and debating public issues, controlling State Government, and shaping and moulding its polices.

Some of these occasions are provided by the Constitution itself, as for example, discussion on the Governor's address [Art. 176],[61] Budget and Demands for Grants through the mechanism of cut-motions [Art. 203].[62] Apart from these, the rules of procedure of the Houses provide for interpellations, adjournment, motions, resolutions etc., much on the same pattern as in Parliament.[63]

G. RELATION BETWEEN THE TWO HOUSES INTER SE

(a) NON-MONEY BILLS

This problem arises in a State having bi-cameral Legislature.

In the area of ordinary legislation, the two Houses have co-extensive power; a non-Money Bill may originate in either House and it becomes law only when both Houses pass it in the same form. In case of an inter-House deadlock, the Legislative Assembly ultimately prevails.[64] The Legislative Council cannot do more than hold up the passage of a Bill for some time.

The procedure to resolve differences between the two Houses in a State differs from the mechanism of joint session provided for in case of Parliament.[65] The State Legislative Council has thus been given much less importance than the Rajya Sabha.[66]

The pattern of relationship between the two Houses in a State in non-money matters is designed on the same lines as in Britain, with this difference, however, that whereas in Britain it needs at least a year for the House of Commons to by-pass the House of Lords, no such minimum time-limit has been fixed in case of a State. After the Legislative Council disagrees with the Assembly regarding a particular Legislative measure, the latter may re-enact the same at any time thereafter, and the Legislative Council can then hold up a Bill for a maximum period of one month [Art. 197].[67]

The purpose of having a Legislative Council is not to veto a Bill passed by the Assembly but to revise and reconsider it after allowing an interval of reflection and thought on the Bill in question.

---

60. Ibid.
61. Supra, Sec. C(b).
62. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(ii).
63. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(iii).
64. Supra, Sec. F(i).
65. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(i)(b).
66. IX CAD, 45, 59.
67. Supra, Sec. F(i).

(b) MONEY BILLS

Like Rajya Sabha, the State Legislative Council plays only a subsidiary role in financial matters, the power of purse having been concentrated in the Assembly.

A Money Bill can originate only in the Assembly; the Council is not authorised to effect any changes therein; it can only make recommendations which the Assembly is free to accept or reject; the maximum time allowed to the Council to make its recommendations is 14 days and, finally, whether a Bill is a Money Bill or not is to be decided finally by the Speaker [Art. 199].[68] Even a Financial Bill can originate only in the Assembly [Art. 207].[69]

(c) CONTROL OF THE EXECUTIVE

In the area of control of the Executive, the dominant power lies in the Assembly to which the Council of Ministers is constitutionally responsible [Art. 164(2)].[70]

An interesting constitutional question was raised in Bihar in 1968, viz., whether a motion censuring the Council of Ministers can be moved in the Legislative Council in view of the fact that the Council of Ministers was responsible to the Lower House and not the Upper House. The Chairman held that Art. 164(2) merely indicates the constitutional position of the Ministry vis-a-vis the Assembly, and does not bar the Upper House from passing a censure motion against the Ministry, or criticising the conduct of the Ministry or expressing disapproval of the policy of the Ministry. The Council passed the resolution disapproving the policies of the Ministry and calling upon it to resign or, in the alternative, requesting the Governor to dismiss the Ministry, but the resolution had no operative force; neither did the Ministry resign nor was it dismissed by the Governor.

(d) ORDINANCES

Both Houses have co-ordinate powers as regards a Governor's ordinance which is to be laid before both Houses and which ceases to operate if a resolution disapproving it is passed by the Assembly which is agreed to by the Legislative Council [Art. 213(2)(a)].[71]

(e) ABOLITION OF LEGISLATURE COUNCIL

As already pointed out, it lies within the power of the Legislative Assembly to have the Legislative Council abolished.[72]

H. LEGISLATIVE PRIVILEGES

Article 194 is a verbatim reproduction of Art. 105. Therefore, the privileges of a House of a State Legislature correspond with those of the Houses of Parliament.[73] Accordingly, the discussion held earlier on Parliamentary Privileges is

---

68. Supra, Sec. F(ii).
69. Ibid.
70. Infra, Ch. VII.
71. Infra, Ch. VII, Sec. D(ii)(c).
72. Supra, Sec. B(i).
73. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. L.

fully relevant to the privileges of a State Legislature. In fact, many cases cited earlier arose in the sphere of State Legislatures under Art. 194.

(a) FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Like Art. 105(1), Art. 194(1) specifically guarantees freedom of speech in the State Legislature. This is to ensure that the elected representatives of the people are able to have their full say on all issues being discussed in the legislature. The Allahabad High Court has held that so long as a Legislator is detained under a valid detention order, he or she has no right to participate in the session of the House and cannot consequently claim any of the rights or privileges available to legislators in the House.[74]

Article 194(2), like Art. 105(2), immunizes a member of a legislature from any proceedings in any Court for anything said or any vote given in the Legislature or a Committee thereof.

The freedom of speech is subject to the provisions of the Constitution subject to the restriction that no discussion is to take place in a House regarding the conduct of a Supreme Court or a High Court Judge in the discharge of his duties [Art. 211].[75] The rules and standing orders relating to the procedure of a House may also curtail the freedom of speech within the House [Art. 194(1)].

The Karnataka High Court has ruled in Subbiah[76] that breach of Art. 211 on the floor of the House is a matter not for the court but for determination by the presiding officer of the House. Two members of the Karnataka Legislative Assembly, espousing the cause of general public filed a writ petition in the High Court alleging that a member of the Legislative Council (respondent 2) had made derogatory remarks against the High Court Judges on the floor of the House and, thus, violated Art. 211. The petitioners therefore requested the court to issue a writ directing the Chairman of the Legislative Council (respondent 1) to produce the records of the proceedings of the Council relating to the objectionable remarks and further requested the court to quash the same. The High Court held that the matter was not actionable in the court, and, therefore, it could not call for the records of the House.

The Court pointed out that Art. 212(1) immunizes the proceedings of a House to be challenged on the ground of irregularity of procedure and it is not open to the court to issue a notice to the presiding officer of the House when the proceeding in which it is issued is itself outside the pale of determination by the courts. The question whether a member has contravened Art. 211 while speaking in the House is one for determination by the presiding officer of the House. "Hence, the question of sending for the records and quashing any such proceedings does not arise". Following the Supreme Court's opinion in Keshav Singh,[77] the High Court also observed in Subbiah:

> "If a Judge in the discharge of his duties passes an order or makes observations which in the opinion of the House amounts to contempt, and the House proceeds to take action against the Judge in that behalf, such action on the part of the House cannot be protected or justified by any specific provision made by

74. Raghu Raj Pratap Singh alias Raja Bhaiya v. State of U.P, 2003 (3) AWC 2106.
75. Keshav Singh's case, supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(i)(a).
76. A.K. Subbiah v. State of Karnataka Legislative Council, AIR 1979 Kant 24, 32.
77. Supra, footnote 75.

> the latter part of Art. 194(3)..... The conduct of a Judge in relation to the discharge of his duties cannot be the subject-matter of action in exercise of the powers and privileges of the House".[78]

The proposition laid down by the Supreme Court in P.V. Narsimha Rao v. State, (CBI/SPE)[79] and in Raja Ram Pal v. Speaker, Lok Sabha[80] in relation to the members of Lok Sabha also applies to the members of the State Legislature.

(b) PUBLICATION

Like Art. 105(2), Art. 194(2) lays down that no person is to be liable to any proceedings in any court in respect of the publication under the authority of a House of any report, paper, votes or proceedings.[81]

Article 361(A) immunizes from any Court action publication in a newspaper of a substantially true report of proceedings in a House, unless the publication is proved to have been made with malice. The same immunity applies to broadcasting.[82]

(c) POWER TO MAKE RULES

Like Art. 118(1), Article 208(1) empowers each House of the State Legislature to make rules for regulating, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, its procedure and the conduct of its business.[83]

(d) INTERNAL AUTONOMY

Internal autonomy is conceded to each House of the State Legislature. The validity of any proceedings in the State Legislature cannot be questioned on the ground of 'any alleged irregularity of procedure' [Art. 212(1)].

In M.S.M. Sharma v. Dr. Krishna Sinha,[84] the Apex Court has observed that the validity of the proceedings inside the Legislature of a State could not be called in question on the ground that the procedure laid down by the law had not been strictly followed. Art. 212 of the Constitution is a complete answer to any such contention. The court has observed:

> "No court can go into those questions which are within the special jurisdiction of the Legislature itself, which has power to conduct its own business."

Under Art. 212(1), the immunity from judicial interference is confined to matters of irregularity of procedure. No immunity can be claimed if the proceedings are held without jurisdiction, e.g., contrary to any mandatory constitutional or legal provision.[85] If the proceedings in the Legislature are attacked on the ground of illegality or unconstitutionality, judicial review thereof is not barred by Art. 212.[86]

---

78. AIR 1979 Kant, 24 at 30.
79. AIR 1998 SC 2120; supra, Ch. II.
80. (2007) 3 SCC 184 : (2007) 2 JT 1.
81. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(i)(b).
82. Supra, Ch. II.
83. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(i)(c).
84. AIR 1960 SC 1186 : (1961) 1 SCR 96 : (1961) 2 SCJ 73.
85. Kihota v. Zachilhu, AIR 1993 SC 412 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 651. Also, State of Kerala v. Sudarsan Babu, AIR 1984 Ker. 1.
86. Om Parkash Chautala v. State of Haryana, AIR 1998 P & H 80, at 83.

As the Supreme Court has observed in Keshav Singh:[87]

> "Art. 212(1) seems to make it possible for a citizen to call in question in the appropriate court of law, the validity of any proceedings inside the legislative chamber, if his case is that the said proceedings suffer not from mere irregularity of procedure, but from an illegality. If the impugned procedure is illegal and unconstitutional, it would be open to be scrutinised in a court of law, though such scrutiny is prohibited if the complaint against the procedure is not more than this that the procedure was irregular".

Thus, the proceedings inside the legislature cannot be challenged in the court on the ground that they have not been carried on in accordance with the rules of business. The House can depart from its own rules of procedure at its own discretion. Where the body has been given complete powers to regulate its own procedure it has by implication also the power to waive or condone the breach of its procedural rules.[88] The working of this principle can be illustrated by the following two cases:

1. In State of Bihar v. Kameswar Singh,[89] the original Bill relating to the Bihar Land Reforms Act was signed and authenticated by the Speaker. It contained an endorsement by the Speaker that the Bill was passed by the Assembly on 5-4-1950. The official report of the proceedings prepared later did not mention that the motion to pass the Bill was put to the House and carried.

The Supreme Court ruled that such omission could not, in the face of the explicit statement by the Speaker endorsed on the bill, be taken to establish that the Bill was not put to the House and carried by it. In any case, the omission to put the motion formally to the House, even if true, was a mere irregularity of procedure because the overwhelming majority of the members present and voting were in favour of carrying the motion.

2. In Mangalore Ganesh Beedi Works v. State of Mysore,[90] the Supreme Court ruled that the validity of a taxing measure cannot be challenged on the ground that it offends Arts. 197 to 199[91] and the procedure laid down in Art. 202 of the Constitution as Art. 212 prohibits the validity of any proceedings in a State Legislature being called in question on the ground of any alleged irregularity of procedure.

No officer or member of the State Legislature in whom powers are vested by or under the Constitution for regulating procedure, or the conduct of business, or for maintaining order in the Legislature, is to be subject to the jurisdiction of any court in respect of the exercise by him of those powers [Art. 212(2)]. The operation of this constitutional provision is illustrated by the following case.

A member of the Kerala Legislative Assembly was prevented from entering the Assembly hall. The guard was acting under the Speaker's order. The member brought an action against the guard who invoked Arts. 212(2) and 194 to bar

---

87. In re under Art. 143 (Keshav Singh), AIR 1965 SC 745 : 1965 (1) SCR 413; supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(ii)(g) and (iv).

88. Rajnarain v. Atmaram Govind, AIR 1954 All 319; Piarelal Singh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1955 Nag. 11; K.A. Mathialagan v. P. Srinivasan, AIR 1973 Mad at 385; S.V. Sirsat v. Leg. Ass. of State of Goa, AIR 1996 Bom 10.

89. AIR 1952 SC 252 : 1952 SCR 889.

90. AIR 1963 SC 589 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 275.

91. See, supra, for these provisions, under "Functions of the State Legislature, Sec. F.

Court's jurisdiction to take cognisance of any incident which may have taken place within the Legislative Assembly.

The High Court quashed the proceedings against the guard arguing that the persons deployed by the Speaker for maintaining law and order in the Assembly fall within the purview of Art. 212(2). The House and the Speaker can act only through these officers. As the Court observed: "An officer carrying out the orders of the Speaker within the precincts of the House is protected by the provisions contained in the Constitution. Such actions are beyond the cognisance of ordinary courts."[1]

Article 212(2), as is clear from its language, protects only exercise of powers vested in an officer under the Constitution. It does not protect from challenge before the court exercise of any power by such officer which is not vested in him under the Constitution.[2]

(e) SUSPENSION OF A MEMBER

Legislative history was made by the Tamil Nadu Assembly on Dec. 22, 1986, when it expelled 10 of its members (belonging to the opposition Party) from the House and declared their seats vacant.[3] These members had earlier burnt copies of the Constitution in public in the course of an agitation. The resolution passed by the House stated that by their act the members had violated the oath they had taken under Art. 188 of the Constitution,[4] and that by their conduct, they had brought down the esteem and dignity of the Constitution as well as the House and its members as their act was not in tune with the stature and standards expected of members of Legislative Assembly (M.L.A.'s) and, therefore, the House considered them ineligible to be its members.

There is no doubt that a House has power of discipline over its members and also has power to expel a member from the House rendering his seat vacant therein.[5] Members have been expelled from Parliament and State Legislatures but for personal misconduct within the House and not for political action. These members had committed an offence under the Prevention of Insults to National Honour Act, 1971, but it does not impose disqualification from membership as a punishment. There is however a danger that the majority party in the House may invoke the power of expulsion of minority party members for political reasons. Such a step would be anti-democratic. To avert such a danger, it is necessary to observe great caution, care and self-discipline by the majority party in the Legislature in using such a power. Because of Art. 212, it may be extremely difficult to challenge the exercise of such power in a court.[6]

The matter of expulsion of members was brought before the Madras High Court in K. Anbazhagan v. Secy., T.N. Legislative Assembly.[7] The High Court dismissed the writ petitions filed by the expelled members challenging their expulsion from the Assembly. The court ruled that the ground of expulsion of the

---

1. Raghunath Panicker v. Kujala Shankappan, AIR 1987 Ker 159, 163.
2. Nipamacha Singh v. Secy., Manipur Legislative Assembly, AIR 2002 Gau. 7. Also see, supra.
3. On the power of expulsion, see, supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(ii)(c).
4. Supra, Sec. B(v)(c).
5. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(ii)(c).
6. Supra.
7. AIR 1988 Mad 277.

members was that their conduct was considered to be derogatory to the dignity of the Constitution as well as that of the Assembly and the members were considered unfit to be members of the Assembly. The House of Commons has the power of expulsion to punish a member in exercise of its disciplinary control over the members with a view to see that such of the members who are unfit, in the opinion of the House, to continue to be its members are expelled from the House. The House can exercise such a power for an action of the member which the House considers to be a misconduct even though it was committed outside the House. Accordingly, the State Assembly also enjoys such a power under Art. 194(3).

It was contended in the instant case that, as the resolution to expel the members was passed by the House without the concerned members having been given an opportunity to put forth their case before the House, the procedure was illegal, arbitrary and the resolution violated Arts. 14 and 21, and, therefore, it was not protected from the court scrutiny under Art. 212. But the court rejected the contention saying that the whole purpose of Art. 212(1) is to shut out any enquiry into the validity of a proceeding in the Assembly on the ground of a defect in procedure. "Absence of opportunity to the person who is likely to be affected by the effect of the decision of the Assembly is undoubtedly a decision which may suffer from irregularity in procedure. The constitutional mandate cannot however be ignored and the Constitution makers clearly intended that the Legislature would not be answerable to a court in the matter of its proceedings on the ground of validity of procedure."

The decision of the Madras High Court is no longer good law and must be taken to have been impliedly overruled by the Supreme Court's decision in Raja Ram Pal's case which for the first time in its history directly dealt with the expulsion from membership of the legislature[8] which has now held that Articles 122 and 105 do not foreclose judicial review in cases of "gross illegality or violation of constitutional provisions" . Since any action taken in contravention of natural justice is violative of fundamental rights guaranteed by Articles 14, 19 and 21 of the Constitution if it is shown that no opportunity of hearing was given to the legislator before expulsion, the decision would be susceptible to being set aside by court.[9] A single judge of the Karnataka High Court has held that judicial review is not available at a stage prior to the Speaker/Chairman's decision and a quia timet action is not permissible.[10]

A House of the Legislature has power to suspend a member for the whole of its session. Such an order automatically comes to an end when the House is prorogued for when the House is prorogued, all pending business in the House lapses.[11]

---

8. (2007) 3 SCC 184 at p. 413 : (2007) 2 JT 1.

9. Ibid at page 435. For further discussion see supra Ch. II Note L.

10. A.K. Subbaiah v. The Chairman, Karnataka Legislative Council, AIR 2007 Kant145 : 2007 (5) Kar L J 554.

11. Also see, Jai Singh Rathi v. State of Haryana, AIR 1970 Punj 379; Hardwari Lal v. Election Commission of India, ILR (1977) 2 P & H 269; Om Prakash Chautala v. State of Haryana, AIR 1998 P & H 80.

On prorogation of the House, see, supra, Sec. C(c).

(f) LAW TO DEFINE PRIVILEGES

Like Art. 105(3), Art. 194(3) authorises the State Legislature to make a law to define the powers, privileges and immunities of each House, its members and the committees. Until, however, so defined, the privileges are to be the same as those enjoyed by the House and its committees and members immediately before the coming into force of S. 26 of the Constitution (Forty-fourth) Amendment Act, 1978.[12] There is no such law till date. However the Supreme Court has in its decision in Raja Ram Pal made legislative privileges subject to judicial review so that like a statute passed by the legislature they cannot prevail against Fundamental Rights.

(g) MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Under Art. 194(4), which is akin to Art. 105(4), [13] privileges are available not only to the members of the Legislature but to all those who have a right to speak, or otherwise to participate, in the proceedings of a House or any committee thereof, such as Ministers and the Advocate-General of the State [Art. 177].

A point of interest which arises in case of a State Legislature, but not Parliament, may be noted. Suppose a newspaper in Bombay commits contempt of the U.P. Assembly by publishing some material derogatory to it. Can the Assembly issue a warrant to enforce the presence of the Editor before it to answer the charge of its contempt, Bombay being outside the territorial jurisdiction of the U.P. Assembly?

It has been held in Homi Mistry v. Nafisul Hasan,[14] that the Assembly could do so as no territorial limitation has been placed on the power conferred by Art. 194(3). The Union of India is not formed of independent States surrendering part of their jurisdiction to the Centre and reserving part of the jurisdiction to themselves. It is inconceivable that although the privilege could be exercised against a citizen of India within the State, a citizen outside the State could assail the dignity of the House with impunity.

(h) LEGISLATURE—COURT CONTROVERSY

During the last fifty years since the inauguration of the Constitution, there have arisen several cases pertaining to legislative privileges at the State level raising unnecessary controversies between the Courts and the Houses of State Legislatures.

Reference has already been made to the Keshav Singh case where an acute controversy arose on a privilege issue between the Allahabad High Court and the U.P. Legislative Assembly.[15] The controversy was defused when the question was referred to the Supreme Court for its advisory opinion under Art. 143.[16]

The Andhra Pradesh Legislative Council decided to summon the chief editor of a newspaper to the bar of the House to be admonished on March 28, 1984, as he had been held guilty of committing breach of privilege of the House as derogatory comments had been made against the House in his paper. Instead of

---

12. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(v) for comments on this provision.
13. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. L.
14. ILR 1957 Bom 218, 238-9.
15. See, supra, Ch. II, Sec. L(iv).
16. See, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F. on Art. 143.

complying with the summons, the editor approached the Supreme Court for relief. The Court issued a show-cause notice to the Council, and also passed an interim order to the effect that the editor ought not to be arrested in pursuance of any process or warrant, if issued by the Council.

Disregarding the Court order, the Chairman of the Council asked the Commissioner of Police to produce the editor before the House on the 28th March. This brought the Council and the Court in a position of confrontation. On March 27, the Court passed another order that the Commissioner of Police should not arrest, and should not cause the arrest to be made. In view of the difficult situation in which he was placed, the Commissioner sought clarification from the Council Chairman who reiterated his earlier stand of producing the editor before the bar of the House for implementing the decision of the House to admonish him. The Chairman also directed that the Council Secretary should not receive any summons or notice from the Supreme court.

The Police Commissioner adopted the course of handing over to the editor the Council Secretary's communication which required him to produce the editor before the House. The Commissioner told the editor that he was not arresting him. "If you come on your own, you are welcome." The controversy was ultimately defused for the time being by the Governor proroguing the Council on the advice of the Chief Minister on March 30, 1984.

In A.M. Paulraj v. Speaker, T.N. Legislative Assembly,[17] a full bench of the Madras High Court has had occasion to consider certain aspects of privileges of the Legislative Assembly. The petitioner, an editor of a magazine, was sentenced to seven days' simple imprisonment by the Eighth Tamil Nadu Legislative Assembly for contempt of the Seventh Assembly. He challenged the Assembly's decision through a writ petition under Art. 226.[18]

The Speaker of the Assembly refused to receive the notice sent by the Court of the admission of the writ petition. Commenting on this aspect of the matter, the Court observed that the refusal to receive even a court notice of filing of a writ petition under Art. 226 by a person who has been punished for a breach of privilege is based on a misapprehension that the admission and hearing of such a petition amounts to an affront to the Legislature and that there is a confrontation between the High Court and the Legislature. "Such an impression is, in our view, wholly unjustified. Indeed the maintainability of a petition under Art. 226 of the Constitution challenging the decision of a House of Legislature sentencing a citizen to imprisonment for contempt of the House has clearly been upheld by the Supreme Court in Keshav Singh. When such a petition is filed, the conflict is not between the High Court and the Legislature but between the citizen and the Legislature. When a citizen approaches the Court contending that as a result of a committal to prison by the Legislature for breach of privilege his Fundamental Right under Art. 21 has been violated, such a petition cannot be thrown out at the very threshold merely on the ground that the decision of a House on an issue of privilege is being challenged." In the instant case, the High Court requested the Advocate General to assist the Court and he did so.

---

17. AIR 1986 Mad 248.
18. For discussion on Art. 226, see, infra, Ch. VIII.

Ultimately, after hearing the arguments of the Advocate General and the petitioner's lawyer, the High Court dismissed the petition on merits and made the following points in its judgment:

(1) A writ petition is maintainable challenging the decision of a House of a Legislature sentencing a citizen to imprisonment for contempt of the House.

(2) A House can take cognisance of the contempt of the previous House, the reason being that the State Legislature is a continuing institution notwithstanding the fact that the Assembly is dissolved from time to time and new members are being elected.

(3) The question of punishment for a breach of privilege is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Legislature;

(4) Art. 212 forecloses any scrutiny by the court into the procedure adopted by the House. The validity of the proceedings inside the Legislature cannot be called in question on the ground that the procedure laid down by the law has not been strictly followed. "The decision of the Assembly cannot be challenged on the ground that there was any irregularity in the procedure. Art. 212 creates an express bar against a challenge to any proceedings of the Legislature on the ground of alleged irregularity of procedure".

(5) When a person is punished with imprisonment under Art. 194(3) in accordance with the rules made by the Legislature under Art. 208(1), it is in accordance with Art. 21.[19]

The contention of the petitioner in the instant case was that he was not heard by the Assembly before passing the resolution to punish him for contempt. Treating this as a matter of mere procedure, the Court ruled that it was covered by Art. 212. The rules made under Art. 208 do not provide for any such hearing.

The criticism expressed by the author in the earlier edition of this book was two fold:

One, fair hearing is a part of natural justice and failure to provide natural justice is now regarded not as a matter of procedural irregularity but as going to the jurisdiction of the authority making the decision.[20] If this view is applied then the failure to giving a hearing to the concerned person can be regarded as affecting its jurisdiction to punish, and this is certainly not protected by Art. 212.

Two, after the Maneka Gandhi case, Art. 21 does not now envisage any procedure, but such procedure as is reasonable.[21] Imprisoning a person without giving him a hearing cannot certainly be regarded as a reasonable procedure. Therefore, the rules of a Legislature which fail to provide for an opportunity of being heard to the affected person before sentencing him to a term of imprisonment for contempt of the Legislature do not measure up to the requirements of Art. 21. Art. 212 protects irregularity in procedure of a Legislature but certainly not a breach of his Fundamental Right under Art. 21.

---

19. On Art. 21, see, Ch. XXVI, infra.

20. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, 450. et. seq; JAIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, I, Ch. XI.

21. See, infra, Ch. XXVI, Sec. D, for discussion on this case.

That the criticism was justified is borne out by the decision of the Supreme Court in Raja Ram Pal.[22]

Again, two cases of tri-partite conflict between the Press, Court and the Legislature arose in Tamil Nadu in 1992. The privileges committee of the Tamil Nadu Assembly found the editor of a newspaper guilty of breach of privilege of the House for publishing an alleged incident and certain proceedings in the House on February 5, 1992. The Speaker directed the editor to appear before the bar of the House on April 27 for being reprimanded. The editor approached the Supreme Court with a writ petition and the Court issued a notice on May 1 to the Secretary, Legislative Assembly, to appear before the Court on May 5, with some information. On May 4, 1992, the Assembly adopted a resolution directing the Secretary not to respond to the Court summons to appear before it, but offered to provide the Court information through the government counsel.

Proceedings for contempt of the House were initiated against Sunil, the Madras correspondent of the Illustrated Weekly published from New Delhi, following publication of an article written by him on Tamil Nadu Assembly in a September issue. The House took the view that the article sought to present the proceedings of the House in a "pejorative and prejudicial slant." Sunil expressed regret to the House, but still on April 10, 1992, the House directed Sunil to be present before the bar of the House on April 20 for being reprimanded. As Sunil did not appear before the House, a warrant for his arrest was issued by the Speaker.

Sunil approached the Supreme Court and on April 24, 1992, the Court in an interim order, stayed the execution of the arrest warrant and also stayed the notice dated April 10, issued by the Speaker directing Sunil to appear before the bar of the House. On April 27, an announcement was made in the T.N. Assembly that the warrant of arrest against Sunil would be executed despite the Supreme Court's stay order. On May 7, the Court clarified that its interim order of April 24 staying the warrant of arrest of Sunil, by necessary implication, interdicted, any assertion of powers to arrest Sunil by any police or other official. The Court also directed the Police Commissioner, Delhi, to give protection to Sunil and prevent infraction of the Court's order. The Court also expressed its confidence and hope that the authorities in consonance with their duty would act in "aid, authority and dignity" of the apex Court as envisaged by Art. 144 of the Constitution.[23] On the other hand, the Speaker pleaded in the House that under Art. 212, the validity of the proceedings could not be questioned.

A significant case pertaining to the legislative privileges arose in Tamil Nadu in 1987. On March 25, 1987, a weekly published a cartoon which, it was alleged, denigrated the MLAs. On March 28, the Speaker made a statement in the House holding the editor guilty of the breach of privilege and demanding the editor to publish an apology in the weekly failing which summary sentence would be passed by the House itself. On April 4, 1987, the House passed a resolution sentencing the editor to undergo three months' rigorous imprisonment. He was arrested the same day but was released after two days. In the meantime, the editor filed a writ petition in the Madras High Court and challenged the resolution as unconstitutional and also demanded compensation for the flagrant violation of his

22. See Chapter II Sec. L for discussion of the case.
23. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I.

Fundamental Rights in imposing the three months' rigorous imprisonment on him.

After considering the matter in the light of the past judicial decisions in the area of legislative privileges, a full bench of the High Court laid down the following propositions: in S. Balasubramanian v. State of Tamil Nadu:[24]

(1) The Constitution is the basic and fundamental law of the land; it reigns supreme and the "rights, powers and privileges" of the various limbs of the state are subject to its provisions.

(2) The final authority to interpret the Constitution and to settle constitutional controversies belongs to the Supreme Court and the High Courts. These courts have been constituted as the sentinels of both the Constitution and the democracy as well as the fundamental rights of the citizens.

(3) The legislatures have to function within the limits of constitutional provisions; adjudication of any controversy as to whether legislative authority has been exceeded or fundamental rights have been contravened is "solely and exclusively" left to the Judicature. Therefore, inevitably, the decision about the construction of Art. 194(3), the privileges, powers and immunities claimed or action taken in vindication thereof "cannot be said to be in the exclusive domain or of the sole arbitral or absolute discretion of the House of legislature".

(4) Of course, the courts having regard to their own self-imposed limits would honour the sentiments particularly keeping in view the plenary powers of the Legislature within the constitutionally permitted limits so long as such action of the Legislature does not result in the negation of the fundamental rights guaranteed to the people. The court observed in this connection:[25]

> "The all powerful postures or claims of sky-high powers or suzerain claims of sovereignty or over-lordism are to be brushed aside as nothing but fossil of the tyrannical and anarchical past and not in keeping tune with the basic and fundamental principle of rule of law, the bedrock of the Constitution or the democratic ideals which are the avowed object of the Republic ushered in by the Constitution of India. The contentions to the contrary have no basis or recognition of law and do not have the merit of acceptance by the courts in this country."

(5) No person can be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law (Art. 21) and the state shall not deny to any person equality before law and the protection of law (Art. 14). Consequently, no law or procedure laid down by law or the action taken thereunder can be arbitrary or irrational or oppressive and the requirements of compliance with the principles of natural justice are implicit in Art. 21 and every action of the state has to be tested on the anvil of Arts. 14, 19 and 21 read together. No immunity can be claimed from the scrutiny of this Court to see whether any Act or action of the legislature as in the case of the other limb of the State, violates the above stated cardinal principles.

24. AIR 1995 Mad 329.
25. Ibid, at 343.

(6) In the instant case, the alleged guilt of the editor had been decided and pronounced upon by the Speaker himself and declaration made by him to that effect even before any opportunity to show cause or hearing was given to him. "Suo motu the Speaker of the House has power only to refer the question to the privileges committee and not to record a verdict on the very question. The High Court observed in this connection:[26]

> "There had been, in our view, gross violation of law as also the principles of natural justice in dealing with the case of the petitioner and punishing him with imprisonment and the entire procedure adopted in this case smacks of arbitrariness and oppressiveness besides the same being most unreasonable. While denying the personal liberty of the petitioner, a citizen of this country, even the elementary procedure established by law does not appear to have been adhered to."

Thus, the Court concluded that, in the instant case, Fundamental Rights of the petitioner under Arts. 14, 19 and 21[27] were grossly violated in imposing three months' imprisonment and, accordingly, "the condemnation of the petitioner as also the punishment imposed are declared to be unconstitutional and null and void." The court also awarded the petitioner a token compensation of Rs. 1000 for infringement of his right under Art. 21.

On March 22, 1999, a member of the Opposition in the Tamil Nadu Legislative Assembly assaulted a Minister. In the evening, the member was imprisoned for a week on a warrant issued by the Speaker. On March 23, a habeas corpus petition was moved on behalf of the concerned member in the Madras High Court under Art. 226. The High Court granted interim bail to the member and ordered his release from the prison. The Judges who heard the petition felt that no one could be sentenced to jail without being given a hearing. They also felt that since the arrest followed a criminal action, the matter should have been referred to an appropriate court. The bench made it clear that it was not interfering with the decision of the House suspending the member from the House for the rest of the ongoing session.

At first, the Speaker reacted strongly to the High court order and said that he would not take cognisance of it. On March 23, while the member's case was being argued in the Court, the Assembly passed a resolution holding the member guilty of contempt of the House and sentenced him to 15 days imprisonment. On March 24, the Speaker relented. The member was released from the prison in pursuance of the court order for his bail but he was rearrested a few minutes later under the Assembly resolution. A fresh habeas corpus petition was filed in the High Court seeking the release of the member and challenging the resolution passed by the Assembly.

---

26. Ibid, 345.

27. For discussion on Art. 14, see, Ch. XXI, infra; on Art. 19, see, Ch. XXIV, infra; for Art. 21, see, infra, Ch. XXVI, Secs. B, C, D, E and F.

In the meantime, the Speaker accepted that his order issued by him suo motu on March 22, ordering member's imprisonment was flawed because he had issued it in his individual capacity as the Speaker. He also made it clear that neither he nor any of the Assembly staff members would accept any notice or summons from the High Court on the matter. He also observed that challenging the Assembly resolution in the court "would definitely affect the sovereignty of the House and I will challenge it."[28]

The Madras High Court again ordered the release of the member on bail after suspending the Assembly's resolution. The Speaker who had earlier declared that he would not brook any interference from the court in implementing the Assembly resolution again relented, chose not to challenge the court order and, accordingly, the member was released from the prison. Thus, a confrontation between the High Court and the Assembly was averted for the time being as the Speaker chose to accept the court order releasing the member on bail.[29] The Speaker told the House that he did not wish a confrontation with the judiciary and that the court order granting bail to the member was only an interim order. The Speaker went on to observe that the legislature and the judiciary are two limbs of the democracy and, therefore, one should not demolish the sovereignty of the other.

Questions regarding the permissible limits of legislative privileges, the role of the courts in this area, the relation between legislative privileges and Fundamental Rights have been arising from time to time creating unnecessary tensions between the courts and the legislatures. This problem needs to be solved so that the court-legislature tensions which result in ugly incidents from time to time may be avoided.[30]

The only viable course to protect the press and the people is to have a central legislation defining legislative privileges. This matter has been hanging fire since the famous Keshav Singh case,[31] in 1964. It may be still better to add an appendix to the Constitution defining legislative privileges as a central law on the subject may not be constitutionally viable. The alternative suggested in the earlier edition of amending Arts 105 and 194 making legislative privileges subject to Fundamental Rights and judicial review, may no longer be necessary given the decision of the Supreme Court in Raja Ram Pal.

It needs to be appreciated that a legislature exercises its privileges against the same people who have elected it. This can be regarded as an anti-democratic action on the part of a democratic legislature. It needs to be remembered that the function of privileges in early days in Britain was to make the House of Commons immune from royal interference. But to-day legislatures use their privileges not for protection against the executive but to stifle criticism by the people. To a great extent, the claim of privilege by a democratically elected legislature borders on being undemocratic and anti-people. At times, the majority party in a House uses the issue of privileges as a political weapon to beat the minority.

---

28. The Hindustan Times, dated, March 25, 99, p. 1.
29. The Times of India, dated March 26, 99, p. 10.
30. Reference may be made in this connection to a study by the author entitled Parliamentary Privileges and the Press (1984) published by the Indian Law Institute, New Delhi.
31. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. I.

CHAPTER VII

STATE EXECUTIVE

SYNOPSIS

The State Executive consists of the Governor, who is the head of the State, and the Council of Ministers with the Chief Minister at its head.

The pattern of the State Executive is very similar to that of the Central Executive which is based on the fundamental principle of accountability of the Executive to the Legislature. Like the Centre, the States also have parliamentary form of government. Therefore, what has been said in Chapter III as regards the Central Executive is applicable to the area of the State Executive as well.

The constitutional provisions dealing with the State Executive are more or less word to word similar to the constitutional provisions dealing with the Central Executive except for some differences arising out of the fact while the Constitution confers some discretion on the State Governor, it confers none on the President.

Arts. 153 to 167 and 213 deal with the composition and powers of the State Executive.

A. ADMISSION TO THE EXECUTIVE ORGANS

(i) GOVERNOR

(a) SIGNIFICANCE OF THE GOVERNOR'S OFFICE

The Governor of a State plays a multifaceted role. He is a vital link between the Centre and the State. It is his duty to keep the Centre informed of the affairs of the State. This helps the Centre to discharge its constitutional functions and responsibilities towards the State.

The Governor is the constitutional head of the State. He appoints the Chief Minister and other Ministers and discharges several important functions in relation to the State Legislature. The Governor assures continuity in the State Administration, as having a fixed tenure, he stays in office while the Chief Minister may come and go from time to time.

The Governor acts as the agent of the Centre when a proclamation of breakdown of constitutional machinery in the State is issued under Art. 356.[1] The State Governor is thus a key functionary in the system envisaged by the Constitution.

(b) APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR

Each State has a Governor, but two or more States may have a common Governor [Art. 153]. The Governor is formally appointed by the President [Art. 155]. The President appoints the State Governor on the advice of the Prime Minister with whom, therefore, the effective power lies in this regard.[2]

The Constituent Assembly fully debated the merits and demerits of an elected v. nominated Governor and finally opted for the system of presidential nomination, rather than direct election, of the Governor because of several reasons:[3] For example—

(1) A nominated Governor would encourage centripetal tendencies and, thus, promote all-India unity. On the other hand, it was apprehended

---

1. For discussion on Art. 356, see, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
2. IV CAD, 588-607.
3. VIII CAD, 455.

that "an elected Governor would to some extent encourage that separatist provincial tendency more than otherwise. There will be far fewer links with the Centre."[4]

(2) In a parliamentary system the head should be impartial, but a Governor elected by the direct vote of the people would have to be a partyman. On this point, it was stated in the Constituent Assembly:

> "He should be a more detached figure acceptable to the province, otherwise he could not function, and yet may not be a part of the party machine of the province. On the whole, it would probably be desirable to have people from outside, eminent in something, education or other fields of life who would naturally cooperate fully with the Government in carrying out the policy of the Government and yet represent before the public something above politics."

(3) Conflicts might arise between the Governor and the Chief Minister if both were to be elected by the people, for the former might claim to arrogate power to himself on the plea of his having been elected by the whole State as against the latter who would be elected only in a constituency which would be a small part of the State. It was stated in the Constituent Assembly:[5]

> "When the whole of the executive power is vested in the Council of Ministers, if` there is another person who believes that he has got the backing of the province behind him and, therefore, at his discretion he can come forward and intervene in the governance of the province, it would really amount to a surrender of democracy".

(4) The Governor being only a symbol, a figurehead, there would be no point in spending money in having him elected.[6]

The Constitution gives a carte blanche to the Centre in the matter of appointment of a State Governor. Under Art. 155, the ultimate responsibility to appoint the Governor rests with the Central Government. The Governor has a dual capacity—he is the Head of the State as well as the representative of the Centre in the State and he works as a channel of communication and contact between the State and the Centre. It is felt that with a view to ensuring the smooth functioning of the constitutional machinery in the State, it would be best to consult the State Chief Minister while appointing the Governor, and a convention has thus grown accordingly.

So long as there was one party rule at the Centre as well as in the States, the consultation was merely a formality and no difficulty ever arose in the matter of appointment of the Governor. During this period, the institution of the Governor remained largely dormant. But after the fourth general election held in February 1967, the political scene underwent a sea change as different political parties came in power in the States and the Centre. The appointment of Governors became a somewhat controversial matter, particularly in those States where the political complexion of the government differed from that at the Centre. These

---

4. Ibid.
5. VII CAD, 455.
6. VIII CAD, 12, 424-556.

States apprehended that the Governor appointed by the Central Government, and holding office during the pleasure of the President (which means the Central Government), would function not objectively and impartially, but at the bidding of the Central Government to destabilize State Governments. These States claimed not only consultation, but rather their concurrence, in the matter of appointment of the Governor. The Centre has not accepted any such proposition. While the Centre consults the Chief Minister, it is not ready to concede a veto to him in the matter of appointment of the Governor. The Centre is not prepared to consult the State Cabinet as such and regards consultation with the Chief Minister as adequate.

For a smooth functioning of the Indian federal structure, it is necessary that the person to be appointed as the Governor should be such as to inspire confidence from both the Centre and the State concerned. The office of the Governor has now become a balance wheel of the Centre-State relationship. As the Governor has to discharge certain functions in the State as the Centre's representative independently of the State Government because of the Centre's ultimate responsibility to see that each State functions according to the Constitution,[7] it is not possible for a State to claim a final say in the matter of the Governor's appointment. But, at the same time, the Centre should not seek to force a person as Governor upon a State against its wishes otherwise relations between him and the State Government will always be strained.

A Study Team of the Administrative Reforms Commission has suggested that though the Chief Minister of the State should be consulted before a Governor is appointed, yet this should not dilute the primary responsibility of the Centre to appoint a competent and suitable person as Governor.[8]

Although one of the reasons to have a nominated Governor was to have an impartial head of the State, in practice, however, persons from political parties have been appointed Governors leading to stresses and strains between the Governor and the State Government as the Governor may belong to a party different from that of the State Government. For smooth sailing of the State Government, it may be advisable to have a non-political, non-party, man eminent in some walk of life as the State Governor. The Sarkaria Commission has suggested that Art. 155 should be amended so as to ensure effective consultation with the State Chief Minister in the Matter of appointment of the Governor.[9]

A citizen of India who has completed the age of 35 years is eligible to be appointed as the Governor [Art. 157]. Before entering upon his office, a Governor has to make and subscribe, in the presence of the Chief Justice of the State High Court, an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form. In the absence of the Chief Justice, the oath may be taken before the senior-most Judge of the High Court available at the time [Art. 159].

The Governor cannot be a member of a House of Parliament, or of the State Legislature, and if a member of a House, at the time of his appointment as the Governor, he has to vacate his seat in that House on the date on which he enters upon his office as Governor [Art. 158(1)].

---

7. Arts. 355 and 356, infra, Ch. XIII.
8. Report, Centre-State Relationship, I. 285, Also see, Lok Sabha Debates, Nov. 16, 1967 and Rajya Sabha Debates, Nov. 20, 1967; Report of the Administrative Reforms Commission, 24.
9. Report, 124.

The Governor cannot hold any other office of profit [Art. 158(2)]. He is entitled to the free use of his official residence and also to such emoluments, allowances and privileges as Parliament may determine by law [Art. 158(3)]. The emoluments and allowances of a Governor cannot be reduced during his term of office [Art. 158(4)]. Where one person is appointed Governor of more than one State, his emoluments are allocated amongst the States in such proportion as the President may determine [Art. 158(3-A)].

(c) GOVERNOR'S PRIVILEGES

The Governor enjoys the same privileges as the President does under Art. 361 and he stands, in this respect, on the same footing as the President.[10]

Even where Governor's bona fides are questioned in the matter of exercise of his discretionary powers of appointment and dismissal of the Chief Minister, he cannot be called upon to enter his defence.[11] According to the Bombay High Court, "the Governor while taking decisions in his sole discretion, enjoys immunity under Article 361…"[12]

The Governor holds his office during the pleasure of the President under Art. 156. "Any mala fide actions of the Governor may, therefore, conceivably be gone into by the President."[13]

In G. Vasantha Pai v. C.K. Ramaswamy,[14] the Madras High Court has laid down that a combined reading of Arts. 154, 163 and 361(1) would show that the immunity against answerability to any Court is regarding functions exercised by the Governor qua-Governor and those functions in respect of which he acts on the advice of the Council of Ministers or in his discretion.

If the Governor appoints a person to a constitutional office who is not qualified for the purpose, the discretion of the Governor may not be challengeable because of Art. 361. But the authority of the appointee to hold the office can be challenged through quo warranto.[15] The fact that the Governor has made the appointment, does not give the appointee any higher right to hold the appointment. If the appointment is contrary to any constitutional provision, it will be struck down.[16]

(d) TENURE OF GOVERNOR

The basic rule is that a Governor holds his office during the pleasure of the President [Art. 156(1)], i.e., as long as the Central Executive wants him in that office. Accordingly, the Central Executive can remove the Governor on any ground, as for example, bribery, corruption, violation of the Constitution, etc.

Subject to this overall condition, a Governor holds office for five years. He, however, continues to hold office even after the lapse of his term till his successor enters upon his office [Art. 156(2)]. Thus, a person once appointed a Governor continues to hold that office till his successor enters upon his office.[17]

---

10. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i)
11. For discussion on "Governor's Discretionary Powers", see, infra.
12. Pratap Singh Raojirao Rane v. State of Goa, AIR 1999 Bom 53.
13. Ibid, 66.
14. AIR 1978 Mad 342.
15. For discussion on quo warranto, see, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. E.
16. B.R. Kapur v. State of Tamil Nadu, JT 2001(8) SC 40, at 66 : (2001) 7 SCC 231.
17. K. Ballabh v. Commission of Inquiry, AIR 1969 SC at 261.

The Governor may resign at any time by writing to the President [Art. 156(3)]. In a contingency for which the Constitution makes no provision, such as death of the Governor, the President may make such provision as he thinks fit for discharge of the functions of the Governor of a State [Art. 160]. Thus, the Chief Justice of the High Court can be appointed temporarily to discharge the functions of the Governor of the State.[18]

While there exist provisions in the Constitution for impeachment of the President, no such provisions exist concerning the Governor. The reason being that as he holds his office during the pleasure of the President, the Central Government can always recall him if the circumstances so require. A Governor is a political appointee, and when an appointment is made by the government on political considerations, it can also be terminated on political considerations.[19]

A glaring example of the Centre's absolute power to recall Governors was furnished in December, 1989, when the President, on the advice of the National Front Prime Minister V.P. Singh, asked all the Governors to tender their resignations, simply because they were appointed by the previous government belonging to another political party.

In Surya Narain v. Union of India,[20] the Rajasthan High Court upheld the dismissal of the Governor of Rajasthan (Raghukul Tilak) by the President.[21]

The Court pointed out that the Governor while discharging his functions works as a channel of communication and contact between the State and the Centre; the Governor is an appointee of the President and expressly holds office during his pleasure. The Governor thus has no security of tenure and no fixed term of office. Art. 156(3) is controlled by Art. 156(1). The President in exercise of his pleasure may cut short the five years term of the Governor. Consequently, the President can ask the Governor to resign or may terminate his term of office. The Governor may be removed by an expression of presidential displeasure before the normal term of five years and the presidential pleasure under Art. 156(1) is 'unjusticiable'.

It seems that sacking a State Governor is much easier than dismissing a Central Government employee. While both hold office during the pleasure of the President, a Government servant enjoys protection of Art. 311,[22] while a Governor enjoys no such protection.

The question of the status of a State Governor was again brought into focus by the summary dismissal of the Governor of Nagaland, Shri M.M. Thomas, on April 11, 1992. Earlier, the Governor had dissolved the State Legislative Assembly on the advice of the then Chief Minister retaining him as the care-taker Chief Minister till fresh elections could be held. The Governor had done so in exercise

---

18. Arun Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Raj 67.

19. It has been held judicially that the appointment of a political appointee can be terminated without much formality as it is done purely on political considerations. See, Om Narain Agarwal v. Nagar Palika, Shahjahanpur, AIR 1993 SC 1440 : (1993) 2 SCC 242; Dattaji Chirandas v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1999 Guj 48.

20. AIR 1982 Raj. 1.

21. Raghukul Tilak assumed office as Governor on May 12, 1977, during the Janata regime. He was removed from office on Aug. 8, 1981, by the Indira Gandhi Government.

22. See, infra, Ch. XXXVI, for discussion on this topic.

of his power under Art. 174(2)(b)[23] without consulting the Centre before taking such an action. The Central Government did not approve of this action of the Governor. Accordingly, the Centre imposed the President's rule in the State under Art. 356 on April 2, and dismissed the Governor soon thereafter.[24] The Centre's justification for taking the action was that the Chief Minister had already lost his majority in the Legislature when he advised the Governor to dissolve the House.[25] The Opposition parties in Parliament described Centre's action as an attack on the federal character of the Constitution.[26]

The episode did bring to the forefront two issues of crucial importance to the Indian federalism:[27] (1) Is the Governor a constitutional authority in his own right or is he bound to seek the consent of the Centre before exercising the powers vested in him by the Constitution? (2) Use of Art. 356 in a State.

On the first question, theoretically speaking, as per the constitutional provisions, the Governor should be entitled to decide in his own judgment whether the powers vested in him by the Constitution should be exercised or not at a particular moment. Theoretically speaking, it should not be necessary for him to seek the Centre's consent to his proposed exercise of any such power. Therefore, in theory, in the instant case, the Governor may not have done anything wrong or improper in exercising his power under Art. 174 and dissolving the House. But, then, hitherto, the practice has developed in a different manner. Governors rarely act in their own judgment independently of the Centre's view. They usually act either at the behest, or with the consent, express or implied, of the Centre.[28]

This practice cannot be regarded as being in conformity with constitutional rectitude. Even politically this practice is not sound because the Central and State Governments may belong to different political parties and the decision of the Central Government in such a situation may have political overtones. Therefore, it will be best to leave the Governor who is the man on the spot free to decide as to how to exercise his constitutional powers as and when the situation arises.

On the other hand, in Hargovind Pant v. Raghukul Tilak,[29] the Supreme Court has ruled that the office of the Governor is not an employment under the Government of India, and so it does not fall within the prohibition of Art. 319(d).[30] Therefore, a member of the State Public Service Commission can be appointed as the Governor. The Court adduced the following reasons for this view : an employment

---

23. Infra, Sec. C(b).
24. For discussion on Art. 356, See, infra, Ch. XIII.
25. On dissolution of a House, see, supra; Ch. II, Sec. I(c).
26. In October, 1980, the Centre dismissed the Tamil Nadu Governor, Prabhudas Patwari. This shows that the Prime Minister can use the President's pleasure under Art. 156(1) to dismiss a Governor from his office for political reasons without assigning any cause. See The Statesman, dated 31-10-1980.
27. For discussion on Federalism, see, infra, Chs. X-XVI.
28. In 1971, the Committee of Governors appointed by President Giri stated in its report that "the Governor as Head of State, has his functions laid down in the Constitution itself, and is in no sense an agent of the President… In the framework of the Constitution as it is conceived there is no power vested in any authority to issue any directions to the Governor".
This may be the formal position but, in practice, this assertion does not accord with the facts mentioned above.
29. AIR 1979 SC 1109.
30. Infra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. K.
This provision prohibits appointment of a member of a Public Service Commission to any post under the Central or State Government.

can be said to be under the Central Government if the holder or the incumbent is under the control of the Central Government vis-a-vis such employment. The office of the Governor does not fall under this description. The office of the Governor is not an employment under the Government of India; the Governor occupies a high constitutional office with important constitutional functions and duties; he is not an employee of the Government of India; he is not subordinate or subservient or under the control of the Government of India, nor is he amenable to its directions, nor is he accountable to it for the manner in which he carries his functions and duties. According to the Court, Governor's "is an independent constitutional office which is not subject to the control of the Government of India".

The Supreme Court has observed further in this connection:

> "He is constitutionally the head of the State in whom is vested the executive power of the State and without whose assent there can be no legislation in exercise of the legislative power of the State."

What the Supreme Court has stated above is only the theoretical or the formal position of the Governor. In practice, things appear to be different because the Governor is appointed by the Centre, holds his office subject to its pleasure and can be dismissed by it at any time. This, in effect, is bound to compromise the Governor's independence of action. A Governor can adopt a stance not in accord with the wishes of the Centre only at his own risk.

Recently, the Patna High Court has explained the position of the Governor.[31] Reading Arts. 156 and 159(1) together, the Court has ruled that the five year term of a Governor is not a fixed term but it is subject to the "pleasure of the President". Therefore, a Governor can be shifted from one State to another even during the term of five years. The Court has observed in this regard: [32]

> "Thus, under Clause (3) of Art. 156 of the Constitution, it is apparent that five years term is subject to the exercise of pleasure by the President and the President of India is the best Judge for exercise of his pleasure to decide as to when and in what circumstances the term of a sitting Governor of a State should be reduced, or, instead of reducing the term, he may be transferred from one State to another or he may be asked to vacate the office."

The Court has also ruled that the President is not bound to give reasons for exercising his pleasure one way or other. The office of the Governor is not an employment under the Government of India. A Government servant cannot be dismissed without being given a right of being heard, the Governor can be removed from office under Art. 156(1) without being given a hearing for the President is the best Judge of when to withdraw his pleasure from the office of the Governor. The maxim of audi alteram partem does not apply to a Governor.[33] This means that the Governor need not be given a hearing, unlike a government servant, before being removed from his office. It remains, however, a moot point whether the State Legislature or Parliament can pass a resolution requesting the President to recall the Governor and what will be the operative force, if any, of such a resolution.

---

31. Indian Union Muslim League v. Union of India, AIR 1998 Pat. 156.
32. Ibid, 160.
33. For discussion on this maxim, see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, Chs. IX and X. Also see, M.P. JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, Ch. VIII and IX.

Recently, the Central Government recalled the Governor of Tamil Nadu [Fathima Beevi, an ex-Judge of the Supreme Court], for having appointed Jayalalitha as the Chief Minister of the State under Art. 164(4) even though she was not qualified at the time to contest an election for the State Legislative Assembly. Later, the Supreme Court ruled that the appointment was unconstitutional.[34]

(ii) COUNCIL OF MINISTERS

On lines similar to the Centre, each State has a Council of Ministers, with the Chief Minister at its head.[35] The provision regarding the Council of Ministers is mandatory and the Governor cannot dispense with this body at any time [Art. 163(1)]. This proposition has now been reiterated by the Supreme Court which has held that the Council of Ministers continues to stay in office even when the Legislature is dissolved by the Governor.[36]

The function of the Council of Ministers is "to aid and advise the Governor in the exercise of his functions except in so far as he is by or under this Constitution required to exercise his functions or any of them in his discretion [Art. 163(1)].[37] The phrase "by or under" the Constitution means that the need to exercise discretionary power may arise from any express provision of the Constitution or by necessary implication.[38]

It has been judicially held that the Council of Ministers comes into existence to aid and advise the Governor as envisaged by Art. 163(1) as soon as the Chief Minister is appointed and sworn in by the Governor. More Ministers can be appointed in course of time. But, till then, the Chief Minister alone acts as the Council of Ministers to aid and advise the Governor. The Constitution does not prescribe any minimum or maximum number of Ministers as members of the Council of Ministers. Accordingly, there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent the Chief Minister from aiding and advising the Governor all by himself pending appointment of other Ministers and allocation of business among them. "The formation of the Council of Ministers is complete with the swearing in of the Chief Minister."[39]

(a) APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF MINISTER AND OTHER MINISTERS

Ordinarily, a Minister should be a member of the State Legislature. A basic feature of the parliamentary system of government is that all Ministers ought to be members of a House of State Legislature. This ensures accountability of the Council of Ministers to the Legislature.[40] However, a non-member may also be appointed as a Minister, but he would cease to be a Minister if he does not become a member of the State Legislature within six months [Art. 164(4)].

Under Art. 177, a Minister has the right to speak in, and participate in the proceedings of, a House of the State Legislature. This means that a Minister, even

---

34. For discussion on this case, see, below.
35. See, supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(ii), under "Council of Ministers".
36. K.N. Rajgopal v. M. Karunanidhi, AIR 1971 SC 1551 : (1972) 4 SCC 733.
37. For a full discussion on this provision, see, infra, Sec. C, under "Governor's Discretionary Power".
38. Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831.
39. Dattaji Chirandas v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1999 Guj 48, 57.
40. On this question, see, below.

though not a member of a House can participate in its proceedings but cannot vote.

Under this provision, a person who is not a member of any House may even be appointed as the Chief Minister[41] as the term 'Minister' in Art. 164(4) covers the "Chief Minister" as well. Therefore, there have been cases when non-members have been appointed as Chief Ministers. For example, Kamraj Nadar was appointed as the Chief Minister of Madras in 1954 although he was not a member of the State Legislature.

A few judicial pronouncements on the scope of Art. 164(4) may be taken note of here.

Shri T.N. Singh who was not a member of either House of the State Legislature was appointed the Chief Minister of Uttar Pradesh. The High Court rejected the challenge to his appointment in view of Art. 164(4) of the Constitution and the Supreme Court upheld the High Court. A non-member can be appointed as Chief Minister for a period of six months.[42]

A question of crucial significance has been considered by the Supreme Court in S.R. Chaudhari v. State of Punjab.[43] Shri Tej Prakash Singh was appointed as a Minister in the State of Punjab on the advice of Chief Minister, Sardar Harcharan Singh Barar, on 9-9-1995. At the time of his appointment as a Minister, he was not a member of the State Legislature. As he failed to get elected to the State Legislature, he resigned from the Council of Ministers after 6 months on 8-3-1996. This was in accordance with Art. 164(4). During the term of the same Legislature, there was a change in the office of the Chief Minister. The new Chief Minister, again appointed Tej Prakash Singh as a Minister on 23-11-96. He was a not a member of the Legislature at the time. A petition was filed for a writ of quo warranto against the Minister. The High Court dismissed the petition in limine, but, on appeal, the Supreme Court quashed the Minister's appointment. The Supreme Court stated that Arts. 164(1) and 164(4) should be so construed as to "further the principles of a representative and responsible Government." The Court refused to interpret Art. 164 in a literal manner on the "plain language of the Article". Instead the Court argued for a "purposive interpretation of the provision[44].

Referring to Art. 164, the Court observed that its scheme clearly suggests that ideally, every Minister must be a member of the Legislature at the time of his appointment. In an exceptional case, a non-member may remain a Minister for six months. Such a person must get elected to the House during the period of six months. If he fails to do so, he must cease to be a Minister. He cannot be re-appointed thereafter during the life time of the same Legislature by the same or even a different Chief Minister. The Court has observed:

> "The "privilege" of continuing as a Minister for six months without being an elected member is only a one time slot for the individual concerned during the

---

41. For criticism of this practice, see, 13 JILI 376 (1971).

42. Harsharan Verma v. Tribhuvan Narain Singh, AIR 1971 SC 1331 : (1971) 1 SCC 616.
The Court reiterated this ruling in Harsharan Verma v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 282 : (1985) 2 SCC 48.

43. AIR 2001 SC 2707 : (2001) 7 SCC 126.

44. Ibid at 2717.
Also see, infra, Ch. XL.

> term of the concerned Legislative Assembly. It exhausts itself if the individual is unable to get himself elected within the period of grace of six consecutive months... It is not permissible for different Chief Ministers, to appoint the same individual as a Minister, without him getting elected, during the term of the same Assembly... The change of a Chief Minister, during the term of the same Assembly would, therefore, be of no consequence so far as the individual concerned."[45]

To appoint a person repeatedly as a Minister while he is not a member of the Legislature would amount to subversion of the constitutional and democratic process. The Court further observed criticising the appointment of a non-member repeatedly as a Minister:[46]

> "By permitting a non-legislator Minister to be re-appointed without getting elected within the period prescribed by Art. 164(4), would amount to ignoring the electorate in having its say as to who should represent it—a position which is wholly unacceptable. The seductive temptation to cling to office regardless of constitutional restraint must be totally eschewed. Will of the people cannot be permitted to be subordinated to political expediency of the Prime Minister or the Chief Minister as the case may be, to have in his cabinet a non-legislator as a Minister for an indefinite period by repeated reappointments without the individual seeking popular mandate of the electorate."

Accordingly, the Supreme Court has expressed its "considered opinion" that—

> "It would be subverting the Constitution to permit an individual, who is not a member of the Legislature, to be appointed a Minister repeatedly for a term of "six consecutive months", without him getting elected in the meanwhile. The practice would be clearly derogatory to the constitutional scheme, improper, undemocratic and invalid."[47]

The Supreme Court has made another momentous pronouncement in B.R. Kapur v. State of Tamil Nadu[48] in relation to Art. 164(4). The matter arose in the following factual context. The nomination paper of Jayalalitha for election to the State Legislative Assembly was rejected. She had been convicted for certain offences under the Prevention of Corruption Act and the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to three years'rigorous imprisonment. She had appealed to the High Court against her conviction; the High Court suspended her sentence but not her conviction pending decision on her appeal. Accordingly, she was disqualified to contest an election to the House. As a result of the election, her party [AIDMK] won by a big majority and elected her as the leader. The Governor of Tamil Nadu appointed her as the Chief Minister under Art. 164(4) as she was not a member of the State Legislature at this time. Her appointment as the CM was challenged and the Supreme Court declared the same as null and void.

The crucial question was whether a person who is disqualified to be a member of the State Legislature could be appointed as a Minister or the Chief Minister under Art. 164(4). The Supreme Court argued in the negative. The Court has argued that it is implicit in Art. 164(4) [read along with Arts. 164(1) and (2)] that a Minister who is not a member of the Legislature must seek election to the Legislature and secure a seat therein, within six months of his appointment. If he fails

---

45. Ibid, at 2718.
46. Ibid, at 2719.
47. Ibid, at 2720.
48. JT 2001 (8) SC 40 : (2001) 7 SCC 231.

to do so, he ceases to be a Minister. It, therefore, follows from this that a person appointed as a Minister should be one who can stand for election to the Legislature and satisfy the requirement of Art. 164(4). This means that he should be one who satisfies the qualification for membership of the State Legislature [Art. 173] and is not disqualified from seeking that membership by reason of any provision in Art. 191 on the date of his appointment as a Minister.

The idea underlying Art. 164(4) is that due to political exigencies, or to avail the services of an expert in some field, a person may have to be appointed as a Minister without his being a member of the State Legislature at the time of his appointment. He has 6 months for this purpose. This means that he should be a person who, when he is appointed, is not debarred from being a member of the Legislature. This means that he should be qualified to stand for the election to the Legislature and is not disqualified to do so. Art. 164(4) is not intended for the induction into the Council of Ministers of someone who is ineligible to stand for election to the State Legislature.

The Court has stated that it would be "unreasonable and anomalous to conclude that a minister who is a member of the Legislature is required to meet the constitutional standards of qualification and disqualification but that a Minister who is not a member of the Legislature need not." "Logically, the standards expected of a Minister who is not a member should be the same as, if not greater than, those required of a member".

If the Governor appoints a disqualified person to a constitutional office, the discretion of the Governor may not be challengeable because of Art. 361[49], but that does not confer any immunity on the appointee himself. The qualification of the appointee to hold the office can be challenged in proceedings for quo warranto.[50] If the appointment is contrary to any constitutional provision, it can be quashed by the Court.

The Supreme Court rejected the argument that Jayalalitha had people's mandate to become the Chief Minister of the State as is evidenced by her party having won at the election. The Court's reply to this argument is—

> "The Constitution prevails over the will of the people as expressed through the majority party. The will of the people as expressed through the majority party prevails only if it is in accord with the Constitution."[51]

The Chief Minister is formally appointed by the Governor [Art. 164(1)].[52]

Although under Art. 164(1), the Governor appoints the Chief Minister, the Constitution is completely silent as to the person who should be appointed as such. The basic rule followed for the purpose is that the leader of the majority party in the State Legislative Assembly should be invited by the Governor to form the Government. When no party has a clear-cut majority in the legislature, the appointment of the Chief Minister becomes problematic. A question has also been raised from time to time whether the appointment of the Chief Minister by the Governor is judicially reviewable. These questions have been discussed in

---

49. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i); Sec. A(i)(c).
50. Infra, Ch. VIII; see, Kumar Padma Prasad v. Union of India, supra, Ch. IV.
51. JT 2001 (8) SC at 66.
52. See, supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(iii)(b), on the appointment of the Prime Minister.

some detail later in this Chapter under the heading "Governor's Discretionary Powers".[53]

There is no convention to the effect that only a member of the Legislative Assembly should be appointed as the Chief Minister. Many a time, members of Lgislative Councils have been appointed as Chief Ministers, for example, C. Rajagopalachari in Madras and Morarji Desai in Bombay in 1952; C.B. Gupta in U.P. in 1960 and Mandal in Bihar in 1968. It is, however, realised that the Chief Minister should properly belong to the Lower House and so a Chief Minister from the Upper House seeks the earliest opportunity to get elected to the Lower House.

At times, while appointing the Chief Minister, the Governor imposes the condition that he should seek a vote of confidence from the State Assembly within a stipulated period. There is no specific provision in the Constitution enabling the Governor to require the Chief Minister to prove his majority on the floor of the House. The question has been raised whether in the absence of any such constitutional provision, can the Governor impose such a condition on the C.M.? The Patna High Court has ruled that the Governor can impose such a condition in his discretion. The underlying idea is to ensure that there is in office a Chief Minister who enjoys the confidence of the majority in the House. The principle of collective responsibility envisages that the Council of Ministers enjoys majority support in the House. When it is doubtful whether the Chief Minister enjoys majority support in the House or not, the Governor can call on him to seek a vote of confidence from the House. The Constitution specifically provides neither for a vote of confidence nor for a vote of no-confidence for or against the government in the House. But it would be preposterous to suggest that there can be no such vote because the Constitution is silent on the point. The entire constitutional scheme would collapse if Art. 164 is interpreted in such a manner.[54]

While the Chief Minister is appointed by the Governor in his discretion, other Ministers are appointed by the Governor on the advice of the Chief Minister. Therefore, in effect, the Ministers are the appointees of the Chief Minister [Art. 164(1)], though he does not have an absolute discretion in the matter as he has to keep party consideration in view.

The Congress Chief Ministers function subject to the supervision of the High Command of the Party which, to some extent, does compromise their independence of action. Similarly, the B.J.P. Chief Ministers function under the control of the Party's central leadership. This, of course, is an extra-constitutional practice.

In the States of Bihar, Madhya Pradesh and Orissa, there has to be a Minister in charge of tribal welfare, who may also be put in charge of the welfare of the Scheduled Castes and Backward Classes or any other work [Proviso to Art. 164(1)].[55]

The salaries and allowances of the Ministers are determined by the State Legislature by law [Art. 164(5)].[56]

---

53. Infra, Sec. C.
54. Sapru, Jayakar Motilal CR Dass v. Union of India, AIR 1999 Pat. 221.
55. See, infra, Ch. XXXV.
56. Until so determined, they are to be as specified in the Second Schedule to the Constitution.

The provisions defining the tenure of the Council of Ministers in the States are parallel to those at the Centre. Thus, (i) the Council of Ministers in a State is collectively responsible to the Legislative Assembly [Art. 164(2)],[57] and not to the Legislative Council and (ii) the Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the Governor [Art. 164(1)].[58] The concept of the Governor's pleasure is discussed below. The Chief Minister can invoke the Governor's pleasure to dismiss an unwanted Minister.[59]

Article 177, noted above, which enables a Minister to participate in the proceedings of a House even if he is not a member thereof is designed to strengthen the principle of ministerial accountability to the Legislative Assembly. Ministerial responsibility means that the minister is able to answer in the House for every act of administration. The concept of ministerial responsibility ensures that the government is in line with the popular opinion.

Besides collective responsibility of the Cabinet, a Minister also has his individual responsibility. This matter has already been discussed earlier.[60]

(b) OATH OF OFFICE AND MINISTERS

Before a Minister enters upon his office, the Governor administers to him the prescribed oaths of office and secrecy [Art. 164(3)]. What happens if a Minister breaks the oath taken by him at the time of his induction into the office of the Minister?

A Minister (Mr. Balakrishna Pillai) in the Kerala Government was reported to have said at a public meeting that people should resort to terrorism and wage a war against the Central Government on the Punjab model to achieve their objectives. A citizen of India filed a petition in the High Court for issue of quo warranto[61] preventing the Minister from exercising the authority of his office on the ground that his speech amounted to a breach of the oath taken by him at the time of assuming office as a Minister and he thus forfeited his right to continue as a Minister. The Minister resigned his office. The Court however dismissed the petition.

In K.C. Chandy v. R. Balakrishna,[62] the Kerala High Court emphasized that when a Minister commits breach of his oath of office, it is for the Governor or the Chief Minister to decide whether he should remain in office. The Court said that it would be wrong to assume that no sanctity is attached to the oath taken before assumption of office. No Minister could enter upon his office without taking oaths of office and secrecy. The constitutional requirement of taking such an oath is not to be treated merely as another moral obligation. The oath of office is the prescription of fundamental code of conduct in the discharge of the

---

57. For discussion on the concept of 'Collective Responsibility', see, supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(d).
58. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(iii)(d).
59. There have been a number of cases of dismissal of the Ministers in the States. For example, in 1964, the Punjab Governor dismissed a Minister on the Chief Minister's advice because he had misused his official influence.
On Nov. 18, 1973, the Governor of Himachal Pradesh dismissed a Minister on the advice of the Chief Minister : The Times of India, Nov. 19, 1973, p. 1.
60. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(e).
61. For discusison on quo warranto, see, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. E.
62. AIR 1986 Ker 116.
Also, K.Sukumaran v. Union of India, AIR 1986 Ker. 122.

duties of the high office. Breach of this fundamental conduct of good behaviour may result in the deprivation of the office he holds. It is for the Governor or the Chief Minister to inquire whether there has been any breach of oath by a Minister. This is a matter to be decided under Art. 164(1) because the Minister holds his office subject to the pleasure of the Governor or the Chief Minister. It is not for a Court to embark on such an inquiry. The High Court also pointed out that breach of oath of office taken by a Minister is not a disqualification constitutionally listed under Art. 191 of the Constitution or specified under any law made by Parliament.[63]

After sometime, Pillai was reinducted as a Minister and again a writ petition was filed challenging his appointment. The writ petition was again dismissed by the High Court. The Court maintained that the question whether the Minister committed breach of oath could not be examined by it as "these are not matters which are open to judicial review. The intention of the founding fathers of the Constitution was to leave such matters to the good sense of the Chief Minister and the legislature with the general public holding a watching brief." Since the office of the Minister is held at the pleasure of the Governor or the Chief Minister "termination at their will may be the possible outcome of a breach of oath". Matters which are entirely within the realm of the "pleasure and unfettered discretion of the appointing authority" are not amenable to the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art. 226.[64]

To the same effect is the ruling of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in Hardwari Lal v. Ch. Bhajan Lal.[65] The Court has ruled that breach of oath by a Chief Minister does not give rise to any disqualification under Arts. 191 and 192. Similarly, breach of oath by him does not disqualify him from holding that office. The Constitution makes no provision as regards the consequences arising from breach of oath by a Minister. The Chief Minister is appointed by the Governor and he holds office during his pleasure. Arts. 191 and 192 exhaustively deal with and furnish a composite machinery regarding disqualification of a member of the Legislature. Therefore, a Court cannot issue any writ to remove a Chief Minister from office on the ground of breach of oath by him. It is for the Governor as the appointing authority to take cognisance of any such matter and not for the Court to terminate the tenure of a Minister on any such ground.

The Andhra Pradesh High Court has refused to issue quo warranto[66] to remove the Chief Minister from office because various allegations had been made against him. Power to terminate the tenure of office vests solely in the Governor.[67]

A code of conduct for Ministers (both Central and State) has been issued by the Government of India, Ministry of Home Affairs. The Government of Andhra Pradesh has also issued a code of conduct for Ministers. The High Court has ruled that these codes are not statutory in nature. Though they lay down rules of

---

63. For disqualifications under Art. 191, see, supra, Chs. II and VI.

64. Sukumaran v. Union of India, AIR 1987 Ker. 212.
For discussion on Art. 226, see, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. D.

65. AIR 1993 P & H 3.

66. See, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. E.

67. D. Satyanarayana v. N.T. Rama Rao, AIR 1988 AP 62. Also see, Ramachandran v. M.G. Ramachandran, AIR 1987 Mad 207.
On this point see, infra, under "Governor's Discretionary Powers".

conduct which the Ministers have to observe, they are in the nature of guidelines and, therefore, the courts cannot enforce these codes against any Minister by issuing any writ.[68]

(c) INTERACTION BETWEEN THE EXECUTIVE AND THE LEGISLATURE

The pattern of interaction between the Executive and the Legislature in a State is similar to that existing at the Centre.[69] A few broad features of this may be recapitulated here.

The Ministers are members of the Legislature and responsible to the Legislative Assembly.[70] They stay in office so long as they are able to command the confidence of the majority in that House.

The Legislature has ample opportunities of criticising and shaping the policies of the Executive. It is a recurring process and opportunity is taken in this respect inter alia at the time of legislation, discussion of the Governor's speech and his messages and consideration of demands.[71]

Further, the Legislature is entitled to fix the emoluments of the Ministers.[72] The ordinance-making power of the Executive is also subject to legislative control.[73]

As at the Centre so in the States, the Executive also has ample opportunities to control the Legislature. It summons and prorogues the Houses and may dissolve the Assembly.[74] It initiates practically all legislation and enjoys a veto power over legislation.[75] It plays a leading part in discussion on financial matters in the Legislature and initiates all demands.[76]

B. WORKING OF THE EXECUTIVE

(a) CONDUCT OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS

Arts. 154 and 166 regulate the working of the State Executive. Art. 166 relates to the conduct of business of the State Government and is couched in terms similar to those in Art. 77 and the same principles govern the interpretation of Art. 166.[77] The State being the author of a decision, cannot resile or go back on that decision merely because it was the order of the previous government. If the order of that government was not acceptable to the newly elected Government, it was open to it to withdraw or rescind the same formally. It is not open to the State to contend that the said decision did not bind it.[78]

The executive power of the State is vested in the Governor who exercises it either directly or through officers subordinate to him in accordance with the Con-

---

68. Vidadala Harinadhababu v. N.T. Rama Rao, AIR 1990 AP 898.
69. See, Supra, Ch. III, Sec. C.
70. See, supra,
71. Supra, Ch. VI.
72. Supra, footnote 40.
73. Art. 213; infra.
74. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. C.
75. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. F(i), under "Legislation"
76. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. F(ii), under "Financial Procedure".
77. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
78. State of Bihar v. Bihar Rajya MSESKK Mahasangh, (2005) 9 SCC 129 : AIR 2005 SC 1605.

stitution [Art. 154(1)]. Parliament or the State Legislature may confer by law functions on any authority subordinate to the Governor [Art. 154(2)(b)].

The Governor is empowered to make rules for the more convenient transaction of the business of the State Government [Art. 166(3)]. Under these Rules, known as the Rules of Business, the government business is divided amongst the Ministers and specific functions are allotted to different Ministries.[79] Each Ministry can, therefore, issue orders or notifications in respect of functions which have been allocated to it under the Rules of Business.

All executive action of the State Government is expressed to be taken in the name of the Governor [Art. 166(1)]. This clause applies to cases where the executive action has to be expressed in the shape of a formal order or notification. It prescribes the mode in which an executive action has to be expressed. Orders and instruments made and executed in the Governor's name are to be authenticated in such manner as may be specified in the rules made by him. The validity of an instrument so authenticated cannot be called into question on the ground that it is not an order or instrument made or executed by the Governor [Art. 166(2)].

These provisions are synonymous with Arts. 53 and 77, discussed earlier, in relation to the working of the Central Executive.[80] Consequently, the earlier discussion can be adopted here. Common principles apply to the Central and State Executive in this regard.[81] The discussion here will apply mutatis mutandis to the Central Executive as well.

The Supreme Court has observed in Barsay[82] that Art. 77(1) is only directory. Similarly, Art. 166(1) is also directory in nature. Any non-compliance therewith, does not make the order invalid. Even if an order is not issued in strict compliance with the provisions of Art. 166(1), i.e. the words "by order", or "in the name of the Governor" are absent therein, it can be established by evidence aliunde that the impugned order was made by the appropriate authority. If an order is issued in the name of the Governor, and is duly authenticated in the manner prescribed in Art. 166(2), there is an irrebuttable presumption that the order or instrument is made or executed by the Governor. Any non-compliance with Art. 166(2) does not invalidate the order, but it precludes the drawing of any such irrebuttable presumption. This does not prevent any one from proving by other evidence that as a matter of fact the order has been made by the appropriate authority.[83]

No particular formula of words are required for compliance. Clause (1) does not prescribe how an executive action of the Government is to be performed; it only prescribes the mode in which such act is to be expressed. While clause (1) is in relation to the mode of expression, clause (2) lays down the ways in which the

---

79. A typical Rule of Business runs as follows:
"The Governor shall, on the advice of the Chief Minister, allocate amongst the Ministers and Ministers of State the business of Government by assigning one or more departments to the charge of a Minister or a Minister of State".

80. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. E.

81. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.

82. Major E.G. Barsay v. State of Bombay, AIR 1961 SC 1762 at 1776 : 1962 (2) SCR 195.
Also, Dattatraya Moreshwar v. State of Bombay, AIR 1952 SC 181 : 1952 SCR 612, L.G. Chaudhari v. Secy. L.S.G. Dept., Govt. of Bihar, AIR 1980 SC 383 : 1980 Supp SCC 374. Cf an order in exercise of quasi-judicial power. State of Maharashtra v. Basantilal, (2003) 10 SCC 620 : AIR 2003 SC 4688.

83. M/s. Laxmi Udyog Rock Cement Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 2001 Ori. 51.

order is to be authenticated.[84] When there was no government order to pay compensation to terminated employee in terms of Art. 166, no action can be regarded as that of the State since Council of Ministers are advisers and, as Head of State, Governor is to act with aid or advice of Council of Ministers. Therefore, till advice is accepted by Governor, views of Council of Ministers do not get crystallized into action of State.[85]

An order initiating departmental proceedings under the M.P. Civil Services Pension Rules was executed in the name of the Governor and was duly authenticated by the signatures of the Under Secretary to the Government of Madhya Pradesh. The Supreme Court ruled in State of Madhya Pradesh v. Yashwant Trimbak,[86] that the order could not be questioned in any Court on the ground that it was not made or executed by the Governor. The bar to judicial enquiry with regard to the validity of such order engrafted in Art. 166(2) would be attracted. "The signature of the concerned Secretary or Under Secretary who is authorised under the authentication rules to sign the document signifies the consent of the Governor as well as the acceptance of the advice rendered by the concerned Minister".

In an earlier case, State of Bihar v. Rani Sonabati Kumari,[87] considering the question with reference to a notification issued under s. 3(1) of the Bihar Land Reform Act, 1950, the Supreme Court held:

> "The order of Government in the present case is expressed to be made "in the name of the Governor" and is authenticated as prescribed by Art. 166(2), and consequently the validity of "the order or instrument cannot be called in question on the ground that it is not an order or instrument made or executed by the Governor".

Even when an order is issued by the Secretary to the Government without indicating that it is by order of the Governor, the immunity in Art. 166(2) would be available if it appears from other material that in fact the decision was taken by the Government.[88]

In Yashwant Trimbak,[89] there was another point also involved. According to the Pension Rules, departmental proceedings against a retired employee could not be instituted without the "sanction of the Governor". It was argued that the rule envisaged sanction of the Governor himself but the Court rejected the argument. The Court argued that the order of sanction for prosecution of a retired government servant is an executive act of the government. Under Art. 166(3), the Governor may frame rules of business and allocate all his functions to different Ministers except those functions which the Governor discharges in his own discretion. The expression 'business of the Government of the State" in Art. 166(3) comprises functions which the Governor is to exercise with the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers including the functions which the Governor has to exer-

---

84. J. P. Bansal v. State of Rajasthan (2003) 5 SCC 134 : AIR 2003 SC 1405.
85. Ibid.
86. AIR 1996 SC 765 : 1996 (2) SCC 305.
Also, Gulabrao Keshavrao Patil v. State of Gujarat, (1996) 2 SCC 26; Mohansingh Tanwani v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 2002 Bom. 39.
87. AIR 1961 SC 221 : 1961 (1) SCR 728.
88. Also see, Municipal Corp. of Delhi v. Birla Cotton Spinning & Weaving Mills, AIR 1968 SC 1232 : 1968 (3) SCR 251.
89. Supra, footnote 86.

cise in his own subjective satisfaction as well as statutory functions of the State Government. Therefore, excepting the matters to be discharged by the Governor in his discretion, "the personal satisfaction of the Governor is not required and any function may be allocated to Ministers". Therefore, the decision taken by the Council of Ministers (to whom the function has been allocated under the Rules of Business) to sanction prosecution of the retired government servant is valid and does not suffer from any legal infirmity.[90]

The Supreme Court has observed in Trimbak:[91]

> "Therefore, excepting the matters with respect to which the Governor is required by or under the Constitution to act in his discretion, the personal satisfaction of the Governor is not required and any function may be allocated to Ministers."

In Shamrao v. State of Maharashtra,[92] the Supreme Court has ruled that the statutory functions and duties vested in the State Government may be allocated to Ministers by the Rules of Business framed under Art. 166(3) of the Constitution.

Rules of authentication prescribe the persons who can sign the orders of the government. When an order is expressed in the name of the Governor and is authenticated by an officer authorised to do so under the Rules, it becomes an order of the government and cannot then be called in question on the ground that it was not an order made or executed by the Governor.

The Courts have held that the provisions regarding the form [Art. 166(1)] are directory and not mandatory; even a substantial, and not necessarily a strict, compliance with these requirements would suffice to confer the immunity on the order.[93] Every executive decision need not be expressed in the form laid down in Art. 166(1). An order not conforming with the required form would not be prima facie invalid. Though it might not claim immunity from being challenged on the ground that it was not made by the Governor, yet it is possible to uphold its validity if extraneous evidence shows that the decision was taken by a competent authorityunder the Rules of Business.[94] Thus, an order confirming preventive detention made in the name of the Government, but signed on behalf of the Secretary to the Government of Bombay, has been held valid.[95] The Court concluded that there was ample evidence to show that the decision had in fact been taken by the appropriate authority, and that the infirmity in the form of authentication did not vitiate the order. It only meant that the presumption could not be availed of by the State.

In State of Bombay v. Purushottam Jog Naik,[96] in the body of the order in question, the 'satisfaction' was shown to be that of the Government of Bombay; at the bottom of the order the 'Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Home Department' signed it under the words "By order of the Governor of Bombay". It

---

90. Also see, Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831; supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
91. AIR 1996 SC 765, at 769.
92. AIR 1964 SC 1128 : 1964 (6) SCR 446.
93. Anand Kumar v. State of U.P., AIR 1966 All 545.
94. Chitralekha v. State of Mysore, AIR 1964 SC 1823 : 1964 (6) SCR 368*; Relly Susan Mathew v. Controller of Entrance Exams., Trivandrum,* AIR 1997 Ker 218, 223.
95. Dattatraya v. State of Bombay, AIR 1952 SC 181 : 1952 SCR 612.
Also see, State of Rajasthan v. Spripal Jain, AIR 1963 SC 1323 : 1964 (1) SCR 475.
96. AIR 1952 SC 317 : 1952 SCR 674.

was argued that the order was defective as it was not expressed to be in the name of the Governor within the meaning of Art. 166(1) of the Constitution and so was not protected by Art. 166(2). Rejecting the contention, the Supreme Court said:

> "In our opinion, the Constitution does not require a magic incantation which can only be expressed in a set formula of words. What we have to see is whether the substance of the requirements is there".

In P. Joseph John v. Travancore-Cochin,[1] a show-cause notice issued under Art. 311 was impugned on the ground that it was not in accordance with Art. 166. The notice was issued on behalf of the Government and was signed by the Chief Secretary to the Government. Under the Rules of Business, the Chief Secretary was in charge of the portfolio of "Service and Appointments" at the Secretariat level in the State. The Court ruled that the said notice was issued in substantial compliance with the directory provisions of Art. 166.

Mere notings in the file by the officers and the Minister which were not communicated to the person concerned, cannot be held to be an order of the government. For an order to be effective it must be expressed in the name of the Governor [Art. 166(1)], authenticated in the manner provided in Art. 166(2), and communicated to the person concerned.[2] Inter-departmental communications also cannot be regarded as orders of the government.[3]

In Chitralekha v. State of Mysore,[4] an order of the Mysore Government expressed through a letter from the Under Secretary, Mysore Government, though not conforming with Art. 166, was not quashed by the Supreme Court as it was not denied by any one that it was an order made by the Government. An order of the Government withdrawing certain amenities from the employees issued in the form of a letter signed by the Under Secretary to the Government was held to be a valid order under Art. 166 as the decision in question was taken by the Minister of the Department concerned who was empowered under the Rules of Business to take such decision.[5]

Merely because the Chief Minister informed the press conference about a decision taken by the Council of Ministers the previous day, it cannot be said that there was an order of the government in terms of Art. 166(1). Before a decision of the Council of Ministers amounts to an order of the government, it should fulfil two conditions viz.: (1) it has to be expressed in the name of the Governor [Art. 166(1)]; and (2) it has to be communicated to the persons concerned. Until these conditions are fulfilled, it only remains a tentative order and the government is competent to reconsider the matter and take a fresh decision.[6]

As a matter of form, legislation usually confers powers on the 'Governor' [or the 'President'], or the 'State Government', [or the 'Central Government']. The government being an impersonal entity has necessarily to function through a hu-

---

1. AIR 1955 SC 160 : 1955 (1) SCR 1011.
2. Bachhittar Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1963 SC 395 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 713.
For a comment on the case see, 5 JILI 418 (1963).
Also see, State of Bihar v. Kripalu Shankar, AIR 1987 SC 1554 : (1987) 3 SCC 34.
3. Ghaio Mal v. Delhi, AIR 1959 SC 65 : 1959 SCR 1424.
4. AIR 1964 SC 1823 : 1964 (6) SCR 368.
5. M.V. Srinivasa v. State of Andhra Pradesh, (1997) 6 SCC 589 : AIR 1997 SC 3008.
6. State of Kerala v. A Lakshmikutty, AIR 1987 SC 331 : (1986) 4 SCC 632.
For a fuller discussion on this question, See, M.P. JAIN, INDIAN ADM. LAW, CASES AND MATERIALS, II, Ch. XIV, Sec. F, 1550-1564.

man agency. According to S. 3(60) of the General Clauses Act, the term 'State Government' means a Governor, and the 'Central Government' means 'President'. However, no one expects that the 'Governor' or 'President' should discharge all the functions personally.

The Rules of Business lay down who has to take what decision. Usually, these Rules enable the Minister-in-charge of a department to dispose of cases coming before him; and the Minister is also authorised to make standing orders, and to give such directions as he thinks fit, for disposal of cases in his department. In practice, therefore, the Governor rarely passes any executive order himself, except where a matter falls within his discretion.[7]

At times, a statute may itself provide for delegation of power by the government. Generally speaking, such a statutory provision is supplementary, and does not exclude making of decisions according, to the Rules of Business, and both co-exist.

Even when the statute formally requires the 'satisfaction' of the 'Government', 'Governor' or the 'President', for taking an action, action can be taken in the usual manner, without the personal satisfaction of the Head of the State[8], by the officers authorised to take decisions under the Rules of Business.[9]

Under a statutory regulation, an appeal from an order of the State Public Service Commission passed by it in disciplinary proceedings against an employee lay to the Governor. Rejecting the argument that the appeal ought to be heard by the Governor himself, and not by the State Government, the Supreme Court observed in the following case[10] that hearing of such an appeal is "not one of those functions which the Governor is required to exercise in his discretion under any of the provisions of the Constitution. The Governor has therefore to act on the advice of the State Government." Accordingly, the appellate power in the instant case could be exercised in accordance with Art. 166 of the Constitution.

Under S. 68(c) of the Motor Vehicles Act, a draft scheme to nationalize certain bus routes was prepared and published. The scheme was challenged on the ground that the 'opinion' requisite under the Act, was formed not by the State Government but by the Secretary of Labour to the Government. The argument was that the functions under the Motor Vehicles Act relate to the Transport Department, and the requisite satisfaction under the Act could be formed either by the Council of Ministers, or the Minister to whom the business under the Act had been allocated under the Business Rules, but not by the Secretary, and that, too, by one who was not the Head of the Transport Department to which the functions in question had been assigned.

In the above case, the Supreme Court rejecting the argument held that under Art. 166(3), the Governor can allocate any function, barring those which fall within his discretion, to any Minister or official. Therefore, Business Rule 23A

---

7. Infra, Sec. C.

8. Godavari v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1964 SC 1128 : 1964 (6) SCR 446; C.M.P. Co-operative Societies v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1967 SC 1815 : 1967 (3) SCR 329.

9. Ishwarlal v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1968 SC 870. Also, Mohan v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1974 Cal 25; Bijaya Lakshmi Cotton Mills v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1967 SC 1145 : 1967 (2) SCR 406.

10. U.P.P.S. Commission at Allahabad v. Suresh Chandra, AIR 1987 SC 1953 : (1987) 4 SCC 176.

under which the Secretary in question had been empowered to take the decision was valid. The Court emphasized that in a well-planned administration, most of the decisions are taken by civil servants, and the primary function of the Minister is to lay down policies and supervise administration and not to burden himself with day to day administration.

The Governor is essentially the constitutional head; the administration of the State is run by the Council of Ministers. But, in the very nature of things, it is impossible for the Council of Ministers to decide each and every matter which comes before the government. So, Rules of Business are made under Art. 166(2) for the convenient transaction of government business. Even a Minister is not expected to burden himself with the day to day administration. His main function is to lay down policies and programmes of his Ministry. Decisions in specific cases are thus taken by officials under the Rule of Business.

A civil servant takes a decision not as a delegate of his Minister but on behalf of the government. He takes decisions under the Business Rules as a 'limb' of the government and not as a person to whom the power of the government has been delegated. When functions entrusted to a Minister are discharged by an official, there is, in law, no delegation because constitutionally the official's decision is that of the Minister.[11] Any type of power—administrative, quasi-judical or legislative—conferred on the Head of the State or the Government can be discharged by civil servants according to the Business Rules.[12]

Under Art. 311(2)(c), a civil servant can be dismissed without an enquiry if the President or the Governor, as the case may be, is satisfied that in the interest of the State, it is not expedient to hold such an inquiry. It has been held by the Supreme Court that under Art. 311(2)(c), the personal satisfaction of the President or the Governor is not necessary. The satisfaction of the Governor for the exercise of powers or functions [other than his discretionary functions] required by the Constitution is not the personal satisfaction of the Governor but is the satisfaction in the constitutional sense under the Cabinet System of government. The President/Governor acts in this matter, as in any other matter, on ministerial advice. The matter can be disposed of according to the Rules of Business.[13]

The Supreme Court has recently sounded a note of warning to the bureaucrats exercising powers of the government. The Court has observed that "senior officers occupying key positions" who take decisions on behalf of the government "are not supposed to mortgage their own discretion, volition and decision making authority and be prepared to give way or being pushed back or pressed ahead at the behest of politicians for carrying out commands having no sanctity in law."[14]

The Collector issued a notification under section 4(1) of the Land Acquisition Act for acquiring certain land. After hearing objections under section 5A, he forwarded his report to the government for appropriate decision. The Revenue De-

---

11. A Sanjeevi v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102 : (1970) 1 SCC 443.

12. Gullapalli N. Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh S.R.T. Corp. (The Gullapalli case), AIR 1959 SC 308 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 319.

13. Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831; supra.
Also see, Bhuri Nath v. State of J&K, AIR 1997 SC 1711, 1721 : (1997) 2 SCC 745.
For discussion on Art. 311(2)(c), see, infra, Ch. XXXVI.

14. Tarlochan Dev Sharma v. State of Punjab, AIR 2001 SC 2524, 2531 : (2001) 6 SCC 260.
Also see, Anirudh Sinhji Jadeya v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1995 SC 2390 : (1995) 5 SCC 302.

partment decided not to proceed with the acquisition, and, accordingly, in a letter requested the land acquisition officer to take necessary proceedings accordingly. The Ministry of Urban Development disagreeing with the view of the Ministry of Revenue moved the Chief Minister to have the issue re-examined. Before any decision was taken, the Revenue Department again requested the land acquisition officer to take further action as requested above. As no action was taken by the land acquisition officer, the appellants approached the High Court and the matter ultimately came before the Supreme Court. Referring to Arts. 166(1) and (2), the Supreme Court ruled in the instant case,[15] that there was no final decision taken by the Minister of Revenue.

It appeared from the Business Rules that both the departments were entitled to deal with the subject of land acquisition and valuation thereof. According to the Instructions issued under the Rules of Business where the subject of a case concerns more than one department, no order is to be issued unless all departments concerned have examined the case. If the departments disagree, the case may be submitted to the Chief Minister for orders for laying the case before the Cabinet. So the decision of the Revenue Minister was not final because the other department did not agree with it. According to the Instructions, when the matter was brought to the Chief Minister, who holds the ultimate responsibility and is accountable to the people, he should place the decision before the Cabinet and then the Chief Minister could take the decision. Therefore, in the instant case, no final decision had been taken by the Chief Minister whether to drop or proceed with the acquisition.

Articles 77 and 166 do not in reality amount to any delegation of power. The decision of a Minister or an officer under the Rules of Business is regarded as the decision of the President or the Governor.

A properly expressed and authenticated order, though not challengeable on the ground that it has not been made or executed by the Governor, may, nevertheless, be challenged on other grounds,[16] as for example, inter alia: the condition precedent to the making of the order has not been fulfilled, or that the principles of natural justice have not been observed where it was necessary to do so,[17] or that it has not been made in accordance with law, or that it has not been made by the person authorised to do so under the Rules of Business, or that it does not correctly reflect the actual decision taken by the government,[18] or that the discretion has not been exercised properly.[19] This aspect of the matter falls legitimately under the scope of Administrative Law.[20]

There are, however, certain powers conferred by the Constitution on the Governor or the President which cannot be entrusted to anybody and the Governor or the President, as the case may be, has to sign the order himself. A few examples of such powers are: ordinance-making power;[21] power to give assent to Bills;[22]

---

15. Gulabrao Keshavrao v. State of Gujarat, (1996) 2 SCC 26.
16. Benoy Krishna v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1966 Cal. 429; Parkash Chand v. Union of India, AIR 1965 Punj. 270.
17. The Gullapalli case, supra.
18. E.P.Royappa v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1974 SC 555 : (1974) 4 SCC 3.
19. King Emperor v. Sibnath, AIR 1945 PC 156.
20. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, I, Ch. XIX.
Also see, JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, III, Ch XVI.
21. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(d); infra, Sec. D(ii)(c).
22. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. J(i)(c); Ch. VI, Sec. F(i).

President's proclamation of emergency under Art. 352;[23] President's proclamation of taking over a State Government under Art. 356,[24] or to declare a financial emergency under Art. 360.[25]

As has already been noted earlier, the President acts on the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers and the same is true of the functions of the Governor except those which he has to exercise in his discretion. Wherever the Constitution requires satisfaction of Governor for exercise of any power or function such satisfaction is not the personal satisfaction of the Governor but the satisfaction in the constitutional sense under the cabinet system of government. The Governor exercises all his powers and functions by or under the Constitution on the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers, save in limited spheres where Governor is required to exercise his functions in his own discretion.[26]Thus, apart from a few of the President's functions, mentioned here, and the Governor's discretionary functions discussed below, all other functions can be discharged under Arts. 77 and 166.

C. GOVERNOR'S DISCRETIONARY POWERS

The concept of the Governor acting in his discretion or exercising independent judgment is not alien to the Constitution. The normal rule is that the Governor acts on the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers and not independently or contrary to it. But there are exceptions under which the Governor can act in his own discretion. Although some of the exceptions were pointed out, they are not exhaustive.[27]

(1) The Governor is required to discharge certain functions in his "discretion" "by or under the Constitution".

This envisages that the Governor's discretionary powers need not be express but may be necessarily implied.

(2) In the discharge of these functions, he is not required to seek the "aid and advice" of his Council of Ministers.

(3) Whether a function falls within his "discretion" or not, it is the Governor who decides the matter in his "discretion".

(4) The Governor's decision under (3) above is final. He is the sole and final judge whether any function is to be exercised in his discretion or on the advice of his Council of Ministers.

(5) The validity of any thing done by the Governor is not to be called in question on the ground that "he ought or ought not to have acted in his discretion".

It was felt necessary by the makers of the Constitution to confer discretionary power on the Governor for two main reasons: (i) the Governor has to serve as an

---

23. Infra, Ch. XIII.
24. Ibid.
25. Ibid.
26. Pu Myllai Hychho v. State of Monogram, (2005) 2 SCC 92 : AIR 2005 SC 1537.
27. M.P. Special Police Establishment v. State of M.P., (2004) 8 SCC 788.

agent of the Central Government in the State; and (ii) he is an important link between the Centre and the State to maintain the unity and integrity of the country.[28]

Under the Constitution, there are several categories of action which the Governor may take in his discretion, viz. :

(1) Art. 200 requires him to reserve for the President's consideration any Bill which in his opinion derogates from the powers of the High Court;

(2) To reserve any other Bill [Art. 200];

(3) To appoint the Chief Minister of the State;[29]

(4) Governor's report under Art. 356;[30]

(5) Governor's responsibility for certain regions such as the Tribal Areas in Assam and responsiblities placed on the Governor's shoulders under Arts. 371A, 371C, 371E, 371H.[31]

In all other matters, the Governor, like the President, acts on the advice of his Council of Ministers.

In the matter of grant of sanction to prosecute a Chief Minister or a Minister the Governor is normally required to act on the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers and not in his own discretion. It is also presumed that a high authority like the Council of Ministers will normally act in a bona fide manner, fairly, honestly and in accordance with law. Where as a matter of propriety the Governor may have to act in his own discretion, or where bias is inherent or manifest in the advice of the Council of Ministers or, on those rare occasions where on facts the bias becomes apparent or the decision of the Council of Ministers is shown to be irrational and based on non consideration of relevant factors, the Governor would be right to act in his own discretion and grant sanction. Similar would be the situation if the Council of Ministers disables itself or disentitles itself from giving such advice. In appropriate facts and circumstances, the Governor may exercise in his own discretion otherwise it would lead to a situation where people in power may break the law with impunity safe in the knowledge that they will not be prosecuted as the requisite sanction will not be granted.[32]

It is well settled that the exercise of administrative power will stand vitiated if there is a manifest error on record or the exercise of power is arbitrary. In the M.P. Special Police etc.[33] The office of the Lokayukta was held by a former Judge of the Supreme Court. It is difficult to assume that such a high authority would give a report without any material whatsoever. No law is intended to be laid down in this behalf however. Each case may be judged on its own merits. When the Council of Ministers takes a decision in exercise of its jurisdiction, it

---

28. VIII CAD, 489, 495.
29. Supra, Sec. A(ii)(a).
30. Infra, Ch. XIII.
31. See, Ch. IX, infra.
32. M.P. Special Police Establishment v. State of M.P., (2004) 8 SCC 788.
33. M.P. Special Police Establishment v. State of M.P., (2004) 8 SCC 788.

must act fairly and reasonably. It must not only act within the four corners of the statute but also for effectuating the purpose and object for which the statute has been enacted where the decision of the Council of Ministers was ex facie irrational and based on non consideration of relevant matters the Governor can decide on his own discretion and grant sanction. whereas the decision of the Governor was not.

So long as one party (i.e., the Congress) with very stable majorities was in office in all the States as well as the Centre, the office of the Governor was not regarded as very significant. Liaison between the States and the Centre was conducted to a large extent at the party level. In fact, doubts were raised whether the Governor's office served any useful purpose, so that Prime Minister Nehru had to explain the role of the Governors to dispel the sense of their futility.[34] He said that they played a useful role which might become very important on occasions. A Governor was a factor in bringing various groups and parties together. He could do a great deal to lessen tensions. He could not obviously overrule the government but his advice was always available. If in some vital matters, the Governor thought that there was a breach of the Constitution, he could refer it to the President. Normally speaking, decisions were of the government but the government should keep an intimate touch with the Governor and consult him formally or informally. The importance of the Governor's office was partly constitutional but largely conventional. Much depended on the personality of the Governor.

But, with the emergence of the multi-party system in the wake of the fourth general elections, the office of the Governor has become more directly involved in the constitutional process and has assumed significance both as a link between the Centre and the States as well as for maintaining an effective constitutional machinery within the States. In this process, the Governor's office has also become controversial, as whatever decision a Governor takes, whether as the representative of the Centre, or the constitutional Head of the State, he becomes a centre of controversy, for one or the other political party feels dissatisfied and thus criticises him and attributes to him partisan motives. This also brings the Central Government into controversy, for the Governor being an appointee of the Centre, and holding his office during its pleasure, is regarded as the Centre's creature, and the disgruntled political group criticises the Central Government as well for exercise of his discretion by the Governor.

The repercussions and reverberations of decisions taken by the Governors are often heard in Parliament.[35] A Governor's decision may at times lead to a sort of confrontation between the Centre and the States which affects the federal balance to some extent. The Central Government usually takes the formal position that the Governor is free to take a decision in the discharge of his function, that it does not dictate to him one way or the other, and though he may seek advice from the Centre, the final decision rests with him.

---

34. Press Conf., Nov. 7, 1958, reported in The Hindustan Times, Nov. 8, 1958, p. 6.

35. On Nov. 15, 1967, a motion disapproving the Central Government's action "in using the institution of Governors of States not as instruments of proper functioning of the Constitution but as agents of the party in power at the Centre.....", was discussed in the Lok Sabha.

Also see, Lok Sabha Debates, July 20, July 28 and Dec. 4, 1967; (1968) JI, Const. & Parl. Studies, II, 98.

Much of the controversy arises around the use of discretionary powers by the Governors, especially the power to appoint the Chief Minister, to dismiss the ministry and to dissolve the House. These powers are exerciseable by the Governor as Head of the State. Controversy also arises with respect to the use by the Governor of his power to recommend to the President the imposition of his rule under Art. 356. The Governor exercises this power as the Centre's representative in the State—a matter discussed later in the book.[36]

As regards the constitutional text, Governor's powers with regard to the State Legislature and the Ministry are couched practically in the same terms as those of the President. Like the President, the Governor is also enabled to keep himself informed of the administrative developments in the State; and like Art. 78,[37] Art. 167 makes corresponding provisions. Thus, the Chief Minister is obligated to communicate to the Governor all decisions of the Council of Ministers relating to the State administration and proposals for legislation [Art. 167(a)], and to furnish such other information to him as the Governor may call for regarding administration of the affairs of the State and proposals for legislation [Art. 167(b)].[38] Further, if the Governor so requires, the Chief Minister will submit for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister without reference to the Council of Ministers [Art. 167(c)].[39]

This provision, as has already been explained, does not vest the Governor with a power to overrule a ministerial decision, but is designed to strengthen the principle of collective responsibility. It is merely a matter of caution that a decision which in the opinion of the Governor is such as requires the imprimatur of the whole Cabinet, and not of a single Minister alone, should so receive it. No individual Minister should take an important decision behind the back of his colleagues and thus bind them without their knowing anything about it. If this happens very often, the principle of collective responsibility will be sapped of its vitality.

To a great extent, the Chief Minister himself should be able to manage his colleagues and enforce the important constitutional principle of collective responsibility.

The Governor's power is the last safety valve to preserve and promote that principle. Commenting on Art. 167, the Sarkaria Commission has observed:[40]

> "The options available to the Governor under Art. 167 give him persuasive and not dictatorial powers to override or veto the decisions or proposals of his Council of Ministers relating to the administration of the affairs of the State. At best they are powers of giving advice or counselling delay or the need for caution and they are powers which may be used to build bridges between the Government and opposition."

The function of the Council of Ministers is to 'aid and advise' the Governor in the exercise of his functions, even when functions are conferred on the Governor

---

36. Infra. Ch. XIII.
37. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
38. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
39. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
40. Report, 116.

by legislation,[41] except in so far as he is required to exercise his functions in his discretion by or under the Constitution [Art. 163(1)]. The implication of Art. 163(1) is that in the exercise of his discretionary powers, the Governor does not have to seek ministerial advice. Governor's discretionary functions thus lie outside the area of ministerial responsibility.

The expression "by or under" the Constitution used in Art. 163(1) has a wide import. The Constitution may not expressly provide that a particular function is to be exercised by the Governor in his discretion. Still, the tenor or the context of the provision may show that the function is one which the Governor is to exercise in his discretion. If any question arises whether a matter falls within the Governor's discretion or not, the decision of the Governor in his discretion is final, and the validity of anything done by the Governor in his discretion cannot be called in question on the ground that he ought or ought not to have acted in his discretion [Art. 163(2)].[42]

No Court is entitled to inquire whether any, and if so what, advice was tendered by the Ministers to the Governor [Art. 163(3)]. This constitutional provision, which is paralled to Art. 74(2),[43] prohibits an inquiry in respect of two matters: (1) whether any advice was given to the Governor by the Council of Ministers; and (2) if an advice was given what was that advice? The clause applies when no advice has been given as well as when an advice has been given.

Vesting the Governor with discretionary powers was justified in the Constituent Assembly on the ground that "the provincial governments are required to work in subordination to the Central Government," "the Governor will reserve certain things in order to give the President opportunity to see that the rules under which the provincial governments are supposed to act according to the Constitution or in subordination to the Central Government are observed."[44]

While the Governor, like the President, usually acts on ministerial advice, the Governor is not bound to seek such advice in his discretionary area, and he discharges such functions to the best of his judgment.[45] The question of the scope of the Governor's discretionary powers has been raised over and over again during the last several years. It is also a matter of vital importance for the proper functioning of the Indian federal polity.

Comparing Art. 74(1) with Art. 163(1) several significant points of difference become noticeable between the Governor and the President.

(1) Under Art. 74(1), no discretion is left with the President. He is bound by ministerial advice in all his functions. On the other hand, under Art. 163(1), Governor receives "aid and advice" from his Council of Ministers only in those functions which lie outside his 'discretion'.

Prima facie, the use of the word 'discretion' for the Governor, but not for the President, indicates that while the Constitution envisages the possibility of the Governor acting at times in his discretion, i.e., independently of the Ministers, no such possibility has been envisaged for the President. Therefore, it can be said

---

41. Ram Nagina Singh v. S.V. Sahni, AIR 1976 Pat 36.
42. Supru Jayakar Motilal C.R. Das v. Union of India, AIR 1999 Pat 221.
43. For discussion on Art. 74(2), see, supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
44. DR. AMBEDKAR, VIII CAD, 502.
45. Samsher Singh v. State of Punjab, supra.

that the Governor is expected to play a somewhat more activist role than the President, and, to this extent, the Governor differs from the President.

(2) After the 42nd Constitutional Amendment enacted in 1976,[46] ministerial advice has been made binding on the President [Art. 74(1)], but no such provision has been made with respect to the Governor.

Article 163(1) only says that there shall be a Council of Ministers "to aid and advise" the Governor except in so far as he acts in his discretion. Unlike Art. 74(1), Art. 163 does not bind the Governor in accordance with the advice of the Ministers even in the exercise of his non-discretionary functions. But that would hardly make a difference. The position is similar to what existed at the Centre before the amendment of Art. 74(1) in 1976 by the 42nd Constitutional Amendment. Ordinarily, therefore, the Governor acts on the advice of his Ministers except when the function is within his discretionary area.

(3) While the President can require the Council of Ministers to reconsider the advice given by it, and he is bound to act in accordance with the advice given after reconsideration, there is no such provision in the case of the Governor. This also indicates that a Governor may have certain functions to discharge independently of ministerial advice.

The Governors' Committee has clarified the position thus: "..... even though in normal conditions the exercise of the Governor's powers should be on the advice of the Council of Ministers, occasions may arise when the Governor may find that, in order to be faithful to the Constitution and the law and his oath of office, he has to take a particular decision independently."

The Constitution expressly mentions only a few functions which a Governor exercises in his discretion.[47] As to what other functions fall within this category has been left vague and flexible; the Constitution provides no guidelines for deciding this and, in effect, the final judge of the matter is the Governor himself.[48]

Article 163 making reference to Governor's discretion has been phrased in rather wide and general terms. It means that in exercising his powers, the Governor may find that action under a particular article in the Constitution by necessary implication requires him not necessarily to act on the advice of his Council

---

46. For a summary of the provisions of this Amendment, see, infra, Ch. XLII.

47. Under Schedule VI, certain discretionary functions are conferred on the Governors of Assam, Meghalaya, Tripura and Mizoram for the purpose of administration of Tribal Areas in these States. Para 9(2) refers to a limited matter of a possible dispute with regard to the share of royalties to be handed over to a District Council of an autonomous District.

Under Art. 239, a State Governor can be appointed as the Administrator of an adjoining Union Territory and in the administration of the Union Territory, the Governor does not have to act on the advice of his Council of Ministers in the State.

Under Art. 371, the President may by order provide for any special responsibility of the Governors of Maharashtra and Gujarat in respect of Vidarbha, Marathwada, Maharashtra, Saurashtra, Kutch and the rest of Gujarat.

Under Art. 371A, a special responsibility has been placed on the Governor of Nagaland for certain purposes and, in the discharge of these functions, he shall, after consulting his Council of Ministers, exercise his individual judgment as to the action to be taken.

Also see, Art. 371D. See, infra, Ch. IX.

48. On Governor's Discretionary Power, see, M.P. SINGH, Governor's Power to Dismiss Ministers or Council of Ministers—An Empirical Study, 13 JILI 612 (1971); SETALVAD, UNION-STATE RELATIONS (1974).

of Ministers but in his own judgment. On this point, the Governors' Committee has observed: [49]

> "Thus, even though in normal conditions the exercise of the Governor's powers should be on the advice of the Council of Ministers, occasions may arise when the Governor may find that, in order to be faithful to the Constitution and the law and his oath of office, he has to take a particular decision independently. It is however realised that, in the scheme of our Constitution, such occasions will be extremely rare."

The constitutional provisions regarding the Governor's appointment, tenure, functions, etc., show that the Governor holds a dual capacity. On the one hand, he is the constitutional Head of the State and is, thus, a part of the State apparatus. On the other hand, he is the representative of the Central Government in the State and, thus, provides a link with the Centre. From this angle, the Governor's position differs from that of the President who functions merely as the constitutional Head at the Centre.

As the representative of the Centre, the Governor has to serve as the eyes and ears of the Centre and so has to act in his discretion in certain matters. One such matter is reservation of Bills passed by the State Legislature for the assent of the President [Art. 200]. In doing so, the Governor may not always be in agreement with his Council of Ministers. The Governor may be justified to reserve a Bill for Presidential sanction, even if his Council of Ministers advises otherwise, if, in his opinion, the Bill in question would affect the powers of the Union or contravene any provision of the Constitution. Obviously, the State Ministry is not expected to tender any advice to the Governor to reserve a Bill for the Presidential assent (except when the Constitution specifically makes it obligatory to do so). The Governor will, therefore, have to exercise his discretion in the matter whether he should assent to a Bill or reserve it for President's assent.[50] He must reserve the Bill where the Constitution stipulates President's assent.

Under the second proviso to Art. 200, it is obligatory for the Governor to reserve a Bill for President's consideration if, in his 'opinion', if it becomes law, it will so derogate from the powers of the High Court as to endanger the position which that Court is designed to fill by the Constitution.[51] The words 'in his opinion' are very suggestive. It suggests that the Governor has to decide the matter in his discretion. In other cases, the Governor may reserve the Bill if he thinks it to be against the larger interests of the concerned State or India as a whole.

In 1982, the Governor of Jammu and Kashmir refused to give assent to the controversial Resettlement Bill earlier passed by the Legislature and returned the Bill to the House for reconsideration. In his statement, the Governor detailed several constitutional, legal and other reasons for his not giving his assent to the Bill. He said that if he had given his assent to the Bill, it would have paved the way for a severe and grave threat to the security, integrity, solidarity and sovereignty

---

49. Report, 20.
On November 26, 1970, the President appointed a Committee of Governors to study certain aspects pertaining to the 'Role of Governors'. The Committee submitted its report in 1971.

50. Supra; also, infra, Part IV, Ch. X.

51. Supra, Ch. II.

of the country.[52] Obviously, the Governor took this action in his discretion for the State Government was in favour of the Bill becoming the law.[53]

An important matter in which the Governor acts in his discretion is making a report to the President under Art. 356 invoking President's rule in the State because of the breakdown of the constitutional machinery therein.[54] Nor can the Ministry be consulted by the Governor while making a report to the Centre under Art. 356 for the failure of the constitutional machinery in the State may be because of the conduct of the Council of Ministers itself and, therefore, the Governor must, of necessity, and in the very nature of things, exercise his own judgment in this matter.

Then there are a large number of matters with regard to which the Centre can give directions to the States under the Constitution and presumably the Governor may be required to perform some functions under these directions.[55]

In a situation when there arises a conflict between the Governor's roles as the Centre's representative and as the constitutional head in the State then, undoubtedly, the former obligation should take precedence over the latter. This is the direct result of his being the nominee, and holding his office during the pleasure, of the Central Government. One of the reasons for the Constituent Assembly to adopt the system of centrally-nominated, rather than elected, Governor was that he would keep the Centre in touch with the State and would remove a source of possible 'separatist tendencies'.[56] Therefore, exercise of discretionary powers by the Governor as the Centre's representative is constitutionally justifiable.

The more difficult problem, however, is regarding the functioning of the Governor in his discretion as the Head of the State. The position here is somewhat vague. According to the Supreme Court, the Governor is essentially a constitutional head and the administration of the State is run by the Council of Ministers.[57] But this observation does not conclusively repudiate the view that there may be some area where the Governor may take a decision which may not have been suggested to him by the Council of Ministers, or he may not be bound automatically to follow ministerial advice.[58]

It is now fairly well-established that the Governor nominates members to the Legislative Council[59] on ministerial advice. Though the formal power to convene and prorogue the House vests in the Governor, he does so only when advised by the Chief Minister and not himself suo motu. The reason for this convention is that it is the Chief Minister alone who can provide the Assembly with business to transact.

(a) APPOINTING CHIEF MINISTER

Again, in the matter of appointing the Chief Minister, the constitutional provision [Art. 164(1)] confers discretionary power on the Governor[60] which is non-

52. The Hindu, Int'l ed., Oct. 2, 1982, p. 4.
53. For Governor's Assent to Bills, see, supra, Ch. VI.
54. See, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B, under 'Emergency'
55. Infra, Ch. XII.
56. VII CAD, 12, 454-6; also see, supra.
57. A. Sanjeevi v. State of Madras, AIR 1970 SC 1102 : (1970) 1 SCC 443.
58. See Samsher's case, supra.
59. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. B(i).
60. Supra, Ch. VII, Sec. A(ii)(a).

justiciable. Because of the immunity granted to the Governor under Art. 361, he is not answerable to the Court even on the ground of mala fides.[61] As the Governor holds his office during the pleasure of the President, the question of mala fide action of the Governor can be gone into by the President, i.e., the Central Executive. This position has been clarified by the courts in a number of cases.

According to the Calcutta High Court,[62] the Governor in making the appointment of the Chief Minister under Art. 164(1) "acts in his sole discretion", and that the "exercise of his discretion by the Governor cannot be called in question in writ proceedings in High Court". Thus, in the matter of appointment of the Chief Minister, the Governor does not act on the advice of the Council of Ministers. It is for the Governor himself to make such inquiries as he thinks proper to ascertain who among the members of the Legislature ought to be appointed as the Chief Minister and who would be in the position to enjoy confidence of the majority in the State Assembly.

In S. Dharmalingam v. His Excellency Governor of Tamil Nadu,[63] the appointment of the Chief Minister was challenged. The Madras High Court ruled that in appointing the Chief Minister, the power exercised by the Governor was wholly within his discretion and the Court could not interfere in the matter relating to his discretion. The Court observed in this connection:

> "Certain powers are available to the Governor under Art. 163, which he could exercise in his sole discretion. With regard to the action pertaining to his sole discretion, the immunity of the Governor is absolute and beyond even the writ jurisdiction of the High Court. The power of the Governor with regard to the appointment of the Chief Minister is a power which falls in his sole discretion and therefore the Court cannot call in question the same."

The Gauhati High Court has also ruled that the Governor is the "sole and exclusive authority" to appoint a Chief Minister. The Governor as the Head of the State, "is the sole judge to ascertain as to who commanded the support of the majority in the Assembly".[64] The Court has observed:

> "The repository of power to appoint Chief Minister and the Council of Ministers or to withdraw the pleasure contemplated under Art. 164(1) and/or dismissal of the Ministry are exclusive pleasure-cum-discretion of the Governor.... It follows, therefore, that the right of the Governor to withdraw pleasure, during which the Ministry holds office, is absolute, unrestricted and unfettered."

Where the Chief Minister of a coalition ministry resigned, but the Governor asked the Ministry to continue in office until alternative arrangements could be made, and the United Front then elected another leader who was then asked to form the government, the Gauhati High Court in R.K. Nokulsana Singh v. Rishang Keising[65] refused to issue quo warranto[66] to remove the Ministry from office, because the Assembly was not in session and no one could say whether they did not command support of the majority in the Assembly. The Chief Minister is

---

61. Supra, Sec. A(i)(c).
62. Mahabir Prasad Sharma v. Prafulla Chandra Ghose, AIR 1969 Cal. 198.
63. AIR 1989 Mad 48.
Also see, G. Vasantha Pai v. C.K. Ramaswamy, AIR 1978 Mad 342; Madan Murari Verma v. Choudhuari Charan Singh, AIR 1980 Cal 95; supra, Ch. III.
64. Jogendra Nath v. State of Assam, AIR 1982 Gau. 25.
65. AIR 1981 Gau 47.
66. For Quo warranto, see, Chapter VIII, Sec. E.

appointed by the Governor (Art. 164) and there is no constitutional bar of any kind on his choice as to whom to appoint as the Chief Minister. The only effective check is that the Ministry shall fall if it fails to command a majority in the Assembly. So long as the Chief Minister and other Ministers enjoy the pleasure of the Governor, no writ of quo warranto can be issued by the High Court.

In the matter of appointment of the Chief Minister, the Governor is not required to act on the advice of the Council of Ministers. However, the over-all affective limitation on his discretion is that he is to appoint a person as Chief Minister who will be able to enjoy a majority support in the Assembly. If the Ministry is not able to command a majority support in the House, it will fall. If a party enjoys a clear majority in the Assembly, the Governor's task is more or less mechanical and non-discretionary, as he has to call upon the leader of the majority party to form the government.

His task, however, becomes difficult, and even controversial, when no party has clear majority in the Assembly, and when loyalties of the legislators undergo frequent changes making the political picture in the State fluid and confused. In such a situation, the Governor's role may become crucial as it often becomes a matter of importance as to who is invited first to form the government, for the party in power could hope to gain accretion to its strength by winning over the loyalties of some legislators with a flexible conscience. In such a fluid situation, the Governor has to take a decision, after making such enquiries as he thinks proper, as to the person who will be in a position to command a majority in the Assembly and invite him to form the Government.[67] For example, the role of the Haryana Governor in appointing the leader of the Congress (I) as Chief Minister came in for a lot of criticism. Congress (I) was not the largest group in the Assembly but its leader was appointed as the Chief Minister; he was later able to attract a few members from other parties and thus managed a majority for himself.

At times, while appointing the Chief Minister, the Governor imposes the restriction that he should seek a vote of confidence from the House concerned. A question has been raised whether the Governor can do so because the Constitution does not specifically refer to anything like a vote of confidence. Does the Governor act beyond his powers while imposing any such condition? The Patna High Court in Sapru[68] has answered the question in the negative. The Court has invoked two constitutional features to support such a condition, viz., (1) collective responsibility of the Council of Ministers to the House;[69] and (2) discretionary nature of the Governor's power to appoint the Chief Minister.

The principle of collective responsibility includes within its ambit the rule that the Council of Ministers must enjoy majority support in the Legislative Assembly and it includes both a vote of confidence and a vote of no confidence for or against the Ministry. Where there is doubt about the Chief Minister enjoying the majority support in the House, the Governor is entitled to call upon him to prove his majority in the House. This serves two purposes, viz.,: (1) it assures the Governor that his choice of the Chief Minister was right; and (2) it satisfies the elec-

67. See, Report of the Governors' Committee, 14, 28 (1971).
68. Sapru Jayakar Motilal C.R. Das v. Union of India, AIR 1999 Pat 221.
69. For discussion on the principle of collective responsibility, see, Ch. III, Sec. B(d), supra.

torate that the Chief Minister enjoys majority in the Assembly. The High Court has observed:[70]

> "… the Constitution does not make any reference either to a vote of confidence or to a vote of no-confidence, and it would indeed be preposterous to suggest that since the Constitution does not refer to these, in a parliamentary form of Government there can be no vote of confidence or vote of no-confidence for or against the Government. The entire constitutional scheme envisaged a parliamentary form of government with a cabinet system would be defeated if such a construction is put on the provision of Article 164 of the Constitution…"

On the whole, however, it is advisable to evolve suitable conventions in this regard to make the Governor's role in the matter of appointing the Chief Minister less activist, non-political and non-controversial. In 1971, an effort was made in this respect when the Committee of Governors[71] suggested the following guidelines for guidance of the Governors in the matter of appointing the Chief Minister:

(1) Where a single party commands a majority in the Assembly, the Governor is to call upon its leader to form the government.

(2) It is not incumbent on the Governor to invite the leader of the largest party (not in majority) to form the government. The ultimate test for the purpose is not the size of a party but its ability to command a majority in the House.

(3) If before the election, some parties combine and produce an agreed programme and the combination gets a majority after the election, the commonly chosen leader of the combination should be invited to form the government.

(4) If no party is returned in a majority at the election and, thereafter, two or more parties come together to form the government, the leader of the combination may be invited to form the government.

(5) The leader of a minority party may be invited to form the government if the Governor is satisfied that the leader will be able to muster majority support in the House.

(6) Ordinarily, an elected member of the Legislature should be chosen as the Chief Minister. A non-member or a nominated member of the Legislature ought not to be appointed as the Chief Minister except in exceptional circumstances. In any case, he should become an elected member of the Legislature as soon as possible.

(b) DISSOLVING THE HOUSE

Another bone of contention has been the question of dissolving the House. As has already been discussed,[72] some discretion has now come to be conceded to the Governor in this area. He is to take a decision to dissolve or not to dissolve the House on a consideration of the totality of circumstances. He may refuse to accept the advice of the Ministry which has lost the majority support if in his view an al-

---

70. AIR 1999 Pat., at 228.
71. Supra., footnote, 49.
72. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. E.

ternative stable government can be formed. The Governor may, however, be bound to accept the advice for dissolution by a Ministry having a majority support.[73]

The discretionary element in the matter of dissolution can be reduced if, as suggested earlier,[74] a convention is adopted to grant dissolution to a defeated Chief Minister if he had a majority earlier. There is however great reluctance in the public to hold frequent elections as holding of an election in India is a very costly proposition. Therefore, dissolution of the Assembly ought to be resorted to only as a last resort. This enhances the discretion of the Governor instead of reducing it. This also encourages the cult of defection of members from one party to another.[75]

(c) DISMISSAL OF MINISTRY

A very controversial question regarding the Governor's discretion is his power to dismiss the Ministry. As at the Centre, so in a State, the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the Legislative Assembly and holds office during the Governor's pleasure.[76]

A non-controversial use of the Governor's power is the dismissal of a Minister who has lost the confidence of the Chief Minister, or the dismissal of a Ministry which has demonstrably lost majority support in the Legislative Assembly, but, instead of respecting the verdict, refuses to vacate the office. Such a step vindicates the normal working of the parliamentary form of government as well as promotes constitutionalism as it is against democratic norms that a cabinet which has lost confidence of the majority in the House should continue to remain in power.

This also amounts to a breach of Art. 164(2) which insists that the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the Legislative Assembly. How can a Ministry which has lost confidence of the House be said to be collectively responsible to the House. Here the Governor is not really exercising any personal discretion for the decision has already been taken by the House and he is merely implementing the same.[77] Such a use of the Governor's power will be very rare in practice for a Ministry losing majority support usually resigns except when the Ministry is defeated in the House on a snap vote.

The Calcutta High Court has ruled that if the Council of Ministers refuses to vacate the office of Ministers, even after a vote of no confidence has been passed against it in the Legislative Assembly of the State, it will then be for the Governor to withdraw the pleasure during which the Council of Ministers holds office.[78]

When a Ministry enjoying the majority support, however, acts to thwart the Constitution, or makes a mockery of the democratic and parliamentary institutions, or infringes a specific constitutional obligation, e.g., it fails to convene the

---

73. Governors' Comm. Rep. 60.
74. Supra, Ch. II, Sec. I(c).
Also see, ARC, Report on Centre-State Relationship, 30 (1969).
75. On Anti-Defection Law, see, Ch. II, supra, Sec. F.
76. For a detailed discussion on the concept of 'Collective Responsibility, see, supra, Ch. III, Sec. B(d).
77. Supra, Sec. A(ii)(c) AIR 1969 Cal 198.
78. Mahabir Prasad Sharma v. Prafulla Chandra Ghose, supra, footnote 62.

Legislature within six months of the last session, recourse may be had to the Presidential power under Art. 356.[79] It may not be possible for the Governor to use his own power to dismiss the Ministry in such a situation, for then he will have to install another Council of Ministers and it may not be possible for him to do so when the dismissed Ministry had majority in the House.

There is also the knotty problem of options open to a Governor when the government in office, enjoyed majority support once, but loses that in between the two sessions of the Legislature. Should the Governor take action to dismiss the Ministry, or wait till the Assembly meets and votes the Ministry out?

The most dramatic exhibition so far of the Governor's discretionary power to dismiss the Ministry has been in West Bengal. A United Front Ministry, a conglomeration of 14 parties having no common policy or programme, took office in March 1967 with Ajoy Mukherjee as the Chief Minister. The parties had fought elections separately, but combined together after the elections with the dominant purpose of keeping the Congress (which had been in office since 1947) out of power.

On November 2, 1967, a few members defected from the UF, formed a new party under the leadership of Dr. P.C. Ghosh, and informed the Governor that they had withdrawn support from the Ministry. The Congress Party informed the Governor that it would extend support to a new Ministry if formed by the leader of the new party. Doubts about the majority support to the UF Ministry were now raised. The Governor impressed on the Chief Minister the imperative need of calling an early session of the Assembly, but the Ministry wanted to delay convening the House by six weeks. Consequently, the Governor dismissed the Ministry and installed another Ministry on November 21, 1967, under Ghosh as the Chief Minister. The Governor based his action on the Ministry losing majority support in the Assembly. He emphasized that it was constitutionally improper for a Ministry to continue in office after losing confidence of the majority in the Assembly. In case of doubt on this point, the proper course for the Ministry would have been to seek a vote of confidence on the floor of the House without delay. The Governor could not appreciate the reasons advanced by the Chief Minister to delay calling the Assembly to test the standing of the Ministry. He felt that to deal effectively with the multifarious problems faced by the State, it was imperative that a Ministry clearly enjoying majority support should be in office.

The constitutional crisis did not, however, come to an end with this step. To test whether the new Ministry enjoyed majority support in the House, the Governor convened the House on the advice of the Chief Minister, but the Speaker adjourned the House when it met.[80] Ultimately, President's rule had to be imposed in West Bengal.

The Governor's action in dismissing the UF Ministry naturally raised a hue and cry in the country. Opinions about its constitutional propriety were divided. The Central Home Minister asserted in both Houses of Parliament, on November 30, 1967, that it was within the constitutional competence of the Governor to dissolve the Council of Ministers when in his judgment the previous government had lost majority support in the Assembly. He also maintained that the Governor

---

79. Infra, Ch. XIII.
80. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. D(a).

had acted in his discretion and not under any directive from the Centre. This statement was approved by both Houses of Parliament on December 4, 1967.

From a purely legalistic angle, on February 6, 1968, the Calcutta High Court dismissed a petition for a writ of quo warranto[81] against the new Chief Minister Ghosh on the ground that under Art. 164(1), the Ministers hold office during the Governor's pleasure and no restriction or condition has been imposed upon the exercise of the Governor's pleasure. The Governor has "an absolute, exclusive, unrestricted and unquestionable discretionary power to dismiss a minister and appoint a new Council of Ministers". The Court asserted that the "withdrawal of the pleasure by the Governor is a matter entirely in the discretion of the Governor" and that "the exercise of the discretion by the Governor in withdrawing the pleasure cannot be called in question in this (writ) proceeding".[82]

The High Court clarified that the provision in Art. 164(2) that the Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the Legislature does not fetter the Governor's pleasure during which the Ministers hold office. It only means that the Council of Ministers is answerable to the Assembly and a majority in the Assembly can at any time express its want of confidence in the Council of Ministers. But this is as far as the Assembly can go, it has no power to remove or dismiss a Ministry. If a Ministry does not vacate office, after the passage of a vote of no-confidence against it by the Assembly, it is then for the Governor to withdraw his pleasure during which the Ministry holds office and the discretion of the Governor is "absolute and unrestricted".

This legalistic position has been confirmed by other High Courts that the Governor has discretionary power to dismiss the Chief Minister. Thus, the Gauhati High Court has held that under Art. 164(1), Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the Governor. "The exercise of the pleasure has not been fettered by any condition or construction or restriction". The Governor as the appointing authority can withdraw his pleasure and dismiss a Chief Minister. The power to appoint or dismiss the Chief Minister or the Ministry are exclusive pleasure-cum-discretion of the Governor. The Constitution lays down no procedure or imposes no fetter as regards the dismissal of a Chief Minister by the Governor whose right to withdraw his pleasure, during which the Ministers hold office, is "absolute, unrestricted and unfettered".[83] "Withdrawal of pleasure is entirely in the discretion of the Governor and the Governor alone. The Assembly can only express its want of confidence in the ministry; the Assembly cannot go further than that; it has no power to remove or dismiss the Ministry. "The power of removal or withdrawal of pleasure is entirely and exclusively that of the Governor." This is an area which is prohibited to the Court because of Art. 163(2).

In Karpoori Thakur v. Abdul Ghafoor, the Patna High Court refused to issue a writ against the Chief Minister asking him to resign because he had lost the confidence of the House. The petition was filed by a few members of the House. The High Court said that the Council of Ministers was responsible to the whole

---

81. For discussion on Quo Warranto, see, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. E.

82. Mahabir Prasad Sharma v. P.C. Ghosh. supra, note 68.
For a comment on the case see, 12 JILI 127 (1970).
Also, M.P., SINGH, Governor's Power to Dismiss Ministers or Council of Ministers—An Empirical Study, 13 JILI, 612 (1971).
Also see, supra, Ch. VI under "Speaker" of the Assembly.

83. Jogendra Nath Hazarika v. State of Assam, AIR 1982 Gau 25.

House and not to a few members only. Also, there is no rule of law that a Ministry must resign on being defeated in the House. That is a political matter and the Governor has power to dismiss the Ministry.[84]

The Bombay High Court has come to a similar conclusion.[85] The Governor of Goa dismissed the incumbent Chief Minister [P] and appointed [W] as the new Chief Minister. The ex-Chief Minister P challenged the Governor's order through a writ petition alleging mala fides on the part of the Governor. The High Court refused to interfere. Dismissing the writ petition as not maintainable, the High Court said that the matter of dismissing and appointing the Chief Minister is one which the Governor discharges in his own sole discretion and without the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers and is, therefore, not open to judicial review. Governor's discretion is restricted only by the paramount consideration of command of majority in the House. With regard to the action pertaining to the Governor's sole discretion, his immunity under Art. 361 is absolute and beyond the writ jurisdiction of the Court.[86] The Governor is not answerable to the Court even in respect of a charge of mala fides in connection with his official acts. The Court pointed out that as the Governor holds office during the pleasure of the President (Art. 156), the President may conceivably go into any allegation of mala fides against the Governor. An effective check is that the Ministry will fall if it fails to command a majority in the State Legislative Assembly.

This, however, is the legalistic position. In practice, the Governor must keep certain matters in view while exercising the power, the basic consideration being that the Governor is to use his powers to promote, not to thwart, responsible government in the State.

The Bengal episode can hardly be regarded as healthy in a parliamentary system as it creates an unfortunate precedent that the Governor may dismiss a Ministry in his discretion. Such episodes ought to be avoided in the interest of smooth working of the Constitution. It is thus necessary to evolve certain conventions in this respect. The crisis would have been averted had the Ministry resigned, or called an early session of the House to test its strength as was suggested by the Governor. Had the Ministry followed any of these courses, the democratic traditions and values would have been strengthened in the country. Undoubtedly, it is unconstitutional for a Ministry to remain in office after losing majority support, and it is under an obligation to remove the cloud of doubt on its support in the House by seeking its verdict at the earliest. But the important question still remains whether the Governor should invoke his discretion in such a situation or bide his time till the Assembly meets and decides the issue one way or other.

One plausible view may be that it is unconstitutional for the Governor to keep a Ministry in office about which he feels sure that it no longer enjoys majority support, and he is under an obligation to dismiss it and put another Ministry in office instead. The Governors' Committee has asserted that "where the Governor is satisfied, by whatever process or means, that the Ministry no longer enjoys majority support, he should ask the Chief Minister to face the Assembly and prove his majority within the shortest possible time. If the Chief Minister shirks

---

84. AIR 1975 Pat 1.
85. Pratapsingh Raojirao Rane v. Governor of Goa, AIR 1999 Bom 53.
86. For discussion on Art. 361, see, supra, Ch. III, Sec. A(i).

this primary responsibility and fails to comply, the Governor would be in duty bound to initiate steps to form an alternative Ministry. A Chief Minister's refusal to test his strength on the floor of the Assembly can well be interpreted as prima facie proof of his no longer enjoying the confidence of the Legislature. If then, an alternative Ministry can be formed which, in the Governor's view, is able to command a majority in the Assembly, he must dismiss the Ministry in power and install the alternative Ministry in office."[87]

But this course of action is full of many hazards and pitfalls and places a heavy responsibility on the Governor. Whenever a Governor takes any such action, he is bound to become the centre of a big political controversy. His action may be characterised as politically motivated. He may make an error of judgment. Not only the Governor, but the Central Government also is drawn into the vortex of political controversy. If the newly installed Ministry fails to secure majority support in the House, the Governor's action would be politically indefensible, and he may have no other choice but to resign his office. Such an action on the Governor's part may also encourage defections from one party to another as the defectors may hope to become ministers in the new Ministry. In the final analysis, it is the House which is the ultimate arbiter on the question of confidence of majority support of a Ministry and it is there that the Governor's action has to be vindicated.

In the Bengal case, when fresh elections were held, the U.F. won a majority and again formed the Ministry and this led to the Governor's resignation from office. A Governor should, therefore, act with extreme care and circumspection in such a crucial matter. All said and done, the soundest democratic convention in this regard would appear to be that, but for the extreme and exceptional situations, the Governor may not use his discretion and wait till the Assembly gives its verdict. At times, even minority Ministry may remain in office with the support or sufferance, of some groups in the House. Lastly, there cannot be a gap of more than six months between the two sessions of the Legislature and, therefore, the fate of the Ministry in the House cannot remain in suspense for longer than six months in any case.

The Administrative Reforms Commission has suggested that when a question arises as to whether the Council of Ministers enjoys majority support in the Assembly, the Governor may suo motu summon the Assembly to obtain the verdict if the Chief Minister does not advise him to convene the Assembly. The Central Government has refused to endorse this suggestion.[88]

On February 21, 1998, the U.P. Governor dismissed the Kalyan Singh Government and installed in office another person (Jagdambika Pal) as the Chief Minister. The Governor's plea was that the Kalyan Singh Ministry had lost its majority in the Legislative Assembly because of defection of some of its supporters. There was no vote of no-confidence passed against the Kalyan Singh Government nor was the Government asked to go to the Assembly to seek a vote of confidence. The action of the Governor was widely criticised as amounting to trampling upon democratic conventions and the Governor misusing his position for partisan ends.[89]

---

87. Report, p. 45.
88. Report on Centre-State Relationship, 28.
89. The Hindu Int'l Ed., Feb. 28, 1998, p. 8.

A writ petition was filed in the Allahabad High Court on February 23, 98, challenging the action of the Governor. Following Bommai,[90] the Allahabad High Court overturned the Governor's action, restored the Kalyan Singh Government and left it open to the Governor to convene a session of the State Legislative Assembly to prove its majority.[91] Then, the newly installed Chief Minister approached the Supreme Court. The Court directed that a special session of the Assembly be summoned which would have the only agenda to have a composite floor test between the two contending parties in order to ascertain who out of the two contesting claimants of Chief Ministership enjoys a majority in the House.[92] The floor test was held as directed by the Supreme Court and Kalyan Singh won the day.

It becomes clear from the above-mentioned decisions of the High Courts and the Supreme Court that the Governor's discretion to dismiss the Chief Minister is exercisable only if the Chief Minister loses his majority in the Assembly and this has to be ascertained only on the floor of the House and not in the chambers of the Governor. It is very clear now that the Governor's pleasure is to be exercised for promotion, and not for supplanting, the democratic parliamentary system. The Governor ought not to exercise his pleasure at his own whim and fancy but only after a floor-test in the Assembly. Thus, the Governor's discretion to dismiss the Ministry has been effectively restricted by judicial pronouncements.

(d) NEED FOR GOVERNOR'S DISCRETIONARY POWERS

In an obiter, the Madras High Court in Mathialagan v. Governor of Tamil Nadu,[93] has propounded the view that the Governor has no discretionary power, except the Governor of Assam under Rule 9(i) in Schedule VI, and that the exception in Art. 163(1) does not apply or govern the interpretation of any other Article pertaining to Governor's function. This is too restrictive a view and cannot be accepted because of many considerations. It goes counter to what the other High Courts have said in many cases.[94] It makes the exception to Art. 163(1)otiose and redundant. Due importance has not been attached by the Madras High Court to Art. 163(2) which empowers a Governor to decide in his discretion whether in any matter he is required to act in his discretion or not.

The Articles pertaining to the Governor have to be interpreted in the light of Arts. 163(1) and (2) and, hence, they cannot be interpreted, in every situation, pari passu with the Articles applying to the President, as in his case the Constitution does not in express terms confer any discretion. This distinction cannot be ignored between the President and the Governor.

There is also a practical reason as to why a Governor should have a greater latitude than the President. The governments in the States have been somewhat unstable, and have often suffered from the curse of defection. The Governor acts also as the Centre's representative in the State, and while the President's rule can be imposed in a State under Art. 356, it cannot be done at the Centre where a Ministry must always remain in office. Because of these factors, it is possible to treat a Governor on a somewhat different footing than the President. The Gover-

---

90. For full discussion on this case, see, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.
91. The Hindu Int'l Ed., dated February, 28, 98, p. 1.
92. Jagdambika Pal v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 998 : (1999) 9 SCC 95.
93. AIR 1973 Mad 198, 217.
94. Supra.

nors' Committee has observed in this connection, "Thus even though in normal conditions the exercise of the Governor's powers should be on the advice of the Council of Ministers, occasions may arise when the Governor may find that, in order to be faithful to the Constitution and the law and his oath of office, he has to take a particular decision independently".[1]

The Court cannot take cognizance of an offence committed by a public servant under Ss. 161, 164 and 165, I.P.C., and under the Prevention of Corruption Act, without the previous sanction of the State Government. A question has been raised whether or not to accord sanction to the prosecution of the Chief Minister, the Governor should, as a matter of propriety, necessarily act in his own discretion and not on the advice of the Council of Ministers? The better opinion seems to be that in this matter, the Governor ought to act in his discretion, for, how can the Chief Minister advise the Governor whether he should be prosecuted or not on a charge of corruption. [2] It is the Governor who appoints the Chief Minister and he can dismiss the C.M. in his discretion. It is, therefore, justifiable that the state Governor should accord sanction to prosecute the Chief Minister on a charge of corruption.

What about a Minister? Who should be the authority to accord sanction to prosecute a Minister? Theoretically, the Governor appoints and can dismiss a Minister but he does so on the advice of the Chief Minister and, thus, the Governor's role in this matter is only formal or passive. Therefore, the question is whether the Governor can sanction prosecution of a Minister in his own discretion, or he should act in this matter on the advice of the Chief Minister. If it is the latter, then it will be extremely difficult to prosecute a Minister for it is difficult to envisage the C.M. to advise prosecution of a Minister appointed by him. Partisan and political considerations are bound to crop up for it will be politically inexpedient for a C.M. to admit that there has been a corrupt Minister in the Cabinet. Therefore, it seems to be necessary that in this matter also, the Governor acts in his discretion. In any case, if the Governor decides to act in such a matter in his discretion, then under Arts. 163(1) and (2), his decision cannot be challenged in any forum.

The only way to reduce the occasions for the Governors to exercise their discretion is to evolve acceptable conventions to take care of various situations which arise.[3] A danger in a Governor deciding matters according to his wisdom is that there may thus arise in the country uncertainty and lack of uniformity in constitutional practices as different Governors may respond differently to identical or near identical situations. The Governor's activist and discretionary role can be minimised if all political parties accept some healthy conventions, follow sound democratic behaviour, and play the game in an even-handed manner without trying to bend the Constitution to serve their own immediate political interests. Also, it goes without saying that the Governor has to use, if at all, his discretionary power to promote, and not to thwart, sound democratic parliamentary government, the principle of responsibility of the Executive to the Legislature and government according to the Constitution.

---

1. Report, 20.
2. State of Maharashtra v. Ramdas Shrinivas Nayak, AIR 1982 SC 1249 : (1982) 2 SCC 463.
3. On 'Conventions' see, supra, Ch. I. Also see, Ch. XL, infra.

The Administrative Reforms Commission suggested in 1969 that some guidelines should be evolved to enable exercise of these discretionary powers by the Governor for the purpose of preserving and protecting democratic values. The Commission felt that the guidelines are necessary to secure uniformity of action and eliminate all suspicions of partisanship or arbitrariness.[4] However, the Central Government considered this recommendation of the A.R.C. and decided against framing any guidelines. The Government felt that the best course would be to allow conventions to grow up.[5]

Presently it seems that a convention has come into existence that in case of doubt whether the Ministry enjoys the confidence of the House or not, the Governor requires the Chief Minister to seek a vote of confidence from the House. For example, there was in office a coalition Government in the State of U.P. consisting of B.J.P. and B.S.P. under the Chief Minister belonging to B.J.P. When in October, 97, the B.S.P. withdrew its support from the Government, the Governor required the Chief Minister to seek a vote of confidence from the House and Chief Minister Kalyan Singh was able to win such a vote.[6] Again, in Gujarat, when the Congress withdrew its support from the Waghela Government in October 97, the Governor refused to dissolve the Assembly as advised by the Chief Minister but asked the Chief Minister to seek a vote of confidence from the House.

The J&K Legislature passed an Act constituting a board of management for the Vaishno Devi Shrine with the Governor as the ex-officio chairman. Interpreting the Act, the Supreme Court ruled in Bhuri Nath v. State of Jammu & Kashmir[7] that the Legislature entrusted the powers to the Governor in his official capacity but he was not to act on the advice of the Council of Ministers as the executive head of the State. The State Governor "is required to exercise his ex officio power as Governor to oversee personally the administration, management and government" of the shrine, its properties and funds.

Under an Act passed by the Haryana Legislature, the State Governor was appointed as the Chancellor of a University. In Hardwari Lal,[8] the High Court ruled that the Act intended that the State Government, as such, ought not to interfere in the affairs of the University, and that the State Government could not give advice to the Governor in the discharge of the functions as the Chancellor. In this capacity, the Governor acts in his discretion and not on the aid and advice of his Council of Ministers.

Ultimately, one point about the governor's discretionary power needs to be emphasized, viz. that the discretionary power has been vested in the governor to deal with any unforeseen situation which may arise in the state. In exercising his power the governor must always act to promote and protect the institution of the parliamentary form of government and not to take arbitrary decisions. While seeking to exercise his discretionary power, the governor is to keep in his view the sole criterion whether his decision will promote or thwart parliamentary system in the State.

---

4. Report on Centre-State Relationship, 25.
5. The Times of India, March 14, 1975.
6. Also see, supra, footnote 92.
7. AIR 1997 SC 1711, 1722 : (1997) 2 SCC 745.
8. Hardwari Lal v. G.D. Tapase, Chandigarh, AIR 1982 P&H 439. Also, Kiran Babu v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1986 AP 275.

(e) GOVERNOR'S POSITION IN NON-DISCRETIONARY AREA

Besides the specific matters mentioned above, what is the position in matters where the Governor receives advice from his Council of Ministers. Art. 163 does not clarify the position between the Governor and his Council of Ministers in the non-discretionary area.[9] Is the Governor bound to act on the advice of the Council of Ministers? In the opinion of the Governors' Committee, the position is as follows: [10]

> "Even in the sphere where the Governor is bound to act on the advice of his Council of Ministers, it does not necessarily mean the immediate and automatic acceptance by him of such advice. In any relationship between the Governor and his Council of Ministers, the process of mutual discussion is implicit, and the Governor will not be committing any impropriety if he states all his objections to any proposed course of action and asks the Ministry to reconsider the matter. In the last resort he is bound to accept its final advice, but he has the duty, whenever necessary, to advise the Ministry as to what he considers to be the right course of action, to warn the Ministry if he thinks that the Ministry is taking an erroneous step and to suggest to it to reconsider the proposed course of action. In the process of advice and consent, there is ample room for exchange of views between the Governor and the Council of Ministers even though he is bound to accept its advice."

The above statement assimilates the position of the Governor vis-a-vis his Council of Ministers (in the non discretionary area) to that existing between the President and his Council of Ministers under Art. 74.[11]

D. FUNCTIONS AND POWERS OF THE EXECUTIVE

(i) JUDICIAL POWER

The Constitution confers certain powers on the State Government which may be characterised as 'judicial' in nature.

The State Executive has power to appoint judges to the subordinate Courts in the State [Art. 233-237].[12] Besides, the question whether a member of the State Legislature has become subject to a disqualification or not is formally decided by the Governor [Art. 192].[13]

POWER TO GRANT PARDON

The Governor is empowered to grant pardons, reprieves, respites or remissions of punishment or to suspend, remit or commute the sentence of any person convicted of any offence against any law relating to a matter to which the executive power of the State extends [Art. 161]. This power of the Governor is very much similar to the power of the President under Art. 72, discussed earlier.[14] Article 161 of the Constitution confers upon the Governor of a State similar powers in respect of any offence against any law relating to a matter to which the executive power of the State extends. The power under Arts. 72 and 161 of the Constitution

---

9. Supra, Sec. A(i); Sec. B.
10. Report, 20.
11. On this point, see, supra, Ch. III, Sec. B.
12. For a detailed discussion on these provisions, see, infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G.
13. Supra, Ch.VI, Sec. B(iii).
14. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(i).

is absolute and cannot be fettered by any statutory provision. But the president or the Governor, as the case may be, must act on the advice of the Council of Ministers.[15] The State Government has full freedom in exercising the power of clemency, which is a matter of policy, and even excluding a category of persons which it thinks expedient to exclude as long as there is no insidious discrimination involved.[16]

As discussed earlier,[17] the Governor's powers, under any law in force, to suspend, remit or commute a death sentence have been saved by Art. 72(3). A power to suspend the execution of a sentence or remit the whole or any part thereof has been conferred by S. 432(1), Cr.P.C., 1974 on the State Government. Under S. 433(1), Cr.P.C., the State Government is authorised to commute a sentence, including that of death, into a less rigorous sentence. Art. 161 is of much wider amplitude than S. 401, Cr.P.C., for while under the former the State Government can give an absolute and unconditional pardon, the latter does not empower it to do any such thing. In any case, the power given under Art. 161 cannot be fettered by any statutory provision. Because of Arts. 72 and 161, the power of the Governor to grant pardon, etc., overlaps, to some extent, with the similar power of the President, particularly in case of a death sentence.[18]

The appellant was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. After about 16 months, the government remitted his sentence. Under the Representation of the Peoples Act, a person sentenced to imprisonment for not less than two years is disqualified from being a candidate at an election. The question was whether the appellant was qualified to be a candidate. In Sarat Chandra Rabha v. Khagendra Nath,[19] the Supreme Court answered in the negative. The effect of remission is to wipe out the remaining part of the sentence which has not been served and, thus, in practice, the sentence is reduced to that already undergone. In law the remission does not touch the order of conviction by the Court and the sentence passed by it. Thus, in the instant case, the sentence of three years' imprisonment is not affected and the appellant remains disqualified although he may not have to undergo the full sentence.

In Nanavati v. State of Bombay,[20] the Supreme Court discussed some aspects of this power. Nanavati, a high naval officer, was found guilty of the offence of murder and was sentenced to life imprisonment by the Bombay High Court. The Governor of Bombay suspended the sentence till the disposal of his appeal by the Supreme Court and directed that he be detained in the naval jail.

The action of the Governor raised a storm of public protest as it was characterised as an interference with the course of justice. However, the High Court upheld the Governor's order. It ruled that the power of pardon, reprieve, suspension of sentence, etc., under Arts. 72 and 161, could be exercised before, during or after trial, as the words of these provisions were wide. These contained no limitation as to the time at, the occasion on, and the circumstances in which, the powers conferred by these provisions might be exercised.

---

15. State (Government of NCT of Delhi) v. Prem Raj, (2003) 7 SCC 121 : (2003) 8 JT 17.
16. Govt. of A.P. v. M.T. Khan, (2004) 1 SCC 616 : AIR 2004 SC 428.
17. Ibid.
18. Dy. I.G. of Police v. Raja Ram, AIR 1960 AP 259; Parkasho v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1962 All. 151.
19. AIR 1961 SC 334 : 1961 (2) SCR 133.
20. AIR 1961 SC 112 : 1961 (1) SCR 497.

Thereafter, Nanavati sought special leave of the Supreme Court to appeal from the High Court's sentence of life imprisonment. The Court has made a rule under Art. 145, requiring a petitioner, sentenced to a term of imprisonment, to surrender to his sentence before his petition is heard unless the Court otherwise orders.[21] Nanavati claimed an exemption from the rule in view of the Governor's order suspending his sentence. The Court pointed out that while exercising its powers under Art. 136, it could either pass an order of suspension of sentence or grant of bail pending the disposal of the application for special leave to appeal.[22] This power of the Court overlaps with that of the Executive to suspend the sentence during pendency of the special leave.

Applying the rule of harmonious construction of the power of the two organs so as to avoid the conflict between them, and the ambit of the power of the Executive being wider and that of the Court being narrower, it must be held that the Executive could not suspend the sentence during the time the matter is sub judice in the Court. The Governor may grant a full pardon at any time, even when the case is pending in the Court, but the suspension of the sentence for the period when the Supreme Court is seized of the case could be granted only by the Court itself and not by the Governor. The Supreme Court held in effect that the Governor's order suspending the sentence could operate only till the matter became sub judice in the Court on filing the petition for special leave to appeal, and no further. Thereafter, it is for the Court to pass such order as it thinks fit. The Court refused to grant to Nanavati the exemption he prayed for.[23]

Several cases have come to light showing that, at times, the power to grant pardon is misused by the State Governments. In Swaran Singh,[24] D, an MLA of the U.P. Assembly, was found guilty of murdering one J. He was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for life. Within a period of two years, the Governor of U.P. granted remission of the remaining long period of his life sentence. The family members of the deceased challenged the action of the Governor in the High Court and the matter ultimately reached the Supreme Court which quashed the Governor's action. The Supreme Court found that when the Governor passed the remission order, certain vital facts concerning D were not placed before the Governor. For example, the same Governor had earlier dismissed a petition from D for remission of his sentence and this fact was not disclosed when the second petition was moved after only few months. It was not disclosed to the Governor that D was involved in five other criminal cases of serious offences; his conduct in the prison was far from satisfactory and that out of two years and five months he was supposed to have been in jail, he was in fact on parole during the substantial part thereof.

Referring to Kehar Singh,[25] and Maru Ram,[26] the Court stated that judicial review of the Governor's decision under Art. 161 is not exercisable on the merits except within strict limits defined in Maru Ram, viz.: "all public power, including constitutional power, shall never be exercisable arbitrarily or mala fide, and ordinarily guidelines for fair and equal execution are guarantors of valid play of power". The Court stated in Swaran Singh:

---

21. For Art. 145, see, Ch. IV, Sec. I(f), supra.
22. For discussion on Art. 136, see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. D.
23. Also see, State v. Nanavati, AIR 1960 Bom 502.
24. Swaran Singh v. State of U.P., AIR 1998 SC 2026 : (1998) 4 SCC 75.
25. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(i).
26. Maru Ram v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 2147 : (1981) 1 SCC 107; supra, Ch. III.

> "The bench stressed (in Maru Ram) the point that the power being of the greatest moment, cannot be a law unto itself but it must be informed by the finer canons of constitutionalism.... If such power [under Art. 161] was exercised arbitrarily, mala fide or in absolute disregard of the finer canons of constitutionalism,[27] the by-product order cannot get the approval of law and in such cases, the judicial hand must be stretched to it."[28]

In the instant case, when the Governor was not posted with material facts, "the Governor was apparently deprived of the opportunity to exercise the powers in a fair and just manner. Conversely the order now impugned fringes on arbitrariness".

The Court therefore quashed the Governor's order and remitted the case back to the Governor for reconsideration and pass a fresh order in "the light of those materials which he had no occasion to know earlier".

Again, in Satpal v. State of Haryana,[29] a BJP leader sentenced to life imprisonment in a murder case was pardoned by the Governor of Haryana. The Supreme Court ruled that the Governor was not properly advised and had exercised his power "without applying his mind" and, accordingly, quashed the clemency order. The Court observed:

> "… the conclusion is irresistible that the Governor had not applied his mind to the material on record and has mechanically passed the order just to allow the prisoner to overcome his conviction and sentence passed by the Court".

Rejecting the plea of the Government that the power of pardon and remission of sentence is executive in nature, the Court stated:

> "There cannot be any dispute with the proposition of law that the power of granting pardon under Art. 161 is very wide and does not contain any limitation as to the time on which and the occasion on which and the circumstances in which the said power could be exercised. But the said power being a constitutional power conferred on the Governor by the Constitution is amenable to judicial review on certain limited grounds".

The Court pointed out the following grounds on which the Court could interfere with an order passed under Art. 161, viz., if the Governor exercises the power himself without being advised by the Government; if the Governor transgresses the jurisdiction in exercise of the power under Art. 161; if the Governor has passed the order without application of mind; if the order is mala fide; if the Governor has passed the order on some extraneous consideration. Whatever applies to the President under Art. 72 equally applies to the power of the Governor under Art. 161. The power under Art. 72 or 161 is to be exercised by the government concerned and not by the President or the Governor on his own.[30] The advice of the appropriate government binds the President/Governor.

The Apex Court has also stated that "considerations for exercise of power under Arts. 72 or 161 may be myriad and their occasions protean, and are left to the appropriate government, but no consideration nor occasion can be wholly irrelevant, irrational, discriminatory or mala fide."

In the instant case, the Supreme Court observed further:

---

27. For discussion on the concept of 'constitutionalism', see, supra, Ch. I.
28. Swaran Singh v. State of U.P., AIR 1998 SC 2026, at 2028 : (1988) 4 SCC 75.
29. AIR 2000 SC 1702 : (2000) 5 SCC 170.
30. Reference was made to the Kehar Singh and Maru Ram cases discussed earlier, see, supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(i).

> "The entire file has been produced before us and we notice the uncanny haste with which the file has been processed and the unusual interest and zeal shown by the authorities in the matter of exercise of power to grant pardon."

In the instant case, the Court ruled that the Governor was not properly advised. He was not made aware of several crucial features of the case going against the accused.

It has now been settled that the Governor does not exercise the clemency power in his own discretion but on the advice of his Council of Ministers. The Governor of Madras rejected a mercy petition on his own without seeking the advice of Council of Ministers. The Madras High Court quashed the Governor's decision on the ground that the Governor had not followed the constitutional practice of seeking the advice of his Cabinet before passing orders on the mercy petition. The High Court directed the Governor to seek the advice of the Council of Ministers before taking a fresh decision on the mercy petition.[31]

These cases are telling examples of criminalisation of politics and show how powers vested in high functionaries by the Constitution can be manipulated to favour criminal politicians. The clemency power is exercised at times not on merits but on political and other extraneous considerations. So long as the clemency power is exercisable on the advice of the government of the day, political considerations are bound to creep in while exercising power under Art. 72 or 161. It is, therefore, necessary to develop a non-political mechanism for the exercise of this power so that it is exercised purely on the merits of each case without any political connotations.

These cases show that there exists a close nexus between crime and politics, and that the Supreme Court has through these sought to break this nexus. It also shows how necessary it is that the courts do exercise the power of judicial review over exercise of power under Art. 72 or 161 so as to ensure that this power is not misused or used arbitrarily in favour of influential politicians who commit crimes with impunity.

(ii) LEGISLATIVE POWER

(a) PARTICIPATION IN THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS

Like the Central Executive, the State Executive also participates intimately in the legislative process.[32] Each Minister is necessarily a member of the State Legislature. The powers of prorogation and dissolution of the Legislature vest in the Executive. The Governor has to signify his assent to a Bill passed by the State Legislature before it can assume legal sanctity or reserve it for Presidential assent.

Most of the bills are drafted by government departments and are presented to, and piloted through, the Legislature by the Ministers. No bill can ever be passed by the Legislature without government sponsorship and support because the government has majority in the Legislative Assembly.

---

31. The Hindustan Times, dated 26-11-1999; The Hindustan Times, dated 27-11-1999, p. 11.
32. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. F(i).

(b) RULE MAKING

Several provisions of the Constitution confer rule-making powers on the Governor. He can make rules regarding:—

(1) authentication of orders and other instruments;[33]

(2) conditions of service of the members of the State Public Service Commission[34] as well as civil servants;[35]

(3) convenient transaction of Government business;[36]

(4) procedure in respect of communications between the Houses of State Legislature;[37]

(5) recruitment of officers, etc., for a High Court,[38]

(6) recruitment of secretarial staff of the Legislature.[39]

(c) ORDINANCE-MAKING POWER

The State Executive has ordinance-making power similar to that enjoyed by the Central Executive.[40]

According to Art. 213(1), which is in pari materia to Art. 123, which has already been discussed earlier, the State Governor may promulgate such ordinances as the circumstances appear to him to require when—(1) the State Legislative Assembly is not in session; or if the State has two Houses, when one of the Houses is not in session; and (2) the Governor is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action.

According to the proviso to Art. 213(1), the Governor cannot, without instructions from the President, promulgate any ordinance if:—(a) a Bill to that effect would, under the Constitution, have required the previous sanction of the President for its introduction into the State Legislature;[41] or, (b) if the Governor would have deemed it necessary to reserve a Bill to that effect for the President's consideration;[42] or, (c), an Act of the State Legislature to that effect would have been invalid under the Constitution without receiving the President's assent.[43]

The purport of (c), mentioned above, is as follows: when a State makes a law containing a provision inconsistent with a Central Law with respect to a matter in the Concurrent List, the State Law has to receive the assent of the President to be valid. Thus, the assent of the President is secured subsequent to the passage of the Bill.[44] If, however, an ordinance is being made in the similar circumstances, then the instructions from the President are a condition precedent to the promulgation of the ordinance.

---

33. Art. 166(2); supra, Sec. B.
34. Art. 318; infra, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. K.
35. Art. 309; Ch. XXXVI, Sec. B, infra.
36. Art. 166(3); supra, Sec. VIII, Sec. B.
37. Art. 208; supra, Ch. VI, Sec. G.
38. Art. 229, Proviso; infra, Ch. VIII, Sec. G.
39. Art. 187(3); supra, Ch. VI, Sec. D(c).
40. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(d).
41. For discussion of these points, see, infra, Ch. X, Sec. K.
42. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. F(i).
43. Infra, Ch. X, Sec. K.
44. See, infra, Ch. X, Secs. F, H and K.

An ordinance is to be laid before the State Assembly, and before the Council as well if there is one in the state. [Art. 213(2)(a)]. An ordinance ceases to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the reassembly of the Legislature. If the State has a bicameral legislature, and the two Houses assemble on different dates, the period of six weeks is to be counted from the later of the two dates. If the Government so desires it can in the mean time bring forth a Bill incorporating the provisions contained in the ordinance and have it enacted. An ordinance ceases to operate earlier than six weeks if a resolution disapproving it is passed by the Assembly, and is agreed to by the Council, if any [Art. 213(2)(a)]. An ordinance may be withdrawn by the Governor at any time [Art. 213(2)(b)].

An ordinance has the same force and effect as an Act passed by the State Legislature. [Art. 213(2)]. The ordinance-making power is co-extensive with the legislative power of the State.[45] Just as the Legislature can make a law under Art. 209 to expedite financial business in the Houses, so can an ordinance.[46] An ordinance cannot make a provision which cannot be validity enacted by an Act of the State Legislature [Art. 213(3)]. In the Concurrent List, an Act of the State Legislature repugnant to an Act of Parliament with respect to a matter in that list may become effective if the President has assented to it. So an ordinance, in a similar situation, will be valid if enacted with the President's prior consent [Art. 213(1)(c)].[47]

The power to make ordinances though formally vested in the Governor is, in effect, exercised by the Council of Ministers on whose advice the Governor acts, except when the matter is one in which the Governor has to seek instructions from the President.[48] The position as regards justiciability of the Governor's satisfaction to issue an ordinance is similar to that of the President's satisfaction discussed earlier.[49]

EFFECT OF AN ORDINANCE

Article 123(2) or 213(2) says that an ordinance has the same force and effect as an Act of the Legislature. What happens when an ordinance lapses without being replaced by an Act of the Legislature? Is the ordinance to be regarded as void ab initio?

Under the Orissa Municipal Act, election took place to certain offices in the Cuttack Municipality. The High Court set aside the municipal election. To overcome the difficulty thus created, an ordinance was issued validating the election. This ordinance was also declared to be invalid by the High Court. The councilors filed an appeal in the Supreme Court. The argument was that the Ordinance lapsed as the Legislature failed to enact the necessary legislation and so the councilors lost their offices.

The Supreme Court observed on the effect of the ordinance:[50]

---

45. See, Ch. XII, infra.
46. State of Punjab v. Satpal Dang, supra, Chs. II and VI.
47. Infra, Ch. X, Sec. K.
Also, Bhupendra Bose v. State of Orissa, AIR 1960 Ori 46.
48. Infra, Ch. X, Sec. K.
49. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(d).
50. State of Orissa v. Bhupendra Kumar Bose, AIR 1962 SC 945, 955 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 380.

> "Having regard to the object of the ordinance and to the rights created by the validating provisions, it would be difficult to accept the contention that as soon as the ordinance expired, the validity of the elections came to an end and their invalidity was revived. The rights created by this ordinance, in our opinion,.. must be held to endure and last even after the expiry of the ordinance."

Here the Court in the factual context ruled that the effect of the ordinance did not cease when it lapsed. Similarly, in Venkata Reddy,[51] an ordinance issued by the State Government abolished the posts of part time village officers. After sometime, the ordinance lapsed without being replaced by an Act of the Legislature. The question was whether the offices revived after the lapse of the Ordinance. The Supreme Court answered in the negative. The Court refuted the argument that when an ordinance is not replaced by an Act, as required by Art. 123(2) or 213(2), the ordinance is to be deemed to be void ab inilio and it should be assumed that it never because effective.

The Court argued, after reading Arts. 123(2) and 213(2), that the wordings of both of these provisions being similar, neither of these provisions says that the ordinance shall be void from its commencement if it is not approved, or is disapproved by the Legislature. The constitutional provision merely says that the ordinance shall cease to operate. This means that the ordinance remains effective till it ceases to operate. Accordingly, a mere disapproval of an ordinance by the concerned legislature cannot revive closed or completed transaction. If the Legislature wants to revive the pre-ordinance position, it can do so by passing a law having retrospective effect. Therefore, abolition of the posts by the ordinance having become a completed event, no question arises of revival of those posts after the lapse of the ordinance. The effect of the ordinance was irreversible except by express legislation as stated above.

But, on the other hand, the Gauhati High Court in the following case[52] took a different view. The Central Government issued an ordinance declaring certain sections of people in Assam as Scheduled Tribes. By successive ordinances the benefit was continued till the last ordinance lapsed without Parliament passing the necessary Act continuing the provisions of the ordinance. The Court ruled that with the lapse of the ordinance, the people concerned also lost the benefit conferred on them by the lapsed ordinance. The ordinance in question was made only for a short period. When Parliament failed to pass the necessary law, the ordinance lapsed. "Until and unless the competent authority enacts such a law with a view to confer such benefits afresh on those sections of the people, it is not possible to hold that as a right has already accrued that right has to be saved".

It is thus clear that an ordinance is effective so long as it lasts. If it lapses because of non-action of the Legislature, its validity is not affected. Depending on the factual context and other factors, the Court may hold that the effect of the ordinance has not come to an end even if the ordinance may have ceased to exist.

JUSTICIABILITY OF ORDINANCE-MAKING POWER

The position as regards justiciability of the Governor's satisfaction to issue an ordinance is similar to that of the President's satisfaction discussed earlier.[53]

---

51. T. Venkata Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 724 : (1985) 3 SCC 198.
52. Maitreyee Mahanta v. State of Assam, AIR 1999 Gau 32.
53. See, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(d), supra.

The question has been raised from time to time whether the 'satisfaction' of the Governor (i.e. of the Government) to issue an ordinance is justiciable or not.

The Governor of Andhra Pradesh issued an ordinance reducing the age of retirement of civil servants from 58 to 55. The ordinance was challenged inter alia on the ground of non-application of mind. Rejecting the argument, the Supreme Court asserted in Nagaraj[54] that issuing an ordinance is a legislative act of the executive. The Court stated in this connection. "The power to issue an ordinance is not an executive power but is the power of the executive to legislate". [55] This power is plenary within its field like the power of the State Legislature to pass laws and "there are no limitations upon that power except those to which the legislative power of the State Legislature is subject". Therefore, an ordinance cannot be declared invalid for the reason of non-application of mind "any more than any other can be. An executive act is liable to be struck down on the ground of non-application of mind not the act of the Legislature."[56]

The Court also rejected the ground of mala fides[57] with the remark that the ordinance making power being a legislative power, the argument of mala fides was misconceived. The Court also observed, "The Legislature, as a body, cannot be accused of having a law for an extraneous purpose."[58] The Court cannot examine the motives of the Legislature in passing an Act.

In T. Venkata Reddy v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[59] the Supreme Court has again reiterated the proposition that an ordinance cannot be struck down on such grounds as non-application of mind, or mala fides, or that the prevailing circumstances did not warrant the issue of the ordinance. An ordinance passed under Art. 123, or under Art. 213, stands on the same footing as an Act. Therefore, "an ordinance should be clothed with all the attributes of an Act of legislature carrying with it its incidents, immunities and limitations under the Constitution. It cannot be treated as an executive action or an administrative decision".[60] The Courts can declare a statute unconstitutional when it transgresses constitutional limits, but they cannot inquire into the propriety of the exercise of the legislative power. It has to be assumed that the legislative discretion is properly exercised.[61]

The U.P. Government promulgated an ordinance acquiring 49% share of the Dalmia Industry in the U.P. State Cement Corporation, a government undertaking. The validity of the ordinance was challenged but the Supreme Court rejected all contentions and ruled that the ordinance was made in public interest. The acquisition of shares of Dalmia in the government company was in public interest. The ordinance was not only in public interest and for public purpose but also was just and fair.[62]

---

54. K. Nagaraj v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1985 SC 551 : (1985) 1 SCC 523.
55. Ibid., at 565.
56. For discussion on the concept of 'non-application of mind', see JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, 959-63; CASES & MATERIALS, III, 2306-16.
57. See, A TREATISE op. cit, 890-928; CASES & MATERIALS, op. cit., 2068-2135.
58. AIR 1985 SC 551 at 566 : (1985) 1 SCC 523.
59. AIR 1985 SC 724 : (1985) 3 SCC 198.
60. Ibid, at 731.
61. See, supra, Ch. II.
Also see, R.K. Garg, supra; A.K. Roy v. Union of India, supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(ii)(d).
62. Dalmia Industries Ltd. v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1994 SC 2117 : (1994) 2 SCC 583.

Again, in the case noted below,[63] the Supreme Court has reiterated what it has said earlier in Nagaraj and Venkata Reddy, viz., the Court cannot take cognizance of "legislative malice" in passing a statute. Accordingly, motive for promulgation of an ordinance cannot be examined by the Court. The Court again reiterated the proposition that the ordinance cannot be invalidated on the ground of non-application of mind.

The judicial view expressed in the above cases that an ordinance cannot be questioned on the ground of mala fides is open to question as discussed earlier. It needs to be emphasized that the doctrine of Separation of Powers envisages not only separation of powers, as such, but also separation of the three organs who wield these powers.[64] When the Executive promulgates an ordinance, it exercises legislative power which in itself amounts to the negation of the doctrine of Separation of Powers, as it combines legislative power with executive power. Although an ordinance may have the same effect as an Act of the Legislature, and the function of making an ordinance may be regarded as legislative, yet there is a vital difference between the two: an ordinance is made by the Executive while an Act is made by a democratically elected Legislature after due deliberation and discussion. Therefore, the making of an ordinance can never be equated with the enactment of an Act through the Legislature. An ordinance and an Act may have the same effect after enactment, but this cannot mean that their origin is also on the same footing. One is the legislative act of the Executive, the other is the legislative act of the democritically elected Legislature. The executive can never be equated with the legislature.

The proposition, mentioned above, seems to have become untenable after the Supreme Court decision in Bommai, where the Supreme Court has ruled that a proclamation issued by the President under Art. 356 on the advice of the Council of Ministers is amenable to judicial review at least to the extent of examining whether the conditions precedent to the issuance of the Proclamation have been satisfied or not.[65] Thus, while an Act passed by a Legislature may not be challengeable on the ground of mala fides, the same ought not to be said of the Executive.

The Constitution itself differentiates between an Act and an ordinance as is very clear from the phraseology of Art. 123 or 213. An ordinance has a temporary life; it is not a permanent law like an Act. The very fact that an ordinance lapses automatically after a while, and has to be replaced by an Act of the Legislature shows that the Constitution does not confer the same status on an ordinance as that of an Act. The following discussion itself brings out clearly the fact that the Supreme Court does not treat an ordinance as being on all fours with an Act. In the eyes of the Court itself, an ordinance is a merely temporary expedient—an inferior kind of law. Accordingly to treat 'legislation' by the executive as pari passu with legislation by a legislature, as has been done in the above cases, does not appear to be sound.

---

63. Gurudevdatta VKSSS Maryadit v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 2001 SC 1980 : (2001) 4 SCC 534.
64. See, supra, Ch. III, Sec. F.
65. For discussion on Bommai, see, infra, Ch. XIII, Sec. B.

MISUSE OF THE POWER TO MAKE ORDINANCES

The power to promulgate ordinances is meant to be used sparingly and only in an emergency and when the State Legislature is in recess. An ordinance has only a limited life. Art. 213 is so structured that no ordinance made by the State Government can remain in force for more than 7½ months without being approved by State Legislature and enacted into an Act. Under Art. 213, the Governor can promulgate an ordinance if the State Assembly is not in session. An ordinance lapses if not passed by the Legislature within six weeks from the re-assembly of the Legislature. The Assembly has to meet within six months of its last session; in effect, the maximum life of an ordinance can thus be seven and half months.

However, in Bihar, an objectionable practice arose of not placing the ordinances before the Legislature for approval. These ordinances were re-promulgated word to word after the prorogation of the Legislature. This practice was helped by the fact that the Assembly always met for less than six weeks. The re-promulgation of the ordinances was done on a massive scale in a routine manner without ever being replaced by Acts of Legislature as envisaged by the constitutional provision. The State Government proceeded on the basis that it was not necessary to introduce any legislation in the Legislature but that the law could be continued to be made by the Government by having ordinances repromulgated by the Governor from time to time. In this way, an ordinance raj in the real sense of the term was ushered in the State. This amounted to law-making by an executive fiat instead of by the Legislature. This practice of mass repromulgation of ordinances on the prorogation of the session of the State Legislature continued unabated for long and was resorted to methodologically and with a sense of deliberateness.

Just to take one example of how the whole thing operated: the Bihar Sugarcane (Regulation of Supply and Purchase) Ordinance was kept in force for more than 13 years through the process of re-promulgation instead of seven and a half months as envisaged by the constitutional provision. Many other ordinances were continued for years without ever being brought before the Legislature for approval.[66]

An idea of the extent of this objectionable practice can be had from the following figures: during the period 1967-81, the State Governor promulgated 256 ordinances; all these ordinances were kept alive for periods ranging between 1 to 14 years by repromulgation from time to time. This reprehensible practice posed a threat to the system of parliamentary democracy. It could also be characterised as a fraud on the constitution as Art. 213 was never designed to be used in such a manner.

A writ petition was filed in the Supreme Court as a matter of public interest litigation on January 16, 1984, challenging such a practice as unconstitutional. The Supreme Court delivered its opinion in the matter in December, 1986.[67] The Court emphasized that under the Constitution, the primary law-making authority is the legislature and not the executive and the ordinance making power is "in the nature of an emergency power". The Court took note of the practice prevailing in Bihar. The Court described the practice as follows:

---

66. See, WADHWA, Re-promulgation of Ordinances; A Fraud on the Constitution of India.

67. D.C. Wadhwa v. State of Bihar, AIR 1987 SC 579 : (1989) 1 SCC 378. On "Public Interest Litigation', see, infra, Ch. VIII; infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. B.

> "It is clear that the power to promulgate ordinance was used by the Governor of Bihar on a large scale and that after the session of the Legislature was prorogued, the same ordinances which ceased to operate were re-promulgated, containing the same provisions almost in a routine manner".

The Court emphasized that every ordinance promulgated by the State Governor under Art. 213, must be placed before the State legislature, and "the executive cannot by taking resort to emergency provision of Art. 213 usurp the law-making function of the legislature."

The Court ruled unequivocally that the executive cannot by taking resort to an emergency power exercisable by it only when the legislature is not in session, take- over the law-making function of the Legislature, as this would subvert the democratic process which lies at the core of our constitutional scheme. The Court emphasized: "The power to promulgate an ordinance is essentially a power to be used to meet an extraordinary situation and it cannot be allowed to be perverted to serve political ends". It is the function of the Legislature which is a representative body to make law; the Executive cannot continue the provisions of an ordinance in force without going to the Legislature. "If the Executive were permitted to continue the provisions of an ordinance in force by adopting the methodology of re-promulgation without submitting to the voice of the Legislature, it would be nothing short of usurpation by the Executive of the law-making function of the Legislature".[68]

Criticizing the practice in trenchant terms, the Court observed:

> "The executive cannot by taking resort to an emergency power exercisable by it only when the legislature is not in session, take over the law-making function of the legislature. That would be clearly subverting the democratic process which lies at the core of our constitutional scheme, for then the people would be governed not by the laws made by the legislature as provided in the Constitution but by laws made by the executive".

The Court set its face against the Ordinance-Raj in the Country.

The Court did concede, however, that "there may be a situation where it may not be possible for the Government to introduce and push through in the Legislature a Bill containing the same provisions as in the ordinance, because the Legislature may have too much legislative business in a particular session, or the time at the disposal of the Legislature in a particular session may be short, and in that event, the Governor may legitimately find that it is necessary to repromulgate the ordinance. Where such is the case, repromultation of the ordinance may not be open to attack. But, otherwise, it would be a colourable exercise of power on the part of the Executive to continue an ordinance with substantially the same provisions beyond the period limited by the Constitution, by adopting the methodology of repromulgation". In this context, the Court further observed:

> "It is settled law that a constitutional authority cannot do indirectly what it is not permitted to do directly. If there is a constitutional provision inhibiting the constitutional authority from doing an act, such provision cannot be allowed to be defeated by adoption of any subterfuge. That would be clearly a fraud on the constitutional provision."[69]

---

68. Ibid., 589.

69. For comments on this case, see, DR. T.V. SUBBA RAO, Doctrine of Colourable Re-Promulgation of Ordinances : Wadhwa's case, AIR 1988 JL 49.

The Court held that the Executive in Bihar "has almost taken over the role of the Legislature in making laws, not for a limited period, but for years together in disregard of the constitutional limitations. This is clearly contrary to the Constitutional Scheme and it must be held to be improper and invalid." The Court ruled that the systematic practice of the Bihar Government in promulgating ordinances successively without enacting them through the Legislature was "clearly unconstitutional" and amounted to "a fraud on the Constitution".

The Court went on to say that "the Government (of Bihar), it seems, made it a settled practice to go on re-promulgating ordinances from time to time and this was done methodically and with a sense of deliberateness". The Court called this a "reprehensible practice of the highest constitutional importance".

The Court declared unconstitutional the Bihar Intermediate Education Council Ordinance, 1985, which was re-promulgated.

On 16-12-1989, the Bihar Government promulgated an ordinance to take over private recognised Sanskrit schools which were receiving government grants. The ordinance of 89 was successively replaced several times during 90 to 92. These ordinances were substantially in similar terms. Each ordinance contained a "repeal and savings' clause repealing the previous ordinance. As a result thereof, all actions taken under the previous ordinance were deemed to be taken under the fresh ordinance. It is thus clear that the facts of this case repeated what had been decried by the Supreme Court in Wadhwa. In Krishna Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar,[70] the Apex Court declared all these ordinances except the original one of 1989, as unconstitutional and invalid.

The Court ruled that in the absence of any explanation by the Government for promulgating these ordinances and in the absence of any compensation for taking over properties of the schools, all the ordinances which took colour from one another and formed a chain, were held to be fraud on Art. 213, arbitrary and invalid violating Art. 14 of the Constitution.[71]

There arose a very substantial question from the facts of the above case. An ordinance is a temporary or a stop-gap law. The first ordinance changed the status of the school employees from private to public or government servants. The ordinance lapsed without being replaced by a statute as is envisaged by the Constitution. The question was : Whether these employees lost the governmental status once the ordinance came to an end or was the status once conferred on them irreversible? The Bench deciding the case consisted of two judges who differed between themselves on this point. One judge took the view that the status conferred by the ordinance came to an end with the lapse of the ordinance as the status was not irreversible. The other judge took the view, that the status once conferred was irreversible. In view of this difference of opinion between the two judges, the matter has been referred to a larger bench.

The difficulty in accepting the doctrine of irreversibility of status is that if such a significant and permanent result can be achieved through the medium of an ordinance which is a stop gap law and which is enacted only to meet an unforeseen situation, then there remains no need to enact a law, as envisaged by the Constitution, to replace an ordinance and this will undermine the constitutional position of the Legislature. The executive can freely resort to an ordinance instead of undertaking the arduous process of legislation through the legislature and subjecting itself to legislative scrutiny.

70. (1998) 5 SCC 643.
71. For discussion on Art. 14, see, infra, Ch. XXI.

In Venkata Reddy,[72] as stated above, an ordinance was given a high status by the Supreme Court, and was equated to an Act of the Legislature. But the later case (Wadhwa) shows that an ordinance cannot be placed on the same pedestal as an Act for all purposes, the reason being that an ordinance is made by the Executive and not by the Legislature, and that ordinance-making power is subject to some limitations to which legislative power is not subject.

Wadhwa exposes in a very telling manner the dangers of an unrestricted power to the Executive to issue ordinances, as this power, like any other power, is prone to be abused or misused.[73] Promulgation of an ordinance by the Executive is inherently undemocratic. But when the government by-passes the Legislature and resorts to the ordinance-making power in a routine manner, the situation becomes much worse.

(iii) EXECUTIVE POWER

As regards the content of the executive power in a State, whatever has been said under the Central Government is fully relevant.[74] The extent and the scope of the State executive power has been discussed under Federalism.[75]

The usual rule is that the executive power of the State Government is co-extensive with the legislative power of the State Legislature.[76] To avoid conflict of State executive power and the Central executive power in the concurrent area, the proviso to Art. 162 provides that the executive power of the State in this area is subject to any law made by Parliament, or restricted by the executive power of the Centre expressly conferred on it by the Constitution or any law made by Parliament.[77]

A State Government thus has the undoubted right to organise fair price shops for distribution of foodstuffs under its executive power derived from entry 33(b) of List III, and no statutory power need be vested in the Government for this purpose.[78] The State Government can make appointments under its executive power without there being any law or rule for the purpose.[79]

In the absence of a law, on a particular subject matter, the State Government can pass executive orders in that behalf.[80]

---

72. Supra.
73. The Supreme Court has reiterated the Wadhwa ruling in Gurudevdatta VKSSS Maryadit v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 2001 SC 1980, at 1988.
74. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(iii).
75. Infra., Ch. XII, Sec. A.
76. Ambesh Kumar v. Principal, LL.R.M. Medical College, AIR 1987 SC 400 : 1986 Supp SCC 543; Bharat Coking Coal Co. Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (1990) 4 SCC 557.
77. Bharat Coking Coal Ltd. v. State of Bihar, op. cit. For fuller discussion on this topic, see, infra, Ch. XII.
78. Sarkari Sasta Anaj Vikreta Sangh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1981 SC 2030 : (1981) 4 SCC 471. For entry 33(b), List III, see, infra, Ch. X, Sec. F.
79. Sikkim v. Dorjee Tshering Bhutia, AIR 1991 SC 1933 : (1991) 4 SCC 243. Also see, Ch. XXXVI, Sec. B.
80. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Nivedita Jain, AIR 1981 SC 2045 : (1981) 4 SCC 296; Dayaram A. Gursahani v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1984 SC 850 : (1984) 3 SCC 36. See, Ram Jawaya v. State of Punjab, supra, Ch. III, Sec. D(iii).

The matter has been further elucidated by the Supreme Court in Bishambar Dayal.[81] The State in the exercise of its executive power is responsible for carrying on general administration of the State. So long as the Government does not go against a constitutional or a statutory provision, the width and amplitude of the executive power cannot be curtailed. If there is no law covering a particular aspect, the government can carry on the administration by issuing administrative directions or instructions until the Legislature makes a law in that behalf. The State Government can act within its competence and take executive action even if there is no legislation to support such executive action.

The Courts have propounded the doctrine of "occupied field" in relation to the exercise of the executive power under Art. 162. When a subject is covered by a statute passed by the State Legislature, then the Government cannot meddle with that subject through its executive power under Art. 162. The executive power under Art. 162 is not available in respect of the subject which is already covered by legislation.[82] In such a case, the executive has to exercise its statutory powers according to the provisions of the relevant statute.

The Government can issue general instructions in exercise of its executive power. These instructions may look very much like rules which the government makes in exercise of its statutory rule-making power which constitute delegated legislation. The instructions issued by the government under its executive power can supplement, but cannot supplant, the statutory rules made by the government. The executive instructions stand on a lower footing than statutory rules as they do not have the force of law.[83]

In the exercise of its executive power under Art. 162, the State Government has power and authority to prescribe conditions for admission to undergraduate and post-graduate medical courses, when there are no legal provisions for the purpose.[84] Government can create posts through administrative orders so long as they are not inconsistent with any statutory rules.[85]

The State Government issued a notification under its executive power prescribing an entrance examination for selection of candidates for admission to the medical colleges run by the State. The administrative notification was held valid as it did not come in conflict with any statutory provision. The notification only

---

81. Bishambar Dayal Chandra Mohan v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1982 SC 33 : (1982) 1 SCC 39.

82. S. Arunachalam v. State of Tamil Nadu, ILR (1996) 3 Mad 1508; V. Chandra v. State of Tamil Nadu, ILR (1996) 1 Mad 1007; Association of Management of Pvt. Colleges v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1998 Mad 34.

83. Union of India v. Tulsiram Patel, AIR 1985 SC 1416 : (1985) 3 SCC 398; State of Maharashtra v. Jagannath, AIR 1989 SC 1133; Chairman, L.I.C. of India, Bombay v. Kalangi Samuel Prabhakar, AIR 1997 AP 304*; Maharashtra State Electricity Board v. State of Maharashtra,* AIR 1997 Bom 267; Ratan Kumar Tandon v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1996 SC 2710 : (1997) 2 SCC 161; National Mineral Development Corpn. Ltd. v. State of Kant., AIR 1997 Kant 331.

See, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Ch. VIII; CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, I, Ch. VII.

84. Dr. Ambesh Kumar v. Principal, L.L.R.M. Medical College, Meerut, AIR 1987 SC 400 : 1986 Supp SCC 543; Aditya Shrikant Kelkar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1998 Bom 260.

85. C. Rangaswamaiah v. Karnataka Lokayukta, AIR 1998 SC 2496 : (1988) 6 SCC 66.

supplemented, did not supplant, the qualifications for admission laid down by statutory rules.[86]

However, in the absence of any law, the State Government or its officers in exercise of its executive authority cannot infringe rights of citizens merely because the State Legislature has power to make laws with regard to that subject.[87] Similarly, a notification issued in exercise of executive power cannot override a rule statutorily made.[88] The executive cannot go, in exercising its executive power, against a constitutional or a statutory provision.

Defining 'executive power', the Supreme Court has stated that the executive power vested in the State Government under Art. 154(1) connotes the residual of government functions which remain after the legislative and judicial functions are taken away. The executive power includes acts necessary for the carrying on or supervision of the general administration of the State including both a decision as to action and the carrying out of the decision.[89]

In addition to the executive power conferred generally on the State Executive, a few specific executive functions have been conferred under the Constitution, e.g., appointing the Advocate-General; appointing members of the State Public Service Commission,[90] etc.

E. ADVOCATE-GENERAL

Parallel to the Attorney-General at the Centre,[91] there is an Advocate-General in each State. He is formally appointed by the Governor. Needless to say that the Governor exercises this power with the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers.

The Advocate-general is a person who is qualified to be appointed as a Judge of the High Court [Art. 165(1)].

The Advocate-General holds his office during the Governor's pleasure and receives such remuneration as the Governor may determine [Art. 165(3)]. The fact that the Advocate-General holds office during the Governor's pleasure means that, unlike a High Court Judge who retires at the age of 62, the Advocate-General can hold office even after he attains the age of 62 years.[92]

He gives advice to the State Government upon such legal matters as may be referred to him. He performs such other duties of a legal character as may be assigned to him by the Governor from time to time, or are conferred on him by the Constitution or any other law [Art. 165(2).]

He also has the right to speak and otherwise participate in the proceedings of the Houses of the State Legislature, or of any committee of the Legislature of which he may be named as a member, but he does not have a right of vote under this provision [Art. 177]. He enjoys all legislative privileges which are available to a member of the Legislature.[93]

---

86. Andhra Pradesh v. Lavu Narendra Nath, AIR 1971 SC 2560 : (1971) 1 SCC 607.
87. Bharat Coking Coal Ltd. v. State of Bihar, op. cit.; Bishambar Dayal, op. cit.
88. Union of India v. Arun Kumar Roy, AIR 1986 SC 737 : (1986) 1 SCC 675.
89. Chandrika Jha v. State of Bihar, AIR 1984 SC 322 : (1984) 2 SCC 41.
90. Infra. Ch. XXXVI, Sec. K.
91. Supra, Ch. III, Sec. G.
92. See, Om Prakash Joshi v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2002 Raj. 33.
93. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. H.

CHAPTER VIII

STATE JUDICIARY

SYNOPSIS

A. INTRODUCTORY

The primary duty of the Judiciary is to uphold the Constitution and the Laws without fear or favour, without being biased by political ideology or economic theory.[1]

The State Judiciary consists of a High Court and a system of subordinate courts. The High Court is at the apex of the State judicial system. The High Courts come below the Supreme Court in India's judicial hierarchy.[2] The institution of the High Courts is fairly old as it dates back to 1862 when under the Indian High Courts Act, 1861, High Courts were established at Calcutta, Bombay and Madras.[3] In course of time, other High Courts also came to be established.[4] The Constitution builds the structure of the High Courts, on the pre-existing foundations.[5]

At present, each State in India has a High Court [Art. 214]. Parliament may, however, establish by law a common High Court for two or more States [Art 231(1)]. The Gauhati High Court is the common High Court of seven States of North East India, namely-Assam, Nagaland, Meghalaya, Manipur, Tripura, Mizoram[6] and Arunachal Pradesh[7]. Bombay High Court has jurisdiction over the State of Goa and the Union Territory of Daman, Diu, Dadra & Nagar Haveli[8]. Similarly Calcutta High Court is the High Court for the Union Territory of the Andaman & Nicobar Islands[9]. The States of Punjab & Haryana have a common High Court which is also the High Court for the Union Territory of Chandigarh[10]. Besides these four, there are at present 17 other High Courts.

The High Courts play a very significant role in the scheme of administration of justice. The enormity of the task assigned to the High Courts can be appreciated by having a look at the wide and varied jurisdiction assigned to these courts.

The High Courts enjoy civil as well as criminal, ordinary as well as extraordinary, and general as well as special jurisdiction. The High Courts enjoy an original jurisdiction in respect of testamentary, matrimonial, company and guardianship matters. Original jurisdiction is conferred on the High Courts under several statutes. The High Courts enjoy extraordinary jurisdiction under Arts. 226 to issue various writs. Several statutes confer an advisory jurisdiction on the High Courts. Each High Court has supervisory powers over the subordinate courts under it. Each High Court, being a Court of record enjoys the power to punish for its contempt as well as of its Subordinate Courts.

Considering the question whether a High Court should sit as a whole at one place or in Benches at different places, the Law Commission expressed its firm opinion as early as 1957 that "in order to maintain the highest standards of ad-

---

1. People's Union for Civil Liberties (PUCL) v. Union of India, (2003) 4 SCC 399 : AIR 2003 SC 2363.
2. For Supreme Court, see, supra, Ch. IV.
3. JAIN, OUTLINES OF INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, 262-289.
4. Ibid.
5. Ibid.
6. State of Mizoram Act, 1986.
7. State of Arunachal Pradesh Act, 1986.
8. Goa, Daman & Re-organization Act, 1987.
9. Calcutta High Court (Extension of Jurisdiction) Act, 1953.
10. See Art. 230 (infra).

ministration of justice and to preserve the character and quality of the work at present being done by the High Courts, it is essential that the High Court should function as a whole and only at one place in the State."[11]

However, several High Courts have Benches apart from the principal one, with separate territorial jurisdictions.[12]

The Chief Justice is the administrative authority of the High Court. He plays or ought to play a very important role in the consultative process relating to appointment of Judges of the High Court. He has absolute prerogative to constitute a Bench is of the Chief Justice of the High Court and a request to the Chief Justice of the High Court to constitute a Bench to dispose of certain matters did not amount to a direction did not in any way express any lack of confidence in the Chief Justice nor take away his prerogative to constitute the Bench.[13]

B. COMPOSITION OF THE HIGH COURT

(a) STRENGTH OF A HIGH COURT

A High Court consists of the Chief Justice and such other Judges as the President may appoint from time to time [Art. 216]. In this way, the number of Judges in a High Court is flexible and it can be settled by the Central Executive from time to time keeping in view the amount of work before a High Court.

Representation of People Act cannot be taken away by the Rules framed by the High Court in exercise of the power conferred by Article 225 such power relates to procedural matters and cannot make nor curtail any substantive law.[14]

The question of justiciability of the adequacy of the Judge-strength in a High Court has been considered by the Supreme Court in Supreme Court Advocates-on-Record Association v. Union of India[15]. The Court has emphasized that it is necessary to make a periodical review of the Judge strength of every High Court with reference to the felt need for disposal of cases, taking into account the backlog of cases and the expected future filing. This is essential to ensure speedy justice. Art. 216 casts a duty on the Central Executive to periodically assess the Judge strength of each High Court. Art. 216 is to be interpreted not in isolation, but as a part of the entire constitutional scheme, conforming to the constitutional purpose and its ethos.

Accordingly, the Court has ruled that fixation of Judge strength in a High Court is a justiciable matter. If it is shown that the existing strength is inadequate to provide speedy justice to the people, in spite of the optimum efficiency of the existing strength, "a direction can be issued to assess the felt need and fix the strength of Judges commensurate with the need to fulfil the State obligation of providing speedy justice." In making the review of the Judge strength in a High Court, the President must attach great weight to the opinion of the Chief Justice

---

11. Law Commission of India, Fourth Report, (1956).
12. Allahabad High Court-1; Bombay High Court-3; Calcutta High Court-1; Gauhati High Court-6; Madras High Court-1; Madhya Pradesh High Court-2; Rajasthan High Court-2.
13. Rajiv Ranjan Singh v. Union of India (2005) 11 SCC 312 : (2005) 5 Scale 297.
14. Raj Kumar Yadav v. Samir Kumar Mahaseth (2005) 3 SCC 601 : (2005) 11 JT 177.
15. AIR 1994 SC 268 : (1993) 4 SCC 441, see, infra, (d).

of the High Court and the Chief Justice of India, and "if the Chief Justice of India so recommends, the exercise must be performed with due despatch".[16]

To reach this conclusion, the Court invoked Art. 21, according to which speedy justice is now a constitutional requirement.[17] On this point, the Court overruled the view expressed by it earlier in S.P. Gupta v. Union of India,[18] that the question of the strength of Judges in a High Court was not justiciable. It is not for the Court to fix the number of judges itself; it can ask for a review to be undertaken of the judge strength. Thereafter, on the question of fixation of the strength of the Judges of a High Court, the Supreme Court had observed in Subhesh Sharma v. Union of India[19]: "For the availability of an appropriate atmosphere where a Judge would be free to act according to his conscience it is necessary, therefore, that he should not be overburdened with pressure of work which he finds it physically impossible to undertake. This necessarily suggests that the Judge strength should be adequate to the current requirement and must remain under constant review in order that commensurate Judge strength may be provided."

The significance of the Supreme Court ruling in the Advocates-on-Record case can be appreciated in the context of the embarrassing situation that every High Court is faced with the load of pending cases. In its report in 1988, the Law Commission estimated that nearly 14 lac cases were pending in the various High Courts.[20] As on 31st March, 2007 there were 3678043 cases pending in the High Courts.[21] One of reasons for this situation is inadequate judicial strength in the High Courts.

(b) APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES

The High Court Judges are appointed by the President after consulting the Chief Justice of India, the Governor of the State concerned[22] and, in case of appointment of a Judge other than the Chief Justice, the Chief Justice of the High Court to which the appointment is to be made [Art. 217(1)].

As mentioned above, the constitutional provision [Art. 217(1)] says that the President appoints these Judges after consulting the Chief Justice of India, the State Governor and the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned. The Central Executive and the State Executive provide the political input in the process of selection of the Judges.

Since the inauguration of the Constitution, the question has been considered by some authorities: how to ensure that the Judges are selected on non-political considerations? It is thought that it is necessary for securing the independence and objectivity of the Judiciary that Judges be selected on merit and not on political considerations. Such an objective can be achieved only if the role of the po-

---

16. Ibid, at 441.
17. See, infra, Ch. XXVI, for discussion on Art. 21.
18. AIR 1982 SC 149 : 1981 Supp SCC 87; see, infra, (c).
19. AIR 1991 SC 631, 636 : 1981 Supp (1) SCC 574.
20. Law Comm. of India, One Hundred Twenty Fourth Report on The High Court Arrears—A Fresh Look, 2 (1988).
21. Court News : published by Supreme Court of India: [April-June 2007]: Vol. II; Issue No: 2; p. 7.
22. In case of a common High Court for two or more States, the Governors of all the States concerned are consulted; Art. 231(2).

litical elements is reduced in the process of selection of the Judges of the High Courts.

The matter was considered by the Law Commission as early as 1958. In its XIV Report,[23] the Commission opined that the High Court Judges were not always appointed on merit because of the influence of the State Executive. Accordingly, the Commission suggested that the Chief Justice of the High Court should have a bigger role to play in the matter of appointment of the Judges; that it should be only on his recommendation that a Judge be appointed, and also that concurrence, and not only consultation, of the Chief Justice of India be needed for this purpose.[24]

The Government of India did not accept this recommendation. On the other hand, it stated that, as a matter of course, the High Court Judges had been appointed with the concurrence of the Chief Justice of India.[25]

Again, the Study Team of the Administrative Reforms Commission on Centre-State Relationship endorsed the Law Commission's view that influence of the State Executive be reduced in appointing the High Court Judges. The Team suggested that the State Executive should have the right only of making comments on the names proposed by the High Court's Chief Justice but not to propose a nominee of its own. The Team hoped that this would reduce political influence exerted at the State level in appointing High Court Judges and improve professional competence.[26]

However, the A.R. Commission did not endorse the suggestion made by its Study Team. The Commission took the view that the proposal would drastically reduce the role of the State Governments in the selection of the High Court Judges. In its view, the existing procedure balanced the right of the Centre and of the States. It harmonized "the initiative and autonomy of the State, on the one hand, and safeguards against the question of undue influence by the State, on the other".[27]

(c) S.P. GUPTA V. INDIA

In 1982, the matter regarding appointment of the High Court Judges as well as of the Supreme Court Judges came before the Supreme Court by way of public interest litigation[28] in the famous case of S.P. Gupta v. Union of India.[29]

Several writ petitions were filed in the various High Courts under Art. 226 by several lawyers practising in the various High Courts.[30] All these petitions were transferred to the Supreme Court for disposal. The main question considered by the Court was: of the several functionaries participating in the process of appointment of a High Court Judge whose opinion amongst the various participants should have primacy in the process of selection?

---

23. Supra.
24. XIV Report, 71-75.
25. Rajya Sabha, Nov. 24, 1959.
26. Report, I, 181-88 (1967).
27. Report on Centre-State Relationship, 40.
28. For Public Interest Litigation, see, infra, this Chapter Sec. D(k) and Ch. XXXIII, Sec. B.
29. AIR 1982 SC 149.
30. For discussion on Art. 226, see, infra, Sec. D.

The majority[31] took the view, in substance, that the opinions of the Chief Justice of India and the Chief Justice of the High Court were merely consultative and that "the power of appointment resides solely and exclusively in the Central Government" and that the Central Government could override the opinions given by the constitutional functionaries (viz., the Chief Justice of India and the Chief Justice of the concerned High Court). This meant that the view of the Chief Justice of India did not have primacy in the matter of appointment of the High Court Judges; that the primacy lay with the Central Government which could decide after consulting the various constitutional functionaries and that the Central Government was not bound to act in accordance with the opinions of all the constitutional functionaries consulted, even if their opinions be identical.

The majority in Gupta thus gave a literal meaning to the word 'consultation' in Arts. 124(2)[32] and 217(1) in relation to all consultees and final decision in the matter was left in the hands of the Central Executive.[33] The majority thus took an extremely literal and positivistic view of Art 217(1). In reality, this view made consultation with the Chief Justices inconsequential in the matter of appointment of High Court Judges.

However, even after Gupta, the Central Government always maintained that it had, as a matter of policy, not appointed any Judge without the name being cleared by the Chief Justice of India.

The majority ruling in Gupta to the effect that in the consultative process leading to the appointment of a High Court Judge, the view expressed by the Chief Justice of India would have as much significance as the opinion of the State Governor, or the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned, came to be criticised in course of time by a Bench of the Supreme Court in Subhesh Sharma.[34] The Bench emphasized that an independent, non-political judiciary was crucial to sustain the democratic political system adopted in India. The Bench now expressed the view that consistent with the constitutional purpose and process, "it became imperative that the role of the institution of the Chief Justice of India be recognised as of crucial importance in the matter of appointments to the Supreme Court and the High Courts of the States".[35]

The Bench in Subhash also criticised the developing practice of a State sending up names for appointment to the High Court direct to the Central Govern-

---

31. BHAGWATI, FAZAL ALI, DESAI AND VENKATARAMIAH, JJ. The Bench consisted of five Judges.

32. See, Ch. IV, Sec. B(b), supra, for this Article of the Constitution.

33. After referring to Arts. 124(2) and 217(1), BHAGWATI, J., observed as follows (AIR 1982 SC at 200):
"... It is clear on a plain reading of these two Articles that the Chief Justice of India, the Chief Justice of the High Court and such other Judges of the High Courts and of the Supreme Court as the Central Government may deem it necessary to consult are merely constitutional functionaries having a consultative role and the power of appointment resides solely and exclusively in the Central Government... It would therefore be open to the Central Government to override the opinion given by constitutional functionaries required to be consulted and to arrive at its own decision in regard to the appointment of a Judge in the High Court or the Supreme Court ... Even if the opinion given by all the Constitutional functionaries consulted by it is identical, the Central Government is not bound to act in accordance with such opinion". For 'consultation' and 'consult' and cases relating thereto see also N. Kannadasan v. Ajoy Khose, (2009) 7 SCC 1, 42, exhaustively considered.

34. Subhesh Sharma v. Union of India, AIR 1991 SC 631 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 574.

35. AIR 1991 SC, at 641.

ment instead of sending the same to the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned. According to the Bench of the Court: "This is a distortion of the constitutional scheme which is wholly impermissible".[36] The Bench opined that primacy be given to the views of the Chief Justice of India in the matter of selection of the High Court Judges. This would improve the quality of selection. In India, judicial review is "a part of the basic constitutional structure"[37] and "one of the basic features of the essential Indian Constitutional policy". Therefore, "to contemplate a power for the Executive to appoint a person despite of his being disapproved or not recommended by the Chief Justice of the State and the Chief Justice of India would be wholly inappropriate and would constitute an arbitrary exercise of the power". The Bench observed:

> "In India, however, the judicial institutions, by tradition, have an avowed apolitical commitment and the assurance of a non-political complexion of the judiciary cannot be divorced from the process of appointments. Constitutional phraseology of "consultation" has to be understood and explained consistent with and to promote this constitutional spirit... The appointment is rather the result of collective constitutional process. It is a participatory constitutional function. It is, perhaps, inappropriate to refer to any 'power' or 'right' to appoint Judges. It is essentially a discharge of a constitutional trust of which certain constitutional functionaries are collectively repositories..."[38]

The Bench, therefore, suggested reconsideration by a larger Bench of this aspect of the process of appointment of Judges.

(d) SUPREME COURT ADVOCATES-ON-RECORD ASSOCIATION V. INDIA

As a consequence of the observations of the Bench in Subhesh, a Bench of 9 Judges was constituted to reconsider the matter.

In Supreme Court Advocates-on-Record Association v. Union of India,[39] in a majority opinion delivered by VERMA, J., the Court has sought to interpret the constitutional provisions concerning the High Courts so as to strengthen the "foundational features and the basic structure of the Constitution."

The majority now gave up literal interpretation and adopted a wider meaning of the constitutional provisions concerning the judiciary. The word 'consultation' in Art. 217(1) was given a broad meaning. The majority now insisted that the main concern of the constitution is the selection of the most suitable person for the superior judiciary. Thus, the majority view expressed in S.P. Gupta—(i) that the last word in appointment of High Court Judges rests with the government; and (ii) that the Chief Justice of India has no place of primacy in selection of High Court Judges were now overruled.

Accordingly, the Court has ruled that "in the choice of a candidate suitable for appointment, the opinion of the Chief Justice of India should have the greatest weight as he is best suited to know the worth of the appointee; the selection should be made as a result of a participatory consultative process in which the Executive has the power to act as a mere check on the exercise of power by the Chief Justice of India, to achieve the constitutional purpose. Thus, the executive

---

36. Ibid, at 642.
37. See, infra, Ch. XLI, for discussion on the Doctrine of Basic Features of the Constitution.
38. AIR 1991 SC, at 645.
39. AIR 1994 SC, 268 : 1993 (4) SCC 441.

element in the appointment process is reduced to the minimum and any political influence is eliminated."[40]

The Court has emphasized that the primary aim must be to reach an agreed decision taking into account the views of all the consultees, giving the greatest weight to the opinion of the Chief Justice of India. "No question of primacy would arise when the decision is reached in this manner, by consensus, without any difference of opinion". However, if conflicting opinions do emerge at the end of the process, then the primacy must lie in the final opinion of the Chief Justice of India, "unless for very good reasons known to the Executive and disclosed to the Chief Justice of India, that appointment is not considered to be suitable".

The Court has further emphasized that the primacy of the opinion of the Chief Justice of India in this context means, in effect, "primacy of the opinion of Chief Justice of India formed collectively, that is to say, after taking into account the views of his senior colleagues who are required to be consulted by him for the formation of his opinion".[41] The Chief Justice of India is expected "to take into account the views of his colleagues in the Supreme Court who are likely to be conversant with the affairs of the concerned High Court. The Chief Justice of India may also ascertain the views of one or more senior Judges of that High Court". The majority of the Judges has emphasized that this process would achieve the constitutional purpose of selecting the best available for composition of the Supreme Court and the High Courts which is so essential to ensure the independence of the judiciary, and, thereby, to preserve democracy.[42]

The majority judgment has laid down detailed procedural norms to be followed while appointing the Supreme Court and High Court Judges.

The law laid down by the Supreme Court in the Supreme Court Advocates-on-Record case has one great advantage, viz., to minimise political influence in the appointment of High Court Judges as the Central Government could no longer appoint a Judge bypassing the Chief Justice of India. The majority has also expressed the opinion that initiation of the proposal for appointment of a High Court Judge must be by the Chief Justice of the concerned High Court.

The ruling of the Supreme Court in the Supreme Court Advocates case regarding appointment of the High Court Judges has been elaborated and articulated further by another 9 Judge Bench in In Re : Presidential Reference.[43]

The Court has now clarified that although the opinion of the Chief Justice of India has "primacy" in the matter of appointment of a High Court Judge, it is not solely the opinion of the Chief Justice of India alone but it is "reflective of the opinion of the judiciary which means that it must necessarily have the element of plurality in its formation". Therefore, the Chief Justice of India should form his opinion in regard to a person to be recommended for appointment as a High Court Judge in consultation with his two senior-most puisne Judges. They would in making their decision take into account the opinion of the Chief Justice of the High Court, which "would be entitled to greatest weight", the views of other High Court judges who may have been consulted and the views of the Supreme

---

40. AIR 1994 SC, at 430.
41. Ibid., at 431.
42. Ibid., at 425.
43. AIR 1999 SC 1, 19-22; see, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. F(j).

Court Judges "who are conversant with the affairs of the concerned High Court." All these views should be expressed in writing and conveyed to the Government of India along with the recommendation.

The Court has emphasized that the plurality of Judges in the formation of the opinion of the Chief Justice of India is an in-built check against the likelihood of arbitrariness or bias. In view of this safeguard, Judicial review of the appointment of a High Court Judge is available only on the following grounds:

(i) if, in making the decision as regards the appointment of a High Court Judge, the views of the Chief Justice and the senior Judges of the High Court concerned, and of the Supreme Court Judges having knowledge of that High Court, have not been sought or considered by the Chief Justice of India and his two senior-most colleagues;

(ii) if the appointee lacks eligibility for appointment as a High Court Judge.

But the opinion of the Chief Justice touching the merit of the decision is not justiciable—only the decision making process is subject to review.[44]

(e) QUALIFICATIONS FOR A HIGH COURT JUDGE

A person to be appointed as a High Court Judge should be a citizen of India; he must have held a judicial office in India, or been an advocate of a High Court, for at least ten years [Art. 217(2)].[45] Unlike the Supreme Court, the Constitution makes no provision for appointment of a jurist as a High Court Judge.

Legal History was made in India when in Kumar Padma Prasad v. Union of India,[46] for the first time, the Supreme Court quashed the appointment of Shri K.N. Srivastava, Secretary (Law and Justice), Mizoram Government, as a High Court Judge on the ground that he was not qualified to be appointed as such.

The appointment of Shri Srivastava as a High Court Judge was challenged through a writ petition moved in the Gauhati High Court by a practising advocate and the High Court granted a stay on the warrant of appointment. Shri Srivastava then moved the Supreme Court against the High Court order and moved a transfer petition of the writ petition from the High Court to the Supreme Court.

Referring to Art. 217(2)(a), the Court pointed out that the question was whether Shri Srivastava had held a judicial office for 10 years. The term 'judicial office' has not been defined in the Constitution but, according to the Court, holder of 'judicial office' under Art. 217(2)(a) means a person who exercises only judicial functions, determines causes inter partes and renders decisions in a judicial capacity. He must belong to the judicial service which as a class is free from executive control and is disciplined to hold the dignity, integrity and independence of judiciary.

---

44. N. Kannadasan v. Ajoy Khose, (2009) 7 SCC 1, 51.

45. To compute the period of ten years, the periods for which a person has held a judicial office, been an advocate of a High Court, been a member of a tribunal or held any post under the Centre or State requiring special knowledge of law have to be counted: Expl. (a) and (aa) to Art. 217(2).

46. AIR 1992 SC 1213 : (1992) 2 SCC 428.

In view of the Court, the expression 'judicial office' "means an office which is a part of judicial service as defined under Art 236(b) of the Constitution".[47] The Supreme Court ruled that Shri Srivastava was not qualified to be appointed as a High Court Judge as he had held no judicial office in a judicial service. The Court ruled that the office of Legal Remembrancer-cum-Secretary (Law and Judicial) of the State Government held by him was a non-judicial office under the control of the Executive. All the other offices held by him were neither judicial nor part of any judicial service. He also did not complete a period of ten years as a member of the State Judicial Service.

The Court made it clear that ordinarily the domain in such matters lay wholly with the constitutional authorities but in exceptional circumstances like the present, where the incumbent did not fulfil the qualification prescribed for the office, it became the Court's duty to see that no ineligible or unqualified person was appointed to a high constitutional and august office of a High Court Judge.

(f) THE CHIEF JUSTICE

The administration of the High Court including the power to constitute Benches and the allocation of cases to puisne judges is with the Chief Justice[48]. The requirement under a statute of consultation with the Chief Justice before appointment of either a sitting or retired judge as a member of a Tribunal under that statute, cannot be equated with Art. 217 of the Constitution and does not require the Chief Justice to consult senior colleagues before making a recommendation.[49]

(g) ACTING CHIEF JUSTICE

The President may appoint one of the Judges of the High Court as its acting Chief Justice in case the office falls vacant, or the Chief Justice is unable to perform his duties by reason of absence or otherwise [Art. 223].

The Acting Chief Justice has all the powers of the Chief Justice "without any limitation or rider", although it is a rule of prudence not to take any major decisions which could await the decision of the would Chief Justice.[50]

(h) ADDITIONAL JUDGES

The President may appoint duly qualified persons as additional Judges of a High Court, for a period not exceeding two years, when it appears to him that because of temporary increase in business or arrears of work therein, the number of Judges of that Court should be increased [Art. 224(1)].[51]

(i) ACTING JUDGE

A duly qualified person may also be appointed as an acting Judge of a High Court when any of its Judges, other than the Chief Justice, is unable to perform his duties due to absence or otherwise, or when a permanent Judge of the High

---

47. See, infra, Sec. G.
48. Rajiv Ranjan Singh 'Lalan' (V) v. Union of India, (2005) 11 SCC 312 : (2005) 5 SCALE 297.
49. Ashok Tanwar v. State of Himachal Pradesh, (2005) 2 SCC 104 : (2005) 4 JT 528 : AIR 2005 SC 614.
50. Ashok Tanwar v. State of Himachal Pradesh, (2005) 2 SCC 104 : AIR 2005 SC 614.
51. See, infra, this Chapter, Sec. B(o), for further discussion on this point.

Court is appointed as its acting Chief Justice. An acting Judge holds office until the permanent Judge resumes his duties [Art. 224(2)].

(j) APPOINTMENT OF RETIRED JUDGES

The Chief Justice of a High Court may, with the previous consent of the President, request a retired High Court Judge to sit and act as a Judge of the High Court. While so sitting and acting, he is entitled to such allowance as the President may by order determine. He has all jurisdiction, powers and privileges of a High Court Judge, but is not regarded as a Judge of the High Court for any other purpose [Art. 224A]. He is, thus, a Judge of the High Court for purposes of jurisdiction, powers and privileges but not for any other purpose. He can, therefore, hear an election petition.[52] Since an ad hoc judge is not otherwise deemed to be a judge of the High Court, the period of service as an ad-hoc judge cannot be included for the purposes of determining pensionary benefits.[53]

(k) OATH BY JUDGES

Before entering upon his office, a person appointed as a High Court Judge is to make and subscribe an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form before the Governor of the State, or his nominee for the purpose [Art. 219].

(l) SALARIES OF JUDGES

The salaries payable to a High Court Judge are determined by Parliament by law and, unil provision is made for the purpose, such salaries as are specified in the Second Schedule to the Constitution [Art. 221(1)]. Further, Parliament is empowered to determine by law such matters as allowances payable to a High Court Judge and his rights in respect of leave of absence and pension.

Parliament may regulate these matters from time to time [Art. 221(2)][54] but never to the disadvantage of a Judge after his appointment.[55] Thus, it has been held that the rights of a Chief Justice of a High Court to receive pension and other benefits, can not be altered to his disadvantage, after his appointment.[56]

(m) PRACTICE AFTER RETIREMENT

A person who has held office as a permanent Judge of a High Court is debarred from acting and pleading in any Court or before any authority in India except the Supreme Court and other High Courts [Art. 220].

The Law Commission adversely commented on the practice of the High Court Judges setting up practice after their retirement, as it greatly detracted from the dignity of the High Courts and the administration of Justice generally. The Commission, therefore, suggested that the retirement age of the High Court Judges be extended from 60 to 65 years and a total ban imposed on a retired High

---

52. Krishan Gopal v. Prakash Chandra, AIR 1974 SC 209 : 1974 (1) SCC 128.
53. Justice P. Venugopal v. Union of India, (2003) 7 SCC 726, at pp. 734-735 : AIR 2003 SC 3887, the Bench doubted the correctness of the Court's earlier decision in Union of India v. Pratibha Bonnerjea, (1995) 6 SCC 765 : AIR 1996 SC 693.
54. Proviso to Art. 221(2).
55. Necessary provisions in this regard have been made by the High Court Judges (Salaries and Conditions of Service) Act, 1954. The Act has been recently amended by the High Court and Supreme Court Judges (Salaries and Conditions of Service) Amendment Act, 1998.
56. Justice S.S. Sandhawalia v. Union of India, AIR 1990 P&H 198.

Court Judge resuming practice in any Court.[57] The Commission's recommendation was partially accepted; the age of retirement of a High Court Judge was raised from 60 to 62, but ban on his practice after retirement was not imposed.

(n) FILLING UP VACANCIES

Usually, there is long delay in filling the posts of High Court Judges. This causes delay in the administration of justice. The High Court Judges are overworked and vacancies among them make matters worse.

In Subhesh Sharma v. Union of India,[58] the Supreme Court has taken into consideration a matter of great public significance, viz., the question of delay in filling up the vacancies in the sanctioned posts of the Judges in the Supreme Court and the High Courts, and fixing the strength of the Judges in each High Court.

The strength of the Judges in the Supreme Court is fixed by law by Parliament.[59] In case of the High Courts, the power lies in the President to fix the judicial strength for each High Court. It is common experience, that a number of these posts remain vacant for long. The Supreme Court has now emphasized that for Rule of Law to prevail, judicial independence is of "prime necessity". To make available to a Judge a proper atmosphere in which he may be free to act according to his conscience, it is necessary to ensure that the Judge is not overburdened with pressure of work. "This necessity suggests that the Judge strength should be adequate to the current requirement and must remain under constant review in order that commensurate judicial strength may be provided.[60] This point has been emphasized upon from time to time by various bodies.[61]

The Supreme Court has pointed out that keeping the load of work in view which comes before the High Courts, the judicial strength in no High Court is adequate. The Court has, therefore, suggested to the Government of India, that the matter should be reviewed from time to time and steps be taken for determining the sanctioned strength in a pragmatic manner on the basis of the existing need. The Court has observed in this connection:

> "If there be no correlation between the need and the sanctioned strength and the provisions of Judge-manpower is totally inadequate, the necessary consequence has to be backlog and sluggish enforcement of the Rule of Law."[62]

Another matter raised by the Court is the delay in filling vacancies of Judges. The Court has emphasized upon quick action to fill up the posts. The Court has observed in this connection:[63]

> "Backlog in the courts, has become a national problem. The adjudicatory process is being blamed for not equalling itself to the challenge of the times. There is a general complaint that the judicial system is on the verge of collapse. It is, therefore, the obligation of the constitutional process to keep the system appropriately manned. We have found no justification for the sluggish move in such an important matter".

---

57. XIV Report, 88.
58. AIR 1991 SC 631 : 1991 Supp (1) SCC 574; supra, footnote 34.
59. See, Ch. IV, supra, Sec. B(a).
60. AIR 1991 SC, at 636.
61. Law Commission, XIV Report.
62. Also see, in this connection, Supreme Court Advocates-on-Record Association v. Union of India, supra, Sec. B(d).
63. AIR 1991 SC, at 641.

(o) TRANSFER OF JUDGES

The question of transfer of a Judge from one High Court to another has raised controversies from time to time. During the emergency of 1975,[64] 16 High Court Judges were transferred from one High Court to another. It was widely believed that the Government did so as a punitive measure to punish those Judges who had dared to give judgments against it.[65]

Article 222(1) empowers the President to transfer a Judge from one High Court to another after consulting the Chief Justice of India. Under Art. 222(2), the transferred Judge is entitled to receive, in addition to his salary, such compensatory allowance as may be determined by Parliament by law, and until so determined, as the President may fix by order.

As the phraseology of Art. 222(1) stands, neither the consent of the Judge is necessary to his transfer nor is the opinion of the Chief Justice binding on the Government.

A Judge of the Gujarat High Court was transferred to the Andhra Pradesh High Court without his consent. He challenged his transfer through a writ petition in the High Court and the matter came ultimately before the Supreme Court in India v. Sankalchand Himatlal Sheth.[66]

The Supreme Court realised that while the Constitution promoted the democratic value of independence of the Judiciary, the Executive could use the power of transfer of High Court Judges to undermine judicial independence. But, as regards the interpretation of Art. 222, the Court divided 3:2. The minority took the view that to preserve judicial integrity and independence, the word 'transfer' in Art. 222 should be interpreted to mean only 'consensual transfer', i.e., transfer of the Judge with his consent and not otherwise because transfer constitutes a stigma on the Judge and is very inconvenient to him. On the other hand, the majority took a more literal view of Art. 222 and held that Art. 222 does not require consent of a Judge to his transfer from one to another High Court.

As a safeguard against misuse of power by the Executive, the majority ruled that 'consultation' with the Chief Justice as envisaged by Art. 222 has to be 'full and effective consultation' and not a mere formality. The opinion given by the Chief Justice would be entitled to the greatest weight and any departure from it would have to be justified by the Government on strong and cogent grounds.

The majority also emphasized that the proposal to transfer a judge/Chief Justice should be initiated only by the Chief Justice of India and that transfer could be resorted to only as an exceptional measure and only in public interest. Transfer made thus ought not to be considered as punitive. Transfer of a Judge from

---

64. For discussion on the emergency provisions in the Constitution, see, infra, Ch. XIII.

65. The Government sought to justify these transfers on the plea of national integration and removal of narrow parochial tendencies, but this defence was found by the Supreme Court as not true. CHANDRACHUD, J., observed in Sankalchand, "..... the record of this case does not bear out the claim that any one of the 16 High Court Judges was transferred in order to further the cause of national integration. Far from it".

In the words of BHAGWATI, J., in S.P. Gupta v. Union of India, [AIR 1982 SC, at 218], "What was held by the Court was that the transfers of the High Court Judges during the emergency were made not for the purpose of furthering the cause of national integration but by way of punishment."

66. AIR 1977 SC 2279 : (1977) 4 SCC 98.

one High Court to another is a non-justiable matter. Transfer of a Judge ought not to be made as a punishment. A High Court Judge can be punished only according to Art. 217(1) read with Art. 124(4),[67] and not otherwise.

Again, the question of transfer of High Court Judges was raised in S.P. Gupta v. Union of India.[68] BHAGWATI, J., reiterated the minority view in Sankalchand that a Judge could not be transferred without his consent. In any case, he said that the transfer of a Judge could be exercised only in public interest and that transfer of a judge by way of punishment could never be in public interest. He emphasized that "whenever transfer of a Judge is effected for a reason bearing upon the conduct or behaviour of the Judge, it would be by way of punishment." Transfer being a serious matter, the burden of sustaining the validity of the transfer order must rest on the Government.[69] In the instant case, BHAGWATI, J., ruled that the transfer of the Chief Justice of the Patna High Court to the Madras High Court was bad because: (1) there was no full and effective consultation between the Central Government and the Chief Justice of India before the decision was taken to transfer him; (2) transfer was made by way of punishment and not in public interest.

FAZL ALI AND DESAI, JJ., joined BHAGWATI, J., in holding the said transfer to be bad. These Judges, however, did not agree with BHAGWATI, J., in his view that under Art. 222, for transfer, the consent of the Judge would be necessary. On the other hand, the majority view was that the transfer of the Chief Justice was valid. The consent of the Judge was not necessary for purposes of his transfer. Still the power of transfer vested in the Central Government was not absolute, but was subject to two conditions: (i) public interest; (ii) effective consultation with the Chief Justice of India. An order of transfer would become a justiciable issue and be liable to be quashed if—(a) it was not in public interest, or (b) it was passed without full and effective consultation; and (c) if the opinion of the Chief Justice was brushed aside or ignored without cogent reasons.

It was emphasized by the majority that transfer of a Judge could not be made for the purpose of punishing him. Therefore, a Judge can never be transferred on the grounds of misbehaviour or incapacity. It was also suggested by some of the majority Judges[70] that the concerned Judge should be consulted by the Chief Justice as regards his proposed transfer though his consent is not necessary. It was also emphasized by some Judges that any transfer with an oblique motive or for an oblique purpose, e.g., not toeing the line of the Executive would be outside the purview of Art. 222.

In the instant case of the transfer of the Chief Justice, the reason was that people in his proximity had created an atmosphere injurious to the administration of Justice. This ground fell within the expression 'public interest'. There was no reflection on the conduct of the Chief Justice as there was no suggestion of any complicity or connivance on his part. There was thus no element of punishment involved in this transfer.

The position as regards transfer of a High Court judge as it emerged after the majority view in Gupta was unsatisfactory. There existed no real safeguard

67. See infra, Sec. B(t), for this procedure.
68. AIR 1982 SC 149 : 1981 Supp SCC 87, supra, (c).
69. Ibid, 270.
70. TULZAPURKAR, PATHAK, GUPTA AND VENKATARAMIAH, JJ.

against an unwarranted transfer of a Judge. After all, during the emergency, 16 Judges were transferred after following the procedure laid down in Art. 222. As Justice BHAGWATI so aptly put it: "..... the so-called safeguard of consultation with the Chief Justice of India has proved to be of no avail." The one positive aspect of the Gupta case was that an order of transfer was held justiciable on some grounds and that some curbs were imposed on the power of the Executive.

On January 28, 1983, the Government of India formally announced its policy of having the Chief Justices of all the High Courts from outside the concerned State. For this purpose, the Government intended to use the provisions of Art. 217 or 222 relating to appointments or transfers. Another idea was to have one-third of the Judges in each High Court from outside the State.

This policy had been advocated by the Law Commission.[71] The Commission wanted this objective to be achieved through initial appointments. In the view of the Commission, this would not only help the process of national integration but also improve the functioning of various High Courts "as it would secure in the bench of each High Court the presence of a number of Judges who would not be swayed by local considerations or be affected by issues which may arouse local passions and emotions." Though it is a commendable policy, care needs to be taken that such a policy is implemented without doing anything to compromise the independence of the Judiciary. It is possible that transfer of a Judge (or Chief Justice) in implementation of this policy may be regarded as a matter of public interest but each case of transfer has to be considered on its own merits.

The question of transfer of High Court Judges has been considered again by the Supreme Court in the Supreme Court Advocates-on-Record case.[72] The proposition has been reiterated that there is no requirement of prior consent of the Judge before his transfer under Art. 222, but the opinion of the Chief Justice of India has been given 'not mere primacy' but a 'determinative' character in the transfer process. According to the majority opinion, the proposal for the transfer of a Judge/Chief Justice should be initiated by the Chief Justice of India alone. The power can be exercised only in "public interest." The transfer ought not to be "punitive" in nature. "Any transfer in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief Justice of India cannot be treated as punitive or an erosion in the independence of judiciary."[73]

Before giving his opinion, the Chief Justice of India has to consult the Chief Justice of the High Court from where the Judge is to be transferred and any Supreme Court Judge whose opinion may be significant for the purpose, as well as the views of at least one other senior High Court Chief Justice, or any other person whose views are considered relevant by the Chief Justice of India. The question of transfer of a Judge is justiciable but only on a limited basis, i.e., transfer is being made without the recommendation of the Chief Justice of India and only the transferred judge has locus standi to question his transfer and no one else.

In Dalpatray Bhandari v. Union of India,[74] the Supreme Court has reiterated the proposition that a writ petition challenging the transfer of a Judge, filed by a

---

71. 14th and 80th REPORTS.
72. Supra, Sec. B(d).
73. AIR 1994 SC, at 435.
74. (1995) Supp (1) SCC 682.

person other than the Judge himself, was not maintainable. "No one other than the transferred judge himself can question the validity of a transfer".

In Re Presidential Reference,[75] the Supreme Court has further elucidated its ruling in Supreme Court Advocates on the transfer of a High Court Judge. The Court has now stated that before recommending the transfer of a Judge of one High Court to another as a judge, the Chief Justice of India must consult a plurality of Judges. He must take into account the views of: (i) the Chief Justice of the High Court from which the Judge is to be transferred; (ii) any Judge of the Supreme Court whose opinion may have significance in the case; (iii) the Chief Justice of the High Court to which the transfer is to be effected.

All these views are to be expressed in writing and should be considered by a collegium consisting of the Chief Justice and the four senior-most puisne Judges of the Supreme Court. The collegium should consider the response of the Judge to be transferred. These views and those of the four senior-most judges should be conveyed to the Government of India along with the proposal for transfer. "Unless the decision to transfer has been taken in the manner aforesaid, it is not decisive and does not bind the Government of India."[76]

Because of all the safeguards mentioned above, the judicial review in case of transfer of a High Court Judge, according to the Court, would be limited to a case where transfer of a Judge has been made or recommended without obtaining the views and reaching the decision in the manner aforesaid.

The matter of transfer of a High Court Judge was raised again before the Supreme Court in Reddy.[77] It was argued that judicial review being a basic feature of the Constitution,[78] exclusion of judicial review in the matter of transfer could not be regarded as good law. There could be arbitrariness in transferring a High Court Judge. The Supreme Court rejected the contention. The Court observed :[79]

> "Every power vested in a public authority is to subserve a public purpose, and must invariably be exercised to promote public interest. This guideline is inherent in every such provision, and so also in Art. 222. The provision requiring exercise of this power by the President only after consultation with the Chief Justice of India, and the absence of the requirement of consultation with any other functionary, is clearly indicative of the determinative nature, not mere primacy, of the Chief Justice of India's opinion in this matter."

The consent of the Judge is not required for his transfer. The Chief Justice of India will recommend transfer of a Judge only in public interest, for promoting better administration of justice throughout the country, or at the request of the concerned Judge.

In the formation of his opinion for transfer of a High Court Judge, the Chief Justice of India would take into consideration the opinion of the Chief Justice of the High Court from which the Judge is to be transferred, any Judge of the Supreme Court whose opinion may be of significance in that case, as well as the views of at least one other senior Chief Justice of a High Court, or any other person whose views are considered relevant by the Chief Justice of India. The pri-

---

75. AIR 1999 SC 1; see, supra, footnote 43.
76. AIR 1999 SC, at 21.
77. K. Ashok Reddy v. Government of India, AIR 1994 SC 1207 : (1984) 2 SCC 303.
78. See, Ch. XLI, infra, for discussion on this Doctrine.
79. AIR 1994 SC 1207 at 1210 : (1994) 2 SCC 303.

macy of the judiciary in the matter of appointments and its determinative nature in transfers introduces the judicial element in the process, and is in itself a sufficient justification for the absence of the need for further judicial review of those decisions.

Judicial review is ordinarily needed as a check against possible executive excess or arbitrariness. Plurality of Judges in the formation of the opinion of the Chief Justice of India is another in built check against the likelihood of arbitrariness or bias. Further, the guideline of "public interest" is sufficient guideline for the proper exercise of the power and to ensure exclusion of the possibility of any arbitrariness in the exercise of power under Art. 222. Judicial review of transfer of a Judge is not excluded but only limited. The area of justiciability is restricted to the constitutional requirement of recommendation of the Chief Justice of India for exercise of the power under Art. 222 by the President of India. "The power under Art. 222 of the Constitution is to be exercised by the highest constitutional functionaries in the country in the manner indicated which provides several inbuilt checks against the likelihood of arbitrariness or bias." The judicial review of transfer can be invoked only at the instance of the transferred Judge and not at the instance of any one else.

(p) PROPRIETY OF APPOINTING ADDITIONAL JUDGES

It has already been mentioned above that under Art. 224(1), provision has been made for appointment of additional Judges for a term not exceeding two years at a time.

Questions have been raised from time to time as regards the advisability and propriety of appointing additional Judges. For example, it has been emphasized that it is the duty of the President to provide for adequate strength of permanent Judges in each High Court commensurate with the load of work before it. Then, it has been said that an additional Judge ought not to be appointed when there is a vacancy of a permanent Judge. It would not be proper to appoint an additional judge while keeping a permanent post vacant or unfilled. Further, it has been emphasized that the permanent strength of each High Court should be periodically reviewed. If the increase in work in a Court is permanent, then resort ought to be had to Art. 216 and not to Art. 224.[80] The purpose of appointment of additional judges is to meet temporary increase in work or arrears.

In India, the present position is that nearly one-third of the High Court Judges are additional Judges. A practice has developed over time that a person is appointed first as an additional judge and, then, when a permanent vacancy arises, he is promoted to be a permanent Judge. Since an additional Judge can be appointed for a maximum period of two years, at one time, his tenure is extended from time to time for a period of not more than two years at a time, and so his position remains vulnerable until he becomes a permanent Judge.

The various Judges participating in the Gupta decision,[81] sought to strengthen the position of the additional Judges to some extent so as to ensure their independence. The highest point was reached in this connection in the opinion of Gupta, J., who practically assimilated the position of an additional judge to that of a permanent Judge. According to him, the only consideration in extending his tenure is whether the volume of work pending in the Court requires his re-appointment. His tenure must be two years. Shorter tenure in the discretion of the executive without reference to the volume of work in a High Court militates against the concept of judicial independence.

80. See TULZAPURKAR, DESAI, VENKATARAMIAH, JJ. in Gupta, supra, Sec. B(c).
81. Ibid.

An additional Judge like a permanent Judge could be removed by following the procedure laid down in Arts. 124(4) and (5) read with Art. 218.[82] Dropping an additional Judge at the end of his initial appointment on the ground that there are allegations against him without properly ascertaining the truth of the allegations may be expedient but it is destructive of judicial independence. Also, in the matter of re-appointment of an additional Judge, the opinion of the Chief Justice of India should have primacy over the opinion of the Chief Justice of the concerned High Court. PATHAK AND TULZAPURKAR, JJ., substantially agreed with GUPTA, J.

But the majority was not prepared to go to such a length to safeguard the position of additional Judges. The majority view may be summed up as follows :

(1) No additional Judge is to be appointed without complying with the requirement of Art. 217(1).[83]

(2) An Additional Judge has a right of being considered for appointment as a permanent Judge. The Government cannot drop him at its sweet will after the expiry of the original term.

(3) For re-appointment of an additional Judge after the expiry of his original term, the procedure laid down in Art. 217(1) must be followed.

(4) He has a right to be considered for re-appointment.

(5) A decision is to be taken in regard to him for re-appointment after consultation amongst the three constitutional authorities, viz., the Government of India, Chief Justice of India and Chief Justice of the concerned High Court.

(6) If it is found that there was no consultation with any of these authorities before decision is taken by the Government not to re-appoint an additional Judge, then the decision is bad.

(7) The outside limit of the term of appointment of an additional Judge is two years. When arrears of pending cases in a High Court is so large that it is not possible to dispose of them in the foreseeable future, there is no justification for appointing an additional judge for less than 2 years.

(8) If the Government decides not to re-appoint an additional Judge on irrelevant grounds or mala fide (other than fitness or suitability), then the decision will be bad and is challengeable.

(9) The Chief Justice of India's opinion stands pari passu with, and has no primacy over, the opinion of the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned in the matter of appointment or re-appointment of an additional Judge.

(10) An additional Judge is not a judge on probation.

By majority, the non-continuance of an additional Judge of the Delhi High Court was sustained as there was doubt about his honesty or integrity. The Chief 82. See, infra, (t), this section.

83. Supra, (b), this section.

Justice of the High Court was against his continuance although the Chief Justice of India was for his extension on the ground that there was not sufficient material to doubt his integrity. The Central Government went by the opinion of the Chief Justice of the High Court in preference to that of the Chief Justice of India. The majority view was that in deciding whether to continue an additional Judge, his reputation as to honesty and integrity could be taken into account. There was no need to hold any judicial or quasi-judicial inquiry or give natural justice to the Judge concerned. Some of the Judges of the Supreme Court were, however, in favour of giving a fair play to the Judge.

The upshot of the majority decision in the Gupta case was to place a large reservoir of power in the hands of the Central Executive as regards appointment of High Court Judges. By refusing primacy of the opinion of the Chief Justice of India, the Central Executive was conceded power to decide finally as to whom to appoint when there was no unanimity of opinion among the three constitutional authorities concerned, viz., the State Executive, the Chief Justice of the concerned High Court and the Chief Justice of India. However, the situation as regards appointment of High Court Judges (including additional Judges) has now undergone a change after the S.C. Advocates- on-Record case.[84] The opinion of the Chief Justice of India has now been given a primacy in the consultative process prior to the appointment of the Judges.

In relation to the recommendation made by the Chief Justice of a High Court for appointment of a person to an office created by a statute, the powers of judicial review is 'very restricted' e.g. when a relevant aspect is not considered.[85]

(q) TENURE

A High Court Judge (whether permanent, additional or acting) retires at the age of sixty-two years [Arts. 217(1) and 224(3)].

Any question as to the age of a High Court Judge is to be decided by the President after consulting the Chief Justice of India, and his decision is final [Art. 217(3)]. Thus, the jurisdiction to determine the Judge's age is vested exclusively in the President. Consultation with the Chief Justice of India is, however, mandatory, but his advice is not binding on the President.

No Court can claim jurisdiction to decide the question of age of a High Court Judge. No question of propriety, correctness or validity of the decision by the President can be raised before a Court.

It has been held by the Supreme Court that the President should follow natural justice, and before reaching his decision on the question, he ought to give to the Judge concerned a reasonable opportunity to give his version, and produce evidence in support of the age stated by him at the time of his appointment. "How this should be done, is, of course, for the President to decide; but the requirement of natural justice that the Judge must have a reasonable opportunity to put before the President his contention, his version and his evidence, is obviously implicit in the provision itself".[86]

---

84. Supra, (d), this section.
85. N. Kannadasan v. Ajoy Khose, (2009) 7 SCC 1, 50.
86. J.P. Mitter v. Chief Justice, Calcutta High Court, AIR 1965 SC 961, at 966 : 1965 (2) SCR 53.

In the instant case,[87] the decision reached by the President as regards the age of a Calcutta High Court was quashed by the Supreme Court because of two infirmities therein:

(1) The evidence of the concerned Judge was not available to the President when he reached his decision. As the decision regarding his age affected the Judge in a very serious manner "considerations of natural justice and fair play require that before the question is determined by the President, the appellant should be given a chance to adduce his evidence."[88]

(2) The decision was made by the Home Minister and approved by the President. This was, therefore, the decision of the Government of India, "but that plainly is not the decision of the President" as envisaged by Art. 217(3). Accordingly, the matter was referred, to the President to decide it again after receiving the evidence from the concerned Judge.

After the President had made his decision in the above case, again the concerned Judge questioned the decision on several grounds. The Supreme Court in its decision[89] ruled against the Judge, upheld the decision of the President and laid down several important propositions as regards Art. 217(3).

The Court has stated that the President is not obligated to give a personal hearing to the Judge concerned. The Judge was entitled to make a representation but he cannot claim an oral hearing. It is for the President to decide whether in a particular case he should give a personal hearing.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that in deciding the age of the Judge, the President is to consult only the Chief Justice of India and none else. As the President performs a 'judicial function of grave importance', he cannot act in this matter on ministerial advice. The President has to reach his own decision. Although the President's decision is 'final', the Court has jurisdiction, in appropriate cases, to set aside the order "if it appears that it was passed on collateral considerations, or the rules of natural justice were not observed, or that the President's judgment was coloured by the advice or representation made by the Executive, or it was founded on no evidence".

The Court would not, however, go into the merits of the President's decision. The Court has emphasized that under Art. 217(3), the President is invested with judicial power of great consequence having a bearing on the independence of the Judges of the higher courts. Accordingly, "there must be no interposition of any other body or authority, in the consultation between the President and the Chief Justice of India."[90]

In Samsher v. State of Punjab,[91] IYER AND BHAGWATI, JJ., have cast doubts on the correctness of the proposition regarding the 'personal satisfaction' of the President while acting under Art. 217(3) as stated above. They insist that the President's satisfaction is constitutionally secured when his Ministers arrive at such satisfaction. The independence of the judiciary, they think, is ensured by the

---

87. Ibid.
88. On Natural Justice, see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, Chs. IX, X, XI & XII; JAIN, CASES & MATERIALS ON ADM. LAW, I, Chs. VIII, IX, X and XI.
89. Union of India v. Jyoti Prakash, AIR 1971 SC 1093 : (1971) 1 SCC 396.
90. Ibid, at 1106.
91. AIR 1974 SC 2192 : (1974) 2 SCC 831, See, Ch. III, Sec. B, supra.

mandatory requirement of consulting the Chief Justice with whom should rest the last word in the matter. Rejection of his advice may ordinarily be regarded "as prompted by oblique considerations vitiating the order". The ruling of these Judes in Samsher would deprive the President of any discretion in the matter and obligate him to act in accordance with the advice of the Chief Justice of India. But this has not yet become a binding norm as other Judes in Samsher expressed no opinion on this point."[92]

The Samsher ruling has the defect that it introduces the Council of Ministers in the decision–making process as regards the age of a High Court Judge which is objectionable. In Samsher, the Court was not considering the specific question in issue, but a different question altogether. As regards the specific question in issue, Mitters' ruling is to be preferred.[93]

Supporting Mitter's ruling, DESAI, J., has said in the Additional Judges case (Gupta case):[94]

> "Once the function of the President while exercising power under Art. 217(2) is held to be judicial it follows as a necessary corollary that the President has to act on his own after consultation with the Chief Justice of India but he cannot act on the advice of the Council of Ministers because a person discharging a judicial or quasi-judicial function cannot act at the behest or dictate of some other authority."

There are, however, two difficulties in the present provision:

(1) The advice of the Chief Justice has not been made binding on the President. Therefore, the President, in theory, can take a view different from that of the Chief Justice.

The view of IYER and BHAGWATI, J.J., expressed in Samsher on this point are only obiter dicta.

(2) Art. 361 bars any Court action against the President as such.[95] If he is to decide the matter himself (without the inter-position of the Central Government), how can President's decision be challenged in a Court on any ground?

As regards determination of the age of a Supreme Court Judge under Art. 124(2A), Parliament is to set up an authority for the purpose.[96] No such authority has been set up as yet. Therefore, for the present, the only method appears to be is to ask for quo warranto against the Judge concerned from the High Court and, finally, the matter can go on appeal to the Supreme Court.[97]

(r) RESIGNATION

A High Court Judge may resign from his office by writing to the President. [Proviso (a) to Art. 217(1)]. Resignation takes effect from the date on which the Judge of his own volition chooses to sever his connection with his office.

There is nothing in the Constitution which expressly or impliedly forbids the withdrawal of a communication by the Judge to resign his office before the arri-

---

92. Ibid.
93. Supra, footnote 86.
94. Supra, this Ch. Sec. B(q).
95. See, Ch. III, Sec. A(i), supra.
96. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. B(l).
97. For quo warranto, see, infra.

val of the date on which it was intended to take effect. A prospective resignation does not, before the intended future date is reached, become a complete, and operative act of 'resigning his office' by the Judge within the contemplation of proviso (a) to Art. 217(1).[1]

(s) VACANCY BY TRANSFER

The office of a High Court Judge falls vacant when he is appointed as a Supreme Court Judge, or is transferred to any other High Court [Proviso (c) to Art. 217(1)].

An additional Judge of the Kerala High Court was transferred to the Gujarat High Court and he was given time till 22/7/96 to join the transferee High Court. In the meantime, he continued to act as the Judge of the Kerala High Court. A petitioner filed a petition for quo warranto on the ground that because of the order of transfer under Art. 222, he ceased to be a Judge of the Kerala High Court under proviso (c) to Art. 217(1). Rejecting the petition, the High Court ruled that the transferred Judge continues to be a Judge of the transferor High Court and till he assumes charge in the transferee High Court, he does not cease to be a judge immediately the transfer order is issued.[2]

(t) REMOVAL OF A JUDGE

A High Court Judge may be removed from office in the same manner as a Supreme Court Judge, i.e., on the two Houses of Parliament passing a resolution for his removal, by a special majority, for proved misbehaviour or incapacity.[3]

Parliament has enacted the Judges (Inquiry) Act, 1968, to regulate the procedure for investigation and proof of misbehaviour or incapacity of a Supreme Court or a High Court Judge for presenting an address by Parliament to the President for his removal. A notice of a motion for presenting such an address may be given by 100 members of the Lok Sabha, or 50 members of the Rajya Sabha.

The Speaker or the Chairman may either admit or refuse to admit the motion. If it is admitted, then the Speaker/Chairman is to constitute a committee consisting of a Supreme Court Judge, a Chief Justice of a High Court and a distinguished jurist. If notices of the motion are given on the same day in both the Houses, the Committee of Inquiry is to be constituted jointly by the Speaker and the Chairman. The Committee is to frame definite charges against the Judge on the basis of which the investigation is proposed to be held and give him a reasonable opportunity of being heard including cross-examination of witnesses. If the charge is that of physical or mental incapacity, the Committee may arrange for the medical examination of the judge by a medical board appointed by the Speaker/Chairman or both as the case may be.

The report of the Committee is to be laid before the House or Houses concerned. If the Committee exonerates the Judge of the charges, then no further action is to be taken on the motion for his removal. If the Committee finds the Judge to be guilty of misbehaviour or suffering from an incapacity, the House can take up consideration of the motion. On the motion being adopted by both

---

1. Union of India v. Gopalchandra Misra, AIR 1978 SC 694 : (1978) 2 SCC 301.
2. M.K. Sasidharan v. Hon'ble Chief Justice of India, AIR 1997 Ker. 35.
3. Arts. 217(1)(b) and 124(4) and (5); supra, Ch. IV, Sec. B(l).

Houses according to the relevant constitutional provision [Art. 124(4) or 218(4)], an address may be presented to the President for removal of the Judge. Rules under the Act are to be made by a committee consisting of 10 members from the Lok Sabha and 5 members from the Rajya Sabha.

A question of some consequence has been considered by the Supreme Court in the following case.[4] What procedure should be followed when there are allegations of bad conduct against a High Court Judge but which falls short of the impeachable conduct, viz., "proved misbehaviour or incapacity" [Art. 217(1)(b)]. The Court has emphasized that bad conduct or bad behaviour of a Judge, even though not impeachable, may yet be improper conduct not befitting the standard of a Judge. The bad conduct of a Judge has a rippling effect on the reputation of the judiciary as a whole. But the Bar Association ought not to criticise the Judge in such a manner as to amount to contempt of Court. The proper course for it would be to collect specific, authentic and acceptable material concerning the conduct of the Judge and the office-bearers of the Bar Association should see the Judge concerned, or the Chief Justice of the High Court who would make an inquiry and place the matter before the Chief Justice of India. If the conduct of the Chief Justice of the High Court is in question, the office bearers ought to approach the Chief Justice of India who will take necessary action in the matter. On the decision being taken by the Chief Justice of India, the matter should rest there.

In another case, the allotment of a plot of land to a High Court Judge by the State Government while the judge was hearing a challenge to the allotment process, was set aside by the Supreme Court and the plot directed to be vested in the State Government and sold, to "instill public confidence in the judiciary".[5]

To ensure that the highest standards of conduct are maintained, in 1999, a Code of Conduct was framed at the Chief Justices' Conference. An in-house procedure was evolved to deal with complaints against any sitting judge, which envisaged the taking of administrative steps, for example not posting cases for disposal before the judge concerned, after an enquiry by the Committee of Judges constituted for the purpose. However in the absence of any legislative sanction to the Code of Conduct, it is not enforceable nor can the proceedings of the Committee be made public.[6]

(u) OFFICERS AND EXPENSES

The officers and servants of a High Court are appointed by its Chief Justice, or such other judge or officer of the Court, as the Chief Justice may direct [Art. 229(1)]. This power of the Chief Justice is subject to three exceptions:

(1) The Governor may by rules require that, in cases mentioned in the rules, no person, not already attached to the Court, is to be appointed to any office connected therewith except after consultation with the State Public Service Commission [Proviso to Art 229(1)].

---

4. C. Ravichandran Iyer v. Justice A. M. Bhattacharjee, (1995) 5 SCC 457 : 1995 SCC (Cri) 953.
5. Tarak Singh v. Jyoti Basu, (2005) 1 SCC 201 : AIR 2005 SC 338.
6. Indira Jaisingh v. Registrar General, Supreme Court of India, (2003) 5 SCC 494 : (2005) 11 JT 552. The Judges (Enquiry) Bill, 2006 substantially incorporates the in-house procedure evolved in the Code of Conduct.

(2) Subject to any law of the State Legislature, the conditions of service of officers and servants of the High Court may be prescribed by rules made by the Chief Justice, or any other Judge or officer of the Court as he may authorize for the purpose [Art. 229(2)].

(3) Such of the rules as relate to salaries, allowances, leave or pensions require the approval of the State Governor [Proviso to Art. 229(2)].

The article assumes that unless the Chief Justice has not only applied his mind or acted on the basis of the recommendations of a committee constituted for the purpose, but also framed Rules fixing the scales of pay of its employees, the State Government cannot be asked to fix the pay scales of the employees of the High Court.[7]

It is for the Governor (i.e., the State Executive) to consider and give its approval to the proposed rules: The Court cannot issue a mandamus to the Governor directing him to give his approval.[8]

The Court has however expressed the hope that "one should accept in the fitness of things and in view of the spirit of Art. 229 that the approval, ordinarily and generally, would be accorded.[9] unless there were "justifiable reason" for not doing so.[10]

When the State Government refused to recommend Draft Rules forwarded by the Chief Justice inter alia relating to the pay-scales of the employees of the High Court on the ground of financial constraints, the Supreme Court directed the Chief Justice in consultation with the Government to constitute a Special Pay Commission consisting of judges and administrators, to submit a report to the Supreme Court on the basis of which "the Chief Justice and the Government shall thrash out the problem and work out an appropriate formula in regard to pay scales to be fixed for the High Court employees".[11] Pursuant to the direction a Special Pay Commission was set up and Draft Rules framed which, after some modification, was agreed by the Government before the Supreme Court, to be sent to the Governor for his approval.[12]

The Supreme Court has emphasized in M. Gurumoorthy v. Accountant General, Assam & Nagaland,[13] that in the matter of appointment of officers, etc., of the High Court, it is the Chief Justice or his nominee who is to be the supreme authority, and the State Government cannot interfere except to the limited extent provided in Art. 229. Thus, the post of the Registrar of the High Court can be

---

7. State of UP v. Section Officer Brotherhood, (2004) 8 SCC 286 : AIR 2004 SC 4769.

8. State of Andhra Pradesh v. T. Gopalakrishna Murthi, AIR 1976 SC 123 : (1976) 2 SCC 883.
Also, State of Assam v. Bhuban Chandra Dutta, AIR 1975 SC 889 : (1975) 4 SCC 1.
For discussion on mandamus, see, infra, Sec. E.

9. Also see, Supreme Court Employees Welfare Association v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 334 : (1989) 4 SCC 187; High Court of Judicature, Rajasthan v. Ramesh Chand Paliwal, AIR 1998 SC 1079, 1084-1085 : (1998) 3 SCC 72; State of Maharashtra v. Association of Court Stenos, (2002) 2 SCC 141 : AIR 2002 SC 555; Union of India v. S.B. Vohra, (2004)2 SCC 150 : AIR 2004 SC 1402.
On this point, also see, under the Supreme Court, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. I(g).

10. State of Maharashtra v. Assn. of Court Stenos, (2002)2 SCC 141 : AIR 2002 SC 555.

11. High Court Welfare Assn.,Calcutta v. State of W.B, (2004) 1 SCC 334 : AIR 2004 SC 354.

12. High Court Welfare Assn.,Calcutta v. State of W.B, (2007) 3 SCC 63 : AIR 2007 SC 1218.

13. AIR 1971 SC 1850 : (1971) 2 SCC 137.

filled only by the Chief Justice and not by the Government.[14] The power to appoint includes the power "to suspend, dismiss, remove or compulsorily retire from service". No outside executive authority can interfere with the exercise of the power by the Chief Justice. The object underlying Art. 229(1) is to ensure the independence of the High Court.[15]

The administrative expenses of a High Court, including all salaries, allowances and pensions payable to or in respect of the officers and servants of the Court, are charged upon the Consolidated Fund of the State, and any fees or other moneys taken by the Court, form part of that Fund [Art. 229(3)].[16]

The Supreme Court has also held in the case noted below,[17] that under Art. 229, power to make appointments of High Court officers and servants is conferred on the Chief Justice, as such, and not on the High Court. The Chief Justice is the "sole authority" in the matter of appointment of the High Court staff and officers and no other Judge can usurp those powers. "The Chief Justice has been vested with wide powers to run the High Court administration independently so as not to brook any interference from any quarter, not even from his Brother Judges who, however, can scrutinize his administrative action or order on the judicial side like the action of any other authority".[18]

Commenting on Art. 229, the Supreme Court has observed: "the objects of this Article was to secure the independence of the High Court which cannot be regarded as fully secured unless the authority to appoint supporting staff with complete control over them is vested in the Chief Justice... There is imperative need for total and absolute administrative independence of the High Court."[19] But the Supreme Court has emphasized that the Chief Justice of the High Court ought not to exercise his power under Art. 229 in an arbitrary manner.

C. JURISDICTION AND POWERS

(i) COURT OF RECORD

A High Court is a Court of record and has all the powers of such a Court including the powers to punish for its contempt [Art. 215]. The power is similar in content, scope and nature to the corresponding power of the Supreme Court.[20]

As a Court of record, the High Court is entitled to preserve its original record in perpetuity. Besides, as a Court of record the High Court has twofold powers:

(i) it has power to determine the question about its own jurisdiction; and

(ii) it has inherent power to punish for its contempt summarily.[21]

---

14. State of Orissa v. Sudhansu Sekhar, AIR 1968 SC 647 : (1968) 2 SCR 154; S.C. Malik v. P.P. Sharma, AIR 1982 Del, 83.

15. Chief Justice, Andhra Pradesh v. L.V.A. Dikshitulu, AIR 1979 SC 193 : (1979) 2 SCC 34.

16. Supra, Ch. VI, Sec. F(iii).

17. High Court of Judicature, Rajasthan v. Ramesh Chand Paliwal, AIR 1998 SC 1079 : (1998) 3 SCC 72.

18. Ibid, at 1086.

19. H.C. Puttuswamy v. Hon'ble Chief Justice of Karnataka, AIR 1991 SC 295, 298 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 421.

20. Supra, Ch. IV, Sec. C(i).

21. Naresh Shridhar Mirajkar v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1967 SC 1; High Court of Judicature at Allahabad v. Raj Kishore, AIR 1997 SC 1186 : (1997) 3 SCC 11 : (1966) 3 SCR 744.

In Sukhdev v. Teja Singh,[22] the Supreme Court refused to transfer contempt proceedings filed against the petitioner in the Pepsu High Court to some other High Court. The Constitution vests in the High Court itself the powers to deal with its contempt and, therefore, transfer of contempt proceedings from the Pepsu to another High Court would deprive the High Court of the jurisdiction vested in it by the Constitution.

The power to take proceedings for the contempt of Court is an inherent power of a Court of record and, therefore, the Criminal Procedure Code does not apply to such proceedings. The contemner is not in the position of an accused as "contempt proceeding is sui generis; it has peculiar features which are not found in criminal proceedings".[23]It has also been held that theContempt of Courts Act, 1971, reaffirms and reiterates the jurisdiction and power of a High Court in respect of its own contempt and of subordinate courts. "The Act does not confer any new jurisdiction instead it affirms the High Court's power and jurisdiction for taking action for the contempt of itself as well as of the subordinate courts".[24] The High Court's suo motu power to take cognizance of its contempt is not affected thereby.

In Kapur,[25] the Supreme Court has emphasized that as a Court of record under Art. 215, the High Court possesses inherent power and jurisdiction, not derived from the Contempt of Courts Act which does not affect that power or confer a new power or jurisdiction. In view of Art. 215, no law made by a legislature could take away the jurisdiction conferred on the High Court nor it could confer it afresh by virtue of its own authority.

The Supreme Court has further ruled in Sukhdev[26] that the High Court can deal with a contempt matter summarily and adopt its own procedure consistent with fair play and natural justice. "All that is necessary is that the procedure is fair and that the contemner is made aware of the charge against him and given a fair and reasonable opportunity to defend himself."

A wilful violation or disobedience of an order of the High Court amounts to its contempt.[27] In 1965, the State of West Bengal issued an order prohibiting preparation of sweets from milk. A writ petition was moved in the High Court to challenge the order, the notice for which was duly served on the State. Thereafter, the Chief Minister in a broadcast made several comments on controversial matters pending before the Court. The Supreme Court held that the Chief Minister's speech was calculated to obstruct the course of justice and amounted to contempt of Court and his conduct merited disapproval.[28]

The Supreme Court has ruled in Mohd. Ikram Hussain v. State of Uttar Pradesh,[29] that the Constitution preserves the power of a High Court to punish

---

22. AIR 1954 SC 186 : 1954 SCR 454.
23. Delhi Judicial Service Association v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1991 SC, at 2191 : (1991) 4 SCC 406.
24. Ibid, at 2198.
25. R.L. Kapur v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1972 SC 858 : (1972) 1 SCC 651.
26. Supra, footnote 22.
27. B.K. Kar v. Chief Justice, AIR 1961 SC 1367 : (1962) 1 SCR 319; Hoshiar Singh v. Gurbachan Singh, AIR 1962 SC 1089 : (1962) Supp 3 SCR 127; Aswini Kumar v. P.C. Mukherjee, AIR 1965 Cal 484.
28. In re, P.C. Sen, AIR 1970 SC 1821 : (1969) 2 SCR 649.
29. AIR 1964 SC 1625 : (1964) 5 SCR 86.

for its contempt and such power is also inherent in a Court of record. The only curbs on such a power are those imposed by the Contempt of Courts Act which limits the term for which a person can be imprisoned for 6 months' simple imprisonment.[30] In the instant case, it has been ruled that disobedience of an order of the High Court amounts to contempt of the Court. A direction given by the High Court in a proceeding for writ of habeas corpus for the production of the body of a person has to be carried out and if disobeyed the contemner is punishable by attachment and imprisonment.[31]

The Supreme Court can also take cognisance suo motu of the contempt of a High Court under Art. 129.[32] The Supreme Court is the highest Court of record. It is charged with the duties and responsibilities of correcting the lower courts and tribunals and of protecting them from those whose misconduct tends to prevent the due performance of their duties. Art. 129 vests powers in the Supreme Court to punish for contempt of itself in its capacity as the highest Court of record and also as a Court charged with the appellate and superintending powers over the lower courts and tribunals as detailed in the Constitution. The Supreme Court has observed in this connection:

> "To discharge its obligations as the custodian of the administration of justice in the country and as the highest Court imbued with supervisory and appellate jurisdiction over all the lower courts and tribunals, it is inherently deemed to have been entrusted with the power to see that the stream of justice in the country remains pure, that its course is not hindered or obstructed in any manner, that justice is delivered without fear or favour and for that purpose all the courts and tribunals are protected while discharging their legislative duties."[33]

The Supreme Court has emphasizned that fair comments, even if outspoken, but made without any malice or attempting to impair the administration of justice and made in good faith and in proper language, do not constitute contempt of Court.

A lawyer or a litigant who seeks to browbeat the Court and maligns the judge because he could not get a favourable order from the Court commits contempt of Court. If such activity is permitted, Judges would not be able to perform their duties freely and fairly with the result that administration of justice would become a casualty and Rule of Law would receive a set back.

The Supreme Court has cautioned the High Courts that the contempt jurisdiction ought to be exercised with scrupulous care and caution, restraint and circumspection. Recourse to this jurisdiction should be had whenever something is done which tends to affect the administration of justice, or which tends to impede its course or tends to shake public confidence in the majesty of law and to preserve and maintain the dignity of the Court.[34]

Reference may be made here to State of Bihar v. Subhash Singh,[35] a case of non-compliance of an order of the High Court by an executive officer. While dis-

---

30. Entry 14, List III, runs as : "Contempt of Court, but not including contempt of the Supreme Court".

31. There have been quite a few cases of the High Courts punishing persons for their contempt. See, for example, Pritam Pal v. High Court of M.P., (1993) Supp. (1) SCC 529 : AIR 1992 SC 904.

32. For discussion on Art. 129, See, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. (c).

33. In re : Vinay Chandra Mishra, AIR 1995 SC 2348, 2358 : (1995) 1 KLJ 504.

34. Chetak Construction Ltd. v. Om Prakash, AIR 1998 SC 1855 : (1998) 4 SCC 577.

35. AIR 1997 SC 1390 : (1997) 4 SCC 430.

posing of a writ petition, the High Court directed the concerned officer to consider the case of the writ petitioner and dispose it of with a reasoned order within two months. When this did not happen, the Court imposed the costs on the officer personally for non-compliance of its order. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the Court refused to interfere as the delay in complying with the High Court order was of 17 months and the concerned officer had not explained the reasons for the delay.

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the Head of the Department/designated officer is ultimately accountable to the Court for the result of the action or decision taken. The Executive is enjoined to comply with the orders passed by the Court in exercise of judicial review. The Court exercises its power of judicial review to ensure that the Executive discharges its power "truly, objectively expeditiously for the purpose for which substantive, acts/results are intended." All actions of the state or its officials must be carried out subject to the Constitution and within the limits set by the law. "Judicial review of administrative action is, therefore, an essential part of rule of law".

When the Court directs an officer to discharge its duties expeditiously and if it is not done, the official concerned is required to explain to the Court as to the circumstances in which he could not comply with the direction issued by the Court. If there was any unavoidable delay, he should have sought further time for compliance. In the instant case, the concerned official took no such step. The Supreme Court also impressed on the High Courts to be circumspect in imposing costs personally against the official and keep at the back of its mind the facts and the circumstances in each case.

The High Court ought not to pass an order holding a person guilty of its contempt and imposing on him punishment therefor without issuing him a show cause notice, or giving him an opportunity to explain the alleged contemptuous conduct.[36]

Can a statute passed by Parliament adversely affect the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court [Art. 129] and the High Courts [Art. 215] to punish for their contempt?

The Supreme Court has answered this question in Pallav Sheth v. Custodian.[37] The question was whether the contempt of courts Act, 1971, in any way affected the power of the High Court under Art. 215. The Supreme Court has stated that Constitution has conferred on the Supreme Court and the High Courts as courts of record the power to punish for their contempt. "This power cannot be abrogated or stultified." Any law which "stultifies or abrogates" this power under Art. 129/215 will not be regarded as having been validly enacted. But a law which provides "for the quantum of punishment, or what may or may not be regarded as acts of contempt, or even providing for a period of limitation for initiating proceedings for contempt cannot be taken to be a provision which abrogates or stultifies the contempt jurisdiction under Art. 129/215 of the Constitution."[38]

---

36. L.P. Misra v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1998 SC 3337 : (1998) 7 SCC 379.
37. AIR 2001 SC 2763 : (2001) 7 SCC 549.
38. Ibid., at 2773. For Art. 129, see, Ch. IV, Sec. C(i), supra.

(ii) GENERAL JURISDICTION

The Constitution does not contain detailed provisions to define the jurisdiction of the High Courts. It merely declares that their jurisdiction, the law administered by them, the respective powers of their Judges in relation to the administration of justice by the courts, and their rule-making power, all are to be the same as were enjoyed by them immediately before the commencement of the Constitution [Art. 225].

The Constitution thus maintains the status quo existing on January 25, 1950, in respect of the jurisdiction and powers of the High Courts. The reason for this is that the High Courts are institutions of respectable antiquity, that these courts had been in existence much before the advent of the present Constitution and they are not new bodies created for the first time by the Constitution.[39] The status quo in respect of the High Courts is subject to the provisions of the Constitution and any law made by the appropriate Legislature in pursuance of its powers under the Constitution [Art. 225].[40]

Accordingly, the three High Courts at Bombay, Calcutta and Madras (Chennai) possessed admiralty jurisdiction and they continue to possess this jurisdiction even after the Constitution has come into force. The Andhra Pradesh High Court being the successor of the High Court of Madras also enjoys the admiralty jurisdiction.[41]

In two important respects, however, the Constitution itself affects the status quo regarding the High Courts. First, any restriction on their original jurisdiction regarding a revenue matter, or an act ordered or done in revenue collection, existing in the pre-Constitution era is no longer to operate.[42] This affects the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay from whose original jurisdiction, due to some historical circumstances, revenue matters were excluded.[43] The original jurisdiction of these Courts is now freed from a very ancient restriction dating back to the year 1781.

Secondly, a major change in the jurisdiction of the High Courts has been effectuated by Art. 226 which empowers them to issue writs and, thus, confers a significant power on them to enforce rights of the people, to administer justice and to review administrative action. This provision is discussed in detail below.[44]

Prior to the Constitution, only the three High Courts at Calcutta, Bombay and Madras could issue writs within the boundaries of their original jurisdiction. Now, Art. 226 treats all High Courts equally and confers the power on them all to issue writs within their territorial jurisdiction.

(iii) CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION

Article 228 provides that if the High Court is satisfied that a case pending in a subordinate Court involves a substantial question of law regarding the interpreta-

---

39. JAIN, INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, Ch. XIX.
40. See, infra, See H., for legislative powers vis-a-vis the High Courts.
41. M.V.AL. Quamar v. Tsavliris Salvage (Intl.) Ltd., AIR 2000 SC 2826 : (2000) 8 SCC 278.
42. Proviso to Art. 225.
43. Only these three High Courts had original jurisdiction in the pre-constitution days. For a detailed discussion on the genesis of this restriction, see, footnote 39, supra.
44. Infra, Secs. D and E.

tion of the Constitution, which it is necessary to determine to dispose of the case, the High Court shall withdraw the case to itself. It may then dispose of the whole case itself, or may determine only the constitutional law point and return the case to the subordinate Court for disposal in conformity with the High Court's judgment on the constitutional point.

The High Court will take action under Art. 228 only if the case cannot be disposed of without determining the constitutional question involved. This provision enables the High Court to determine the constitutional question at the earliest opportunity. The language of Art. 228 is such that once the conditions mentioned therein are satisfied, the High Court has no option but to withdraw the case to itself for disposal.[45]

(iv) POWER OF SUPERINTENDENCE

SALIENT FEATURES OF ART. 227

According to Art. 227(1), every High Court has the power of superintendence over all courts and tribunals within its territorial jurisdiction except those which are constituted by or under a law relating to the armed forces [Art. 227(4)].

This power of superintendence and control over all Subordinate Courts and tribunals is both of administrative and judicial nature, and, such power could be exercised suo motu. However the power of superintendence does not imply that the High Court can influence the subordinate judiciary to pass any order or judgment in a particular manner.[46] In Waryam Singh v. Amarnath,[47] a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court traced the High Court's history of the power of Superintendence now elevated in the Constitution as Art. 227. The court pointed out that the material part of Art. 227 substantially reproduces the provisions of S.107 of the Government of India Act, 1917. The power of the High Court was not merely 'administrative superintendence' apart from and independently of the provisions of other laws conferring revisional jurisdiction on the High Court. It was noticed that S. 107 was reproduced as S. 244 in the Government of India Act, 1935 which, in turn, was reproduced with some modification as Art. 227 of the Constitution.

The power of superintendence includes the power to call returns from the courts, to make and issue general rules and prescribe forms for regulating the practice and proceedings of such courts, and prescribe forms in which books, entries and accounts are to be kept by the officers of such courts [Art. 227(2)].

Article 227 of the Constitution of India gives the High Court the power of superintendence over all Courts and tribunals throughout the territories in relation to which it exercise jurisdiction. This jurisdiction cannot be limited or fettered by any act of the State Legislature. The supervisory jurisdiction extends to keeping the subordinate tribunals within the limits of their authority and to seeing that they obey the law. The powers under Article 227 are wide and can be used, to meet the ends of justice. They can be used to interfere even with an interlocutory order. However the power under Article 227 is a discretionary power [and it is difficult to attribute to an order of the High Court, such a source of power, when

---

45. Ranadeb Chaudhary v. Land Acquisition Judge, AIR 1971 Cal 368.
46. Jasbir Singh v. State of Punjab, (2006) 8 SCC 294 : (2006) 9 JT 35.
47. AIR 1954 SC 215.

the High Court itself does not in terms purport to exercise any discretionary power]. It is settled law that this power of judicial superintendence must be exercised sparingly and only to keep subordinate courts and tribunals within the bounds of their authority and not to correct mere errors. Further, where the statute bars the exercise of revisional powers it would require very exceptional circumstances to warrant interference under Article 227 since the power of superintendence was not meant to circumvent statutory law. It is settled law that the jurisdiction under Article 227 could not be exercised in the "cloak of an appeal in disguise".[48]

The High Court may also settle tables of fees to be allowed to the officers of such courts and to attorneys, advocates and pleaders practising therein [Art. 227(3)]. However, the rules made, forms prescribed, or tables settled cannot be inconsistent with any law in force and require the previous approval of the Governor of the State concerned in which the subordinate courts are situated.[49]

The power of superintendence thus conferred on the High Court over the courts and tribunals within its territorial jurisdiction is very broad. It extends to administrative as much as judicial superintendence. It may even be exercised suo motu in the interest of justice.[50] The power and duty of the High Court under Art. 227 is essentially to ensure that the courts and tribunals, inferior to High Court, have done what they were required to do.

A notable point about Art. 227 is that it enables the High Court to superintend not only 'courts' but tribunals as well. This aspect of Art. 227 is very significant in the present era of proliferation of tribunals.[51]

SCOPE OF ART. 227

Where a statutory right to file an appeal has been provided for, it is not open to High Court to entertain a petition under Article 227 of the Constitution. Even if a remedy by way of an appeal has not been provided for against the order and judgment of a District Judge, the remedy available to the aggrieved person is to file a revision before the High Court under Section 115 CPC. Where remedy for filing a revision before the High Court under Section 115 CPC has been expressly barred by a State enactment, only in such case a petition under Article 227 of the Constitution would lie and not under Article 226 of the Constitution.

It is also not permissible to a High Court on a petition filed under Article 227 of the Constitution to review or reweigh the evidence upon which the inferior Court or tribunal purports to have passed the order or to correct errors of law in the decision.[52]

The power under Art. 227 is broader than that conferred on the High Court by Art. 226.[53] For example, through its power to issue certiorari under Art. 226, a High Court can annul the decision of a tribunal while under Art. 227 it can do

---

48. State v. Navjot Sandhu, (2003) 6 SCC 641 : (2003) 4 JT 605. See also Sneh Gupta v. Devi Sarup, (2009) 6 SCC 194 : (2009) 2 JT 641, general principles of interference reiterated.
49. Proviso to Art. 227(3) read with Art. 231(2)(b).
50. Pramod Saraswat v. Ashok Kumar, AIR 1981 All 441; Ratan Muni Jain Intermediate College v. Director of Education, AIR 1997 All 163.
51. See, infra, Sec. I.
52. Sadhana Lodh v. National Insurance Co. Ltd., (2003) 3 SCC 524 : AIR 2003 SC 1561.
53. See, Sec. D., infra.

that and do something more—it can issue further directions in the matter. But under Art. 227, the High Court does not sit as a Court of appeal.

In Umaji v. Radhikabai,[54] the Supreme Court has explained the difference between Arts. 226 and 227. The power to issue writs is not the same as the power of superintendence. A writ in the nature of habeas corpus or mandamus or quo warranto or prohibition or certiorari cannot be equated with the power of superintendence.[55] These writs are directed against persons, authorities and the state.

The power of superintendence conferred by Art. 227 is supervisory and not appellate jurisdiction. This jurisdiction is intended to ensure that subordinate courts and tribunals act within the limits of their authority and according to law. The power of superintendence is in addition to the power conferred on the High Courts under Art. 226. The powers conferred by Arts. 226 and 227 are separate and distinct and operate in different fields. Though, prima facie, it may appear that the writ of certiorari or prohibition partakes of the nature of superintendence inasmuch as at times the end result in both cases may be the same, in reality the nature of the power to issue these writs is different from the supervisory or superintending powers under Art. 227. The fact that the same result can at times be achieved by two different processes does not mean that both the processes are the same.

The power of superintendence is to be exercised to keep the courts and tribunals within the bounds of their authority and jurisdiction and not for correcting mere errors of law or facts. Art. 227 does not confer on the High Court power similar to that of an ordinary Court of appeal. The power under Art. 227 is to be used sparingly and only in appropriate cases, for the purpose of keeping the subordinate courts and Tribunals within the bounds of their authority, and not for correcting mere errors.[56]

The High Court will usually interfere under Art. 227, if a Court or tribunal acts arbitrarily, or declines to do what is legally incumbent on it to do and thereby refuses to exercise jurisdiction vested in it by law, or exceeds its jurisdiction, or assumes erroneous jurisdiction, or a tribunal acts against natural justice, or its findings are based on no evidence, or are otherwise perverse, or there is an error of law apparent on the face of the record.[57]

When a tribunal has acted within its jurisdiction, the High Court does not interfere unless there is any grave miscarriage of justice or flagrant violation of law.[58] The Court would interfere only when the exercise of discretion by a tribunal is capricious, perverse or ultra vires and not when it is exercised judicially. The Court would not interfere merely because it might take a different view of the facts and exercise the discretion differently from what the tribunal has done.[59]

---

54. AIR 1986 SC 1272, 1317 : 1986 Supp SCC 401.
55. For these writs, see, infra, Sec. E.
56. Waryam Singh v. Amarnath, AIR 1954 SC 215 : 1954 SCR 565; Jijabai v. Pathankhan, AIR 1971 SC 315 : (1970) 2 SCC 711; Ahmedabad Mfg. & Calico Ptg. Co. Ltd. v. Ramtahel Ramnand, AIR 1972 SC 1598 : (1972) 1 SCC 898.
57. Dahya Lala v. Rasul Mohd. Abdul Rahim, AIR 1964 SC 1320 : (1963) 3 SCR 1; Ahmedabad Mfg, & Calico Ptg. Co. v. Ramtahel, AIR 1972 SC 1568 : (1972) 1 SCC 898; India v. Adhoc Claims Commissioner, AIR 1977 Cal 393; S. Mahalakshmi v. M. Syamala, AIR 1997 Mad 34; State of Maharashtra v. Milind, AIR 2001 SC 393 : AIR 2001 SC 393.
58. D.N. Banerjee v. P.R. Mukherjee, AIR 1953 SC 58.
59. Sarpanch v. Ramgiri Gosavi, AIR 1968 SC 222 : (1967) 3 SCR 774.

The High Court would not re-appreciate, review or reweigh the evidence after the tribunal has appreciated the same and decided questions of fact.[60] Normally the High Court does not enter the arena of facts under Art. 227, but the High Court may interfere if a substantial portion of the evidence relied upon by the lower courts is found to be inadmissible, or of no evidentiary value,[61] or a finding of fact is not supported by any evidence, or is based on manifest misreading of evidence, or if its conclusions are perverse.[62] In this connection, the Supreme Court has observed.[63]

> "In the exercise of this jurisdiction [under Art. 227] the High Court can set aside or ignore the findings of fact of an inferior Court or tribunal if there was no evidence to justify such a conclusion and if no reasonable person could possibly have come to the conclusion which the Court or tribunal has come to, or in other words it is a finding which was perverse in law. Except to the limited extent indicated above the High Court has no jurisdiction to interfere with the findings of fact".[64]

In the instant case, the Supreme Court ruled that the findings recorded by the lower Court did not suffer from such an infirmity so as to justify interference with the said finding under Art. 227. The High Court in exercise of its jurisdiction under Art. 227 was not justified in setting aside the finding of fact recorded by the lower Court. Where the appellate authority under the W.B. Restoration of Alienated Land Act, 1973, gave a finding without considering the evidence on record, the High Court would be justified in interfering with such finding of fact and setting it aside.[65]

Similarly, the Supreme Court has asserted in another case[66] that under Art. 227, the High Court can set aside a finding of fact by a tribunal if it is arrived at by non-consideration of the relevant and material documents, the consideration of which could have led to an opposite conclusion.

It has been held by the Supreme Court that the High Court does not exercise its jurisdiction under Art. 227 if an alternative remedy is available.[67] But this is not an inflexible rule and there may be circumstances when, despite the existence of an alternative remedy, the High Court may deem it fit to intervene under Art. 227.[68]

When a High Court refuses to exercise its power of superintendence, the Supreme Court may itself, on an appeal from the High Court's order, exercise

---

60. Shaik Mohammed v. K.H. Karimsab, AIR 1970 SC 61 : (1978) 2 SCC 47; Maruti Lala Raut v. Dashrath Babu Wathare, AIR 1974 SC 2051 : (1974) 2 SCC 615; India Pipe Fitting Co. v. Fakruddin, AIR 1978 SC 45 : (1977) 4 SCC 587; Ganpat v. Sashikant, AIR 1978 SC 955 : (1978) 2 SCC 573.

61. Zenna Soralaji v. Virabell Hotel Co. (P) Ltd., AIR 1981 Bom 446.

62. Gopala Genu v. N.P.A.A. Trust, AIR 1978 SC 347 : (1978) 2 SCC 47; Satyanarayan M. Sakaria v. Vithaldas Shyamlal Jhaveri, 1994 Supp (1) SCC 614; Achutananda Baidya v. Prafullya Kumar Gayen, AIR 1997 SC 2077 : (1997) 5 SCC 76.

63. Mani Nariman Daruwala v. Phiroz N. Bhatena, AIR 1991 SC 1494 : (1991) 3 SCC 141.

64. Also see, Chandravarkar Sita Ratna Rao v. Ashalata S. Guram, AIR 1987 SC 117 : (1986) 4 SCC 447.

65. Achutananda Baidya v. Prafullya Kumar Gayen, AIR 1997 SC 2077, 2079 : (1997) 5 SCC 76.

66. Baby v. Travancore Devaswom Board, AIR 1999 SC 519 : (1998) 8 SCC 310.

67. Mohd. Yunus v. Mohd. Mustaqim, AIR 1984 SC 38 : (1983) 4 SCC 566.

68. Union of India v. Ad-hoc Claims Commissioner, AIR 1977 Cal 393.

the same powers in a suitable case.[69] The High Court's jurisdiction under Art. 227 cannot be controlled by a statute and it can be exercised even when a tribunal's decision is declared to be final and conclusive.[70]

The Supreme Court has held that the Commissioner of Hindu Religious Endowments who acts in a quasi-judicial capacity under the Orissa Hindu Religious Endowments Act is subject to High Court's superintendence under Art. 227. He is, therefore, bound to follow the decisions of the High Courts and it will amount to contempt of Court on his part if he deliberately avoids to follow the High Court's decision, mala fide, by giving wrong and illegitimate reasons.[71] The Court has emphasized that if the Commissioner does not follow the previous decisions of the High Court, it will create confusion in the administration of law, will undermine respect laid down by the High Court, and will impair the constitutional authority of the High Court.

When the statutory power of revision given to the High Court is inadequate, the High Court can fall back upon its supervisory power under Art. 227.[72]

Recently, the Supreme Court has emphasized [73]that the power of superintendence vested in the High Courts under Art. 227 is "part of the basic structure of the Constitution"[74]

Article 235 also vests in the High Courts some control over the subordinate courts. While Art. 227 deals with the official acts of the persons occupying those courts, Art. 235 deals with such persons themselves in relation to the discipline. Further, while the power of superintendence of the High Courts under Art. 227 extends to the courts and tribunals, the controlling power under Art. 235 extends only to courts and not to tribunals.[75]

(v) POWER OF REVIEW

There is no provision in the Constitution to confer on High Court power to review its own decisions. But the Supreme Court has ruled that a High Court being a superior Court has inherent power to review its own decisions.

The High Court can exercise the power of review to prevent miscarriage of justice, or correct grave and palpable errors committed by it. The High Court can review its decision on such ground as "error apparent on the face of the record."[76]

The Supreme Court has observed in Thomas[77] that a High Court being a Court of record [Art. 215][78] has inherent powers to correct its record by way of review. A Court of record envelopes all such powers whose acts and proceedings are to be

---

69. Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Ahmad Ishaq, AIR 1955 SC 233 : (1955) 1 SCR 233.
70. State of Gujarat v. Vakhat Singhji, AIR 1968 SC 1481 : (1968) 3 SCR 692.
71. B. Mishra v. B. Dixit, AIR 1972 SC 2466 : (1973) 1 SCC 446.
72. Baby v. Travancore Devaswom Board, AIR 1999 SC 519 : (1987) 8 SCC 310.
73. L. Chandra Kumar v. Union of India, AIR 1997 SC 1125, 1150 : (1997) 3 SCC 261, also see, infra, Ch. XLI.
74. For explanation of this concept, see, infra, Ch. XLI.
75. Infra, Sec. G.
76. Shivdeo Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1963 SC 1909; Ariban Tuleshwar Sharma v. Ariban Pishak Sharma, AIR 1979 SC 1041 : (1979) 4 SCC 389; Khaitan (India) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 2000 Cal 1; Ramakrishna Hela v. Official Liquidator, AIR 2000 Cal 68.
77. M.M. Thomas v. State of Kerala, AIR 2000 SC 540 : (2000) 1 SCC 666.
78. Supra, Sec. C (a).

enrolled in a perpetual memorial and testimony. The High Court, as a Court of record, has a duty to itself to keep all its records correctly and in accordance with law. Hence if any apparent error is noticed by the High Court in respect of any order favoured, by it, the High Court has not only the power, but a duty, to correct it. The High Court's power in that regard is plenary. And where an order is obtained by fraud and misrepresentation the High Court can, inexercise of its inherent power, recall its order.[79]

D. WRIT JURISDICTION: ART. 226

(a) NATURE OF THE WRIT JURISDICTION

A very significant aspect of the Indian Constitution is the jurisdiction it confers on the High Courts to issue writs. The writs have been among the great safeguards provided by the British Judicial System for upholding the rights and liberties of the people. It was an act of great wisdom and foresight on the part of the Constitution-makers to introduce the writ system in India, and, thus, constitute the High Courts into guardians of the people's legal rights.

In the modern era of welfare state, when there is governmental action on a vast scale, a procedure to obtain speedy and effective redress against an illegal exercise of power by the Executive is extremely desirable. Through writs, the High Courts are able to control, to some extent, the administrative authorities in the modern administrative age. The writ system provides an expeditious and less expensive remedy than any other remedy available through the normal Court-process.

In the pre-Constitution era, only the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay enjoyed the jurisdiction to issue writs. The jurisdiction was, however, limited territorially as each High Court could issue a writ not throughout the whole of its territorial jurisdiction but only within the area of the Presidency Town within which it enjoyed an original jurisdiction.[80] No other High Court had such a jurisdiction. Art. 226 thus affects all the High Courts in a fundamental manner and adds greatly to their power. Each High Court now has a writ jurisdiction, and even the Calcutta, Madras and Bombay High Courts have benefited for they can now issue writs even outside the limits of their original jurisdiction.

It is a public law remedy. The High Court while exercising its power of judicial review does not act as an appellant body. It is concerned with illegality, irrationality and procedural impropriety of an order passed by the State or a statutory authority.[81] Under Art. 226(1), a High Court is empowered to issue directions, orders or writs, including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari, for the enforcement of a Fundamental Right and for any other purpose. High Courts exercise discretionary and equitable jurisdiction under Art. 226.[82]

The power of the High Court to entertain a petition under Art. 226 is an original power whereas the power of the Supreme Court while entertaining an appeal under Art. 136 is an appellate power[83].

---

79. Deepa Gourang Murdeshwar Katre v. Principal V.A.V. College of Arts, (2007) 14 SCC 108 : (2007) 3 JT 403.
80. JAIN, OUTLINES OF INDIAN LEGAL HISTORY, 303-308 (1990).
81. Dwarka Prasad Agarwal v. B. D. Agarwal, (2003) 6 SCC 230 : AIR 2003 SC 2686.
82. U.P. State Sugar Corpn. Ltd. v. Kamal Swaroop Tondon, (2008) 2 SCC 41, see also Secretary, ONGC Ltd. v. V.U. Warrier, (2005) 5 SCC 245 : AIR 2005 SC 3039; Indian Overseas Bank, Annasalai v. P. Ganesan, (2008) 1 SCC 650.
83. State of Orissa v. Gokulananda Jena, (2003) 6 SCC 465 : AIR 2003 SC 4207.

The significant point to note is that under Art. 226, the power of a High Court is not confined only to issue of writs; it is broader than that for a High Court can also issue any directions to enforce any of the Fundamental Rights or "for any other purpose". In a number of cases, courts have issued directions rather than writs.[84]

High Court can pass appropriate orders while exercising jurisdiction under Art. 226. Such power can neither be controlled nor affected by Or. 23 R. 3 CPC. Proceedings in exercise of writ jurisdiction are different from proceedings in a civil suit.[85]

Power under Article 226 can be exercised by the High Court to reach injustice wherever it is found.[86] But the Court has also set its own limits saying that even a wrong decision is not open to challenge unless it be mala fide. The doctrine of fairness does not convert the writ courts into appellate authorities over administrative authorities. Unless the action of the authority is mala fide, even a wrong decision taken by it is not open to challenge. Hence, whatever the wisdom (or the lack of it) of the conduct of such an authority, it will not be judicially reviewed and particularly so in commercial matters, the Courts should not risk their judgments for the judgments of the bodies to which that task is assigned.[87]

Further, it cannot supplant substantive statutory provisions. Hence, since the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 is a self-contained Code, the common law principles of justice, equity and good conscience cannot be extended in awarding interest, contrary to or beyond the provisions of the Statute and the Court has no power to award interest in a manner other than one prescribed by Statute while exercising jurisdiction under Article 226.[88]

The jurisdiction thus conferred on a High Court is to protect not only the Fundamental Rights but even any other legal right as is clear from the words 'any other purpose'. This Constitutional Right to access the High Court cannot be fettered and more so by the Court itself e.g. by directing the petitioner to deposit money as a condition precedent to such access.[89] Fundamental Rights of a citizen, whenever infringed, the High Court having regard to its extraordinary power under Article 226 of the Constitution, as also keeping in view that access to justice is a human right, would not turn him away only because a red corner notice has been issued by Interpol. The superior courts in criminal cases are entitled to go into the manner in which such red corner notice is sought to be enforced and/or whether local police is threatening an Indian citizen with arrest although they are not entitled to do so, except in terms of the Extradition Act, 1962.[90]

Any authority or body of persons having legal authority to adjudicate upon questions affecting the rights of a subject and enjoined with a duty to act judicially or quasi-judicially is amenable to the certiorari jurisdiction of the High Court. The proceedings of judicial courts subordinate to the High Court can be

---

84. See, Swayambar Prasad v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1972 Raj. 69; Gujarat State Financial Corporation v. Lotus Hotel, AIR 1983 SC 848 : (1983) 3 SCC 379; Air India Statutory Corpn. v. United Labour Union, AIR 1997 SC 645, 680 : (1997) 9 SCC 377.

85. Commr. of Endowments v. Vittal Rao, (2005) 4 SCC 120 : AIR 2005 SC 454.

86. Secy. ONGC Ltd. v. V.U. Warrier, (2005) 5 SCC 245 : AIR 2005 SC 3039, the Court referred to jurisdiction as 'equitable'.

87. Karnataka State Industrial Investment & Development (Corpn.) Ltd. v. Cavalet India Ltd., (2005) 4 SCC 456 : (2005) 3 JT 570.

88. Delhi Development Authority v. Mahender Singh, (2009) 5 SCC 339 : (2009) 4 JT 208.

89. Grand Vasant Residents Welfare Assn. v. DDA, (2005) 12 SCC 281.

90. Bhavesh Jayanti Lakhani v. State of Maharashtra, (2009) 9 SCC 551.

subjected to certiorari. It is well settled principle that : (i) technicalities associated with the prerogative writs in English law have no role to play under the constitutional scheme; (ii) a writ of certiorari to call for records and examine the same for passing appropriate orders, is issued by a superior Court to an inferior Court which certifies its records for examination; and (iii) a High Court cannot issue a writ to another High Court, nor can one Bench of a High Court issue a writ to a different Bench of the High Court much less can the writ jurisdiction of a High Court be invoked to seek issuance of a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court. The High Courts are not constituted as inferior courts in the constitutional scheme. Courts subordinate to the High Court are amenable to writ jurisdiction of the High Court under Article 226 of the Constitution.[91]

Article 226 provides an important mechanism for judicial review of administrative action in the country. India is a democratic country governed by Rule of Law. Public authorities exercise various types of powers—executive, adjudicatory, legislative. It is necessary that public authorities act according to law and so they are subjected to judicial review. Judicial review of the action of the public authorities, is an essential part of Rule of Law and the courts have been expressly entrusted with the power of judicial review as sentinel in qui vive. In L. Chandra Kumar[92] a Seven Judge Bench of the Supreme Court held that the power of judicial review under Art. 226 of the Constitution was one of the basic features of the Constitution. Hairing held so, the court at the same time held a litigant cannot straight away invoke the High Court's constitutional jurisdiction at the first instance but must approach the Administrative Tribunal first. But even after considering the Seven Judge Bench decision in L. Chandra Kumar a two Judge Bench of the Supreme Court in relation to dismissal of two lakh employees by State Govt. for going on strike, held that the High Court was empowered to exercise its extra ordinary jurisdiction under Art. 226 to meet unprecedented extraordinary situations with no parallel and the availability of alternative remedy before Administrative Tribunal would not be a bar.[93]

The legal parameters of judicial review has undergone a change. WEDNESBURY principle of unreasonableness has been displaced by the doctrine of proportionality.[94] Although the Court referred to the observations of the House of Lords in Tweed Pardes Commission[95], it is doubtful whether the true implication of the observations of House of Lords results in the replacement of Wednesbury as conceived by the Supreme Court. After all, disproportionate exercise of power is also unreasonable exercise of power.

The Supreme Court has often said that judicial review is not concerned with policy making functions of the State and particularly those involving financial implications. Yet the Court appears to have made an uncharacteristic leap in Mohd. Abdul Kadir,[96] saying that where an issue involving public interest has

---

91. Surya Dev Rai v. Ram Chander Rai, (2003) 6 SCC 675 : AIR 2003 SC 3044. See Kannadasan, (2009) 7 SCC 1, 50, where the Supreme Court has reiterated that judicial review itself is a part of the basic structure of the Constitution.

92. (1997) 3 SCC 261.

93. T.K. Rangarajan v. Govt. of T.N., (2003) 6 SCC 581 : AIR 2003 SC 3032. The Court found that at the particular time there was only one member manning the Administrative Tribunal.

94. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Hazarilal, (2008) 3 SCC 273 : AIR 2008 SC 1300.

95. Tweed v. Parades Commission, (2007) 4 All ER 177.

96. (2009) 6 SCC 611 : (2009) 6 SCALE 615.

not engaged the attention of those concerned with policy, or where the failure to take a prompt decision on a pending issue is likely to be detrimental to public interest, Courts will be failing in their duty if they did not draw the attention of the authorities concerned to the issue involved in appropriate cases on the logic that the Courts are not framers but they can act as catalysts when there is a need for a policy or a change in policy.

The great advantage of Art. 226 is that its scope cannot be curtailed or whittled down by legislation. The jurisdiction of the High Court under Art. 226 cannot be taken away by any legislation. Even when the Legislature declares the action or decision of an authority final, and ordinary jurisdiction of the courts is barred, a High Court is still entitled to exercise its writ jurisdiction which remains unaffected by legislation.[1] A finality clause in a statute is no bar to the exercise of the High Court's jurisdiction under Art. 226.[2] The judicial review in India thus stands on a much firmer ground than in Britian because while the jurisdiction of the British courts to issue writs may be regulated by legislation, the same cannot be done in India.

A mere wrong decision without anything more is not enough to attract jurisdiction of the High Court under Art. 226.[3] The High Court acts as a supervisory authority and hence it cannot reappreciate the entire evidence adduced in the disciplinary proceeding to alter the findings of the enquiring authority.[4] Where a decision in an earlier writ petition adversely affected the interest of the appellants, a second writ petition at their instance was maintainable.[5]

Since exercise of power under Art. 226 is discretionary relief may be denied because of suppression of facts. But the suppressed fact must be material one, i.e. one which would have had an effect on the merits of the case. Hence where a suit is withdrawn and was not pending by the time the writ petition was heard and the writ petition was otherwise maintainable, it could not be rejected on the ground of suppression of the fact of filing of the suit.[6]

But in the judicial review jurisdiction the Court cannot change the policy by requiring the government to select the best from among "films made" instead of "films made and certified" for public exhibition.[7] The Court also found fault with the reasoning of the High Court which proceeded on the wrong assumption that the objects of the film festival and the national films awards were the same and, therefore, when permission was granted for entering the film in film festivals without certification by the Board, a similar treatment should be extended to entries for the national film award.[8]

---

1. Sajjan Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1965 SC 845 : (1965) 1 SCR 933; Custodian, Evacuee Property v. Jafran Begum, AIR 1968 SC 169 : (1967) 3 SCR 736; Kartar Singh v. State of Punjab, (1994) 3 SCC 569.
2. Srikant K. Jituri v. Corp. of Belgaum, see, infra, footnote 10.
3. Sadhana Lodh v. National Insurance Co. Ltd., (2003) 3 SCC 524.
4. Sub-Divisional Officer, Konch v. Maharaj Singh, (2003) 9 SCC 191 : (2000) 8 SLJ 705.
5. Pohla Singh v. State of Punjab, (2004) 6 SCC 126 : AIR 2004 SC 3329.
6. SJS Business Enterprises (P) Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2004) 7 SCC 166.
7. Ibid.
8. Directorate of Film Festivals v. Gaurav Ashwin Jain, (2007) 4 SCC 737 : AIR 2007 SC 1640.

Article 226 cannot be invoked for resolution of a private law dispute and recording a compromise as contradistinguished from a dispute involving public law character. It is also well settled that a writ remedy is not available for resolution of a property or a title dispute.[9]

Under Art. 226, the High Court may even grant a declaratory relief when writ is not a proper remedy.[10] A High Court can make an interim order pending final disposal of the writ petition.[11] A High Court cannot, however, give interim relief to the petitioner if it does not propose to determine the rights of the parties involved in the matter, but desires a regular suit to be filed for the purpose.[12]

Further, the words in the Article 'in the nature' of writs imply that a High Court is not obligated to follow all the procedural technicalities of the English law relating to writs, or changes of judicial opinions from case to case there, but should keep to the broad and fundamental features of these writs as followed in the English law. A petition is not thrown out merely because the proper writ has not been prayed for.[13]

It is impermissible for the High Court to adopt an adjudicatory role and decide upon the very existence or otherwise of the agreement as well as the tenability and legality or otherwise of making a reference to an arbitrator.[14]

The Court will not permit abuse of process by way of suppression of facts and the petition is liable to be dismissed at the threshold.[15] A writ petition cannot be filed under Art. 226 merely to enforce a purely contractual obligation. For this purpose, the proper remedy is a suit for damages or specific performance.[16] It has been held that the Courts have no jurisdiction to give directions for amending statutory rules framed by the executive.[17]

It is impermissible for the High Court to widen the scope of hearing of writ petitions without giving notice to parties concerned and without pleadings in respect of the wider questions taken up by it.[18]

---

9. Dwarka Prasad Agarwal v. B. D. Agarwal, (2003) 6 SCC 230 : AIR 2003 SC 2686.
10. Srikant K. Jituri v. Corpn. of the City of Belgaum, (1994) 6 SCC 572 : AIR 1995 SC 288.
11. Kanoria Chemicals & Industries Ltd. v. Uttar Pradesh State Electricity Board, (1997) 5 SCC 772; State of Madhya Pradesh v. M.V. Vyavsaya & Co., AIR 1997 SC 993 : (1997) 1 SCC 156.
12. State of Orissa v. Madan Gopal, AIR 1952 SC 12 : 1952 SCR 28.
13. Basappa v. Nagappa, AIR 1954 SC 440; Kanu Sanyal v. Dist. Mag., AIR 1973 SC 2684 : (1973) 2 SCC 674.
14. Food Corpn. of India v. Indian Council of Arbitration, (2003) 6 SCC 564 : AIR 2003 SC 3011.
15. B. Srinivasa Reddy v. Karnataka Urban Water Supply & Drainage Board Employees' Assn., (2006) 11 SCC 731
16. Har Shankar v. Dy. Excise and Taxation Commr., AIR 1975 SC 1121 : (1975) 1 SCC 737; Divisional Forest Office v. Biswanath Tea Co. Ltd., AIR 1981 SC 1368 : (1981) 3 SCC 238; Food Corporation of India v. Jagannath Dutta, AIR 1993 SC 1494 : 1993 Supp (3) SCC 635; State of Madhya Pradesh v. M.V. Vyavsaya & Co., AIR 1997 SC 993 : (1997) 1 SCC 156.
For further discussion on this point, see, Ch. XXXIX.
17. State of Manipur v. Ksh. Moirangninthou Singh, (2007) 10 SCC 544 : (2007) 3 SCALE 50.
18. State of U.P. v. Satya Narain Kapoor, (2004) 8 SCC 630 : (2004) 9 JT 410.

The Supreme Court has given an expansive interpretation to Art. 226 over time. Under Art. 226, instead of merely quashing an administrative order as invalid when it is found to be flawed, the judicial tendency is to mould the relief according to the needs of the situation. In this way, judicial review has assumed a very positive and creative complexion.[19]

Requirements of Or. 23 R. 3 CPC can be pressed into service in writ proceedings also even though in terms of explanation to S. 141 CPC the code is not applicable to proceedings under Art. 226.[20] Disposal of the case on a point not raised by the parties and omission to decide the question raised is improper.[21]

Although High Court lacked jurisdiction to entertain appeal against order of Tribunal passed in 1994 but when subsequently writ petition was filed against the Tribunal's order, it got jurisdiction in view of Supreme Court's decision in L. Chandra Kumar case.[22] The Court explained that the fact the jurisdiction of High Court came to be recognized only later, cannot change the situation, since when the High Court entertained the writ petition, it had jurisdiction to do so and also to consider what was the effect of the earlier order or proceeding before it and whether the earlier order was legal and justified.[23]

(b) TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION TO ISSUE WRITS

A High Court exercises its writ jurisdiction throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises its jurisdiction.

The High Court can issue a writ—

(1) to a person or authority having its location or residence within the Court's territorial jurisdiction; or,

(2) if the cause of action either wholly or partly arises within the High Court's territorial jurisdiction.

Although in view of Section 141 CPC the provisions thereof would not apply to writ proceedings, the phraseology used in Section 20(c) CPC and Article 226(2) being in pari materia, the decisions of the Supreme Court rendered on interpretation of Section 20(c) CPC shall apply to the writ proceedings also.[24]

The High Court can issue a writ even when the person resides, or the authority is located, outside its territorial jurisdiction if the cause of action wholly or partially arises within the Court's territorial jurisdiction. This is a very useful constitutional provision [Art. 226(2)] as a High Court within whose jurisdiction a

---

19. State of Gujarat Steel Tubes v. Its Mazdoor Sabha, AIR 1980 SC 1896 : (1980) 2 SCC 593; Shiv Shankar Dal Mills v. State of Haryana, AIR 1980 SC 1037 : (1980) 2 SCC 437; Nawabganj Sugar Mills Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1976 SC 1152.
See, M.P. JAIN, THE EVOLVING INDIAN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 215-18 (1983).

20. K. Venkatachala Bhat v. Krishna Nayak, (2005) 4 SCC 117 : (2005) 3 JT 161.

21. V. K. Majotra v. Union of India, (2003) 8 SCC 40 : AIR 2003 SC 3909.

22. (1997) 3 SCC 261,

23. Rama Rao v. M.G. Maheshwara Rao, (2007) 14 SCC 54 : (2007) 10 JT 504.

24. Kusum Ingots & Alloys Ltd. v. Union of India, (2004) 6 SCC 254 : AIR 2004 SC 2321.

cause of action arises is competent to issue writs to the Central Government located at New Delhi.

Cause of action implies a right to sue. The material facts which are imperative for the suitor to allege and prove constitute the cause of action. Cause of action is not defined in any statute. It has, however, been judicially interpreted, inter alia, to mean every fact which would be necessary for the plaintiff to prove, if traversed, in order to support his right to the judgment of the Court. Negatively put, it would mean that everything which, if not proved, gives the defendant an immediate right to judgment, would be part of cause of action. Its importance is beyond any doubt. The question as to whether the Court has territorial jurisdiction to entertain a writ petition, must be arrived at on the basis of averments made in the petition, the truth or otherwise thereof being immaterial. In order to confer jurisdiction on a High Court to entertain a writ petition it must disclose that the integral facts pleaded in support of the cause of action do constitute a cause so as to empower the Court to decide the dispute and that the entire or a part of it arose within its jurisdiction. The facts pleaded in the writ petition must have a nexus on the basis whereof a prayer can be granted. Those facts which have nothing to do with the prayer made therein cannot be said to give rise to a cause of action which would confer jurisdiction on the Court.[25] Even if a small fraction of the cause of action accrues within the jurisdiction of the Court, the Court will have jurisdiction in the matter. However, the same by itself may not be considered to be a determinative factor compelling the High Court to decide the matter on merits. In appropriate cases, the Court may refuse to exercise its discretionary jurisdiction by invoking the doctrine of forum convenience.

When a part of the cause of action arises within one or the other High Court, it will be for the petitioner to choose his forum.[26]

Although the original order was given at a place outside the area where the appellate/revisional order was passed, it may give rise to a cause of action at the place where the original order was passed.

Even in a given case, when the original authority is constituted at one place and the appellate/revisional authority is constituted at another, a writ petition would be maintainable at both the places as order of the appellate authority constitutes a part of cause of action. A writ petition would be maintainable in the High Court within whose jurisdiction the appellate authority is situate having regard to the fact that the order of the appellate authority is also required to be set aside and as the order of the original authority merges with that of the appellate authority.[27]

In Alchemist[28] the Supreme Court has reiterated that for the purpose of deciding whether facts averred in a writ petition would or would not constitute a part of cause of action, one has to consider whether such facts constitute a material, essential or integral part of the cause of action and that in determining this ques-

---

25. Kusum Ingots & Alloys Ltd. v. Union of India, (2004) 6 SCC 254 : AIR 2004 SC 2321.
26. Kusum Ingots & Alloys Ltd. v. Union of India, (2004) 6 SCC 254 : AIR 2004 SC 2321.
27. Kusum Ingots & Alloys Ltd. v. Union of India, (2004) 6 SCC 254 : AIR 2004 SC 2321.
28. Alchemist Ltd. v. State Bank of Sikkim, (2007) 11 SCC 335 : AIR 2007 SC 1812.

tion, the substance of the matter and not form has to be considered. Even if a small faction of the cause of action arises within the jurisdiction of the Court, the Court would have territorial jurisdiction to entertain the petition. The petitioner had filed a writ petition before the Punjab & Haryana High Court under Article 226 and invoked the Court's jurisdiction stating at its registered office was in Chandigarh; it carried on business at Chandigarh; It offer was accepted and such acceptance was communicated at Chandigarh; part performance of the contract took place at Chandigarh by reason of depositing of Rs. 4.50 crores as per the request of the State of Sikkim; negotiations were held between the parties at Chandigarh and, finally the letter of revocation was received by the petitioner at Chandigarh and the consequences of such revocation ensued at Chandigarh. These events had to be proved in order that the petitioner could establish that his rights had been affected by the revocation which was the reason for his filing the writ petition.[29]

Where the services of an employees of Eastern Coalfields Ltd., was terminated at Mugma (Jharkhand) where he was serving in the office of the General Manager and the entire cause of action arose in Mugma, the Supreme Court held that the mere fact that the head office of the Eastern Coalfields was in West Bengal by itself could not confer jurisdiction on the Calcutta High Court.[30] This is a patently erroneous decision. Art. 226(1) provides from the inception of the Constitution that the High Court within whose territorial jurisdiction the 'seat' of the authority was situate would have the power or jurisdiction to issue writs.[31] New India Assurance is wholly wrong and needs to be overruled as early as possible as otherwise it is productive of harm and mischief to citizens who seek relief from the High Courts of their respective states.

Where an obligation is cast on a party and he commits a breach of such obligation, he cannot be permitted to take advantage of such situation. Hence the authorities cannot be allowed to take undue advantage of their own fault in failing to act in accordance with law.[32] Hence when under a ceiling law a return was filed and the statute required the final statement to be issued within a particular time or within a reasonable time after issuance of the order of a designated officer made in 1976 and the final statement attained finality, initiation of fresh proceedings against the landholder after the insertion of a new provision in the act to that effect could not be permitted.

It is the duty of the High Court before which the writ petition is filed to ascertain whether any part of the cause of action has arisen within the territorial limits of its jurisdiction. It depends on the facts of each case. When an order is challenged, cause of action arises.—

(i) at the place where the order was made, as well as;

(ii) at the place where its consequences fall on the person concerned.[33]

---

29. The Court ought to have pointed out why these facts were not material or essential or integral part of the cause of action. As such this case begs the question of as to what such essential integral or material factors would be in a given situation.

30. New India Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Vipin Behari Lal Srivastava, (2008) 3 SCC 446 : AIR 2008 SC 1525.

31. Ibid

32. Kusheshwar Prasad Singh v. State of Bihar, (2007) 11 SCC 447 : (2007) 5 JT 237.

33. SEBI v. Alka, AIR 1999 Guj. 221; Birla Institute of Technology v. Yamini Shukla, AIR 1996 All 244.

Reference may be made here to ONGC v. Utpal Kumar Basu.[34] The petitioner company, having its registered office in Calcutta, read in a Calcutta newspaper the ONGC advertisement inviting tenders at Delhi for works to be executed in Gujarat. In response to this advertisement, the petitioner company sent its tender from Calcutta to the Delhi address. All the bids were analysed at Delhi and the petitioner company's bid was rejected on the ground that it did not fulfil the requisite experience criteria stipulated in the tender.

The company made representations from Calcutta against non-consideration of its offer but the same were rejected by ONGC at Delhi. The company then filed a writ petition against ONGC in the Calcutta High Court which issued direction to ONGC to consider the petitioner's tender.

On appeal by ONGC, the Supreme Court quashed the High Court order on the ground of lack of jurisdiction in the High Court as no part of the cause of action arose within the territorial jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court. Under Art 226, a High Court can exercise its jurisdiction if a part of the cause of action arises within its territorial jurisdiction but, in the instant case, no part of the cause of action arose within the territorial jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court.

Merely because the petitioner company read the advertisement at Calcutta, submitted the offer from Calcutta, made representations from Calcutta and received a reply thereto at Calcutta, cannot constitute facts forming an integral part of the cause of action. The advertisement itself mentioned that the tenders should be submitted at New Delhi, that they would be scrutinised there and the final decision arrived at New Delhi.

It was wrong for the Calcutta High Court to assume jurisdiction merely because the petitioner before it resided or carried on business at Calcutta. It is for the High Court to decide whether any part of the cause of action has arisen within its territorial limits of jurisdiction. The High Court ought not to claim jurisdiction merely because some insignificant event connected with the cause of action happened within its territorial limits.

Ordinarily, a High Court will not issue a writ of certiorari for quashing its own order.[35]

A FIR was filed in Shillong (Meghalaya) against the petitioner carrying on business in Bombay. The petitioner filed a writ petition in the Bombay High Court to transfer the FIR to Bombay on the ground that most of the facts on which the FIR was filed occurred in Bombay and most of the investigation in the complaint had to take place in Bombay. The Bombay High Court rejected the writ petition.

However, on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the High Court and ordered transfer of the FIR from Shillong to Bombay.[36] The place of residence of the writ petitioner is not the criterion to determine the contours of the cause of action in a particular writ petition. Filing of a FIR in a particular State is not the sole criterion to decide that no cause of action has arisen even partly in the territorial limits of the jurisdiction of another State.

---

34. (1994) 4 SCC 711.
35. Dwarka Prasad Agarwal v. B. D. Agarwal, (2003) 6 SCC 230 : AIR 2003 SC 2686.
36. Navinchandra N. Majitha v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 2000 SC 2966 : (2000) 7 SCC 640.

The passing of legislation by itself does not give rise to a cause of action to file a writ petition challenging its validity, and the situs of the office of Parliament, the State Legislature or authorities making the legislation or subordinate legislation, would not therefore be a place at which the cause of action arises wholly or in part. However, when an order is passed by a Court or tribunal or an executive authority, whether under provisions of a statute or otherwise, part of the cause of action arises at that place. So also where appellate/revisional authority is situated elsewhere a part of cause of action would arise there. Therefore a writ petition questioning the constitutionality of a parliamentary Act shall not be maintainable in the High Court of Delhi only because the seat of the Union of India is in Delhi.[37] Question of territorial jurisdiction to entertain a writ petition must be arrived at solely on the basis of averments made in the petition, the truth or otherwise thereof being immaterial.[38]

But the Court has been continually taking a restrictive approach and depriving persons to access the High Court in their own states for which the 15th amendment was made[39]

(c) WRIT JURISDICTION NOT APPELLATE BUT SUPERVISORY IN NATURE

The Supreme Court has emphasized time and again that the power of the High Court under Art. 226 is supervisory in nature and is not akin to appellate power. The main purpose of this power is to enable the High Court to keep the various authorities within the bounds of their powers, but not to sit as an appellate body over these authorities.

While exercising power under Art. 226, the High Court cannot go into the correctness or merits of the decision taken by the concerned authority but a review of the manner in which the decision is made[40]; it only ensures that the authority arrives at its decision according to law[41] and in accordance with the principles of natural justice wherever applicable.[42]

The Court can also intervene if the authority acts unfairly or unreasonably.[43] It is often said that judicial review is not directed against the decision, as such, but is confined to the decision-making process.

---

37. Kusum Ingots & Alloys Ltd. v. Union of India, (2004) 6 SCC 254 : AIR 2004 SC 2321.
38. Kusum Ingots & Alloys Ltd. v. Union of India, (2004) 6 SCC 254 : AIR 2004 SC 2321.
39. Alchemist Ltd. v. State Bank of Sikkim, (2007) 11 SCC 335 : AIR 2007 SC 1812.
40. H.B. Gandhi, Excise and Taxation Officer-cum-Assessing Authority v. Gopi Nath & Sons, (1992) Supp (2) SCC 312.
41. The Court quashed an illegal action in Gurdeep Singh v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1993 SC 2638 : 1995 Supp (1) SCC 188.
42. State of Madhya Pradesh v. M/s. M.V. Vyavasaya & Co., AIR 1997 SC 993, 997; Indian Oil Corp. Ltd. v. Ashok Kumar Arora, AIR 1997 SC 1030 : (1997) 3 SCC 72; H.B. Gandhi, Excise and Taxation Officer-cum-Assessing Authority v. Gopi Nath & Sons, (1992) Supp. (2) SCC 312; Rattan Lal Sharma v. Managing Committee, Dr. Hari Ram H.S. School, AIR 1993 SC 2155 : (1993) 4 SCC 10.
Also see, infra, under Certiorari, Sec. E.
43. U.P. Financial Corporation v. M/s. Gem Cap (India) Pvt. Ltd., AIR 1993 SC 1435, at 1439 : (1993) 2 SCC 299; Al-Karim Educational Trust v. State of Bihar, AIR 1996 SC 1469 : (1996) 8 SCC 330.
For discussion on the concept of unreasonableness in Administrative Law, see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, I, 945-953; CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, III, 2229-2236.
Also see, infra, under Mandamus, Sec. E.

The Supreme Court has described the nature of the High Court's jurisdiction under Art. 226 as follows: [44]

> ".... in a proceeding under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution the High Court cannot sit in appeal over the findings recorded by a competent Tribunal. The Jurisdiction of the High Court, therefore, is supervisory and not appellate. Consequently Art. 226 is not intended to enable the High Court to convert itself into a Court of appeal and examine for itself the correctness of the decision impugned and decide what is the proper view to be taken or order to be made."

But here also flexibility is recognized. In Rajendra Singh the Supreme Court, after setting aside the Speaker's decision declaring that certain MPs had not incurred disqualification as it was based on no evidence, did not remit the matter back to the Speaker but itself decided the issue and declared that the members were disqualified.[45]

The Supreme Court has often referred to the following extract from an English case[46] to define the nature of the jurisdiction conferred by Art. 226 :

> "The purpose of judicial review is to ensure that the individual receives fair treatment, and not to ensure that the authority, after according fair treatment, reaches on a matter which it is authorised or enjoined by law to decide for itself a conclusion which is correct in the eyes of the Court."

This means that, generally speaking, the writ Court can quash a flawed decision but it cannot substitute its own decision for that of the concerned authority.

In exercise of its jurisdiction the High Court is not justified in going into merits and expressing its views and thereafter remitting the matter.[47]

Directing that final report of police under S. 173(2) Cr. P.C. was not to be accepted, and if accepted to be treated as rejected, the impugned order clearly indicated that the High Court wanted the rejection of the final report though it was not specifically spelt out, hence, impugned order set aside.[48]

The principle stated above represents the nature of the High Court's supervisory power under Art. 226.

(d) INTER-RELATIONSHIP OF ARTS. 32 AND 226

Article 226 operates "notwithstanding anything in article 32" [Art. 226(1)]. Thus, Art. 32 and Art. 226 exist independently of each other.

Article 226 is wider in scope than Art. 32. Under Art. 32, the Supreme Court may issue writs for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights only;[49] under Art. 226, on the other hand, a High Court may enforce not only a Fundamental Right but also any other legal right. For example, under Art. 265, no tax can be levied

---

44. Shama Prashant v. Ganpatrao, AIR 2000 SC 3090, 3097 : (2000) 7 SCC 522.
45. Rajendra Singh Rana v. Swami Prasad Maurya, (2007) 4 SCC 270 : AIR 2007 SC 1305.
46. Chief Constable of the North Wales Police v. Evans, (1982) 3 All ER 141 (HL).
47. Union of India v. Adani Exports Ltd., (2007) 13 SCC 207 : (2007) 13 JT 144.
48. Sanjay Bansal v. Jawaharlal Vats, (2007) 13 SCC 71 : AIR 2008 SC 207.
49. Infra, Chs. XX-XXXIII.

without the authority of law.[50] When, therefore, a tax imposed without the authority of law infringes a Fundamental Right, relief can be had either under Art. 32, or Art. 226. But when a Fundamental Right is not infringed, only Art. 226, and not Art. 32, can be invoked.[51]

For enforcement of Fundamental Rights, a parallel writ jurisdiction has been conferred on the High Courts as well as on the Supreme Court. The High Court's jurisdiction is not in derogation of the Supreme Court's jurisdiction.[52]

Although under the Constitution, Arts. 32 and 226 exist independently of each other, the courts have by their process of interpretation introduced the doctrine of res judicata to discourage multiple and overlapping writ petitions in the High Court and the Supreme Court to get the same relief in the same factual situation.[53]

(e) ARTS. 226 AND 136 COMPARED

The scope of Art. 136 has already been discussed earlier.[54] Art. 226 differs from Art. 136 in several respects.

While under Art. 136, the Supreme Court hears appeals from courts or tribunals, and not from any administrative body, under Art. 226, a High Court can issue a writ to any authority, quasi-judicial or administrative or legislative. That way, Art. 226, is broader in scope than Art. 136. But, from another point of view, Art. 226 is narrower in compass than Art. 136. Whereas Art. 136 confers appellate jurisdiction on the Supreme Court, Art. 226 confers only a writ jurisdiction on a High Court, and the scope allowed to a Court in its appellate jurisdiction is much wider than what is available to a Court in its writ jurisdiction.

Under Art. 136, the Supreme Court can go into questions of fact as well as of law and can give any remedy which appears to it to be suitable in the circumstances of the case. A High Court's powers under Art. 226 are not so broad. The High Court does not act as a Court of appeal under Art. 226.[55] The scope of writs is not as wide as that of an appeal as many more matters can be taken cognisance of in an appeal than under the writs, e.g., in certiorari, a High Court goes into errors of law manifest on the face of the record while in an appeal under Art. 136 there is no such restriction on the Supreme Court.

In Workmen, Cochin Port Trust v. Board of Trustees,[56] an interesting question was raised : whether dismissal of the special leave appeal petition by the Supreme Court would necessarily bar a writ petition before the High Court under Art. 226 on the same grounds?

---

50. Supra, Ch. II.
51. Bengal Immunity Co. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1955 SC 661 : (1955) 2 SCR 603.
52. Also see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, for application of the doctrine of res judicata to petitions under Art. 32.
53. See, infra, under Res Judicata.
54. See, supra, Ch. IV, Sec. D.
55. Sangram Singh v. Election Tribunal, AIR 1955 SC 425 : (1955) 2 SCR 1.
56. AIR 1978 SC 1283 : (1978) 3 SCC 119.

The facts in the case were as follows: an industrial tribunal gave an award in favour of the workmen. A special leave petition under Art. 136 against the award was dismissed by the Supreme Court. The employees thereafter filed a writ petition in the High Court under Art. 226 substantially on the same grounds on which the special leave petition was based earlier. Objection against the maintainability of the petition was rejected by the Supreme Court. The Court emphasized that the question was whether the order dismissing the special leave petition had considered all the matters raised in the petition. When the Supreme Court rejected the special leave petition earlier, it decided nothing specifically except that it was not a fit case for appeal.[57]

When a person files a special leave petition in the Supreme Court under Art. 136, but withdraws the same, he cannot be barred from filing a writ petition in the High Court under Art. 226.[58] The situation would however be different if the appeal was dismissed on merits by the Supreme Court. In such a situation, the same matter cannot be re-agitated through a writ petition in the High Court under Art. 226.[59]

(f) INTER-RELATION BETWEEN ARTS. 226 AND 227

In practice parameters of exercising jurisdiction under either Articles 226 or 227 are almost similar and width of jurisdiction exercised by High Courts, unlike English courts, has almost obliterated distinction between the two jurisdictions. However, in Radhey Shyam v. Chhabi Nath,[60] another two judge Bench of the Supreme Court doubted the correctness of the decision in Surya Dev Rai and after pointing out the erroneous reading of a 9-judge Constitution Bench Judgement in Naresh Shridhar Mirajkar,[61] expressed its difference of opinion with the views expressed in Surya Dev Rai, directed the matter to be placed before the Chief Justice of India for constituting a larger Bench to consider the correctness or otherwise of the law laid down in Surya Dev Rai. Three differences that nevertheless exist, are: (i) Issuing writ of certiorari is an exercise of its original jurisdiction by High Court while exercise of supervisory jurisdiction under Art. 227 is not original, in this sense the latter is akin to appellate revisional or corrective jurisdiction; (ii) If the High Court issues writ of certiorari it may only annul or quash proceedings but cannot substitute its own decision in place thereof, while in exercise of supervisory jurisdiction High Court may not only quash or set aside the impugned proceedings, judgment or order but may also give suitable directions so as to guide the subordinate Court as to the manner in which it should proceed thereafter or afresh. In appropriate cases High Court may make an order in supersession or substitution of order of subordinate Court as the Court should have made in the facts and circumstances of the case; and (iii) Jurisdiction under Art. 226 has to be invoked by an aggrieved party, but supervisory jurisdiction under Art. 227 can be exercised suo motu as well.[62] Remedies under Articles 226 and 227 are not available for correcting mere errors of fact or law. They are

---

57. On this point, see, also, Ch. IV, Sec. D(a), supra.
58. Ahmedabad Mfg. & Calico Printing Co. v. Workmen, AIR 1981 SC 960 : (1981) 2 SCC 663.
59. Also see, infra, under Res Judicata.
60. (2009) 5 SCC 616 : (2009) 6 JT 511.
61. AIR 1967 SC 1.
62. Surya Dev Rai v. Ram Chandra Rai, (2003) 6 SCC 675 : AIR 2003 SC 3044. See also State of Madhya Pradesh v. Visan Kumar Shiv Charan Lal, (2008) 15 SCC 233 and cases cited therein.

available only when (i) error is manifest and apparent on face of record, and (ii) grave injustice or gross failure of justice has been occasioned thereby. Further, ordinarily neither is available when an alternative efficacious remedy by way of appeal or revision is available to the person aggrieved but in a given situation. High Court has to choose between causing delay by its intervention and meet the need for imminent action.[63] The power of the High Court under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution is always in addition to the revisional jurisdiction conferred on it. The curtailment of revisional jurisdiction of the High Court under Section 115 CPC by Amendment Act 46 of 1999 does not take away and could not have taken away the constitutional jurisdiction of the High Court.[64]

In MMTC,[65] a 3 Judge Bench of the Supreme Court undertook an exhaustive study of the interrelation between Article 226 and 227 quoting a number of earlier observations of the Court converging to the view that the distinction between the two jurisdictions stands almost obliterated in practice and viewed the broad general difference between them as follows:

(a) A writ petition under Art. 226 was an exercise of the High Court's original jurisdiction whereas that under Art. 227 was of supervisory and in that sense it was akin to appellate, revisional or 'corrective' jurisdiction.

(b) In the case of a writ of certiorari, the records of the proceedings are certified and then sent up by the inferior court or tribunal is brought up before the High Court and it may 'simply annul or quash the proceedings and do no more' whereas in its supervisory jurisdiction the Court can go further in that after quashing the proceedings it may also 'give such direction as the facts and circumstances of the case may warrant and even substitute such a decision of its own in place of the impugned decision'.

The first decision of the High Court on a petition under Art. 226 or Art. 227 is by a single judge. Writ proceedings under Art. 226 fall on the original side of the High Court and therefore, an intra-Court appeal is possible from a single Judge to a Division Bench. Not so in case of Art. 227 for proceedings thereunder do not fall on the original side.

There are many situations where a petition can be filed under both the Articles. The Supreme Court has ruled that where the fact justifies a party filing a petition either under Art. 226 or Art. 227, and a party chooses to file the petition under both the Articles, in fairness to the petitioner concerned, the Court should treat the petition as having been filed under Art. 226 as this will protect petitioner's right to file an intra-Court appeal from the single Judge to the Division Bench.[66]

(g) ALTERNATIVE LEGAL REMEDY

A High Court does not ordinarily issue a writ when an alternative efficacious remedy is available. Under Art. 226, the High Court does not decide disputes for

---

63. Surya Dev Ra v. Ram Chandra Rai, (2003) 6 SCC 675 : AIR 2003 SC 3044.
64. Surya Dev Rai v. Ram Chandra Rai, (2003) 6 SCC 675 : AIR 2003 SC 3044.
65. MMTC Limited v. Commissioner of Income Tax, (2009) 1 SCC 8 : AIR 2009 SC 1349.
66. Umaji Keshao Meshran v. Radhikabai, AIR 1986 SC 1272 : 1986 Supp SCC 401; Lokmat Newspapers Pvt. Ltd. v. Shankar Pd., AIR 1999 SC 2423 : (1999) 6 SCC 275.

which remedies under the general law are available. Ordinary remedies are not sought to be replaced by Art. 226.

The principle has been stated by the Supreme Court as follows:[67]

> "It is well settled that when an alternative and equally efficacious remedy is open to a litigant, he should be required to pursue that remedy and not invoke the special jurisdiction of the High Court to issue a prerogative writ. It is true that the existence of another remedy does not affect the jurisdiction of the Court to issue a writ; but the existence of an adequate legal remedy is a thing to be taken into consideration in the matter of granting writs...."

Article 226 is not meant to short-circuit or circumvent statutory procedures.[68] In State of West Bengal v. North Adjai Coal Co.,[69] the Supreme Court has held that normally before a writ petition under Art. 226 is entertained, the High Court would insist that the party aggrieved by the order of a quasi-judicial tribunal should have recourse to the statutory authorities which have power to give relief.[70]

Thus, to question the election to an office or a body, the statutory procedure by way of election petition, and not Art. 226, ought to be resorted to.[71] The Supreme Court has stated recently that once an election is over the aggrieved candidate ought to pursue his remedy in accordance with the relevant statutory provisions and the Court will not ordinarily interfere with the elections under Art. 226. The Court will not ordinarily interfere where there is an appropriate or equally efficacious remedy available, particularly in relation to election disputes.[72]

When a right or liability is created by a statute, which itself prescribes the remedy or procedure for enforcing the right or liability, resort must be had to that particular statutory remedy and not the discretionary remedy under Article 226 of the Constitution.[73]

The Motor Vehicles Act contains a complete code for regulating issue of permits, and a person aggrieved by the refusal of a permit should take recourse to the remedies provided under the Act and not to a writ petition.[74]

---

67. Union of India v. T.R. Varma, AIR 1957 SC 882 : 1958 SCR 499.

68. Titaghur Paper Mills Co. Ltd. v. State of Orissa, AIR 1983 SC 603 : (1983) 2 SCC 33; Asstt. Collector of Central Excise, Chandan Nagar, West Bengal v. Dunlop India Ltd., AIR 1985 SC 330 : (1985) 1 SCC 260; Swetambar Stahanakwasi Jain Samiti v. The Alleged Committee of Management Sri R.J.I. College, Agra, (1996) 3 JT (SC) 21 : (1996) 3 SCC 11; APDDC Staff & Workers Union v. Govt. of AP, AIR 2000 AP 70.

69. (1971) 1 SCC 309, 310 : (1971) 27 SCC 268.
Also see, Sri Ramdas Motor Transport Ltd. v. Tadi Adhinarayana Reddy, AIR 1997 SC 2189 : (1997) 5 SCC 446.

70. Also see, U.P. Jal Nigam v. Nareshwar Sahai Mathur, (1995) I SCC 21 : 1995 SCC (194) 209; See also Radha Raman Samanta v. Bank of India, (2004) 1 SCC 605 : (2003) 10 SCALE 1094, for the stage when the issue to be raised and decided.

71. Prafulla Chandra v. Oil India Ltd., AIR 1971 Ass. 9; Bar Council of Delhi v. Surjeet Singh, AIR 1980 SC 1612 : (1980) 4 SCC 211; Ravjibhai Bhikabhai v. Chief Officer, Bilimora Nagar Palika, AIR 1982 Guj 163.
But see, D.L. Suresh v. Institute of Chartered Accountants, AIR 1983 Knt. 43, where the High Court interfered because the nomination paper was unduly rejected and the election petition could be filed only after the election. When an election petition is not available to cover a specific question arising out of a municipal election, a writ petition would be maintainable: Navuba Gokalji v. Returning Officer, AIR 1982 Guj 281.

72. Umesh Shivappa Ambi v. Angadi Shekara Basappa, AIR 1999 SC 1566 : (1998) 4 SCC 529.

73. Seth Chand Ratan v. Pandit Durga Prasad, (2003) 5 SCC 399 : AIR 2003 SC 2736.

74. G. Veerappa Pillai v. Raman and Raman Ltd., AIR 1952 SC 192 : 1952 SCR 583.

For adjudication of labour disputes, recourse should be had to the machinery provided under the Industrial Disputes Act.[75] An income-tax assessee should take recourse to the machinery provided by the Income-tax Act in case he feels aggrieved by an action of the income-tax authorities.[76]

In relation to appointment of non-hereditary trustees from the Vysya community of Marwadies of Adilabad, appropriate remedy lies under S. 92. CPC or under provisions of the Hindu Religious Institutions and Endowments Act, 1987 and not under Art. 226.[77]

The petitioner was assessed to property tax by the Delhi Municipal Corporation. The petitioner challenged it as totally arbitrary and unwarranted through a writ petition under Art. 226. The High Court rejected the writ petition on the ground that the Delhi Municipal Corporation Act is "a complete code in itself. It provides for an appeal against the assessment and levy of house tax to the district judge. The Act, thus, provides for a machinery for redressal of grievances of a person who feels aggrieved on account of levy or assessment of any tax under this Act."[78]

When there is an arbitration clause in a contract the courts will not permit recourse to any other remedy without invoking the remedy by way of arbitration, unless both the parties agree to another mode of dispute resolution.[79]

When no action is taken by the police on the information given to it, the complainant can have recourse to S. 190 r/w S. 200 Cr. P.C. to lay the complaint before the Magistrate concerned. Without availing that remedy, the complainant could not have approached the High Court by filing a writ application.[80] Where prosecution proceedings under S. 276 of the Income Tax Act were challenged on the ground that (i) there was no concealment of income and the allegation of tax evasion was based on no evidence, and (ii) the delay in filing returns happened in unavoidable circumstances and without any guilty mind it was held that the absence of culpable mental state could be pleaded in defence at the criminal trial and the High Court rightly did not deal with those aspects.[81]

Where a large number of employees of PSU transferred to a private organization in a terms of a bipartite agreement between the PSU and the private organization, writ petition challenging such transfer on the ground that in the absence of specific consent of the employees, such transfer was arbitrary and unreasonable, it was held that since the claim of the writ petitioner employees related to interpretation of the agreement and appointment letters and no disputed facts were involved and the issue related to employment of hundreds of employees and also because alternative remedy is a rule of discretion and not a rule of law,

---

75. Basant Kumar v. Eagle Rolling Mills, AIR 1964 SC 1260 : (1964) 6 SCR 913; Prafulla Chandra v. Oil India, AIR 1971 Ass 9; See also U.P. State Bridge Corpn. Ltd. v. U.P. Rajya Setu Nigam S. Karamchari Sangh, (2004) 4 SCC 268, industrial dispute normally before the Tribunal.

76. Champalal Binani v. CIT, AIR 1970 SC 645 : (1971) 3 SCC 20.

77. Rajasthani Pragathi Samaj v. Ramesh Kumar Sharma, (2003) 11 SCC 680 : AIR 2004 SC 105.

78. India Trade Promotion Organisation v. Deputy Assessor & Collector, MCD, AIR 1997 Del. 74.

79. ABL International Ltd. v. Export Credit Guarantee Corpn. of India Ltd., (2004) 3 SCC 553 : (2003) 10 JT 300.

80. Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768 : AIR 2004 SC 4753.

81. Prakash Nath Khanna v. CIT, (2004) 9 SCC 686 : AIR 2004 SC 4552.

remedy under industrial law was not a bar to maintainability of such writ petition[1]

The Supreme Court has observed in Thansingh[2] that though Art. 226 is couched in wide terms, the exercise of the jurisdiction is discretionary and is subject to several self-imposed restrictions, one of these being that ordinarily the writ jurisdiction is not to be resorted to if the petitioner can obtain an alternative remedy under the statute. "Ordinarily the Court will not entertain a petition for a writ under Art. 226, where the petitioner has an alternative remedy, which without being unduly onerous, provides an equally efficacious remedy."

Proceedings under Art. 226 are not a substitute for statutory appeal.[3] But an appeal to the Central Government from an order passed by the Reserve Bank of India would be an appeal from Caesar to Caesar since the Reserve Bank would hardly act without the concurrence of the Central Government.[4]

In the instant case, the petitioner challenged through a writ petition the decision made by the Commissioner of Sales Tax. Under the relevant law, a reference of questions of law could be made by the Commissioner to the High Court. The petitioner did not resort to this remedy but moved the writ jurisdiction of the High Court. The Supreme Court rejected the writ petition saying "the High Court normally will not permit by entertaining a petition under Art. 226 of the Constitution the machinery created under the statute to be bypassed, and will leave the party applying to it to seek resort to the machinery so set up".[5]

The Government passed an order compulsorily retiring the writ petitioner. He filed a writ petition to challenge the order, but the writ petition was dismissed by the High Court on the ground that there was an alternative remedy available to him before the U.P. Service Tribunal which was the highest forum created by law to give full, complete and expeditious relief to public servants in service matters. The petitioner could not invoke the extraordinary jurisdiction under Art. 226 for redressal of his grievances, by-passing the special forum created specifically by law for redressal of such grievances efficaciously and adequately.[6]

The Supreme Court has laid down the proposition that when a statutory forum or tribunal is specially created by a statute for redressal of specified grievances of persons on certain matters, the High Court should not normally permit such persons to ventilate their specified grievances before it by entertaining petitions under Art. 226 of the Constitution.[7]

Although the High Courts do apply the rule of "exhaustion of the statutory remedy" before issuing a writ under Art. 226, the rule is not rigid but somewhat flexible and it is primarily a matter of the discretion of the writ Court.[8] The Su-

---

1. Balco Captive Power Plant Mazdoor Sangh v. NTPC, (2007) 14 SCC 234 : AIR 2008 SC 336.
2. Thansingh v. Supdt. of Taxes, AIR 1964 SC 1419 : (1964) 6 SCR 654.
3. Transmission Corpn. of A.P. v. Ch. Prabhakar, (2004) 5 SCC 551 : AIR 2004 SC 3368.
4. Reserve Bank of India v. M. Hanumaiah, (2008) 1 SCC 770, 778 : AIR 2008 SC 994.
5. All India Lawyers Forum for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, AIR 2001 Del. 380.
6. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Labh Chand, AIR 1994 SC 754, 759 : (1993) 2 SCC 495.
Also see, Thansingh, supra, footnote 2.
7. Secretary, Minor Irrigation and Rural Engineering Services v. Sahngoo Ram Arya, (2002) 5 SCC 521.
8. A.V. Venkateswaran, Collector of Customs, Bombay v. Ramchand Sobhraj Wadhwani, AIR 1961 SC 1506 : (1962) 1 SCR 753.

preme Court has characterised the rule of "exhaustion of the remedies" as "a rule of policy, convenience and discretion rather than a rule of law."[9]

A writ petition is maintainable when the lis involves a public law character and when the forum chosen by the parties would not be in a position to grant appropriate relief. Question as to when discretionary jurisdiction is to be exercised or refused has to be determined having regard to the facts and circumstances of each case. No hard and fast rule can be laid down in this regard.[10]

The contention that in view of the provision in the agreement for cancellation of the agreement without assigning any reasons barred resort to writ jurisdiction under Art. 226 has been repelled as the cancellation was not for violation of any terms of the agreement and the Letter of Intent (LOI) holders and those awaiting issue of LOIs were also equally affected.[11]

The rule of exhaustion of remedies is not however an inflexible rule; it is a rule of policy, convenience and discretion rather than of law. It is a rule of practice rather than that of jurisdiction. Existence of an alternative remedy does not affect High Court's jurisdiction under Art. 226 and so it is not always obligated to relegate the petitioner to the other remedy available to him. The High Court's jurisdiction being discretionary, it will take into consideration the alternative remedy available and then decide whether in the circumstances of the case, it should grant or refuse to grant a remedy under Art. 226.[12]

The Supreme Court has observed in Nooh:[13]

> "If an inferior Court or tribunal of first instance acts wholly without jurisdiction or patently in excess of jurisdiction or manifestly conducts the proceedings before it in a manner which is contrary to the rules of natural justice and all accepted rules of procedure and which offends the superior Court's sense of fair-play the superior Court may, we think, quite properly exercise its power to issue the prerogative writ of certiorari to correct the error of the Court or tribunal of first instance even if an appeal to another inferior Court or tribunal was available..."[14]

Where there is complete lack of jurisdiction of the officer or authority or tribunal to take action or there has been a contravention of fundamental rights or there has been a violation of rules of natural justice or where the Tribunal acted under a provision of law, which is ultra vires, then notwithstanding the existence of an alternative remedy, the High Court can exercise its jurisdiction to grant relief.[15]

A writ under Art. 226 is not denied when, for instance, the alternative remedy is ill-suited, burdensome and onerous, or the petitioner has lost it through no fault of his,[16] or if the tribunal in question acts under an ultra vires law,[17] or without a

---

9. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Mohd. Nooh, AIR 1958 SC 86 : 1958 SCR 595.
10. Sanjana M. Wig. v. Hindustan Petroleum Corpn. Ltd., (2005) 8 SCC 242 : AIR 2005 SC 3454.
11. Onkar Lal Bajaj v. Union of India, (2003) 2 SCC 673 : AIR 2003 SC 2562.
12. Gopal Sen v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1981 Cal 437; See also Indian Airlines Ltd. v. Prabha D. Kanan, (2006) 11 SCC 67 : AIR 2007 SC 548.
13. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Mohd. Nooh, AIR 1958 SC 86 : 1958 SCR 595.
14. Also see, Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, Mumbai, AIR 1999 SC 22 : (1998) 8 SCC 1.
15. See also Seth Chand Ratan v. Pandit Durga Prasad, (2003) 5 SCC 399 : AIR 2003 SC 2736.
16. Venkateswaran v. Wadhwani, AIR 1961 SC 1506 : (1962) 1 SCR 753.
17. E.B. Kendwadih Colliery Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1983 Del 70.

law,[18] or exceeds its jurisdiction,[19] or has not followed the principles of natural justice,[20] or the writ petition seeks enforcement of a Fundamental Right.[21]

When an order has been made completely outside jurisdiction of the authority making it,[22] or in violation of natural justice,[23] the aggrieved party is entitled to invoke the writ jurisdiction of the High Court instead of availing the alternative statutory remedy. Thus, when a taxing authority acts despite the absence of basic jurisdictional facts, the assessee does not have to exhaust the available statutory remedy before seeking a writ and the High Court can stay assessment proceedings at its inception.[24]

The Registrar of Trade Marks suo motu gave a notice to the writ petitioner to show cause as to why the registration of his trade mark be not cancelled. The petitioner filed a writ petition questioning the notice on the ground that the Registrar had no power to issue any such notice. The High Court dismissed the writ petition by the petitioner on the ground that the petitioner had not exhausted the remedy provided by the relevant law, viz. The Trade and Merchandise Marks Act, 1958.

On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the High Court saying that the High Court was not justified in dismissing the writ petition at the initial stage without examining the contention that the show-cause notice issued to the petitioner was wholly without jurisdiction. The Supreme Court quashed the notice issued by the Registrar as he had no power to issue such a notice to the petitioner. The Supreme Court stated that the High Court can entertain a writ petition "in spite of the alternative statutory remedies" "in a case where the authority against whom the writ is filed is shown to have had no jurisdiction or had purported to usurp jurisdiction without any legal foundation".[25]

In tax-assessment cases, where an appeal from the assessing officer can be taken to a higher authority only after depositing the tax assessed, the remedy provided is burdensome, and so the assessee can approach the High Court under Art. 226.[26] The Supreme Court has observed that it is not palatable to 'our jurispru-

---

18. N.M.C.S. & Weaving Mills v. Ahmedabad Municipality, AIR 1967 SC 1801; J.K. Manufacturers v. Sales Tax Officer, AIR 1970 All 362.

19. Kashi Nath v. Collector, Central Excise, AIR 1972 All 16; Bawa Gopal Das Bedi & Sons v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Pat 152.

20. Tata Electric Loco Co. v. Commr., Commercial Taxes, AIR 1967 SC 1401; Babu Ram Prakash Chandra Maheshwari v. Antarim Zila Parishad, AIR 1969 SC 566 : (1969) 1 SCR 518; T.R. Ramiah v. Dy. Commr., AIR 1975 Knt 77; State of Uttar Pradesh v. Indian Hume Pipe Co., AIR 1977 SC 1132 : (1977) 2 SCC 724; V. Vellaswamy v. Inspector General of Police, Tamil Nadu, AIR 1982 SC 82 : (1981) 4 SCC 247.

21. Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, AIR 1999 SC 22 : (1998) 8 SCC 1.

22. Shyam Sunder Azad v. Transport Appellate Tribunal Rajasthan, AIR 1971 Raj 97; Whirlpool Corp., supra, note 11; Kuntesh Gupta v. Management of Hindu Kanya Mahavidyalaya, AIR 1987 SC 2186 : (1987) 4 SCC 525.

23. Orient Paper Mills v. Deputy Collector, AIR 1971 Ori 25; Titaghur Paper Mills Co. Ltd. v. Orissa, AIR 1983 SC 603 : (1983) 2 SCC 433; Smt. Sushila Chand v. State Transport Authority, AIR 1999 Ori 1; Rajan Ramnath Patil v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 2001 Bom. 361.

24. Veeri Chettiar v. Sales Tax Officer, AIR 1971 Mad. 155.

25. Whirpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, Mumbai, AIR 1999 SC 22, at 27 : (1998) 8 SCC 1. Also, Khaitan (India) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 2000 Cal 1.

26. Indian Oil Corporation Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1982 Goa 26.

dence' to turn down the prayer for a writ on the negative plea of 'alternative remedy' since the root principle of law 'married to justice, is ubi jus ibi remedium'.[27]

The existence of an adequate alternative legal remedy is not a bar to the invocation of the High Court's jurisdiction under Art. 226 when relief is sought in case of infringement of a Fundamental Right.[28] The position in this regard is very much similar to that as under Art. 32.[29] When appeal against Tribunal's decision before High Court by U.P. Avas Evam Vikas Parishad was not maintainable under S. 381 of U.P. Nagar Mahapalika Adhiniyam, a writ petition filed under Art. 226 would be maintainable.[30]

Where a party has initiated an alternative remedy but not pursued it, the High Court can call upon the party to elect either the alternative remedy or the writ petition. If the party has withdrawn from the alternative remedy by the time the writ petition was heard, the writ petition should not be rejected if otherwise maintainable, even though the party had not disclosed pendency of the alternative remedy when it filed the writ petition. Therefore, the fact that a suit had already been filed by the appellant was not such a fact the suppression of which could have affected the final disposal of the writ petition on merits.[31]

A writ petition which seeks an interpretation of intricate questions of law, or an interpretation of constitutional provisions, and a petition which raises an issue of jurisdiction is directly maintainable in the High Court.[32] But when the order of Sales Tax Tribunal is challenged in appeal as well as in writ petition simultaneously, the petition has been held to be not maintainable.[33]

(h) LACHES

No period of limitation is prescribed for a High Court to exercise its power under Art. 226. Nevertheless, a writ petition under Art. 226 may be dismissed by a High Court on the ground of petitioner's laches because courts do not like stale claims being agitated and unsettle settled matters. Therefore, writ petitions filed after inordinate delay are usually dismissed.[34] For example, in Sadasivaswamy,[35]

---

27. Shiv Shankar Dal Mills v. State of Haryana, AIR 1980 SC 1037 : (1980) 2 SCC 437. Also see, Hay Lay Poultry v. State of Haryana, AIR 1977 SC 685 : (1976) 4 SCC 87; Anil Kumar Panda v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1997 Cal 128.

28. Himmat Lal v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1954 SC 403 : 1954 SCR 1122.

29. Infra, Ch. XXXIII, for discussion on Art. 32.

30. Kanak v. U.P. Avas Evam Vikas Parishad, (2003) 7 SCC 693 : AIR 2003 SC 3894.

31. S.J.S. Business Enterprises (P) Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2004) 7 SCC 166 : AIR 2004 SC 2421.

32. Modern Syntax [I] Ltd. v. Debts Recovery Tribunal, Jaipur, AIR 2001 Raj 170.

33. State of Punjab v. Punjab Fibres Ltd., (2005) 1 SCC 604 : AIR 2005 SC 437.

34. Durga Pd v. Chief Controller, AIR 1970 SC 769 : (1969) 1 SCC 185; Krishnaswamy v. Union of India, AIR 1973 SC 1168; Amrit Lal v. Collector, C.E.G., AIR 1975 SC 538 : (1975) 4 SCC 714; Gian Singh Mann v. High Court of Punjab & Haryana, AIR 1980 SC 1894 : 1980 Supp SCC 449; Roshan Lal v. International Airport Authority, AIR 1981 SC 597 : 1980 Supp SCC 449; R.S. Makashi v. I.M. Menon, AIR 1982 SC 101; Rattan Chandra Sammanta v. Union of India, AIR 1993 SC 2276; B.S. Bajwa v. State of Punjab, AIR 1999 SC 1510; Municipal Corp. of Greater Bombay v. Industrial Development Investment Co. Ltd., AIR 1997 SC 482; Municipal Council, Ahmednagar v. Shah Hyder Baig, AIR 2000 SC 671 : (2000) 2 SCC 48; See also Printers (Mysore) Ltd. v. M. A. Rasheed, (2004) 4 SCC 460 : (2004) 4 JT 158 delay of 3 years in challenging allotment of land. See also State of U.P. v. Ved Pal Singh, (2003) 9 SCC 212 : (2000) 8 SLT 706.

35. P.S. Sadasivaswamy v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1974 SC 2271.

the writ petition was dismissed because the petitioner, a government servant, slept over the promotions of his juniors over his head for fourteen years. After such a long time, he filed the writ petition challenging these promotions. By the time the petition was filed the allottee had not only taken possession of the land but also made sufficient investment (about Rs. 80 crores in this case) as such the delay defeated the equity which had arisen in favour of the petitioner.[36] But this rule is not applied in a rigid manner. For example, dismissal on the ground of delay when the petition had been admitted and when it has been sufficiently explained has been set aside.[37] Dismissal on the ground of delay when the petition had been admitted and when it has been sufficiently explained has been set aside.[38]

When a person is not vigilant and acquiesces with the situation, and the acquiescence prejudices, or there is a change of position on the part of the party allegedly violating the rights, such person's writ petition cannot be heard after the delay on the ground that same relief should be granted as was granted to persons similarly situated but who were vigilant regarding their rights.[39]

In appropriate cases, a High Court may condone the delay if there is a satisfactory explanation for the same.

As the Supreme Court has emphasized in Dehri Rohtas,[40] the rule that the Court may not enquire into stale claims is not a 'rule of law' but a 'rule of practice' based on sound and proper exercise of discretion. Each case depends on its own facts. "It will all depend on what the breach of the Fundamental Right and the remedy claimed are and how delay arose."

The principle on which the party is denied relief on the ground of laches or delay is that rights may have accrued to others by reason of the delay in filing the petition and the same ought not to be disturbed unless there is reasonable explanation for the delay.[41] The Supreme Court has observed on this point :

> "The real test to determine delay in such cases is that the petitioner should come to the writ Court before a parallel right is treated and that the lapse of time is not attributable to any laches or negligence."

In this case, the district board demanded a cess from the railway company for the period 53 to 67 which was prima facie ultra vires. The railway company filed a suit challenging the demand which was dismissed in 1971 and an appeal against it was dismissed in 1980. The company then filed a writ petition challenging the demand and, thus, the question of laches arose. The Supreme Court condoned the delay in the circumstances of the case saying: "The real test to determine delay in such cases is that the petitioner should come to the writ Court before a parallel right is created and that the lapse of time is not attributable to any laches or negligence".

---

36. Chairman & MD, BPL Ltd. v. S. P. Gururaja, (2003) 8 SCC 567 : AIR 2003 SC 4536. For adverse effect of delay see Delhi Development Authority v. Rajendra Singh, (2009) 8 SCC 582 : (2009) 10 JT 137.

37. Ravindra Nath v. State Bank of India, (2008) 15 SCC 256.

38. Ravindra Nath v. State Bank of India, (2008) 15 SCC 256.

39. U.P. Jal Nigam v. Jaswant Singh, (2006) 11 SCC 464 : AIR 2007 SC 924.

40. Dehri Rohtas Light Rly. Co. Ltd. v. District Board, Bhojpur, AIR 1993 SC 802 : (1992) 2 SCC 598.

41. Ibid.

When the order passed in the proceeding had worked itself out in that nothing further remained to be performed under the order in respect of which review was sought, a Court should not interfere and set the clock back after almost a decade.[42] What is the measure of delay? On this question the judicial pronouncements do not follow a coherent pattern. The Limitation Act, as such, does not apply to writ petitions but it may provide a standard to measure delay in invoking Art. 226. As the Supreme Court has observed in Bhailal Bhai[43]:

> "The provisions of the Limitation Act do not as such apply to the granting of relief under Art. 226. However, the maximum period fixed by the legislature as the time within which the relief by a suit in a civil Court must be brought may ordinarily be taken to be a reasonable standard by which delay in seeking remedy under Art. 226 can be measured."

However, the High Courts are not mechanically bound by the period of limitation fixed in the Limitation Act. One can find cases where petitions filed within the period of limitation have been dismissed,[44] while there are cases where petitions filed after the period of limitation have been entertained by the courts.[45] In this connection, the Supreme Court has recently observed :

> "In exercise of its writ jurisdiction, facts and circumstances of each case are to be kept in mind in ascertaining whether there have been laches on the part of the parties seeking relief in due time or not."[46]

The position has been explained by the Supreme Court in Shri Vallabh Glass Works Ltd. v. Union of India.[47] Art. 226 prescribes no period of limitation. What relief should be granted to a petitioner under Art. 226 where the cause of action arose in the remote past is a matter of sound judicial discretion. A writ petition filed beyond the period of limitation fixed for filing suits without any explanation for delay is unreasonable. But this is not a rigid formula. There may be cases where even a delay of a shorter period may be considered sufficient to refuse relief under Art. 226. There may be cases where there may be circumstances which may persuade the Court to grant relief even though the petition has been filed beyond the prescribed limitation period for a suit. The Court has observed:

> "Each case has to be judged on its own facts and circumstances touching the conduct of parties, the change in situation, the prejudice which is likely to be caused to the opposite party or to the general public etc."

In the instant case, the Supreme Court directed refund of excess excise duty paid by the petitioners within three years prior to the filing of the writ petition.

In case of delay, the petitioner has to give a satisfactory explanation as to why he did not come to the Court earlier. For example, in Haryana State Electricity Board v. State of Punjab,[48] the Court entertained a writ petition in respect of a

---

42. Asha Prasad v. Chandrakant Gopalka, (2003) 12 SCC 347

43. State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bhailal Bhai, AIR 1964 SC 1006 : (1964) 6 SCR 261.
Also, D. Cawasji & Co. v. State of Mysore, AIR 1975 SC 813 : (1975) 1 SCC 636.

44. Kamini Kumar v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1972 SC 2060 : (1972) 2 SCC 420.

45. Sachindra v. N.E.F. Railways, AIR 1973 Gau 108.

46. U.P. Pollution Control Board v. Kanoria Industries Ltd., AIR 2001 SC 787, at 793 : (2001) 2 SCC 549.

47. AIR 1984 SC 971 : (1984) 3 SCC 362; Govt. of A. P. v. Kollutla Obi Reddy, (2005) 6 SCC 493 AIR 2006 SC 642.

48. AIR 1974 SC 1806 : (1974) 3 SCC 91.

long standing service matter because of the circumstances of the case. The real position in this regard has been stated by the Supreme Court as follows: "It is not that there is any period of limitation for the courts to exercise their powers under Art. 226, nor is it that there can never be a case where the courts cannot interfere in a matter after the passage of certain length of time. But it would be a sound and wise exercise of discretion for the courts to refuse to exercise their extraordinary powers under Art. 226 in case of persons who do not approach it expeditiously for relief and who stand by and allow things to happen and then approach the Court to put forward stale claims and try to unsettle settled matters."[49] A person seeking relief against the state under Art. 226 cannot get discretionary relief under Art. 226, unless he is able to fully satisfy the High Court that the facts and circumstances of the case clearly justified the laches or undue delay on his part in approaching the Court for the grant of relief.[50] Unexplained delay would include a case where the illness of the Secretary was not of such a nature so as to prevent the union of workmen from filing the writ petition before the High Court.[51] Further, making of the representations is no excuse for long delay in filing writ petition.[52] As under Art. 32, so also under Art. 226, the Court adopts a case to case approach. The High Court does not bind its discretion by any fixed norm of limitation but decides the matter in the circumstances of each case.[53] Hence a claim by an illiterate widow with meagre resources who had been deprived by the Railways of her gangman husband's arrears of family pension was maintainable despite delay.[54] Explanation has been accepted where the widow of an employee challenged the order of dismissal based on a conviction which was subsequently set aside as the widow could only throw the challenge after setting aside of the conviction.[55]

The Supreme Court has emphasized that the question whether in a given case the delay involved is such that it disentitles a person from relief under Art. 226 is a matter within the discretion of the High Court which is to be exercised "judiciously and reasonably having regard to the surrounding circumstances."[56]

In 1980, the appellant applied for grant of a quarry lease. The same was denied to him in 1981. He filed a writ petition in 1989 challenging the order passed in

---

49. Tilokchand Motichand v. H.B. Munshi, AIR 1970 SC 898 : (1969) 1 SCC 110; P.S. Sadasivaswamy v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1974 SC 2271 : (1975) 1 SCC 152.

50. State of Maharashtra v. Digambar, AIR 1995 SC 1991, 1995 : (1995) 4 SCC 683.

51. Jharkhand Mazdoor Sangh v. Presiding Officer, (2002) 10 SCC 703 : (2001) 1 SLT 251.

52. Yunus (Baboobhai) A. Hamid Padvekar v. State of Maharashtra, (2009) 3 SCC 281 : (2009) 3 JT 487.

53. ALICE JACOB, Laches: Denial of Judicial Relief under Articles 32 and 226, 16 JILI 352 (1974); SEERVAI, The Supreme Court, Article 32 of the Constitution and Limitation, 71 Bom LR (Jl) 35-8 (1969), See also State of Orissa v. Lochan Nayak, (2003) 10 SCC 678 : (2003) 6 SCALE 268; W.B. Govt. Employees (Food & Supplies) Co-op. Housing Society Ltd. v. Sulekha Pal (Dey), (2003) 9 SCC 253 : AIR 2003 SC 2328.
Also see, infra, under Art. 32, Ch. XXXIII.

54. S. K. Mastan Bee v. GM, South Central Rly., (2003) 1 SCC 184 : (2002) 10 JT 50.

55. Basanti Prasad v. Chairman, Bihar School Examination Board, (2009) 6 SCC 791 : (2009) 8 JT 243.

56. Ashok Kumar v. Collector, Raipur, AIR 1980 SC 112 : (1980) 1 SCC 180; Radhey Shyam v. State of Haryana, AIR 1982 P & H 519; Dehri Rohtas Light Rly. Co. Ltd. v. District Board, Bhojpur, AIR 1993 SC 802 : (1992) 2 SCC 598.

1981. The Court rejected the writ petition on the ground of laches as there was no explanation for a delay of eight years in filing the writ petition.[57] The Supreme Court has observed in State of Maharashtra v. Digambar[58] "... Persons seeking relief against the state under Art. 226 of the Constitution, be they citizens or otherwise, cannot get discretionary relief obtainable thereunder unless they fully satisfy the High Court that the facts and circumstances of the case clearly justified the laches or undue delay on their part in approaching the Court for grant of such discretionary relief."[59]

(i) QUESTIONS OF FACT

In a writ petition, theoretically, the High Court has jurisdiction to determine questions both of fact and law. But, usually, the Court is reluctant to go into questions of fact which require oral evidence for their determination. The attitude of the courts is that questions of fact are best determined in an ordinary civil suit after adducing evidence, and not in a writ petition which is in essence supervisory and not appellate jurisdiction.[60]

Ordinarily, therefore, a writ is not issued to determine questions relating to immovable property. The reason is that this may involve determination of questions of fact and such questions are best decided in a civil suit because questions of fact cannot be decided without evidence, both oral or documentary. Whether the commodity sold by the respondents fell in the category of dementhol oil or not is a question of fact which must be left to the statutory authority.[61] It would be manifest and grave error to scan the evidence or to re-appreciate and reappraise the evidence led before an authority and arrive at a finding of fact.[62] Suspicious circumstances relating to disputed title is inappropriate for adjudication under Art. 226.[63]

But in an appropriate case the Court may direct the appointment of a committee to find out whether allotments were made involving political patronage and direct the authority concerned to proceed on the basis of the committee's findings.[64]

---

57. S.A. Rasheed v. Director of Mines & Geology, AIR 1995 SC 1739 : (1995) 4 SCC 539.
58. AIR 1995 SC 1991, 1995 : (1995) 4 SCC 683.
59. On Laches, see : Union of India v. S.S. Kothiyal, (1998) 8 SCC 682; Larsen & Toubro Ltd. v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1998 SC 1608 : (1998) 4 SCC 387; see also National Textile Corpn. Ltd. v. Haribox Swalram, (2004) 9 SCC 786 : AIR 2004 SC 1998.
60. D.L.F. Housing Construction v. Delhi Municipality, AIR 1976 SC 386 : (1976) 3 SCC 160; Union of India v. Bata India Ltd., AIR 1994 SC 921 : 1994 Supp (3) SCC 79; M/s. Padmavathi Constructions v. The A.P. Industrial Infrastructure Corp. Ltd., AIR 1997 AP 1; Brij Bihari Pandey v. State of Bihar, AIR 1997 Pat. 74; Goa v. Leukoplast (India) Ltd., AIR 1997 SC 1875 : (1994) 2 SCC 124; Mahesh Chandra v. Zila Panchayat, Mainpuri, AIR 1997 All. 248; see also Grid Corpn. of Orissa Ltd. v. Timudu Oram, (2005) 6 SCC 156 : AIR 2005 SC 3971.
61. State of U.P.v. Chemtreat Chemicals, (2002) 10 SCC 593. See also Director of Entry Tax v. Sunrise Timber Company, (2008) 15 SCC 287. See also NTPC Ltd. v. Mahesh Dutta, (2009) 8 SCC 339 : (2009) 9 JT 537. Question as to whether possession of land acquired in terms of Section 17(1) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 has been taken or not.
62. Mahesh Chandra Gupta v. U.O.I., (2009) 8 SCC 273 : (2009) 9 JT 199.
63. City and Industrial Development Corpn. v. Dosu Aardeshir Bhiwandiwala, (2009) 1 SCC 168 : AIR 2009 SC 571.
64. Ambika Mandal v. State of Bihar (Now Jharkhand), (2008) 15 SCC 743.

However, the matter is one of Court's discretion and not of its jurisdiction;[65] i.e., when an inquiry into questions of fact arise in a writ petition, it is a question of the High Court's discretion whether or not it will enter into such an inquiry; it is not that the Court does not have jurisdiction to do so.[66] In a given situation the High Court can set up an investigation committee. Thus in a writ petition against public sector banks against denial of amounts under FDRs alleging fraud on the part of depositors and officers of the bank, the bank asserting that the amounts had already been paid by way of loans. In such circumstances, although disputed question of fact were involved and relief in a private litigation might not have been permissible, High Court could, in view of involvement of a public law element concerning a large number of people, rightly treat the writ petition as PIL and invoke S.35A of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949 to direct constitution of a high powered committee to examine the matter in detail. However, the decisions of such a committee would not be necessarily decisive.[67] High Court directed to have evidence recorded on commission or by a subordinate Court.[68]

To decide questions of fact in a writ petition, the Court takes recourse to affidavits and it may even permit cross-examination of a person who has sworn to an affidavit.[69] But this is done very rarely.

The High Court can intervene if it is a mixed question of fact and law.[70] A finding of fact recorded by Financial Commissioner on relevant considerations and based on evidence does not care for interference.[71] But where there were no denials in the written statement that the wires were loose and dropping and that the respondent had asked the appellants to tighten the wires no disputed questions of facts arose.[72]

(j) LEGAL STANDING

A petitioner should have 'legal standing' to file a writ petition.[73] As the Supreme Court has observed, "The requirement of locus standi of a party to a litigation is mandatory; because the legal capacity of the party to any litigation

---

65. Muni Lal v. Prescribed Authority, AIR 1978 SC 28 : (1977) 3 SCC 336; Ajay Kumar v. Chandigarh Adm., Union Territory, AIR 1983 P&H 8.

66. Zeenat v. Prince of Wales Medical College, AIR 1971 Pat. 43; Babubhai Muljibhai Patel v. Nandlal Khodidas Barot, AIR 1974 SC 2105 : (1974) 2 SCC 706; see also G.M. Kisan Sahkari Chini Mills Ltd. v. Satrughan Nishad (2003) 8 SCC 639 : AIR 2003 SC 4531; see also Rourkela Shramik Sangh v. Steel Authority of India Ltd., (2003) 4 SCC 317 : AIR 2003 SC 1060; President, Poornathrayisha Seva Sangham v. K. Thilakan Kavenal, (2005) 2 SCC 689 : AIR 2005 SC 2918; See also New Okhla Industrial Development Authority v. Kendriya Karmachari Sahkari Grih Nirman Samity, (2006) 9 SCC 524 : (2006) 6 JT 604; Petition raising complex question of fact should not be entertained.

67. Indian Bank v. Godhara Nagrik Coop. Credit Society Ltd., (2008) 12 SCC 541 : AIR 2008 SC 2585.

68. B.L. Chakraborty v. State of West Bengal, (2005) 12 SCC 148.

69. Barium Chemicals v. Company Law Board, AIR 1967 SC 295 : 1966 Supp SCR 311; Gunwant Kaur v. Bhatinda Municipality, AIR 1970 SC 802 : (1969) 3 SCR 769; Babubhai v. Nandlal, AIR 1974 SC 2105 : (1974) 2 SCC 706; Jain Plastics & Chemicals Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 2001 Pat. 16.

70. Shama Prashant v. Ganpatrao, AIR 2000 SC 3094 : (2000) 7 SCC 522.

71. Sadhu Ram v. Financial Commr. Haryana, (2005) 10 SCC 226.

72. HSEB v. Ram Nath, (2004) 5 SCC 793.

73. Prasar Bharati Broadcasting Corpn. of India v. Debyajoti Bose, AIR 2000 Cal 43.

whether in private or public action in relation to any specific remedy sought for has to be primarily ascertained at the threshold".[74] Article 226 cannot be invoked on the basis of appeal to sympathy. The applicant must have a legal right.[75]

Where a statute provides for a right, but enforcement thereof is in several stages, unless and until the conditions precedent laid down therein are satisfied, no right can be said to have been vested in the person concerned.[76]

Thus where permission was granted under Section 31(1) of the Himachal Pradesh Town and Country Planning Act, 1977 subject to the conditions that building permission would be obtained from the legal authority concerned before commencement of development work and an application for sanction of the building plan in terms of the Himachal Pradesh Municipal Corporation Act, 1994 was made but subsequently during the pendency of the application the government issued an order temporarily freezing the construction activities and the site was also declared to be a "heritage zone" it was held that the Municipal Corporation was not entitled to sanction the building plans.[77] The Supreme Court considered the concepts of 'ligitimate' or 'settled expectation' and expressed the view that they do not create any vested right (e.g. to obtain sanction of a building plan). Moreover such a settled expectation or 'legitimate expectation" cannot be countenanced against public interest and convenience and more so where the sanction violated the ecology and private interest is justly overridden.[78]

Ordinarily a person can approach the High Court under Art. 226 to enforce his legal right, or when he has sufficient interest in the subject-matter.[79] Until the petitioner shows that his legal rights are adversely affected, or that breach is likely to be committed, he is not entitled to file the petition.[80] This principle has been stated by the Supreme Court as follows in S.P. Gupta v. President of India:[81]

> "The traditional rule in regard to locus standi is that judicial redress is available only to a person who has suffered a legal injury by reason of violation of his legal right or legally protected interest by the impugned action of the state or a public authority or any other person or who is likely to suffer a legal injury by reason of threatened violation of his legal right or legally protected interest by any such action. The basis of entitlement to judicial redress is personal injury to property, body, mind or reputation arising from violation, actual or threatened, of the legal right or legally protected interest of the person seeking such redress."

---

74. Janta Dal v. H.S. Chowdhary, AIR 1993 SC 892 : (1992) 4 SCC 305.
75. State of MP v. Sanjay Kumar Pathak, (2008) 1 SCC 456 : (2007) 12 JT 219.
76. Commissioner of Municipal Corporation Shimla v. Prem Lata Sood, (2007) 11 SCC 40 : (2007) 7 JT 336.
77. Ibid.
78. Commissioner of Municipal Corporation Shimla v. Prem Lata Sood, (2007) 11 SCC 40 : (2007) 7 JT 336.
79. Calcutta Gas v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1962 SC 1044 : 1962 Supp (3) SCR 1; Maganbhai v. Union of India (The Kutch case), AIR 1969 SC 783 : (1970) 3 SCC 400; N.R. & F. Mills v. N.T.G. Bros., AIR 1971 SC 246; Bennett Coleman Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1973 SC 106 : (1972) 2 SCC 788; Town Improvement Trust v. Sahaji Rao, AIR 1978 MP 218; Mohd. Ibrahim Khan v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1980 SC 517. See also State of Uttaranchal v. Alok Sharma, (2009) 7 SCC 647 : (2009) 6 JT 463, aggrieved but not covered by circular—no rights.
80. Charanjit Lal v. Union of India, AIR 1951 SC 41 : 1950 SCR 869.
81. AIR 1982 SC 149 : 1981 Supp SCC 87.

It must be shown that there is a statute which imposes a legal duty and the aggrieved party has a legal right under the statute to enforce its performance.[82] This "right" concept is not an absolute one [e.g. principles of promissory estoppel or legitimate expectations etc.]

However, this rule is not strictly applied in cases of writs of quo warranto and habeas corpus.[83]

Whether a person has sufficient interest or not is for the writ Court to decide.[84] Thus, the chairman of a statutory corporation which is superseded by the government can challenge the government's action.[85] A member of a municipality can challenge a resolution passed by the municipality on the ground that it is ultra vires. A tax-payer can file a writ petition against a municipal council if it misapplies its funds.[86] A resident in a locality may challenge a municipal resolution approving construction of a cinema in the locality.[87] When the Lt. Governor of Delhi superseded the New Delhi Municipal Committee, two members of the committee challenged the order on the ground that natural justice had been denied to the committee before it was superseded, and their contention was upheld.[88] A person in the same trade as another has a right to seek the cancellation of the licence granted to the latter in violation of a statute or the rules concerned.[89]

To maintain a petition for mandamus or certiorari, it is not necessary that petitioner's personal right must be infringed. If he has a genuine grievance arising from an action or inaction of the authority, he may invoke Art. 226. The Supreme Court has ruled that a rice mill-owner has no locus standi to challenge under Art. 226, the setting up of a new rice-mill by another person even if the setting up of a new rice-mill be in contravention of a statutory provision [s. 8(3)(c) of the Rice Milling Industry (Regulation) Act, 1958], the reason being that no right vested in such an applicant is infringed.[90] Similarly, the Court has ruled that the proprietor of a licensed cinema theatre has no locus standi to seek certiorari from the High Court to quash the 'no-objection' certificate granted by the Administration to a trade rival. In the Court's view, grant of 'no-objection' did not deny or deprive the petitioner of any legal right. "He has not been subjected to any legal wrong. He has suffered no legal grievance. He has no legal peg for a justiciable claim to hang on." The Court further observed that to issue certiorari at the petitioner's instance would, on balance be against public policy as "it will eliminate healthy competition in the business which is so essential to raise commercial morality" and it would perpetuate petitioner's monopoly of cinema business."[91]

The Supreme Court has recognized that there are other concepts (judicially evolved) which could confer a standing although no right as such is sought to be

---

82. Union of India v. C. Krishna Reddy, (2003) 12 627 : AIR 2004 SC 1194.
83. See below.
Also, infra, under Art. 21, Ch. XXVI.
84. J.M. Desai v. Roshan Kumar, AIR 1976 SC 578 : (1976) 1 SCC 671.
85. Jwala Prasad v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1973 Raj. 187.
86. Varadarajan v. Salem Municipality, AIR 1973 Mad. 55.
87. K.R. Shenoy v. Udipi Municipality, AIR 1974 SC 2177 : (1974) 2 SCC 506.
88. S.L. Kapoor v. Jagmohan, AIR 1981 SC 136 : (1980) 4 SCC 379.
89. Sai Chalchitra v. Commr., (2005) 3 SCC 683 : (2005) 5 SLT 187 (2).
90. Nagar Rice & Flour Mills v. N.T. Gowda, AIR 1971 SC 246 : (1970) 1 SCC 575.
91. Mithilesh Garg v. Union of India, AIR 1992 SC 443 : (1992) 1 SCC 168.

vindicated. The Court has identified certain areas e.g. promissory estoppel, legitimate expectation which could be invoked where fairness is a criteria for conferring stnding. The law relating to promissory estoppel and its usual analogous principles of acquiescence and waiver as well as the principle of legitimate expectation have been discussed exhaustively by the Supreme Court in Southern Petrochemical.[1] The Court held that the doctrine of promissory estoppel would undoubtedly be applicable where an entrepreneur alters his position pursuant to or in furtherance of the promise made by a State to grant inter alia, exemption from payment of taxes or charges. The policy to exempt can not only be expressed by reason of notifications issued under statutory provisions but also under executive instructions.[2]

The Court has now strengthened the doctrine by raising it to the level of a right and has proceeded to observe that a right is preserved when it is not expressly taken away.[3] In unqualified terms the Court has held that unlike an ordinary estoppel, promissory estoppel gives rise to a cause of action. It creates a right and it also acts on equity.[4] But its application against a constitutional or statutory provision is impermissible in law.[5] The Court rejected the argument that the mere issuance of an exemption notification under a provision in a fiscal statute could not create any promissory estoppel because such an exemption by its very nature is susceptible to being revoked or modified or subjected to other conditions. Such an argument was of no avail where a right has already accrued e.g. in a case where the right to exemption of a tax for a fixed period accrues and the conditions for the exemption have also been fulfilled. In such a situation the withdrawal could not defeat the accrued right.[6]

In Southern Petrochemical[7] the Supreme Court has referred to legitimate expectation as an "emerging doctrine" of an expectation of substantive benefit. The Court has almost equated the efficacy of both the principles i.e. promissory estoppel and legitimate expectation observing that saying that if the "principle of promissory estoppel" would apply, there may not be any reason as to why the doctrine of legitimate expectation would not.

A right to an statutorily conferred cannot be taken away only because a proposal for such taking away was in the offing.[8]

In relation to challenge appointment to public post one who is qualified for the post and is a candidate for the post would have locus standi.[9]

---

1. Southern Petrochemical Industries Co. Ltd. v. Electricity Inspector & Etio, (2007) 5 SCC 447 : AIR 2007 SC 1984.
2. Ibid.
3. Ibid.
4. Ibid
5. Ibid
6. Ibid
7. Southern Petrochemical Industries Co. Ltd. v. Electricity Inspector & Etio, (2007) 5 SCC 447 : AIR 2007 SC 1984.
8. Commissioner of Municipal Corporation Shimla v. Prem Lata Sood, (2007) 11 SCC 40 : (2007) 7 JT 336; referring to T. Vijayalakshmi v. Town Planning Member, (2006) 8 SCC 502 : AIR 2007 SC 25; Howrah Municipal Corpn. v. Ganges Rope Co. Ltd., (2004) 1 SCC 663 : (2003) 10 JT 355; Director of Public Works v. Ho Po Sang, 1961 AC 901 : (1961) 2 All ER 721.
9. B. Srinivasa Reddy v. Karnataka Urban Water Supply & Drainage Board Employees' Assn., (2006) 11 SCC 731 : AIR 2006 SC 3106.

There are number of cases where the Supreme Court has held that unless pleaded, a party will not be permitted to run a case at the hearing. For example, although challenge to the constitutional validity of increased tax rates levied on contract carriage was raised in the writ petition, it suffered from proper pleadings i.e. in that very sketchy. Greater details were required to be furnished before the State could submit quantifiable and measurable data justifying the impugned rate.[10]

(k) PUBLIC INTEREST LITIGATION

Lately, the courts have shown a good deal of flexibility in the matter of legal standing because with the expansion of bureaucratic power, the chances of its misuse have increased.[11] The rule of locus standi has assumed much wider dimensions, in the day to day expanding horizons of socio-economic justice and welfare of the state. So much so that the courts have even sanctioned 'public interest' litigation where a question of public interest may be espoused through a writ petition by some one even though he may not be directly injured or affected by it, or may have any personal interest in the matter.[12] The petitioner comes to the Court to espouse a public cause. The expression "public interest litigation" means a legal action initiated in a Court for enforcement of public interest.

As the Supreme Court observed in an earlier case anticipating the future development: "Where a wrong against community interest is done, 'no locus standi' will not always be a plea to non-suit an interested public body chasing the wrong doer in the Court..... 'Locus standi' has a larger ambit in current legal semantics than the accepted, individualistic jurisprudence of old."[13]

This observation referring to the legal standing of public body is now true of a private body as well. For example, in the Additional Judges case,[14] writ petitions under Art. 226 by lawyers raising certain significant questions concerning High Court Judges were held maintainable because the lawyers practicing in the High Courts have great interest in the independence of the High Courts and quick disposal of cases by them. If by any illegal state action, the independence of the judiciary is impaired, the lawyers would certainly be interested in challenging the constitutionality or legality of such action.

This case can be regarded as the precursor of public interest litigation in India. Enunciating the broad aspect of PIL, BHAGWATI, J., observed that:[15]

> "Whenever there is a public wrong or public injury caused by an act or omission of the State or a public authority which is contrary to the Constitution or the law, any member of the public acting bona fide and having sufficient interest can maintain an action for redressal of such wrong or public injury."

BHAGWATI, J., observed further:[16]

---

10. R.Senthil Babu v. State of T.N., (2009) 2 SCC 309 : (2008) 13 JT 508.
11. Fertilizer Corp. Kamgar Union v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 344 : (1981) 1 SCC 568; Dutta & Associates v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1982 Cal 225; A.U.T. Association v. Chancellor, Allahabad University, AIR 1982 All 343; Geeta Bajaj v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1982 Raj 49.
12. Jitendra Nath v. State of West Bengal Board of Examination, AIR 1983 Cal. 275.
13. Maharaj Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1976 SC 2602 : (1977) 1 SCC 155.
14. S.P. Gupta v. Union of India, AIR 1982 SC 149 : 1981 Supp SCC 87; supra.
15. Ibid., at 190.
16. Ibid., at 194.

> "We would, therefore, hold that any member of the public having sufficient interest can maintain an action for judicial redress for public injury arising from breach of public duty or from violation of some provision of the Constitution or the law and seek enforcement of such public duty and observance of such constitutional or legal provision."

Emphasizing the need for PIL in India, BHAGWATI, J., observed:

> "If public duties are to be enforced and social collective "diffused" rights and interests are to be protected, we have to utilize the initiative and zeal of public minded persons and organizations by allowing them to move the Court and act for a general or group interest, even though, they may not be directly injured in their own rights".

Even in a case where a petitioner moves the Court in his private interest and for redressal of personal grievances, the Court may in furtherance of public interest consider it necessary to enquire into the state of affairs of the subject matter of litigation in the interest of justice reflecting the same approach as in a public interest litigation.[17]

The Supreme Court has observed in M/s. J. Mohapatra & Co. v. Orissa,[18] that to-day "the law with respect to locus standi has considerably advanced" and "in the case of public interest litigation it is not necessary that a petitioner should himself have a personal interest in the matter". The petitioner should not, however, come to the Court for personal gain or private profit or political motive or any oblique consideration.[19] Nevertheless, even though the scope of locus standi has been widened by the Supreme Court in the field of PIL, yet a mere busy body having no interest in the subject-matter cannot invoke the jurisdiction of the courts.[20] The Court should be careful and circumspect and should reject at the outset petitions especially involving service matters which in the guise of PIL are really intended to settle personal scores or to gain cheap popularity.[21] Where third party interest has been created on account of delay, PIL is liable to be dismissed.[22] When a public interest litigation was entertained the individual conduct of the writ petitioners would take a back seat.[23]

Public Interest Litigation relates to the nature of the proceedings and has no inbuilt implications as to the forum competent to deal with such litigation. In practice, however, PIL is, almost invariably, filed in the High Court under Article 226 or the Supreme Court under Article 32. When the complainant invokes the jurisdiction of the High Court or the Supreme Court under Articles 226 and 32 respectively, many of the principles applied by the Courts while reviewing under Article 226 or Article 32 are applied. For example, the principle that questions concerning title to property where there is a factual dispute, the High Court or the

---

17. Ashok Lanka v. Rishi Dixit, (2005) 5 SCC 598 : AIR 2005 SC 2821.
18. AIR 1984 SC 1572, 1574 : (1984) 4 SCC 108.
19. S. K. Kantha v. Qamarulla Islam, (2005) 11 SCC 507, petition filed by a political rival to settle personal scores; Delhi Municipal Workers Union v. Delhi Municipal Corpn., AIR 2001 Del. 68.
20. Rajnit Prasad v. Union of India, (2000) 9 SCC 313 : (2000) 1 SCR 663.
21. Gurpal Singh v. State of Punjab, (2005) 5 SCC 136 : AIR 2005 SC 2755.
22. R&M Trust v. Koramangala Residents Vigilance Group, (2005) 3 SCC 91 : AIR 2005 SC 894.
23. Ashok Lanka v. Rishi Dixit, (2005) 5 SCC 598 : AIR 2005 SC 2821.

Supreme Court will not take upon itself the burden of resolving such dispute; and more so when a civil suit relating to the same dispute and same property was pending.[24]

A few examples of writ petitions filed in the High Courts under Art. 226 as public interest litigation are mentioned below.

A member of the Legislative Assembly and an educationist can challenge the appointment of the Vice-Chancellor in the University on the ground that it has not been made properly. The M.L.A. being interested in public affairs and also being an educationist has interest in the universities and other educational institutions in the State. He therefore feels concerned if the appointment of the Vice-Chancellor has not been made properly. In case of an injury affecting the public, a public man having some interest can maintain an action challenging the action of the government.[25]

A medical practitioner who is interested in maintaining and promoting public health and an association formed for upholding public causes through litigation can maintain writ petitions challenging government decision to sell arrack in polythene containers. The grievance projected by the petitioners if substantiated would show that the government action may result in serious damage to public health. The question whether selling arrack in a polythene sachet is unsafe and a health hazard deserves serious consideration particularly in the light of Art. 47 of the Constitution. The cause sought to be espoused is a public cause and the petitioners are acting bona fide and, therefore, they have sufficient interest in the matter to maintain writ petitions.[26]

Where legal rights of the poor, ignorant, socially and economically disadvantaged persons are sought to be vindicated through a Court action, the High Courts permit public men or concerned voluntary associations to agitate such matters before them under Art. 226. The reason for this development is that it has been realised that if this is not permitted, rights of the poor will ever remain unredressed as such persons are least equipped to themselves bring their grievances before the courts and such a situation is destructive of Rule of Law.

A non-political, non-profit and voluntary organisation consisting of public spirited citizens interested in taking up the causes of ventilating legitimate public problems filed a writ petition to espouse the cause of old pensioners who were individually unable to seek redress through the labyrinth of legal and judicial process which is costly and protracted. The Supreme Court ruled that the body concerned undoubtedly had locus standi to raise the matter before the Court.[27]

Merely because it is a public interest litigation, its width cannot be unlimited. Hence, the Supreme Court held that when the grievance in such litigation is misuse of park, the High Court erred in directing cancellation of the lease of certain areas in the park because of unauthorized constructions made in such areas – particularly in the absence of requisite averments in the petition.[28]

---

24. Santosh Sood v. Gajendra Singh, (2009) 7 SCC 314 : (2009) 8 SCALE 489.
25. Balbir Singh v. F.D. Tapase, AIR 1985 P & H 244.
26. George Mampilly v. State of Kerala, AIR 1985 Ker 24.
27. D.S. Nakara v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 130 : (1983) 1 SCC 305. Also, Akhila Bharatiya Grahak Panchayat v. A.P.S.E. Board, AIR 1983 AP 283.
28. Allahabad Ladies' Club v. Jitendra Nath Singh, (2007) 11 SCC 609 : (2007) 4 SCALE 541.

In a Public Interest Litigation the essential rules of adjudication cannot be ignored. Hence where there was no averment in the petition that the construction made were unauthorized it would not been in order for the High Court to direct cancellation of a lease on the ground of alleged violation of provisions of the U.P. Parks, Playgrounds and Open Spaces (Preservation and Regulation) Act, 1975.[29]

Public interest litigation continues to flourish in India. A large number of writ petitions are filed in the High Courts under this category. More will be said on public interest litigation later in the book.[30]

(l) TO WHOM CAN A WRIT BE ISSUED?

The law on the point remains in a flux at the present moment and lately the courts have widened the writ jurisdiction by bringing more and more bodies under it.

Ordinarily a writ of mandamus or certiorari is issued to a government instrumentality whether statutory[31] or not.[32] Accordingly, writs have been issued to such statutory bodies as the International Airport Authority,[33] or the Warehousing Corporation,[34] or to non-statutory government companies registered under the Companies Act,[35] or to a registered society sponsored, financed and supervised by the government.[36]

The Supreme Court has thrown some light in this grey area. The Court has pointed out the difficulty in drawing a line between public functions and private functions when they are being discharged by a purely private authority. A body is performing a public function when it seeks to achieve some collective benefit for the public or a section of the public and is accepted by the public or that section of the public as having authority to do so. Bodies therefore exercise public functions when they intervene or participate in social or economic affairs in the public interest. There cannot be any general definition of public authority or public action. The facts of each case decide the point.[37]

The Patna High Court has ruled that the Bihar Industrial and Technical Consultancy Organisation Ltd. (BITCO) is an instrumentality of the State as becomes clear from its Articles of Association and its functions. BITCO is treated as a unit of the State Government under the Rules of Executive Business. BITCO has been set up to promote industrial growth in the State; industrial growth being a matter

---

29. Allahabad Ladies' Club v. Jitendra Nath Singh, (2007) 11 SCC 609 : (2007) 4 SCALE 541.

30. For further discussion on PIL, see, infra, Ch. XXXIII, Sec. B.
For a much more elaborate discussion on PIL, see, JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, II.

31. Rajasthan State Electricity Board v. Mohan Lal, AIR 1967 SC 1857 : (1967) 3 SCR 377.

32. Sukhdev v. Bhagat Ram, AIR 1975 SC 1331 : (1975) 1 SCC 421; Mathew v. Union of India, AIR 1974 Ker 4; Samir Kumar v. State of Bihar, AIR 1982 Pat 66; U.P. Singh v. Board of Governors, MACT, AIR 1982 MP 59.

33. Ramana Dayaram Shetty v. International Airport Authority, AIR 1979 SC 1628 : (1979) 3 SCC 489.

34. U.P. Warehousing Corp. v. Vijay Narain, AIR 1980 SC 840. Also see, Premji Bhai Parmar v. Delhi Development Authority, AIR 1980 SC 738 : (1980) 2 SCC 129.

35. Som Prakash v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 212 : (1981) 1 SCC 449; B. Satyanarayana v. State of Andhra Pradesh, AIR 1981 AP 121.

36. Ajay Hasia v. Khalid Majid, AIR 1981 SC 487 : (1981) 1 SCC 722.

37. Binny Ltd. v. V. Sadasivan, (2005) 6 SCC 657 : AIR 2005 SC 3202.

of governmental concern, any body set up to promote this growth also discharges governmental function. All share holding in BITCO is held by various statutory bodies which are all instrumentalities of the government. BITCO is closely controlled by IDBI which is another governmental instrumentality.

The Council of Indian School Certificate Examination is a society registered under the Societies Registration Act. It exercises a public function of imparting education. The council is deeply impregnated with governmental character not only structurally but also functionally. The council has been held to be an instrumentality of the State.[38]

The U.P. State Co-operative Land Development Bank Ltd. functioning as a co-operative society under the Societies Act, but constituted under the Bank Act, has been held to be an 'instrumentality' of the State and hence an 'authority' under Art. 12. Therefore, writ petitions filed by its dismissed employees to challenge the orders of their dismissal were held to be maintainable.[39]

Recently, a non-statutory body, such as a government company, under the control of the State Government has been held to be an 'authority' under Art. 12.[40]

A government instrumentality is included in the term 'authority' which is regarded as a 'state' under Art. 12. All bodies falling under the coverage of Art. 12 are subject to Fundamental Rights as stated in the Constitution. This topic has been discussed later in detail.[41]

Besides Art. 12, the word 'authority' also occurs in Art. 226. There has been a question for the consideration of the courts whether the term 'authority' in Art. 226 ought to be interpreted in the same narrow sense as in Art. 12, or more broadly than that.[42] After much confusion of thought and several conflicting judicial dicta, the position as it has emerged now seems to be that Art. 12 is relevant only for purposes of Art. 32 under which the Supreme Court can issue a writ only for purposes of enforcement of Fundamental Rights.

Article 226 is broader in scope than Art. 32 as under Art. 226, a High Court may issue a writ not only for enforcement of fundamental rights but "for any other purpose" as well. So it is argued that the term "authority" in Art. 226 should be given a broader and a more liberal interpretation than the term "other authority" in Art. 12. There may be a body which may not fall within the compass of Art. 12 (as it may not be regarded as an 'instrumentality' of the state) but, nevertheless, it may still be regarded as an 'authority' under Art. 226 and may thus be subject to the writ jurisdiction of the High Court.

The Sanskrit Council constituted under a government resolution to hold examinations and publish results has been held to be subject to Mandamus because it performs a public, though not a statutory, duty.[43] A commission of enquiry ap-

---

38. Master Vibhu Kapoor v. Council of Indian School Certificate Examination, AIR 1985 Del. 142.
39. U.P. State Coop. Land Development Ltd. v. Chandra Bhan Dubey, AIR 1999 SC 753 : (1999) 1 SCC 741.
40. The Mysore Paper Mills Ltd. v. The Mysore Paper Mills Officers Association, AIR 2002 SC 609 : (2002) 2 SCC 167.
41. See, infra, Ch. XX, Sec. D.
42. For discussion on Art. 12, see, infra, Ch. XX, Sec. D.
43. G. Misra v. Orissa Association of Sanskrit Language & Culture, AIR 1971 Ori 212.

pointed under an administrative order, and not under a statutory provision, to enquire into certain allegations against an ex-Chief Minister has been held subject to certiorari.[44] Certiorari or mandamus may issue even to a private person or a body regarded as a government instrumentality even when it is incorporated or registered under a statute, e.g., a co-operative society or a limited company.[45] A writ petition against a private unaided educational institution for refund of money paid against a payment seat for admission is maintainable.[46]

Formerly, the High Courts refused to issue certiorari or mandamus to a body not regarded as government instrumentality (i.e., which fell outside Art. 12),[47] but now judicial perspective has widened. There have been cases where mandamus or certiorari has been issued under Art. 226 to such a body as well when it is a public utility service, or to enforce a statutory or public duty, or when it is discharging a function under some statutory provision. Thus, a writ can be issued to a company, or a co-operative society, or even a private person when it discharges functions under a statute. International Crops Research Institute is neither a State nor an authority as it was neither set up by a statute nor were its activities statutorily controlled nor did it perform any public or statutory duty or a public function.[48]

For purposes of Art. 226, it is not necessary that the body in question should have the character of a government instrumentality. In this sense, the scope of Art. 226 is much broader than Art. 32 where a writ can go only to a government instrumentality. For example, in Praga Tools,[49] the Supreme Court explained that the words "any person or authority" in Art. 226 are not to be confined only to statutory authorities and instrumentalities of the state. "They may cover any other person or body performing public duty. The form of the body concerned is not very much relevant. What is relevant is the nature of the duty imposed on the body. The duty must be judged in the light of positive obligation owned by the person or authority to the affected party. No matter by what means the duty is imposed, if a positive obligation exists mandamus cannot be denied." The Court also maintained that mandamus cannot be denied on the ground that the duty to be enforced is not imposed by a statute. Only when such a person or body performed a public function or discharged a public duty that Art. 226 could be invoked and since a sugar mill was engaged in the manufacture and sale of sugar, which did not involve any public function, the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art. 226 could not be invoked.[50] And merely because there are regulatory provisions, to ensure that business or commercial activity carried on by private bodies remains within a discipline, do not confer any status upon the company nor any obligation upon it which may be enforced through issue of a writ under

---

44. Harekrishna Mahtab v. Chief Minister, Orissa, AIR 1971 Ori 175.
45. General Manager, United India Fire & General Ins. Co. v. Nathan, (1981) Lab IC 1076; see also Baba Kamala Nehru Engg. College v. Sanjay Kumar, (2002) 10 SCC 487.
46. Ramdeo Baba Kamala Nehru Engg. College v. Sanjay Kumar, (2002) 10 SCC 487.
47. Chakradhar Patel v. Sama Singha Service Co-op. Soc. Ltd., AIR 1982 Ori 38; Pritam Singh v. State, AIR 1982 P & H 228.
48. G. Bassi Reddy v. International Crops Research Institute, (2003) 4 SCC 225 : AIR 2003 SC 1764.
49. Praga Tools Corp. v. C.V. Imanual, AIR 1969 SC 1306 : (1969) 1 SCC 585; District Co-operative Bank v. Dy. Reg., Coop. Societies, AIR 1973 All 348.
50. GM, Kisan Sahkari Chini Mills Ltd. v. Satrughan Nishad, (2003) 8 SCC 639 : AIR 2003 SC 4531.

Art. 226. Writ will not be issued where there is any non-compliance with or violation of any statutory provision by a private body.[51]

In Mewa Singh,[52] the Shrimoni Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee, a statutory body, has been held to be an "authority" for purposes of Art. 226. The body in question is a creation of the statute. The Supreme Court has insisted that the committee should function within the four corners of the law constituting it and the rules framed by it under statutory powers. Any violation of the provisions of the Act and the Rules made by it will certainly make it amenable to the writ jurisdiction of the High Court under Art. 226 of the Constitution.

This judicial trend to issue writs against private parties to enforce public duties imposed on them is gaining momentum. In Sarvaraya Sugars Ltd. v. A.P. Civil Supplies Corpn. Ltd.,[53] for example, the Andhra Pradesh High Court issued a writ to enforce a public duty on sugar manufacturers. In Rohtas Industries v. Its Union,[54] certiorari was issued against the award of an arbitrator appointed under s. 10A of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, as such an arbitrator can legitimately be regarded as part of the methodology of "the sovereign's dispensation of justice". Although the concerned parties name the arbitrator and voluntarily submit the industrial dispute to him, yet the arbitrator has the power not only to bind the immediate parties to the reference, but even third parties and arbitrator's powers flow from s. 10A.

In this connection, T. Gattaiah v. Commissioner of Labour is worth mentioning.[55] Some workmen were retrenched by a company. The workmen filed a writ petition against the company claiming that their retrenchment was against mandatory provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act. The Andhra High Court issued mandamus against the company to compel it to act according to law and to enforce a public duty imposed on the company by law not to retrench the workers except in accordance with the statutory conditions. The Court ruled that mandamus can be issued to enforce a statutory duty cast on a private body so long as it is a public duty. It is the nature of the duty and not the nature of the body which is important. The Andhra High Court was of the view that even certiorari can be issued to a private body, but the Punjab and Haryana High Court does not subscribe to this view.[56]

The significant point to note is (which High Courts ignore at times) that to issue a writ under Art. 32, it is necessary that the body in question be characterised as an instrumentality of the government,[57] but it is not necessary for purposes of issuing a writ under Art. 226.

Under Art. 226, a writ can be issued for—(i) enforcement of Fundamental Rights; and (ii) for any other purpose. Whereas, Fundamental Rights are enforceable only against the bodies mentioned in Art. 12,[58] for purposes of 'any other

---

51. Federal Bank Ltd. v. Sagar Thomas, (2003) 10 SCC 733 : AIR 2003 SC 4325.
52. Mewa Singh v. Shrimoni Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee, AIR 1999 SC 688 : (1999) 2 SCC 60.
53. AIR 1981 AP 402, 406.
54. AIR 1976 SC 425. Also, Gujarat Steel Tubes v. Mazdoor Sabha, AIR 1980 SC 1896 : (1980) 2 SCC 593.
55. (1981) Lab IC 942 : (1976) 2 SCC 82.
56. Pritam Singh, supra, footnote 47.
57. For discussion on this point, see, infra, Ch. XX, Sec. D.
58. Ibid.

purpose', a writ may be issued to any body which has a public character even though it does not fall under Art. 12. Therefore, a High Court may issue mandamus or certiorari to a body which is imbued with some public character even though it may not be regarded as a "government instrumentality"if it is not a question of enforcement of a Fundamental Right.

The High Courts often miss this difference between Arts. 32 and 226. For instance, the Punjab and Haryana High Court refused to issue mandamus to the Indian Institute of Bankers saying that it is not an instrumentality of the government.[59] The Court failed to appreciate the point that for purposes of Art. 226, a body can still be regarded as an 'authority' even though it may not be an instrumentality of the government. The institute is registered as a company; it holds examinations for bank employees and imparts in-service training to bank employees through correspondence course. A candidate was debarred from appearing at an examination conducted by the Institute for three years for using unfair means at the examination. Obviously the Institute is discharging a public function and hence it is imbued with public character and so it ought to have been subject to mandamus under Art. 226

Ordinarily mandamus has not been issued to a privately-managed college affiliated to a University and receiving grants in aid to quash an order of dismissal of a member of the staff, primarily on the ground that the relationship between the two is contractual and a writ is not issued to enforce a contract.[60] But, this judicial approach is not correct because the relationship between an aided college and its teachers is not purely contractual; it is also a matter of status which is regulated by a number of rules made by the affiliating university.

Writs are issued now against educational institutions in matters of disciplinary proceeding against the students. For example, in Harijander Singh v. Kakatiya Medical College,[61] the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that certiorari can go to a private affiliated college and an order cancelling admission of a student in breach of natural justice was quashed. But the same High Court differed from the Harijander view later in Shakuntala,[62] mainly because of the Supreme Court's decision in Vaish College. In Kumkum,[63] the Delhi High Court issued mandamus against the Principal of such a private college on the petition of a student in the matter of exercise of his powers under the University Ordinances. The High Court ruled that the Principal holds a public office, has statutory duties to perform and acts in a public capacity. It is not necessary for purposes of mandamus that the office be the creature of a statute. Public office is one where the powers and duties pertaining to the office relate to a large section of the public.

In view of the author, the Harijander approach had much to commend itself. After all, these institutions use public funds, are subject to the discipline of the affiliating University, are bound by the rules and regulations of the University and so they cannot thus be regarded as purely private bodies with no public char-

59. Ram Parshad v. Indian Institute of Bankers, AIR 1992 P&H 2-8.
60. Vaish Degree College v. Lakshmi Narain, AIR 1976 SC 888 : (1976) 2 SCC 58; Arya Vidya Sabha, Kashi v. K.K. Srivastava, AIR 1976 SC 1073 : (1976) 3 SCC 83; Ref. Jwala Devi Vidyalaya, AIR 1981 SC 122 : (1979) 4 SCC 160.
61. AIR 1975 AP 35.
62. Shakuntala v. Director of Public Instruction, AIR 1977 AP 381.
63. Kumkum v. Principal, Jesus & Mary College, AIR 1976 Del 35.

acter. They must therefore be subjected to the writ jurisdiction for certain purposes.[64]

The matter has now been placed beyond any shadow of doubt by the Supreme Court pronouncement in the Anandi Mukta case.[65] The Supreme Court has ruled that the words "any person or authority" used in Art. 226 would cover "any other person or body performing public duty". The form of the body concerned is not very much relevant. What is relevant is the nature of the duty imposed on the body.

In the instant case, a trust registered under the Trusts Act was running a school aided by the government. The teachers filed a writ petition claiming termination benefits from the trust when it closed down the school. The Court held the trust subject to the High Court's writ jurisdiction under Art. 226 as it was discharging a public function by way of imparting education to students; it was subject to rules and regulations of the affiliating university; its activities were closely supervised by the university authorities; employment in such an institution "is not devoid of any public character".

The Supreme Court has very clearly ruled in the instant case that:—

> "The term "authority" used in Article 226 in the context must receive a liberal meaning unlike the term in Article 12. Article 12 is relevant only for the purposes of enforcement of Fundamental Rights under Art. 32. Article 226 confers powers on the High Courts to issue writs for enforcement of Fundamental Rights as well as non-fundamental rights."

Undoubtedly, the exposition of the law in Anandi Mukta has widened the scope of Art. 226 as well as that of mandamus.[66]

It is thus established now that the High Courts have power to issue writs not only to statutory authorities and instrumentalities of the state but also to "any other person or body performing public duty."[67] Thus, medical colleges which are affiliated to the Universities and are receiving aid from state funds have been held subject to Art. 226.[68] These colleges are supplementing the effort of the state.

Recently, the Supreme Court has ruled that a writ petition is maintainable even against an unaided private educational institution to enforce government instructions against it.[69] The Court has ruled that an educational institution performs a public function, viz. imparting education. When an element of public interest is

---

64. For comments on Harijander, see, JAIN, THE EVOLVING INDIAN ADM. LAW, 263-6, (1983).

65. Shri Anadi Mukta Sadguru Shree Muktajee Vandajiswami Surana Jayanti Mahatsav Smarak Trust v. Rudani, AIR 1989 SC 1607 : (1989) 2 SCC 691.
Also see, U.P. State Co-operative Land Development Bank Ltd. v. Chandra Bhan Dubey, AIR 1999 SC 753 : (1999) 1 SCC 741.

66. For discussion on mandamus, see, Sec. E, infra.

67. Sri Konaseema Coop. Central Bank Ltd. v. N. Seetharama Raju, AIR 1990 AP 171.

68. Ravneet Kaur v. Christian Medical College, Ludhiana, AIR 1998 P&H 1. Also see, Kobad Jehangir Bharda v. Farokh Sidhwa, AIR 1991 Bom. 16; TTC Yuvaraj v. Principal, Dr. B.R. Ambedkar Medical College, AIR 1997 Kant. 261.

69. K. Krishnamacharyulu v. Sri Venkateswara Hindu College of Engineering, AIR 1998 SC 295 : (1997) 3 SCC 571 But see State Bank of India v. K. C. Tharakan, (2005) 8 SCC 428 : (2005) 12 JT 358.

created and the institution is catering to the element, the teacher, the arm of the institution, is also entitled to avail of the remedy provided by Art. 226. Under the government instructions, the teachers in the private institutions were entitled to the same pay as the government servants and it was held that the teachers could take recourse to a writ petition under Art. 226 to enforce the same because of Art. 39(d) of the Constitution which is a directive principle.[70]

This pronouncement expands the dimensions of judicial review a great deal. In the first place, even an unaided private educational institution is held subject to the writ jurisdiction under Art. 226, for certain purposes, because it performs a public function, viz. that of imparting education. Secondly, the Court has enforced in this case non-statutory administrative instructions which do not have any legal effect per se.[71]

A stock exchange has been held subject to Art. 226. A stock exchange is a public limited company but is recognised by the Securities and Exchange Board of India (SEBI) as a stock exchange and it has to comply with the conditions laid down in the Securities Contracts (Regulation) Act, 1956. The exchange is subject to the writ jurisdiction under Art. 226 if it fails to perform the public duty by going beyond the mandate of the rules and bye-laws made under the Act.[72]

As regards certiorari, there is no principle that it cannot go to a non-statutory body. Any adjudicatory body which affects the rights of the people may be held subject to certiorari. In a very famous English case,[73] the Court of Appeal has practically said that bodies which exercise public functions may be susceptible to judicial review whatever the source of power. The reason is that so long as there is a possibility, however remote, of the body abusing its powers, it would be wrong for the courts to abdicate their responsibility. In the instant case, the question was whether certiorari could be issued to the Panel on Take-overs and Mergers—a non statutory body. The Panel oversees and regulates an important part of U.K. Financial market. The panel has no legal authority behind it and has no statutory, prerogative or common-law powers. Yet the Panel has been held to be subject to certiorari because it performs public law functions with public law consequences. Its powers being great, there is need to control lest it should act in an unfair manner in any case. The significance of the case lies in the acceptance of the proposition that bodies which exercise public functions may be susceptible to judicial review, whatever the source of their powers. This case widely enhances the range of bodies to whom certiorari can be issued.

Certiorari has been issued to a large number of sundry bodies exercising some type of adjudicatory function, such as, industrial tribunals, disciplinary authorities, Court-martial held under the Army Act, 1950.[74]

---

70. For discussion on "Directive Principles", see, infra, Ch. XXXIV.

71. For a detailed discussion on "Directions" see, M.P. Jain, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, Ch. VIII (1996); CASES & MATERIALS ON INDIAN ADM. LAW, Ch. VII (1994).

72. Sijal Rikeen Dalal v. Stock Exchange, Bombay, AIR 1991 Bom 30; Rakesh Gupta v. Hyderabad Stock Exchange Ltd., AIR 1996 AP 413.

73. R. v. Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, ex parte Datafin and Prudential Bache Securities Inc., [1987] 1 All ER 564.

74. Union of India v. A. Hussain, AIR 1998 SC 577 : (1998) 1 SCC 537.
For discussion on Certiorari, see, Sec. E, infra.

(m) APPLICABILITY OF CIVIL PROCEDURE CODE

A proceeding under Art. 226 is not a civil suit as envisaged in the Code of Civil Procedure. The Code itself provides that it will not apply to proceedings under Art. 226 (See explanation to S. 141 of the Code). But that does not bar the High Court from framing a rule providing that the Code would be applicable (See e.g. Rules of the Calcutta High Court relating to matters under Art. 226 of the Constitution). In any case, the principle underlying the procedure, provisions of the Code have been made applicable by judicial rulings. Thus, for example some of such provisions are cited hereafter but only as examples. Or. 8 Rule 5 of the Civil Procedure Code is applicable in relation to matters under Art. 226 of the Constitution and, as such, the absence of a specific denial of the averments made in the writ petition would be deemed to have been admitted.[75]

(i) Necessary Parties.—In a writ petition, necessary parties must, and proper parties may, be impleaded.

A necessary party is one without whom no effective order can be made. The question is whether the presence of a particular party is necessary in order to enable the Court effectively and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions which are involved in the writ petition.[76] If the number of such parties is large, at least some of them must be joined in a representative capacity. The Supreme Court has said in Prabodh Verma v. State of Uttar Pradesh[77] :

> "A High Court ought not to decide a writ petition under Art. 226 of the Constitution without the persons who would be vitally affected by its judgment being before it as respondents or at least by some of them being before it as respondents in a representative capacity if their number is too large."

Selection and appointment of candidates made by the Subordinate Services Selection Board, Haryana, were quashed by the High Court without impleading the selected/appointed candidates as parties. The High Court order was set aside by the Supreme Court because the High Court quashed the selection/appointment without hearing the persons concerned. It is settled law that no order to the detriment of a person can be passed without hearing him.[78]

The Central Government allotted a limited quantity of liquid fuel to the State of Kerala. Several applicants including the respondent applied for allotment of fuel to their independent power projects (IPP). The entire quantity of the fuel was allotted to four IPPs excluding the respondent. The respondent filed a writ petition challenging the selection policy of the State without inpleading the applicants whose IPPs had been selected. The writ petition was held not maintainable in the absence of those applicants as parties.[79]

---

75. Bharat Sanchar Nigam Ltd. v. Abhishek Shukla, (2009) 5 SCC 368 : (2009) 5 JT 310.

76. A. Janardhana v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 769 : (1983) 3 SCC 601; State of Himachal Pradesh v. Kailash Chand Mahajan, AIR 1992 SC 1277, 1308 : 1992 Supp (2) SCC 351; Harcharan Singh v. Financial Commissioner, Revenue, Punjab, Chandigarh, AIR 1997 P&H 40.

77. AIR 1985 SC 167, 180 : (1984) 4 SCC 258.

78. Bhagwanti v. Subordinate Services Selection Board, (1995) Supt. 2 SCC 663.
Also see, Ishwar Singh v. Kuldip Singh, (1995) Supt. I SCC 179; Rajesh Kumar Gupta v. State of U.P., (2005) 5 SCC 172 : AIR 2005 SC 2540.

79. State of Kerala v. W.I. Services & Estates Ltd., (1998) 5 SCC 583.

In a petition for certiorari, the tribunal whose order is sought to be quashed, and also the parties in whose favour the said order is issued, are regarded as necessary parties.[80]

A proper party is one, in whose absence, an effective order can be made but whose presence is considered proper for a complete and final decision on the question involved in the proceeding.[81] A proper party is one whose presence is considered to be proper in order to provide effective relief to the petitioner and for avoiding multiplicity of litigation. Proper party is one whose presence is considered appropriate for effective decision of the case, although no relief may have been claimed against him. Where High Court felt that issues concerning public interest had arisen it should have framed specific issues and then put the State on specific notice inviting pleadings and documents. Any other party likely to be adversely affected and interested in being heard should have been allowed an opportunity of doing so.[82]

SUPPRESSION OF FACTS

It is a well established principle that suppression of materials exposes the petitioner to the risk of threshold dismissal. The principle emanates from the very nature of the power of interference under Art.226 {and since the court is sitting} i.e. a discretionary jurisdiction. A person who approaches the court for justice must come with clean hands and not one who deliberately attempts to deflect the court from the true path of justice by leading the court to injustice.[83]

Since it is a discretionary jurisdiction a petition may be dismissed on the ground that the petitioners have suppressed material facts in their petition.[84] Identification of material facts will be a case by case exercise and the definition of the expression has been attempted. The latest attempt (2009) of the Supreme Court,[85] is prefaced by saying that there is no definition of "material facts" in the Code of Civil Procedure nor in many statutes which come before the courts. But the Supreme Court in a series of judgments has laid down that all facts necessary to formulate a complete cause of action should be termed as "material facts". All basic and primary facts which must be proved by a party to establish the existence of cause of action or defence are material facts. "Material facts" in other words mean the entire bundle of facts which would constitute a complete cause of action.[86]

---

80. Udit Narayan v. Board of Revenue, AIR 1963 SC 786 : 1963 Supp (1) SCR 676; Birendra Nath v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1973 Cal 94.

81. G.M., S.C. Rly v. A.V.R. Siddhanti, AIR 1974 SC 1755; A. Janardhana v. Union of India, AIR 1983 SC 769 : (1983) 3 SCC 601.

82. State of U. P. v. Satya Narain Kapoor, (2004) 8 SCC 630 : (2004) 9 JT 410.

83. Arunima Baruah v. U.O.I., (2007) 6 SCC 120 : (2007) 6 SCALE 293; Bhagubhai Dhanabhai Khalasi v. State of Gujarat, (2007) 4 SCC 241 : (2007) 5 SCALE 357; S.J.S. Business Enterprises (P) Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2004) 7 SCC 166 : AIR 2004 SC 2421.

84. See e.g. Chancellor v. Bijayananda Kar, AIR (1994) SC 529.

85. Anil Salgaonkar, (2009) 9 SCC 310.

86. Anil Vasudev Salgaonkar v. Naresh Kushali Shigaonkar, (2009) 9 SCC 310, relying on Manubhai Nandlal Amorsey v. Popatlal Manilal Joshi, (1969) 1 SCC 372; Samant N. Balkrishna v. George Fernandez, (1969) 3 SCC 238; Udhav Singh v. Madhav Rao Scindia, (1977) 1 SCC 511; V.Narayanaswamy v. C.P.Thirunavukkarasu, (2000) 2 SCC 294 : AIR 2000 SC 694; L.R. Shivaramagowda v. T.M.Chandrashekar, (1999) 1 SCC 666; Harmohinder Singh Pradhan v. Ranjeet Singh Talwandi, (2005) 5 SCC 46 : AIR 2005 SC 2379; Harkirat Singh v. Amrinder Singh, (2005) 13 SCC 511 : AIR 2006 SC 713; Hardwari Lal v. Kanwal Singh, (1972) 1 SCC 214; Sudarsha Avasthi v. Shiv Pal Singh, (2008) 7 SCC 604 : AIR 2008 SC 2724.

The Supreme Court has reiterated that a Court of law is also a Court of equity and in granting relief under Art. 226 the Courts will bear in mind the conduct of the party who was invoking the jurisdiction. Non disclosure of full facts or suppression of relevant materials or otherwise misleading the Court would disentitled a party to any relief.[87] This was a case where the appellant company had taken a collusive route to prevent a bank from realizing its dues and also created third party interest in the property mortgaged with the Bank.

Where the agent of the State (Karnataka State Forest Industries Corporation) being a Government of Karnataka Undertaking, is guilty of suppression of facts, the State as the principal was obliged to disclose the entire facts before the Court.[88]

(ii) Res Judicata.—The rule of res judicata envisages that finality should attach to the binding decisions pronounced by courts of competent jurisdiction so that individuals are not made to face the same litigation twice. It is basically a rule of private law but has been transposed into the area of writs proceedings as well. Thus, a person is debarred from taking one writ proceeding after another, and urging new grounds every time, in respect of one and the same cause of action, thus, causing harassment to the opposite party. This means that when once a High Court has disposed of a writ petitition under Art. 226, then a subsequent writ petition under Art. 226 cannot be moved in the High Court relating to the same cause of action.[89]

In Ram Saran Tripathy v. Chancellor Gorakhpur University,[90] the High Court dismissed a writ petition under Art. 226 against the Chancellor and the Vice-Chancellor of the University. Thereafter, the petitioner made representation to the Vice-Chancellor and the Chancellor, but it was rejected. He then filed another writ petition under Art. 226 in the High Court on the same subject-matter, but the High Court dismissed the same on the ground of res judicata.

When once a tax assessment order has been unsuccessfully challanged through a writ petition, it cannot be challenged again even though the petitioner-assessee wishes to raise some new ground against the order which he failed to urge before. But a tax assessment order for the subsequent year may be challanged on the basis of new grounds.[91]

The principle res judicata has been applied by the Supreme Court to determine the mutual relationship under Arts. 32 and 226. Disposal of a writ petition under Art. 226 by a High Court on merits bars a subsequent petition for a writ under Art. 32,[92] or even a regular suit,[93] between the same parties for the same cause of action, because of the principle of res judicata.[94] Claiming in the second writ petition a relief which had been voluntarily not claimed in the earlier writ petition

---

87. Prestige Lights Ltd. v. State Bank of India, (2007) 8 SCC 449 : (2007) 10 JT 218.
88. Karnataka State Forest Industries Corporation v. Indian Rocks, (2009) 1 SCC 150 : AIR 2009 SC 684.
89. M.S.M. Sharma v. Sinha, AIR 1960 SC 1136 : 1959 Supp (1) SCR 806; Ishwar Dutt v. Land Acquisition Collector, (2005) 7 SCC 190 : AIR 2005 SC 3165.
90. AIR 1990 All 96.
91. Devilal v. S.T.O., AIR 1965 SC 1150 : (1965) 1 SCR 686.
92. Daryao v. State of U.P., AIR 1961 SC 1457 : (1962) 1 SCR 574; Nagabhushanam v. Ankem Ankaiah, AIR 1968 AP 74; Also see, infra, under Art. 32, Part V, Ch. XXXIII.
93. Gulab Chand v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1965 SC 1153 : (1965) 2 SCR 547.
94. YOGENDER SINGH, Principle of Res Judicata & Writ Proceedings, 16 JILI, 399 (1974); ILI, ANNUAL SURVEY OF INDIAN LAW, 124 (1970).

filed against the same parties, is not permissible.[1] The principle of constructive res judicata is also applicable.[2] An issue not raised in the first round of litigation cannot be raised in the second.[3]

The Supreme Court has emphasized in Daryao[4] that the rule of res judicata is based on public policy. It is in the interest of the public at large that finality should attach to the binding decisions pronounced by the courts of competent jurisdiction. Further, it is also in public interest that individuals should not be vexed twice over the same kind of litigation. Therefore, if a writ petition filed under Art. 226 is disposed of on merits, the decision would bar a writ petition under Art. 32 made on the same facts and for obtaining the same or similar orders or writs.

But when a writ petition is dismissed by the High Court in limine without passing a speaking order, it does not create res judicata. If a writ petition is dismissed on the ground that the petitioner was guilty of laches, or that he had an alternative remedy, then it would not be a bar for a subsequent writ petition under Art. 32 "except in cases where and if the facts thus found by the High Court may themselves be relevant even under Art. 32."[5] And an order which is a nullity cannot be brought into effect for invoking the principles of estoppel, waiver or res judicata.[6]

In case a writ petition under Art. 226 is dismissed on any ground (laches, alternative remedy), then another writ petition under Art. 226 before another bench is barred. The reason is that entertaining the second writ petition would render the order of the same Court dismissing the earlier writ petition redundant and nugatory. Further, if a petitioner is allowed to file a second writ petition after the dismissal of his earlier petition in limine, it would encourage an unsuccessful petitioner to go on filing one writ petition after another in the same matter in the same High Court, and there could thus be no finality for a Court order dismissing a writ petition.[7]

When the Supreme Court dismisses a special leave appeal petition filed under Art. 136, without a speaking order, it does not create res judicata for a subsequent writ petition under Art. 226. Dismissal of a special leave petition only means that the Court had decided that the case was not fit for appeal; it is not a decision on merits and so a writ petition under Art. 226 is maintainable to try identical issues.[8]

---

1. State Bank of India v. K. C. Tharakan, (2005) 8 SCC 428 : (2005) 12 JT 358.
2. State of Punjab v. Varinder Kumar (2005) 12 SCC 435. See also Raghavendra Rao v. State of Karnataka, (2009) 4 SCC 635 : (2009) 2 JT 520. See also Food Corporation of India v. Ashis Kumar Ganguly, (2009) 7 SCC 734 : AIR 2009 SC 2582, plea not available when representation was pending.
3. M.P. Palanisamy v. A.Krishnan, (2009) 6 SCC 428 : AIR 2009 SC 2809.
4. Daryao v. State of U.P., supra, footnote 92.
5. Daryao v. State of U.P., AIR 1961 SC at 1466 : (1962) 1 SCR 574. Hoshnak Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1979 SC 1328 : (1979) 3 SCC 135.
6. Jayendra Vishnu Thakur v. State of Maharashtra, (2009) 7 SCC 104 at p. 108 : (2009) 8 JT 5.
7. State of Uttar Pradesh v. Labh Chand, AIR 1994 SC 754, at 761. Also, Brij Bihari Pandey v. State of Bihar, AIR 1997 Pat. 74.
8. Workmen of Cochin Port Trust v. Board of Trustees of the Cochin Port Trust, AIR 1978 SC 1283 : (1978) 3 SCC 119; supra, 428; Ahmedabad Manufacturing & Calico Printing Co. Ltd. v. Workmen, AIR 1981 SC 960 : (1981) 2 SCC 663; Indian Oil Corporation Ltd. v. State of Bihar, AIR 1986 SC 1780 : (1986) 4 SCC 146; Sahi Ram v. Avtar Singh, AIR 1999 Del 96.

In case of habeas corpus, the principle of res judicata does not apply. Thus, when a petition challenging an order of detention is dismissed by the High Court, a second petition can be filed on fresh, additional grounds to challenge the legality of the continued detention of the petitioner.[9] This is because the courts attach great value to the right of personal freedom of a person.[10]

When a writ petition under Art. 226 is withdrawn without seeking permission of the High Court to file a fresh petition, the petitioner cannot file a fresh writ petition for agitating the same cause once again. This is on the ground of public policy.[11] But when the subject matter of the second writ petition is different from that of the first, the second petition is competent.[12]

ABUSE OF PROCESS

Abuse of process means utilizing the court's process not for justice but for some other ulterior motive. For example, where the court directs the Government to consider a representation made by a school and in furtherance thereof the State Government, after hearing the party concerned rejects the representation but such rejection is not challenged, another Writ Petition for the same issue merely on the ground that a few subsequent representations had been made reiterating the same issue and seeking similar relief amounted to abuse of the process.[13]

(n) DISMISSAL OF WRIT PETITIONS IN LIMINE

The Supreme Court has at times come with a heavy hand on the practice of the High Courts dismissing writ petitions in limine. The Supreme Court has pointed out that the High Court may, in exercise of its discretion, decline to exercise its extra- ordinary jurisdiction under Art. 226. The discretion however is judicial.

If the petition makes a frivolous, vexatious, or prima facie unjust claim, or a claim which may not appropriately be tried, or seeks a relief which the Court cannot grant, in a petition invoking extraordinary jurisdiction, the Court may decline to entertain the writ petition.[14] But when a writ petition raises an arguable or triable issue, or when the party claims to have been aggrieved by the action of a public body on the plea that the action is unlawful, high-handed, arbitrary or prima facie unjust, he is entitled to a hearing on its petition on the merits. Dismissal of the petition in limine would be unjustified in such a situation.[15] If the Court finds that the writ petition on its face does not raise any triable issue, it is liable to be dismissed in limine.[16]

---

9. Lallubhai Jogibhai v. Union of India, AIR 1981 SC 728 : (1981) 2 SCC 427; Kirit Kumar v. Union ofIndia, AIR 1981 SC 1621 : (1981) 2 SCC 436.

10. For a full-fledged discussion on "Right to Personal Liberty", see, infra, Ch. XXVI.
For habeas corpus, see, Sec. E, infra.

11. Sarguja Transport Service v. State Transport Appellate Tribunal, AIR 1987 SC 88 : (1987) 1 SCC 5.

12. G.N. Nayak v. Goa University, (2002) 2 SCC 712 : AIR 2002 SC 790.

13. State of Tamil Nadu v. Amala Annai Higher Secondary School, (2009) 9 SCC 386.

14. Gunwant Kaur v. Municipal Committee, Bhatinda, AIR 1970 SC 802 : (1969) 3 SCC 769.

15. Century Spg. & Mfg. Co. v. Ulhasnagar Municipality, AIR 1971 SC 1021 : (1970) 1 SCC 582; Exen Industries v. Chief Controller of Imports, AIR 1971 SC 1025 : (1972) 3 SCC 176; Prem Chandra v. Collector, Faizabad, AIR 1970 SC 802.

16. Himansu Kumar Base v. Jyoti Prakash Mitter, AIR 1964 SC 1636; Union of India v. S.P. Anand, AIR 1998 SC 2615, at 2618; Cf. Director of Entry Tax v. Sunrise Timber Company, (2008) 15 SCC 287.

The High Court may decline a writ petition in limine if it is frivolous or without substance. But a writ petition should not be thrown out if a prima facie case for investigation is made out. The High Court may reject a petition in limine if it takes the view that the authority in question had not acted improperly, or if the Court feels that the petition raises complicated questions of fact for determination which could not be properly adjudicated upon in a proceeding under Art. 226.[17]

The Haryana Government superseded the Kaithal Municipality. The order was challenged through a writ petition on the ground of mala fides on the part of the government. The High Court dismissed the petition in limine. The Supreme Court criticised this and observed:[18]

> "... in a case of the present kind the writ petition ought not to have been dismissed in the manner in which it was done without obtaining any return from the respondents and considering the same."

The Supreme Court has emphasized that when the High Court seeks to dismiss a writ petition in limine, it should give reasons for doing so. Absence of reasons deprives the Supreme Court of knowing the circumstances which weighed with the High Court to dismiss the writ petition at the threshold. Also, the petitioner not knowing the reasons cannot challenge the reasons in the higher forum.

In the following cases,[19] the Supreme Court remanded the writ petitions to the High Court concerned for fresh disposal on merits, because these writ petitions had been dismissed in limine without reasoned orders by the High Courts.

(o) DECLARATORY RELIEF

Normally, under Art. 226, the High Court does not grant merely a declaration unless the person aggrieved has asked for the consequential relief available to him. But the High Court can grant a mere declaration if the petitioner is not entitled to the further consequential relief on account of some legal bar of circumstances beyond his control.

> "In exceptional cases, the High Court may be justified to grant the relief merely in a declaratory form after being satisfied that the person approaching the Court was prevented from praying for any other consequential relief on account of legal impediment or bar of jurisdiction created by same statute."

In the instant case,[20] the petitioner came to the High Court for declaration of a University Service Rule as unconstitutional. The problem was that unless the rule was declared unconstitutional, the petitioner could not get any relief. The relief

---

17. D.D. Suri v. A.K. Barren, AIR 1971 SC 175 : (1970) 3 SCC 313; Jagdish Prasad v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 1971 SC 1224; Ram Chandra v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1971 SC 128.

18. Gyan Chand v. State of Haryana, AIR 1971 SC 333 : (1970) 1 SCC 582.

19. Subash Chandra Choubey v. State of Bihar, (1998) 8 SCC 714; State of Punjab v. Surinder Kumar, (1992) 1 SCC 489; Sat Pal Chopra v. Director-cum-Joint Secretary, AIR 1991 SC 970 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 352; Gram Panchayat, Bari v. Collector, Sonepat, AIR 1991 SC 1082 : 1991 Supp (2) SCC 407; Llewyn Furtado v. Govt. of Goa, (1997) 7 SCC 533; Nurul Station Complex Businessmen's Assn. v. City and Industrial Development Corpn. of Maharashtra Ltd., (2005) 11 SCC 478.

20. M.C. Sharma v. The Punjab University, Chandigarh, AIR 1997 P & H 87.

could be given by the Administrative Service Tribunal and not by the High Court. But the Tribunal could not declare the rule in question unconstitutional. Only the High Court could do so. Because of this division of jurisdiction between the High Court and the Tribunal, the High Court gave the declaration holding the impugned rule to be unconstitutional.

After referring to earlier authorities, the Supreme Court has reiterated that in the absence of a statutory framework and depending on a given situation, it and the High Court can issue a "positive mandamus" by directing the authorities to do what was required to be done in such a situation.[21]

(p) MOULDING OF RELIEF

The High Courts under Art. 226 have power not only to issue writs but also to make orders and to issue directions. Accordingly, the High Courts do not only issue writs, but discharge a much wider function, viz., to mould relief in accordance with the facts of the case with a view to do complete justice between the contending parties. One or two examples of how the courts mould relief may be given here. High Court's power to consider subsequent events is limited to the purpose of moulding the relief and does not extend to grant of a relief for which no foundation was laid in pleadings of the parties.[22]

In Grindlays Bank v. I.T.O.,[23] the High Court while quashing the income-tax assessment proceedings also directed that fresh assessment be made. The appellant company contested this direction on the ground that the I.T.O. could not make an assessment as it was time-barred. Over-ruling this objection, the Supreme Court held that under article 226, the High Court may not only quash the offending assessment order but may also mould the remedy to suit the facts of the case. A party ought not to be permitted to gain any undeserved or unfair advantage by invoking the Court's jurisdiction. The Court's direction for a fresh assessment was necessary for properly and completely disposing of the writ petition. It had jurisdiction to do so and acted in the sound exercise of its judicial discretion in making it.

In Shiv Shankar Dal Mills v. State of Haryana[24], the market committee increased the market fees from 2 per cent to 3 per cent and the appellants paid the increased fees. On being challenged, the Supreme Court held that the increase in fee was ultra vires. Consequently, the committee became liable to refund the illegal payment made to it. The Court ruled that there could be no dispute about the amounts payable. Where public bodies, under colour of public laws, recover people's money, later discovered to be erroneous levies, the dharma of the situation admits of no equivocation. There is no law of limitation, especially for public bodies, on the virtue of returning what was wrongly recovered to whom it belongs.

---

21. Destruction of Public & Private Properties v. State of Andhra Pradesh, (2009) 5 SCC 212 (3-Judge Bench) : AIR 2009 SC 2266.
22. Ramrao v. All India Backward Class Bank Employees Welfare Asson., (2004) 2 SCC 76 : AIR 2004 SC 1459.
23. AIR 1980 SC 656 : (1980) 2 SCC 191.
24. AIR 1980 SC 1037.

However, in the instant case, the difficulty was that the petitioners, who were traders, had themselves collected the amount in question in small levies from the next purchasers. To meet the situation, the Court referred to the procedure devised by it in Nawabganj Sugar Mills case.[25] There the Court devised a scheme to enable the consumers who had paid the excess amount to get back their money. The Court justified its decision by saying that article 226 grants an 'extraordinary remedy which is essentially discretionary, although founded on legal injury', and it is perfectly open to the Court, 'exercising that flexible power', to pass such order as 'public interest dictates and equity projects.[26]

(q) GRANT OF COMPENSATION

A very innovative development has taken place with respect to Art. 226, namely, in certain situations, courts have granted compensation to the victims of government lawlessness or negligence. Although Art. 226 does not make any reference to "compensation", but only says that a High Court may issue "directions or orders or writs", the Supreme Court has interpreted this constitutional provision in a flexible manner so as to permit award of compensation where a person's fundamental or legal right is infringed.[27]

In DK Basu v. State of West Bengal,[28] the Supreme Court accepted that compensation can be awarded to the victims of torture in police custody. In the instant case, the Supreme Court granted compensation for the custodial death of a person as this was held to be an infringement of Art. 21.[29]

In a very recent case, under Art. 226, compensation has been awarded to a Bengala Deshi lady who was gang raped by railway employees at the Sealdah station.[30]

After the husband underwent vasectomy operation, his wife conceived. This happened because of the negligence of the doctor in the government hospital. The Allahabad High Court ruled that, in the circumstances, it was the duty of the State to maintain the child as the said lady never wanted another child. The Court directed the State Government to deposit Rs. 50,000 in a bank for the purpose.[31]

A six year old child fell in a deep sewerage tank and died. The tank was not covered with a lid and was left open. On a writ petition being filed by the mother of the child in the High Court under Art. 226, compensation of Rs. 50,000/- was awarded to her.[32]

---

25. Nawabganj Sugar Mills Co. v. Union of India, AIR 1976 SC 1153.
26. Also see on this topic infra, Ch. XXXIII, under Art. 32.
27. Nilabati Behera v. State, 1993 AIR SCW 2366 : AIR 1993 SC 1960.
28. AIR 1997 SC 610.
Also see, Rudal Shah v. State of Bihar, AIR 1993 SC 1086 : (1983) 4 SCC 141; Murti Devi v. Delhi, (1998) 9 SCC 604; Sebastian M. Hongray v. Union of India, AIR 1984 SC 1026; Rajendra Singh v. Smt. Usha Rani, AIR 1984 SC 956; Bhim Singh v. State of Jammu & Kashmir, AIR 1986 SC 494 : (1985) 4 SCC 677; Saheli v. Commr. of Police, AIR 1990 SC 513 : (1990) 1 SCC 422; Kumari (Smt.) v. State of Tamil Nadu, (1992) 2 SCC 223 : AIR 1992 SC 2069.
For a full-fledged discussion on "compensation", see, M.P. JAIN, A TREATISE ON ADM. LAW, II; CASES & MATERIALS ON ADM. LAW, IV.
Also see, Ch. XXXIII, infra, Ch. XXXVIII, Sec. E.
29. For discussion on Art. 21, see, infra, Ch. XXVI.
30. Chairman, Railway Board v. Chandrima Das, AIR 2000 SC 988 : (2000) 2 SCC 465.
31. Shakuntala Sharma v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR 2000 All 219.
32. Kumari (Smt.) v. State of Tamil Nadu, AIR 1992 SC 2069 : (1992) 2 SCC 223.

Where, however, disputed questions of fact arise, a petition under Art. 226 is not a proper remedy.[33]

It is true that most of the cases coming before the courts for compensation under Art. 226, relate to deprivation of life or personal liberty guaranteed by Art. 21.[34] But, in theory, there could be no reason for not extending the same principle to the violation of any other Fundamental Right (under Art. 226) or to the breach of any other legal right.[35] The matter is discussed further at a later stage.[36]

(r) INTERLOCUTORY ORDERS

When a writ petition is filed, the Court may make an interim or interlocutory order. The purpose of such an order is to preserve in status quo the rights of the parties, so that, the proceedings do not become infructuous or ineffective by any unilateral overt acts by one side or the other during the pendency of the writ petition.[37]

The scope and effect of an interim order would depend upon terms of the order itself. In case of any ambiguity the interim order should be understood in the light of prayer made for interim relief, facts of the case and terms of the interim order.[38]

Exceptional situations can emerge where the granting of an interim relief would tantamount to granting the final relief itself. And then there may be converse cases where withholding of an interim relief would tantamount to dismissal of the main petition itself; for, by the time the main matter comes up for hearing there would be nothing left to be allowed as relief to the petitioner though all the findings may be in his favour. In such cases the availability of a very strong prima facie case of a standard much higher than just prima facie case, the considerations of balance of convenience and irreparable injury forcefully tilting the balance of the case totally in favour of the applicant may persuade the Court to grant an interim relief though it amounts to granting the final relief itself. Of course, such would be rare and exceptional cases. The Court would grant such an interim relief only if satisfied that withholding of it would prick the conscience of the Court and do violence to the sense of justice, resulting in injustice being perpetuated throughout the hearing, and at the end the Court would not be able to vindicate the cause of justice. Obviously such would be rare cases accompanied by compelling circumstances, where the injury complained of is immediate and pressing and would cause extreme hardship. The conduct of the parties shall also have to be seen and the Court may put the parties on such terms as may be prudent. Hence the Court has accepted the submission that since the election was for a period of one year out of which a little less than half of the time has already elapsed and in the absence of interim relief being granted to him there is nothing which would survive for being given to him by way of relief at the end of the final hearing. In Deoraj the Supreme Court indicated the factors to be considered

---

33. Tamil Nadu Electricity Board v. Sumathi, AIR 2000 SC 1603 : (2000) 4 SCC 543; Chairman, Grid Corp. of Orissa v. Sukamani Das, AIR 1999 SC 3412 : (1999) 7 SCC 298.
34. Common Cause v. Union of India, (1999) 6 SCC 667.
35. Lucknow Development Authority v. M.K. Gupta, (1994) 1 SCC 243.
Also see, Rabindra Nath Ghoshal v. University of Calcutta, (2002) 7 SCALE 137.
36. See, infra, Ch. XXXVIII. Also, Ch. XXXIII.
37. Kihota Hollohon v. Zachillu, AIR 1993 SC 412 : 1992 Supp (2) SCL 651.
38. BPL Ltd. v. R. Sudhakar, (2004) 7 SCC 219 : AIR 2004 SC 3606.

before granting any interim relief namely, prima facie case, irreparable injury and balance of convenience. The Court expressed the view that ordinarily the Court is inclined to maintain status quo. The Court said: Interim order should not be granted as a matter of course, particularly in relation to matter where standards of institutions are involved and the permission to be granted to such institutions is subject to certain provisions of law and regulations applicable to the same and unless the same are complied with. Indeed by grant of such interim orders students who have been admitted in such institutions would be put to serious jeopardy, apart from the fact whether such institutions could run the medical college without following the law.[39]

All India Dravida Munnetra Kazagam (AIADMK) along with other political parties gave a call for total cessation of work and closure of shops etc. on 1.10.2007. This call was challenged in a writ petition filed in Madras High Court contending that the call in substance was for a 'bandh'. The High Court, by its interim order gave various directions on State Government and its police officers, basically, to ensure that persons who were not honestly responsive to the call should be able to carry on their normal activities. Aggrieved by the order, AIDMK took the matter to the Supreme Court. The Court after referring to the Full Bench judgment of the Kerala High Court,[40] which had declared 'bandh' and its enforcement to be illegal and unconstitutional, virtually incorporated the Kerala judgment and held that although generally an interim order should not be granted which would result in granting the main relief, in cases such as the one under consideration such relief could be granted and confirmed the interim order of the Madras High Court.[41]

In Ghouse[42] a show cause notice issued under FERA was challenged and interim relief was prayed for staying the notice upon which the High Court directed status quo. The Supreme Court held that High Court ought to have give reasons for granting such relief. The Court, however directed that the proceedings before the authority would continue but the final order should not be communicated without leave or further orders of the High Court.

Where the landlord files an application for execution of a eviction decree filed but an order under U.P. Accommodation Requisition Act, 1947 passed for requisition of the premises and the landlord challenged the requisition order as well as order pursuant to which possession of the premises was taken by State, interim order was issued directing the State either to proceed under Land Acquisition Act or vacate the premises within a week. But neither the order of DM produced before the Court nor any law or rule brought to the notice of the Court which would authorize the DM to take possession of any premises in such manner in which possession was taken by DM, This was labelled as high handed, arbitrary and without any legal sanction.[43]

---

39. Medical Council of India v. Rajiv Gandhi University of Health Sciences, (2004) 6 SCC 76 : AIR 2004 SC 2603.
40. Bharat Kumar v. State of Kerala, AIR 1997 Ker 291.
41. All India Anna Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam v. L.K.Tripathi, (2009) 5 SCC 417, 452 : AIR 2009 SC 1314.
42. Ibid.
43. State of Uttranchal v. Ajit Singh Bhola, (2004) 6 SCC 800 : (2004) 5 JT 513.

While considering an interim application High Court is not justified in rendering a categorical finding on merits.[44]

The Supreme Court has cautioned the High Courts that ex parte injunctions should be granted only under "exceptional circumstances".[45]

An exparte order on the view that since the matter had to be remitted no prejudice would be caused to the respondents if they were not brought on record has been negatived.[46]

E. THE WRITS

(i) HABEAS CORPUS

The writ of habeas corpus is used to secure release of a person who has been detained unlawfully or without legal justification. The great value of the writ is that it enables an immediate determination of a person's right to freedom. Detention may be unlawful if inter alia it is not in accordance with law, or the procedure established by law has not been strictly followed in detaining a person, or there is no valid law to authorise detention, or the law is invalid because it infringes a Fundamental Right, or the Legislature enacting it exceeds its limits.[47]

Detention should not contravene Art. 22, as for example, a person who is not produced before a magistrate within 24 hours of his detention is entitled to be released.[48] The power of detention vested in an authority, if exceeded, abused or exercised mala fide makes the detention unlawful.[49]

Article 21 of the Constitution having declared that no person shall be deprived of life and liberty except in accordance with the procedure established by law, a machinery was needed to examine the question of illegal detention with utmost promptitude. The writ of habeas corpus is such a device. The writ has been described as a writ of right which is grantable ex debito justitiae. Though a writ of right, it is not a writ of course. The applicant must show a prima facie case of unlawful detention. Once, however, he shows such a case and the return is not good and sufficient, he is entitled to this writ as of right. While dealing with a habeas corpus application undue importance is not to be attached to technicalities, but at the same time where the Court is satisfied that an attempt has been made to deflect the course of justice by letting loose red herrings, the Court has to take serious note of unclean approach.[50]

While dealing with a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the Court may examine the legality of the detention without requiring the person detained to be pro-

---

44. Union of India v. Kundan Rice Mills Limited, (2009) 1 SCC 553 : (2008) 12 JT 36.
45. Morgan Stanley Mutual Fund v. Kartick Das, (1994) 4 SCC 225; Union of India v. Era Educational Trust, AIR 2000 SC 1573 : (2000) 5 SCC 57; see also State of U.P. v. Ram Sukhi Devi, (2005) 9 SCC 733 : AIR 2004 SC 284.
46. Cyrill Lasrado v. Juliana Maria Lasrado, (2004) 7 SCC 431 : AIR 2004 SC 1367.
47. State of Bihar v. K.P. Verma, AIR 1965 SC 575 : (1963) 2 SCR 183.
48. Infra, Ch XXVII.
49. G. Sadanandan v. State of Kerala, AIR 1966 SC 1925 : (1966) 3 SCR 590; Ram Manohar Lohia v. State of Bihar, AIR 1966 SC 740 : (1966) 1 SCR 709.
50. Union of India v. Paul Manickam, (2003) 8 SCC 342 : AIR 2003 SC 4622.

duced before it.[51] Thus the High Court will not direct the authorities concerned to lodge the report with the Police along with documents to enable them to register a case under the provisions of the Indian Penal Code, since the matter in issue before the court was the validity of the detention order and the curtailment of the personal liberty of the detenu and nothing more. Further, in such a case the court was not justified in issuing a direction and awarding exemplary costs (Rs.50,000/-) to be paid by the petitioner.[52] The writ is issued to the authority having the custody of the aggrieved person. It may be prayed for by the prisoner himself, or if he is unable to do so, by someone else on his behalf.[53] The writ is not issued if the Court is satisfied that the prisoner is not under unlawful restraint.[54]

Because the courts regard personal liberty as one of the most cherished values of mankind, the Supreme Court has lately sought to reduce procedural technicalities to the minimum in the matter of issue of habeas corpus. The Supreme Court has pointed out in Icchu Devi v. Union of India, that in case of an application for a writ of habeas corpus, the Court does not, as a matter of practice, follow strict rules of pleading. Even a postcard by a detenu from jail is sufficient to activise the Court into examining the legality of detention. Also, because of Art. 21, the Court places the burden of showing that detention is in accordance with the procedure established by law on the detaining authority.[55] The Court may grant an interim bail while dealing with a habeas corpus petition.[56]

There have been cases where persons picked up by the police or the army have disappeared without a trace. In such cases, on petitions for habeas corpus being moved by their relatives, courts have awarded compensation.[57]

In October, 1991, some officers and policemen of the Punjab Police abducted seven persons. As all efforts to have these persons released failed, a petition for habeas corpus was filed in the Supreme Court under Art. 32 seeking release of these persons. After perusing the various affidavits filed by various persons and after hearing arguments of the counsels, the Court became convinced that the enquiry into the matter so far by the Punjab Police had been highly unsatisfactory and that an independent enquiry at a very high level was called for. Accordingly, the Court directed the Director, CBI, to personally conduct the enquiry into the matter and report to the Court.[58]

The above matter came before the Court again in 1995 after the Director, CBI, completed the inquiry and placed his report before the Court. The Director concluded that the seven persons had been liquidated by the police. The Court held the whole police action as illegal and expressed its 'disapprobation' of the Punjab Police as it failed to discharge its primary duty of upholding law and order and of protecting the citizens. Instead, the whole episode "betrays scant respect for the life and property of innocent citizens". The Court directed the State to pay Rs. 1.50

---

51. Kanu Sanyal v. District Magistrate, AIR 1973 SC 2684 : (1973) 2 SCC 674.
52. Pooja Batra v. U.O.I., (2009) 5 SCC 296 : AIR 2009 SC 2256.
53. Sheela Barse v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1983 SC 378 : (1983) 2 SCC 96.
54. Janardan v. State of Hyderabad, AIR 1951 SC 217; Godavari v. State of Maharashtra, AIR 1966 SC 1404 : (1966) 3 SCR 314.
55. AIR 1980 SC 1983 : (1980) 4 SCC 531. Also see, infra, Ch. XXVII, Sec. B.
56. State of Bihar v. Rambalak Singh, AIR 1966 SC 1441 : (1966) 3 SCR 344.
