PREFACE

We wrote the preface to the first edition of this book in March 2009. The three years since then have brought a volume of new cases, legislation, reform proposals and academic commentary that thoroughly refutes any lingering idea that land law is a musty or static subject. Indeed, on one day alone (9 November 2011), the Supreme Court delivered judgments in two potentially seminal land law cases: Jones v Kernott and Berrisford (FC) v Mexfield Housing Co-operative Limited.

These and other developments have naturally left their mark on this second edition. Chapters 16 and 23 have been extensively revised to incorporate the judgments in Jones and Berrisford; Chapter 10 has been re-written to take account of a House of Lords decision of 2009 (Thorner v Major); and a Supreme Court case of 2010 (Star Energy Weald Basin Limited v Bocardo SA) features prominently in a re-worked Chapter 2. To give just one further example, the pivotal decision of a nine-member Supreme Court in Manchester City Council v Pinnock (2010) has led to a thorough revision of our human rights chapter. It has also caused us to re-structure our introductory chapters so that our second edition, like the Supreme Court's decision itself, affirms the importance of human rights in land law.

We have also incorporated the impact of new legislation, such as the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009, the Equality Act 2010, and the Localism Act 2011. Despite all this activity, the scent of further reform is in the air, and Chapters 25 and 26 have been updated to consider the Law Commission's 2011 report on easements, covenants and profits à prendre. As our first edition made clear, we are also keen to give readers access to the best academic writing on land law, and this edition includes extracts from and references to new articles and books on a wide range of topics, from land registration to constructive trusts.

We have taken the opportunity of a new edition not only to update the content of the chapters, but also to revise their structure. The first chapter, and the whole of Part A, has been streamlined, to give a more focused introduction to land law. Readers of the first edition found its three-step approach to be very helpful in understanding the operation of interests in land, and therefore Parts B, C and D have been modified so as to correspond to the content, acquisition and defences questions. We have also altered the contents and positioning of the licences chapter, so as to make the most of the instructive comparison between licences and leases. Despite the large number of developments since 2009, we have, by careful pruning, ensured that the overall length of the book has barely increased.

We wrote in the preface to the first edition that the Text, Cases and Materials format is ideally suited to land law. The key advantage of such a book is that it can both show and tell. In this edition, as well as providing direct access to the most important and useful cases and materials, we have again made sure to guide readers, by devoting more than half of the book to our author commentary. While there are some areas in which we can all claim a level of expertise, our individual interests meant that the division of labour was perhaps more readily determined than might have been the case. Ben is responsible for Chapters 1–2, 4–6, 10, 12, 15 and 21–23; Nick for Chapters 7–9, 11, 13–14 and 16–19; Sarah for Chapters 3 and 24–30; and Nick and Sarah jointly wrote Chapter 20. Each of us has read and commented on chapters written by the others.

Our thanks are wholeheartedly extended to colleagues, friends and to staff at OUP who have helped us in writing each of the first and second editions. Professor John Mee and a number of anonymous referees took on the unenviable task of reading and commenting on the first edition. Likewise, a number of people commented on individual chapters in that first edition: we are particularly indebted to Amy Goymour, Professor David Clarke and Peter Smith. Their generosity in giving of their time and their own insights into the subject is gratefully acknowledged and has undoubtedly improved the finished text. Rupert Seal and Ruth Hudson played a significant role in the development of the Online Resource Centre. Ben is grateful to Stephen Du and Christopher Knowles for their comments on the first edition and research assistance on the second edition. The enthusiasm and commitment of OUP have helped make the process of writing an enjoyable one. Particular thanks are due to Kate Whetter, our commissioning editor for the second edition, to copy-editor Francesca White, and to Stella White for her management of the marketing.

WHAT'S SPECIAL ABOUT LAND?

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. This introductory chapter aims to show the importance of land, and hence of land law. It focuses on the features that make land special and the distinctive legal rules produced by those features. By considering a specific example, it also shows how and why land law can give rise to very difficult questions of both doctrine and policy.
2. This chapter thus helps to answer an important question: why is it worth studying land law? Firstly, the special features of land mean that rules regulating the use of land are very important in practice. Secondly, those special features mean that the rules are analytically interesting: they try to perform the very difficult job of balancing the interests of a number of deserving parties. Thirdly, although many land law rules are rooted in tradition, the practical importance of land law means that the rules must change in response to new social and economic conditions. This means that land law can be a topical and lively subject.
3. In this chapter, our focus is on what makes land (and thus land law) special. As we will see, however, land law is part of the broader subject of property law. This gives us a further important reason for studying land law: it is a very useful way in which to learn about core concepts that apply not only where land is concerned, but in many other situations as well.
4. In this chapter, we will look at a particular situation that shows the sharp debates and difficult questions that can arise in land law. In later chapters, we will return to that situation in more detail and closely examine the relevant legal rules. Our purpose here, however, is to see what can be discerned about the special concerns of land law.

1 THE IMPORTANCE OF LAND

No one needs to be told that land is important. In fact, in the United Kingdom, land is something of a national obsession. We would not necessarily think it odd if a friend were to spend the morning on some do-it-yourself jobs in her house, stop to look in the windows of a local estate agency whilst out for lunch, come back to do some gardening in the afternoon, and then spend the evening watching a television programme about the property market, and playing a board game based on buying land and renting out houses in London. And that is only at the weekend, when she is not out at work earning money to make her mortgage payments. And, of course, land can be even more important for those who are not fortunate enough to own a home: a tenant may worry that his landlord will fail to make the necessary repairs to his roof or is about to raise his rent, while someone with nowhere at all to live will face the more urgent task of finding shelter for the night.

So, whilst we may sometimes take it for granted, land is always there: under our noses, beneath our feet, and perhaps even in our souls. As a result, land looms large in much of the law. For example, in the law of torts, occupiers' liability forms a discrete area due to the special responsibilities placed on those with control of land. Conversely, the criminal law gives special protection to a residential occupier of land: if another party uses force or the threat of force to come onto land despite the objections of the occupier, that party can be guilty of a special criminal offence.[1] In the law of contract, special rules regulate agreements relating to land: the importance of land is recognized by the requirement that contracts to sell land must be made in writing, signed by both vendor and purchaser. In administrative and public law, special responsibilities are placed on local authorities, in certain circumstances, to provide accommodation to those with nowhere to live.

2 THE SCOPE OF THIS BOOK

This book cannot focus on all of the varied areas of law in which land is important. Its focus instead is on the special rules that govern private rights to use land. By 'private' rights, we mean the rights that, in theory, any of us might acquire. For example, the government or a local authority may have a statutory power to acquire land for particular purposes: for example, the London Development Agency, by means of compulsory purchase orders approved by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in 2005, was permitted to buy land needed for use in connection with the 2012 Olympics, even if the current owners of that land did not agree to sell. Such special powers to use land are not considered in this book.

Similarly, we will not examine the various tort claims that may arise against an occupier of land: if you are injured at a friend's house and claim damages from her, you claim a right to be paid money, not a right to use her land. Nor will we look at the special crimes that may apply where land is concerned: to be seen as criminal, a party's conduct must be deserving of public sanction; it is not enough for that conduct simply to interfere with another party's rights. And we will not look directly at the special statutory responsibilities placed on local authorities: those duties do not necessarily respond to any individual's private right. Equally, we will not examine the special public limits that may be placed on private rights. For example, if you own a house, you may wish to convert it into a block of flats: to do so, you will need planning permission, because your private rights, as an owner of the land, are limited by the need for the approval of a public body.

[1] See Criminal Law Act 1977, s 6. To commit the crime, the party must know of the occupier's presence on the land and of his objection to that party's entry. The crime is not committed if the party entering is a 'displaced residential occupier'—i.e. someone who was himself earlier removed from the land. See also the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s 1, for a further example of a crime protecting the use of land.

This is not to suggest that the areas not covered by this book are unimportant, or lacking in interest. In fact, to have a full picture of how the law regulates the use of land, it is vital to be aware of the relevant parts of the law of torts or of public law. But no book can sensibly examine all of the legal rules that can regulate the use of land; rather, this book focuses on a set of rules that are joined together not only by the context in which they apply, but also by the concepts that underlie them. In this way, the book fits with the meaning of 'land law', as set out in the following extract.[2]

Birks, 'Before We Begin: Five Keys to Land Law' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives (eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, pp 457–60)

The name 'land law' suggests a simple contextual category: all the law about land. The law does use many such categories, ordered only by the alphabet: all the law about aviation, banks, commerce, dogs, education and so on. They take as their subject some aspect of life, just as a non-lawyer would identify it. But in this case things are not quite so straightforward. By the end of this section we will have formulated a more complex proposition: land law, as generally understood, is a contextual subset of a legal-conceptual category.

The socio-historical context

It will help to start with some background. The role of land, and hence of land law, has changed dramatically since the Industrial Revolution and the rise of the limited liability company. The paragraphs which follow sketch in that change and two others.

The managed fund

For institutions and individuals with serious wealth, land has lost its central role. The managed fund has displaced the rolling acres. Land used to be the pre-eminent form of wealth. Landed property was the focus of dynastic ambition. Land opened the door to high social status and political power. A landed family had by that fact alone a stake in governmental power. Keeping land in the family mattered. That has changed. Land, important as it is, has lost its pride of place. For the mega-wealthy, land has become just one species of investment, just as agriculture has become just one more industry. Pension funds and wealthy institutions hold mixed portfolios. They hold some land, some works of art, and many shares in many companies. Rich individuals do the same. The dynastic urge has been translated, with one eye constantly on the tax man, into trust funds and private companies [. . .]

The fragility of the environment

The notion of land as scarce and fragile is relatively new. The Industrial Revolution created a few black spots. Blake's dark, satanic mills were terrible to behold, but local. It is only relatively recently that we have realized that our transport systems, our power stations, our industrial processes, and our intensive agricultural methods have the potential utterly to destroy this green and pleasant land. The private law of nuisance, the historic role of which was to control annoying activities as between one neighbour and another, cannot sufficiently express the social interest in the safety of this scarce resource. Protection of the environment

2 As is the case with all such extracts in this book, footnotes, numbering, and cross-references have been omitted unless essential to understanding the extract.

means more social control of land use. There will have to be more planning control, more conservation legislation, more anti-pollution legislation [...]

Public-sector housing

Local government is nowadays a powerful force in the provision of housing, adding a public law dimension new to land law as it been historically determined. During the Thatcher era the public sector experienced an upheaval, partly from shortage of money, partly from being opened to the private market through the right-to-buy legislation[3] [...] The public sector ultimately rests on concepts identical to those of the private sector, overlaid by principles of public law and a mass of highly technical legislation. It is in every way a part of land law, but, because of the mass of detail, it has become a specialism. As a lawyer you have at some stage to decide whether to make yourself an expert in that field. The same is largely true of the statutory regime controlling the relations of landlord and tenant in the private sector.

The core of land law

A target has a centre. Taking land law as a simple contextual category, we can identify at least five topics, all of which have already figured in the discussion. Four of these must on reflection be located in the second or third circles, just outside the bull's-eye at which we are aiming. They matter, but they do not relieve us of the intellectual necessity of mastering the core. Two belong largely in public law. One of these comprises the social control essential if the environment is to be protected. The other is the housing law which applies to local government tenancies. Within private law, a third unit lies in the law of civil wrongs and deals with the duties imposed by the law for regulating the behaviours of neighbours towards each other, especially through the torts of nuisance and trespass to land. Fourthly, there is the structuring of mega-wealth, the mission of the old Lincoln's Inn conveyancers. That is breaking away, not specifically land law any longer but wealth management. Its principal vehicle is the trust, often enough off-shore, in which land becomes just one kind of asset in a rolling fund. Fifthly and last of all, there is the unit at the very centre of the target. When lawyers speak of land law, it is usually to this core that they refer.

Every business needs premises, every factory needs a site. For most of us as private individuals our home is the centre of our lives. Functionally, this core of land law has the task of providing the structure within which people and businesses can safely acquire and exploit land for daily use, to live and to work. To discharge that function, it has to have its own conceptual apparatus. The proper content of this fifth unit thus becomes the nature, creation and protection of interests in land. Those interests and their implications are the conceptual apparatus of our land law.

The word 'interests' is slightly evasive. The law recognizes different kinds of rights, among them property rights. By 'interest' we mean 'property right'. The category of all property rights (or, in other words and more simply, 'the law of property') is a legal-conceptual category. It differs from, say, the law of dogs in that its subject is a legal concept, the concept of a proprietary right. The core of land law is the subset formed when the conceptual category of 'property right' is confined to one context: the law relating to property rights in land. To focus on that core is neither to downgrade the importance of the units in the next circles nor to forget that in real life all the units which we have identified, and others, cohere together.

3 THREE UNDERLYING QUESTIONS

As Birks suggests, the focus of land law, and hence of this book, is on private property rights to use land. We will examine the concept of a property right in Chapters 4 and 5. Birks suggests that land law examines the 'nature, creation and protection' of property rights relating to land. Certainly, at a very general level, the questions that we will examine in this book can be organized into three broad groups: firstly, there are questions about the content of rights to use land; secondly, there are questions about the acquisition of rights to use land; thirdly, there are questions about the defences available to one party where another party has a right to use land. In Part B of this book, we will look in detail at the different content of particular rights to use land. In Part C, we will look at how a person can acquire such rights. And in Part D, when considering how the law establishes the priority of competing rights to use land, we will look at the defences that may be available to a person against another's right to use land. In the remaining parts of the book, Parts E-H, we will look in more detail at specific contexts in which these questions about content, acquisition and defences may arise.

To take a simple example, imagine that you are interested in buying a house advertised in the window of a local estate agency. It is important to know whether the house is advertised as 'freehold' or 'leasehold'. The point is that the vendor is not simply selling a house: she is selling her right to use the land. If you go ahead and buy her house, you will acquire a particular private right to use land. As Birks suggests, land law deals with the nature of that right. In particular, it is vital for you to know the content of the right: if you acquire the right, how will you be able to use the land? As we will see in Chapter 4, a freehold will give you ownership of the land for an unlimited period; a leasehold also gives you ownership, but only for a limited period.

Let us say that you have established that the vendor is selling a freehold, and that you have decided to go ahead and make an offer. Your focus will then shift to the acquisition question: what has to be done in order for you to acquire the vendor's freehold? In Birks' terms, land law deals with the creation of your right to use the land. There will generally be two stages to the process, often known as 'contract' and 'conveyance'. At the first stage, you need to know (or, at least, your solicitor or conveyancer needs to know) what has to be done in order to reach a legally binding agreement with the vendor. As noted above, there are special rules that regulate contracts to transfer a right such as a freehold. We will examine those rules in this book (see Chapter 7, section 3), because they are crucial in defining how a party can acquire a private right to use land.

At the second stage, you need to know (or, at least, your solicitor or conveyancer needs to know) what has to be done in order for you actually to acquire the vendor's freehold: we will also examine those rules in Chapter 7. As we will see, registration forms a crucial part of the process: even if you pay the vendor and even if you move into her house, you do not actually acquire her freehold unless and until you are recorded on the central register as holding that right.

If all goes well and you are now registered as holding a freehold, it might seem that you are home and dry. But let us say that one of your new neighbours, when walking to his house from the road, regularly takes a short cut across your new front garden. You (very politely) object to this and he (equally politely) claims that a former owner of your land granted him a right of way over your land. This is the first that you have heard of such a right: in fact, when acquiring your freehold, you checked on the central register and there was no mention of the land being subject to a right of way. If your neighbour was indeed given a right of way over your land, it will be necessary to establish which of the two competing rights (your freehold on the one hand and his right of way on the other) is to be given priority. At this point, as we will see in Chapter 12, the defences question is crucial. Even if your neighbour can show that he was given a right of way over your land, it may well be that you have a defence to his right and so do not need to let him walk across your land. In our example, that defence may come from the facts that: (i) you paid for, and registered, your freehold; and (ii) your neighbour failed to have his right of way noted on the register. This is just one example of how land law, to use Birks' words, deals with the protection of rights: it may be that your neighbour should have protected his right by having it noted on the register.

What if your neighbour instead claims that there is a public right of way, such as a public footpath, running over your land? If that is the case, then any member of the public will be able to walk over your front garden. We will not examine such public rights in this book, because our focus is on private rights: rights that can be held by an individual as an individual, not as a member of the public.

4 THE SPECIAL FEATURES OF LAND

Birks suggests that land law is a 'contextual subset' of property law. This raises the question of why we should gather together the legal rules relating to private rights to use land. We could equally, for example, study private rights to use chairs. Yet, whilst there are lots of books and courses dealing with 'land law', very few deal with 'chair law'. One reason, of course, is the practical importance of land—but then chairs are pretty useful too. A linked, but better, reason is that land has certain features that make it a unique resource, fundamentally different from other types of physical thing. The legal rules relating to rights to use chairs are essentially identical to those relating to rights to use tables, bikes, or cauliflowers. So, these rules can be found in books or courses dealing with 'personal property law'. In fact, personal property law deals with private rights to use just about any physical thing other than land. Land is separated out for special treatment because, due to its fundamentally different physical characteristics, rights to use land are regulated by fundamentally different legal rules.

The following extract discusses those special features and the special legal rules to which they give rise.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 7–11)

Permanence

Subject to the rarest of exceptions, land is permanent. Whereas other objects that can be physically located (e.g. bikes) wear out, the usefulness of land endures. This special feature of land is reflected by a special feature of the land law system: ownership of land can be split up over time. For example, A, an owner of land, can give B a Lease: B then has ownership of that land for a limited period. In contrast, if A is an owner of a bike, A cannot give B ownership of that bike for a limited period.

Uniqueness

"Location, location, location": a crucial feature of any piece of land is its physical location. That physical location can never be shared by another piece of land. In this significant sense, all pieces of land are unique. This special feature of land explains two special rules of land law.

Recovery of the thing itself from X or C?

First, let us say that: (i) B owns a thing, such as a bike; and (ii) X takes physical control of that thing without B's consent or other lawful authority. B can assert his right, as an owner of the thing, against X: by interfering with B's right, X commits a wrong against B. However, there is no guarantee that a court will order X to return the bike to B: rather than getting his thing back, B may well have to settle for receiving money from X [...]

In contrast, if: (i) B has ownership of some land; and (ii) X takes physical control of that land without B's consent or other lawful authority; then (iii) a court will make an order (a "possession order") allowing B to remove X and to take physical control of the land. This difference between land and other things thus relates to the remedies question: the question of how a court will protect B's right. It explains why land is sometimes known as "real property". "Real" comes from the Latin for "thing" (res); when used in the phrase "real property" it indicates that B can recover the thing itself if wrongfully deprived of it by X or C.

Forcing A to transfer the thing itself to B?

Second, let's say A owns a bike and makes a contractual promise to transfer his ownership to B. A then changes his mind and refuses to go ahead with the transfer. B can assert his right against A: by breaching his contractual duty to B, A commits a wrong against B. However, it is unlikely that the court will order A to transfer the bike itself to B; B will, almost always, have to settle for receiving money from A. The aim of remedies for breach of contract is to put B in the position he would have been in had A kept his promise: B's right is adequately protected if A gives B any money necessary to allow B to buy a similar bike elsewhere.

However, where A promises to transfer a unique thing to B, the position is different. To put B in the position he would have been had A kept his promise, A must give B the thing itself. So, in the rare case where A promises to transfer a unique bike to B, A may be ordered to keep his promise. In contrast, if A promises to transfer land to B, the standard position is that a court will order A to keep his promise and to transfer his right to the land to B: after all, each piece of land is unique. Again, this difference between land and other things relates to the remedies question: the question of how a court will protect B's right. Where B's contractual right is to acquire a right to land, it is, in general, specifically protected; where B's contractual right is to acquire a right to a thing other than land, B usually has to settle for receiving money.

Capacity for multiple simultaneous use

The same piece of land can be used in many different ways, by many different people, at the same time. For example, let's say:

1. A buys No.32 Acacia Gardens from A0.
2. A0 owns a local shop and makes A promise, when buying No.32, that neither A nor future owners of No.32 will use it as a shop.

3. A acquires No.32 with a "mortgage" loan: in return for a loan from C Bank, A gives C Bank a security right. C Bank thus has a right, if A fails to pay back the loan, to: (i) remove A and other occupiers from the land; (ii) sell the land; and (iii) use the proceeds to pay off A's debt.
4. In return for payment from E, a neighbour, A gives E a right to reach E's house by using a path crossing the garden of No.32.
5. A then moves away. He decides to keep the land and use it as an investment by renting it to B. So, in return for paying money to A, B is permitted to occupy the land. B uses the land as his home and allows his lover, D, to live with him.

Each of A0, A, B, C, D and E has a right to make some use (or at least to prevent a particular use) of the land. Things other than land are also capable of multiple, simultaneous use. If A owns a bike, A can: (i) give B permission to ride the bike; and (ii) offer his bike as security for a loan from C. The difference between land and other things is therefore one of degree. However, the difference remains important as it poses a significant question for the land law system: can it reconcile the competing desires of all those who simultaneously want to use the same piece of land? It certainly helps to explain another special feature of the land law system: the longer list of property rights in land.

Social importance

Land is uniquely capable of meeting important social needs. B can only acquire the sense of security and identity that comes with establishing a home if he has some sort of right in relation to land. Similarly, it is very difficult to establish business premises without a right to use land. As a result, an interference with B's use of land can have dramatic consequences. For example, eviction from a settled home can cause great stress and disruption; eviction from business premises can cause grave commercial harm.

This special feature of land is reflected in a number of special rules. For example, if: (i) B occupies land as his home; and (ii) C unlawfully prevents B occupying that land or with the intention of causing B to leave the land, interferes with the "peace or comfort" of B or members of B's household, then (iii) C commits a criminal offence.[4] Further, if B has ownership of some land, the rest of the world is under a prima facie duty not to unreasonably interfere with B's use and enjoyment of that land. So, if C's pig farm, next to B's land, produces nauseating smells, C breaches that duty and thus commits the wrong of nuisance against B. However, C commits no such wrong if he interferes, in a similar way, with B's enjoyment of a thing other than land.[5] Further, in some circumstances, A and B's private agreement can be regulated by mandatory rules protecting B's use of land. So, if A gives B a Lease of land for one year, B may have a statutory right to remain even after the year has expired.

This special feature of land also means that certain human rights may be of particular relevance in land law. For example, Article 8 of the European Convention of Human Rights states that: "Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence." [. . .] [T]his right is of course subject to qualifications; but the social importance of land means that the right may have a role in shaping the rules of the land law system.

[5] [To bring a claim in nuisance, B must have a property right in land: see Hunter v Canary Wharf [1997] AC 655.]

Limited availability

It is impossible to make more land. This special feature of land has a number of consequences. First, coupled with the many valuable uses to which land can be put, it ensures that land is an expensive commodity. For most, acquiring ownership of land is impossible unless a lender, such as C Bank, is willing to provide a substantial loan. In return, C Bank will demand a security right over the land. Second, the limited availability of land intensifies the need for the stock of land to be freely marketable. As a result, it is particularly undesirable for an owner to remove land from the market by placing permanent restrictions on its use.

The limited availability of land, coupled with its importance and uniqueness, can lead to special limits being placed on an owner of land. For example, the need to promote the marketability of land has led the land law system to give protection to certain parties [e.g. C] who acquire rights relating to land. As we will see, registration rules, particularly prominent in land law, are one means of giving C such protection. Equally, the rules of the land law system have long tried to promote marketability by preventing an owner from limiting the use of land after his death. Further, legislation commonly allows public bodies compulsory purchase powers: powers to acquire land from an owner in order to use it for a specific purpose, such as the building of a motorway.

More startling is the doctrine of adverse possession: a means by which an owner of land can lose his right without receiving any compensation. Due to changes in the registered land system, the doctrine of adverse possession now has much less of an impact. However, where it applies, its effect is dramatic. If: (i) X occupies B's land without B's consent; and (ii) B fails, over a long period, to take steps to remove X; then (iii) B's right to the land can be extinguished. The doctrine only applies if X has been acting as an owner of the land: it protects X's claimed ownership, exercised over the long period, by extinguishing B's prior ownership. It can protect X even if X is fully aware that the land initially belongs to B. In this way, the doctrine recognises X's claim (established by his long use) and removes the right of B, who has failed to make use of his land.

The doctrine of adverse possession applies only to land. If: (i) X takes physical control of B's bike without B's consent or other authority; and (ii) B fails, over a long period, to assert his ownership against X; then (iii) there is no general rule that the passage of time, by itself, can lead to B losing his ownership of the bike. The limited availability of land supports the idea that land is too scarce a commodity to remain under the ownership of a party who fails, over a long period, to assert his right. As seen above, it also heightens the need for land to be freely marketable. The doctrine of adverse possession certainly promotes that goal: the extinction of B's right not only protects X, but also anyone later acquiring a right from X.

As demonstrated by the extract, the special physical features of land lead to special legal rules that regulate private rights to use land. Those rules can be organized into three general groups by looking at: the content of those rights; the means by which they can be acquired; and the defences that may be used against them.

One of the most distinctive features of land law is that the content of property rights can be more varied than the content of property rights relating to, say, chairs. This is because many of the property rights that we will examine in later chapters can exist only in relation to land: this is the case, for example, with the lease (see Chapters 22 and 23), easement (see Chapter 25), and restrictive covenant (see Chapter 26). Due to the social importance of land, there may also be special means by which a party can acquire a right to use land. For example, if you set up home with your partner, then, even if your partner is registered as the sole owner of the home, you may nonetheless be able to rely on special rules, developed by the courts, to show that you have acquired a property right: we will examine those rules in detail in Chapter 16. In contrast, the limited availability of land may make it easier for you to lose a property right relating to land: there may be special defences that someone can use against your right to use the land. For example, the extract above refers to the doctrine of adverse possession: if you own land, but fail, over a long period, to assert your right to that land, a squatter may then gain a defence to your property right. We will examine adverse possession in detail in Chapter 8.

5 LAND LAW IN PRACTICE: OCCUPIERS V BANKS

There is no doubt that land law is a difficult subject. In defining and regulating private rights to use land, land law has some very tough choices to make. The best way to see this is by considering an example. In this section, we will consider the facts and result of an important land law case involving a dispute between an occupier of land and a bank. We will return to the case in later chapters, when we will examine the relevant principles in greater detail.[6] Our purpose here is simply to use the case, focusing on one specific aspect of land law, to highlight some of the difficult questions raised by the subject as well as some of the different approaches to tackling those questions.

When examining the case, as well as the other cases included in this book, we will necessarily look at how the rules of land law are used to solve disputes about the use of land. It is important, however, to bear in mind that those rules, as well as solving disputes, affect parties' future conduct. In particular, the rules form the background against which an owner of land can arrange his affairs. It is therefore important to remember that land law is not only about resolving disputes; it also aims to create a settled legal background against which parties can plan their future use of land.

5.1 THE FACTS OF THE CASE AND THE DILEMMA

In National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth,[7] Mr and Mrs Ainsworth lived together in Milward Road, Hastings, Sussex. Mr Ainsworth was registered as owner of the home. In 1957, Mr Ainsworth moved out. In 1958, he borrowed £1,000 from the National Provincial Bank.[8] The money was borrowed as part of a mortgage deal: to secure his duty to repay that sum, plus interest, Mr Ainsworth gave the bank a particular right (a charge) over his home.[9] This meant that, if Mr Ainsworth were to fall behind in his repayments, the bank would have a power to sell the land and use the proceeds to meet his debt. By 1962, Mr Ainsworth had fallen behind on his repayments to the bank. The bank wished to sell the land. To get a good price, the bank knew that it had to sell the home with vacant possession. Because Mrs Ainsworth refused to leave, the bank applied for an order for possession of the home.

[8] Formerly one of the largest banks in England and Wales, the National Provincial Bank became part of the National Westminster Bank in 1970.

[9] In fact, before borrowing the money and giving the bank the charge, Mr Ainsworth had transferred his title to the home to a company: that company then granted the bank its charge. In separate proceedings against her husband, however, Mrs Ainsworth succeeded in having the transfer to the company set aside, so the later litigation between the bank and Mrs Ainsworth proceeded on the basis that the company had not been involved, and that Mr Ainsworth had retained title to the home, and given the bank its charge directly.

The majority of the Court of Appeal, led by Lord Denning MR, found that Mrs Ainsworth had a right to occupy the land that bound the bank. On that basis, the bank's claim for possession would fail. But the House of Lords reversed the finding of the Court of Appeal: Mrs Ainsworth had to leave the land. As we will see in Chapter 5, section 5.4, the House of Lords' decision depended in part on the content question: in contrast to the Court of Appeal, it found that Mrs Ainsworth's right did not count as a property right and so was not capable of binding the bank. As we will see in Chapter 6, section 2.6, the House of Lords also found that Mrs Ainsworth had no direct right against the bank: there was nothing in the bank's conduct that placed it under a duty to allow Mrs Ainsworth to remain in her home.

The House of Lords, like the Court of Appeal, had a tough choice to make. Mrs Ainsworth and the bank can each be seen as victims, in different ways, of Mr Ainsworth—he gave the bank a charge over the home without telling his wife; equally, her claim came as a surprise to the bank, as Mr Ainsworth, when giving the bank that charge, had not informed the bank that he had deserted his wife. The court was thus forced to choose between two parties who can each be seen as 'innocent'.

This type of dilemma is common in property law. For example, consider a case in which the claimant owns property and sells that property to a fraudster, who then fails to pay for the goods. Before the fraud is discovered, the rogue sells the goods on to the defendant, who pays the usual market price for them. Of course, each of the claimant and the defendant has a good claim against the fraudster; in practice, however, such a claim is likely to be rendered useless by the fraudster's disappearance or hopeless insolvency. A crucial question, then, is who has the better right to the goods: the claimant or the defendant? If it is the claimant, then the innocent defendant will lose out, as he or she will have to pay the value of the goods to the claimant. If the defendant has the better right, in contrast, the innocent claimant will lose out, as he or she will have parted with their goods without receiving any payment in return.

As the following extract shows, when the dilemma arises in relation to land rather than goods, the special features of land sharpen the court's dilemma. To translate the passage to the case, Mr Ainsworth equates to the party referred to as 'A'; Mrs Ainsworth to 'B'; and the bank takes the role of 'C Bank'.

On the one hand, B can point to the social importance of land: [she] is currently using the land as a home and uprooting that home will cause severe disruption. B can also point to the uniqueness of land: even if B is able to find a home elsewhere, it will be in a different location and so B may be forced to change many aspects of [her] life. So it might seem that the social importance and uniqueness of land should cause the rules of the land law system to lean in favour of someone, such as B, who is currently occupying or otherwise making use of land.

However, C Bank can make a powerful counter-argument. It may well have made a substantial loan to A: the limited availability of land, along with its social importance, ensures that land has a high value. So, if C Bank is unable to sell the land, it is likely to be left substantially out of pocket. It is also important to think about the wider consequences of finding in favour of B. First, whilst it is easy to have sympathy with B rather than with a faceless bank, it should be remembered that if banks have systematic problems in recovering loans, this can have repercussions not just for the bank's customers but for the wider economy.[10] Second, if C Bank is unable to sell the land, we need to consider the effect of such a decision on lenders' future practice. Will lenders have to carry out extensive and expensive checks to ensure that there are no other users of the home who may later thwart a lender's attempt to sell the land? After all, as land is capable of multiple, simultaneous use, there may be many potential rights that a lender will need to watch out for. The costs incurred by lenders would then be passed on to borrowers. As land is already very expensive, this will make it harder still for would-be homeowners to enter the market. And, given its limited availability, it would be unfortunate if land became very difficult to trade in. Given we can't produce new land, we should be particularly careful to make sure the land we do have does not become permanently burdened and thus difficult to buy or sell.

[...T]he dispute between B and C Bank could be characterised as part of a wider clash between commerce and market forces on the one hand and the need for social protection and the maintenance of a home on the other. The fact that the dispute involves land, a special kind of thing, does not help us resolve this conflict; instead, it heightens the tension. The dispute between market forces and social protection thus draws out the ambivalent nature of land itself. On the one hand, it is of limited availability and constitutes an important financial investment: we therefore do not want the process of buying land to be unduly difficult. Yet on the other hand, it is unique and socially important: we therefore do not want to give insufficient protection to those who use and, in particular, occupy land.

5.2 TWO POSSIBLE APPROACHES

Before we examine the reasoning of the courts in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth, it is worth asking how a court should approach the dispute between the occupier and the bank. In the following extract, Harris contrasts two broad types of possible approach. He opens with a quotation from Max Weber, the political economist and sociologist.

(3rd series, eds Eekelaar and Bell, 1987, pp 168–9)

> 'The expectations of the parties are oriented towards the economic and utilitarian meaning of a legal proposition. However, from the point of view of legal logic, this meaning is an "irrational one" [...] a "lawyers' law" has never been and never will be brought into conformity with lay expectation unless it totally renounce that formal character which is immanent in it. This is just as true of the English law which we glorify so much to-day, as it has been of the ancient Roman jurists or of the methods of modern continental legal thought.'[11]

So wrote Max Weber some seventy years ago. It constitutes one of his leading conclusions about the nature of lawyers' law. It points to a contrast between formal-doctrinal (and hence circumscribed) reasoning which, he claimed, was intrinsic to professional legal thinking, and open-ended consequentialist controversy over the interpretation of legal propositions.

[10] The importance to the wider economy of such banks was dramatically emphasized by the UK government's nationalization of Northern Rock plc using powers under the Banking (Special Provisions) Act 2008. The problems faced by that bank, a major 'mortgage' lender, were not caused by difficulties faced by the bank in recovering loans, but the highly unusual steps taken by the government nonetheless demonstrate the importance of such banks to the wider economy.

[11] Weber, Law in Economy and Society (ed Rheinstein, 1954), pp 307–8.

> If there are rival views as to the meaning of a legal rule, the layman expects the choice to be made according to which version will have the best outcome, all things considered. The professional lawyer, however, will settle the issue by reference to doctrinal arguments based upon existing legal materials.
> I propose to examine this alleged contrast in the context of current issues concerning interests in land in English law. I shall argue that the dichotomy exists, but not in the stark Weberian form. Consequentialist interpretation is not, from the point of view of legal logic, 'irrational'. On the contrary, it constitutes the basis of one professionally accepted style of reasoning—what I call the 'utility model of rationality'. However, the 'doctrine model of rationality'—along with two other models—also plays a crucial role in the development of the law. To the extent that 'policy' can never totally displace doctrine, so long as our legal institutions retain anything like their present character, Weber was correct [...] if we want to ditch doctrine, we need to invent new institutions, new lawyers, and a new conception of 'law' itself.

Harris thus identifies two prominent, but contrasting, models that may inform a court's approach when dealing with cases such as Ainsworth. The 'utility model of rationality' is based on what Weber sees as a non-specialist's expectation of how the dispute should be decided: it essentially consists of weighing up, on one side, the practical advantages of favouring the occupier and, on the other, the practical advantages of finding for the bank. The 'doctrinal model of rationality' is based on what Weber calls 'lawyers' law': the dispute is resolved by the application of specific legal rules, not by a general weighing of the consequences of finding in favour of the occupier or the bank.

Was either of those models important in the decisions in Ainsworth? To test this, we can examine an extract from each of the Court of Appeal and House of Lords decisions.

5.3 THE COURT OF APPEAL'S APPROACH IN AINSWORTH

Although Russell LJ dissented, the majority of the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning MR and Donovan LJ) found in favour of Mrs Ainsworth. The case was the culmination of a series of decisions in which the Court of Appeal, under Lord Denning's direction, had first created and then developed a right that protected a party such as Mrs Ainsworth: the 'deserted wife's equity'. In the extract below, Lord Denning relies on those decisions to find that Mrs Ainsworth's 'deserted wife's equity' protected her not only against her husband, but also against the bank.

National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth* (sub nom National Provincial Bank v Hastings Car Mart and ors)
[1964] Ch 665 (CA)

Lord Denning MR

On August 17, 1957, the husband deserted his wife and children. He left the matrimonial home at 124, Milward Road, and has never returned. The wife has remained there with the children ever since. The husband went off with another woman and committed adultery with her. The bank did not know of these domestic happenings. They did not know that he had deserted his wife. [...]

On January 27, 1959, the wife filed a petition for judicial separation, not for divorce. The reason for judicial separation was because she wanted to remain in the house. She was advised that if she divorced her husband, she would have no security of tenure. But that, so long as she remained married to him, her position with regard to the house was reasonably secure. She did not, therefore, seek a divorce. But she petitioned for a judicial separation. She based it on her husband's adultery. (She did not base it on his desertion because the necessary three years had not elapsed.) The husband wanted a divorce, not a judicial separation. A good deal of pressure was brought on the wife to induce her to change her prayer from one of judicial separation to one of divorce. But she refused. And her main reason was because of the house. She wanted to stay there because she had no other place for herself and the children.

[Lord Denning then described the loan made by the bank and the charge it received in return over 124, Milward Road, noting that it was 'important' that, when taking the charge, the bank 'made no inquiries as to who was living in the house or on what terms.']

The wife knew nothing of these transactions with the property. She proceeded with her petition for judicial separation. It came on for hearing in March, 1961. It lasted for four days. She won completely. She was granted a judicial separation on the ground of her husband's adultery, and his cross-prayer was dismissed. On May 2, 1961, the wife obtained an order for permanent alimony against her husband on these terms: she was to be at liberty to live with the children in the house, 124, Milward Road, rent free; and in addition he was to pay her £4 6*s.* 6*d.* a week for herself, and £1 18*s.* 5*d.* a week for each child. She has lived since that time in the house, rent free, with her children; but the husband has not made the money payments due under the order. He is seriously in arrears. We were told that he has been made bankrupt. And she has had to resort to national assistance [i.e. state benefits] for herself and the children.

In February, 1962, the bank wrote to the wife demanding possession of the house. They said that they required to enforce their charge on the property and, in order to do so, required the property to be vacated. She went to solicitors, who pointed out that her husband had deserted her and the children and she had no place to go to. But the bank determined to press on with the claim [. . .] And they now seek to get possession of No. 124, Milward Road, so as to sell it with vacant possession. If they do so, it is probable (so we were told) that, at the high prices now prevailing, they may more than recoup themselves all that they have lost with interest, and there may be a balance over to go to somebody—but not to the wife, not even for the arrears of alimony. The husband, we are told, is bankrupt. Arrears of alimony are not provable in bankruptcy. [. . .]

Since the war there have been many cases in this court which have established that a wife, who has been deserted by her husband, has a right to remain in occupation of the matrimonial home unless and until the court orders her to go. The development can be easily traced. Prior to the war it was recognised that, where the husband owns the matrimonial home and is living there himself, he cannot turn his wife out. He cannot treat her as a stranger. He cannot exclude her from the house without good cause.[12] Now suppose he deserts his wife and goes off, leaving her in the matrimonial home with the children. Is he to be in any better position because he has deserted her? Can he turn her out as if she was a stranger? Clearly not. He cannot take advantage of his own wrong—of his own desertion—and use it as a ground for ejecting her. The reason is simply this: it is the husband's duty to provide the wife with a roof over her head; and, by providing the matrimonial home, he gives her an authority to be there. It is an authority which he cannot revoke, so long as it remains the matrimonial home. He certainly cannot revoke it on his desertion. Just as in olden days a deserted wife had an irrevocable authority to pledge his credit for necessaries, so in these days she has an irrevocable authority to remain in the matrimonial home. [...]

But the question here is: what is the position of successors in title? Suppose the husband, after deserting his wife, sells the house over her head, or mortgages it without her knowledge. Can the purchaser or mortgagee turn her out? The courts have already given some consideration to the problem. Take first the case where the husband becomes bankrupt and the property becomes vested in his trustee in bankruptcy. Can the trustee turn her out and sell the house for the benefit of the creditors? This court has held that the trustee stands in no better position than the husband and cannot turn her out: see Bendall v. McWhirter.[13] Take then the case where the husband sells the house to his new mistress for an agreed price. Can the mistress turn her out? It would be surprising if she could. Lynskey J. held that the new mistress cannot turn out the wife: see Street v. Denham.[14] Take next the case where the husband conveys the house to a purchaser, by a genuine conveyance and no sham, but intending that the purchaser should sue the wife for possession. In one case he conveyed it to his brother-in-law; in another to a speculator. Can such a purchaser turn out the wife? The judges have held that he cannot do so: see Ferris v. Weaven;[15] Savage v. Hubble.[16] Take finally this case, where the husband conveys the house to a company, which is entirely under his control, in return for fully paid shares. Can the company turn out the wife? Cross J. thought it inconceivable. 'I cannot think, however,' he said, 'that any court would allow the company to turn Mrs. Ainsworth out of the house without providing her with another home.'[17]

Such being the decided cases, what is the principle underlying them? It is the way of English law to decide particular cases and then seek for the principle. It has been suggested that those cases turned on the fact that there was a collusive arrangement between husband and purchaser. But what does this mean? Collusion is not unlawful if it is designed to achieve a lawful end by lawful means. In all these cases, if the wife has no right to remain there, the husband is fully entitled to sell the house to a purchaser or to give it away, even though the design of both is that the purchaser or donee should evict her for their own benefit. It is only because she has a right to remain that it is unlawful to enter into an arrangement designed to turn her out. Take this simple instance: suppose the husband says to a prospective purchaser: 'I cannot myself turn out my wife because I have deserted her; but if you buy from me, there is nothing to stop you getting her out, and then you can sell with vacant possession.' If such a transaction were permitted, the husband would benefit greatly because he would get a high price at his wife's expense. There is nothing wrong with such a transaction if the wife has no right to remain. But there is everything wrong with it if she has a right. It seems to me that, if the cases I have mentioned were correctly decided, as I believe them to be, it can only be on the footing that the wife has a right to remain in the matrimonial home—and a right which is enforceable against the successors of the husband—save, of course, a purchaser for value without notice [...]

It is said that this will put an undue burden on purchasers and mortgagees, but I do not see this. If the husband, on deserting his wife, had granted the wife a tenancy (as he might well have done) they would be bound by it if they made no inquiry of her. So, in order to be safe, they should make inquiry at the house. I do not see why it should be in the least embarrassing. All they need say is: 'As we are buying (or lending money on) the house, we wish to verify the occupation of it.' She may say: 'I live here with my husband,' or 'I am a tenant,' or 'My husband has left me.' The husband may deny it, but his denial would not affect her right, if she was a tenant. Nor should it, if she has been deserted.

Then it is said that the wife should look after herself and should apply to the court for an injunction to stop her husband selling the house over her head[18] and register the suit as a pending action under the Land Charges Act, 1925. But what wife, I ask, on being deserted, has the knowledge or foresight to do this? More often than not she carries on in the house, hoping that her husband will return. She does not go straight off to a lawyer; and, if she does, it is not every lawyer who advises action at once. The lawyer here did not do so. Surely she can rest on the fact that she is in actual occupation of the house. The burden should not rest on her to take action, but on the purchaser to make inquiries.

The question remains: what order should be made? When should the wife go? It is a matter for the discretion of the court. On the one hand there is the bank who desire to recoup themselves all that is owing to them. On the other hand there is the wife with four children, receiving nothing from her husband, and on National Assistance. Of all the creditors of the husband, she has the most crying claim of all. It is a case where I would fain temper justice with mercy. Justice to the bank, with mercy to the wife.

[Further evidence was then filed, as to the sums owing to the bank and to the value of the house. After hearing that evidence, Lord Denning MR formulated the court's order]

This is clearly a case where the bank are owed a sum in the region of £2,000 and meanwhile interest is running upon it. Equally, on the other hand, the wife is living in the house with four children. Her husband only pays her £5 a week instead of the £12 which he has been ordered to pay. She receives £1 8*s.* a week by way of family allowance and £3 8*s.* 6*d.* from the National Assistance Board.

It is a matter, as the majority of this court have held, for the discretion of this court as to what order should he made for possession. We think that the bank should be protected in this way: that the interest which is payable to them on their outstanding advance should be paid and also that there should be a sum paid sufficient to enable any necessary repairs to be carried out. It seems, as far as we can judge, that the sum of £3 a week should cover these current expenses. We understand that the value of the house may be somewhere in the region of £2,500 or £2,600. That means that the principal owing to the bank is covered. So the bank should be fully covered in every respect. In these circumstances we think, exercising our discretion, that it would be quite reasonable for the wife to be able to stay in the house for a period, which we fix now at twelve months. At the end of one month she ought to start paying the sum of £3 a week and pay £3 a week thereafter. We hope that will give her an opportunity during the month to obtain assistance from the National Assistance Board, which it appears likely she will be able to get, so as to be able to pay that sum. The bank should keep an account relative to the £3 a week, remembering that the greater portion of it is interest paid by her and they can deal with any tax position arising out of it, and they will also no doubt, for the sake of their security, deal with any question of repairs. In addition to that period of twelve months, which we fix, we also think it right to give liberty to apply, for instance, to the bank if the payments are not made so that they can ask for possession, but liberty also to the wife to apply. It is contemplated that there may be an appeal to the House of Lords in this case, and if the payments are made, it would seem reasonable that she should remain in possession at least until the House of Lords have given their decision. But, at all events, what we fix is an order for possession at the end of a period of twelve months: but as from one month from today, £3 a week is to be paid by the wife to the bank, liberty to both parties, to apply in case of need.

In analysing Lord Denning's approach, we can use both of the models of legal reasoning identified by Harris: the 'utility model' and the 'doctrinal model'. In one way, Lord Denning appeals to the doctrinal model: he argues that protecting a deserted wife against a bank involves only a logical, incremental extension of the existing case-law. In another, more significant way, however, his Lordship's approach is motivated by the utility model: by the desire to find what Harris calls the 'best outcome, all things considered'. Firstly, consider Lord Denning's analysis of the facts of the case: he emphasizes the vulnerability of Mrs Ainsworth and her children and contrasts their innocence not only with the adultery of Mr Ainsworth but also with the laxity of the bank, who failed to make its own inspection of the house before acquiring a charge over the land. Secondly, and most importantly, Lord Denning's conclusion ensures that the court has a very wide discretion to reach whatever result it considers just. To find that Mrs Ainsworth's deserted wife's equity binds the bank does not mean that the bank are necessarily denied a possession order. For the effect of that equity can only be determined by a court, considering all the facts (including the parties' respective financial positions) and combining '[j]ustice to the bank, with mercy to the wife'. On this approach, then, the ultimate resolution of the case depends entirely on the judges' view of what is 'the best outcome, all things considered'. As we will see in the next extract, however, the House of Lords decisively rejected this view.

To understand Lord Denning's approach, it is important to be aware of the social and economic context in which the courts developed the concept of the 'deserted wife's equity'. This context is discussed in the following extract.

Dunn, 'National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth (1965)' in Landmark Cases in Equity (eds Mitchell and Mitchell, 2012)

In a decade leading up to legislative reform on equal pay and sex discrimination, concern with the economic vulnerability of women had become a worldwide concern. The legal, social and fiscal vulnerability of the abandoned spouse will be evident in any age, but for the wife was particularly acute in the 1950s and 1960s. In an age which saw the beginnings of an erosion of traditionalist values and attitudes towards the family, rising divorce rates and ultimately a liberalisation of divorce laws, this was a period in which wives tended not to be in circumstances which would allow them to establish financial independence or housing security. Whilst there was a rise in numbers of women going out to work and earning a separate income, wage rates in this period were insufficient to afford independent housing. The post-war housing shortage also meant that there was a dearth of affordable housing, and for a deserted wife (and her children) the possibility of homelessness was a real one. Against this background, wives' vulnerability was addressed directly by Lord Denning within the case law as a process of welfare-based discretionary justice to prevent a husband from 'taking advantage of his own wrong'.[19]

[19] National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth (sub nom National Provincial Bank v Hastings Car Mart [1964] Ch 665 (CA) 683 (Lord Denning MR). Also accepted was the emotional cruelty which could occur in permitting a husband to sell the matrimonial home to his new partner over the head of his wife, as occurred for example in Street v Denham [1954] 1 WLR 624.

5.4 THE HOUSE OF LORDS' APPROACH IN AINSWORTH

A unanimous House of Lords differed from the majority of the Court of Appeal as to the answer to be given to the crucial content question: did Mrs Ainsworth's 'deserted wife's equity' count as a property right, capable of binding not only Mr Ainsworth but also a third party such as the bank? The House of Lords thus rejected Lord Denning's analysis, not only allowing the bank's appeal but also overruling the previous Court of Appeal and first instance decisions, relied on by Lord Denning, that had allowed a 'deserted wife's equity' to bind a party other than the relevant husband.[20]

[1965] AC 1175, HL

Lord Upjohn

In this case your Lordships are dealing with essentially conveyancing matters. It has been the policy of the law for over a hundred years to simplify and facilitate transactions in real property. It is of great importance that persons should be able freely and easily to raise money on the security of their property. [Lord Upjohn then considered what would happen if, before making such a secured loan, the bank were to check the husband's property and ask the deserted wife what rights she had in that land] The answer 'I am a deserted wife' (if given) only gives notice of a right so imprecise, so incapable of definition, so impossible of measurement in legal phraseology or terms of money that if [it] is to be safe the [bank] will refuse to do business and much unnecessary harm will be done [. . .] It does not seem to me that an inquiry as to the marital status of a woman in occupation of property is one which the law can reasonably require to be made; it is not reasonable for a third party to be compelled by law to make inquiries into the delicate and possibly uncertain and fluctuating state of affairs between a couple whose marriage is going wrong. Still less can it be reasonable to make an inquiry if the answer to be expected will probably lead to no conclusion which can inform the inquirer with any certainty as to the rights of the occupant. These considerations give strong support to the opinion I have already expressed that the rights of the wife must be regarded as purely personal between herself and her husband.

Lord Wilberforce

My Lords, the doctrine of the 'deserted wife's equity' has been evolved by the courts during the past 13 years in an attempt to mitigate some effects of the housing shortage which has persisted since the 1939–45 war. To a woman, whose husband has left her, especially if she has children, it is of little use to receive periodical payments for her maintenance (even if these are in fact punctually made) if she is left without a home. Once possession of a house has been lost, the process of acquiring another place to live in may be painful and prolonged. So, even though, as is normally the case, the home is in law the property of the husband, the [20] See the House of Lords decision: [1965] AC 1175 at 1252, per Lord Wilberforce. The decisions in Bendal v McWhirter [1952] 2 QB 466 and Street v Denham [1954] 1 WLR 624 were overruled, and the decision in Ferris v Weaven [1952] 2 All ER 233 was explained on a different basis—for that explanation, see Chapter 4, section 3.1.

courts have intervened to prevent him from using his right of property to remove his deserted wife from it and they have correspondingly recognised that she has a right, or "equity" as it has come to be called, which the law will protect, to remain there.

This case relates to one aspect, and one aspect only, of [the deserted wife's equity]. No question arises here as to any claim which a deserted wife may have against her husband: all that we are concerned with is the right of a deserted wife to remain in possession as against a third party, claiming, in good faith, under the husband. And the issue is even narrower than that: it relates only to the position of a third party whose title arises subsequently to the desertion [...]

The issue is thus a narrow one, affecting a small proportion only of those deserted wives who are left in occupation of their husband's house. Nevertheless as to them, as to [Mrs Ainsworth], issues of importance, and probably of hardship, are involved. The ultimate question must be whether such persons can be given the protection which social considerations of humanity evidently indicate without injustice to third parties and a radical departure from sound principles of real property law [...]

The appeal raises two questions, one of general, the other of more limited scope.[21] The general question is whether the respondent Mrs. Ainsworth as the deserted wife of her husband, the owner of the house, has any interest in or right over it which is capable of binding the bank as the proprietor of a legal interest in the land. This is a general question of real property law [...]

I turn to the first and more general question: what is the nature of the deserted wife's interest, or right? [Lord Wilberforce then analysed the duties imposed on Mr Ainsworth by the deserted wife's equity: his conclusion is set out below]

The position then, at the present time, is this. The wife has no specific right against her husband to be provided with any particular house, nor to remain in any particular house. She has a right to cohabitation and support. But, in considering whether the husband should be given possession of property of his, the court will have regard to the duty of the spouses to each other, and the decision it reaches will be based on a consideration of what may be called the matrimonial circumstances. These include such matters as whether the husband can provide alternative accommodation and if so whether such accommodation is suitable having regard to the estate and condition of the spouses; whether the husband's conduct amounts to desertion, whether the conduct of the wife has been such as to deprive her of any of her rights against the husband. And the order to be made must be fashioned accordingly: it may be that the wife should leave immediately or after a certain period: it may be subject to revision on a change of circumstances.

The conclusion emerges to my mind very clearly from this that the wife's rights, as regards the occupation of her husband's property, are essentially of a personal kind: personal in the sense that a decision can only be reached on the basis of considerations essentially dependent on the mutual claims of husband and wife as spouses and as the result of a broad weighing of circumstances and merit. Moreover, these rights are at no time definitive, they are provisional and subject to review at any time according as changes take place in the material circumstances and conduct of the parties.

On any division, then, which is to be made between property rights on the one hand, and personal rights on the other hand, however broad or penumbral the separating band between 21 [The second question was the defences question: even if Mrs Ainsworth's right counted as a property right and was thus capable of binding a third party, did the bank have a defence to that right? We will consider the particular defence raised by the bank in Chapter 12, section 3.2.]

these two kinds of rights may be, there can be little doubt where the wife's rights fall. Before a right or an interest can be admitted into the category of property, or of a right affecting property, it must be definable, identifiable by third parties, capable in its nature of assumption by third parties, and have some degree of permanence or stability. The wife's right has none of these qualities, it is characterised by the reverse of them.

5.5 COMPARING THE APPROACHES OF THE COURT OF APPEAL AND THE HOUSE OF LORDS

It would be over-simplistic to say that the difference in the results reached by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords depended entirely on the former's adoption of the 'utility model' of reasoning, whereas the latter favoured the 'doctrinal model'. Firstly, as noted above, Lord Denning did at least pay lip-service to the doctrinal model, by claiming that the Court of Appeal's decision was a logical extension of the pre-existing case-law as to the effect of a deserted wife's equity. Secondly, we can see the influence of the utility model in the extract, set out above, from Lord Upjohn's speech. The divergence from Lord Denning's approach is that Lord Upjohn attaches greater significance to the practical disadvantages of making it harder for banks to take an unencumbered security over land. Thirdly, in the first paragraph of the extract set out above, Lord Wilberforce acknowledges the social and economic factors that may well have motivated the Court of Appeal's decision.

It thus seems that the approaches of each of Lord Denning, Lord Upjohn and Lord Wilberforce can be seen as combining, in different proportions, elements of each of the utility model and the doctrinal model. This should be no surprise; we should not expect any judge deciding a difficult case wholly to ignore either the wider policy questions or the technical legal rules. It does seem, nonetheless, that in Lord Wilberforce's speech, the doctrinal model is more prominent: in particular, there is a concern to avoid 'a radical departure from sound principles of real property law.'[22] In other words, a decision in favour of Mrs Ainsworth can be made only if it can be reconciled with the doctrinal, technical rules of land law. And, according to Lord Wilberforce, those rules meant that Mrs Ainsworth's right could count as a property right (a right capable of binding the bank) only if it was 'definable, identifiable by third parties, capable in its nature of assumption by third parties, and ha[d] some degree of permanence or stability'.[23] Because Mrs Ainsworth's right did not have those features, the content question was decided against her and the bank was therefore free to remove her from her home.

It should be noted that, whilst the House of Lords was unanimous in its decision, each of Lord Cohen[24] and Lord Upjohn[25] called upon Parliament to consider legislative reform of the law, to improve the protection afforded to a deserted wife against third parties. In contrast, Lord Denning clearly felt that such protection could be developed by judicial means. This demonstrates an important point: a judge's view as to the constitutional limits on judges' freedom to create and develop the law may have an important influence on his or her approach. If, for example, a judge takes a fairly strict view as to [22] This point is noted by Harris: see 'Legal Doctrine and Interests in Land' in Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (3rd series, eds Eekelaar and Bell, 1987, n 60).

those limits, the doctrinal model may be more appealing. As Harris noted, concerns about the 'separation of powers' and the 'rule of law' may be used to limit reliance on the utility model: 'If judges resolve an uncertain question about the present law by an assessment and balancing of social consequences, are they not trespassing on the functions of the legislature?'.[26]

Certainly, at a number of points in this book, we will come across land law rules that are subject to disapproval, not only by commentators but also by the judges themselves. At such points, it is important to consider not only if the rules should be changed, but also how they should be changed. For example, in Chapter 16, section 2.3.2, we will examine a recent Supreme Court decision concerning the application of the acquisition question to interests in the family home; and in Chapter 22, section 2.7, we will examine a recent Supreme Court decision concerning the application of the content question to leases. Each case raised the question of whether it would be better to reform existing land law rules through judicial intervention or, instead, by legislation.

5.6 DEVELOPMENTS AFTER AINSWORTH: RIGHTS OF OCCUPATION

Parliament did not ignore Lord Cohen and Lord Upjohn's call for legislation to protect a party such as Mrs Ainsworth. The Matrimonial Homes Act 1967 established: (i) that a spouse has a (qualified) statutory right to occupy a home owned by his or her partner; and (ii) that the statutory right to occupy is capable of binding a third party, such as a bank, if and only if the spouse registers the right of occupation before the third party acquires its right. The 'spouse's right to occupy' thus replaces the 'deserted wife's equity': the statutory right is extended to husbands, and is not limited to spouses who have been deserted. Indeed the statutory right to occupy, now found in the Family Law Act 1996,[27] was extended to civil partners by the Civil Partnership Act 2004.[28]

Parliament thus reformed the law by coming up with a specific, tailored solution that it believed formed the best compromise between the need to protect an occupying spouse and the need to protect a third party such as a bank.[29] That compromise could not have been reached by purely judicial reform, as it avoids the doctrinal question of whether the right to occupy counts as a property right; instead, the right is allowed to bind a third party, such as a bank, only if it is registered. This is a way of addressing Lord Upjohn's concern, expressed in the extract above, that a bank should not have to undertake exhaustive or delicate enquiries: instead, the bank need only check the relevant register. If the spouse's right is not registered, then, even if the spouse is in occupation of the home when the bank acquires its right, the bank will not be bound. And, even if the right is registered, a court still has the discretion to allow a third party to remove the occupying spouse.[30]

5.7 DEVELOPMENTS AFTER AINSWORTH: PROPERTY RIGHTS IN THE FAMILY HOME

Whilst the Matrimonial Homes Act 1967 eventually settled the specific dilemma arising in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth, the wider issues raised by that case have certainly not gone away. First, the issue of women's rights in relation to family homes remains prominent, and the courts continue to be confronted by the question of whether the existing land law rules respond adequately to changing social and economic factors. Indeed, as we will see in Chapter 16, the question now relates not just to the rights of wives, but also to those of unmarried partners, and the focus has now shifted from the content question to the acquisition question. In other words, the question is not whether a 'deserted wife's equity', based on a wife's right to maintenance from her husband, can count as a property right and so bind a third party. Rather, the question now is how can a partner (married or unmarried) acquire a recognized property right: a share of ownership of the family home? Indeed, as the following extract indicates, this question was already an important one, even at the time of the Ainsworth litigation.

Kahn-Freund, 'Recent Legislation on Matrimonial Property' (1970) 33 MLR 601

The acquisition for family use of durable assets, immovable [i.e. land] and movable, is one of the dominant features of economic life in the Western world [. . .] Very often such acquisition is made possible through much improved facilities for married women to participate in gainful employment, owing to the state of the labour market, owing to family planning, and also owing to that mechanisation of the household which is in its turn the result of the ability of the family to use part of its current income towards the acquisition of durable assets [. . .] Mrs X may, by her thrift as a housewife, contribute as much to the acquisition of the matrimonial home or of the family car or the television set as her neighbour Mrs Y does by working in a factory or in an office. The maintenance obligation which the law imposes on the husband used to be considered as an answer to the question raised by the economic dependence of wives upon husbands which results from the arrangements of nature rather than those of society. As a housewife and as a mother the wife was 'rewarded' in this way. This approach to the problem had a certain plausibility as long as the large majority of married couples were compelled to spend their income on current needs of food, clothing and shelter for themselves and their children. The link between the law of matrimonial property and the law of matrimonial maintenance is as close today as ever it was, but how can one seriously assert that supply by the husband of the means to cover these elementary needs can be an equivalent to the wife's economic contribution (in whatever form) where a large part of the contribution is destined for the acquisition of durable goods, and especially of a home for the family?

[. . .] Today the problem of sharing between the spouses and of the protection of the non-earning housewife (which is part of it) can no longer be solved through the law of maintenance. It must comprise her share in what has been called 'household property' or 'family assets'. Much the most important of these is the family home, whether it be freehold or rented property.

Kahn-Freund's analysis must now, of course, be extended to unmarried cohabiting partners. His central point is that, even by the middle of the 1960's, the 'deserted wife's equity' was an anachronism. The equity was an elaboration of a husband's historic duty to maintain his wife: Lord Denning drew an explicit link between the equity and the wife's power 'in olden days' to pay for necessaries (such as food) by using her husband's credit.[31] This raises a real difficulty for Lord Denning's idea that the equity could bind a third party such as the bank—if the wife's right is ultimately based on a husband's duty to maintain his wife, how can the right also bind a third party, such as a bank? After all, the bank has no such duty to maintain Mrs Ainsworth. This difficulty, of course, was exposed when the case reached the House of Lords.

As Kahn-Freund suggests, a focus on maintenance is outdated: the real issue is as to the ownership of property acquired by cohabiting partners. And land, chiefly the home in which the partners live, is by far the most valuable and significant piece of such property. It may be, for example, that formal ownership of that land is vested in only one of the partners; but, as Kahn-Freund suggests, there may be strong arguments that the other partner should nonetheless have a share of the benefit of the property. It is therefore no surprise that, as we will see in Chapter 16, the modern focus of the law is on whether a partner has acquired a recognized property right in the family home. As we will see, however, the general issues raised by the Ainsworth litigation remain important. The dilemma faced by judges and Parliament is as acute as ever, and the tension between the utility model and the doctrinal model remains unresolved.

Although the Ainsworth litigation focussed on one particular corner of land law, it teaches us a number of general lessons. Firstly, as we noted in section 1 above, land law is clearly very important in practice: the outcome of the litigation had significant practical consequences not only for Mrs Ainsworth and the National Provincial Bank, but also for thousands of other occupiers and mortgage lenders sharing their positions.

Secondly, the case focused on whether the occupier had a private right to use land that she could assert against the bank: did Mrs Ainsworth have an interest in land (i.e. a property right) that could bind the bank? That question can usefully be broken down into three further questions: the content, acquisition, and defences questions. The content question considers the nature of a party's right and, in particular, asks if that right counts as a property right. The acquisition question concerns the means by which a party can acquire a private right to use land and, in particular, how a property right can be acquired. The defences question asks whether a party later acquiring a private right to use land may have a defence to a pre-existing property right held by another party. The Ainsworth litigation concerned the first of those questions; as suggested in section 5.7 above, its modern day equivalents, to be examined in Chapter 16, focus on the second of those questions.

The simple facts of Ainsworth demonstrate a tension that runs throughout land law: the tension between two parties who each claim competing rights to use the land. At a more abstract level, the judges' differing approaches to the case show a further tension: between a 'utility model' (in which a court should make the decision having what it regards as the best practical consequences) and a 'doctrinal model' (in which a court should make the decision that best accords with the existing legal rules).

This leads us to perhaps the most important lesson of Ainsworth. Imagine that you are employed to act as a lawyer for one of the parties in the case. If acting for Mrs Ainsworth, you may want to emphasize the social importance of land and the need to allow her and her children to continue living in their home. If you are instead acting for the bank, you may want to focus on the need to keep the cost of mortgages down by ensuring that banks do not need to make time-consuming enquiries before making a mortgage loan. Either way, however, it will not be enough simply to go to court and make those general points. If you want to do the best job for your client, it is vital to understand, and to be confident in using, the doctrinal rules that make up land law.

This should not be taken to mean that the 'utility model' is irrelevant or that there is no need to consider the practical merits or wider justice of the doctrinal rules of land law. On the contrary, the social importance of land law means that it is vital not only to understand land law rules, but also to evaluate them. After all, as we noted in sections 5.6 and 5.7 above, and as we will see throughout this book, land law, like other areas of law, necessarily changes over time; the crucial question is whether those changes are for the better.

QUESTIONS

1. In what ways does land differ from other physical things? What consequences do those differences have for land law?
2. What is 'land law'? Does it involve all legal rules related to the use of land?
3. Harris suggests that the 'utility model' and the 'doctrinal model' may be useful in understanding particular approaches to land law. What are the differences between the two models?
4. Why did the Court of Appeal and House of Lords reach differing results in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth? In your view, what should the result be in such a case?
5. Land law has a reputation as a subject that is full of technical rules. Even if that reputation is true, is it necessarily a bad thing?

WHAT IS LAND?

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. In Chapter 1, we looked at the special features of land and saw that land law is a special part of property law. In this chapter, we will look more closely at the legal meaning of land.
2. Firstly, in section 1 of this Chapter, we will look at the fundamental question of what it means to say that land is a form of property. We will see that it is important to focus not on the land itself, but rather on the relationship between a person and the land. That relationship can take the form of a right: so, if a party claims that he or she owns particular land this is a claim that he or she has a property right in that land.
3. Secondly, in section 2 of this Chapter, we will look in more detail at what it means to say that someone owns 'land'. We will see that an 'owner' of land has a particular type of property right in that land: a freehold or a lease. The rights of such an owner of land are not limited to the physical surface of the land: they extend both downwards and upwards from that surface. We will also consider the extent to which an owner's right to exclusive control of land entails a right to exclusive control of objects attached to that land, or found in or on that land.
4. We noted in Chapter 1 that the focus of land law, as a distinct subject, is on property rights to use land. In this Chapter, we will begin to see some of the questions with which the courts have to deal in deciding on the nature and extent of parties' property rights. We will look at these questions in more detail in Chapters 4 and 5.

1 LAND AS A FORM OF PRIVATE PROPERTY

In Chapter 1, section 1, we noted that rules relating to land can be seen throughout the law, not only in land law. The following extract, taken from a seminal constitutional law case, provides an example of this. It is important to note that the case does not only concern the protection of land; the claimant also complained of the theft of some of his papers. Those two aspects of the case are not separated out by the court: as we will see, the case depends not on the special features of land, but rather on the protection given to any property right.

(1765) 2 Wils KB 274, Common Pleas

Facts: Carrington and three others (messengers to the King) entered the house of Entick without his consent, searched it, and removed various papers. They were acting under a warrant issued by the Earl of Halifax, one of the King's Secretaries of State. The warrant authorized them to search for papers at the house of Entick, because he was 'the author of, or one concerned in the writing of, several weekly very seditious papers, entitled The Monitor or British Freeholder containing gross and scandalous reflections and invectives upon His Majesty's Government, and upon both Houses of Parliament'.

Lord Camden, Lord Chief Justice, considered whether the warrant could authorize the actions of Carrington and the other messengers.

Lord Camden, LCJ

The warrant in our case was an execution in the first instance, without any previous summons, examination, hearing, or proof that he [Entick] was author of the supposed libels; a power claimed by no other magistrate whatsoever; [. . .] it was left to the discretion of these defendants to execute the warrant in the absence or presence of [Entick], when he might have no witness present to see what they did; for they were to seize all papers, bank bills, or any other valuable papers they might take away if they were so disposed; there might be nobody to detect them.

[W]e were told by one of these messengers that he was obliged by his oath to sweep away all papers whatsoever; if this is law it would be found in our books, but no such law ever existed in this country; our law holds the property of every man so sacred, that no man can set his foot upon his neighbour's close without leave; if he does he is a trespasser, though he does no damage at all; if he will tread upon his neighbour's ground he must justify it by law.

The defendants have no right to avail themselves of the usage of these warrants since the Revolution [. . .] we can safely say there is no law in this country to justify the defendants in what they have done; if there was, it would destroy all the comforts of society; for papers are often the dearest property a man can have [. . .]

We shall now consider the usage of these warrants since the Revolution; if it began then, it is too modern to be law; the common law did not begin with the Revolution; the ancient constitution which had almost been overthrown and destroyed was then repaired and revived; the Revolution added a new buttress to the ancient venerable edifice: the Kings Bench lately said that no objection had ever been taken to general warrants, they have passed sub silentio:[1] this is the first instance of an attempt to prove a modern practice of a private office to make and execute warrants to enter a man's house, search for and take way all his books and papers in the first instance, to be law, which is not to be found in our books. It must have been the guilt or poverty of those upon whom such warrants have been executed, that deterred or hindered them from contending against the power of the Secretary of State, or such warrants could never have passed for lawful till this time [. . .]

Our law is wise and merciful, and supposes every man accused to be innocent before he is tried by his peers: upon the whole, we are all of opinion that this warrant is wholly illegal and void. One word more for ourselves; we are no advocates for libels, all Governments must set their faces against them, and whenever they come before us and a jury we shall > set our faces against them; and if juries do not prevent them they may prove fatal to liberty, destroy Government and introduce anarchy; but tyranny is better than anarchy, and the worst Government better than none at all.

When analysing Entick v Carrington, it is useful to bear in mind the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

That constitutional guarantee was passed, in large part, to prevent an abuse of governmental power that had occurred in the 1760s, when tax collectors had been given a very wide power to enter and search private homes. It is worth noting that, in Entick, the reasoning of Lord Camden was not based on a special limit on governmental power, such as that later established by the Fourth Amendment, but rather on the general rules of property law. More precisely, because Entick had a property right in relation to both his house and papers, no one could interfere with those things without showing some lawful authority to do so. So, even without an explicit constitutional guarantee, Entick's land, like his papers, could be seen as private property, safe from unjustified interference.

In a case such as Entick, it is tempting to say that the land and papers were each 'Entick's property'. As the following extract shows, however, that general description may not, in fact, be an accurate picture of the legal position.

Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009, pp 86–8)

> Few concepts are quite so fragile, so elusive and so frequently misused as the notion of property. There is a pervasive element of shared deception in our normal property talk: property is not theft, but fraud. We commonly speak of property as if its meaning were entirely clear and logical, but property is a conceptual mirage which slips tantalisingly from view just when it seems most solidly attainable. Amongst the misperceptions which dominate the conventional analysis of both lay persons and lawyers is the lazy myth that property is a 'monolithic notion of standard content and invariable intensity'.[2] Our daily references to property therefore tend to comprise a mutual conspiracy of unsophisticated sematic allusions and confusions, which we tolerate—frequently, indeed, do not notice—largely because our linguistic shorthand commands a certain low-level communicative efficiency [. . .]
> It remains painfully true that most of our everyday references to property are unreflective, naïve and relatively meaningless. In our crude way we are seldom concerned to look behind the immediately practical or functional sense in which we employ the term 'property' in relation to land. What does it really mean to say that Julian Bishop 'owns' 25 Mountfield Gardens or that these premises are his 'property'? [. . .]

[2] See Yanner v Eaton (1999) 201 CLR 351 (High Court of Australia) at [19], per Gleeson CJ, and Gaudron, Kirby, and Hayne JJ.

The mistaken reification of property[3]

As the High Court of Australia acknowledged in Yanner v Eaton,[4] much of our false thinking about property 'stems from the residual perception that "property" is itself a thing or resource rather than a legally endorsed concentration of power over things and resources.' The root of the difficulty lies in the fact that non-lawyers (and often lawyers) tend to speak rather loosely of 'property' as the thing which is owned (eg 'that book/car/house is my property'). Whilst this reification of property is harmless enough in casual conversation, it has the effect of obscuring important features of property as a legal and social institution.

Property is not a thing but a power relationship

Deep at the heart of the phenomenon of property is the semantic reality that 'property' is not a thing, but rather the condition of being 'proper' to a particular person (eg 'That book/car/house is proper to me'). For serious students of property, the beginning of truth is the recognition that property is not a thing but a power relationship—a relationship of social and legal legitimacy existing between a person and a valued resource (whether tangible or intangible). To claim 'property' in a resource is, in effect, to assert a significant degree of control over that resource. Moreover, as Karl Renner once said, '[p]ower over matter begets personal power'.[5] 'Property' ultimately articulates a political relationship between persons. Land—the physical substratum of all human interaction—becomes a vital component of all social and economic engineering.

All property talk is value-laden

All property references are, at some level, a statement about the social legitimacy attaching to the claim in question. The etymological links between terms such as 'property', 'proper', 'appropriate', and 'propriety' underscore the value-laden complexity of inter-relating nuances of property talk. Genuine property discourse thinly conceals a subtext of social propriety. The law of property incorporates a series of critical value judgments, reflecting the cultural norms, the social ethics and the political economy prevalent in any given community. It is inevitable that property law should serve in this way as a vehicle for ideology, for 'property' has commonly been the epithet used to identify that which people most greatly value. The terminology of 'property' also points more subtly to relationships of dependence, for dependence is the inescapable outcome of unequal distributions of that which is valued. The terms 'property' and 'dependence' are merely positive and negative descriptions of existing distributions of control over socially valued resources.

Gray and Gray make a number of important points: some of them can assist us to understand, internally, how land law works; others can help us to stand outside land law and evaluate the system. The first crucial point is that, to understand property as it is used in legal contexts, we cannot equate it with physical things: so, in Entick v Carrington, it is not enough simply to say that the land or papers were Mr Entick's property; instead, we need to make clear that there is something in between Mr Entick and those physical things. Gray and Gray

3 [Reification means 'turning into a thing'—the argument here is that it is a mistake to equate 'property' as a concept or organizing idea with physical things, such as land or cars.]

4 [(1999) 201 CLR 351 at [18], per Gleeson CJ, and Gaudron, Kirby and Hayne JJ.]

5 The Institutions of Private Law and Their Social Functions (ed O Kahn-Freund, 1949), p 107.

develop this point by focusing on property as a 'power relationship' between, say, Mr Entick and his land or papers. A different way of developing the point (linking it into our discussion of the scope of land law in Chapter 1, section 2) is to say that what stands between Mr Entick and his land or papers is a right. In defining the content of that right, we can build on Gray and Gray's definition of the content of the 'power relationship': it is a right to a 'significant degree of control over that resource'.

So, the first vital lesson to take from Gray and Gray's analysis is that we cannot always equate 'property' with 'things'. If we say that the house broken into by Mr Carrington was Mr Entick's property, what we really mean is that Mr Entick had a particular type of right in relation to that land—a right that gave him a significant degree of control over that land. We can describe Mr Entick's right as a property right in relation to that land. We can therefore say that land (like papers) counts as a form of private property in the sense that land is a resource in relation to which a private individual (such as Mr Entick) can have a property right. This means that, in thinking about the notion of property in land law, we really need to focus on the concept of a property right. We will examine the nature of a property right in land in more detail in Chapters 4 and 5. A key feature of such a right is that imposes a prima facie duty on the rest of the world. In Entick, the King's messengers, along with everyone else in the world, were thus under a duty to Mr Entick, and that duty arose because Mr Entick had a property right in relation to both the land and papers.

In the extract above, Gray and Gray also point out the assumptions that we may make when saying, for example, that the land and papers are Mr Entick's property. That formulation implies that the land and papers are proper to Mr Entick—that is, they are due to, or appropriate to, him. That point is made clearer if, instead of describing the land and papers as his property, we say that Mr Entick has a property right in relation to them. The terminology of 'rights' is also, to use Gray and Gray's term, 'value-laden' because it implies something about the legitimacy of Mr Entick's claim.

At this point, it is very useful to distinguish between two different kinds of legitimacy. In Entick itself, Mr Entick was not concerned to show that, for moral, social, or economic reasons, it was appropriate for him to have a significant degree of control over the land or papers; his only concern was to show that his claim to that control was legally legitimate—that is, to show that he had a right that the courts were prepared to protect and enforce. His focus was therefore on showing that the rules of property law gave him a property right in relation to both the land and the papers. When considering his claim from that internal perspective, we can therefore limit ourselves to looking at the land law rules and seeing if they do, indeed, give him a property right in relation to the land in question. We can, however, say that Mr Entick does have such a property right and still consider whether, for moral, social, or economic (or other) reasons, Mr Entick should have that degree of control over the land or papers. It is at this point that the 'critical value judgements' referred to by Gray and Gray play a very important role.

Of course, it would be naive to think that these two kinds of legitimacy can, or should, be kept firmly separate. After all, as judges or legislators develop the law, they have to keep in mind the wider (moral, social, economic, etc.) effects of the legal rules. In fact, the contrast between two kinds of legitimacy links in to the contrast between the two approaches that we examined in Chapter 1, section 5.2—that is, what Harris called the 'doctrinal model' and the 'utility model'. The first question in Entick is whether Mr Entick's claim to a property right in the land and papers is legally legitimate: does it accord with the doctrinal rules of property law? The second question, is whether, taking into account a broad range of considerations (e.g. moral, social, economic, etc.), it would be better or worse to recognize that Mr Entick has such a right: does recognizing such a right have better consequences than not recognizing it? And, as we saw in the previous chapter, the 'utility model' can play a role not only when Parliament decides how to reform the law for the future, but also when judges decide on the current state of the law.

2 THE MEANING OF 'LAND'

2.1 THE PHYSICAL REACH OF LAND

In the extract set out above, Gray and Gray raise a fundamental question: 'What does it really mean to say that Julian Bishop "owns" 25 Mountfield Gardens or that these premises are his "property"?' As we have seen, the first step is to understand that statement as simply a shorthand for the more accurate analysis: Julian Bishop has a property right in relation to that land. After all, as we noted in Chapter 1, section 3, if Julian Bishop puts 25 Mountfield Gardens up for sale and you decide to put a bid in, then you are not bidding for the land as such; instead, you are bidding for his property right in that land—either a freehold or a lease. Gray and Gray's question therefore boils down to a question about the content of a freehold or a lease: if you acquire such a right, what rights to use the land will you get? We will examine that question in Chapter 4, section 3, when we focus on the nature of the freehold and the lease.

There is also a more practical side to the content of your freehold or lease. It will give you rights to use the land—but what do we mean by 'the land'? You might think of yourself as buying 'a house', but, clearly, if you get Julian Bishop's freehold or lease, you get more than the house. After all, if the house were to burn down, you would still have your freehold or lease. Indeed, the decision of McNair J in Kelsen v Imperial Tobacco Co[6] shows that a party with a property right in land also has rights in relation to the sky.

Mr Kelsen had a lease of a tobacconist's shop in City Road, Islington, London. The Imperial Tobacco Co maintained a large advertising sign that projected into the air above that shop. Initially, Mr Kelsen made no complaint, but he later demanded that the sign be removed. The company refused, arguing that, because its sign did not substantially interfere with Mr Kelsen's enjoyment of his land, the tort of nuisance was not made out. McNair J, however, ordered the sign to be removed: Mr Kelsen's lease gave him a right to exclusive control not only of the shop itself, but also of the air above it. As a result, the tobacco company, like the rest of the world, had a prima facie duty not to encroach on that space without Mr Kelsen's consent. An injunction could therefore be granted to prevent the company's ongoing act of trespass.

Whilst the Kelsen decision deals with a land owner's rights above the ground, an American case, Edwards v Lee's Administrator,[7] provides a memorable example of a land owner's rights below the ground. Mr and Mrs Edwards owned land in Kentucky, near the famous Mammoth Cave. They discovered a spectacular cave under their own land: they dubbed it the 'Great Onyx Cave', charged tourists for entry, and built a hotel on their land. The only entrance to the cave was on the Edwards' land, but a third of the cave was in fact situated beneath the land of Lee, one of the Edwards' neighbours. As Lee had not given permission for visitors to enter the part of the cave below his land, he claimed that the Edwards had committed the tort of trespass and should be made to pay him a share of their profits.

7 96 SW 2d 1028 (1936, Court of Appeals of Kentucky).

The Kentucky Court of Appeals upheld an order that the tort of trespass had been committed and that the Edwards should pay Lee a third of their net profits. In doing so, the court found that Lee's rights extended below the surface of his land, and it referred to an important maxim, or brocard: cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cœlum et ad infernos (to whomsoever the soil belongs, he owns also to the sky and to the depths). Like most maxims, however—particularly those in Latin—the expression cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cœlum et ad infernos can be misleading, as the next extract shows.

[1978] QB 479

Facts: Skyviews took aerial photographs of houses and then offered to sell copies of the photographs to residents of the houses. On receiving an offer to buy such a photograph of his country house in Leigh, Kent, Lord Bernstein took exception, not only turning down the offer, but also complaining of an invasion of his privacy and requesting the destruction of any negatives or prints of his house. Unfortunately, his letter of complaint was answered by an 18-year-old who had just joined Skyviews. She replied by offering to sell Lord Bernstein the negative of his house. This led to another letter of complaint, in the absence of an answer to which, Lord Bernstein began legal proceedings. The chief part of his claim was that Skyviews had committed the wrong of trespass by flying over his land without permission. Griffiths J, however, dismissed the claim, finding that Skyviews had not interfered with Lord Bernstein's property right.

Griffiths J

I therefore find that on August 3, 1974, [Skyviews] flew over [Lord Bernstein's] land for the purpose of photographing his house and did so without his permission.

I turn now to the law. [Lord Bernstein] claims that as owner of the land he is also owner of the air space above the land, or at least has the right to exclude any entry into the air space above his land. He relies upon the old Latin maxim, cujus est solum ejus est usque ad coelum et ad inferos, a colourful phrase often upon the lips of lawyers since it was first coined by Accursius in Bologna in the 13th century.[8] There are a number of cases in which the maxim has been used by English judges, but an examination of those cases shows that they have all been concerned with structures attached to the adjoining land, such as overhanging buildings, signs or telegraph wires, and for their solution it has not been necessary for the judge to cast his eyes towards the heavens; he has been concerned with the rights of the owner in the air space immediately adjacent to the surface of the land.

That an owner has certain rights in the air space above his land is well established by authority. He has the right to lop the branches of trees that may overhang his boundary, although this right seems to be founded in nuisance rather than trespass: see Lemmon v. Webb.[9] In Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co. Ltd.,[10] the Court of Appeal did not doubt that the owner of land would have the right to cut a wire placed over his land [. . .]

[8] [Franciscus Accursius was a professor of law at the University of Bologna. By compiling the 'Great Gloss' of the Roman law under Justinian, he played a pivotal role in the spread of Roman law thinking in the European medieval world and beyond.]

[10] (1884) 13 QBD 904.

> It may be a sound and practical rule to regard any incursion into the air space at a height which may interfere with the ordinary user of the land as a trespass rather than a nuisance. Adjoining owners then know where they stand; they have no right to erect structures overhanging or passing over their neighbours' land and there is no room for argument whether they are thereby causing damage or annoyance to their neighbours about which there may be much room for argument and uncertainty. But wholly different considerations arise when considering the passage of aircraft at a height which in no way affects the user of the land.
> There is no direct authority on this question, but as long ago as 1815 Lord Ellenborough in Pickering v. Rudd[11] expressed the view that it would not be a trespass to pass over a man's land in a balloon [. . .]
> I can find no support in authority for the view that a landowner's rights in the air space above his property extend to an unlimited height. In Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co. Ltd.,[12] Bowen L.J. described the maxim, usque ad coelum, as a fanciful phrase, to which I would add that if applied literally it is a fanciful notion leading to the absurdity of a trespass at common law being committed by a satellite every time it passes over a suburban garden. The academic writers speak with one voice in rejecting the uncritical and literal application of the maxim [. . .]
> The problem is to balance the rights of an owner to enjoy the use of his land against the rights of the general public to take advantage of all that science now offers in the use of air space. This balance is in my judgment best struck in our present society by restricting the rights of an owner in the air space above his land to such height as is necessary for the ordinary use and enjoyment of his land and the structures upon it, and declaring that above that height he has no greater rights in the air space than any other member of the public.
> Applying this test to the facts of this case, I find that [Skyviews'] aircraft did not infringe any rights in [Lord Bernstein's] air space, and thus no trespass was committed. It was on any view of the evidence flying many hundreds of feet above the ground and it is not suggested that by its mere presence in the air space it caused any interference with any use to which [Lord Bernstein] put or might wish to put his land. [Lord Bernstein's] complaint is not that the aircraft interfered with the use of his land but that a photograph was taken from it. There is, however, no law against taking a photograph, and the mere taking of a photograph cannot turn an act which is not a trespass into the plaintiff's air space into one that is a trespass.

Section 40 of the Civil Aviation Act 1949 makes clear that simply flying at a reasonable height above another's land does not constitute a wrong against that landowner. Griffiths J decided that, in any case, there is an inherent limit on a landowner's property right. So, whilst a property right unquestionably allows its holder to assert a significant degree of control over a resource, that control must be limited—in some circumstances, at least—in order to take account of the needs of others.

In the next extract, the Supreme Court considered the usefulness of the cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad coelum et ad infernos brocard to establishing the reach of a land owner's rights below the surface of the land.

[2010] UKSC 35, [2010] 3 WLR 654

Facts: The case concerned an oil field in the unlikely location of Surrey. The apex of the Palmers Wood Oil Field, located near Caterham, lies beneath a plot of land, the freehold of which was held by Bocardo, the claimant. The defendant, Star Energy, had drilled diagonally from the surface of neighbouring land in order to extract oil from the apex of the field. When, in 2006, Bocardo discovered this, it sought damages from Star Energy.

Bocardo did not claim that it owned the oil beneath its land, or even that it had a right to search or drill for such oil. By statute (formerly the Petroleum Production Act 1934, now the Petroleum Act 1998), those rights were vested in the relevant licence holder: in this case, Star Energy. Bocardo did, however, claim that, by extracting oil from beneath the surface of its land without its permission, Star Energy had committed a trespass to Bocardo's land.

At first instance, Peter Smith J found in favour of Bocardo. This finding was upheld by the Court of Appeal and Star Energy appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court unanimously held that a trespass had occurred. There was also a cross-appeal by Bocardo as to the extent of the damages awarded to it. The question of damages in such a case is regulated by the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act 1966. The view of the Court of Appeal, upheld by a majority of the Supreme Court, was that, in light of the 1966 Act, Bocardo's damages were limited to £1,000.

[. . .] The question which this issue raises is whether an oil company which has been granted a licence to search, bore for and get petroleum in the licensed area which is beneath land belonging to another, and drills wells at depth beneath that land in order to recover petroleum from within the licensed area without obtaining the landholder's agreement or an ancillary right under the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act 1966 to do so, is committing a trespass [. . .]

It is common ground that a trespass occurs when there is an unjustified intrusion by one party upon land which is in the possession of another. It is common ground too that Bocardo did not, and does not, own any of the petroleum in the reservoir that is situated beneath its land. Nor does it possess, or have the right to possess, any of that petroleum. Those rights belonged to the holder of the licence granted by the Secretary of State under section 2 of the Petroleum (Production) Act 1934, Conoco (UK) Ltd. They now belong to [Star Energy] as the original holder's assignees. By virtue of section 1 of the 1934 Act, which vested the property in petroleum existing in its natural condition in strata in Great Britain in the Crown, at no time did Bocardo have any right to search, bore for or get that petroleum from the reservoir beneath its land. Only the Crown or its licensee had the right to do so.

The question whether the drilling of the three wells under Bocardo's land, and the continued presence of the well casing and tubing within them, was an actionable trespass raises the following issues: (1) whether Bocardo's title to the land extends down to the strata below the surface through which the three wells and their casing and tubing pass; (2) whether possession or a right to possession is a pre-condition for bringing a claim for trespass and, if so, whether Bocardo has or is entitled to possession of the subsurface strata through which these facilities pass; (3) whether [Star Energy] have a right under the 1934 Act (and subsequently the 1998 Act) to drill and use the three wells and their casing and tubing to extract petroleum from beneath Bocardo's land which gives them a defence to a claim in trespass.

Ownership: how far below the surface?

There is, of course, nothing new in one person carrying out works under land whose surface is in the ownership or the possession of another. Operations of that kind have been familiar since at least Roman times. They ranged from great public works such as catacombs on the one hand to modest cellars for the storage of wine or other commodities on the other. What is new is the depth at which the operations that are said to constitute a trespass in this case have been carried out. The advance of modern technology has led to the discovery of things below the surface, and the desire to obtain access to and remove them, that were unimaginable when the depths to which people could go were limited by what manual labour could achieve.

Bocardo's case is that it is trite law that a conveyance of land includes the surface and everything below it, unless there have been exceptions from the grant such as commonly occurs in the case of minerals. [Star Energy] do not dispute this proposition as a general rule that applies where the rights of the surface owner are interfered with. But they maintain that it does not extend to the depth at which the operations were and are being carried out in this case. The minimum depth was 800 feet, while for the most part the depths were greatly in excess of this. [Counsel for Star Energy] said that he accepted that in law the surface owner owned the substrata to some depth, but not that far. He submitted that the wells and their tubes and casing did not interfere with or enter upon "land" in any meaningful way at all. Moreover the right to search, bore for and get the petroleum was vested in the Crown. Bocardo did not own, and had no right to possess, the petroleum.

It has often been said that prima facie the owner of the surface is entitled to the surface itself and everything below it down to the centre of the earth . . . The proposition that prima facie everything below the surface belongs to the surface owner is often linked to the proposition that everything above it belongs to him too: "everything up to the sky", as Sir William James VC put it in Corbett v Hill,[13] or "everything under the sky" in the words of Bowen LJ in Pountney v Clayton.[14] In Mitchell v Mosley Cozens Hardy MR said that the grant of the land includes the surface and all that is supra—houses, trees and the like—and everything that is infra—mines, earth and clay, etc.[15] Agreeing with him, Swinfen Eady and Phillimore LJJ said that this was a recognised rule of law. Plainly, the source for these remarks was the well-known Latin brocard cuius est solum, eius est usque ad coelum et ad inferos[. . .]

In the Court of Appeal Aikens LJ, referring to Lord Wilberforce's remarks in Commissioner for Railways v Valuer-General,[16] said that he had no doubt that Accursius's maxim or brocard was not part of English law.[17] Asking himself what the general rule is at common law about the ownership of the substrata below the surface of land, he said that he found it in Mitchell v Mosley,[18] but shorn of its references to Accursius's maxim. In short, he said, the registered freehold proprietor of the surface will also be the owner of the strata beneath the surface of his land, including the whole minerals, unless there has been some express or implied alienation of the whole or a particular part of the strata to another. In his view,[19] Bocardo's title certainly extended to the strata (other than the petroleum) to be found at the depth of the wells up to 2,800 feet below the surface of the Oxted Estate. Precisely how much further into the earth's crust that ownership might go was a question that he did not need to decide. But if it carried to the centre of the earth landowners, he said, all have a lot of neighbours.

I think, with respect, that Aikens LJ was perhaps a little too hasty in asserting that the brocard is not part of English law. It is true that Lord Wilberforce appears to have had little enthusiasm for it. He regarded it as an excuse for dispensing with analysis. But those remarks were made in a case where the question was what was meant by the word "land" in the statute. He seems to have been prepared to accept it as having some relevance as a statement, imprecise though it is, of the rights, prima facie, of owners of land: see his reference to Bowen LJ's observation in Pountney v Clayton.[20] Furthermore, although Aikens LJ adopted what Cozens Hardy MR said in Mitchell v Mosley[21] as an accurate statement of the law if shorn of his references to Accursius's maxim, it must be acknowledged that it was by reference to that maxim that Cozens Hardy MR said what he did. As Lord Wilberforce pointed out, the maxim only has authority at common law in so far as it has been adopted by decisions, or equivalent authority. I am inclined to think that the observations by the Court of Appeal in Mitchell v Mosley, seen against the background of various dicta in the 19th Century cases including Pountney v Clayton, measure up to that requirement. In the present context, therefore, I believe that the brocard does have something to offer us.

The particular relevance of the brocard to the dispute in this case is that, taken literally, it answers [counsel for Star Energy's] point that the wells in question were too deep for the landowner's interest in his land to be affected. If the brocard is accepted as a sound guide to what the law is, there is no stopping point. This makes it unnecessary to speculate as to how it can be applied in practice as one gets close to the earth's centre. The depths to which the wells in question were drilled in this case do not get anywhere near to approaching the point of absurdity. The fact that there were substances at that depth which can be reached and got by human activity is sufficient to raise the question as to who, if anybody, is the owner of the strata where they are to be found. The Crown has asserted ownership of the petroleum, but it does not assert ownership of the strata that surround it. The only plausible candidate is the registered owner of the land above, which is exactly what the brocard itself indicates. [Counsel for Star Energy] was unable to point to any contrary authority.

It is perhaps worth looking more closely at the words used by the glossator. The earliest source that we have for them is the Glossa Ordinaria which was compiled by Accursius, a professor at the University of Bologna, in the 13th century. He set for himself the task of collecting and arranging a vast number of annotations to the Digest that had been made by his predecessors in one great work. He supplemented these with annotations of his own. For the most part at least, the authors of these annotations are not identified. The gloss that led to the brocard with which we are all familiar is not attributed to anybody. We have no means of knowing when it was first written down. Francis Lyall[22] observed that the history of its development is obscure. It may have been one of Accursius's own annotations, but it seems just as likely that it was much older. All we can say with confidence is that it was not part of Roman law but that it had been recognised by 1250 when the Glossa Ordinaria was completed [. . .]

I think that it is significant that the glossator took as his starting point the rule that applied to the underlying strata and then applied it to what took place above the surface. The context for the annotation was the proposition that, while the owner may erect structures as high as he likes on the solum of land in his ownership, his freedom to do so is restricted by the praedial servitude non altius tollendi which protects his neighbour's right to light and prospect. The owner of the dominant tenement is entitled to insist that there should be no interference with the sky over his land. The assumption appears to have been that it was generally understood that the ownership of land carried with it the right to everything that lay below the surface. The point that the glossator was making, as an explanation for the praedial servitude, was that the existing rule as to what lay below (cuius est solum) should be (debet esse) applied to the air-space above it. The rule that applied to the underlying strata appears to have been of greater antiquity.

The problems that a rule in these terms might give rise to as man's understanding of the earth's structure improved, airspace began to be used for the passage of aircraft and means were developed to penetrate deep below the surface were not, of course, obvious in the 13th century. But the simple notion that each landowner is the proprietor of a column or cylinder of land that stretches down to the centre of the earth and upwards indefinitely into outer space is plainly no longer tenable. The earth is not flat, as the glossator may have supposed. A greater understanding of geology has taught us that most of the earth's interior, due to extremes of pressure and temperature, is a complex and inhospitable structure that is beyond man's capacity to enter or make use of. It has been observed that anything that is drilled below a depth of about 8.7 miles or 14 kilometres would be crushed by the earth's pressure of 50,000 pounds per square inch and vaporised by a temperature of 1,000 degrees Fahrenheit.[23] [P]roductive human activity is possible only within the shallowest portion of the earth's crust, and humans have never penetrated below it.[24] As for that portion of it, the development of heat mining and carbon capture, storage and sequestration technologies to reduce greenhouse gas emissions[25] would be difficult to achieve if the subsurface within which it is sought to carry out these activities in the public interest were to be broken up into columns of rock owned by the surface owners.

As for the position above the surface, the development of powered flight has made it impossible to apply the brocard usque ad coelum literally. In Bernstein of Leigh (Baron) v Skyviews & General Ltd[26] Baron Bernstein failed in his claim that the defendants, who had flown over his land to take an aerial photograph of his property which they then offered to sell to him, were guilty of trespass. Griffiths J noted[27] that the proposition that an owner has certain rights in the air space above his land was well established by authority. In Kelsen v Imperial Tobacco Co (of Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Ltd,[28] for example, a mandatory injunction was granted ordering the defendants to remove a sign which projected 8 inches over the plaintiff's property on the ground that, applying the brocard, this was a trespass. Griffiths J was willing to accept, as a sound and practical rule, that any incursion into air space at a height which may interfere with the ordinary user of land was a trespass. But he said that wholly different considerations arise when considering the passage of aircraft at a height which in no way affects the user of the land. In his judgment,[29] the balance was best struck by restricting the rights of the owner to such height as necessary for the ordinary use and enjoyment of his land and the structures upon it, and declaring that above that height he has no greater rights in the air space than any other member of the public.

[Star Energy] say that this analysis should be applied to subsurface ownership too. They submit that a sensible and pragmatic solution would be for each surface owner to own directly down beneath the boundaries of his land as far down as is necessary for the use and enjoyment of the surface, the buildings on the surface and any minerals which have not been excluded from his ownership by conveyance, common law or statute which lie beneath it. [Counsel for Star Energy] was unable to point to any English authority that provided direct support for this approach to the position beneath the surface. But there is some support for it in the United States . . .

Sprankling[30] points out however that most modern US legal texts continue to endorse the centre of the earth theory and that almost all modern cases continue to embrace it too [. . .] Addressing himself to the question, how far below the earth's surface do property rights extend, he asserts that the surface owner should certainly hold property rights to a portion of the subsurface.[31] After exploring four alternative models—ownership of the entire crust, ownership based on first-in-time exploitative use, ownership for reasonable and foreseeable uses and ownership to a specified depth—he comes down in favour of a specified depth such as 1000 feet, but he acknowledges that reasonable minds may differ as to the appropriate extent [. . .]

Coming closer to home, Dr Jean Howell[32] acknowledges that it might be argued that the same test as that which Griffiths J applied in Bernstein of Leigh (Baron) v Skyviews & General Ltd should be used for land below the surface. But, as she also notes, it was implicit in that case that even above the notional height at which the land owner's usable rights stop, there is not a free for all in the airspace above. To characterise the surface owner's rights as following technological advances as to the depth at which land can be exploited, she says, would offend against all notions of "property" whose defining quality in land is certainty. She concludes[33] that any intrusion into land which is not sanctioned by some countervailing property right will be a trespass and that, although the surface owner will not usually wish to or be able to utilise the ground below the surface, he has rights in the land which could be valuable.

In my opinion the brocard still has value in English law as encapsulating, in simple language, a proposition of law which has commanded general acceptance. It is an imperfect guide, as it has ceased to apply to the use of airspace above a height which may interfere with the ordinary user of land: Bernstein of Leigh (Baron) v Skyviews & General Ltd [. . .] But I think that the reasons for holding that the brocard has no place in the modern world as regards what goes on below the surface, even in England, are not by any means as compelling as they are in relation to the use of airspace. In US v Causby[34] the US Supreme Court regarded the airspace as a public highway to which only the public had a just claim. The same cannot be said of the strata below the surface. As Aikens LJ said in the Court of Appeal, it is not helpful to try to make analogies between the rights of an owner of land with regard to the airspace above it and his rights with regard to the strata beneath the surface.[35] Although modern technology has found new ways of making use of it in the public interest, there is no question of it having become a public highway [. . .]

The better view, as the Court of Appeal recognised[36] is to hold that the owner of the surface is the owner of the strata beneath it, including the minerals that are to be found there, unless there has been an alienation of them by a conveyance, at common law or by statute to someone else. That was the view which the Court of Appeal took in Mitchell v Mosley.[37] Much has happened since then, as the use of technology has penetrated deeper and deeper into the earth's surface. But I see no reason why its view should not still be regarded as good law. There must obviously be some stopping point, as one reaches the point at which physical features such as pressure and temperature render the concept of the strata belonging to anybody so absurd as to be not worth arguing about. But the wells that are at issue in this case, extending from about 800 feet to 2,800 feet below the surface, are far from being so deep as to reach the point of absurdity. Indeed the fact that the strata can be worked upon at those depths points to the opposite conclusion.

I would hold therefore that [Bocardo's] title extends down to the strata through which the three wells and their casing and tubing pass.

Lord Hope went on to find that, if possession was required for a trespass claim, Bocardo could be said to be in possession of the strata used by Star Energy, as it had registered title to the land, and no other party claimed to be in actual possession of the strata. It was further held that the relevant legislation gave Star Energy no defence to a trespass claim.

For our purposes, the importance of Star Energy v Bocardo lies in the Supreme Court's refusal to extend the reasoning in Bernstein v Skyviews to the question of how far below ground the rights of a freehold owner extend. As a result, a freehold owner's rights are better protected below ground than above it. In Lord Hope's view, this reflects the historical development of the cujus est solum maxim: that an owner's right to the strata beneath his or her land was recognized first, and only then extended by analogy to the area above his land. After all, a balance must be struck between protecting the position of an owner of land and preserving the freedom of those who do not own the land; in Roman times as today, the activities of such non-owners are more likely to take place above the land than below it.

2.2 WHAT OBJECTS DOES THE LAND INCLUDE?

2.2.1 Things attached to, or part and parcel of, the land

On 23 May 2002, the BBC News website reported on a decision from the Colchester county court. Mr Bennis had a property right in a large detached house. He sold that right to Mr and Mrs McMahon. When the McMahons moved in, they were disappointed to find that Mr Bennis had removed a number of items from the house (including a towel rail attached to the central heating system, and signs with the name and number of the house), as well as taking paving stones from the garden. Mr Bennis believed that he was entitled to remove those things: it seems that the contract between him and the McMahons did not specifically list those items as part of the sale. Nonetheless, the county court found in favour of the McMahons and Mr Bennis was ordered to pay them £1,166. The point is that Mr Bennis had clearly agreed to transfer his property right in the land—and that property right includes not only the house and the surface of the land, but also any items that are viewed as part of that land.

How, then, can we tell if a particular object is included within the scope of a property right in land? The relevant principles are considered in the following extract.

Elitestone Ltd v Morris
[1997] 1 WLR 687, HL

Facts: Elitestone Ltd had a property right in land in Murton, Swansea. Mr Morris (along with Ms Sked) lived in a wooden bungalow on that land and paid an annual fee to Elitestone Ltd. Elitestone Ltd wished to redevelop the land and brought proceedings to remove Mr Morris from the land. Mr Morris claimed that, under the provisions of the Rent Act 1977, he had a protected tenancy. If that claim were correct, the grounds on which Elitestone Ltd could apply for possession of the land were limited by statute and none of those grounds was available to them. Both sides accepted that, to have a protected tenancy, Mr Morris had to show that he had a property right in land (a lease). Elitestone Ltd argued that Mr Morris could not have a property right in land because, instead, he simply owned a wooden bungalow—that is, a separate object not forming part of any land. The Court of Appeal accepted that argument and Mr Morris appealed to the House of Lords, which allowed his appeal.

Lord Lloyd

The assistant recorder held, correctly, at the end of what was necessarily a very lengthy judgment that the question in Mr. Morris's case turned on whether or not the bungalow formed part of the realty.[38] [...]

Having visited the site, the assistant recorder had this to say:

> 'While the house rested on the concrete pillars which were themselves attached to the ground, it seems to me clear that at least by 1985 and probably before, it would have been clear to anybody that this was a structure that was not meant to be enjoyed as a chattel to be picked up and moved in due course but that it should be a long-term feature of the realty albeit that, because of its construction, it would plainly need more regular maintenance.'

The Court of Appeal disagreed[39] [...] Aldous L.J., who gave the leading judgment, was much influenced by the fact that the bungalow was resting by its own weight on concrete pillars, without any attachment. He was also influenced by the uncertainty of Mr. Morris's tenure. Although Mr. Morris had been in occupation since 1971, he was required to obtain an annual "licence." At first the licence fee was £3 a year. It rose to £10 in 1984, then to £52 in 1985, and finally to £85 in 1989. In 1990 the plaintiffs required a licence fee of £1,000: but Mr. Morris, and the other occupiers declined to pay.

On these facts Aldous L.J. inferred that it was the common intention of the parties that the occupiers should acquire the ownership of their bungalows, but the ownership of the sites should remain in [Elitestone Ltd]. On that footing Mr. Morris's bungalow was to be regarded as a chattel. It was never annexed to the soil, so it never became part of the realty. It followed that the tenancy did not include the bungalow, and Mr. Morris was not a protected tenant.

Unlike the judge, the Court of Appeal did not have the advantage of having seen the bungalow. Nor were they shown any of the photographs, some of which were put before your Lordships. These photographs were taken only very recently. Like all photographs they can be deceptive. But if the Court of Appeal had seen the photographs, it is at least possible that they would have taken a different view. For the photographs show very clearly what the bungalow is, and especially what it is not. It is not like a Portakabin, or mobile home. The nature of the structure is such that it could not be taken down and re-erected elsewhere. It could only be removed by a process of demolition. This, as will appear later, is a factor of great importance in the present case. If a structure can only be enjoyed in situ, and is such that it cannot be removed in whole or in sections to another site, there is at least a strong inference that the purpose of placing the structure on the original site was that it should form part of the realty at that site, and therefore cease to be a chattel [. . .]

It will be noticed that in framing the issue for decision I have avoided the use of the word 'fixture.' There are two reasons for this. The first is that 'fixture,' though a hallowed term in this branch of the law, does not always bear the same meaning in law as it does in everyday life. In ordinary language one thinks of a fixture as being something fixed to a building. One would not ordinarily think of the building itself as a fixture [. . .] There is another reason. The term fixture is apt to be a source of misunderstanding owing to the existence of the category of so called 'tenants' fixtures' (a term used to cover both trade fixtures and ornamental fixtures), which are fixtures in the full sense of the word (and therefore part of the realty) but which may nevertheless be removed by the tenant in the course of or at the end of his tenancy. Such fixtures are sometimes confused with chattels which have never become fixtures at all. Indeed the confusion arose in this very case [. . .]

For my part I find it better in the present case to avoid the traditional twofold distinction between chattels and fixtures, and to adopt the three-fold classification set out in Woodfall, Landlord and Tenant:

> 'An object which is brought onto land may be classified under one of three broad heads. It may be (a) a chattel; (b) a fixture; or (c) part and parcel of the land itself. Objects in categories (b) and (c) are treated as being part of the land.'

So the question in the present appeal is whether, when the bungalow was built, it became part and parcel of the land itself. The materials out of which the bungalow was constructed, that is to say, the timber frame walls, the feather boarding, the suspended timber floors, the chipboard ceilings, and so on, were all, of course, chattels when they were brought onto the site. Did they cease to be chattels when they were built into the composite structure? The answer to the question, as Blackburn J. pointed out in Holland v. Hodgson,[40] depends on the circumstances of each case, but mainly on two factors, the degree of annexation to the land, and the object of the annexation.

Degree of annexation

The importance of the degree of annexation will vary from object to object. In the case of a large object, such as a house, the question does not often arise. Annexation goes without saying [. . .]

Purpose of annexation

Many different tests have been suggested, such as whether the object which has been fixed to the property has been so fixed for the better enjoyment of the object as a chattel, or whether it has been fixed with a view to effecting a permanent improvement of the freehold. This and similar tests are useful when one is considering an object such as a tapestry, which may or may not be fixed to a house so as to become part of the freehold: see Leigh v. Taylor.[41] These tests are less useful when one is considering the house itself. In the case of the house the answer is as much a matter of common sense as precise analysis. A house which is constructed in such a way so as to be removable, whether as a unit, or in sections, may well remain a chattel, even though it is connected temporarily to mains services such as water and electricity. But a house which is constructed in such a way that it cannot be removed at > all, save by destruction, cannot have been intended to remain as a chattel. It must have been intended to form part of the realty. I know of no better analogy than the example given by Blackburn J. in Holland v. Hodgson:[42]

> > "Thus blocks of stone placed one on the top of another without any mortar or cement for the purpose of forming a dry stone wall would become part of the land, though the same stones, if deposited in a builder's yard and for convenience sake stacked on the top of each other in the form of a wall, would remain chattels."
> Applying that analogy to the present case, I do not doubt that when Mr. Morris's bungalow was built, and as each of the timber frame walls were placed in position, they all became part of the structure, which was itself part and parcel of the land. The object of bringing the individual bits of wood onto the site seems to be so clear that the absence of any attachment to the soil (save by gravity) becomes an irrelevance.

Lord Clyde also gave a reasoned speech, and the other members of the House of Lords agreed with both Lord Clyde and Lord Lloyd. Mr Morris's bungalow was therefore regarded as part of the land in relation to which Elitestone Ltd had a property right. As a result, Mr Morris had a lease (another property right in relation to that same land) and the resulting statutory protection that allowed him to resist Elitestone Ltd's claim for possession.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Mew v Tristmire Ltd[43] provides a useful contrast. The occupiers lived in houseboats on the claimant's land.[44] The occupiers wished to show they had an assured tenancy, which attracts statutory protection: as in Elitestone v Morris, this turned on whether or not the houseboats could be seen as part of the land. The houseboats, like the bungalow in Elitestone, were not attached to the land but rather rested on supports. The Court of Appeal affirmed the judge's finding that, in contrast to the bungalow in Elitestone, the houseboats were not part of the land. Two key differences were that the houseboats were, initially at least, 'structures which could have been removed without being dismantled or destroyed in the process'; they also 'fall into a category of items such as caravans which, as designed, are moveable.'[45] In contrast, the bungalow in Elitestone had always been 'intended to be a permanent feature of the site' and 'was constructed on site from components brought in for that purpose'.[46]

Lord Lloyd's reasoning in the extract set out above is important because it shows the potentially confusing nature of the term 'fixture'. For example, it used to be said that an object (such as the towel rail and paving stones in the McMahon's case, or the bungalow in Mr Morris's case) had to be either a chattel (something independent of the land and so not covered by a property right in that land) or a fixture (something attached to the land and so covered by a property right in that land). As Lord Lloyd points out, however, it would be odd to think of a building, such as a house, as merely attached to land: it is covered by a property right in the land not because of its attachment, but rather because it is part and parcel of the land itself.

[43] [2011] EWCA Civ 912.
[44] The status of a houseboat was also considered by the Court of Appeal in Chelsea Yacht & Boat Co Ltd v Pope [2001] 2 All ER 309, but it was reasonably clear there that the boat was not part of any land as it remained floating alongside the Thames embankment and could easily have been detached from its mooring: see per Patten LJ in Mew v Tristmire Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 912 at [32].
[45] Ibid, [42], per Patten LJ.
[46] Ibid, [41], per Patten LJ.

Lord Lloyd's second reason for treating the word 'fixture' with care is that it has a special meaning when used to refer to 'tenant's fixtures' or 'landlord's fixtures'. Those terms are used to solve a related, but different problem. Imagine that an owner of land gives you a lease of business premises. When the lease ends, you can clearly take your office furniture with you; equally clearly, you cannot rip out the toilets and take those with you. But what if you have installed a special shed in which to store your stock? That shed may have become attached to, or be part and parcel of, the land, because you may have attached it with iron straps to a concrete floor. But, as the Court of Appeal confirmed in Webb v Frank Bevis Ltd,[47] you may nonetheless be allowed to remove the shed at the end of the lease. The term 'tenant's fixtures' is used to refer to objects attached to the land or forming part and parcel of the land that the tenant is allowed to remove at the end of the lease (such as the shed); the term 'landlord's fixtures' is used to refer to such objects (such as the toilets) that the tenant cannot remove.

Once any confusion over the concept of 'fixtures' is dealt with, we are left with the position that a property right in land covers: (i) the surface of the land itself; (ii) anything that is part and parcel of that land (e.g. a house built on the land); and (iii) anything that is sufficiently attached to that land (e.g. a towel rail connected to the central heating system). Of course, in practice, it may not be obvious whether a particular object falls into either of (ii) or (iii); in such cases, as shown by Lord Lloyd's approach in Elitestone Ltd v Morris, a court has to look at both the degree of attachment to the land and the purpose of such attachment.

The following extract provides a useful practical example of the results that a court may reach.

Botham and ors v TSB Bank plc
[1996] EWCA Civ 549, CA

Facts: Mr Botham owned a luxury flat at 90 Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, London. He borrowed money from TSB Bank and, in return, granted TSB a mortgage over his flat. TSB thus acquired a property right (technically, a charge by way of legal mortgage—see Chapter 28, section 4.2) in the land. Mr Botham failed to repay TSB as agreed; TSB therefore acquired a power to sell the flat and use the proceeds towards meeting Mr Botham's debt. A dispute arose as to the scope of TSB's property right in the land: did it give TSB a power to sell (and use the proceeds) of particular objects within the flat, such as the fitted carpets, light fittings, the dishwasher in the fitted kitchen, etc.? Mr Botham claimed that such items were not covered by TSB's property right, because they were not fixtures and therefore not part of the land.

The first instance judge split the various objects in dispute into nine groups. Table 1 sets out the groups, along with the related decision of the first instance judge and then of the Court of Appeal.

The first instance judge, by examining the degree and purpose of annexation, thus found that almost all of the disputed objects (including the kitchen sink) were fixtures, and therefore that TSB did have the power to sell those objects and use the proceeds of sale towards meeting Mr Botham's debt.

The Court of Appeal applied the same basic test, but reached different conclusions.

[1] Subject to two exceptions, conceded by Mr Botham to be fixtures.

Lord Justice Roch

The tests, in the case of an item which has been attached to the building in some way other than simply by its own weight, seem to be the purpose of the item and the purpose of the link between the item and the building. If the item viewed objectively is intended to be permanent and to afford a lasting improvement to the building, the thing will have become a fixture. If the attachment is temporary and is no more than is necessary for the item to be used and enjoyed, then it will remain a chattel. Some indicators can be identified. For example, if the item is ornamental and the attachment is simply to enable the item to be displayed and enjoyed as an adornment that will often indicate that this item is a chattel. Obvious examples are pictures. But this will not be the result in every case; for example ornamental tiles on the walls of kitchens and bathrooms. The ability to remove an item or its attachment from the building without damaging the fabric of the building is another indicator. The same item may in some areas be a chattel and in others a fixture. For example a cooker will, if free standing and connected to the building only by an electric flex, be a chattel. But it may be otherwise if the cooker is a split level cooker with the hob set into a work surface and the oven forming part of one of the cabinets in the kitchen. It must be remembered that in many cases the item being considered may be one that has been bought by the mortgagor on hire purchase, where the ownership of the item remains in the supplier until the instalments have been paid. Holding such items to be fixtures simply because they are housed in a fitted cupboard and linked to the building by an electric cable, and, in cases of washing machines, by the necessary plumbing would cause difficulties and such findings should only be made where the intent to effect a permanent improvement in the building is incontrovertible. The type of person who instals or attaches the item to the land can be a further indicator. Thus items installed by a builder, eg the wall tiles will probably be fixtures, whereas items installed by eg a carpet contractor or curtain supplier or by the occupier of the building himself or herself may well not be [. . .]

I have no hesitation in agreeing with the judge that Groups 5 and 6, the bathroom fittings namely the taps, plugs and showerhead together with the towel rails, soap dishes and lavatory roll holders which are all the items listed under the heading "Ironmongery" in the schedule of disputed items helpfully prepared by Mr Chapman, the Bank's counsel for the purpose of this appeal, are fixtures.

Those items are attached to the building in such a way as to demonstrate a significant connection with the building, and are of a type consistent with the bathroom fittings such as the basins, baths, bidets and lavatories, as to demonstrate an intention to effect a permanent improvement to the flat. They are items necessary for a room which is used as a bathroom. They are not there, on the evidence which was before the judge and which is before us, to be enjoyed for themselves, but they are there as accessories which enable the room to be used and enjoyed as a bathroom. Viewed objectively, they were intended to be permanent and to afford a lasting improvement to the property.

The third group about which I have no doubt is Group 8, the kitchen units, including the sink [. . .]. Again in my judgment the degree of annexation, the fact that between the working surfaces and the underside of the wall cupboards of the wall units there is tiling, demonstrates both a degree of annexation and an intention to effect a permanent improvement to the kitchen of the flat so as to make those units fixtures. Further, as a matter of common sense, those units could not be removed without damaging the fabric of the flat, even if the damage is no more that the leaving of a pattern of tiling which is unlikely to be of use if different units had to be installed.

The seventh group of items, the marble panels and mirrors in the principal bathroom were conceded by Mr Botham's counsel before the judge to be fixtures and [counsel for Mr Botham] in this appeal, accepts that that concession was rightly made [. . .]

I would allow the appeal with regard to the fitted carpets and the curtains and blinds i.e., Groups 1 and 4. These items, although made or cut to fit the particular floor or window concerned, are attached to the building in an insubstantial manner. Carpets can easily be lifted off gripper rods and removed and can be used again elsewhere. In my judgment neither the degree of annexation nor the surrounding circumstances indicate an intention to effect a permanent improvement in the building. Although many people take with them their curtains and carpets when they move, it is true that others leave curtains and carpets for the incoming occupier, but normally only where the incoming occupier has bought those items separately from the purchase of the property itself. Curtains are attached merely by being hung from curtain rails. The removal of carpets and curtains has no effect damaging or otherwise on the fabric of the building. In my opinion, the method of keeping fitted carpets in place and keeping curtains hung are no more than is required for enjoyment of those items as curtains and carpets. Such items are not considered to be or to have become part of the building. They are not installed, in the case of new buildings, by the builders when the building is constructed, but by the occupier himself or herself or by specialist contractors who supply and install such items. The same is true of curtains. Both will be changed from time to time as the occupier decides to change the decoration of one or more rooms in his or her house or flat. There may be cases where carpeting or carpet squares are stuck to a concrete screed in such a way as to make them part of the floor and thus fixtures. In this case, there was no evidence, in my opinion, to justify the judge's finding that the carpets in this flat were fixtures.

With regard to Group 2, the light fittings, [counsel for Mr Botham] conceded that two of the light fittings recessed into the ceilings shown in photographs 129 and 138 were fixtures. I would hold that [TSB Bank] on the admissible evidence have failed to show that the other lighting items were fixtures. There is no admissible evidence as to the method of attachment of these items to the walls and ceilings other than that the photographs show that they must be attached in some manner. [Counsel for Mr Botham] submitted that their removal cannot be too difficult because in many cases the fitting would have to be removed in order to replace a bulb or connection that had failed. In my judgment, these light fittings, in the absence of evidence other than the photographs of them, remain chattels as would lamp shades or ornamental light fittings or chandeliers suspended from a ceiling rose.

Group 3 were the gas fires. In their case the only connection between them and the building was a gas pipe. In the gas pipes, shortly before the pipes enter these gas fires, gas taps are to be seen in the photographs. Apart from that link, which essential if they are to be used as gas fires, nothing secures the gas fires, on the evidence, other than their own weight. [Counsel for Mr Botham] argues that their function was purely ornamental, the flat actually being heated by water filled radiators. I would not accept that submission. These fires have two purposes: one decorative, the mock coal fire aspect, and one functional, the gas fire aspect. Nevertheless I am of the view that electric fires and heaters which are simply plugged into the electricity supply of a house are not fixtures and I do not see any sensible distinction between such electric fires and these four gas fires on the evidence which was available to the judge and is available to us. [. . .]

Many of [the items in Groups 8 & 9] were made by a single manufacturer, Neff. The judge said that whilst the kitchen units and sink were manifestly fixtures, the white goods he had found to be the most difficult items he had had to decide. He found that they were manufactured to standard sizes, they were fitted into standard sized holes and that they were removable. They were very probably expensive items, although he had no direct evidence of their value. He held them to be fixtures because:

> 'They were there as part of the overall kitchen. If one were taking a flat on a lease one would expect them to be there. They were put in to be part of the kitchen as it stood. They were all physically fixed in, not only resting on their own weight, but being plumbed in, wired in and in most cases aligned with and perhaps to some extent abutted to, so that they could not be too easily removed, the remaining parts of the fitted kitchen. A fitted kitchen is a whole.'

I differ from the judge on this group of items on the slender facts in this case. What one might expect to be in a flat if one were taking a flat, would depend on the type of letting one was seeking. That is not, in my view, a test of whether an item is or is not a fixture. Clearly all of these items are items one would not be surprised to find in a kitchen, but then so is an electric kettle, a food mixer and a microwave oven, which are all normally 'plugged in'. No one, I venture to suggest would look on these as fixtures. Here the judge should have reminded himself that the degree of annexation was slight: no more than that which was needed for these items to be used for their normal purposes. In fact these items remain in position by their own weight and not by virtue of the links between them and the building. All these items can be bought separately, and are often acquired on an instalment payment basis, when ownership does not pass to the householder immediately. Many of these items are designed to last for a limited period of time and will require replacing after a relatively short number of years. The degree of annexation is therefore slight. Disconnection can be done without damage to the fabric of the building and normally without difficulty. The purpose of such links as there were to the building was to enable these machines to be used to wash clothes or dishes or preserve or cook food. Absent any evidence other than the photographs, it was not open to the judge, in my opinion, to infer that these items were installed with the intention that they were to be a permanent or lasting improvement to the building. This is not a case where the intent to effect a permanent improvement in the building by installing these machines so that they became part of the realty was incontrovertible, as the judge's doubts illustrated.

The Court of Appeal's decision in Botham v TSB Bank is useful not only because it shows how the fixtures test can be applied in practice, but also because it underlines that the test is not based on reasonable expectations or common practice as to what B, a party buying or renting land from A, would expect to find when moving in. It might be unusual, as noted by the first instance judge, for A to remove gas fires previously connected to pipes, or an oven fitted and installed into a particular slot in the kitchen. Nonetheless, this does not mean that such items necessarily count as part of the land. If B wants to ensure that, as well as acquiring a property right in the land, she also acquires the right to have or use those items, she needs to ensure that A makes a contractual promise to give B such rights.

2.2.2 Things found on, or in, the land

We have seen that if a party (B) has a property right in land, he also has a right to control of: (i) (within limits) the area above and below the surface of the land; (ii) anything that is part and parcel of the land (such as a house); and (iii) anything that is sufficiently attached to the land (such as a towel rail attached to the central heating system). Of course, this does not mean that B's property right in the land gives him a right to control of everything that may be in or on his land. That point is clear from the following extract.

Facts: In 1938, Major Peel bought Gwernhaylod House, Overton-on-Dee, Shropshire, and thereby acquired a property right in that land: a freehold. He did not move in immediately and the house remained empty, apart from periods during which it was requisitioned by the government and used by the armed forces. In August 1940, during one of those periods of requisition, Mr Hannah, a lance corporal stationed at the house, dislodged a brooch that had been in a crevice by a window frame. He later handed it to the police. No one came forward to claim the brooch and it was given by the police to Major Peel. He offered Mr Hannah a reward for having found the brooch, but Mr Hannah refused to accept the reward: he claimed that, because he found the brooch, he had a property right to it and that Major Peel was under a duty not to interfere with that property right. Major Peel, however, kept and then sold the brooch. Mr Hannah claimed that Major Peel thereby committed a tort: he had interfered with Mr Hannah's property right and so should pay damages as a result. Major Peel claimed that he was, in fact, entitled to the brooch because it had been found on his land. Birkett J found in favour of Mr Hannah.

Birkett J

As to the issue in law, the rival claims of the parties can be stated in this way: [Mr Hannah] says: "I claim the brooch as its finder and I have a good title against all the world, save only the true owner." [Major Peel] says: "My claim is superior to yours inasmuch as I am the freeholder. The brooch was found on my property, although I was never in occupation, and my title, therefore, ousts yours and in the absence of the true owner I am entitled to the brooch or its value." Unhappily the law on this issue is in a very uncertain state and there is need of an authoritative decision of a higher court [...].

In the famous case of Armory v. Delamirie,[48] the plaintiff, who was a chimney sweeper's boy, found a jewel and carried it to the defendant's shop, who was a goldsmith, in order to know what it was, and he delivered it into the hands of the apprentice in the goldsmith's shop, who made a pretence of weighing it and took out the stones and called to the master to let him know that it came to three-halfpence. The master offered the boy the money who refused to take it and insisted on having the jewel again. Whereupon the apprentice handed him back the socket of the jewel without the stones, and an action was brought in trover against the master [i.e. the boy claimed that the master committed a tort by interfering with the boy's property right in the jewel], and it was ruled "that the finder of a jewel, though he does not by such finding acquire an absolute property or ownership, yet he has such a property as will enable him to keep it against all but the rightful owner, and consequently may maintain trover [i.e. sue in tort]." The case of Bridges v. Hawkesworth[49] is in process of becoming almost equally as famous because of the disputation which has raged around it. The headnote in the Jurist is as follows: "The place in which a lost article is found does not constitute any exception to the general rule of law, that the finder is entitled to it as against all persons except the owner."

The case was in fact an appeal against a decision of the county court judge at Westminster. The facts appear to have been that in the year 1847 the plaintiff, who was a commercial traveller, called on a firm named Byfield & Hawkesworth on business, as he was in the habit of doing, and as he was leaving the shop he picked up a small parcel which was lying on the floor. He immediately showed it to the shopman, and opened it in his presence, when it was found to consist of a quantity of Bank of England notes, to the amount of £65. The defendant, who was a partner in the firm of Byfield & Hawkesworth, was then called, and the plaintiff told him he had found the notes, and asked the defendant to keep them until the owner appeared to claim them. Then various advertisements were put in the papers asking for the owner, but the true owner was never found. No person having appeared to claim them, and three years having elapsed since they were found, the plaintiff applied to the defendant to have the notes returned to him, and offered to pay the expenses of the advertisements, and to give an indemnity. The defendant refused to deliver them up to the plaintiff, and an action was brought in the county court of Westminster in consequence of that refusal. The county court judge decided that the defendant, the shopkeeper, was entitled to the custody of the notes as against the plaintiff, and gave judgment for the defendant. Thereupon the appeal was brought which came before the court composed of Patteson J. and Wightman J. Patteson J. said:

> "The notes which are the subject of this action were incidentally dropped, by mere accident, in the shop of the defendant, by the owner of them. The facts do not warrant the supposition that they had been deposited there intentionally, nor has the case been put at all upon that ground. The plaintiff found them on the floor, they being manifestly lost by someone. The general right of the finder to any article which has been lost, as against all the world, except the true owner, was established in the case of Armory v. Delamirie which has never been disputed. This right would clearly have accrued to the plaintiff had the notes been picked up by him outside the shop of the defendant and if he once had the right, the case finds that he did not intend, by delivering the > notes to the defendant, to waive the title (if any) which he had to them, but they were handed to the defendant merely for the purpose of delivering them to the owner should he appear."

Then a little later:

> "The case, therefore, resolves itself into the single point on which it appears that the learned judge decided it, namely, whether the circumstance of the notes being found inside the defendant's shop gives him, the defendant, the right to have them as against the plaintiff, who found them."

After discussing the cases, and the argument, the learned judge said:

> "If the discovery had never been communicated to the defendant, could the real owner have had any cause of action against him because they were found in his house? Certainly not. The notes never were in the custody of the defendant, nor within the protection of his house, before they were found, as they would have been had they been intentionally deposited there; and the defendant has come under no responsibility, except from the communication made to him by the plaintiff, the finder, and the steps taken by way of advertisement. [. . .] We find, therefore, no circumstances in this case to take it out of the general rule of law, that the finder of a lost article is entitled to it as against all persons except the real owner, and we think that that rule must prevail, and that the learned judge was mistaken in holding that the place in which they were found makes any legal difference. Our judgment, therefore, is that the plaintiff is entitled to these notes as against the defendant."

It is to be observed that in Bridges v. Hawkesworth which has been the subject of immense disputation, neither counsel put forward any argument on the fact that the notes were found in a shop. Counsel for the appellant assumed throughout that the position was the same as if the parcel had been found in a private house, and the learned judge spoke of "the protection of his (the shopkeeper's) house." The case for the appellant was that the shopkeeper never knew of the notes. Again, what is curious is that there was no suggestion that the place where the notes were found was in any way material; indeed, the judge in giving the judgment of the court expressly repudiates this and said in terms "The learned judge was mistaken in holding that the place in which they were found makes any legal difference." There is no doubt that in this case the brooch was lost in the ordinary meaning of that term, and I should imagine it had been lost for a very considerable time. Indeed, from this correspondence it appears that at one time the predecessors in title of the defendant were considering making some claim. But the moment the plaintiff discovered that the brooch might be of some value, he took the advice of his commanding officer and handed it to the police. His conduct was commendable and meritorious. The defendant was never physically in possession of these premises at any time. It is clear that the brooch was never his, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, in that he had the prior possession. He had no knowledge of it, until it was brought to his notice by the finder. A discussion of the merits does not seem to help, but it is clear on the facts that the brooch was "lost" in the ordinary meaning of that word; that it was "found" by the plaintiff in the ordinary meaning of that word, that its true owner has never been found, that the defendant was the owner of the premises and had his notice drawn to this matter by the plaintiff, who found the brooch. In those circumstances I propose to follow the decision in Bridges v. Hawkesworth, and to give judgment in this case for [Mr Hannah] for £66.

The first point to take from this decision is the important general principle that if a party takes physical control of an object (e.g. by finding it), he acquires a property right in that object. This is a fundamental principle of property law. Indeed, even a thief can use it: even though he has dishonestly taken physical control of an object, he still acquires a property right in it.[50] Of course, this does not mean that the finder or thief has the best property right: the party who lost the thing, or from whom it was stolen, also has a property right. And the general rule is that he or she can assert that property right against the finder or thief, because his or her property right arose before that of the finder or thief. As we will see in Chapter 12, section 2, timing is absolutely crucial when considering the priority of conflicting property rights: the general rule is that the party with the earliest property right will win.

So, in Hannah v Peel, Mr Hannah clearly had a property right in the brooch: he acquired that right simply by taking physical control of the brooch, just as the chimney sweep's boy in Armory v Delamrie acquired a property right by taking physical control of the jewel. Equally clearly, the party who lost the brooch had an earlier property right in the brooch: so, if that party were to have come forward, she would have been able to bring a claim against Mr Hannah. But that party did not come forward: the dispute was between Mr Hannah (who clearly had a property right in the brooch) and Major Peel. So, Major Peel had to show that: (i) he, too, had a property right in the brooch; and (ii) he acquired that property right before Mr Hannah found the brooch.

How could Major Peel show that he had such a property right? In theory, he could try to claim that his property right in the land also covered the brooch. But, as we saw in section 2.2.1 above, he could only make that argument if the brooch, when lost, had become part and parcel of his land, or was sufficiently attached to his land. Given that the brooch was easily dislodged from the crevice, it clearly was not part and parcel of, or sufficiently attached to, Major Peel's land. Further, if that argument were accepted, then the party who lost the brooch, even were she to come forward, would not be able to claim the brooch: her property right would have disappeared when the brooch became part of Major Peel's land.

So, Major Peel tried a different argument, proposing that he automatically acquired a property right in anything found on his land. Birkett J rejected that argument. As shown by the earlier decision in Bridges v Hawkesworth, the mere fact that something was lost or found on a party's land does not give that party a property right in the thing. After all, as was the case in Hannah v Peel, the party with the property right in the land may not even know that the thing is on his land.

It may therefore seem that the position is fairly simple: a party with a property right in land has no special rights in relation to anything lost or found on his land. The following extract, however, is from a case that (perhaps unnecessarily) introduced some complications.

Parker v British Airways Board

Facts: In November 1978, Mr Parker was waiting for a flight in an executive lounge at Heathrow Terminal One. He spotted a gold bracelet on the floor that had been dropped by an unknown passenger. He handed the bracelet to British Airways staff in case that unknown passenger should come forward to claim it; he also gave the staff his contact details and said that the bracelet should be returned to him if no one came forward to claim it. By June 1979, no one had come forward. Although Mr Parker had requested that it be sent to him, British Airways sold the bracelet for £850. Mr Parker claimed that, by finding and taking control of the bracelet, he had a property right in the bracelet and that, by refusing to give it to him, British Airways had committed the tort of conversion. The first instance judge accepted Mr Parker's arguments and ordered British Airways to pay him £850 plus interest. The Court of Appeal dismissed British Airways' appeal.

Donaldson LJ

On November 15, 1978, the plaintiff, Alan George Parker, had a date with fate—and perhaps with legal immortality. He found himself in the international executive lounge at terminal one, Heathrow Airport. And that was not all that he found. He also found a gold bracelet lying on the floor.

We know very little about the plaintiff, and it would be nice to know more. He was lawfully in the lounge and, as events showed, he was an honest man. Clearly he had not forgotten the schoolboy maxim 'Finders keepers.' But, equally clearly, he was well aware of the adult qualification 'unless the true owner claims the article.' He had had to clear customs and security to reach the lounge. He was almost certainly an outgoing passenger because the defendants, British Airways Board, as lessees of the lounge from the British Airports Authority and its occupiers, limit its use to passengers who hold first class tickets or boarding passes or who are members of their Executive Club which is a passengers' 'club.' Perhaps the plaintiff's flight had just been called and he was pressed for time. Perhaps the only officials in sight were employees of the defendants. Whatever the reason, he gave the bracelet to an anonymous official of the defendants instead of to the police. He also gave the official a note of his name and address and asked for the bracelet to be returned to him if it was not claimed by the owner. The official handed the bracelet to the lost property department of the defendants. Although the owner never claimed the bracelet, the defendants did not return it to the plaintiff. Instead they sold it and kept the proceeds which amounted to £850. The plaintiff discovered what had happened and was more than a little annoyed. I can understand his annoyance. He sued the defendants in the Brentford County Court and was awarded £850 as damages and £50 as interest. The defendants now appeal.

It is astonishing that there should be any doubt as to who is right. But there is. Indeed, it seems that the academics have been debating this problem for years. In 1971 the Law Reform Committee reported that it was by no means clear who had the better claim to lost property when the protagonists were the finder and the occupier of the premises where the property was found. Whatever else may be in doubt, the committee was abundantly right in this conclusion. The committee recommended legislative action but, as is not uncommon, nothing has been done. The rights of the parties thus depend upon the common law.

As a matter of legal theory, the common law has a ready made solution for every problem and it is only for the judges, as legal technicians, to find it. The reality is somewhat different. Take the present case. The conflicting rights of finder and occupier have indeed been considered by various courts in the past. But under the rules of English jurisprudence, none of their decisions binds this court. We therefore have both the right and the duty to extend and adapt the common law in the light of established principles and the current needs of the community. This is not to say that we start with a clean sheet. In doing so, we should draw from the experience of the past as revealed by the previous decisions of the courts.

Neither the plaintiff nor the defendants lay any claim to the bracelet either as owner of it or as one who derives title from that owner. The plaintiff's claim is founded upon the ancient common law rule that the act of finding a chattel which has been lost and taking control of it gives the finder rights with respect to that chattel. The defendants' claim has a different basis. They cannot and do not claim to have found the bracelet when it was handed to them by the plaintiff. At that stage it was no longer lost and they received and accepted the bracelet from the plaintiff on terms that it would be returned to him if the owner could not be found. They must and do claim on the basis that they had rights in relation to the bracelet immediately before the plaintiff found it and that these rights are superior to the plaintiff's. The defendants' claim is based upon the proposition that at common law an occupier of land has such rights over all lost chattels which are on that land, whether or not the occupier knows of their existence.

The common law right asserted by the plaintiff has been recognised for centuries. [Donaldson LJ here referred to Armory v Delamrie,[51] which is considered in the extract above from Hannah v Peel [. . .] Some qualification has also to be made in the case of the trespassing finder. The person vis à vis whom he is a trespasser has a better title. The fundamental basis of this is clearly public policy. Wrongdoers should not benefit from their wrongdoing. This requirement would be met if the trespassing finder acquired no rights. That would, however, produce [a] free-for-all situation [. . .], in that anyone could take the article from the trespassing finder. Accordingly, the common law has been obliged to give rights to someone else, the owner ex hypothesi being unknown. The obvious candidate is the occupier of the property upon which the finder was trespassing.

Curiously enough, it is difficult to find any case in which the rule is stated in this simple form, but I have no doubt that this is the law [. . .] One might have expected there to be decisions clearly qualifying the general rule where the circumstances are that someone finds a chattel and thereupon forms the dishonest intention of keeping it regardless of the rights of the true owner or of anyone else. But that is not the case [. . .]

[Donaldson LJ then surveyed previous cases and set out the following five propositions as to the rights and duties of a finder:]

1. The finder of a chattel acquires no rights over it unless (a) it has been abandoned or lost and (b) he takes it into his care and control.
2. The finder of a chattel acquires very limited rights over it if he takes it into his care and control with dishonest intent or in the course of trespassing.
3. Subject to the foregoing and to point 4 below, a finder of a chattel, whilst not acquiring any absolute property or ownership in the chattel, acquires a right to keep it against all but the true owner or those in a position to claim through the true owner or one who can assert a prior right to keep the chattel which was subsisting at the time when the finder took the chattel into his care and control.
4. Unless otherwise agreed, any servant or agent who finds a chattel in the course of his employment or agency and not wholly incidentally or collaterally thereto and who takes it into his care and control does so on behalf of his employer or principal who acquires a finder's rights to the exclusion of those of the actual finder.
5. A person having a finder's rights has an obligation to take such measures as in all the circumstances are reasonable to acquaint the true owner of the finding and present whereabouts of the chattel and to care for it meanwhile.

[Donaldson LJ also set out the following four propositions as to the rights and duties of an occupier of land on which a thing is found:]

1. An occupier of land has rights superior to those of a finder over chattels in or attached to that land and an occupier of a building has similar rights in respect of chattels attached to that building, whether in either case the occupier is aware of the presence of the chattel.

2. An occupier of a building has rights superior to those of a finder over chattels upon or in, but not attached to, that building if, but only if, before the chattel is found, he has manifested an intention to exercise control over the building and the things which may be upon it or in it.
3. An occupier who manifests an intention to exercise control over a building and the things which may be upon or in it so as to acquire rights superior to those of a finder is under an obligation to take such measures as in all the circumstances are reasonable to ensure that lost chattels are found and, upon their being found, whether by him or by a third party, to acquaint the true owner of the finding and to care for the chattels meanwhile. The manifestation of intention may be express or implied from the circumstances including, in particular, the circumstance that the occupier manifestly accepts or is obliged by law to accept liability for chattels lost upon his "premises," e.g. an innkeeper or carrier's liability.
4. An 'occupier' of a chattel, e.g. a ship, motor car, caravan or aircraft, is to be treated as if he were the occupier of a building for the purposes of the foregoing rules [...]

The plaintiff was not a trespasser in the executive lounge and, in taking the bracelet into his care and control, he was acting with obvious honesty. Prima facie, therefore, he had a full finder's rights and obligations. He in fact discharged those obligations by handing the bracelet to an official of the defendants' although he could equally have done so by handing the bracelet to the police or in other ways such as informing the police of the find and himself caring for the bracelet.

The plaintiff's prima facie entitlement to a finder's rights was not displaced in favour of an employer or principal. There is no evidence that he was in the executive lounge in the course of any employment or agency and, if he was, the finding of the bracelet was quite clearly collateral thereto. The position would have been otherwise in the case of most or perhaps all the defendants' employees.

The defendants, for their part, cannot assert any title to the bracelet based upon the rights of an occupier over chattels attached to a building. The bracelet was lying loose on the floor. Their claim must, on my view of the law, be based upon a manifest intention to exercise control over the lounge and all things which might be in it. The evidence is that they claimed the right to decide who should and who should not be permitted to enter and use the lounge, but their control was in general exercised upon the basis of classes or categories of user and the availability of the lounge in the light of the need to clean and maintain it. I do not doubt that they also claimed the right to exclude individual undesirables, such as drunks, and specific types of chattels such as guns and bombs. But this control has no real relevance to a manifest intention to assert custody and control over lost articles. There was no evidence that they searched for such articles regularly or at all.

On the evidence available, there was no sufficient manifestation of any intention to exercise control over lost property before it was found such as would give the defendants a right superior to that of the plaintiff or indeed any right over the bracelet. As the true owner has never come forward, it is a case of 'finders keepers.'

On the one hand, the result in Parker v British Airways Board is consistent with the simple position adopted in Hannah v Peel: British Airways did not acquire a property right in the bracelet simply because it was lost and found on its land. On the other, the reasoning of Donaldson LJ introduces a complication: it means that a party with a property right in land can acquire a property right in a thing lost and found on its land if it can show a 'manifest intention to exercise control over the [land] and all things which might be in it'. It is not immediately obvious why a landowner's intention to control such things should give it a property right: why change the general rule that, to acquire a property right in relation to a lost or found thing, a party needs to take actual physical control of the thing?

Despite this problem, the reasoning of Donaldson LJ was relied on by the Court of Appeal in the following case.

Waverley Borough Council v Fletcher
[1996] QB 334, CA

Facts: Waverley Borough Council had a property right (a freehold) in Farnham Park, Farnham, Surrey. The park was open to the public for recreational use. In August 1992, Mr Fletcher visited the park with a metal detector and, after some digging, uncovered a medieval gold brooch about nine inches below the surface of the ground. Mr Fletcher thus took physical control of the brooch. Under the terms of the Treasure Act 1996, the Crown acquires a property right to any 'treasure' as soon as it is found. It was determined, however, that the brooch did not count as treasure and that the Crown consequently had no claim to it. The Council, however, claimed that, because it had been lost and found on its land, it had a prior property right in the brooch. The first instance judge found in favour of Mr Fletcher; the Court of Appeal allowed the Council's appeal.

Auld LJ

[Auld LJ, adding his own emphasis, referred to the following passage from Pollock and Wright, Possession in the Common Law (1888) at p 41, dealing with objects attached to or in land]:

> 'The possession of land carries with it in general, by our law, possession of everything which is attached to or under that land, and, in the absence of a better title elsewhere, the right to possess it also. And it makes no difference that the possessor is not aware of the thing's existence. So it was lately held concerning a prehistoric boat imbedded in the soil. It is free to any one who requires a specific intention as part of de facto possession to treat this as a positive rule of law. But it seems preferable to say that the legal possession rests on a real de facto possession, constituted by the occupier's general power and intent to exclude unauthorized interference.'

[. . .] The test of possession, in its most abstract form, may have a constant meaning whether applied to objects in or unattached and on land. But it is clear from Pollock and Wright's statement [. . .] that they regarded its application to objects in land to be free from the uncertainties inherent in disputes about entitlement to unattached objects found on land. Their proposition was that in practice possession of land should generally be taken as carrying with it an intent to possession of objects in or attached to it [. . .]

[Counsel for Mr Fletcher] argued that it is against commonsense that it should make all the difference whether an object is just under or on the surface. That was also the view of the [first instance] judge. He said that he could see no reason in common sense why the better possessory claim should depend upon whether an object was found on or in ground.

[Counsel for Mr Fletcher] gave as one of a number of examples in support of his argument, a lost watch on a muddy path which might within a day or two become covered by a thin coating of mud. Why, he asked, should the landowner's claim be different and stronger when the watch finally, but only just, disappears from sight?

In my view, the authorities reveal a number of sound and practical reasons for the distinction.

First, as Donaldson L.J. said in Parker v. British Airways Board,[52] an object in land "is to be treated as an integral part of the realty as against all but the true owner" or that the finder in detaching the object would, in the absence of licence to do so, become a trespasser. [Counsel for Mr Fletcher] suggested that this is wrong because if an object is treated as part of the realty the true owner cannot have priority. However, the English law of ownership and possession, unlike that of Roman Law, is not a system of identifying absolute entitlement but of priority of entitlement, and Donaldson L.J.'s rationale is consistent with that [. . .]

Second, removal of an object in or attached to land would normally involve interference with the land and may damage it [. . .]

Third, putting aside the borderline case of a recently lost article which has worked its way just under the surface, in the case of an object in the ground its original owner is unlikely in most cases to be there to claim it. The law, therefore, looks for a substitute owner, the owner or possessor of the land in which it is lodged. Whereas in the case of an unattached object on the surface, it is likely in most cases to have been recently lost, and the true owner may well claim it. In the meantime, there is no compelling reason why it should pass into the possession of the landowner as against a finder unless he, the landowner, has manifested an intention to possess it. As to borderline cases of the sort mentioned by [counsel for Mr Fletcher], potential absurdities can always be found at the margins in the application of any sound principle. It is for the trial judge to determine as a matter of fact and degree on which side of the line, on or in the land, an object is found [. . .]

In my view, the two main principles established by the authorities, and for good practical reasons, are as stated by Donaldson L.J. in Parker v. British Airways Board. I venture to restate them with particular reference to objects found on or in land, for he was concerned primarily with an object found in a building. (1) Where an article is found in or attached to land, as between the owner or lawful possessor of the land and the finder of the article, the owner or lawful possessor of the land has the better title. (2) Where an article is found unattached on land, as between the two, the owner or lawful possessor of the land has a better title only if he exercised such manifest control over the land as to indicate an intention to control the land and anything that might be found on it [. . .]

Accordingly, I can see no basis for not applying the general rule that an owner or lawful possessor of land has a better title to an object found in or attached to his land than the finder, or for modifying it in some way to produce a different result in the circumstances of this case. Mr. Fletcher did not derive a superior right to the brooch simply because he was entitled as a member of the public to engage in recreational pursuits in the park. Metal detecting was not a recreation of the sort permitted under the terms under which the council held the land on behalf of the general public. In any event, digging and removal of property in the land were not such a permitted use, and were acts of trespass. And the council was entitled to exercise its civil remedy for protection of its property regardless of the absence of any applicable byelaw.

[52] [1982] QB 1004, 1010.

According to the reasoning of Auld LJ, the crucial point in Waverley BC v Fletcher, which distinguishes that case from Hannah v Peel, is that the brooch was found in the land rather than on the land. As the following extract suggests, however, there are some problems with that reasoning.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 157–8)

The Court of Appeal's reasoning in Waverley BC is flawed. First, it was said that once the brooch was submerged, it became part and parcel of [the Council's] land, so that [the Council], as an owner of the land, also had Ownership of the brooch. It is true that if one thing loses its physical identity and becomes subsumed into another thing, the first thing ceases to have an independent existence [...] However, if this had occurred in Waverley BC then all—pre-existing property rights in the brooch would have ceased to exist. On that view, the person who originally lost the brooch (A) would lose his Ownership of the brooch and so would be unable to assert a right against either [Mr Fletcher] or [the Council]. However, the Court of Appeal's view was that A retained Ownership and so, if he came forward, could assert his right against each of [Mr Fletcher] and [the Council].[53] But a court cannot have it both ways: either (i) the brooch lost its identity and became part of the land, so that A's pre-existing property right is destroyed; or (ii) the brooch did not lose its identity and A still has a property right he can assert against each of of [Mr Fletcher] and [the Council]. On that second view, the brooch does not count as part of [the Council's] land: so [the Council's] position as an owner of the land does not give [it] Ownership of the brooch.

The puzzling statement of Donaldson LJ in Parker v British Airways Board,[54] relied on in Waverley BC, that a thing can become an "integral part of the realty [i.e. the land] as against all but the true owner" must be rejected. Either the brooch lost its identity and became part of the land or it did not. The better view must be that it did not. The brooch did not become part of [the Council's] land simply by being submerged by the top soil. The brooch remained a distinct physical object: after all, once he found the brooch, [Mr Fletcher] was easily able to remove it from [the Council's] land.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND LAND

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. The Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998) prospectively incorporates the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) into domestic law. Article 1 of the First Protocol and Art 8 have particular relevance to land law.
2. The HRA 1998 has vertical effect: under s 6, public authorities must act in accordance with the ECHR, while s 2 requires the courts to take account of the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg (the Strasbourg Court).
3. The HRA 1998 may also have horizontal effect (i.e. between private individuals) as a consequence of s 3, which requires legislation to be interpreted in accordance with the ECHR, and s 6, which requires the courts (as public authorities) to act in accordance with the ECHR.
4. The Articles of the ECHR confer qualified protections. Infringements may be justified in the wider public interest. The government enjoys a wide margin of appreciation in identifying and implementing a legitimate purpose, but nevertheless must act proportionately.
5. Article 1 of the First Protocol guarantees the peaceful enjoyment of possessions. It provides that a person is not to be deprived of, or subject to controls over, their possessions except in the public or general interest.
6. Article 8 guarantees respect for the home, the enjoyment of which may only be infringed in proscribed circumstances: for example, in the national economic interest or to protect the rights of others.
7. Article 6 ensures the right to a fair trial in the determination of property rights, and Art 14 provides that individuals should not be discriminated against in the exercise of their ECHR rights.
8. The effect of the HRA 1998 on property rights is still uncertain, but two views have been advanced. The first is that the Act will have little impact, because English law is already founded on the fundamental principles that it espouses. The second suggests that the HRA 1998 will have a wider effect by providing an alternative measure against which conflicting rights may be balanced, and by the possibility that it founds a free-standing property protection.

1 INTRODUCTION

The Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998) incorporates the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) into the domestic law of England and Wales. As such, it is said to bring human rights home by permitting an infringement of the ECHR to be raised and considered in the domestic courts.[1] Previously, a claimant had to bring his or her case before the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg (the Strasbourg Court) once he or she had exhausted any redress under English law in the domestic courts.[2]

The ECHR is a product of post-war Europe. In the face of the cold war, its object was to set out the freedoms that are considered central to human life in a civilized and democratic society. The majority of these rights were agreed and incorporated into the original form of the ECHR, to which the United Kingdom became a signatory in 1951, but the right to property proved more controversial and was not agreed until 1954. It is thus contained in a separate Protocol.

Although the ECHR was only incorporated into domestic law by the HRA 1998, the rights that it espouses are not a radical departure from the traditional principles upon which property law has been founded for centuries. The principle that no one should be arbitrarily deprived of their property found in Art 1 of the First Protocol has been a hallmark of democratic government, whilst the sanctity of the home that forms the basis of Art 8 reflects the sentiments of the time-honoured phrase that 'an Englishman's home is his castle'.

Gray, 'Land Law and Human Rights' in Land Law Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, 2002, p 216)

> The safeguards provided by the Convention are, in their way, mirrored across the expanse of European history during the past millennium. The human right to protection from arbitrary dispossession by the state is born of a deep impulse which views lawless seizure of property as a particularly violating kind of molestation—a form of proprietary rape. An instinct against arbitrary dissessin of freehold is at least as old as the Magna Carta and went on to animate the great eighteenth century declarations of social and civil liberties. For Blackstone, writing in 1765, it was inconceivable that 'sacred and inviolable rights to private property' should be postponed to 'public necessity' without 'a full indemnification and equivalent for the injury thereby sustained'. As Blackstone explained in strikingly modern parlance, the state cannot act 'even for the general good of the community [. . .] by simply stripping the subject of his property in an arbitrary manner'. Blackstone's premise was adopted, quickly and in virtually identical terms, in the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen and has since inspired a vast range of national and international prohibitions on the taking of property by the state except for justifiable purposes and on payment of a fair value.

It is becoming increasingly apparent, however, that the HRA 1998 may have a more far reaching impact upon our property law by providing a new form of property protection based upon the human rights enshrined in the ECHR.

[2] In 1966, the UK adopted the optional clauses that enabled an individual claimant to bring a case before the Strasbourg Court. See Harpum, 'Property Law: The Human Rights Dimension—Part 1' [2000] L&T Rev 4, for details of the pre-HRA effect of the ECHR.

In this chapter, we will look firstly at the mechanics of how the HRA 1998 brings human rights home; we will then go on to examine the two principal Articles of the ECHR that are of direct importance to property lawyers—namely, Art 1 of the First Protocol (protection of possessions) and Art 8 (respect for the home). Art 14 (protection from discrimination) and Art 6 (right to a fair trial) will also be considered, but only in outline.[3] The chapter will conclude with an assessment of the impact of the HRA 1998 on property law to date and in particular the emergence of a new human rights based protection of property.

2 THE MECHANICS OF THE HUMAN RIGHTS ACT 1998

We need to examine how the HRA 1998 incorporates the ECHR into domestic law, because it is only then that we can begin to appreciate its impact on land law. Unfortunately, the answer to this question is uncertain because the interpretation and impact of the HRA 1998 is the source of much debate amongst public lawyers. Land lawyers cannot remain immune to these debates, given the potential for human rights to affect the relations between private individuals. However, we will confine our attention to outlining the essential framework and highlighting the central issues.

2.1 THE COURTS AND THE HRA 1998

2.1.1 Section 2 and the duty to 'take into account' of Strasbourg jurisprudence

2.—Interpretation of Convention rights.

(1) A court or tribunal determining a question which has arisen in connection with a Convention right must take into account any—

(a) judgment, decision, declaration or advisory opinion of the European Court of Human Rights,

(b) opinion of the Commission given in a report adopted under Article 31 of the Convention,

(c) decision of the Commission in connection with Article 26 or 27(2) of the Convention, or

(d) decision of the Committee of Ministers taken under Article 46 of the Convention, whenever made or given, so far as, in the opinion of the court or tribunal, it is relevant to the proceedings in which that question has arisen.

Section 2, dictates that courts 'must take into account' the decisions of the Strasbourg Court, which has built up a considerable body of jurisprudence on the interpretation of the ECHR. Lord Bingham explained the meaning of this phrase in the conjoined appeals in the following cases.

[3] Gray and Gray question whether Arts 10 and 11—the right to freedom of speech, and to assembly and association—raise the possibility of uncontested access to private land: see Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009, [1.68]).

The mandatory duty imposed on domestic courts by section 2 of the 1998 Act is to take account of any judgment of the Strasbourg court and any opinion of the commission. Thus they are not strictly required to follow Strasbourg rulings, as they are bound by section 3(1) of the European Communities Act 1972 and as they are bound by the rulings of superior courts in the domestic curial hierarchy. But by section 6 of the 1998 Act it is unlawful for domestic courts, as public authorities, to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right such as a right arising under article 8. There are isolated occasions [. . .] when a domestic court may challenge the application by the Strasbourg Court of the principles it has expounded to the detailed facts of a particular class of case peculiarly within the knowledge of national authorities. The 1998 Act gives it scope to do so. But it is ordinarily the clear duty of our domestic courts, save where and so far as constrained by the primary domestic legislation, to give practical recognition to the principles laid down by the Strasbourg court as governing the Convention rights specified in s 1(1) of the 1998 Act. That court is the highest judicial authority on the interpretation of those rights, and the effectiveness of the Convention as an international instrument depends on the loyal acceptance by member states of the principles it lays down.

Thus s 2 does not reflect a strict approach to precedent but rather that Strasbourg decisions should exert a predominate influence which allows judges only a limited measure of discretion with any departure justified only when particular domestic circumstances dictate. This limited discretion is also constrained by ss 3 and 6 of the HRA 1998 as well as by a traditional hesitation to embark on judicial activism. There was an expectation that Strasbourg jurisprudence would operate as a floor below which domestic law would not fall, but in fact judges have shown reluctance in building upon the foundations laid by Strasbourg. Thus, Strasbourg Court decisions have tended to operate as a ceiling on the development of our domestic human rights.[4]

On occasions the courts have struggled to accept the opinions of the Strasbourg Court. For instance, we will see when examining Art 8 that our highest courts were initially reluctant to accept the unequivocal message from the Strasbourg Court regarding the compatibility of mandatory rights to possession exercised by public authorities.[5] In R v Hardcastle it was suggested that the Supreme Court should enjoy a degree of latitude where they believe that the Strasbourg Court does not appreciate the domestic situation. A dissatisfied victim may then appeal to the Strasbourg Court resulting in a dialogue, through the judgments of the two courts, to hopefully resolve any misunderstanding.

The requirement to "take into account" the Strasbourg jurisprudence will normally result in this Court applying principles that are clearly established by the Strasbourg Court. There will, however, be rare occasions where this court has concerns as to whether a decision of the Strasbourg Court sufficiently appreciates or accommodates particular aspects of our domestic process. In such circumstances it is open to this court to decline to follow the Strasbourg decision, giving reasons for adopting this course. This is likely to give the Strasbourg Court the opportunity to reconsider the particular aspect of the decision that is in issue, so that there takes place what may prove to be a valuable dialogue between this court and the Strasbourg Court.

Nevertheless, no such dialogue is appropriate where there is a clear and consistent line of authority from the Strasbourg Court.[6]

The advent of a new source of authority has raised the question of the precedent status of Strasbourg Court decisions upon the lower courts, which the House of Lords considered in Kay; Price.[7] Our highest domestic court is free to depart from its own decisions and will need to do so if that decision is subsequently found to take inadequate account of the views of the Strasbourg Court.[8] But the Lords in Kay decided that their decisions would continue to bind the lower courts: it is for their Lordships alone to consider the consistency, or otherwise, of their decisions with the Strasbourg jurisprudence.

2.1.2 Section 3 and the interpretation of legislation

Human Rights Act 1998, s 3

Interpretation of legislation

(1) So far as it is possible to do so, primary legislation and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights.

(2) This section—

(a) applies to primary legislation and subordinate legislation whenever enacted;

(b) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible primary legislation; and

(c) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible subordinate legislation if (disregarding any possibility of revocation) primary legislation prevents removal of the incompatibility.

6 Manchester CC v Pinnock [2010] UKSC 45, [48], per Lord Neuberger.

7 [2006] 2 AC 465.

8 The Court of Appeal is also free to depart from its own incompatible decisions see R v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2008] UKHL 63, [65]–[67].

Section 3 requires all bodies, including the courts, to give effect to legislation, whether enacted before or after the coming into force of the HRA 1998, in a manner that is compatible with the ECHR. Where a court finds that it cannot do so, it may issue a declaration of incompatibility under s 4, whereupon the government may amend the offending legislation using the fast-track procedure set out in s 10.[9] In this manner, parliamentary sovereignty is respected, whilst ensuring that Parliament itself does not infringe the ECHR.

The width of the court's power of statutory interpretation under s 3 has proved controversial. This question was considered by the House of Lords in the leading case of Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza. Their Lordship decided that the phrased "So far as it is possible to do so" conferred upon the courts extensive powers of interpretation which went beyond resolving ambiguities in legislation and could depart from the stated intention of the Parliament that had enacted the legislation. Thus, a court could modify the meaning of legislation to achieve compatibility, for instance by reading in words. However, the courts could not encroach upon Parliamentary sovereignty by adopting a meaning that was inconsistent with the fundamental thrust of the legislation.

Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza
[2004] UKHL 30, [2004] 2 AC 557

Facts: Mr Wallwyn-James died and his landlord sought possession against his homosexual partner, Mr Godin-Mendoza, who claimed to be entitled to succeed to the tenancy under the terms of Schedule 1, paragraph 2(1) and (2) of the Rent Act 1977. These provisions provided that a spouse or person living with the tenant 'as his or her wife or husband' can take over the tenancy.

Lord Nicholls

Section 3 is open to more than one interpretation. The difficulty lies in the word "possible". Section 3(1), read in conjunction with section 3(2) and section 4, makes one matter clear: Parliament expressly envisaged that not all legislation would be capable of being made Convention-compliant by application of section 3. Sometimes it would be possible, sometimes not. What is not clear is the test to be applied in separating the sheep from the goats. What is the standard, or the criterion, by which "possibility" is to be judged? A comprehensive answer to this question is proving elusive[. . .] It is now generally accepted that the application of section 3 does not depend upon the presence of ambiguity in the legislation being interpreted. Even if, construed according to the ordinary principles of interpretation, the meaning of the legislation admits of no doubt, section 3 may none the less require the legislation to be given a different meaning [. . .] it follows that the interpretative obligation decreed by section 3 is of an unusual and far-reaching character. Section 3 may require a court to depart from the unambiguous meaning the legislation would otherwise bear. In the ordinary course the interpretation of legislation involves seeking the intention reasonably to be attributed to [9] The county court cannot issue a declaration of incompatibility and, thus, proceedings will have to be adjourned to enable the higher courts to deal with the matter of incompatibility: see s 4(5), HRA, and Kay v Lambeth LBC [2006] UKHL 10, [2006] 2 AC 465, per Lord Hope at [110].

Parliament in using the language in question. Section 3 may require the court to depart from this legislative intention, that is, depart from the intention of the Parliament which enacted the legislation. The question of difficulty is how far, and in what circumstances, section 3 requires a court to depart from the intention of the enacting Parliament. The answer to this question depends upon the intention reasonably to be attributed to Parliament in enacting section 3.

On this the first point to be considered is how far, when enacting section 3, Parliament intended that the actual language of a statute, as distinct from the concept expressed in that language, should be determinative [. . .] From this the conclusion which seems inescapable is that the mere fact the language under consideration is inconsistent with a Convention-compliant meaning does not of itself make a Convention-compliant interpretation under section 3 impossible. Section 3 enables language to be interpreted restrictively or expansively. But section 3 goes further than this. It is also apt to require a court to read in words which change the meaning of the enacted legislation, so as to make it Convention-compliant. In other words, the intention of Parliament in enacting section 3 was that, to an extent bounded only by what is "possible", a court can modify the meaning, and hence the effect, of primary and secondary legislation.

Parliament, however, cannot have intended that in the discharge of this extended interpretative function the courts should adopt a meaning inconsistent with a fundamental feature of legislation. That would be to cross the constitutional boundary section 3 seeks to demarcate and preserve. Parliament has retained the right to enact legislation in terms which are not Convention-compliant. The meaning imported by application of section 3 must be compatible with the underlying thrust of the legislation being construed. Words implied must, in the phrase of my noble and learned friend, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry, "go with the grain of the legislation". Nor can Parliament have intended that section 3 should require courts to make decisions for which they are not equipped. There may be several ways of making a provision Convention-compliant, and the choice may involve issues calling for legislative deliberation.

We will see examples of the court's powers under s 3 when considering the compatibility with Art 8 of mandatory grounds for possession in 4.2.2 below.

2.1.3 The court as a public authority

Section 6(3) of the HRA 1998 extracted at 2.2 below, defines a court as a public authority. All public authorities are by s 6 required to act in a manner that is compliant with the ECHR. For instance, courts should have human rights firmly in mind when exercising any discretion they enjoy.

We have already noted that s 3 requires courts to interpret legislation in a human rights compliant manner. Although property law is increasingly regulated by legislation, much is still reliant upon common law and equitable principles: do the courts in their development of the common law and equitable principles also have to comply with the ECHR? An affirmative argument is put forward based upon the operation of s 6. The courts, as public bodies, are required to act, and thus decide cases before them, in a manner that is compliant with the ECHR regardless of whether those cases concern the interpretation of a statute, and/or the application of the common law and equitable principles. Howell has also pointed out that it is arbitrary to draw a distinction.

Howell, 'The Human Rights Act 1998: Land, Private Citizens, and the Common Law' (2007) 123 LQR 618, 627

It must also follow that if the court is itself a public authority sufficient under s.6, there is a strong argument that the courts must equally interpret the common law in a way compatible with the Convention. Although s.3 refers only to statute law not to common law, under its obligation as a public body under s.6 the court has to act in a way which is compatible with the Convention. The fact that the HRA does not refer to the common law is understandable if it is the actions of public authorities as emanations of the State (as in Qazi and Kay) which are being scrutinised. Public bodies owe their existence and obtain their legitimacy solely through legislation, although they are, of course, also bound by any relevant common law principles. But once the HRA is applied to actions between private parties, then not only is all legislation potentially open to scrutiny under s.3 but also by the same reasoning all common law. Not to apply the Convention to the common law would itself lead to arbitrary distinctions.

Whether a particular area of property law is covered by legislation is largely a matter of chance. Much of the law relating to landlord and tenant is subject to statutory regulation as various Governments have sought to give protection first to the tenant and then to the landlord as political expediency and social trends dictated. On the other hand much of the law relating to real property is still left to the common law with occasional statutory regulation (which may itself be largely a codification of the common law). For example, at present the rules governing the acquisition of a beneficial interest under a constructive or resulting trust are governed by the common law, but may in the future be put into statutory form.

The House of Lords in the following case (in the context of a local authority's possession proceedings of a travellers' site) noted the difficulty of separating common law and statute when legislation is inevitably drawn against the landscape of the common law to produce a framework of rights and duties.[10]

Birmingham City Council v Doherty
[2008] 3 WLR 636, HL

Lord Walker

At common law, a landlord is entitled to possession of the demised premises if the tenant's lease or tenancy has expired or been validly terminated, and similarly a fortiori if there was only a licence. To that extent [. . .] the City Council was, in seeking possession, relying on a common law right. That is part of the picture, but it is far from the whole picture, and in my opinion, it would be unrealistic, and productive of error, not to look at the whole picture. The fact is that the City Council's common law right was surrounded on all sides by statutory infrastructure, like a patch of grass in the middle of a motorway junction [. . .]

At [104]

The paramount consideration, I think, will be whether the composite legal scheme in general, and the offending provision in particular (offending that is against someone's Convention > right) clearly represents the considered intention of Parliament [. . .] By contrast the fact that Parliament has made some limited statutory modification to the common law [his Lordship referred to defamation as an example] could not, I think be treated as a general parliamentary endorsement of those extensive areas which have been left unmodified. Within these two extremes there may be some difficult problems to be determined on a case-by-case basis.

We will return to consider the court's duties under ss 3 and 6 when examining the extent of the horizontal effect of the HRA 1998.

2.2 VERTICAL EFFECT

The HRA 1998 not only affects the work of the court but also places a direct duty upon all public authorities to act in a manner that is compatible with the EHCR.

Human Rights Act 1998, s 6

Acts of public authorities

(1) It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right.

(2) [. . . see section 2.2.3 below]

(3) In this section "public authority" includes—

(a) a court or tribunal, and

(b) any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature, but does not include either House of Parliament or a person exercising functions in connection with proceedings in Parliament.

(4) In subsection (3) "Parliament" does not include the House of Lords in its judicial capacity.

(5) In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private.

(6) "An act" includes a failure to act but does not include a failure to—

(a) introduce in, or lay before, Parliament a proposal for legislation; or

(b) make any primary legislation or remedial order.

This duty is known as the vertical effect of the HRA 1998 because s 7 of the HRA 1998 confers upon a victim of an infringement of his or her human rights by a public authority a direct cause of action so that he or she may bring proceedings against, or defend proceedings brought by, that authority. A 'victim' is a person who is directly affected by the act or omission of the public authority.[11] Where the court finds that a public authority has failed to act as required by s 6, the court may grant such remedy as it deems to be 'just and appropriate', including the award of damages.[12]

2.2.1 Public authorities

Central to vertical effect is what we mean by a 'public authority'. A distinction must be drawn between core public authorities, the entire functions of which fall to be considered under s 6, and hybrid public authorities, which may not appear to be public in nature, but which may nevertheless carry out some public functions. In the performance of these public functions, hybrid bodies are subject to s 6.[13] The House of Lords made this functional distinction in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank,[14] when rejecting the suggestion that a parochial church council was a public authority.

A core public authority is required to comply with the ECHR in the performance of all of its functions because it is a public authority 'through and through'.[15] The identification of a core public authority should be relatively straightforward: for example, a local authority is a public authority and thus must observe the ECHR when exercising all of its functions, including when acting as a landlord of local authority housing.

A hybrid public authority is only required to comply with the ECHR when exercising those functions that are of a public nature. It is not so constrained when performing a private function.

Whether or not a particular body is subject to s 6 thus requires 'a two-fold assessment':[16] firstly, a consideration of whether some of its functions have a public character, so that it qualifies as a hybrid public authority; and secondly, whether the particular function in question was a public function and thus subject to scrutiny. The tests are not always easy to divine[17] and Howell has complained that 'unfortunately the cases reveal at best a lack of consistency and, at worst an apparent lack of awareness of the importance of the question, or at least a disinclination to deal with it directly'.[18]

Whether or not a registered provider of social housing, although not a core public authority, is a hybrid public authority which is acting in a public or private capacity are significant questions for housing lawyers. The Court of Appeal has provided guidance in London Quadrant Housing Trust v Weaver.[19] Registered providers of social housing (previously known as Registered Social landlords and referred to as RSL in the extract below) provide accommodation to those in need with the assistance of government funded grants and are subject to statutory regulation in the management of their housing stock. As a registered provider and an independent legal entity with charitable status, London Quadrant entered into private tenancy agreements directly with its tenants although some of those tenants were allocated by local authorities to meet their housing responsibilities to those unable to secure accommodation on the open market. Mrs Weaver was one such tenant who fell into rental arrears and was evicted by London Quadrant. The issue that fell to be determined was whether in terminating Mrs Weaver's tenancy London Quadrant was subject to s 6 of the HRA 1998 because it was a hybrid public authority which was acting in a public, rather [17] The House of Lords was divided in Aston Cantlow, with Lord Scott deciding that the parochial church council, whilst not a core public authority, was exercising a public function as a hybrid public authority. See, also, YL v Birmingham CC [2007] UKHL 27, [2008] 1 AC 95. The restricted scope of the definition has been criticized: see Clayton, 'The Human Rights Act Six Years On: Where Are We Now?' than a private, capacity. London Quadrant conceded that it was a hybrid public authority but maintained that in terminating Mrs Weaver's tenancy they were acting as a private landlord. The majority of the Court of Appeal disagreed.

Elias LJ

The essential question is whether the act of terminating the tenancy is a private act. When considering how to characterise the nature of the act, it is in my view important to focus on the context in which the act occurs; the act cannot be considered in isolation simply asking whether it involves the exercise of a private law power or not. As Lord Mance observed in YL, both the source and nature of the activities need to be considered when deciding whether a function is public or not, and in my view the same approach is required when determining whether an act is a private act or not within the meaning of section 6(5). Indeed, the difficulty of distinguishing between acts and functions reinforces that conclusion.

In this case there are a number of features which in my judgment bring the act of terminating a social tenancy within the purview of the Human Rights Act.

A useful starting point is to analyse the Trust's function of allocating and managing housing with respect to the four criteria identified by Lord Nicholls in paragraph 12 in the Aston Cantlow case [. . .] First, there is a significant reliance on public finance; there is a substantial public subsidy which enables the Trust to achieve its objectives. This does not involve, as in YL, the payment of money by reference to specific services provided but significant capital payments designed to enable the Trust to meet its publicly desirable objectives.

Second, although not directly taking the place of local government, the Trust in its allocation of social housing operates in very close harmony with it, assisting it to achieve the authority's statutory duties and objectives. In this context the allocation agreements play a particularly important role and in practice severely circumscribe the freedom of the Trust to allocate properties. This is not simply the exercise of choice by the RSL but is the result of a statutory duty to co-operate. That link is reinforced by the extent to which there has been a voluntary transfer of housing stock from local authorities to RSLs.

Third, the provision of subsidised housing, as opposed to the provision of housing itself, is, in my opinion a function which can properly be described as governmental. Almost by definition it is the antithesis of a private commercial activity. The provision of subsidy to meet the needs of the poorer section of the community is typically, although not necessarily, a function which government provides. The Trust, as one of the larger RSLs, makes a valuable contribution to achieving the government's objectives of providing subsidised housing. For similar reasons it seems to me that it can properly be described as providing a public service of a nature described in the Lord Nicholls' fourth factor.

Furthermore, these factors, which point in favour of treating its housing functions as public functions, are reinforced by the following considerations. First, the Trust is acting in the public interest and has charitable objectives. I agree with the Divisional Court that this at least places it outside the traditional area of private commercial activity. Second, the regulation to which it is subjected is not designed simply to render its activities more transparent, or to ensure proper standards of performance in the public interest. Rather the regulations over such matters as rent and eviction are designed, at least in part, to ensure that the objectives of government policy with respect to this vulnerable group in society are achieved and that low cost housing is effectively provided to those in need of it. Moreover, it is intrusive regulation on various aspects of allocation and management, and even restricts the power to dispose of land and property.

None of these factors taken in isolation would suffice to make the functions of the provision of housing public functions, but I am satisfied that when considered cumulatively, they establish sufficient public flavour to bring the provision of social housing by this particular RSL within that concept. That is particularly so given that their Lordships have emphasised the need to give a broad and generous construction to the concept of a hybrid authority.

Is termination of a tenancy a private act?

That still leaves the central question whether the act of termination itself can nonetheless be treated as a private act. Can it be said that since it involves the exercise of a contractual power, it is therefore to be characterised solely as a private act? [. . . .]

In my judgment, the act of termination is so bound up with the provision of social housing that once the latter is seen, in the context of this particular body, as the exercise of a public function, then acts which are necessarily involved in the regulation of the function must also be public acts. The grant of a tenancy and its subsequent termination are part and parcel of determining who should be allowed to take advantage of this public benefit. This is not an act which is purely incidental or supplementary to the principal function, such as contracting out the cleaning of the windows of the Trust's properties. That could readily be seen as a private function of a kind carried on by both public and private bodies. No doubt the termination of such a contract would be a private act (unless the body were a core public authority.)

In my opinion, if an act were necessarily a private act because it involved the exercise of rights conferred by private law, that would significantly undermine the protection which Parliament intended to afford to potential victims of hybrid authorities. Public bodies necessarily fulfil their functions by entering into contractual arrangements. It would severely limit the significance of identifying certain bodies as hybrid authorities if the fact that the act under consideration was a contractual act meant that it was a private act falling within section 6(5) [. . .]

It follows that in my view the act of terminating the tenancy of Mrs Weaver did not constitute an act of a private nature, and was in principle subject to human rights considerations [. . .]

Rix LJ, however, delivered a dissenting judgment. He was strongly of the view that in terminating a tenancy a social landlord was exercising a private right conferred by a private tenancy agreement.[20] An appeal to the Supreme Court was refused in Weaver, although given the importance of the issue, it may well be that another case will be the subject of an appeal.[21]

A further distinction between a core and hybrid public authority should also be noted.[22] A core hybrid authority cannot be a victim of a breach of its human rights; by contrast, a hybrid public authority, when acting in a private capacity, may be a victim. This distinction may be relevant in determining whether or not a body is a core or hybrid public authority.

[20] At [147]–[159]. He furthermore expressed doubts about the concession made by London Quadrant that it was a hybrid public authority at [160].

2.2.2 Section 6(2): defences

The duty imposed by s 6(1) upon public authorities to act in a manner that is compliant with the ECHR is subject to the defences set out in s 6(2).

Human Rights Act 1998, s 6(2)

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to an act if—

(a) as the result of one or more provisions of primary legislation, the authority could not have acted differently; or

(b) in the case of one or more provisions of, or made under, primary legislation which cannot be read or given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights, the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce those provisions.

The courts as public authorities cannot change the law so that it complies with the ECHR; they can only try to interpret the law to comply with the ECHR, in pursuance of their duty under s 3, or, if that is not possible, issue a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 to instigate a change in the law by Parliament. Until an incompatible law is brought into line with the ECHR, public authorities must still go about their work, which may involve applying an incompatible law. Section 6(2) provides a defence to public authorities if they find themselves in this unenviable position.

Section 6(2)(a) provides a defence where a public authority is under a duty to apply an incompatible provision because it 'could not have acted differently'; s 6(2)(b) provides a defence where a public authority has a power, which it may or may not exercise, conferred by an incompatible, but still current, statute. It should be noted that the s 6(2) defences have no application where a public authority is acting under a statutory power which can be interpreted compatibly with the ECHR pursuant to s 3 of the HRA 1998.[23]

The operation of s 6(2)(b) raises several difficult questions. The fundamental issue is whether the sub-section enables a public authority to exercise a power or discretion in a way that infringes Convention rights when it could have acted differently. The answer is not yet clear. In R (Hooper) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions.[24] Lords Hoffmann and Hope appeared to accept the possibility. However, Lord Mance in Doherty, in the context of a decision to take possession proceedings pursuant to a statutory scheme, came to a different conclusion[25] with which Lord Neuberger in Pinnock expressed agreement.[26] Their Lordships were of the opinion that in taking the decision to take possession proceedings the public authority was not acting 'to give effect to' incompatible primary legislation. It was deciding whether or not to rely on its statutory right to possession and that decision was not dictated by the legislation in question. The authority was, thus, still under a s 6 duty to act in accordance with Convention values.

The key point is, therefore, to determine when a public authority 'was acting to give effect to' primary legislation. Lord Hope, in Doherty, identified three possibilities. It is the third situation where the statutory scheme lays down general powers, for instance of housing management, that marks these divergent views.

The cases in which the effect of section 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act has been considered so far demonstrate that three distinct situations may arise. The first is where a decision to exercise or not to exercise a power that is given by primary legislation would inevitably give rise to an incompatibility [. . .] The second, which lies at the opposite end of the spectrum, is where the act or omission of the public authority which is incompatible with a Convention right is not touched by one or more provisions of primary legislation in any way at all. As the matter is not to any extent the product of primary legislation, the sovereignty of Parliament is not engaged. The act or omission will be unlawful under section 6(1) because section 6(2)(b) does not apply to it. The third situation lies in the middle. This is where the act or omission takes place within the context of a scheme which primary legislation has laid down that gives general powers, such as powers of management, to a public authority. That is the situation in this case. The answer to the question whether or not section 6(2)(b) applies will depend on the extent to which the act or omission can be said to be giving effect to any of the provisions of the scheme that is to be found in the statutes.

The important point [. . .] is that section 6(2)(b) assumes that the public authority could have acted differently but excludes liability if it was giving effect to a statutory provision which could not be read in a way that was compatible with the Convention rights. It protects a decision to exercise or not to exercise a discretion that is available to it under the statute [. . .] Public authorities which make use of the common law in the exercise of their statutory powers of management are in no less favourable a position under that section 6(2)(b) than they would have been had their powers been derived entirely from statute.

Yet a further gloss lies in determining the scope of powers arising under non-compliant primary legislation. As we have noted, statute and the common law are often entwined. From the last extract we can see that Lord Hope was prepared to accept that a s 6(2) defence could encompass common law rules, which operate within a statutory framework. However, Lord Mance in Doherty, disagreed.[27] If deciding to take possession pursuant to a statutory scheme was not within s 6(2)(b), relying on a common law right clearly also was not.

2.2.3 The interface with judicial review

As we have noted, s 7 of the HRA 1998 provides a direct cause of action where a public authority has breached its s 6 duty to act in a Convention compliant manner. A public authority's administrative decisions can also be questioned through the public law route of judicial review. At common law a public authority's administrative decision may be overturned where it fails either to meet the requisite procedural standards, for instance, because relevant facts are not considered, or where the decision does not satisfy the well known Wednesbury reasonableness standard, because it is so unreasonable that no authority acting reasonably could have reached that decision.[28] The enactment of the HRA 1998 has raised two fundamental issues. First, what is the appropriate standard to be applied where judicial review is founded upon a public authority's failure to comply with human rights standards and secondly what is the interface between a s 7 direct human rights cause of action and a public law action by judicial review?

The Strasbourg Court in Kay v UK[29] rejected judicial review, confined to conventional Wednesbury reasonableness, as an adequate process that satisfied the demands of proportionality but, "welcome[d] the increasing tendency of the domestic courts to develop and expand conventional judicial review grounds."[30] The House of Lords in Doherty struggled to articulate the width of judicial review where an Art 8 challenge was mounted against a local authority's decision to repossess an occupier's home. However, in a series of cases in other areas their Lordships have formulated a clearer picture of the appropriate approach.[31]

It is not necessarily a question of developing a common law super Wednesbury standard to encompass human rights but of recognizing that the court is engaged in a different role in assessing the human rights compatibility of the public authority's conduct. Hickman has described these distinct roles as standards of review and standards of legality.[32] The Wednesbury standard of review empowers the courts to intervene to question a public authority's decision but no overt duty is placed upon the public authority itself. Whereas standards of legality, whether derived from the rules of natural justice or the HRA 1998, impose duties upon public authorities that the courts, as adjudicators, decide whether or not have been met. Standards of legality, thus, look to what the public authority is lawfully able to do and standards of review can question how they do so. Where a court is asked to adjudicate upon whether a public authority's decision has satisfied the human rights' standards of legality, they should look to the distinct human rights concept of proportionality that we will consider at 2.5 below.

Given this emerging wider basis of judicial review, it has been suggested that there is little difference between a direct s 7 HRA 1998 challenge and a challenge brought by way of judicial review. For instance, in Taylor v Central Bedfordshire Council[33] Walker LJ stated:

> ... although there is a distinction between a defence raising Article 8 directly for decision by the court [i.e. via s 7] and the question [i.e. via judicial review] whether the council as a public authority has made a lawful decision in the light of the occupier's Article 8 rights, the distinction has, very largely become academic.

The 'academic' distinction to which Walker LJ refers is summarized by Nield in the following extract:

> . . . the question before the court is different. In judicial review the court is called upon to examine the decision of the public authority to pursue possession proceedings. The focus is upon the conduct of the public authority which it is for the occupier to establish did not meet the required standard. Whereas, where an Article 8 defence is directly in issue, the court is weighing the proportionality of the claim for possession in its effect upon the occupier's right to respect for their home. Though it is to be presumed that the law governing possession is compatible and the occupier must raise the challenge that it is not in his or her circumstances, it is for the public authority to demonstrate that possession is justified. The remedial response may also differ. Section 8 of the Human Rights Act 1998 offers the possibility of damages to a victim of an unjustified interference whilst the judicial review just attacks the validity of the impugned decision.
> Judicial review also suffers from a number of draw backs as an adequate process. Most obviously it can only examine the decision of a public authority and thus will be of no assistance should Article 8 be applied horizontally to affect the relations of private parties. Judicial review is also not designed to resolve dispute facts, yet a consideration of an occupier's personal circumstances might well lead to factual discrepancies. This may not be an insurmountable obstacle with Lord Scott and Lord Mance in Doherty suggesting that only a modest adjustment to judicial review procedure could overcome this deficiency.

The question of whether or not human rights can operate in a dispute between private individuals is a much-debated one. Rather surprisingly, the courts have to date failed to address the question directly. In Kay; Price, Lords Bingham, Nicholls, and Hope did advert to the possibility of Art 8 being engaged by a private landlord's possession proceedings, but only Lord Hope was prepared to admit the likelihood.[34] Subsequently, their Lordships have studiously avoided the issue. For instance, in Pinnock Lord Neuberger was keen to underline that the Supreme Court was making no comment on horizontal effect.[35]

A case for horizontal application of the ECHR can be made based upon ss 3 and 6 of the HRA 1998. It should be noted at the outset that neither of these sections confers a cause of action between individual litigants: an individual cannot thus directly claim that his or her human rights have been infringed by another individual. He or she can only claim a breach of human rights in the context of other proceedings, for instance, by questioning the human rights compatibility of the law governing the dispute rather than the compatibility of the opposing party's actions (or inaction). It is, thus, generally accepted that the HRA 1998 does not have direct horizontal effect[36] but that it does have a measure of indirect horizontal effect, although differences of opinion are expressed over its extent.[37]

2.3.1 Section 3 Statutory interpretation and horizontal effect

The obligation of the courts to interpret legislation in a human rights compatible manner has been applied to disputes between private individuals. Indeed the leading case of Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza (extract at 2.2.1 above) involved a dispute between private individuals.

Likewise, we shall see in Chapter 8 that courts have been prepared to consider the human rights compatibility of the law on adverse possession, even though the protagonists are private individuals, because the law is statute-based.[38]

2.3.2 Section 6, the common law and horizontal effect

But where does this leave the development of the common law and equitable principles? We have already seen that it is somewhat anomalous to draw a distinction between legislation and legal rules that have been articulated and developed by the courts. It has been suggested that the courts as public authorities are required, pursuant to s 6, to have note of human rights when performing this role. Advocates of horizontal effect point to the development of the tort of misuse of private information as evidence of the influence of s 6 upon the common law.[39] The difference in views concerns whether or not the court are under an actually duty to apply and develop the common law in accordance with the ECHR (known as the strong indirect effect) or are merely obliged to give weight to Convention values depending on the context of the case (known as weak indirect effect).[40] Phillipson argues that, whilst the courts have accepted the impact of s 3 upon statutory interpretation with alacrity, they are reluctant to accept strong indirect horizontal effect upon the common law. He suggests that this explains their Lordships' reluctance to resolve this vital issue.

[37] See for a summary of the debate Phillipson, 'Clarity Postponed: horizontal effect after Campbell' in Judicial Reasoning under the Human Rights Act (eds Fenwick, Phillipson, and Masterman, Cambridge, CUP: 2007) 215 and Bennett ibid.

The House of Lords ([2002] UKHL 30) decided that the HRA 1998 was not applicable, because it did not have retrospective effect, not because it did not have horizontal application.

[40] The case for a strong indirect effect is made by Hunt, 'The Horizontal Effect of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423, Lester and Pannick 'The Impact of the Human Rights Act on Private Law: The Knights Move' (2000) 116 LQR 380 and Beatson and Grosz, 'Horizontality: A footnote' (2000) 116 LQR 385. Phillipson, 'Clarity Postponed:Horizontal Effect after Campbell' in Judicial Reasoning under the Human Rights Act (eds Fenwick, Phillipson and Masterman, 2007, pp 143 and 173)

> [. . .] to allow what was hitherto an international treaty to penetrate deep into the common law was something about which the judiciary was always likely to feel ambivalent. It is one thing when Parliament simply replaces an area of common law with a statutory code [. . .] But for Parliament to enact a statute that had the capacity to colonise whole swathes of the common law with general Convention principles was quite another matter: it threatened the whole traditional common law style of reasoning and the judiciary's autonomy in developing it. If Parliament chooses to enact in one statute—the HRA—a provision that clearly instructs the judges how to interpret other statutes, that is one thing Parliament is merely modifying the rules of interpretation applying to the laws that Parliament itself produces.
> This outcome [a lack of resolution] at present allows the Convention rights to play a greater or lesser part in judicial reasoning, depending, presumably, upon the judge's overall view of the case and where he or she wants the law to go. In other words there is an additional source of principle to draw upon in common law reasoning, but judges have so far avoided the possibility of the Convention displacing, in a thorough going way, the broad consideration of a wide range of factors traditionally used in common law reasoning.

2.3.3 A State's positive duties and s 2

At the higher level of States' Convention duties, it is accepted that under the ECHR States are subject to both negative duties not to breach the Convention and certain positive duties to 'protect individual persons from threats to their Convention rights or to assist them to achieve full enjoyment of those rights.'[41] The domestic courts need to pay heed to these positive duties through their responsibility to take account of Strasbourg jurisprudence under s 2 of the HRA 1998.

Although the extent of such positive duties is unclear, it is becoming increasingly evident that the Strasbourg Court is prepared to consider the compatibility of legal rules governing the relations of private individuals. Their traditional approach is exemplified in Di Palma v UK[42] where an attempt to claim that the forfeiture of a lease by a private landlord for non-payment of service charges was a breach of Art 8 was robustly rejected as 'manifestly ill founded'.[43] A distinctly different attitude is evident from the more recent case of Khurshid Mustafa v Sweden[44] where the Strasbourg Court held that a repossession based upon the breach of a covenant not to erect a satellite dish on the exterior of a block of flats was admissible and indeed a breach of Art 10 (freedom of expression).[45] The satellite dish was erected so that the foreign residents could receive foreign television programmes in their own language. The court stated:

[42] (1996) 10 EHRR 149. [43] At [2]. [44] App No 23883/06.

[45] A breach of Art 8 was also alleged but, in view of the breach of Art 10, the court did not go on to consider this alleged violation of Convention rights.

Admittedly, the Court is not in theory required to settle disputes of a purely private nature. That being said, in exercising the European supervision incumbent on it, it cannot remain passive where a national court's interpretation of a legal act, be it a testamentary disposition, a private contract, a public document, a statutory provision or an administrative practice appears unreasonable, arbitrary, discriminatory or, more broadly, inconsistent with the principles underlying the Convention.

This more interventionist change of approach is evident in environmental cases where States' liability has been considered in the control of nuisance, including pollution[46] and anti-social behaviour,[47] by private individuals or entities. It also underlies the demand for adequate procedural safeguards to protect Convention rights; an imperative that has been applied equally to disputes between private individuals.[48]

The need for protective positive duties is particularly significant where a victim is perceived as vulnerable.[49] The important following case illustrates the strength of States' positive duties to protect vulnerable victims even where important property based consideration such as the enforcement of payment obligations, certainty and the protection of bona fide purchasers are at stake.

[2011] 52 EHRR 22

Facts: Ms Zehentner had repairs carried out to her flat but unfortunately suffered from mental illness and had left her flat to receive treatment before she could pay for the repairs. Her workmen obtained judgment for the cost of these repairs which they enforced by obtaining the Austrian equivalent of a charging order. The flat was subsequently sold when the strict time limits for payment of the now secured judgment debt had expired. Because of her illness Ms Zehentner was unaware of the enforcement proceedings and the sale of her flat. However, when she recovered sufficiently to learn of what had happened she successfully claimed that she had been unjustifiably deprived of her possessions under Art 1 Protocol 1 and the right to respect for her home under Art 8 had been violated.

The Court notes at the outset that the judicial sale of the applicant's apartment was authorised on the basis of a payment order which had been issued in summary proceedings. While this may be in the interest of efficient enforcement proceedings, the Court has doubts as to whether the debtor's interests are adequately taken into account where such a payment order, moreover for a comparatively minor sum, can be the basis for the judicial sale of a debtor's "home" within the meaning of Article 8. While the Court does not have to examine this system in the abstract, it notes that in the circumstances of the present case it was particularly detrimental to the applicant. It appears from the expert opinion provided in the guardianship proceedings that by the time the judicial sale of her apartment took place she had lacked legal capacity for years. As a result she had not been in a position either to object to the payment order underlying the decision authorising the judicial sale or to make use of the remedies available to the debtor under the Enforcement Act.

It is true, as the Government pointed out, that the courts were not and could not have been aware of the applicant's lack of legal capacity when conducting the proceedings at issue. However, the Court attaches weight to the fact that once the applicant's lack of legal capacity had been established and a guardian had been appointed for her, she was left without any means of obtaining a review of her case due to the absolute nature of the time-limit for appealing against a judicial sale laid down in section 187 § 1 of the Enforcement Act.

The Court notes the Supreme Court's and the Government's arguments that the said time-limit served to protect the bona fide purchaser and the general interests of an efficient administration of justice and of preserving legal certainty. Nevertheless, persons who lack legal capacity are particularly vulnerable and States may thus have a positive obligation under Article 8 to provide them with specific protection by the law (see, mutatis mutandis, Connors). While generally there may be good reasons for having an absolute time-limit for lodging an appeal against a judicial sale of real estate, specific justification would be required where a person lacking legal capacity is concerned. The Court notes that the Supreme Court has not given any such justification and has not carried out any weighing of the conflicting interests at stake, namely the interests of the bona fide purchaser on the one hand and the debtor lacking legal capacity on the other hand [. . .]

In the present case, neither the protection of the bona fide purchaser nor the general interest of preserving legal certainty are sufficient to outweigh the consideration that the applicant, who lacked legal capacity, was dispossessed of her home without being able to participate effectively in the proceedings and without having any possibility to have the proportionality of the measure determined by the courts. It follows that, because of the lack of procedural safeguards, there has been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention in the instant case.

The Court does not overlook the fact that the present case concerned proceedings between private parties, namely the applicant and her creditors on the one hand and the applicant and the purchaser of the apartment on the other hand. However, even in cases involving private litigation the State is under an obligation to afford the parties to the dispute judicial procedures which offer the necessary procedural guarantees and therefore enable the domestic courts and tribunals to adjudicate effectively and fairly in the light of the applicable law (see [. . .] J.A. Pye).

The horizontal application of the ECHR to property law, whilst beguiling, is problematic.

Perhaps the most significant problem of applying human rights between private individuals is the possibility that the assertion of one party's human rights may lead to the infringement of another's human rights. For instance, in possession proceedings the issue would be where the balance should come to rest between the occupier's Art 8 right to respect for their home and the Art 1 Protocol 1 rights of the owner asserting the right to possession. The issue of competing human rights is hotly debated in the context of press freedom and privacy where the balance must be struck between the competing rights to respect for family life under Art 8 and the freedom of expression under Art 10.[50] The issue is not confined to competing rights under different Articles but is also important to competing rights under the same Article, for instance, the conflict might be between individuals both claiming interference with their Art 8 rights.

2.4 ABSOLUTE AND QUALIFIED RIGHTS

The nature of the Articles contained in the ECHR differs. Some provide an absolute protection: for example, no circumstances can justify a departure from the absolute prohibition against torture contained in Art 3.[51] The two Articles with which we are primarily concerned are clearly qualified by the terms of the Articles which provide that an interference with the protections that they enshrine may be justified in prescribed circumstances. A human rights challenge is thus frequently focused upon whether or not an infringement is justified by the relevant qualifications.

2.5 THE JUSTIFICATION FORMULA

In considering whether or not an interference is justified, the Strasbourg Court has developed a tried-and-tested formula: the interference must be in accordance with the law and be in pursuit of a legitimate aim within the qualifications set out in the appropriate Article. States enjoy a wide margin of appreciation in identifying a legitimate aim and the means to achieve that aim—although there must be proportionality between those means and the interference with the individual's human rights.

We need to examine each of these elements.

2.5.1 In accordance with the law

The interference must be in accordance with the law of the particular State.[52] Although it is for States to articulate that law, the Strasbourg Court indicated, in the following repossession case, that laws must meet a minimum qualitative threshold in terms of clarity and rationale application.

Kryvitska and Kryvitskyy v Ukraine
App No 30856/03

The expression "in accordance with the law" does not merely require that the impugned measure should have a basis in domestic law but also refers to the quality of the law in question. In particular, the law must be sufficiently clear in its terms and afford a measure of legal protection against arbitrary application [. . .] The function of clarification and interpretation of > the provisions of domestic law belongs primarily to domestic judicial authorities [. . .] While the Court is not in a position to substitute its own judgment for that of the national courts and its power to review compliance with domestic law is limited [. . .], it is the Court's function to review the reasoning adduced by domestic judicial authorities from the point of view of the Convention [. . .] To protect a person against arbitrariness it is not sufficient to provide a formal possibility of bringing adversarial proceedings to contest the application of a legal provision to his or her case. Where a resulting judicial decision lacks reasoning or an evidentiary basis, ensuing interference with a Convention right may become unforeseeable and consequently fall short of the lawfulness requirement.

> [. . .] Lack of reasoning in a judicial decision as to the grounds of application of a statute may, even where the formal requirements have been complied with, be taken into account among other factors in determining whether the measure complained of struck a fair balance.

2.5.2 Legitimate aim

An interference must made for a legitimate purpose that serves the appropriate qualification. Thus, for example, an interference with Art 1 of the First Protocol must be in the public or general interest; an interference with Art 8 must be necessary in a democratic society, because, for example, it is for the economic well-being of the country, or because it protects the rights and freedoms of others.

2.5.3 Margin of appreciation

A State is afforded a margin of appreciation, or discretion, in determining the legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim, because a State is generally in a better position to assess the society's needs and the best means of achieving those needs within its own country. The Strasbourg Court explained the concept in the context of a challenge to the compatibility with Art 1 of the First Protocol of legislation entitling a tenant to purchase his landlord's reversion.

(1986) 8 EHRR 123

Facts: The Duke of Westminster, whose estate comprised a significant number of houses in London let on long leases, unsuccessfully questioned the compatibility with Art 1 of the First Protocol of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967. The Act entitled the tenants of the houses to require him to transfer the freehold reversion to them for sums (as defined by the legislation) that were less than their market value.

> Because of their direct knowledge of their society and its needs, the national authorities are in principle better placed than the international judge to appreciate what is "in the public interest." Under the system of protection established by the Convention, it is thus for the national authorities to make the initial assessment both of the existence of the problem of public concern warranting measures of deprivation of property and of the remedial action to be taken [. . .] Here as in other fields to which the safeguards of the Convention extend, the national authorities accordingly enjoy a certain margin of appreciation.

> Furthermore, the notion of "public interest" is necessarily extensive, in particular, as the Commission noted, the decision to enact laws expropriating property will commonly involve consideration of political, economic and social issues on which opinions within a democratic society may reasonably differ widely. The Court finding it natural that the margin of appreciation available to the legislature in implementing social and economic policies should be a wide one, will respect the legislature judgment as to what is "in the public interest" unless that judgement be manifestly without reasonable foundation [. . .]

Thus, a State's actions taken in the public interest under Art 1 Protocol will be respected unless they are 'manifestly without reasonable foundation', in the sense that no reasonable government would have come to a similar decision in the circumstances.[53] It should be noted that in pursuance of their obligations under s 2 of the HRA 1998, the domestic courts will accept, save in exceptional circumstances, the compatibility of a law which the Strasbourg Court has held to be within the United Kingdom's margin of appreciation.[54]

A State's margin of appreciation, however, will depend on, and may vary according to, the Article and context in which it is exercised.

(2005) 40 EHRR 9

Facts: The Connors were gypsies. The family occupied the same local authority site under a licence for over thirteen years, but, after their daughter married and their sons grew up, it was alleged that their pitch was a 'magnet for trouble'. As a result, the local authority terminated their licence to occupy and summarily evicted them from the site, but without citing any reasons. The local authority chose not to rely upon the Connors' alleged 'antisocial' behaviour. The Connor family successfully claimed that their summary eviction breached their rights to respect for their home and way of life as gypsies under Art 8.

> In this regard, a margin of appreciation must, inevitably, be left to the national authorities, who by reason of their direct and continuous contact with the vital forces of their countries are in principle better placed than an international court to evaluate local needs and conditions. This margin will vary according to the nature of the Convention right in issue, its importance for the individual and the nature of the activities restricted, as well as the nature of the aim pursued by the restrictions. The margin will tend to be narrower where the right at stake is crucial to the individual's effective enjoyment of intimate or key rights. [. . .] On the other hand, in spheres involving the application of social or economic policies, there is authority that the margin of appreciation is wide, as in the planning context where the Court has found that: "[i]n so far as the exercise of discretion involving a multitude of local factors is inherent in the choice and implementation of planning policies, the national authorities in principle enjoy a wide margin of appreciation". Buckley v United Kingdom (1997) 23 E.H.R.R. 101 at [75].

53 See, also, Lithgow v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 329, which concerned the compensation to be paid for nationalization of certain areas of the ship and aircraft-building business.

54 See in the context of adverse possession Ofulue v Bossert [2009] Ch 1, CA, [37] and [52].

The Court has also stated that in spheres such as housing, which play a central role in the welfare and economic policies of modern societies, it will respect the legislature's judgment as to what is in the general interest unless that judgment is manifestly without reasonable foundation. See Mellacher v Austria (A/169): (1990) 12 E.H.R.R. 391 at [45]; Immobiliare Saffi v Italy: (2000) 30 E.H.R.R.756 at [49]. It may be noted however that this was in the context of Art.1 of Protocol No.1, not Art.8 which concerns rights of central importance to the individual's identity, self-determination, physical and moral integrity, maintenance of relationships with others and a settled and secure place in the community. See, Gillow v United Kingdom at [55]; Pretty v United Kingdom: (2002) 35 E.C.H.R. 1; Christine Goodwin v United Kingdom: (2002) 35 E.H.R.R. 18 at [90]. Where general social and economic policy considerations have arisen in the context of Art.8 itself, the scope of the margin of appreciation depends on the context of the case, with particular significance attaching to the extent of the intrusion into the personal sphere of the applicant. Hatton v United Kingdom: (2002) 34 E.H.R.R. 1 at [103] and [123].

The justification of public interest found in Art 1 Protocol 1 is generally taken to be a wider test than the narrower demands of necessity to meet a pressing social need which defines the justification under Art 8. The margin of appreciation may, thus, be narrower under Art 8, particularly where the nature of the interference is severe.

The existence and adequacy of procedural safeguards, that enable the court to assess the proportionality of the interference, are crucial in determining whether or not a State has remained within its margin of appreciation.[55] In the following case, concerning mandatory rights to possession, the court underlined the need for adequate procedural safeguards, particularly where the interference with the Convention right is severe.

The procedural safeguards available to the individual will be especially material in determining whether the respondent State has, when fixing the regulatory framework, remained within its margin of appreciation. In particular, the Court must examine whether the decision-making process leading to measures of interference was fair and such as to afford due respect to the interests safeguarded to the individual by Article 8 (see Connors and Buckley v UK, Chapman v UK, and Connors v UK).

As the Court emphasised in McCann the loss of one's home is the most extreme form of interference with the right to respect for the home. Any person at risk of an interference of this magnitude should in principle be able to have the proportionality of the measure determined by an independent tribunal in light of the relevant principles under Art 8 of the Convention notwithstanding that, under domestic law, his right to occupation has come to an end.

The interaction between the substantive law, which gives effect to a given social or economic policy, and the procedural safeguards, which attend the implementation of that policy, are difficult to separate as Nield observes in the following extract.

55 See T Hickman, Public Law after the Human Rights Act (Oxford: Hart, 2010) pp 118–19.

Neild, 'Clash of the Titan: Article 8, Occupiers and Respect for their Home' in Modern Studies in Property Law (ed S Bright, Oxford, Hart 2011)

> It would be tempting to conclude that whilst on matters of the substantive content of the law implementing a particular social or economic policy, where a party is granted a right to possession against another, the State's margin of appreciation remains wide; but as a matter of the procedural operation of that policy, where the consequences dictate repossession of an individual's home, the margin is narrow. But this distinction is too simplistic. The two issues are intimately entwined because the substantive law will define the circumstances when the occupier may be heard before the court [. . .] As Loveland has succinctly put the issue [referring to McCann v UK]; 'it is not what the council had done but what the court could not do'.

2.5.4 Proportionality or fair balance

Although States enjoy a wide margin of appreciation, there must nevertheless be a fair balance struck, or proportionality, between the means employed to address the legitimate aim and the interference with an individual's human rights that results. The principle is that no single individual should be expected to bear an excessive burden in meeting the particular community or social object of the legitimate aim. If it is possible to achieve that aim without interfering unduly with an individual's rights, then that route should be adopted in preference to other solutions that do so trespass.

Proportionality operates at two levels of intensity.[56] First, there is the fair balance that must be struck between individual Convention rights and the general interest of the public or society; here it is the law itself that is under scrutiny and the balance it strikes between the legitimate aim and the severity of the infringement resulting from the means employed. Here proportionality operates at a macro-level. Secondly, the nature of the Convention right may dictate proportionality in the impact of that law upon the individual victim, which necessitates a consideration of the victim's individual circumstances. Thus, there must be an adequate process to determine proportionality at this micro-level. Although there may be macro-proportionality between the legitimate aim and the interference, there may still be a breach of the relevant Article where the victim is afforded no, or an inadequate, opportunity to question its impact upon their particular rights. It was the lack of procedural safeguards that constituted the breach of Art 8 in the following repossession case, even though the claimant's case may not seem at all meritorious.

Facts: The McCanns were joint tenants of a local authority house under a secure tenancy. Mr McCann was abusive to his wife and their marriage broke down, with Mrs McCann obtaining a non-molestation order against her husband. Mr McCann moved out of the house, as required by the order, but he broke back in using a crowbar and assaulted his wife. Mrs McCann fled with the children and was rehoused by the local authority. Mr McCann moved back into the house. When the local authority discovered that Mr McCann was living in the house, it approached Mrs McCann and asked her to sign a notice terminating the tenancy, which had the effect of bringing the tenancy to an end, not only in respect of her interest, but also her husband's, although the local authority did not explain these consequences fully. The local authority brought possession proceedings to evict Mr McCann as a trespasser. Mr McCann successfully alleged that his right to respect for his home had been infringed under Art 8, because his right to occupy the house had been brought to an end without recourse to court proceedings, but by his wife's notice.

[56] The approach of Lord Neuberger to his judgement in Manchester CC v Pinnock [2010] UKSC 45 demonstrates these two levels.

The court considers that this interference was in accordance with the law and pursued a legitimate aim of protecting the right and freedom of others in two respects. First, it protected the local authority's right to regain possession of the property against an individual who had no contractual or other right to be there [. . .] the interference also pursued the aim of ensuring that the statutory scheme for housing provision was properly applied. The "others" in such a case are the intended beneficiaries of the complex arrangements set up by, amongst others, the Housing Acts. The Court accepts that it is only by limiting the protection of the Acts to the categories to which it applies that the policy underlying the Acts can sensibly be implemented.

The central question in this case is, therefore whether the interference was proportionate to the aim pursued and thus "necessary in a democratic society". It must be recalled that this requirement under para 2 of art 8 raises a question of procedure as well as one of substance [. . .]

The Court is unable to accept the Government's argument that the reasoning in Connors v UK [2004] ECHR 66746/01 was to be largely confined only to cases involving the eviction of gypsies or cases where the applicant sought to challenge the law itself rather than its application in his particular case. The loss of one's home is a most extreme form of interference with the right to respect for the home. Any person at risk of an interference of this magnitude should in principle be able to have the proportionality of the measure determined by an independent tribunal in the light of the relevant principles under art 8 of the Convention, notwithstanding that, under domestic law, his right to occupation has come to an end.

[. . .] Had the local authority sought to evict the applicant in accordance with this statutory scheme, it would have been open to the applicant to have asked the court to examine, for example, whether his wife had really left the family home because of domestic violence and whether in his personal circumstances, including his need to provide accommodation for his children during overnight visits several times a week, it was reasonable to grant the possession order.

In the present case, however the local authority chose to bypass the statutory scheme by requesting Mrs McCann to sign a common law notice to quit, the effect of which was immediately to terminate the applicant's right to remain in the house. It does not appear that the authority, in the course of this procedure, gave any consideration to the applicant's right to respect for his home. Moreover in domestic law [. . .] in summary proceedings such as those brought against the applicant it was not open to the county court to consider any issue concerning proportionality of the possession order, save in exceptional cases [. . .] No such exceptional circumstances applied in the present case.

The Strasbourg Court has continued to emphasize the importance of procedural safeguards in subsequent cases. Indeed it has become a constant refrain in the context of repossession proceedings by public authorities, which infringe the respect for the home due to the occupiers under Art 8.[57] However, it should be noted that the need for procedural safeguards is of general significance and applies equally to Art 1 Protocol 1[58] and, furthermore, may apply horizontally to disputes between private parties as part of a State's positive duties to provide adequate legal protection to Convention rights.[59]

We will return to consider the operation of proportionality and adequate procedural safeguards in the context of particular Convention rights.

2.5.5 The domestic context and 'deference'

The concept of a State's margin of appreciation does not really fit the domestic context when the courts are called upon to consider the compatibility of a public authority's actions pursuant to s 6 or the compatibility of the law in accordance with their duties under ss 3 and 6. Lord Nicholls described the court's new role under s 3 in the following case. In so doing he refers to the familiar concepts of legitimate aim and proportionality but not the margin of appreciation.

Wilson v First County Trust Ltd (No 2)
[2004] 1 AC 816, HL

Facts: Mrs Wilson entered into a consumer credit agreement with First County in January 1999. The agreement was unenforceable, because it breached the Consumer Credit Act 1974 by failing to state accurately the total amount of credit.[60] First County argued that the statutory provision was incompatible with Arts 1 and 6, but the House of Lords declined to determine the questions, because the HRA 1998 did not have retrospective effect.

Lord Nicholls

The Human Rights Act 1998 requires the court to exercise a new role in respect of primary legislation. This new role is fundamentally different from interpreting and applying legislation. The courts are now required to evaluate the effect of primary legislation in terms of Convention rights and, where appropriate, make a formal declaration of incompatibility. In carrying out this evaluation the court has to compare the effect of the legislation with the Convention right. If the legislation impinges upon a Convention right the court must then compare the policy objective of the legislation with the policy objective which under the Convention may justify a prima facie infringement of the Convention right. When making these two comparisons the court will look primarily at the legislation, but not exclusively so. Convention rights are concerned with practicalities. When identifying the practical effect of an impugned statutory provision the court may need to look outside the statute in order to see the complete picture [. . .] As to the objective of the statute, at one level this will be coincident with its effect [...] But that is not the relevant level for Convention purposes. What is relevant is the underlying social purpose sought to be achieved by the statutory provision. Frequently that purpose will be self-evident, but this will not always be so.

The legislation must not only have a legitimate policy objective. It must also satisfy a "proportionality" test. The court must decide whether the means employed by the statute to achieve the policy objective is appropriate and not disproportionate in its adverse effect. This involves a "value judgment" by the court, made by reference to the circumstances prevailing when the issue has to be decided. It is the current effect and impact of the legislation which matter, not the position when the legislation was enacted or came into force [...]

Nevertheless, a similar concept to the margin of appreciation is evident in the domestic context. Here the appropriate consideration is the proper constitutional balance between Parliament, the administration, and the courts given the courts' new role under the HRA 1998 as adjudicators of Convention compatibility. Unsurprisingly, the fundamental question of the extent to which the courts should pay heed to the policy choices of Parliament or the administrative decisions of public authorities has attracted considerable academic attention.[61] Commentators have described this domestic concept as deference. However, in Huang v Secretray of State for the Home Department[62] Lord Nicholls disapproved of this label. Instead he acknowledged that the court in reaching its decision on human rights compatibility will afford due respect to the opinion of those who are in a better position to make an evaluation.

Lord Nicholls

The giving of weight ... is not, in our opinion, aptly described as deference: it is performance of the ordinary judicial task of weighing up the competing considerations on each side and according appropriate weight to the judgment of a person with responsibility for a given subject matter and access to special sources of knowledge and advice. That is how any rational judicial decision-maker is likely to proceed.

In areas of socio-economic policy, particularly where public resources are in issue, the courts have shown themselves unlikely to upset the legislative design of Parliament. In Kay v Lambeth LBC[63] the House of Lords was not prepared to question social housing policy expressed through a complex web of legislation and common law rules, which they felt had been the subject of continuous and extensive Parliamentary scrutiny. The courts may be more questioning where the law has not been so carefully considered by Parliament.

struck by the general law in the type of case of which his is an example, does not comply with the Convention. We also agree that the cases in which such a claim will have a real prospect of success are rare. This is an area of the law much trampled over by the legislature as it has tried to respond to shifting and conflicting social and economic pressures. If there were enough suitable and affordable housing to share amongst those who needed it there would be no problem. But there is not, so priorities have to be established, either by Parliament or by the public sector landlord, who has to allocate this scarce resource in accordance with the priorities set by Parliament.

The balance has changed over time in accordance with what were perceived to be the needs of the time. Once upon a time, it was thought necessary to control the freedom of private landlords to let for such terms and on such rents as the market allowed. Public sector landlords, on the other hand, could be left to manage the public housing stock in a responsible manner. Then things changed. Controls over private landlords were progressively relaxed, although never abandoned, with a view to expanding the supply of privately rented homes. Controls over public sector landlords, on the other hand, were increased and public sector tenants were given the security which previously only private sector tenants had enjoyed. This and other measures reduced the supply of public sector rented homes. These were all intensely political judgments. The extent to which, and the terms on which, public authorities should be engaged in providing housing for those who for whatever reason cannot or will not buy it on the private market was one of the most politically controversial issues of the 20th century.

To the extent that a court insists that a public authority does not rely upon its right to evict an occupier, it is obliging that public authority to continue to supply that person with a home in circumstances where Parliament has not obliged (and may not even have empowered) it to do so. In this politically contentious area of social and economic policy, any court should think long and hard before intervening in the balance currently struck by the elected legislature. There may be more scope for argument in a case not covered by statute, but the most obvious example of that is a trespasser who has never had any right to occupy the premises in question.

Although substantial deference is to be expected in many areas of property law, the courts would be failing in their role under the HRA 1998 if they assumed that existing rules are compatible.

Nield, 'Clash of the Titans: Occupiers Article 8 and their Home' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed S Bright, Oxford, Hart, 2011, Ch 5)

In assessing the proper extent of judicial deference, context is everything. Qazi demonstrates an extreme degree of deference in which proprietary rights to possession are not to be questioned at all—they were in fact nonjusticiable! In Kay the House of Lords has shown, in both the views of the majority and minority, that in relation to the regulation of housing they will show exceptional deference to the policy choices of Parliament. This is not surprising given both the degree of Parliamentary scrutiny of housing policy and the public funding underpinning that policy. Similar substantial deference is to be expected in relation to proprietary rules governing possession where certainty and due balancing of the rights of third parties is necessary. However, it should not mean that the ECHR compatibility of proprietary rules should be non-justiciable or even that substantial deference should be automatic. Judicial deference should be assessed on a case-by-case (or rule-by-rule) basis.

2.6 RETROSPECTIVE APPLICATION

The HRA 1998 came into force on 2 October 2000, but, of course, property disputes may have a much longer history. It is, thus, important to consider to what extent (if any) the Act has retrospective application. The question is procedural, in the sense that its importance is directed to whether an individual can bring a human rights issue before the domestic courts. An individual will still be able to bring proceedings before the Strasbourg Court where the cause of action arose before 2 October 2000. For example, in JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v Graham,[64] the House of Lords declined to consider the question of whether adverse possession was incompatible with Art 1 of the First Protocol because the relevant events had taken place before 2 October 2000, but Pye then pursued its claim before both the Chamber[65] and, on appeal, the Grand Chamber the Strasbourg Court.[66]

The HRA 1998 follows the general presumption that legislation does not have retrospective effect.[67] Thus, the court, in performance of its obligations under s 3, does not have to consider the ECHR where the right of action accrued before the Act came into force, even though the hearing may take place after that date. However, retrospective application will differ according to which Articles are being considered. For instance, where procedure is in issue—for example, because of an alleged breach of Art 6—the Act will have immediate effect upon any proceedings conducted after 20 October 2000.[68]

There is one instance in which the HRA 1998 does make express provision for retrospective application and that is contained in s 22(4), which provides that the Act is to have retrospective application in proceedings 'brought by or at the instigation of a public authority whenever the act in question took place'. It may thus be used defensively against public authorities that have acted in breach of their obligations under s 6. An argument that this provision may operate retrospectively to effect the decisions of the courts (as public authorities) made prior to 20 October 2000 and in accordance with the law then in force has, however, been rejected.[69]

The fact that the HRA 1998 does not have retrospective effect does not mean that the interpretation of a particular provision may not change as a result of the duties it imposes. It has long been accepted that the parties' respective rights and obligations may be altered as a result of legislation.

3 ARTICLE 1 OF THE FIRST PROTOCOL TO THE ECHR

European Convention on Human Rights, First Protocol, Art 1

Protection of property

Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law.

> The preceding provisions shall not, however, in any way impair the right of a State to enforce such laws as it deems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions or penalties.

Article 1 provides a right of property and not to property. Its object is thus to protect existing property that a person holds by both positively guaranteeing that a person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his or her property, and by providing supporting negative prohibitions upon a person being deprived of his or her possession or being subject to controls over his or her enjoyment of those possessions.

The Strasbourg Court, in the following case, analysed Art 1 as comprising three distinct rules.

Sporrong and Lonnroth v Sweden
(1983) 5 EHRR 35

> The first rule, which is of a general nature, announces the principle of peaceful enjoyment of property; it is set out in the first sentence of the first paragraph. The second rule covers deprivation of possessions and subjects it to certain conditions; it appears in the second sentence of the same paragraph. The third rule recognizes that the States are entitled, amongst other things, to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest, by enforcing such laws as they deem necessary for the purpose; it is contained in the second paragraph.

The rules may be distinct, but it is clear that they are also interrelated, as the Strasbourg Court stated in the following case.

[1986] 8 EHRR 123

> The three rules are not however "distinct" in the sense of being unconnected. The second and third rules are concerned with particular instances of interference with the right to peaceful enjoyment of property and should therefore be construed in the light of the general principle enunciated in the first rule.

Thus, the second and third rules need to be considered in the light of the overarching nature of the first rule. An interference that is justified under these rules by their limiting conditions will also satisfy the first rule. This point was also made in James.

[1986] 8 EHRR 123

> The rule (in the second sentence) subjects deprivation of possessions to certain conditions concerns a particular category, indeed of the most radical kind, of interference with the right to peaceful enjoyment of property [...]; the second sentence supplements and qualifies > the general principle enunciated in the first sentence. This being so, it is inconceivable that application of the general principle to the present case should lead to any conclusion different from that already arrived at by the court in the application of the second sentence.

The courts will look to see whether the last two rules are applicable before considering whether the first rule has been infringed.[70] This analysis and approach has been adopted in subsequent cases.

3.1 WHEN IS ARTICLE 1 ENGAGED?

The first step to consider is whether Art 1 has been engaged, because there has been an interference with possessions under one of the three elements of the Article. This will depend on what we mean by 'possessions' as well as what may constitute an interference.

3.1.1 The meaning of 'possessions'

'Possessions' bears what is known as an autonomous meaning in Strasbourg jurisprudence.[71] This means that the Strasbourg Court develops its own interpretation of a term. In so doing, it will look to, but will not be bound by, the meaning of the term within the appropriate domestic jurisdiction.[72] In fact, the Strasbourg Court has adopted a wide interpretation of 'possessions', and there is no doubt that our established notions of estates and interests in land fall within its meaning. The term also covers other accepted categories of property rights that fall outside the scope of this book, such as personal and intellectual property, as well as rights that may arise from contractual relations or a tortious claim. But an expectation that you may receive property in the future—for example, by inheritance—is not a possession for the purposes of Art 1.[73] This raises the question of whether an inchoate equity—for example, arising by estoppel (see Chapter 10)—constitutes a possession for the purpose of Art 1. Unfortunately, we do not yet have guidance of the courts, although there is some support for the proposition.[74] The Strasbourg Court, in Stretch v UK,[75] has accepted that a legitimate expectation of entitlement upon which the claimant had acted constitutes a possession for the purposes of Art 1.[76]

Land may have the benefit of certain rights: for example, an easement (see Chapter 25), or the benefit of a covenant (see Chapter 26), or, in the case of a leasehold reversion, a right to receive rent and to re-enter for breach of the tenant's covenants (see Chapter 24). These benefits do not constitute separate possessions for the purposes of Art 1; rather, they are [75] (2004) 38 EHRR 12. See also Pine Valley Developments Ltd v Ireland (1992) 14 EHRR 319. The principle has been applied by the domestic courts in Rowland v Environment Agency [2003] EWCA Civ 1885. See Elliott, 'Legitimate Expectations and Unlawful Representations' (2004) 63 CLJ 261.

[76] The legitimate expectation arose from an ultra vires representation by a local authority, that the claimant was entitled to an option to renew his lease, which both the claimant and the local authority assumed was valid during the 22-year term of the original lease. In fact, the local authority had no power to grant the option.

encompassed within the property to which they are attached.[77] Likewise, land may be subject to an encumbrance in favour of a third person: for example, an easement or restrictive covenant in favour of a neighbouring owner. The possession that is vested in the landowner is the appropriate estate in the land, as burdened by the encumbrance. In other words, if you acquire land that is already subject to a burden, the burden does not engage Art 1.

The House of Lords confirmed this approach in the following case. The encumbrance in question was a liability to pay for chancel repairs to the local church: an unusual liability that can be difficult to discover, but which Lord Hope described as follows.

Lord Hope

[...] just like any other burden which runs with the land which is, and has been at all times within the scope of the property right which [was] acquired and among other factors to be taken into account in determining its value [...] The enforcement of the liability under the general law is an incident of the property right which is now vested jointly in Mr and Mrs Wallbank. It is not [...] an outside intervention by way of a form of tax.

The creation of a new encumbrance or burden may, however, engage Art 1. In most cases, the owner will have consensually created that encumbrance and so can hardly complain that his or her rights have been infringed. It is where that encumbrance has arisen, or is deemed to have arisen, by operation of external legal rules that Art 1 may be engaged.[78]

A further difficult question is whether or not a contract that is void under the terms of a statute is capable of comprising a possession within the terms of the Article. The House of Lords considered this issue in Wilson v First County Trust Ltd,[79] although they did not speak with one voice. In Wilson, the credit agreement was void for failing to comply with the statutory requirements of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 (CCA 1974).[80] Lords Hope and Scott decided that no agreement had been created in the first place, and thus there was no possession of which First County could be deprived.

Lord Nicholls disagreed. He believed that a statutory provision that robbed an agreement of its force should not escape review under the HRA 1998, otherwise '[a] Convention right guaranteeing a right to property would have nothing to say'.

Lord Hobhouse was more equivocal. He felt that the question turned upon whether or not an agreement had been created.[81]

A similar, although slightly different, question is whether a possession is also inherently limited by the operation of the legal rules to which it is subject and therefore cannot be infringed by the operation of those rules. Here, the law regulates the possession, rather than

78 For example, an easement may arise by prescription: see, further, Chapter 25.

79 [2003] UKHL 40, [2004] 1 AC 816, although their comments are dicta.

80 The offending s 127 has been amended by the Consumer Credit Act 2006, s 15. However, similar concerns may arise with a contract for the sale of land that is void under s 2(1), Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989.

81 His approach draws some support from Beyeler v Italy (2001) 33 EHRR 52, (2003) 36 EHRR 5.

dictates its creation. The answer to this question is clear: the operation of such rules may engage Art 1.[82] Goymour explains why.

Goymour, 'Proprietary Claims and Human Rights: A "Reservoir of Entitlement"?' (2006, 65 CLJ 696, p 711)

However this argument, whilst technically compelling, would largely strip Article 1 of any sensible meaning. Indeed, one type of conduct which Article 1 Protocol 1 typically regulates is arbitrary compulsory acquisition of private property by the State. If one were to say that all property is inherently liable to compulsory acquisition, Article 1 Protocol 1 would rarely, if ever, bite. The Convention is supposed to guard against interference with property rights. To say Article 1, Protocol 1 fails to be engaged because property rights are inherently vulnerable is logical but circular.

3.1.2 Deprivation of possessions: the second limb

The second limb of Art 1 is concerned with the deprivation of possessions. A 'deprivation' is generally defined by a transfer or shift in ownership: examples include the compulsory purchase of land,[83] or the nationalization of a business by the government.[84] The transfer need not be to the government, or other public authority; it may be to another private individual, where the State has sanctioned that transfer by legislation. For example, the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 confers a right of enfranchisement upon certain tenants which entitles them to acquire their landlord's freehold reversion. The deprivation thus involves the transfer of a possession from landlord to tenant.[85] By contrast, the determination of a lease (whether by the expiry of the term, by a notice to quit, or by a right of forfeiture) does not deprive the tenant of his or her possessions, because the lease is defined by these means of termination from the outset. These modes of termination are part and parcel of the lease itself.

3.1.3 Controls over possessions: the third limb

A government may enact laws that control the use of land, the most obvious examples being the planning controls that prevent development of land without the consent of the local planning authority.[86] More unusual examples include controls over fishing,[87] and hunting rights over land,[88] or controls over who can actually use the land.[89]

3.1.4 Deprivation or control?

Whether or not an interference constitutes a deprivation or control of property is not always as clear-cut as the above examples. The distinction is significant when it comes to considering whether or not the interference is proportionate. As we will see, there is an expectation that a deprivation of property under the second limb will be balanced by the payment of compensation whereas there is not necessarily the same expectation where there is a control over property under the third limb.

It might initially be thought that the extinction of the paper owner's title by the operation of adverse possession is a clear example of a deprivation of property.[90] The Grand Chamber of the Strasbourg Court decided, however, that the effect of the limitation periods for the recovery of possession of land and the consequent effect of their expiry on the paper owner's title was a control of property. In effect, the Court viewed the extinction of the paper owner's title more as an administrative step that brought the legal evidence of ownership into line with the de facto position when the squatter could no longer be evicted from the land.

(2008) 46 EHRR 45, Grand Chamber

Facts: Pye owned land that it intended to develop. In the meantime, it licensed the land to a neighbouring farmer, Mr Graham. When the licence expired, Mr Graham continued in adverse possession of the land for a period in excess of the limitation period of twelve years. When Pye eventually tried to evict Mr Graham, the House of Lords dismissed its claim and held that Mr Graham was entitled to be registered as the owner. Pye unsuccessfully claimed that it had been deprived of its ownership in breach of Art 1 of the First Protocol.

The applicant companies did not lose their land because of a legislative provision which permitted the State to transfer ownership in particular circumstances (as in the cases of AGOSI, Air Canada, Gasus), or because of a social policy of transfer of ownership (as in the case of James), but rather as the result of the operation of the generally applicable rules on limitation periods for actions for recovery of land.

At [66]

The statutory provisions which resulted in the applicant companies' loss of beneficial ownership were thus not intended to deprive paper owners of their ownership, but rather to regulate questions of title in a system in which, historically, 12 years' adverse possession was sufficient to extinguish the former owner's right to re-enter or to recover possession, and the new title depended on the principle that unchallenged lengthy possession gave a title. The provisions of the 1925 and 1980 Acts which were applied to the applicant companies were part of the general land law, and were concerned to regulate, amongst other things, limitation periods in the context of the use and ownership of land as between individuals. The applicant companies were therefore affected, not by a "deprivation of possessions" within the meaning of the second sentence of the first paragraph of Article 1, but rather by a "control of use" of land within the meaning of the second paragraph of the provision.

[90] See Limitation Act 1980, ss 15 and 17, Land Registration Act 1925, s 75, and Chapter 10.

There are other areas of uncertainty: for example, does overreaching lead to a deprivation of property, or is it a control of property? We will consider this question in the context of the sale by a trustee in Chapter 19 and by a mortgagee in Chapter 30.

3.1.5 Peaceful enjoyment: the first limb

An interference that does not fall within the second or third limb may nevertheless be an interference with the peaceful enjoyment of possession under the residual category provided by the first limb. Sporrong and Lonnroth v Sweden[91] provides an example. The complainants owed land in Stockholm that was earmarked for development and the authorities issued expropriation notices.[92] Although the notices were never implemented, the complainants' ability to deal with their land was blighted. The Court found that there was no deprivation or control under the second and third limbs, but did find that there was an infringement of the first rule.

3.2 WHEN IS AN INTERFERENCE JUSTIFIED?

Here, we must apply the justification formula at which we looked in section 2.5 above. Under Art 1 of the First Protocol, a deprivation of possession may be justified if it is 'in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law', whilst a control of possessions may be justified if it is made pursuant to 'laws as [the State] deems necessary [. . .] in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions or penalties'.

3.2.1 Subject to the law

The interference must be in accordance with domestic law. Furthermore, that domestic law must satisfy the fundamental requirements of the rule of law. It must not operate arbitrarily, it must be certain and accessible, and it must provide adequate procedural safeguards.[93]

3.2.2 The public and general interest

It is not thought that there is a distinction between the public and general interest, nor that these expressions necessarily call for the deprivation to accrue directly to, or the control be exercised by, the government.[94] The expressions 'general' and 'public' interest define the legitimate interest in respect of which a deprivation or control may be justified. States enjoy a wide margin of appreciation in both identifying what is in the public interest and in formulating the appropriate measures to address that interest. The width of a State's margin of appreciation is evident from James v UK.

[92] Prohibition notices prohibiting building were also issued, but these had lapsed.

[93] In Lithgow v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 329, and James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 329, claims that the assessment of compensation was arbitrary were rejected, but in Hentrich v France (1994) 18 EHRR 440, the Court found that the domestic law failed to satisfy the rule of law. It operated arbitrarily and did not provide adequate procedural safeguards.

(1986) 8 EHRR 123

At [43]
In the Court's opinion, even if there could be a difference between the concepts of "public interest" and "general interest" in Article 1 (P-1), on the point under consideration no fundamental distinction of the kind contended for by the applicants can be drawn between them [. . .]

The aim of the 1967 Act as spelt out in the 1966 White Paper, was to right the injustice which was felt to be caused to occupying tenants by the operation of the long leasehold system of tenure (see para 18 above). The Act was designed to reform the existing law, said to be inequitable to the leaseholder," and to give effect to what was described as the occupying tenant's "moral entitlement" to the ownership of the house.

Eliminating what are judged to be social injustices is an example of the functions of a democratic legislature. More especially, modern societies consider housing of the population to be a prime social need, the regulation of which cannot entirely be left to the play of market forces. The margin of appreciation is wide enough to cover legislation aimed at securing greater social justice in the sphere of people's homes, even where such legislation interferes with the existing contractual relations between private parties and confers no direct benefit on the State or the community at large. In principle therefore the aim pursued by the leasehold reform legislation is a legitimate one.

The real focus of the courts' review is thus on the proportionality of the interference in meeting the public interest. In assessing proportionality, the courts will need to determine whether a fair balance has been struck between the public interest to be addressed and the individual's right to the protection of his or her possessions. A number of factors may need to be considered, depending on the circumstances of the particular case, but two factors are particularly prominent in this enquiry: firstly, the availability of compensation; and secondly, the adequacy of the process to challenge the interference.

3.2.3 Compensation

Many constitutional guarantees of property rights include an express right to compensation upon the compulsory acquisition of property by the State. Article 1 does not expressly do so,[95] but the Strasbourg Court has made clear that where the second limb of the Article is engaged (i.e. where there is a deprivation of property), compensation is to be expected, although that compensation may be less than market value.[96]

95 Allen explains that this omission was because the right to compensation was controversial in, 'Liberalism, social democracy and the value of property under the European Convention on Human Rights' (2010) 59 ICLQ 1055.

96 See also Holy Monasteries v Greece (1995) 20 EHRR 51 and The Former King of Greece v Greece (App No 25701/94). Allen questions Strasbourg's approach to the calculation of compensation.

James v UK
(1986) 8 EHRR 123

The taking of property in the public interest without payment of compensation is treated as justifiable only in exceptional circumstances [. . .] As far as Article 1 (P1–1) is concerned, the protection of the right to property it affords would be largely illusory and ineffective in the absence of any equivalent principle. Clearly compensation terms are material to the assessment whether the contested legislation respects a fair balance between the various interests at stake and, notably, it does not impose a disproportionate burden on the applicants [. . .]

The Court further accepts the Commission's conclusion as to the standard of compensation: the taking of property without payment of an amount reasonably related to the value would normally constitute a disproportionate interference which could not be considered justifiable under Article 1 (P1–1). Article 1 (P1–1) does not, however guarantee a right to full compensation in all circumstances. Legitimate objectives of "public interest" such as pursued in measures of economic reform or measures designed to achieve greater social justice may call for less than reimbursement of the full market value. Furthermore, the Court's power of review is limited to ascertaining whether the choice of compensation terms falls outside the State's wide margin of appreciation in this domain.

The requirement for compensation is not so strong where the interference is a control over property under the third limb.[97] For example, the Grand Chamber in Pye, having decided that the interference was a control rather than a deprivation of possession, went on to hold that a lack of compensation to the paper owner whose title is extinguished could be justified.

At [79]

The Chamber and the applicant companies emphasised the absence of compensation for what they both perceived as a deprivation of the applicant's companies' possessions. The Court has found the interference with the applicant's companies' possession was a control of use, rather than a deprivation of possession, such that the case-law on compensation for deprivations is not directly applicable. Further, in the cases in which a situation was analysed as a control of use even though the application lost possessions (AGOSI, and Air Canada [. . .]), no mention was made of a right to compensation. The Court would note, in agreement with the Government, that a requirement of compensation for the situation brought about by a party failing to observe a limitation period would sit uneasily alongside the very concept of limitation periods, whose aim is to further legal certainty by preventing a party from pursuing action after a certain date. The Court would also add that, even under the provisions of the Land Registration Act 2002, which the applicant companies use as confirmation that the provisions of earlier legislation were not compatible with the Convention, no compensation is payable by a person who is ultimately registered as a new owner of registered land on expiry of the limitation period.

[97] Baner v Sweden (1989) 60 DR 128; Chassagnou v France (2000) 29 EHRR 615.

The question of whether or not compensation is required is thus likely to call for a closer examination of the legitimate aim, as well as the financial impact of the control or disturbance upon the complainant. The minority in Pye also drew a connection between the need for compensation and the procedural safeguards available:[98] '[...] the fact that the landowner received no compensation made the loss of beneficial ownership the more serious and required, in our view, particularly strong measures of protection of the registered owner's property rights if a fair balance was to be preserved'.

3.2.4 Procedural safeguards

The process by which a person is deprived of their possessions, or by which controls are imposed upon their possessions, is an important aspect of proportionality. The fair balance may be upset if the individual has no opportunity to question the interference.[99] The importance of procedural safeguards under Art 1 Protocol 1 is illustrated by the case of Zehentner v Austria, which we first looked at in 2.3.3 above. The Strasbourg Court held that both Art 8 and Art 1 Protocol 1 had been infringed. In respect of Art 1 Protocol 1 the court sanctioned sale of the victim's property was a disproportionate interference with the victim's property, given the relatively small debts involved, and because the process took no account of the victim's incapacity. Furthermore, the procedural possibility of challenging the debts themselves on the grounds of the victim's lack of capacity did not constitute a viable alternative.

The present case raises an issue regarding the applicant's procedural protection in the proceedings at issue.

In that respect, the Court [...] has doubts as to whether the debtor's interests are adequately taken into account where a payment order for a comparatively minor sum issued in summary proceedings can serve as a basis for the judicial sale of real estate of considerable value [...]

However, under Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 the Court is examining the judicial sale of the applicant's apartment not from the point of view that it was the applicant's "home" but from the point of view of property rights. In that context the Government's argument that the applicant had alternative means to protect her pecuniary interests needs to be examined. The Government pointed out that the applicant, represented by her guardian, had obtained a finding that the payment orders underlying the judicial sale were not enforceable due to her lack of legal capacity. Subsequently, she would be able to obtain a review of the proceedings on the merits and, if they resulted in her creditor's claims being dismissed, she could claim reimbursement of the amounts which had been paid to them from the proceeds of the judicial sale.

99 Hentrich v France (1994) 18 EHRR 440. See also the Scottish decisions of Karl Construction Ltd v Palisade Properties Ltd [2002] SLT 312; AG for Scotland v Taylor [2003] SLT 1340; Maguire v Itoh [2004] SLT (Sheriff Ct) 120.

However, the Court is not convinced that this procedural mechanism, which requires conducting a number of consecutive sets of proceedings against each of the applicant's creditors, offers adequate protection to a person lacking legal capacity. It therefore refers to its above considerations dismissing the Government's argument that the strict time-limit for appealing against a judicial sale was justified in the interests of protecting the bona fide purchaser and in the general interests of an efficient administration of justice and of preserving legal certainty. In sum the Court does not find any reasons to come to a different conclusion under Article 1 of Protocol No. 1.

The Chamber's decision in Pye[100] was also largely premised on the lack of procedural safeguards afforded to the paper owner, whose registered title was automatically extinguished (without notification) on the expiration of the twelve-year limitation period.[101] On appeal, the majority of the Grand Chamber, however, was satisfied that adequate procedural safeguards did exist.[102] The paper owners were entitled to take proceedings for possession at any time before expiry of the limitation period and, furthermore, they could challenge proof of the squatter's adverse possession. The LRA 2002 now provides extensive procedural safeguards to protect a registered owner's title against the risk of adverse possession.[103]

4 ARTICLE 8: THE RIGHT TO RESPECT FOR PRIVATE AND FAMILY LIFE AND THE HOME

European Convention on Human Rights, Art 8

1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

The inspiration for Art 8 is drawn from rights to privacy enshrined in other international human rights instruments,[104] although it does not refer explicitly to a right to privacy, but rather to a right to respect. Feldman has noted the implications of this shift in emphasis.

101 See ss 15 and 17, Limitation Act 1980, and s 75 of the Land Registration Act 1925. The same lack of notification also affects unregistered land.

103 See Chapter 8.

104 For example, Art 17 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides that: 'No one shall be subjected to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his privacy, family and home or correspondence, not to unlawful attacks on his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.' Art 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is identical, but is contained in a single paragraph.

(2nd edn, 2002, pp 524–5)

> This movement from a right to freedom from interference with privacy to a right to respect for it might seem to weaken the right, as there may be circumstances in which it could be argued that interfering with a person's privacy would not indicate a lack of respect. [. . .]
> This potential limitation on the negative (freedom from interference) aspects of the right to privacy should not blind us to the considerable extension of the right which the notion of respect may entail, and which has been influential in the case law of the Court on Article 8. [. . .] Furthermore, a right to respect is capable of imposing positive duties on public authorities, because it can be interpreted as requiring them to take active measures to enable people to have a private and family life, going beyond providing remedies for interference.

Our discussion of Art 8 will concentrate on the respect that it affords to the home. At the outset, it should be noted that the Article does not confer a right to a home, nor does it place upon the government an obligation to meet an individual's housing needs.[105] The focus is upon the protection afforded to an individual's existing home. In this context, there are clear interactions between the home and a person's private and family life.

4.1 WHEN IS ARTICLE 8(1) ENGAGED?

4.1.1 Meaning of 'home'

'Home' has an autonomous meaning, being a place of residence with which the individual has 'sufficient and continuing links', and is not dependent upon that person having a legal right of occupation. This test was developed by the Strasbourg Court in the case of Gillow v UK,[106] and has been consistently applied in subsequent cases by the Strasbourg Court, the House of Lords, and the Supreme Court.

Facts: Mr Qazi was a tenant, with his wife, of a house owned by the local housing authority. When his wife left him, she terminated their tenancy of the house—a step which she was entitled to take without her husband's knowledge or agreement. Mr Qazi sought a tenancy of the house in his own right, but the housing authority refused, on the grounds that the house was too large for his needs. When Mr Qazi refused to move out, the housing authority successfully took possession proceedings.

to live. On a straightforward reading of the Convention, its use of the expression "home" appears to invite a down-to-earth and pragmatic consideration whether [...] the place in question is that where a person "lives and to which he returns and which forms the centre of his existence", since "home" is not a legal term of art and article 8 is not directed to the protection of property interests or contractual rights.

[...] this has been the approach of the Strasbourg institutions also. In Gillow v United Kingdom (1986) 11 EHRR 335, para 46, the court held that the house in question was the applicants' home because although they had been absent from Guernsey for many years they had not established any other home elsewhere in the United Kingdom and had retained "sufficient continuing links" with the house for it to be considered their home for the purposes of article 8. This test was repeated and elaborated by the commission in Buckley v United Kingdom (1996) 23 EHRR 101, 115, para 63:

> "'Home' is an autonomous concept which does not depend on classification under domestic law. Whether or not a particular habitation constitutes a 'home' which attracts the protection of article 8(1) will depend on the factual circumstances, namely, the existence of sufficient and continuous links. The factor of 'unlawfulness' is relevant rather to considerations under paragraph 2 of that provision of 'in accordance with law' and to the balancing exercise undertaken between the interests of the community and those of the individual in assessing the necessity of any interference."

The general approach of the Strasbourg institutions has however been to apply a simple, factual and untechnical test, taking full account of the factual circumstances but very little of legal niceties.

Although the test of 'sufficient and continuing links' is well established, the nature of these links is not easy to pin down.[107] It is clear that the links are not forged by property interests. Thus, even though an occupier's legal right to remain in possession may have ceased, or indeed never arisen, their residence may still qualify as their home for the purposes of Art 8(1). The legality of their occupation is relevant only to the justification balance under Art 8(2). Looking beyond property rights raises the possibility that Art 8 may offer a new measure of human rights based protection of the home—see section 7.

Physical occupation of the property as a residence for a period will be the norm, although in Gillow v UK, the lack of occupation was no bar where the Gillows had worked abroad for many years, but still regarded the house they owned in Jersey as their only home. The necessary links thus look particularly to the emotional connection that a person forms with their home and neighbourhood. In the following extract, Nield explains these aspects of home referring to the contribution of academic commentators.

Nield, 'Clash of the Titans: Article 8, Occupiers and Their Home' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed S Bright, Oxford, Hart 2011)

[A] dwelling may be a person's home although they have no current legal right to occupy that dwelling. This interpretation may come as a surprise to property lawyers whose normal area of enquiry is concerned with identifying and then reconciling competing property rights [...]

107 Busye, 'Strings Attached: the concept of home in the case law of the ECHR' (2006) 3 EHRLR 294.

However, this wider meaning of home is fundamental to claims that Article 8 provides a 'new form of proprietary entitlement.' It opens up the respect due to the home under Article 8 to possibilities beyond the traditional boundaries of property law and forces property lawyers to look at the concept of home in a much wider context.

The autonomous meaning of home in Strasbourg jurisprudence is defined by the 'sufficient and continuing links' that the claimant has with a dwelling. These links owe more to the social and psychological attachment or bond that develops with a particular dwelling and neighbourhood rather than proprietary rights. The concern is not just with the use of a dwelling as a mere shelter but also with abstract, but nevertheless powerful, ties to a particular place and locality. The concept of home is thus used in symbolic terms, rather than restricted by functionality, and as such dovetails with the similar Article 8 demands for respect for a person's 'private and family life.' A home is thus 'not just a place where one lives but also the place where one feels one belongs' [see Buyse Strings Attached: the concept of home in the case law of the ECHR (2006) EHRLR 294 at 296]. It is concerned with 'identity, self determination, physical and mental integrity, . . . and a settled and secure home and place in community.' [see Connors v UK at [82]] [. . .] Fox in her book Conceptualising Home: Theories, Law and Policy [Oxford, Hart:2007] explores the meaning of home beyond its physical structure to the concept of home as 'territory', home as 'identity', home as 'social and cultural unit' as well as home as 'a financial investment.' It is these intangible values of home which capture the essence of 'sufficient and continuing links' beyond a dwelling's tangible bricks and mortar. Yet lawyers and judges seem to find these home meanings challenging to accommodate for it is this wider concept of home which underpins the conflict between domestically recognised proprietary rights and the respect due to the home under Article 8.

Although the meaning of home is not easy to pin down, the home test of 'sufficient and continuing links' has generally not been difficult for a victim to pass unless their temporal connection with their home has been brief.[108] For instance, in Leeds CC v Price[109] occupation of a traveller's site for just a few days was insufficient.[110]

4.1.2 The implications of respect

As Feldman notes, respect has both negative and positive connotations that can encompass a wide variety of actions. Negative protection of the home encompasses protection from government interference, from (for example) police powers of entry and search,[111] or the regulation of land use through compulsory purchase,[112] and planning or residency controls.[113] Positive obligations are also placed upon governments to frame the law in such a way that individuals are at liberty to enjoy their homes and to exercise their chosen way of life.[114]

114 Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330. A positive duty may also arise to protect a particularly vulnerable group: see Connors v UK (2005) 40 EHRR 9.

An example of this positive duty is evident from cases that have challenged anti social behaviour[115] and environmental pollution.[116] For example, in Lopez Ostra v Spain,[117] the siting of a waste treatment plant and its operation without the requisite licence presented a health risk and nuisance to the applicant that breached Art 8. The Spanish government was responsible, because it had authorized and facilitated the construction of the plant close to the applicant's home,[118] and had failed to take steps to ensure that it was operated without causing a nuisance to neighbouring occupiers. Similar challenges to environmental pollution, caused by Heathrow and Gatwick Airports,[119] and road construction in the East End of London,[120] have also constituted an interference with the respect that Art 8(1) affords the home—although, in each case, that interference has been justified under Art 8(2).

These cases also demonstrate that governments' responsibilities may extend to the activities of private bodies, where there is a direct and immediate link between a government's duties under Art 8 and the interference.[121] Article 8(2) suggests that the interference must be by a public authority, but a public authority will be taken to have engaged Art 8(1) where it is responsible for the conditions that allow a private body to disturb an individual's enjoyment of his or her home.

4.1.3 Repossession as an interference

It is now clear that the exercise of a proprietary right to possession, for instance by a landlord or a creditor, is the most serious interference with the respect due to the home under Art 8(1) even though sanctioned by domestic law. The majority of the House of Lords in Harrow LBC v Qazi[122] had questioned this proposition but, following unequivocal judgments from the Strasbourg Court,[123] it is now accepted that domestic rights to possession are an interference with respect for the home, which must thus be justified as legitimate and proportionate under Art 8(2).[124]

4.2 WHEN IS AN INTERFERENCE JUSTIFIED UNDER ARTICLE 8(2)?

Article 8(2) sets out the grounds upon which an interference with the home may be justified. These grounds, in effect, set out the legitimate aims. They are comprehensive and, in many instances, an interference will be justified under one or more grounds. The most common grounds for our purposes are measures that are designed to promote the economic well-being of the country, to protect public safety, or to protect the rights and freedom of others.

For example, planning controls and powers of compulsory purchase will often be justified on all three grounds,[125] whilst environmental pollution may be justified to attain national economic goals.[126]

4.2.1 Necessary in a democratic society

The measures taken to achieve one or more of the legitimate aims identified in Art 8(2) must be necessary in a democratic society in order to address a pressing social need. Furthermore, they must be a proportionate response to that need, which strikes a fair balance between the respect due to an individual's home and the necessary social objective. In formulating these needs and the measures to achieve them, the government enjoys a wide margin of appreciation (see 2.5.3 above). As we have noted, it is thought that the margin of appreciate in the context of defining the necessity of a social need under Art 8 is somewhat narrower than the test of public or general interest under Art 1 Protocol 1. Nevertheless, it is not 'strict necessity' and, thus, a degree of latitude is envisaged depending on the context of the interference and the associated justification.[127] Furthermore, we have also noted in the domestic context that the courts are likely to show considerable deference to the policy choices of Parliament in socio-economic matters of which much of our land law forms part, particularly where that law has been subject to recent Parliamentary scrutiny (see 2.5.5 above).

4.2.2 Justification and social housing possession proceedings

A pressing social need is, without doubt, the provision of adequate housing, in which social landlords play a vital and prominent role. It is thus not surprising that possession proceedings by these social landlords have come under scrutiny in recent years on human rights grounds. The result has been 'a dialogue' between the Strasbourg Court and our highest court that has seen the Supreme Court eventually bow to the clear dictates of Strasbourg jurisprudence.[128]

We have already noted that repossession of the home is a serious interference with respect for the home under Art 8(1). The focus is thus upon the justification for this interference in the vindication of social landlords' property rights and their role in the provision of social housing as well as the process by which repossession operates. In most cases, a social landlord will seek possession of secure tenancies on statutory grounds, when it must satisfy the court that the requisite grounds for possession exist and, furthermore, that it is reasonable to make a possession order and/or that suitable alternative accommodation is available.[129] These cases are not thought to raise human rights difficulties. It is those occasions when a social landlord is exercising a mandatory ground for repossession that have been the subject of scrutiny. Here the victim will have no defence to the claim for possession and the court no, or very limited, discretion to refuse or delay an order for possession.

Mandatory grounds for possession fall into a number of groups. There are demoted and introductory tenancies, which were introduced to try and address anti social behaviour.

Both create non-secure tenancies that entitle the social landlord to repossession via a process that prescribes the width of the court's discretion. Introductory tenancies are granted to new social tenants who are, in effect, put on probation for an initial period to prove that they are responsible tenants before their tenancy moves to a secure basis. Existing secure tenants, who have been guilty of anti social behaviour, may have their tenancies demoted to unsecure tenancies for a period. They are, essentially, given a second chance to amend their behaviour. The second group look to provision of non-secure accommodation to certain categories of occupier including the grant of temporary accommodation to those who would otherwise be homeless and the licensing of mobile home sites to gypsies and travellers. Lastly there are the cases that look to the means by which a tenancy is terminated on mandatory grounds. These grounds include the termination of a joint tenancy by one joint tenant without the consent of the other joint tenant under the Rule in Hammersmith and Fulham LBC v Monk[130] and the statutory Ground 8 where a court must order repossession on the basis of rent arrears.

When focusing upon a human rights challenge to justification under Art 8(2), we need to remember that it is not just the compatibility of the legal rules that govern rights to possession (macro-compatibility) but also their impact upon the respect due to the home occupier (micro-compatibility). There is thus a need for both an adequate process and adequate judicial discretion within that process to apply that right to possession and assess their impact on the individual occupier. In addition, where possession proceedings are brought by a public authority landlord, there is the interface with a public law challenge via judicial review of the administrative decision(s) to terminate the tenant or licensee's legal right to possession and to subsequently pursue and enforce repossession proceedings.

A brief outline of 'the dialogue' between Strasbourg and our domestic courts is necessary to appreciate the full import of the justification balance that has been achieved.[131] A prelude to this dialogue is the initial position of our domestic courts in Harrow LBC v Qazi.[132] The majority of the House of Lords decided that the exercise of an established proprietary right to possession is necessarily compliant with Art 8 because it automatically provides the necessary justification under Art 8(2).[133] An influential minority, however, called for landowners' rights to possession to undergo justification as a proportionate interference with respect for the home, although they acknowledged that only in exceptional circumstances was it likely that an established right to possession would be found incompatible.[134] The Strasbourg Court refused an appeal in Qazi but they did announce their position in Connors v UK[135] (extract at 2.5.3 above). They held that the termination of a licence for gypsies to occupy a local authority mobile home site, without an opportunity to consider the proportionality of the termination, was an unjustified interference with the respect due to the Connors' home who, as members of a vulnerable cultural group, i.e. gypsies, were entitled to positive protection to facilitate their way of life.

A seven member House of Lords responded to Connors in Kay v Lambeth LBC,[136] which concerned the termination of a licence of housing provided to homeless individuals. The majority moved only marginal from Qazi in deciding that the proprietary rules governing possession might exceptionally be unjustified as a disproportionate interference with respect for the home under Art 8(2).[137] In contrast to the minority, however, the majority refused to accept that the application of those rules to the personal circumstances of the individual occupier also needed to be justified as proportionate. The majority held that in this respect Connors was confined to the particular circumstances of gypsies as a vulnerable group to whom positive duties were owed. The process concerns expressed by Strasbourg in Connors, the House of Lords believed, could be met by the public law redress via judicial review of the public authority's decision to repossess, which they confined to traditional Wednesbury grounds.[138] The Strasbourg Court was unimpressed. They repeated their position in ever clearer tones in McCann v UK, (extracted at 2.5.4 above) and in a number of other appeals on the compatibility of repossession proceedings from other jurisdictions.[139] In McCann the Strasbourg Court also expressed doubt that judicial review on traditional Wednesbury grounds could provide an adequate process and expressed their preference for the view of the minority in Kay v Lambeth LBC.

A five member House of Lords in Doherty v Birmingham CC,[140] another gypsy eviction case in which judgment was handed down shortly after McCann, virtually ignored the message from Strasbourg. The House felt constrained by their previous decision in Kay although they did try to address the process issue by suggesting, unfortunately with muffled and inconsistent voices, that the grounds of judicial review of a public authority's decision to repossess were wider than common law irrationality. They hinted that this alternative wider judicial review route could encompass human rights based concerns by taking into account the impact of the repossession upon the personal circumstances of the victim.

A successful appeal by Kay to Strasbourg in Kay v UK (extracted at 2.5.3 above) finally brought the Strasbourg message home. The exercise of a right to possession by a public authority is a serious interference with respect for the home that will be justified only if it is lawful and serves a legitimate aim by meeting a pressing social need that lies within a State's margin of appreciation, but which is also proportionate in striking a fair balance in its impact upon the individual victim. The proportionality of the interference necessitates an assessment by an independent tribunal of the impact of the interference upon the personal circumstances of the victim. Judicial review, confined to traditional Wednesbury irrationality, is an inadequate process given its shortcomings in reconciling disputed facts. Strasbourg in Kay v UK did not rule out the possibility that judicial review might be adapted to provide a compatible process and welcomed the developments to judicial review that were hinted at in Doherty.

The Supreme Court has bowed to the inevitable in their decisions in Manchester CC v Pinnock,[141] on the compatibility of the termination of demoted tenancies, and in the conjoined appeals in Hounslow LBC v Powell, Leeds CC v Hall, Birmingham CC v Frisby,[142] concerning the termination of introductory tenancies and unsecure tenancies to those qualifying as homeless. Before turning to look at the final conclusion reached by these decisions, it is worth noting the concerns of our domestic courts in their reluctance to heed the message from Strasbourg.

First, there is a concern not to upset the social housing regime articulated through detailed statutory schemes emanating from Parliament. Here we have an example of judicial deference to Parliament in a key area of socio-economic policy that attracts significant state funding. The judiciary is keen to acknowledge the democratic mandate of the legislature in determining housing policy and the expertise of those responsible for the articulation and administration of those policy choices (see 2.5.5 above). In Powell, Lord Hope repeated their Lordships' views on the proper constitutional balance in the regulation of social housing.

Hounslow LBC v Powell
[2011] UKSC 8

Lord Hope

The legislature has excluded these types of tenancy [i.e. introductory tenancies and homeless accommodation] from the statutory scheme which applies to secure tenancies for very good reason, which are firmly rooted in social policy. In seeking democratic solutions to the problems inherent in the allocation of social housing, parliament has sought to strike a balance between the rights of the occupier and the property rights and public responsibilities of the public authority. The regimes that apply to introductory and demoted tenancies have been designed to address the problem of irresponsible and disruptive tenants whose presence in social housing schemes can render the life for their neighbours in their homes intolerable. The homeless regime provides the local housing authority with the flexibility in the management of its housing stock that it needs if it is to respond quickly and responsibly to the demands that this pressing social problem gives rise to. Measure which would have the effect of widening the protections given to occupiers by the statutes must be carefully tested against Parliament's choice as to who should, and should not, have security of tenure and when it should be given to them, if at all. Social housing law draws a clear distinction between cases where security of tenure has been given, and those there it has not. There are clear policy reasons why Parliament has denied security to certain classes of occupier.

Secondly, there is, as dictated by Strasbourg jurisprudence, the importance attached to procedural safeguards that has produced tensions both with the regulation of social housing, which, as Lord Hope explains, on occasions denies security of tenure for sound policy reasons. There is also perhaps a more fundamental tension between the common law's acceptance of non-judicial controls of possession and the civilian preference for judicial control over the assertion of ownership rights. The need for procedural safeguards demonstrates the underlying demands of respect for the home. That respect dictates a judicial process within which there is an adequate opportunity to measure the proportionality of the repossession both in terms of the legal rules that sanction possession and in their impact upon the individual victim (see 2.5.3 and 2.5.4 above).

This search for adequate procedural safeguards has demonstrated the interface between a freestanding cause of action on human rights grounds emanating from s 7 of the HRA 1998 and the traditional administrative law route by which public authorities have been held to account through judicial review. Judicial review itself is undergoing somewhat of a reformation in the light of public authorities' duties under s 6 of the HRA 1998 to act in a human rights compatible manner, which looks to proportionality rather than irrationality, as the appropriate test (see 2.2.3 above).

Lastly, the decisions highlight the Supreme Court's concern with the practicalities of possession proceedings which occupy much of the business of our County Courts. The higher courts may revel in the niceties of human rights adjudication but it is the County Courts which must apply those rules fairly yet efficiently.

The Supreme Court's decision in Pinnock acknowledges that a tenant from a social landlord may challenge the proportionality of his or her eviction in the proceedings for possession.

[2010] UKSC 45

Lord Neuberger

At [45] and [49]

[. . .] it is clear that the following propositions are now well established in the jurisprudence of the European court: (a) Any person at risk of being dispossessed of his home at the suit of a local authority should in principle have the right to raise the question of the proportionality of the measure, and to have it determined by an independent tribunal in the light of article 8, even if his right of occupation under domestic law has come to an end: McCann v United Kingdom 47 EHRR 913, para 50; Ćosić v Croatia given 15 January 2009, para 22; Zehentner v Austria given 16 July 2009, para 59; Paulic v Croatia given 22 October 2009, para 43; and Kay v United Kingdom given 21 September 2010, paras 73–74. (b) A judicial procedure which is limited to addressing the proportionality of the measure through the medium of traditional judicial review (i e, one which does not permit the court to make its own assessment of the facts in an appropriate case) is inadequate as it is not appropriate for resolving sensitive factual issues: Connors v United Kingdom 40 EHRR 189, para 92; McCann v United Kingdom 47 EHRR 913, para 53; Kay v United Kingdom, paras 72–73. (c) Where the measure includes proceedings involving more than one stage, it is the proceedings as a whole which must be considered in order to see if article 8 has been complied with: Zehentner v Austria, para 54. (d) If the court concludes that it would be disproportionate to evict a person from his home notwithstanding the fact that he has no domestic right to remain there, it would be unlawful to evict him so long as the conclusion obtains—for example, for a specified period, or until a specified event occurs, or a particular condition is satisfied. Although it cannot be described as a point of principle, it seems that the European court has also franked the view that it will only be in exceptional cases that article 8 proportionality would even arguably give a right to continued possession where the applicant has no right under domestic law to remain: McCann v United Kingdom 47 EHRR 913, para 54; Kay v United Kingdom, para 73.

We have referred in a little detail to the European court jurisprudence. This is because it is important for the court to emphasise what is now the unambiguous and consistent approach of the European court, when we have to consider whether it is appropriate for this court to depart from the three decisions of the House of Lords . . . .

In the present case there is no question of the jurisprudence of the European court failing to take into account some principle or cutting across our domestic substantive or procedural law in some fundamental way. That is clear from the minority opinions in Harrow London Borough Council v Qazi [2004] 1 AC 983 and Kay v Lambeth London Borough Council [2006] 2 AC 465, and also from the fact that our domestic law was already moving in the direction of the European jurisprudence in Doherty v Birmingham City Council [2009] AC 367. Even before the decision in Kay v United Kingdom The Times, 18 October 2010, we would, in any event, have been of the opinion that this court should now accept and apply the minority view of the House of Lords in those cases. In the light of Kay v United Kingdom that is clearly the right conclusion. Therefore, if our law is to be compatible with article 8, where a court is asked to make an order for possession of a person's home at the suit of a local authority, the court must have the power to assess the proportionality of making the order, and, in making that assessment, to resolve any relevant dispute of fact.

Lord Neuberger went onto to observe that these dictates present no problem to the existing possession proceedings against secure tenants where the court has a statutory discretion to assess the reasonableness of the order for possession, but that mandatory grounds for possession were more problematic. Before holding that the regime for the termination of demoted tenancies was compliant, and that its application to Mr Pinnock was proportionate, he made the following general observations.

Lord Neuberger

Nevertheless, certain general points can be made, even at this stage.

First, it is only where a person's "home" is under threat that article 8 comes into play, and there may be cases where it is open to argument whether the premises involved are the defendant's home (eg where very short-term accommodation has been provided). Secondly, as a general rule, article 8 need only be considered by the court if it is raised in the proceedings by or on behalf of the residential occupier. Thirdly, if an article 8 point is raised, the court should initially consider it summarily, and if, as will no doubt often be the case, the court is satisfied that, even if the facts relied on are made out, the point would not succeed, it should be dismissed. Only if the court is satisfied that it could affect the order that the court might make should the point be further entertained.

Fourthly, if domestic law justifies an outright order for possession, the effect of article 8 may, albeit in exceptional cases, justify (in ascending order of effect) granting an extended period for possession, suspending the order for possession on the happening of an event, or even refusing an order altogether.

Fifthly, the conclusion that the court must have the ability to assess the article 8 proportionality of making a possession order in respect of a person's home may require certain statutory and procedural provisions to be revisited [. . .] we say no more on the point, since these aspects were not canvassed on the present appeal to any significant extent, save in relation to the legislation on demoted tenancies which we are about to discuss under the third issue.

Sixthly, the suggestions put forward on behalf of the Equality and Human Rights Commission, that proportionality is more likely to be a relevant issue "in respect of occupants who are vulnerable as a result of mental illness, physical or learning disability, poor health or frailty", and that "the issue may also require the local authority to explain why they are not securing alternative accommodation in such cases" seem to us well made.

Evident in these observations is a concern with the practicalities of possession proceedings, which should not be hampered by a human rights based defence unless the occupier raises the issue, i.e. compliance should be presumed unless questioned. Also evident is the message that a successful human rights challenge to the social housing legislation enacted by Parliament will be rare and likely only to arise where its impact upon an individual occupier is disproportionate because of the occupier's particular vulnerability. His message is repeated by Lord Hope in Powell.[143]

In previous decisions the word 'exceptional' had been used to describe the likelihood of a disproportionate result. Lord Neuberger, in Pinnock, criticized the use of the word 'exceptional' and tried to articulate a more useful guide. In so doing he suggests that vindication of a social landlord's property rights and their duties of housing management in almost all cases will provide the necessary pressing social need to demonstrate proportionality.

Lord Neuberger

It is necessary to address the proposition that it will only be in "very highly exceptional cases" that it will be appropriate for the court to consider a proportionality argument. Such a proposition undoubtedly derives support from the views expressed by Lord Bingham, and has been referred to with apparent approval by the European court in more than one case. Nevertheless, it seems to us to be both unsafe and unhelpful to invoke exceptionality as a guide. It is unhelpful because, as Baroness Hale of Richmond JSC pointed out in argument, exceptionality is an outcome and not a guide. It is unsafe because, as Lord Walker observed in Doherty v Birmingham City Council [2009] AC 367, para 122, there may be more cases than the European court or Lord Bingham supposed where article 8 could reasonably be invoked by a residential tenant.

We would prefer to express the position slightly differently. The question is always whether the eviction is a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim. Where a person has no right in domestic law to remain in occupation of his home, the proportionality of making an order for possession at the suit of the local authority will be supported not merely by the fact that it would serve to vindicate the authority's ownership rights. It will also, at least normally, be supported by the fact that it would enable the authority to comply with its duties in relation to the distribution and management of its housing stock, including, for example, the fair allocation of its housing, the redevelopment of the site, the refurbishing of sub-standard accommodation, the need to move people who are in accommodation that now exceeds their needs, and the need to move vulnerable people into sheltered or warden-assisted housing. Furthermore, in many cases (such as this appeal) other cogent reasons, such as the need to remove a source of nuisance to neighbours, may support the proportionality of dispossessing the occupiers.

In this connection, it is right to refer to a point raised by the Secretary of State. He submitted that a local authority's aim in wanting possession should be a "given", which does not have to be explained or justified in court, so that the court will only be concerned with the occupiers' personal circumstances. In our view, there is indeed force in the point, which finds support in Lord Bingham's comment in Kay v Lambeth London Borough Council [2006] 2 AC 465, 491, para 29, that to require the local authority routinely, from the outset, to plead and prove that the possession order sought is justified would, in the overwhelming majority of cases, be burdensome and futile. In other words, the fact that the authority is entitled to possession and should, in the absence of cogent evidence to the contrary, be assumed to be acting in accordance with its duties, will be a strong factor in support of the proportionality of making an order for possession. But, in a particular case, the authority may have what it believes to be particularly strong or unusual reasons for wanting possession—for example, that the property is the only occupied part of a site intended for immediate development for community housing. The authority could rely on that factor, but would have to plead it and adduce evidence to support it.

Unencumbered property rights, even where they are enjoyed by a public body such as a local authority, are of real weight when it comes to proportionality. So, too, is the right—indeed the obligation—of a local authority to decide who should occupy its residential property. As Lord Bingham said in Harrow London Borough Council v Qazi [2004] 1 AC 983, 997, para 25: "the administration of public housing under various statutory schemes is entrusted to local housing authorities. It is not for the court to second-guess allocation decisions. The Strasbourg authorities have adopted a very pragmatic and realistic approach to the issue of justification."

Therefore, in virtually every case where a residential occupier has no contractual or statutory protection, and the local authority is entitled to possession as a matter of domestic law, there will be a very strong case for saying that making an order for possession would be proportionate. However, in some cases there may be factors which would tell the other way.

Again Lord Neuberger's views regarding the legitimate aim of the interference presented by possession proceedings were repeated in Powell, where Lord Hope emphasized that in the case of social landlords the vindication of their property rights was by itself insufficient.[144] Lord Hope went on to reject the need for a more structured approach to proportionality, which would look to the particular policy of the ground for possession under scrutiny.

Lord Hope

A structured approach of the kind that Mr Luba was suggesting may be appropriate, and indeed desirable, in some contexts such as that of immigration control which was the issue under discussion in Huang v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2007] 2 AC 167. But in the context of a statutory regime that has been deliberately designed by Parliament, for sound reasons of social policy, so as not to provide the occupier with a secure tenancy it would be wholly inappropriate. I agree with Mr Stilitz for the Secretary of State that to require the local authority to plead its case in this way would largely collapse the distinction between secured and non-secure tenancies. It would give rise to the risk of prolonged and expensive litigation, which would divert funds from the uses to which they should be put to promote social housing in the area. In the ordinary case the relevant facts will be encapsulated entirely in the two legitimate aims that were identified in Pinnock [2010] 3 WLR 1441, para 52. It is against those aims, which should always be taken for granted, that the court must weigh up any factual objections that may be raised by the defendant and what she has to say about her personal circumstances. It is only if a defence has been put forward that is seriously arguable that it will be necessary for the judge to adjourn the case for further consideration of the issues of lawfulness or proportionality. If this test is not met, the order for possession should be granted. This is all that is needed to satisfy the procedural imperative that has been laid down by the Strasbourg court.

The difficulty is in identifying those very few cases where repossession may be disproportionate. Lord Neuberger, in Pinnock, acknowledged that the particular vulnerability of the individual occupier may tip the balance. Lord Bingham in Kay v Lambeth LBC[145] was of the view that County Court judges should be able to spot those rare cases.

Lord Bingham

I do not think it possible or desirable to attempt to define what facts or circumstances might rank as highly exceptional. The practical experience of county court judges is likely to prove the surest guide, provided always that the stringency of the test is borne in mind. They are well used to exercising their judgment under existing statutory schemes and will recognise a highly exceptional case when they see it. I do not, however, consider that problems and afflictions of a personal nature should avail the occupier where there are public services available to address and alleviate those problems, and if under the relevant social legislation the occupier is specifically disentitled from eligibility for relief it will be necessary to consider the democratic judgment reflected in that provision. Nor can article 8 avail a tenant, otherwise perhaps than for a very brief period, if he can be appropriately accommodated elsewhere (whether publicly or privately). Where, as notably in the case of gipsies, scarcity of land adversely affects many members of the class, an article 8(2) defence could only, I think, succeed if advanced by a member of the class who had grounds for complaint substantially stronger than members of the class in general.

Lord Phillips, in Powell,[146] also pointed out that it is 'fundamentally unfair' for an occupier not to be informed at an early stage of the reasons for the possession proceedings against him or her. Early notification is important so that an occupier can consider the possibility of raising a defence.

The Supreme Court, in Pinnock, held the demoted tenancy regime compatible by a resourceful use of their power of statutory interpretation under s 3. A secure tenancy can be demoted for one year where the court is satisfied that the tenant has committed anti social behaviour.[147] Within that year the social landlord is entitled to recover possession provided they follow the prescribed procedure, which provides for an internal review by the social landlord of a decision to repossess.[148] If the internal review confirms repossession the court's discretion appears limited—the court 'must make an order for possession unless it thinks that the [prescribed] procedure has not been followed'.[149] However, Lord Neuberger held that this literal wording did not prevent the court assessing the proportionality of the repossession upon the individual. He did so by the novel, if somewhat circular, argument that the statutory procedure must be read to require a lawful process. To be lawful that process must comply with the ECHR, thus, the section, despite its apparent restrictive wording, must entitle the court to assess the proportionality of the order for possession.

Lord Neuberger

As we have pointed out [. . .] the purpose of [s143D] appears to be to ensure that the court makes an order for possession in all cases except where it thinks that the procedure under sections 143E and 143F has not been followed. In other words, the purpose is to ensure that the court does nothing more than check whether the procedure has been followed. It could therefore be argued that holding that the court could assess the proportionality of the local authority's decision to bring and to continue the possession proceedings would go against the whole import of the section and would amount to amending rather than interpreting it.

We have come to the conclusion that we should reject that argument.

In our view, if the procedure laid down in section 143E or 143F has not been lawfully complied with, either because the express requirements of that section have not been observed or because the rules of natural justice have been infringed, the tenant should be able to raise that as a defence to a possession claim under section 143D(2). After all, the tenant's argument in such circumstances would be within the scope of the ambit of section 143D(2), namely that "the procedure under sections 143E and 143F has not been [lawfully] followed", since lawfulness must be an inherent requirement of the procedure. It must equally be open to the court to consider whether the procedure has been lawfully followed, having regard to the defendant's article 8 Convention rights and section 6 of the 1998 Act.

A similar interpretative approach was taken in Powell. The Supreme Court again exercised their duty under s 3 of the HRA 1998, by reading into the statutory framework for the termination of introductory tenancies and tenancies granted to the homeless a discretion for the court to conduct a proportionality assessment and, thus, meet human rights' procedural demands.[150]

Lord Neuberger, in Pinnock, also briefly addressed the availability of a public law challenge by way of judicial review of a public authority's decision to bring a tenancy to an end and their subsequent decision(s) to recover possession through the bringing of proceedings and the execution of the possession order obtained. In so doing he noted both the expanded human rights basis upon which a public landlord's decision could be questioned and recognized that the judicial review process needed to accommodate the resolution of disputed facts.

Lord Neuberger

At [72]–[74] and [81]

Rightly, in our view, it is common ground that a court has jurisdiction, under normal judicial review principles, to satisfy itself that the local authority and panel have indeed acted reasonably and have investigated the relevant facts fairly, when deciding to bring possession proceedings. From this it must follow that any decision by the local authority to continue possession proceedings is similarly susceptible to judicial review. At the same time, it is right to emphasise that it would almost always require a marked change of circumstances following a panel's decision to approve the proceedings, before an attempt could properly be made to judicially review the continuance of proceedings which were initially justified.

In our judgment, once it is accepted that it is open to a demoted tenant to seek judicial review of a landlord's decision to bring and continue possession proceedings, then it inevitably follows that, as a generality, it is open to a tenant to challenge that decision on the ground that it would be disproportionate and therefore contrary to article 8.

Further, as we saw at paras 31 to 43 above, the European court jurisprudence requires the court considering such a challenge to have the power to make its own assessment of any relevant facts which are in dispute. We have already pointed out, at para 28 above, that Lord Scott and Lord Mance, in particular, reached this conclusion in Doherty v Birmingham City Council [2009] AC 367, paras 68 and 138. The European court acknowledged this development in

> Kay v United Kingdom The Times, 18 October 2010, para 73. In these circumstances we are satisfied that, wherever possible, the traditional review powers of the court should be expanded so as to permit it to carry out that exercise.
> In summary: where it is required in order to give effect to an occupier's article 8 Convention rights, the court's powers of review can, in an appropriate case, extend to reconsidering for itself the facts found by a local authority, or indeed to considering facts which have arisen since the issue of proceedings, by hearing evidence and forming its own view.

As we can see from both Pinnock and Powell, adequate procedural safeguards call for a consideration of the proportionality of the infringement upon the victim's individual respect for their home. There must, thus, be juridical process which provides adequate judicial discretion to balance the proportionality of the interference upon the individual's personal circumstances. The Strasbourg Court has indicated that those proceedings should be substantive, when the court has jurisdiction to consider the relevant issues, and not merely in enforcement proceedings, where the courts' examination of the circumstances may be constrained.

Application No 3572/06

Facts: Mr Paulic's tenancy of the home he occupied with his wife and son was brought to an end in accordance with domestic law. The enforcement of the repossession order was adjourned pending the hearing of an appeal against the repossession order and in the light of the ill health of Mr Paulic's son.

> While it is true that the applicant's eviction has been temporarily adjourned owing to the illness of his son in the course of enforcement proceedings, this in itself does not satisfy the requirement that the reasonableness and the proportionality of the eviction order as such has to be assessed by an independent tribunal. The Court notes that enforcement proceedings—which by their nature are non-contentious and whose primary purpose is to secure the effective execution of the judgment debts—are unlike regular civil proceedings, neither designated nor properly equipped with procedural tools and safeguards for the thorough and adversarial examination of such complex legal issues. Therefore the competence for carrying out the test of proportionality lies with a court conducting regular civil proceedings in which the civil claim lodged by the State and seeking the applicant's eviction is determined.

Whilst Lord Neuberger, in Pinnock, was inventive in finding the demoted tenancy procedure compliant, he warned that other measures that constrained the court discretion might not be compliant. He mentioned s 89 of the Housing Act 1980 as a possible non-compliant candidate.[151] This section limits the ability of the court's common law discretion to delay the enforcement of a possession order for such period as it thinks fit. It does so by stipulating that the court cannot delay the enforcement of a possession order for longer than 14 days, unless there are exceptional circumstances, and in any event for no longer than six weeks.

There are exceptions to this statutory rule including possession orders made in favour of mortgagees exercising a right to possession,[152] a landlord exercising a right of forfeiture,[153] and non-secure tenancies. The section was not directly in issue in either Pinnock or Powell but Lord Hope, in Powell, did make the following comments where we find reference to the margin of appreciation, deference, and limits on the court's powers of interpretation under s 3 HRA 1998.[154]

Lord Hope

In the face of such strong statutory language, any reading down of the section to enable the court to postpone the execution of an order for possession of a dwelling house which was not let on a secure tenancy for a longer period than the statutory maximum would go well beyond what section 3(1) of the 1998 Act permits. As Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead said in Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza [2004] 2 AC 557, para 33, for the courts to adopt a meaning inconsistent with a fundamental feature of legislation would be to cross the constitutional boundary that section 3 of the 1998 Act seeks to demarcate and preserve.

Section 89 of the 1980 Act does not, of course, take away from the court its ordinary powers of case management. It would be perfectly proper for it, for example, to defer making the order for possession pending an appeal or to enable proceedings to be brought in the administrative court which might result in a finding that it was not lawful for a possession order to be made, as was contemplated by the judge in the case of Mr Frisby but is now no longer necessary. An adjournment would also be a permissible exercise of the court's discretion if more information was needed to enable it to decide what order it should make. But what the court cannot do, if it decides to proceed to make the order, is play for more time by suspending or staying its effect so as to extend the time limit beyond the statutory maximum.

The question then is whether the court should make a declaration of incompatibility under section 4 of the 1998 Act. This would be appropriate if there was good reason to believe that the time limit that the section sets is likely in practice to be incompatible with the article 8 Convention right of the person against whom the order for possession is made. Mr Arden's comment in Current Law Statutes indicates that at the time when section 89 of the 1980 Act was enacted postponements of orders for possession for periods of four to six weeks was normal. No evidence has been put before the court to show that in practice the maximum period of six weeks is insufficient to meet the needs of cases of exceptional hardship. Furthermore, this is an area of law where the judgment of Parliament as to what was necessary to achieve its policy of restricting the discretion of the court in the case of non-secure tenancies should be respected, unless it was manifestly without reasonable foundation: Blecic v Croatia (2004) 41 EHRR 185, para 65. In these circumstances, as no obvious need for the section to be revisited has been demonstrated, I would decline to make a declaration of incompatibility.

The basic principles of how Art 8 impacts upon possession proceedings brought by social landlords may now be established but there is still much to be worked out. There are the practical procedural ramifications and further clarity of those elusive 'exceptional circumstances' when repossession will be disproportionate. There is little guidance from the Supreme Court for those at the coal face who will have to deal with these questions on a daily basis.[155]

Arden, Whose rights? Whose reasons? [2011] JHL 47, 49

What is most notable about both Pinnock and Powell is the paucity of theory, the absence of reasoned, precedent based (or distinguishing) approach for which our highest court—in its present and previous incarnations—has been world renowned. What the decisions say is no more than that the time has come to accept the conclusion of the European Court of Human Rights that an independent proportionality hearing is invariably required on an eviction from the home.

More fundamentally, there are also the wider implications for possession proceedings of the home by private parties.

5 ARTICLE 14: FREEDOM FROM DISCRIMINATION

European Convention on Human Rights, Art 14

The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property birth or other status.

The target of Art 14 is discrimination, but the Article does not provide a free-standing protection against discrimination.[156] Its operation is directed against discrimination in the enjoyment of the other rights protected by the ECHR. It is said to be parasitic in nature. It is thus necessary for another Article (the 'host Article') to be engaged before Art 14 can be considered. If the breach of the host Article is proved, the court will often not progress to consider whether or not Art 14 has been infringed.[157] But if there is no breach of the host Article, the court may go on to consider whether or not there has been a breach of Art 14: for example, because the justification for engagement of the host Article operates in a discriminatory fashion. In this sense, Art 14 is said to be autonomous and can provide an effective weapon that belies its parasitic nature.

Baroness Hale, in the following case, outlined the issues to be established under Art 14.

[2004] 2 AC 557, HL

Baroness Hale

At [133] and [134]

It is common ground that five questions arise in an article 14 inquiry [. . .] The original four questions were: (i) Do the facts fall within the ambit of one or more of the Convention rights?

156 The Twelfth Protocol of the ECHR includes a free-standing right against discrimination, but the Protocol has not been signed or ratified by the United Kingdom.

157 See Connors v UK (2005) 40 EHRR 9, although the House of Lords in Doherty noted the discriminatory treatment of occupiers evicted from local authority and privately owned travellers' sites—a distinction that has now been removed from the legislation.

(ii) Was there a difference in treatment in respect of that right between the complainant and others put forward for comparison? (iii) Were those others in an analogous situation? (iv) Was the difference in treatment objectively justifiable? i.e, did it have a legitimate aim and bear a reasonable relationship of proportionality to that aim?

The additional question is whether the difference in treatment is based on one or more of the grounds proscribed—whether expressly or by inference—in article 14. The appellant argued that that question should be asked after question (iv), the respondent that it should be asked after question (ii). In my view, the [. . .] questions are a useful tool of analysis but there is a considerable overlap between them: in particular between whether the situations to be compared were truly analogous, whether the difference in treatment was based on a proscribed ground and whether it had an objective justification. If the situations were not truly analogous it may be easier to conclude that the difference was based on something other than a proscribed ground. The reasons why their situations are analogous but their treatment different will be relevant to whether the treatment is objectively justified. A rigidly formulaic approach is to be avoided.

The victim must thus establish that he or she was treated differently from another person who is in an analogous position. For example, Mr Godin-Mendoza was able to prove that he would be treated differently from a heterosexual partner. The victim must then prove that his or her discriminatory treatment was not reasonably and objectively justifiable: not only must the discrimination be based upon unacceptable grounds, of which the Article provides a non-exhaustive list, but it must also be unjustified, following the process that we have already examined. For example, in James v UK,[158] the enfranchisement legislation under review applied only to certain landlords, but was not discriminatory under Art 14 because it met a pressing social need and, in so doing, provided a proportionate response.

6 ARTICLE 6(1): THE RIGHT TO A FAIR TRIAL

In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgement shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interest of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society where the interests of juveniles or the protection of private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in the special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.

Article 6(1) demands due process in the determination of civil rights and obligations, including proprietary rights and duties. That process requires a timely, fair, and public hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal. We have already seen a concern for proper procedural guarantees inherent in the assessment of whether or not a fair balance has been struck to justify an infringement of either Art 1 of the First Protocol or Art 8. Article 6(1) provides a further procedural guarantee, but, this time, where there is a dispute in which a person's civil rights and obligations are determined.

6.1 CIVIL RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS

A 'civil right' is an autonomous concept, which is defined by the Strasbourg jurisprudence rather than domestic law. A civil right equates to a right defined by private, rather than public, law: it thus includes, for example, property rights in land and personal rights to use land.[159] There must, however, be a right recognized by the domestic law in the first place, because Art 6(1) relates to proceedings that determine substantive rights. For example, in the following case, the void credit agreement never conferred a right upon First County in the first place, so Art 6 had no role to play.[160]

[2004] 1 AC 816, HL

Lord Nicholls

For present purposes it is sufficient to note that the established case law of the European Court of Human Rights is to the effect that article 6(1) does not itself guarantee any particular content for civil rights and obligations. [Article] 6(1) applies only to disputes over what, at least arguably, are recognised under domestic law to be "rights and obligations" see Z v UK [2001] 2 FLR 612, 634 at para 87. Article 6(1) may not be used as a means of creating a substantive civil right having no basis in national law. The content of the substantive national law may call for scrutiny under other articles of the Convention or its Protocols, but that is not a target of article 6(1).

The distinction between public and private rights, although fundamental to Art 6(1), is not always easy to draw. For example, a private individual's interaction with a public authority will not necessarily be regarded as a matter of public law and thus will be outside the scope of Art 6(1). It is necessary to look to the character of the particular right. A measure within the administrative control of a public authority may nevertheless affect the exercise of private rights. For example, planning controls will determine whether or not an owner is able to exercise his or her private rights of ownership by building on the land. It is thus said to be 'decisive' of private law rights and subject to Art 6(1).[161] The expropriation of land by a public authority, and any compensation payable as a result, are also clearly matters that are decisive of private law rights, and thus fall to be determined in a manner required by Art 6(1).[162]

159 The scope of Art 6(1) is, of course, much wider.

160 See also Powell and Rayner v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 355, in which the applicants were deprived by statute of any claim in nuisance against the Civil Aviation Authority by s 76(1) of Civil Aviation Act 1982. They thus had no right to be determined.

161 Bryan v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 342; Regina (Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2003] 2 AC 295.

6.2 A FAIR HEARING

Article 6(1) requires proprietary rights to be determined by a hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal at which the parties have an opportunity to state their case, having access to all relevant information. That hearing must be held within a reasonable time and it is anticipated that it will take place, and the judgment be given, in public, unless the exceptions set out in the Article are satisfied. These requirements will be met where the proceedings take place before a court, but a number of self-help remedies will fall short of these requirements. For example, a landlord's exercise of a right of re-entry, or right to seize the tenant's possessions by way of distress for unpaid rent, will not do so where the landlord is able to exercise these rights without seeking the assistance of the court.[163]

The entire course of proceedings, including any right of appeal, will be considered when assessing compliance with the above requirements.[164] Thus, the fact that a body that is neither independent nor impartial initially decides a matter will not necessarily be fatal where there is an adequate right of appeal to a court that is independent and impartial. That right of appeal may be sufficient even though it is limited (for example, to points of law), provided that, taken as a whole, the proceedings satisfy the requirements of fairness.[165] Where the administrative decision of a public authority is the subject of scrutiny, the availability of judicial review may be sufficient even though the court is unable to consider the merits of the case, but is merely able to consider the legality and reasonableness of the administrative decision.[166]

7 THE IMPACT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

The crucial question is to what extent the HRA 1998 will impact on proprietary rights. The House of Lords, and now the Supreme Court, has been tussling with these issues for almost a decade and is cautiously inching its way forward but the way is not yet clear.

Allen has suggested two possibilities: either there will be little change, because human rights values are already embedded in our fundamental proprietary principles, or there will be a greater impact through the influence of an alternative process of balancing competing proprietary interests, and, possibly, also a further basis on which to claim rights affecting property.

Allen, Property and The Human Rights Act 1998 (2005, p 250)

This leaves the central question open: what are the values that may affect the development of substantive principles of the private law of property? In the discussion on the applicability of P1(1) [Art 1 of the First Protocol] and other Convention rights, it was said that human autonomy and dignity are values in both human rights law and private law, Similarly, both human rights and private law often require a balance to be struck between competing interests. However, if the values only take effect at a very high level of generality, alongside other private law values such as certainty, fairness and the like, the effect of human rights law is unlikely to be significant. It may add a new rhetorical dimension to the reasoning in private law cases, but without changing the outcome. But once values are identified at a high level of generality, it should be possible to move to two more specific aspects relating to the development of private law doctrines where human rights law may prove significant (and is already proving significant). The first relates to the nature of the balancing process, and the second to the interest which private law seeks to protect.

The alternative balancing process to which Allen refers is found in the elements that we have examined in the justification formula and, in particular, the fair balance upon which proportionality depends. Fox has described the human rights framework as offering 'a useful lens',[167] whilst Gray and Gray have offered the analogy of a 'prism'[168] through which compliant legislation must pass. We have seen that the courts have identified that, when assessing the compatibility of legislation, they are engaged in a 'new role',[169] which calls upon them to consider policy to greater extent than has previously been required. Although the ECHR is a product of traditional property values, it does seek to articulate those values in a manner that affords greater clarity and legitimacy to the balancing process. Nevertheless, we have seen, through the cases on the mandatory repossession proceedings by public authorities, that the courts are unlikely to question the social and economic policy ramifications of housing policy. The same reluctance is also likely to be displayed in considering the compatibility of rules affecting the property rights of individuals particularly where these rules have been the subject of recent legislative reform.

The implementation of policy through the law reform process is, however, not always logical and seamless. Anomalies and lacunae do occur—particularly in land law, in which, throughout its long history, prospective and piecemeal evolution predominates. It is in these circumstances that the new balancing process may have most to contribute and we will, in the remainder of this book, try to identify those areas in which we think that a human rights challenge might make a difference.

Allen notes that Art 1 of the First Protocol 'is a very conservative element in the protection of human rights'.[170] By contrast, Art 8 has attracted attention as a possible foundation for a new human rights based protection of the home.[171] Article 8 has already provided a platform from which claimants can seek environmental protection; there is also the possibility that claimants, with no recognized proprietary rights or for whom the existing property rules provide no redress, might be able to look to Art 8 for protection. This protection springs instead from their particular status, for instance those suffering from a disability, or way of life, for instance gypsies, which the government under Art 8 is under a positive duty to protect. In addition it is now accepted that the proportionality balance under Art 8 looks both to the fair balance of the substantive law governing the interference and to the impact of that interference upon the personal circumstances of the particular victim. In order to address this latter demand of proportionality there must be a process by which an independent tribunal can make that assessment which demands both adequate legal proceedings and adequate judicial discretion within those proceedings. These imperatives lie at the heart of the recent string of cases that have occupied the House of Lords, the Supreme Court, and the Strasbourg Court.

These developments mark radical shifts in the traditional emphasis of land law. First, there is a shift from repossession as a positive vindication of property rights towards the characterization of repossession as a violation of human rights, namely the respect due to the home under Art 8. Secondly, there is a shift from the primacy of a certain and limited list of property rights towards an acknowledgement that, in the context of the home, the assertion of a right to possession may need to accommodate the personal circumstances of the victim. This refocusing of attention signifies a step away from the objective application of rules towards a subjective evaluation of their impact, which, as Gray and Gray point out, could operate 'to modify or even override'[172] the existing proprietary rights of others. Thirdly, the demand for procedural safeguards by which proportionality can be measured reinforces moves away from the common law's sympathy for the extra judicial assertion of superior rights and, more significantly, underlines the need for adequate judicial discretion in place of the bald application of possessory rights. Given the intertwined relationship between substance and process, the presence of discretion within the process by which a property right finds expression will inevitably colour the nature of the right itself. There is an obvious distinction between a mandatory right to possession, the exercise of which the court merely regulates in terms of its timing and mode of execution, and a right to possession that is inherently dependent upon positive court vindication.

The implication of this more radical agenda could prove particularly potent should the HRA 1998 have horizontal effect, and thus extend to relations between private individuals, as well as those between public authorities and individuals. The danger is that the Act could prove a precipitous rollercoaster ride and commentators have warned against upsetting the traditional balance.[173]

Howell, 'The Human Rights Act 1998: Land, Private Citizens, and the Common Law' (2007) 123 LQR 618

On one view, the HRA is to be welcomed: land law has never acted in a vacuum. Legislation and judgments are already driven by social, economic and to an extent, moral, considerations, whose weight and content change over time. Land Law is already going through a period of unprecedented but largely unremarked change. The HRA is simply one more factor to be absorbed and given its value [. . .] But the problem [. . .] is that what is driving the change is a human rights rather than a property law agenda. Replacing established rules with individual decisions based upon human rights principles may seem attractive but will lead to uncertainty [. . .]

But the seductive effects of the HRA should be resisted. Land law must, it is suggested, keep to the narrow and stony path. Land law is essentially pragmatic and practical and, most importantly, has consequences for third parties: certainty is almost always justice. Already the uncertainty over the circumstances in which the courts will find that a beneficial interest has arisen under a constructive trust or through estoppel is making life difficult for practitioners. The introduction of human rights values is a wild card which is wholly unpredictable in effect. Parties will not enter into agreements over land if they cannot be sure of their effect, and practitioners will not be able to advise them. The Convention is a "living instrument", but it will be unfortunate indeed if this principle were to be applied to agreements relating to land.

QUESTIONS

1. To what extent does the European Convention on Human Rights affect relations between private landowners?
2. How does Art 1 of the First Protocol operate to protect rights of property?
3. What is the role of compensation in determining whether or not an Act that affects property rights is compliant with the ECHR?
4. Article 8 provides that respect is to be afforded to an individual's home. What does 'respect' mean in this context?
5. Is there such a concept as a human property right?
6. Article 14 has been described as 'parasitic'. How may the Article assist in a challenge based upon the Human Rights Act 1998?
7. To what extent is it appropriate for the courts to consider government policy in determining the compliance of property rules with the ECHR?
8. How useful is the human rights 'prism' through which the law governing property rights must now pass?

LEGAL ESTATES AND LEGAL INTERESTS

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. In Chapter 3, we considered how human rights may be relevant to the use of land. In the next three chapters, we will look at other forms of right that are relevant to the use of land.
2. In this chapter, we will look at one of the key building blocks of land law: legal property rights in land. As we noted in Chapter 1, section 3, it is useful to ask three questions when looking at property rights in land: the content question; the acquisition question; and the defences question.
3. In this chapter, we will look at the content of legal property rights in land. Our question is a simple one: what types of right can count as a legal property right in land? In Chapters 7 and 8, we will look in detail at how legal property rights in land are acquired; and in Chapters 12–15, we will look at the defences that may be available against such rights. Before we can examine those questions, however, we need to know what rights count as legal property rights in land.
4. We will see that, when considering the content question, the numerus clausus (or 'closed list') principle is of crucial importance. It ensures that there is a limited list of legal property rights in land. It means that individual parties, such as A and B, cannot simply decide that a right given to B is to count as a legal property right in land: the right can only have that effect if its content matches that of one of the rights on the list. The list of legal property rights in land is a statutory one: it is provided by s 1 of the Law of Property Act 1925.
5. The Law of Property Act 1925 makes a distinction between two classes of legal property rights in land: legal estates and legal interests. We will see that the content of a legal estate can be defined by reference to the concept of ownership: if B has a legal estate in land, he has a right to exclusive possession of that land, and so can be said to be its owner, either forever or for a limited period. In contrast, legal interests in land are those property rights in land with a limited content: a party with a legal interest does not have any ownership of the land.
6. Whilst there are, thus, differences between legal estates and legal interests, each is a form of legal property right in land. As a result, each has the crucial feature of imposing a prima facie duty on the rest of the world. So, even if B acquires a legal property right from A, B's right is capable of binding not only A but also anyone else who may attempt to use or interfere with the land. In this way, a legal property right in land is more powerful than a personal right against A, as such a personal right can be asserted only against A.

7. It is important to bear in mind that even if B cannot show he has a legal estate or legal interest in land, it may still be possible for B to show that he has an equitable interest in land. If B's right is not on the list of legal estates and legal interests, it may nonetheless count as an equitable interest. The content of equitable interests, therefore, differs from the content of legal estates and legal interests. We will examine the content of equitable interests in Chapter 5. One important point to bear in mind is that certain equitable interests may be related to certain legal property rights. For example, an easement can count as a legal property right in land, but it is also possible for B to have an equitable easement. In Chapter 5, we will consider how the effect of such an equitable property right may differ from the effect of a legal property right.

1 THE CONCEPT OF A PROPERTY RIGHT

In Chapter 2, we saw that land is a form of private property. To understand the law relating to private property, it is crucial to understand the concept of a 'property right'. A number of different terms can be used to describe such a right: for example, a property right can also be referred to as a 'right in rem' (from the Latin, this literally means a right against a thing), or, on the same basis, as 'a real right'. As we saw in Chapter 2, land is sometimes referred to as 'real property', but, as the following extract notes, it is important to realize that property rights can exist not only in relation to land, but also in relation to other things, such as books.

Lawson and Rudden, The Law of Property (3rd edn, 2002, p 14)

Real, or property rights. At this juncture, however, a further complication of terminology needs to be explained. 'Real property' means land. But the expression 'real right' can be used with regard to any type of property (movable or immovable). It is used to describe those interests which, broadly speaking, (a) can be alienated; (b) die when their object perishes or is lost without trace; (c) until then can be asserted against an indefinite number of people; (d) if the holder of the thing itself is bankrupt, enable the holder of the real right to take out of the bankruptcy the interest protected by the real right.

This apparently complicated statement can be illustrated quite simply. If you own this book you have a real right. As to point (a), you can give away or sell both the book and ownership of the book. As to point (b) if the book is destroyed in a fire, it is no longer yours and you bear the loss. As to (c) if you lend the book to a friend, of course you can claim it (or its value) back from him or her. But if your friend lends it to someone else you can claim it from them; indeed, in English law, you can claim it from someone to whom your friend sells it—your right is enforceable against an indefinite number of persons. Finally, as to (d), if your friend goes bankrupt while reading the book, you do not have to prove as a creditor in the bankruptcy proceedings. The book does not vest in the trustee in bankruptcy, since your friend cannot pay off his or her creditors with your book.

Other ways of referring to these features of a 'real right' are to speak of 'a property right' or 'proprietary right'.

The term 'property right' is often used to distinguish a particular right from a 'personal right'. Again, the term 'personal right' is often referred to using Latin, as a 'right in personam' (i.e. a right against a person). To understand the concept of a property right, it can therefore be useful to see how it differs from a personal right. And because the distinction flows from Roman law, it is helpful to consider the following extract.

Nicholas, An Introduction to Roman Law (1962, pp 99–100)

Property and obligations—actions and rights in rem and in personam. A man's assets are either property or obligations. The difference between the two is the difference between owning and being owed something. Thus a man's assets may be his house and his furniture, which he owns, his bank balance which, however much one may speak of 'having money in the bank', is a debt owed by the bank, and his right to his unpaid salary, which is likewise a debt. His assets will often, of course, be more complicated than this, but they will still fall into one of the two categories. For example, if he is a shopkeeper he will own, we may suppose, his shop and his stock-in-trade; he may have ordered, but not received, further supplies from a wholesaler, and these will, from the Roman point of view, be still owned by the wholesalers but will be owed to him (and if he has not yet paid for them he will correspondingly owe the price); he will have supplied goods on credit to his customers, and here again there is obviously a debt. He may have acquired the goodwill of the business of a former competitor, and this constitutes once more a debt—the debtor's duty being not, as in the previous cases, to pay a sum of money or to supply goods, but to refrain from soliciting his former customers.

This difference between owning and being owed is expressed by the Roman lawyer in the distinction between actions in rem and actions in personam. Any claim is either in rem or in personam, and there is an unbridgeable division between them. An action in rem asserts a relationship between a person and a thing, an action in personam a relationship between persons [. . .] The Romans think in terms of actions not of rights, but in substance one action asserts a right over a thing, the other a right against a person, and hence comes the modern dichotomy between rights in rem and rights in personam. Obviously there cannot be a dispute between a person and a thing, and therefore even in an action in rem there must be a defendant, but he is there not because he is alleged to be under a duty to the plaintiff but because by some act he is denying the alleged right of the plaintiff.

Of course, it may be thought that, in the modern world, this distinction between 'owning' (property rights) and 'owing' (personal rights) is too simplistic. Certainly, there is no obvious reason why a distinction derived from Roman law should help us to classify concepts such as intellectual property rights. Indeed, as we will see in Chapter 5, it is not obvious that the Roman distinction can be applied to equitable property rights. But modern-day land law still retains the key distinction between a personal right (which can be asserted only against a specific person) and a legal property right (a right relating to land that is capable of binding the whole world). That distinction was particularly important in the following case.

(1863) 2 H & C 122, Exchequer Chamber

Facts: The Company of Proprietors of the Basingstoke Canal Navigation owned the Basingstoke Canal. It made a contractual promise to Mr Hill that he would have the exclusive right to put pleasure boats on the canal and to hire out those boats to paying customers. Mr Tupper was the landlord of an inn at Aldershot, which adjoined the canal. He also started to hire out pleasure boats on the canal. Mr Hill objected, claiming that Mr Tupper was interfering with Mr Hill's exclusive right and was thus committing a tort against Mr Hill. The Exchequer Chamber rejected Mr Hill's claim.

After the very full argument which has taken place, I do not think it necessary to assign any other reason for our decision, than that the case of Ackroyd v Smith[1] expressly decided that it is not competent to create rights unconnected with the use and enjoyment of land, and annex them to it so as to constitute a property in the grantee.[2] This grant merely operates as a licence or covenant on the part of the grantors, and is binding on them as between themselves and [Mr Hill], but gives [Mr Hill] no right of action in his own name for any infringement of the supposed exclusive right. It is argued that, as the owner of an estate may grant a right to cut turves, or to fish or hunt,[3] there is no reason why he may not grant such a right as is now claimed by [Mr Hill]. The answer is, that the law will not allow it. So the law will not permit the owner of an estate to grant it alternately to his heirs male and heirs female. A new species of incorporeal hereditament[4] cannot be created at the will and pleasure of the owner of property, but he must be content to accept the estate and the right to dispose of it subject to the law as settled by decisions or controlled by acts of parliament. A grantor may bind himself by covenant to allow any right he pleases over his property, but he cannot annex it to a new incident, so as to enable the grantee to sue in his own name for an infringement of such a limited right as that now claimed.

I am of the same opinion. This grant is perfectly valid as between [Mr Hill] and the canal Company, but in order to support this action, [Mr Hill] must establish that such an estate or interest vested in him that the act of [Mr Tupper] amounted to an eviction. None of the cases cited are at all analogous to this, and some authority must be produced before we can hold

2 [On the fact of Hill v Tupper, the canal company is the grantor (because it gave Mr Hill a right) and Mr Hill is the grantee (because he was given a right by the canal company).]

3 [Such rights are example of profits, a recognized legal property right in land: see section 6 below. A right to cut turves is a right to remove turf or peat from another's land to use as fuel: it is more commonly called a 'right of turbary'.]

4 [As used in this particular context, that term is synonymous with 'a legal property right'. Technically, a 'hereditament' is a right that can count as 'real property' and so, for example, will be included in the scope of a term in a will 'leaving all my real property to X'. Land (including fixtures) can be seen as a 'corporeal hereditament', because it has a physical form; an easement (a right capable of counting as a legal property right in land, e.g. a right of way over another's land) is an 'incorporeal hereditament', because it has no physical form.]

that such a right can be created. To admit the right would lead to the creation of an infinite variety of interests in land, and an indefinite increase of possible estates. The only consequence is that, as between [Mr Hill] and the canal Company, he has a perfect right to enjoy the advantage of the covenant or contract; and, if he has been disturbed in the enjoyment of it, he must obtain the permission of the canal Company to sue in their name.

Hill v Tupper is an important case for a number of reasons. One reason, which we will examine in section 6 below, concerns the approach of the Exchequer Chamber in deciding whether Mr Hill's right counted as a legal property right in land. For our present purposes, the case is significant because it is a very good example of a key difference between a legal property right in land and a personal right. The Exchequer Chamber found that the canal company's contractual promise to Mr Hill gave him only a personal right against the company. So, if a third party, such as Mr Tupper, also puts out boats on the canal, Mr Hill's only option is to assert his right against the company. He can ask for an injunction, forcing the company, as owner of the canal, to take action against Mr Tupper; he can also ask for an order that the company pay him damages, to compensate him for any loss that he has suffered as a result of Mr Tupper's action. Mr Hill's only recourse, however, is against the canal company: he has no claim against Mr Tupper. If his contract with the company had instead given Mr Hill a legal property right, things would be very different. Mr Hill's exclusive right to put boats on the canal would then be capable of binding not only the party who granted that right (in this case, the canal company), but also any other party who interferes with that right (such as Mr Tupper).

In the following extract, Birks explains both this fundamental difference between a personal right and a property right, and also its importance to land law.[5]

Birks, 'Five Keys to Land Law' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives
(eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, pp 472–3)

Real rights and personal rights

We move now to the kind of 'reality' or 'thing-relatedness' which matters in the modern law. The key proposition is that land law is, centrally, the law of real rights in land [. . .] 'Real' and 'personal' here anglicize the Latin labels in rem and in personam. Many people prefer to use the Latin labels. The Latin tells us that a right in rem is a right in or against a thing, while a right in personam is a right in or against a person.

One can change to different language. A right in personam can be called an obligation. A right in personam and an obligation are one and the same thing, but looked at from different ends. I have an overdraft. I owe my bank £1,000. The bank has a right in personam, the person here being me. I have an obligation to pay. The relationship can be named from either end, and in practice we usually name it from the liability end. Here we very frequently speak, not of the law of personal rights or of rights in personam, but of obligations. As for rights in [5] The usefulness of the distinction between personal rights and property rights has been challenged (see, e.g. Worthington, 'The Disappearing Divide between Property and Obligation: The Impact of Aligning Legal Analysis and Commercial Expectation' in Equity in Commercial Law (eds Degeling and Edelman, 2005)). Such challenges have, however, tended to focus on the application of the distinction to commercial dealings with intangible wealth, rather than on its usefulness in land law.

rem, if we drop both the Latin and the latinate English, they usually become 'property rights' or 'proprietary rights'.

We sometimes use 'property' loosely to mean 'wealth'. In that loose sense 'property' wobbles. Sometimes 'my property' evokes and is intended to evoke more specific things, such as cars and clothes and cottages. Sometimes, and rather more technically, 'my property' denoted mere rights vested in me, such as a fee simple, a lease, ownership, or the obligations of my debtors. Whichever the focus, the loose notion of property as wealth is too broad to be useful in analysis. To think clearly the law has to draw a bright line between two classes of right, both of which can fall within the loose notion of wealth.

The bright line distinguishes between property and obligations. When that line is drawn, property clearly has a narrower and much more technical sense. Within wealth, taken as including all assets, the law of obligations is the law of rights in personam and the law of property is the law of rights in rem. Hence a 'property right' or 'proprietary right' is a real right, is a right in rem. The law of property is the law of all known real rights, and land law is the law of real rights in land.

What is the difference? The practical difference bears on this question. Against whom can the right be demanded? 'Demandability' is intelligible but not really English. But another word for 'to demand' is 'to exact', which gives us 'exigible' and 'exigibility'. A right in rem is a right the exigibility of which is defined by the location of a thing. The exigibility of a right in personam is defined by the location of the person. Where I have a right in personam the notional chain in my hand is tied round that person's neck. Where I have a right in rem, the notional chain in my hand is tied around a thing. Between me and the car which I own there is such a chain.

So, if B has a personal right against A, it is only possible for him to assert that right against A. If B has a property right in a piece of land, then B's right is capable of binding the rest of the world. The word 'capable' is important: as we will see in Chapter 12, it is possible for a particular third party to have a defence to B's property right. But this does not undermine the importance of the distinction between personal rights and property rights. For example, the distinction was crucial in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth,[6] a case we examined in Chapter 1. The House of Lords decided that Mrs Ainsworth's 'deserted wife's equity' was only a personal right against her husband and, as a result, she could not assert it against the bank, who wished to remove her from the land.[7]

2 THE CONCEPT OF A LEGAL ESTATE IN LAND

The extracts in section 1 all use ownership as the core example of a property right; indeed, Nicholas portrays the distinction between a property right and a personal right as the difference between owning and being owed. In Chapter 2, we saw how it is possible to identify a particular person (B) as an owner of land. Technically speaking, however, it is true to say that, in English law, no one owns land. Even if you buy a house and think of yourself as owning that land, you technically have an estate in that land: either a freehold or a lease. This raises an important question: is the concept of ownership irrelevant to English land law?

7 See the extract from the speech of Lord Wilberforce, set out in Chapter 1, section 5.4.

In the following extract, Harris: (i) outlines the historical reasons why English law has a doctrine of estates in land; (ii) notes the argument that, as a result, ownership is irrelevant to English land law; but (iii) argues that ownership is nonetheless crucial to understanding English land law, because it enables us to understand the very concept of an estate in land.

Harris, Property and Justice (1996, pp 68–9)

The significance of ownership interests as an every-day organizing idea is commonly obscured for lawyers in common law systems, and for theorists who seek to build upon the insights of the common law, by the doctrine of estates in land. Land-transfer transactions in common law systems convey or create estates, freehold or leasehold, never dominium or ownership. This is a consequence of the feudal origins of English real property law.

In Early English feudal law, that interest which was to develop into the fee simple estate was a grant of seisin by a superior lord to be held by the grantee and his heirs subject to one or other variant of free tenure. It seems that the consent of both the lord and the heir were necessary before the grantee could alienate his land. Free alienability inter vivos of this estate evolved at common law, and free testamentary disposition of it was conferred by statute in the sixteenth century. There were as well lesser estates of freehold: estates for life; estates pur autre vie;[8] and the estate tail which emerged as the result of judicial interpretation of the Statute de donis conditionalibus of 1285.[9] There were also a variety of copyhold estates, the outcome of the progressive emancipation of land held on non-free tenure.

The leasehold estate was unknown to feudal law, but evolved from the end of the Middle Ages as common law actions were adapted to confer trespassory protection on a leaseholder, eventually, against all-comers to the land. Like the fee simple, the leasehold estate became freely transmissible inter vivos or on death. A covenant in a lease may prohibit assignment of the estate. Its effect is not, technically, to make the estate inalienable but to give rise to a ground for forfeiture should the estate be assigned in breach of covenant.

The terminology and conceptual structures elaborated in works on English real property law have reflected the technical concerns of conveyancers. Since what is conveyed is always an estate in the land, it has been widely assumed that 'ownership' of land, as such, is not a conception internal to English land law. A. D. Hargreaves gave robust expression to this view:

> 'English land law has made no contribution to the legal theory of ownership more striking, more brilliant and of more permanent value than the separation of the land from the estate in the land [. . .]. By distinguishing the land from the estate, English land law has shown conclusively that even within a society as individualistic and as legalistic as England in the nineteenth century, ownership is not a necessary legal concept. The problem of ownership remains, but it is not a legal problem; it is the concern of the politician, the economist, the sociologist, the moralist, the psychologist—of any and every specialist who can contribute his grain to the common heap. Ultimately the philosopher will try to unify this shifting mass into a coherent whole.'[10]

The story of the evolution of the doctrine of estates is one of complex elaboration based on the writ system, ancient statutes, and the conveyancing cunning of legal practitioners.

8 [For the life of another: e.g. A could give B a right to land for the duration of X's life.]

9 [De donis conditionalibus means 'relating to conditional gifts'. So, if A leaves land in his will to B1 for B1's life, then to B2 provided that B2 is married, B2's right to the land is conditional on both his marriage and the death of B1.]

10 Hargreaves, 'Modern Real Property' (1956) 19 MLR 14, 17.

If asked what was the content of the interests which came thus to be freely disposable by their holders, the traditional real property lawyer will answer that it consisted of a right to seisin or possession of the land. But if a man was the beneficiary of seisin or possession, what use-privileges over the land did that entail, and what powers to control uses by others? No general answer to that question is usually to be found in land law textbooks, although the case law on nuisance summarized in works on tort is replete with partial answers to it.

The answer to the general question about the normative content of a right to seisin or a right to possession is glaringly obvious. Perhaps it is so manifest as to be trite, and so beneath the notice of a technical lawyer who seeks to expound only that which is obscure and arcane. The truth is that ownership interests in land, of varying magnitudes, are and always have been incidents of legal estates in land. The jurist of the early medieval period took it for granted that the tenant who holds land in demesne is as much dominus rei as is the owner of a chattel.[11] As Pollock and Maitland point out, Bracton and contemporaries (rightly in their view) 'ascribed to the tenant in demesne ownership and nothing less than ownership'.[12] [...]

This truth, however trite, makes claims such as those contained in the above citation from Hargreaves patently absurd. Ownership of land is not a conveyancer's problem, but it is a conception—or rather a battery of conceptions—internal to the law. An indefinitely large set of use-privileges and control-powers over the land follow from the fact that, as an incident to the estate, a person has an ownership interest over the land itself.

Harris' argument may seem complicated, but it can be summed up quite shortly. Although it is technically true to say that B can never own land itself, it is also true to say that, if B has an estate in land, he has ownership rights over that land. So, if we want to know what, in practice, the holder of a freehold can do with his land, we need to consider, as we did in Chapter 2, what 'ownership' means. If this is right, we may well wonder why English law developed the doctrine of estates: it seems strange to have a system in which, whilst B cannot own the land itself, he can hold an estate that gives him ownership rights.

The following extract tackles this point.

(eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, pp 462–3)

Although bits do occasionally wash away or slip into the sea, land is in general permanent. For most human purposes we have to regard it as lasting for ever. There is a powerful urge to deal in slices of time. It is not confined to land. The institution of the trust makes it relatively easy to turn all kinds of wealth into an enduring fund, and that facility in turn excites and to a degree gratifies the urge to deal in slices of time. However, it is the natural permanence of land which makes slices of time a dominant feature of land law.

Two motivations

Why do people want to deal in slices of time? It is an urge which has been fed from at least two sources. One is essentially commercial, the other not.

11 [Demesne is pronounced 'demean'. A tenant holding in demesne acquired rights in relation to the land under a grant from a feudal lord.]

12 Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law (1911), pp ii, 2–6.

The commercial motivation

Commercial motivation means, in plain words, the desire to get money out of land. There are all sorts of ways of getting money out of land. For instance, one can farm the land and sell the produce. The most extreme method of all is to sell one's whole interest in the land. This means selling the whole slice of time over which one has control. The largest interest in land—the greatest slice of time—is "for ever". In everyday conversation I tend to say 'my house' or 'the house I own'. In all probability, what I actually have is my house 'for ever', a slice of time measured by the length of time the land will last. There is no harm in calling that ownership. That is in effect what it is. But in the technical language of the law that huge slice of time measured by the life of the land itself is called a fee simple. The fee simple in the land on which my house stands is worth about £200,000. I could mortgage it or sell it. But there is another possibility. I could keep 'for ever' and deal instead in a shorter slice of time.

The commercial motivation for dealing in lesser slices of time is to realize in money some of the value of the land without giving up one's whole interest. The lease is the proprietary interest which most obviously facilitates this. I might let my land for a fixed number of years, say for ten years. If I go for that option, I have further choices. I could take a single capital sum, or I might prefer a flow of income in the form of an annual rent, or a mixture of both, say £20,000 now and £5,000 per annum by way of rent. Whichever I choose, the fee simple remains mine, though occluded by the lease. When the ten years have passed, the shadow occluding my interest will vanish, and my fee simple will once again be unencumbered. The reversion has value even during the ten years during which I am out of possession. If I choose to, I can sell it even while the ten years are running.

The family motivation

The primary non-commercial motivation for dealing in slices of time is concern for one's family. In obsolescent aristocratic terms this might be restated as a dynastic motivation. The idea of benefiting the different generations of one's family is perfectly natural. The desire to keep land permanently in the family or part of the family has been a routine temptation.

As Birks notes, it is useful to see an estate in land as a 'slice of time'. We noted in Chapter 1, section 4, that permanence is one of the distinctive features of land. This means that, where land is concerned, it is very useful for an owner of land to be able to divide up his ownership over time. The doctrine of estates allows this to happen. As Birks notes, an owner of a thing other than land (e.g. a painting) can divide up the benefit of that thing by setting up a trust: for example, if A owns a painting, he can transfer it to T to hold on trust for B1 for ten years, then for B2. B2 can thus acquire an equitable property right. It is impossible, however, for A to give B1 a legal property right amounting to ownership of the painting for ten years. A special feature of land, then, is that, by creating a lease, an owner of land can give B ownership rights over that land for a limited period.

3 LEGAL ESTATES IN LAND: THE CONTENT QUESTION

When examining if B has a legal estate in land, the first question to ask is the content question: does the right claimed by B count as a legal estate in land? As a result of s 1 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925), that question is relatively easy: there are now only two permissible legal estates in land.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 1

(1) The only estates in land which are capable of subsisting or of being conveyed or created at law are—

(a) An estate in fee simple absolute in possession;

(b) A term of years absolute.

'An estate in fee simple absolute in possession' is more commonly referred to as a 'fee simple'[13] or, as we will call it in this book, a freehold. And 'a term of years absolute' is more commonly referred to as a 'leasehold' or, as we will call it in this book, a lease. So, for example, if you are buying a house, you are, in fact, buying either a freehold or a lease. In this section, we will examine the content of a freehold and of a lease, before asking the important question of why the LPA 1925 imposed this limit on the types of permissible legal estate in land.

3.1 THE CONTENT OF A LEGAL FREEHOLD

A freehold can be described as 'ownership of land for an unlimited period' as, if B has a freehold, he has a right to exclusive possession forever of a piece of land. In practice, there is usually very little doubt as to whether B's right counts as a freehold: in particular, if A has a freehold of land and simply transfers that right to B, it is clear that B now has a freehold. There are, however, some contexts in which we do have to test to see if B really does have a freehold. The following extract provides an example.

Facts: Mr Bull and his brother had a freehold of a farmhouse and adjacent land. Mr Bull occupied the land with his wife until 1965, when he left the home. Under the Matrimonial Homes Act 1967, Mrs Bull had a statutory right to remain in occupation of the home.[14] As a result, Mr Bull and his brother could not remove her from the land. In 1968, Mr Bull and his brother sold their freehold to Mr Miles for £10,000. Mr Miles wished to remove Mrs Bull from the land. Mrs Bull could not assert her statutory right to remain in occupation against Mr Miles, because she had not properly registered that right. Mr Miles therefore applied for summary judgment in his favour. Mrs Bull claimed, however, that she deserved to have the chance to argue her case at a full trial because: (i) the supposed transfer of the freehold to Mr Miles was, in fact, a sham; so (ii) the freehold was still held by Mr Bull and his brother; and therefore (iii) Mr Miles had no right to remove her from the land. In considering that argument, Megarry J had to consider the decision of Jones J in Ferris v Weaven,[15] in which it had been held that a purported transfer of a freehold was, in fact, a sham.

13 As in the extract by Birks given in section 2 above.
14 As discussed in Chapter 1, section 5.6, this statutory right of occupation was introduced in response to the House of Lords' decision in NPB v Ainsworth [1965] AC 1175.

Megarry J

Accordingly, it seems to me that there is a strong preponderance of high authority for the view that the decision in Ferris v. Weaven can be supported on the basis that the transaction there was a sham, and that although a genuine purchaser will take free from the rights of a deserted wife, a sham purchaser will not. It is therefore necessary to examine the facts of Ferris v. Weaven with some care [. . .]

In that case the husband deserted his wife in 1941, leaving her in occupation of his house; he continued to pay the building society instalments and the rates on it. He wrote to her telling her that he would "carry on paying on the house providing you do not annoy me." This state of affairs continued for some 10 years. Then:

> 'In June, 1951, wishing to obtain possession of the house so that he could dispose of it, the husband sold it for £30 to his brother-in-law, Herbert James Ferris, the plaintiff. The £30 was not, in fact, paid to the husband, the plaintiff entering into the transaction only to oblige the husband and enable him to obtain possession of the house from the wife. He did not exercise any act of ownership in respect of it, and the husband continued to pay the rates and the mortgage instalments, the amount of which due at the time of the sale was £1,600.'[16]

[. . .] In his judgment, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for possession against the wife, Jones J. said of the plaintiff:

> 'I find that he bought the house by agreement with the husband, not because he wanted to buy it, but simply to enable the husband to defeat a right which the husband believed the wife possessed as a result of the arrangement which the husband had made with her in 1941.'[17]

[. . .] The essential features of the so-called sale in that case were thus that the price was £30; that the purchaser neither paid it nor exercised any act of ownership over the house, even though it was conveyed to him; that the husband continued paying the rates and mortgage instalments as he had done before entering into the transaction; and that the object of both the husband and the purchaser was to obtain possession of the house for the husband so that he could dispose of it. The purchaser (who was the husband's brother-in-law) entered into the transaction with the object of obliging the husband. I can readily see how such a transaction could properly be described as a 'sham' for; although in outward show the ownership was vested in the purchaser, in substance and reality it was still vested in the husband. The documents lied; they made false representations, concealing what was and asserting what was not. The purchaser could not evict the wife, for the ownership of the property upon which he based his claim to possession was a mere pretence.

On the other hand, a transaction is no sham merely because it is carried out with a particular purpose or object. If what is done is genuinely done, it does not remain undone merely because there was an ulterior purpose in doing it. If in Ferris v. Weaven the purchaser had sought to exercise acts of ownership, and the husband had ceased to do them, and there had been no common objective of enabling the husband (as distinct from the purchaser) to dispose of the property, it would, in my judgment, be very difficult to contend that the low price and the failure to pay it made the transaction a sham. After all, some genuine transactions within the family are carried out at low prices; and some genuine purchasers fail to discharge their obligation to pay the full purchase price, if the vendor is incautious enough to make this possible. Mere circumstances of suspicion do not by themselves establish a transaction as a > sham; it must be shown that the outward and visible form does not coincide with the inward and substantial truth.

In the end, Megarry J decided that summary judgment in Mr Miles' favour should not be given: Mrs Bull's argument that there had, in fact, been no transfer of the freehold deserved to be evaluated at a full trial.

For our purposes, the important point about Megarry J's analysis is his use of the concept of ownership. On his Lordship's analysis, the simple fact that the supposed transfer in Ferris v Weaven was carried out with the motive of removing Mrs Weaven did not make that transfer a sham. Instead, it was a sham because the documents lied. They said that Mr Ferris had a freehold, but 'although in outward show the ownership was vested in the purchaser, in substance and reality it was still vested in the husband'. This confirms the analysis given by Harris (see the extract in section 2 above): the concept of ownership is vital to understanding the content of a freehold.[18]

3.2 THE CONTENT OF A LEGAL LEASE

We will examine the content of a lease in detail in Chapter 22. Three general points are, however, worth noting here. Firstly, as Harris has argued, the content of a lease, like the content of a freehold, can be understood by using the concept of ownership. In fact, in a seminal case on the content of a lease, Street v Mountford,[19] Lord Templeman referred to a tenant (a party holding a lease) as someone 'able to exercise the rights of an owner of land which is in the real sense his land, albeit temporarily and subject to certain restrictions'.

Secondly, as Lord Templeman's statement makes clear, the difference between a freehold and a lease is that the latter consists of ownership for a limited period. This is why s 1 of the LPA 1925 describes the lease as a 'term of years absolute'. 'Term', here, comes from the same root as 'terminal' or 'terminus', and means that a lease must come to an end—that is, that it must be for a limited period (see Chapter 22, section 2.7).

Thirdly, as we will see in Chapter 5, it is possible for B to have an equitable lease. In such a case, B does not have a legal property right in land, nor, according to the terminology of the LPA 1925, does he have an estate in land; instead, B has an equitable interest in land. In Chapter 5, we will consider how the effect of an equitable interest may differ from that of a legal estate or interest; in Chapter 22, section 4.2, we will specifically see why it may be better for B to show that he has a legal lease rather than an equitable lease.

3.3 WHY ONLY TWO LEGAL ESTATES IN LAND?

It may seem puzzling that the LPA 1925 imposes a limit on the types of legal estate. After all, in the final extract given in section 2 above, Birks set out some of the advantages, to an owner of land, of being able to divide his ownership into slices of time and then distribute those slices to others. An owner may well want to give another a legal estate that is neither a freehold nor a lease: for example, he may want to give his eldest child ownership of the land for her life, then give ownership for the future, taking effect on the eldest child's death, to his eldest grandchild, and so on. So why has English law limited an owner's ability to create those different sorts of legal estate in land?

[18] Harris, therefore, refers to Miles v Bull to support his analysis: see Property and Justice, p 71.
[19] [1985] AC 809, 816. See further Chapter 22, section 1.1.

(eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, p 464)

> Carried to extremes, the dynastic temptation might have led to an infinite series of life estates: to A, my eldest son, for life, then to A's eldest son for life, then to the eldest son of A's eldest son, and so on. The effect would have been to give each successive son only the slice of time measured by the thread of his life. He could deal in that slice, but no buyer would ever get, or pay for, more than an estate pur autre vie.[20] [Some of the bad effects of such an arrangement are instantly appreciable. Nobody would ever have a marketable slice of time. No money could be raised to invest in the land. It is in nobody's interest to produce an impoverished class of landowners. If such arrangements prevailed, the value of land would be locked up and sterilized.
> [...] The law now does everything it can to ensure that land is freely alienable and that any future interests granted to descendants are detached from the land and transferred to the fund represented by the money for which it is sold. Since the great reforms of 1925, anyone wanting to deal in slices of time other than leases, and less than for ever, has had to do it in equity, behind the curtain of a trust. In other words, in front of the curtain there are now only two slices of time known to the law, 'for ever' and the lease for whatever time is agreed. All other slices of time once recognized directly by the common law have been abolished.

As Birks notes, it is no longer possible for A to give B1 a legal property right consisting of ownership of land for his life, or to give B2 a legal property right consisting of ownership from the time of B1's death. The closest that A can come to dividing up his ownership in that way is to set up a trust, under which B1 and B2 each acquire an equitable property right. We will consider those types of trust in Chapter 20, but two basic points can be noted now. Firstly, A's ability to set up such a trust is not limited to land and so does not depend on the doctrine of estates: for example, A can set up an identical trust in relation to his ownership of a painting. Secondly, under such a trust, it is very important that B1 and B2 each have an equitable, and not a legal, property right. In particular, as we will see in Chapters 12 and 19, it means that there may well be situations in which B1 and B2 cannot assert that right against a later purchaser of the land. This may be bad news for B1 and B2, but, by protecting the purchaser, it promotes the goal of allowing land to be 'freely alienable'—that is, to be transferred free from pre-existing rights of parties such as B1 and B2.

4 LEGAL ESTATES IN LAND: THE ACQUISITION QUESTION

To show that he has a legal estate in land, B needs to show not only that his claimed right counts as a freehold or lease, but also that he has, in fact, acquired that right. The obvious way for B to acquire a freehold or lease is through a dependent acquisition—that is, by showing that A, an owner of the land, has given B that legal estate. So, if B claims that A has transferred his freehold to B, or that A has granted him a lease, B relies on a dependent acquisition. We will examine the rules applying to a dependent acquisition of a legal estate in Chapter 7.

[20] That is, an estate terminating on the death of another.

It is also possible for B to acquire a legal freehold by means of an independent acquisition.[21] In such a case, B does not claim that A has given him a legal estate; instead, B acquires that right through his own, unilateral conduct. For example, if B simply goes onto A's land and takes physical control of it, B acquires a legal freehold of that land, even if he acts without A's permission.[22] We will examine this point in detail in Chapter 8.

5 THE CONCEPT OF A LEGAL INTEREST IN LAND

A legal interest in land is a legal property right in land that does not give its holder a right to exclusive possession, and so does not confer ownership of that land. In the following extract, Lawson and Rudden discuss one example of a legal interest in land: a legal easement.

Lawson and Rudden, The Law of Property (3rd edn, 2002, pp 14–15)

> We have used the simple example of ownership, but as we shall see later there is a limited number of other interests which can be described as 'real' or 'proprietary'. This can be illustrated by considering your right to leave your car in next door's yard. Probably at the moment you have no such right. If your neighbour lets you, you can park but you have no right to stay. If you pay for parking, say by the month, you have a contractual right to leave your car, enforceable by an action for damages and possibly an injunction, but enforceable against your neighbour only.[23] If, however, you have an easement—a recognized real right—your claim to park will prevail against whoever owns next door. But before the common law will recognize it as a property interest, the right to park must comply with certain requirements both of substance and form; you must own the freehold or leasehold of your house; the parking must not be a claim to possession of your neighbour's entire yard; it must be intended to add to the value of the house and not just to confer a personal benefit on you; and it must be created by deed and entered on the Land Register, or else have been acquired by over twenty years open user.

The key positive feature of a legal interest in land, such as an easement, is thus that it counts as a legal property right in land. As a result, it is capable of binding not only A (the party giving B the right), but also the rest of the world (including, for example, any later owners of A's land). For example, in Hill v Tupper,[24] which we examined in section 1 above, Mr Hill was unable to show that the right he acquired from the canal company counted as an easement, or as any other form of legal interest in land. As a result, Mr Hill could not assert that right against Mr Tupper. In contrast, if Mr Hill had been able to show that he had a legal interest in land, that right would have been prima facie binding not only on the canal company, but also on the rest of the world—including, of course, Mr Tupper.

The key negative feature of a legal interest in land, such as an easement, is that it does not give its holder ownership, as it does not consist of a right to exclusive possession of land. As we will see in Chapter 25, section 2.4.4, that point can be important when considering B's

21 As to whether a legal lease can be acquired independently, see Chapter 22, section 3.1.

22 It has been suggested that, in such a case, B acquires only an equitable freehold. That view is, however, difficult to support: see Chapter 10, section 3.

23 [Such a right is an example of a contractual licence, which is a type of right that we will examine in Chapter 21, section 3.]

claim to an easement. B's right cannot count as an easement if it amounts to a claim of ownership of a particular piece of land.[25] If B wants to claim such a right, he must show that he has an estate in land—that is, a freehold or a lease.

It is worth noting that the concept of a property right that does not involve ownership may well be unique to land law. Certainly, it is impossible, for example, to have an easement over property other than land. It seems that the special features of land that we examined in Chapter 1, section 4 (in particular, its capacity for multiple, simultaneous use) may justify the recognition of special forms of property right that can exist only in relation to land.

6 LEGAL INTERESTS IN LAND: THE CONTENT QUESTION

In Hill v Tupper,[26] which we examined in section 1 above, Mr Hill tried to argue that his exclusive right to put boats on the canal should be regarded by the court as a new form of legal interest in land. The Exchequer Chamber made very clear, however, that individuals, such as Mr Hill and the canal company, cannot simply choose to create new forms of legal interest in land. That important point is confirmed by the following extract.

Keppell v Bailey
(1834) 2 My & K 517

Facts: Edward and John Kendall were the proprietors of an ironworks in Monmouthshire. They set up a joint stock company, along with a number of other parties, to build the Trevill railroad. The Kendalls made a binding promise to the other stockholders that the limestone used in their ironworks would come only from the Trevill quarry (and so would be carried on the Trevill railroad, thus earning money for the joint stock company). Following the deaths of the Kendalls, the ironworks was passed on, and was eventually bought by Joseph and Crayshaw Bailey. The Baileys planned to use limestone from a different quarry and to build a new railroad to carry that limestone to the ironworks. Stockholders in the joint stock company (including Mr Keppell) applied for an injunction preventing the Baileys from using any limestone not taken from the Trevill quarry. They argued: (i) that the promise made by the Kendalls bound not only themselves, but also any later owners of the ironworks, such as the Baileys; and, alternatively, that (ii) even if the promise made by the Kendalls did not create a property right, it should bind the Baileys, because they acquired the ironworks knowing of that earlier promise. The High Court of Chancery rejected both of those arguments.

We will examine that second argument in Chapter 6, section 2.6; our focus here is on the first argument.

Lord Brougham LC

There are certain known incidents to property and its enjoyment; among others, certain burdens wherewith it may be affected, or rights which may be created and may be enjoyed > over it by parties other than the owner; all which incidents are recognised by the law [. . .] All these kinds of property, however, all these holdings, are well known to the law and familiarly dealt with by its principles. But it must not therefore be supposed that incidents of a novel kind can be devised and attached to property at the fancy or caprice of any owner. It is clearly inconvenient both to the science of the law and to the public weal that such a latitude should be given. There can be no harm in allowing the fullest latitude to men in binding themselves and their representatives, that is, their assets real and personal, to answer in damages for breach of their obligations. This tends to no mischief, and is a reasonable liberty to bestow; but great detriment would arise and much confusion of rights if parties were allowed to invent new modes of holding and enjoying real property, and to impress upon their lands and tenements a peculiar character, which should follow them into all hands, however remote. Every close, every messuage,[27] might thus be held in a several fashion; and it would hardly be possible to know what rights the acquisition of any parcel conferred, or what obligations it imposed. The right of way or of common is of a public as well as of a simple nature, and no one who sees the premises can be ignorant of what the vicinage[28] knows. But if one man may bind his messuage and land to take lime from a particular kiln, another may bind his to take coals from a certain pit, while a third may load his property with further obligations to employ one blacksmith's forge, or the members of one corporate body, in various operations upon the premises, besides many other restraints as infinite in variety as the imagination can make them; for there can be no reason whatever to support the covenant in question, which would not extend to every covenant that can be devised.

[25] See per Lord Scott in Moncrieff v Jamieson [2007] 1 WLR 2620, HL, [55].

Lord Brougham LC thus set out some of the dangers that would come from allowing individuals to create new legal interests in land. The central point is that a third party, such as someone later acquiring a right in that land, would then find it very difficult to know what burdens he may have to bear. We can also make the separate point that if new types of burden are imposed on land, the value of that land may be severely reduced. These fears have resulted in the adoption of the numerus clausus ('closed list') principle: there is a set list of legal property rights in relation to land and if B's right is not on that list, it simply cannot count as a legal property right in land.

Doubts have been expressed about the true usefulness of the principle. For example, whilst noting that the principle seems to exist in all non-feudal legal systems, Rudden[29] also argues that it may not be efficient: if A and B are unable to create a desired property right, they may well resort to complicated legal mechanisms in an effort to achieve, as far as possible, the same effect. As Rudden puts it:

> all that the law of many countries does is to prevent an owner from simply and cheaply creating fancy property interests; he can almost always achieve his aims at some cost by the use of devices [. . .] which, when one stands back and contemplates them calmly, appear largely mumbo-jumbo.

As we will see in Chapter 26, section 2.4, when examining the law relating to positive covenants, there is some truth in that observation.

27 [That is, every piece of land; 'messuage' means a piece of land on which a house stands.]

28 ['Vicinage' here means the neighbourhood or, more specifically, other neighbours who are entitled to exercise rights of common over a piece of land.]

29 'Economic Theory v Property Law' in Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (3rd series, eds Eekelaar and Bell, 1987).

It can also be argued that the numerus clausus principle allows judges to evade their responsibility to explain precisely why particular rights count as legal interests in land, whilst others do not. Gray and Gray have made this criticism forcefully.[30]

Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009, pp 96–7)

Nowhere, perhaps, is the imperfect logic of English land law more clearly apparent than in its attempt to demarcate proprietary rights from merely personal rights in land. The outcome is a philosophical shambles, but English law has never been overly concerned with philosophical propriety. Although the way in which the law identifies the categories of proprietary right is deeply unsatisfactory, the difficulties (albeit irksome) should not be over-estimated. Somehow English law blunders its way towards roughly the correct conclusions and there is usually little doubt, except perhaps at the perimeters of the field, as to whether a particular entitlement is or is not proprietary in the relevant conveyancing sense [. . .]

The difficulty with this orthodox understanding of proprietary quality is, of course, that it is riddled with circularity: the definition of proprietary character becomes entirely self-fulfilling. If naively we ask which entitlements are 'proprietary', we are told that they are those rights which are assignable to and enforceable against third parties. When we then ask which rights these may be, we are told that they comprise, of course, the entitlements which are traditionally identified as 'proprietary'. It is radical and obscurantist nonsense to formulate a test of proprietary quality in this way.

Nonetheless, as the following extract shows, the numerus clausus principle, as far as legal interests in land is concerned, has been given statutory confirmation.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 1(2) and (3)

(2) The only interests or charges in or over land which are capable of subsisting or of being conveyed or created at law are—

(a) An easement, right or privilege in or over land for an interest equivalent to an estate in fee simple absolute in possession or a term of years absolute;

(b) A rentcharge in possession issuing out of or charged on land being either perpetual or for a term of years absolute;

(c) A charge by way of legal mortgage;

(d) Any other similar charge on land which is not created by an instrument;

(e) Rights of entry exercisable over or in respect of a legal term of years absolute, or annexed, for any purpose, to a legal rentcharge.

(3) All other estates, interests, and charges in or over land take effect as equitable interests.

So, just as s 1(1) of the LPA 1925 limits the number of possible legal estates in land, s 1(2) of the same Act limits the numbers of possible legal interests in land. Essentially, there are five types of permissible legal interest: an easement; a profit; a charge; a rentcharge; and a right of entry. If B's right does not match the content of one of those five rights, it cannot count as a legal interest in land.

In Chapter 25, we will examine the content of the easement in detail; we will do the same for the charge in Chapter 28. Profits, rentcharges, and rights of entry are of less practical importance, and will not be examined in detail. A profit is a right to take something from A's land (e.g. turf, timber, fish, or wild animals);[31] a rentcharge is a right to receive money from a freehold owner of land.[32] A right of entry may arise as part of a lease, where a landlord reserves a right to enter the land if, for example, the tenant fails to pay rent as agreed; it may also arise as part of a rentcharge to allow the party holding the rentcharge to enter the freeholder's land if that charge is not paid.

The list imposed by s 1(2) of the 1925 Act is not necessarily fixed forever. For example, as we will see in Chapter 26, the Law Commission has recently suggested an addition: the 'land obligation'. It does mean, however, that any change to the list can be made only by Parliament, and by amending s 1(2).

7 LEGAL INTERESTS IN LAND: THE ACQUISITION QUESTION

The obvious way for B to acquire a legal interest in land is through a dependent acquisition—that is, by showing that A has given B that right. In Chapter 7, we will look at the general rules applying to the dependent acquisition of a legal interest in land. In Chapter 25, section 3, and Chapter 28, section 4, we will examine the specific rules applying to a dependent acquisition of, respectively, a legal easement and a legal charge.

As for independent acquisition, we will see in Chapter 25, section 3.3, that it is also possible for B to acquire an easement simply by exercising a right over a long period. In such a case, B's easement is said to arise 'through prescription' and there is no need for B to show that he has registered that right, or that A used a deed (or even any writing) to give B that right. Where B relies on prescription to acquire an easement, it may well seem that he is relying on an independent acquisition—that is, he is claiming a right as a result of his own, unilateral conduct, just as occurs where B acquires a freehold by taking physical control of land. As we will see in Chapter 25, section 3.3, however, the courts have not adopted this view.

8 CONCLUSION

The facts of Hill v Tupper[33] (see section 1 above) and Keppell v Bailey[34] (see section 6 above) provide particular examples of a more general question that land law has to tackle: if A owns land and B then acquires a right that relates to A's land, can B also assert that right against C, a third party? To answer that question, we need to be aware of the crucial distinction between: (i) a legal property right in land; and (ii) a personal right. If, as in both Hill and Keppell, B's right is simply a personal right against A, then it is impossible for B to assert that right against C. But if B can instead show that his right is a legal property right in land, that right is capable of binding the rest of the world, including C.

[31] For more detail, see Law Commission Consultation Paper No 186 (2008, Part 6).

[32] For more detail, see Rentcharges Act 1977; Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009, Part 6.6).

Legal property rights in land can be divided into two types: legal estates and legal interests. The difference is that the former category, unlike the latter, give their holder ownership rights over a piece of land. The LPA 1925 carefully restricts the number of legal estates and legal interests in land: there are only two permissible legal estates (freehold and lease), and, for our purposes, there are only two significant legal interests (easement and charge). If B claims to have a legal estate or legal interest, he must pass both the content test and the acquisition test. To pass the content test, B needs to show that the right he claims counts as a legal estate or legal interest. To pass the acquisition test, B needs to show that he has, in fact, acquired that right: as we will see in Chapter 7, it is generally the case that, to do so, B needs to show that he is registered as holding that right and/or that A has used a particular form (such as a deed) to give him that right.

Clearly, legal estates and interests form a crucial part of land law. But to avoid overstating their importance, we need to bear four points in mind. Firstly, even if B has no legal or equitable property right in land, there may be some cases in which B can nonetheless rely on a human right as protection against both A and C. We discussed the impact of human rights on land law in Chapter 3.

Secondly, if B fails to show that he has a legal property right in land, this does not necessarily mean that B has only a personal right against A. Instead, as we will see in Chapter 5, it is still possible for B to have an equitable property right. And such a right may give B precisely the protection that he needs: not only against A, but also against a third party later acquiring a right in A's land.

Thirdly, even if B does have a legal property right in land, there may, in theory, be circumstances in which he cannot assert that right against a particular third party: as we will see in Chapter 12, it may be possible for C to have a defence against B's legal property right.

Finally, if B wants protection simply against a specific third party (rather than any third party later acquiring a right in A's land), it is not always necessary for B to show that he has either a legal or equitable property right. Instead, B may be protected by showing he has a direct right against that particular third party. We will examine such direct rights in Chapter 6.

QUESTIONS

1. What is the difference between a 'personal' right and a 'property' right?
2. How might the result in Hill v Tupper have been different if Mr Hill's right had counted as a property right?
3. What role, if any, does the concept of ownership play in English land law?
4. Why did the Law of Property Act 1925 limit the number of possible legal estates in land?
5. What is the difference between dependent and independent acquisition?
6. What is the numerus clausus principle? Is it an unjustified limit on the ability of an owner of land to create new property rights in that land?

EQUITABLE INTERESTS

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. It is generally said that there are two sorts of property right in land: legal property rights and equitable property right. We examined the content of legal property rights in Chapter 4; we will examine the content of equitable property rights in this chapter.
2. We saw in Chapter 4 that legal property rights in land can be split into two groups: legal estates and legal interests. In contrast, under the scheme of the Law of Property Act 1925, there is no such thing as an equitable estate in land. All equitable property rights in land are equitable interests. Equitable interests in land can usefully be split into two groups: equitable interests arising under a trust; and other equitable interests.
3. As we also saw in Chapter 4, there is a limited number of legal estates and legal interests in land. The list of possible equitable interests in land is also limited, but is longer than the list of legal interests. In particular, a right under a trust counts as an equitable interest—and rights under a trust can have very varied content. This means that whilst the content of B's right may prevent it from being a legal interest in land, it may still count as an equitable interest in land.
4. Equitable interests in land share a key feature of legal estates and legal interests: they are capable of being asserted against third parties. For example, consider a case where A has a legal estate in land and B, through his dealings with A, acquires an equitable interest in A's land. B's right will then be prima facie binding on C, a party who later acquires a right from A. In this way, equitable interests in land have a power lacked by personal rights.
5. It is clear that the content and acquisition questions are answered differently depending on whether B claims a legal or equitable property right. In section 7 of this chapter, we will consider whether these differences can be justified. One important point is that if B has an equitable property right rather than a legal property right, it will generally be easier for a third party to show that he has a defence to B's right. We will focus on the defences question in Chapter 12. It may also be the case that equitable interests are conceptually, as well as historically, distinct from legal property rights.

1 THE CONCEPT OF AN EQUITABLE PROPERTY RIGHT

In land law, as in many other areas of law, it is possible to distinguish between common law rules and equitable rules. Historically, the distinction is a simple one: common law rules were developed by the common law courts, equitable rules were developed by courts of equity. As a result of procedural reform in the late nineteenth-century, there are no longer separate common law courts and equitable courts; rather, all courts must consider any relevant common law rules and equitable rules.

In land law, one of the lasting contributions of those equitable rules is the concept of an equitable property right. In Chapter 4, section 1, we considered the fundamental distinction between a personal right and a property right: whereas a personal right can be asserted only against a specific person, a property right has a wider range of application. An equitable property right shares a very important feature with a legal property right: it does more than simply bind a specific person. For example, if A has a freehold or lease of land and then gives B an equitable property right, B has a right that is capable of binding not only A, but also C, a party who later acquires A's land.

In the following extract, Lionel Smith discusses the development of equitable property rights. He makes the important point that these rights, unlike the legal property rights that we examined in Chapter 4, are necessarily based on A's being under a duty to B.

Smith, 'Fusion and Tradition' in Equity in Commercial Law (eds Degeling and Edelman, 2005, pp 32–3)

I would argue that there are at least two examples of norms that are enforced routinely by Equity, but only sporadically by the common law, and that it is here that the true distinctiveness of Equity may lie. In other words, leaving aside the mass of detailed doctrine in both traditions, these are examples of situations in which Equity enforces a norm or value which the common law generally does not.

Respect for other people's obligations

This section can be introduced with a simple normative problem. Imagine that John owns a boat. He lends it to Mary, promising her that she can keep it for one month. After one week, Eleanor offers to buy the boat from John. John accepts her offer and Eleanor becomes the owner of the boat. Is she required to allow Mary to retain possession during the rest of the one-month period? Reasonable people could differ. Many people would say that it depends upon whether Eleanor was aware of the arrangements between John and Mary, and some might think it was relevant whether Mary had paid for her one month of use, or whether it was in the nature of a gift.

In the Romanist tradition, the most fundamental distinction in private law is the one between obligations and property rights. A right of ownership binds everyone. Obligations bind only the parties to the obligation: the debtor is bound to the creditor. The common law, in the narrow sense that excludes Equity, basically follows this line. Both modern civil law and the common law in the narrow sense admit the possibility that someone can commit a wrongful act by interfering with the fulfilment of another person's obligation.[1] But short of that fault-based wrong, obligations do not have effects except on the debtor and the creditor. Equity takes a different view. Some obligations systematically have third-party effects, without recourse to the law of wrongs. These are obligations that relate to the benefit of particular property, or an interest therein.

This approach is seen in a crucial technique of legal reasoning that underlies much of the original jurisdiction of Equity. At the risk of leaving out much doctrinal detail, it can be stated in this way. If a person is under an obligation, and the obligation relates to the benefit of particular property or an interest therein, then another person who comes into possession or control of that particular property—even though he does so without any personal culpability—is not allowed to get in the way of the fulfilment of the obligation. The defendant can free himself of this constraint only by affirmative proof that he gave value in good faith without notice of the obligation, and that the interest he acquired was a common law interest and not an Equitable one only [. . .] The representative of creditors is also caught, although he represents persons who are in good faith and who, for the most part, gave value.

This principle is not totally alien to the common law. First, as we have noted, the common law recognises that one person should not deliberately interfere in another person's performance of his obligations. But in this tort context, it looks for a level of cognition on the part of the defendant that allows us to understand the defendant as having committed a genuinely wrongful act. In that setting, of course, it is irrelevant whether the obligation relates to specific property or not. More interestingly, in one crucial context, the common law did exactly what Equity does routinely: it said that if the obligation does relate to specific property, then a recipient of that property must allow the obligation to be performed, even though the recipient does not owe the obligation, and without any finding that the recipient acted wrongfully. That context is the lease of land. The lessee's rights were enforceable against a transferee from the lessor, and later against all the world, first in damages only, but later by specific recovery.

In Equity, however, this principle is ubiquitous, and routinely turns an obligation relating to a particular asset into a kind of property right, held by the beneficiary or creditor of the obligation, in the particular asset. Effectively, people are bound by other people's obligations—not bound to perform them, but bound not to interfere with them.

In the following extract, Hackney also discusses how equitable property rights developed from an initial duty of A to B. In doing so, he uses the trust as an example. As we will see in this chapter, the trust is a classic example of a situation in which B has an equitable property right. A trust arises where A (the trustee) has a right (the trust property) and is under a duty to use that right for the benefit of B (or B and others, known as the 'beneficiaries'), as well as a duty not to use that right for A's own benefit.[2] If another party has specifically set up the trust, that party is often referred to as the 'settlor'.

Hackney, Understanding Equity and Trusts (1987, pp 20–2)

In the course of the mid seventeenth to early nineteenth centuries, Equity[3] was turned into a systematic body of principles as refined, rigorous and ultimately unyielding as anything produced by the common law. [. . .]

[2] It is possible for there to be trusts in which A, as well as being a trustee, is also a beneficiary of the trust: see for example Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland [1981] AC 813, HL, which we will discuss in section 2 of this Chapter. In such a case, A is permitted to use the trust property for his own benefit (to the extent that he is a beneficiary).

[3] [The author uses Equity with a capital E to refer to the body of specific rules developed by courts of equity and to distinguish those rules from the general concept of 'equity' with its broader sense of what is fair.]

> One consequence of the 'regularisation' of Equity was the creation of a law of property. The Chancellor had originally intervened by imposing personal obligations on particular defendants. So the early trustee of land would be under a personal obligation to administer the property for his beneficiary, but the trustee might still be seen as the owner of the land. The particular novelty of the trust is that the beneficiary need not have been a party to a transaction establishing the trust, yet he is still able to enforce it, and what is more, the person who does set up the transaction finds he has no standing to intervene to see that it is honoured. By the end of this period the beneficiary of the trust is perceived as having an equitable proprietary interest in the asset, not just rights enforceable only against the trustee. He can enforce his rights against total strangers, from whom he can demand the asset. This 'exigibility'—demandability—is one of the characteristics of property. He can also alienate and pass a good equitable title. For some of the beneficiary's protection his trustee will have to use the mechanism of the common law courts, and the beneficiary of the trust may have to invoke the assistance of the Chancellor to drive a reluctant trustee to take the necessary steps. But it is important to see that the trustee is no longer exercising rights. His common law ownership was made up of a set of rights, powers and duties. The Chancellor's intervention has overridden or destroyed the rights, which the trustee can no longer exercise at his own election and for his own benefit, and has converted them into equitable duties, to be performed for the sole benefit of the beneficiary. No principle seems more central to the law of trusts than that the trustee may not derive a profit from the trust. There is today no sensible usage of 'owner' which can apply to the trustee, and every sensible usage which can apply to the beneficiary. The trustee has a legal title and access to common law courts and remedies, but he is a driven vehicle for the superior rights of his beneficiary. He litigates at common law in response to his equitable duties, and not to his common law rights, which have been subordinated. The trustee is now a manager in an institution which is a hybrid between the creation of an agency and the disposition of property.

2 THE CONCEPT OF AN EQUITABLE INTEREST IN LAND

In Chapter 1, we considered the decision of the House of Lords in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth.[4] It was held that Mrs Ainsworth's right, her 'deserted wife's equity', whilst clearly a product of equitable rules, did not count as an equitable interest in land. Instead, it was simply an equitable personal right against her husband. As a result, Mrs Ainsworth could not assert that right against the bank, who had acquired a right in the land from her husband. That decision can be contrasted with the decision of the House of Lords in Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland.[5] Mr Boland was registered as holding a freehold of a home in Ridge Park, Beddington, Surrey. Mr Boland and his brother were directors of a building company. To support the business, Mr Boland borrowed money from the Williams & Glyn's Bank. The money was borrowed as part of a mortgage deal: to secure his duty to repay that sum, plus interest, Mr Boland gave the bank a legal charge over his home. When Mr Boland failed to repay the loan, the bank wished to sell the land. To get a good price, the bank knew that it had to sell the home with vacant possession. Because Mrs Boland refused to leave, the bank applied for an order for possession of the home.

The facts of Boland thus have much in common with those of Ainsworth. The crucial difference between the two cases was as to the content of the wife's right. Mrs Boland did not attempt to assert a 'deserted wife's equity' against the bank. Rather, because Mr Boland had acquired his freehold of the land with her financial assistance, he was under a duty to use that freehold not for his own sole benefit, but for the benefit of both himself and his wife.[6] Mr Boland thus held his freehold on trust, and both he and his wife were beneficiaries of that trust. A beneficiary of a trust has an equitable interest, and so Mrs Boland, unlike Mrs Ainsworth, had more than a mere personal right against her husband. As confirmed by the House of Lords, Mrs Boland had an equitable interest in the land: a right capable of binding a third party, such as the bank, later acquiring a right from Mr Boland.

[5] [1981] AC 813.

It is important to note that, as we will see in Chapter 14, section 5.1.1, the House of Lords considered whether the bank had a defence to Mrs Boland's pre-existing equitable property right. The fact that an equitable interest in land is capable of binding a party other than A does not mean that such a right will always bind such parties. We noted in Chapter 4, section 1, that it is possible for a third party to have a defence to a pre-existing legal estate or legal interest; it is also possible for a third party to have a defence to a pre-existing equitable interest. We will consider such defences in detail in Part D of this book.

3 RIGHTS UNDER TRUSTS: THE CONTENT QUESTION

Let us say that S, who has a freehold, wants to divide up his ownership of land by making B1 owner of the land for B1's life, with B2 becoming owner on the death of B1. We know that S cannot achieve his aims by giving either of B1 or B2 a legal estate in land: as we saw in Chapter 4, section 3, section 1 of the Law of Property Act 1925 allows for only two forms of legal estate in land: the freehold and the lease. S can, however, set up a trust, by transferring his freehold to A1 and A2 subject to a duty to use that freehold: (i) for the benefit of B1 during B1's life; then (ii) for the benefit of B2 forever. In such a case, A1 and A2 clearly have a legal estate: a freehold. But, as noted in the Hackney extract set out in section 1 above, the trust imposed on A1 and A2 means that they cannot use their ownership rights for their own benefit: instead, they must use their freehold for the benefit of B1, then for the benefit of B2. So, whilst A1 and A2 have ownership, they are under equitable duties to B1 and B2; and those duties ensure that it is B1 and B2 who take the benefit of A1 and A2's ownership.

This structure is made clear in the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 (TOLATA 1996).

Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 6(1) and (6)

(1) For the purpose of exercising their functions as trustee, the trustees of land have in relation to the land subject to the trust all the powers of an absolute owner.

(6) The powers conferred by this section shall not be exercised in contravention of, or of any order made in pursuance of, any other enactment or any rule of law or equity.

In our example, each of B1 and B2 has an equitable property right that allows him or her to take the benefits, for a slice of time, of ownership of land. Nonetheless, it would be inaccurate to say that either of B1 or B2 has an 'equitable estate'. Firstly, the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925) does not use that term. As we saw in Chapter 4, s 1(1) of the Act sets out permissible legal estates and s 1(2) sets out permissible legal interests. Section 1(3) then states that: 'All other estates, interests, and charges in or over land take effect as equitable interests.' So, if we are to follow that terminology, we should treat all equitable property rights as equitable interests.

6 We will consider the circumstances in which such trusts can arise in Chapter 16.

Secondly, and more importantly, in Chapter 4, section 2, we defined an estate as a property right giving its holder ownership rights. In our example in which A1 and A2 hold a freehold on trust for B1 and B2, it is not accurate to say that B1 and B2 have ownership rights; rather, A1 and A2 have ownership, and A1 and A2 are under a duty to use that ownership for the benefit of each of B1 and B2. As a result, each of B1 and B2 can, in practice, enjoy the benefit of A1 and A2's ownership. For example, if the land consists of commercial premises rented out to a business, the rent will be paid to A1 and A2, but A1 and A2 will be under a duty (depending on the exact terms of the trust) to pay that rental income to B1 during B1's life.

It is therefore important to distinguish two cases. In the first case, A, a freehold owner of land, grants B a lease of that land. In the second case, A, a freehold owner of land, transfers that freehold to A1 and A2 to hold on trust for B1 and B2. In the first case, A can be seen as splitting, or carving up, A's right to exclusive possession of the land: that right goes to B for the duration of the lease, before returning to A. In the second case, there is no such splitting or carving up. Rather, A's freehold is transferred intact to A1 and A2, who acquire A's right to exclusive possession of the land forever. In the second case, the rights of B1 and B2 therefore derive not from any splitting or carving up of A's freehold, but rather from A's imposition of a duty on A1 and A2. As an Australian judge once put it: 'An equitable interest is not carved out of a legal estate but impressed upon it.'[7] In the second case, the equitable interest is impressed upon the freehold of A1 and A2 because of the duty imposed on A1 and A2. That duty, owed to each of B1 and B2, relates to the freehold held by A1 and A2, as it limits the uses that A1 and A2 can make of the freehold. It ensures, in particular, that A1 and A1 must use the freehold not for their own benefit, but rather for the benefit of each of B1 and B2.

As far as the content question is concerned, that is the key feature of the trust: A must hold a right, and also be under a duty to B not to use that right for A's own benefit, unless and to the extent that A is also a beneficiary of the trust. We saw that, in Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland,[8] for example, Mr Boland held his freehold on trust for each of himself and his wife. As a result, Mr Boland was permitted, to a certain extent, to use his freehold to his own benefit: if the freehold was sold, for example, Mr Boland would be entitled to retain a proportion of the proceeds of sale for his own benefit. The presence of the trust, however, means that, in such a case, he would be under a duty to pay a proportion of those proceeds to Mrs Boland; and also that, when deciding whether to sell his freehold, he would be under a duty to take into account the wishes of his wife.

In analysing equitable interests in land, it is important to distinguish rights under trusts from other forms of equitable interest in land. Firstly, as we will see in Chapters 17 and 20, a special statutory regime regulates trusts of land, but does not apply to other equitable interests in land; secondly, as we will see in Chapter 11, section 2, a special formality rule applies to the acquisition of rights under trusts of land.[9]

[7] Per Brennan J in DKLR Holding Co (No 2) Ltd v Commissioner of Stamp Duties (1982) 149 CLR 431 (High Court of Australia). See Swadling, 'Property' in Burrows (ed) English Private Law (Oxford: OUP, 2nd edn, 2007) 4.145–4.150. This view also fits with the historical development of the trust: see N Jones 'Trusts in England after the Statute of Uses: A View from the Sixteenth Century' in R Helmholz and R Zimmerman (eds) Itinera Fiduciae: Trust and Treuhand in Historical Perspective (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1998), p 190: 'The interest of [a beneficiary of a trust] depends upon the interest of the trustee: the creation of a trust is a process of cumulation, and not division'.

To make this distinction between rights under trusts and other forms of equitable interest in land, we need to focus on the content of A's duty. In a trust, A is under a duty in relation to the whole of a particular right held by A, such as A's freehold or A's lease. In contrast, if B has a different form of equitable interest, it seems that A is under a narrower, more specific duty: for example, if B has an equitable easement, A's duty is simply to grant B an easement and A is otherwise free to use A's freehold or lease for A's own benefit.

It is important to remember that a trust will often have more than one beneficiary. We have already discussed the example where A1 and A2 hold a freehold on trust for B1 and B2, with a duty to use the freehold for B1's benefit during B1's life, and then for the benefit of B2. This example demonstrates one of the great advantages of the trust: it can be used to divide up the benefits of a right in almost any way.[10] The next extract considers examples that do not involve land, but, as shown by our examples above, the flexibility of the trust also applies where the right held on trust is a freehold or lease of land.

Worthington, Equity (2nd edn, 2006, pp 73–7)

> Now that the idea of a trust is clearer, with its ingenious splitting of the ownership 'bundle of rights' into legal and Equitable ownership, it is possible to explore some of the enormous practical advantages of the trust [. . .]
> [. . . T]rusts enable proprietary interests to be divided along a time line. A trustee can hold a Rembrandt painting on trust 'for A for life, then B for life, remainder to C' (and death need not be the only marker along the time line). This arrangement gives each party (the trustee, A, B and C) some immediate proprietary interest in the painting, with all the protection this entails, even though B and C have to wait some time before they are entitled to possession of the painting. A contract could achieve a similar result, but again without the important protections that proprietary interests afford [. . .]
> [. . . T]rusts are enormously flexible in slicing up property rights in ways that would be inconceivable without the trust. Consider company shares. A shareholder who wishes to deal with his shares can only transfer full ownership or a security interest in the entire bundle of rights associated with the share. He cannot sell part of a share; he certainly cannot parcel out the different benefits inherent in shareholding to different transferees, giving one the right to dividends, another the right to vote and yet another the right to capital gains. Under the umbrella of a trust, however, all of this is possible. The owner (as settlor) simply has to specify the beneficiaries' rights under the trust in the appropriate way.

In Chapter 20 we will look more closely at the ways in which a trust can be used to divide up the benefits of ownership over time (as in our first example). One question is, however, worth asking here: does the possibility of creating diverse equitable interests in land undermine the aim of s 1 of the LPA 1925? After all, as we saw in Chapter 4, section 3.3, part of the purpose of that provision is to protect third parties against the risk of being bound by complicated and unusual property rights. So, for example, it is impossible for B1 to have a legal life estate, or for B2 to have a legal estate giving B2 ownership of the land after B1's death. Yet in our example above, in which A1 and A2 hold a freehold on trust for B1 for B1's life, and then for B2, each of B1 and B2 has an equitable property right, capable of binding a third party who, for example, acquires the freehold of A1 and A2. So there may seem to be little point limiting the content of legal estates and interests in land if those limits can be evaded by simply setting up a trust.

[9] That rule is set out in s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925; it differs from the general formality rule applying to the acquisition of equitable interests in land, set out in s 53(1)(a) of the same Act.

The key point, however, is that where a party has an equitable interest, it is far easier for C (a third party later acquiring a right from A1 and A2) to have a defence to that pre-existing right. Indeed, in our example, if C acquires the freehold of A1 and A2, he may well be able to take free from the equitable interests of B1 and B2, even if C knows about those rights, and even if B1 or B2 is in actual occupation of the land when C acquires his right. This is because C may well be able to rely on a special application of the overreaching defence. We will explore this defence, which is regulated by s 2 of the LPA 1925, in Chapter 12, section 3.3, and in Chapter 19: it gives C valuable protection against the risk of being bound by a pre-existing equitable interest arising under a trust. It thus seems that, as far as the protection of third parties is concerned, the LPA 1925 has a clear, logical structure:

- in order to protect third parties such as C, s 1 limits the list of legal estates and interests in land;
- this means that particular arrangements (such as giving B1 a right to benefit from the land for B1's life, with the right to benefit thereafter going to B2) have to take effect behind a trust, with each of B1 and B2 having only an equitable interest;
- s 2 then recognizes that C can use a special overreaching defence against a pre-existing equitable property right arising under a trust.

4 RIGHTS UNDER TRUSTS: THE ACQUISITION QUESTION

As we noted in section 1 above, any equitable property right depends on A being under an initial duty to B. So, the first step for B in showing that he has a right under a trust is to show that A is under a duty to him. In Chapter 4, section 4, we saw that it may be possible for B to acquire a legal estate in land by an independent acquisition—that is, through relying simply on his own, unilateral conduct. In contrast, it is impossible for B to acquire a right under a trust by relying on an independent acquisition. This is because B can acquire an equitable property right only when A is under a duty to B; and A cannot come under a duty to B simply as a result of B's own, unilateral conduct.

In practice, however, the need to show that A is under a duty to B increases B's chances of showing that he has acquired a right under a trust. This is because there are many different means by which A can come under a duty to B.[11] We will discuss these means in Chapters 9–11. For example, if A makes a contractual promise to transfer his freehold to B, that contract, by itself, does not transfer A's freehold: as we will see in Chapter 7, section 3, further formalities must be completed before B acquires A's freehold. The contract between A and B, however, imposes a duty on A: a duty in relation to A's freehold. As a result, as we will see in Chapter 9, the contract itself may suffice to give B a right under a trust of A's freehold.

5 OTHER EQUITABLE INTERESTS: THE CONTENT QUESTION

5.1 A LONGER LIST OF PROPERTY RIGHTS

In the following extract, Swadling considers one of the contributions of equity to property law: the recognition of a longer list of property rights.

Swadling, 'The Law of Property' in English Private Law (ed Burrows, 2nd edn, 2007, [4.26])

A longer list

All rights recognized as property rights at common law are also recognized as such by equity. So, for example, it is possible to have an easement, for example a right of way over land, both at common law and in equity. But there are also some rights recognized in equity as proprietary which at common law either do not exist at all or, if they do, are only recognized as personal rights. An example of the latter is the restrictive covenant over land. Others are contracts and options to purchase certain types of legal property rights. The mortgagor's equity of redemption is an example of equity creating a property right where not even a corresponding personal right exists at law.

5.2 THE LIST OF EQUITABLE INTERESTS

It is possible to come up with a list of rights that, in addition to rights under a trust, count as equitable interests in land. Building on Swadling's approach in the extract above, that list can be usefully split into two categories. In the first category are those rights that do not correspond to any legal estate or legal interest in land. Examples of such rights are: (i) the restrictive covenant (which we will examine in Chapter 26); and (ii) the mortgagor's equity of redemption (see Chapter 28, section 5). Where registered land is concerned, we can also include: (i) an 'equity by estoppel' (see Chapter 10, section 4.3); and (ii) a 'mere equity'.[12] Under s 116 of the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002), those rights are expressly said to be capable of binding a third party acquiring a right in relation to registered land.

In the second category are equitable interests that do correspond to a legal estate or legal interest in land. Clear examples of such rights are: (i) equitable leases (see Chapter 22, section 3.2); (ii) equitable easements (as noted by Swadling in the extract above, and see further Chapter 25); and (iii) equitable charges (see Chapter 28, section 4.3). In each of those cases, B's equitable interest arises because A is under a duty to grant B a recognized legal property right in land. The content of the equitable property right thus reflects the content of the legal estate or interest in question.[13] The crucial difference is that A has not yet granted B the relevant legal estate or legal interest; rather, A is under a duty to do so.

In this category, we can also include what Swadling refers to as 'contracts and options to purchase certain types of legal property rights'. Such equitable property rights can be broken down into: (i) estate contracts (see Chapter 9); and (ii) options to purchase. Where registered land is concerned, we can add a further right: (iii) the right of pre-emption. Under s 115(b) of the LRA 2002, that right is expressly said to be capable of binding a third party acquiring a right in relation to registered land. As we will see in section 6 below, equity's contribution here again relates to the acquisition question, not the content question. To show that he has an estate contract, option to purchase, or right of pre-emption, B always needs to show that A has a legal estate. To show that he has an estate contract, B also needs to show that A is under an existing contractual duty to transfer that estate to B. To show that he has an option to purchase, B need only show that B has the option to impose a contractual duty on A to transfer A's estate to B. And to show that he has a right of pre-emption, B only needs to show that, if A chooses to sell A's estate, B has the option to impose a contractual duty on A to transfer that estate to B.

It is, therefore, possible to come up with the set of equitable interests in land illustrated in Table 2.

5.3 LIMITING THE CONTENT OF EQUITABLE INTERESTS

Whilst all equitable interests depend on A being under a duty to B, it is clear that B does not have an equitable interest in all cases where A is under a duty to B. For example, as we noted in section 2 above, the House of Lords held in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth that, whilst Mr Ainsworth was under an equitable duty to Mrs Ainsworth, his 'deserted wife', that duty did not give Mrs Ainsworth an equitable interest.[14]

Equally, the content of those rights that do count as equitable interests is carefully controlled by the courts. This can be shown by the following extract, in which Lord Templeman considers the content of the restrictive covenant. As we will see in Chapter 26, it is possible to take issue with Lord Templeman's reasoning, but, for our present purposes, it is important to note one key point. We saw in section 1 above that equitable property rights arose because of equity's willingness to allow an obligation owed by A to B to affect a third party, C; as the following extract demonstrates, it is clear that equity does not allow all obligations to have that effect.

[13] There can, however, be a slight difference. To count as a legal interest in land, an easement or charge must last forever (like a freehold) or for a certain, limited period (like a lease). As a result, if A gives B a right of way that is due to last only for B's life, that right, even if passes the content test for an easement (see Chapter 25, section 2), cannot count as a legal easement. Nonetheless, it can count as an equitable easement: see ER Ives Investments Ltd v High [1967] 2 QB 379, 395, per Lord Denning MR.

[1994] 2 AC 310, HL

Facts: Walford House in Combwich, Somerset, was divided by its owner into a house and a cottage. The roof of the house overhung the cottage. In 1960, the former owner then sold a freehold of the cottage. When doing so, he promised the purchasers of the cottage 'for himself and his successors in title [...] to maintain [...] such part of the roof of Walford House [...] as lies above the property conveyed in wind and watertight condition'. After that, both the house and the cottage were sold on. By 1991, the freehold of the house was held by Ms Stephens, and the freehold of the cottage was held by Mr and Mrs Rhone. Mr and Mrs Rhone claimed that Ms Stephens was under a duty to repair the roof of the house, as a result of the covenant entered into by the former owner of the house in 1960. On that basis, they claimed compensation from Ms Stephens for damage that they had suffered as a result of the state of the roof and also asked for an order forcing Ms Stephens to ensure that the necessary repairs were done. The first instance judge found in favour of Mr and Mrs Rhone; but the Court of Appeal reversed that finding, holding that the promise made in 1960 did not give rise to an equitable property right, because it imposed a positive burden (a duty to do repairs) and so did not count as a restrictive covenant. The House of Lords upheld that finding.

Lord Templeman

My Lords, equity supplements but does not contradict the common law. When freehold land is conveyed without restriction, the conveyance confers on the purchaser the right to do with the land as he pleases provided that he does not interfere with the rights of others or infringe statutory restrictions. The conveyance may however impose restrictions which, in favour of the covenantee, deprive the purchaser of some of the rights inherent in the ownership of unrestricted land. In Tulk v. Moxhay (1848) 2 Ph. 774 [see Chapter 6, section 2.6] a purchaser of land covenanted that no buildings would be erected on Leicester Square. A subsequent purchaser of Leicester Square was restrained from building. The conveyance to the original purchaser deprived him and every subsequent purchaser taking with notice of the covenant of the right, otherwise part and parcel of the freehold, to develop the square by the construction of buildings. Equity does not contradict the common law by enforcing a restrictive covenant against a successor in title of the covenantor but prevents the successor from exercising a right which he never acquired [...]

Equity can thus prevent or punish the breach of a negative covenant which restricts the user of land or the exercise of other rights in connection with land. Restrictive covenants deprive an owner of a right which he could otherwise exercise. Equity cannot compel an owner to comply with a positive covenant entered into by his predecessors in title without flatly contradicting the common law rule that a person cannot be made liable upon a contract unless he was a party to it. Enforcement of a positive covenant lies in contract; a positive covenant compels an owner to exercise his rights. Enforcement of a negative covenant lies in property; a negative covenant deprives the owner of a right over property.

5.4 EQUITABLE INTERESTS AND THE NUMERUS CLAUSUS PRINCIPLE

In the extract above, Lord Templeman could have supported his analysis by referring to the following statutory provision (emphasis added), which makes clear that there is a limit to the content of equitable interests.

Creation and disposition of equitable interests

(1) Interests in land validly created or arising after the commencement of this Act, which are not capable of subsisting as legal estates, shall take effect as equitable interests, and, save as otherwise expressly provided by statute, interests in land which under the Statute of Uses or otherwise could before the commencement of this Act have been created as legal interests, shall be capable of being created as equitable interests:

Provided that, after the commencement of this Act (and save as hereinafter expressly enacted) an equitable interest in land shall only be capable of being validly created in any case in which an equivalent equitable interest in property real or personal could have been validly created before such commencement.

It thus seems that, whilst s 1(2) of the Act limits the content of legal interests, s 4(1) does the same job for the content of equitable interests. Rather than setting out the permissible equitable interests, s 4(1) instead imposes a freeze on the development of new equitable interests. As noted by Briggs:[15] '[Section 4(1)] seems clear enough [...] If [particular rights] are to bind purchasers of land as proprietary interests, then they must be shown to have existed in pre-1926 land law [...]'

It is certainly the case that the courts have developed no new equitable interests since 1926. Perhaps surprisingly, however, the courts have not supported that approach by relying on s 4(1). For example, we saw in Chapter 1 that, when finding in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth[16] that a 'deserted wife's equity' did not count as an equitable interest, Lord Wilberforce did not refer to s 4(1), but instead explained that the content of the 'deserted wife's equity' meant that it was unsuited to binding anyone other than the husband. In an important passage, Lord Wilbeforce stated that: 'Before a right or an interest can be admitted into the category of property, or of a right affecting property, it must be definable, identifiable by third parties, capable in its nature of assumption by third parties, and have some degree of permanence or stability. The wife's right has none of these qualities, it is characterised by the reverse of them.'[17]

Once it had been decided that Mr Ainsworth was not under a duty to allow Mrs Ainsworth to live in her current house, but instead simply had a duty to provide her with some accommodation, Mrs Ainsworth's claim to an equitable property right was doomed to fail: she could not show that her husband's duty to her related to his freehold. But Lord Wilberforce went further and set out criteria that can be used to analyse a claim that B has an equitable property right. To count as such a right, B's right must be:

- definable;
- identifiable by third parties;
- capable in its nature of assumption by third parties; and
- (to some degree) permanent and stable.

It is important to realize, however, that a right will not count as an equitable property right simply because it meets Lord Wilberforce's criteria. For example, a positive covenant, such as that considered by Lord Templeman in Rhone v Stephens[18] (see section 5.3 above), gives its holder a right that has all of the characteristics specified by Lord Wilberforce. So whilst these characteristics may be necessary if B's right is to count as an equitable property right, they are clearly not sufficient.

6 OTHER EQUITABLE INTERESTS: THE ACQUISITION QUESTION

In section 4 above, we noted that, to acquire a right under a trust, B must show that A is under a duty to B. The same is true when B claims any form of equitable interest. For example, in Walsh v Lonsdale,[19] which we will examine in detail in Chapter 9, Lonsdale had made a contractual agreement to grant Walsh a seven-year lease. Walsh did not acquire a legal lease because no grant was made. Nonetheless, the Court of Appeal held that Walsh had an equitable lease, arising as a result of Lonsdale's contractual duty to grant Walsh the promised legal lease.

In Chapters 9 and 10, we will examine a general means by which B may acquire an equitable interest. In other chapters, we will consider the acquisition of specific equitable interests: for example, in Chapter 22, section 3.2, we will consider the acquisition of an equitable lease; in Chapter 26, sections 2.5 and 3, we will consider the acquisition of a restrictive covenant. It is important to bear in mind that formality rules may regulate the acquisition of an equitable interest: for example, we will see in Chapter 7, section 3 that a contract for the grant of a seven-year lease (such as was relied on in Walsh v Lonsdale) is only valid if it complies with the formality rule imposed by s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989. The general formality rule applying to the acquisition of an equitable interest in land is set out by section 53(1)(a) of the Law of Property Act 1925:

Instruments required to be in writing

(1) Subject to the provision hereinafter contained with respect to the creation of interests in land by parol—

(a) no interest in land can be created or disposed of except by writing signed by the person creating or conveying the same, or by his agent thereunto lawfully authorised in writing, or by will, or by operation of law.

(b) [. . .]

(2) This section does not affect the creation or operation of resulting, implied or constructive trusts.

In Chapters 10 and 11, we will examine a number of means by which B can acquire an equitable interest even in the absence of any writing. Chapter 10 is concerned with proprietary estoppel: we will consider the reasons why that doctrine does not require formality in Chapter 7, section 3.7, and in Chapter 10, section 2.4. In Chapter 11, sections 3 and 4, we will consider resulting and constructive trusts, which fall within the exception permitted by s 53(2).

7 THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN COMMON LAW AND EQUITY

Many land law cases share a basic form: A, an owner of land, has some dealings with B; as a result, B acquires a right to make a particular use of A's land. A then gives C a right in relation to the land: for example, by selling his freehold or lease to C, or by granting C a legal charge over the land. B wishes to carry on using the land, but C wants to prevent B from using the land in that way. For example, in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth[20] (see Chapter 1 as well as section 5.4 above), the bank (C) wanted to prevent Mrs Ainsworth (B) from continuing to occupy the home owned by Mr Ainsworth (A).

In such cases, it is important to ask if B's right, acquired from A, counts as a property right. If it does, it is capable of binding C. If it does not, and is simply a personal right against A, B cannot assert that right against C (although, as we will see in Chapter 6, it may still be possible for B to assert a new, direct right against C, arising as a result of C's conduct). To see if B's right counts as a property right, we need to look at both the content question and the acquisition question. But in the past two chapters, we have seen that, as far as the content question is concerned, there are two sets of answers: one set is provided by the common law rules; another set, by the equitable rules. For example, a restrictive covenant does not count as a legal estate or interest in land, but it can count as an equitable interest (see section 5.3 above). As pointed out in the following extract, these differences raise an awkward question: does it make sense for common law and equity to give different answers to the same question?

Burrows, 'We Do This at Common Law But That in Equity' (2002) 22 OJLS 1

[T]he fusion of law and equity is a topic that provokes strong reactions. But the question remains of what, exactly, is meant by fusion. One way of answering this is to give a short description of the essence of first, the anti-fusion school of thought; and second, the fusion school of thought.

According to the anti-fusion school of thought, the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts 1873–5 fused the administration of the courts but did not fuse the substantive law. Common law and equity sit alongside one another. Moreover, they can happily sit alongside one another. Clashes or conflicts or inconsistencies between them are very rare. Where they exist, and in so far as they are not resolved by the more specific provisions of the 1873–5 Acts, they are resolved by the general provision in section 11 of the 1873 Act which lays down that 'equity shall prevail'. This is not to say that common law or equity is frozen in the position it was in before 1873. Rather common law and equity can independently develop incrementally. But one should not develop the law by reasoning from common law to equity or vice versa. To do so would cut across the historical underpinnings of the two areas; and a harmonized rule or principle that has features of both common law and equity but cannot be said clearly to be one or the other, would be unacceptable.

In contrast, the fusion school of thought argues that the fusion of the administration of the courts brought about by the 1873–5 Acts, whilst not dictating the fusion of the substantive law, rendered this, for the first time, a realistic possibility. While there are areas where common law and equity can happily sit alongside one another, there are many examples of inconsistencies between them. It is important to remove the inconsistencies thereby producing a coherent or harmonized law. In developing the law it is legitimate for the courts to reason from common law to equity and vice versa. A harmonized rule or principle that has features of both common law and equity is at the very least acceptable and, depending on the rule or principle in question, may represent the best way for the law to develop.

It is submitted that the latter view is to be strongly preferred. There are numerous instances of inconsistencies between common law and equity; and to support fusion seems self-evident, resting, as it does, on not being slaves to history and on recognizing the importance of coherence in the law and of 'like cases being treated alike' [. . .]

[Burrows goes on to suggest that cases in which common law and equitable rules do differ can be placed into one of three categories:]

The first category is where common law and equity co-exist coherently and where the historical labels of common law and equity remain the best or, at least, useful terminology [. . .]

The second category is where common law and equity co-exist coherently but, in contrast to the first category, there is nothing to be gained by adherence to those historical labels. If we are to take fusion seriously, the labels common law and equity in the areas of the law covered by this category should be abandoned at a stroke [. . .]

The third category is more complex. It comprises probably most of our civil law. In this category, in contrast to both of the first two categories, common law and equity do not exist co-exist coherently. If we are to take fusion seriously, what is needed is a change in the law, albeit often only a small change, so as to produce a principled product which may combine elements of law and equity.

As Burrows notes, the 'fusion' debate provokes strong reactions. Certainly, his preference for what he calls the 'fusion approach' is not universally shared: for a robustly-expressed alternative view, see, for example, Meagher, Gummow and Lehane's Equity: Doctrines and Remedies.[21] Nonetheless, the central point raised by Burrows seems to be a valid one: where there is a difference between common law rules and equitable rules, we need to ask whether that difference can be justified. After all, history can explain why we have two different sets of rules, but, by itself, history cannot justify why we should keep them. If we apply that same approach to the law of property rights, we need to be able to justify the special rules, noted in this chapter, that apply to equitable property rights but not to their legal counterparts.

It seems that these differences can be justified if we focus on the different effects of legal and equitable property rights. The list of legal property rights is shorter, and such rights are, in general, harder to acquire—but, if B has a legal property right, then he receives better protection. Firstly, as we will see in Chapter 12, section 3.6, it is far harder for C to have a defence to a pre-existing legal property right in land; where B has a pre-existing equitable interest, a number of additional defences may be available to C.

Secondly, as we saw in Chapter 4, section 1, a key feature of a legal property right is that it imposes a prima facie duty on the rest of the world. As noted in the following extracts, however, that does not seem to be the case with all equitable interests.

Swadling, 'The Law of Property' in English Private Law
(ed Burrows, 2nd edn, 2007, [4.23])

[E]quitable rights which might be seen as 'proprietary' behave in a slightly different fashion to those at common law. At common law, as we have seen, the right is exigible directly against anyone interfering with it. Thus, the holder of a common law easement can sue for damages and an injunction against any third party, be it a successor in title of the original grantor or even a complete stranger, who interferes with his right. This is not generally true for equitable property rights. Take, for example, the case of an option to purchase a fee simple estate in land [...] such a right will generally bind transferees of the fee simple in question from its grantor, and so is classed as a property right. But it will not bind other third parties, such as squatters. Although a squatter will be bound by easements granted by the person he has dispossessed, he will not be bound by an option to purchase. Indeed, he could not be bound by any such right, for the burden of such a right entails a duty to convey the right contracted to be sold, and the squatter does not have that right. The only exception would seem to be the restrictive covenant, which has been held to bind persons other than a successor in title of the grantor.

Penner, 'Duty and Liability in Respect of Funds' in Commercial Law: Perspectives and Practice (eds Lowry and Mistelis, 2006, pp 214–16)

[I]t is necessary to make a distinction between two version of the notion of rights in rem, both of which operate in law but which are often not clearly distinguished. The best way to see the distinction is not to focus on the right, but on the corresponding duties or liabilities. Under the first, 'trespassory' version of rights in rem, a right is protected by duties in rem that everyone owes to the right holder, which bind everyone unconditionally all the time. The best example is the case of the ownership of a chattel: all persons presently have a right not to interfere with your chattels. Of course there may be factual contingency here—I may be > in no position to interfere with your Rolls-Royce at the minute because it is in the shop in Guildford, but that doesn't mean I have no duty not to interfere with it in law. This notion of rights/duties in rem is the one normally spoken of by philosophers when they speak of rights of property binding all the world.

> The second, 'successor' version is distinct but equally often encountered in the law. Such a right in rem is one which in principle, may bind all others, not because of the fact that each of us all presently owe a duty to the rightholder, but because of the fact that in principle all persons may become a successor in title or possession to property which is bound by the right-holder's right. Here, the right-holder's right is in rem, binds all the world, because it binds successors in title or possession to another distinct property, and the right holder's interest runs with that property, and anyone, in principle, might be a successor in title or—possession to it [...]
> I will now look at the liability of third party recipients of trust property [...i]n doing so I will rely upon the distinction just drawn. It is one of the features of the particular property interest that exists in a trust fund that the trust reveals the distinction between the trespassory and successor versions of the right in rem in the following way: in so far as their proprietary rights are concerned, the trust divides the rights of the trustee and the rights of the beneficiary such that the trustee has all the trespassory rights in rem to the trust property, while the beneficiaries' rights are purely successor rights in rem—rights to enforce the trust against successors in title to the trustee of any property which can be seen to constitute an asset of the [trust] fund.

It may, therefore, be the case that legal property rights and equitable property rights are conceptually, as well as historically, different. Each type of right differs from a personal right, as each is capable of binding a third party. Legal property rights are capable of binding any third party, so if B has a legal property right in land, the rest of the world is under a prima facie duty to B not to interfere with the land. In contrast, if B has an equitable interest in A's land, B's right is capable of binding only A and parties later acquiring a right from A.

This possible difference in the effect of legal and equitable property rights can be related to the different content of each type of right. In particular, we have seen in this Chapter that an equitable interest in land depends on A's coming under a duty to B. In the following extract, it is suggested that the difference between equitable property rights on the one hand, and personal rights on the other, is that in the former case, A's duty to B relates to a specific right held by A. As a result, B is permitted to assert a right not only against A, but also against third parties who later acquire A's right, or a right that depends on A's right. B, however, is not permitted to assert a right against X, a third party who does not acquire any right from A, as, in such a case, it is not possible for B to trace A's right into X's hands.

McFarlane and Stevens, 'The Nature of Equitable Property'
(2010, 4 Journal of Equity 1, pp 1–2)

> This article proposes three principal theses about the nature of equitable property rights. The first is that such rights are fundamentally different not only from personal rights but also from the property rights recognised by common law. An equitable property right is neither a right against a person nor a right against a thing. Rather, it is a right against a right. [...]

> The second thesis is that, whenever a party (B) has a right against a right of another (A), B's right is prima facie binding on anyone who acquires a right that derives from A's right. [. . .] Nonetheless, there remains a difference between a right against a thing and a right against a right. The key attribute of a right against a thing is its universal exigibility: if B has a right against a thing, B's right is prima facie binding on the rest of the world. The key attribute of a right against a right can be labelled persistence: if B has a right against A's right, B's right is prima facie binding on anyone who acquires a right that derives from A's right.
> The third thesis is that B will acquire such a persistent right whenever A is under a duty to hold a specific claim-right or power, in a particular way, for B. [. . .]
> [The approach taken in this article] it rejects a very common, not to say orthodox, view of the nature of equitable property rights. On that view, such rights are, in effect, a weaker, more vulnerable version of the property rights recognised at common law. Both types of right give their holder the power to exclude others from making use of a thing, but the equitable variety is weaker than its common law counterpart as it is generally vulnerable to the bona fide purchaser defence. That view, however, overlooks the genius of equity. That genius consists in its willingness to transcend, not to duplicate, the classic division between rights against things and rights against people. This has resulted in the concept of a right against a right. By recognising the distinctiveness of that concept, it is possible to avoid the orthodox, but unattractive, view that English law contains two competing laws of property.

In land law, this possible difference between the effect of legal and equitable property rights is often hidden. In most cases, B's reason for claiming a property right is to assert that right against C, a party who later acquired a right from A. So, in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth,[22] for example, Mrs Ainsworth wished to show that a right she held against Mr Ainsworth could also bind the bank: a party later acquiring a right from Mr Ainsworth. In such a case, Mrs Ainsworth would be happy either with a right in the land itself (a right against a thing) or a right against Mr Ainsworth's right: each type of right would be prima facie binding on the bank.

McFarlane and Stevens do acknowledge in their article that one particular equitable property right, the restrictive covenant, has departed from the 'right against a right' model as it has been allowed to bind C, even if C has not acquired a right from A.[23] This occurred in a case where B was allowed to assert a restrictive covenant against a squatter:[24] a third party who had not acquired his title to the land from A, but who had rather acquired that right independently,[25] through his action in taking possession of the land. They argue, however, that the restrictive covenant has been allowed to operate in this anomalous way for particular policy reasons: to use the terms we discussed in Chapter 1, section 5.2, this is an example of courts giving more weight to the 'utility model' rather than the 'doctrinal model'.

In the following case, B's right was not a restrictive covenant; it was rather an equitable interest arising under a trust. On the facts of the case, it was important to know if B's right was a right in a thing (prima facie binding on anyone interfering with the thing) or a right against A's right (prima facie binding only on those later acquiring a right that derives from A's right).

[2010] EWCA Civ 180, [2011] QB 86

Facts: The largest peace-time explosion in Britain occurred in the early morning of 11 December 2005 at the Buncefield oil storage terminal in Hertfordshire. The explosion was caused by the careless overfilling of a fuel storage tank, for which the defendants were responsible. The destruction and damage extended to fuel storage and pipeline facilities used by Shell. As a result, Shell suffered serious loss through its temporary inability to supply fuel to customers in the South East of England. Shell sought to recover compensation from the defendants. The defendants conceded that their negligence had caused Shell to suffer economic loss, but argued that they owed no duty of care to Shell. This argument was based on the fact that Shell did not hold legal title to the damaged facilities, nor to the land on which those facilities stood. The legal title to the land and facilities was held by two service companies on trust for four beneficiaries, including Shell. The defendants' argument succeeded at first instance, where David Steel J held that the general rule that there is no duty to avoid carelessly causing economic loss applied: Shell's equitable interest in the damaged property did not prevent the application of that rule. Particular reliance was placed on the decision of the House of Lords in Leigh & Sillivan Ltd v Aliakmon Shipping Co Ltd (The Aliakmon),[26] in which Lord Brandon found that a beneficiary of a trust of goods could not bring a claim against a party who had carelessly damaged those goods, stating that: 'in order to enable a person to claim in negligence for loss caused to him by reason of loss or damage to property, he must have had either the legal ownership of or a possessory title to the property concerned at the time when the loss or damage occurred'.[27] The Court of Appeal, however, upheld Shell's appeal. Waller LJ delivered a judgment of the court, to which its other members (Longmore and Richards LJJ) also contributed.

[Counsel for Shell] accepted that Lord Brandon in The Aliakmon[28] had confined the right to sue for negligent loss of or damage to property to a person who had "the legal ownership of or a possessory title to" the relevant property but he submitted that Lord Brandon was not intending to rule out the owner in equity at any rate if that equitable owner had (as Shell had) joined the legal owner to the proceedings [. . .]

The first proposition [of counsel for the claimants in The Aliakmon] in relation to equitable ownership in The Aliakmon was that the owner in equity was entitled to sue in tort for negligence anyone who by want of care caused his property to be lost or damaged, without joining the legal owner as a party to the action. Lord Brandon responded that that proposition could not be supported. He explained this response by saying:[29]

> "There may be cases where a person who is the equitable owner of certain goods has also a possessory title to them. In such a case he is entitled, by virtue of his possessory title rather than his equitable ownership, to sue in tort for negligence anyone whose want of care has caused loss of or damage to the goods without joining the legal owner as a party to the action: see for instance Healey v Healey.[30] If, however, the person is the equitable owner of the goods and no more, then he must join the legal owner as a party to the action, either as co-plaintiff if he is willing or as co-defendant if he is not. This has always been the law in the field of equitable > ownership of land and I see no reason why it should not also be so in the field of equitable ownership of goods."

In this passage Lord Brandon appears to contemplate that joining the legal owner will suffice to enable the beneficial owner to sue for his loss or, perhaps more accurately, that once both the legal owner and the beneficial owner are parties to the action they can recover, subject to the rules of remoteness of damage, for all the loss which they have suffered.

[Counsel] for Total submitted that that was too simplistic a view of what Lord Brandon was saying. First, Lord Brandon would not have used the words "legal ownership" [in the quotation set out in the facts of the case, above] if beneficial ownership (albeit together with the legal ownership) was enough. Secondly the point of requiring the legal owner to be a party to the action was (as was the case in The Aliakmon itself) to enable recovery to be made for physical loss or damage to the goods not to enable a claim for the negligent infliction of economic loss suffered by the beneficial owner which he would never be able to mount in his own name and on his own behalf.

It is fair to say that Lord Brandon's speech in The Aliakmon does not resolve the question which divides the parties in this case [. . .]

In the absence of any directly applicable authority, it is necessary to look in a little more detail at the exclusionary rule and the rationale for it. The rule is set out in Clerk & Lindsell on Torts[31]

> "no duty is owed by a defendant who negligently damages property belonging to a third party, to a claimant who suffers loss because of a dependence upon that property or its owner."

So on the facts of this case Total, who has admittedly damaged the pipelines owned by [the service companies], submits that it owes no duty to Shell who has a contractual right to have its fuel loaded into, carried and discharged from the pipelines. If Shell were a complete stranger to the transaction that would be understandable but Shell is not a complete stranger. It is the (co-) beneficial owner of the pipelines and the contract to use the pipeline is only an incident of its beneficial ownership (albeit a necessary incident, since it is a co-owner of the pipelines with others who also wish to use it). On the face of things, it is legalistic to deny Shell a right to recovery by reference to the exclusionary rule. It is, after all, Shell who is (along with BP, Total and Chevron) the "real" owner, the "legal" owner being little more than a bare trustee of the pipelines. [. . .]

The editors of Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, summarise the position by saying:[32]

> "To allow all claims for such economic loss would lead to unacceptable indeterminacy because of the ripple effects caused by contracts and expectations. Proximity requires some special relationship between the defendant and the person suffering relational economic loss, one which goes beyond mere contractual or non-contractual dependence on the damaged property."

Beneficial ownership of the damaged property goes well beyond contractual or non-contractual dependence on the damaged property and does indeed constitute a special relationship of the kind required by the editors. It is, in fact, a closer relationship in many ways than that of a bare trustee having no more than the legal title.

We must confess to being somewhat influenced . . . by what Lord Goff of Chieveley in White v Jones called "the impulse to do practical justice".[33] It should not be legally relevant that the > co-owners of the relevant pipelines, for reasons that seemed good to them, decided to vest the legal title to the pipelines in their service companies and enjoy the beneficial ownership rather than the formal legal title. Differing views about the wisdom of the exclusionary rule are widely held but however much one may think that, in general, there should be no duty to mere contracting parties who suffer economic loss as a result of damage to a third party's property, it would be a triumph of form over substance to deny a remedy to the beneficial owner of that property when the legal owner is a bare trustee for that beneficial owner.

> The judge understandably relied on The Aliakmon to dismiss Shell's claim but, for the reasons given, The Aliakmon does not conclude the argument about equitable ownership once the legal owner has been joined . . . It leaves the question open for this court to determine and we would reverse the judge on this aspect of this case and hold that Shell can recover for its provable loss or, if formality is necessary, that [the service companies holding the land on trust] can recover the amount which Shell has lost but will hold the sums so recovered as trustees for Shell.

The reasoning of the Court of Appeal in Shell UK v Total UK is, perhaps, rather surprising. A number of previous decisions, not only The Aliakmon, seemed to establish that if A holds a property right on trust for B, and the property is taken or damaged by X, then, assuming B did not have possession of the property, only A can bring a claim against X.[34] On this model, any damages recovered by A will then be held on trust for B, but A's claim against X is based on X's breach of a duty owed to A. This means that if, as in Shell UK v Total UK, B suffers consequential loss as a result of X's breach of duty, that loss is not recoverable from X. After all, if A has a property right, A can in theory declare that he holds that right on trust for an unlimited number of people; can all of those people then recover their consequential loss from X if X has the misfortune carelessly to damage A's property?

The defendants were given permission to appeal to the Supreme Court, but the case was settled before any such appeal was heard. There may have been a number of alternative bases on which Shell's claim could have been allowed. First, it was accepted by the first instance judge that, if Shell could show that it had suffered loss which was 'particular, substantial and direct' as a result of the explosion, a claim in public nuisance would be available.[35] Such a claim can be made in respect of purely economic loss and does not depend on the claimant having any legal, or even equitable, property right. Second, it may have been possible for Shell to argue that it had a legal property right by virtue of its possession of the land and facilities, such possession arising because the service companies were acting as agents for Shell and the other beneficiaries, and their possession was thus attributable to Shell and the other beneficiaries.

The result reached by the Court of Appeal may therefore not be too surprising; but its reasoning has attracted a great deal of criticism.[36] It is the first and thus far only decision in which, in effect, B's interest under a trust has been held binding against a stranger, rather than against a third party later acquiring a right from A. The difficulty is that the court equated the position of a beneficiary of a trust of land with that of an owner of land, stating that it would be 'legalistic' to deny Shell's claim simply because it had an equitable interest in the land rather than a legal estate or legal interest. To use the language of McFarlane & Stevens in the extract set out above, that analysis seems to adopt the 'very common, not to say orthodox, view' that the only difference in the effect of legal and equitable property rights is that the latter are subject to a greater range of defences. It overlooks the argument, developed in the extracts set out in this section, that equitable property rights are conceptually different from legal property rights, as B's equitable property right can bind only A and A's successors, whereas legal property rights can bind the whole world. It is true that the Court of Appeal did impose a condition on Shell's claim: the service companies, as trustees, had to be joined to the claim against Total. This requirement preserves a formal difference between legal and equitable property rights. The surprise in Shell UK v Total UK, however, is that Total could be made to pay not only for the value of the destroyed or damaged property but also for the consequential loss suffered by Shell.

QUESTIONS

1. How did equitable property rights develop?
2. Why might the term 'equitable estate in land' be misleading?
3. Why might a party with a freehold or lease decide to set up a trust of that right?
4. Is the limit on the number of permissible legal estates in land, imposed by s 1 of the Law of Property Act 1925, undermined by the variety of different rights which may be enjoyed by a beneficiary of a trust of land?
5. The criteria for proprietary status set out by Lord Wilberforce in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth[37] have been described as 'riddled with circularity'.[38] Do you agree?
6. In what ways do equitable property rights have a different effect from that of legal property rights?

DIRECT RIGHTS

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Many land law cases share a basic form: a dispute arises between B and C, each of whom wants to make an inconsistent use of the land. We saw in Chapters 4 and 5 that the courts will find in favour of B if B has a pre-existing legal or equitable property right, and C has no defence to that right.
2. It is possible, however, for B to prevail even if he or she has no pre-existing property right; and even if he or she has a property right to which C has a defence. B can do so if he or she can assert a direct right against C.
3. A direct right, unlike a pre-existing property right, arises as a result of C's conduct. In this chapter, we will consider some examples of situations in which C's conduct allows a court to recognise that B has a direct right against C.
4. In most cases, it will be very difficult for B to show that he or she has a direct right against C. For example, if C buys some land by acquiring A's freehold or lease, it is very unlikely that C will act in such a way as to give B a direct right. Nonetheless, in some cases, direct rights may provide a court with a useful means to protect B. For example, a direct right can protect B even if he or she has failed to ensure that his or her pre-existing property right is recorded on the register.
5. It is not always clear whether the result of a particular case depends on B asserting a direct right against C or, instead, on B having a pre-existing property right to which C has no defence. When analysing the cases, however, it is very important to distinguish between those two possibilities. We will see the importance of this distinction in Chapter 21, section 3.3, when analysing the contractual licence.

1 INTRODUCTION: THE CONCEPT OF A DIRECT RIGHT

We saw in Chapters 4 and 5 that if B and C each wish to make an inconsistent use of the same piece of land, it is important to ask: (i) whether B has a pre-existing legal or equitable property right; and (ii) if so, whether C has a defence to that right. But it is also important to bear in mind the possibility of B having a direct right against C. For example, in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth,[1] a case that we examined in Chapter 1, section 5, and Chapter 5, sections 2 and 5.4, we saw that, when the bank acquired its charge, Mrs Ainsworth had no pre-existing property right. Imagine, however, that the bank had nonetheless made a contractual promise to Mrs Ainsworth to allow her to remain in occupation of the land. In such a case, the fact that Mrs Ainsworth had no pre-existing property right would be irrelevant: she would simply be able to rely on her direct, contractual right against the bank.

The important point about a direct right, as opposed to a pre-existing property right, is that it arises as a result of C's own conduct. Of course, in Ainsworth, the bank did not make a contractual promise to Mrs Ainsworth; nor did it do anything else to give her a direct right (as we will see in section 2.6). After all, the bank wanted to ensure that, if Mr Ainsworth failed to repay the mortgage loan, it would be able to sell the land with vacant possession: it therefore had no reason to act in such a way as to give Mrs Ainsworth a direct right. In some cases, however, there may be an incentive for A, when giving C a right, to ensure that C does, indeed, act in such a way as to give B a direct right.

For example, consider the situation in Rhone v Stephens,[2] a case that we examined in Chapter 5, section 5.3. There, A's roof overhung B's land, and A had made a promise to B that he and future owners of his land would keep that roof in good repair. The question then arose of whether A's promise could give B, and later owners of B's land, an equitable interest in A's land: a right that was capable of binding C, who later acquired A's freehold. As we saw, the House of Lords found that A's promise did not give B an equitable interest: in general,[3] a promise to act in a certain way, unlike a promise not to act in a certain way, cannot currently give B a legal or equitable interest in land (see Chapter 26, section 2.3, for more detail). The rule applied in Rhone v Stephens thus causes B a problem if he or she wants to ensure that later owners of A's land, as well as A, will be under a duty to perform a positive act, such as repairing a roof. As we will see in Chapter 26, section 2.4.2, one possible response to this problem is for B to give A an incentive, when transferring his or her freehold to C, to make C agree to repair the roof. This can be done by a chain of 'indemnity covenants': the initial agreement between A and B makes clear that A not only has a duty to repair the roof, but also to ensure that, if he or she later transfers his or her freehold to C, C will also agree to repair the roof. Of course, B still faces the risk that A, when transferring the land to C, will not extract that promise from C—but the terms of A's initial promise to B do at least give A an incentive to ensure that C makes that promise. The question then arises of whether C's promise, if made to A, can give B a direct right against C.

2 WHEN WILL B HAVE A DIRECT RIGHT AGAINST C?

There are many different means by which B can acquire a direct right against C. We will concentrate here on those that are most likely to be relevant in a dispute relating to the use of land.

2 [1994] 2 AC 310.

3 As we saw when examining Walsh v Lonsdale in Chapter 5, section 6, there is an exception where A's promise is to give B a property right in relation to A's land: this point will be explored further in Chapter 9. In such a case, A is not simply promising to act in a particular way; he or she is instead promising to exercise a power to grant a property right in favour of B.

2.1 WHERE C GIVES B A DIRECT RIGHT BY MEANS OF A DEED

If C chooses to give B a direct right, C can use a deed to do so. As the following extract shows, it is important to distinguish between cases in which the deed is executed by C alone; and those in which the deed is entered into by both C and another party. In the latter case, it may well be that C makes the deed with A, not with B. After all, C, when acquiring his or her right, must deal with A, and, if C is acquiring a legal estate in the land from A, it will usually be necessary for a deed to be used. The fact that C deals with A, not B, may seem to make it more difficult for B to acquire a direct right against C. As discussed in the following extract, however, that problem is alleviated by s 56 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925) (set out after the extract). We will return to s 56 in Chapter 26, section 3.3.3, when examining promises made between owners of neighbouring land.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 268–9)[4]

C can use a deed to give B a direct right [. . .] If the deed is executed by C alone, it is known as a deed poll. C can use such a deed to give B a direct right even if there is no agreement between B and C and even if B is not aware of the deed.[5]

An additional requirement applies to a deed executed not just by C, but by C and another party, such as A. Such a deed is known as an inter partes (between parties) deed: the deed itself will record that it is made between C and A. Again, C can use such a deed to give B a right. However, the traditional rule is that B can only acquire a right by means of an inter partes deed if B is named as one of the parties to the deed.[6] So, the deed itself must record that it is made between all three parties: A, B and C.

However, where C attempts to give B a right relating to a thing,[7] section 56 of the Law of Property Act 1925 provides an exception. Even if C uses an inter partes deed, and fails to name B as a party to the deed, B can acquire a right. The section thus means that where C attempts to deal directly with B by means of an inter partes deed, C's failure to include B as a party to the deed will not prevent B acquiring a direct right against C.

It is important to note the limits of the section 56 exception: it cannot be used whenever C makes a promise in a deed that happens to, or is even intended to, benefit B.[8] Instead, C must purport to deal directly with B: C must make a promise to B or otherwise attempt to give B a right.[9] As a result, B must be identifiable at the time the deed is executed.[10]

7 Section 56 allows B to acquire a right relating to 'land or other property'. The majority of the House of Lords in Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58 take the strange view that the section can only apply to give B a right relating to land, or to a property right in land. The natural reading of the section, however, is that it can apply whenever C attempts to give B a right relating to the use of a thing.

8 As was made clear by Neuberger J in Amsprop Trading Ltd v Harris Distribution Ltd [1997] 1 WLR 1025.

9 See also Simonds J in White v Bijou Mansions Ltd [1937] Ch 610, 625: B can only rely on s 56 if 'although not named as a party to the instrument, [B] is yet a person to whom that conveyance or other instrument purports to grant some thing or with whom some agreement or covenant is purported to be made'. That view was cited with approval by Lords Upjohn and Pearce in Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58, 106 (Lord Upjohn) and 92–4 (Lord Pearce), and was also accepted by Neuberger J in Amsprop Trading Ltd v Harris Distribution Ltd [1997] 1 WLR 1025.

10 For example, if C has promised to give a right to 'future owners of A's property', then B, a future owner of that thing, cannot use s 56, because he could not have been specifically identified when C made the promise in the deed.

> (1) A person may take an immediate or other interest in land or other property, or the benefit of any condition, right of entry, covenant, or agreement over or respecting land or other property, although he may not be named as a party to the conveyance or other instrument.

2.2 WHERE C GIVES B A DIRECT RIGHT BY MEANS OF A CONTRACTUAL PROMISE

If C chooses to give B a direct right, C may also do so by means of a contractual promise. Again, the fact that C is likely to deal only with A may seem to cause B a problem: if C's promise is made to A, and if only A provides consideration for it, then it seems that B cannot acquire a contractual right against C. The Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, however, now allows B, in certain situations, to acquire a statutory right as a result of C's contractual promise to A.

Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s 1

> (1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a person who is not a party to a contract (a "third party") may in his own right enforce a term of the contract if—
> (a) the contract expressly provides that he may, or
> (b) subject to subsection (2), the term purports to confer a benefit on him.
> (2) Subsection (1)(b) does not apply if on a proper construction of the contract it appears that the parties did not intend the term to be enforceable by the third party.
> (3) The third party must be expressly identified in the contract by name, as a member of a class or as answering a particular description but need not be in existence when the contract is entered into.
> (4) This section does not confer a right on a third party to enforce a term of a contract otherwise than subject to and in accordance with any other relevant terms of the contract.
> (5) For the purpose of exercising his right to enforce a term of the contract, there shall be available to the third party any remedy that would have been available to him in an action for breach of contract if he had been a party to the contract (and the rules relating to damages, injunctions, specific performance and other relief shall apply accordingly).

Section 1(5) is particularly worth noting: where land is concerned, it is often the case that a court will protect a contractual right by means of specific performance or an injunction: for example, as we will see in Chapter 21, section 3.1.2, if A makes a contractual promise to B to allow B to occupy land for a period, a court will usually intervene, at B's request, to grant an injunction preventing A from breaching that promise. Similarly, then, if C makes a contractual promise to A to allow B to occupy land for a period, it will generally be the case that if B has a right against C, arising under s 1 of the 1999 Act, that right will be protected by means of an injunction.

The effect of the 1999 Act can be compared to that of s 56 of the LPA 1925. It is clear that the 1999 Act has a wider scope: for example, there is no need for C's promise to be made in a deed. Further, B does not need to be in existence and identifiable when C makes his or her promise: a promise by C for the benefit of 'A's current and future neighbours' can give B a right under the 1999 Act even if B becomes A's neighbour after C has made his or her promise. As a result, the 1999 Act can be important in practice: we will therefore return to it in Chapter 21, section 3.3.1 and Chapter 26, section 3.3.3. It is worth noting here, however, that it is possible for B to rely on s 56 of the LPA 1925 in order to acquire a legal estate or interest in C's land.[11] In contrast, if B relies instead on the 1999 Act, C's promise can, at most, give B an equitable interest in C's land (see section 3 below).

2.3 WHERE C GIVES B A DIRECT RIGHT BY MEANS OF A NON-CONTRACTUAL PROMISE

The Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 can only assist B where C has made a contractual promise to A. If C makes any promise to benefit B, it is likely to be made as part of the contract under which C acquires an estate or interest in land from A. This means that, as we noted in Chapter 5, section 6, the formality rule imposed by s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989) will apply. We will examine that rule in more detail in Chapter 7, section 3. Its basic effect is that C's promise will be contractually binding on C only if it is recorded in writing signed by both A and C. So, if A transfers his or her estate to C and C simply makes an oral promise for B's benefit, it seems that: (i) C's promise will not be contractually binding; and so (ii) B will not be able to rely on the 1999 Act to acquire a direct right against C.

In such a case, B may, however, be able to rely on a different principle to acquire a direct right against C. Even before the passing of the 1999 Act, the courts recognized that, in certain situations, a promise made by C to A could give B a direct right against C. It has been suggested that the principle is that if: (i) C makes a promise to A to give B a right in relation to the land; and (ii) as a result of that promise, C acquires some sort of advantage in relation to his or her acquisition of the land; then (iii) C will be under a duty to B to perform their promise.[12] The suggested principle is an equitable one and does not depend on C's promise being contractually binding. It has been called the 'receipt after a promise' principle as it seems to depend on the argument that it would be unjust for C, having acquired a right from A, both to retain the advantage stemming from his or her promise and to be free to renege on that promise.[13] Whilst there is much controversy as to the exact basis[14] and scope[15] of the principle, some evidence for its existence can be derived from the following three extracts.

[11] In some cases (e.g. where C grants B a non-exceptional lease of seven years or less) B can acquire a legal property right simply through the use of a deed; in most cases, however, B will also need to register in order to acquire a legal property right: see Chapter 22, section 3.1.

[1948] 2 All ER 133, CA

Facts: Mrs Bannister had a freehold of two cottages: 30 and 31 Maryland Cottages, Mountnessing, Essex. She planned to sell her freehold to Mr Bannister, her brother-in-law. She told him that she was only willing to sell if she could continue to live in No 30. He orally agreed to this, telling her: 'I will let you stay as long as you like, rent free.' The freehold of the two cottages was then transferred to Mr Bannister by means of a standard conveyance, which made no mention of Mrs Bannister's right to remain in No 30. But Mr Bannister paid only £250 for the land, which was, in fact, worth around £400. Following a dispute between Mrs Bannister and her brother-in-law, Mr Bannister sought an order for possession of No 30. He argued that his oral promise, at most, gave Mrs Bannister a 'tenancy at will'—that is, a permission to occupy that could be revoked by Mr Bannister at any time. The Court of Appeal rejected that argument and found that Mr Bannister, as a result of his promise, held his freehold of No 30 on trust for Mrs Bannister: under that trust, he had a duty to use the freehold for her benefit for the rest of her life, provided that she continued to occupy No 30.

Scott LJ

In view of the learned county court judge's acceptance of [Mrs Bannister's] evidence he necessarily found as a fact that the oral agreement as a result of which [Mrs Bannister] conveyed Nos 30 and 31 to [Mr Bannister] for £250 included an undertaking by [Mr Bannister] to permit [Mrs Bannister] to stay in No 30 for as long as she liked rent free, and that, but for this undertaking, [Mrs Bannister] would not have sold the two cottages to [Mr Bannister] at what, on the uncontradicted evidence of value, he rightly described as "a bargain price." He further found as a fact that there was no fraud in the case. On these findings of fact he held that on well-known equitable principles there was (as he put it) an implied or inferential trust, or, in other words, a constructive trust, of No 30 under which [Mr Bannister] held that property in trust for [Mrs Bannister] for life.

The conclusion thus reached by the learned county court judge was attacked in this court on substantially the following three grounds:—First, it was said that the oral undertaking found by the learned county court judge to have formed part of the agreement—namely, that [Mr Bannister] would let [Mrs Bannister] stay in No 30 as long as she liked rent free—did not, as a matter of construction of the language used, amount to a promise that [Mrs Bannister] should retain a life interest in No 30, but amounted merely to a promise that [Mr Bannister] would allow [Mrs Bannister] to remain in No 30 rent free as his tenant at will. Secondly, it was said that, even if the terms of the oral undertaking were such as to amount to a promise that [Mrs Bannister] should retain a life interest in No 30, a tenancy at will free of rent was, nevertheless, the greatest interest she could claim in view of the absence of writing and the provisions of ss 53 and 54 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. Thirdly, it was said that a constructive trust in favour of [Mrs Bannister] (which the absence of writing admittedly would not defeat) could only be raised by findings to the effect that there was actual fraud on the part of [Mr Bannister] and that the property was sold and conveyed to him on the faith of an express oral declaration of trust which it would be fraudulent in him to deny. It was, accordingly, submitted that the learned county court judge's conclusion that there was a constructive trust could not stand since it was negatived by his finding that there was no fraud in the case and by the absence of any evidence of anything amounting to an express oral declaration of trust.

In support of the first of these three objections reliance was placed on Buck v Howarth,[16] in which a King's Bench Divisional Court held that the occupant of a house who had been told by a predecessor in title of the freeholder "that he could live in the house until he died" (an oral and, it would seem, a purely voluntary promise) was given an uncertain interest in the premises and that the law would presume a tenancy at will [...] That was, obviously, a very different case from the present one and we find ourselves unable to derive any assistance from it. The promise was a purely voluntary one, and any court would naturally have been slow to construe it as intended to confer a life interest, even if it was literally capable of that construction. Moreover, whatever the words may have meant, the case clearly fell within s 54 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, under which interests in land created by parol have the force and effect of interests at will only. There was, of course, no question of a resulting trust as there might have been if the occupant of the house had been a former owner who had sold the freehold on the faith of a similar promise. In the present case [Mrs Bannister] did, on the facts found, sell and convey the property on the faith of the oral undertaking and would not otherwise have done so, and the undertaking must be assumed to have been regarded as reserving to her a benefit worth at least £150, or three-eights of the contemporary market value of the property without vacant possession. We, therefore, see no reason why the words of the undertaking should not be given the most favourable construction, from [Mrs Bannister's] point of view, of which they are properly capable. Similar words in deeds and wills have frequently been held to create a life interest determinable (apart from the special considerations introduced by the Settled Land Act, 1925) on the beneficiary ceasing to occupy the premises [...] In our view, that is the meaning which should, in the circumstances of the present case, be placed on the words of the oral undertaking found by the learned county court judge to have been given by [Mr Bannister]. We are, accordingly, of opinion that the first objection fails, though the interest promised to [Mrs Bannister] by [Mr Bannister] must, we think, be taken to have been a life interest determinable on her ceasing to occupy No 30 and not a life interest simpliciter as held by the learned county court judge.

As will be seen from what is said below, the second objection (based on want of writing) in effect stands or falls with the third, and it will, therefore, be convenient to deal with that next. It is, we think, clearly a mistake to suppose that the equitable principle on which a constructive trust is raised against a person who insists on the absolute character of a conveyance to himself for the purpose of defeating a beneficial interest, which, according to the true bargain, was to belong to another, is confined to cases in which the conveyance itself was fraudulently obtained. The fraud which brings the principle into play arises as soon as the absolute character of the conveyance is set up for the purpose of defeating the beneficial interest, and that is the fraud to cover which the Statute of Frauds or the corresponding provisions of the Law of Property Act, 1925, cannot be called in aid in cases in which no written evidence of the real bargain is available. Nor is it, in our opinion, necessary that the bargain on which the absolute conveyance is made should include any express stipulation that the grantee is in so many words to hold as trustee. It is enough that the bargain should have included a stipulation under which some sufficiently defined beneficial interest in the property was to be taken by another [...] We see no distinction in principle between a case in which property is conveyed to a purchaser on terms that the entire beneficial interest in some part of it is to be retained by the vendor [...] and a case, like the present, in which property is conveyed to a purchaser on terms that a limited beneficial interest in some part of it is to be retained by the vendor. We are, accordingly, of the opinion that the third ground of objection to the learned county court judge's conclusion also fails. His finding that there was no fraud in the case cannot be taken as meaning that it was not fraudulent in [Mr Bannister] to insist on the absolute character of the conveyance for the purpose of defeating the beneficial interest which he had agreed [Mrs Bannister] should retain. The conclusion that [Mr Bannister] was fraudulent, in this sense, necessarily follows from the facts found, and, as indicated above, the fact that he may have been innocent of any fraudulent intent in taking the conveyance in absolute form is for this purpose immaterial. The failure of the third ground of objection necessarily also destroys the second objection based on want of writing and the provisions of ss 53 and 54 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

One important point in Bannister is that Mrs Bannister's right arose under a trust: there is a slight puzzle as to the nature of this trust, and so we will examine it further in Chapter 11, section 4.3.1. For our present purposes, however, the importance of the decision in Bannister lies in the recognition that a party acquiring an estate or interest in land can come under a duty as a result of an oral, non-contractual promise made when acquiring that estate or interest. Certainly, Mrs Bannister did not assert her pre-existing freehold against Mr Bannister: after all, she transferred that very right to him. Instead, she relied on a new, direct right, arising as a result of Mr Bannister's promise to her.

Of course, there is a difference between the facts of Bannister and the three-party situation in which C, on acquiring an estate or interest from A, makes a promise to give B a direct right. But it seems that the principle set out in Bannister can also apply in a three-party case. Certainly, Lord Denning MR took that view in the following extract.

[1972] Ch 359, CA

Facts: Mrs Evans lived with her husband in a cottage in Cardiff Road, Newport. The cottage was owned by the husband's employers, the trustees of the Tredegar Estate. After her husband died, Mrs Evans entered into an agreement with the trustees, under which she was allowed to remain in the cottage for the rest of her life. The trustees then sold some land, including the cottage, to Mr and Mrs Binions. The trustees warned them that Mrs Evans was entitled to remain in the cottage for the rest of her life and sold the land 'subject to' her right; as a result, Mr and Mrs Binions bought the land for a reduced price. They then brought proceedings to remove Mrs Evans from the cottage. Mrs Evans claimed that: (i) her agreement with the trustees gave her a pre-existing property right that was binding on Mr and Mrs Binions; and, in any case, (ii) the term included in the sale to Mr and Mrs Binions gave her a direct right against them.

Lord Denning MR

[Lord Denning MR first examined the argument that the agreement between Mrs Evans and the trustees gave her a pre-existing property right. His Lordship then considered the position if the agreement gave her no such right.]

Suppose, however, that [Mrs Evans] did not have an equitable interest at the outset, nevertheless it is quite plain that she obtained one afterwards when the Tredegar Estate sold > the cottage. They stipulated with [Mr and Mrs Binions] that they were to take the house 'subject to' [Mrs Evans'] rights under the agreement. They supplied [Mr and Mrs Binions] with a copy of the contract: and [Mr and Mrs Binions] paid less because of her right to stay there. In these circumstances, this court will impose on [Mr and Mrs Binions] a constructive trust for [Mrs Evans'] benefit: for the simple reason that it would be utterly inequitable for Mr and Mrs Binions to turn Mrs Evans out contrary to the stipulation subject to which they took the premises. That seems to me clear from the important decision of Bannister v Bannister,[17] which was applied by the judge and which I gladly follow.

Lord Denning MR thus adopted the view that C's oral promise to A could give B a direct right against C, arising under a constructive trust. In Chapter 21, section 3.3.1, we will see that there are a number of significant problems with the view that B's right arose under a trust. For present purposes, however, the important point is the recognition that B can acquire a direct right against C as a result of C's oral promise to A.

This particular means by which B can acquire a direct right against C is considered further in the following extract. The court's analysis also provides a very good example of the fact that, even if C has a defence to a pre-existing property right of B, it may nonetheless be possible for B to have a direct right against C.

[2001] EWCA Civ 1754, CA

Facts: Mr Ingham had a long lease (999 years) of Moorcroft Mill in Haywood, Greater Manchester. Mr Dugdale was the major shareholder and managing director of JAD Flooring Ltd. He was looking for new business premises and entered into negotiations with Mr Ingham about acquiring Mr Ingham's rights in a part of the Mill, including an office and warehouse. This part of the Mill was referred to as the 'Unit'. Mr Dugdale reached a preliminary agreement with Mr Ingham, but no formal contract was signed. Because Mr Dugdale had urgent need of the premises, however, Mr Ingham allowed JAD to begin operating from the Unit. Mr Dugdale wanted to spend money on improving the Unit, but was worried that Mr Ingham might pull out of the planned sale. Mr Ingham assured Mr Dugdale that he was a 'man of his word'. After Mr Dugdale had improved the Unit and before any formal contract of sale was signed, Mr Ingham decided to pull out of the proposed sale, and sought to remove Mr Dugdale and JAD from the Unit. Mr Dugdale refused and legal proceedings were commenced. Mr Ingham then died. His executors purchased a freehold of the Mill and then sold the Mill to the trustees of a pension scheme. By virtue of clause 14, the sale agreement was made 'subject to' the legal proceedings between Mr Ingham and Mr Dugdale. Those trustees then sought to remove Mr Dugdale and JAD from the Unit.

Mr Dugdale's first argument was that he had a pre-existing equitable property right that was binding on the pension scheme trustees. The Court of Appeal found that Mr Dugdale did, indeed, have a right, arising as a result of proprietary estoppel, that was capable of binding a third party (see further Chapter 10, section 4). But it also held that the pension scheme trustees could use the lack of registration defence provided by the Land Registration Act 1925 (LRA 1925) against Mr Dugdale's right. Mr Dugdale argued that he had an overriding interest, because he was in actual occupation of the Unit (see Chapter 12, section 3.2.2). The Court of Appeal found, however, that it was JAD, and not Mr Dugdale, who occupied the Unit. Nonetheless, the Court of Appeal, as can be seen in the following extract, did consider whether Mr Dugdale had a direct right against the pension scheme trustees, arising under a constructive trust and based on the trustees' purchase 'subject to' the legal proceedings between Mr Dugdale and Mr Ingham.

Sir Christopher Slade LJ

At [50]–[56]

Issue (D): Constructive trust

Even if Mr Dugdale did not enjoy an overriding interest in the Unit, the claimants acquired the Unit with notice of his claim and, by virtue of clause 14 of the 1994 Agreement, expressly subject thereto. There is no general principle which renders it unconscionable for a purchaser of land to rely on a want of registration of a claim against registered land, even though he took with express notice of it. A decision to the contrary would defeat the purpose of the legislature in introducing the system of registration embodied in the 1925 Act. Nevertheless, the authorities show that, in certain special circumstances the court will impose on a purchaser, who has taken a disposition expressed to be subject to specified incumbrances or prior interests, a constructive trust obliging him to give effect to them, if it considers it unconscionable for him to do otherwise, in the particular circumstances of the case.

Counsel have helpfully taken us through a number of authorities in which the court has been invited to find a constructive trust on this basis [. . .] I do not find it necessary to traverse the authorities at any length in this judgment, because I consider the relevant principles and their application to the particular facts of this case fairly clear. The relevant principles to be extracted from the authorities may for present purposes be summarised as follows:

(1) Even in a case where, on a sale of land, the vendor has stipulated that the sale shall be subject to stated possible incumbrances or prior interests, there is no general rule that the court will impose a constructive trust on the purchaser to give effect to them. In Ashburn and Anstalt v Arnold Fox LJ,[18] delivering the judgment of the court, expressed agreement with the following observations of Dillon J in Lyus v Prowsa Development Ltd:[19]

> "By contrast, there are many cases in which land is expressly conveyed subject to possible incumbrances when there is no thought at all of conferring any fresh rights on third parties who may be entitled to the benefit of the incumbrances. The land is expressed to be sold subject to incumbrances to satisfy the vendor's duty to disclose all possible incumbrances known to him, and to protect the vendor against any possible claim by the purchaser. [. . .] So, for instance, land may be contracted to be sold and may be expressed to be conveyed subject to the restrictive covenants contained in a conveyance some 60 or 90 years old. No one would suggest that by accepting such a form of contract or conveyance a purchaser is assuming a new liability in favour of third parties to observe the covenants if there was for any reason before the contract or conveyance no one who could make out a title as against the purchaser to the benefit of the covenants."

> (2) The court will not impose a constructive trust in such circumstances unless it is satisfied that the conscience of the estate owner is affected so that it would be inequitable to allow him to deny the claimant an interest in the property.[20]
> (3) In deciding whether or not the conscience of the new estate owner is affected in such circumstances, the crucially important question is whether he has undertaken a new obligation, not otherwise existing, to give effect to the relevant incumbrance or prior interest. If, but only if, he has undertaken such a new obligation will a constructive trust be imposed. The importance of this point was repeatedly stressed in Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold:[21] [. . .]
> (5) Proof that the purchase price by a transferee has been reduced upon the footing that he would give effect to the relevant incumbrance or prior interest may provide some indication that the transferee has undertaken a new obligation to give effect to it: see Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold.[22] However, since in matters relating to the title to land certainty is of prime importance, it is not desirable that constructive trusts of land should be imposed in reliance on inferences from "slender materials".[23] [. . .]
> The Judge also inferred that the purchase price paid by the claimants for the Unit had been reduced by reason of the potential claims of Mr Dugdale, but there was no evidence whatever to support this inference, which was not in my opinion justified [. . .] In my judgment, however, [the arguments made by counsel for Mr Dugdale] do not suffice to support the Judge's decision that the provisions of the 1994 Agreement gave rise to very special circumstances showing that, when the [pension fund trustees] acquired the Unit, they undertook a new liability to give effect to any rights which Mr Dugdale might have enjoyed in equity immediately prior to that acquisition. That Agreement certainly demonstrated an intention to protect the claimants against any future claims which might be made by Mr Dugdale. But, as [counsel for the pension fund trustees] pointed out, so far from imposing on the [trustees] an obligation to give effect to Mr Dugdale's asserted rights, it plainly contemplated that the [trustees] would be proceeding with the claim for possession of the Unit against him and JAD on the basis that neither he nor JAD had any rights in equity in relation to the Unit. Mr Dugdale's rights, if they existed at all, were at best uncertain and ill defined. To impose a constructive trust on the claimants would be to do so on the basis of very slender materials. There was in my judgment no thought of conferring any fresh rights on Mr Dugdale himself by the 1994 Agreement. In all the circumstances Mr Dugdale's defence based on constructive trust must in my judgment also fail.

The analysis of Sir Christopher Slade LJ is helpful in clarifying the principle applied in Binions v Evans. Firstly, B cannot acquire a direct right against C simply because C knows that B has some form of pre-existing right in relation to the land. Secondly, even if the contract between A and C states that C acquires his right 'subject to' a right of B, this may not be enough to give B a direct right against C. The question in all cases is whether C has 'undertaken a new obligation' to B. These two points, which together limit the situations in which B will be able to rely on the principle to acquire a direct right against C, were also emphasised by the Court of Appeal in Chaudhary v Yavuz.[24] In that case, B had an equitable easement to access his property by means of a metal staircase installed on A's land. A then sold his land to C. B could not argue that his pre-existing equitable interest bound C as C had a defence to it: the lack of registration defence (see Chapter 12, section 3.2 and Chapter 14, section 2.2). This defence arose as B had not entered a notice on the register to protect his equitable easement, nor could it be said that B was in actual occupation of the staircase (see Chapter 14, section 5.1). B therefore tried to argue that he had a direct right against C, using the principle developed in cases such as Bannister v Bannister.[25]

The problem for B was that the contract of sale between A and C contained no express reference to any right of B to use the staircase; nor had C made any promise outside the contract of sale. B's claim was therefore founded on no more than a term in the standard conditions of sale used by A and C: that C buys the land free from any incumbrances, other than (inter alia) 'those discoverable by inspection of the property before the contract'.[26] B argued that the presence, on A's land, of the metal staircase adjoining B's land meant that it should have been obvious to C that B might have some right over A's land. The Court of Appeal, however, rightly gave short shrift to B's somewhat fanciful claim. Firstly, B cannot acquire a direct right simply because C knows, or ought to know, that B has some form of pre-existing right in relation to the land. Secondly, the purpose of the terms in the standard conditions of sale are to protect A against possible claims from C, not to protect B by giving B a new direct right against C. It was therefore clear that, simply by entering into the standard contract with A, C had not undertaken a new obligation to B.

Chaudhary v Yavuz thus provides a useful reminder that the principle discussed here is a limited one, and will apply only in rare cases. Indeed, even if C has made a promise to A to give B a right in relation to the land, we are left with the question of precisely why B should acquire a direct right against C. Certainly, the question is a difficult one,[27] and has been complicated by the courts' insistence that B's right arises under a constructive trust. We will return to it in Chapter 11, section 4, when examining such trusts.

2.4 WHERE C COMMITS A TORT AGAINST B

The situations we have examined so far all involve C choosing to give B a direct right, whether by means of a deed (section 2.1), a contractual promise (section 2.2), or a non-contractual promise (section 2.3). But it is also possible for B to acquire a direct right against C even if C has not chosen to give B such a right. For example, it may be that C's conduct gives B a direct right because it counts as a tort against B. This was the case in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green (No 3).[28] We will examine the background to that case in detail in Chapter 12, section 3.1. Walter Green (A) owned a farm, title to which was unregistered. Walter had given his son, Geoffrey (B) an equitable interest in that land. Walter and his wife, Evelyne, then fell out with Geoffrey, and wanted to deny him the benefit of that equitable interest. Walter, therefore, sold his land to his wife (C). Geoffrey's pre-existing equitable interest was, of course, prima facie binding on Evelyne, but as Geoffrey had failed to enter his option on the Land Charges Register, the House of Lords held that Evelyne had a defence to Geoffrey's equitable interest:[29] in the words of s 13(2) of the Land Charges Act 1925, Geoffrey's equitable interest was 'void as against' Evelyne. So far, so good then, for Walter and Evelyne's plan: they succeeded in denying Geoffrey the benefit of his equitable interest in the land. In further litigation, however, Geoffrey argued that his parents had committed a tort against him, precisely because their plan was successful. His argument, accepted by Oliver J[30] and then the Court of Appeal, was that, by working together with the predominant motive of causing him loss, Walter and Evelyne had committed the tort of 'lawful act conspiracy'. As a result, each of Walter and Evelyne was liable to pay damages to Geoffrey to compensate him for the loss that he suffered as a result of losing his right to purchase the farm from Walter.[31]

The tort of 'lawful act conspiracy' is a controversial and difficult one,[32] and we cannot examine it in detail here. One important point is that it requires B to show that A and C have acted with the 'predominant purpose' of harming B.[33] That may be possible in a case such as Green, in which the only point of the transfer of A's estate to C was to prevent B from exercising his option to purchase that estate. In most situations, however, C's principal purpose will simply be to acquire a right to use the land for his own benefit. Nonetheless, Green shows us that, if B can complete the difficult task of showing that A and C acted with the predominant purpose of harming B, B will acquire a direct right against C even if C has a defence (such as the lack of registration defence) to B's pre-existing property right. We will explore this point further in section 3 below.

There is a further tort that may provide some assistance to B in a case in which his initial right to use A's land comes from a contract with A. In such a case, B may try to argue that C, by acquiring a right from A and then attempting to stop B's use of the land, commits the tort of procuring a breach by A of A's contract with B.[34] This argument is of most relevance when B has a contractual licence with A: in such a case, B has a contract with A, but that contract does not give B a legal or equitable interest in the land. We will, therefore, examine the possible application of this tort in more detail in Chapter 21, section 3.3.1. As with 'lawful act conspiracy', the exact boundaries of the tort are unclear. Moreover, there is also a problem that, if the tort is applied too readily, it will undermine the basic position that C, when acquiring a right in relation to A's land, cannot be bound by his mere knowledge of a pre-existing personal right of B (see section 2.6).

2.5 THE 'BENEFIT AND BURDEN' PRINCIPLE

The 'benefit and burden' principle provides another means by which B can acquire a direct right against C even if C has not made a promise to give B a right. It can be particularly important when considering disputes between neighbours and we will examine it in more detail in Chapter 26, section 2.4.1, when looking at freehold covenants.

As noted in the extract below, the basis of the principle is that: (i) if an arrangement between A and B links the enjoyment of a particular right by A (and later owners of A's land, such as C) to the bearing of a particular burden (e.g. if A is permitted to use roads on B's land only if he pays an annual charge to B); and (ii) C, a later owner of A's land, chooses to enjoy the benefit (e.g. if C chooses to use the roads on B's land); then (iii) C will be under a duty to B (or a later owner of B's land) to bear that burden.

30 See [1980] Ch 590 for Oliver J's decision.

31 Of course, Walter was, in any case, liable to pay damages to Geoffrey, because he had breached his contractual promise to allow Geoffrey to buy the farm.

32 In Lonrho Ltd v Shell Petroleum Co Ltd (No 2) [1982] AC 173, 188 and 189, Lord Diplock described the tort as 'highly anomalous' but 'too well-established to be discarded'.

33 See per Viscount Simon LC in Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co Ltd v Veitch [1942] AC 435, 445.

34 This tort is often associated with the reasoning of the majority of the Court of Queen's Bench in Lumley v Gye (1853) 2 E and B 215 (although it was held that, on the facts of the case, the tort had not been committed). For a more recent consideration of the tort at the highest judicial level, see OBG Ltd v Allan [2008] 1 AC 1.

Davis, 'The Principle of Benefit and Burden' [1998] CLJ 522

The cases have all involved what may loosely be termed as an 'arrangement'. The arrangement may take various forms: a gift, whether inter vivos or by will; an agreement, whether by deed, writing or oral; or a grant. What is common to the arrangements is that they confer a benefit and also impose a burden. The burden only binds persons who accept or exercise the benefit, have no other right to do so other than by relying on the arrangement, and have a choice whether or not they accept it. Although in a large number of the cases the benefit was a right relating to land, there has been no indication in any of the cases that the principle is limited to real property and there are a number of cases where the benefit was personal property, money or a contractual right [...]

The burden must be linked to the benefit, or made a condition of it, by the original arrangement. This link may be express, implied or even presumed. If it is clear that the burden is personal to the original party or separate from the benefit then the principle will be inapplicable [...]

It is impossible to find adequate discussion of the issue whether a person needs to have knowledge of the burden and the fact that it is linked to the benefit before being bound [...]

The principle seems to operate both at law and in equity and imposes a personal obligation on the person who seeks to use the benefit without affecting the liability of the original party. It can be used as a cause of action, not only by the original party, but also by his successors.

It is arguable that 'benefit and burden' is a principle, reasonably clear in its application, that promotes fairness and, consequently, far greater use should be made of it. It seems only fair that a right or benefit originally granted subject to a condition or linked with a reciprocal right or obligation should remain conditional or linked.

2.6 WHERE C KNOWS ABOUT A PRE-EXISTING RIGHT OF B

As the following extract shows, it has occasionally been suggested that B will acquire a direct right against C if: (i) B has a pre-existing personal right against A; and (ii) C then acquires a right from A with knowledge of B's personal right.

Tulk v Moxhay
(1848) 2 Ph 774, High Court of Chancery

Facts: Mr Tulk owned land in Leicester Square, London. He sold part of that land to Mr Elms, and demanded that Elms promise that he would 'at all times thereafter at his own cost keep and maintain the piece of ground in sufficient and proper repair, and in an open state, uncovered with any buildings, in neat and ornamental order'. Elms' land then passed to Mr Moxhay. When acquiring the land, Moxhay did not make a promise to maintain the garden. Moxhay did, however, know about Elms' promise and paid a lower price for the land as a result. When Moxhay decided to develop the land by building on the garden, Tulk applied for an injunction to prevent Moxhay from acting inconsistently with Elms' promise.

Lord Cottenham LC

It is said that, the covenant being one which does not run with the land, this Court cannot enforce it; but the question is, not whether the covenant runs with the land, but whether a party shall be permitted to use the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract entered into by his vendor, and with notice of which he purchased. Of course, the price would be affected by the covenant, and nothing could be more inequitable than that the original purchaser should be able to sell the property the next day for a greater price, in consideration of the assignee being allowed to escape from the liability which he had himself undertaken.

That the question does not depend upon whether the covenant runs with the land is evident from this, that if there was a mere agreement and no covenant, this Court would enforce it against a party purchasing with notice of it; for if an equity is attached to the property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased.

Today, as we will see in Chapter 26, section 2, Tulk v Moxhay is generally regarded as a case in which B was able to assert a pre-existing equitable interest against C. Certainly, Elms' promise not to build on the garden can nowadays be seen as giving B a restrictive covenant and, as we saw in Chapter 5, section 5.2, such a right counts as an equitable interest in land. But Lord Cottenham LC's reasoning in the extract above does not depend on B having a pre-existing property right; indeed, his Lordship expressly says that the question is not 'whether the covenant runs with the land'. Instead, Lord Cottenham's reasoning seems to be that because: (i) Moxhay knew about Elms' promise; and (ii) Moxhay paid a lower price for his estate as a result; then (iii) Tulk acquired a direct right against Moxhay. It therefore seems that, as a matter of history, the recognition of such a direct right played an important part in the journey by which the restrictive covenant came to be an equitable property right: this is a point to which we will return in Chapter 21, section 3.3.2.

It is, however, now generally accepted that C's knowledge of B's pre-existing personal right, by itself, cannot give B a direct right against C. The basic point is a simple one: in Chapters 4 and 5, we saw that the content test is used to ensure that only a limited class of rights can count as property rights in relation to land. This provides important protection for third parties later acquiring a right in land: if C knows that B's pre-existing right does not count as a property right, and is only a personal right against A, C knows that he or she cannot be bound by B's right. That protection would be fatally undermined if B were able to acquire a direct right against C whenever C knows of B's pre-existing personal right.[35]

Keppell v Bailey

(1834) 2 My & K 517

Facts: We examined this case in Chapter 4, section 6, and the facts are set out there. We saw that Mr Keppell, on behalf of the shareholders in a joint stock company, wished to assert a right to stop the Baileys from buying limestone from anywhere other than the Trevill quarry. Mr Keppell made two arguments: (i) that the promise made by the Kendalls bound not only them, but also any later owners of the ironworks, such as the Baileys; and, alternatively, that (ii) even if the promise made by the Kendalls did not create a property right, it should bind the Baileys, because they acquired the ironworks knowing of that earlier promise. As we saw in Chapter 4, section 6, the High Court of Chancery rejected that first argument. The extract set out below shows that the second argument was also rejected.

Lord Brougham LC

[Given that the Kendalls' promise does not give rise to a pre-existing right capable of binding the Baileys], does the notice which the [Baileys] had of its existence alter the case in this Court, upon an application for an injunction; or would it, upon the application of a co-relative and co-extensive nature, for a specific performance? Certainly not [. . .] The knowledge by an assignee of an estate, that his assignor had assumed to bind other than the law authorises him to affect by his contracts—that he had attempted to create a real burden upon property which is inconsistent with the nature of that property, and unknown to the principles of the law—cannot bind such assignee by affecting his conscience. If it did, then the illegality would be of no consequence; and however wild the attempt might be to create new kinds of holding and new species of estate, and however repugnant such devices might be to the rules of law, they would prove perfectly successful in the result, because equity would enable their authors to prevail; nay, not only to compass their object, but to obtain a great deal more than they could at law, were their contrivances ever so accordant with strict legal principle [. . .]

So a person who had conveyed land, and subjected it to covenants in the hands of his [purchaser], could at once make sure of those burdens following it into the hands of all holders to whom it might pass, by taking the precaution of notifying the covenants in some effectual though easy manner, as by publication in some place near the premises, where the purchaser needs must observe the announcement. It is clear then that this Court will never interefere, by way of injunction, or in any other more direct manner to enforce such covenants, when satisfied that they could receive no support or countenance at law.

[1965] AC 1175, HL

Facts: We examined this case in detail in Chapter 1 and its facts can be found in Chapter 1, section 5.1. We saw that the House of Lords viewed Mrs Ainsworth's 'deserted wife's equity' as a purely personal right against her husband. The following extract makes clear that the bank's notice of that pre-existing personal right, by itself, could not give Mrs Ainsworth a direct right against the bank.

Lord Wilberforce

It was said that the wife's right was an equitable claim, binding on the husband's conscience, and that consistently with what has been decided in relation to such matters as restrictive > covenants, it should be held to be binding on the conscience of a "purchaser" with notice [. . .] In my opinion, this line of argument is but a revival of a fallacy that, because an obligation binds a man's conscience, it therefore becomes binding on the consciences of those who take from him with notice of the obligation. But this has been decisively rejected, not only in relation to covenants (enforceable by specific performance) entered into by the predecessor of the purchaser whom it is sought to bind[36] but in the law of restrictive covenants to which an appeal by way of analogy was made.

Equally, if B has a pre-existing property right to which C has a defence (e.g. as in Midland Bank v Green, a lack of registration defence), then C's knowledge of B's right will not, by itself, give B a direct right against C. After all, the possibility of having a defence to B's pre-existing property right also gives C important protection. That protection would also be significantly undermined if B were able to acquire a direct right against C whenever C knows of B's pre-existing property right. As Bright argues in the following extract, it therefore seems that C's notice of B's pre-existing right, by itself, will not give B a direct right against C.

Bright, 'The Third Party's Conscience in Land Law' [2000] Conv 398, 407–8[37]

> Part 3 What good reasons are there for holding C liable?
> There are various reasons why we might want to argue that C is liable. One is that C bought with notice of B's rights and it would, therefore, be "unconscionable" to deny these rights. Although it has been suggested at various times that notice is enough, there are many judicial utterances showing that notice alone will not suffice to impose liability.[38] To hold otherwise would undermine land law. If a property statute clearly states that a purchaser shall not be affected with notice, then it cannot be unconscionable to rely on this statute. Midland Bank v. Green provides the highest judicial authority for this. The mother bought the farm at considerable undervalue in order to defeat her son's option, which she knew he had not protected by registration. There was seemingly no other reason for the purchase, Lord Denning described her behaviour as fraudulent. The House of Lords held, however, that she took free of the option. C is not liable if that is what the statutes clearly state; old equitable doctrines of notice and so on should not be read into modern Acts of Parliament.[39]
> In each case something more than notice is required. What that "something more" is will depend upon the circumstances. In some cases the "something more" stems from wrongful conduct by C in relation to the transfer itself, the fact that C is knowingly interfering with B's rights. In Midland Bank v. Green (not a constructive trust case), the mother should be held liable, not as a matter of property law, but in tort because she bought the property for the sole purpose of defeating the son's unprotected interest [. . .] In other cases, C should be held liable not because he behaved badly at the time of the transfer, but because he assumes some responsibility towards B at the time of the transfer and it would be wrong later to turn his back on this responsibility. In Binions [. . .] the inequity stems from the fact that having clearly promised to honour the agreement with B (and in Binions even paid less in recognition of this) C later tries to deny this promise.

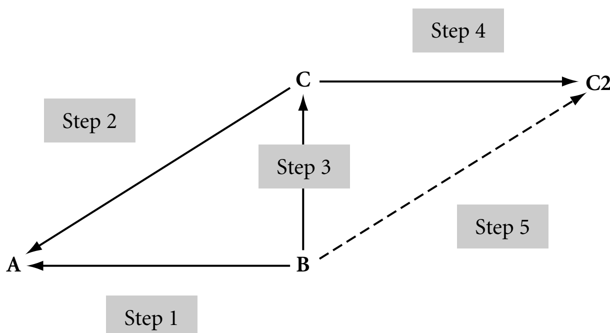
3 IS B'S DIRECT RIGHT A PROPERTY RIGHT OR A PERSONAL RIGHT?

A direct right is simply a right that arises as a result of C's conduct. It can be a property right (as, for example, if C chooses to give B a lease), or simply a personal right against C (as, for example, in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green, in which, as a result of C's commission of the tort of conspiracy, B acquired a right to claim damages from C). Where B simply wants to assert his right against C, it makes very little difference whether B's direct right counts as a property right or as a personal right. Things are different, however, if C later transfers his estate to C2, as Figure 1 illustrates.

In such a case, B may wish to argue that: (i) as a result of C's conduct, B acquired a direct right against C; and (ii) that right counts as a legal or equitable property right in relation to the land; and so (iii) B can assert that right against C2, provided that C2 has no defence to it. This shows us that the content and acquisition questions, which we examined in Chapters 4 and 5, may also be important where direct rights are concerned.



Key:

Step 1 B acquires a right to use A's land

Step 2 C later acquires a right to use A's land

Step 3 B acquires a direct right due to C's conduct

Step 4 C2 acquires a right to use the land

Step 5 Does B have a right against C2?

Where B's direct right against C arises because of C's commission of a tort, B will simply have a right to claim damages from C and so the content question is easy to answer: B has only a personal right against C. In other cases, as when B's direct right arises because of C's use of a deed, or a contractual or non-contractual promise of C, we simply need to look at the right C has given B and see if it matches the content of any of the legal or equitable property rights examined in Chapters 4 and 5. It is important to note that, in cases such as Bannister v Bannister and Binions v Evans, B's direct right against C is said to arise under a constructive trust. As we saw in Chapter 5, if B has a right under a trust, he has an equitable property right. But it is not clear that, in all of those cases, B's direct right should necessarily be an equitable property right. We will consider this point in detail in Chapter 21, section 3.3.1.

As for the acquisition question, any relevant formality rules will, of course, apply if B claims that the direct right that he has acquired against C is a legal or equitable property right. For example, if B claims that C has given B a legal lease of five years' duration, B will need to show that C used a deed to give B that right (see Chapter 7, section 4, and Chapter 22, section 3.1.1).

4 DIRECT RIGHTS AND REGISTERED LAND

If B claims that the direct right that he has acquired against C counts as a legal property right, then B may have to satisfy a formality rule laid down by the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002) to show that he has acquired that right. For example, if B claims that C, when acquiring registered title, also gave B a lease of more than seven years' duration, B will need to show that he is registered as holding that lease. There is, however, no general rule, even in relation to registered land, that says that B must be on the register in order to acquire a direct right against C. For example, when examining Lloyd v Dugdale in section 2.3 above, we saw that, although B was not on the register, the Court of Appeal was still prepared to consider whether C's conduct gave B a direct right. Indeed, as the following extract argues, even Australian jurisdictions using the strict 'Torrens' forms of registration system (under which C, by registering his right, is said to have 'indefeasible title') have accepted that it may still be possible for an unregistered B to acquire a direct right against C.

Chambers, An Introduction to Property Law in Australia (2nd edn, 2008, pp 464–5)

Indefeasibility of title provides a registered proprietor with powerful protection from older unregistered rights. However, with one important exception[40] [. . .] it does not affect the creation of new property rights to land. Registered proprietors are free to create property rights to their land. Property rights can also arise without their consent, in response to events such as detrimental reliance, unjust enrichment and wrongdoing [. . .]

This principle, that the indefeasibility of title does not prevent the creation of rights, is sometimes called the "in personam exception" to indefeasibility. This phrase was coined

[40] [The exception given occurs where C acquires a registered right with notice that the registered document was a forgery or obtained by fraud. In that case, provided that C has not been dishonest, a Torrens system will ensure that B does not acquire a direct right against C; B's protection will instead come from making a claim on the assurance fund—i.e. through the Australian equivalent of an English claim for indemnity (see Chapter 7, section 5.6.1 and Chapter 15).]

> following a comment made by Lord Wilberforce in Frazer v Walker.[41] After setting out the principle of immediate indefeasibility, he said that "this principle in no way denies the right of a plaintiff to bring against a registered proprietor a claim in personam, founded in law or in equity, for such relief as a court acting in personam may grant."[42]
> The phrase "in personam exception" is unfortunate for two reasons. First, it is not really an exception to indefeasibility of title. It refers not to the survival of older unregistered rights, but to the creation of newer unregistered rights. Indefeasibility of title is about the priority of rights and has (almost) nothing to do with their creation. The in personam exception is an "exception" to indefeasibility only because a registered right can be affected by the creation of a new right [. . .]
> Secondly, this "exception" is not limited to the creation of personal rights. Registered proprietors often create personal rights to use their land (such as a licence to stay in a guest room for the weekend), but they also create unregistered property rights, through tenancy agreements, contracts of sale, equitable mortgages and the like. Both fall within the in personam exception.

In this extract, Chambers draws on the key distinction between: (i) cases in which B attempts to assert a pre-existing property right against C; and (ii) cases in which B claims that he or she has acquired a direct right against C. Whilst a registration system may protect C in the first set of cases, by giving C a defence against a pre-existing property right of B that is not recorded on the register, it does not assist C in the second set of cases. As we will see in Chapter 14, section 7, this is true not only of the Australian registration systems discussed by Chambers, but also of the system applying in England and Wales under the LRA 2002. Indeed, the provisions of the 2002 Act, by making it more difficult for B to assert an unregistered right against C, have increased the importance of direct rights.

5 CONCLUSION

We have seen that many land law cases share a basic form: B has some sort of right to use A's land; A then gives C a right in relation to that land; and B and C each want to use the land in incompatible ways. The first question to ask in such a case is whether B has a pre-existing legal or equitable property right (see Chapters 4 and 5). If B does have such a right, we then need to consider whether C has a defence to that right. But if B has no such property right, or even if C has a defence to B's property right, it may still be possible for B to prevail. To do so, B needs to show that he or she has acquired a direct right, arising as a result of C's conduct.

In most cases, it will be impossible for B to show he or she has a direct right against C. For example, we have seen that C's knowledge of a pre-existing right of B, by itself, will not give B a direct right against C (see section 2.6 above). It is always important, however, to keep in mind the possibility that B may have such a right. A direct right against C can give B crucial protection even where B has failed to register his or her pre-existing property right, and, as we will see in Chapter 21, it may also protect B where his or her initial right to use the land is simply a personal right against A.

QUESTIONS

1. What is the difference between a direct right and a pre-existing property right?
2. When can a promise made by C to A give B a direct right against C?
3. Is the Court of Appeal's decision in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green (No 3) that Evelyne Green was liable to pay damages to Geoffrey Green compatible with the House of Lords' earlier decision that Geoffrey's unregistered equitable property right did not bind Evelyne?
4. When might it be important to know if a direct right acquired by B as a result of C's conduct is a property right as opposed to a personal right against C?

THE ACQUISITION QUESTION

FORMAL METHODS OF ACQUISITION: CONTRACTS, DEEDS, AND REGISTRATION

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. The creation and transfer of legal rights is heavily regulated by statutory formality requirements. Land is more complex to deal with than other property—a position that is considered desirable because of the uniqueness of land.
2. Specific formality requirements must be met to enter a contract for sale or other disposition of an interest in land and to create or transfer legal rights. The creation and transfer of legal estates is generally subject to a further requirement of registration.
3. The requirements for a contract for sale or other disposition of land are provided in the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989. The effect of non-compliance is that no contract exists, although devices of rectification and collateral contracts may be used to save invalid agreements.
4. In the absence of a contract, rights may also arise through the doctrine of proprietary estoppel. This is just one possible application of a much broader doctrine (which is discussed fully in Chapter 10) and its application in the context of a failed contract remains highly controversial.
5. The creation or transfer of legal rights generally requires a deed. In the absence of a deed, legal rights will not be created. Equitable rights may, however, be obtained through the doctrine of anticipation if the parties have entered a valid contract.
6. A system of registration of title has been spreading gradually since its introduction in the nineteenth century. With the exception of short leases, all legal estates are now either registered, or will become subject to compulsory first registration the next time that a specified transaction occurs. Additionally, it is possible to register a title voluntarily.
7. In registered land, title to legal estates does not pass until registration. Registered land is now governed by the Land Registration Act 2002, which repealed and replaced the Land Registration Act 1925. The 2002 Act purports to provide 'a conveyancing revolution'. It introduced significant amendments, with the underlying objective of facilitating the introduction of e-conveyancing; but work towards this has now been placed on hold. The 2002 Act marks a shift in English law from a system of 'registration of title' to one of 'title by registration'.

1 INTRODUCTION

In Chapter 4, we saw that legal estates and interests in land can be acquired dependently, where they are granted by a person with property rights in land, and independently, by the unilateral conduct of the person acquiring the right. In most cases, dependent acquisition of a legal right requires compliance with statutory formality requirements.

In this chapter, we consider the formality requirements that must be complied with for the creation or transfer of legal estates and interests in land. These statutory requirements are generally based on the need for the transaction to be in signed writing, usually witnessed, and sometimes require the written document to take the specific form of a deed. For the creation and transfer of legal estates (except for short leases), there is an overarching requirement of registration. In the introduction to this chapter, we will explore two issues: what are formality requirements and why do we have them in relation to land?

Critchley considers a legal definition of 'formality'.[1]

Critchley, 'Taking Formalities Seriously' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives (eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, p 508)

One good starting point might be the common legal distinction between matters of 'substance' and 'form'. This suggests a definition of formality as something which is external or added to the transaction, rather than a constituent, substantive part of it. In legal usage, formality is generally also seen as a requirement, rather than a mere habit or convention, so it would be helpful for our definition to express the notion that formality is something mandatory. Further, it is typical (though not essential), where a legal formality is imposed, to have some sort of sanction for breach of the rule: some legal disbenefit, or some failure to obtain a legal benefit. The sanction is frequently the invalidation of a non-complying transaction, but there are other possibilities: for example, there might be procedural disadvantages (limiting the type of evidence which may be used to prove the transaction in legal proceedings); or the transaction might be valid as regards the original parties to it, but invalid against third parties. Whatever the sanction is, it would clearly also be useful to have a definition which would cover a formality rule with a sanction attached. Putting all of this together, then, we reach the following definition: 'in law, a formality is a requirement that matters of substance must be put into a particular form (in order to have a specified legal effect).'

The effect of formality requirements is undoubtedly that land is more complex to deal with than other forms of property. Why, then, are they considered desirable? Ultimately, it is for all of the reasons relating to the uniqueness of land that we have outlined in Chapter 1. This is reflected, too, in the following extract, in which Birks highlights the particular need for formality requirements in light of the nature of rights in land.

Birks, 'Before We Begin: Five Keys to Land Law' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives (eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, p 483)

There is an extra reason [for formality requirements] too. It derives from the invisibility of real rights. Just as one cannot see a fee simple, so one cannot see an easement or a restrictive covenant. A neighbour's right to pass over a field does not reveal itself in a pink line, nor will even an infra-red camera disclose his right to restrict or forbid building. If one is buying a fee simple from a company, and a firm of solicitors is in daily occupation of the premises doing the business of soliciting, one might reasonably infer that the firm holds a lease. But still a lease is not visible, nor a pyramid of sub-leases. Real rights have to be made apparent through documents. Acquiring land would otherwise be a nightmare unless the law made really massive erosions of the principle of nemo dat.

In addition, however, formality requirements serve functional roles. Immediately prior to the comment extracted above, Birks acknowledges, for example, their role in encouraging people to think about the job in hand, and in preventing doubt and argument.

In making recommendations relating to one aspect of formality requirements (those concerning contracts for sale of land), the Law Commission highlighted the practical functions served by the requirements in issue. These can fairly be carried over to all formality requirements.

Law Commission Report No 164, Transfer of Land Formalities for Contracts for Sale etc of Land (1987, [2.7]–[2.13])

One principal justification for perpetuating formalities for contracts dealing with land is the need for certainty. The existence and terms of oral contracts are always difficult to establish and the resulting confusion [. . .] would, we anticipate, lead to increased litigation. To minimise disputes, reliable uncontrovertible evidence of the existence and terms of a transaction needs to be available for later reference. In the light of this, the value of the evidential function of writing cannot be doubted.

The evidential function of writing is also valuable in assisting the prevention of fraud. The requirement goes some way to ensuring that parties are not bound in the absence of actual agreement. In fact, the prevention of fraud was the rationale of the original Act, the Statute of Frauds 1677 [. . .]

A related argument in favour of formalities for contracts for the sale of land is based upon consumer protection. Whilst it has been suggested that laymen appreciate the significance of entering into a contract for the sale of land, we still consider that some form of protection imposed from outside is necessary. The consumer should be warned about the gravity of the transaction into which he is about to enter. He needs time to reflect and, if necessary, to seek legal advice. This is especially important in the case of contracts dealing with land because they often involve acceptance of a complexity of rights and duties. A formal requirement of writing is, in our view, suited to this cautionary role. At least, it prevents a person from becoming bound without realizing it, since most people nowadays are aware that signature of a written document imports some binding effect. The need for consumer protection is particularly strong in the case of the sale or purchase of a dwelling, house or flat. The majority of people, at some time in their life, will enter into such a transaction, and it will involve them in major financial commitments and general upheaval. In such circumstances, it appears vital that a consumer takes all reasonable precautions and is fully protected. [. . .]

The cautionary role of formalities is not confined to the consumer protection context. It is equally important for all types of contract dealing with land, whether in domestic or commercial conveyancing, because it prevents the parties from being bound inadvertently or prematurely. Without formalities, it may be difficult to ascertain the exact time when a contract is created, and this would lead to confusion. As a result, pre-contract negotiations would be unnecessarily uncertain and hazardous.

Another recognised function performed by formalities is the "channelling" function. This describes the way in which formalities mark off transactions from one another and create a standardised form of transaction. As a result, the identification and classification of certain types of transaction are facilitated, enabling them to be dealt with routinely. Such a function contributes to certainty by making clear the effect of non-compliance with formalities. [. . .]

The general uniqueness of land constitutes another argument for requiring formalities for contracts relating to it: each particular piece of land is regarded as unique from which it follows that interests in or rights over it should not be created or disposed of casually. [. . .] It has also been argued that land is different from other property because there can exist simultaneously several interests, whether corporeal or incorporeal, in or over the same piece of land. Therefore, so the argument goes, writing is desirable to avoid so far as possible confusion about who owns what. As was said in the working paper, this argument may be found persuasive but not totally compelling, because third party interests can also be created in other forms of property.

Finally [. . .] most other legal jurisdictions require more formality for contracts relating to land.

2 FORMALITY REQUIREMENTS FOR THE CREATION OR TRANSFER OF LEGAL RIGHTS

The process of creating and transferring legal rights can be divided into three stages: contract; creation, or transfer; and registration. These stages are most apparent in a typical conveyance, or sale, of a home.

1. Contract The vendor and purchaser enter a contract for sale of the legal estate (whether freehold or leasehold). The purchaser usually pays a deposit.
2. Creation or transfer The contract is executed by the vendor transferring title. This stage is commonly referred to as 'completion', and is the stage at which the purchase money is paid (less the deposit) and the purchaser takes possession of the land.
3. Registration The purchaser applies to be registered as proprietor of the estate. Legal title does not vest in the purchaser until registration.

Although legal title does not vest in the purchaser until registration, equitable rights arise under the doctrine of anticipation from the moment at which the parties have entered a specifically enforceable contract. Under that doctrine, in the period between contract and registration, the vendor holds the legal estate on trust for the purchaser. The nature of these rights is discussed fully in Chapter 9. In McLaughlin v Duffill[2] the Court of Appeal noted that even allowing for the operation of the doctrine of anticipation a sharp distinction exists between a contract for disposition and a disposition. There, Ms Duffill argued (inter alia) that by virtue of the doctrine of anticipation a contract for sale of a legal estate was simultaneously a disposition of an equitable interest and, as such, had to comply with s 51(1)(a) of the LPA 1925. This affected the manner in which an agent could be authorised to sign on behalf of the vendor as s 53(1)(a) requires written authorization. The court rejected the argument, noting that the disposition under the doctrine of anticipation does not arise merely by virtue of the contract but is dependent on the availability of specific performance.[3]

The same three-stage process may be followed whether the conveyance of land involves the transfer of an existing legal estate (for example, the transfer of a freehold or assignment of the existing term of a lease) or the creation of a new one (such as the grant of a new lease). Not every transaction in which a legal right is created or transferred will follow each stage of this process. For example, a contract is a convenient stage in the sale of land, but is not an essential requirement. A gift of land necessarily does not involve a contract. The requirement of registration only arises in relation to specified legal rights. Further, as we will see in section 4 (and discuss further in Chapter 22), it remains possible to create certain short leases without the need to comply with any formality requirements. Where any stage in the process is applicable, however, compliance with the formality requirements is mandatory.

3 CONTRACT

The requirements for a valid contract for the sale or other disposition of an interest in land are provided by s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989). That Act is the product of work of the Law Commission[4] and replaced the previous formality requirement contained in s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925). The 1989 Act has been considered to mark a change in philosophy from previous legislation, focusing attention on the written contract. As a result, case law under the previous legislation may no longer be authoritative.[5]

As will be apparent from the following analysis, the 1989 Act has proved controversial in a number of respects. It increased the formality requirements for contracts and made more severe the consequences of non-compliance. Recurring concerns have been that the report and the legislation (which differs from the draft Bill annexed to the Law Commission's report) have failed to consider the consequences of the changes, and to enable parties to escape from what appears to be a clear bargain.

Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 2

(1) A contract for the sale or other disposition of an interest in land can only be made in writing and only by incorporating all the terms which the parties have expressly agreed in one document or, where contracts are exchanged, in each.

(2) The terms may be incorporated in a document either by being set out in it or by reference to some other document.

(3) The document incorporating the terms or, where contracts are exchanged, one of the documents incorporating them (but not necessarily the same one) must be signed by or on behalf of each party to the contract.

(4) Where a contract for the sale or other disposition of an interest in land satisfies the conditions of this section by reason only of the rectification of one or more documents in pursuance of an order of a court, the contract shall come into being, or be deemed to have come into being, at such time as may be specified in the order.

(5) This section does not apply in relation to—

(a) a contract to grant such a lease as is mentioned in section 54(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (short leases);

(b) a contract made in the course of a public auction; or

(c) a contract regulated under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, other than a regulated mortgage contract, a regulated home reversion plan, a regulated home purchase plan or a regulated sale and rent back agreement; and nothing in this section affects the creation or operation of resulting, implied or constructive trusts.

(6) In this section—

"disposition" has the same meaning as in the Law of Property Act 1925;

"interest in land" means any estate, interest or charge in or over land;

"regulated mortgage contract"[,"regulated home reversion plan","regulated home purchase plan" and "regulated sale and rent back agreement"] must be read with—

(a) section 22 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000,

(b) any relevant order under that section, and

(c) Schedule 2 to that Act.

(7) Nothing in this section shall apply in relation to contracts made before this section comes into force.

(8) Section 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (which is superseded by this section) shall cease to have effect.

Section 2 governs all contracts entered into on or after the 27 September 1989. It differs from s 40 of the LPA 1925 both as regards the formality requirements specified and the consequences of non-compliance.[6] As regards the formality requirements, under s 40, there was no requirement for a contract to be in writing; it was necessary only for it to be evidenced in writing. In contrast, s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989 requires the contract to be in writing. This difference has a direct effect on the consequence of non-compliance. Under s 40 of the 1925 Act, a contract that was not evidenced in writing remained valid, but was not enforceable by action. Under s 2 of the 1989 Act, no contract exists unless and until formality requirements are fulfilled. There is no concept of a contract being valid, but unenforceable.

The principal significance of this difference is the abolition by s 2 of the doctrine of part performance.[7] That doctrine enabled the court to order specific performance of an oral contract if there was a sufficient act of part performance by the claimant.[8] Essential to the application of the doctrine was the fact that, under s 40 of the LPA 1925, an oral contract was valid. Without a valid contract, there is nothing in relation to which specific

[6] Law of Property Act 1925, s 40(1), provided as follows: 'No action may be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land or any interest in land, unless the agreement upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged or by some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised.' performance can be ordered. The uncertainty created by the doctrine was identified by the Law Commission as one of the key defects in the operation of s 40.[9] Its effect was that 'an oral contract for sale can readily and unilaterally be rendered enforceable and the provisions of section 40 left to beat the air'.[10] It was considered a 'blunt instrument for doing justice'[11] where formality requirements have not been complied with. Its abolition was therefore a key recommendation in the Law Commission's report. Although nothing in the terms of s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989 expressly abolishes the doctrine, no such provision is necessary. Its abolition was recognized by the Law Commission as inherent in the requirement for a contract to be in writing.[12] The abolition of the doctrine has generally been given effect by the courts,[13] although it was doubted in Singh v Beggs[14] and the doctrine has continued to attract limited academic support.[15]

[7] The application of part performance was expressly provided for by the Law of Property Act 1925, s 40(2).

[8] For an example of the operation of part performance, see Steadman v Steadman [1976] AC 536.

Under s 2, the written contract may take one of two forms: a single document signed by both parties; or separate documents signed by each party and exchanged. The document—or each document, in the case of an exchange—must contain all of the terms expressly agreed by the parties. The terms may be contained in the signed document—or documents, in the case of exchange—or be contained in a separate document that is incorporated by reference. Three main issues arise for discussion: the circumstances in which s 2 applies; the concept of an exchange; and the requirement of a signature.

3.1 WHEN DOES SECTION 2 APPLY?

Section 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989 applies to all contracts for the creation or transfer of an interest in land.[16] Although, in this chapter, we are concerned specifically with the acquisition of legal rights, it should be noted that s 2 applies equally to equitable interests.[17] In McCausland v Duncan Lawrie Ltd,[18] it was held that s 2 also applies to the variation of an existing contract. As a result, unless the variation complies with s 2, the terms of the contract as originally agreed remain enforceable. In that case, an attempt to vary the completion date in a contract failed for non-compliance with s 2, with the effect that the vendor's attempt to rescind the contract was premature.[19]

Section 2 does not apply to a contract that relates to land without involving the sale or disposition of an interest in land. In Pitt v PHH Asset Management Ltd,[20] it was held that a 'lock-out' agreement, through which a vendor agreed not to negotiate with anyone other than the purchaser for a fixed period of time, was not a contract for sale of land and therefore s 2 did not need to be complied with. The contract locked the parties into negotiations, but with no obligation that a contract for sale would be entered.

[17] While the creation of equitable interests generally arises informally and is exempt from formality requirements, s 2 will apply to the transfer of an equitable interest: e.g., a contract to transfer a beneficial interest. See Law Commission Report No 164 (1987, [4.4]).

A specific issue has arisen as regards the application of s 2 to an option to purchase. An option to purchase land consists of two stages: in the first stage, the option is granted; in the second, the option is exercised by the grantee. Following the enactment of the LP(MP) A 1989, Adams suggested that the exercise of the option by the grantee would need to comply with s 2:[21] an outcome that would run counter to commercial practice[22] and that, Stark suggested, would give the provision 'seismic effect', by leaving the exercise of options to 'the whim of the vendor'.[23] The issue soon arose for decision in the following case, which arose from an option granted a matter of weeks after s 2 came into force.

Spiro v Glencrown Properties Ltd
[1991] Ch 537, HC

Facts: The vendor granted the purchaser an option to purchase land, exercisable the same day by notice in writing. The grant of the option complied with s 2(1), but was exercisable by unilateral notice by the purchaser. The purchaser exercised the option, but failed to complete and the vendor had been awarded damages for breach of contract. In an action for judgment against the purchaser's guarantor, the question arose whether the exercise of the option was required to comply with s 2(1).

Hoffmann J

Apart from authority, it seems to me plain enough that section 2 was intended to apply to the agreement which created the option and not to the notice by which it was exercised. Section 2, which replaced section 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925, was intended to prevent disputes over whether the parties had entered into a binding agreement or over what terms they had agreed. It prescribes the formalities for recording their mutual consent. But only the grant of the option depends upon consent. The exercise of the option is a unilateral act. It would destroy the very purpose of the option if the purchaser had to obtain the vendor's countersignature to the notice by which it was exercised. The only way in which the concept of an option to buy land could survive section 2 would be if the purchaser ensured that the vendor not only signed the agreement by which the option was granted but also at the same time provided him with a countersigned form to use if he decided to exercise it. There seems no conceivable reason why the legislature should have required this additional formality.

The language of section 2 places no obstacle in the way of construing the grant of the option as the relevant contract. An option to buy land can properly be described as a contract for the sale of that land conditional on the exercise of the option. A number of eminent judges have so described it.

Following a review of authorities, Hoffmann J concluded that nothing prevented him from interpreting s 2 in that way. Hence, while the grant of an option must comply with s 2, the exercise of the option is a unilateral act by the purchaser.

22 Ibid. 23 Stark, 'The Option to Purchase: A Legal Chameleon' [1992] JBL 296, 296.

The decision has been welcomed as regards the practical operation of options under s 2, although the 'conditional contract' analysis of options taken by Hoffmann J to achieve this may be more problematic in other contexts.[24]

3.2 THE CONCEPT OF AN EXCHANGE

As has been noted, under s 2 of the 1989 Act, a contract may take the form of an exchange of documents. Prior to that Act, it was possible for a contract for sale of land to come into existence though correspondence between the parties—the correspondence providing the written evidence of the contract required by s 40 of the LPA 1925. Parties could prevent their correspondence from being interpreted this way by indorsing it 'subject to contract'. In its report, the Law Commission anticipated that contracts by correspondence would remain possible[25]—but in the following case, the Court of Appeal held that s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989 goes further than the Law Commission anticipated in this regard.

But there were in fact three problems under the old law [. . .] and endless difficulties in determining when, and if so on what terms, a contract was entered into in correspondence. I can see no reason why Parliament should not have gone further than the Law Commission recommendation and required a greater degree of formality in this very important area of the law where it is crucial that the parties know for certain when they are bound and on what terms.

The decision in Commission for the New Towns v Cooper runs counter to a previous Court of Appeal case, Hooper v Sherman,[26] but its authority has not been doubted. As Oakley notes, a contract may still arise by correspondence, but only in the unlikely event that the parties' correspondence results in a document (or documents) that comply with the requirements of s 2: for example, if each party signs the same document, thus removing the need for an exchange.[27]

Hence, while the LP(MP)A 1989 enables contracts by exchange, the process of exchange must be distinguished from mere correspondence. The nature of an exchange was also considered in Commission for the New Towns v Cooper.

In my opinion, the authorities show that, even if the expression "exchange of contracts" is not a term of art, it is a well-recognised concept understood both by lawyers and laymen which has the following features.

1. Each party draws up or is given a document which incorporates all the terms which they have agreed, and which is intended to record their proposed contract. The terms that have been agreed may have been agreed either orally or in writing or partly orally or partly in writing.
2. The documents are referred to as "contracts" or "parts of contract," although they need not be so entitled. They are intended to take effect as formal documents of title and must be capable on their face of being fairly described as contracts having that effect.
3. Each party signs his part in the expectation that the other party has also executed or will execute a corresponding part incorporating the same terms.
4. At the time of execution neither party is bound by the terms of the document which he has executed, it being their mutual intention that neither will be bound until the executed parts are exchanged.
5. The act of exchange is a formal delivery by each party of its part into the actual or constructive possession of the other with the intention that the parties will become actually bound when exchange occurs, but not before.
6. The manner of exchange may be agreed and determined by the parties. The traditional method was by mutual exchange across the table, both parties or their solicitors being present. It also commonly takes place by post, especially where the parties or their solicitors are at a distance. In such a case exchange is sequential and does not take place until the second document to be dispatched has been received or posted: Eccles v. Bryant and Pollock [1948] Ch. 93, 97–98, per Lord Greene M.R. Exchange can also take place by telephone, in which case it will be simultaneous: Domb v. Isoz [1980] Ch. 548, 558, per Buckley L.J.

Therefore, an exchange is qualitatively different from correspondence; the difference is marked most clearly by the parties' mutual intentions as regards the documents and the 'formal delivery' by way of exchange.

3.3 THE REQUIREMENT OF A SIGNATURE

To constitute a contract within s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989, the 'document' itself must be signed. Problems may arise in identifying what constitutes the document. In the following case, an Ordnance Survey plan was attached to a letter that purported to record an agreement for sale of land.[28] The vendor signed the letter and the plan, but the purchaser signed only the plan. It was held that the 'document' requiring signature for s 2 was the letter alone, the plan being a separate document incorporated into the letter by reference. Peter Gibson LJ acknowledged that the identification of the document was 'largely one of first impression', but, on the facts, the 'natural' interpretation was to treat the letter alone as the document.[29] In the absence of the purchaser's handwritten signature on the letter, the question arose whether the requirement of a signature was met by the appearance of his printed or typed name. This had been considered sufficient to constitute a signature under s 40 of the LPA 1925 and its predecessor, the Statute of Frauds 1677.

[28] In fact, it was held that the letter did not constitute a contract, because it failed to contain an obligation to buy: [1995] 1 WLR 1567.

Peter Gibson LJ

In my judgment, it is an artificial use of language to describe the printing or the typing of the name of an addressee in the letter as the signature by the addressee when he has printed or typed that document. Ordinary language does not, it seems to me, extend so far; and for this there appears to be the powerful support of Sir Raymond Evershed M.R. in Goodman v. J. Eban Ltd. [1954] 1 Q.B. 550, 555 and of Denning L.J., who said, at p. 561:

> "In modern English usage, when a document is required to be 'signed by' someone, that means that he must write his name with his own hand upon it."

In any event, I do not accept that authorities on what was a sufficient signature for the purposes of the Statute of Frauds 1677 and section 40 of the Act of 1925 should continue to govern the interpretation of the word "signed" in section 2 of the Act of 1989. Prior to the Act of 1989 the courts viewed with some disfavour those who made oral contracts but did not abide by them. The courts were prepared to interpret the statutory requirements generously to enable contracts to be enforced and in relation to the question whether there was a sufficient memorandum evidencing an agreement extrinsic evidence was admissible.

There are statements by judges who were called upon to consider what was a signature for the purpose of those statutory provisions which suggest that they regarded the interpretation by earlier courts, in the generous manner that I have indicated, as not being what they themselves would have decided if not constrained by authority. In particular, in Durrell v. Evans (1862) 1 H. & C. 174 both Crompton and Blackburn JJ. expressed their doubts as to the way the matter had been interpreted by earlier courts. I have already referred to the remark of Cave J. in Evans v. Hoare [1892] 1 Q.B. 593 in the first sentence of the passage which I cited from his judgment and that supports the view that a liberal interpretation had been placed by the courts on the statutory requirements. The Act of 1989 seems to me to have a new and different philosophy from that which the Statute of Frauds 1677 and section 40 of the Act of 1925 had. Oral contracts are no longer permitted. To my mind it is clear that Parliament intended that questions as to whether there was a contract, and what were the terms of the contract, should be readily ascertained by looking at the single document said to constitute the contract.

To accept Mr. Seymour's contentions would be to allow the courts to consider matters outside the claimed contractual document such as what the parties subjectively intended by the document or by the name to be found on it or who prepared the document. For my > part, I do not see why it is right to encumber the new Act with so much ancient baggage, particularly when it does not leave the "signed" with a meaning which the ordinary man would understand it to have. This decision is of course limited to a case where the party whose signature is said to appear on a contract is only named as the addressee of a letter prepared by him. No doubt other considerations will apply in other circumstances. I therefore do not accept Mr. Seymour's contention that a signature of the purchaser appears on the letter.

Peter Gibson LJ's clear limitation of his judgment leaves the matter open to discussion in other circumstances, although with the clear message that the requirement of a signature will be interpreted differently now from how it was under s 40 of the LPA 1925.

3.4 THE EFFECT OF NON-COMPLIANCE

As has been noted, the effect of non-compliance with s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989 is that there is no contract. The Law Commission acknowledged that: 'While it is important not to undermine the general rule that the formalities should be observed, it is equally important that the law should not be so inflexible as to cause unacceptable hardship in cases of non-compliance.'[30]

There are two possible responses to non-compliance. Where the parties have written and signed a document—or documents, in the case of exchange—but the terms are absent or wrong, rectification or the finding of a collateral contract may be invoked to create a contract that complies with s 2.[31] Alternatively, rather than seeking to establish a valid contract (or where there is no prospect of one being established, for example, through an absence of writing) a non-contractual remedy may be sought. The Law Commission specifically anticipated the doctrine of proprietary estoppel playing a role in this regard,[32] although, as will be seen, this has proved problematic.

Arguments relating to the validity of a contract cannot be raised once the contract has been executed by the creation or transfer of the legal right.

Tootal Clothing Ltd v Guinea Property Management Ltd

Facts: The parties had entered two agreements on the same day: firstly, a lease agreement, for the grant to the tenant, Tootal, of a 25-year lease of commercial premises; secondly, a 'supplemental agreement' that the landlord, Guinea, would pay Tootal £30,000 on completion of work by Tootal to fit the premises for use as a shop. The lease was granted, but Guinea refused to pay Tootal for its work. Guinea argued, unsuccessfully, that the term was part of the bargain for the grant of the lease and was therefore not enforceable for its exclusion from the lease agreement.

Scott LJ

However, section 2 is of relevance only to executory contracts. It has no relevance to contracts which have been completed. If parties choose to complete an oral land contract or a land contract that does not in some respect or other comply with section 2, they are at liberty to do so. Once they have done so, it becomes irrelevant that the contract they have completed may not have been in accordance with section 2.

In the present case, the parties having agreed all the terms under which the new 25 year lease would be granted, including those relating to the shop-fitting works and the contribution by Guinea Properties of £30,000 towards the cost incurred by Tootal in carrying out the shop-fitting works, chose to incorporate the terms in two documents instead of one, namely the lease agreement and the supplemental agreement. They then completed the lease agreement. The lease agreement thereupon ceased to be an executory contract. The question whether section 2 of the 1989 Act would, because not all the terms of the contractual bargain had been incorporated into the lease agreement, have rendered the lease agreement unenforceable became irrelevant. All that was left was the supplemental agreement. The supplemental agreement was not and is not by itself a land contract, or, at least, if it is, by incorporation therein of the terms of the lease agreement, a land contract, then there is no issue in the case that need detain the court. But on the footing that the supplemental agreement by itself is not a land contract, which is the contention of Mr. Ritchie for Guinea Properties, there was no longer, after the completion of the lease agreement, any executory land contract in existence to which section 2 of the 1989 Act could apply. There was simply a contract recorded in writing, signed by each party, for the payment of £30,000 in a certain event by one party to the other.

Hence, following execution of the contract, Guinea could not raise compliance with s 2 to question the enforceability of its agreement to pay Tootal for its works.

As Wilde notes,[33] the decision is of limited practical significance. It is relevant only in cases in which contractual obligations remain following the creation or transfer of the legal right in issue. This does not affect the possibility of an action for damages for breach of contract where a term of the contract is not complied with in its execution.[34]

3.5 COLLATERAL CONTRACTS

Section 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989 requires a contract for sale of land to contain all of the terms agreed by the parties. Hence, if a term is omitted, there is no contract, even where there is a written and signed document (or documents, in the case of exchange). If the absent term can be construed as a separate or collateral contract, then this difficulty is overcome. The parties' agreement constitutes a valid contract within s 2, minus the absent term, which is enforceable (if at all) as a separate contract. If the collateral contract does not itself constitute a contract for the sale of land, then it does not need to comply with s 2. A collateral contract must, however, have all of the elements of an ordinary contract—that is, offer, acceptance, and consideration.

The possibility of a collateral contract was an alternative ground for the decision in Tootal Clothing. In that case, as we have seen, the Court held that no question of compliance with s 2 could be raised, because the contract for the grant of a lease had been executed. Alternatively, the Court suggested that the landlord's supplemental agreement to pay the tenant £30,000 on completion by the tenant of works could be constructed as collateral to the main agreement for the grant of a lease.

33 Wilde, 'Contracts for the Sale or Disposition of Land' (1993) 109 LQR 191.
34 See Robert Leonard Developments v Wright [1994] NPC 49.

I am of the opinion, speaking for myself, that even before completion of the lease agreement on August 31, 1990, section 2 would not have prevented the enforcement of the lease agreement. If parties choose to hive off part of the terms of their composite bargain into a separate contract distinct from the written land contract that incorporates the rest of the terms, I can see nothing in section 2 that provides an answer to an action for enforcement of the land contract, on the one hand, or of the separate contract on the other hand. Each has become, by the contractual choice of the parties, a separate contract.

The device of a collateral contract was used in Record v Bell.[35] In that case, a vendor had been unable to provide the purchaser with an office copy of the registered title at the time of exchange. To enable exchange to proceed, the vendor provided a warranty of title. The purchaser subsequently failed to complete and argued that the parties' agreement did not comply with s 2, because it did not contain the warranty of title. Judge Paul Baker QC held that the warranty was a collateral contract. The warranty had been offered to 'induce' exchange and was accepted by exchange taking place.[36] He noted the utility of the device in ensuring that common transactions do not fail for non-compliance with s 2.[37]

The notion of 'hiving off' part of the parties' agreement to save an agreement from non-compliance with s 2(1) was, however, criticized by the Court of Appeal in the following case.

Grossman v Hooper
[2001] EWCA Civ 615, CA

Facts: Mr Hooper and Miss Grossman had separated after a period of cohabitation. The parties had both signed an agreement, whereby Mr Hooper undertook to transfer legal title to the parties' home to Miss Grossman. The agreement was contained in a single document, signed by both parties. Mr Hooper subsequently argued that the agreement did not constitute a contract under s 2(1), because it omitted a term whereby Miss Grossman agreed to repay a loan for £10,000 to a Mr Modi.

Chadwick LJ

At [19]–[23]

I do not, myself, find it helpful to ask whether the arrangement between the appellant and the respondent in relation to the discharge of the Modi loan was to be described as a collateral agreement. The correct starting point, as it seems to me, is to examine the words used in section 2 of the 1989 Act. Subsection (1) requires that "all the terms which the parties have expressly agreed" must be incorporated in one document—or, where contracts are exchanged, in each of the documents exchanged. In that context, "the terms which the parties have expressly agreed" means the terms (so far as they are not to be implied) upon which the parties to the sale or other disposition have agreed that the relevant interest in land shall be sold or otherwise disposed of. The words do not refer to terms upon which the parties have agreed (albeit contemporaneously) that some other transaction should be entered. [...]

The relevant inquiry, therefore, is (i) upon what terms did the parties agree that the land (or interest in land) was to be sold, and (ii) are all those terms incorporated in the document which the parties have signed. Or, to elide the two stages of the enquiry: did the terms upon which the parties agreed that the land was to be sold include a term (or terms) which have not been incorporated in the document which they have signed?

The point can be illustrated by an example. Suppose that A wishes to purchase a house from B; and wishes, also, to purchase the carpets and curtains that are in the house. Before anything is put in writing A and B negotiate a price for the house, say £500,000, and a separate price for the carpets and curtains, say £50,000. But the negotiation for the sale of the house is made subject to contract; and it is implicit neither A nor B intends to become bound to a purchase and sale of the carpets and curtains (if at all) until after the terms for the sale of the house have been put in writing and signed. A contract for the sale of the house at a price of £500,000 is drawn up and is signed by both A and B. The document contains no reference to the sale of carpets or curtains. The question, in such a case, in the context of section 2(1) of the 1989 Act, is whether it was a term of the contract for the sale of the house that A would purchase and B would sell the carpets and curtains. That is a question of fact in each case. It would have been open to A and B to agree that the sale of the house was independent of any sale of the carpets and curtains; so that A was to buy the house whether or not he bought the carpets and curtains as well. It would, equally, have been open to A and B to agree that the sale of the house was conditional upon a sale of the carpets and curtains; so that A would not be obliged to buy the house, nor B to sell it, unless the carpets and curtains were sold also. In the first case, the requirements of section 2(1) of the 1989 Act would be satisfied; in the second case those requirements would not be satisfied. The requirements would not be satisfied in the second case because, upon a true understanding of the bargain between the parties, it was a term of the contract for the sale of the house that A would purchase and B would sell the carpets and curtains; and that term was not incorporated in the document signed by the parties.

The question of fact, in such a case, is not answered by asking whether the agreement to sell the carpets and curtains was "a collateral contract"; unless, by that term, it is intended to refer only to a contract the existence, or nonexistence of which has no effect upon the efficacy of the principal contract. Nor, it may be noted, is that question answered by asking whether or not the contract for the sale of the carpets and curtains is conditional upon the sale of the house. It is obvious that (save in the most exceptional circumstances) if a contract for the sale of the carpets and curtains has been made in advance of the contract for the sale of the house, it will be conditional upon the sale of the house. The question is whether the contract for the sale of the house is conditional upon the sale of the carpets and curtains.

In the present case, therefore, the relevant question is whether the respondent's undertaking to discharge the Modi loan was a term of the sale by the appellant to the respondent of his interest in 77d Nightingale Lane. The judge held that it was not. In my view he was entitled to reach that conclusion. [...]

Sir Christoper Staughton

At [35]–[37]

[. . .] If the parties are allowed by a simple device to avoid the effects of section 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, what was the point of Parliament enacting it? [. . .]

So if there was a term in the contractual agreement that Miss Grossman would pay off Mr Modi, and if that was part and parcel of an agreement for the transfer of property, I am by no means sure that it can be hived off, as Scott LJ put it, into a separate contract.

But in the event it is unnecessary in this case for Miss Grossman to establish a collateral contract. There was in my judgment no term of any contract whether integral or collateral, that she should pay off Mr Modi. That was simply a matter of concurrence common to them both. They were in agreement that it would happen, as appears from the passage in the judgment which I first cited. There was no need for any contractual term about it and no such term was created.

In the view of the Court of Appeal, an agreement is either part of the contract for the sale of land, or it is not. If it is, then it must be contained in the parties' written document to ensure compliance with s 2; it cannot be 'hived off' as a collateral contract. If it is not part of the agreement for the sale of land, then it is not a collateral contract, but simply a wholly separate transaction, the existence of which has no bearing on whether s 2 is complied with. The classification of the agreement is dependent on the terms of Chadwick LJ's judgment. The essential question appears to be this: did the parties intend that the sale of the land would go ahead even in the absence of the agreement in question? If so, then the agreement is not part of the contract for sale of land.

This is a strict approach that casts doubt on the future use of collateral contracts and, implicitly, on the correctness of the decision in Record v Bell. Notably, that case is not referred to in the judgments. By reference to [21], however, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the warranty of title in that case was part of the contract for sale of land: in the absence of the warranty, the sale of the land would not have proceeded. If this is so, then, contrary to the decision in the case, the contract should have been void for non-compliance with s 2.

The cases may be distinguished by reference to the subject matter of the agreements in question. In Grossman v Hooper, the subject matter of the agreement was distinct from the land to be transferred: it concerned the discharge of an unsecured debt. Similarly, the example discussed by Chadwick LJ in his judgment involves distinct subject matter: carpets and curtains. It is difficult to apply the Court's reasoning to Record v Bell when the agreement related to the title of the land being transferred.

One consequence of the strict approach to collateral contracts signposted by Grossman v Hooper is that the ability of parties to establish a valid contract within s 2 through rectification becomes more significant.

3.6 RECTIFICATION

Where the parties have reached an agreement, but the terms are not all recorded in the document (or documents, in the case of exchange), or are recorded wrongly, the court may order rectification, with the result that the document then satisfies s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989. The possibility of rectification is specifically referred to in s 2(4), which confers on the court discretion to determine the time at which the contract comes into being. This is to enable the court to take into account the possible effect of rectification on third parties who enter a transaction between the date of the original 'contract' (void at the time for non-compliance with s 2) and the court's decision to rectify the agreement.[38]

It is established as a matter of contract law that rectification may be awarded where there is a prior agreement or common intention to contract on specified terms, and convincing proof[39] that the written agreement does not reflect those terms.[40] More controversially, rectification may also be available in cases of unilateral mistake, but only where the party not mistaken has acted unconscionably.[41] To date, there is little authority on the use of rectification in relation to contracts for sale of land. But the courts' reticence towards the use of collateral contracts expressed in Grossman v Hooper implicitly increases the likelihood of claims to rectification.

The remedy was adopted in Robert Leonard Developments Ltd v Wright.[42] In that case, a purchaser had agreed to buy a show flat, the price of which was to include carpets and furnishings. This term was not included in both written contracts on exchange and the vendor removed the furniture. The contract was executed by the transfer of the lease of the flat and therefore the validity of the contract could no longer be questioned—but the purchaser sought damages for breach of contract. The Court of Appeal considered that there was no separate or collateral contract for the sale of the furnishings; it was part of one package for the sale of the flat. Instead, the Court held that the contract should be rectified to include the omitted term.

Rectification is not available in all cases in which a written document does not include all of the terms agreed by the parties. Interpreted in such a broad manner, it would have the potential to undermine the operation of s 2 of the 1989 Act.

[2008] EWHC 545

Facts: Mr Ahmad and Mr Oun signed an agreement (referred to in the judgment as the 'first document') for the sale of premises comprising of a residential flat and an off-licence. The sale was never completed and the question arose as to whether a valid contract for sale had been entered. The agreement signed by the parties did not refer to an apportionment of the purchase price between the building, fixtures, and fittings, and the business goodwill. This matter was instead recorded by the parties in a second document. Mr Oun, the proposed purchaser, argued that the parties' agreement should be rectified to include this term.

Section 2(4) of the 1989 Act expressly contemplates that a court can order rectification in some cases where the written document does not incorporate all of the terms expressly agreed. However, there is an important issue in the present appeal as to the cases in which rectification is available. Is it every case where the written document does not incorporate all of the terms expressly agreed (whatever the reason for that might be) or is it only those cases where, applying conventional principles, the equity of rectification is available? [. . .]

Although the process of rectification in this context is an unusual form of rectification, it seems to be the case that one applies the usual rules as to the availability of rectification. In the Robert Leonard case, Henry LJ adopted a passage in the Law Commission Report (Law Com No. 164) at paragraph 5.6 which dealt with the possibility of rectification. Reference to the Law Commission Report itself shows that the footnotes to paragraph 5.6 refer to the general law as to rectification as set out in Snell's Equity and in well known cases dealing with rectification. [. . .]

At [41]–[43]

Rectification: further discussion

Because of the arguments addressed to me, it is necessary to consider the possibility of rectification in more detail. I will distinguish between two types of case.

In the first type of case, the written document does not incorporate all the terms expressly agreed, by reason of a mistake in the recording of the agreement. In such a case, the court can rectify the written document so as to incorporate all the terms expressly agreed and then the document as rectified complies with section 2.

The second (rather more unusual) type of case is as follows. Say the parties expressly agree upon five terms of their agreement. They agree to record four of them in a written document and they do so. They agree that the fifth term shall remain unrecorded in writing. The result is that the written document does not comply with section 2 and is of no effect. Can one party seek an order for rectification to the effect that the fifth term should be incorporated into the written document so that the written document will then comply with section 2? Will the position be different if the court finds that the parties believed that they had made a binding contract and that it was unnecessary for them to record the fifth term in writing? [. . .]

It appears from the above formulation that the court can order rectification where the relevant mistake is as to the meaning or effect of the words used in the instrument and, indeed, as to the legal effect of the instrument as a whole. [. . .]

At [51]

But rectification is not available where the parties have executed the document they intended to execute and the mistake is as to the legal consequences of that document. In Allnutt v Wilding, the parties had created a discretionary trust. They believed that the creation of a discretionary trust would be a potentially exempt transfer for the purposes of inheritance tax. It was not. If they had appreciated that legal consequence, their claim was that they would have created an interest in possession trust. It was held that a change in the document from > one which created a discretionary trust into one which created an interest in possession trust was outside the ambit of rectification. [. . .]

> In my judgment, this express agreement to omit the term means that there is no defect or mistake in the recording of, or the expression of, the arrangement and it is beyond the ambit of rectification to write into the written agreement a term which the parties expressly agreed should not be so recorded. I reach this conclusion applying what I understand to be conventional principles as to the availability of rectification and not some special set of rules as to rectification for the purposes of section 2(4) of the 1989 Act. In my judgment, this approach serves the legislative objective of section 2 of the 1989 Act. [. . .]

On the facts, Morgan J considered that the parties had agreed on the apportionment of the purchase price at the time that the first document was signed and had further agreed that this should not be included in the document. Both parties had mistakenly considered that, notwithstanding the absence of the term, the document would still be a valid contract. This mistake was beyond the scope of rectification and therefore there was no contract for sale of the premises.

3.7 ESTOPPEL

The doctrine of proprietary estoppel has application in a wide range of circumstances, in many of which (for example, promises of a gift or an inheritance) there is no question of the existence of a contract. The doctrine is discussed in Chapter 10. In this chapter, we are concerned with a specific point regarding the operation of proprietary estoppel: can the doctrine be invoked by a claimant where a contract has failed for non-compliance with s 2(1) of the LP(MP)A 1989?

The Law Commission specifically envisaged the use of estoppel in appropriate cases in which formality requirements for a contract for sale were not complied with. Indeed, this prospect played a central role in the Law Commission's acknowledgment that the effect of its recommendations was that the doctrine of part performance would cease to have effect.[43]

Law Commission Report No 164, Transfer of Land Formalities for Contracts for Sale etc of Land (1987, [5.4]–[5.5])

> We have already pointed out that it is implicit in our recommendation that a contract will no longer be enforceable simply because one party has performed some or all of his obligations under it. We believe this not to be a consequence to be regretted. [. . .] Nevertheless there are clearly circumstances in which injustice could be caused through the inability to plead part performance. [. . .] Are there other solutions than that which might have been provided by part performance? We believe that there are, and that the courts would use doctrines of estoppel to achieve very similar results where appropriate to those of part performance.
> We see no cause to fear that the recommended repeal and replacement of the present section as to the formalities for contracts for sale or other disposition of land will inhibit the courts in the exercise of the equitable discretion to do justice between parties in individual otherwise hard cases.

The ability to invoke estoppel was, however, subsequently called into question in the following case. Two key issues were central to the Court of Appeal's discussion: firstly, a 'public policy principle' that estoppel could not be used to render valid a transaction that legislation has enacted is to be invalid;[44] secondly, the scope of s 2(5) of the 1989 Act. That provision (extracted above) provides a saving for the operation of resulting and constructive trusts, but makes no reference to proprietary estoppel. This second issue, in turn, raised the question of the relationship between estoppel and constructive trusts.[45]

[2000] 1 Ch 162, CA

Facts: Mr Yaxley, a builder, found a property ripe for redevelopment. He entered an oral agreement, described as a 'gentleman's agreement', with his friend, Mr Brownie Gotts. The terms of the agreement were that Brownie would purchase the property, and that Mr Yaxley would undertake the redevelopment and manage the building, in return for which he would be given the two ground-floor flats. The property was, in fact, purchased in the name of Brownie's son, Mr Alan Gotts. Mr Yaxley carried out the works, but, following a falling out between the friends, Alan refused to transfer the flats to Mr Yaxley. At first instance, the judge had found that Mr Yaxley could invoke proprietary estoppel and ordered a long lease of the flats to be granted to him. On appeal, the Gotts argued that the agreement with Mr Yaxley was void for non-compliance with s 2(1) of the LP(MP)A 1989 and estoppel could not be invoked to give effect to the void agreement.

Recent cases on section 2 and estoppel

[. . .] I have no hesitation in agreeing with what I take to be the views of Peter Gibson L.J., Neill L.J., and Morritt L.J., that the doctrine of estoppel may operate to modify (and sometimes perhaps even counteract) the effect of section 2 of the Act of 1989. The circumstances in which section 2 has to be complied with are so various, and the scope of the doctrine of estoppel is so flexible, that any general assertion of section 2 as a "no-go area" for estoppel would be unsustainable. Nevertheless the impact of the public policy principle to which Sir John Balcombe drew attention in Godden v. Merthyr Tydfil Housing Association does call for serious consideration. It is not concerned with illegality (some confusion may have arisen from the inadequate report or note shown to this court in Bankers Trust Co. v. Namdar) but with what Viscount Radcliffe in Kok Hoong v. Leong Cheong Kweng Mines Ltd. [1964] A.C. 993, 1016, called a principle of general social policy,

44 The principle is cited by Robert Walker LJ [2000] Ch 162, 172–3, from Halsbury's Laws of England: Vol 16 (4th edn, reissue, 1992): 'The doctrine of estoppel may not be invoked to render valid a transaction which the legislature has, on grounds of general public policy, enacted is to be invalid.'

45 The nature of constructive trusts is discussed in Chapter 11. The specific type of constructive trust discussed in this section is the common intention constructive trust, which is considered in Chapter 16.

> "to ask whether the law that confronts the estoppel can be seen to represent a social policy to which the court must give effect in the interests of the public generally or some section of the public, despite any rules of evidence as between themselves that the parties may have created by their conduct or otherwise."

In this case that principle must of course be applied consistently with the terms in which section 2 of the Act of 1989 has been enacted, including the saving at the end of section 2(5).

Parliament's requirement that any contract for the disposition of an interest in land must be made in a particular documentary form, and will otherwise be void, does not have such an obviously social aim as statutory provisions relating to contracts by or with moneylenders, infants, or protected tenants. Nevertheless it can be seen as embodying Parliament's conclusion, in the general public interest, that the need for certainty as to the formation of contracts of this type must in general outweigh the disappointment of those who make informal bargains in ignorance of the statutory requirement. If an estoppel would have the effect of enforcing a void contract and subverting Parliament's purpose it may have to yield to the statutory law which confronts it, except so far as the statute's saving for a constructive trust provides a means of reconciliation of the apparent conflict.

None of the recent authorities referred to by counsel is determinative of this appeal [. . .] Nor can anything in the Law Commission's report (or its earlier working paper) be decisive. The report and the working paper are invaluable guides to the old law and to the problems which constituted the "mischief" at which section 2 of the Act of 1989 is directed, but they cannot be conclusive as to how section 2, as enacted, is to be construed and applied.

Proprietary estoppel and constructive trusts

At a high level of generality, there is much common ground between the doctrines of proprietary estoppel and the constructive trust, just as there is between proprietary estoppel and part performance. All are concerned with equity's intervention to provide relief against unconscionable conduct, whether as between neighbouring landowners, or vendor and purchaser, or relatives who make informal arrangements for sharing a home, or a fiduciary and the beneficiary or client to whom he owes a fiduciary obligation. The overlap between estoppel and part performance has been thoroughly examined in the defendants' written submissions, with a survey of authorities from Gregory v. Mighell (1811) 18 Ves. 328 to Take Harvest Ltd. v. Liu [1993] A.C. 552.

The overlap between estoppel and the constructive trust was less fully covered in counsel's submissions but seems to me to be of central importance to the determination of this appeal. Plainly there are large areas where the two concepts do not overlap: when a landowner stands by while his neighbour mistakenly builds on the former's land the situation is far removed (except for the element of unconscionable conduct) from that of a fiduciary who derives an improper advantage from his client. But in the area of a joint enterprise for the acquisition of land (which may be, but is not necessarily, the matrimonial home) the two concepts coincide [. . .]

In this case the judge did not make any finding as to the existence of a constructive trust. He was not asked to do so, because it was not then seen as an issue in the case. But on the findings of fact which the judge did make it was not disputed that a proprietary estoppel arose, and that the appropriate remedy was the grant to Mr. Yaxley, in satisfaction of his equitable entitlement, of a long leasehold interest, rent free, of the ground floor of the property. Those findings do in my judgment equally provide the basis for the conclusion that Mr. Yaxley was entitled to such an interest under a constructive trust. The oral bargain which the judge found to have been made between Mr. Yaxley and Mr. Brownie Gotts, and to have been adopted by Mr. Alan Gotts, was definite enough to meet the test stated by Lord Bridge in Lloyds Bank Plc. v. Rosset [1991] 1 A.C. 107, 132.

The saving in section 2(5)

To recapitulate briefly: the species of constructive trust based on "common intention" is established by what Lord Bridge in Lloyds Bank Plc. v. Rosset [1991] 1 A.C. 107, 132, called an "agreement, arrangement or understanding" actually reached between the parties, and relied on and acted on by the claimant. A constructive trust of that sort is closely akin to, if not indistinguishable from, proprietary estoppel. Equity enforces it because it would be unconscionable for the other party to disregard the claimant's rights. Section 2(5) expressly saves the creation and operation of a constructive trust.

[...] To give [section 2(5)] what I take to be its natural meaning, comparable to that of section 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 in relation to section 53(1), would not create a huge and unexpected gap in section 2. It would allow a limited exception, expressly contemplated by Parliament, for those cases in which a supposed bargain has been so fully performed by one side, and the general circumstances of the matter are such, that it would be inequitable to disregard the claimant's expectations, and insufficient to grant him no more than a restitutionary remedy.

Proprietary estoppel and the Law Commission

The Act of 1989 expressly refers to resulting, implied or constructive trusts but it does not expressly refer to proprietary estoppel, in so far as its principles are different from those relating to constructive trusts. The Act neither expressly saves the operation of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel nor expressly provides that it should have no application. Whether the principles of proprietary (or indeed other classes of estoppel) can be invoked will no doubt depend upon the principle which Robert Walker L.J. has quoted from Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. reissue, vol. 16, pp. 849–850, para. 962, namely that the doctrine of estoppel may not be invoked to render valid a transaction which the legislature, on grounds of general public policy, has enacted is to be invalid or void.

It seems to me that in considering whether a particular estoppel relied upon would offend the public policy behind a statute it is necessary to consider the mischief at which the statute is directed. Where a statute has been enacted as a result of the recommendations of the Law Commission, it is, as I see it, both appropriate and permissible for the court to consider those recommendations in order to help to identify both the mischief which the Act is designed to cure and the public policy underlying it. Indeed, although I agree with Robert Walker L.J. that they cannot be conclusive as to how a particular provision should be construed, I entirely agree with Beldam L.J. that the policy behind section 2 of the Act of 1989 can clearly be seen from the Law Commission Report to which he refers. In my opinion the contents of that report will be of the greatest assistance in deciding whether or not the principles of particular types of estoppel should be held to be contrary to the public policy underlying the Act. In this regard it seems to me that the answer is likely to depend upon the facts of the particular case. So, for example, an attempt to apply the principles of estoppel by convention is likely to fail, as in Godden v. Merthyr Tydfil Housing Association [1997] N.P.C. 1; Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Transcript No. 370 of 1997, whereas an attempt to apply the principles of proprietary estoppel might well succeed, depending upon the facts of the particular case.

Beldam LJ

In the present case the policy behind the Commission's proposals was as clearly stated as its intention that the proposal should not affect the power of the court to give effect in equity to the principles of proprietary estoppel and constructive trusts. Even if the use to be made of the Commission's report is to be confined to identifying the defect in the law which the proposals were intended to correct, in a case such as the present it is unrealistic to divorce the defect in the law from the policy adopted to correct it. The Commission's report makes it clear that in proposing legislation to exclude the uncertainty and complexities introduced into unregistered conveyancing by the doctrine of part performance, it did not intend to affect the availability of the equitable remedies to which it referred.

The general principle that a party cannot rely on an estoppel in the face of a statute depends upon the nature of the enactment, the purpose of the provision and the social policy behind it. This was not a provision aimed at prohibiting or outlawing agreements of a specific kind, though it had the effect of making agreements which did not comply with the required formalities void. This by itself is insufficient to raise such a significant public interest that an estoppel would be excluded. The closing words of section 2(5)—"nothing in this section affects the creation or operation of resulting, implied or constructive trusts"—are not to be read as if they merely qualified the terms of section 2(1). The effect of section 2(1) is that no contract for the sale or other disposition of land can come into existence if the parties fail to put it into writing; but the provision is not to prevent the creation or operation of equitable interests under resulting implied or constructive trusts, if the circumstances would give rise to them [...]

There are circumstances in which it is not possible to infer any agreement, arrangement or understanding that the property is to be shared beneficially but in which nevertheless equity has been prepared to hold that the conduct of an owner in allowing a claimant to expend money or act otherwise to his detriment will be precluded from denying that the claimant has a proprietary interest in the property. In such a case it could not be said that to give effect to a proprietary estoppel was contrary to the policy of section 2(1) of the Act of 1989. Yet it would be a strange policy which denied similar relief to a claimant who had acted on a clear promise or representation that he should have an interest in the property. Moreover claims based on proprietary estoppel are more likely to arise where the claimant has acted after an informal promise has been made to him [...]

For my part I cannot see that there is any reason to qualify the plain words of section 2(5). They were included to preserve the equitable remedies to which the Commission had referred. I do not think it inherent in a social policy of simplifying conveyancing by requiring the certainty of a written document that unconscionable conduct or equitable fraud should be allowed to prevail.

In my view the provision that nothing in section 2 of the Act of 1989 is to affect the creation or operation of resulting, implied or constructive trusts effectively excludes from the operation of the section cases in which an interest in land might equally well be claimed by relying on constructive trust or proprietary estoppel.

That, to my mind, is the case here. There was on the judge's findings, as I interpret them, a clear promise made by Brownie Gotts to the plaintiff that he would have a beneficial interest in the ground floor of the premises. That promise was known to Alan Gotts when he acquired the property and he permitted the plaintiff to carry out the whole of the work needed to the property and to convert the ground floor in the belief that he had such an interest. It would be unconscionable to allow either Alan or Brownie Gotts to resile from the representations made by Brownie Gotts and adopted by Alan Gotts. For my part I would hold that the plaintiff established facts on which a court of equity would find that Alan Gotts held the property subject to a constructive trust in favour of the plaintiff for an interest in the ground floor and that that interest should be satisfied by the grant of a 99-year lease. I consider the judge was entitled to reach the same conclusion by finding a proprietary estoppel in favour of the plaintiff [. . .]

The outcome of the case for Mr Yaxley is beyond doubt. The first instance judge had ordered a grant to him of a 99-year lease of the ground-floor flats and the Gotts' appeal against that ruling failed.

It is, however, much harder to identify a clear ratio for the decision. The differences between the judgments of Robert Walker and Beldam LJJ, and the issues to which these differences give rise, are highlighted by Moore.

Moore, 'Proprietary Estoppel, Constructive Trusts and Section 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989' (2000) 63 MLR 912, 914

It appears that, according to Robert Walker LJ, proprietary estoppel does not survive as a separate and distinct remedy in a case where a claimant relies on an oral agreement. Proprietary estoppel survives only in so far as it overlaps with (and is subsumed within) the common intention constructive trust. By implication, an estoppel claim that cannot be framed alternatively as a constructive or resulting trust can not override section 2.

At first sight the approach of Beldam LJ appears to be more generous than that of Robert Walker LJ. Unlike Robert Walker LJ, Beldam LJ did not hesitate to rely upon the Law Commission papers to identify parliamentary policy and intent. His Lordship observed that the general principle raised by the appellants depended upon the nature and purpose of the statutory provision and the social policy behind it. The policy here was to exclude uncertainty and complexities introduced by the doctrine of part performance, and not to prohibit specific agreements. The mere fact that informal agreements were rendered void rather than unenforceable was not enough in itself to raise a public interest sufficient to exclude proprietary estoppel. Furthermore his Lordship commented that if the appellants' contention succeeded, a claimant raising a proprietary estoppel through mere standing-by and encouragement would be in a stronger position than a claimant relying on a clear oral agreement.

Following this reasoning, proprietary estoppel (and presumably other equitable remedies) could continue to operate notwithstanding a failure to comply with section 2. Since the intention of the reforms was not to abolish these remedies there would be no conflict between equitable remedies and statutory policy. There is thus no logical need to restrict estoppel remedies to cases already falling within the saving of section 2(5). Despite this, Beldam LJ's later comments appear to restrict the scope of his judgment. Firstly, Beldam LJ considered that section 2(5) was 'included to preserve the equitable remedies to which the Law Commission had referred', so apparently allying proprietary estoppel and constructive trusts. Secondly, the learned judge concluded 'the saving in section 2 effectively excludes cases where an interest might equally well be claimed by relying on a constructive trust or proprietary estoppel. That, to my mind, is the case here.' This appears to echo the approach of Robert Walker LJ. There is therefore some doubt whether, despite his reasoning, Beldam LJ intended to give a wider judgment than Robert Walker LJ.

As Moore subsequently identities, the issue that remains unanswered in Yaxley v Gotts is whether a claimant in Mr Yaxley's position succeeds on the basis of constructive trusts or estoppel. The issue may be crucial, given the existence of remedial discretion in estoppel. Even on the facts of Yaxley v Gotts, as Smith noted, it is far from clear that the grant of a lease can be explained on the basis of a constructive trust.[46]

The relationship between estoppel and s 2 was further considered in the following case. While the decision offers some clarification of the application of estoppel, the Court of Appeal followed the approach in Yaxley v Gotts without offering further elucidation as to whether the claimant succeeds under estoppel or constructive trust.

Kinane v Mackie-Conteh
[2005] EWCA Civ 45, CA

Facts: Mr Mackie-Conteh agreed to grant a charge over his home as security for a loan from Mr Kinane, but the charge was not formally executed. Mr Kinane provided the loan money, but Mr Mackie-Conteh argued that the charge was void for non-compliance with s 2. Mr Kinane therefore argued for an estoppel.

Arden LJ

In my judgment, therefore, a party seeking to rely on proprietary estoppel as a basis for disapplying section 2(1) of the 1989 Act is not prevented from relying in support of his case on the agreement which section 2(1) would otherwise render invalid. Thus, the requirement that the defendant encouraged (or allowed) the claimant to believe that he would acquire an interest in land may (depending on the facts) consist in the defendant encouraging the claimant (by words or conduct) to believe that the agreement for the disposition of an interest in land (here a security interest) was valid and binding. Here, Mr Mackie-Conteh gave Mr Kinane that encouragement. Mr Kinane made it clear that he required security for his loan. Mr Mackie-Conteh responded by providing the security agreement and persuading him that, once he had got that letter (and the cheque for £15,000 had been banked), he should make the loan to Almack. By his conduct, Mr Mackie-Conteh thereby encouraged Mr Kinane to believe that the security agreement was valid and binding. He must stand by that conduct even if he himself misunderstood the effect of section 2(1) on the security agreement. Accordingly, the requirement for encouragement by Mr Mackie-Conteh of Mr Kinane in the erroneous belief that he would obtain a security interest over the property is satisfied.

It is to be noted that, even on this scenario, reliance on the unenforceable agreement only takes the claimant part of the way: he must still prove all the other components of proprietary estoppel. In particular, the requirement that the defendant encouraged or permitted the claimant in his erroneous belief is not satisfied simply by the admission of the invalid agreement in evidence. In this sort of case, the claimant has to show that the defendant represented to the claimant, by his words or conduct, including conduct in the provision or delivery of the agreement, that the agreement created an enforceable obligation. The cause of action in proprietary estoppel is thus not founded on the unenforceable agreement but upon the defendant's conduct which, when viewed in all relevant respects, is unconscionable. [. . .]

[46] Smith, 'Oral Contracts for the Sale of Land: Estoppels and Constructive Trusts' (2000) 116 LQR 11, 12–13.

Accordingly the issue here is whether the circumstances justify a finding of proprietary estoppel overlapping with constructive trust in the manner explained above. I have dealt with the question of encouragement above. Did Mr Kinane act in the belief that he had or would obtain a valid security? Did he act thereon to his detriment? The security agreement demonstrates an intention to create a security interest. Mr Kinane made it clear in his witness statement and when giving evidence that he was not prepared to make a loan without security. Having obtained the security agreement, he made a loan which, to his detriment, is now irrecoverable. In my judgment, the fact that he knew that the formal documentation had not been executed does not mean that proprietary estoppel cannot be established. The fact is that he drew no distinction between the security agreement and the formal document. He assumed that the security agreement was enforceable and thus he acted in the belief that he would be given a formal security. Thus I would reject Mr Jack's argument that it is fatal to Mr Kinane's case that the security agreement had not been executed. Likewise, in my judgment, it is immaterial that the reliance consisted in the single act of making the loan. That act had significant consequences on its own, and is thus of itself sufficient to give rise to proprietary estoppel.

As I see it, the policy of section 2(1) of the 1989 Act is to protect the public by preventing parties from being bound by a contract for the disposition of an interest in land unless it has not been fully documented in writing. However, in section 2(5) Parliament has acknowledged that under section 2(1) there is a risk that one party will seek to take advantage of the sanction provided by that subsection when it is unconscionable for him so to do. To that extent, section 2(5) plays a role similar to that of part performance, although it operates more flexibly than that doctrine. Unconscionability on the part of the party seeking to rely on subsection (1) is the touchstone giving rise to a constructive trust. It will arise where a party led another party to believe that he would obtain an interest in property to another and then stands by while that other party acts to his detriment in reliance on that promise. The knowledge of the disadvantaged party is of less significance. Here Mr Mackie-Conteh induced Mr Kinane to make the loan before the formal documentation was executed. Even though the venture was abortive, Mr Mackie-Conteh benefited therefrom to the extent that he did not have to find another lender to get to the stage where FMBC could produce a letter of credit. The risk of the letter of credit at that stage not meeting the seller's requirements was one which, under the parties' agreement, Mr Mackie-Conteh and not Mr Kinane, had implicitly agreed to bear.

In proprietary estoppel, the court awards a remedy appropriate to satisfy the expectations that the defendant has induced. This need not be an interest in land. However, in my judgment, that is the appropriate remedy in this case and neither counsel has suggested otherwise.

Neuberger LJ

At [46]–[49]

There are observations in the speeches of Robert Walker and Beldam LJJ (with both of whom Clarke LJ agreed) in Yaxley v Gotts [2000] Ch. 174, to the effect that facts giving rise to an estoppel, could be sufficient (even if they do not give rise to a trust) to enable a claimant to avoid the rigours of Section 2(1) of the 1989 Act: see at 174F-G and 188F-9G. It is unnecessary to decide in this case whether those observations can survive in light of the reasoning of the House of Lords in Actionstrength. For the purposes of this appeal, I am content to assume, in favour of Mr Mackie-Conteh, that it would not be open to Mr Kinane to avoid the consequences of Section 2(1) of the 1989 Act if he could only establish a proprietary estoppel, and not a trust.

There are clearly circumstances which can give rise to an estoppel, but not a trust. This point was made clear by Robert Walker LJ in Yaxley at 176D where he said this of "estoppel and the constructive trust":

> "Plainly there are large areas where the two concepts do not overlap: when a landowner stands by while his neighbour mistakenly builds on the former's land the situation is far removed (except for the element of unconscionable conduct) from that of a fiduciary who derives an improper advantage from his client."

He then went on to explain at 176E that, in light of cases such as Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886, it was well established that "the two concepts coincide" "in the area of a joint enterprise for the acquisition of land".

It initially appeared to me well arguable that the nature of the estoppel which could be established by Mr Kinane may not be such as to amount to a constructive trust. There is obviously a conceptual similarity between a person building on another's land in the false belief that he owns it, thereby conferring a benefit on the true owner, and a person who lends money to the owner of land, in the false belief that he has a mortgage over the land. In each case, the true owner of the land receives a benefit at the expense of a person who has spent money in the mistaken belief that he has an interest in the land.

However, I am persuaded that the reasoning, and the authorities cited, in Yaxley do lead to the conclusion that a constructive trust was created in the present case.

The case is notable as confirming that while the parties' agreement is void as a contract for non-compliance with s 2, it can, notwithstanding, form the basis of the agreement or assurance of rights for an estoppel claim. As Arden LJ explains, the other elements of estoppel must still be made out. It remains unclear, however, whether the claimant therefore succeeds on the basis of estoppel or constructive trust. Both Arden and Neuberger LJJ appear to adopt a narrow approach to estoppel that echoes Robert Walker LJ's judgment in Yaxley v Gotts. Hence, Arden LJ identifies the question as whether Mr Kinane can demonstrate an estoppel 'overlapping' with a constructive trust. Neuberger LJ proceeds on the basis that Mr Kinane's claim would fail under s 2 if he could only establish an estoppel, but not a constructive trust.[47]

Writing extra-judicially, Lord Neuberger has subsequently indicated a broader approach than that given in his judgment in Kinane. He has moved towards the view that an estoppel claim is not precluded by section 2 even where there is no overlapping constructive trust. Notably, this change appears to have been prompted by a narrow approach to estoppel both generally and in relation to section 2 that was advocated by Lord Scott in Yeoman's Row Management Ltd v Cobbe.[48] Giving judgment in that case, Lord Scott commented, obiter "My present view, however, is that proprietary estoppel cannot be prayed in aid in order to render enforceable an agreement that statute has declared to be void. The proposition that an owner of land can be estopped from asserting that an agreement is void for want of compliance with the requirements of section 2 is, in my opinion, unacceptable. The assertion is no more than the statute provides. Equity can surely not contradict the statute".[49] In a discussion of that decision Lord Neuberger said the following.

There is another aspect of the relationship between proprietary estoppel and contract, which arises out of that misconceived piece of legislation, section 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989. Section 2(1) of that Act declares void any agreement purporting to create or dispose of an interest in land which does not comply with the requisite formalities. Section 2(5) sets out certain exceptions, including implied, resulting, and constructive trusts, but not proprietary estoppel. Section 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925, which section 2 was designed to replace, had its quirks, but it worked perfectly well. Now that the Law Commission, by needlessly meddling, Parliament, with misconceived drafting, and the courts, through inconsistent decisions, have had their wicked ways with section 2, we are worse off than we ever were with section 40.

However, the point about section 2 for present purposes is that, at least on one view of Lord Scott's speech in Cobbe, it seemed to have put paid to proprietary estoppel. He said that his "present view [was] that proprietary estoppel cannot be prayed in aid to in order to render enforceable an agreement that statute has declared to be void". If the proprietary estoppel also gives rise to a constructive trust, it is different because constructive trusts are excluded from the ambit of section 2 by subsection (5). So, save to the extent that proprietary estoppel claims can be said to be grounded in constructive trust, or are based on a mistake as to present ownership, it seems to me that Lord Scott's approach may either serve to defeat any proprietary estoppel claim, or else it means that the weaker the claim the less the section 2 problem.

Consider the facts in Crabb v. Arun or in Thorner v. Major. As in the great majority of proprietary estoppel cases, the defendant made a statement or gave an indication, which was relied on by the claimant as meaning that he would be granted an interest in land. If Lord Scott's approach is right, there are two possibilities. First, as section 2 would prevent the claimant from mounting a claim in contract, every proprietary estoppel claim must fail, as the statutory formalities were not complied with. Alternatively, section 2 presents no problem where the statement or indication is so imprecise that we are not near contractual territory. Either alternative is unpalatable. The first would mean that any proprietary estoppel claim based on an indication or promise that the claimant will get an interest in land will fall foul of section 2, unless the claimant happens to be able to erect a constructive trust out of the arrangement. On that view, it would seem that Lord Hoffmann's owl is stuffed, as it could never fly. The second would mean that the clearer and more precise the defendant's indication or promise, and therefore the stronger the claimant's case in principle, the more likely it is that section 2 will scotch any proprietary estoppel claim. On that view, Lord Hoffmann's owl would be rather perverse—scarcely a wise old owl.

However, it is only fair to acknowledge that Lord Scott's approach was consistent with a number of previous Court of Appeal decisions, including two to which Lord Walker and I were parties—Yaxley v. Gotts and Kinane v. Mackie-Conteh. However, in agreement with the Court of Appeal and Etherton J. in Cobbe, I suggest that section 2 has nothing to do with the matter. In cases such as those in Crabb v. Arun and Thorner v. Major, the estoppel rests on the finding that it would be inequitable for the defendant to insist on his strict legal rights. So the fact that, if there was a contract, it would be void is irrelevant: indeed the very reason for mounting the proprietary estoppel claim is that there is no enforceable contract. I accept of course that it is not open to a claimant to take the unvarnished point that it is inequitable for a defendant to rely on the argument that an apparent contract is void for not complying with the requirements of section 2. But where there is the superadded fact that the claimant, with > the conscious encouragement of the defendant, has acted in the belief that there is a valid contract, I suggest that section 2 offers no bar to a claim based in equity.

There is strong logical force in favour of the view that s 2 should not bar claims to estoppel even where the claim does not coincide with a constructive trust. It is beyond doubt that estoppel cannot be used to enforce an otherwise invalid contract.[50] But the purpose of an estoppel claim is not to enforce the parties' agreement. As Arden LJ acknowledges in Kinane v Mackie-Conteh, the claim is founded on the prevention of unconscionability, not on the unenforceable agreement.[51] In the following extract, Dixon suggests that the key to understanding the relationship between estoppel and s 2 lies in the precise meaning of unconscionability within the doctrine. He considers that once the meaning of unconscionability is properly understood, the reasoning in cases that rely on the existence of an overlapping constructive trust can be rejected.

Dixon 'Confining and defining proprietary estoppel: the role of unconscionability' (2010) 30 LS 408, pp 416–18

> [A]lthough the use of the constructive trust is readily understandable (especially as there is great attraction in having a statutory justification), it is respectfully submitted that it does not stand up to close scrutiny. Few cases explain why a constructive trust is imposed, save that the existence of the estoppel means that someone has been unconscionable and constructive trusts can protect against unconscionability. This seems to be entirely circular and implies that whenever there is an estoppel, there is also a constructive trust. In reality, it amounts to the imposition of a remedial and artificial constructive trust simply because we want to avoid a conflict with s 2. It is not a justification or an explanation of why s 2 is not engaged, it is an assertion that avoids us having to dive deeper into the dark waters of estoppel to look for such a justification.
> It is suggested below that it is not necessary to resort to the constructive trust to explain the relationship between formality requirements in land law, be they found in s 2 or elsewhere. [. . .]The argument is that estoppel can be explained and confined on a principled basis through the use of unconscionability.
> The essence of the argument here is that estoppel can be the antidote to the imperfect and otherwise flawed creation of property rights if, but only if, there is clear justification for ignoring the formality rules that otherwise normally apply. If the formality rules apply (ie their inapplicability cannot be justified), then there can be no estoppel. Unconscionability provides this justification and the legislature's insistence that property rights must be created in certain ways, means that our understanding of unconscionability should be tied inexorably to the concept of formality, rather than being simply a function of assurance, reliance and detriment. Thus, unconscionability will exist if (but only if) the landowner's assurance amounts both to an assurance of a 'certain enough' right in relation to land and this carries with it a further assurance that the right will be granted despite the absence of the formality that is normally required to create, transfer or enforce that right. Assuming detrimental reliance, an estoppel is made out when a landowner makes a 'double assurance'—an assurance that the claimant will have some right over the representor's land (the 'rights assurance') combined with an assurance that the right will ensue even if the formalities necessary to convey that right are not complied with (the 'formality assurance'). This second assurance may be express or implied, but it is submitted that it exists in all successful cases of estoppel. Unconscionability is a function of formality, not of assurance reliance and detriment. Unconscionability exists when a 'formality assurance' is withdrawn after detrimental reliance. In the absence of such an assurance and its withdrawal, there is no unconscionability and no estoppel:

[50] Dixon, 'Invalid Contracts, Estoppel and Constructive Trusts' [2005] Conv 247, 250.

[...] In failed contract cases, such as Cobbe, Kinane v Mackie-Conteh and Yaxley v Gotts, the fact that the parties attempted to enter into a formality compliant transaction means that it is much more difficult to establish estoppel. This is not because the formality rules triumph over estoppel as a matter of public policy (the s 2 et al argument), but because the landowner cannot easily be said to have promised that formality would not apply when the parties intended but failed to comply with the required formality. It is more difficult to establish unconscionability because the attempted use of formality usually will mean that no assurance was given that formality would not apply—no 'formality assurance'. In both Yaxley and Kinane, the estoppel was successful because in both cases the landowner in essence assured the claimant that the required formality was not needed—in Yaxley when the defendant encouraged the claimant to assume that the gentleman's agreement was binding and in Kinane when the defendant encouraged the claimant to believe that the oral agreement was binding. In Cobbe, not only did Mr Cobbe know and understand that formality was needed, more crucially the defendant did not assure Mr Cobbe that he would acquire property rights without that formality—there was no formality assurance. Thus, it is not the fact that Cobbe was a commercial case that is critical, nor that the 'rights assurance' was not 'certain enough' on the facts, but rather that there was no unconscionability in the sense here explained. Had the defendant made a 'formality assurance', the estoppel could have existed. It is simply that in commercial contexts, the 'formality assurance' is more difficult to establish and so unconscionability is less likely to exist.

4 CREATION AND TRANSFER

Once a contract for the sale or other disposition of an interest in land is created, it is executed by the creation or transfer of the interest concerned. As we have noted, once the contract is executed, no question of compliance with s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989 can be raised. The formality requirements necessary for the creation or transfer of the legal right, and their exceptions, are provided by ss 52 and 54 of the LPA 1925.

Law of Property Act 1925, ss 52 and 54

52 (1) All conveyances of land or of any interest therein are void for the purpose of conveying or creating a legal estate unless made by deed.

(2) This section does not apply to— [...]

(d) leases or tenancies or other assurances not required by law to be made in writing; [...]

(g) conveyances taking effect by operation of law.

54 (1) All interests in land created by parol and not put in writing and signed by the persons so creating the same, or by their agents thereunto lawfully authorised in writing, have, notwithstanding any consideration having been given for the same, the force and effect of interests at will only.

(2) Nothing in the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act shall affect the creation by parol of leases taking effect in possession for a term not exceeding three years (whether or not the lessee is given power to extend the term) at the best rent which can be reasonably obtained without taking a fine.

Hence, save in exceptional cases, the creation or transfer of a legal right requires the execution of a deed. The effect of non-compliance is that legal title does not pass. The intended recipient of the rights may have a claim in equity. For example, where there is a contract for sale, but s 52 is not complied with, an equitable interest may arise under the doctrine of anticipation (discussed further in Chapter 9).

The most notable exception to the need for a deed is that contained in s 54(2) for short leases. This is limited by the terms of the provision to leases at market rent, without a premium, and taking effect in possession. It has been held that possession must be immediate.[52]

The requirements of a deed are provided in s 1 of the LP(MP)A 1989.

Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 1

Deeds and their execution

(1) Any rule of law which—

(a) restricts the substances on which a deed may be written;

(b) requires a seal for the valid execution of an instrument as a deed by an individual; or

(c) requires authority by one person to another to deliver an instrument as a deed on his behalf to be given by deed, is abolished.

(2) An instrument shall not be a deed unless—

(a) it makes it clear on its face that it is intended to be a deed by the person making it or, as the case may be, by the parties to it (whether by describing itself as a deed or expressing itself to be executed or signed as a deed or otherwise); and

(b) it is validly executed as a deed—

(i) by that person or a person authorised to execute it in the name or on behalf of that person, or

(ii) by one or more of those parties or a person authorised to execute it in the name or on behalf of one or more of those parties.

(2A) For the purposes of subsection (2)(a) above, an instrument shall not be taken to make it clear on its face that it is intended to be a deed merely because it is executed under seal.

(3) An instrument is validly executed as a deed by an individual if, and only if—

(a) it is signed—

(i) by him in the presence of a witness who attests the signature; or

(ii) at his direction and in his presence and the presence of two witnesses who each attest the signature; and

(b) it is delivered as a deed.

[52] Long v Tower Hamlets LBC [1998] Ch 197. The implications of the decision are considered by Bright, 'Beware the Informal Lease: The (Very) Narrow Scope of S.54(2) Law of Property Act 1925' [1998] Conv 229.

(4) In subsections (2) and (3) above "sign", in relation to an instrument, includes

(a) an individual signing the name of the person or party on whose behalf he executes the instrument; and

(b) making one's mark on the instrument, and "signature" is to be construed accordingly.

(4A) Subsection (3) above applies in the case of an instrument executed by an individual in the name or on behalf of another person whether or not that person is also an individual.

This section, like s 2 of the 1989 Act concerning contracts, implements recommendations by the Law Commission.[53] It represents a modernization of the requirements for a deed. Under the provision, the key requirements for a document to be a deed are that it is signed and attested, and that it specifies on its face that it is a deed. The specific need for attestation, explained in s 1(3)(a)(i), is that the document is signed 'in the presence of a witness', who then signs the deed him or herself. This requirement is not met, for example, if a witness who was not present when the party executing the deed signed it signs the document. Non-compliance with this requirement is most likely to be known by the party executing the deed, who may, in any event, be estopped from seeking to invalidate it on this basis.[54]

A deed takes effect when it is 'delivered as a deed'.[55] This will be immediate if the document specifies that it is 'signed and delivered' as a deed; in other cases, there will need to be a subsequent delivery. Delivery originally denoted a physical act, but the requirement has evolved to relate to an intention to be bound.

The law as to "delivery" of a deed is of ancient date. But it is reasonably clear. A deed is very different from a contract. On a contract for the sale of land, the contract is not binding on the parties until they have exchanged their parts. But with a deed it is different. A deed is binding on the maker of it, even though the parts have not been exchanged, as long as it has been signed, [. . .] and delivered. "Delivery" in this connection does not mean "handed over" to the other side. It means delivered in the old legal sense, namely, an act done so as to evince an intention to be bound. Even though the deed remains in the possession of the maker, or of his solicitor, he is bound by it if he has done some act evincing an intention to be bound, as by saying: "I deliver this my act and deed." He may, however, make the "delivery" conditional: in which case the deed is called an "escrow" which becomes binding when the condition is fulfilled.

Yale doubts the antiquity of this rule, highlighting the artificiality of continued reference to delivery.

55 Section 1(3)(b) of the 1989 Act.

Yale, 'The Delivery of a Deed' [1970] CLJ 52, 73–4

It is perhaps too harsh to say that fact has been replaced by fiction, for a man's state of mind is as much a fact as the state of his paper [...] But the element of fiction is truly present in the use of the word "delivery" in the mouths of modern judges. It is not the case that a word of lay usage has been appropriated to an artificial sense for purposes of legal definition and application; it is the case that one legal content has been emptied out of "delivery" and replaced by another. The wine has been changed (for better or for worse) but the bottle bears the same label.

Intention becomes significant where, in the ordinary course of transactions, deeds are prepared and signed in advance of an anticipated completion of creation or transfer. Following Longman v Viscount Chelsea,[56] a deed that has been signed, but not delivered, may be classified in one of two ways: as an escrow, or as a 'non-deed'.[57]

The different legal consequence of these possibilities was considered in that case.

Longman v Viscount Chelsea
(1989) 58 P & CR 189, CA

Nourse LJ

At 195

A writing cannot become a deed unless it is signed, [...] and delivered as a deed. Having reached that stage, it is correctly described as having been "executed" as a deed. Having been signed [...], it may be delivered in one of three ways. First, it may be delivered as an unconditional deed, being irrevocable and taking immediate effect. Secondly, it may be delivered as an escrow, being irrevocable but not taking effect unless and until the condition or conditions of the escrow are fulfilled. Thirdly, it may be handed to an agent of the maker with instructions to deal with it in a certain way in a certain event, being revocable and of no effect unless and until it is so dealt with, whereupon it is delivered and takes effect [...]

Whether a deed is within the second or third category is dependent on the intention of the party executing the deed. In that case, Mrs Longman, who held a long lease of a residential property, had negotiated with her landlord, the Cadogan Estate, for the surrender of her existing lease and the grant of a new one with an extended term. Each part of the transaction required a deed and both parties had signed deeds in preparation for completion. Following delays by the landlord, they then withdrew and made a fresh offer for a new lease at a vastly increased cost. Mrs Longman argued that the deed granting the new lease had been delivered as an escrow and that the remaining conditions had been, or could be, fulfilled. Her claim failed, because there was no intent on the part of the landlord to deliver the deed. This was evident by the fact that the parties' negotiations had been expressly conducted subject to the formal execution of the deeds. The Court was critical [T]he negotiations did not differ in substance from those which are conducted between solicitors all round the country every day of the week. In an area where there has already been some tendency to allow hard cases to make bad law we must recognise that our decision will have equal effect on everyday transactions of varying and unpredictable merits, in respect of which settled and expedient practices ought to be more highly regarded than the merits of individual cases.

5 REGISTRATION OF TITLE

In most cases, the formal transfer of a legal estate is not complete until title is registered.[59] Either the legal title being transferred will already be subject to registration, or the transfer in question will trigger compulsory first registration. Where registration is required, failure to do so carries the consequence that legal title will not be transferred. Title remains with the transferor, although, in the case of a sale, it will be held in trust for the transferee under the doctrine of anticipation discussed in Chapter 9.[60]

Registration of title is now governed by the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002), which repealed and replaced the Land Registration Act 1925 (LRA 1925). The 2002 Act is based on recommendations by the Law Commission.[61] While the Act is a revolution in its own terms, it also marks the latest stage in the evolution of registered land, the origins of which can be traced back to the eighteenth century.[62] Over the course of time, the system has developed from a mechanical means of registration of title, based on the substantive principles of unregistered land law, to an independent system of 'title by registration'.[63]

59 The scope of registration is discussed below. The principle exception relates to leases of seven years' duration or less.

60 No trust will be imposed in the case of a transfer by gift as a result of the maxim that 'equity does not complete an incomplete gift'.

61 Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001).

62 The history is traced by Ruoff et al, Registered Conveyancing (1986, ch 1).

63 The Law Commission's Consultation Paper, which preceded the final Report, noted the aim to bring about 'not a system of registration of title but a system of title by registration': Law Commission Report No 254, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Consultative Document (1998), [10.43]. The clearest illustration of the shift to title by registration is found in how the 2002 Act governs claims to adverse possession of registered land. This is considered in Chapter 8.

Cooke, The New Law of Land Registration (2003, p 31)

> [In] the Land Registration Act 2002 and the Law Commission documents that preceded it we find the divergence of registered from unregistered title affirmed with confidence and reinforced. It has finally been appreciated that title registration can be used to manipulate the nature of title; for the first time we see real legislative enthusiasm for title registration not merely because of its accuracy or its potential benefit to conveyancers, but also because of its ability to change the law relating to land ownership.

Despite the development noted by Cooke, registration of title in English law operates alongside, rather than wholly separately from, general rules of property law. Such a system of registration of title has been described by the Scottish Law Commission as 'bijural': it is a scheme 'which operates with two different laws of property'.[64] This characteristic is important to bear in mind in understanding registration of title. As Nair explains, it means 'that the title registration rules cannot be fully understood except by reference to their interaction with the principles of English property law as a whole'.[65] The difficulty in such a system is that the general law and the rules of registration of title may conflict and each allocate property to different parties. This phenomenon is described by O'Connor as 'bijural ambiguity'.[66] Resolving such conflicts is a key challenge for bijural schemes of registration of title.

5.1 WHY REGISTRATION OF TITLE?

It is common to refer to 'registered land' in contra-distinction to unregistered land, although 'registration of title' is more accurate, because it is titles that are registered. More than one title may subsist in relation to the same piece of land and be registered as separate titles: in particular, a freehold and leasehold. Registration of title is considered desirable, both because of the positive attributes of registration and the defects of alternative systems. Unregistered conveyancing is cumbersome and repetitive: title must be investigated fresh on every transfer through an examination of the title deeds. Registration of title obviates this process by providing a single, updated record of title. An alternative system of deeds registration has successfully been adopted in some jurisdictions, and operated in Yorkshire and Middlesex before being replaced by registration of title.[67] It ensures that an accurate record of deeds is available to investigate title, but maintains the mechanism, and therefore the disadvantages, of unregistered conveyancing.

The 1857 Royal Commission considered registration of title to be the only answer to the following problem:

67 For further explanation, see Cooke, The New Law of Land Registration (2003), pp 5–7. She notes that the system is successfully used within the USA, South Africa, and Scotland.

Royal Commission, Registration of Title (1857, 23–4)

> By what means, consistently with the preservation of existing rights, can we now obtain such a system of registration as will enable owners to deal with land in as simple and easy a manner, as far as the title is concerned, and the difference in the nature and the subject matter may allow, as they now can deal with movable chattels or stock? No-one doubts that it would be a great benefit to the proprietors of land if they were able to convey it with the same facility as the owners of ships or of stocks or railway shares can now assign their property in any of them. The questions is, can this be accomplished?—and if so how?

The provision of a system of registration of title based on the 1857 Royal Commission report was first provided by the Land Transfer Act 1875.[68] Despite this, even at the time of the 1925 legislation, registered land was still seen as experimental. The intention was to operate both registered and unregistered systems for a ten-year period, before adopting 'whichever system should be found more safe, simple, speedy and economic'.[69] Although no formal decision on the matter was ever taken, the system of registration was gradually extended.

In replacing the LRA 1925, the primary focus of the LRA 2002 is to lay the foundations for the implementation of e-conveyancing.

Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001, [1.5]–[1.6])

> The fundamental objective of the Bill is that, under the system of electronic dealing with land that it seeks to create, the register should be a complete and accurate reflection of the state of the title of the land at any given time, so that it is possible to investigate title to land on line, with the absolute minimum of additional enquiries and inspections.
> Although that ultimate objective may seem an obvious one, its implications are considerable, and virtually all the changes that the Bill makes to the present law flow directly from it. [. . .]

E-conveyancing itself has not yet been achieved (and is discussed in section 6 below), but the changes made to facilitate its introduction are far reaching in their own right.

The Law Commission noted that the legislation called for a shift in attitude and perception.

Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001, [1.09]–[1.10])

> To achieve the goals [of the report] will also require a change in attitude. There is a widely held perception that it is unreasonable to expect people to register their rights over land. We find this puzzling given the overwhelming prevalence of registered title. Furthermore, the law has long required compliance with certain formal requirements for the transfer of interests in 68 A previous system under the Land Registry Act 1862 had departed from those recommendations and was superseded by the 1875 Act: see Ruoff et al (1986), [1–03].

69 Ruoff et al (1986), [1–05].

land and for contracts to sell or dispose of such interests. The wisdom of these requirements is not seriously questioned. We cannot see why the further step of registration should be regarded as so onerous. In any event, under the system of electronic conveyancing that we envisage (and for which the Bill makes provision), not only will the process of registration become very much easier, but the execution of the transaction in electronic form and its simultaneous registration will be inextricably linked.

These changes will necessarily alter the perception of title to land. It will be the fact of registration and registration alone that confers title. This is entirely in accordance with the fundamental principle of a conclusive register which underpins the Bill.

The changes introduced by the LRA 2002 impact, in particular, on the operation of priority rules in registered land, discussed in Chapter 14, and on adverse possession of registered land, discussed in Chapter 8. We return to evaluate the operation of the 2002 Act in Chapter 15.

5.2 THE PRINCIPLES OF REGISTRATION OF TITLE

Registration of title is not unique to English law. Its introduction matched a parallel development in Australia, in the introduction to New South Wales of the Torrens system of registration, pioneered by Sir Robert Torrens. The principles underlying systems of registered title are identified in the following seminal work.

Ruoff, An Englishman Looks at the Torrens System (1957, pp 7–14)

The essential features of every system of registered title are that the State authoritatively establishes title by declaring, under a guarantee of indemnity, that it is vested in a named person or persons, subject to specified incumbrances and qualifications. Anterior defects of title are cured, and thenceforth all investigation of the history of how the named owner came to be entitled is ruled out for ever and all future transactions are carried out by simple forms and simple machinery. No transaction is effective until it has been entered on the official record kept by the State, but once this has happened it cannot (apart from fraud) be upset—that is the broad theory.

It remains for me to indicate what I believe to be the merits or faults of this system. I suggest that in each particular country or state it succeeds or fails according to the degree with which the local law and the local administration accord, or do not accord, with certain fundamental principles. I will call these:

1. The mirror principle.
2. The curtain principle.
3. The insurance principle.

The mirror principle involves the proposition that the register of title is a mirror which reflects accurately and completely and beyond all argument the current facts that are material to a man's title. [. . .]

The curtain principle is one which provides that the register is the sole source of information for proposing purchasers, who need not and, indeed, must not concern themselves with trusts and equities which lie behind the curtain. [. . .]

> The true [insurance] principle is this, that the mirror that is the register is deemed to give an absolutely correct reflection of title but if, through human frailty, a flaw appears, anyone who thereby suffers loss must be put in the same position, so far as money can do it, as if the reflection were a true one. A lost right is converted into hard cash.

Achieving the 'mirror principle' has been a continuous goal of registration of title. It is reflected in the 'fundamental objective' of the LRA 2002 extracted above. Ruoff acknowledged that 'in this imperfect world the mirror does not invariably give a completely reliable reflection'.[70] Tension remains, in particular, as regards the balance between the mirror principle and the category of 'overriding interests'—that is, those not entered on the register, but necessarily binding against purchasers. This category of interest is discussed in Chapter 14.

The 'curtain principle' is ensured through the process of overreaching, whereby (as long as certain conditions are met) purchasers take land free from beneficial interests under a trust. The mechanism is discussed in Chapter 19.

The 'insurance principle' is reflected in the provision for payment of an indemnity, now governed by Sch 8 of the 2002 Act, for those suffering loss as a result of a rectification of the register (or a mistake, the correction of which would involve rectification), or through mistakes made by the Land Registry. It is closely connected to the issue of indefeasibility of title,[71] which is discussed below.

5.3 THE SCOPE OF REGISTRATION

When registration of title was first introduced, it operated on a voluntary basis. The Land Transfer Act 1897 was the first to make provision for compulsory registration.

Compulsory registration is a two-stage process: firstly, an area is declared (by Order in Council) to be subject to compulsory registration of title; secondly, title is registered for the first time on the occurrence of an event that triggers registration. Compulsory registration began in London and spread piecemeal. The last remaining districts were made subject to compulsory registration on 1 December 1990.[72] Hence, title to all land in England and Wales is now either registered, or will be registered for the first time on the next triggering event.

Voluntary registration is possible under s 3 of the LRA 2002. To assist in the completion of the register, financial incentives have been provided by the reduction of fees for voluntary registration.[73] The Act further encourages voluntary registration through making a registered title qualitatively superior to its unregistered counterpart[74]—in particular, through its limited vulnerability to claims to adverse possession (discussed in Chapter 8).

It is estimated that as much as 25 per cent of land in England and Wales remains unregistered.[75] Because much of this is likely to be rural land, the percentage of titles that remain 70 Ruoff, An Englishman Looks at the Torrens System (1957, Sydney: The Lawbook Co), p 9.

71 Whilst acknowledging the importance of the link between rectification and indefeasibility, Cooper has argued that indemnity in systems of title registration 'is also to be justified on account of its function as a policy tool to manipulate the attitudes and behaviour of those involved in land dealing': Cooper, 'The Versatality of State Indemnity Provisions' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 5 (ed Dixon, Oxford: Hart, 2009), p 35.

unregistered is considerably lower. The Law Commission identified 'total registration' as a goal:[76] '[U]nregistered land has had its day. In the comparatively near future, it will be necessary to take steps to bring what is left of it on to the register.'[77] But the recommendations for the 2002 Act did not include provisions to achieve this goal, for which three reasons were given.[78] Firstly, the Law Commission noted that it would be premature to do so before existing provisions were given the opportunity to work (including an anticipated rise in voluntary registration under the LRA 2002).

Secondly, it was felt that the triggers for compulsory registration catch the principal dispositions of land and extension of compulsion beyond this may be heavy handed.

Thirdly, concerns were expressed at further stretching the Land Registry's resources following the changes introduced by the 2002 Act.

The Law Commission suggested that the matter should be subject to a future review.

5.3.1 Registrable Titles and First Registration

The scope of registration of title is outlined in s 2 of the LRA 2002.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 2

This Act makes provision about the registration of title to—

(a) unregistered legal estates which are interests of any of the following kinds—
   (i) an estate in land,
   (ii) a rentcharge,
   (iii) a franchise,
   (iv) a profit à prendre in gross, and
   (v) any other interest or charge which subsists for the benefit of, or is a charge on, an interest the title to which is registered; and

(b) interests capable of subsisting at law which are created by a disposition of an interest the title to which is registered.

Of most significance is s 2(1)(a), through which registration applies to the two legal estates in land: the freehold and leasehold. As regards leases, ss 2 and 3 (which make provision for first registration of title) limit the application of registration to those of more than seven years' duration. The true scope of registration of title is therefore freeholds and leaseholds of more than seven years' duration. These are the only rights that are subject to compulsory registration. Rentcharges, franchises,[79] and profits à prendre in gross[80] may be registered voluntarily, but there is never an obligation to do so. Although economically valuable, these rights are of limited significance in understanding the operation of registered titles and they are not further discussed in this chapter.

Sections 3 and 4 of the LRA 2002 make provision for first registration of title. Section 3 concerns voluntary registration, enabling the proprietor of a freehold and of a lease with more than seven years left to run to apply to have the title registered. Section 4 then identifies the events that trigger compulsory registration.

[76] Law Commission Report No 271 (2001), [2.13]. [77] Ibid, [1.6]. [78] Ibid, [2.10]–[2.12].

[79] This category covers certain privileges, such as the grant of a right to hold a market.

[80] A profit is a right to take something from land. It exists in gross where it is not attached to a dominant estate. The category includes, e.g. a right to hunt and shoot game.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 4

(1) The requirement of registration applies on the occurrence of any of the following events—

(a) the transfer of a qualifying estate—

(i) for valuable or other consideration, by way of gift or in pursuance of an order of any court, or

(ii) by means of an assent (including a vesting assent); [. . .]

(c) the grant out of a qualifying estate of an estate in land—

(i) for a term of years absolute of more than seven years from the date of the grant, and

(ii) for valuable or other consideration, by way of gift or in pursuance of an order of any court;

(d) the grant out of a qualifying estate of an estate in land for a term of years absolute to take effect in possession after the end of the period of three months beginning with the date of the grant; [. . .]

(f) the grant of a lease out of an unregistered legal estate in land in such circumstances as are mentioned in paragraph (b);

(g) the creation of a protected first legal mortgage of a qualifying estate.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a qualifying estate is an unregistered legal estate which is—

(a) a freehold estate in land, or

(b) a leasehold estate in land for a term which, at the time of the transfer, grant or creation, has more than seven years to run.

Hence, registration is compulsory for freehold titles and for leases of more than seven years' duration. The events triggering first registration relate to the transfer of a freehold and the creation or transfer of a lease or mortgage.

5.3.2 Grades of Title

On first registration, a freehold estate is registered with absolute, qualified, or possessory title. 'Absolute' title is the usual expectation, and vests the estate in the proprietor subject principally to burdens on the register and overriding interests.[81] 'Qualified' or 'possessory' title may be awarded (respectively) where there is a possible defect in the applicant's title or insufficient documentary proof. Registration is additionally subject to estates, rights, or interests that are excepted from registration (in the case of qualified title), or are subsisting or capable of arising at the date of registration (possessory title).[82]

81 Land Registration Act 2002, s 11(3)–(5).

82 Ibid, s 11(6)–(7).

A fourfold scheme applies to leasehold title.[83] Absolute, qualified, and possessory leasehold titles have analogous effect to those grades of freehold title, with additional provision that they are subject to covenants, obligations, and liabilities in the lease.[84] Absolute leasehold is only available, however, where the freehold is also registered or proved to the satisfaction of the Registrar. Where this is not the case, good leasehold title is granted, leaving open a possible challenge against the estate out of which the lease was granted.[85]

5.3.3 Subsequent Dispositions

It is essential that the register is kept up to date. Hence, once a title has been brought onto the register through voluntary or compulsory first registration, subsequent dealings must be completed by registration.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 27

(1) If a disposition of a registered estate or registered charge is required to be completed by registration, it does not operate at law until the relevant registration requirements are met.

(2) In the case of a registered estate, the following are the dispositions which are required to be completed by registration—

(a) a transfer,

(b) where the registered estate is an estate in land, the grant of a term of years absolute—

(i) for a term of more than seven years from the date of the grant,

(ii) to take effect in possession after the end of the period of three months beginning with the date of the grant,

(iii) under which the right to possession is discontinuous,

(iv) in pursuance of Part 5 of the Housing Act 1985 (c. 68) (the right to buy), or

(v) in circumstances where section 171A of that Act applies (disposal by landlord which leads to a person no longer being a secure tenant),

(c) where the registered estate is a franchise or manor, the grant of a lease,

(d) the express grant or reservation of an interest of a kind falling within section 1(2)(a) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (c. 20), other than one which is capable of being registered under the Commons Registration Act 1965 (c. 64),

(e) the express grant or reservation of an interest of a kind falling within section 1(2)(b) or (e) of the Law of Property Act 1925, and

(f) the grant of a legal charge.

There is a logical symmetry between the scope of registered dispositions and events triggering compulsory first registration. Hence, the transfer of a registered freehold or leasehold title, and the creation of a lease or more than seven years' duration, are all included in the list of registrable dispositions.

[83] Ibid, s 12. [84] Ibid, s 12(4). [85] Ibid, s 12(7).

It should be noted that the transfer of a registered lease requires registration even if there is less than seven years of the term left to run. The effect of non-compliance is specified in s 27(1): legal title does not pass unless and until completed by registration.[86]

5.4 THE REGISTRATION GAP

Inherent within s 27(1) of the LRA 2002 is the existence of a 'registration gap'—that is, a period between completion of a transfer by execution of a deed and the vesting of legal title by registration. During this period, legal title is held on trust for the purchaser through the doctrine of anticipation discussed in Chapter 9. But the purchaser remains vulnerable to third-party rights arising during this period, or further dealings affecting the title being carried out by the vendor.

Brown & Root Technology Ltd v Sun Alliance and London Assurance Co Ltd
[2001] Ch 733, CA

Facts: Brown & Root Technology Ltd (Technology) was registered proprietor of a lease. Clause 8.1 conferred on it a personal break clause, enabling it to bring the lease to an end by notice. Technology assigned the lease to its parent company, B & R, but the assignment was not registered. Under the predecessor to s 27(1) of the 2002 Act in the Land Registration Act 1925, this meant that legal title had not vested in the assignee. Technology sought to exercise the break clause.

Mummery LJ

In my judgment, Technology were entitled, on the correct construction of clause 8.4 of the lease, to serve the notice terminating the lease. [...] My reasons are:

1. Clause 8.4 had two purposes: first, that the right to terminate should be unassignable; secondly, that, if there was an assignment of the lease, the personal right to terminate conferred on Technology should cease to have effect. The second purpose is relevant to the resolution of this appeal, which turns on the identification of the precise event occasioning Technology's cesser of the right to invoke the break clause. The critical question is: has there been an assignment of the lease by the lessee and, if so, when did that event occur?
2. It is common ground that there has been no transfer (and therefore no assignment) of the legal title to the lease; that, as between Technology and B & R, the equitable title to the lease was capable of passing by virtue of a specifically enforceable contract to assign the lease; that, if this were unregistered land, the assignment would occur on the execution of the deed of assignment and the conveyance of the legal estate thereby, and not on the conclusion of the contract to assign; and that, depending on the context, the passing of the equitable or beneficial interest may amount to a transfer or assignment of the property in question, even though there has been no registration of the transfer, as required by statute, to perfect the legal title. The judge referred to the cases of In re Rose [1949] Ch 78 and In re Rose [1952] Ch 499 as instances of a bequest of shares and an inter vivos gift of shares which took effect as between donor and donee and in accordance with donative intent before the registration of the transfers of the shares pursuant to the provisions of the Companies Act. Until registration there was no transfer so far as the company was concerned, but that did not prevent the gift from being effective as between others.

3. This case is not a matter of beneficial ownership between parties to the transfer of the lease: the issue of assignment or no assignment affects the legal position of a third party, the lessors, who have given their licence to assign but are not a party to the transfer. As was observed by Jenkins LJ in In re Rose [1952] Ch 499, 518 it is necessary to keep clear and distinct the position between the transferor and the transferee and the position of a third party. Transfer of the beneficial title is not, in this context, relevant to the legal relationship between the lessees and the lessors. The issue is not what rights Technology and B & R have against each other, but what rights Technology and Sun Alliance have against each other. That is a question of legal, not equitable, rights.
4. As between lessors and lessees, there is binding Court of Appeal authority in Gentle v Faulkner [1990] 2 QB 267 for the proposition that assignment means, in the absence of a context showing an extended meaning, an assignment of the legal estate, and not of the beneficial interest, e g by declaration of trust of the lease. It is not a matter of intention to assign, a point highly relevant to the passing of beneficial title, but of whether a defined event has occurred. That event is not completion, as Mr Dowding contended; it is the transfer of the legal title to the lease, so as to create the legal relationship of lessor and lessee between B & R and Sun Alliance.

The facts of the case are unusual. The companies were the claimants in the action and had brought proceedings against the landlord, who had refused to accept the exercise of the break clause. Technology was owned by B & R and, following the assignment of the lease, falling rental values meant that the lease was commercially unattractive. B & R's non-registration therefore operated to its advantage. Technology's exercise of the break clause effectively enabled B & R to escape an unwanted lease.

The case illustrates, however, the vulnerability of a purchaser or assignee pending registration. The loss of a property right may, more usually, be the last thing wanted by a purchaser: for example, if the companies were not related and the exercise of the break clause was motivated by spite against the assignee. In such a case, personal remedies may lie against the vendor (or assignor),[87] although the utility of these is dependent on the vendor's whereabouts and ability to pay.

The registration gap will be removed by e-conveyancing, because completion and registration will occur simultaneously.[88] The Law Commission flagged possible solutions to apply in the meantime,[89] but considered that personal liability sufficed.[90]

[87] For example, because the legal title is held on trust, an action may lie for breach of trust.

5.5 OUTLINE OF A REGISTERED TITLE

A sample registered title is provided in Figure 2. Each registered title is given a unique title number. The information recorded is divided into three parts.

- The property register identifies the title as freehold or leasehold, and, in the case of a lease, provides brief details of its terms. It identifies the land by a description, usually the address, and by reference to the official plan. It also lists rights that benefit the title, such as the benefit of an easement.
- The proprietorship register gives the name and address of the registered proprietor(s) and any restrictions on their ability to deal with the land.[91] It may also state the price paid for the title.
- The charges register contains information on registered mortgages and other secured interests, and any other burdens affecting the title: for example, leases, easements, and covenants to which the land is subject.

5.6 INDEFEASIBILITY

Ruoff, in the extract at section 5.2 above, identifies as an essential requirement of title registration the idea that, once title is entered on the register, 'it cannot (apart from fraud) be upset'. This encapsulates both the suggestion that a registered title is indefeasible and that indefeasibility is not absolute, because it is subject to an exception for fraud.

Cooke describes 'indefeasibility' as the affirmative warranty of title provided by registration.[92] The warranty is backed by an indemnity through the insurance principle. The approach adopted to indefeasibility is significant, because it determines how secure a registered title is.

Cooke, The New Law of Land Registration (2003, pp 99–100)

> The question behind a discussion of indefeasibility, or security, or the affirmative warranty, is: can I be sure that, if I purchase a registered estate, I will be able to keep it without fear that I will lose it because of something already existing that I do not know about? Indefeasibility is a policy issue. The shape of the law, and the answer to any ambiguities in it, must depend upon whether preference is to be given to a proprietor of land or to a purchaser; that is, to static or dynamic security. Dynamic security means that the purchaser can be confident that he will get a good title, and this generates a confident market; static security means that someone who owns or has an interest in land can be sure he will not be deprived of it against his will. The two are in tension. If we say that an innocent purchaser P, who has obtained registration of a forged transfer, must be able to keep his land (while compensating O who has lost it due to fraud or forgery by a third party, who of course is not worth suing), P may be happy now, but he will be less happy if another rogue forges P's signature and transfers the land to P2, to whom the same principle will also give a good title, while compensating P. The system must therefore find an acceptable compromise between dynamic and static security; but different systems find the balance at different points.

[91] The entry and removal of restrictions is governed by the 2002 Act, ss 40–47. They are considered in Chapter 14.

Cooke argues that determining the approach to indefeasibility is now the 'biggest challenge' for the English system, because the provisions of the 2002 Act leave the matter open to interpretation.[93]

In Torrens systems, two approaches to indefeasibility have been identified: immediate indefeasibility supports dynamic security, by favouring the purchaser's title;[94] deferred indefeasibility supports static security, by giving preference to the former proprietor. Immediate indefeasibility has now been adopted in Australia and New Zealand. Cooke argues that the policy of the LRA 2002 requires a move towards the Torrens system and therefore to immediate indefeasibility[95]—but this is subject to special protection that is provided to a proprietor in possession.[96] The Law Commission termed its approach 'qualified indefeasibility'.[97] In this chapter we explain the operation of the provisions of the LRA 2002 connected with indefeasibility. We return to the issue in our evaluation of the LRA 2002 in chapter 15.

5.6.1 Alteration, Rectification, and Indemnity

The scheme of the LRA 2002 is to permit, in circumstances specified in Sch 4 to the Act, an 'alteration' of the register. An alteration may be made by order of a court or by the Registrar. The circumstances in which a court or the Registrar may alter the register are the same, except for an additional power on the part of the Registrar to remove superfluous entries.[98] The other circumstances are given in Sch 4, para 2, in relation to a court and in para 3 in relation to the Registrar.

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 4, para 2

(1) The court may make an order for alteration of the register for the purpose of—

(a) correcting a mistake,

(b) bringing the register up to date, or

(c) giving effect to any estate, right or interest excepted from the effect of registration.

(2) An order under this paragraph has effect when served on the registrar to impose a duty on him to give effect to it.

The same provision is made for alterations by the Registrar in Sch 4, para 5(a)–(c). A mistake may be procedural or be substantive, the latter arising for example where a person becomes registered proprietor of a title which they are not entitled to as a matter of 93 Ibid, p 11.

94 See, however, O'Connor, 'Registration of Title in England and Australia: A Theoretical and Comparative Analysis' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 2 (ed Cooke, 2003), p 86. She notes that equating dynamic security with protection of purchasers is too simplistic. It also benefits owners because 'Without it, owner's titles can be disturbed years after purchase if a defect in their title or a prior interest comes to light within the relevant limitation period'.

95 Cooke (2003), p 101.

96 Ibid. The term 'proprietor in possession' is defined in s 131 of the 2002 Act. It covers proprietors who are physically in occupation themselves, or where the land is occupied by a party in a specified relationship to the proprietor: e.g., trustees and landlords are treated as proprietors in possession where the land is physically occupied by (respectively) their beneficiaries or tenants.

97 Law Commission Report No 271 (2001), [10.13].

98 Schedule 4, para 5(d), of the 2002 Act.

law.[99] We discuss the meaning of mistake further in our evaluation of the LRA 2002 in chapter 15, part 3.1.

'Rectification' is the term given to one specific type of alteration.

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 4, para 1

In this Schedule, references to rectification, in relation to alteration of the register, are to alteration which—

(a) involves the correction of a mistake, and

(b) prejudicially affects the title of a registered proprietor.

Rectification is significant in understanding the extent to which a title is indefeasible, because it is an alteration that 'prejudicially affects' the registered title. It is directly linked to the availability of an indemnity under Sch 8 of the 2002 Act.

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 8, para 1

(1) A person is entitled to be indemnified by the registrar if he suffers loss by reason of—

(a) rectification of the register,

(b) a mistake whose correction would involve rectification of the register, [. . .]

(2) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (1)(a)— [. . .]

(b) the proprietor of a registered estate or charge claiming in good faith under a forged disposition is, where the register is rectified, to be regarded as having suffered loss by reason of such rectification as if the disposition had not been forged.

These provisions therefore ensure that where a decision is made as regards the rectification of the register, the party who loses as a result of that decision receives an indemnity. Subparagraph 2(b) precludes an argument that no 'loss' is suffered where rectification is made pursuant to a forged disposition, because such a transaction has no effect.[100]

Paragraph 5 of Sch 8 limits the availability of an indemnity to 'innocent' parties.[101]

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 8, para 5

(1) No indemnity is payable under this Schedule on account of any loss suffered by a claimant—

(a) wholly or partly as a result of his own fraud, or

(b) wholly as a result of his own lack of proper care.

(2) Where any loss is suffered by a claimant partly as a result of his own lack of proper care, any indemnity payable to him is to be reduced to such extent as is fair having regard to his share in the responsibility for the loss.

99 Baxter v Mannion [2011] 1 WLR 1594. The case is discussed below and in Chapter 15, section 3.1.

100 The provision maintains the reversal of Re Odell [1906] 2 Ch 47, enacted in the 1925 Act.

101 Apart from instances of rectification, Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 8, provides for an indemnity to be payable as a consequence of various mistakes, errors, and omissions connected with the register that are not connected to an alteration of the register.

The special protection afforded to a proprietor in possession is provided in Sch 4, paras 3 (as regards alterations by a court) and 6 (as regards alterations by the Registrar).

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 4, para 3

(1) This paragraph applies to the power under paragraph 2, so far as relating to rectification.

(2) If alteration affects the title of the proprietor of a registered estate in land, no order may be made under paragraph 2 without the proprietor's consent in relation to land in his possession unless—

(a) he has by fraud or lack of proper care caused or substantially contributed to the mistake, or

(b) it would for any other reason be unjust for the alteration not to be made.

(3) If in any proceedings the court has power to make an order under paragraph 2, it must do so, unless there are exceptional circumstances which justify its not doing so.

(4) In sub-paragraph (2), the reference to the title of the proprietor of a registered estate in land includes his title to any registered estate which subsists for the benefit of the estate in land.

The same provision is repeated in para 6 as regards alterations by the Registrar. As we have seen, in Sch 4 para 1 rectification is defined as the correction of a "mistake" in a manner that "prejudicially affects the title of the registered proprietor". Hence, the effect of Sch 4 para 3 is that rectification against a proprietor in possession is only possible where, in addition to establishing a mistake, the proprietor consents, substantially contributed to the mistake by fraud or lack of proper care, or for any other reason it would be unjust not to rectify. In Baxter v Mannion,[102] Mr Baxter became registered proprietor of a field through claiming to have been in adverse possession of the land against the title of the previous registered proprietor, Mr Mannion.[103] In fact, Mr Baxter had not been in adverse possession and so his registration was held to constitute a mistake within Sch 4 para 1. However, he was now a registered proprietor in possession entitled to the protection afforded (in this instance) by paras 3 and 6. The Court of Appeal accepted the judge's conclusion that "simple justice" required Mr Mannion to be reinstated as proprietor.[104] Mr Baxter had obtained registration when he was not entitled to do so and therefore it would be unjust not to rectify. Commenting on the first instance decision that was endorsed by the Court of Appeal, Dixon suggests that the judge's approach elides two separate issues; the existence of the mistake on the one hand and the reason why it would be unjust not to rectify on the other.[105] The judgment amounts to saying that it would be unjust not to rectify because registration had been made by mistake.

The special protection afforded to the proprietor in possession is limited to rectification and does not apply to other alterations of the Registrar. Such an alteration may include amending the register to reflect an easement acquired through prescription, or a right binding against the proprietor as an overriding interest.[106]

5.6.2 Indefeasibility in Action

To understand the scope of these provisions and, in particular, the 'qualified indefeasibility' conferred on a proprietor in possession, it is helpful to consider their application to a number of examples. The examples are based on the transfer of a registered title from A to B, or the grant of a registered charge to B. It transpires that the transfer is the result of forgery of A's signature, or fraud conducted against A, which includes the situation in which A signs a transfer as a result of undue influence. B may be the perpetrator of the forgery or fraud, or may be innocent—the wrong being committed by a third party (typically, a person who was jointly registered proprietor of the title with A).

The distinction between 'forgery' and 'fraud' is a significant one. The special protection afforded to a proprietor in possession applies only in relation to a rectification (Sch 4, para 3) and the register is only rectified if it is altered to correct a mistake (Sch 4, para 1). The availability of an indemnity (in Sch 8) is, in turn, linked to rectification. 'Mistake' is not defined in the LRA 2002. To determine whether a mistake has been made, it is necessary to consider the effect of a transaction as a matter of the general law. A forged transaction is void and does not, under the general law, pass title to B. Hence, if B is entered on the register pursuant to a forged transaction, then there is a mistake, because B did not, in fact, hold title. Removing B from the register constitutes rectification.

But fraud (such as undue influence) renders a transaction voidable by A. Title passes to B under the general law and therefore no mistake is made in registering B as proprietor: B holds the title at the time of registration. If the voidable transfer is rescinded by A, then removing B from the register does not involve rectification. It is an alteration of the register to bring it up to date (within Sch 4, para 2(1)(b)), with the setting aside of the transaction.[107]

With this distinction in mind, the examples can now be discussed. In each case, it is assumed that following B's entry on the register as proprietor, A seeks to be reinstated.

B forges A's signature

The register is rectified to correct the mistake made by B's registration following a void transaction. B's fraud precludes him or her from benefiting from indefeasibility, even if B is now a proprietor in possession (Sch 4, para 3(2)(a)), or from claiming an indemnity (Sch 8, para 5).

B procures A's signature through fraud (such as undue influence)

The effect of the fraud under the general law is that the transaction is voidable and A has an equity to rescind the transaction against B. When the transaction is set aside, the register is altered to bring it up to date. Because there is no rectification here, no issue arises of B being protected as a proprietor in possession or of an indemnity being payable.

A's signature is forged by a third party

The registration of B is a mistake, because it has been made pursuant to a void transaction. Alteration of the register therefore constitutes rectification. If the register is rectified, then B is indemnified under Sch 8, para 1(1)(a); if not, then A is indemnified under Sch 8, para 1(1)(b). Nothing in the terms of Sch 4 dictates the approach to be taken, although immediate indefeasibility (leaving B as registered proprietor) is consistent with the policy identified by Cooke of moving closer to the Torrens system.[108]

The position changes, however, if B is a proprietor in possession. B then benefits from the special protection afforded to proprietors in possession under Sch 4, para 3(2). The register is unlikely to be rectified against B, leaving A to a financial indemnity. This exemplifies the Law Commission's concept of 'qualified indefeasibility'.

A's signature is procured by fraud (such as undue influence) perpetrated by a third party

As in the previous example of forgery, there is no mistake in B's registration pursuant to a voidable transaction. There is therefore no rectification of the register and no issue of payment of an indemnity. The register may be altered to bring it up to date within Sch 4, para 2(1) (b), if the transaction is rescinded as against B.

The difference between this situation and that in which the fraud is perpetrated by B relates to the likelihood of rescission being available against B, and therefore to the likelihood of any alteration being made to the register. This, in turn, relates to the operation of the general law on undue influence rather than the statutory provisions on alteration of the register. Rescission will be available against B only if B is 'infected' by the undue influence exerted against A by the third party:[109] for example, if B, a bank, were to fail to take the steps necessary under Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2)[110] to avoid being infected by undue influence exerted against A by her husband, the third party, in procuring A's signature on a mortgage application.

6 THE FUTURE: E-CONVEYANCING

The fundamental objective of the LRA 2002 (contained in [1.5] of the Law Commission report, extracted in section 5.1 above) is directly connected to the introduction of e-conveyancing. The Law Commission further described providing the framework for its introduction as 'the most important single function' of the Act.[111]

Harpum, who, as Law Commissioner, was one of the architects of the 2002 Act, notes the close connection between the procedural and substantive changes introduced by the Act, and the political significance of e-conveyancing.

Harpum, 'Property in an Electronic Age' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 1

> The mechanisms by which property is transferred are undergoing a revolution, namely, the move from paper-based to dematerialised dealings. [. . .] Because of the time that the business of conveyancing takes and its expense, it has become a significant political issue. These fundamental changes in the ways in which conveyancing is conducted, remarkable though they are in themselves, will necessarily bring equally significant changes in substantive land law in their wake. The substantive law must be harmonised to fit the new conveyancing order.

[111] Law Commission Report No 271 (2001), [13.1].

None of this should come as any great surprise. Changes in the manner in which conveyancing is conducted have in the past acted as a catalyst for much wider changes, both legal and otherwise.

Cooke further describes e-conveyancing as the 'magic carpet' that transported the Bill through Parliament by making it politically attractive.[112]

The goal of e-conveyancing is to enable transfers or dispositions of land to become electronic transactions. This will be achieved gradually by the incremental development and introduction of an e-conveyancing system which will, at least initially, operate on a voluntary basis alongside paper-based transactions. E-conveyancing requires a change in formalities, with the deed, discussed in section 4 of this chapter, superseded by an electronic document provided for by section 91 of the LRA 2002. Central to the validity of this document is an electronic signature. For conveyancers this is likely to consist of a signature key held on a cryptographic token and connected to their computer each time a document needs to be signed. Parties to a transaction may delegate authority to sign to their conveyancer or sign using their own electronic signature. In their case, a personal signature takes the form of an Identity Guard Authentication Grid; a card containing a grid of numbers which is valid for the life of a single transaction.[113]

Despite its centrality to the 'conveyancing revolution' promised by the LRA 2002, e-conveyancing has remained elusive. In 2010, the Land Registry launched a consultation on secondary legislation designed to introduce the first e-transfers in 2011. The result of that consultation was a decision to put work "'on hold' for the immediate future".[114] A number of important steps towards e-conveyancing have been taken. Previous consultations by the Land Registry have resulted in secondary legislation providing for Network Access Agreements to be entered into by those participating in e-conveyancing,[115] and for the e-charge;[116] making remortgages the first electronic disposition of land. In addition, there is already electronic access to the register and provision for electronic searches. An electronic application can be made to make non-dispositionary changes to the register (for example, a change of the name of a current registered proprietor), and by a lender to discharge a registered charge. Why then has progress now stalled? There are three key reasons.[117] First is the downturn in the property market that followed the global economic crisis. The Land Registry concluded that this was not the time to launch a new system of conveyancing and that take-up was likely to be small.[118] The experience of e-charges has been telling in this respect. There has been very little take-up of e-charges, with only around 20 created by 2011. The downturn in the market for remortgages following the global economic crises is seen as a significant factor in this respect.[119] Secondly, there remain concerns—albeit doubted by the Land Registry—that e-conveyancing will exacerbate the risk of conveyancing fraud.[120] While paper-based conveyancing is also susceptible to fraud, e-conveyancing appears more vulnerable. As Cooke notes, electronic forgery removes the need for the manual skill involved in copying a handwritten signature: 'I cannot forge a signature on a paper transfer; I can swipe my card [containing the signature key] and press the button.'[121] A signature key is only as secure as the computer system on which it is used. It is vulnerable to lapses in security by the holder of the key (for example, in leaving a computer unattended) and to more sophisticated attacks, such as malicious software enabling the signature to be hijacked by a third party.[122] Thirdly there are unresolved legal issues surrounding the possibility of parties to the transaction delegating their authority to sign to a conveyancer.[123] In particular, there is a concern whether a transaction signed by a single conveyancer on behalf of joint owners will trigger the overreaching mechanism. Overreaching, which is discussed in Chapter 19, plays an essential role in transactions involving co-owned land, but is triggered only where the transaction is undertaken by at least two trustees. It is uncertain whether it will apply to a transaction signed by a single conveyancer on the authority of two trustees.

Underlying these causes for delay in progress towards e-conveyancing is a question of confidence in the system on the part of all of its intended users; from the Land Registry and professionals involved in conveyancing to institutional lenders and ultimately individual consumers undertaking transactions involving land. To instil confidence, e-conveyancing must be legally robust and at the least not increase risks associated with transactions. In relation to risk, with such a significant change perception may be as important as reality. The goal of achieving e-conveyancing has not been abandoned, but its introduction seems almost as far away now as it did when the LRA 2002 passed into law.

6.1 ELECTRONIC DISPOSITIONS: THE LEGAL IMPACT

The introduction of electronic conveyancing does not signal only a procedural change in dealings with land. Its eventual introduction will mark a change in the relationship between the process of registration and substantive property law. This is because of the legal effect of e-conveyancing provided in s 93 of the LRA 2002.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 93

(1) This section applies to a disposition of—

(a) a registered estate or charge, or

(b) an interest which is the subject of a notice in the register, where the disposition is of a description specified by rules.

(2) A disposition to which this section applies, or a contract to make such a disposition, only has effect if it is made by means of a document in electronic form and if, when the document purports to take effect—

(a) it is electronically communicated to the registrar, and

(b) the relevant registration requirements are met.

As a result of this section, a contract for the disposition of a registered estate and the disposition (for example, a contract to transfer the freehold of a house or to create a lease of more than seven years) has no effect unless made in electronic form.

As Howell notes,[124] up to now registration has been seen as an 'add-on' to pre-existing interests. Rights are transferred under the general law and then registered (with the acquisition of legal title alone dependent on the final step). Hence, in this chapter, it has been possible to discuss separately creation and transfer, on the one hand, and registration, on the other. Under e-conveyancing, such separation of the substantive law and the process of creation or transfer will cease to be possible.

The wording of s 93(2) is to be contrasted with s 27(1), which currently governs paper-based registered dispositions (and the application of which will be superseded by s 93).[125] Under s 27, a disposition 'does not operate at law' until registration requirements are met. This enables equitable title to pass (through the doctrine of anticipation) as soon as a specifically enforceable contract is in existence. Under s 93(2), a disposition 'only has effect' on registration; there is no qualification to its effect at law.

The consequence of s 93(2) is that the registration gap that currently exists between creation or transfer and registration is removed: creation or transfer and registration will occur simultaneously. The entry into a contract remains a separate stage, although the contract also becomes an electronic document.

At this stage, the likely response of the courts to the attempt to crush equitable intervention is a matter of speculation. Dixon has suggested that the application of s 91 will result in an 'estoppel boom'.[126]

Dixon, 'Proprietary Estoppel and Formalities in Land Law and the Land Registration Act 2002: A Theory of Unconscionability' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 2 (ed Cooke, 2003, pp 170–1)

> First, it is anticipated that the great majority of proprietary rights will be subject to section 93 LRA 2002 in due course [...] Of course, the point is precisely to ensure that virtually all expressly created rights appear on the register. Thus, if they do not appear, they do not exist and resort to estoppel may be the only hope for a disappointed claimant. Secondly, we cannot assume that all property professionals immediately will understand that material deeds and contracts are to be completely ineffective, and a remedy in negligence will not secure the proprietary right denied by section 93 LRA 2002. Thirdly, registration (ie the act of creation or transfer) will be electronic, and only authorised persons will be able to transact. Thus, not only is it likely that individuals will continue to deal with each other without the benefit of legal advice and hence without understanding the relevant formality rules (as in Yaxley v Gotts), even if they did comprehend section 93 LRA 2002, how would they ensure the registration of their right? [...] Fourthly, and perhaps most importantly, it is now clear [...] that an 'estoppel' is a proprietary right capable of binding a third party as an overriding interest [...] Thus, whereas the failed creation or transfer of a proprietary right under the rubric of electronic conveyancing will be of no effect at all (s 93 LRA 2002), and so cannot trigger an 'interest that overrides' [...] a successful estoppel can do just this [...] How tempting then 124 'Land Law in an E-Conveyancing World' [2006] Conv 553, 563.

to use estoppel both to acquire the right despite the absence of compliance with sections 91 or 93 LRA 2002 [...] and then when the estoppel is established to ally it with actual occupation to make it binding against a third party. In other words, estoppel may well come to be the single most effective way of creating, transferring and enforcing property rights outside of electronic formalities. The greater the injunction to use electronic measures, the greater the scope for claims in estoppel.

But while acknowledging the possible reticence of the courts to allow perceived injustices to go unchecked, Cooke urges a restrictive approach to estoppel.

Cooke, The New Law of Land Registration (2003, pp 163–4)

Law and Equity have fused, but both traditions remain very much alive; the courts' will to intervene when the law works injustice will hardly vanish overnight. What the courts have found very difficult, of course, is the interaction of their equity jurisdiction with statute. It is one thing to counter a common law injustice with an equitable maxim and its out-workings; it is quite another to override the expressed will of the legislature in a statute. Yet equity has ancient roots as the response to circumstances that the legislator had not thought of, so that modification of a statute by the courts is not inherently impossible, although the courts have become increasingly reluctant to do it. [...] Will the courts use their equitable jurisdiction, including the law of estoppel, to combat electronic conveyancing and conveyancing provisions? There is a very difficult line to be drawn here. The courts have the power to sabotage the new system, and it is to be hoped that they will find ways to balance the wish to remedy injustice in the individual case with the need to uphold the policy of the statute, reserving estoppel as a means of reversing injustice in cases involving unusual hardship or fraudulent behaviour, and interpreting fraud quite strictly.

QUESTIONS

1. Are formality requirements necessary?
2. Assess the role of rectification, collateral contracts, and proprietary estoppel under s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989.
3. Compare and contrast a deed, a 'non-deed', and an escrow.
4. What are the key advantages of registration of title?
5. What is the 'registration gap' and how will it be closed by e-conveyancing?
6. What do you understand by 'indefeasibility' of title? To what extent is a title registered under the Land Registration Act 2002 indefeasible?
7. What impact will the introduction of e-conveyancing have on existing formality requirements?

INFORMAL METHODS OF ACQUISITION: ADVERSE POSSESSION

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. The principal means of the informal acquisition of legal rights are adverse possession, which enables the acquisition of a legal estate, and rules providing for the informal grant of legal easements.
2. An adverse possession claim has two stages. The first stage—establishing 'adverse possession'—has rules that are common to registered and unregistered land. The second—the consequences of adverse possession—operates differently in relation to registered and unregistered land.
3. Adverse possession has its roots in the concepts of title by possession and relativity of title, combined with the operation of rules on limitation of actions. Its operation reflects ideas underlying unregistered titles.
4. Adverse possession is incompatible with registration of title. The Land Registration Act 1925 sought to align registered land with unregistered land, but the Land Registration Act 2002 has departed from this approach.
5. Under the 2002 Act, it is not possible to acquire title automatically by adverse possession; instead, a claimant has access to a procedure, the outcome of which may be the award of title by registration. The scheme is, however, heavily weighted against claims, except in limited circumstances in which adverse possession is considered still to play a legitimate role.
6. Adverse possession rules have been held to be human rights compliant.
7. Specific issues arise where adverse possession takes place against a leasehold title.

1 INTRODUCTION

In Chapter 4, we saw that legal estates and interests in land can be acquired dependently, where they are granted by a person with property rights in land, and independently, by the unilateral conduct of the person acquiring the right. In Chapter 7, we considered the formality requirements that govern the dependent acquisition of legal estates and interests. We have seen that the creation of some legal rights is exempt from the statutory formality requirements: in particular, the grant of a lease for a term of three years or less is exempt from the requirement of a deed.[1] Apart from these specific exemptions, however, legal estates and interests cannot be created though informal dependent acquisition. Generally, informal dependent acquisition is the provenance of equitable intervention. We consider the acquisition of equitable interests in land in Chapters 9–11 and 16.

Legal rights may, however, be acquired informally through independent acquisition. There are two means through which such rights may arise: firstly, the rules of adverse possession, which provide a means of acquiring a legal estate; secondly, a number of doctrines enable the informal acquisition of a legal easement. The basis for the acquisition of a legal estate by adverse possession is long use. This basis is shared by prescription, which is one of the sources of an informally acquired easement. If a claimant uses land, or exercises a right with the characteristics of an easement over land, for a period of time, then he or she may obtain legal title, or a legal easement, by virtue of that use.

The similarity between adverse possession and prescription begins and ends with their common foundation in long use.[2] The doctrines differ in how long use is analysed as conferring rights. On the one hand, adverse possession has historically viewed long use as having a negative effect—of extinguishing previous titles. This remains the case in relation to unregistered land, although, as we will see, the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002) adopts a different approach to the effect of adverse possession. Prescription, on the other hand, views long use as having a positive effect—of implying the grant of a legal easement.

In Buckingham County Council v Moran,[3] Nourse LJ explained the essential difference between the claims as being that prescription requires possession 'as of right', while adverse possession concerns possession 'as of wrong'. This, in turn, means that, in prescription, the intention of the grantor may be significant, while, as will be seen, in adverse possession, the focus is on the intention of the claimant.[4] For the remainder of this chapter, our discussion is confined to adverse possession. Prescription and the other doctrines enabling the informal acquisition of legal easements are considered in Chapter 25.[5]

The English law of adverse possession came under close scrutiny in the Pye litigation, which plays a central role in this chapter. The first case, the House of Lords' decision in JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v Graham,[6] concerned a successful claim to adverse possession by Mr and Mrs Graham to valuable development land of which Pye was the registered proprietor. Following the loss of its land, Pye brought an action against the UK before the European Court of Human Rights. It argued that the English law on adverse possession was contrary to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and that, as a result, it should receive financial compensation for the loss of its land. The Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights rejected Pye's claim.[7] The decision of that Court has been discussed

5 A conjoined discussion of the doctrines is provided by Hopkins, The Informal Acquisition of Rights in Land (2000, ch 10). in Chapter 3, but it is necessary to return to the decision in this chapter in order to place it in the context of the substantive laws challenged by Pye and how those laws have been changed by the LRA 2002.

2 IS ADVERSE POSSESSION JUSTIFIED?

We have noted that the basis on which rights are acquired by adverse possession is long use. As Howard and Hill explain, this is not an obvious basis for conferring rights on a claimant.

Howard and Hill, 'The Informal Creation of Interests in Land'
(1995) 15 LS 356, 372–3

> The fact that a claimant has enjoyed a gratuitous benefit for a period in excess [of the statutory requirements] is not in itself a justification for allowing the claimant to continue to enjoy that benefit. If, for example, a newsagent does not object when each week a stranger comes into his shop and takes a Sunday newspaper without paying for it, does the passage of time enable the stranger to assert a right to a Sunday newspaper when the newsagent's good-nature is finally exhausted?

Why, then, is long use seen as sufficient to confer a legal right in land?

Holmes[8] suggested that what lies at the heart of justifications is 'the deepest instincts of man'. He explained: 'A thing which you have enjoyed and used as your own for a long time [...] takes root in your being and cannot be torn away without your resenting the act and trying to defend yourself, however you came by it.'[9] Holmes emphasized the need to look at limitation rules from the position of the person who gains a right, not that of the 'loser'. In this respect, long use has a 'curative' effect[10] through which the courts clothe fact with right.

Hopkins, The Informal Acquisition of Rights in Land (2000, p 219)

> The initial difficulty in justifying [adverse possession and prescription] stems from a perspective of seeing them as "taking" from the legal owner. The difficulties become less apparent if the rules are viewed in terms of "confirming" to [the claimant] that he has the rights he has been exercising. The rules ensure that formal ownership of land reflects actual occupation and use. Reality is given preference above formal legal ownership.

Dockray[11] discussed four reasons why adverse possession is needed. Adverse possession forms part of the general law of limitation of actions—that is, rules that place a long stop on the time during which a claimant may commence proceedings to assert his or her rights.

[10] Goodman, 'Adverse Possession of Land: Morality and Motive' (1970) 33 MLR 281.
[11] 'Why Do We Need Adverse Possession?' [1985] Conv 272.

Therefore, Dockray took as a starting point the general justifications for the operation of limitation periods, drawn from the Law Reform Committee.

Law Reform Committee 21st Report, Final Report on Limitation of Actions (1977, Cmnd 6923, [1.7])

1. to protect defendants from stale claims
2. to encourage plaintiffs not to sleep on their rights; and
3. to ensure that a person may feel confident, after the lapse of a given period of time, that an incident which might have led to a claim against him is finally closed.

Dockray concluded that these objectives themselves, while relevant, do not fully explain the limitation of actions to recover land. The rules of adverse possession do not operate in a manner that is wholly consistent with any of the three objectives, while, in relation to the third, there is also insufficient evidence that it has influenced the development of the law. Dockray suggested that a fourth objective is at work, which he identified as facilitating the investigation of title to unregistered land.[12]

Dockray, 'Why do we Need Adverse Possession?' [1985] Conv 272, 277–8

To outline the policy, it is necessary to start by recalling that a vendor of unregistered land is obliged nowadays (subject to contrary agreement) to prove his title over a period of at least 15 years starting from a good root. However, as Professor J.T. Farrand points out in Contract and Conveyance, this does not require the vendor to give anything like a complete history, the account may not be of ownership at all, some third party being the true owner all the time.

But if this is possible why, it might be asked, does the legislation only require (and why are purchasers generally content only to require) a vendor to prove his title over a minimum period of 15 years. The answer, according to the theory on which the Statute of Limitations is based, is that this is because it is reasonably safe to do so, And it is reasonably safe to do so, according to the same theory, because the Statute was designed to and does provide a kind of qualified guarantee that any outstanding claims to ownership by third parties are time-barred.

The Law Commission considered this to be the 'strongest justification' for adverse possession.[13] The identification of this objective is significant, because, if the justification is rooted in the operation of unregistered land, an obvious question arises as to its applicability in registered land. As we will see, the incompatibility of adverse possession with principles of registered land resulted in significant reforms in the LRA 2002.

3 AN OUTLINE OF THE OPERATION OF ADVERSE POSSESSION

Adverse possession has its roots in the concept of relativity of title[14] and the operation of limitation periods. The paradigm case, on which the following explanation is based, is adverse possession by the claimant (C) in unregistered land, of which the title, traced through the title deeds, belongs to the paper owner (PO). In English law, there is no concept of absolute title: title is relative and is based on possession. In a dispute between two parties, the court determines which party has the stronger claim to possession. As soon as C enters into adverse possession, he or she obtains a freehold title to the land. As the following extract explains, the ability to acquire title by possession is a characteristic shared by land and personal property.

Swadling, 'Property' in English Private Law (2nd edn, ed Burrows, 2007, [4.414]–[4.417])

The mere act of taking possession—occupatio is the Roman term– bestows a right to exclusive possession, a title good against the whole world save a person with a better title. This is true of all things capable of being physically possessed, viz land and goods. In the leading case of Armory v Delamirie a chimney-sweep's boy acquired a right to exclusive possession of a brooch merely by the act of taking possession of it. Pratt CJ said:

> [T]he finder of a jewel, though he does not by such finding acquire an absolute property or ownership, yet he has such a property as will enable him to keep it against all but the rightful owner and consequently may maintain trover.

The words 'against all but the rightful owner' are not perfectly accurate. As between the goldsmith who refused to return the brooch and the boy, the boy had the better right to possession, because he had the earlier factual possession. As between the boy and the title-holder of the house where it was found, it is likely that the latter would have had the better title, not because he was 'the rightful owner', but because his possession of his house included possession of the brooch in the chimney and antedated the possession obtained by the boy.

Asher v Whitlock teaches the same lesson in relation to land. The mere act of taking possession of a parcel of land gives the actor a right to exclusive possession of that land good against all save those with a superior right to possession. It should be stressed that the interest acquired by the possessor in a case such as Armory v Delamirie or Asher v Whitlock is legal and not equitable, for both cases involved successful actions in common law courts.

Logically, the freehold title obtained by possession should be classified as legal. As Swadling notes, both cases that he discusses arose in common law courts—but some doubt as to the classification of the right has been expressed.[15]

C's right to possession is stronger than that of any subsequent possessor, but is vulnerable to earlier claims. Hence, PO can bring an action against C to recover the land, relying on its earlier claim to possession evidenced by the paper title. In other words, in a dispute between the parties, PO has the relatively stronger title. But s 15 of the Limitation Act 1980 provides a twelve-year limitation period for actions to recover land. If PO does not take action within that time, then its claim is time-barred. Section 17 of the Limitation Act 1980 provides that, once time-barred, PO's title is extinguished. There is no transfer of PO's title to C. Once the limitation period has expired, however, the title that C obtained by the inception of adverse possession becomes unimpeachable by PO (and anyone claiming through PO's title).

[14] For a general analysis of this concept in property law, see Fox, 'Relativity of Title at Law and in Equity' (2006) 65 CLJ 330.

[15] The different views are summarized by Cooke, 'Adverse Possession: Problems of Title in Registered Land' (1994) 14 LS 1, 4–5.

The acquisition of title by adverse possession therefore consists of two distinct stages: firstly, the inception of adverse possession; and secondly, the operation of limitation rules at the end of the requisite period of adverse possession. The principles applying to the inception of adverse possession apply uniformly to registered and unregistered land. Differences emerge, however, in the operation of limitation rules. The concept of title being acquired by possession and extinguished at the end of the limitation period makes no sense in the context of registered land. In registered land, as we have seen in Chapter 7, titles are acquired by registration. A registered title is indefeasible and could not be 'extinguished' for so long as the proprietor is registered as holder of the estate. The Land Registration Act 1925 (LRA 1925) sought to align registered land with the operation of adverse possession in unregistered land. Hence, it enabled title to be acquired automatically in registered land by adverse possession, using the device of a trust to reconcile the extinguishment of a title with registered land principles. The LRA 2002 provides a significant departure from the previous law. There is no concept of title being acquired by adverse possession, or of a limitation period at the end of which the assertion of title is automatically time-barred. Instead, adverse possession provides access to a procedure though which the claimant may acquire title by registration.

In the next section of this chapter, we consider the rules governing the inception of adverse possession; these rules remain applicable to all claims. We will then consider the effect of adverse possession: by the operation of limitation rules in unregistered land and registered land under the LRA 1925, and the new scheme provided for registered land by the LRA 2002. We then consider the human rights challenge to adverse possession and, finally, specific issues that arise where adverse possession is commenced against the holder of a leasehold title.

4 THE INCEPTION OF ADVERSE POSSESSION

The key date to identify is the date at which a cause of action accrues against the paper owner. In unregistered land (and registered land under the LRA 1925), that is the date from which the limitation period begins to run.[16] In registered land, under the LRA 2002, that is the date from which a person is treated as being in adverse possession.[17] The events that trigger the accrual of a right of action are provided by the Limitation Act 1980.

Limitation Act 1980, Sch 1, paras 1 and 8

1 Where the person bringing an action to recover land, or some person through whom he claims, has been in possession of the land, and has while entitled to the land been dispossessed or discontinued his possession, the right of action shall be treated as having accrued on the date of the dispossession or discontinuance.

[16] Limitation Act 1980, s 15(1).

8 (1) No right of action to recover land shall be treated as accruing unless the land is in the possession of some person in whose favour the period of limitation can run (referred to below in this paragraph as 'adverse possession'); and where under the preceding provisions of this Schedule any such right of action is treated as accruing on a certain date and no person is in adverse possession on that date, the right of action shall not be treated as accruing unless and until adverse possession is taken of the land.

Hence the inception of adverse possession is dependent on demonstrating either dispossession of the paper owner or its discontinuance in possession. In the latter case, it will be necessary to show separately that the claimant has moved into adverse possession. In relation to the former, as will be seen below, the commencement of adverse possession by the claimant is inherent in the definition of dispossession.

Discontinuance arises where 'the person in possession abandons possession and another then takes it'.[18] Discontinuance in possession is not demonstrated by discontinuance in physical occupation; rather, it is analogous to abandonment of land. In Powell v McFarlane,[19] Slade J noted that 'merely very slight acts by an owner in relation to the land are sufficient to negative discontinuance'. Dispossession arises by 'a person coming in and putting another out of possession'.[20]

The meaning of dispossession was considered by the House of Lords in the following case, the facts of which it is useful to set out at this stage. In this case, whether the Grahams had dispossessed Pye was identified as one of two key issues that determined the outcome of the case.[21]

JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v Graham
[2003] 1 AC 419, HL

Facts: Pye was the registered proprietor of development land that adjoined the Graham's farm. The land was enclosed by hedges, except for a gate, to which the Grahams held the only key, and a public footpath and highway. Pye had initially granted the Grahams a short grazing agreement to use the land. On the expiry of the agreement, Pye refused a request for renewal, because it was concerned that the existence of an agreement could adversely affect its application for planning permission. The Grahams continued to use the land for their farm, including uses that went beyond the original agreement. Initially, the Grahams continued to seek a renewal of the licence, but their requests went unanswered. Pye did nothing in relation to the land and the Grahams argued that they had acquired title by adverse possession. The House of Lords considered that the claim depended on whether the Grahams had dispossessed Pye (there being no suggestion that Pye had discontinued in possession) and, if so, whether the Grahams had remained in possession for the requisite limitation period.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson

[...] The question is simply whether the defendant squatter has dispossessed the paper owner by going into ordinary possession of the land for the requisite period without the consent of the owner. [...]

It is sometimes said that ouster by the squatter is necessary to constitute dispossession: see for example Rains v Buxton (1880) 14 Ch D 537, 539 per Fry J. The word "ouster" is derived from the old law of adverse possession and has overtones of confrontational, knowing removal of the true owner from possession. Such an approach is quite incorrect. There will be a "dispossession" of the paper owner in any case where (there being no discontinuance of possession by the paper owner) a squatter assumes possession in the ordinary sense of the word. Except in the case of joint possessors, possession is single and exclusive. Therefore if the squatter is in possession the paper owner cannot be. If the paper owner was at one stage in possession of the land but the squatter's subsequent occupation of it in law constitutes possession the squatter must have "dispossessed" the true owner for the purposes of Schedule 1, paragraph 1 [...]

Hence, in a case of dispossession, the right of action accrues at the date at which the claimant commences possession. Therefore, the answer to the question of whether the Grahams had dispossessed Pye lay in determining whether the Grahams could establish that they were in possession of the land.

Before considering the meaning of 'possession', it is useful to consider the definition of 'adverse'.

4.1 'ADVERSE' POSSESSION DEFINED

A claimant's possession is not adverse if he or she is present with the licence of the paper owner. In the following case, a claim to adverse possession failed, because the paper owner had unilaterally granted a licence.

BP Properties Ltd v Buckler
(1988) 55 P & CR 337, CA

Facts: The appellant's parents had been in adverse possession of their home by remaining in occupation at the end of their lease. An order of possession was obtained within the limitation period, but was not enforced. BP Properties then purchased the freehold and wrote to Mrs Buckler, informing her that she could remain in the property rent-free for her life. Mrs Buckler neither accepted nor rejected the terms of the letter. Following her death, the appellant sought to establish that his parents had obtained title by adverse possession.

Dillon LJ

The claim that a unilateral licence can stop time running is a new one. It may be of some general importance in that it would enable a person who is not prepared to incur the obloquy of bringing proceedings for possession, or of enforcing a possession order, to keep his title alive for very many years until it suits him to evict. It might be thought that for title to be kept alive in this way was contrary to the policy of the statute as exemplified by section 13 of the 1939 Act which reproduced earlier statutory provision to the same effect and prevented any right of action to recover land being preserved by formal entry or continual claim.

So far as the facts are concerned, it would in my judgment be artificial to say that Mrs. Buckler "accepted" the terms set out in the two letters; B.P. Properties Ltd. neither sought nor waited for her acceptance. It would be equally artificial to say that there was any consideration in law for those terms.

It may be that the result would have been different if Mrs. Buckler had, as soon as she learned of the letters, plainly told B.P. Properties Ltd. that she did not accept the letters, and maintained her claims to be already the owner of the property; she did not however do that. She accepted her solicitors' advice that as the warrant for possession had been withdrawn, she should do nothing while the 12-year period from the date of the possession order of December 11, 1962 expired. In essence she was not asserting during the time from the receipt of the letters until after December 11, 1974—or indeed thereafter—any claim to ownership of the farmhouse and garden, or any intention to exclude the owner of the paper title.

Whether B.P. Properties Ltd. could or could not in law, in the absence of consideration have sought to determine in her lifetime the licence granted to Mrs. Buckler by the two letters, they did not in fact seek to do so. Had they sought to do so, they would in the absence of any repudiation of the letters by Mrs. Buckler have had to give Mrs. Buckler a reasonable time to quit as with any licensee.

The nature of Mrs. Buckler's possession after receipt of the letters cannot be decided just by looking at what was locked up in her own mind. It must depend even more, on this aspect of the case, on the position as seen from the standpoint of the person with the paper title. What could that person have done? The rule that possession is not adverse if it can be referred to a lawful title applies even if the person in possession did not know of the lawful title; the lawful title would still preclude the person with the paper title from evicting the person in possession. So far as Mrs. Buckler was concerned, even though she did not "accept" the terms of the letters, B.P. Properties Ltd. would, in the absence of any repudiation by her of the two letters, have been bound to treat her as in possession as licensee on the terms of the letters. They could not have evicted her (if they could have done so at all) without determining the licence.

I can see no escape therefore from the conclusion that, whether she liked it or not, from the time of her receipt of the letters, Mrs. Buckler was in possession of the farmhouse and garden by the licence of B.P. Properties Ltd., and her possession was no longer adverse within the meaning of s 10 of the 1939 Act.

The paper owner in that case therefore expressly granted the licence.

In the following case, the Court of Appeal considered that, in certain circumstances, a licence could be implied, thus defeating a claim to adverse possession on the basis that the claimant's possession is not 'adverse'.

Wallis's Cayton Bay Holiday Camp Ltd v Shell-Mex and BP Ltd
[1975] QB 94, CA

Facts: Shell-Mex had acquired land fronting the proposed site of a new road. The owners of the holiday camp had used the land as a farm and subsequently as a frontage to their camp. When the Council abandoned plans for the road, Shell-Mex wrote to the Wallises, offering to sell the land to them. The Wallises did not reply to this or a subsequent letter, but waited until their use exceeded twelve years, whereupon they argued that they had obtained title by adverse possession.

Lord Denning MR

When the true owner of land intends to use it for a particular purpose in the future, but meanwhile has no immediate use for it, and so leaves it unoccupied, he does not lose his title to it simply because some other person enters on it and uses it for some temporary purpose, like stacking materials; or for some seasonal purpose, like growing vegetables. Not even if this temporary or seasonal purpose continues year after year for 12 years, or more: see Leigh v. Jack (1879) 5 Ex.D. 264; Williams Brothers Direct Supply Ltd. v. Raftery [1958] 1 Q.B. 159; and Tecbild Ltd. v. Chamberlain (1969) 20 P. & C.R. 633. The reason is not because the user does not amount to actual possession. The line between acts of user and acts of possession is too fine for words. The reason behind the decisions is because it does not lie in that other person's mouth to assert that he used the land of his own wrong as a trespasser. Rather his user is to be ascribed to the licence or permission of the true owner. By using the land, knowing that it does not belong to him, he impliedly assumes that the owner will permit it: and the owner, by not turning him off, impliedly gives permission. and it has been held many times in this court that acts done under licence or permitted by the owner do not give a licensee a title under the Limitation Act 1939. They do not amount to adverse possession

In Pye v Graham, the decision in the Wallis's case was seen as stemming from a concept of 'non-adverse possession': arising where a claimant entered into possession of the paper owner's land, but did not 'oust' the paper owner by carrying out acts inconsistent with the paper title.[22] The general concept of non-adverse possession was removed from English law by the Real Property Limitation Act 1833 and the House of Lords considered that it had not been reintroduced by a 'side wind' by the specific requirement of 'adverse possession' in Sch 1, para 8, of the Limitation Act 1980 (or its predecessor in the Limitation Act 1939).[23] The specific manifestation of the concept in the Wallis's case was reversed by the Limitation Act 1980.

Limitation Act 1980, Sch 1, para 8(4)

(4) For the purpose of determining whether a person occupying any land is in adverse possession of the land it shall not be assumed by implication of law that his occupation is by permission of the person entitled to the land merely by virtue of the fact that his occupation is not inconsistent with the latter's present or future enjoyment of the land.

[22] [2003] 1 AC 419, [33]. [23] Ibid, [32].

This provision does not preclude the implication of a licence in a genuine case, but ensures that a licence is not implied merely by reason of the fact that the adverse possessor's actions are not inconsistent with the paper owner's intended use of the land.

4.2 'POSSESSION' DEFINED

As has been noted, in Pye v Graham, the House of Lords considered that the Grahams would establish that they had dispossessed Pye by demonstrating that they had entered into possession of the land. This, in turn, raised the question of the meaning of 'possession'.

Defining this term forms the bedrock of case law on adverse possession. Although the term is being defined for a particular purpose, Green argues that the courts are influenced by, and construct, a particular concept of landowner.

Green, 'Citizens and Squatters' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives
(eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, p 230)

In each case of adverse possession, the judges have to decide whether what the claimant did to the land amounts to possession of it. In making these decisions, they are, little by little, fleshing out the character and activities of 'the landowner', while at the same time his pre-existing mythical figure is affecting their decisions. This is because such mythical figures as 'the landowner' 'resonate across space and over time' to anchor a philosophy of having and being 'which can influence events, behaviour and perception'. The judges are thus stabilizing and making transparent the boundaries not only on the surface of the land but also in the ideology of ownership.

In Pye v Graham, the House of Lords confirmed that 'possession' is to be understood in the 'ordinary sense of the word'.[24] The House of Lords defined it in a manner closely following an analysis by Slade J in Powell v McFarlane.[25]

JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v Graham

Lord Browne-Wilkinson

[There] are two elements necessary for legal possession: (1) a sufficient degree of physical custody and control ("factual possession"); (2) an intention to exercise such custody and control on one's own behalf and for one's own benefit ("intention to possess"). What is crucial is to understand that, without the requisite intention, in law there can be no possession. [. . .] [There] has always, both in Roman law and in common law, been a requirement to show an intention to possess in addition to objective acts of physical possession. Such intention may be, and frequently is, deduced from the physical acts themselves. But there is no doubt > in my judgment that there are two separate elements in legal possession. So far as English law is concerned intention as a separate element is obviously necessary. Suppose a case where A is found to be in occupation of a locked house. He may be there as a squatter, as an overnight trespasser, or as a friend looking after the house of the paper owner during his absence on holiday. The acts done by A in any given period do not tell you whether there is legal possession. If A is there as a squatter he intends to stay as long as he can for his own benefit: his intention is an intention to possess. But if he only intends to trespass for the night or has expressly agreed to look after the house for his friend he does not have possession. It is not the nature of the acts which A does but the intention with which he does them which determines whether or not he is in possession.

It is necessary to address each of these elements separately—that is the approach taken by the courts in determining claims to adverse possession—but it should be borne in mind at the outset that the two are closely interconnected.

Green, 'Citizens and Squatters' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives
(eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, pp 235–6)

> In reality, the human body and mind, actions and thoughts, are fully interdependent: interpretation of the one is dependent on an understanding of the other. An ambiguous action may be given unambiguous meaning when viewed in the light of the intention with which it is done, and the interpretation of an action which appears to have an unequivocal meaning may be changed by the additions of a particular human will. On their own, neither actions nor intentions have any necessary meaning.
> [. . .] The real key to adverse possession lies not in discrete acts and intentions but in the effect of the claimant on the object of the claim (the land), and on the world beyond.

As we will see, ultimately, a claimant's acts provide the strongest evidence of his or her intent. Indeed, such is the connection between them that there is some doubt as to whether intent, in fact, exists as a free-standing element.

4.2.1 Factual Possession

In Pye v Graham, the House of Lords approved a definition of factual possession given by Slade J in the following case.

Powell v McFarlane
(1979) 38 P & CR 452, HC

Facts: The claimant, Mr Powell, lived on a farm with his grandparents. As a 14-year-old boy, he had started to use neighbouring land for purposes connected with the farm. In particular, he cut hay and made 'rough and ready' repairs to the boundary fence, so that the land could be used to graze the family's cow. The paper owner, Mr McFarlane, was working overseas and, on his return, Mr Powell argued that he had obtained title to the land by adverse possession.

Slade J

Factual possession signifies an appropriate degree of physical control. It must be a single and [exclusive] possession, though there can be a single possession exercised by or on behalf of several persons jointly. Thus an owner of land and a person intruding on that land without his consent cannot both be in possession of the land at the same time. The question what acts constitute a sufficient degree of exclusive physical control must depend on the circumstances, in particular the nature of the land and the manner in which land of that nature is commonly used or enjoyed. In the case of open land, absolute physical control is normally impracticable, if only because it is generally impossible to secure every part of a boundary so as to prevent intrusion. [. . .] Everything must depend on the particular circumstances, but broadly, I think what must be shown as constituting factual possession is that the alleged possessor has been dealing with the land in question as an occupying owner might have been expected to deal with it and that no-one else has done so.

Mr Powell's claim to adverse possession failed on the basis that he could not demonstrate an intention to possess (that aspect of the case is considered below). No specific findings were made in relation to factual possession. In Pye v Graham, it was held that the Grahams were in occupation of the land with exclusive physical control. Pye was physically excluded by the hedges and by the lack of a key to the only gate.[26] Therefore, factual possession was established.

The geographical scope of a claim to adverse possession is not necessarily limited to the extent of the land over which the acts that constitute factual possession have been exercised. In Roberts v Swangrove Estates Ltd, Lindsay J explained that the question of the scope of a claim is 'necessarily one of fact and degree'.[27] He suggested, for example, that 'a squatter [who] has occupied a terraced house, has lived in it and has denied access through its doors other than to his visitors, he would, no doubt, be taken to have had possession of the whole house notwithstanding that he failed to prove he had occupied a back room on the top floor. Conversely a squatter who created for himself a small kitchen garden in a corner of a 40 acre field might find, on claiming title as to the whole 40 acres, that all he acquired by adverse possession was a fee simple in the kitchen garden part'.[28] Possession of part will also constitute possession of the whole where such an inference is reasonably drawn from a 'common character of locality'.[29]

The claimant's acts of possession must be open, but in the absence of deliberate concealment it is not necessary for the paper owner to be aware of them.[30] If the paper owner credibly denies knowledge, the test is an objective one, 'whether a reasonable owner of the plot, paying that due regard to his interests as owner of it which was to be expected of him, would have acquired notice of them and would thereby have clearly appreciated that the squatter concerned was seeking to dispossess him'.[31]

The requirement of exclusive possession has raised a specific question whether it is possible to claim adverse possession of part of a building; for example, a room in a house or one flat in a block. In Ramroop (Sampson) v Ishmael and Heerasingh,[32] the Privy Council noted that there is 'surprisingly little authority'[33] on the point, but accepted that such claims follow logically from the fact that land can be held horizontally. It must be shown, however, that 'part of the building was capable of being possessed by the claimant to the exclusion of others'.[34] The Privy Council noted that this 'might be relatively easy to plead and prove if the property in question was a self-contained residential flat in a purpose-built block. It might be much more difficult in a building which had slipped into informal multiple occupation with shared facilities'.[35] On the facts, the claim failed. The claimant argued that she was in adverse possession of the downstairs of a house, but had not provided sufficient evidence of the extent of her claim or of the layout of the house in question.

4.2.2 Intention to Possess

In Pye v Graham, the House of Lords approved the decision in Buckinghamshire County Council v Moran,[36] in which an intention to possess had been distinguished from an intention to 'own'.[37] Adopting the formulation of the judge at first instance, the Court of Appeal in Moran held that what is required is 'not an intention to own or even an intention to acquire ownership but an intention to possess'.[38] The distinction had been significant on the facts of that case. The council had acquired the disputed land for future use as part of a road. The land adjoined the claimant's garden and he used the land as an extension of his garden. The only access to the land was through the claimant's garden, or by a gate, which the claimant had locked. The claimant had conceded that he would have been obliged to leave the land if it was required for the road. This may have defeated an intention to 'own' the land, but it did not preclude the claimant demonstrating that he intended to possess the land, for the time being, to the exclusion of all others.[39]

Similarly, in Pye v Graham, the Grahams' willingness to enter into another agreement with Pye and to pay for the use of the land may have defeated an intention to own, but did not preclude an intention to possess. Lord Browne-Wilkinson explained: '[An] admission of title by the squatter is not inconsistent with the squatter being in possession in the meantime.'[40]

It is necessary to show an intention to exclude the world at large, including the paper owner.[41] For the duration of the limitation period, however, the claimant remains vulnerable to the paper owner's assertion of its stronger title. With this in mind, the requirement of intention was reformulated in Powell v McFarlane, in a manner approved by the House of Lords in Pye v Graham.[42]

Powell v McFarlane
(1979) 38 P & CR 452, HC

Slade J

What is really meant, in my judgment, is that, the animus possidendi involves the intention, in one's own name and on one's own behalf, to exclude the world at large, including the owner with the paper title [. . .] so far as is reasonably practicable and so far as the processes of the law will allow.

As has been noted, in Powell v McFarlane, the claim to adverse possession failed on the basis of intention. Slade J considered Mr Powell's acts to be equivocal, in the sense that they were open to interpretation as demonstrating intent merely to use the land for so long as the paper owner took no steps to prevent the use, without intending to appropriate the land.[43] The claimant's age at the time that his acts began appeared to be a significant consideration in this regard.[44] Subsequently, Mr Powell had erected signs on the land and parked lorries on it in connection with his business. Slade J acknowledged that, at that later stage, the claimant may have established an intention to possess, but these acts occurred within the limitation period.

In Pye v Graham, the House of Lords held that the Grahams could establish an intention to possess. In continuing to use the land at the expiry of the original grazing agreement, they had acted in a way that they knew to be contrary to the wishes of Pye. They had made such use of the land as they had wished, including for purposes beyond the scope of the original grazing agreement. In essence, the Grahams had used the land 'for all practical purposes [. . .] as their own and in a way normal for an owner to use it'.[45]

How to prove intent, and the relationship between intent and factual possession, remains unclear. In Powell, as has been seen, the failure of intent related directly to the nature of the claimant's acts: his acts were not sufficient, in qualitative terms, to establish intent. Further, it appears that the only way in which Mr Powell could have established intent would have been to show that he had done more. Slade LJ indicated that little weight would be afforded to self-serving declarations by a claimant as to his or her intent.[46] Similarly, in Pye v Graham, the claimants succeeded in establishing intent because their acts were qualitatively strong: they had used the land as an owner would. This gives rise to the question of whether intent is a free-standing requirement or is simply derived from the claimant's acts.

In Pye v Graham,[47] Lord Browne-Wilkinson acknowledged that intent may be deduced by the claimant's physical acts. Lord Hutton suggested that where the claimant makes full use of the land as if he or she were the owner, the claimant's conduct is sufficient to establish intent. The burden then shifts to the paper owner to provide evidence that points to the contrary.[48] In Powell v McFarlane, Slade J suggested that 'unequivocal' acts by the claimant established intent, unless the paper owner could demonstrate otherwise. Such acts include enclosure, which has been described as the strongest evidence of intent,[49] the cultivation of agricultural land, placing and enforcing 'keep out' notices, and locking or blocking the only means of access.[50] Where the claimant's acts are equivocal (as they were considered to be in that case), the claimant will need to adduce additional evidence to demonstrate his or her intent.[51]

On the face of it, this suggests that, in some cases, intent will be determined by reference to the claimant's acts, while in others, the claimant will be invited positively to prove his or her intent. Given the courts' (understandable) reticence to give weight to self-serving statements by claimants as to their intent, however, it is difficult to know what evidence, other than the claimant's acts, could be adduced.

Radley-Gardner questions whether intent is, in fact, a free-standing requirement. He distinguishes between 'strong' will theory (in which intent is a free-standing requirement) and 'weak' will theory (in which intent is derived from the claimant's acts).

Radley-Gardner, 'Civilized Squatting' (2005) 25 OJLS 727, 745–7

It has to be said that the flirtations in English adverse possession cases with the 'strong' intentions theory, requiring animus as a discrete component, have not been successes. This has been a back-door method for introducing inquiries as to motive into the post-1833 law to inject some moral fibre into what has been described as 'a major inducement to steal land'. Yet such inquiries are irrelevant to the operation of possession, which is a question of fact and not morality. [...]

A weaker form of animus can, however, produce beneficial results. The unhappy consequences of stronger will theories might make a weaker version of animus more attractive, in which it is treated not as an independent component requiring separate proof, but rather arises as a rebuttable presumption arising from conduct. This would be beneficial in those rare cases where a squatter makes a statement against his own interest, denying that he intended to be in possession. In cases of that nature, there is no practical reason why the court should not deny possession. [...] Except, then, in this attenuated form, where the squatter effectively waives his possession, conduct alone should be the crux of possession in English law.

In Purbrick v London Borough of Hackney,[52] Neuberger J emphasized the need to assess the claim on the basis of what the claimant has done. The fact that the claimant could have done more does not defeat a claim if what he or she has done is sufficient to demonstrate factual possession and an intention to possess.

Similarly, in Topplan Estates v Townley,[53] the claimant's acts were sufficient to establish intent even though his use of the land did not change following the expiry of a previous grazing agreement, which, on its terms, purported not to grant possession. The acts fell to be assessed on their own merits and were not 'diluted or denatured' by reference to the parties' previous dealings.[54]

4.2.3 The Rule in Leigh v Jack

We have seen that, in the Wallis's case, the Court of Appeal held that a licence would be implied where a person enters into possession, but does not act in a manner inconsistent with the holder of the paper title, although that decision has since been reversed by Sch 1, para 8(4), of the Limitation Act 1980. The Wallis's case was based on a more specific doctrine derived from Leigh v Jack.[55] In that case, it was held that there is no 'dispossession' of the paper owner by a claimant whose acts are not inconsistent with the paper owner's future use of the land. On the facts, the claimant's use of land for storage connected with his business was held not to constitute a dispossession of the paper owner, because the acts were not inconsistent with the paper owner's intention to dedicate the land to the public as a road. Doubt has been expressed about whether this rule is reversed by Sch 1, para 8(4), of the Limitation Act 1980,[56] but it has been held, in any event, to be wrong as a matter of law.[57]

The underlying difficulty with the rule is that the sufficiency of the claimant's acts is made dependent upon the paper owner's intent. In this way, the rule focuses on the intention of the paper owner and not the intention of the adverse possessor. In Pye v Graham, Lord Browne-Wilkinson commented that 'the suggestion that the sufficiency of the possession can depend on the intention not of the squatter but of the true owner is heretical and wrong'.[58] This is not to say, however, that the paper owner's intended use of the land is invariably irrelevant.

JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v Graham
[2003] 1 AC 419, HL

Lord Browne-Wilkinson

The highest it can be put is that, if the squatter is aware of a special purpose for which the paper owner uses or intends to use the land and the use made by the squatter does not conflict with that use, that may provide some support for a finding as a question of fact that the squatter had no intention to possess the land in the ordinary sense but only an intention to occupy it until needed by the paper owner. For myself I think there will be few occasions in which such inference could be properly drawn in cases where the true owner has been physically excluded from the land. But it remains a possible, if improbable, inference in some cases.

In this way, Lord Browne-Wilkinson refocused Leigh v Jack on the intention of the claimant: the paper owner's intended use of the land may be relevant, but only to the extent that it sheds light on the intention of the claimant. The decision on the facts of Leigh v Jack is generally considered to have been correct. It has been suggested that either the paper owner was not dispossessed, because he had continued to carry out repairs to a fence,[59] or that the adverse possessor, who was aware of the intended use of the land, thereby fell short of demonstrating factual possession or an intention to possess.[60]

4.2.4 Acknowledgement of Title

A right of action that has accrued to the paper owner on the inception of adverse possession is brought to an end and replaced with a fresh right of action if the adverse possessor acknowledges the paper owner's title. The date of the acknowledgement of title, therefore, replaces the date of adverse possession as the time from which the limitation period begins to run in unregistered land or the adverse possession is treated as having commenced in registered land. However, only a formal acknowledgement, made in writing and signed by the person making it, is effective. The relevant provisions are found in ss 29 and 30 of the Limitation Act 1980.

Limitation Act 1980, sections 29 and 30

29(1) Subsections (2) [. . .] below apply where any right of action (including a foreshore action) to recover land [. . .] has accrued.

(2) If the person in possession of the land [. . .] in question acknowledges the title of the person to whom the right of action has accrued –

(a) the right shall be treated as having accrued on and not before the date of the acknowledgment [. . .]

(7) [. . .] a current period of limitation may be repeatedly extended under this section by further acknowledgements [. . .], but a right of action, once barred by this Act, shall not be revived by by any subsequent acknowledgement [. . .]

30(1) To be effective for the purposes of section 29 of this Act, an acknowledgment must be in writing and signed by the person making it.

(2) For the purposes of section 29, any acknowledgment [. . .] –

(a) may be sent by the agent of the person by whom it is required to be made under that section; and

(b) shall be made to the person, or to an agent of the person, whose title or claim is being acknowledged [. . .]

The operation of these provisions was scrutinized by the House of Lords in the following case.

Ofulue v Bossert

Facts: Mr and Mrs Ofulue were registered proprietors of a property which they had let to tenants when they went to live abroad. Since 1981 or 1982 the property had been occupied by Ms Bossert who had been given possession, together with her father (who was now deceased), by the previous tenant. Possession proceedings had initially been commenced against Ms Bossert and her father in 1987, but these had been struck out in 2002. The current proceedings had then been launched in 2003. The initial proceedings had commenced well within the limitation period and so adverse possession had not been raised. When Ms Bossert claimed adverse possession in response to the current proceedings, the Ofulues argued that two events related to the initial proceedings constituted an acknowledgment of title under s 29. One event was an offer to buy the property which the Bosserts had made in correspondence with the Ofulues in 1992. The House of Lords agreed with the Court of Appeal that an offer to buy constituted an acknowledgement of title, but the difficulty faced by the Ofulues was that the correspondence was labelled 'without prejudice'. The majority of their Lordships (Lord Scott dissenting) concluded that the correspondence fell within the scope of a general rule of evidence which prohibited 'without prejudice' correspondence from being relied upon in court. This aspect of the case, which concerns the operation of rules of evidence rather than adverse possession, is not further discussed. The second event relied upon, while subsidiary to the Ofulues' claim, raised more substantive issues on the interpretation of s 29 of the Limitation Act 1980. In their defence to the initial proceedings, the Bosserts had counter-claimed for a lease, which Ms Bossert's father argued he had been promised by the Ofulues in return for repairs and improvements to the property. This gave rise to two questions. First, whether an acknowledgement of title is sufficient if it does not admit an immediate right to possession on the part of the claimants. Secondly, if there was an acknowledgement of title, whether it was confined to the date the defence was issued in 1990, or continued to operate until the proceedings were struck out in 2002. This was significant as an acknowledgement confined to the date the defence was issued would no longer assist the Ofulues. Under the limitation rules that applied to registered land at the time of the claim (which are discussed in section 5.2 of this chapter) their title would still be defeated as the Bosserts had remained in occupation for 12 years since that date.

Lord Neuberger

74 The Court of Appeal concluded that the admission in the defence in the first proceedings did not amount to an acknowledgement within section 29 , because it was only an acknowledgement of the Ofulues' title to the freehold, and not an admission of their right to immediate possession. [. . .] But the conclusion that section 29 requires an acknowledgement of a right to immediate possession, as opposed to an acknowledgement of title, is, in my judgment, wrong for two separate reasons, which may be shortly stated.

75 First, the conclusion reached by the Court if Appeal is inconsistent with the wording of section 29(2), which refers in clear terms to acknowledging "the title" of the person whose claim is said to be time-barred. Secondly, in any event, the concept of "possession" is more subtle than the reasoning of the Court of Appeal appears to have assumed. The effect of the defence in the earlier proceedings was to acknowledge the Ofulues' right to possession, albeit subject to the Bosserts' rights as tenants (in law or equity). This analysis also accords with common sense. The current dispute is whether the Ofulues effectively lost the freehold interest in the property to Ms Bossert, so it would be strange if a plain acknowledgement by Ms Bossert of their ownership of that very interest was not a sufficient acknowledgement for the purposes of section 29 . It would also be strange if the Bosserts' contention that they held, or were entitled to the grant of, an interest in premises from the Ofulues did not operate as an acknowledgement by them of the Ofulees's title.

The admission of title in the defence as a continuing acknowledgement

78 Mr Richard Wilson QC, on behalf of Mrs Ofulue, contended that the admission in the defence constituted an effective acknowledgement which prevented time running for the period up to the time the proceedings in which it was served were dismissed. The principal basis for this contention was that, by maintaining her case in the defence from the date it was served until the first proceedings were dismissed in 2002, Ms Bossert was affirming her acknowledgement of the Ofulues' title to the property for the purpose of section 29(2).

79 I can see no reason why a statement in a pleading or statement of case, or in any other court document, cannot amount to an acknowledgement for the purposes of section 29. Accordingly, the admission in the defence in this case, as I see it, operated as such as an acknowledgement of the Ofulues' title as at 18 July 1990, the date on which it was served. Indeed, although the point was in issue below, the contrary was not argued by Mr Peter Crampin QC, for Ms Bossert.

80 However, in my opinion, the argument that the admission continued to operate as such an acknowledgement beyond 18 July 1990 was rightly rejected by the Court of Appeal. It is inconsistent both with the language of the relevant provisions, and with the policy, of the 1980 Act. Conceptually and as a matter of language, I accept that an "acknowledgement" could cover a continuing state of affairs. However, particularly where it has to be embodied in a signed document, the more natural meaning of the word would suggest that it arises as at the date of the document—most naturally the date on which the document is provided to the person to whom the acknowledgement is made. The requirement in section 30(1) that an acknowledgement must be in writing and signed was no doubt intended to minimise the room for argument as to whether and when it was made.

81 The effect of section 15 of the 1980 Act is that a formal record, such as a conveyance or entry on the register, which appears to establish the paper title owner's title against the world, cannot be relied on after 12 years of adverse possession have passed. In those circumstances, it would seem very odd if an informal written acknowledgement could be relied on under section 29 of the same Act, where the adverse possession has thereafter continued for a longer period. If Mr Wilson's argument were correct, an offer to purchase, which remained open for acceptance, because it was not time-limited and not rejected, would presumably continue to operate as an acknowledgement for a potentially indefinite period. That appears surprising, inconvenient, and inconsistent with the purpose of the 1980 Act. Further, it seems clear that an act which could be said to refer to the future, namely a payment of rent in advance, will only stop time running up to the date it actually occurs: see paragraph 5(2) of Schedule 1 to the 1980 Act. [. . .]

Ms Bossert's claim to adverse possession therefore succeeded. Although the Bosserts had acknowledged the Ofulues' title on two occasions, on the facts neither operated to prevent their claim under s 29 of the Limitation Act 1980.

The acceptance of the Bosserts' acknowledgement of the Ofulues' freehold title as sufficient under s 29 leads to a curious juxtaposition with the requirement of intention in establishing the existence of adverse possession, which serves to highlight the significance of the formality requirement in s 30. As we have seen in section 4.2.2 of this chapter, in order to establish adverse possession a claimant must demonstrate only an intention to possess not an intention to own. Hence, we have noted that in Pye v Graham, the Grahams' willingness to enter into a new licence did not defeat their claim to adverse possession. Their willingness to do so was conceded in evidence, but there was no written acknowledgement within ss 29 and 30. Similarly, the Bosserts' claim to be tenants was held by the Court of Appeal not to prevent their ability to demonstrate an intention to possess for the purchase of establishing their adverse possession.[61]

61 For further discussion when a claimant may be considered to have provided written acknowledgement of title, see Jourdan and Radley-Gardner, Adverse Possession (2nd edn, 2011), [16–65]–[16–80].

It is possible that s 29 does not apply to claims to adverse possession arising under the LRA 2002 and discussed in section 5.3 of this chapter. While the matter remains unresolved, such a conclusion would be a surprising and apparently unexpected consequence of the disapplication of s 15 of the Limitation Act 1980 in the new scheme of limitations provided by the LRA 2002.[62]

5 THE EFFECT OF ADVERSE POSSESSION

As has been noted, the effect of adverse possession differs between unregistered land, registered land claims governed by the LRA 1925, and registered land claims governed by the LRA 2002.

5.1 UNREGISTERED LAND

Unregistered land displays the purity and simplicity of the operation of adverse possession in a system of relative titles. The general limitation period of twelve years is provided in s 15 of the Limitation Act 1980. Once adverse possession has continued for the twelve-year limitation period, the paper owner's title is extinguished by the operation of limitation of actions.

Limitation Act 1980, s 17

[. . .] at the expiration of the period prescribed by this Act for any person to bring an action to recover land (including a redemption action) the title of that person to the land shall be extinguished.

The 12-year period may be completed by a single adverse possessor, or by two or more adverse possessors in succession: for example, where one adverse possessor is him or herself dispossessed by another before the expiry of the 12-year period. At this stage, the adverse possessor's title is relatively superior to that of the paper owner, or persons claiming title through the paper owner.[63] There is no 'statutory conveyance' of the paper owner's title to the adverse possessor.[64] The effect of the statute is entirely negative.

Fairweather v St Marylebone Property Co Ltd
[1963] AC 510, HL

Lord Radcliffe

At 535
It is necessary to start, I think, by recalling the principle that defines a squatter's rights. He is not at any stage of his possession a successor to the title of the man he has dispossessed.

62 Jourdan and Radley-Gardner, ibid, [22–40]–[22–41].
63 In a case of successive adverse possessors, where C1 is dispossessed by C2, C1's title remains superior to that of C2 for 12 years from the date of dispossession. This is a consequence of relativity of title, discussed at section 3 of this chapter.
64 Tichborne v Weir (1892) 67 LTR 735, 737.

> He comes in and remains in always by right of possession, which in due course becomes incapable of disturbance as time exhausts the one or more periods allowed by statute for successful intervention. His title, therefore, is never derived through but arises always in spite of the dispossessed owner.

The adverse possessor acquires an independent freehold title from the time at which he or she commenced adverse possession. The effect of the limitation rules, combined with relativity of title, is that the adverse possessor's title becomes inviolable by the paper owner. But the adverse possessor is not a purchaser for value of the land and therefore will be bound by pre-existing property rights affecting the paper owner's title: for example, the adverse possessor is bound by any easements or restrictive covenants affecting use of the land.[65]

Exceptions to the operation of the twelve-year limitation period are provided in a number of special cases, including: the mental incapacity of the paper owner;[66] fraud and concealment on the part of the adverse possessor and cases of mistake;[67] acts between parties to a trust of land;[68] Crown lands and the foreshore.[69]

5.2 REGISTERED LAND: LAND REGISTRATION ACT 1925

As has been noted, the LRA 1925 sought to align registered land with the operation of adverse possession in unregistered land. Registered land was subject to the same limitation rules, except the extinguishment of title was replaced by s 75 of the Act.

Land Registration Act 1925, s 75

> (1) The Limitation Acts shall apply to registered land in the same manner and to the same extent as those Acts apply to land not registered, except that where, if the land were not registered, the estate of the person registered would be extinguished, such estate shall not be extinguished but shall be deemed to be held by the proprietor for the time being in trust for the person who, by virtue of the said Acts, has acquired title against any proprietor, but without prejudice to the estates and interests of any other person interested in the land whose estate or interest is not extinguished by those Acts.
> (2) Any person claiming to have acquired a title under the Limitation Acts to a registered estate in the land may apply to be registered as proprietor thereof.

65 Re Nisbet and Potts Contract [1906] 1 Ch 386.

66 Limitation Act 1980, s 28. A paper owner who is under a disability when the right of action accrues and regains capacity after the twelve-year limitation period had expired has six years from the time at which he or she regains capacity to bring an action. This is subject to a long stop of thirty years from the date at which the right of action accrued.

67 Limitation Act 1980, s 32. The limitation period commences from the date at which the claimant discovers the fraud, concealment, or mistake, or could have done so through reasonable diligence. Beyond concealment, there is no obligation on the part of the adverse possessor to bring its acts to the attention of the paper owner. See Topplan Estates Ltd v Townley [2004] EWCA 1369, [85]–[86].

68 Limitation Act 1980, Sch 1, para 9, prevents a right of action accruing in favour of one beneficiary or a trustee against another beneficiary.

69 Limitation Act 1980, Sch 1, para 10, provides for a thirty-year limitation period for adverse possession against the Crown and para 11 provides for a sixty-year period in relation to the foreshore.

> (3) The registrar shall, on being satisfied as to the applicant's title, enter the applicant as proprietor either with absolute, good leasehold, qualified or possessory title, as the case may require, but without prejudice to any estate or interest protected by any entry on the register which may not have been extinguished under the Limitation Acts, and such registration shall, subject as aforesaid, have the same effect as the registration of a first proprietor; but the proprietor or the applicant or any other person interested may apply to the court for the determination of any question arising under this section.

At first sight, the imposition of a trust appears to be an expedient means of reconciling the idea of title being extinguished with registered land principles. As Cooke notes:[70] '[A] trust is the English lawyer's natural response to a situation where true ownership and paper title diverge.' In fact, however, the Law Commission noted that a trust was not necessary. All that was required was provision for the adverse possessor to apply for registration.[71]

The imposition of a trust was a source of confusion. It had the potential to confer a windfall on the adverse possessor, by providing a choice of enforcing his or her rights against the land, or enforcing personal liability against the dispossessed registered proprietor as trustee.[72] More generally, the trust raised questions as regards the relationship between the adverse possessor and the registered proprietor.

Cooke, 'Adverse Possession: Problems of Title in Registered Land'
(1994) 14 LS 1, 3–4

> Indeed, the whole concept of a trust, once its fiduciary implications are explored, begins to feel very uncomfortable. We are accustomed to trusts imposed upon a trustee against his will and even, initially, without his knowledge, in the context of resulting and constructive trusts. But in such cases the trust operates to prevent injustice to an innocent and often vulnerable beneficiary. To impose a trust, with the same implications and consequences, on the dispossessed proprietor to protect the erstwhile trespasser seems inappropriate [. . .]

A separate issue arising from the imposition of the trust is the nature of the interest acquired by the adverse possessor. In registered land, as in unregistered land, the claimant obtains a freehold title from the inception of the adverse possession. This title is independent from the title held by the registered proprietor. Once the trust is imposed by s 75(1) of the LRA 1925, however, the adverse possessor necessarily has a beneficial interest in the registered proprietor's estate. Therefore, the adverse possessor of registered land appears to have two distinct interests in the land: the independently acquired freehold title, and a beneficial interest in the registered proprietor's estate.[73]

As Cooke explains, this has consequences for understanding the nature of the right with which the adverse possessor should be registered if he or she applies under s 75(2) of the LRA 1925.

Cooke, 'Adverse Possession: Problems of Title in Registered Land'
(1994) 14 LS 1, 5–6

Once the limitation period has expired, the well-advised squatter will apply to be registered as proprietor. As we have seen, under s 75(2) 'any person claiming to have acquired a title under the Limitation Acts to a registered estate in the land may apply to be registered as proprietor thereof.'

Does 'thereof' mean 'of the land' or 'of the registered estate to which he claims to have acquired title'? In either case, does it mean that X is to be registered as proprietor 'of the fee simple arising by adverse possession' or 'of X's already registered estate, to which he has the equitable title by virtue of the trust imposed by s 75'?

In unregistered land, there is no question of the squatter's acquiring the dispossessed owner's estate by a 'parliamentary conveyance.' The fact that it is land registry practice to give [the squatter] a new title number indicates that [the squatter] is getting something new, and that he is being registered with title to his own independent fee simple so as to mirror his position in unregistered land. This is of course what the position should be.

It is debatable whether the 1925 Act provided for a parliamentary conveyance. The opening of a new title by the Land Registry suggests that this is not the case. Under the LRA 1925 (as in unregistered land cases), the adverse possessor obtained an independent freehold title, although he or she remained bound by property rights affecting the previous registered title.[74] The final closing of the registered proprietor's title produced a result analogous to the extinction of an unregistered title.

Notwithstanding, in Fairweather v St Marylebone Property Co Ltd,[75] a case involving unregistered land, Lord Radcliffe suggested obiter that s 75 of the LRA 1925 achieved a parliamentary conveyance. This analysis was subsequently taken in a first instance decision involving registered land.[76] But both of those cases concerned adverse possession against a leasehold estate. Specific difficulties arise in that context, which we return to consider below.

The LRA 2002 preserves the rights of adverse possessors acquired under the 1925 Act, but removes the s 75 trust. That section is repealed (without any saving) and transitional provisions are provided in Sch 12 of the 2002 Act.

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 12, para 18

(1) Where a registered estate in land is held in trust for a person by virtue of section 75(1) of the Land Registration Act 1925 immediately before the coming into force of section 97, he is entitled to be registered as the proprietor of the estate.

(2) A person has a defence to any action for the possession of land (in addition to any other defence he may have) if he is entitled under this paragraph to be registered as the proprietor of an estate in the land.

The LRA 2002 came into force on 13 October 2003. As a result of Sch 12, para 18(1), the rights of a claimant who had completed twelve years of adverse possession (so that the s 75(1) trust had come into existence) on or before 12 October 2003 are preserved. The trust is removed by the repeal of s 75 of the 1925 Act, but the adverse possessor retains the right (originally conferred by s 75(2)) to be registered as proprietor. The entitlement to be registered as proprietor 'of the estate' confirms that a statutory transfer takes place.

5.3 REGISTERED LAND: LAND REGISTRATION ACT 2002

The LRA 2002 provides a new scheme of adverse possession. The scheme applies to adverse possessors in registered land who had not completed twelve years of adverse possession on or before the 12 October 2003.[77] It marks a clean break from attempting to transplant the operation of adverse possession in unregistered land into registered land. Instead, it takes as its starting point the underlying principle that, in registered land, registration alone confers title, and seeks to provide a more appropriate balance between the registered proprietor and adverse possessor.[78]

The Law Commission explains the aims of the scheme.

Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001, [14.6])

The aims of the scheme are as follows.

1. Registration should of itself provide a means of protection against adverse possession, though it should not be unlimited protection. Title to registered land is not possession-based as is title to unregistered land. It is registration that vests the legal estate in the owner and that person's ownership is apparent from the register. The registered proprietor and other interested persons, such as the proprietor of a registered charge, are therefore given the opportunity to oppose an application by a squatter to be registered as proprietor.
2. If the application is not opposed, however, whether because the registered proprietor has disappeared or is unwilling to take steps to evict the squatter, the squatter will be registered as proprietor instead. This ensures that land which has (say) been abandoned by the proprietor, or which he or she does not consider to be worth the price of possession proceedings, will remain in commerce.
3. If the registered proprietor (or other interested person) opposes the registration, then it is incumbent on him or her to ensure that the squatter is either evicted or his or her position regularised within two years. If the squatter remains in adverse possession for two years after such objection has been made, he or she will be entitled to apply once again to be registered, and this time the registered proprietor will not be able to object. In other words, the scheme provides a registered proprietor with one chance, but only one chance, to prevent a squatter from acquiring title to his or her land. The proprietor

[77] It is not necessary that the title was registered throughout the period of adverse possession: Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 6, para 1(4). Hence the scheme will apply where a claimant enters into possession of unregistered land, but the title is registered before being extinguished by the expiry of the limitation period.

[78] Law Commission Report No 254 (1998), [10.43]; Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001), [14.4].

who fails to take appropriate action following his or her objection will lose the land to the squatter.

4. Consistently with the approach set out above, a registered proprietor who takes possession proceedings against a squatter will succeed, unless the squatter can bring him or herself within some very limited exceptions.

It will be apparent from this summary that one of the essential features of the scheme is that it must produce a decisive result. Either the squatter is evicted or otherwise ceases to be in adverse possession, or he or she is registered as proprietor of the land.

Under the 2002 Act, there is no concept of title being acquired by adverse possession or of a limitation period barring the assertion of a registered proprietor's title. Sections 15 and 17 of the Limitation Act 1980, which provide the twelve-year limitation period for an action to recover land, and 'extinguish' title at the end of that period, are disapplied in relation to registered land.[79] Instead, the completion of a minimum of ten years' adverse possession[80] enables the claimant to access a procedure that will result in one of two outcomes: either with the claimant acquiring title to the land by registration (not by adverse possession itself); or with the assertion of title by the registered proprietor. Where the adverse possessor acquires title, there is a 'statutory transfer' of the registered proprietor's estate.

Sch 6 of the LRA 2002 provides the scheme. We will first outline the operation of the procedure and then assess the impact of the 2002 Act on adverse possession.

5.3.1 The New Scheme of Adverse Possession

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 6, paras 1–4

1 (1) A person may apply to the registrar to be registered as the proprietor of a registered estate in land if he has been in adverse possession of the estate for the period of ten years ending on the date of the application. [. . .]

2 (1) The registrar must give notice of an application under paragraph 1 to—

(a) the proprietor of the estate to which the application relates,

(b) the proprietor of any registered charge on the estate,

(c) where the estate is leasehold, the proprietor of any superior registered estate,

(d) any person who is registered in accordance with rules as a person to be notified under this paragraph, and

(e) such other persons as rules may provide.

(2) Notice under this paragraph shall include notice of the effect of paragraph 4.

3 (1) A person given notice under paragraph 2 may require that the application to which the notice relates be dealt with under paragraph 5.

[79] Land Registration Act 2002, s 96.

[80] Ibid, Sch 6, para 1, extracted below. The adoption of ten years as the requisite period reflects separate recommendations made by the Law Commission for reform of limitation of actions: Law Commission Report No 271 (2001), [14.19].

(2) The right under this paragraph is exercisable by notice to the registrar given before the end of such period as rules may provide.

4 If an application under paragraph 1 is not required to be dealt with under paragraph 5, the applicant is entitled to be entered in the register as the new proprietor of the estate.

By virtue of Sch 6, adverse possession has no effect unless or until an application for registration is made. Adverse possession must have been maintained for at least ten years immediately prior to the application. Further, the applicant must generally have completed the adverse possession; successive periods of adverse possession by different squatters cannot be added together.[81] This ensures that if the adverse possessor succeeds in obtaining registration, his or her title is not vulnerable to challenge by a prior possessor. Security of the adverse possessor's title is preferred over the continued recognition of relativity of title, consistent with the underlying acceptance that title is based on registration, not possession. The general period of ten years provided in para 1(1) is subject to exceptions: in particular, an application cannot be made against a registered proprietor who is incapacitated by mental disability.[82] Applications relating to Crown foreshore land can be made only after a period of sixty years' adverse possession.[83]

Once an application for registration is made, the registered proprietor (and the other persons specified in para 2) are notified of the application by the Registrar. The onus then shifts to the registered proprietor to take steps to assert his or her title by issuing a counter-notice requiring the application to be dealt with under para 5. The period that has been provided in which the registered proprietor can do so under para 3(2) is 65 business days from the date of issue of the notification.[84] If the proprietor fails to issue a counter-notice within that period, then, by para 4, a statutory transfer of the estate is affected to the adverse possessor. The adverse possessor thereby acquires title to the land by registration.

If a counter-notice is issued, then (save in three exceptional cases in para 5, discussed below) the application for registration is rejected. Under para 6, the registered proprietor has two years in which to commence proceedings for possession of the land. If no such proceedings are commenced within that period, then the adverse possessor may make a further application for registration.[85] This application does not instigate a new system of notifications. On making this application, the adverse possessor is immediately entitled to be registered as proprietor of the estate.[86]

The exceptional circumstances, in which the adverse possessor's application will be successful despite the issue of a counter-notice, are given in para 5(2)–(4).

[81] This is in contrast to the position in unregistered land explained at section 5.1 above. Successive periods of adverse possession were also possible in registered land under the 1925 Act. Limited exceptions to the bar on successive periods of adverse possession are provided by the 2002 Act, Sch 6, para 11(2). This includes where the applicant is the successor in title to a previous adverse possessor. For further discussion of these, see Law Commission Report No 271 (2001), [14.20]–[14.21].

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 6, para 5(2)–(4)

(2) The first condition is that—

(a) it would be unconscionable because of an equity by estoppel for the registered proprietor to seek to dispossess the applicant, and

(b) the circumstances are such that the applicant ought to be registered as the proprietor.

(3) The second condition is that the applicant is for some other reason entitled to be registered as the proprietor of the estate.

(4) The third condition is that—

(a) the land to which the application relates is adjacent to land belonging to the applicant,

(b) the exact line of the boundary between the two has not been determined under rules under section 60,

(c) for at least ten years of the period of adverse possession ending on the date of the application, the applicant (or any predecessor in title) reasonably believed that the land to which the application relates belonged to him, and

(d) the estate to which the application relates was registered more than one year prior to the date of the application.

The third of these is the only true exception. In each of the other situations, the underlying assumption is that the adverse possessor, in fact, has a separate claim to the land.[87] The third exception reflects what the Law Commission acknowledged to be a legitimate conveyancing justification for adverse possession in registered land.[88] The register is not conclusive as to boundaries and therefore there is no conflict with the concept of title by registration to enable adverse possession to be used to settle genuine boundary disputes.

We have seen that, in unregistered land, and in registered land under the LRA 1925, even though the adverse possessor acquires an independent freehold title, the title is subject to burdens affecting the old title. The position is clearer in the LRA 2002 where there is a statutory transfer of the exiting title. Schedule 6, para 9, confirms that the registration of the adverse possessor does not affect the priority of interests affecting the estate. An exception is, however, made as regards registered charges. A registered chargee is notified by the Registrar of the adverse possessor's application for registration, and has the same opportunity as the registered proprietor to issue a counter-notice and bring proceedings for possession against the adverse possessor.[89] If a chargee fails to do so, then there is no justification for enabling him or her to enforce his or her charge against an adverse possessor who obtains registration.

While Sch 6 confers on a successful applicant an entitlement to be registered, that entitlement presupposes the existence of the underlying claim to adverse possession. The existence of adverse possession is a pre-condition to the right to make an application under Sch 6 and [87] The relationship between estoppel and adverse possession is considered by Nield, 'Adverse Possession and Estoppel' [2004] Conv 123. As Cooke notes (2003, p 142), the utility of combining estoppel with adverse possession is unclear. The Law Commission Report No 271 (2001, [14.43]) suggested that the second exception could apply where the adverse possessor is entitled to the land under the will or intestacy of the registered proprietor, or where a sale of land had not been formally completed, but purchase money has been paid, so that the registered proprietor, in fact, holds the land on trust for the adverse possessor. The application of the exception to informal purchasers is considered by Woods, 'Adverse Possession and Informal Purchasers' (2009) 60 NILQ 305.

[89] Ibid, [14.74].

of the entitlement to obtain registration if that claim is successful. In Baxter v Mannion,[90] Mr Baxter obtained registration of title to a field under Sch 6 when the registered proprietor, Mr Mannion, failed to issue a counter-notice on receiving notice of his application for registration. Mr Mannion successfully argued that the registration of Mr Baxter had been a 'mistake' and obtained rectification of the register under the procedure in Sch 4 of the LRA 2002 (discussed in Chapter 7, section 5.6.1). It had been established on the facts that Mr Baxter's use of the land did not in fact constitute adverse possession and, therefore, he was not entitled to have been registered under Sch 6. The Court of Appeal refused to allow the 'bureaucratic machinery' of Sch 6 to '[trump] reality'.[91]

5.3.2 Assessment of the Land Registration Act 2002

As we have noted, one of the Law Commission's aims in its recommendations for adverse possession is to provide a more appropriate balance between adverse possessors and the registered proprietor. In fact, the new system is heavily weighted in favour of the registered proprietor. The LRA 2002 has been described as the 'emasculation' of adverse possession[92] and as making registered land 'virtually squatter proof'.[93] The role of adverse possession is reduced to settling boundary disputes and ensuring the marketability of abandoned land.[94] This is a deliberate policy choice to make registered land more secure and, in so doing, encourage voluntary registration.[95]

While the Act favours the registered proprietor, there is an underlying obligation of personal responsibility. To benefit from the protection afforded by Sch 6, registered proprietors must act on receipt of a notification by the Registrar and, in order to do so, must have systems in place to manage their land. This may pose few difficulties for the individual homeowner, but presents more of a challenge to large landowners, including some local authorities that have failed to protect their interests under the LRA 1925.[96]

Bogusz argues that the approach taken by the 2002 Act is to be welcomed.

Bogusz, 'Bringing Land Registration into the Twenty-First Century: The Land Registration Act 2002' (2002) 65 MLR 556, 563

From a legal perspective, the Act reflects the true position that the basis of title to registered land is the fact of registration and is not based (as is the case in unregistered land) on the concept of possession. The Act intends to ensure an accurate register and restricting adverse possession in this way is necessary to achieve this. Adverse possession is therefore difficult to validate in the way it perhaps was in 1925. Arguments justifying adverse possession such as preventing the neglect of land or that there was a social need for wider land ownership are not so relevant today in a property owning democracy. Land ownership is not limited to a small proportion of the population, who, as was progressively becoming the case, did not have the resources to maintain the quality and value of their land. Adverse possession had > a role to play when feudal landowners could no longer manage the estates they owned and when there was a need for some form of land redistribution.

The authors suggest that the Law Commission's proposals were 'heavily influenced' by media criticism of the loss of local authority housing by adverse possession.

> Adverse possession with this egalitarian dimension is difficult to justify, at least in its present form, within a jurisdiction where land prices are high and the commercial market in land is particularly buoyant. The concept of alienability of land, which went to the heart of 1925 legislation, is very much a reality today. The economic reality of land being an important commercial commodity, that is freely and widely traded, makes adverse possession appear to be a very outdated concept. In this sense the LRA 2002 has very much lived up to the objectives of the Law Commission's Consultation Document of 1998 and as far as adverse possession is concerned, brought land registration into the twenty-first century.

Bogusz suggests that the reforms are equally welcome from a moral perspective.

Dixon, meanwhile, emphasizes that the approach taken by the LRA 2002 is not an inevitable one, but represents a policy choice.

Dixon, 'The Reform of Property Law and the Land Registration Act 2002: A Risk Assessment' [2003] Conv 136, 151–2

> [The reform of adverse possession] is also a reflection of a political philosophy that sees adverse possession as "land theft" and as inherently inconsistent with a registration system. Of course, there is merit in both these views: modern expositions of the law on adverse possession appear to have favoured the rights of possessors over the rights of paper owners and the existence of an off-register mechanism for destroying titles seems to make a mockery of the state guarantee of title. On the other hand, the social and economic justifications for principles of adverse possession have been well documented and instead of "land theft", adverse possession can be seen as encouraging "productive land use". Again, there is nothing inherently contradictory in having principles of adverse possession operate in registered land, at least if those principles are seen positively as a method of transferring title from one person to another instead of a method of unfairly snatching it from them. It is a matter of perception, not of incontrovertible logic. Consequently, given that the Act has chosen to emasculate adverse possession—and so favours one policy perspective—we must be alive to the possibility that there will be some creative interpretation of the relevant provisions by a differently minded judiciary. [...]

Picking up on Dixon's acknowledgment of the importance of perception, Cobb and Fox are highly critical of the Law Commission's presentation of the morality of adverse possession. Focusing on the position of urban squatters—that is, people who deliberately move in to empty residential properties—the authors argue that the Law Commission relies on too simplistic a presentation of an undeserving adverse possessor and a blameless registered proprietor.

Cobb and Fox, 'Living Outside the System? The (Im)morality of Urban Squatting after the Land Registration Act 2002' (2007) 27 LS 236, 242–3 and 249

> The first component of the Commission's argument sought to highlight the 'undeserving' nature of many claims for title through adverse possession. It accepted the importance of protecting certain categories of 'inadvertent' squatter from hardship [...] In contrast to this, > however, the Commission was highly critical of those squatters who deliberately take—possession of land [. . .] Significantly, by focusing upon the construction of advertent squatting as 'land theft', the Law Commission has introduced, for the first time in England and Wales, an important moral distinction between good and bad faith adverse possession. The basis of moral opprobrium, quite simply, is the squatter's own knowledge of his or her occupation, which—like mens rea under the criminal law—renders the otherwise innocent act a culpable one.

> The second, and arguably more implicit, component of the Commission's moral analysis was an emphasis upon the blamelessness of the dispossessed landowner. On the one hand, the Commission identified certain landowners as blameworthy, for example a landowner who encouraged an inadvertent squatter to rely on his representations [. . .] and proposed an exception to deal with this scenario. More importantly though, [. . .] the Commission pointed out that landowners who lose title to deliberate squatters are often unaware of the presence of squatters on their property until it is too late. In these circumstances—deliberate squatting unnoticed as a result of the inadvertence of the landowner—the Commission considered it unfair to allow a squatter to gain title to the property. [. . .]
> The Law Commission's proposals implicitly constructed the moral debate over the doctrine of adverse possession around a binary division between 'good faith' and 'bad faith' squatters. Yet, while the 'land theft' approach to adverse possession appears, prima facie, to provide a convincing justificatory basis for the Law Commission's agenda in relation to registered land, the Commission should not simply be accepted as having the final word on the morality of 'bad faith' squatting, particularly in light of its apparent lack of engagement with the traditional justificatory theories. The actions of the 'bad faith' squatter in an unsupervised property can be usefully conceptualised through the alternative perspectives of labour-desert theory, personhood theory and utilitarianism. Each of these frameworks allows for the possibility that, in certain contexts—specifically, in the case of an advertent squatter—the consequences of unauthorised occupation by a squatter may negate the original title holder's moral claim and provide a moral justification for the conduct of the squatter.

We have noted that the LRA 2002 seeks to provide a scheme of adverse possession that is consistent with the underlying principle of title by registration. Cooke[97] notes that, under the Act, 'proof of title has been divorced from proof of possession' and that relativity of title, a concept central to unregistered land, is no longer important.[98] These concepts have not been removed from registered land. The adverse possessor still relies on the inception of possession as the foundation of his or her claim. It is still recognized that adverse possession confers an independent freehold title from the moment at which possession begins. Hence, Sch 6, para 9, of the 2002 Act provides that this title (in contradistinction to that of the registered proprietor) is 'extinguished' when the adverse possessor becomes registered proprietor of the estate.

But these concepts retain only a ghostly existence. Their operation is overshadowed by the overarching principle that the adverse possessor remains vulnerable to the assertion of the registered title unless and until that title is acquired by the adverse possessor by registration. The position is aptly summarized in the following extract.

[97] Land Law (2006, p 211). [98] Ibid, p 203.

Nair, 'Morality and the Mirror: The Normative Limits of the "Principles of Land Registration"' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011) 263, p 280

[A]lthough it radically shifts the balance of interests between a registered proprietor and an adverse possessor, the LRA 2002 does not eliminate the concept that possession is, in principle, capable of generating a right to land that ought to be protected even against a party who originally had better title. The right of an adverse possessor to apply for registration as registered proprietor and his entitlement to succeed if certain conditions are met is, of course, a highly watered-down version of the right of an adverse possessor of unregistered land once all other titles have been extinguished by limitation. But it exists on a continuum with the rules that generate those more powerful rights and cannot be understood except in the context of a system in which possession generates rights.

5.4 HUMAN RIGHTS AND ADVERSE POSSESSION

Following the decision in Pye v Graham, Pye commenced proceedings in the European Court of Human Rights. It argued that the loss of its land was an infringement of its right of property under Art 1 of the First Protocol to the ECHR, for which it was entitled to compensation from the government. The Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998), which incorporates the ECHR into domestic law, was not applicable to Pye v Graham, because the cause of action arose before that Act came into force.[99] Hence a direct action in the Strasbourg Court was the only means through which the human rights argument could be raised. The financial stakes were high, with Pye assessing its loss at £10m (a sum disputed by the government). The legal stakes were higher, with the legitimacy of rules of adverse possession called into question. The case focused on the operation of limitation periods under the LRA 1925, the scheme applied in Pye v Graham, although raised more generally the justification for adverse possession claims in a system of registered title.

In Pye v UK, the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights ultimately rejected Pye's claim by ten votes to seven.[100] This decision reversed that of the ordinary Chamber, in which Pye had succeeded by the narrowest of margins (four to three votes).[101] We have seen, in Chapter 3, the different stages of a claim under Art 1 of the First Protocol. Firstly, it must be established that the provision of the ECHR is engaged, and secondly, if it is, the possibility of justification must be considered. As we have seen in Chapter 3, the Grand Chamber agreed that Art 1 was engaged, and considered the operation of limitation rules to be concerned with the control of possessions, rather than with deprivation. The Court then turned its attention to the possibility of justification, considering, firstly, whether the limitation period serves a legitimate aim.

conception of the importance and role of property. Even where title to real property is registered, it must be open to the legislature to attach more weight to lengthy, unchallenged possession than to the formal fact of registration. The Court accepts that to extinguish title where the former owner is prevented, as a consequence of the application of the law, from recovering possession of land cannot be said to be manifestly without reasonable foundation. There existed therefore a general interest in both the limitation period itself and the extinguishment of title at the end of the period.

Applying its justification formula,[102] the Court held that the rules struck a fair balance between the general interest and the interest of the individuals. The absence of provision for compensation in domestic law was not considered significant in the context of limitation rules, while adequate procedural protection was available to Pye to enforce its rights. The Court was not swayed in its conclusions by the extent of Pye's loss and the corresponding gain enjoyed by the Grahams.

JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v UK* (App No 44302/02)
[2008] 1 EHRLR 132, Grand Chamber

The applicant companies contended that their loss was so great, and the windfall to the Grahams so significant, that the fair balance required by Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 was upset. The Court would first note that, in the case of James, the Court found that the view taken by Parliament as to the tenant's "moral entitlement" to ownership of the houses at issue fell within the State's margin of appreciation. In the present case, too, whilst it would be strained to talk of the "acquired rights" of an adverse possessor during the currency of the limitation period, it must be recalled that the registered land regime in the United Kingdom is a reflection of a long-established system in which a term of years' possession gave sufficient title to sell. Such arrangements fall within the State's margin of appreciation, unless they give rise to results which are so anomalous as to render the legislation unacceptable. The acquisition of unassailable rights by the adverse possessor must go hand in hand with a corresponding loss of property rights for the former owner. In James and Others, the possibility of "undeserving" tenants being able to make "windfall profits" did not affect the overall assessment of the proportionality of the legislation (James and Others judgment, referred to above, § 69), and any windfall for the Grahams must be regarded in the same light in the present case.

As to the loss for the applicant companies, it is not disputed that the land lost by them, especially those parts with development potential, will have been worth a substantial sum of money. However, limitation periods, if they are to fulfil their purpose (see paragraphs 67—74 above), must apply regardless of the size of the claim. The value of the land cannot therefore be of any consequence to the outcome of the present case.

It was on the issue of a fair balance that five of the seven dissenting judges disagreed with the majority.[103] In this respect, they highlighted the difference between unregistered and registered land.

102 See Chapter 3.

103 The other two dissenting judges considered that the application of the limitation rules in the context of registered land did not serve a legitimate function. They further considered that even if a legitimate function was served, the rules provided by the 1925 Act were disproportionate.

JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v UK (App No 44302/02)

At [10]–[11] of the first dissenting judgment

In the case of unregistered land, title was made out by establishing a number of years' possession. Title deeds served only as evidence in support of possession, and could be defeated by a person who could prove actual (adverse) possession for the requisite number of years. In such a system, the extinguishment of title at the end of the limitation period could be seen as a coherent element in the rules on acquisition of title. [. . .]

In the case of registered land, however, title depends not on possession, but on registration as the proprietor. A potential purchaser of land can ascertain the owner of the land by searching the register, and there is no need for a potential vendor to establish title by proving possession. As pointed out by the Law Commission, the traditional reasons advanced to justify a law of adverse possession which resulted in the extinguishment of title on expiry of the limitation period had lost much of their cogency. This view was shared in the circumstances of the present case both by Lord Bingham and by Neuberger J., who found that the uncertainties which sometimes arose in relation to the ownership of land were very unlikely to arise in the context of a system of land ownership where the owner of the land was readily identifiable by inspecting the proprietorship register.

In the view of these dissenting judges, the absence of compensation carried a requirement of strong measures of protection for registered proprietors, which were not provided by the LRA 1925. In this respect, they contrasted the 1925 Act with the new safeguards provided by the LRA 2002 through the Sch 6 notification procedure.

Although based on the 1925 Act, it is implicit in the judgment of the Grand Chamber that the operation of adverse possession in unregistered land, and in registered land under the 2002 Act, is also human rights compliant.[104] The Grand Chamber accepted the legitimacy of limitation rules and hence the crucial issue is that of fair balance. The holder of unregistered land enjoys the same level of procedural protection as his LRA 1925 counterpart. The acceptance of the scheme under the 1925 Act necessarily means that the LRA 2002, with its additional protection for registered proprietors, would satisfy this test. This is implicit even in the joint judgment of five of the seven dissenting judges.

Jones argues further that the Grand Chamber was wrong to consider that Art 1 of the First Protocol was engaged.

Jones, 'Out with the Owners! The Eurasian Sequels to _JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v United Kingdom_' (2008) 27 CJQ 260, 265–6

This [the conclusion that article 1, protocol 1 is engaged] is mistaken. The key term in Art.1 is "possessions". Article 1 is ultimately bound by its ordinary meaning, i.e. things which a person holds, according to the circumstances in which they were acquired. Thus, Art.1 merely confers a right to retain property in manner in which it has come to be held. The provision cannot be used to broaden the original scope of ownership. For this would have it confer a right, not to retention, but to acquisition of property, on more generous terms that did not, on the facts, emerge. As the Grand Chamber itself stated, "[i]t does not [. . .] guarantee the right to acquire property".

Paradoxically, this is precisely what the Grand Chamber's conclusion allows. As it indicated, the applicants' title to the Berkshire land was, "necessarily limited by the various rules of statute and common law applicable to real estate", including "the various rules on adverse possession". Thus, when "the applicant companies lost the beneficial ownership of [the land]", title had simply lapsed according to the terms on which it was acquired. The process was no more objectionable than the expiration of a lease by the effluxion of time. It could not attract the protection of Art.1, without suggesting that the provision guarantees the right to acquire title free from the possibility of adverse possession. As indicated, the provision does not go this far. In short, it was anything but "inescapable [. . .] that Article 1 of Protocol No 1 is applicable".

Jones' point is that once the issue goes to the matter of a fair balance, the division of opinion in the Grand Chamber (and, previously, in the ordinary Chamber judgment) shows that there is an element of subjectivity.

His argument has resonance with the approach of the House of Lords in a different context in Aston Cantlow Parochial Church Council v Wallbank.[105] In that case, as we have seen in Chapter 3, it was held that liability for chancel repairs did not engage Art 1, because it was an encumbrance that defined the nature of the possession. There is, however, an analytical difference between an encumbrance, as a right held by a third party affecting ownership, and the possibility of losing ownership through limitation of actions.

The Grand Chamber decision in Pye v UK is not technically binding on English courts, but it has since been followed by the Court of Appeal in the following case.[106] The Court rejected an argument that the justification for the operation of adverse possession is a matter that arises for reconsideration where a claim is distinguishable on the facts from Pye v Graham.

[2008] EWCA Civ 7, CA

Facts: The facts of the case are outlined above in section 4.2.4 where the House of Lords decision is discussed. In the Court of Appeal, the Ofulues argued that the loss of their title through adverse possession was a violation of Art 1 Protocol 1. This issue was not raised again in the House of Lords.

Arden LJ

The written submissions of the Ofulues proceed on the basis that it is open to this court to distinguish the decision in Pye on its facts or by reference to the applicability of the policy reasons for adverse possession identified by the Law Commission. In my judgment, this approach fundamentally misunderstands the purpose of the doctrine of the margin of appreciation. The Strasbourg Court accepted that the national authorities could in general determine the rules for the extinction of title as a result of the occupation of the land by a person who was not the true owner. That determination applies to all decisions on adverse possession and it is not open to this court not to follow that determination because the case is distinguishable on its facts. For the doctrine of the margin of appreciation to be inapplicable, the results would have to be so anomalous as to render the legislation unacceptable (see [83] of the judgment of the Strasbourg Court set out above), and in my judgment that has not been demonstrated in this case (see further [55] below).

The Ofulues' submissions additionally proceed on the basis that this court must apply the test of legitimate aim and proportionality to each different case of adverse possession which arises. Again, in my judgment this fundamentally misunderstands the function of this court. The Strasbourg Court considered the compatibility with the Convention of the limitation period in the case of adverse possession with Art.1 of Protocol No.1 and assessed its legitimate aim and proportionality as a general rule and not simply in the context of the specific facts of the Pye case. It would not therefore be appropriate for this court to proceed to examine the questions of legitimate aim and proportionality simply from the perspective of the facts of this case and the relationship between them and the policy considerations in the Law Commission's Consultation Paper.

6 ADVERSE POSSESSION AND LEASEHOLD TITLES

As we have seen in section 3 above, a claimant who moves into adverse possession thereby immediately obtains a freehold title. This is so even if the land is leased at the time at which the claimant commences adverse possession. In such a case, however, the adverse possession operates against the leasehold estate; the claim does not affect the title of the landlord (the holder of the freehold title). At the expiry of the term of the lease, the landlord can assert his or her freehold title against the adverse possessor. To defeat the landlord's title, a fresh claim to adverse possession is required.

The additional complexity of adverse possession in the leasehold context has given rise to a number of questions regarding the nature of the right acquired by the adverse possessor, the extent to which an estate is extinguished by the operation of limitation rules, and the relationship between the adverse possessor and the freeholder. The specific context in which these questions have arisen is the surrender of a lease by a tenant who has lost his or her title by adverse possession: is such a surrender effective to enable the landlord immediately to assert its freehold title against the adverse possessor, without the need to wait for the expiration of the term of the lease? Different answers to this question have been given in unregistered and registered land.

In unregistered land, the possibility of surrender of a lease is met with the immediate objection that the leasehold title is extinguished by adverse possession. It therefore appears illogical to suggest that the lease can be surrendered. Despite this apparent difficulty, the House of Lords has held that surrender was effective.

Fairweather v St Marylebone Property Co Ltd
[1963] AC 510, HL

Facts: The freeholder of adjoining plots of land built a shed across the boundary of the two plots. The entrance to the shed was on No 311, but 75 per cent of the shed was on No

315. Long leases were granted of both plots. It was accepted that the owner of No 311 had obtained title to the land on No 315 occupied by the shed through adverse possession. The tenant of No 315 surrendered the lease and the freeholder sought to assert its title against the adverse possessor.

Lord Radcliffe

On one view, which seems not an implausible one having regard to the structure of the respective sections, the right or title extinguished is coterminous with the right of action the barring of which is the occasion of the extinguishment. This would mean that, when a squatter dispossesses a lessee for the statutory period, it is the lessee's right and title as against the squatter that is finally destroyed but not his right or title as against persons who are not or do not take through the adverse possessor. On the other view, that upon which the appellant's case depends, the lessee's right and title to the premises becomes extinguished for all purposes and in all relations, so that as between himself and the lessor, for instance, he has thereafter no estate or interest in the land demised. [...]

I think, therefore, that it is a false approach to the provisions of the Limitation Acts to regard the "extinguishment of title" as extinguishing more than the title of the dispossessed against the dispossessor. Where the person dispossessed is a lessee, I do not think it right to try to build legal conclusions on the assumption that the nexus between him and his lessor has been destroyed; or, consequently, that, once adverse possession has been completed, he ceases to hold the term of years and estate in it granted to him by his lessor. [...]

I conclude, therefore, that the effect of the "extinguishment" sections of the Limitation Acts is not to destroy the lessee's estate as between himself and the lessor; and that it would be incorrect to say that if he offers a surrender to the lessor he has nothing to surrender to him in respect of the land in the possession of the squatter. Nemo dat quod non habet, and I daresay that he does not, but, as Pearson L.J. indicated in the Court of Appeal, the question here is not whether there are any exceptions from that general principle but whether, as a principle, it is relevant to the situation that we have here. In my opinion it is not.

Hence, the extinguishment of title operated only as regards the relationship between the tenant and the adverse possessor. Because the lease continued in existence between the tenant and landlord, the surrender of the lease was effective to enable the landlord immediately to assert the freehold title against the adverse possessor.

In registered land, under s 75 of the LRA 1925, we have seen that title was not extinguished by adverse possession, but instead was held on trust. By s 75(2), the adverse possessor was then entitled to apply to be 'registered as proprietor thereof'. A question arose as regards with what estate the adverse possessor should be registered: the freehold title acquired by the inception of adverse possession, or the leasehold estate held on trust by s 75(2)? This, in turn, appeared to affect the issue of the effectiveness of a surrender of the lease.

In the following case, Mrs David was the registered proprietor of a long lease granted by Spectrum Investment. The defendant had been in adverse possession against Mrs David and, following the expiration of the limitation period, applied for registration. The Registrar closed Mrs David's title and registered the defendant as proprietor of a new leasehold estate. In these circumstances, a surrender by Mrs David was considered to be ineffective. Browne-Wilkinson J held that, because the surrender of a lease is a registered disposition, it was clear that, once Mrs David's title had been closed, she lacked the ability to execute a surrender. Browne-Wilkinson J was satisfied that the registration of the defendant with a lease had been correct.

To my mind the words are clear and unequivocal: the squatter claims to have acquired a title to "a registered estate in the land" (i.e. the leasehold interest) and applies to be registered as a proprietor "thereof" (my emphasis). Therefore under section 75 (2), references to the squatter having acquired title to a registered estate must include the rights which under the Limitation Act 1939 the squatter acquires in relation to leasehold interests. Section 75 (2) then refers to the squatter applying to be registered as proprietor "thereof." This word can, in my judgment, only refer back to the registered estate in the land against which the squatter has acquired title under the Act of 1939, i.e. the leasehold interest. The clear words of the Act therefore seem to require that, once the 12 years have run, the squatter is entitled to be registered as proprietor of the lease itself, and is bound to be so registered if he applies for registration. It follows that in my judgment the defendant (as the squatter) is correctly registered as proprietor of the lease itself in accordance with the clear requirements of section 75. If that is right, Mrs. David cannot be entitled to rectification of the register as against the defendant, and she can therefore never get into a position in which she is competent to surrender the lease to the plaintiff.

Cooke identified difficulties with this result.

Cooke, 'Adverse Possession: Problems of Title in Registered Land'
(1994) 14 LS 1, 9

The decision in Spectrum is unsatisfactory, while being correct on its facts, and has generated much academic distress. So glaring an inconsistency with unregistered land is unfortunate in itself; from a practical point of view, it imposes on the parties a relationship of landlord and tenant which neither has chosen. It raises technical queries. What has happened, for example, to [the squatter's] independent fee simple, arising from his adverse possession of the land? He becomes the registered proprietor of the estate which the dispossessed owner held on trust for him; his fee simple has disappeared without trace.

Cooke argued that while Spectrum Investment was the correct decision on the facts, the registration of the adverse possessor with a leasehold title should not take place. She argued that the adverse possessor should be registered with a freehold title, to reflect the title acquired by possession. This prevented the relationship of landlord and tenant being forced upon the freeholder and adverse possessor.

In St Marylebone, Lord Radcliffe had also expressed doubt that the adverse possessor would be registered with the leasehold title.

[. . .] the trust of the dispossessed owner's title under subsection (1) must somehow be reconciled with the provision under subsection (2) for the squatter to apply to register his own title, which would presumably be his independent possessory title acquired by the adverse possession.

If the adverse possessor is registered with freehold title, then, as in unregistered land, the leasehold title continues to exist as between the landlord and dispossessed tenant, enabling the effective surrender of the lease.

But Browne-Wilkinson J's analysis of s 75 of the LRA 1925 was supported in a subsequent decision.

To split the leasehold interest after 12 years' adverse possession into an element related entirely to the freehold and another related solely to the squatter, as is now known to happen with unregistered land, does not seem to me to marry up with either the purpose or the operation of section 75(1). The squatter, unlike an underlessee, has no legal relationship at all with the leaseholder during the 12 initial years of trespass (except in the negative sense that the leaseholder may at any time evict him and claim damages); and at the end of the 12 years, by operation of law, the leaseholder's right and title to do even this are extinguished wherever the Limitation Acts apply. At law the squatter is then in a position to make a good title, independent of the lease, although always subject to the freeholder's eventual reversion. In relation to a registered leasehold, however, section 75 lifts the extinguishing effect of the Limitation Act 1980 and substitutes a trust of the leasehold interest, benefits and burdens alike, from the moment of extinction of the leasehold title. The squatter becomes entitled, without regard to merits, to be placed in the same relationship with the freeholder as had previously been enjoyed by the leaseholder. The trust preserves not the squatter's common law title but a new statutory right to be substituted by registration for the leaseholder—carrying with it, as Mr Nugee accepts, an obligation to indemnify the leaseholder against outgoings. This is to all appearances a statutory conveyance of the entire leasehold interest.

In that case, the question that arose was whether a tenant in registered land that had lost its title by adverse possession could surrender the lease prior to the adverse possessor becoming registered and, therefore, while the s 75 trust remained in existence. This possibility had not arisen on the facts of Spectrum Investment, although Browne-Wilkinson J had noted the possibility that the tenant may remain free to deal with the title during this period. In Kato Kagaku, the answer followed logically from the court's refusal to 'split' the estate. A surrender of the lease passed the leasehold title back to the freeholder, but subject to the adverse possessor's beneficial interest.

As we have seen, the LRA 2002 preserves the rights of adverse possessors who completed 12 years of adverse possession at the time that the Act came into force, but removes the s 75 trust. The transitional provision in Sch 12, para 18, confers on the adverse possessor an entitlement to be registered as the proprietor of 'the estate'. This appears to confirm the approach adopted in Spectrum Investment and Kato Kagaku in so far as the adverse possessor is entitled to be registered with the lease. Once registered, the factual position mirrors that in Spectrum Investment and therefore the possibility of a surrender by the dispossessed tenant is removed. Doubt may arise, however, as regards the position prior to registration. In the absence of a trust, there may be nothing to prevent the dispossessed proprietor executing a surrender of the lease.

As regards claims to adverse possession under the 2002 Act, the position is placed beyond doubt. Title remains vested in the tenant unless and until the adverse possessor successfully applies for registration under Sch 6. A successful application will result in the claimant being registered as proprietor of the lease,[107] thus again removing the possibility of a surrender.

7 CONCLUSION

The LRA 2002 brings the modern law of adverse possession in line with principles of registration of title. In so doing, its practical impact is to reduce the role of adverse possession and reduce the significance of concepts that have long underlined English land law: title by possession and relativity of title.

At the outset of our discussion of possession, we noted Green's suggestion that, in defining this concept, the case law is influenced by, and constructs, the concept of an ideal landowner. Green identifies the characteristics of that individual.

Green, 'Citizens and Squatters' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives
(eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, p 241)

> The ideal landowner constructed by the laws of adverse possession is clearly no threat to civilised society. On the contrary, he is settled and stable, and honours both man-made and natural laws. His cultivation involves hard work. The sturdy figure of the ideal English landowner as reflected and maintained in adverse possession law invests his physical, intellectual, and emotional energies in the ground: he has entirely committed himself, through his engagement with the earth, to his plot of land. He wants to be a fixture in the landscape. He fences his land and locks his gates in order to exclude those who might detract from his hard labour—addressing the world outside as well as the land within his boundaries.

Green draws comparisons between the ideal landowner and the ideal citizen. She notes that, by drawing an ideal, the law also has an exclusionary effect. Green highlights that the most successful adverse possessors are those who already own land (and, therefore, are already included) and are trying to extend their boundaries. The successful claimants in the leading cases of Pye v Graham and Moran clearly fit within this category. The least successful (on Green's analysis) are the 'have nots' who want to join the 'haves'. The unsuccessful claimant in Powell may be so described: he is presented in the court's judgment as a strong-willed rebellious teenager, acting despite (rather than in pursuance of) the wishes of his elderly, landowning grandparents.

Cobb and Fox further highlight the exclusionary effect of adverse possession.[108] They argue that, by setting the odds against claims, the LRA 2002 encourages urban squatters to lie low and not draw attention to their actions by applying for registration—that is, in this way, to live 'outside the system'.

While the practical role of adverse possession may therefore have been reduced and reformed by the 2002 Act, this is an area of law that continues to have resonance with important issues for land law and law in general: issues of ownership and use of land, and of inclusion and exclusion. Current debate remains centred on—and perhaps polarized by—the spectre of those who take possession of residential buildings. In 2010 the government published new guidance for property owners affected by adverse possession.[109] In 2011, following consultation, the government announced plans to introduce a new criminal offence of squatting in residential buildings.[110]

QUESTIONS

1. What do you understand by the concepts of 'title by possession', 'relativity of title', and the 'extinguishment' of a title by limitations?
2. To what extent are the concepts in the above question compatible with registration of title? Consider how any differences that may you identify are reflected in the operation of adverse possession in registered land.
3. How is adverse possession established? To what extent is this dependent on the intention of the adverse possessor and the paper owner/registered proprietor?
4. Do you consider the maintenance of rules of adverse possession to be justified?

PART C2

THE ACQUISITION OF AN EQUITABLE INTEREST IN LAND

THE DOCTRINE OF ANTICIPATION: WALSH V LONSDALE

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Equitable rights arise under the doctrine of anticipation where parties enter a specifically enforceable contract for the creation or transfer of legal estates and interests in land.
2. The doctrine is based on the maxim 'equity looks on as done that which ought to be done'. The availability of specific performance is the trigger for the application of the doctrine as providing the basis upon which the contract 'ought' to be performed.
3. Where the contract is for the transfer of an existing estate (the sale of a freehold or assignment of a lease), the effect of the doctrine is to separate legal and equitable entitlement to the same estate. The vendor therefore holds the estate on constructive trust for the purchaser, although the trust has some unusual features.
4. The doctrine of anticipation is of practical significance, in particular in determining the rights and duties of parties during the course of a transaction. Its application is, however, in decline and will be further curtailed on the eventual introduction of e-conveyancing.

1 INTRODUCTION

In this chapter, we consider how equitable interests may arise through the application of the maxim 'equity looks on as done that which ought to be done'. The acquisition of equitable rights through this maxim is attributed to the decision in Walsh v Lonsdale,[1] although it has been afforded a much broader application than the specific context in which it was applied in that case. It is sometimes referred to as the 'doctrine of conversion', but we have adopted the nomenclature of the 'doctrine of anticipation' as a clearer description of the basis for the acquisition of rights.

The doctrine applies where a party is under a duty to grant another a legal property right, but has not yet done so. Equity anticipates the grant of those legal rights by conferring on the intended grantee an equitable interest mirroring the legal right in question. These equitable rights are generally temporal in duration, existing only in the period between the time at which legal rights 'ought' to be granted and the time at which such rights are, in fact, granted. But the rights are practically important, both in determining the rights and obligations of the grantor and grantee during this period, and in providing the grantee with proprietary rights that may be enforceable against third parties (under the priority rules discussed in Part D) prior to the completion of the legal grant.

2 WALSH V LONSDALE IN CONTEXT

Walsh v Lonsdale
(1882) LR 21 Ch D 9, CA

Facts: Lonsdale agreed to grant a lease of a mill to Walsh for seven years. The rent payable depended on the number of looms operated, but this was subject to a minimum number and rent based on that number was payable yearly in advance. No lease was granted, but Walsh moved in and started paying rent quarterly in arrears. Lonsdale demanded payment in advance and levied distress for non-payment of rent. Whether Lonsdale had acted lawfully in doing so depended on whether the terms of the parties' agreement were enforceable.

Jessel MR

There is an agreement for a lease under which possession has been given. Now since the Judicature Act the possession is held under the agreement. There are not two estates as there were formerly, one estate at common law by reason of the payment of the rent from year to year, and an estate in equity under the agreement. There is only one Court, and the equity rules prevail in it. The tenant holds under an agreement for a lease. He holds, therefore, under the same terms in equity as if a lease had been granted, it being a case in which both parties admit that relief is capable of being given by specific performance. That being so, he cannot complain of the exercise by the landlord of the same rights as the landlord would have had if a lease had been granted. On the other hand, he is protected in the same way as if a lease had been granted; he cannot be turned out by six months' notice as a tenant from year to year.

The context of the case lies in the merger of law and equity by the Judicature Acts 1873–75. The specific issue was the effect of the Acts on the position of a tenant who moves into possession and starts to pay rent in the absence of a formally granted lease. At common law, such facts gave rise to an implied periodic tenancy. If such a tenancy was present on the facts of the case, then Walsh was only liable for rent in arrears (as had been paid) and Lonsdale's distress for non-payment of rent in advance was illegal. In equity, it was already established that the effect of the maxim 'equity looks on as done that which ought to be done' was that the parties would be treated as though the lease had been granted,[2] with the effect that all of the terms of the parties' agreement were enforceable. Applying the Judicature Acts, the Court gave precedence to equity's analysis. The agreement for the grant of a legal lease created an equitable lease under which the parties were bound by the same terms as their intended grant. Jessel MR's judgment is generally considered to be too broad a statement of the effect of the Judicature Acts,[3] although the doctrine of anticipation attributed to the case is well established and beyond doubt.

The principle espoused in the case has significance beyond the factual context of an agreement to grant a lease. The doctrine applies in two distinct circumstances.[4] The first, exemplified by Walsh v Lonsdale, is a contract to create a lease (a new legal estate) or to assign an existing legal interest.

Hopkins, The Informal Acquisition of Rights in Land (2000, p 63)

> [In Walsh v Lonsdale, the] uncompleted sale of the legal lease became the source for the creation of a lease in equity. Similarly, specifically enforceable contracts to create an interest in land are treated as creating the corresponding interest in equity. Hence, for example, a specifically enforceable contract to create a legal easement creates an equitable easement; a specifically enforceable contract to create a legal mortgage creates an equitable mortgage. In the same way, effect will be given to a specifically enforceable contract to transfer an existing legal interest.

The second situation in which the doctrine in Walsh v Lonsdale applies is an agreement for the sale of an existing legal estate: the transfer of a freehold or assignment of an existing lease. Its application in this situation is of particular practical significance, because it means that the doctrine is invoked as part of the usual conveyancing process for the sale and purchase of land. As we have seen in Chapter 7, the typical conveyance of land is divided into three stages: the entry into a contract for sale; execution of the contract by transfer of title; the application by the purchaser for registration. Legal title does not pass until registration. The doctrine of anticipation, however, operates as soon as there is a specifically enforceable contract.[5] From that time, equity treats the parties as though the contract has been executed.

Oakley explains the effect of the doctrine in this situation.

[2] Parker v Taswell (1858) 2 De G & J 559.

[3] In upholding the use of a legal remedy (distress) for rent payable under an equitable lease, the decision is considered to go beyond mere procedural fusion generally attributed to the Judicature Acts. On this aspect of the case, see Sparkes, 'Walsh v Lonsdale: The Non-Fusion Fallacy' (1988) 8 OJLS 350.

[4] Hopkins, The Informal Acquisition of Rights in Land (2000), pp 62–5.

[5] Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499. The equitable interest created by the doctrine arises when the vendor makes title according to the contract, or the purchaser agrees to accept the vendor's title, but is then backdated to the time of the contract. See further Oakley, Constructive Trusts (3rd edn, 1997), pp 282–5.

Oakley, Constructive Trusts (3rd edn, 1997, p 275)

> [The] effect of the operation of the doctrine is to separate the legal and beneficial ownership of the property and it is only to be expected that equity therefore regards the vendor as a trustee of the property for the purchaser pending performance of the contract. No corresponding trust of the purchase money will arise simply because such a trust would lack the necessary certainty of subject matter. However, the vendor acquires a lien or charge on the property for the unpaid purchase money.

The trust is generally classified as a constructive trust. The nature of the trust changes once the purchase money has been paid in full, at the second stage of the usual conveyancing process—that is, the execution of the contract. At that stage, the vendor ceases to have any charge or lien on the property, and the trust becomes a bare trust.

In principle, the doctrine of anticipation applies equally to contracts relating to equitable interests.[6] Where the contract is for the sale of an existing beneficial interest, the application of the doctrine creates a sub-trust.

The doctrine of anticipation has also been applied where the duty to grant a property right has arisen otherwise than under a contract: for example, where a court orders a transfer of property and the transfer has not yet taken place.[7]

3 THE SIGNIFICANCE OF SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE

For the doctrine of anticipation to apply, it must be established that the parties' agreement is capable of specific performance. The availability of specific performance renders the execution of a contract inevitable and is the basis upon which equity considers that the agreement 'ought' to be performed. Not all specifically enforceable agreements that relate to land attract the application of the doctrine. It applies only to specifically enforceable contracts to create a recognized proprietary right in land.

The distinction between a contract relating to land and a contract creating, or transferring, a proprietary right in land has been noted in Chapter 7, section 3.1. Specific performance is not capable of turning a personal right into a proprietary right. This point is explained, in relation to the doctrine of anticipation, in the following extract.

McFarlane, 'Identifying Property Rights: A Reply to Mr Watt' [2003] Conv 473, 474

> It is important to distinguish between two different senses in which the availability of specific performance is said to be relevant to the proprietary status of a right. The first is under a generally accepted equitable doctrine, which can be called the "doctrine of anticipation". Where A enters a contract with B to confer a recognised property right on B, if specific performance of that contract is available, then B can gain an equitable equivalent of that property right

6 The leading authority is Oughtred v IRC [1960] AC 206, which concerned a contract for sale of the beneficial interest under a trust of personal property (shares in a private company) rather than land. The application of the doctrine to equitable interests is not without controversy and is discussed by Oakley (1997), pp 278–80 and Hopkins (2000), pp 65–8.

7 Mountney v Treharne [2003] Ch 135.

which takes effect before, and continues in the absence of, the contemplated conferral of the right by A. This doctrine is irrelevant when it comes to determining the proprietary status of a particular right, as it depends for its operation on A's being under a binding obligation to confer on B a right which is independently recognised as proprietary. Indeed, the doctrine of anticipation is concerned only with the methods by which property rights can be acquired: it allows such a right to be claimed without A's completing the planned transaction. The doctrine thus extends the list of means by which property rights can be acquired, not the list of rights which have proprietary status. Hence, as Swadling has emphasised, the doctrine of anticipation cannot, by itself, be used to confer proprietary status on rights otherwise regarded as personal.

An agreement to create or transfer a legal estate or interest will be specifically enforceable if three requirements are met. Firstly, there must be a valid contract. This means that there must be a contract that meets the formality requirements of s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989), as discussed in Chapter 7.

Secondly, consideration must have been provided; specific performance is an equitable remedy and equity does not assist a volunteer.

Thirdly, the circumstances must not reveal a defence to an action for specific performance. Defences include mistake (by the party seeking specific performance), undue hardship caused by ordering performance, impossibility of an order being complied with, delay, and misconduct. In particular, the party claiming specific performance must not have acted inequitably, because 'he who seeks the assistance of equity must come to court with clean hands'.

The dependence of the doctrine of anticipation on the availability of specific performance means that no rights are acquired until the requirements of specific performance are met. Moreover, once acquired, the rights remain dependent on the continuing availability of specific performance. This appears to make the equitable rights precarious: in particular, they are vulnerable to challenge through the intervention of a defence. In the contemporary context, the defences of hardship and impossibility may come to the fore where, for example, job loss after a contract has been entered results in the withdrawal of mortgage finance required for a purchase.[8]

The precarious nature of such rights leads Gardner to doubt that the ongoing availability of specific performance can, in fact, be a requirement of the doctrine.[9]

Gardner, 'Equity, Estate Contracts and the Judicature Acts: Walsh v Lonsdale Revisited' (1987) 7 OJLS 60, 64–5 and 74

According to the orthodoxy, then, the subsistence of estate contracts [acquired under Walsh v Lonsdale] is circumscribed at two levels: first, by the law of contract in general; and secondly, within that, by the law on the remedy of specific performance in particular. Now it is fundamentally implausible that a property right could be constituted in this way. The law of contract, with its doctrine of privity, is obviously at variance with the in rem quality of a proprietary interest; and the injection of the parameters of specific performance into its definition

8 For discussion of recent cases raising these defences see Dowling 'Vendors' Application for Specific Performance' [2011] Conv 208.

9 A view shared by McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), pp 235–7 and 705.

would give it an intermittent, discretionary nature quite at odds with the stability which is needed in an institution which has to be capable of recognition and application other than ad hoc and inter partes. This was the message of Lord Wilberforce's classic dictum that a property right must be 'definable, identifiable by third parties, capable in its nature of assumption by third parties, and have some degree of permanence and stability'.

[...] The applications of estate contracts are wide and varied. They involve many of considerable importance as property interests, for which a high degree of stability is of the essence. And the more applications to which they are put, the more they take on the aspect of a wholly pervasive institution, so conducing to their application in yet further contexts, in a self-propelling development. Overall, the doctrinal load which they have come to be expected—indeed, known—to bear is so large and multifarious that it appears in large measure to have been found incompatible with the maintenance of the orthodox requirement that specific performance must be available between the present parties in their present question. The proprietary nature which estate contracts are in practice evidently conceived to possess is fundamentally irreconcilable with the orthodoxy, and in reality is rather commonly upheld at the latter's expense.

Gardner suggests that rather than the interest acquired under the doctrine of anticipation being dependent on the availability of specific performance, the relationship between the two is reversed: specific performance is available to vindicate the right acquired under Walsh v Lonsdale, which is itself derived from another source.[10] Gardner's concern with the precarious nature of a right dependent upon the continuing availability of specific performance appears to be a legitimate one—but it begs the question: if the doctrine is not dependent on specific performance, on what basis 'ought' an agreement be performed?

Hopkins suggests that, other than specific performance, an agreement ought to be performed where the purchaser has paid the consideration in full.

Hopkins, The Informal Acquisition of Rights in Land (2000, pp 74–5)

For a contract to be specifically enforceable, it is necessary for the purchaser to have provided some consideration. The rights and obligations of the parties change when the purchaser has paid the consideration in full. This change can be illustrated by reference to the sale of a legal estate. On the conventional analysis, once full payment is made, the vendor becomes a bare trustee of the land for the purchaser, and the purchaser is entitled to any benefit derived from the land. [...] It is submitted that the effect of full payment of consideration by the purchaser is now twofold. [...] Secondly the purchaser's right is no longer dependent upon specific performance. This is significant because the absence of the need to rely on specific performance removes the element of precariousness that otherwise characterises the purchaser's right. Before full payment of consideration, it is the availability of specific performance that enables the application of equity's maxim "equity regards as done that which ought to be done" by demonstrating that the contract "ought" to be performed. However, once the consideration has been paid, the fact of full payment itself provides a sufficient basis to assert that the contract "ought" to be performed.

10 Gardner, 'Equity, Estate Contracts and the Judicature Acts: Walsh v Lonsdale Revisited' (1987) 7 OJLS 60, 74.

The purpose of Hopkins' analysis is twofold. Firstly, he argues that a right acquired under the doctrine of anticipation that is initially dependent on the availability of specific performance of a contract may mature and cease to be so dependent once full consideration is paid. Secondly, he suggests that the doctrine of anticipation may apply where a purchaser provides full consideration in the absence of a valid contract. Payment pursuant to an oral agreement may also reveal the elements of a claim to proprietary estoppel—but an ability to claim rights under the doctrine of anticipation would be advantageous. In particular, as we have seen in Chapter 7, doubt exists as to the availability of estoppel where a contract for sale of land is invalid for non-compliance with s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989.

Full payment of consideration undoubtedly has an effect on the nature of the rights acquired under the doctrine of anticipation: for example, in rendering the vendor a bare trustee. It has not, however, had the wider impact advocated by Hopkins.[11] In particular, in Lloyds Bank plc v Carrick[12] (a case that is discussed further below), the Court of Appeal rejected an argument that a right acquired by entering a specifically enforceable contract ceased to be dependent on that contract once the consideration had been paid in full. Despite Gardner's analysis of the case law demonstrating to the contrary, the orthodox view remains that rights acquired under the doctrine of anticipation are dependent on the parties' contract and, therefore, on the continuing availability of specific performance of that contract.

4 THE NATURE OF THE RIGHTS ACQUIRED

As we have seen, the type of right acquired under the doctrine of anticipation is dependent on the nature of the agreement from which they are derived. Where the agreement concerns the creation of a lease or of an interest in land, the purchaser obtains the equitable equivalent of the intended right: an agreement for a lease gives rise to an equitable lease and an agreement for a mortgage gives rise to an equitable mortgage, etc. Where the agreement is for the transfer of an existing legal estate, the effect of the doctrine is that the estate is held on trust for the purchaser. In all cases, the right acquired is distinct from the legal right intended to be granted. This is readily apparent where the effect of the doctrine is to create a trust and so the contract for sale of the legal estate creates an equitable interest. It is less apparent, although is still the case, where the doctrine confers the equitable equivalent of the intended right.

In Walsh v Lonsdale, in the extract from his judgment above, Jessel MR considered that the parties hold under the same terms as if a lease had been granted. In Chan v Cresdon Proprietary Ltd,[13] the High Court of Australia emphasized that the equitable lease acquired is a distinct proprietary right from the legal lease that the tenant has contracted to buy. In that case, in the context of an intended grant of a legal lease to a tenant, the appellants agreed to act as guarantors for the tenant's obligations 'under this lease'. No legal lease was granted, because registration provisions had not been complied with. On the assumption that an equitable lease arose under the doctrine of anticipation, the Court held that the appellants were not liable as guarantors. The equitable lease was distinct from the legal lease and therefore obligations arising under it did not arise 'under this lease'.

Two further issues arise as regards the nature of the right acquired: firstly, the basis upon which rights acquired under the doctrine are enforceable against third parties; secondly, where the doctrine is given effect by the creation of a trust, the rights and obligations of the parties under the trust.

4.1 ENFORCEABILITY OF RIGHTS AGAINST THIRD PARTIES

As we have seen, on an orthodox approach, rights acquired under the doctrine of anticipation are dependent upon the existence of a contract and on the availability of specific performance of that contract. Similarly—at least, in most instances—the enforcement of the rights against third parties is dependent on the enforceability of the contract. A contract to convey or create a legal estate is an estate contract—itself a property right capable of binding third parties under the priority rules discussed in Part D of this book. In registered land, estate contracts may be enforceable against third parties by entry of a Land Registry notice or as an overriding interest where the beneficiary of the contract is in actual occupation; in unregistered land, estate contracts are registrable as a Class C(iv) land charge.[14] Hence, where the doctrine of anticipation applies, there may be two proprietary rights: the estate contract and the equitable rights acquired under the doctrine. At least as regards the enforcement of the rights against third parties, however, it seems that the latter has no existence independent from the former.

Where the contract is for the creation of a lease or a legal interest (such as an easement or mortgage), this may make little practical difference, because the priority rules applicable to the equitable easement or mortgage are the same as those applicable to an estate contract.[15] The difference is more evident in a contract for sale of an existing legal estate, where the doctrine of anticipation gives rise to a trust. The priority rules applicable to beneficial interests under a trust differ from those applicable to the underlying estate contract.

Lloyds Bank plc v Carrick
(1997) 73 P & CR 314, CA

Facts: Following the death of her husband, Mrs Carrick agreed to buy the remaining term of a lease of a maisonette from Mr Carrick, her brother-in-law. The agreement was specifically enforceable and Mrs Carrick had paid the full purchase price, but no assignment of the lease had been executed. Mr Carrick subsequently used the lease as security for a loan. On his default, the bank argued that Mrs Carrick's interest constituted an estate contract, which (the land being unregistered) was void against it for non-registration as a land charge.

Morritt LJ

At 320–2

Thus the issue argued on this appeal was whether Mrs Carrick had an interest in the maisonette separate and distinct from that which arose under the unregistered estate contract

[14] Land Charges Act 1972, s 2(4)(iv); Land Registration Act 2002, ss 32–39 and Sch 3. For full discussion of these priority rules, see Part D.

[15] In unregistered land, differences may arise in relation to the category of registrable land charge in issue. An equitable easement acquired under the doctrine of anticipation may be registered under Class D(iii) and an equitable mortgage under Class C(iii). In both cases, however, registration of the contract under Class C(iv) is also possible in the alternative. See Hopkins (2000), p 72.

> which was capable of binding the Bank as successor in title to Mr Carrick. For Mrs Carrick it was submitted that she did. [...]
> The argument for Mrs Carrick relied on the relative position at law and in equity as I have described it to found the argument that such an absolute equitable interest was not itself registrable but bound the bank as they had constructive notice of it. Counsel for Mrs Carrick accepted that such interest came or started from the contract but, he contended, it matured into an interest separate and distinct from the contract as soon as the purchase price was paid in full.
> For my part I am unable to accept this analysis. The payment of £19,000 by Mrs Carrick to Mr Carrick did not as such and without more give her any interest in the maisonette. Nor, prior to the conclusion of the contract, were the circumstances such that Mrs Carrick could assert that her brother-in-law held the maisonette on any trust for her benefit. The source and origin of the trust was the contract; the payment of the price by Mrs Carrick served only to make it a bare trust by removing any beneficial interest of Mr Carrick. Section 4(6) of the Land Charges Act 1972 avoids that contract as against the bank. The result, in my judgment, must be that Mrs Carrick is unable to establish the bare trust as against the bank for it has no existence except as the equitable consequence of the contract. Accordingly I reject the contention founded on the bare trust. [...]
> In this case there was a trust of the maisonette for the benefit of Mrs Carrick precisely because there had been an agreement between her and Mr Carrick which, for her part, she had substantially if not wholly performed. As between her and Mr Carrick such trust subsisted at all times after November 1982. I agree with counsel for the bank that there is no room in those circumstances for the implication or imposition of any further trust of the maisonette for the benefit of Mrs Carrick.

The enforcement of Mrs Carrick's interest acquired under the doctrine of anticipation was therefore wholly dependent on the priority rules applicable to estate contracts, not those applicable to trusts. On the facts, Mrs Carrick's interest was void against the bank because she had not registered her estate contract as a Class C(iv) land charge. In this respect, rights acquired under the doctrine of anticipation appear parasitic in nature: they are dependent for their enforceability on the underlying contract from which they are derived. Further, the Court held that the existence of the estate contract precluded Mrs Carrick from seeking to establish property rights under other equitable doctrines, including estoppel (discussed in Chapter 10) and the common intention constructive trust (discussed in Chapter 16). Because interests arising under these doctrines would have been binding against the bank, the existence of the contract, and the consequent application of the doctrine of anticipation, left Mrs Carrick in a worse position than would otherwise have been the case.[16]

4.2 THE NATURE OF THE TRUST

As we have seen, where parties enter into a contract to convey an existing legal estate the effect of the doctrine of anticipation is to separate legal and equitable entitlement to the same estate. In such cases, the vendor has generally been regarded as becoming constructive trustee for the purchaser. The trust has been described as being 'of an extremely unusual

16 A point acknowledged by the court: Lloyds Bank plc v Carrick (1997) 73 P & CR 314, 322. For further discussion, see Ferguson, 'Estate Contracts, Constructive Trusts and the Land Charges Act' (1996) 112 LQR 549.

nature'.[17] Until full payment of the purchase money on completion, the trustee (the vendor) remains in possession, has a significant interest in the land, is entitled to income generated from the land, and is responsible for outgoings. The purchaser (the beneficiary under the trust) becomes entitled to capital benefits, such as any increase in the value of the land. In principle, risks pass to the purchaser, although these may be passed back to the vendor by the terms of the contract.[18]

The trust therefore serves a very practical role in determining the respective rights and obligations of the parties during the period of the transaction, but, as Harpum notes, it is an inelegant mechanism with which to do so.

Harpum, 'The Uses and Abuses of Constructive Trusts: The Experience of England and Wales' (1997) 1 Edin LR 437, 457

> Of course English law will not now abandon the constructive trust that arises out of a specifically enforceable contract. It is of ancient origin and is too much part of the weft and warp of our conveyancing law. In practice it is workable if inelegant. But it is not a cloth that any legal system would weave if it was starting de novo.

Viewed in the broader context of the doctrine of anticipation, the imposition of the trust creates a lack of doctrinal cohesion. The application of the same doctrine has a different effect depending on the type of contract entered. Only in those situations in which a constructive trust is imposed does the doctrine create fiduciary obligations.

It is difficult to justify why a contract to assign an existing lease places the vendor under fiduciary obligations to the purchaser as constructive trustee, while a contract to grant a new lease (such as that in Walsh v Lonsdale) does not. The basis for the imposition of the constructive trust (as is acknowledged by Oakley) is simply the division of legal and equitable entitlement to the same estate.[19] In Westdeutsche Landesbank Gorozentrale v Islington LBC,[20] the House of Lords denied that the division of entitlement necessarily requires a trust.

Hopkins suggests that the case may be used to rationalize the doctrine of anticipation.

Hopkins, The Informal Acquisition of Rights in Land (2000, pp 64–5)

> Following Westdeutsche Landesbank Gorozentrale v. Islington L.B.C., it is no longer necessary to see the imposition of fiduciary obligations as the inevitable consequence of the division of legal and equitable entitlement. [. . .] there are circumstances in which it is appropriate to accept that legal and equitable title is divided without the imposition of fiduciary obligations. However, adopting a broad definition, such situations could still be described as involving a trust. It may be more appropriate to treat the division of title that occurs by entering a specifically enforceable contract to sell a legal estate as not imposing fiduciary obligations. This would provide conceptual coherence to the application of equity's maxim by ensuring that the consequence of intervention is the same in all situations in which the rule is applied. In all situations, the purchaser acquires an equitable interest corresponding to the right he has contracted to buy. Where this results in the division of legal and equitable title to an estate, a form of trust may be imposed, but the vendor will not necessarily be placed under any fiduciary obligation towards the purchaser.

It may be questioned whether this solution, in fact, provides the rationalization that Hopkins suggests. It removes the initial disparity caused by the imposition of fiduciary obligations in those situations in which the doctrine of anticipation triggers the imposition of a constructive trust—but, for so long as a trust is in place, the subsequent imposition of such obligations remains possible. Indeed, Hopkins suggests that fiduciary obligations should arise at the point in time that consideration has been paid in full, where the trust becomes a bare trust.[21] Arguably, full doctrinal cohesion could only be obtained by taking the doctrine outside the scope of constructive trusts. As Harpum acknowledges (in his comment quoted above), the trust is now too embedded in English law to do so.

5 CONCLUSION

The doctrine of anticipation applies where a party is under a duty to grant another a legal property right, but has not yet done so. The effect of the doctrine, reflecting the maxim 'equity looks on as done that which ought to be done', is to create equitable proprietary rights mirroring the legal rights that 'ought' to be granted. The doctrine is of practical significance in determining the rights and obligations of parties between contract and the grant of the legal right in question. The equitable rights created are unusual in two respects: firstly, on the orthodox view, they are precarious in their nature as dependent on the continuing availability of specific performance; secondly, their ability to bind third parties is dependent upon the enforceability of the underlying estate contract.

Despite its practical significance, the application of the doctrine in the context of contractual duties is in decline. Its scope has already been curtailed by s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989. Only contracts that comply with the formality requirements provided in that section are capable of specific performance and therefore attract the application of the doctrine. In particular, this prevents the doctrine from applying to oral agreements.[22]

Eventually the utility of the doctrine will be further curtailed by the introduction of e-conveyancing, though we have seen in Chapter 7 that this is currently on hold. When e-conveyancing is introduced, it will remove the 'registration gap' that currently exists between completion and registration—that is, the period during which the parties' rights are currently based on a bare trust subsisting under the doctrine of anticipation. The application of the doctrine will then be limited to the period between entry into a specifically enforceable contract and simultaneous completion/registration.

21 Hopkins (2000), pp 74–5.

22 A direct consequence of the 1989 Act was to prevent the doctrine of anticipation from being used to create an equitable mortgage by the deposit of title deeds—a previously common form of creating temporary security for a loan or overdraft: United Bank of Kuwait plc v Sahib [1996] 3 WLR 472.

QUESTIONS

1. Assess the relationship between the doctrine of anticipation and specific performance. Is there any other basis upon which an agreement 'ought' to be performed?
2. Compare and contrast the operation of the doctrine of anticipation to the following contracts: (i) a contract to grant a new lease; and (ii) a contract to assign an existing lease.
3. Assess the role of the constructive trust in the operation of the doctrine of anticipation.

PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Proprietary estoppel is a means, originally developed by courts of equity, by which a party (B) can gain some protection against an owner of land (A), even if he or she has no contract with A and even if A has not formally given B a property right in relation to A's land. That protection consists of A coming under a duty to B. This means that, in some cases at least, proprietary estoppel is a means by which B can acquire a property right in land.
2. It is important to distinguish proprietary estoppel from other forms of estoppel. As we will see in the first section of this chapter, proprietary estoppel is not merely a means by which B can prevent A from asserting a right against B, or by which B can prevent A from denying that B already has a right. Rather, proprietary estoppel is an independent means by which B can acquire a right against A: it can be used not only as a 'shield' to defend B from A, but also as a 'sword' to impose a duty on A to B.
3. To make a successful proprietary estoppel clam, B must show that each of three key requirements has been satisfied. First, A assured B that B already has a right in relation to A's land, or that B will get such a right in the future. Second, B reasonably relied on A's assurance. Third, B would now suffer a detriment if A were not under a duty to B. We will examine each of these requirements in the second section. We will also consider the suggestion that there is a further, fourth requirement: that A must be shown to have acted unconscionably.
4. If B makes a successful proprietary estoppel claim, a question then arises as to the extent of the right acquired by B. In other words, what is the content of A's duty to B? For example, will A necessarily be under a duty to honour the assurance made to B? We will examine this question below, in section 3.
5. Having established the content of A's duty to B, we then need to work out the effect of B's right on third parties. For example, if B successfully claims a proprietary estoppel against A, will it ever be possible for B to rely on that same claim against C, a party who later acquires A's land? And, to answer that question, do we simply apply the content question, as outlined in Chapter 5, and ask if the content of A's duty to B is such that B has a recognised equitable interest in A's land? Or are there special rules, that apply only to cases of proprietary estoppel? We will examine these questions in section 4 of this chapter.

1 INTRODUCTION: THE NATURE OF PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL

The term 'estoppel' can be confusing. In law, there are many different forms of estoppel but, in general, the term is used to refer to situations in which a party is prevented—that is, stopped or, in old French, estopped—from denying the truth of a particular matter of fact or law. In general, then, we would not expect an estoppel, by itself, to give B a right against A; at most, it could assist B in acquiring a right, by preventing A from denying one of the matters of fact or law that B may have to establish to acquire a right. This is certainly true of two important forms of estoppel: estoppel by representation (which prevents A, sometimes only temporarily, from denying the truth of a representation of existing fact or law made to B, where B has relied on that representation);[1] and promissory estoppel (which prevents A from enforcing an existing right against B, where A has promised not to do so and where B would suffer a detriment if A were allowed to enforce his right).[2]

There is, however, a fundamental difference between proprietary estoppel and each of estoppel by representation and promissory estoppel. The difference is that, unlike the other two forms of estoppel, proprietary estoppel can, by itself, give B a right against A. As Lord Denning MR once put it: 'there are estoppels and estoppels. Some do give rise to a cause of action. Some do not. In the species of estoppel called proprietary estoppel, it does give rise to a cause of action…The new rights and interests, so created by estoppel, in or over land, will be protected by the courts and in this way give rise to a cause of action.'[3] In other words, proprietary estoppel, unlike the other two forms of estoppel, is relevant to the acquisition question.

This special feature of proprietary estoppel was recently confirmed by the House of Lords, as can be seen in the following extract.

Thorner v Major [2009] UKHL 18, [2009] 3 All ER 945

Facts: Peter Thorner owned Steart Farm, by the village of Cheddar in Somerset. David Thorner, whose father was a cousin of Peter, worked on that farm, for Peter, for 30 years. David was not paid for that work. He also worked on his parents' farm, and his parents gave him accommodation and pocket money. As a result of working for both his parents and Peter, David worked very long hours. David believed that, on Peter's death, he would inherit Steart Farm. There was no explicit promise or assurance by Peter to David, but David's belief developed over a period of 15 years and was encouraged by Peter's conduct. For example, in 1990, Peter gave David a bonus notice relating to two assurance policies on Peter's life, saying 'That's for my death duties'. As a result of his belief that he would inherit the farm, David continued to work for Peter and did not pursue other opportunities. Peter did in fact make a will leaving the farm to David. However, that will also gave specific sums of money to other individuals; when Peter later fell out with some of those individuals, he destroyed his will. Unfortunately, Peter died without making a new will and so his property, including the farm, passed not to David but to the closer relatives of Peter who, by statute, received his estate on the event of his intestacy.

David made a claim against Peter's estate, claiming that, when Peter died, he was under a duty, arising as a result of proprietary estoppel, to leave the farm to David. The first instance judge found in favour of David and ordered that Peter (and so now Peter's estate) was under a duty to transfer Steart Farm to David. For these purposes the farm included the land and buildings, worth around £2.4 million, as well as other farm assets (e.g. machinery and live stock), worth an additional £650,000 or so, plus whatever limited amount of working capital was credited to the farm's trading accounts at the time of Peter's death.

The Court of Appeal, however, held that David had no proprietary estoppel claim. Before the House of Lords, the argument centred on two issues. First, had Peter made an assurance that was capable of giving rise to a proprietary estoppel? Second, if such an assurance was made, was the land to which it related adequately identified? Each of these issues was decided in David's favour, and the House of Lords thus restored the order of the first instance judge that Peter's estate was under a duty to transfer Steart Farm to David.

Lord Walker

At [29]–[30]

This appeal is concerned with proprietary estoppel [. . .] most scholars agree that the doctrine is based on three main elements, although they express them in slightly different terms: a representation or assurance made to the claimant; reliance on it by the claimant; and detriment to the claimant in consequence of his (reasonable) reliance.[4]

This appeal raises two issues. The first and main issue concerns the character or quality of the representation or assurance made to the claimant. The other (which could be regarded as a subsidiary part of the main issue, but was argued before your Lordships as a separate point) is whether, if the other elements for proprietary estoppel are established, the claimant must fail if the land to which the assurance relates has been inadequately identified, or has undergone a change (in its situation or extent) during the period between the giving of the assurance and its eventual repudiation.

At [55]–[57]

The present appeal is not of course a case of acquiescence (or standing-by). David does not assert that he can rely on money which he has spent on the farm, or improvements which he has made to it. His case is based on Peter's assurances to him. But if all proprietary estoppel cases (including cases of acquiescence or standing-by) are to be analysed in terms of assurance, reliance and detriment, then the landowner's conduct in standing by in silence serves as the element of assurance [. . .]

I would prefer to say (while conscious that it is a thoroughly question-begging formulation) that to establish a proprietary estoppel the relevant assurance must be clear enough. What amounts to sufficient clarity, in a case of this sort, is hugely dependent on context. I respectfully concur in the way Hoffmann LJ put it in Walton v Walton (in which the mother's 'stock phrase' to her son, who had worked for low wages on her farm since he left school at fifteen, was 'You can't have more money and a farm one day'). Hoffmann LJ stated:[5]

[4] [The books quoted by Lord Walker were Harpum et al (eds) Megarry & Wade's Law of Real Property (London:Sweet & Maxwell, 7th edn, 2008), para 16–001; Gray & Gray, Elements of Land Law (Oxford:OUP, 5th edn, 2009), para 9.2.8; McGhee et al (eds), Snell's Equity (31st edn, 2005), paras 10–16 and 10–19; and Gardner, An Introduction to Land Law (Oxford:Hart, 2007), para 7.1.1.

> 'The promise must be unambiguous and must appear to have been intended to be taken seriously. Taken in its context, it must have been a promise which one might reasonably expect to be relied upon by the person to whom it was made.'[6]

At [60]–[66]

I respectfully consider that the Court of Appeal did not give sufficient weight to the advantage that the trial judge had in seeing and hearing the witnesses. They concentrated too much, I think, on the 1990 incident of the bonus notice. That was certainly an important part of the narrative. For David it marked the transition from hope to expectation. But it did not stand alone. The evidence showed a continuing pattern of conduct by Peter for the remaining 15 years of his life and it would not be helpful to try to break down that pattern into discrete elements (and then treat each as being, on its own, insignificant). To my mind the deputy judge did find that Peter's assurances, objectively assessed, were intended to be taken seriously and to be relied on.[7] In the end it is a short point; I do not think that there was sufficient reason for the Court of Appeal to reverse the trial judge's careful findings and conclusion. I do not share the Court of Appeal's apparent apprehension that floodgates might be opened, because cases like this are fairly rare, and trial judges realise the need to subject the evidence (whether as to assurances, as to reliance or as to detriment) to careful, and sometimes sceptical, scrutiny [...]

The identity of the farm

In my opinion it is a necessary element of proprietary estoppel that the assurances given to the claimant (expressly or impliedly, or, in standing-by cases, tacitly) should relate to identified property owned (or, perhaps, about to be owned) by the defendant. That is one of the main distinguishing features between the two varieties of equitable estoppel, that is promissory estoppel and proprietary estoppel. The former must be based on an existing legal relationship (usually a contract, but not necessarily a contract relating to land). The latter need not be based on an existing legal relationship, but it must relate to identified property (usually land) owned (or, perhaps, about to be owned) by the defendant. It is the relation to identified land of the defendant that has enabled proprietary estoppel to develop as a sword, and not merely a shield: see Lord Denning MR in Crabb v Arun DC.

In this case the deputy judge made a clear finding of an assurance by Peter that David would become entitled to Steart Farm. The first, 'watershed' assurance was made in 1990 at about the time that Peter made an advantageous sale of one field for development purposes, and used part (but not the whole) of the proceeds to buy more agricultural land, so increasing the farm to the maximum at about 582 acres (some merely tenanted by Peter) which Peter farmed in 1992. Both Peter and David knew that the extent of the farm was liable to fluctuate (as development opportunities arose, and tenancies came and went). There is no reason to doubt that their common understanding was that Peter's assurance related to whatever the farm consisted of at Peter's death (as it would have done, barring any restrictive language, under s 24 of the Wills Act 1837, had Peter made a specific devise of Steart Farm). This fits in with the retrospective aspect of proprietary estoppel noted in Walton v Walton.[8]

[6] At [57], Lord Walker approved of a further quotation from Hoffmann LJ's judgment in Walton v Walton: this paragraph is set out in section 2.1.3 below.

[7] [2007] EWHC 2422 (Ch) at [94], [98].

[8] 14 April 1994, unreported.

In any event, for the reasons already mentioned, I do not perceive any real uncertainty in the position here. It is possible to imagine all sorts of events which might have happened between 1990 and 2005. If Peter had decided to sell another field or two, whether because of an advantageous development opportunity or because the business was pressed for cash, David would have known of it, and would no doubt have accepted it without question (just as he made no claim to the savings account which held that part of the proceeds of the 1990 sale which Peter did not roll over into land). If Peter had decided in 2000 to sell half the farm in order to build himself a retirement home elsewhere (an unlikely hypothesis) David might well have accepted that too [. . .] But it is unprofitable, in view of the retrospective nature of the assessment which the doctrine of proprietary estoppel requires, to speculate on what might have been.

Apart from his principled attack based on uncertainty, [counsel for Peter's executors], realistically, did not criticise the deputy judge's decision to award David the whole farm and the whole of the farming assets. There is no ground on which to challenge the judge's discretion in determining the remedy. I would allow the appeal and restore the judge's order.

Lord Neuberger

In my judgment, those findings clearly indicate that the deputy judge was of the opinion, contrary to the view expressed by the Court of Appeal, that the statements he found to have been made by Peter were reasonably understood by David to indicate that Peter was committing himself to leaving the farm to David, and were reasonably relied on by David as having that effect. Such a reading is strongly supported by the deputy judge's observations that, if it was necessary to make such a finding, he would have regarded Peter's statement in 1990 as 'tantamount to an assurance to David', and that he did 'not accept' that it was 'ambiguous'.[9]

[. . .] It may be that there could be exceptional cases where, even though a person reasonably relied on a statement, it might be wrong to conclude that the statement-maker was estopped, because he could not reasonably have expected the person so to rely. However, such cases would be rare, and, in the light of the facts found by the deputy judge, it has not been, and could not be, suggested that this was such a case.

At [95]

In this case, the extent of the farm might change, but, on the deputy judge's analysis, there is, as I see it, no doubt as to what was the subject of the assurance, namely the farm as it existed from time to time. Accordingly, the nature of the interest to be received by David was clear: it was the farm as it existed on Peter's death. As in the case of a very different equitable concept, namely a floating charge, the property the subject of the equity could be conceptually identified from the moment the equity came into existence, but its precise extent fell to be determined when the equity crystallised, namely on Peter's death.

At [102]

[. . .] Of course, there may be cases where the facts justify a different conclusion either because the promise had a different meaning at the time it was made, or because intervening events justify giving it a different effect—or even no effect. However, such considerations do not apply in this case. The farm did increase in size, but this had largely happened by 1992, which was only two years after the principal statement on which the estoppel relies; and 13 years elapsed thereafter, during which that statement, together with subsequent statements by Peter, were relied on by David. Further, the increase in the farm's size was achieved largely by Peter buying more land with money obtained through the sale for development of a much smaller area of the farm. In any event, there is no suggestion that Peter had any wish or moral obligation to leave the farm or any part of it to anyone other than David.

Lord Hoffmann

My Lords, the appellant David Thorner is a Somerset farmer who, for nearly 30 years, did substantial work without pay on the farm of his father's cousin Peter Thorner. The judge found that from 1990 until his death in 2005 Peter encouraged David to believe that he would inherit the farm and that David acted in reliance upon this assurance. In the event, however, Peter left no will. In these proceedings, David claims that by reason of the assurance and reliance, Peter's estate is estopped from denying that he has acquired the beneficial interest in the farm. [. . .]

Such a claim, under the principle known as proprietary estoppel, requires the claimant to prove a promise or assurance that he will acquire a proprietary interest in specified property. A distinctive feature of this case, as Lloyd LJ remarked in the Court of Appeal, was that the representation was never made expressly but was 'a matter of implication and inference from indirect statements and conduct'.[10] It consisted of such matters as handing over to David in 1990 an insurance policy bonus notice with the words 'that's for my death duties' and other oblique remarks on subsequent occasions which indicated that Peter intended David to inherit the farm. As Lloyd LJ observed such conduct and language might have been consistent with a current intention rather than a definite assurance.[11] But the judge found as a fact that these words and acts were reasonably understood by David as an assurance that he would inherit the farm and that Peter intended them to be so understood.

The Court of Appeal said, correctly, that the fact that Peter had actually intended David to inherit the farm was irrelevant. The question was whether his words and acts would reasonably have conveyed to David an assurance that he would do so. But Lloyd LJ accepted that the finding as to what Peter would reasonably have been understood to mean by his words and acts was a finding of fact which was not open to challenge.[12] That must be right. The fact that he spoke in oblique and allusive terms does not matter if it was reasonable for David, given his knowledge of Peter and the background circumstances, to have understood him to mean not merely that his present intention was to leave David the farm but that he definitely would do so.

However, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal on the ground that the judge had not found that the assurance was intended to be relied upon and that there was no material upon which he could have made such a finding. The judge had found that David had relied upon the assurance by not pursuing other opportunities but not, said Lloyd LJ, that Peter had known about these opportunities or intended to discourage David from pursuing them.

At that point, it seems to me, the Court of Appeal departed from their previously objective examination of the meaning which Peter's words and acts would reasonably have conveyed and required proof of his subjective understanding of the effect which those words would have upon David. In my opinion it did not matter whether Peter knew of any specific alternatives which David might be contemplating. It was enough that the meaning he conveyed would reasonably have been understood as intended to be taken seriously as an assurance which could be relied upon. If David did then rely upon it to his detriment, the necessary > element of the estoppel is in my opinion established. It is not necessary that Peter should have known or foreseen the particular act of reliance.

> The judge found not only that it was reasonable for David to have understood Peter's words and acts to mean that 'he would be Peter's successor to [the farm]' but that it was reasonable for him to rely upon them.[13] These findings of fact were in my opinion sufficient to support the judge's decision.
> The judge held that the equity in David's favour created by the proprietary estoppel required a declaration that Peter's personal representatives held the farm with its chattels, live and dead stock and cash at bank on trust for David absolutely. The personal representatives object on two grounds. First, they say although the judge placed reliance on the incident of the handing over of the insurance policy in 1990, the assurance was not unequivocal until affirmed by later words and conduct, after which the detriment suffered by David was a good deal less than if one took the whole period from 1990 until Peter's death and therefore did not justify an award of the whole farm.
> I do not think that the judge was trying to pinpoint the date at which the assurance became unequivocal and I think it would be unrealistic in a case like this to try to do so. There was a close and ongoing daily relationship between the parties. Past events provide context and background for the interpretation of subsequent events and subsequent events throw retrospective light upon the meaning of past events. The owl of Minerva spreads its wings only with the falling of the dusk.[14] The finding was that David reasonably relied upon the assurance from 1990, even if it required later events to confirm that it was reasonable for him to have done so.
> The second ground of objection is that the farm when Peter died in 2005 was not the same as it was in 1990. In between, he had sold some land and bought other land. I agree with my noble and learned friends Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe and Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury that changes in the character or extent of the property in question are relevant to the relief which equity will provide but do not exclude such a remedy when there is still an identifiable property. In the present case, I see no reason to question the judge's decision that David was entitled to the beneficial interest in the farm and the farming business as they were at Peter's death.

The decision of the House of Lords in Thorner v Major provides a graphic demonstration of the power of proprietary estoppel. Peter did not make a testamentary gift to David, as he died without a valid will. Nor could David show that Peter was under any contractual duty to give him the farm: certainly, as we saw in Chapter 7, the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 ensures that any such contract would have required a formal, written agreement. Nonetheless, thanks to proprietary estoppel, Peter was, at the time of his death, under a duty to transfer the farm land and business assets, worth over £3 million, to David. As Lord Hoffmann put it, David was 'entitled to the beneficial interest in the farm and farming business as they were at Peter's death'. This beneficial interest can be seen to arise as a result of the doctrine of anticipation, discussed in Chapter 9: as Peter was under a duty to transfer the farm land to David, David acquired an immediate equitable interest in that land.

[14] [This aphorism was coined by Hegel, writing in 1820, at the end of the Preface to his Philosophy of Right (see Knox (trs) Hegel's Philosophy of Right, 1967). Minerva was the Roman goddess of, amongst other things, wisdom. The idea behind the aphorism is that, in some contexts at least, the truth is known only after the event. Hegel used it to make the point that philosophy should not be expected to lay down how one ought to behave in the future. As we will see in this chapter, Lord Hoffmann uses the aphorism to capture an important difference between proprietary estoppel and contractual claims.]

It is, therefore, clear that proprietary estoppel, unlike estoppel by representation or promissory estoppel, is a means by which A can come under a duty to B, and thus a means by which B can, in some cases at least, acquire an equitable interest in A's land. As a result, the term 'proprietary estoppel' is unhelpful: the doctrine does far more than simply stop A from doing something, and so thinking of it as a form of estoppel may lead to confusion. Such confusion, it is submitted, can be seen in the following extract from Lord Scott's speech in Thorner v Major.

Lord Scott

The second 'certainty' problem about a representation that David would inherit Steart Farm, a problem inherent in every case in which a representation about inheritance prospects is the basis of a proprietary estoppel claim, is that the expected fruits of the representation lie in the future, on the death of the representor, and, in the meantime, the circumstances of the representor or of his or her relationship with the representee, or both, may change and bring about a change of intentions on the part of the representor[...]If, for example, Peter had become, before his death, in need of full-time nursing care, so that he could not continue to live at Steart Farm or continue as a farmer and needed to sell Steart Farm or some part of it in order to fund the costs of necessary medical treatment and care, it seems to me questionable whether David's equity in Steart Farm, bred from the representations and conduct in evidence in this case, would have been held by a court to bar the realisation of Steart Farm, or some sufficient part of it, for those purposes. I do not, of course, imagine for a moment that, in the circumstances I am postulating, David would have raised any objection.

However, the conceptual possibility of a dispute arising in the circumstances postulated has to be borne in mind. Would it really be the case that the representations made by Peter, relied on and acted on by David as they were, would have barred the use of Steart Farm as a source of funding for the needs of Peter in a decrepit old age? For my part, I doubt it. But it is an odd sort of estoppel that is produced by representations that are, in a sense, conditional.

These reflections invite some thought about the relationship between proprietary estoppel and constructive trust and their respective roles in providing remedies where representations about future property interests have been made and relied on. There are many cases in which the representations relied on relate to the acquisition by the representee of an immediate, or more or less immediate, interest in the property in question. In these cases a proprietary estoppel is the obvious remedy. The representor is estopped from denying that the representee has the proprietary interest that was promised by the representation in question [...] In cases where the owner of land stands by and allows a neighbour to build over the mutual boundary, representing either expressly or impliedly that the building owner is entitled to do so, the owner may be estopped from subsequently asserting his title to the encroached-upon land. This, too, seems to me straightforward proprietary estoppel. There are many other examples of decided cases where representations acted on by the representee have led to the representor being estopped from denying that the representee had the proprietary interest in the representor's land that the representation had suggested. Constructive trust, in my opinion, has nothing to offer to cases of this sort. But cases where the relevant representation has related to inheritance prospects seem to me difficult, for the reasons I have given, to square with the principles of proprietary estoppel [...] and, for my part, I find them made easier to understand as constructive trust cases. The possibility of a remedial constructive trust over property, created by the common intention or understanding of the parties regarding the property on the basis of which the claimant has acted to his detriment, has been recognised at least since Gissing v Gissing.[15] [...] The 'inheritance' cases [...]

are, to my mind, more comfortably viewed as constructive trust cases [. . .] For my part I would prefer to keep proprietary estoppel and constructive trust as distinct and separate remedies, to confine proprietary estoppel to cases where the representation, whether express or implied, on which the claimant has acted is unconditional and to address the cases where the representations are of future benefits, and subject to qualification on account of unforeseen future events, via the principles of remedial constructive trusts.

I am satisfied, however, that this case would, on the factual findings made by the judge and accepted by the Court of Appeal have justified a remedial constructive trust under which David would have obtained the relief awarded him by the judge. I would allow the appeal.

Lord Scott thus agreed that, at the time of his death, Peter was under a duty to transfer the farm to David. However, he did not think that proprietary estoppel could explain why that duty arose; rather, his view was that the duty arose on a different basis, shared by that of the common intention constructive trust. We will examine the common intention constructive trust in Chapter 16, section 2.1.2. The important point, for present purposes, is that Lord Scott sees proprietary estoppel, like other forms of estoppel, as being limited in effect: it can only operate to prevent A from denying something. This model cannot work in a case where A, rather than representing that B currently has a right in A's land, instead promises B that B will acquire such a right in the future. That is why Lord Scott thinks that proprietary estoppel cannot apply in an 'inheritance case', such as Thorner v Major, where A promises B that B will acquire A's land on A's death.

The reasoning of all the other members of the House of Lords in Thorner v Major is, however, inconsistent with Lord Scott's view. The extracts set out above show that each of Lord Walker, Lord Neuberger and Lord Hoffmann held that proprietary estoppel can impose a duty on A to B, even in a case where A's assurance is not that B already has a right in A's land, but is rather than B will acquire such a right in the future. As a result, it is clear that proprietary estoppel is very different from other forms of estoppel; so different, in fact, that the term 'estoppel' is positively misleading.

2 THE REQUIREMENTS OF PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL

In section 1, we considered the nature of proprietary estoppel and saw that it can be used, in some cases at least, as a means by which B can acquire an equitable interest in A's land. We also saw that, in Thorner v Major, Lord Walker noted that there are generally said to be three elements of the doctrine.[16] Writing extra-judicially, Lord Neuberger has also summarised proprietary estoppel as consisting of three requirements.

Lord Neuberger, 'The Stuffing of Minerva's Owl? Taxonomy and Taxidermy in Equity' [2009] CLJ 537

In very summary terms, the ingredients of proprietary estoppel are the following:

(1) a statement or action (which can include silence or inaction) by the defendant, who ought to appreciate the claimant will rely on it;

16 [2009] 3 All ER 945, [29] (set out in the extract in section 1 above).

(2) an act by the claimant in the reasonable belief that he has or will get an interest in land, induced by that statement or action;

(3) consequent detriment to the claimant if the defendant is entitled to resile from his statement or action.

We will now examine each of those three elements, basing our terminology on that used by Lord Walker in Thorner v Major. As we will see, there is a degree of overlap between each of the three. So, whilst it is undoubtedly useful to divide the requirements of proprietary estoppel in this way, it is also important to bear in mind the following warning, given by Lord Walker in an earlier case.

Gillett v Holt

Walker LJ

At 225

[A]lthough the judgment is, for convenience, divided into several sections with headings which give a rough indication of the subject matter, it is important to note at the outset that the doctrine of proprietary estoppel cannot be treated as subdivided into three or four watertight compartments. Both sides are agreed on that, and in the course of the oral argument in this court it repeatedly became apparent that the quality of the relevant assurances may influence the issue of reliance, that reliance and detriment are often intertwined [. . .] Moreover the fundamental principle that equity is concerned to prevent unconscionable conduct permeates all the elements of the doctrine. In the end the court must look at the matter in the round.

This passage also raises the question of what role the concept of unconscionability plays in proprietary estoppel: we will examine that issue in section 2.4 below, after looking at each of the three elements of assurance, reliance, and detriment.

2.1 AN ASSURANCE BY A

2.1.1 The content of A's assurance

A's assurance must be that B already has, or will receive in the future, a right that relates to A's land.[17] In other common law jurisdictions, including those in the United States[18] and in Australia,[19] B's reliance on A's assurance is capable of giving B a right against A even if A's assurance does not relate to land. In England, however, this does not seem to be the case: proprietary estoppel has developed specifically to deal with situations in which B has relied on an assurance relating to land. This limitation does seem to be rather difficult to justify.

17 For example, in Warwick v Trustee in Bankruptcy of Yarwood [2010] EWHC 2272 (Ch), [38], it was held that proprietary estoppel cannot apply where A's assurance is that B will be paid a sum of money, even if the parties intend that sum to be paid from the proceeds of the sale of specific land.

18 See Restatement (Second) of Contracts, s 90.

19 See Waltons Stores v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387.

The explanation may be that, in cases not related to land, English courts have been more willing to find that, where B has relied on A's assurance, B has provided consideration for that assurance, and so A is under a contractual duty to B.[20] In contrast, where land is concerned, that contractual route has generally been blocked by the formality rules applying to contracts to dispose of an interest in land.[21]

This does not mean, however, that any duty imposed on A by proprietary estoppel is limited to A's land. As we saw in Thorner v Major, if A's assurance relates, at least in part, to land, then the duty imposed on A may extend beyond A's land and also encompass A's personal property (such as farm machinery and livestock) and personal rights of A (such as the farm's trading account: a personal right against a bank).[22]

2.1.2 Finding an assurance

There is an important distinction between a representation of future intention and an assurance. If A simply tells B that A's current plan is to leave his or her land to B, then this statement, by itself, does not amount to an assurance that A will, in the end, stick to that plan. An assurance can only be found if A can be seen as making some form of commitment, either that B already has a right in relation to A's land, or that B will acquire such a right. As Lord Hoffmann put it in Thorner v Major, the question is whether 'the meaning [A] conveyed would reasonably have been understood as intended to be taken seriously as an assurance which could be relied upon.'[23]

There is no need, however, for A to have made an express assurance to B. As demonstrated by the House of Lords's analysis of Thorner, the question is whether A's conduct, taken as a whole, suffices to convey the necessary commitment to B. This point can also be seen in the following extract.

Crabb v Arun District Council [1976] Ch 179, CA

Facts: The council (A) and Mr Crabb (B) owned neighbouring plots of land. They entered negotiations concerning the potential grant to Mr Crabb of a right of way over the council's land. An agreement in principle was reached, and a particular access point ('point B') for Mr Crabb was identified, but no formal contract was concluded. When the council later put up a fence to separate its land from Mr Crabb's land, a gap was left at the planned access point for Mr Crabb, and a gate was later installed there. Confident that he had, or would get, a right of way over the council's land, Mr Crabb then sold off part of his land without reserving a right of way over that land. Unfortunately for Mr Crabb, the council then took down the gate, built a wall over the gap, and refused to grant him a right of way over its land. Mr Crabb had no other means of access to his retained land, and claimed that the council were estopped from denying him access to its land. The Court of Appeal held that proprietary estoppel imposed a duty on the council to allow Mr Crabb access to its land.

20 See Shadwell v Shadwell (1860) 142 ER 62 (CCP): B's marriage, following A's promise to pay B a yearly sum during B's life, was found to constitute consideration for A's promise. Compare Ricketts v Scothorn 77 NW 365 (1898), in which the Supreme Court of Nebraska, in a similar case, based its enforcement of A's promise on the grounds of promissory estoppel.

21 We examined those rules in Chapter 7, section 3.

The question then is: were the circumstances here such as to raise an equity in favour of the plaintiff? [. . .] The judge found that there was 'no definite assurance' by the defendants' representative, and 'no firm commitment,' but only an 'agreement in principle,' meaning I suppose that, as Mr. Alford [counsel for the council] said, there were 'some further processes' to be gone through before it would become binding. But if there were any such processes in the mind of the parties, the subsequent conduct of the defendants was such as to dispense with them. The defendants actually put up the gates at point B at considerable expense. That certainly led the plaintiff to believe that they agreed that he should have the right of access through point B without more ado.

Scarman LJ

[. . .] I can conceive of cases in which it would be absolutely appropriate for a defendant to say: 'But you should not have acted to your detriment until you had had a word with me and I could have put you right.' But there are cases in which it is far too late for a defendant to get himself out of his pickle by putting upon the plaintiff that sort of duty; and this, in my judgment, is one of those cases.

In Crabb v Arun DC, then, A's assurance consisted both of express communication to B (in the negotiations over the planned right of way) and other, non-verbal conduct of A (in leaving the gap in the fence and later installing a gate there).

According to the approach taken in the following extract, A may also come under an equitable duty to B in cases of pure 'acquiescence' where, for example, A allows B to do work on A's land and A knows that B is doing the work because of a mistaken belief that he has, or will get, a right in that land.[24]

Ramsden v Dyson
(1866) LR 1 HL 129

Lord Cranworth

At 140–141

If a stranger begins to build on my land supposing it to be his own, and I, perceiving his mistake, abstain from setting him right, and leave him to persevere in his error, a Court of equity will not allow me afterwards to assert my title to the land on which he had expended money on the supposition that the land was his own. It considers that, when I saw the mistake into which he had fallen, it was my duty to be active and to state my adverse title; and that it would be dishonest in me to remain wilfully passive on such an occasion, in order afterwards to profit by the mistake which I might have prevented.

[24] Of course, A comes under no duty to B if A warns B that B does not have, or will not get, a right in the land: see per Sir James Wigram V-C in The Master or Keeper, Fellows and Scholars of Clare Hall v Harding (1848) 6 Hare 273, 296–297; per Lord Scott in Blue Haven Enterprises v Tully [2006] UKPC 17, [14].

But it will be observed that to raise such an equity two things are required, first, that the person expending the money supposes himself to be building on his own land; and, secondly, that the real owner at the time of the expenditure knows that the land belongs to him and not to the person expending the money in the belief that he is the owner. For if a stranger builds on my land knowing it to be mine, there is no principle of equity which would prevent my claiming the land with the benefit of all the expenditure made on it. There would be nothing in my conduct, active or passive, making it inequitable in me to assert my legal rights.

Lord Wensleydale

If a stranger build on my land, supposing it to be his own, and I, knowing it to be mine, do not interfere, but leave him to go on, equity considers it to be dishonest in me to remain passive and afterwards to interfere and take the profit. But if a stranger build knowingly upon my land, there is no principle of equity which prevents me from insisting on having back my land, with all the additional value which the occupier has imprudently added to it.

There is a debate as to whether the duty arising in such 'acquiescence' or 'standing by' cases is an example of proprietary estoppel, or whether it instead depends on some other principle. Certainly, if the acquiescence cases are to be seen as part of proprietary estoppel, then A's duty should arise only if B knows of if A's failure to act. In such a case, as Lord Walker explains in the following extract, A's failure to act can be said to have encouraged B to start, or to continue, the work, then A can be viewed as having made the necessary assurance.

Thorner v Major
[2009] 3 All ER 945

Lord Walker

[I]f all proprietary estoppel cases (including cases of acquiescence or standing-by) are to be analysed in terms of assurance, reliance and detriment, then the landowner's conduct in standing by in silence serves as the element of assurance. As Lord Eldon LC said over 200 years ago in Dann v Spurrier: 'this Court will not permit a man knowingly, though but passively, to encourage another to lay out money under an erroneous opinion of title; and the circumstance of looking on is in many cases as strong as using encouragement.'[25]

In a case where B is not aware that A is standing by and failing to intervene, it is very difficult either to imply an assurance by A or to say that B has relied in any way on A. According to the formulations of Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale, set out above, the 'acquiescence' principle can apply in such a case. To that extent, then, it seems that the principle must lie outside the core case of proprietary estoppel.

[25] (1802) 7 Ves 231, 235–36, 32 ER 94, 95.

Mee, 'Proprietary Estoppel, Promises and Mistaken Belief' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 6) (ed Bright, 2011, p 182)

> The acquiescence scenario is clearly covered by the fundamental statements of principle by the majority in Ramsden v Dyson.[26] This category, which the older cases also refer to in terms of 'lying by', has also been recognised in cases arising outside the context of disputes over land.[27] In the view of the current author, the tendency to treat [A]'s failure to speak as a representation by silence due to the fact that he was under a duty to speak [. . .] serves only to confuse the matter. In principle, nothing which can be construed as a representation needs to be communicated from [A] to [B], so that the principle can apply in a case where [B] was unaware that [A] was observing events and [B] could not, therefore, have read anything into [A's] failure to intervene. The reason for equitable intervention is not the fact that [A] has led [B] to act to his detriment by means of a representation or promise but rather that [A] has failed to act when he was aware that [B] was acting to [B's] detriment on the basis of a mistake concerning [B's] rights (although the precise scope of the principle is in need of further analysis).

In Ramsden v Dyson, each of Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale, when discussing acquiescence, refer to the profit that A would unjustly make if he or she were free to take advantage of B's mistaken work. As a result, it has been argued that the acquiescence principle depends on A's being unjustly enriched at B's expense.[28] Indeed, it has been argued that A can be unjustly enriched at B's expense, and so come under a duty to B, even if A has not stood by and knowingly failed to stop B's work.[29] This is because a broad unjust enrichment principle requires only that B has made a mistake and that A has benefitted from B's work (as will be the case if, for example, the work done by B is work which A was in any case planning to have done on his land). It is, however, far from clear that this broad unjust enrichment principle forms part of the law:[30] after all it is incompatible with the principle set out by Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale, and its requirement that A knowingly fails to intervene.[31]

2.1.3 The certainty of A's assurance

In cases of estoppel by representation, or of promissory estoppel, it is often said that A's representation or promise must be 'clear and unequivocal': is this also the case in proprietary estoppel? As we saw in the extract set out in section 1 above, this question was considered by the House of Lords in Thorner v Major. Lord Walker clearly wished to avoid any over-refinement of the test, stating that: 'to establish a proprietary estoppel the relevant assurance must be clear enough. What amounts to sufficient clarity, in a case of this sort, is hugely dependent on context.' Lord Walker then went on to quote with approval a passage from the judgment of Hoffmann LJ in Walton v Walton, part of which is now set out.

26 [These statements of Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale are set out in the extract above. Lord Cranworth noted ((1866) LR 1 HL 129, 162) that Lord Brougham, who was present at the hearing but unable to attend the House of Lords when the speeches were delivered, concurred with Lord Cranworth. Lord Kingsdown dissented.]

Walton v Walton

Hoffmann LJ

At [19]–[21]

In many cases of promises made in a family or social context, there is no intention to create an immediately binding contract. There are several reasons why the law is reluctant to assume that there was. One which is relevant in this case is that such promises are often subject to unspoken and ill-defined qualifications. Take for example the promise in this case. When it was first made, Mrs Walton did not know what the future might hold. Anything might happen which could make it inappropriate for the farm to go to the plaintiff.

But a contract, subject to the narrow doctrine of frustration, must be performed come what may. This is why [counsel for the plaintiff] has always accepted that Mrs Walton's promise could not have been intended to become a contract.

But none of this reasoning applies to equitable estoppel, because it does not look forward into the future and guess what might happen. It looks backwards from the moment when the promise falls due to be performed and asks whether, in the circumstances which have actually happened, it would be unconscionable for the promise not to be kept.

The analysis of Hoffmann LJ in Walton v Walton makes an important distinction between the requirements of a contract and of proprietary estoppel. It demonstrates that, even if A's assurance is not certain enough to be contractually binding, it may nonetheless form the basis of a proprietary estoppel claim. The justification given for this in Walton v Walton was, perhaps not surprisingly, affirmed by Lord Hoffmann in Thorner v Major, when stating that: 'Past events provide context and background for the interpretation of subsequent events and subsequent events throw retrospective light upon the meaning of past events. The owl of Minerva spreads its wings only with the falling of dusk.'[32] The point seems to be that, because a contract imposes an immediate duty to perform a promise, the terms of that promise must be clear from the outset. In contrast, proprietary estoppel does not impose such an immediate duty: instead, a court can ask whether, in the light not only of A's assurance, but also of subsequent events (such as B's reliance), A came under some form of duty to B. As we will see in section 4 below, that duty need not be a duty to honour the assurance. It seems then that, when Lord Walker stated that '[w]hat amounts to sufficient clarity, in a case of this sort, depends hugely on context', that context can include events occurring after the moment of any initial assurance of A.

It thus seems that, in practice, it is not necessary for B to prove that A's assurance was 'clear and unequivocal'. In Thorner v Major, Lord Neuberger was reluctant to depart from that test; but, as we can see in the extract now set out, the qualifications he permits deprive the test of much of its practical impact.

Lord Neuberger

It should be emphasised that I am not seeking to cast doubt on the proposition, heavily relied on by the Court of Appeal,[33] that there must be some sort of an assurance which is 'clear and unequivocal' before it can be relied on to found an estoppel. However, that proposition must be read as subject to three qualifications. First, it does not detract from the normal principle, so well articulated in this case by Lord Walker, that the effect of words or actions must be assessed in their context. Just as a sentence can have one meaning in one context and a very different meaning in another context, so can a sentence, which would be ambiguous or unclear in one context, be a clear and unambiguous assurance in another context. Indeed, as Lord Walker says, the point is underlined by the fact that perhaps the classic example of proprietary estoppel is based on silence and inaction, rather than any statement or action.[34]

Secondly, it would be quite wrong to be unrealistically rigorous when applying the 'clear and unambiguous' test. The court should not search for ambiguity or uncertainty, but should assess the question of clarity and certainty practically and sensibly, as well as contextually. Again, this point is underlined by the authorities [. . .] which support the proposition that, at least normally, it is sufficient for the person invoking the estoppel to establish that he reasonably understood the statement or action to be an assurance on which he could rely.

Thirdly, as pointed out in argument by my noble and learned friend Lord Rodger of Earlsferry, there may be cases where the statement relied on to found an estoppel could amount to an assurance which could reasonably be understood as having more than one possible meaning. In such a case, if the facts otherwise satisfy all the requirements of an estoppel, it seems to me that, at least normally, the ambiguity should not deprive a person who reasonably relied on the assurance of all relief: it may well be right, however, that he should be accorded relief on the basis of the interpretation least beneficial to him.

2.1.4 Pre-contractual negotiations

In Thorner v Major, Lord Walker emphasised that, in deciding if A has made a sufficiently certain assurance to B, much will depend on context. This context can include not only later events (such as B's reliance), but also whether the assurance is made in a commercial or domestic setting. In particular, in a case where A and B have begun contractual negotiations, but have not yet concluded a formal contract, it may be difficult for B to show that A has made the required assurance. It is true that in Crabb v Arun DC, discussed in section 2.1.2 above, B was able to establish a proprietary estoppel, and the parties' pre-contractual negotiations formed part of the evidence from which A's assurance was found. Yet, as the following extract shows, such a case may be the exception rather than the rule.

Yeoman's Row Management Ltd v Cobbe

Facts: Yeoman's Row Management Limited (YRML) held the registered freehold of land in Knightsbridge. Mr and Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring controlled the company. A building on the land contained thirteen flats. Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring hoped to redevelop the land: if planning permission could be obtained, six houses could be built, thereby greatly increasing the value of the land. Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring, acting on behalf of YRML, entered into lengthy negotiations with Mr Cobbe, a property developer. They came to an oral agreement, with the following key points: (i) Mr Cobbe, at his own expense, would apply for planning permission to demolish the existing block of flats and to erect, in its place, a terrace of six houses; (ii) upon the grant of planning permission and the obtaining of vacant possession, YRML would sell its freehold to Mr Cobbe (or to a company nominated by him) for an up-front price of £12m; (iii) Mr Cobbe (or his nominee company) would develop the property in accordance with the planning permission; and (iv) Mr Cobbe (or his nominee company) would sell the six houses and pay to YRML 50 per cent of the amount, if any, by which the gross proceeds of sale exceeded £24m.[35]

The basics of the deal were thus clear: if Mr Cobbe were to fail to obtain planning permission, he would be paid nothing. But, if he were to succeed in getting planning permission, he and YRML would be able to share in the profits made from the redevelopment of the land. Mr Cobbe and Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring were both experienced business people: they both knew that the oral agreement was not legally binding and that a later, signed contract would have to be concluded, dealing with further issues not covered by the oral agreement. Nonetheless, Mr Cobbe, with the encouragement of Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring, spent considerable time and effort and incurred considerable expense, between late 2002 and March 2004, in applying for planning permission. By late 2003, Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring had formed an intention not to comply with the oral agreement, deciding instead to ask for more than £12m up-front before selling the freehold—but she hid her plan from Mr Cobbe, deliberately giving him the impression that, if planning permission were obtained, she would enter into a binding contract based on the oral agreement.

In March 2004, as a result of Mr Cobbe's efforts, planning permission was granted. As a result, before any redevelopment work had been started, it seems that YRML's freehold increased in value by around £4m. Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring then informed Mr Cobbe that she would only sell the land if he paid £20m up-front (as well as the agreed share of the proceeds should Mr Cobbe sell on for over £24m). Mr Cobbe objected and brought a claim against YRML. At first, he alleged a breach of contract—a claim that was doomed to fail, because no final agreement had been reached, and there was, in any case, no signed, written agreement between the parties complying with s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989) (see Chapter 7, section 3). Mr Cobbe then amended his pleadings to seek relief on the basis of proprietary estoppel, a constructive trust, or unjust enrichment.

At first instance, Etherton J found that Mr Cobbe did have a good proprietary estoppel claim; as a result, he ordered YRML to pay Mr Cobbe a sum equal to half of the increase in value of YRML's freehold caused by the grant of planning permission (as it turned out, this meant that YRML had to pay Mr Cobbe £2m). The Court of Appeal upheld that decision. The House of Lords, however, found that Mr Cobbe had no proprietary estoppel claim. It also found that he had not acquired a right under a constructive trust. The House of Lords did decide that he had a claim based on YRML's unjust enrichment, because YRML had received the benefit of his services without paying for them; but that claim allowed him to recover only his expenses in applying for planning permission, plus a reasonable fee to cover his professional services. As a result, Mr Cobbe was therefore limited to receiving only around £150,000—far less than the £2m awarded to him by Etherton J.

Our focus here is on the House of Lords' reasoning in rejecting Mr Cobbe's proprietary estoppel claim.

Lord Walker

[...] In the commercial context, the claimant is typically a business person with access to legal advice and what he or she is expecting to get is a contract. In the domestic or family context, the typical claimant is not a business person and is not receiving legal advice. What he or she wants and expects to get is an interest in immovable property, often for long-term occupation as a home. The focus is not on intangible legal rights but on the tangible property which he or she expects to get. The typical domestic claimant does not stop to reflect (until disappointed expectations lead to litigation) whether some further legal transaction (such as a grant by deed, or the making of a will or codicil) is necessary to complete the promised title. [...]

So the judge found that Mr Cobbe believed that Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring was, and regarded herself as, bound in honour to enter into a formal written contract if planning permission was granted; and that Mr Cobbe regarded himself as similarly bound. It is implicit—in my view necessarily and deliberately implicit—in the judge's carefully chosen language that neither Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring nor Mr Cobbe regarded herself or himself as legally bound. They were both very experienced in property matters and they knew perfectly well that that was not the position.

Another unusual feature of this case is the judge's finding that Mr Cobbe believed that he would be reimbursed his reasonable expenditure if Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring decided to withdraw from the arrangement before planning permission was granted. This emphasis on the actual grant of planning permission as the crucial condition produces a strange result: would it be conscionable for Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring to withdraw (subject only to reimbursement) at a stage when 99% of the work necessary to obtain planning permission had been done, and success was virtually certain, but unconscionable to do so once success had actually been achieved? This feature of the arrangement emphasises the risk which Mr Cobbe was undertaking, in deciding to rely on Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring's sense of honour.

Crabb v Arun District Council,[36] the facts of which are well known, is a difficult case, not least because of different views taken by different members of the Court [...] The situation was that of a commercial negotiation in which both sides expected formal legal documents to be agreed and executed. The case is best explained, I think, by recognising that the Council's erection of the two sets of gates was an act so unequivocal that it led to Mr Crabb

irretrievably altering his position, putting the matter beyond the stage at which it was open to negotiation [...]

[...] In my opinion none of these cases casts any doubt on the general principle laid down by this House in Ramsden v Dyson,[37] that conscious reliance on honour alone will not give rise to an estoppel. Nor do they cast doubt on the general principle that the court should be very slow to introduce uncertainty into commercial transactions by over-ready use of equitable concepts such as fiduciary obligations and equitable estoppel. That applies to commercial negotiations whether or not they are expressly stated to be subject to contract.

[...] The informal bargain made in this case was unusually complex, as both courts below acknowledged. When a claim based on equitable estoppel is made in a domestic setting the informal bargain or understanding is typically on the following lines: if you live here as my carer/companion/lover you will have a home for life. The expectation is of acquiring and keeping an interest in an identified property. In this case, by contrast, Mr Cobbe was expecting to get a contract. Under that contract he (or much more probably a company controlled by him) would have been entitled to acquire the property for a down-payment of £12m, but only as part of a deal under which the block of flats on the site was to be demolished, the site cleared, and six very expensive townhouses were to be erected instead, and sold for the best prices that they would fetch [...]

[...] Mr Cobbe's case seems to me to fail on the simple but fundamental point that, as persons experienced in the property world, both parties knew that there was no legally binding contract, and that either was therefore free to discontinue the negotiations without legal liability—that is liability in equity as well as at law [...] Mr Cobbe was therefore running a risk, but he stood to make a handsome profit if the deal went ahead, and the market stayed favourable. He may have thought that any attempt to get Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring to enter into a written contract before the grant of planning permission would be counter-productive. Whatever his reasons for doing so, the fact is that he ran a commercial risk, with his eyes open, and the outcome has proved unfortunate for him. It is true that he did not expressly state, at the time, that he was relying solely on Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring's sense of honour, but to draw that sort of distinction in a commercial context would be as unrealistic, in my opinion, as to draw a firm distinction depending on whether the formula "subject to contract" had or had not actually been used.

Lord Scott

An "estoppel" bars the object of it from asserting some fact or facts, or, sometimes, something that is a mixture of fact and law, that stands in the way of some right claimed by the person entitled to the benefit of the estoppel. The estoppel becomes a "proprietary" estoppel—a sub-species of a "promissory" estoppel—if the right claimed is a proprietary right, usually a right to or over land but, in principle, equally available in relation to chattels or choses in action. So, what is the fact or facts, or the matter of mixed fact and law, that, in the present case, [YRML] is said to be barred from asserting? And what is the proprietary right claimed by Mr Cobbe that the facts and matters [YRML] is barred from asserting might otherwise defeat? [...]

My Lords, unconscionability of conduct may well lead to a remedy but, in my opinion, proprietary estoppel cannot be the route to it unless the ingredients for a proprietary estoppel are present. These ingredients should include, in principle, a proprietary claim made by a claimant and an answer to that claim based on some fact, or some point of mixed fact and law, that the person against whom the claim is made can be estopped from asserting. To treat a "proprietary estoppel equity" as requiring neither a proprietary claim by the claimant nor an estoppel against the defendant but simply unconscionable behaviour is, in my respectful opinion, a recipe for confusion.

At [20]

[. . .] The problem (for Mr Cobbe's proprietary estoppel claim) is that when he made the planning application his expectation was, for proprietary estoppel purposes, the wrong sort of expectation. It was not an expectation that he would, if the planning application succeeded, become entitled to "a certain interest in land". His expectation was that he and Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring, or their respective legal advisers, would sit down and agree the outstanding contractual terms to be incorporated into the formal written agreement, which he justifiably believed would include the already agreed core financial terms, and that his purchase, and subsequently his development of the property, in accordance with that written agreement would follow.

At [27]–[28]

[. . .] It would be an unusually unsophisticated negotiator who was not well aware that oral agreements relating to [the transfer of estates in land] are by statute unenforceable and that no express reservation to make them so is needed. Mr Cobbe was an experienced property developer and Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring gives every impression of knowing her way around the negotiating table. Mr Cobbe did not spend his money and time on the planning application in the mistaken belief that the agreement was legally enforceable. He spent his money and time well aware that it was not. Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring did not encourage in him a belief that the second agreement was enforceable. She encouraged in him a belief that she would abide by it although it was not. Mr Cobbe's belief, or expectation, was always speculative. He knew she was not legally bound. He regarded her as bound "in honour" but that is an acknowledgement that she was not legally bound.

The reality of this case, in my opinion, is that Etherton J and the Court of Appeal regarded their finding that Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring's behaviour in repudiating, and seeking an improvement on, the core financial terms of the second agreement was unconscionable, an evaluation from which I do not in the least dissent, as sufficient to justify the creation of a "proprietary estoppel equity". As Mummery LJ said,[38] she took unconscionable advantage of Mr Cobbe. The advantage taken was the benefit of his services, his time and his money, in obtaining planning permission for the property. The advantage was unconscionable because immediately following the grant of planning permission, she repudiated the financial terms on which Mr Cobbe had been expecting to be able to purchase the property. But to leap from there to a conclusion that a proprietary estoppel case was made out was not, in my opinion, justified.

Although the House of Lords overturned the decisions of Etherton J and the Court of Appeal, the result in Yeoman's Row is not too surprising. Lord Scott, as in Thorner v Major, viewed proprietary estoppel as simply a form of estoppel by representation or promissory estoppel. As we saw in section 1 above, however, this view is difficult to support and it is impliedly rejected by all the members of the House of Lords (other than Lord Scott) in Thorner v Major. Yet Lord Scott's analysis, like that of Lord Walker, rests on the finding that Mr Cobbe, by undertaking work when he knew that there was no contract between him and YRML, was running a risk: the risk that, even if he did obtain planning permission, Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring (on behalf of YRML) might pull out of the planned contract. The House of Lords' assessment of the facts seems to be that: (i) it was perhaps dishonourable or immoral for Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring to lead on Mr Cobbe and then pull out of the planned agreement; but (ii) Mr Cobbe, an experienced property developer, should have been aware that business people do not always do the right thing.

Attorney-General of Hong Kong v Humphrey's Estate is an example of a similar case.[39] B started work on some land in the belief that A would sell that land to B. A and B had made a preliminary agreement for a sale, but that agreement was expressly 'subject to contract'. A thus made clear to B that, until a final contract was signed, A was not bound to transfer its ownership of the land to B. As a result, A could not be said to have made the necessary assurance: B acted at his own risk when undertaking the work and so proprietary estoppel did not impose a duty on A to B.

Equally, there are clear differences between the facts of Thorner v Major and those of Yeoman's Row v Cobbe. This can be seen in Lord Neuberger's comparison of the two cases, set out in the next extract.

Thorner v Major
[2009] 3 All ER 945

Lord Neuberger

There are two fundamental differences between [Yeoman's Row v Cobbe] and this case. First, the nature of the uncertainty in the two cases is entirely different [. . .] In [Yeoman's Row v Cobbe], there was no doubt about the physical identity of the property. However, there was total uncertainty as to the nature or terms of any benefit (property interest, contractual right, or money), and, if a property interest, as to the nature of that interest (freehold, leasehold, or charge), to be accorded to Mr Cobbe.

In this case, the extent of the farm might change, but, on the deputy judge's analysis, there is, as I see it, no doubt as to what was the subject of the assurance, namely the farm as it existed from time to time. Accordingly, the nature of the interest to be received by David was clear: it was the farm as it existed on Peter's death. As in the case of a very different equitable concept, namely a floating charge,[40] the property the subject of the equity could be conceptually identified from the moment the equity came into existence, but its precise extent fell to be determined when the equity crystallised, namely on Peter's death.

Secondly, the analysis of the law in Cobbe's case was against the background of very different facts. The relationship between the parties in that case was entirely arm's length and commercial, and the person raising the estoppel was a highly experienced businessman. The circumstances were such that the parties could well have been expected to enter into a contract, however, although they discussed contractual terms, they had consciously chosen not to do so. They had intentionally left their legal relationship to be negotiated, and each of them knew that neither of them was legally bound [. . .]

In this case, by contrast, the relationship between Peter and David was familial and personal, and neither of them, least of all David, had much commercial experience. Further, at no time had either of them even started to contemplate entering into a formal contract as to the ownership of the farm after Peter's death. Nor could such a contract have been reasonably expected even to be discussed between them. On the deputy judge's findings, it was a relatively straightforward case: Peter made what were, in the circumstances, clear and unambiguous assurances that he would leave his farm to David, and David reasonably relied on, and reasonably acted to his detriment on the basis of, those assurances, over a long period.

[39] [1987] 2 All ER 387.

[40] [We will look briefly at floating charges in Chapter 28, section 3.4].

In these circumstances, I see nothing in the reasoning of Lord Scott in Cobbe's case which assists the respondents in this case. It would represent a regrettable and substantial emasculation of the beneficial principle of proprietary estoppel if it were artificially fettered so as to require the precise extent of the property the subject of the alleged estoppel to be strictly defined in every case. Concentrating on the perceived morality of the parties' behaviour can lead to an unacceptable degree of uncertainty of outcome, and hence I welcome the decision in Cobbe's case. However, it is equally true that focusing on technicalities can lead to a degree of strictness inconsistent with the fundamental aims of equity.

The distinction made by Lord Neuberger between domestic and commercial cases was also made by Lord Walker in Cobbe itself, as we saw in the extract set out above. The crucial distinction, however, may be between those cases, such as Cobbe, in which the parties have been involved in pre-contractual negotiations and other cases, such as Thorner, where no contract has been discussed. In the former class of cases, as Lord Walker explained in Cobbe, B faces the difficulty of showing that A's assurance is that B will acquire a particular right in A's land, and is not merely an assurance that A will negotiate in good faith with B, or that some sort of contract will be concluded, which may or may not give B a right in specific land of A. Indeed, the approach in Cobbe may cast doubt on previous decisions, such as Crabb v Arun DC,[41] in which a proprietary estoppel was said to arise against the context of pre-contractual negotiations: as one judge has put it, there is a question as to the 'Cobbe-compliance' of such decisions.[42]

The standing of Crabb v Arun DC after the decision in Cobbe, as well as the significance of the distinction between domestic and commercial cases, has been discussed by Lord Neuberger in an extra-judicial contribution.[43]

Lord Neuberger, 'The Stuffing of Minerva's Owl? Taxonomy and Taxidermy in Equity' [2009] CLJ 537

Both parties [in Cobbe] knew there was no contractual arrangement: indeed, they intended it. They both appreciated that there was an arrangement binding in honour only. The message from the House of Lords is that it is simply not for the courts to go galumphing in, 41 See also Holiday Inns v Broadhead (1974) 232 EG 951 and Yaxley v Gotts [2000] Ch 162.

42 Per Arden LJ in Herbert v Doyle [2010] EWCA Civ 1095, [6]. In Yeoman's Row v Cobbe [2008] 4 All ER 713, [24] and [31], Lord Scott suggested that, in a case where B knows that there is no legally binding agreement with A, it may still be possible for B to show that a constructive trust has arisen under the principle in Pallant v Morgan [1953] 1 Ch 43 (the same suggestion was made by Morgan J in Crossco No 4 Unlimited v Jolan Ltd [2011] EWHC 803 (Ch), [279]). For discussion of that form of constructive trust, see Chapter 11, section 5.

43 In the same article, Lord Neuberger also set out his view that s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 has no impact on a proprietary estoppel claim (see the extract from the article in Chapter 7, section 3.7.) The same view is taken by McFarlane, 'Proprietary Estoppel and Failed Contractual Negotiations' [2005] Conv 501.

wielding some Denningesque sword of justice, to rescue a miscalculating, improvident or optimistic property developer from the commercially unattractive, or even ruthless, actions of a property owner, which are lawful at common law.

[. . .] I suggest that, before he can establish a proprietary estoppel claim, a claimant must show that he has acted in the belief that he has something which can be characterized as a legal right—at least in a commercial arm's length context.

I add that qualification, because it is perhaps in this connection that the difference between commercial and domestic cases (which Lord Walker discussed in Cobbe at [66]–[68], and which I also touched on in Thorner v Major at [96]–[97]) comes into focus. The notion that a claimant takes his chance, where he knows that he has no legally enforceable right, is easier to accept in the context of a commercial and arm's length relationship than in a domestic or familial context. In a commercial situation, the absence of a contractual relationship normally arises from the parties, with easy access to legal advice, considering themselves better off, or at least choosing to take a risk, rather than being bound. Maybe Mr Cobbe wanted to be free to walk away, rather than being committed to paying £12m and developing the property, if the market went the wrong way. Maybe he thought that he might be able to negotiate a better deal once planning permission was obtained. But, whatever his reason for not having a contract, he faced no emotional or social impediment to insisting on some form of legally binding protection before he went ahead with seeking planning permission. Why should equity assist him, when YRML decided to negotiate a better deal?

But it is much easier to see why David Thorner should have been able to invoke proprietary estoppel. His older, gruff and taciturn cousin led him to believe that, if he continued to provide work and companionship, he would inherit the farm. The notion that David could or should have asked for a commitment in writing, in the context of an informal family relationship, seems somewhat unreal. It would have risked harming the relationship with Peter, and the only solicitor he knew would no doubt have been advising Peter. Unlike in Cobbe, formal contractual rights and obligations were simply not the stuff of the relationship between Peter and David Thorner. [. . .]

It may very well be that proprietary estoppel will not often assist a claimant in the commercial context, but that is probably all to the good: in the business world, certainty and clarity are particularly important, and judges should be slow to encourage the introduction of uncertainties based on their views of the ethical acceptability of the behavior of one of the parties.

[. . .] If Mr Crabb believed, to the Council's knowledge, that he had been promised the grant of a right of way, and sold off his field in that belief, there is no reason to doubt that his claim in proprietary estoppel was rightly accepted by the Court of Appeal. But if his claim was simply based on a 'subject to contract' agreement (whether or not those words were used) or on moral indignation, then it may well be that it does not survive Cobbe.

2.2 RELIANCE BY B

To bring a proprietary estoppel claim, B must show that he has relied on A's assurance that B has, or will acquire, a right in relation to A's land. As the facts of the next two cases demonstrate, it might seem that, particularly in domestic or family cases, reliance will be difficult to prove. Nonetheless, in each case, the Court of Appeal held that reliance had occurred.

Greasley v Cooke
[1980] 1 WLR 1306, CA

Facts: Ms Cooke lived in a home owned by Kenneth and Hedley Greasley. She was Kenneth's partner and also cared for Clarice, another member of the Greasley family. Both Kenneth and Hedley had assured Ms Cooke that she would have 'a home for life', but Kenneth died without giving her any right to remain on the land and the current owners of the land wished to remove her. Ms Cooke's proprietary estoppel claim was based on the fact that, because of the assurances that she would have a 'home for life', she had remained there and cared for Clarice, rather than leaving to find paid work. It might seem difficult for her to prove such reliance: after all, because she was, in any case, 'one of the family', she may well have cared for Clarice even if she had not been given any assurances about remaining in the home. Nonetheless, the Court of Appeal held that reliance had occurred.

Lord Denning MR

The first point is on the burden of proof. [In Brikom Investments Ltd v Carr [1979] 2 All ER 753 at 759] I said that, when a person makes a representation intending that another should act on it—

> 'It is no answer for the maker to say: "You would have gone on with the transaction anyway." That must be mere speculation. No one can be sure what he would, or would not, have done in a hypothetical state of affairs which never took place [. . .] Once it is shown that a representation was calculated to influence the judgment of a reasonable man, the presumption is that he was so influenced.'

So here. These statements to [Ms Cooke] were calculated to influence her, so as to put her mind at rest, so that she should not worry about being turned out. No one can say what she would have done if Kenneth and Hedley had not made those statements. It is quite possible that she would have said to herself: 'I am not married to Kenneth. I am on my own. What will happen to me if anything happens to him? I had better look out for another job now rather than stay here where I have no security.' So, instead of looking for another job, she stayed on in the house looking after Kenneth and Clarice. There is a presumption that she did so relying on the assurances given to her by Kenneth and Hedley. The burden is not on her but on them to prove that she did not rely on their assurances. They did not prove it, neither did their representatives.

The approach taken in Greasley v Cooke is consistent with that taken in other areas of law, such as the law of misrepresentation:[44] if A makes a statement that is likely, objectively speaking, to cause B to act in a particular way then, if B does act in that way, it can be presumed that B did act in reliance on A's statement—in other words, the burden shifts to A to show that B would have acted in the same way even if A had not made the statement. In the next case, however, the Court of Appeal departed from that general test in order to allow B's proprietary estoppel claim.

44 See Smith v Chadwick (1884) 9 App Cas 187, 196.

Wayling v Jones

(1993) 69 P & CR 170, CA

Facts: Mr Wayling first met Mr Jones in 1967. In 1971, they began a homosexual relationship and started to live together. At that time, Mr Wayling, a chef, was 21 years of age, while Mr Jones was aged 56. Over the following years, as well as living with Mr Jones, Mr Wayling worked in a number of Mr Jones' businesses. Mr Wayling received 'pocket money' and expenses, but was never given a standard salary for his work. Mr Jones made a will in which Mr Wayling was given a particular hotel (the Glen-y-Mor Hotel) owned by Mr Jones. That hotel was later sold and a different hotel bought (the Royal Hotel), but the will was never updated. So, when Mr Jones died in 1987, his will did not succeed in giving anything to Mr Wayling. Mr Wayling claimed that Mr Jones was under a duty (now binding on Mr Jones' executors), arising under the doctrine of proprietary estoppel, to give Mr Wayling ownership of the Royal Hotel.

Mr Jones had made a number of promises to Mr Wayling as to what would happen on Mr Jones's death: he promised that ownership of the Glen-y-Mor Hotel, and then the Royal Hotel, would go to Mr Wayling. The following exchange took place when Mr Wayling was cross-examined in court by counsel for Mr Jones' executors:

> 'Q: If he had not made that promise to you, would you still have stayed with him?
> A: Yes [. . .]
> Q: The promises were not the reason why you remained with the deceased?
> A: No, we got on very well together. He always wanted to reward me.'

The judge at first instance took this to mean that, because Mr Wayling would have acted in the same way even if he had never been promised Mr Jones' hotel, he could not show that he had relied on Mr Jones' assurances. But the Court of Appeal upheld Mr Wayling's appeal.

Balcombe LJ

At 1030

I am satisfied that [Mr Wayling's] conduct in helping [Mr Jones] run the café in Hastings Street and the Glen-y-Mor Hotel and managing the Royal Hotel for what was at best little more than pocket money [. . .] was conduct from which his reliance on [Mr Jones's] clear promises could be inferred. The question is whether [Mr Jones' executors] have established that [Mr Wayling] did not rely on these promises.

In his affidavit evidence [Mr Wayling] stated that he relied on [Mr Jones'] promises. In his oral evidence-in-chief he said:

> 'Q: One question, Mr Wayling. Assuming you were in the Royal Hotel bar before [Mr Jones's] death and [Mr Jones] was there, if [Mr Jones] had told you that he was not going to give the Royal Hotel to you but to somebody else after his death, what would you have done?
> A: I would have left.'

[. . .] I am satisfied that [Mr Wayling's] answers in cross-examination do not relate to the only question that mattered: "What would you have done if [Mr Jones] had told you that he was no longer prepared to implement his promises?".

> [. . .] I am satisfied:
> (a) that the promises were made;
> (b) that [Mr Wayling's] conduct was of such a nature that inducement may be inferred;
> (c) that [Mr Jones' executors] have not discharged the burden upon them of establishing that the plaintiff did not rely on the promises.

Mr Wayling was a deserving claimant because: (i) only a technical mistake (Mr Jones' failure to update his will) prevented him from acquiring the hotel as expected; and (ii) he had lived with, and worked for, Mr Jones as part of a long-term relationship—he had made sacrifices as a result of that relationship and was, to an extent, dependent on Mr Jones. Nowadays, as well as bringing a proprietary estoppel claim, a party in Mr Wayling's position can also bring a claim under the Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependants) Act 1975. That Act gives the court a power to award a share of A's estate to B, an adult dependant of A, where adequate provision for B has not been made in A's will. When Wayling v Jones was decided, however, the Act did not give the court a power to make an order in favour of A's homosexual partner. So, proprietary estoppel was Mr Wayling's only recourse.

It is therefore, unsurprising, that the Court of Appeal wished to allow B's claim. The difficulty is that, because Mr Wayling had admitted that he would have worked for low pay even if he had not been promised the hotel, it would seem that the executors had met the burden recognised in Greasley v Cooke: they had proved that, in fact, Mr Wayling had not relied on Mr Jones's promises. Yet the Court of Appeal nonetheless allowed Mr Wayling's proprietary estoppel claim. As explained by Cooke in the following extract, this was done by applying an unusual test: to prove that Mr Wayling had not relied, the executors had to show that Mr Wayling would have continued to work for low pay even if he had been told by Mr Jones that Mr Jones intended to break his promise to leave the hotel to him.

Cooke, 'Reliance and Estoppel' [1995] 111 LQR 389, 391

> That this is an unusual interpretation of reliance is best seen by comparing a case where it was held that there was no reliance. In Coombes v. Smith [1986] 1 W.L.R. 809 the plaintiff left her husband, moved into the defendant's house and bore his child. She claimed an interest in the property on the basis of proprietary estoppel. She failed for a number of reasons, among them the fact that she acted as she did, not in reliance upon the defendant's assurance that he would provide for her, but simply because she wanted to. Imagine her reaction if she had heard her partner say that he was not going to provide for her, in spite of his promise. Surely she would have left, because that would have undermined her relationship with him. She would thus have met the Wayling test. But it was held that she did not rely upon the assurance, because the giving of that assurance, and her expectation of an entitlement to the property, did not influence her actions.
> Reliance is an aspect of causation. When we say that someone acted in reliance upon a promise we generally mean that he would not have so acted but for the making of the promise. We cannot say that of Wayling. Alternatively, it seems that reliance in the context of estoppel can mean that the plaintiff would not have acted as he did but for a belief, which was then encouraged by the promise, (as envisaged by Robert Goff J., as he then was, in Amalgamated Investment & Property Co. Ltd. v. Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd. [1982] Q.B. 84 at pp. 104–105). Wayling could not meet that test either, since he did not set up home with Jones in the belief that the latter would leave his property to him. He did so, and he stayed, because of his relationship with the defendant; because, as he put it, "he needed me". Obviously, if he had discovered that Jones was not going to change his will, the relationship would have been undermined, and he would have left. But any broken promise could have had the same effect.

The treatment of reliance in Wayling v. Jones is thus unusually generous. Despite the obvious justice of the result, the means of reaching it was inconsistent with earlier estoppel cases.

It may well be that the in Wayling v Jones, the Court of Appeal modified the general rule in order to give full effect to the nature of the relationship between A and B. As we will see in Chapter 16, a similar relaxation of the general rules is in evidence when B claims shared ownership of a family home. In section 2.1.4 above, we saw that, in applying the first requirement of proprietary estoppel (the need for an assurance by A), there seems to be an important difference between domestic and commercial cases. As a result of Wayling v Jones, that distinction also seems to be significant when considering the requirement of reliance by B. Certainly, it is very unlikely that the same test of reliance, with its generosity to B, would be applied in a commercial case.

2.3 THE PROSPECT OF DETRIMENT TO B

The third element of proprietary estoppel is often referred to as detriment, but it is important to note that B's reliance, in itself, does not need to be detrimental; rather, the key question is whether, given B's reliance, he would suffer a detriment if he had no proprietary estoppel claim against A.[45] In addition, 'the time when the prejudice to a claimant is to be judged is when the person making the representation or promise departs from his promise or indicates that he will break the promise or act otherwise than in accordance with his representation in the future.'[46] This supports the point made by Lord Hoffmann in Thorner v Major, when invoking the owl of Minerva, which flies only at dusk. In a bilateral contract, for example, A's promise coincides with B's provision of consideration to create an immediate duty on A; in contrast, in proprietary estoppel, detriment is judged not at the time of A's assurance, but at a later point.

Gillett v Holt

Facts: Geoffrey Gillett first met Mr Holt at Woodhall Spa golf club in 1952. Geoffrey was then aged 12 and Mr Holt was a gentleman farmer aged 38. Geoffrey became Mr Holt's regular caddie and a friendship developed between them. In 1956, Geoffrey left school to start working on Mr Holt's farm (The Limes). He continued working for Mr Holt, taking on extra responsibilities, for over thirty-eight years. In 1971, Mr Gillett and his wife moved into a farmhouse (The Beeches), newly acquired by a company (KAHL)

[45] This point is made most clearly in an influential passage from the judgment of Dixon J in Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1938) 59 CLR 641, 674–5. That passage was quoted with approval by Robert Walker LJ in Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210, 232–3.

[46] Per Warren J in Clarke v Meadus [2010] EWHC 3117 (Ch), [65].

controlled by Mr Holt. In 1995, Mr Holt attempted to sack Mr Gillett and to remove him from The Beeches. Mr Holt also altered his will so that Mr Gillett was no longer the principal beneficiary.[47]

Mr Gillett claimed that Mr Holt was under a duty, arising as a result of proprietary estoppel: (i) not to remove him and his wife from The Beeches; and (ii) to transfer to him at least some of the The Limes. Mr Gillett claimed that, during the period from 1964 to 1989, Mr Holt gave seven 'specific assurances' that 'one day, he (Mr Gillett) would own the farm'. It was claimed that these assurances reflected a general understanding between Mr Gillett and Mr Holt, and were usually at significant events: for example, after Mr Gillett brought in his first harvest (1964) and at the christening of Mr Gillett's first child (1971).

Robert Walker LJ

[I]n this case Mr Holt's assurances were repeated over a long period, usually before the assembled company on special family occasions, and some of them (such as "it was all going to be ours anyway" [in 1975]) were completely unambiguous [...] Plainly the assurances given on this occasion were intended to be relied on, and were in fact relied on.

It is therefore necessary to go on to consider detriment [...] It is understandable that the judge devoted most attention to the issue of Mr Gillett being underpaid because that was the issue (affecting detriment) on which most time was spent in cross-examination [...] The judge said that he was not persuaded, on the evidence, that Mr Gillett did in fact receive less than a reasonable wage for his services as a manager, or that he did so as part of an understanding related to his expectations, and that conclusion has not been seriously challenged in this court.

Both sides agree that the element of detriment is an essential ingredient of proprietary estoppel [...] The overwhelming weight of authority shows that detriment is required. But the authorities also show that it is not a narrow or technical concept. The detriment need not consist of the expenditure of money or other quantifiable financial detriment, so long as it is something substantial. The requirement must be approached as part of a broad inquiry as to whether repudiation of an assurance is or is not unconscionable in all the circumstances.

[...] There must be sufficient causal link between the assurance relied on and the detriment asserted. The issue of detriment must be judged at the moment when the person who has given the assurance seeks to go back on it. Whether the detriment is sufficiently substantial is to be tested by whether it would be unjust or inequitable to allow the assurance to be disregarded—that is, again, the essential test of unconscionability. The detriment alleged must be pleaded and proved [...]

The matters which Mr Gillett pleaded as detriment, and on which he adduced evidence of detriment, included, apart from the level of his remuneration, (i) his continuing in Mr Holt's employment (through KAHL) and not seeking or accepting offers of employment elsewhere, or going into business on his own account; (ii) carrying out tasks and spending time beyond the normal scope of an employee's duty; (iii) taking no substantial steps to secure his future wealth, either by larger pension contributions or otherwise; and (iv) expenditure on improving [47] The principal beneficiary instead was a Mr Wood, whom Mr Holt had met in 1992. According to the first instance judge in Gillett v Holt, 'Mr Holt's relationship with Mr Wood developed into something of an obsession, which was of concern to his family and other friends': see [2001] Ch 210, 222.

The Beeches farmhouse which was, Mr Gillett said, barely habitable when it was first acquired by KAHL in 1971. That company paid for some structural work, with a local authority improvement grant, but Mr Gillett paid for new fittings and materials and carried out a good deal of the work himself [. . .]

[. . .] After listening to lengthy submissions about the judgment, and after reading much of Mr Gillett's evidence both in his witness statement and under cross-examination, I am left with the feeling that the judge, despite his very clear and careful judgment, did not stand back and look at the matter in the round. Had he done so I think he would have recognised that Mr Gillett's case on detriment (on the facts found by the judge, and on Mr Gillett's uncontradicted evidence) was an unusually compelling one.

[Having decided that the requirements of proprietary estoppel had been met, Robert Walker LJ went on to consider how to 'satisfy the equity'—that is, how to decide on the extent of Mr Gillett's right. It was held that Mr Holt and KAHL were under a duty to: (i) transfer to Mr Gillett the freehold of The Beeches (including the farmhouse and 42 hectares of attached land); and (ii) pay Mr Gillett £100,000 as compensation for not receiving any of The Limes.]

The Court of Appeal thus rejected the argument that detriment should be interpreted in a narrow, purely financial way. As Lord Denning MR had earlier put it in Greasley v Cooke:[48] 'It so happens that in many of these cases there has been expenditure of money. But that is not a necessary element [. . .] It is sufficient if the party, to whom the assurance is given, acts on the faith of it in such circumstances that it would be unjust and inequitable for the party making the assurance to go back on it [. . .]'

The decision in Gillett v Holt also shows that B's action in reliance on A's assurance does not need to be wholly detrimental to B. For example, in Gillett, it could be said that Geoffrey benefitted from being allowed to live, with his wife, in The Beeches. As the Privy Council explained in the following case, however, the crucial question in relation to detriment is whether such benefits outweigh the prejudice that B would suffer if A were wholly free to go back on A's assurance to B.

Henry v Henry
[2010] 1 All ER 988

Facts: Calixtus Henry claimed to be entitled to an undivided half share in a plot of rural land on a hillside in Jalousie, St Lucia; Theresa Henry was the registered proprietor of that half-share, having purchased it in 1999 from Geraldine Pierre, just two months before Geraldine's death. During her life, Geraldine had told her relatives that they could possess the land if they remained to work the land and care for her. Calixtus was the only person to accept this offer; other relatives left St Lucia and moved to St Croix, in the US Virgin Islands, for an easier life. By the time of Geraldine's death, Calixtus had lived on the land for more than 30 years, cultivating it and caring for Geraldine, who had made further promises to Calixtus that she would then leave her share in the plot to him. The trial judge dismissed Calixtus' proprietary estoppel claim. One of his grounds for doing so was that Calixtus had not suffered a detriment: whilst he had cared for Geraldine and cultivated the land, he had also received the countervailing advantages of rent-free accommodation and the benefit of any produce of the land not personally needed by Geraldine. The Court of Appeal of the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court allowed Calixtus's appeal, declaring that he was the true owner of the half share registered in Theresa's name. The Privy Council considered various points, both on appeal on cross-appeal. One of these points was as to whether the correct test had been applied on the question of detriment.

Sir Jonathan Parker (giving the advice of the Board)

In the judgment of the Board, the [trial] judge clearly misdirected himself in his approach to the issue of detriment. He said [. . .] that Calixtus Henry could not say that he had acted to his detriment and that, far from having suffered detriment because of his reliance on the deceased's promises, he positively benefited. But he did not attempt to weigh the disadvantages suffered by Calixtus Henry by reason of his reliance on Geraldine Pierre's promises against the countervailing advantages which he enjoyed as a consequence of that reliance. That is a process which, on principle, he should have undertaken. [. . .]

[. . .] Had he done so, he would have brought into account on, as it were, the debit side of the account [. . .] the fact that other members of the family had not responded to Geraldine's offer of 'an opportunity to possess land on the mountain . . . if they would work the land and cared for her in her own country as she did not want to leave St Lucia to live abroad or to live in St Croix', but instead had moved to St Croix where they were able to live more comfortably.

As well as establishing if a detriment would occur if A were free to renege on his or her assurance to B, a court will usually also have to take a view on the extent of B's detriment. This is because, as we will see in section 3 below, the nature of A's duty to B may well depend, at least in part, on the degree of detriment to which B is exposed by A's failure to honour his or her assurance.

2.4 THE ROLE OF UNCONSCIONABILITY

There is a debate as to the precise role of unconscionability within the doctrine of proprietary estoppel. It is clear that B cannot bypass the three requirements set out above and acquire a right by simply showing that A has behaved unconscionably. For example, Lord Scott in Yeomans Row v Cobbe stated that 'unconscionability of conduct may well lead to a remedy but, in my opinion, proprietary estoppel cannot be the route to it unless the ingredients for a proprietary estoppel are present.' And, writing extra-judicially, Lord Neuberger has opined that: 'equity is not a sort of moral US fifth cavalry riding to the rescue every time a claimant is left worse off than he anticipated as a result of the defendants behaving badly, and the common law affords him no remedy.'[49] It is equally clear that the concept of unconscionability has played some role in the fashioning of the requirements of proprietary estoppel, and of the judges' interpretation of those requirements. As Robert Walker LJ put it in Gillett v Holt:

'the fundamental principle that equity is concerned to prevent unconscionable conduct permeates all the elements of the doctrine. In the end the court must look at the matter in the round.'[50]

49 'The Stuffing of Minerva's Owl? Taxonomy and Taxidermy in Equity' [2009] CLJ 537, 540.
50 [2001] Ch 210 (CA), 225.

The difficulty of establishing the exact role of unconscionability is well demonstrated by the Court of Appeal's decision in the following case.

Taylor Fashions v Liverpool Victoria Trustees; Old & Campbell v Liverpool Victoria Friendly Society
[1982] QB 133, CA

Facts: Each of Taylor Fashions (Taylors) and Old & Campbell (Olds) made a separate claim that it had a right to renew a lease of business premises. The landlord, Liverpool Victoria, denied that either Taylors or Olds had such a right. All of the parties had acted on the basis that both Taylors and Olds did have a right to renew the lease: they all assumed that an earlier lease that contained such a right bound Liverpool Victoria. As a result, Taylors and Olds had, for example, spent money on improving the premises. But that general assumption was mistaken: Liverpool Victoria was not bound by the earlier lease. Taylors and Olds, because each had acted in reliance on the mistaken belief that it had a right to renew, argued that Liverpool Victoria was now estopped from denying the existence of the right to renew. Liverpool Victoria argued that proprietary estoppel could not apply, because it had not acted unconscionably, nor had it tried to deceive Taylor or Olds: it, too, had genuinely believed that it was bound by the earlier lease.

Oliver J

This is the principal point upon which the parties divide. [Counsel for Taylors and Olds] contend that what the court has to look at in relation to the party alleged to be estopped is only his conduct and its result, and not—or, at any rate, not necessarily—his state of mind. It then has to ask whether what that party is now seeking to do is unconscionable. [Counsel for Liverpool Victoria] contends that it is an essential feature of this particular equitable doctrine that the party alleged to be estopped must, before the assertion of his strict rights can be considered unconscionable, be aware both of what his strict rights were and of the fact that the other party is acting in the belief that they will not be enforced against him [That contention of counsel was supported by the decision of Fry J in Willmott v Barber.[51] In that case, Fry J set out five criteria or 'probanda' for proprietary estoppel, one of which is that A, when making a representation to B that B has a particular right in relation to A's land, must be aware of his true rights against B.]

Now, convenient and attractive as I find [counsel for Liverpool Victoria's] submissions as a matter of argument, I am not at all sure that so orderly and tidy a theory is really deducible from the authorities—certainly from the more recent authorities, which seem to me to support a much wider equitable jurisdiction to interfere in cases where the assertion of strict legal rights is found by the court to be unconscionable. It may well be (although I think that this must now be considered open to doubt) that the strict Willmott v. Barber probanda are applicable as necessary requirements in those cases where all that has happened is that the party alleged to be estopped has stood by without protest while his rights have been infringed [. . .] in a case of mere passivity, it is readily intelligible that there must be shown a duty to speak, protest or interfere which cannot normally arise in the absence of knowledge or at least a suspicion of the true position.

[Oliver J then examined a number of authorities, before continuing as follows.]

[...] the more recent cases indicate, in my judgment, that the application of the Ramsden v Dyson[52] principle—whether you call it proprietary estoppel, estoppel by acquiescence or estoppel by encouragement is really immaterial—requires a very much broader approach which is directed rather at ascertaining whether, in particular individual circumstances, it would be unconscionable for a party to be permitted to deny that which knowingly, or unknowingly, he has allowed or encouraged another to assume to his detriment than to inquiring whether the circumstances can be fitted within the confines of some preconceived formula serving as a universal yardstick for every form of unconscionable behaviour.

So regarded, knowledge of the true position by the party alleged to be estopped becomes merely one of the relevant factors—it may even be a determining factor in certain cases—in the overall inquiry [...]

The inquiry which I have to make therefore, as it seems to me, is simply whether, in all the circumstances of this case, it was unconscionable for the defendants to seek to take advantage of the mistake which, at the material time, everybody shared, and, in approaching that, I must consider the cases of the two plaintiffs separately because it may be that quite different considerations apply to each.

Oliver J's conclusion was that Taylors' claim failed, but Olds' claim succeeded. The difficulties for Taylors were: (i) Liverpool Victoria had not encouraged Taylors to believe that it had a right to renew the lease; but instead, both parties had assumed that such a right existed; and (ii) it was not clear that the improvements made to the premises by Taylors were carried out in reliance on its belief that it had a right to renew the lease, because Taylors, in any case, benefited from those improvements by continuing to use the premises up to the end of its existing lease. In contrast, Olds had been encouraged by Liverpool Victoria to spend a 'very large sum' on improving the premises precisely because of the belief that it would be able, at the end of the existing lease, to renew that lease and continue using the premises. As a result, Liverpool Victoria was ordered to allow Olds to renew its lease.

The decision in Taylor has been hailed as allowing an important relaxation in the requirements of proprietary estoppel: indeed, it has been called a 'watershed in the development of proprietary estoppel'.[53] Certainly, Oliver J made clear that B can acquire a right through proprietary estoppel even if the five strict requirements laid down by Willmott v Barber have not all been fulfilled. And, in reaching that conclusion, Oliver J emphasized that proprietary estoppel, a doctrine developed by courts of equity, ultimately depends on the notion of unconscionability.

But we need to be careful. In fact, it was counsel for the defendants, Liverpool Victoria, who emphasised the importance of unconscionability. This is because Liverpool Victoria had not acted deceitfully or led anyone 'up the garden path': when leading Olds to believe that Olds had a right to renew its lease, Liverpool Victoria had honestly (but mistakenly) believed that Olds did have such a right. The actual decision in Taylor Fashions thus demonstrates that a proprietary estoppel claim can succeed even if A has not deceived B by leading B to believe something that A knows to be false. In other words, the decision could be said to stand for the fact that, if the three elements of proprietary estoppel are satisfied, it does not matter whether or not A's behaviour can be said, in a general sense, to be unconscionable.

52 (1866) LR 1 HL 129 (see section 2.1.2 above).

53 See Robert Walker LJ in Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210, 225, quoting from Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (2nd edn, 1993, p 324). See now Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009, [9.2.36]).

Taylor Fashions, then, cannot provide us with a clear answer as to the role of unconscionability. The question was also considered by Lord Walker in Cobbe.

Yeoman's Row Management Limited v Cobbe
[2008] 1 WLR 1752, HL

Lord Walker

[Counsel for Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring] devoted a separate section of his printed case to arguing that even if the elements for an estoppel were in other respects present, it would not in any event be unconscionable for Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring to insist on her legal rights. That argument raises the question whether "unconscionability" is a separate element in making out a case of estoppel, or whether to regard it as a separate element would be what Professor Peter Birks once called "a fifth wheel on the coach".[54] But Birks was there criticising the use of "unconscionable" to describe a state of mind.[55] Here it is being used (as in my opinion it should always be used) as an objective value judgment on behaviour (regardless of the state of mind of the individual in question). As such it does in my opinion play a very important part in the doctrine of equitable estoppel, in unifying and confirming, as it were, the other elements. If the other elements appear to be present but the result does not shock the conscience of the court, the analysis needs to be looked at again. In this case Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring's conduct was unattractive. She chose to stand on her rights rather than respecting her non-binding assurances, while Mr Cobbe continued to spend time and effort, between Christmas 2003 and March 2004, in obtaining planning permission. But Mr Cobbe knew that she was bound in honour only, and so in the eyes of equity her conduct, although unattractive, was not unconscionable.

Lord Walker thus seems to suggest that unconscionability may have a role to play in the test for proprietary estoppel: not as a separate requirement, but rather as a concept to be borne in mind when interpreting the specific criteria of the doctrine. This point is developed in the following extract, which also notes that Lord Walker's view of the role of unconscionability may have shifted since his discussion of it in Gillett v Holt.[56]

Hopkins, 'Proprietary Estoppel: A Functional Analysis' (2010) 4 Journal of Equity 1

Robert Walker LJ [in Gillett v Holt] appeared to envisage two distinct roles for unconscionability. First as feeding into the assessment of whether the other elements of the claim were fulfilled: hence in Gillett, conduct that had been considered insufficient to constitute detriment at first instance when viewed in isolation, was considered by the Court of Appeal to be 'unusually compelling' when judged as a question of whether the claimant had so conducted himself that it would now be unconscionable for the representor to renege on the assurance. Second, the concept appeared to provide a mechanism through which the court would assess claims 'in the round.' The consequence of this second role appeared to be that even where an assurance, reliance and detriment were found, a successful claim was subject to the court being satisfied, on a holistic assessment, that at the time the representor reneged it was unconscionable for him or her to do so [...]

[54] [See Birks in Breach of Trust (eds Birks and Pretto, Oxford:Hart, 2002, p 226).]

[55] [The specific use of the term discussed by Birks comes from Bank of Credit & Commerce International (Overseas) Ltd v Akindele [2001] Ch 437, 455, per Nourse LJ. That case did not concern estoppel, but rather the question of whether a third party receiving a right held on trust can be liable, due to his 'knowing receipt' of the right, to account to the beneficiary of the trust.]

[Given] Lord Walker's own previous enthusiasm for the concept, the relative lack of discussion of unconscionability in Cobbe and Thorner appears both significant and surprising. It will be suggested that while no uniform picture emerges, there is evidence of an attempt by Lord Walker to shift the focus of unconscionability further towards the other elements of an estoppel claim. In this way, unconscionability continues to play a central role in the informal acquisition of rights in land through proprietary estoppels [...]

In Lord Walker's view in Cobbe [...] the other elements [i.e. assurance, reliance, and detriment] cannot be fulfilled unless the result 'shocks the conscience'. The other elements may only appear to be fulfilled. Hence, having found that the other elements were not present, Lord Walker could not concur with the classification of Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring's conduct as unconscionable. In his judgment, unconscionability has no role independent from the other elements. Implicitly, this means that those other elements should be assessed in the context of determining whether it would be unconscionable for the representor to renege. Only by doing so can the courts ensure that the elements will be fulfilled only when the result 'shocks the conscience'. In effect, what seemed to be two distinct roles for unconscionability outlined by Robert Walker LJ in Gillett became a single role in Cobbe. Whether seen as part-and-parcel of the assessment of the other elements, or as the basis for an 'in the round' evaluation, only two outcomes are possible: a claim will succeed because the three elements of assurance, reliance and detriment are present and this necessarily means that it is unconscionable for the representor to renege; or a claim will fail because one or more of those requirements has not been met. It is logically impossible under Lord Walker's judgment... for a court to find that an assurance, reliance and detriment are actually present (as opposed to appearing to be present), but for a claim still to fail on the basis that it would not be unconscionable for the representor to renege.

[...] [T]he absence of discussion of unconscionability in Cobbe and Thorner does not necessarily make a move away from the significance of the concept in estoppel claims. Instead, what may emerge from the cases is a greater focus on the connection between unconscionability and the other elements of an estoppel claim. If maintained, the effect may be to consolidate the role of unconscionability by preventing the potential misuse of the concept that can arise when it is seen as not merely having a role independent from those elements but sufficient on its own to form the basis of a claim [...] However, our understanding and interpretation of the detailed rules, and therefore of the informal acquisition of rights in land through estoppel, is inseparable from the underlying concept of unconscionability.

There is, however, no academic consensus as to the precise role played by the concept of unconscionability in a proprietary estoppel claim. For example, in the next extract, the author argues that the concept must be given a meaning that is distinct from the three requirements of assurance, reliance, and detriment.[57]

[57] The extract was written before the decisions in Cobbe and Thorner, but, as noted below, the author's views on the issue remain essentially the same after those cases: see Dixon, 'Confining and Defining Proprietary Estoppel: the Role of Unconscionability' (2010) 30 LS 408.

Dixon, 'Proprietary Estoppel and Formalities in Land Law and the Land Registration Act 2002: A Theory of Unconscionability' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 2 (ed Cooke, 2002)

At p 175

The central role that unconscionability plays in the law of estoppel seems, at least to the present writer, to be in inverse proportion to the analysis devoted to it in the cases. All judges are agreed that unconscionability is vital, but few seem willing to share their understanding of the concept [. . .]

At p 177

[On one view of proprietary estoppel] 'unconscionability' has no independent existence for it is defined purely in terms of the three factual requirements. The corollary is, of course, that unconscionability exists by definition whenever there is an assurance, reliance and detriment, because non-performance of the assurance after detriment will always be unconscionable. Such a view is at odds with those who view unconscionability as at the heart of the doctrine—in the sense of providing its underlying rationale—because, quite simply it denies the concept of any discernible meaning. It is a non-definition.

If it is true that unconscionability is now to be regarded as no more than a function of assurance, reliance and detriment, this author submits that the approach is flawed and unprincipled. There are a number of reasons. First, and formally, this 'definition' of unconscionability is not supported by Taylor Fashions itself. A straightforward reading of Oliver J's judgment suggests that before an estoppel can be established, there must be an assurance, reliance and detriment (albeit holistically examined), but that this must occur in circumstances where the court is satisfied that it would be unconscionable to allow the party making the assurance to go back on it. Or, put shortly, Taylor Fashions suggests that assurance, reliance and detriment are necessary but not sufficient. Secondly, if unconscionability is simply the reflection of a withdrawn assurance after detrimental reliance, how does it justify the grant of an estoppel remedy in the formality cases, bearing in mind the point that estoppel is an exception to the normal formality rules? The whole point of the formality rules is to ensure that a representation about a property right shall be capable of enforcement only if it is in a proper form. If the proper form can be ignored simply because the representee has relied on the representation to his detriment, that is tantamount to saying that the formality rules invalidate only 'voluntary' promises, being those where there is no detriment issuing from the promisee [. . .]

At p 180

In so far as the general law requires the creation, transfer or enforcement of proprietary rights to be undertaken in certain forms, estoppel can be used to side-step these requirements only where there is a clear justification. That it would be 'unconscionable' for one of the parties to rely on the absence of the required formality is that justification. This means that unconscionability cannot be merely a function of assurance, reliance and detriment (the factual elements of estoppel) for otherwise it is devoid of meaning [. . .] 'unconscionability' can explain why the absence of formality may be ignored—in the sense that a right still ensues for the claimant—if the concept is tied to the formality rules. Hence, it will be unconscionable for a representor to withdraw an assurance, relied on to detriment, if the assurance of the rights carries with it (expressly or impliedly) a further assurance that the right will ensue even if the formalities necessary to convey the right are not complied with. It is the withdrawal of the promise of the right after the second assurance (assuming detrimental reliance) that constitutes the unconscionability required for a successful claim in estoppel.

Although it is submitted that unconscionability in the narrow sense just discussed must be present before a claim can succeed, that does not mean that the claim must then succeed. The 'double assurance', withdrawn after detrimental reliance is necessary but not sufficient. There still remains the broad equitable jurisdiction either to deny the remedy or modify the remedy because of the background circumstances of the case [...] Of course, this is not [an] unfettered and unprincipled discretion... but it is in keeping with the use of estoppel as a remedy protecting those who cannot rely on formality and who instead must plead the favour of the court.

Dixon's main point is an important one and raises the question we noted in Chapter 7, section 3.7: if a failure to satisfy a formality rule means that A has not granted B a property right, nor made a contractual promise to B, is that formality rule undermined if we recognise that B has acquired a right through proprietary estoppel? In Chapter 7, section 3.7 we considered an extract from a more recent article by Dixon,[58] in which he again relates 'unconscionability' not to the three elements of assurance, reliance and detriment, but to the question of whether it is permissible for B to acquire a right in the absence of formality: in Dixon's words, '[u]nconscionability is a function of formality, not of assurance, reliance and detriment.'[59]

A sensitivity to the formality rules does not mean, however, that the role of proprietary estoppel can be justified only by viewing unconscionability as an independent requirement of the doctrine. It rather means that, if we take the view that A's duty arises simply because of A's commitment, B's reliance, and the prospect of B's detriment, we need to explain why those factors impose a duty on A to B. We then have to ask if our explanation can also justify the fact that proprietary estoppel can operate without formality; but it may be that it can do so without invoking unconscionability.

3 THE EXTENT OF A'S DUTY TO B: REMEDYING A PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL

If B can show that proprietary estoppel imposes a duty on A, we then need to know the extent of A's duty. This task is often said to be one of deciding what remedy to give, or how best to 'satisfy the equity' arising,[60] where B has made a successful proprietary estoppel claim.

In any particular case, there are a number of possible ways in which the extent of A's duty might be determined. For example, it could be that:

- A is under a duty to honour his commitment to B—in such a case, the extent of A's duty depends on the extent of A's commitment to B; or
- A is under a duty to ensure B suffers no detriment as a result of A's failure to honour his commitment—in such a case, the extent of A's duty depends on the extent of B's potential detriment; or 58 Dixon, 'Confining and Defining Proprietary Estoppel: the Role of Unconscionability' (2010) 30 LS 408.

59 Ibid, p 418.

60 In accordance with the terminology employed in Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179 by Lord Denning MR (at 190) and by Scarman LJ (at 193, 198–9).

- A is under a duty to pay B the value of any benefit A has received as a result of B's reliance on A—in such a case, the extent of A's duty is determined by the extent of the benefit that A has received at B's expense; or
- A is under a duty to do whatever is necessary to ensure that A does not act unconscionably—in such a case, the extent of A's duty depends on what a court determines that A must do to avoid behaving badly.

Of course, there may be other possibilities; equally, one of the four measures could be adopted in a certain set of cases, with other measures used in other cases.[61] Unfortunately, it is not currently possible to describe the courts' approach in a way which is both clear and consistent with the results of the cases. The most thorough judicial treatment of the question is contained in the following extract.

Jennings v Rice

Facts: Mrs Royle, a childless widow, lived at Lawn House, Shapwick, in Somerset. She died in 1997. Mr Jennings had started to work for her in 1970 as a part-time gardener. He later began to do other work for her (e.g. running errands, taking her shopping, doing minor maintenance work). In the late 1980s, Mrs Royle stopped paying Mr Jennings for these services, but she provided him with £2,000 towards the purchase of a house. By the mid-1990s, Mr Jennings, at Mrs Royle's request, cared for her and stayed overnight at her house. In return, Mrs Royle assured him that, in her will, she would 'see him right'—but she died without leaving a will.

Mr Jennings claimed that, at her death, Mrs Royle was under a duty to Mr Jennings, arising as a result of proprietary estoppel. The first instance judge held that Mrs Royle (and so now Mr Rice, her personal representative) was under a duty to pay Mr Jennings £200,000. Mr Jennings appealed, claiming that Mr Rice was under a duty to give him the whole of Mrs Royle's estate (valued at £1.285m) or, at least, a sum equal to the value of Mrs Royle's house and its furniture (£435,000). The Court of Appeal upheld the award of the first instance judge: on her death, Mrs Royle was under a duty to pay Mr Jennings £200,000.

Aldous LJ

At [15]–[22]

The [first instance] judge then had to decide what was the appropriate relief [. . .] He concluded that he had a discretion to be exercised judicially in the light of all the relevant circumstances. He took into account, first that Mr Jennings did not know the extent of Mrs Royle's wealth and second, that the value of her actual estate and even the part known to Mr Jennings was out of all proportion to what Mr Jennings might reasonably have charged for the services he provided free. He then considered whether it would be equitable for Mr Jennings to take the house and the furniture which were the minimum he expected, and also what the judge called the problem of proportionality. The judge reminded himself that the house was valued at £420,000 and was not a suitable house for Mr Jennings to reside in on his own and he took into account that Mrs Royle had no special obligations to her family. He said that to reward an employee on the scale of £420,000 was excessive. He also compared the cost of full-time nursing care, which he estimated at £200,000, with the value of the house. He reasoned that Mr Jennings would probably need £150,000 to buy a house. He concluded:

> 'I do not think that he could complain that he had been unfairly treated if he had been left £200,000 in Mrs Royle's will. Most people would say that she would, at least, then have performed her promise to see him all right. The quality of her assurance affects not only questions of belief, encouragement, reliance and detriment, but also unconscionability and the extent of the equity.'

Mr Warner, who appeared for Mr Jennings, submitted that in a case like the present, where the claimant had established his claim of proprietary estoppel, the basic rule was that the established equity should be satisfied by making good the expectation. He accepted that there were exceptions, for example where there had been misconduct, but this case did not fall within any of them [...]

Miss Rich, who appeared for the respondents, supported the conclusion and reasoning of the judge. She submitted that to arrive at the correct award, the starting point was the claimant's expectation as that would indicate the maximum extent of the equity. However the court's task did not end there. The ultimate aim was to achieve justice. That was achieved by making the award proportionate to the expectation and the detriment suffered [...]

Before coming to the authorities which establish the approach necessary to arrive at the correct award, it is instructive to consider the basic principles of proprietary estoppel [...]

There can be no doubt that reliance and detriment are two of the requirements of proprietary estoppel and that the basis of the estoppel is, as Lord Denning MR said in Crabb's case, the interposition of equity: thus the requirement of unconscionability. If the conscience of the court is involved, it would be odd that the amount of the award should be set rigidly at the sum expected by the claimant.

Against that background I turn to consider the crucial question in this case, namely how to give effect to the estoppel. Mr Warner took us back to cases decided in the last century. For my part, I believe it is appropriate to start with Crabb's case, decided in 1976 [...]

There is a clear line of authority from at least Crabb's case to the present day which establishes that once the elements of proprietary estoppel are established an equity arises. The value of that equity will depend upon all the circumstances including the expectation and the detriment. The task of the court is to do justice. The most essential requirement is that there must be proportionality between the expectation and the detriment.

Mr Warner warned against the conclusion I have reached. He submitted that it led to uncertainty and that the appropriate course was to satisfy the expectation. I accept that the flexible approach adopted in the past may mean that there is room for what has been referred to as a judicial discretion, but the rigidity of the approach advocated by Mr Warner can lead to injustice which could not form the basis of an equitable result. One only has to alter the facts of this case to illustrate the unsatisfactory nature of Mr Warner's submissions. The expectation was that Mr Jennings would receive the house and furniture valued at £435,000. If he had been left £5 or £50,000 or £200,000 in Mrs Royle's will, or she had died one month, one year or 20 years after making the representation relied on, should the court award the same sum? Yes, said Mr Warner. The result could then have been that Mr Jennings would receive £635,000 made up of the expectation and the legacy of £200,000, or perhaps, £435,000 in total, even when the detriment was say £800.

The judge was right to conclude that the award must be proportionate. He took into account the relevant factors as placed before him, namely the expectation, the detriment, the position of Mr Jennings and the amount available. His conclusion was the result of a judgment to which he was entitled to come. I would not interfere with it and would dismiss the appeal.

Robert Walker LJ

I also agree that this appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by Aldous LJ. Because of the general interest of this appeal I add some observations of my own.

It cannot be doubted that in this as in every other area of the law, the court must take a principled approach, and cannot exercise a completely unfettered discretion according to the individual judge's notion of what is fair in any particular case [...]

The need to search for the right principles cannot be avoided. But it is unlikely to be a short or simple search, because (as appears from both the English and the Australian authorities) proprietary estoppel can apply in a wide variety of factual situations, and any summary formula is likely to prove to be an over-simplification. The cases show a wide range of variation in both of the main elements, that is the quality of the assurances which give rise to the claimant's expectations and the extent of the claimant's detrimental reliance on the assurances. The doctrine applies only if these elements, in combination, make it unconscionable for the person giving the assurances (whom I will call the benefactor, although that may not always be an appropriate label) to go back on them.

Sometimes the assurances, and the claimant's reliance on them, have a consensual character falling not far short of an enforceable contract (if the only bar to the formation of a contract is non-compliance with s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, the proprietary estoppel may become indistinguishable from a constructive trust: Yaxley v Gotts).[62] In a case of that sort both the claimant's expectations and the element of detriment to the claimant will have been defined with reasonable clarity. A typical case would be an elderly benefactor who reaches a clear understanding with the claimant (who may be a relative, a friend, or a remunerated companion or carer) that if the claimant resides with and cares for the benefactor, the claimant will inherit the benefactor's house (or will have a home for life). In a case like that the consensual element of what has happened suggests that the claimant and the benefactor probably regarded the expected benefit and the accepted detriment as being (in a general, imprecise way) equivalent, or at any rate not obviously disproportionate [...]

However the claimant's expectations may not be focused on any specific property [...] Moreover (as the judge's findings in this case vividly illustrate) the claimant's expectations may have been formed on the basis of vague and inconsistent assurances. The judge said of Mrs Royle that she 'was prone to saying different things at different times and, perhaps deliberately, couched her promises in non-specific terms'. He made that observation in relation to the failure of the contract claim, but it is relevant to the estoppel claim also.

If the claimant's expectations are uncertain (as will be the case with many honest claimants) then their specific vindication cannot be the appropriate test. A similar problem arises if the court, although satisfied that the claimant has a genuine claim, is not satisfied that the high level of the claimant's expectations is fairly derived from his deceased patron's assurances, which may have justified only a lower level of expectation. In such cases the court may still take the claimant's expectations (or the upper end of any range of expectations) as a starting point, but unless constrained by authority I would regard it as no more than a starting point.

I do not see that approach as being inconsistent with authority. On the contrary, I think it is supported by a substantial body of English authority. Scarman LJ's well-known reference to 'the minimum equity to do justice to the plaintiff'[63] must no doubt be read in the context of the rather unusual facts of that case, but it does not stand alone [...] Scarman LJ's reference to the minimum does not require the court to be constitutionally parsimonious, but it does implicitly recognise that the court must also do justice to the defendant.

It is no coincidence that these statements of principle refer to satisfying the equity (rather than satisfying, or vindicating, the claimant's expectations). The equity arises not from the claimant's expectations alone, but from the combination of expectations, detrimental reliance, and the unconscionableness of allowing the benefactor (or the deceased benefactor's estate) to go back on the assurances.

To recapitulate: there is a category of case in which the benefactor and the claimant have reached a mutual understanding which is in reasonably clear terms but does not amount to a contract. I have already referred to the typical case of a carer who has the expectation of coming into the benefactor's house, either outright or for life. In such a case the court's natural response is to fulfil the claimant's expectations. But if the claimant's expectations are uncertain, or extravagant, or out of all proportion to the detriment which the claimant has suffered, the court can and should recognise that the claimant's equity should be satisfied in another (and generally more limited) way.

But that does not mean that the court should in such a case abandon expectations completely, and look to the detriment suffered by the claimant as defining the appropriate measure of relief. Indeed in many cases the detriment may be even more difficult to quantify, in financial terms, than the claimant's expectations. Detriment can be quantified with reasonable precision if it consists solely of expenditure on improvements to another person's house, and in some cases of that sort an equitable charge for the expenditure may be sufficient to satisfy the equity.[64] But the detriment of an ever increasing burden of care for an elderly person, and of having to be subservient to his or her moods and wishes, is very difficult to quantify in money terms. Moreover the claimant may not be motivated solely by reliance on the benefactor's assurances, and may receive some countervailing benefits (such as free bed and board). In such circumstances the court has to exercise a wide judgmental discretion.

It would be unwise to attempt any comprehensive enumeration of the factors relevant to the exercise of the court's discretion, or to suggest any hierarchy of factors. In my view they include, but are not limited to, the factors mentioned in Dr Gardner's third hypothesis[65] (misconduct of the claimant as in J Willis & Sons v Willis[66] or particularly oppressive conduct on the part of the defendant, as in Crabb's case or Pascoe v Turner).[67] To these can safely be added: the court's recognition that it cannot compel people who have fallen out to live peaceably together, so that there may be a need for a clean break; alterations in the benefactor's assets and circumstances, especially where the benefactor's assurances have been given, and the claimant's detriment has been suffered, over a long period of years; the likely effect of taxation; and (to a limited degree) the other claims (legal or moral) on the benefactor or his or her estate. No doubt there are many other factors which it may be right for the court to take into account in particular factual situations.

> [. . .] The essence of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel is to do what is necessary to avoid an unconscionable result, and a disproportionate remedy cannot be the right way of going about that.

On the approach adopted by the Court of Appeal in Jennings, proprietary estoppel does not always lead to A being under a duty to honour a commitment made to B. This point was emphasised by the Privy Council in Henry v Henry (the facts of the case are set out in section 2.3 above).[68] The court below had assumed that, once it had held that Calixtus had made out his proprietary estoppel claim, Geraldine must necessarily have been under a duty to honour her assurance to Calixtus. The Privy Council firmly rejected this approach: as Sir Jonathan Parker put it, the approach of the court below: 'betrays a fundamental misconception as to the nature and purpose of the doctrine of proprietary estoppels [. . .] Proportionality lies at the heart of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel and permeates its every application.'[69]

Certainly, it would be difficult to defend a rule that, in all cases of proprietary estoppel, A's duty must be to honour his or her assurance to B.[70] After all, in cases such as Jennings and Henry, A is under no contractual duty to B, not least because of the absence of the signed writing required for a contract to dispose of an interest in land (see further Chapter 7, section 3). We saw in section 2.1.3 above that, in Walton v Walton,[71] Hoffmann LJ (as he then was) emphasised the distinction between contractual claims and proprietary estoppel. In the latter case, A's assurance does not impose an immediate duty on A; rather, B's claim arises only if, as a result of B's reliance on A's assurance, B would suffer a detriment if A were wholly free to resile on his or her assurance. This is the point that Lord Hoffmann somewhat cryptically captured by means of his mythological metaphor in Thorner v Major: 'the owl of Minerva spreads its wings only with the falling of the dusk'.[72] If, then, B's claim arises only because of B's reliance on A, and the prospect of B's suffering a detriment, it would be strange if the extent of A's duty were fixed solely by the content of A's assurance to B. Nonetheless, a difficulty remains after Jennings and Henry: once we know that proprietary estoppel does not always lead to A being under a duty to honour a commitment to B, how do we know what duty will be imposed on A? In particular, the concept of 'proportionality' is emphasised in each case; but what does it entail? It is striking that, in Henry, Sir Jonathan Parker simply stated that: 'The Board concludes that, in all the circumstances of the case, the appropriate relief in order to achieve the minimum equity required to do justice to Calixtus Henry is to award him one-half of Theresa Henry's undivided half-share of the plot.' Calixtus therefore did not receive, as he had been promised, the whole of the interest formerly held by Geraldine; yet no reasoning was given by the Board as to why 50 per cent of that interest (rather than any other proportion) was the appropriate award.

One way to interpret the approach in Jennings is as follows. A will not always be under a duty to honour his or her assurance to B, but this should still be the starting point: in other words, B's expectation will be protected unless it would be disproportionate to do so. If it is disproportionate the court will then, to use Walker LJ's phrase, decide on A's duty by exercising its 'wide judgmental discretion'.[73] Such an approach may seem appealing but, as the following extract demonstrates, it leads to unprincipled results and so cannot be accepted.

Mee, 'The Role of Expectation in the Determination of Proprietary Estoppel Remedies' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 5 (ed Dixon, 2009, pp 402–40)

The Flaw in the 'Expectation as Starting Point' Approach

Consider a hypothetical case where D has promised to leave C a certain house and where, in reliance on this, C has incurred detriment which is substantial but difficult to quantify. On the approach under discussion, the court should grant an expectation remedy unless this would be disproportionate to the detriment incurred by C. A crucial variable in the hypothetical scenario is, therefore, the value of the house. The argument will proceed by examining the consequences of adjusting the example by increasing the value of the hypothetical house, while holding constant the level of C's detriment and the other features of the case. Let it first be said that the house is worth (say) £100,000 and that, on the facts, it would not be disproportionate for the court to fulfil C's expectation when it is set at this level. In these circumstances, the court would grant the house to C by way of remedy.

Consider next a case where the value of the house is adjusted upwards to the highest level whereby it would still not be disproportionate to fulfil C's expectation. Let it be said that this value of the house is £400,000. In the version of the example where the house has this value, the court will once more fulfil C's expectation and grant him the house worth £400,000 . . . Consider finally a variation on the example where all the facts are the same except that the house is now worth £1,000,000. In this situation, it would be disproportionate to order that C should receive the house, given the disparity in value between the expectation and C's detriment. Therefore the court must devise a remedy in the exercise of its 'wide judgmental discretion'. Depending on the way in which the relevant factors operate in the particular circumstances of the case, the court might award a monetary remedy valued at (say) £200,000 or £300,000 or £400,000 . . . Imagine that, in the circumstances of the case, the court exercises its discretion to choose a remedy of £300,000.

Thus, with an expectation valued at £400,000, C received a remedy valued at £400,000 (the fulfilment of the expectation); however, when the expectation was greater, being valued at £1,000,000, the award was only £300,000. That cannot be right. It is not possible to defend a position where, with all the other facts in the scenario being held constant, a higher expectation on the part of C can lead to a lower remedy . . . Yet this anomaly is the inevitable consequence of an approach which seeks to privilege the expectation remedy as 'the starting point' in the remedial inquiry, i.e. as the prima facie remedy which will be granted unless it is disproportionate to C's detriment. Either one applies the same approach to determining the remedy in all cases—in which case the expectation remedy loses its status as the prima facie remedy—or else one faces the absurdity that C may be in a stronger position if he can show that the expectation induced in him by D was sufficiently low to count as 'not disproportionate' to his detriment.

The following extract considers a different interpretation of the Jennings approach.

Gardner, 'The Remedial Discretion in Proprietary Estoppel—Again' (2006) 122 LQR 492, 498–500

Jennings v Rice tells us that the outcome should be "proportionate to" both expectation and detriment. The statements to this effect are not always cleanly put. For example, we read that "the task of the court is to do justice. The most essential requirement is that there must be proportionality between the expectation and the detriment." In itself, this says nothing about the scale of relief. The idea, however, is probably that there must be proportionality between the expectation, the detriment and the outcome [...]

Still, what does it mean to say that there must be "proportionality between" the expectation, the detriment and the outcome? It is hard to find anything beyond: "When the claimant's reliance and expectation interests differ, the judge should pitch the outcome somewhere between the two."

Notice one problem. To pitch the outcome somewhere between the reliance and the expectation, each of these must be quantifiable. But a valid estoppel claim may arise even though they are not. The claimant needs to have acted in detrimental reliance on his belief, but there is no requirement that the reliance has to take any particular form, and the current position is that "it is not a narrow or technical concept," and that it "need not consist of the expenditure of money or other quantifiable financial detriment." And it is well established that the right believed in need not be conceived by the claimant with any precision. It is thus perfectly possible for a successful estoppel claim to arise in circumstances where the claimant's detriment, or expectation, or both, cannot be valued. This was in fact the case in a number of modern authorities on relief. But in none of them did it prevent the court from reaching an outcome. The solution is presumably to pitch the outcome between the innermost values that the two interests may have.

There is a more fundamental problem, however. Imagine a judge asked "I understand that I am to pitch the remedy at a point somewhere between the value of the claimant's expectation and that of her detriment. And I understand that there is no single correct place for that point: that I must make a discretionary decision about it. But still, I do have to choose my place, and I have to do so as a representative of the law, not as a private individual. How am I supposed to go about it?" The question might well be an anxious one, for the facts generating estoppel claims often involve a wide difference between expectation and detriment. The authorities do not readily disclose the answer.

The information the judge seeks is the aim of the jurisdiction. It is the jurisdiction's aim that gives meaning to the assertion, which we require the judge to make in arriving at a discretionary outcome, "(in my view, though others may differ) this is the best response". The idea of a "best response" is meaningless unless we are told "best for what?" [...] and the "what" is the aim of the jurisdiction. It would make sense, for example, for a judge in a criminal trial to say "(in my view, though others may differ) this sentence best captures the defendant's deserts". It makes no sense for a judge in a proprietary estoppel case to say "(in my view, though others may differ) this outcome best pitches the remedy somewhere between the value of the claimant's expectation and that of his detriment". If the objective is simply to pitch the remedy at a point somewhere between the value of the claimant's expectation and that of his detriment, that objective is achieved equally well by the choice of any point between the two poles: there is nothing to make any particular point the "best" one.

In other words, "proportionality" cannot be not the aim of the jurisdiction. Rather, the aim is to rectify unconscionability, of a particular kind. The claimant's expectation and reliance are relevant because they are the essential ingredients of the unconscionability. The linkage is explicitly put in the famous dictum of Oliver J. in Taylor Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd, posing the question "whether [...] it would be unconscionable for a party to be permitted to deny that which [...] he has allowed or encouraged another to assume to his detriment".[74] Likewise in the dictum of Robert Walker L.J. in Gillett v Holt, stating that the finding of detrimental reliance "must be approached as part of a broad inquiry as to whether repudiation of an assurance is or is not unconscionable in all the circumstances".[75]

So our judge should be told to seek the outcome that (in his or her view, though others might differ) best redresses the unconscionability. The essence of unconscionability, as the concept is used in property law contexts, is that the defendant has behaved vis-à-vis the claimant in a way which means that it would be morally reprehensible for him to insist on the current allocation of resources between them. More specifically, in proprietary estoppel, there is unconscionability where (and because) the defendant is responsible, by his encouragement or acquiescence, for an expectation on the part of the claimant, and for the reliance that the claimant has placed on that expectation, to his detriment. The aim of the jurisdiction is to redress the resulting state of affairs.

So the outcome our judge should seek will necessarily reflect the claimant's expectation and reliance interests, since these are essential to the unconscionability; and it will therefore normally (it should perhaps be, rather than necessarily) lie between the two in value. But that is not enough. For there to be unconscionability, the claimant's expectation and reliance must be ascribable to the defendant, via the encouragement, or acquiescence, that the defendant must have given. To redress the unconscionability, the outcome must therefore reflect both the claimant's expectation and reliance, and the degree to which these can be ascribed to the defendant, given his encouragement or acquiescence.

On the model suggested by Gardner, then, B's expectation is not treated as a starting point, but it has a definite role in determining the extent of A's duty to B. This is because proportionality is interpreted as demanding that the extent of A's duty be proportionate to both B's expectation and B's detriment. There are, however, difficulties with this approach.

Mee, 'The Role of Expectation in the Determination of Proprietary Estoppel Remedies' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 5 (ed Dixon, 2009, pp 402–40)

Consider the facts of Jennings, where the claimant acted to his detriment in the expectation of inheriting a house worth £435,000 and was awarded a remedy of £200,000. If the expectation had been to inherit a house worth £1,000,000, would this have justified an increase in the value of the remedy? In other words, in Jennings, the defendant 'promised Mr Jennings the moon and left him nothing';[76] would Jennings have deserved a greater remedy if he had been promised the moon and the stars? [...] it is difficult to see why, as a matter of principle, the claimant in a case like Jennings should receive an ever greater remedy, on the basis of the same detriment, as one increases the extent of the hypothetical expectation [...]

A central problem with an approach which gives a role to expectation as a factor in the determination of the remedy is that, unless it is to be an entirely arbitrary process, there must be some principled way of determining the extent to which the expectation impacts upon the remedy. However, no such principled mechanism is available. One must ask how, as a matter of logic, the remedy can be made proportional to two different values, the expectation and the detriment?

A further interpretation of proportionality attempts to avoid this difficulty, by suggesting that the extent of A's duty should be proportionate solely to the B's detriment: in other words, the right acquired by B should be no more and no less than the right required to prevent B from suffering a detriment as a result of his or her reliance on A's assurance. Such an interpretation is explored in each of the following extracts.

Bright and McFarlane, 'Proprietary Estoppel and Property Rights'
[2005] CLJ 449, 452–4

In order to determine the nature and extent of rights arising through proprietary estoppel it is crucial to ask why proprietary estoppel is recognized as a source of rights. Any account of the underlying purpose of the doctrine must be consistent both with the test for the availability of a proprietary estoppel claim, and with the extent of the rights awarded in response to such a claim. In particular cases proprietary estoppel may have the effect of allowing the informal grant of a property right; of enforcing a promise; or of reversing an unjust enrichment. Yet none of these three aims can constitute the basic purpose of the doctrine as, by itself, each fails to account both for the test for the availability of a claim and for the extent of the rights thereby gained by B.

On this approach, the only satisfactory theory of proprietary estoppel is one which explains proprietary estoppel as generating rights in order to protect B's reliance. Analysis of the case law shows that proprietary estoppel is concerned with reacting to and protecting B's reasonable reliance, where A can be said to be responsible for the expectation on which that reliance was based. This particular form of reliance seems to be the unifying feature which justifies the courts' view of proprietary estoppel as a single doctrine.

Moreover, this aim of protecting B's reliance explains the diverse range of responses to a proprietary estoppel claim. It does not follow that protecting reliance will limit B to recovering the direct financial cost of his reliance. This is no surprise: the reliance B needs to show in order to bring a claim is not limited to financial expenditure; hence the reliance protected by B's consequent right is not so limited. This can be seen in Crabb v. Arun District Council. B's reliance in that case consisted of selling part of his land without reserving a right of access to his remaining land. Were A then able to deny B his expected easement over A's land, B would be left without access to that remaining land. That particular reliance could only be protected by allowing B to have the expected easement over A's land. In some cases, protecting B's reliance will require B's receiving a property right through an informal grant; in others it will require the enforcement of a promise by A; in others the reversal of A's unjust enrichment; in others the reimbursement of money spent by B. In each case, however, each response will not be a goal in itself but will rather be a means to the end of protecting B's reliance [...]

The use of proportionality in recent English decisions supports the view that the purpose of proprietary estoppel is to protect B's reliance: making a proportionate award, like finding the "minimum equity to do justice to [B]", entails recognizing that B has a right which adequately protects his reliance, but goes no further. The application of this principle in practice can be seen by a consideration of Jennings v. Rice [...] It is possible to take the [result in Jennings] as evidence of the wide discretion a court has when responding to an estoppel claim. Certainly, there is a tendency to equate the move away from the automatic enforcement of expectations with a move towards the courts having discretion to react to a proprietary estoppel as they see fit and even to re-distribute property rights. However [...] it is preferable to find specific principles which can be used to regulate that task: even when departing from expectations a court must, as Robert Walker L.J. emphasized in Jennings v. Rice, "take a principled approach". Admittedly, protecting B's reliance is a less predictable standard than routinely enforcing B's expectation: there will always be an element of judgement in gauging what is proportionate. The matter will not, however, be left to the unbridled discretion of the court: the crucial point is that the response to the estoppel will be guided by the goal of protecting B's reliance.

Robertson, 'The Reliance Basis of Proprietary Estoppel Remedies' [2008] Conv 295, 300–3

The outcomes of the English and Australian cases fall into a clear and consistent pattern. In most cases it is found that the claimant's equity can be satisfied only by granting expectation relief, either in specie or in monetary form. In a small but significant number of cases it is necessary to grant more limited relief in order to give effect to the minimum equity principle. In a few cases the courts seek to quantify the claimant's reliance loss by reference to a mathematical formula. In a similar number of cases the courts prefer to adopt a broad-brush approach to relief, framing the remedy by reference neither to the value of claimant's expectations nor the extent of his or her reliance loss. Together those two categories of case, the mathematical and the broad-brush, show that the proportionality principle is playing an important role in the determination of relief in proprietary estoppel cases [. . .]

The minimum equity principle requires that, in fashioning a remedy to give effect to proprietary estoppel, the court must go no further than is necessary to prevent detriment. This principle recognises reliance-based harm as the core of the estoppel equity: the touchstone in the determination of relief is the overriding goal of protecting against harm resulting from reliance on inconsistent conduct. The decision in Jennings v Rice was based on a rejection of the idea that the purpose of proprietary estoppel is to protect expectations or to enforce promises [. . .] In Commonwealth v Verwayen, Mason C.J. said that, in giving effect to an estoppel, "[i]t would be wholly inequitable and unjust to insist upon a disproportionate making good of the relevant assumption".[77] Mason C.J. did not, however, explain why it would be unjust or inequitable to do so. If the expectation of a benefit and harm or potential harm, resulting from reliance, are both essential elements in the establishment of an estoppel, why should the claimant be limited to a remedy which protects his or her reliance interest? Why is it not necessary to protect the expectation interest? The answer is that both expectation loss and reliance loss are essential elements of the equity, and, once either the expectation is fulfilled or reliance loss is prevented, the relying party has no claim in estoppel. This is why it is said in estoppel cases that the relying party has nothing to complain about while the assumption is adhered to. It is also why even proprietary estoppel can, in some situations, have a suspensory effect: if the representor is able to and does give the relying party the opportunity to resume his or her original position, there is no longer an equity arising by way of estoppel. If either the expectation loss or the reliance loss is in one way or another avoided or taken away, the reason for the court's intervention comes to an end.

The reason reliance loss rather than expectation loss provides a loose cap on the remedy is simply that, where there is a discernable difference in value between the reliance interest and the expectation interest, the reliance interest is almost always the smaller. It usually makes no sense to expend £100 in the expectation of a benefit worth £50. Since both expectation loss and reliance loss are essential elements of an estoppel claim, the remedy must necessarily be limited by the smaller of the two measures. Once the lesser interest has been satisfied, an essential element of the claim has been removed. When the reliance-based harm has been prevented or compensated, there is no longer any need for the court to intervene. But just as we can say that, where there is no reliance loss, there is no claim, we can equally say that, where there is no expectation loss, there is no claim. For this reason, in the rare situation in which the claimant's reliance interest exceeds the value of the expectation, the expectation interest provides the upper limit of the remedy. Baker v Baker stands as authority for this proposition.[78] There, the claimant contributed £33,950 to the purchase of a house by his son's family in the expectation of having the right to occupy a room in the house for the rest of his life. The arrangement came to an end when the relationship between the parties broke down. The trial judge's award of (reliance-based) compensation in the amount of £33,950 was held on appeal to be unjustifiable because it exceeded the value of the expectation. The starting point should have been the value of the expectancy (the right to occupy), since that was less valuable than the reliance loss (the claimant's contribution to the purchase price).

In summary, then, the proportionality principle can be justified on the basis that both reliance loss and expectation loss are necessary to an estoppel claim. Where the lesser interest has been met, the equity is satisfied because an essential element of the claim has been removed. In those rare instances in which the expectation interest is less valuable, it will provide a cap on the claim. Almost invariably, however, the reliance interest is the smaller. That is why the minimum equity principle requires the courts to go no further in granting relief than is necessary to prevent reliance loss.

An approach in which the extent of A's duty to B is determined by the need to prevent B suffering a detriment as a result of his or her reliance on A's assurance is, at least, capable of being stated clearly. Such an approach, however, is yet to be explicitly adopted by the courts: other factors, such as the need to avoid unconscionable conduct by A, continue to feature prominently in the courts' reasoning. For example, in Ottey v Grundy,[79] Arden LJ stated that: 'the purpose of proprietary estoppel is not to enforce an obligation that does not amount to a contract nor yet to reverse the detriment which the claimant has suffered but to grant an appropriate remedy in respect of the unconscionable conduct.'

Perhaps the most that can be said in conclusion is that, whenever A comes under a duty to B, whether that duty arises because of proprietary estoppel or some other means, the extent of A's duty must depend on the reason, or reasons, for which that duty has arisen. Where proprietary estoppel is concerned, the difficulties in determining the extent of A's duty stem from a lack of clarity as to the reason, or reasons, for which A's duty has arisen. In other words, until we have a clear sense of the justification for the doctrine of proprietary estoppel, we cannot hope to have a clear test for determining the extent of A's duty to B.

4 THE EFFECT OF PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL ON A THIRD PARTY: PRIORITY AND THE DEFENCES QUESTION

4.1 INTRODUCTION

In land law, as we saw in Part A of this book, one of the most fundamental questions is as follows: if B acquires a right from A, when will it be possible for B to assert that right against C, a party later acquiring a right in relation to A's land? For example, we can go back to Thorner v Major. In that case, the only question was as to the rights of David Thorner against Peter Thorner: any duties that Peter was under at the time of his death were also binding on Peter's administrators. But what if, before his death, Peter had fallen out with David, and sold the farm to a third party: would David then have had any claim against that third party?

As we have seen, for example in Chapter 1, as well as Chapters 4 and 5, land law provides a clear structure for determining this fundamental question of whether B can assert his or her initial right against C.[80] That structure depends on asking whether B, at the time of the sale to C, had a property right in relation to A's land. This in turn depends on the content and acquisition questions. First, is the right claimed by B capable of counting as legal estate or legal interest, or as an equitable interest? Second, has B in fact acquired that right? If B can show that he or she did have such a right then, as we will see in Chapter 12, there is an issue as to the priority of B and C's competing rights. As B acquired his or her right before C, the question will be whether C has a defence to B's pre-existing property right.

Where does proprietary estoppel fit into this structure? The obvious answer would be that proprietary estoppel is concerned solely with the acquisition question: it is simply a means by which A can come under a duty to B. The mere fact that B's right has arisen through proprietary estoppel should tell us nothing about the content of B's right: that will depend on the content of A's duty to B. It seems, however, that, where proprietary estoppel is concerned, things are more complicated than the obvious answer would suggest. In answering the question as to whether B's right can bind C, the usual approach is to distinguish between two situations: (i) where the sale to C occurs after a court has made an order in B's favour; and (ii) where the sale to C occurs before such an order.

4.2 B'S POSITION AFTER A COURT ORDER IN HIS OR HER FAVOUR

The position here seems to be clear, and it is consistent with the obvious answer set out above. We simply need to examine the content of A's duty to B, as determined by the court order made in B's favour. So if, as Thorner v Major, that duty is to transfer A's legal estate to B, then, at the date of the court order, B has an immediate equitable interest in A's land. In Crabb v Arun DC, the Court of Appeal ordered that A's duty, arising as a result of proprietary estoppel, was to allow B a right of access over A's land. That right of access, in theory, could have taken the form of either a personal right against A (a licence) or a property right in relation to A's land (an easement). In the former case, B's right would not have been capable of binding C: as we will see in Chapter 21, a licence does not count as an equitable interest in land.[81] In the latter case, A's duty to grant B a legal easement would give B an immediate equitable easement and such a right would be capable of binding any third party acquiring A's land after the court order in B's favour. It seems that, in Crabb, A was under a duty to grant B an easement: the detriment B faced consisted of having no means of access to his land and, to secure such access in the future, B required a right that was capable of binding not only A, but also any party later acquiring A's land.

In some cases, however, the court's order does not recognize that B has a property right. For example, in Jennings v Rice (see section 3 above) Mrs Royal (and then her estate) was simply under a duty to pay Mr Jennings a sum of money: £200,000. Because that duty to pay money was not in any way secured on the land,[82] it could only give Mr Jennings a personal right. So it seems that if the land had been sold to C after the court order in favour of Mr Jennings, he would have had no legal or equitable property right to assert against C.

[80] There is, of course, a separate question as to whether B can assert a new, direct right against C: see Chapter 6. In such a case, B relies on the new, direct right, rather than the right initially acquired from A.

[81] Although it is true that there have been some complications surrounding the status of an 'estoppel licence': these are discussed in Chapter 21, section 4.

4.3 B'S POSITION BEFORE A COURT ORDER IN HIS OR HER FAVOUR

The general view is that, before any court order is made in his or her favour, B has only an 'estoppel equity', or 'inchoate equity'—that is, a right to go to court. This is the case even if the test for proprietary estoppel has been clearly satisfied, so that we know that A is under some form of duty to B. This means that, if A sells the land to C after B has relied to his or her detriment on a commitment made by A, but before a court has made any order in B's favour, the crucial question is whether B's 'estoppel equity' counts as a property right.

In relation to registered land, the position has now been clarified by s 116(a) of the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002).

Land Registration Act 2002, s 116

It is hereby declared for the avoidance of doubt that, in relation to registered land, each of the following:

(a) an equity by estoppel, and

(b) a mere equity

has effect from the time the equity arises as an interest capable of binding successors in title (subject to the rules about the effect of dispositions on priority).

The thinking behind this provision is explained in the following extract from the Law Commission Report that led to the 2002 Act.

Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001, [5.30])

Our concern was with the status of B's 'inchoate equity' that arises after he or she has acted to his or her detriment but before the court can make an order giving effect to it. Although the point is not finally settled, the weight of authority firmly favours the view that such an equity is a proprietary and not merely a personal right.[83] HM Land Registry treats it as such, permitting the entry of a caution or notice in relation to such equities. It has also been assumed that a person in actual occupation can protect such an equity in relation to land as an overriding > interest. We pointed out in the Consultative Document that proprietary estoppel is increasingly important as a mechanism for the informal creation of property rights. To put the matter beyond doubt, we recommended that the proprietary status of an equity arising by estoppel should be confirmed in relation to registered land. It could therefore be protected by the entry of a notice in the register or, where the claimant was in actual occupation of the land in relation to which he or she claimed an equity, as an overriding interest. This recommendation was more contentious than our proposal in relation to rights of pre-emption. It was supported by 55 per cent of those who responded to the point (of whom there were not many). Those who opposed it were mainly academics, several of whom were defending their published views. On the other hand members of the legal profession generally supported the proposal. We have therefore decided to take the proposal forward, particularly as we consider that we are merely confirming what is probably the present law.

[82] The possible forms of security right in relation to land are discussed in Chapter 28.

[83] [The report here refers to Megarry & Wade's Law of Real Property (eds Harpum et al, 6th edn, 2000, [13–028]–[13–032]). Law Commission Consultation Paper No 254, which first suggested the provision to become s 116(a) of the Land Registration Act 2002, listed the following authorities at [3.35]: Duke of Beaufort v Patrick (1853) 17 Beav 60, 78; Inwards v Baker [1965] 2 QB 29, 37; E R Ives Investment Ltd v High [1967] 2 QB 379; Voyce v Voyce (1991) 62 P & CR 290, 294 and 296.]

It is important to note that s 116(a) does not mean that B's 'equity by estoppel' will always bind C. After all, any property right may be subject to defences. In particular, as we will see in Chapter 14, section 2.2, if C pays for and registers his or her right, C will have a defence against B's 'equity by estoppel' unless: (i) B has protected his or her equity by entering a notice on the register; (ii) or B can show that he or she was in actual occupation of the land at the relevant time. For example, in Henry v Henry,[84] Calixtus Henry wished to assert a right not against Geraldine Pierre, who had promised to leave her land to him, but rather against Theresa Henry, to whom Geraldine had sold her land shortly before Geraldine's death (the facts of the case are set out in section 2.3 above). The case was governed by the law of St Lucia, and s 28 of the Land Registration Act (St Lucia) sets out the list of overriding interests: that list, includes, in paragraph (g), 'the rights of a person in actual occupation of land [. . .] save where inquiry is made of such person and the rights are not disclosed'. As a result, the Court of Appeal of the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court concluded (and this point was not challenged on appeal to the Privy Council) that Calixtus' estoppel equity bound Theresa: she could not rely on the lack of registration defence, as his estoppel equity counted as an overriding interest.

In Henry v Henry, the Privy Council advised that Calixtus was entitled to one half of Theresa's interest in the land. The result in Henry, therefore, can be explained without taking the view that every 'equity by estoppel' is capable of binding a third party.[85] The result in Henry is equally consistent with the view that a proprietary estoppel claim can only bind a third party if the right arising is a recognised equitable interest, such as a beneficial interest under a trust.

Indeed, in the following extract, Smith notes there are some doubts as to whether an 'equity by estoppel' should be capable of binding a third party. His first point relates to the discretion possessed by a court in deciding what right B has acquired through proprietary estoppel.

[85] For the application of this argument to earlier cases in which rights acquired through proprietary estoppel were allowed to bind a third party, see McFarlane, 'Proprietary Estoppel and Third Parties After the Land Registration Act 2002' [2003] CLJ 661.

Smith, 'How Proprietary is Proprietary Estoppel', in Consensus ad Idem: Essays on the Law of Contract in Honour of Guenther Treitel (ed Rose, 1996, p 244)

Although most equities are claims to conventional property interests, the nature of the discretion is such that it cannot be argued that there is a right to this interest. It must, therefore, be recognised that, in saying that the equity binds a purchaser, the law is in substance accepting the principle that estoppels bind purchasers. It may well be argued that this is odd. Estoppels and contracts are rather similar, in that they are routes to providing remedies. Nobody seriously suggests that contracts bind purchasers, unless of course there is a contractual right to a legal estate (an estate contract). This seems correct: contracts as such do not represent rights to the land. The same can be argued of estoppels. Yet it has been seen that there is a large body of cases holding that proprietary estoppels bind successors in title. So it seems that the equity involved in an estoppel is a special and discrete property right, albeit one having respectably old origins [. . .]

The second and perhaps more forceful articulation of doubts is to argue that the position of purchasers is intolerable if it is impossible to discover what remedy B will be given. It is not enough to be informed that one is bound by an equity, when the practical effect of this cannot be foretold [. . .] Purchasers know what sort of rights to expect if there is, for example, an easement or a lease, but estoppels have no common content in terms of rights over the land. Next, it will be rare for an estoppel to be evidenced in writing, which necessarily makes it more difficult to ascertain the nature of the right claimed, quite apart from the strength of the claim. Similarly, the facts required to be prove an estoppel will often be in doubt: the average purchaser cannot be expected to investigate allegations of detriment. These points have little to do with discretion; they are features of any estoppel. Even once a purchaser knows about the expectation and the detriment, it will often be essential to know what remedy will be given in order to decide whether to proceed with a purchase. Many purchasers would withdraw from the purchase if B could reside in the property for life. On the other hand, monetary compensation for B could be reflected in an adjustment of the purchase price paid to A.

Yet these arguments have an air of unreality about them. In practice, most purchasers will run a mile on becoming aware of any form of estoppel claim. The typical response will be that the sale is off, unless A (the vendor) can persuade B to drop the claim. It would be very rare for the purchaser to want to investigate the claim and then proceed with the sale. It follows that uncertainty as to whether the claim can be made out and as to its exact scope is unlikely to be significant.

More fundamentally, it is also possible to challenge the very notion of the 'equity by estoppel'. The extract, which adopts an admittedly unorthodox view, argues that there is simply no need for the 'equity by estoppel': B's position should be the same both before and after any court order made in his or her favour.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 468–70)

[The orthodox view] takes a two-stage approach to the acquisition of a right through proprietary estoppel. The first stage is complete once all the requirements of the doctrine have been met: B has relied on A's commitment, and has suffered, or would suffer, a detriment if A fails to honour that commitment. At that stage, we would expect B already to have a right against A: after all, the requirements of the doctrine have been met. However, on the orthodox view, B does not yet have a right against A. B has only an "equity by estoppel": a right to go to court [...]

So, in a case such as Crabb v Arun DC, if C acquires a right in relation to A's land after Stage 2 has begun [i.e. after the court order in B's favour] things are fairly clear. Due to the court order, A is under a duty to give B an Easement: A is thus under a duty in relation to a specific right and so C is prima facie bound by B's pre-existing Equitable Easement.

However, if C instead acquires his right during Stage 1 (i.e. before the court has made its order, but after B has relied on A's commitment) everything depends on the status of B's mysterious "equity by estoppel". C can be bound by B's proprietary estoppel claim if, and only if, the "equity by estoppel" counts as a persistent right.[86]

So, on the orthodox view, a choice has to be made: is an "equity by estoppel" capable of binding a third party or not? The consensus answer is Yes: and so the Law Commission, when preparing the draft provision that became s.116(a) of the LRA 2002, adopted that position [...]

The orthodox view treats proprietary estoppel in an odd way and therefore leads to odd results. First, as a matter of principle, it is strange to say that the doctrine works in two separate stages, and that B has no actual right until a court makes an order. Certainly, we do not talk of "inchoate" contracts, wrongs or unjust enrichments: the rule is that B's right arises as soon as all the relevant requirements for acquiring the right have been met. So, if A commits a wrong by carelessly running B over, B acquires a right against A immediately: there is no need to wait for a court order. Indeed, we do not usually think of courts as awarding rights to the parties: unless they have a special statutory jurisdiction, the job of the courts is not to confer new rights but to recognise rights the parties have already acquired. To say that, even after the requirements of proprietary estoppel have been met, B only has an "equity by estoppel" (a right to go to court) gives insufficient weight to the fact that B has relied on A's commitment and would suffer a detriment if that commitment were not honoured: after all, vexatious litigants aside, everyone has the right to go to court. In fact, there are a number of cases in which the courts have recognised that B has a definite right before any court order has made in his favour.[87]

The special, two-stage view of proprietary estoppel would be defensible if the doctrine gave the courts an unfettered discretion to vary the rights of A and B. In such a world, it would be very difficult to say that B has a right before the court had exercised its discretion and awarded B a right. However [...] proprietary estoppel does not operate in that way: like contract, wrongs and unjust enrichment, it is a means of acquiring a right that has its own specific requirements. Indeed, the two-stage model seems to be based on an out-dated, seemingly medieval model of the law, where parties go cap in hand to an all-powerful representative of the monarch and hope that he will exercise his unregulated largesse in their favour.

The two-stage model, and the special treatment it accords proprietary estoppel, is thus over-complicated and unnecessary. There is simply no need for the "equity by estoppel": if B acquires a right through proprietary estoppel that right should arise immediately.

McFarlane's view is inconsistent with the view of the Law Commission, seemingly now enshrined by statute in relation to registered land.[88] For example, in Halifax plc v Curry

[86] ['Persistent right' here is used by the author to refer to rights usually called 'equitable property rights': see the discussion of this point in Chapter 5, section 7.]

[87] [The example given in the text is Voyce v Voyce (1991) 62 P & CR 290, esp per Dillon LJ at 294.]

[88] The word 'seemingly' is used as there is an argument that the term 'equity by estoppel', in s 116(a) of the LRA 2002, could be limited in its meaning to 'recognised equitable interests arising through estoppel': see McFarlane 'Proprietary Estoppel and Third Parties After the Land Registration Act 2002' [2003] CLJ 661. The author does there admit that this argument depends on a somewhat strained interpretation of s 116(a).

Popeck,[89] the parties accepted that, in the words of Norris J, 'a proprietary estoppel, including an inchoate one, is a property interest.' In that case, however, it seems clear that A's duty, arising under proprietary estoppel, was to grant B a legal charge; on McFarlane's view, then, the content of A's duty was such that B would in any case have acquired an equitable interest in A's land: as A was under a duty to grant B a legal charge, B had an immediate equitable charge over A's land. The decision in Halifax plc v Curry Popeck, like that in Henry v Henry, is thus consistent with the view that a right arising through proprietary estoppel should be capable of binding a third party only if it gives rise to a recognised equitable interest.

The difference between that view and the Law Commission's view, seemingly now enshrined in s 116(a) of the LRA 2002, is only apparent in a case where the content of A's duty is not such as would usually give B an equitable interest. This will be the case, for example, where A's duty is simply to pay B a sum of money (that duty not being secured on any land of A), or to allow B a licence to make some use of A's land. In such a case, it is clear that, after a court order is made in B's favour, B will have only a personal right against A. Yet, before such a court order, B will, according to the intended effect of s 116(a) of the LRA 2002, have a property right. It is not immediately clear what the justification is for this position.

In conclusion, s 116(a) was enacted 'for the avoidance of doubt', but it may not have achieved that aim. Indeed, a possible further complication was considered by the Privy Council in Henry v Henry.[90] Counsel for Theresa Henry, who had bought Geraldine's share in the land, argued that 'the test of unconscionability must be considered afresh in relation to the position of Theresa Henry as purchaser.'[91] That argument was rejected on the technical grounds that it had not been pleaded or pursued at the initial trial of the case, but Sir Jonathan Parker stated that the Privy Council 'does not rule out the possibility that cases may arise in which the particular circumstances surrounding a third party purchase may, notwithstanding the claimant's overriding interest, require the court to reassess the extent of the claimant's equity in the property.'[92] There is some academic support for that position:[93] its logic is that, where C acquires his or her right before any court order in B's favour, C is bound by B's inchoate estoppel equity. In satisfying that equity, the court then has to consider whether C's action in attempting to deny B a right relating to the land is unconscionable. Of course, B will have no independent proprietary estoppel claim against C, as C has made no assurance on which B has relied. So, in determining whether or not C has acted unconscionably, a court will not be able to rely on the three elements of proprietary estoppel but, presumably, must adopt a wider notion of what conscience demands of C. In contrast, if the general land law position were to be adopted, there would be no room for an independent assessment of C's behaviour: if B had an equitable interest before C acquired C's right in the land, and if C has no defence to B's right, B can assert that interest against C. It is difficult to see what, if anything, is to be gained by departing from this general position and making special rules for proprietary estoppel. In particular, it is surprising that s 116(a) of the LRA 2002, part of an Act that was introduced to protect the position of a third party purchaser for value of registered land,[94] seems to have rendered C's position so uncertain.

TRUSTS: THE ACQUISITION QUESTION

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Beneficial interests under a trust of land may be acquired through an express, resulting, or constructive trust.
2. An express trust of land must be evidenced by signed writing to fulfil statutory formality requirements. Resulting and constructive trusts of land are exempt from this requirement.
3. A purchase money resulting trust arises where A purchases or contributes to the purchase of land in the name of B, or where land is purchased in the joint names of A and B, but with no express declaration as to their beneficial shares. The trust confers on the parties beneficial interests in proportion to their contribution. The presumption is not applied in specific circumstances where property is bought as a home.
4. The basis of the resulting trust remains subject to debate. The trust arises either through a reluctance to assume that A intended a gift, or to prevent B's unjust enrichment at A's expense.
5. Constructive trusts arise in a number of circumstances in which, through the existence of specific factors, it is considered unconscionable for the legal owner to assert his or her own beneficial ownership, and to deny the beneficial interest of another.
6. There is no exhaustive definition of the circumstances giving rise to a constructive trust. Two types of constructive trust are considered in this chapter: those arising under the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead;[1] and those arising under the Pallant v Morgan[2] equity.
7. Constructive trusts arise under the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead where A transfers land to B on an oral trust in favour of A or transfers land to C on trust for B, a third party. The trust prevents B or C from fraudulently relying on the absence of compliance with formalities for an express trust to claim the land for him or herself.
8. Constructive trusts arise under the Pallant v Morgan equity where one party acquires land pursuant to an informal commercial joint venture and reneges on an agreement that another party will have an interest in the land. The non-acquiring party must have relied on the agreement, but it is not necessary that he or she acted to his or her detriment in so doing. The trust has been analysed as a specific example of the 'common intention constructive trust' (discussed in Chapter 16) but this classification is problematic.

1 INTRODUCTION

In this chapter, we consider how equitable interests in land are acquired by the creation of a trust. Not all equitable interests take effect under a trust. The difference between equitable interests under a trust and other forms of equitable interests is explained in Chapter 5. There are three principal categories of trust that need to be considered: express, resulting, and constructive. These categories of trust are differentiated by their method of creation and, specifically, by the different role afforded to the settlor's intention in the creation of the trust.

Snell's Equity (32nd edn, ed McGhee, 2010, [21-018]–[21-021])

A classification of trusts in these terms [express, resulting, and constructive] refers to the degree that the trust arises though the expression of the settlor's actual intention to create it, or by operation of law and irrespective of his intentions. The distinction is often a fine one, and depends on a close analysis of the relevant transaction.

(a) Express trust. An express trust is created by the actual intention of the person in whom the property is vested, as where A declares himself a trustee of Whiteacre for B, or conveys it to C on trust for B. [. . .]

(b) Resulting trust. A resulting trust arises by operation of law, though in response to a legal presumption about the intentions of the person who transfers the property which becomes subject to the trust. If A transfers property to B when it is unclear whether A intends B to have the beneficial interest in it, then B may hold the property on resulting trust for A. The trust arises by operation of law to give effect to a presumption that A did not intend B to take the property beneficially.

(c) Constructive trust. A constructive trust is imposed by operation of law, rather than through the express or presumed intention of the owner of the property to create a trust or to retain any beneficial interest for himself. The trust may even arise contrary to the actual intentions of the owner [. . .] In other cases the distinction between constructive and express trusts is less clear. So a constructive trust may be imposed on property to give effect a person's intention to make a gift to another or to act as an express trustee, but where the formalities necessary to give effect to the gift or the express trust have not been fully complied with.

A fourth and fifth category of trust are also commonly referred to. We note these categories here but they are not further discussed. The fourth category—the 'implied trust'—lacks a clear and consistent usage. It is sometimes used to refer to a trust created by a settlor, but where the settlor's intention is inferred, rather than express. This use of the implied trust has no application in relation to land,[3] where, as we will see, written evidence of intent is required. At other times, the expression 'implied trust' is used simply as an umbrella term for resulting and constructive trusts, in contradistinction to express trusts. The final category is the statutory trust. Trusts are imposed by statute in a disparate range of circumstances. The consequence can be significant for the unwary statutory trustee. One example is a purported conveyance of a legal estate in land to a minor. A minor cannot hold legal title to land[4] and the effect of such a transfer is a statutory trust under which the legal title is held on trust for the minor by the transferor.[5] In Hammersmith and Fulham LBC v Alexander-David[6] a local authority purported to grant a legal lease to a 16 year-old homeless girl. The result was that the local authority held the lease on trust for her. This had the practical consequence that the local authority could not terminate the lease using their usual powers as landlord as this would destroy the trust property. As such, it would be a breach of trust.

[3] Lewin on Trusts (18th edn, ed Mobray, 2008), [7–04].

An alternative means of classifying trusts has been suggested based on the causative event that triggers the imposition of the trust.[7] This development should be seen in the broader context of the taxonomy of private law pioneered by Professor Peter Birks.[8] He demonstrated that obligations arise on the basis of consent, wrongs, unjust enrichment, and through a category of miscellaneous other events. This scheme appeals to a sense of logic and rationalization by aligning the creation of trusts with the creation of obligations in private law—but as the language of the traditional scheme is embedded in statute a wholesale change appears unlikely.

Once a trust comes into existence, the method of creation and the consequent classification of the trust are of limited significance. Hence, the priority rules determining the enforcement of trusts against third parties (the defences question) operate in the same way, regardless of how the trust came into existence. Equally, express, resulting, and constructive trusts of land are all 'trusts of land' within s 1(2)(a) of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 (TOLATA 1996). That Act, which is discussed in Chapter 17, deals with the content question: it sets out the general rights of beneficiaries and duties of the trustees for all trusts of land. The Act draws no distinction between different categories of trust, except that, where a trust is created expressly, the settlor may make specific provision as regards those rights and duties. In some instances, however, differences emerge through specific rules applicable to trusts arising in particular circumstances. For example, as we have seen in Chapter 9, the constructive trust arising under the doctrine of anticipation has unusual features stemming from its origin in a contract for sale of land.

The classification of a trust therefore seems to be of secondary importance. In the beginning, it is more important to understand when a beneficial interest will arise than whether it is called an 'express', 'resulting', or 'constructive' trust.

Once these rules are understood, however, the issue of classification becomes more significant. The scope of resulting and constructive trusts ultimately lies in the development of doctrine by the courts. Rationalizing the basis on which these trusts come into existence can provide an important benchmark for distinguishing the uses and abuses of these doctrines. With this in mind, this chapter considers the application of express, resulting, and constructive trusts to land, and places this discussion in the broader context of current debate concerning those doctrines of trust.

2 EXPRESS TRUSTS

As we have seen, an express trust is one created by the actual intention of the settlor. The creation of express trusts of land is subject to compliance with formality requirements. These are contained in s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925).

(b) a declaration of trust respecting any land or any interest therein must be manifested and proved by some writing signed by some person who is able to declare such trust or by his will;

(2) This section does not affect the creation or operation of resulting, implied or constructive trusts.

An express declaration of trust is conclusive as to the existence of the trust. If the declaration specifies the parties' respective beneficial shares, it is also conclusive in that respect;[9] otherwise, the parties' shares will be determined by the application of resulting and constructive trust principles.[10]

Debate arises as to whether a trust that the settlor intends to create, but which does not comply with s 53(1)(b) of the LPA 1925, should still be classified as 'express'. One instance of this debate is considered below, as regards the classification of the trust arising under the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead. The better view, it is suggested, is that a trust of land should be classified as an express trust only where s 53(1)(b) is complied with. In the absence of compliance, the trust should be classified as resulting or constructive to invoke the exception in s 53(2).

3 RESULTING TRUSTS

There are two main views on the scope of resulting trusts, each of which affords a different role to intent. The first, and traditional, view is that resulting trusts arise in two distinct categories: where A pays or contributes to the purchase of property in B's name (the 'presumed intention', or 'purchase money', resulting trust); and where A creates an express trust that does not exhaust the beneficial interest (an 'automatic' resulting trust).[11] The presumed trust arises through an assumption that A does not intend a gift. The role of intent in the automatic resulting trust is more contentious: it may play no role,[12] or the trust may arise because A does not intend the property to vest in the Crown as bona vacantia.[13]

The second view on the scope of resulting trusts is that they arise whenever B receives property in relation to which he or she was not intended to benefit. On this view, the trust arises through A's (the transferor or purchaser) lack of intent to benefit B and the effect of the trust is to provide restitution for unjust enrichment.

9 Goodman v Gallant [1986] 2 WLR 236.

10 The quantification of shares in such cases is considered in Chapter 16.

11 The description of these as presumed and automatic is provided by Megarry J in Re Vandervell's Trusts (No 2) [1974] Ch 269, 294.

12 The approach suggested ibid.

13 Compare the discussion by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche v Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, 708.

Chambers, Resulting Trusts (1997, p 220)

> There are two requirements for every resulting trust: (i) a transfer of property (ii) in circumstances in which the provider of that property did not intend to benefit the recipient. The property may be any interest in any type of property or asset, so long as it is capable of being the subject of the trust. The provider may be the previous owner of the property in question or someone who has contributed to the recipient's acquisition of that property. [. . .]
> All resulting trusts effect restitution of what would otherwise be the unjust enrichment of the recipient. They are created neither by the consent of the recipient nor by the intention of the provider to create a trust. The resulting trust is not merely the passive preservation of the provider's pre-existing property interest, but is one of equity's active responses to non-voluntary transfer.

The broader view of the resulting trust was rejected by the House of Lords in Westdeutsche v Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC.[14] The House of Lords preferred the traditional view, confining the trust to its two categories. Placing the resulting trust in the context of general principles of trust law, however, Lord Browne-Wilkinson considered that the trust could not arise until the trustees' conscience is affected by knowledge of the factors giving rise to the trust.[15]

That decision has not put an end to the debate. The restitutionary approach was advocated by Birks,[16] while Chambers has remained its chief proponent.[17] In contrast, Penner has noted that the recognition of the trust as restitutionary is "a prospect which some of us find appalling".[18] McFarlane suggests that the limitation of the resulting trust in Westdeutsche to the two traditional situations is arbitrary. Combining the analysis of Lord Browne-Wilkinson, on one hand, and Birks and Chambers, on the other, McFarlane argues that the resulting trust should arise to prevent unjust enrichment in cases outside the two traditional situations, but only where the trustee is aware, or ought to be aware, of the relevant facts.[19]

The practical differences between Lord Browne-Wilkinson's view of the resulting trust, on the one hand, and Birks' and Chambers' view, on the other, are twofold. Firstly, Lord Browne-Wilkinson confines the operation of the trust to its two traditional applications. The second difference relates to the timing of the trust: if an unjust enrichment analysis is applied, the trust dates from the time of receipt of the property (the time of the enrichment); on Lord Browne-Wilkinson's view, the trust does not arise until the trustee has knowledge of the factors that give rise to the trust. This difference in timing can be particularly significant where the recipient becomes bankrupt between the date of receipt and the date on which the trustee becomes aware of the relevant facts.[20]

In relation to land, the most significant application of the resulting trust is the purchase money resulting trust, arising where A purchases or contributes to the purchase of land in the name of B. In such a case, the analysis adopted may have no practical impact on the timing of the trust. The trust is within the two traditional categories and, because B will necessarily have knowledge of A's contribution, whichever analysis is taken, the trust will arise at the time of receipt. In view of this, and in line with prevailing judicial preference, the traditional analysis of the resulting trust is followed in the remainder of this chapter.

3.1 THE PURCHASE MONEY RESULTING TRUST

Where A purchases or contributes to the purchase of land in the name of B, a resulting trust arises, because it is presumed that A did not intend a gift. A classic exposition of the trust is contained in the following case.

Dyer v Dyer
(1788) 2 Cox 92

Eyre CB

At 93

The clear result of all the cases, without a single exception, is that the trust of a legal estate whether freehold, copyhold, or leasehold, whether taken in the names of the purchaser and others jointly, or in the names of others without that of the purchaser, whether in one name or several, whether jointly or successive, results to the man who advances the purchase money.

The link between the trust and payment of purchase money is reflected in the quantification of shares under the resulting trust. Each party receives a share in proportion to their contribution.

The nature of the presumption is analysed by Swadling.

Swadling, 'Explaining Resulting Trusts' (2008) 124 LQR 72, 74

Presumptions properly so-called form part of the law of proof. Generally speaking, facts can be proved by admission, judicial notice, or evidence. In the absence of admission and judicial notice, the general rule is that facts must be proved by evidence, the burden of proving those facts lying on the party alleging them to have occurred. Very occasionally, however, proof by evidence of one fact, the "basic" or "primary" fact, gives that party to the litigation the benefit of another fact, the "secondary" fact, without any need to adduce evidence in proof. In such cases, the fact is proved by presumption. The burden then lies on the other party to adduce evidence to rebut the presumption. If they do not, the tribunal of fact must find the secondary fact proved.

In the resulting trust, the primary fact is A's contribution to the purchase. Swadling argues that the secondary fact (the fact presumed) is that A intended a declaration of trust.[21] On Birks' and Chambers' unjust enrichment analysis, the fact presumed is the lack of intent to benefit the recipient.[22]

[21] Swadling, 'Explaining Resulting Trusts' (2008) 124 LQR 72, 79.
[22] See Chambers (1997, p 21). Chambers directly refutes Swadling's views in Chambers, 'Is There a Presumption of Resulting Trust?' in Resulting and Constructive Trusts (ed Mitchell, Oxford: Hart 2009).

3.1.1 Presumption of advancement

In a limited number of circumstances, due to the relationship between A and B, no presumption of resulting trust is currently drawn; instead, it is presumed that A did, in fact, intend to make a gift of the land to B. These cases are described as involving a 'presumption of advancement', or a 'presumption of gift'. The relationships to which the presumption of advancement applies were established by the early twentieth century and reflect the prevailing views of relationships in which there is a moral obligation for A to provide for B. Hence, the presumption applies to transfers from a husband to his wife (but not from a wife to her husband, or between cohabiting partners), and from a father to his child. In Laskar v Laskar,[23] the Court of Appeal assumed that it would also apply to a transfer from a mother to her child although counsel did not argue for its application on the facts.[24]

The values on which the presumption of advancement is based now appear outdated. Its continuing application on a transfer from husband to wife has met with particular criticism. As we have seen in the context of the presumption of resulting trust, a presumption is no more than a means of proving the existence of a fact. As Lord Diplock explains, this means that a presumption is only as valid as the underlying assumptions upon which it is drawn.

Pettitt v Pettitt
[1970] AC 777, HL

Lord Diplock

At 824

But the most likely inference as to a person's intention in the transactions of his everyday life depends upon the social environment in which he lives and the common habits of thought of those who live in it. The consensus of judicial opinion which gave rise to the presumptions of "advancement" and "resulting trust" in transactions between husband and wife is to be found in cases relating to the propertied classes of the nineteenth century and the first quarter of the twentieth century among whom marriage settlements were common, and it was unusual for the wife to contribute by her earnings to the family income. It was not until after World War II that the courts were required to consider the proprietary rights in family assets of a different social class. The advent of legal aid, the wider employment of married women in industry, commerce and the professions and the emergence of a property-owning, particularly a real-property-mortgaged-to-a-building-society-owning, democracy has compelled the courts to direct their attention to this during the last 20 years. It would, in my view, be an abuse of the legal technique for ascertaining or imputing intention to apply to transactions between the post-war generation of married couples "presumptions" which are based upon inferences of fact which an earlier generation of judges drew as to the most likely intentions of earlier generations of spouses belonging to the propertied classes of a different social era.

Although the presumption of advancement still exists in a transfer from husband and wife, it will readily be rebutted. In Stack v Dowden,[25] Lord Neuberger noted: '[T]he pre- sumption of advancement, as between man and wife, which was so important in the 18th and 19th centuries has now become much weakened, although not quite to the point of disappearance.'

While the courts have therefore made some attempt at modernizing the operation of the presumption, the underlying discriminatory treatment of transfers by husbands and fathers on the one hand and wives and mothers (subject to the assumption in Lasker v Lasker) on the other is impossible to rationalize in a modern context. The Equality Act 2010 contains a provision in section 199 for the abolition of the presumption of advancement. The section is not yet in force and will apply only to transfers undertaken after it comes into effect. Following abolition of the presumption of advancement, the presumption of resulting trust will apply to transfers in its place.

3.1.2 Rebutting the presumptions: general principles

The presumptions of resulting trust and of advancement can be displaced by evidence of the actual intention of A.[26] Where the presumption of resulting trust is rebutted, A does not obtain a beneficial interest in the land despite his or her financial contribution to its purchase. Where the presumption of advancement is rebutted, the land is held on resulting trust for A, who provided the purchase money, despite A's relationship to B.

Debate has centred on the nature of the evidence required to rebut the presumption of resulting trust. As we have noted, the presumption that A intended a declaration of trust is drawn because of a reluctance to presume that A intended to make a gift of the land to B. Hence, evidence that a gift was, in fact, intended would clearly rebut the presumption of trust. But the presumption may be rebutted by a wider range of evidence, consistent with the view that the presumption drawn is that of a declaration of trust.

Swadling, 'A New Role for Resulting Trusts?' (1996) 16 LS 110, 116–17

> The presumption of resulting trust which arises in the case of a transfer of property without consideration is not one of non-beneficial transfer. It is instead a presumption of transfer on trust for the transferor. And for that reason, evidence of a positive donative intent is not the only thing capable of rebutting the presumption. Any evidence which is inconsistent with the implication of an intended trust will do [...]

In Westdeutsche v Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,[27] Lord Browne-Wilkinson approved the statement that the presumption of trust is rebutted by evidence of any intention inconsistent with the trust. In doing so, he rejected the view (consistent with an unjust enrichment analysis) that the presumption is rebutted only by evidence of an intention to make a gift.[28]

3.1.3 Rebutting the presumptions: transfers for an illegal purpose

Where A transfers land to B, or contributes to the purchase of property in B's name, in order to facilitate an illegal activity, the illegal purpose cannot be invoked to rebut a presumption of advancement or trust. In the following case, a three–two majority of the House of Lords held that this does not prevent A from relying on the initial presumption, because A does not need to plead the illegality in order to do so.

Tinsley v Milligan
[1994] 1 AC 340, HL

Facts: Tinsley and Milligan, a lesbian couple, both contributed to the purchase of the house that they shared, but the house was transferred into Tinsley's sole name in order to facilitate fraudulent social security claims. Milligan subsequently repented and confessed to the frauds, following which, Tinsley moved out of the house. Tinsley then sought possession of the house and argued that she was solely entitled.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson

The presumption of a resulting trust is, in my view, crucial in considering the authorities. On that presumption (and on the contrary presumption of advancement) hinges the answer to the crucial question 'does a plaintiff claiming under a resulting trust have to rely on the underlying illegality?' Where the presumption of resulting trust applies, the plaintiff does not have to rely on the illegality. If he proves that the property is vested in the defendant alone but that the plaintiff provided part of the purchase money, or voluntarily transferred the property to the defendant, the plaintiff establishes his claim under a resulting trust unless either the contrary presumption of advancement displaces the presumption of resulting trust or the defendant leads evidence to rebut the presumption of resulting trust. Therefore, in cases where the presumption of advancement does not apply, a plaintiff can establish his equitable interest in the property without relying in any way on the underlying illegal transaction. In this case Miss Milligan as defendant simply pleaded the common intention that the property should belong to both of them and that she contributed to the purchase price: she claimed that in consequence the property belonged to them equally. To the same effect was her evidence in chief. Therefore Miss Milligan was not forced to rely on the illegality to prove her equitable interest. Only in the reply and the course of Miss Milligan's cross-examination did such illegality emerge: it was Miss Tinsley who had to rely on that illegality.

Although the presumption of advancement does not directly arise for consideration in this case, it is important when considering the decided cases to understand its operation. On a transfer from a man to his wife, children or others to whom he stands in loco parentis, equity presumes an intention to make a gift. Therefore in such a case, unlike the case where the presumption of resulting trust applies, in order to establish any claim the plaintiff has himself to lead evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption of gift and in so doing will normally have to plead, and give evidence of, the underlying illegal purpose.

Hence, Milligan could still invoke the presumption of resulting trust, because she did not need to rely on the illegal purpose of the purchase in Tinsley's sole name in order to do so. The principle espoused by the case is therefore sometimes described as the 'reliance principle'. The outcome in Tinsley v Milligan would have been different, however, if the case had involved a husband and wife, and the house had been purchased in the wife's name in order to facilitate social security fraud. In such a case, the initial presumption would be of a gift and therefore the husband would have to plead the illegal purpose in order to establish a resulting trust.

An exception to the principle that an illegal purpose cannot be raised to rebut a presumption was recognized in Tribe v Tribe.[29] In that case, a father transferred shares in a company to his son to preserve them for the benefit of the family in light of the father's possible liability for dilapidations under commercial leases. The liability did not materialize, but the son refused to re-transfer the shares. The relationship of father and son is one to which the presumption of advancement applies. The Court of Appeal noted the comments in Tinsley v Milligan that an illegal purpose could not be raised to rebut the presumption of advancement, but it was held that, because the illegal purpose had not been carried out, the father was not precluded from pleading the purpose of the transfer to claim a resulting trust of the shares. Q v Q signals that in applying Tribe v Tribe the court will resist attempts to rely on an unduly narrow (and self-serving) explanation of the purpose of a transfer.[30] There, a father argued that the illegal purpose of a transfer of a house to his sons was to avoid inheritance tax which therefore would not be carried out until his death. The court considered that the purpose should be interpreted more broadly as being 'to deceive the Revenue'. Such deception had already occurred by, for example, the father falsely representing to the Revenue that he was no longer the owner of the house. Hence, his attempt to invoke Tribe v Tribe failed.

The fact that the outcome in cases of illegality is dependent on whether the initial presumption applied is one of trust or advancement is unsatisfactory as the nature of the illegality in each case is identical.[31] We have seen in section 3.1.1 that provision has been made for the abolition of the presumption of advancement in the Equality Act 2010, but this is not yet in force. When the presumption is abolished, Tinsley v Milligan will apply to all cases of illegality: the initial presumption will be one of resulting trust and the claimant will not need to rely on the illegality to prove the existence of the trust. However, the Law Commission has recommended replacing the reliance principle with a statutory discretion.[32] If enacted, the proposals will apply where a trust is created, or an existing trust is used,[33] to conceal beneficial ownership in connection with a criminal purpose.[34] The starting point under the proposals is that a beneficiary should be able to retain their interest and enforce a trust despite the illegality (the same starting point that will arise in all cases when the presumption of advancement is abolished). However, in 'exceptional circumstances' the court may exercise a discretion to deprive the beneficiary of their interest.[35] Where the discretion is exercised, the court must then decide in whom the property should vest; the settlor, trustee or another beneficiary.[36] The approach adopted is (like under the current law) one of 'all or nothing'.[37] Either the beneficiary obtains their full share unconditionally,[38] or they are deprived of their entire interest.

3.2 THE SCOPE OF THE PURCHASE MONEY RESULTING TRUST

As we have seen, the presumption of resulting trust applies where A purchases or contributes to the purchase of land in B's name. The presumption also applies where land is purchased in the joint names of A and B, but there is no express declaration of trust regarding the parties' respective beneficial shares. In all cases, the presumption of resulting trust confers on the parties beneficial shares in proportion to their financial contribution to the purchase.

The scope of the purchase money resulting trust is curtailed by its relationship with the common intention constructive trust. Where A purchases or contributes to the purchase of land in B's name, or land is purchased in the joint names of A and B, but there is no express declaration of trust, a constructive trust may be imposed to give effect to the common intention of the parties. The practical difference between the constructive and resulting trusts relates to the quantification of the parties' respective beneficial shares. In the common intention constructive trust, beneficial shares are determined in accordance with the common intention of the parties. This may result in the acquisition of shares that are disproportionate to the parties' contributions.

There is no doubt that the resulting trust is the appropriate device to use where A and B are commercial parties.[39] The relationship between the resulting trust and common intention constructive trust has arisen principally in the context of determining ownership of a home. It is discussed fully in this context in Chapter 16. For the purposes of this chapter, it is sufficient to note that in two significant decisions the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden[40] and the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott[41] have removed the application of the resulting trust in some cases where the property in question is a home. The reason underlying this development, and the type of home to which the presumption of resulting trust no longer applies, are explained in the following extract.

Jones v Kernott
[2011] 3 WLR 1121

Lord Walker and Baroness Hale

In the context of the acquisition of a family home, the presumption of a resulting trust made a great deal more sense when social and economic conditions were different and when it was tempered by the presumption of advancement. The breadwinner husband who provided the money to buy a house in his wife's name, or in their joint names, was presumed to be making her a gift of it, or of a joint interest in it. That simple assumption—which was itself an exercise in imputing an intention which the parties may never have had—was thought unrealistic in the modern world by three of their Lordships in Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777. It was also discriminatory as between men and women and married and unmarried couples. That problem might have been solved had equity been able to extend the presumption of advancement to unmarried couples and remove the sex discrimination. Instead, the tool which equity has chosen to develop law is the "common intention" constructive trust. Abandoning the presumption of advancement while retaining the presumption of resulting trust would place an even greater emphasis upon who paid for what, an emphasis which most commentators now agree to have been too narrow: hence the general welcome given to the "more promising vehicle" of the constructive trust: see Gardner and Davidson at (2011) 127 LQR 13, 16. The presumption of advancement is to receive its quietus when section 199 of the Equality Act 2010 is brought into force.

The time has come to make it clear, in line with Stack v Dowden (see also Abbott v Abbott [2007] UKPC 53, [2007] 2 All ER 432), that in the case of the purchase of a house or flat in joint names for joint occupation by a married or unmarried couple, where both are responsible for any mortgage, there is no presumption of a resulting trust arising from their having contributed to the deposit (or indeed the rest of the purchase) in unequal shares. The presumption is that the parties intended a joint tenancy both in law and in equity. But that presumption can of course be rebutted by evidence of a contrary intention, which may more readily be shown where the parties did not share their financial resources.

It should be noted that the types of home to which the presumption of resulting trust no longer applies is narrower than had been understood in the immediate aftermath of Stack v Dowden. In that case Baroness Hale explained that '[i]n law, "context is everything" and the domestic context is very different from the commercial world'.[42] Subsequently, the courts had distinguished the domestic and commercial contexts according to the purpose for which property was acquired. Hence, the presumption of resulting trust was not applied in Adekunle v Ritchie[43] to a home bought jointly by a mother and her son, but was applied in Laskar v Laskar[44] where a mother and daughter jointly purchased a house as a buy-to-let investment. Following Jones v Kernott the resulting trust is the correct starting point outside the context of homes purchased by couples in an intimate relationship. In such cases the presumption of resulting trust may still be displaced by a claim to a constructive trust.

4 CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS

Constructive trusts represent the broadest and least clearly defined of the three categories of trust.

A constructive trust arises by operation of law whenever the circumstances are such that it would be unconscionable for the owner of property [. . .] to assert his own beneficial interest in the property and deny the beneficial interest of another.

The reference in this definition to unconscionability is significant, but of limited utility. In Westdeutsche, Lord Browne-Wilkinson considered unconscionability to be the foundation for the whole of the law of trusts. Notwithstanding, the constructive trust is the only category explicitly defined on this basis. The concept of unconscionability provides a common thread that ties together all trusts classified as constructive. The concept is of limited utility, however, because it does not operate at large. Indeed, in so far as it is indicative of a general discretionary jurisdiction to impose constructive trusts, it is entirely misleading. At best, it may be said that the combination of elements required for the imposition of a constructive trust in each particular application of the doctrine collectively establish conduct considered by the courts to be unconscionable.

4.1 INSTITUTIONAL AND REMEDIAL CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS

The key division in constructive trust doctrine is that between institutional and remedial versions of the trust. Lord Browne-Wilkinson explained the difference between these in Westdeutsche.

Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC
[1996] AC 669, HL

Lord Browne-Wilkinson

At 714–15

Under an institutional constructive trust, the trust arises by operation of law as from the date of the circumstances which give rise to it: the function of the court is merely to declare that such trust has arisen in the past. The consequences that flow from such trust having arisen (including the possibly unfair consequences to third parties who in the interim have received the trust property) are also determined by rules of law, not under a discretion. A remedial constructive trust, as I understand it, is different. It is a judicial remedy giving rise to an enforceable equitable obligation: the extent to which it operates retrospectively to the prejudice of third parties lies in the discretion of the court.

This difference can be illustrated as follows. Assume that a claimant has fulfilled the elements of a claim to a constructive trust of land on 1 December 2006, but that a court does not decide the claim until 1 December 2009. If the trust is institutional, then the role of the court, having found the constituent elements of the claim to be established since 1 December 2006, is to declare that the trust arose on that date. Since that date, the claimant has had a proprietary interest in the land. If the defendant has sold the land since that date, or has become bankrupt, then the claimant's interest may bind the purchaser and the claimant will have priority in the bankruptcy against unsecured creditors. If, however, the trust is remedial, then the court has discretion to decide what effect, if any, it should have prior to its decision on 1 December 2009. The court, therefore, has a discretion to determine the claimant's ability to enforce his or her interest against a purchaser who has bought the land since 1 December 2006, and to determine whether the claimant should be treated as a secured creditor in a bankruptcy.

The remedial version of the trust has been embraced in North American jurisdictions, but its place in English law is uncertain. Undoubtedly, there are instances in which English courts impose a constructive trust as a remedy. Nield[45] highlights that a constructive trust imposed as the remedy for proprietary estoppel would be classified in this way. Outside such isolated incidences, however, attempts to develop the remedial constructive trust have faltered.

In the 1970s, Lord Denning advocated the development of a 'constructive trust of a new model',[46] which he described as 'an equitable remedy by which the court can enable an aggrieved party to obtain restitution'.[47] This new model trust was developed by Lord Denning in the context of determining ownership of the home: a matter that has subsequently been established as based on a much narrower form of institutional constructive trust.[48] In Westdeutsche, Lord Browne-Wilkinson suggested that the remedial constructive trust could be used as a proprietary response to unjust enrichment. His comment was made in the context of his rejection of the unjust enrichment analysis of the resulting trust—but this suggestion has since been rejected by the Court of Appeal in Re Polly Peck International (No 2).[49] Although the case was only a preliminary ruling, the court's objection strikes at the very heart of what a remedial trust involves. Nourse LJ explained, 'we must recognise that the remedial constructive trust gives the court a discretion to vary proprietary rights. You cannot grant a property right to A, who has not had one beforehand, without taking some proprietary right away from B. No English court has ever had the power to do that, except with the authority of Parliament'.[50]

The most recent judicial attempt to identify a role for the remedial constructive trust came in Thorner v Major.[51] That case, which is discussed fully in Chapter 10, involved a claim to proprietary estoppel in the context of a promise of an inheritance. Lord Scott suggested that the remedial trust may be better equipped than estoppel to accommodate the uncertainty inherent in promises as to the future.[52] However, Lord Scott's concerns were not shared by the other members of the House of Lords and Lord Scott made it clear that he did not disagree with the claim succeeding under proprietary estoppel. Indeed, the promise of an inheritance has become a common situation in which proprietary estoppel is invoked and there seems little prospect that Lord Scott's preference for a remedial constructive trust will be adopted.

Currently, therefore, beyond isolated incidents of remedial trusts, the constructive trust recognized by English law is the institutional trust. There are four types of institutional constructive trust that are specifically concerned with the acquisition of beneficial interests in land:

- the common intention constructive trust that is used to determine ownership of the home;
- constructive trusts imposed on a vendor under a specifically enforceable contract for sale of land;
- constructive trusts imposed under the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead;[53]
- constructive trusts arising under the Pallant v Morgan[54] equity.

The common intention constructive trust is considered in Chapter 16, while the trust imposed on a vendor has been considered in Chapter 9. In this chapter, we will consider constructive trusts arising under the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead and the Pallant v Morgan equity.

4.2 THE DOCTRINE IN ROCHEFOUCAULD V BOUSTEAD

The doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead stems from the maxim that 'equity will not allow a statute to be used as an instrument of fraud'. Where land is transferred on trust, but the statutory requirements for an express trust are not complied with, a constructive trust is imposed to prevent the transferee from reneging on the trust and seeking to retain the property for him or herself. The paradigm case within the doctrine is a two-party case, in which land is transferred from A to B, to hold on trust for A. An extension to this paradigm is a three-party case, in which land is transferred from A to C, to hold on trust for a third party, B. These are illustrated in Figure 3.

Figure 3 Rochefoucauld v Boustead in two and three-party cases

The doctrine has been further extended to situations in which A transfers land to C expressly 'subject to' rights in favour of B, where the rights intended to be enjoyed by B have either been proprietary rights that do not generally take effect under a trust,[55] or personal

[53] [1897] 1 Ch 196. [54] [1953] Ch 43.

[55] See Lyus v Prowsa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 WLR 1044, in which the transfer was made 'subject to' an option to purchase (an estate contract).

rights.[56] In such cases, the courts have, notwithstanding, held that a constructive trust may be imposed to prevent C reneging on the 'subject to' agreement. This extension of the doctrine has been particularly significant in cases in which A has conferred a contractual licence on B (a personal right) and wants to protect B's occupation on a transfer of the land to C. The imposition of a constructive trust pursuant to a 'subject to' transfer is considered in Chapter 21 in the context of licences. In this chapter, we consider the imposition of a constructive trust on a transfer of land from A to B on trust for A, or a transfer from A to C on trust for a third party, B.

4.3 THE TWO-PARTY CASE

The two-party case provides the factual context of the decision from which this doctrine takes its name.

Rochefoucauld v Boustead
[1897] 1 Ch 196, CA

Facts: Rochefoucauld owned coffee estates in Ceylon, but had been unable to pay mortgages on the estates. She transferred the estates to Boustead, who had subsequently sold them. Rochefoucauld argued that the estates had been transferred to Boustead on trust for her and that the surplus proceeds of sale (after discharge of sums owed to Boustead) should therefore be paid to her. The Court doubted that there was written evidence of the trust, as was required under the Statute of Frauds 1677—the precursor to s 53 of the LPA 1925.

Lindley LJ

It is further established by a series of cases, the propriety of which cannot now be questioned, that the Statute of Frauds does not prevent the proof of a fraud; and that it is a fraud on the part of a person to whom land is conveyed as a trustee, and who knows it was so conveyed, to deny the trust and claim the land himself. Consequently, notwithstanding the statute, it is competent for a person claiming land conveyed to another to prove by parol evidence that it was so conveyed upon trust for the claimant, and that the grantee, knowing the facts, is denying the trust and relying upon the form of conveyance and the statute, in order to keep the land himself.

The effect of the fraud was to enable oral evidence to be admitted as to the existence of the trust. On the facts, the Court was satisfied that the evidence established that the land had been transferred on trust in favour of Rochefouaculd.

4.3.1 Elements of the Rochefoucauld v Boustead constructive trust

The court's intervention is triggered by B's (the transferee's) denial of the trust pursuant to which the land was transferred. It is necessary only to establish that the land was transferred on trust and that the transferee has reneged on this agreement. In Rochefoucauld v Boustead, as we have seen in the extract above, Lindley LJ described Boustead's conduct as fraudulent. It is important to note that Lindley LJ's reference is to the concept of equitable fraud. In equity, fraud is a broad concept and has no inherent connection to an intention to cheat. Equitable fraud and unconscionability have been defined by reference to each other, and nothing turns on the classification of the conduct as 'fraudulent' as opposed to 'unconscionable'.[57] Discussing the terminology of fraud and unconscionability in another context (that of proprietary estoppel), Scarman LJ commented: '"[F]raud" was a word often in the mouths of those robust judges who adorned the bench in the 19th century. It is less often in mouths of the more wary judicial spirits today who sit upon the bench.'[58]

[56] See Binions v Evans [1972] Ch 359, in which the transfer was 'subject to' a contractual licence.

The key difficulty with the concept of fraud in Rochefoucauld v Boustead is that the fraud consists in denying the trust, which is the very thing that s 53(1)(b) of the LPA 1925 requires to be evidenced in writing.

Hopkins, The Informal Acquisition of Rights in Land (2000, pp 31–2)

Applied broadly, Rochefoucauld v. Boustead has the effect that when land is transferred on trust, the trust is enforced as long as it is evidenced: in writing (within section 53(1)(b)); or orally. The effect of such a rule would be to reduce section 53(1)(b) to trusts declared by (current) holders of land. This would be a startling result for a rule purportedly based on the prevention of fraud. The underlying difficulty is in determining why the denial of an informal trust should, in some circumstances, be considered fraudulent [. . .] it may be argued that the fraud lies in the combination of the trustee's wrongdoing and the harm to the transferor. [. . .] However, it seems that such a definition does no more than beg the question as to the nature of the underlying wrongdoing and harm, in light of non-compliance with statutory formalities.

A comparison can be drawn with the use of proprietary estoppel in the context of s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989). As we have seen in Chapter 7, in Yaxley v Gotts,[59] the Court of Appeal held that estoppel could not be used to render valid a transaction that legislation has enacted is to be invalid—but this is exactly what the doctrine of Rochefoucauld v Boustead appears to allow. The difference between this doctrine, operating in relation to s 53(1)(b) of the LPA 1925, and proprietary estoppel, operating in relation to s 2 of the LP(MP)A 1989, is that s 53(2) contains an explicit exception for constructive trusts. This difference is undoubtedly crucial. Notwithstanding, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Rochefoucauld v Boustead 'amounts to a drastic judicial modification' of the statutory formalities.[60]

Three important points about the operation of the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead are derived from its application in the following case.

[57] See Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932, 954; Semiahmoo Indian Band v Canada (1997) 148 DLR (4th) 523, 551–2. Further discussion of the relationship between these terms is provided by Hopkins, 'Understanding Unconscionability in Proprietary Estoppel' (2004) 20 JCL 210, 212–14.

Bannister v Bannister
[1948] 2 All ER 133, CA

Facts: The defendant had inherited two cottages, one of which was her home, on the death of her husband. She transferred the cottages to the plaintiff, her brother-in-law, for less than the market value, pursuant to an oral agreement that she would remain living in her home, rent-free, for life. The plaintiff reneged on the agreement and sought possession of the defendant's home.

It is, we think, clearly a mistake to suppose that the equitable principle on which a constructive trust is raised against a person who insists on the absolute character of a conveyance to himself for the purpose of defeating a beneficial interest, which, according to the true bargain, was to belong to another, is confined to cases in which the conveyance itself was fraudulently obtained. The fraud which brings the principle into play arises as soon as the absolute character of the conveyance is set up for the purpose of defeating the beneficial interest, and that is the fraud to cover which the Statute of Frauds or the corresponding provisions of the Law of Property Act, 1925 cannot be called in aid in cases in which no written evidence of the real bargain is available. Nor is it, in our opinion, necessary that the bargain on which the absolute conveyance is made should include any express stipulation that the grantee is in so many words to hold as trustee. It is enough that the bargain should have included a stipulation under which some sufficiently defined beneficial interest in the property was to be taken by another.

It is clear therefore that: firstly, the conveyance need not be obtained by fraud; secondly, the transfer need not use the technical language of trust; and thirdly, that no weight was given to the fact that the conveyance was at an undervalue. Intervention was triggered solely by the fraud consisting in the denial of the trust. As we will see below, this is significant in understanding the basis of intervention.

4.3.2 The classification of the trust: express or constructive?

In Rochefoucauld v Boustead, the Court classified the trust as an express trust. Without doubt, the trust was one that the parties intended to create. On that basis, Swadling considers that the trust is correctly considered to be express.[61] But the classification of the trust was discussed in the context of the prevailing Statute of Limitations.[62] As McFarlane explains, the classification of a trust for that purpose is not conclusive. (In this extract C is the transferee.)

McFarlane, 'Constructive Trusts Arising on Receipt of Property Sub Conditione'
(2004) 120 LQR 667, 675

[The] characterisation of trusts adopted when applying limitation statutes cannot be taken as definitive: to say that a trust is to be treated as an express trust "within the meaning" of [61] Swadling (2007), [4.207]; Swadling, 'The Nature of the Trust in Rochefoucauld v Boustead' in Constructive and Resulting Trusts (ed Mitchell, Oxford: Hart, 2009).

[62] A point refuted, however, by Swadling, 'The Nature of the Trust in Rochefoucauld v Boustead' ibid.

a limitation statute is not the same as saying that trust is an express trust for all purposes. As far as the current inquiry is concerned, the critical question is: "what is the event which leads the court to recognise the new right arising on the transfer to C in Rochefoucauld?" On this point, there seems to be little controversy. On the constructive trust analysis, the trust does not arise simply because the former owner of the property so intended; rather, the trust arises to prevent C's reneging on the understanding subject to which he received the property. The trust is therefore constructive, and can arise without being manifested and proved by writing. It is thus possible to accept the view in Rochefoucauld that the trust is an express one for limitation purposes, as it was one that B (and C) intended to create, without admitting that the trust is an express one in the sense that this intention is by itself sufficient to create the trust.

While the parties in Rochefoucauld v Boustead intended a trust, this was not the basis upon which a trust was imposed: the trust was imposed to prevent Boustead's fraudulent denial of the agreement pursuant to which the land was transferred. As we have noted, nothing turns on the description of the conduct as fraudulent rather than unconscionable. The trust was therefore imposed to prevent unconscionable conduct and contrary to the view maintained by Swadling is correctly classified as a constructive trust.[63] This classification of the trust was adopted by the Court of Appeal (without discussion) in Bannister v Bannister.[64]

4.3.3 An alternative analysis: unjust enrichment

There is a tendency in the literature to subject the operation of the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead to an unjust enrichment analysis.[65] Sometimes, the analysis appears to relate to a broad sense of unjust enrichment, denoting no more than 'a state of affairs where the defendant can be said to have been enriched in circumstances of injustice'.[66] This is in contradistinction to the narrow sense of the term (the sense in which it is used in other references to the concept in this chapter) as denoting the existence of limited and specific factors on which a claimant can obtain restitution, because the defendant has been unjustly enriched at his or her expense.[67]

There are, however, difficulties in using either sense of unjust enrichment in relation to the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead. Used in a narrow sense, unjust enrichment requires a structured analysis of whether the transferee has been enriched at the transferor's expense and whether the enrichment is unjust by reference to specific unjust factors. There is no evidence of such an analysis being taken by the courts. It is doubtful, in particular, whether the facts of a claim within Rochefoucauld v Boustead fit within the scope of existing unjust factors.[68]

Used in a broad sense, the concept does not add to our understanding of the operation of the doctrine.

> In the broad sense of the term it may be accurate to say that a defendant who reneges on an agreement to hold on trust pursuant to which land is transferred would be unjustly enriched. However, at best this takes our understanding of intervention no further than the statement that it is unconscionable or fraudulent of the transferee to renege on the agreement.

Indeed, used in a broad sense, unjust enrichment can be detrimental to our understanding of the doctrine.

This is the sense in which Youdan appears to refer to unjust enrichment in a discussion of Bannister v Bannister. As we have seen, in that case, the transferee received a discount on the market value of the cottages in return for agreeing to allow the transferor to live in one cottage for the rest of her life.

Youdan, 'Formalities for Trusts of Land, and the Doctrine in Rochefoucauld v. Boustead' (1984) 43 CLJ 306, 328

> Consider the position in Bannister if the making of the undertaking had been seriously disputed and the property had been sold for its full market value on a vacant possession basis. The enforcement of a mistaken or false allegation of an undertaking would have resulted in the woman being unjustly enriched by receiving both the full market value and the right to live in the property for the rest of her life. On the other hand, the non-enforcement of an undertaking that in fact was made would only have the result that the woman would not retain an expected gift—free living accommodation.

As Youdan acknowledges (and as has been noted above), the provision of the discount was not, in fact, considered significant. By focusing on the financial position of the parties, an unjust enrichment analysis loses sight of the essential element of the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead: the objection in the doctrine lies in the transferee reneging on the agreement pursuant to which the land was transferred.[69]

4.4 THE THREE-PARTY CASE

As we have noted, the three-party case involves a transfer of land from A to C on trust for B. This is only a slight extension from the paradigm two-party case and there is no doubt that the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead applies in this context.[70] The doctrine has been further applied beyond this factual matrix, where the agreement for the trust in favour of B is entered into between C (the transferee) and a party (X) providing finance for the purchase of land (Figure 4).

Neale v Willis
(1968) 19 P & CR 836, CA

Facts: A husband obtained a loan from his mother-in-law in connection with the purchase of the house. The loan was made pursuant to an agreement that the house would be bought in the joint names of the husband and wife. The husband reneged on this agreement and bought the house in his sole name. Following the couple's divorce, the question arose as to the beneficial ownership of the house.

Lord Denning MR

This was a binding contract and a court of equity will not allow the husband to go back on it. It will enforce it by holding that the husband holds the property on a constructive trust for himself and his wife. This follows from Bannister v Bannister. That case shows that if a person who takes a conveyance to himself, which is absolute in form, nevertheless has made a bargain that he will give a beneficial interest to another, he will be held to be a constructive trustee for it for the other. He cannot insist on the absolute character of a conveyance to himself for the purpose of defeating a beneficial interest which according to the true bargain is to belong to another. So here we have a husband who is seeking to insist on the absolute character of the conveyance to himself and to him alone. He does it for the purpose of defeating a beneficial interest which according to the true bargain was to belong to his wife. He holds it on a constructive trust to carry out the bargain.

4.4.1 In whose favour does the constructive trust operate?

The key question that has arisen in three-party cases is whether the trust should operate in favour of B, the intended beneficiary, or A, the transferor. The debate has been complicated by the absence of clear authority, and the consequential impact on this issue of competing views as to the nature of the trust in issue and the basis of intervention. Hence, if Rochefoucauld v Boustead enforces the parties' express trust, then, in the three-party case, the trust necessarily operates in favour of B. If the doctrine is founded on unjust enrichment, then this necessarily dictates intervention in favour of A, as the party at whose expense C is otherwise unjustly enriched.[71]

71 See the example discussed by Worthington (2006), pp 203–4.

But it has been suggested above that both of these views are incorrect: the doctrine imposes a constructive trust in response to C's fraudulent or unconscionable conduct. In a series of articles, Youdan and Feltham expressed opposing views: Youdan supporting the claim of B, and Feltham, that of A.

Youdan, 'Formalities for Trusts of Land, and the Doctrine in Rochefoucauld v. Boustead' (1984) 43 CLJ 306, 335–6

The claim of [B] is, I suggest, stronger for three main, related reasons. First, it seems inappropriate that [C], the trustee, should have the power to determine whether [B] or A should get the benefit of the property. Secondly, A has effectively divested himself of the property. It is he who is seeking equity to obtain the return of property he has given away on a valid trust. Thirdly, the allowance of [B's] claim is not contrary to the purpose of the formality requirement. If A had simply conveyed the land to [C] as a gift for [C] he obviously could not recover it since he effectively divested himself [...] There is no reason why A should be in a stronger position merely because the beneficial gift was to [B] with the interposition of [C's] trusteeship.

Feltham, 'Informal Trusts and Third Parties' [1987] Conv 246, 249

T. G. Youdan suggests three reasons why [B's] claim should be preferred to that of A. First, that it is inappropriate that [C], the trustee, should have the power to determine whether [B] or A should get the benefit of the property. But this goes rather to the proposition that lack of writing renders the transaction unenforceable rather than void. Secondly, that A has effectively divested himself of the property and is seeking the assistance of equity to obtain its return. But the only property of which A has effectively divested himself is the legal estate; the location of the equitable interest is what is at issue. Thirdly, that the allowance of [B's] claim is not contrary to the purpose of the formality requirement. But it has been argued in the previous paragraph that the allowing of such claims does defeat the purpose of the formality requirement. Youdan's comparison with a direct conveyance by way of gift does not hold because he is assuming in the case of a direct conveyance that the relevant formal requirement (and the purpose behind it) has been satisfied.

Youdan, 'Informal Trusts and Third Parties: A Response' [1988] Conv 267, 272–3

My three points were explicitly based on the assumption that it is "established that an oral trust of land is valid despite non-compliance with [the statutory formality requirement]; it is merely unenforceable. Consequently, where A conveys land to [C] on an oral trust for [B], A has ordinarily no right to restitution since [C] is holding the property on a valid trust for [B], and he may carry out that trust if he chooses to do so." I discuss, and indeed criticise, this principle in an earlier section of my article. Nevertheless, despite possible criticism of it, this principle does appear to be well established, as Feltham also seems to recognise at the beginning of his article.

My first point seems, therefore, to be accepted by Feltham if one accepts the assumption that lack of writing makes the transaction unenforceable rather than void. My second point > is grounded on the same assumption and, on this basis, Feltham is wrong in saying "the only property of which A has effectively divested himself is the legal estate; the location of the equitable interest is what is at issue," since [C] is holding title to the property on a valid trust for [B]. Feltham is, however, justified in criticising the way I put my third point. I did overstate it when I said that the allowance of [B's] claim is not contrary to the purpose of the formality requirement. The Rochefoucauld doctrine as a whole substantially diminishes the policies of the formality requirement, and, as it was the main purpose of my article to show, the question becomes one of balancing the value of those policies against the injustice that may be caused by reliance on the formality requirement. Moreover, there is, as I recognised in my article, considerable merit in the view that restitution back to the transferor entails a less serious interference with the statute than enforcement in favour of the third party beneficiary.

> However, I do maintain that my comparison with a direct gift to [C] is tenable, although perhaps too strongly stated.

On balance, the arguments appear weighted against B. The purpose of the doctrine is to prevent C's fraudulent or unconscionable conduct, and intervention should go no further than is necessary to achieve this purpose. B is a volunteer and 'equity does not assist a volunteer'. The imposition of a trust in favour of A provides A with a further opportunity to benefit B. Finally, intervention in favour of A does less violence to the formality requirement in s 53(1)(b) of the LPA 1925.[72]

In limited circumstances, however, intervention in favour of B may be justified.

Hopkins, The Informal Acquisition of Rights in Land (2000, pp 37–8)

> First, there may be exceptional circumstances where intervention in [B's] favour is the only means of preventing fraud. This possibility is illustrated by Neale v. Willis. [. . .] it would not have been appropriate for the land to be held in favour of the mother-in-law with whom the agreement had been entered. The agreement did not envisage that she, as a lender, should acquire rights in the house.
> Secondly, an assumption underlying the reasoning against [B] is that A will have another opportunity to grant rights to [B]. There are circumstances in which no such opportunity in practice arises. The clearest example is where A has died. On a strict view this (unlike the first situation) does not alter the reasoning against [B]. The purpose of the rule, of preventing fraud, is still achieved by vesting the beneficial interest in A's estate. However, a concession in favour of [B] may be justified in terms of giving effect to A's intentions as he has died in the belief the gift was effective.

5 THE PALLANT V MORGAN CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST

Although taking its name from the decision in Pallant v Morgan,[73] the operation of this constructive trust received its most comprehensive judicial analysis and rationalization in Banner Homes Group plc v Luff Developments Ltd.[74] As Nield has demonstrated, the origins of the trust ultimately lie in the doctrine of Rochefoucauld v Boustead.[75] As with the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead, the trigger for the imposition of the constructive trust lies in the transferee of land reneging on an agreement pursuant to which land is acquired—but the agreement arises in a different factual matrix and the finding of unconscionability is not based solely on the transferee reneging on the agreement.

5.1 THE ELEMENTS OF THE PALLANT V MORGAN CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST

The requirements of the claim were enumerated in Banner Homes.

Banner Homes Group plc v Luff Developments Ltd
[2000] Ch 372, CA

Facts: Banner Homes (the claimant) and Luff Developments (the defendant) had commenced negotiations for a joint venture for the acquisition of development land. The parties had reached an agreement in principle for the joint venture, but no contract had been concluded, when the land was acquired by S Ltd, a wholly owned subsidiary of Luff. Unknown to Banner Homes, Luff had had second thoughts about the suitability of Banner Homes as a joint venture partner. Luff had not informed Banner Homes of this, out of concern that Banner Homes would mount a rival bid for the land. Banner Homes sought to establish entitlement to the land through a constructive trust.

It is important, however, to identify the features which will give rise to a Pallant v. Morgan equity and to define its scope; while keeping in mind that it is undesirable to attempt anything in the nature of an exhaustive classification. [. . .]

1. A Pallant v. Morgan equity may arise where the arrangement or understanding on which it is based precedes the acquisition of the relevant property by one party to that arrangement. It is the pre-acquisition arrangement which colours the subsequent acquisition by the defendant and leads to his being treated as a trustee if he seeks to act inconsistently with it. [. . .]
2. It is unnecessary that the arrangement or understanding should be contractually enforceable. Indeed, if there is an agreement which is enforceable as a contract, there is unlikely to be any need to invoke the Pallant v. Morgan equity; equity can act through the remedy of specific performance and will recognise the existence of a corresponding trust. [. . .]
3. It is necessary that the pre-acquisition arrangement or understanding should contemplate that one party ("the acquiring party") will take steps to acquire the relevant property; and that, if he does so, the other party ("the non-acquiring party") will obtain some interest in that property. Further, it is necessary that (whatever private reservations the acquiring party may have) he has not informed the non-acquiring party before > the acquisition (or, perhaps more accurately, before it is too late for the parties to be restored to a position of no advantage/no detriment) that he no longer intends to honour the arrangement or understanding.

> 4. It is necessary that, in reliance on the arrangement or understanding, the non-acquiring party should do (or omit to do) something which confers an advantage on the acquiring party in relation to the acquisition of the property; or is detrimental to the ability of the non-acquiring party to acquire the property on equal terms. It is the existence of the advantage to the one, or detriment to the other, gained or suffered as a consequence of the arrangement or understanding, which leads to the conclusion that it would be inequitable or unconscionable to allow the acquiring party to retain the property for himself, in a manner inconsistent with the arrangement or understanding which enabled him to acquire it. Pallant v. Morgan [1953] Ch. 43 itself provides an illustration of this principle. There was nothing inequitable in allowing the defendant to retain for himself the lot (lot15) in respect to which the plaintiff's agent had no instructions to bid. In many cases the advantage/detriment will be found in the agreement of the non-acquiring party to keep out of the market. That will usually be both to the advantage of the acquiring party—in that he can bid without competition from the non-acquiring party—and to the detriment of the non-acquiring party—in that he loses the opportunity to acquire the property for himself. But there may be advantage to the one without corresponding detriment to the other. Again, Pallant v. Morgan provides an illustration. The plaintiff's agreement (through his agent) to keep out of the bidding gave an advantage to the defendant—in that he was able to obtain the property for a lower price than would otherwise have been possible; but the failure of the plaintiff's agent to bid did not, in fact, cause detriment to the plaintiff—because, on the facts, the agent's instructions would not have permitted him to outbid the defendant. Nevertheless, the equity was invoked.
> 5. That leads, I think, to the further conclusions: (i) that although, in many cases, the advantage/detriment will be found in the agreement of the non-acquiring party to keep out of the market, that is not a necessary feature; and (ii) that although there will usually be advantage to the one and correlative disadvantage to the other, the existence of both advantage and detriment is not essential—either will do. What is essential is that the circumstances make it inequitable for the acquiring party to retain the property for himself in a manner inconsistent with the arrangement or understanding on which the non-acquiring party has acted. Those circumstances may arise where the non-acquiring party was never "in the market" for the whole of the property to be acquired; but (on the faith of an arrangement or understanding that he shall have a part of that property) provides support in relation to the acquisition of the whole which is of advantage to the acquiring party. They may arise where the assistance provided to the acquiring party (in pursuance of the arrangement or understanding) involves no detriment to the non-acquiring party; or where the non-acquiring party acts to his detriment (in pursuance of the arrangement or understanding) without the acquiring party obtaining any advantage therefrom.

On the facts of the case, the requirements for the constructive trust were fulfilled. There was a pre-acquisition agreement (falling short of a specifically enforceable contract) that a jointly owned company would acquire the land. Banner Homes had relied on this agreement by treating the site as 'out of play', as a potential acquisition in its own right.[76] This conferred an advantage on Luff of keeping Banner Homes out of the market as a potential competitor. The shares in S Ltd were, therefore, to be held on constructive trust for Banner Homes and Luff equally, charged with the payment by Banner Homes of half the purchase price.

Subsequent case law has cast some light on the scope of the doctrine and on how the individual elements will be interpreted. In Baynes-Clarke v Corless the Court of Appeal held that the agreement need only be 'sufficiently clear' that the parties understood that they would acquire an interest in the land, even if the mechanics through which this was to be achieved were left undecided.[77] It has become apparent that there is little room for manoeuvre around the elements stated by Chadwick LJ. Hence, in Yeoman's Row Management Ltd v Cobbe,[78] the House of Lords held that Pallant v Morgan was not applicable, because the land in question was already owned by one of the parties to the joint venture agreement.

The Court of Appeal also noted this factor in rejecting a claim in London & Regional Investments Ltd v TBI plc.[79] In that case, in any event, the claim failed, because the negotiations between the parties had been conducted expressly 'subject to contract'. In these circumstances, it was not unconscionable for the party to withdraw from discussions following the acquisition of the land.[80]

In Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfellow (Birmingham) Ltd,[81] it was suggested that it was not essential for the non-acquiring party to have intended to obtain the land on their own account. The claim failed on the facts, however, because there was no agreement that the property would be acquired for the parties' joint benefit.

5.2 THE NATURE OF THE UNCONSCIONABILITY

As we have noted, the unconscionability on which the constructive trust is based does not lie solely in the trustee reneging on the agreement. It must also be demonstrated that the party in whose favour the trust is imposed had relied on the agreement. This is the fourth of the five elements of the trust in Chadwick LJ's judgment (extracted above). Whether it is unconscionable for the trustee to renege requires an objective assessment of the agreement and the effect that it has had, rather than being concerned with the trustee's subjective state of mind.[82] A requirement of reliance is found in other doctrines through which equitable interests may be acquired: for example, the common intention constructive trust and proprietary estoppel. In those doctrines, however, the requirement is explicitly one of detrimental reliance. The distinctive feature of the Pallant v Morgan constructive trust is that it suffices for the reliance to confer an advantage on the acquiring party, with no requirement of a corresponding detriment on the part of the non-acquiring party.

Nield highlights that the focus on the detriment or advantage in Banner Homes marks a development from the earlier cases.

Nield, 'Constructive Trusts and Estoppel' (2003) 23 LS 311, 324–5

> [. . .] Earlier cases do not focus on this possible detriment or advantage, but upon the unconscionability inherent in the breach of trust and confidence that the non-acquiring party placed in the acquiring party to carry out their arrangements for the acquisition of certain property.

> This duty may be articulated as an agency, but it does not have to fit neatly within defined categories of fiduciary relationship, provided the central characteristics of a fiduciary relationship can be identified. For instance, commercial enterprises, husband and wife, relatives and neighbours have all been required by equity to adhere to their informal arrangements for the joint acquisition of property because of the trust and confidence placed in them to act not only in their own interests, but also the interests of the non-acquiring party. In this context equity seems to demand remarkably high standards of conduct and perhaps what is surprising about the Banner Homes decision is the line drawn between acceptable commercial tactics and a breach of duty justifying the imposition of one of equity's most potent weapons, the constructive trust.

In many cases that fulfil the requirements of the Pallant v Morgan trust, there will, in any event, be detrimental reliance. In Banner Homes, the Court left open the issue of whether Banner Homes had suffered a detriment on the facts.

Banner Homes Group plc v Luff Developments Ltd
[2000] Ch 372, CA

Chadwick LJ

> I am satisfied, also, that the judge was wrong to reject the constructive trust claim on the grounds that Banner had failed to show that it had acted to its detriment in reliance on the arrangement agreed on 14 July 1995. [. . .] In other words, Luff saw it as an advantage that Banner's belief that the site was out of play should be maintained. Luff wanted to keep Banner out of the market. In those circumstances, it does not lie easily in Luff's mouth to say that Banner suffered no detriment. But whether or not Banner suffered detriment from the fact that it never regarded itself as free to consider the site as a potential acquisition of its own does not seem to me conclusive. Luff obtained the advantage which it sought.

In the context of proprietary estoppel, the requirement of detrimental reliance has been met where a claimant has linked his or her life and career to the defendant in reliance on an assurance of rights (typically, of an inheritance).[83] It may be suggested, by analogy, that detriment lies in the non-acquiring party resting his or her chance of obtaining an interest in the land on the proposed joint venture.[84]

The analogy has, however, been doubted by Nield.[85] Further, it is clear that Pallant v Morgan can operate where no detriment arises—a point illustrated by the facts of that case. In Pallant v Morgan, immediately before the start of an auction, agents acting for the parties agreed that the claimant would refrain from bidding and, if the defendant succeeded in acquiring the land, part would be sold on to the claimant. The defendant's agent obtained the land with a bid of £1,000, but the defendant then reneged on the agreement. The defendant's agent was authorized to bid up to £3,000, while the claimant's agent was authorized to bid to £2,000. On these facts, it is clear that the claimant suffered no detriment, because the land would not have been acquired even in the absence of the agreement—but the defendant obtained an advantage, because the land was acquired for half of the sum that would have been necessary to outbid the claimant. Judgment in the case is not given explicitly in terms of a constructive trust. The Court considered that the defendant's agent had acted for both parties at the auction. The defendant therefore held the land for himself and the claimant jointly, subject to agreement by the parties as to its division (with provision for a resale if no such agreement was reached).

5.3 THE BASIS OF THE PALLANT V MORGAN CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST

Following the decision in Banner Homes, the basis of the Pallant v Morgan constructive trust appeared unclear. Thompson suggested that it was an application of the common intention constructive trust that is more commonly applied in relation to ownership of the home (the trust is discussed in Chapter 16).[86] However, the existence of a distinction between the Pallant v Morgan constructive trust and the common intention constructive trust appeared to be acknowledged in Cox v Jones.[87] There, following the breakdown of a relationship between the parties, the Pallant v Morgan trust was applied to determine ownership of a flat purchased as an investment, while the common intention constructive trust was used to ascertain ownership of a property bought as a home. The two doctrines were described by Mann J as being 'slightly different, though probably conceptually related'.[88] An analysis of the Pallant v Morgan trust as an example of the common intention trust was doubted by Hopkins. He highlighted the conceptual difference between the Pallant v Morgan trust as 'gain-based' in contra-distinction to the common intention constructive trust which is 'loss-based'.[89] In the following extract, Hopkins criticized the exposition of the trust provided by Banner Homes.

Hopkins, 'The Pallant v Morgan "Equity?"' [2002] Conv 35, 46–7

Constructive trusts are not usually imposed solely as a response to an unconscionable gain. Constructive trusts are usually imposed only where the gain is the result of a particular breach of duty; for example, in relation to gains made by a breach of fiduciary duty. On one level it may seem attractive to suggest that the Pallant v Morgan equity could be rationalized as involving the breach of a fiduciary relationship and, therefore, as within an accepted category of gain-based constructive trust. The finding of agency in some of the earlier cases may have provided an avenue for such an analysis. Such an approach would also be consistent with Canadian law. In that jurisdiction, a constructive trust has been imposed following the breakdown of a commercial joint venture based on breach of fiduciary duty or breach of confidence. The finding of fiduciary duties in a commercial context is contentious because of the consequence such duties carry; i.e. the imposition of equitable doctrines, such as the constructive trust. In this respect, the decision in Banner Homes perhaps represents the worst of both worlds. By providing for a gain based constructive trust, without an indication of a breach of duty, the court circumvented difficult questions arising from the nature of fiduciary relationships and the circumstances in which one commercial undertaking may owe fiduciary duties to another.

[86] 'Constructive Trusts and Non-Binding Agreements' [2001] Conv 265, 265–6.
[87] [2004] EWHC 1486. [88] Ibid, [45].
[89] 'The Pallant v Morgan "Equity?"' [2002] Conv 35, 36.

The jurisprudential basis of the Pallant v Morgan trust was addressed by the Court of Appeal in Crossco No 4 Unlimited v Jalan Limited.[90] There, the court was presented with competing arguments by Counsel that the trust was either a common intention constructive trust or was founded on a breach of fiduciary duty. Etherton LJ considered that the link between Pallant v Morgan and the common intention constructive trust had become 'untenable'.[91] He explained that the common intention constructive trust was now 'driven by policy considerations and the special facts that normally apply in the dealings between those living in an intimate relationship', which made it inappropriate to apply in a commercial context.[92] Etherton LJ considered that cases in which Pallant v Morgan has been applied 'can all be explained, and, in my judgment, ought to be explained in wholly conventional terms by the existence and breach of fiduciary duty'.[93] However, the majority of the court, McFarlane and Arden LLJ, felt constrained by authority to hold that Pallant v Morgan is an example of the common intention constructive trust. In so-doing, McFarlane LJ expressed some sympathy with Etherton LJ's alternative rationale.[94] At the present stage, the majority's view must be accepted as binding and the Pallant v Morgan trust analysed as a common intention constructive trust. Notwithstanding, there are difficulties with this approach, not least of which is reconciling the gain-based nature of the Pallant v Morgan trust with a requirement of detrimental reliance.

6 TOWARDS A RATIONALIZATION OF CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS

In this chapter, we have considered two situations in which constructive trusts are imposed in relation to land: those arising under the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead; and those arising through the Pallant v Morgan equity. We have noted other constructive trusts that are discussed elsewhere in this book: a transfer of land from A to C 'subject to' rights in favour of B; the common intention constructive trust used to determine ownership of the home; and the constructive trust imposed on a vendor under the doctrine of anticipation. We have noted that constructive trusts share a common thread, because the trust is imposed in response to unconscionability, but that this concept is of limited utility in understanding the scope of constructive trust doctrine. Is there a further thread linking these trusts together, or must each simply been seen as a discrete operation of the constructive trust?

There are undoubtedly advantages in identifying common links. This rationalizes our understanding of the constructive trust and can assist us in understanding developments of the doctrine. An awareness of differences, as well as similarities, can, however, aid our understanding of individual applications of the trust. It must also be acknowledged that no single element ties together all constructive trusts.

McFarlane and Gardner have both suggested that the trusts in Rochefoucauld v Boustead and Pallant v Morgan are illustrations of a broader principle. McFarlane sees both trusts as examples of what he terms a 'receipt after promise' principle. The scope of McFarlane's idea, which has attracted considerable criticism,[95] is outlined in the following extract.

> [T]he courts seem to apply a clear principle, which can be called the "receipt after a promise" principle [. . .] The principle means that if:
> 1. C makes a promise to come under a duty to B; and
> 2. C's promise relates to the use of a particular right; and
> 3. C acquires, as a result of that promise, an advantage in relation to the acquisition of that right; then
> 4. C is under a duty to B to keep that promise, as far as it relates to the right advantageously acquired by C.
> [. . .] The principle thus allows C's promise, even though it was made to A, to be enforced by B, the party who benefits from the promise. It is important to note that B's right does not arise as a result of a contract between B and C. Rather, it is based on the principle that, having received a right on a particular basis (that he will allow B to make some use of that right), C is not then allowed to enjoy that right on a different basis."

Gardner offers an alternative means of unifying the trusts. He suggests that the trusts are imposed, 'to correct a reliance loss—specifically the loss that someone suffers when, acting in reasonable reliance on another's undertaking, he foregoes his opportunity to achieve the content of the undertaking in some other way'.[96]

There are undoubtedly advantages in the recognition of a general principle linking together these doctrines of constructive trust: for example, both McFarlane and Gardner's theses can provide an explanation of the decision in Neale v Willis[97] (extracted above), which may otherwise appear an awkward deviation from the factual matrix of a claim within Rochefoucauld v Boustead. In Crossco No 4 Unlimited v Jalan Limited, Etherton LJ noted the merit in McFarlane and Gardner's arguments insofar as they are 'put forward as principled explanations for a range of constructive trusts'.[98] But the sense of unity provided is illusory if it in fact masks genuine differences in the operation of each trust. Neither approach was endorsed by Etherton LJ, who noted that it was 'not possible to do full justice in the context of this judgment to the alternative explanations' whilst reiterating the specific basis on which he considered the Pallant v Morgan trust could be rationalized.[99] Commenting on McFarlane's analysis, Hopkins has highlighted the danger of losing sight of the fact that Rochefoucauld v Boustead enables the court to intervene solely on the basis of preventing Swadling rejects any attempt to unify Rochefoucauld v Boustead with other types of constructive trust as he considers that the trust is an express trust (a view rejected above), but he also outlines, at pp. 106–7 a number of reasons for resisting McFarlane's analysis.

the transferee's fraudulent or unconscionable attempt to renege from the trust and claim the land for him or herself.[100] He suggests that this feature of the trust 'links together the application of Rochefoucauld v Boustead in both two- and three-party cases, and distinguishes this instance of unconscionability'.[101] In the present state of the authorities recognition of a unifying principle appears unlikely.

QUESTIONS

1. Assess the different role afforded to the settlor's intention in the creation of express, resulting, and constructive trusts.
2. Would the following situations, each concerning the purchase of an investment property, give rise to a presumption of resulting trust or a presumption of advancement? Do your answers yield a logical result?
   (a) The property is purchased in the joint names of Mr and Mrs X, with the purchase money provided by Mr X.
   (b) The property is purchased in the joint names of Mr and Mrs X, with the purchase money provided by Mrs X.
   (c) The property is purchased in the joint names of Mr Y and his son, with the purchase money provided by Mr Y.
   (d) The property is purchased in the joint names of Mr Y and his son, with the purchase money provided by the son.
3. What is the nature of the unconscionable of fraudulent conduct that triggers the imposition of the constructive trust under the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead? Compare and contrast this with the conduct required for a trust under the Pallant v Morgan equity.
4. In a three-party case within the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead, should the constructive trust arise in favour of A (the transferor) or B (the intended beneficiary)?

PRIORITY AND THE DEFENCES QUESTION

THE PRIORITY TRIANGLE

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Many land law cases share a basic form: a dispute arises between B and C, each of whom wants to make an inconsistent use of the land.
2. The law has adopted a very clear structure to deal with these difficult disputes. Firstly, does B have a pre-existing (legal or equitable) property right that he or she can assert against C? Secondly, if B does have such a property right, does C have a defence to it? Thirdly, does B have a direct right against C?
3. In Chapters 4 and 5, we examined an aspect of the first question—whether the right claimed by B counts as a (legal or equitable) property right. In Chapter 6, we looked in detail at the question of when B can acquire a direct right against C. In Chapters 7–11, we looked at another aspect of the first question—whether B can show that he or she has, in fact, acquired a claimed legal or equitable property right. In this chapter, our focus is on the question of when C can have a defence to B's pre-existing property right. This question can be thought of as the priority question: does B's property right have priority over C's right?
4. The question of priority is one of the most important, and most difficult, in land law. In a case where each of B and C has a (legal or equitable) property right in relation to land, it may be very difficult, in the abstract, to decide which of B or C should be free to use the land as he or she wishes. After all, it may well be that each of B and C has paid for his or her right; and that each of B and C is entirely innocent. In such cases, however, the law must try to provide a relatively simple set of rules to establish which right will take priority: B's right or C's right.
5. We will examine the priority question throughout Part D. In Chapters 13 and 14, our focus will be on the detail of the specific statutory rules imposed by the Land Charges Act 1972 (in relation to unregistered land) and the Land Registration Act 2002. In Chapter 15, we will evaluate the impact of the 2002 Act. The aim of this introductory chapter is to set out the basic principles that apply when answering the priority question.

1 INTRODUCTION: THE PRIORITY TRIANGLE IN PRACTICE

The cases that we will examine in this chapter share a basic set of facts:

1. A is an owner of some land (i.e. A has a freehold or lease of some land); and
2. B then acquires a right to make some use of that land; and
3. C then acquires a right in relation to A's land (e.g. C buys A's freehold or lease, or A gives C a charge over A's land).

If C is content for B to continue using the land, there will be no problem for B. In practice, however, C may want to prevent B from continuing to use the land. For example, it may be that A, who has a freehold or lease, has allowed B to occupy all or part of A's land. If C then buys A's freehold or lease, it is likely that C will want to remove B. In such a case, we need to ask if B has a right that he or she can assert against C. This question is sometimes put in the following terms: does B's right to use the land take priority over C's right? Or, instead, does C's right take priority over B's right? As Figure 5 shows, we can consequently think of a priority triangle involving A, B, and C.

For example, in Chapter 1, section 5, and Chapter 5, section 5.4, we examined the decision of the House of Lords in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth.[1] The facts of the case provide a good example of the priority triangle in practice. A (Mr Ainsworth) held a freehold. B (Mrs Ainsworth) had a right to use A's land ('a deserted wife's equity').[2] C (National Provincial Bank) then acquired a charge over A's land. That charge gave it the power, if A failed to repay a loan as agreed, to sell A's freehold and use the proceeds towards meeting the debt owed to C. As long as A (or someone acting on A's behalf) continued to repay the debt, there was no problem for B. But when A defaulted on the debt, C wanted to recover the sums due to it by selling A's freehold. And, of course, to get a reasonable price for A's freehold, C needed to sell the land with vacant possession (i.e. without B remaining in occupation). So the question was whether B had a right that she could assert against C—or, in other words, who had priority: B or C?

[1] [1965] AC 1175.

[2] As we saw in Chapter 1, section 5, a 'deserted wife's equity' was the name given to the right held by a wife as a result of a duty imposed on a husband, having moved out of the matrimonial home, to provide her with financial support and, perhaps, accommodation.

To determine the priority question, we have to do more than simply ask whose right came first in time. For example, in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth, Mrs Ainsworth's 'deserted wife's equity' arose before the bank received its charge, and yet, as we saw in Chapter 5, section 5.4, Mrs Ainsworth had no right that she could assert against the bank: the bank was free to remove Mrs Ainsworth from the land. The crucial point was that the House of Lords saw the 'deserted wife's equity' as giving Mrs Ainsworth only a personal right against Mr Ainsworth. As we saw in Chapter 4, section 1, a personal right, by itself, cannot be asserted against a third party. So, in answering the priority question, we firstly need to ask whether, when C acquired C's right, B already had a (legal or equitable) property right in relation to the land. As demonstrated by Chapters 4 and 5, the question of whether B had a pre-existing property right can, in turn, be split into two questions. Firstly, we need to ask the content question: does the type of right claimed by B count as a property right in relation to land? Secondly, if B's claimed right does count as a property right, we then need to ask the acquisition question: on the facts of the case, had B, in fact, acquired that right before C acquired C's right?

National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth provides a good example of the content question in practice. There was no doubt that, when Mr Ainsworth moved out of the matrimonial home, Mrs Ainsworth acquired a right: a 'deserted wife's equity'. And there was no doubt that Mrs Ainsworth had that right before the bank acquired its right in the land. But Mrs Ainsworth's right could not bind the bank, because, according to the House of Lords, it did not count as a property right in land: it thus failed the content test. In one sense, then, National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth was a relatively straightforward case: the priority question was decided in C's favour as, whilst B had acquired a right before C, B's right was only a personal right. As we will see in this chapter, the priority question can be trickier to solve if each of B and C has a (legal or equitable) property right in relation to the land. In section 2.1, we will consider the basic rule that applies in such a case.

2 THE BASIC RULE AND THE TIMING QUESTION

2.1 THE BASIC RULE

When considering the priority triangle, the most difficult cases are those in which each of B and C has a property right in relation to the same piece of land. In such a case, the starting point is that the first in time prevails. So, if (i) A has a freehold or lease, and (ii) B then acquires a property right in relation to A's land, and (iii) A then transfers his freehold or lease to C, the starting point, in relation to both registered and unregistered land, is that (iv) B's pre-existing (legal or equitable) property right will take priority over C's later property right. As far as registered land is concerned, that basic rule is now enshrined by statute:

Land Registration Act 2002, s 28

(1) Except as provided by sections 29 and 30, the priority of an interest affecting a registered estate or charge is not affected by a disposition of the estate or charge.

(2) It makes no difference for the purposes of this section whether the interest or disposition is registered.

Of course, in relation to registered land, the exceptions provided by ss 29 and 30 are often more important than the basic rule, as we will see in section 3 of this chapter. Nonetheless, it is important to bear the basic rule in mind: if C does not have a defence to B's pre-existing legal or equitable property right, then B's right will bind C, even if B's right has not been entered on the register.[3]

2.2 THE TIMING QUESTION

To apply the basic rule, we must, of course, know whether or not B's property right arose before C's property right. In most cases, it will be very easy to work out the order of the parties' rights. For example, in Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland[4] (a case we discussed in Chapter 5, section 2), Mr and Mrs Boland bought a home together. The registered title to the land was in Mr Boland's sole name, but he held his right to the land on trust for both himself and his wife, as Mrs Boland had contributed to the purchase price of the home. Some years later, Mr Boland borrowed money from the bank to support his business, and this loan, unbeknownst to Mrs Boland, was secured by a charge over the home. So, each of Mrs Boland and the bank had a property right in relation to the home: Mrs Boland had an equitable interest under a trust; the bank had a legal charge. It is, therefore, clear that the basic 'first in time' rule favoured Mrs Boland, and so the onus was on the bank to displace that rule, by showing that it had a defence to Mrs Boland's right.

In other cases, however, it can be slightly more difficult to establish which of two property rights is the first in time.

2.2.1 Whose right is first in time? Charges

In Boland, the loan secured by the bank's charge was used to support Mr Boland's business: it was not used to acquire the land itself. It was, therefore, clear that Mrs Boland's equitable interest in the land had arisen before the bank's legal charge. A particular problem can arise, however, in the very common case of an 'acquisition mortgage'. This is where: (i) A borrows money from C in order to buy a freehold or lease; and (ii) in return, C acquires a charge over the land to secure A's duty to repay the loan. In such a case, when does C acquire its right? The traditional view was a technical one: C acquires its charge from A, and A can only give C a right in relation to the land if A already has a freehold or lease. On that view, A must acquire a property right before C: logically, there must be a scintilla temporis—that is, a tiny spark of time during which A holds his or her right free from C's charge.

But that view may seem unrealistic: after all, if A needs to borrow money from C in order to acquire his or her freehold or lease, why should A's property right take priority to C's charge? In the following case, the House of Lords considered the problem and decided to depart from the traditional view.

Abbey National v Cann
[1991] 1 AC 56, HL

Facts: George Cann lived with his mother, Daisy, in Island Road, Mitcham, South West London, in a home that was registered in George's sole name. Because Daisy had

[3] For an example of the application of the general 'first in time' rule in registered land, see Halifax plc v Curry Popeck [2008] EWHC 1692 (Ch).

[4] [1981] 1 AC 487.

contributed to the purchase price of that home, George held his estate on trust for both himself and Daisy. George and Daisy decided to move to a smaller home in South Lodge Avenue, also in Mitcham. They paid for that home by means of: (i) the proceeds of sale of their previous home in Island Road; and (ii) a loan from the Abbey National Building Society, secured by a charge over their new South Lodge Avenue home. The new home was registered in George's sole name and Daisy was not a party to the loan from the Abbey National. Daisy had known that a mortgage loan was necessary, because the new South Lodge Avenue home cost £4,000 more than the proceeds of sale of the Island Road home. Acting without Daisy's knowledge, however, George had taken out a loan of £25,000 from the Abbey National. When George failed to repay that loan as agreed, the building society attempted to remove Daisy (along with her new husband) from the home so that it could sell the home with vacant possession and use the proceeds to meet George's outstanding debt.

It was accepted that Daisy had an equitable property right: George held his estate in the South Lodge Avenue home on trust for himself and Daisy, because she had contributed to the purchase price by allowing all of the proceeds of sale of Island Road to be used in buying the new home. It was also clear that the Abbey National had a legal property right: the charge that it had acquired from George and then registered. The Abbey National argued that its property right arose before Daisy's property right. The Court of Appeal had rejected that argument, but found in favour of the Abbey National on other grounds. The House of Lords, whilst also supporting those other grounds (see below), also accepted Abbey National's argument that its charge arose before Daisy's equitable property right.

Lord Oliver

Of course, as a matter of legal theory, a person cannot charge a legal estate that he does not have, so that there is an attractive legal logic in the ratio in Piskor's Case [a decision of the Court of Appeal applying the traditional scintilla tempors view].[5] Nevertheless, I cannot help feeling that it flies in the face of reality. The reality is that, in the vast majority of cases, the acquisition of the legal estate and the charge are not only precisely simultaneous but indissolubly bound together. The acquisition of the legal estate is entirely dependent upon the provision of funds which will have been provided before the conveyance can take effect and which are provided only against an agreement that the estate will be charged to secure them. Indeed, in many, if not most, cases of building society mortgages, there will have been, as there was in this case, a formal offer and acceptance of an advance which will ripen into a specifically enforceable agreement immediately the funds are advanced which will normally be a day or more before completion. In many, if not most, cases, the charge itself will have been executed before the execution, let alone the exchange, of the conveyance or transfer of the property. This is given particular point in the case of registered land where the vesting of the estate is made to depend upon registration, for it may well be that the transfer and the charge will be lodged for registration on different days so that the charge, when registered, may actually take effect from a date prior in time to the date from which the registration of the transfer takes effect [. . .] The reality is that the purchaser of land who relies upon a building society or bank loan for the completion of his purchase never in fact acquires anything but an equity of redemption [a concept we will examine in Chapter 28, section 5], for the land is, from the very inception, charged with the amount of the loan without which it could never have been transferred at all and it was never intended that it should be otherwise. The "scintilla temporis" is no more than a legal artifice and, for my part, I would adopt the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in In re Connolly Brothers Ltd. (No. 2)[6] and of Harman J. in Coventry Permanent Economic Building Society v. Jones[7] and hold that Piskor's Case was wrongly decided.

Lord Jauncey

It is of course correct as a matter of strict legal analysis that a purchaser of property cannot grant a mortgage over it until the legal estate has vested in him. The question however is whether having borrowed money in order to complete the purchase against an undertaking to grant security for the loan over the property the purchaser is, for a moment of time, in a position to deal with the legal estate as though the mortgagee had no interest therein [. . .] In my view a purchaser who can only complete the transaction by borrowing money for the security of which he is contractually bound to grant a mortgage to the lender [simultaneously] with the execution of the conveyance in his favour cannot in reality ever be said to have acquired even for a scintilla temporis the unencumbered fee simple or leasehold interest in land whereby he could grant interests having priority over the mortgage [. . .]. Since no one can grant what he does not have it follows that such a purchaser could never grant an interest which was not subject to the limitations on his own interest. In so far as Piskor decided that such a purchaser could be vested for a moment of time in the unencumbered freehold or leasehold estate with the consequences to which I have just referred, I consider that it was wrongly decided.

The decision in Cann certainly has an important effect: it means that, if A takes out a mortgage to assist in acquiring a freehold or lease, then C (the mortgagee: i.e. bank or building society providing the loan) will take priority over B (a party also providing money towards the purchase of the freehold or lease).

The approach adopted in Cann has since received further support: for example, in Ingram v IRC,[8] Lord Hoffmann stated that: 'For my part, I do not think that a theory based upon the notion of the scintilla temporis can have a very powerful grasp on reality.' But its operation in a case such as Cann itself seems somewhat harsh.[9] Firstly, whilst it may be true to say that George could not have acquired his estate in the South Lodge Avenue home without the mortgage loan, it is equally true to say that George could not have acquired that right without Daisy's financial contribution. Secondly, whilst Daisy knew that a mortgage of around £4,000 was necessary to complete the purchase, George went well beyond that in borrowing £25,000. It may therefore be that the courts should take a more nuanced approach, as explored by the following extract.[10]

Smith, 'Mortgagees and Trust Beneficiaries' (1990) 109 LQR 545, 548–9

Let us turn to the economic reality behind these cases. What is objectionable about the old scintilla temporis cases is that the mortgagee's finance [i.e., the money provided by the bank or building society] enables the interest of the claimant to arise. How does this apply to the facts of Cann? The proceeds of the previous house (after repayment of a mortgage) amounted to £30,000, owned equally by George Cann (the legal owner) and Mrs Cann. The new house (costing £34,000) required extra finance of £4,000. In fact George Cann, without authority from his mother, raised £25,000 on mortgage. It can be appreciated that the house could not have been purchased without mortgage finance of £4,000 and that to this extent the mortgagee should have priority. This may be explained either on the basis of Mrs Cann's authorising the mortgage [see section 3.4.2 below] or on the rejection of scintilla temporis. Beyond £4,000, however, George Cann had two overlapping sources of finance: the proceeds from the previous house and the mortgage. What logic or sense is there in saying that the mortgagee must have priority?

If we suppose that the second house had been purchased for £30,000, it is easy to see that no mortgage would have been necessary. In such a case, Lord Jauncey's analysis fails to operate: no longer is there "a purchaser who can only complete the transaction by borrowing money." Yet to the mortgagee the situation looks exactly the same, whatever the financial position of the purchaser is. The problem is most obviously acute if [. . .] the purchaser obtains loan finance sufficient to purchase the property from each of two sources, promising each of them a legal mortgage.

How can these problems be resolved? We may start by saying that where finance is required to complete a purchase, then the mortgagee should to that extent have priority. Such a proposition represents the very minimum that Cann is authority for. If there are overlapping sources of finance then three solutions offer themselves (all subject to the operation of land registration or other priority rules). First, we could simply favour the mortgagee. As has been argued, it is difficult to support this conclusion in terms of legal logic or economic reality. A second solution is to favour the source of finance that is first in time. The difficulty here is partly that establishing a time order may be difficult and partly that it is difficult to reconcile with the Cann decision favouring the mortgagee when finance is required. The final solution is to accord the sources of finance equal priority (proportionate to their quantum). A variation on this is to deny that either of the sources has priority over the other (see A. M. Prichard (1964) 80 L.Q.R. 370 at pp. 381–382): this may be appropriate when it is not possible to quantify a contribution in financial terms or the dispute concerns possession. It is worth noting that if a mortgagee fails to obtain possession then he is likely to bankrupt the mortgagor. Almost inevitably, the house will be sold and an equal priority analysis can be applied to the proceeds of sale. The third solution seems most likely to do justice, although it would require considerable elucidation. It has to be recognised, however, that it is at odds with other real property priority rules, which invariably strive to prefer one proprietary claim to another. On the other hand, once the scintilla temporis doctrine (designed to provide us with a preference) is dismissed, the law appears to be at a loss as to what to put in its place.

2.2.2 Whose right is first in time? Independently acquired rights

We saw in Chapter 4, section 4 that, where A has an estate in land, it is possible for B independently to acquire a property right in that land. For example, if B takes physical control of A's land, even without A's consent, B acquires a freehold of that land. But because A's property right arose before B's freehold, the basic rule tells us that A's pre-existing property right takes priority to that of B. So, A is free to remove B from the land, either by using reasonable force or by seeking a possession order from a court. Initially then, B's freehold may give him or her useful protection against X (a party who later tries to move into the home), but it does not protect him or her against A.

Similarly, if A then gives C a property right in the land (for example, by transferring his or her estate to C), C is also free to remove B from the land. From a technical point of view, it may seem that B's pre-existing property right should take priority: after all, B had that right before C acquired his or her right. But the point is that C, by acquiring a property right from A, is essentially basing his or her claim on A's property right, which arose before B's property right. In a case in which A gives a property right to B, and then to C, this 'backdating' process cannot assist C because each of B and C can backdate his or her right to A's right. Where B acquires his or her right independently, however, he or she does not base the claim on A's right: in such a case, C alone can rely on backdating to take priority to B's right.

It is important to note that if either A or C delays in exercising his or her right to remove B from the land, it may then be possible for B to take priority: the lapse of time, either by itself or coupled with other factors, may give B a defence to the pre-existing property right of A, or to C's backdated property right. We will examine this point in section 3.5 below.

3 EXCEPTIONS TO THE BASIC RULE: THE DEFENCES QUESTION

3.1 THE POSSIBILITY OF A DEFENCE

There are exceptions to the basic rule that B's property right, where it arises before C's property right, will take priority. As we noted in Chapters 4 and 5, we have to bear in mind that, even if B has a pre-existing property right relating to land, it may be possible for C to have a defence to that right. In such a case, C can use that defence to take priority to B's property right. The following case, concerning unregistered land, provides a particularly memorable example of this point.

Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green
[1981] AC 513, HL

Facts: Walter Green owned Gravel Hill Farm, a 300-acre farm in Lincolnshire. Walter made a contractual promise to his son, Geoffrey, that Geoffrey could, if he wished, purchase the farm at a price of £75 per acre at any time in the next ten years. As a result of this contractual promise, Geoffrey acquired an 'option to purchase': a recognized equitable property right—but Walter and Geoffrey then fell out. Walter was determined to prevent Geoffrey from buying the farm. Walter therefore transferred ownership of the farm to his wife, Evelyne. At the time, the farm was worth about £40,000, but Evelyne paid only £500. Evelyne, of course, was fully aware of Geoffrey's pre-existing option to purchase, but she argued that, because Geoffrey had failed to enter that option to purchase on the Land Charges Register, the Land Charges Act 1925 (LCA 1925) enabled her to take priority over his right. The Court of Appeal found in favour of Geoffrey, but the House of Lords upheld Evelyne's appeal.

Lord Wilberforce

[Geoffrey's] option was, in legal terms, an estate contract and so a legal charge, class C, within the meaning of the Land Charges Act 1925. The correct and statutory method for protection of such an option is by means of entering it in the Register of Land Charges maintained under the Act. If so registered, the option would have been enforceable, not only (contractually) against Walter, but against any purchaser of the farm [. . .]

My Lords, section 13 (2) of the Land Charges Act 1925 reads as follows:

> "A land charge of class B, class C or class D, created or arising after the commencement of this Act, shall (except as hereinafter provided) be void as against a purchaser of the land charged therewith [. . .] unless the land charge is registered in the appropriate register before the completion of the purchase: Provided that, as respects a land charge of class D and an estate contract created or entered into after the commencement of this Act, this subsection only applies in favour of a purchaser of a legal estate for money or money's worth."

As regards the word "purchaser" section 20 (8) of the same Act reads: " 'Purchaser' means any person [. . .] who, for valuable consideration, takes any interest in land [. . .]"

Thus the case appears to be a plain one. The "estate contract," which by definition (section 11) includes an option of purchase, was entered into after January 1, 1926; Evelyne took an interest (in fee simple) in the land "for valuable consideration"—so was a "purchaser"; she was a purchaser for money—namely £500; the option was not registered before the completion of the purchase. It is therefore void as against her.

In my opinion this appearance is also the reality. The case is plain: the Act is clear and definite. Intended as it was to provide a simple and understandable system for the protection of title to land, it should not be read down or glossed: to do so would destroy the usefulness of the Act. Any temptation to remould the Act to meet the facts of the present case, on the supposition that it is a hard one and that justice requires it, is, for me at least, removed by the consideration that the Act itself provides a simple and effective protection for persons in Geoffrey's position—viz.—by registration.

Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green provides a very good example of the priority triangle in practice: Geoffrey (B) acquired a property right in relation to the farm before Evelyne (C) acquired her right. So the basic rule is that Geoffrey's property right will take priority. But that basic rule was changed by s 13(2) of the LCA 1925, which can be seen as giving Evelyne a defence against Geoffrey's pre-existing equitable property right: in the language of the statute, Geoffrey's pre-existing equitable property right was void as against Evelyne. To use that defence, Evelyne had to show three things: (i) that Geoffrey's right was one of those property rights that was covered by the registration rules of the Act; (ii) that Geoffrey had not registered that right as a land charge; and (iii) that Evelyne had acquired her property right in land 'for valuable consideration' and so counted as a 'purchaser' for the purposes of the Act. Because Evelyne was able to show all of these three things, she had priority to Geoffrey's right even though she knew all about it.

Since the decision in Green, the LCA 1925 has been replaced by the Land Charges Act 1972 (LCA 1972). But the relevant provisions of that new Act operate in exactly the same way as the previous Act: so, if the facts of Green were to occur again today in relation to unregistered land, the result would be exactly the same. Of course, it is possible to disapprove of that result: for example, Battersby[11] has argued that 'the decision in Midland Bank v Green, though correct on the present statutory provisions, is unacceptable and the Land Charges Act needs amendment'. We will examine that argument, and the wider issues that it raises, when looking in detail at the priority question in Chapters 13–15. The crucial point to note here is that, whether or not we agree with the current provisions of the LCA 1972, the decision in Green makes very clear that it may be possible for C, by relying on a defence, to take priority over B's pre-existing property right in land. It is also important to bear in mind that, whilst the House of Lords in Green decided that C's property right took priority over B's property right, this was not the end of the story. As we saw in Chapter 6, section 2.4, it was later held that, by acting with the predominant purpose of harming Geoffrey, his parents (Walter and Evelyne) had committed the tort of lawful act conspiracy against Geoffrey and were, therefore, liable to pay him damages. This shows that, even if C has priority over B, it may still be possible for B to assert a direct right against C.[12]

3.2 REGISTERED LAND AND THE LACK OF REGISTRATION DEFENCE

3.2.1 The basic defence

In Green, the specific defence relied on by Evelyne is now provided by the Land Charges Act 1972 (LCA 1972), which applies only to dealings with unregistered land. That defence can, however, be seen as an example of a more general type of defence: the lack of registration defence. A lack of registration defence forms a very important part of the registered land system. As we saw in section 2.1 above, s 28 of the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002) ensures that, where dealings with registered land are concerned, the basic rule applies: B's pre-existing property right will take priority over a later property right of C. But as s 28(1) makes clear, that basic rule is subject to the exceptions provided by ss 29 and 30 of the same Act. Those sections ensure that, in relation to registered land, it may be possible for C to take priority over a pre-existing property right of B that is not recorded on the register. Section 29 is set out below: it governs the position in which A has a registered freehold or lease (a 'registered estate'), and then gives C a property right in the land by means of a 'registrable disposition' (e.g. by transferring his freehold or lease to C, by granting C a new lease of more than seven years' duration, or by giving C a charge). Section 30 is not set out below: it is very similar in effect, and applies only where A has a registered charge.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 29

(1) If a registrable disposition of a registered estate is made for valuable consideration, completion of the disposition by registration has the effect of postponing to the interest under the disposition any interest affecting the estate immediately before the disposition whose priority is not protected at the time of registration.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), the priority of an interest is protected—

(a) in any case, if the interest—

(i) is a registered charge or the subject of a notice in the register;

[12] A further example of this point is provided by Lyus v Prowsa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 WLR 1044, a case considered in the extract from Lloyd v Dugdale [2001] EWCA Civ 1754 set out in Chapter 6, section 2.3.

> (ii) falls within any of the paragraphs of Schedule 3, or
> (iii) appears from the register to be excepted from the effect of registration, and
> (b) in the case of a disposition of a leasehold estate, if the burden of the interest is incident to the estate.
> (3) Subsection 2(a)(ii) does not apply to an interest which has been the subject of a notice in the register at any time since the coming into force of this section
> (4) Where the grant of a leasehold estate in land out of a registered estate does not involve a registered disposition, this section has effect as if—
> (a) the grant involved such a disposition; and
> (b) the disposition was registered at the time of the grant.

In Chapter 14, we will examine the lack of registration defence provided by the LRA 2002 in more detail. Some general points are, however, worth noting here. When analysing any lack of registration defence, it is useful to ask two questions: firstly, what does C have to do to take advantage of the defence? Secondly, when will B's pre-existing property right be vulnerable to that defence? For example, in Green, C was able to take advantage of the lack of registration defence provided by the LCA 1925, because she was a 'purchaser of a legal estate for money or money's worth', and B's right was vulnerable to that defence, because it counted as an estate contract and, thus, as a Class C land charge.

When applying the first question to s 29 of the LRA 2002, we can see that C must meet certain requirements in order to rely on the lack of registration defence. Firstly, there must be a 'registrable disposition of a registered estate' in favour of C. In Chapters 7 and 14, the meaning of 'registrable disposition' is discussed in more detail. As noted in Chapter 4, it includes almost all situations in which A, a holder of a registered freehold or lease, might attempt to give C a legal property right. An important exception occurs if A gives C a lease of seven years or less: in general, that does not count as a 'registrable disposition'. But in such a case, s 29(4) comes to C's rescue: it means that C may nonetheless qualify for the lack of registration defence because, for the purposes of s 29, he will be regarded as having acquired his property right by means of a 'registrable disposition'.

Secondly, the disposition in C's favour must be made for 'valuable consideration'. This is an important qualification. It means, for example, that if C acquires his property right by means of a gift from A, or on A's death, then C cannot use the lack of registration defence against a pre-existing property right of B.

Thirdly, to qualify for the defence, the 'completion of the disposition by registration' is necessary: so C must register his newly acquired property right. Again, s 29(4) means that C is viewed as having met that requirement if he acquires a lease that, due to its length, cannot be registered.

3.2.2 Exceptions to the basic defence

If C does qualify for the lack of registration defence, we need to ask if B's pre-existing property right is vulnerable to that defence. The starting point, under both ss 29 and 30 of the LRA 2002, is that B's pre-existing property right will be vulnerable to the lack of registration defence. The 2002 Act thus works in the opposite way to the LCA 1972. The 1972 Act sets out a list of property rights that need to be registered, the 2002 Act: (i) sets out a general rule, in s 29(1), that any 'interest affecting [A's estate] immediately before the disposition [to C]' is vulnerable to the lack of registration defence; and (ii) in s 29(2), sets out exceptions to that rule. Section 29(2)(a)(i) and (iii) simply protect a pre-existing property right of B that C can see by examining the register. Section 29(2)(b) applies a special rule ensuring that if B's right arises because A is a tenant of B, C will also be subject to those duties: again, it will be easy for C to discover any such right of B, because he simply needs to examine the terms of A's lease with B. So the really important provision is s 29(2)(a)(ii): it means that, if B's property right is on the list of rights set out by Sch 3 of the Act, it will not be vulnerable to the lack of registration defence.

Those pre-existing property rights of B that are not vulnerable to the lack of registration defence are known as overriding interests. We will examine the list in detail in Chapter 14, section 5, but it is worth noting here one important example of an overriding interest. The Land Registration Act 1925 (LRA 1925), by means of s 70(1)(g), allowed a property right of B to count as an overriding interest if B was in 'actual occupation of the land or in receipt of the rents and profits thereof, save where enquiry is made of such person and the rights are not disclosed'. The LRA 2002 contains a very similar provision (Sch 3, para 2), which can again be used by B if he is in actual occupation of the registered land. That provision does vary from its predecessor, but not in such a way as to change the result of the following case, which provides a good example of the role of actual occupation.

Hodgson v Marks

Facts: In 1939, Mrs Hodgson bought a freehold of 31 Gibbs Green, Edgware, Middlesex. By 1959, she was a widow and took in lodgers. Mr Evans moved in as a lodger in April 1959. In June 1960, Mrs Hodgson, at Mr Evans' urging, transferred her freehold to him, for free. Mr Evans was then registered as holding that freehold, which he then sold to Mr Marks, who gave a charge over the land to the Cheltenham & Gloucester Building Society. Mrs Hodgson had continued to live in the home throughout. When she learned that Mr Marks now claimed to be an owner of the home, Mrs Hodgson applied to court for a declaration that Mr Marks should transfer his freehold to her, free from the charge in favour of the building society. Her argument was that: (i) although Mr Evans acquired her legal property right (her freehold), he held that right on trust for her; and (ii) her equitable interest, arising under the trust, was capable of binding both Mr Marks and the building society. Ungoed-Thomas J, at first instance, found in favour of Mrs Hodgson. The Court of Appeal upheld that decision.

There is some debate as to the precise basis on which Mrs Hodgson acquired her equitable interest under the trust.[13] Our focus here, however, is on the defences question: given that Mrs Hodgson had acquired an equitable interest before Mr Marks and the building society acquired their property rights, could either Mr Marks or the building society establish a defence to that pre-existing equitable interest?

Mr Marks and the building society tried to rely on the lack of registration defence provided by the LRA 1925. Their argument was that: (i) each had paid for, and registered, a property right in the land; and that (ii) Mrs Hodgson's pre-existing equitable property right had not been noted on the register. Mrs Hodgson argued that she had an overriding interest: her property right was not vulnerable to the lack of registration defence, because she had been in actual occupation of the land when Mr Marks and the building society acquired their later property rights.

At first instance, Ungoed-Thomas J held that Mrs Hodgson had not been in actual occupation of the land at the relevant time: although she had been living there, her presence was not such as to alert Mr Marks or the building society to the risk that she had a pre-existing property right. This reasoning seems to be based on the idea that Mr Marks and the building society could reasonably believe that Mrs Hodgson's presence showed only that Mr Evans permitted her to share occupation of the land with him. The Court of Appeal disagreed with that analysis and held that Mrs Hodgson was in actual occupation of the land at the relevant time.

Russell LJ

[Ungoed-Thomas J, having decided that Mrs Hodgson was in physical occupation of the premises at the relevant time,] then proceeded to attach a different and special meaning to the words "in actual occupation" in section 70(1)(g). He took as a starting point to justify departure from the ordinary meaning of the words first the fact that every person in actual occupation could not include the vendor himself; but that only puts a gloss on the words "every person" and, indeed, assumes the ordinary meaning of "actual occupation"; moreover, it is not in the context a special construction of "every person" to exclude the vendor who ex hypothesi has transferred his rights to the purchaser. Secondly, the judge relied upon the correct conclusion that "the land" included part of the land. I cannot see that this can properly be used as a justification for departure from the ordinary meaning of the words "in actual occupation." Having by this means freed himself from the fetters of the golden rule, he then, after considering the circumstances in which in the case of unregistered land a purchaser would be fixed with constructive notice of the rights of persons in occupation of the land sold, concluded that "actual" should be construed in the sense of "actual and apparent." [. . .] But, nevertheless, how can it be said that the plaintiff was not in actual occupation of the house? The judge said that in all fairness a purchaser of this house (if unregistered) should not be fixed with notice of the plaintiff's rights. But why not? It is a principle of law (and of the Land Registration Act 1925) that a person in occupation is protected in his rights by that occupation, unless, of course, the rights are such that they require registration if they are to be protected. A purchaser must pay heed to anyone in occupation if he is to be sure of getting a good title. It was argued, on the basis of a quotation from the judgment of Vaughan Williams L.J. in Hunt v. Luck[14] that this does not apply when the vendor is in occupation, and that (as is the fact) there is no reported case of unregistered land where a purchaser was fixed with constructive notice of the rights of any other occupier when the vendor was in occupation, and that any other view would lead to an impossible burden of inquiry on a purchaser and more particularly on a lender of money on mortgage such as the building society. (As to the defendant building society it is plain that it made no inquiries on the spot save as to repairs; it relied on Mr. Marks, who lied to it; and I waste no tears on it.) I do not think this is a real problem. Conveyancing is conducted generally upon a basis of good faith, with something of a long stop in the shape of covenants for title. Moreover, I do not consider that it is correct in law to say that any rights of a person who is in occupation will be overridden whenever the vendor is, or appears to be, also in occupation.

I do not think it desirable to attempt to lay down a code or catalogue of situations in which a person other than the vendor should be held to be in occupation of unregistered land for the purpose of constructive notice of his rights, or in actual occupation of registered land for the purposes of section 70(1)(g). It must depend on the circumstances, and a wise purchaser or lender will take no risks. Indeed, however wise he may be he may have no ready opportunity of finding out; but, nevertheless, the law will protect the occupier. Reliance upon the untrue [statement] of the vendor will not suffice. Take the present case—though the test of occupation must be objective. Mr. Evans was only a lodger, and whether in law he was in occupation at all is at least doubtful. But the plaintiff was there for Mr. Marks to see and he saw her on two occasions. He did not introduce himself to her as an intending purchaser. He made no inquiry of her. He assumed her to be Mr. Evans' wife who knew all about the proposed purchase. This assumption may well have stemmed from a lie told by Mr. Evans, though neither Mr. Marks nor Mrs. Marks actually said so. Nonetheless, there was the plaintiff de facto living in the house as her house, and, if the judge's gloss were to be accepted, I should say just as much in apparent actual occupation of it as before the transfer to Mr. Evans; and, indeed, if Mr. Evans had stopped lodging there before the registration in Mr. Marks' name she would unquestionably have been in actual occupation. In short, unless it can be established in law that a person is not to be regarded as in actual occupation for the purposes of section 70(1)(g) merely because the vendor appears also to be occupying the property, it seems to me that the judge's decision on this point cannot be supported.

Accordingly, I would hold that the plaintiff was at all material times a person in actual occupation of the property.

As we will see in Chapter 14, section 5.1.1, there is an important debate about how the term 'actual occupation' should be interpreted. For our present purposes, however, the crucial point is to understand how the priority triangle was resolved in Hodgson.

1. The basic rule is that Mrs Hodgson's pre-existing property right takes priority over the later property rights of Mr Marks and the building society.
2. Mr Marks and the building society then attempted to displace that basic rule by using the lack of registration defence.
3. That attempt failed: because Mrs Hodgson was in actual occupation of the registered land at the relevant time, her pre-existing property right counted as an overriding interest. As a result, it was immune from the lack of registration defence.

In fact, exactly the same analysis applied in Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland,[15] the case we discussed at the start of section 2 of this chapter. The bank in that case was unable to use the lack of registration defence against Mrs Boland's pre-existing equitable interest, as Mrs Boland was in actual occupation of the land when the bank acquired its charge. It is important to remember, however, that the actual occupation of Mrs Hodgson and Mrs Boland was important only because each had a pre-existing property right. For example, in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth (see Chapter 1, section 5 and Chapter 5, section 5.4), Mrs Ainsworth lived in the home throughout—but her actual occupation was irrelevant, because she had no pre-existing property right that she could assert against the bank. So, without the support of a pre-existing property right, actual occupation is irrelevant.

Similarly, as we will see in the next extract, there may also be cases in which C takes priority even though B: (i) has a pre-existing property right; and (ii) is in actual occupation of the land at the relevant time. This is because B's actual occupation simply means that his or her pre-existing property right is not vulnerable to the lack of registration defence; B's actual occupation does not prevent C from taking priority by using a different defence to B's property right. We will consider such different defences in the remainder of section 3 of this chapter.

3.3 OVERREACHING UNDER S 2 OF THE LAW OF PROPERTY ACT 1925

Midland Bank v Green concerns the application of the lack of registration defence in unregistered land; Hodgson v Marks deals with its application to registered land. The following extract considers a wholly different defence, which does not depend on B's failure to protect a pre-existing property right through registration. The defence is known as overreaching and we will examine it in detail in Chapter 19.

A few points need, however, to be made here to put the following extract in context. Overreaching is a general defence that can be used by C whenever A has a power to give C a right free from B's pre-existing property right.[16] It is important where trusts are concerned: it may be that, if A holds on trust for B, the terms of the trust give A a power to give C a right free from B's pre-existing equitable interest. And it is particularly important where trusts of land are concerned, because the trustee or trustees will then have a default statutory power to give C a right free from B's pre-existing equitable interest.

For example, in City of London Building Society v Flegg,[17] Mr and Mrs Flegg had contributed to the purchase price of a house, legal title to which was in the names of their daughter and her husband (Mr and Mrs Maxwell Brown). The Maxwell-Browns, therefore, held their legal freehold on trust for themselves and for Mr and Mrs Flegg, and all four lived in the home together. The Maxwell-Browns later granted a legal charge over the land to the building society, who wished to enforce that charge by removing Mr and Mrs Flegg and selling the land. As in Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland,[18] Mr and Mrs Flegg's right arose before that of the lender; and, as in Boland, their pre-existing equitable interests counted as overriding interests, as they were coupled with actual occupation of the land. Nonetheless, the building society in Flegg was able to take priority, as it had a defence to Mr and Mrs Flegg's right: the overreaching defence.

We will examine the overreaching defence in detail in Chapter 19, as it is particularly relevant to the context of the shared home, the subject matter of Part E of this book. We will see there that the decision in Flegg provoked a good deal of controversy. Here, our concern is with what Flegg can tell us about how the courts deal with the priority triangle. The first point concerns the role of actual occupation. It is wrong to think that if B has a pre-existing property right and is in actual occupation of registered land, B will always take priority over C. B's actual occupation may prevent C from using the lack of registration defence against B, but it does not prevent C from relying on a different defence, such as overreaching.

The second point demonstrated by Flegg is that the defences available to C may depend on the nature of B's pre-existing property right. In Flegg, B's right arose under a 'trust for sale'; as a result, that right was vulnerable to the overreaching defence regulated by s 2 of the LPA 1925. As we will see in Chapter 19, B is now vulnerable to that defence whenever his equitable property right arises under a trust of land. Similarly, C's ability to rely on a defence may depend on C satisfying certain requirements: for example, as we will see in Chapter 19, s 2 of the LPA 1925 meant that, in Flegg, it was crucial that the building society had paid the loan money to two trustees.[19] This is why, in Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland, the bank was not able to rely on the statutory overreaching defence: in that case, there was only one trustee (Mr Boland) and so the bank did not meet the requirement, imposed by the LPA 1925, that the loan money be paid to at least two trustees.

[16] See Harpum, 'Overreaching, Trustees' Powers and the Reform of the 1925 Legislation' [1990] CLJ 277.
[17] [1988] AC 54, HL. [18] [1981] AC 487, HL: see section 2 above.

3.4 DEFENCES BASED ON B'S CONSENT

3.4.1 Where B expressly consents to C taking priority

Imagine a case in which A holds a freehold on trust for both A and B, who share occupation of the home. That freehold was acquired without a mortgage loan. A and B then decide to raise some money by taking out a mortgage loan. A approaches C Bank and informs C Bank that B has a pre-existing equitable property right. If C Bank deals with A alone, it can acquire a charge over the land, because A is a sole registered proprietor. But C Bank is aware that, B's beneficial interest, coupled with B's actual occupation of the land, gives B an overriding interest. As a result, C Bank requires B to give his consent to C Bank's later charge taking priority over B's right. Clearly, if B gives that consent, C Bank's later charge will take priority: B's consent gives C Bank a defence to B's pre-existing equitable property right.

Problems can, however, arise if B later claims that his consent was not freely given: for example, it may be that A pressured B into giving the consent, or that A lied to B about the terms of the loan. In that case, two questions arise: firstly, was there really any flaw in B's consent—for example, did A use undue influence or make a misrepresentation in order to convince B to give that consent? Secondly, if so, should that flaw in B's consent affect C Bank: after all, if it was A who used the undue influence or made the misrepresentation, why should C Bank lose out?

We will examine the special principles developed to deal with this difficult question in Chapter 29, section 3.3. For the moment, we simply need to note that, in some circumstances, a flaw in B's consent, even if procured by A, can prevent C Bank from taking priority.

3.4.2 Where B impliedly consents to C taking priority

We saw above that, in Abbey National v Cann, Daisy Cann did not give her express consent to the Abbey National taking priority. The Abbey National did not have the chance to ask for such consent, because it was unaware that Daisy had any pre-existing property right: when George Cann applied for the mortgage loan, he lied to the building society and said that he did not plan to share occupation of the home. Daisy did, however, know that a loan would be necessary to provide the extra £4,000 that she and George needed to buy that land. The Court of Appeal therefore decided that Daisy had impliedly consented to [19] Section 2(1)(ii) limits overreaching in a case such as Flegg to situations in which 'the statutory requirements respecting the payment of capital money arising under the settlement are complied with'. Section 27 of the Law of Property Act 1925 then imposes such a requirement: if C pays money in return for its property right, that money must be paid to at least two trustees or to a trust corporation (see Chapter 19, section 2.3).

a mortgage lender (the Abbey National) taking priority. We have seen that the House of Lords held that, in any case, there was no need for such consent: the Abbey National did not need a defence to Daisy's equitable property right, because its charge arose before Daisy acquired that right.

Nonetheless, in the following extracts from the House of Lords' decision, Lord Oliver (with whom Lords Bridge, Ackner, and Griffiths agreed)[20] supported the Court of Appeal's reasoning.

The view that I have formed renders it strictly unnecessary to consider the ground upon which Mrs. Cann's claim failed in the Court of Appeal. What was said was that, despite her initial evidence (in her affidavit) that she did not know of her son's intention to raise any of the money required for the purchase on mortgage, nevertheless her oral evidence before the judge disclosed that she was well aware that there was a shortfall which would have to be met from somewhere. Her own account of the matter was that his reason for selling was that he was in financial difficulties, so that she must have known that he was not going to be able to meet it out of his own resources. Dillon L.J. (with whom, on this point, the other two members of the court agreed) inferred that "she left it to George Cann to raise the balance"[21] from which he further inferred that George Cann had authority to raise that sum from the society. There was no finding to this effect by the judge, but I think, for my part, that it is a necessary conclusion once it is accepted, as it has to be, that she knew that there was a shortfall of some £4,000 apart from conveyancing costs, that George Cann was going to raise it, and that he was in financial difficulties. It is said that there was no evidence that he was going to raise it on the security of this property. There might, for instance, be other property available to him. He might obtain an unsecured loan. In the circumstances of his known lack of resources, however, this is fanciful and in my judgment the court was entitled to draw the inference that it did draw. If that is right, it follows that George Cann was permitted by her to raise money on the security of the property without any limitation on his authority being communicated to the society. She is not, therefore, in a position to complain, as against the lender, that too much was raised and even if, contrary to the view which I have formed, she had been able to establish an interest in the property which would otherwise prevail against the society, the circumstances to which I have alluded would preclude her from relying upon it as prevailing over the society's interest for the reasons given in the judgment of Dillon L.J. in the Court of Appeal. For all these reasons, I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

[20] Lord Jauncey's reasoning is also consistent with that of Lord Oliver, but at 102–3, Lord Jauncey noted that, in finding that the Abbey National's charge arose before Daisy Cann's equitable property right, 'it is unnecessary to consider whether or not Mrs Cann was aware that George Cann would require to borrow money in order to finance the purchase of [the new home]'.

The idea that B can be taken to have impliedly consented to giving priority to C did not originate in Cann,[22] and it has been applied since the House of Lords' decision in that case.[23] Nonetheless, it is somewhat controversial.[24] Firstly, there is a practical question: in Cann itself, was it really true to say that Daisy 'must have known' that George would take out a mortgage? After all, it may have been possible to raise the £4,000 by other means.[25]

Secondly, even if Daisy did know that a mortgage would be necessary, there is a conceptual problem. There is a general doctrine, often referred to as 'promissory estoppel', which can be used to give C a defence against a right of B.[26] For that defence to operate, however, it is usually necessary: (i) for B to make some form of promise to C (e.g. a promise not to enforce his right against C); and (ii) for C to rely on that promise. The difficulty in a case such as Cann is that Daisy Cann did not make any promise to the Abbey National; indeed, the cause of the problem was that the Abbey National was entirely unaware of her.

The following extract makes this point, as well as suggesting a way of understanding other cases that adopt the implied consent reasoning. In the extract: (i) 'promissory estoppel' is referred to as 'defensive estoppel'; (ii) 'A' represents George Cann, 'B' represents Daisy Cann, and 'C Bank' represents the Abbey National; and (iii) the term 'persistent right' is used to refer to an equitable property right (see Chapter 5, section 7).

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, p 823)

As there have been no direct dealings between B and C Bank, the defensive estoppel defence can apply only if we can say that: (i) A, acting as an agent for B, made an implied commitment to C Bank on behalf of B; or (ii) B was under a duty to inform C Bank of her right. Yet neither (i) nor (ii) is persuasive. As to (i), in [a case such as Cann], it is at most tenable to say that B allowed A to give C Bank a Charge in order to raise [£4,000: the extra money necessary to purchase the home]. B certainly did not give A any authority to borrow [£25,000]. And yet, in Cann, the House of Lords stated that C Bank has a defence irrespective of the fact that A borrowed more than was necessary to achieve A and B's plan. As to (ii), it is very odd to say that B, with a pre-existing persistent right, is under any duty to inform others of that right: such an idea is entirely absent from the property law system. Rather, if anything, the opposite approach is adopted: C's failure to check for a pre-existing persistent right of B may be important in denying C a defence to that right.

So, as a matter of doctrine, the position adopted in Cann cannot be defended [. . .] The Cann position thus gives special protection to a secured lender. Can that special treatment be justified by the needs of practical convenience? Probably not. The Cann position is not a simple rule that C Bank always wins; rather, it is based on B's knowledge of the shortfall in A and B's funds. So to defend the Cann position we need to show why that knowledge should affect C Bank's position. And it is hard to find a convincing practical reason why that knowledge should make any difference.

22 It was also applied in Bristol & West BS v Henning [1985] 1 WLR 778 and Paddington BC v Mendelsohn (1985) 50 P & CR 244.

23 See Equity & Law Home Loans Ltd v Prestidge [1992] 1 WLR 137.

24 See Smith (1990) 109 LQR 545.

25 This point is noted by Sawyer, 'A World Safe for Mortgagees? Registering a Scintilla of Doubt' in Modern Studies in Propety Law: Vol 1 (ed Cooke, 2001, p 209).

26 See Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House [1947] KB 130.

In practice, this particular aspect of the Cann decision is not too important: the real impact of that decision is in protecting C Bank whenever it makes a secured loan used by A to acquire a Freehold or Lease. In fact, cases before Cann adopting the modified "defensive estoppel" defence may well have done so precisely because, at that time, it was not possible for C Bank to argue that its Charge arose before B's persistent right.[27] So, when changing the approach to the timing question in Cann [see section 2.2.1 above], the House of Lords should also have taken the opportunity to change the approach to "defensive estoppel" by stating that C Bank cannot use that defence if, as in [Cann], B has made no commitment to C Bank.

3.5 DEFENCES BASED ON THE LAPSE OF TIME

3.5.1 Unregistered land

As we saw in Chapter 4, section 4, and Chapter 8, section 3, B can acquire a legal property right (a freehold) simply by taking physical control of a piece of land. That is the case even if B acts with full knowledge that A has a pre-existing property right in the same land. For example, if A has a freehold of a holiday home, and B moves into that home whilst A is away and starts to use the house as his own, B acquires his own freehold. But because A's freehold arose before B's freehold, the basic rule tells us that A's pre-existing property right takes priority to that of B. So, A is free to remove B from the land, either by using reasonable force or by seeking a possession order from a court. Initially, then, B's freehold may give him useful protection against X (a party who later tries to move into the home), but it does not protect him against A.

If B continues to act as an owner of the home over a long period, however, the lapse of time can give B a defence to A's pre-existing property right. Where unregistered land is concerned, the basic rules are set out by ss 15(1) and 17 of the Limitation Act 1980.

Limitation Act 1980, ss 15(1) and 17

15 Time limit for actions to recover land

(1) No action shall be brought by any person to recover any land after the expiration of twelve years from the date on which the right of action accrued to him or, if it first accrued to some person through whom he claims, to that person [. . .]

17 Extinction of title to land after expiration of time limit

Subject to section 18 of this Act, at the expiration of the period prescribed by this Act for any person to recover land (including a redemption action) the title of that person to the land shall be extinguished.

[27] [The footnote in the original refers to Bristol & West BS v Henning [1985] 1 WLR 778 and Paddington BC v Mendelsohn (1985) 50 P & CR 244, noting that the result in those cases need not depend on the 'implied consent' of B: following the decision in Cann on the scintilla temporis point (see section 2.2.1 above), the result can instead be seen as depending on the fact that C Bank's charge arises before B's equitable property right. The decision in Equity & Law Home Loans Ltd v Prestidge [1992] 1 WLR 137 is explained on the basis that: (i) following the Cann decision on the scintilla temporis point, the holder of the first charge took priority over B; and (ii) the holder of the second charge, when providing the money used to pay off that first loan, then stepped into the shoes of the holder of the first charge. See further Dixon, 'Consenting Away Proprietary Rights' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol I (ed Cooke, 2001), pp 193–8.]

Section 15(1) allows the lapse of time (twelve years) to give B a defence against A's pre-existing property right. Section 17 goes further: it means that, once twelve years has elapsed, A loses that pre-existing right. This means that not only is B protected from A's previous right, but also that any later users of the land are safe from a claim by A. As a result, B's acquisition of a freehold (which occurs as soon as B takes physical control of the land), coupled with the lapse of time, means that B may be able to acquire, in practice, the best right to the land. In such a case, B's protection is said to depend on the doctrine of adverse possession.

We examined the detail of that doctrine in Chapter 8; as far as the priority triangle is concerned, two points are worth noting here. Firstly—in relation to unregistered land, at least—the lapse of time can operate to give a later property right priority to an earlier property right, even if the holder of the later property right has deliberately acted inconsistently with that earlier right.

Secondly, the defence provided by s 15(1) of the Limitation Act 1980 has an unusual effect: it not only protects an adverse possessor from a pre-existing property right; it also extinguishes that pre-existing right.[28]

3.5.2 Registered land

Land Registration Act 2002, s 96

(1) No period of limitation under section 15 of the Limitation Act 1980 (time limits in relation to recovery of land) shall run against any person, other than a chargee, in relation to an estate in land or rentcharge the title to which is registered.

(2) [. . .]

(3) Accordingly, section 17 of that Act (extinction of title on expiry of time limit) does not operate to extinguish the title of any person where, by virtue of this section, a period of limitation does not run against him.

Section 96 of the LRA 2002 thus makes clear that, if A has a registered freehold or lease, the lapse of time, by itself, can never give B a defence against A's pre-existing property right. Instead, the 2002 Act provides a new set of rules to deal with cases in which B takes physical control of land covered by a freehold or lease registered in A's name.

We examined the detail of those rules in Chapter 8. One important point to note here is that the 2002 Act enacted a deliberate policy of giving greater protection to A where he or she has a registered freehold or lease. Indeed, if A has a freehold or lease of unregistered land and has no current plans to sell that land, the extra protection given against an adverse possessor provides perhaps the best incentive for A to register his or her property right.

28 The limitation defence has the same effect in relation to goods: if B tortiously interferes with A's goods, and A fails to act before the limitation period expires, then s 3(2) of the Limitation Act 1980 operates to extinguish A's pre-existing property right in the goods. In contrast to the position in relation to land, however, the limitation period does not begin to run in favour of B if B dishonestly takes possession: see s 4 of the 1980 Act.

3.6 DEFENCES AND THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN LEGAL AND EQUITABLE PROPERTY RIGHTS

If B has a pre-existing legal property right, it is possible for C's later property right to take priority: C may have a defence to B's legal property right. For example, B's express consent can clearly give C such a defence, and we have seen that—in unregistered land, at least—the lapse of time can also give a party a defence against a legal freehold or lease. It is, however, far easier for C to have a defence against a pre-existing equitable property right. It is therefore crucial, when considering the defences question, to ask if B's pre-existing property right is legal or equitable: as noted in Chapter 5, section 7, this is one of the main reasons why it is so important to distinguish between legal and equitable property rights.

Similarly, when considering the defences question, it is also very important to know if C's property right is legal or equitable. For example, in relation to registered land, if C has only an equitable property right, then it is not possible for C to take advantage of the lack of registration defence set out in ss 29 and 30 of the LRA 2002; instead, the basic rule in s 28 of that Act will apply.[29] Equally, if C acquires only an equitable property right, C will not be able to rely on the statutory overreaching defence discussed in section 3.3 above.[30]

The differences between legal and equitable property rights are particularly clear when we look at the lack of registration defence. For example, we saw in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green,[31] at the start of section 3 of this chapter, that Geoffrey's failure to register his equitable property right as a land charge allowed Evelyne to have a defence against that right. As we will see in Chapter 13, section 5.1, however, it is only in very rare cases that the lack of registration defence operating in unregistered land can be used against a pre-existing legal property right.

Similarly, under the LRA 2002, it is almost impossible for C to use the lack of registration defence against a pre-existing legal property right. This is for two reasons: firstly, in order to acquire such a legal property right in the first place, B will often need to register it, as we saw in Chapter 7; in such a case, the lack of registration defence is irrelevant. Secondly, if the LRA 2002 does allow B to acquire a legal property right without registering it, that right will almost always count as an overriding interest; as a result, it will be immune to the lack of registration defence (see section 3.2.2 above). We will examine the detail of overriding interests in Chapter 14, section 5, but we can see the crucial difference between legal and equitable property rights in the following provisions.

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 3, para 1

Unregistered interests which override registered dispositions

Leasehold estates in land

A leasehold estate in land granted for a term not exceeding seven years from the date of the grant, except for—

(a) a lease the grant of which falls within section 4(1)(d)(e) or (f);

(b) a lease the grant of which constitutes a registrable disposition.

29 See Halifax plc v Curry Popeck (a firm) [2008] EWHC 1692 (Ch), [25], per Norris J.

30 Under s 2(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925, overreaching can occur only if there is a 'conveyance to a purchaser of a legal estate in land'.

31 [1981] AC 513.

The exceptions in (a) and (b) simply ensure that, in those exceptional cases in which a lease of seven years or less must be registered, it cannot count as an overriding interest. The crucial word in setting the scope of the main rule is 'granted'. That word is used because, following the decision in the case set out below, it means that only a legal lease is covered by the LRA 2002, Sch 3, para 1. In that case, the court considered s 70(1)(k) of the LRA 1925, which allowed 'Leases granted for a term not exceeding twenty-one years' to count as an overriding interest.

City Permanent Building Society v Miller
[1952] Ch 840, CA

Facts: Louie Cumberland had seven children and was in desperate need of somewhere to live. Henry Miller agreed to give Ms Cumberland a lease of the first and second floors of a house in Earl's Court, London. The lease was stated to run for three years, initially, and then to run from week to week. In return, she paid three years' rent in advance. At that point, however, Mr Miller had no rights in relation to the house and Ms Cumberland was not able to move in until three months later, when Mr Miller acquired a long lease of the house. To acquire that lease, Mr Miller borrowed £650 from the City Permanent Building Society: that sum was secured by a charge over the house. When Mr Miller failed to repay the loan as agreed, the building society attempted to remove Ms Cumberland so that it could sell the house with vacant possession and use the proceeds to meet Mr Miller's debt. Ms Cumberland argued that she had an overriding interest under s 70(1)(k) of the LRA 1925, which protected 'Leases granted for a term not exceeding twenty-one years'.

Lord Evershed MR

[T]he effect of the contract was that [Mr Miller] obliged himself to grant to the tenant a term in these premises of three years plus one week at the least [. . .] such an agreement is not capable of conferring upon the tenant any estate in the property; in order that a tenant may acquire an estate of over three years, a deed is necessary [see Chapter 7, section 4 and Chapter 22, section 3.1.2].

I therefore proceed to a consideration of the main problem, bearing in mind that all the tenant took at the most was, as I have said, a specifically enforceable contract to grant a lease of at least three years and a week. [Counsel for Ms Cumberland], in his reply, has said that she took an equitable term and that during the moment of time when the mortgagor was registered proprietor unencumbered by the charge that equitable term ripened into a legal interest. I am unable to accept any stage of that argument. I do not think she had an equitable term. Indeed, I do not think that that phrase really can mean anything except that she had the right to get specific performance of this contract; and, assuming in [Ms Cumberland's] favour that there was a [point in time] when the mortgagor was the unencumbered proprietor of the property, I am clear that the effect of it was not to create any legal estate in the tenant, more particularly since she was not, as I have explained, at that time in occupation.

Now having dealt with all those points, I return to give my reasons for the conclusion which I have already anticipated. It seems to me that as a matter of English the use of the word "granted" in paragraph (k), whether it he applied to the word "lease" or the word "term," indicates, on the face of it, that the lease or agreement for lease which is to be an overriding interest must be a lease or agreement which is effective to create a term. An agreement for a tenancy or to grant a tenancy for a year would be so effective if the tenant were in possession, but I have felt compelled, upon a review of the whole of the relevant legislation, to conclude that such a limitation of the expanded word "lease" is inevitably imposed by the use of the word "granted"; and since, as I have already stated, the definitions must be read subject to the requirement of the context, that is my conclusion.

So, in City Permanent Building Society v Miller, the crucial point was that Ms Cumberland's agreement with Mr Miller could not give her a legal lease: because the lease was due to last for more than three years, s 52 of the LPA 1925 meant that it could only be legal if created by means of a deed. The agreement did give Ms Cumberland an equitable lease (under the doctrine of anticipation)[32] and that equitable lease arose before the building society acquired its charge. But the building society was able to use the lack of registration defence: Ms Cumberland had not protected her lease by entering a notice on the register, and that lease, because it was only equitable, could not count, by itself, as an overriding interest.

Of course, in Miller, things would have been different if Ms Cumberland had been in actual occupation of the land when the building society acquired its charge. In fact, where B has a pre-existing equitable property right, actual occupation is the only means by which that right can count as an overriding interest. This is why actual occupation is so important in practice and why we will consider the concept in detail in Chapter 14, section 5.1.

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 3, para 3

Unregistered interests which override registered dispositions

Easements and profits a prendre

(1) A legal easement or profit a prendre, except for an easement, or a profit a prendre which is not registered under the Commons Registration Act 1965, which at the time of the disposition—

(a) is not within the actual knowledge of the person to whom the disposition is made, and

(b) would not have been obvious on a reasonably careful inspection of the land over which the easement or profit is exercisable.

(2) The exception in sub-paragraph (1) does not apply if the person entitled to the easement or profit proves that it has been exercised in the period of one year ending with the day of the disposition.

This paragraph is badly drafted (we will unpick its detailed meaning in Chapter 14, section 5.3), but one point is made very clear: the paragraph protects only legal easements and profits. Under the LRA 1925, the comparable provision (s 70(1)(a)) had, rather controversially, been interpreted as including at least some equitable easements.[33] Following the recommendation of the Law Commission, however, the new Act makes clear that equitable easements and profits cannot count, by themselves, as overriding interests. So, such a right

32 See the discussion of Walsh v Lonsdale in Chapter 5, section 6 and also in Chapter 9.

33 See Celsteel Ltd v Alton House Holdings Ltd [1985] 1 WLR 204.

can only be immune from the lack of registration defence in the unlikely case that B is in actual occupation of the land to which his or her equitable easement or profit relates.

4 CONCLUSION

Many disputes about the use of land have the same basic form: (i) B acquires a right to make some use of land from A, who has an estate in that land; (ii) C then acquires a similar right from A; and (iii) B and C want to use that land in mutually inconsistent ways. In such a case, the first question to ask is whether B acquired a legal or equitable property right: as we saw in Chapters 4 and 5, we can break that question down into the content and acquisition questions. It may be the case that C also acquired a legal or equitable property right from A. If so, there is a priority triangle: we need to ask whether B or C's property right is to take priority.

The basic rule is clear: B's property right will take priority because it is first in time—that is, it arose before C's property right. As we saw in section 2.2 above, however, there are some cases in which we need to take care in working out the order in which the property rights arose. And, even if it is clear that B's property right arose before C's property right, it may still be possible for C to take priority: to do so, C needs to show he has a defence to B's pre-existing right. In section 3 above, we saw a number of examples of such a defence. In later chapters, we will return to examine some of those defences in more detail: for example, Chapter 13 will look at the lack of registration defence in unregistered land, Chapter 14 will focus on that defence in registered land, and Chapter 19 will explore overreaching.

We have, however, already seen a number of important points. Firstly, it is always vital to keep in mind the possibility of C having a defence to B's pre-existing property right. Secondly, the availability of a defence can depend on both: (i) the nature of B's property right; and (ii) the circumstances in which C acquired his property right. In particular, C's chances of having a defence are much greater where both: (i) B's property right is an equitable, rather than a legal, right; and (ii) C's property right is a legal, rather than an equitable, right.

So, even if B can clear the hurdles discussed in Chapters 4 and 5, and show that he has a legal or equitable property right in relation to land, there is no guarantee that his right will always bind a third party. Equally, however, it is important to remember that, even if he cannot assert a pre-existing property right against C, there is another means by which B's claim can prevail. As we saw in Chapter 6, if B can show that he has a direct right against C, arising as a result of C's conduct, B can simply rely on that right.

QUESTIONS

1. In National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth, Mrs Ainsworth acquired her 'deserted wife's equity' before National Provincial Bank acquired its charge. So why was her claim to remain in occupation of the land unsuccessful?
2. Do you agree with the approach to the scintilla temporis question adopted by the House of Lords in Abbey National v Cann? Should that approach be limited to cases in which a mortgage loan is necessary in order to enable the borrower to buy the land in question?

3. In Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green, Geoffrey Green acquired his equitable property right before Evelyne Green acquired her freehold. So why was Evelyne free to ignore Geoffrey's right? Should the fact that Evelyne was fully aware of Geoffrey's right make any difference to the result?
4. What is an 'overriding interest'? Can you explain why Mrs Hodgson had such a right in Hodgson v Marks, but Mrs Ainsworth did not in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth?
5. In a case such as Abbey National Building Society v Cann, does it make sense to say that Mrs Cann impliedly consented to the building society taking priority?

UNREGISTERED LAND AND PRIORITIES

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Where A transfers land to C, priority questions arise as to whether B, who has pre-existing property rights, can enforce those rights against C. Property rights are capable of binding any third party later acquiring a right from A; therefore this issue is conceptualized as the defences question: does C have a defence against the enforcement of B's pre-existing property rights?
2. Priority rules differ between unregistered and registered land. The overreaching mechanism (discussed in Chapter 19) is the only rule that is common to both systems. This chapter considers the priority rules of unregistered land.
3. In unregistered land, the key distinction is between legal and equitable rights.
4. C generally has no defence against the enforcement of legal rights held by B.
5. The enforcement of equitable rights in unregistered land used to be governed by the doctrine of notice. C would have a defence only if he or she were a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of B's equitable rights. The doctrine is perceived as being a fundamentally ethical means of resolving priority issues, but had fallen out of favour by the time of the 1925 legislation and has largely been replaced with more mechanical means of determining priorities.
6. A number of equitable interests, and one legal interest, are registrable as land charges under the Land Charges Act 1972. This is a limited register of interests in unregistered land. Land charges are registered against the name of the holder of the legal estate at the time of registration.
7. Where B's interest is registrable as a land charge, its enforcement against C is entirely dependent on the provisions of the 1972 Act; the defence of bona fide purchaser is irrelevant. Controversially, this has been held to mean that C has a defence against B's unregistered land charge even where C knows about B's interest.

1 INTRODUCTION

Where A transfers an estate in land to C, or creates a mortgage in C's favour, the question arises whether third parties, B, have property rights that are enforceable against C. This fundamental question gives rise to the priority triangle that was introduced in Chapter 12.

There are two distinct ways in which B may have rights that are binding on C. Firstly, the transfer from A to C may have created a new direct right in favour of B. The importance of new direct rights has been discussed in Chapter 6.

Secondly, B may have pre-existing property rights at the time of the transfer. Property rights are prima facie enforceable against third parties later acquiring a right from A; therefore property rights owned by B at the time of the transfer are prima facie enforceable against C.

The difference between these two scenarios is illustrated in Figure 6.

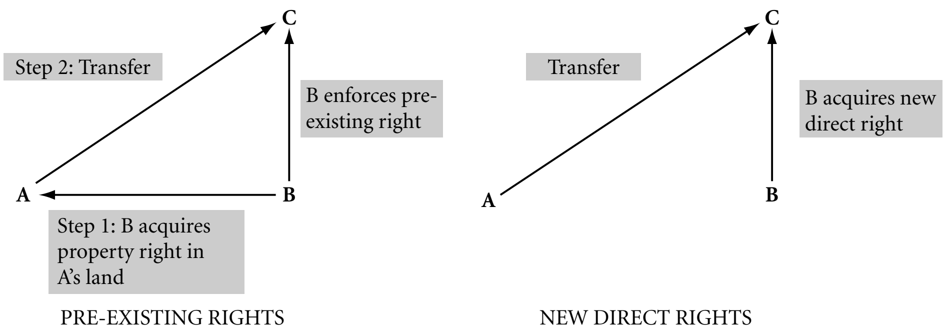

Figure 6 The priority triangle and the creation of new direct rights

In this chapter, and in Chapter 14, we are concerned with the enforcement of B's pre-existing property rights. These are sometimes referred to in this context as 'incumbrances'. We examine the rules that determine whether B's pre-existing property rights are binding against C on a transfer of an estate in land. Because B's rights are prima facie binding, this is conceptualized as the defences question: does C have a defence to the enforcement of B's property rights? This question is answered through land law's priority rules. These rules determine whether C has priority over B's property rights, or is bound by them.

It is important to emphasize that we are concerned only with the enforcement of pre-existing property rights held by B—that is, legal and equitable estates and interests in land. These are the only rights that are prima facie enforceable against a third party. We are not concerned with any personal rights that B has against A at the time of the transfer: B's pre-existing personal rights are not enforceable against C. To obtain property rights enforceable against C, B would need to demonstrate that new direct rights were created on the transfer.

Different priority rules apply to unregistered and registered land. The unregistered land rules are considered in this chapter and those of registered land in Chapter 14. The practical significance of the unregistered land rules is diminishing, but they retain some importance. As we have seen in Chapter 7, all unregistered land is now subject to compulsory first registration on the occurrence of a triggering event. This includes the transfer (by sale or gift) of a legal estate, except the grant of a new legal lease of no more than seven years' duration, or the transfer of an existing legal lease with seven years or less remaining.[1]

The priority rules of unregistered land apply in two situations. Firstly, on a transfer of unregistered land that triggers compulsory first registration, title to the estate in question will be investigated through the unregistered land rules for the last time. Secondly, the rules will continue to apply to unregistered land as regards transfers of an estate that do not trigger compulsory first registration: for example, the creation of a legal lease for seven years or less, or the transfer of an existing legal lease with seven years or less remaining, or the transfer of an equitable interest (such as an assignment of an existing beneficial interest under a trust).

2 INVESTIGATION OF TITLE

To ascertain the existence of pre-existing property rights, C will investigate A's title to the land. The means of investigation is twofold. Firstly, C will investigate the documentary proof of A's title. In Chapter 7, we saw the written formality requirements that apply to the creation and transfer of rights in land. In unregistered land, there is no central record of title. A's documentary proof therefore consists of the bundle of deeds recording transactions carried out in relation to the land that have been executed to fulfil those formality requirements. C does not need to investigate the full history of the title, but must establish a good root of title. The period of time that must be investigated to establish good root of title has gradually been decreased. At the time of the 1925 legislation, it was necessary to investigate from the first conveyance that had taken place at least thirty years ago. Section 23 of the Law of Property Act 1969 (LPA 1969) reduced this period to fifteen years.

Secondly, C should undertake a physical inspection of the land. As we will see, each of these means of investigation has a particular role in the application of priority rules.

3 THE TWO BASIC PRIORITY RULES

In unregistered land, two basic priority rules are applied. The key distinction is that between legal and equitable rights. Firstly, legal rights bind all third parties who later acquire a right from A and therefore legal rights held by B are necessarily binding. C has no defence against the enforcement of these rights. The existence of legal rights will generally be apparent from the title deeds, although this is not invariably the case.[2]

Secondly, equitable rights bind any third party acquiring a right from A except a bona fide purchaser of legal estate without notice of the rights. Hence, equitable rights held by B are enforceable against C unless C can invoke the defence of bona fide purchaser. The 'doctrine of notice' is an important part of this defence. A person who successfully invokes this defence is sometimes described as 'equity's darling'—that is, as beyond the reproach of courts of equity.

The first rule is subject only to one limited exception. As we will see, the enforcement of a puisne mortgage, a specific type of legal mortgage, is now subject to registration under the

1 Land Registration Act 2002, s 4.

2 For example, there may be no record of short leases that are exempt from statutory formalities for their creation (Law of Property Act 1925, s 54(2)) or of legal easements created by implied grant.

Land Charges Act 1972 (LCA 1972). C may have a defence against this type of mortgage if it has not been registered under that Act. Apart from this exception, pre-existing legal property rights held by B do not require further discussion.

The second rule is subject to two significant exceptions. Firstly, the enforcement of a number of equitable property rights is subject to registration under the 1972 Act. The defence of bona fide purchaser has no application in relation to these rights, the enforcement of which is determined by the rules provided by that Act. Secondly, the enforcement against C of beneficial interests under a trust is subject to the operation of the overreaching mechanism. That mechanism, which applies equally to unregistered and registered land, is discussed in Chapter 19. Overreaching enables C to take the land free from beneficial interests as long as certain conditions are fulfilled: in particular, C must pay the purchase money to a minimum of two trustees or a trust corporation. If the conditions for overreaching are met, then C has a defence against the enforcement of beneficial interests held by B. As we will see in Chapter 19, B's interests are removed from the land and attach to the proceeds of sale held by the trustees (A). If the conditions for overreaching are not fulfilled (for example, because there is only one trustee of the trust), then the enforcement of beneficial interests is determined by the doctrine of notice. Hence, C will be bound by B's beneficial interest unless C can invoke the defence of bona fide purchaser.

As a result of these exceptions, the defence of bona fide purchaser plays a residual, but significant, role. In Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding,[3] Lord Wilberforce noted: '[T]here may well be rights, of an equitable character, outside the provisions as to registration and which are incapable of being overreached.' Such rights remain enforceable against C unless C can invoke the defence of bona fide purchaser.

4 THE DEFENCE OF BONA FIDE PURCHASER

The defence of bona fide purchaser is founded on equity's ideas of acting in good conscience. Equity would enforce its property rights against all those who could not, in good conscience, seek to take free from them. In this respect, the defence represents an essentially ethical rule.[4] But by the time of the 1925 legislation, the defence appeared too narrow. As is illustrated below in the debate arising from Kingsnorth Finance v Tizard,[5] its effect is to enforce rights against persons whose conduct it is difficult to call into question. As we will see, this is due, in particular, to the broad reach of constructive notice.

The effect of the defence, when successfully applied, is to provide the purchaser of a legal estate with an 'absolute, unqualified, unanswerable defence' against the enforcement of B's equitable interest.[6] B's interest is not resurrected on a subsequent sale to a purchaser with notice.[7] The defence therefore seems to reflect a value judgment about the relative worth of legal and equitable rights; security of legal transfers is assisted at the cost of equitable proprietary rights.

The legitimacy of this value judgment is assessed by Worthington. She considers the defence in the context of its impact on a beneficiary, B, following the transfer of legal title from A to C.

Worthington, Equity (2nd edn, 2006, p 96)

> Although the bona fide purchaser rule is commonly justified by the need to make (legal) transfers of property secure, this rationalization presupposes that legal ownership is the— pre-eminent property right. [. . .] In the face of this, it is sometimes suggested that the rule is not grounded in logic, but in the competitive jurisdictional politics that once existed between the Common Law and Chancery courts, and that Chancery was simple (but perhaps illogically) ceding jurisdiction to the Common Law courts. There is scope for logical justification, however. A trust presupposes that the beneficiary has left the trustee with all the incidents of title and the power (even if not the authority) to deal with the trust property. Given this, it may make sense to reassess the appropriate balance of risk between the beneficiary and an innocent third party, and sometimes (perhaps not always) favour the third party's security of transaction over the beneficiary's security of property. This forces the beneficiary, not the third party, to bear the risk of the defaulting trustee being unable to make the claims against him.

To invoke the defence, C must meet each of the composite elements.

4.1 'BONA FIDE'

C must act in good faith in the purchase. The requirement of good faith is closely related to an absence of notice, but it has been held to remain a distinct element.

Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green
[1981] AC 513, HL

>
> My Lords, the character in the law known as the bona fide (good faith) purchaser for value without notice was the creation of equity. In order to affect a purchaser for value of a legal estate with some equity or equitable interest, equity fastened upon his conscience and the composite expression was used to epitomise the circumstances in which equity would or rather would not do so. I think that it would generally be true to say that the words "in good faith" related to the existence of notice. Equity, in other words, required not only absence of notice, but genuine and honest absence of notice. As the law developed, this requirement became crystallised in the doctrine of constructive notice which assumed a statutory form in the Conveyancing Act 1882, section 3. But, and so far I would be willing to accompany the respondents, it would be a mistake to suppose that the requirement of good faith extended only to the matter of notice, or that when notice came to be regulated by statute, the requirement of good faith became obsolete. Equity still retained its interest in and power over the purchaser's conscience. The classic judgment of James L.J. in Pilcher v. Rawlins (1872) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 259, 269 is clear authority that it did: good faith there is stated as a separate test which may have to be passed even though absence of notice is proved. and there are references in cases subsequent to 1882 which confirm the proposition that honesty or bona fides remained something which might be inquired into (see Berwick & Co. v. Price [1905] 1 Ch. 632, 639; Taylor v. London and County Banking Co. [1901] 2 Ch. 231, 256; Oliver v. Hinton [1899] 2 Ch. 264, 273).

While it is clear from this statement that bona fides is a separate requirement from notice, it is difficult to pinpoint what it adds to the defence.

In Grindal v Hooper,[8] the definition of a good faith purchaser arose for consideration in the context of a statute, rather than the defence of bona fide purchaser. Lord Wilberforce's statement was interpreted to mean that 'notice is an essential but not an exclusive aspect of good faith'. Hence, a purchaser with notice would necessarily act in bad faith in denying the enforceability of B's rights, but an absence of notice does not guarantee that C acts in good faith in so doing.

4.2 'PURCHASER FOR VALUE'

To be a purchaser, C must acquire the estate by an act of the parties, rather than by operation of law. Hence, for example, a person who acquires a legal estate through adverse possession (as discussed in Chapter 8) is not a 'purchaser'.

The requirement of value precludes the defence being invoked where A transfers the land to C as a gift, whether during A's lifetime or on A's death. 'Equity will not assist a volunteer' and therefore the recipient of a gift is not placed in a better position than the donor. In Midland Bank v Green, in the context of discussing statutory definitions of purchaser, Lord Wilberforce considered that valuable consideration 'requires no definition: it is an expression denoting an advantage conferred or detriment suffered'.[9] It is a general expression that, unless curtailed by statute, includes inadequate consideration[10] and even nominal consideration.[11] In that case, it was held that a purchaser who paid £500 for land valued at £40,000 had provided valuable consideration.[12]

4.3 'OF A LEGAL ESTATE'

The defence of bona fide purchaser is available only to purchasers of a legal estate—that is, a legal freehold or leasehold. If C purchases an equitable interest, such as an equitable lease or an existing beneficial interest, then C remains bound by all equitable interests affecting that interest.

4.4 'WITHOUT NOTICE'

The most significant aspect of the defence is the requirement that C does not have notice of B's equitable proprietary right. Notice can take three forms: actual, constructive, and imputed.

8 Unreported, judgment 6 December 1999.

9 [1981] AC 513, 531.

10 Basset v Nosworthy (1673) 23 ER 55, 56, 'in Purchases the Question is not, whether the Consideration be adequate, but whether 'tis valuable' (sic).

11 Compare Lord Wilberforce's discussion in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green [1981] AC 513, 531–2. Lord Wilberforce defined nominal consideration and a nominal sum as 'terms of art, [referring] to a sum or consideration which can be mentioned as consideration but is not necessarily paid'.

12 Ibid. While the matter did not arise for consideration, Lord Wilberforce doubted that £500 would be classed as nominal consideration on the definition of that term which he provided.

4.4.1 Actual notice

Actual notice refers to those matters of which C is actually aware. If C knows of B's property rights, then C has no defence against their enforceability. The means by which C obtained notice are generally irrelevant: in particular, it is not necessary that notice is obtained from A or B.

The contrary was suggested to be the case in Barnhart v Greenshields.[13] In that case, it was held that 'a purchaser is not bound to attend to vague rumours to statements by mere strangers, but that a notice in order to be binding, must proceed from some person interested in the property'.[14] While the irrelevance of rumours has not been doubted, a broader approach to the defence has been indicated.

Lord Cairns LC

I do not think it would be consistent with the principles upon which this Court has always proceeded, or with the authorities which have been referred to, if I were to hold that under no circumstances could a trustee, without express notice from the incumbrancer, be fixed with knowledge of an incumbrance upon the fund of which he is the trustee so as to give the incumbrancer the same benefit which he would have had if he had himself given notice to the trustee. It must depend upon the facts of the case; but I am quite prepared to say that I think the Court would expect to find that those who alleged that the trustee had knowledge of the incumbrance had made it out, not by any evidence of casual conversations, much less by any proof of what would only be constructive notice—but by proof that the mind of the trustee has in some way been brought to an intelligent apprehension of the nature of the incumbrance which has come upon the property, so that a reasonable man, or an ordinary man of business, would act upon the information and would regulate his conduct by it in the execution of the trust.

4.4.2 Constructive notice

If C does not have actual notice of B's rights because of a failure to make reasonable inquiries, then C will be fixed with constructive notice and be precluded from invoking the defence. The Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925) provides a statutory explanation of the scope of constructive notice.

> (a) it is within his own knowledge, or would have come to his knowledge if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him;
> [. . .]

Howell explains the rationale for this form of notice.

Howell, 'The Doctrine of Notice: An Historical Perspective' [1997] Conv 431, 432

> It is constructive notice which has caused and continues to cause the most difficulty. The principle upon which it is based is eminently reasonable. If a purchaser is affected only by matters of which he actually knows, he will take care to ensure that he is without that knowledge. Since this could clearly lead to injustice, equity was prepared in certain circumstances to treat the purchaser as having knowledge which he did not in fact have. In order to satisfy the courts of equity, the purchaser was expected to inspect both the land itself and the documents of title to a standard of enquiry set by the courts, and that standard could be very high. [. . .] In general, however, the courts were concerned to confine constructive notice within the scope of those inspections and enquiries which it was reasonable to make, and not to put an over-stringent burden of enquiry on the purchaser.

Inevitably, what constitutes 'reasonable' inquiries has provided a fertile ground for litigation. In particular, this has centred on the protection afforded to those in occupation.

It is well established that B's occupation is sufficient to fix C with constructive notice of B's rights.[15] To have this effect, however, the fact of B's occupation must be ascertainable on reasonable enquiries. This gives rise to two issues: what constitutes occupation and what constitutes reasonable enquiries.

As we will see in Chapter 14, occupation is relevant to determining priorities in registered, as well as unregistered, land. In registered land, in William & Glyn's Bank v Boland,[16] the House of Lords interpreted 'occupation' broadly. In particular, it was held that there is no requirement that occupation must be inconsistent with the title offered by A. In taking this approach, the House of Lords declined to follow case law from unregistered land, including the following case, which signals a narrower definition of 'occupation'.

Caunce v Caunce
[1969] 1 WLR 286, HC

Facts: Mr Caunce was the sole legal owner of a matrimonial home, which he held on trust for himself and his wife, who had paid towards the cost of the purchase. Mr Caunce used the home as security for loans and became bankrupt. Mrs Caunce argued that the banks had constructive notice of her beneficial interest, because she was in occupation.

Stamp J

In my judgment, where the vendor or mortgagor is himself in possession and occupation of the property, the purchaser or the mortgagee is not affected with notice of the equitable interests of any other person who may be resident there, and whose presence is wholly consistent with the title offered. If you buy with vacant possession on completion and you know, or find out, that the vendor is himself in possession and occupation of the property, you are, in my judgment, by reason of your failure to make further inquiries on the premises, no more fixed with notice of the equitable interest of the vendor's wife who is living there with him than you would be affected with notice of the equitable interest of any other person who might also be resident on the premises, e.g., the vendor's father, his "Uncle Harry" or his "Aunt Matilda," any of whom, be it observed, might have contributed towards the purchase of the property. The reason is that the vendor being in possession, the presence of his wife or guest or lodger implies nothing to negative the title offered. It is otherwise if the vendor is not in occupation and you find another party whose presence demands an explanation and whose presence you ignore at your peril.

Caunce v Caunce has never been overruled. Its effect, if applied, is that where A is in occupation of the land, C is not fixed with constructive notice of property rights held by other persons in occupation whose presence is not inconsistent with A's title. In particular, this includes A's spouse.

As a matter of policy, the decision is unsatisfactory. It means that the level of protection afforded to a person's property rights is dependent on his or her relationship to A. At a broad level, it runs counter to the increasing recognition of the likelihood of co-ownership of the home. The practical effect of developing the doctrines of trust through which co-ownership may be established (discussed in Chapter 16) is weakened if due protection of those rights is denied simply on the basis of the parties' relationship. Therefore, it may be expected that, should the scope of occupation arise again in unregistered land, the court would prefer the wide approach taken in Boland and further discussed in Chapter 14.

The court considered the need for C's occupation to be ascertainable on reasonable inquiries in the following case.

Kingsnorth Finance Co Ltd v Tizard
[1986] 1 WLR 783, HC

Facts: Mr Tizard held legal title to his house on trust for himself and his wife. Following the breakdown of their marriage, Mrs Tizard had stopped living in the home, while Mr Tizard had remained there with the couple's son and daughter. Most of Mrs Tizard's clothes remained in the house, which she visited every day to care for the children. Mrs Tizard slept at the house on the frequent occasions when her husband was away. Unknown to her, Mr Tizard used the house as security for a loan, the proceeds of which he used to emigrate with their son. The facts came to light when the loan was not repaid. The court held that Mrs Tizard was in occupation. Prior to the grant of the loan, an agent (Mr Marshall) had visited the house to undertake a valuation. The inspection had taken place on a Sunday afternoon, at a time arranged by Mr Tizard, who ensured that his wife took the children out for the day. Mr Marshall saw evidence of occupation by the children, but not of Mrs Tizard. Mr Tizard told Mr Marshall that he was separated from his wife, although he had described himself as single on his application form. The issue arose of whether Kingsnorth Finance had constructive notice of Mrs Tizard's beneficial interest.

Judge John Finlay QC

I return to the submissions made by Mr. Romer and Mr. Wigmore. Mr. Romer's submission is that as Mrs. Tizard was in fact in occupation, that circumstance itself fixed the plaintiffs with notice of such rights as she had; to the contrary is the submission made by Mr. Wigmore that, in the case of unregistered land, it is only where the purchaser or mortgagee finds the claimant to an equitable interest in occupation that he has notice.

I accept Mr. Wigmore's submission but subject to a significant qualification: if the purchaser or mortgagee carries out such inspections "as ought reasonably to be made" and does not either find the claimant in occupation or find evidence of that occupation reasonably sufficient to give notice of the occupation, then I am not persuaded that the purchaser or mortgagee is in such circumstances (and in the absence, which is not the case here, of other circumstances) fixed with notice of the claimant's rights. One of the circumstances, however, is that such inspection is made "as ought reasonably to be made."

Here Mr. Marshall carried out his inspection on a Sunday afternoon at a time arranged with Mr. Tizard. If the only purpose of such an inspection were to ascertain the physical state of the property, the time at which the inspection is made and whether or not that time is one agreed in advance with the vendor or mortgagor appears to me to be immaterial. Where, however, the object of the inspection (or one of the objects) is to ascertain who is in occupation, I cannot see that an inspection at a time pre-arranged with the vendor will necessarily attain that object. Such a pre-arranged inspection may achieve no more than an inquiry of the vendor or mortgagor and his answer to it. In the case of residential property an appointment for inspection will, in most cases, be essential so far as inspection of the interior is concerned. How then is a purchaser or mortgagee to carry out such inspection "as ought reasonably to have been made" for the purpose of determining whether the possession and occupation of the property accords with the title offered? What is such an inspection "as ought reasonably to be made" must, I think, depend on all the circumstances. In the circumstances of the present case I am not satisfied that the pre-arranged inspection on a Sunday afternoon fell within the category of "such inspections which ought reasonably to have been made," the words in section 199 of the Law of Property Act 1925 which I have already read. The plaintiffs not having established that they made such an inspection, the conclusion that I have reached by another route is, in my view, fortified. It follows that the plaintiffs' claim for possession fails.

Jackson notes that Tizard takes a broad approach to determining when occupation is apparent. On her analysis, there were two routes to the finding of constructive notice: in the following extract, she refers to 'latent' and 'patent' defects in A's title. Latent defects are those ascertainable on inquiry; patent defects are those that would be disclosed on a reasonable inspection of the land.[17]

[17] Jackson, 'Title by Registration and Concealed Overriding Interests: The Cause and Effect of Antipathy to Documentary Proof' (2003) 119 LQR 660, 672–3.

Jackson, 'Title by Registration and Concealed Overriding Interests: The Cause and Effect of Antipathy to Documentary Proof' (2003) 119 LQR 660, 673–4

> There were two grounds for the decision. First, under the "latent" aspect of constructive notice he [Judge Finlay] held that inquiries would have revealed the presence of an interest that encumbered Kingsnorth's title. Secondly, under the "patent" aspect of the doctrine, it was held that Kingsnorth had not made a reasonable inspection of the land. In relation to the latter, Judge Finlay observed that sufficient evidence of occupation was required before a purchaser would be bound by an equitable co-ownership right. Under s.199, occupiers' rights are protected to the extent that their occupation is patent, i.e. apparent on a reasonable inspection. That occupation then puts a purchaser on inquiry as to the possible existence of an adverse claim. A purchaser will take free from the interest of the occupier only if the purchaser could not establish that there was insufficient evidence of occupation. [...] By definition therefore, if Mrs Tizard's minimal constructive occupation would be considered to be apparent, the apparency requirement itself imposes a high standard of inspection on purchasers.

Thompson criticizes Judge Finlay's focus on whether Kingsnorth Finance had notice of Mrs Tizard's occupation. He notes that the issue under the bona fide purchaser defence is whether the company had notice of Mrs Tizard's beneficial interest, not of her occupation. This is in contrast to the position in registered land. There, as we will see in Chapter 14, the rights of persons in occupation are protected as 'overriding interests'. Statutory regulation of this category of interest is centred on the issue of occupation as the trigger for protecting B's rights.[18]

Once it is accepted that occupation confers constructive notice, however, some focus on determining when B is in occupation appears logical and necessary. The key question for the scope of constructive notice is whether the court has struck the right balance in its interpretation of what constitutes reasonable inquiries. This is the case whether those inquiries are focused towards discovering B's rights, or B's occupation. On this crucial issue, Thompson questions Judge Finlay's suggestion (in the extract from his judgment above) that a single inspection at a prearranged time is insufficient when the object is to ascertain who is in occupation.

Thompson, 'The Purchaser as Private Detective' [1986] Conv 283, 286

> With respect, this seems to go too far. Suppose Mr. Marshall had asked where the mother of the children was and had been told either that she was dead or that she had left years ago and her present whereabouts, or even whether she was still alive, was unknown. What then is he supposed to do? Clearly, an inspection of the property should take place. If the mortgagor says this can take place at the weekend, can it really be supposed that the mortgagee's agent must insist on calling at an alternative, unannounced time to check whether the mortgagor is lying? Similarly must he insist upon rifling through drawers and cupboards, inevitably causing offence? It is submitted that such behaviour goes far beyond what are reasonable inquiries.

[18] Thompson, 'The Purchaser as Private Detective' [1986] Conv 283. Overriding interests are discussed in Chapter 14.

It is suggested that the onus on a purchaser of unregistered land is not this heavy. It is necessary that the vendor should be asked whether he shares the house with anyone else. Additionally he should be asked if he either is or was married. If the answers reveal the existence of anybody, then inquiries where possible should be made of that person. Further, an inspection of the property should be carried out. If such an inspection gives no cause to suspect adverse rights then, pace Judge Finlay, even if this inspection was performed at a time arranged with the vendor, the purchaser should be held to have done all that is required of him by section 199 of the Law of Property Act 1925. For the purchaser to insist on doing more carries the inevitable implication that he suspects the vendor of deceit. Such demands should not be considered to be within the scope of reasonable inquiries.

Ultimately, it must be recalled that the requirement is to make reasonable inquiries. What this entails must be dependent on the facts. In a case such as Tizard, in which a prearranged inspection brings to light irregularities, it may be reasonable to expect that these are followed up.

Where B is in occupation as a tenant, his or her occupation does not give C constructive notice of the rights of the landlord. Farwell J explained the position at first instance in the following case—a judgment that was upheld by the Court of Appeal[19] and remains authoritative.

Hunt v Luck
[1901] 1 Ch 45

Facts: A solicitor transferred property to the defendant as security for a mortgage. The property consisted of a number of homes let out to tenants. Prior to the transfer, the defendant had been informed by the tenants that their rent was paid to a local estate agent, but did not make further inquiries to ascertain on whose behalf the rent was collected. The plaintiff argued that the defendant had constructive notice that the property was held on her behalf.

Farwell J

At 48–9

The plaintiff's contention, therefore, is that it was the duty of the mortgagees to direct their agent (1.) to inquire of the tenants, not merely whether they claimed any and what interest in their holdings, but also who was the person to whom their rents were paid; and (2.) having ascertained to whom the rents were paid, to inquire of the recipient on whose behalf those rents were received.

Now, in my opinion on the authorities as they stand, it is not the duty of a purchaser to ask the tenants to whom they pay their rents. The fact that a tenant is in occupation is notice of his own rights, but is not notice of the rights of the persons through whom he claims.

The matter is different if the purchaser has actual notice that rent is being paid to a person whose receipt is inconsistent with the vendor's title. In such circumstances, the purchaser has constructive notice of the recipient's property rights.[20]

[19] [1902] 1 Ch 428. [20] [1901] 1 Ch 45, 51.

4.4.3 Imputed notice

This category concerns notice obtained by agents acting on C's behalf.[21] If C's agent—for example, C's solicitor—has notice of B's rights, whether actual or constructive, then the agent's notice is imputed to C.

Like constructive notice, a statutory explanation of the scope of imputed notice is provided by s 199 of the LPA 1925.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 199

(1) A purchaser shall not be prejudicially affected by notice of—

[...]

(ii) any other instrument or matter or any fact or thing unless—

(b) in the same transaction with respect to which a question of notice to the purchaser arises, it has come to the knowledge of his counsel, as such, or of his solicitor or other agent, as such, or would have come to the knowledge of his solicitor or other agent, as such, if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by the solicitor or other agent.

Tizard illustrates the operation of imputed notice. In that case, as we have seen, Mr Marshall undertook an inspection of the property. He was considered to have been acting as an agent for Kingsnorth Finance and therefore information that he obtained, that Mr Tizard was separated from his wife, was imputed to Kingsnorth Finance. It was on the basis of this imputed knowledge that Judge Finlay considered that Kingsnorth Finance should have made further inquiries.[22]

5 THE LAND CHARGES ACT 1972

A system for the registration of a limited number of interests in unregistered land was provided by the Land Charges Act 1925 (LCA 1925). The idea of registering land charges was not new, but had previously been confined to 'somewhat unusual charges which a purchaser might fail to discover in an ordinary investigation of title'.[23] The 1925 Act extended the operation of registration to 'numerous everyday transactions'.[24] That Act was replaced by the LCA 1972.

At first sight, it seems paradoxical to speak of registration in relation to unregistered land. It is important, therefore, to understand the limited scope of land charges registration and how this scheme differs from the system of registered land.

[21] For further consideration of the nature of imputed notice, see Nield, 'Imputed Notice' [2000] Conv 196.

[22] [1986] 1 WLR 783, 794.

[23] Megarry and Wade's The Law of Real Property (6th edn, ed Harpum, 2000), [5–086]. This paragraph is referred to in [8–062] of the seventh edition, but is not repeated in the text.

[24] Ibid.

The 1972 Act provides for a number of equitable interests, and one legal interest, to be recorded on a register against the name of the holder of the legal estate. Registered land, as we have seen in Chapter 7, requires the registration of legal estates in land. Each estate is given a title number, with the name of the holder of the legal estate, and the holders of certain other legal and equitable interests in the land, recorded against that title number. Hence land charges registration is a system for the registration of interests in unregistered land against the name of the holder of the legal title; registered land provides for the registration of legal estates against a unique title number.

5.1 THE SCOPE OF THE LAND CHARGES ACT 1972

The interests registrable as land charges are listed in s 2 of the LCA 1972 in six classes: Classes A–F, with Classes C and D further subdivided. The most important land charges are those contained in Classes C(i) and C(iv), D(ii) and D(iii), and F. These are discussed below. Other classes cover various statutory and equitable financial obligations connected to land, including equitable mortgages (Class C(iii)) and statutory charges securing payment of tax (Class D(i)).

Land Charges Act 1972, s 2

(1) If a charge on or obligation affecting land falls into one of the classes described in this section, it may be registered in the register of land charges as a land charge of that class.

[...]

(4) A Class C land charge is any of the following (not being a local land charge), namely—

(i) a puisne mortgage;

[...]

(iv) an estate contract;

and for this purpose—

(i) a puisne mortgage is a legal mortgage which is not protected by a deposit of documents relating to the legal estate affected;

(iv) an estate contract is a contract by an estate owner or by a person entitled at the date of the contract to have a legal estate conveyed to him to convey or create a legal estate, including a contract conferring either expressly or by statutory implication a valid option to purchase, a right of pre-emption or any other like right.

(5) A Class D land charge is any of the following (not being a local land charge), namely—

(ii) a restrictive covenant;

(iii) an equitable easement;

and for this purpose—

> (ii) a restrictive covenant is a covenant or agreement (other than a covenant or agreement between a lessor and a lessee) restrictive of the user of land and entered into on or after 1st January 1926;
> (iii) an equitable easement is an easement, right or privilege over or affecting land created or arising on or after 1st January 1926, and being merely an equitable interest.
> [. . .]
> (7) A Class F land charge is a charge affecting any land by virtue of the Part IV of the Family Law Act 1996

The Class C(i) land charge, the puisne mortgage, is notable as the only legal interest registrable as a land charge and (as has been noted above) the only exception to the general priority rule that a purchaser of unregistered land is necessarily bound by legal interests. In unregistered land, the first legal mortgagee generally holds title deeds—hence registration is aimed at second and subsequent legal mortgages.

The estate contract in Class C(iv) has a broad application. Its scope may be sufficiently broad to cover all cases in which there is a specifically enforceable contact for the creation or transfer of legal estates and interests[25] in land that would attract the application of the doctrine of anticipation discussed in Chapter 9. It includes contracts for sale of a freehold, for the creation and assignment of a lease, and contracts to create a mortgage. It also includes a contract to create an easement,[26] although an equitable easement arising from the contract could be registered as a Class D(iii) land charge.

An estate contract arises in the ordinary course of a conveyance of a legal estate in unregistered land as soon as there is a specifically enforceable contract (the requirements of which are discussed in Chapter 7). Registration may not be usual where the period of time between contract and conveyance is short. This leaves the purchaser vulnerable to loss of his or her property right, although it does not affect contractual remedies. For example, if A contracts to sell land to B and, in breach of contract, sells to C (who has offered a higher price), B's estate contract is not enforceable against C unless registered, but A remains liable for damages for breach of contract.

Class D(iii) covers only equitable easements; legal easements are governed by the general priority rule that legal rights bind all third parties who acquire rights from A. The existence of legal easements should be apparent from the title deeds if expressly created, but, as we will see in Chapter 25, legal easements may also arise through an implied grant. The existence of such easements may be no more or less apparent on an inspection of the land than equitable easements. Hence the different treatment of these is not necessarily logical. The scope of Class D(iii) has been subject to debate. In ER Ives Investment Ltd v High,[27] Lord Denning MR suggested that it included only those easements that would have been categorized as legal before the 1925 legislation and became equitable as a result of the changes introduced by those Acts. This is an artificially narrow interpretation.[28] In Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding,[29] Lord Wilberforce said that it 'should be given its plain prima facie meaning'.

[25] Although defined in the Land Charges Act 1972, s 2(4)(iv), as concerned with 'legal estates', s 17 provides for that expression to be given the same meaning as in the Law of Property Act 1925. 'Legal estates' is defined broadly in the 1925 Act, s 1(4), as 'estates, interests, and charges which under this section are authorised to subsist or to be conveyed or created at law'. See Battersby (1995), p 646.

[26] Ibid. [27] [1967] 2 QB 379. [28] Battersby (1995). [29] [1973] AC 691, 721.

Equitable easements and restrictive covenants (in Class D(ii)) are registrable only if created after the LCA 1925 came into force. The enforceability of those that pre-date the introduction of registration of land charges remains determined by the doctrine of notice. This limitation on the scope of Class D(ii) is significant, because easements and restrictive covenants constitute some of the most important and enduring third-party rights, the creation of which was already common prior to 1925.

Class F concerns statutory rights of occupation conferred on certain spouses and civil partners who do not own legal title to their home. The scope of these occupation rights is considered in Chapter 16. The need to register has been described as a 'severe restriction' on the protection afforded by these statutory rights.[30] Registration is unlikely to be undertaken through lack of knowledge or advice, or where the claimant is 'still living at home in peace with her husband'.[31] Notwithstanding, registration can be used as a potent weapon. In Wroth v Tyler,[32] the vendor's wife objected to her husband's plan to sell their house and relocate the family. She registered a Class F land charge between contract and conveyance, thus preventing her husband from completing the sale with vacant possession and leaving him liable for damages for breach of contract. On the facts, it was apparent that the consequence of such liability would be the bankruptcy of the husband and, through that, the loss of the home. Despite this, the wife refused the opportunity to cancel the land charge to enable the sale to go ahead.

5.2 THE EFFECT OF REGISTRATION AND NON-REGISTRATION

The effect of registration is given in clear and unequivocal terms in s 198 of the LPA 1925.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 198

(1) The registration of any instrument or matter [in any register kept under the Land Charges Act 1972 or any local land charges register], shall be deemed to constitute actual notice of such instrument or matter, and of the fact of such registration, to all persons and for all purposes connected with the land affected, as from the date of registration or other prescribed date and so long as the registration continues in force.

[. . .]

The effect of a failure to register is provided in s 4 of the LCA 1972. The general effect of non-registration is to provide a purchaser with a defence of lack of registration—the defence that we introduced in Chapter 12. Minor differences arise as regards when a purchaser can invoke the defence, depending on the class of registrable land charge.

[. . .]

(5) A land charge of Class B and a land charge of Class C (other than an estate contract) created or arising on or after 1st January 1926 shall be void as against a purchaser of the land

[30] Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland [1979] Ch 312, 328, per Lord Denning MR. [31] Ibid.
[32] [1974] Ch 30.

> charged with it, or of any interest in such land, unless the land charge is registered in the appropriate register before the completion of the purchase.
> (6) An estate contract and a land charge of Class D created or entered into on or after 1st January 1926 shall be void as against a purchaser for money or money's worth [or, in the case of a HM Revenue and Customs charge, a purchaser within the meaning of the Capital Transfer Tax Act 1984] of a legal estate in the land charged with it, unless the land charge is registered in the appropriate register before the completion of the purchase.

The effect of non-registration of land charges in Classes C(iv) and D therefore differs in two respects from non-registration of all other classes. Firstly, unregistered land charges in Classes C(iv) and D are void only against purchasers for money or money's worth. In the absence of a specific requirement, land charges in other classes are void for non-registration against purchasers for 'valuable consideration', within the general definition of 'purchaser' in s 17 of the 1972 Act. The practical difference between these is that marriage consideration constitutes value, but is not money or money's worth.

Secondly, unregistered land charges in Classes C(iv) and D are void only against purchasers of a legal estate. Unregistered land charges in other classes are void against purchasers of any interest in the land, which would include equitable interests.

As we will see below, there is no scope in these provisions to superimpose the doctrine of notice. Where B holds a property right that is registrable as a land charge and has not been registered, the statutory protection conferred by s 4 of the LCA 1972 provides the purchaser with a complete defence against the enforcement of B's property right.

5.3 THE MECHANICS OF REGISTRATION

The register maintained under the LCA 1972 is names-based.

Land Charges Act 1972, s 3

> (1) A land charge shall be registered in the name of the estate owner whose estate in intended to be affected.
> [...]

B registers his or her land charge against the name of the holder of the legal estate at the time of registration. The purchaser, C, searches the register against the names of all holders of the legal estate within the period of inspection necessary to establish a good root of title. The successful operation of the register is therefore dependent on B registering and C searching against the correct name. The correct name is the name of the estate owner, as disclosed by the conveyancing documents;[33] this is the name available to the purchaser when investigating title.

The need to register against the name of the holder of the legal estate gives rise to a particular difficulty on a sub-sale. In Barrett v Hilton Developments,[34] A contracted to buy land from X. Before the purchase was completed, A subcontracted to sell the land to B, who registered a Class C(iv) land charge against A's name. A subsequently acquired legal title, but sold the land to C (Figure 7).

[33] Standard Property Investment plc v British Plastics Federation (1987) 53 P & CR 25.

[34] (1975) 29 P & CR 300.

B's registration against A's name was ineffective, because A was not the holder of the legal estate at the time of the registration. The Court of Appeal acknowledged the practical difficulties for B, who may have no means of knowing that A did not hold legal title—but the Court considered that that s 3(1) of the 1972 Act was not susceptible to a construction that would validate registration against anyone other than the current holder of legal title.

The purchaser is entitled to see the title deeds only once the contract for sale has been entered, although, in practice, they may be produced beforehand. The title deeds enable the purchaser to ascertain the names against which a search of the land charges register should be carried out, and it is usual conveyancing practice to search the register in the period between contract and completion. This means that C generally investigates title only after he or she has become contractually bound to purchase the land. The vendor will, however, have contracted to give good title free from undisclosed third party interests; hence, if good title is not shown, or undisclosed interests are discovered, then contractual remedies, including rescission, would be available to the purchaser. Provisions in the contract to the contrary are void.[35]

5.4 SEARCHING THE LAND CHARGES REGISTER

A purchaser may search the land charges register personally or requisition an official search.[36] An official search carries two significant advantages. Firstly, the certificate of search is deemed conclusive.

Land Charges Act 1972, s 10

[. . .]

(4) In favour of a purchaser or an intending purchaser, as against persons interested under or in respect of matters or documents entries of which are required or allowed as aforesaid, the certificate, according to its tenor, shall be conclusive, affirmatively or negatively, as the case may be.

35 Law of Property Act 1969, s 24.

36 Land Charges Act 1972, ss 9 and 10.

Hence, a correctly registered charge that is not revealed on the certificate of an official search is unenforceable against the purchaser. In such a case, the Registrar would be liable in negligence to the holder of the land charge.[37]

The second advantage of an official search is that it confers on the purchaser, for a limited 'priority period', protection against new charges registered between the time of search and completion of the conveyance.

[. . .]

(5) Where a purchaser has obtained a certificate under section 10 above, any entry which is made in the register after the date of the certificate and before the completion of the purchase, and is not made pursuant to a priority notice entered on the register on or before the date of the certificate, shall not affect the purchaser if the purchase is completed before the expiration of the relevant number of days after the date of the certificate.

(6) The relevant number of days is—

(a) for the purposes of subsections [. . .] (5) above, fifteen; or such other number as may be prescribed; but in reckoning the relevant number of days for any of the purposes of this section any days when the registry is not open to the public shall be excluded.

Land charges registered pursuant to a 'priority notice' are excluded from the protection afforded to purchasers during the priority period. Such land charges arise where notice of intent to register has been given to the Registrar prior to the creation of the land charge.

5.5 PROBLEMS WITH A NAMES-BASED REGISTER

The system of land charges registration is undermined by two flaws: firstly, it is susceptible to human error in registration and search; secondly, there is an inherent and unavoidable risk of registered charges being hidden behind a good root of title.

5.5.1 Errors in search and registration

As we have noted, land charges should be registered and searches made under the name of the holder of the legal estate as provided on the title deeds. Like any database, variations and misspellings of names will not be recognized. An official search against the correct name provides a purchaser with a defence against interests registered under an incorrect [37] By analogy with Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp [1970] 2 QB 223. In that case, a local authority was held vicariously liable for the negligence of its clerk in issuing an incorrect local land charges search certificate.

name. In Diligent Finance Co Ltd v Alleyne,[38] Mrs Alleyne registered her statutory rights of occupation as a Class F land charge against her husband as 'Erskine Allyene'. This was not revealed when Diligent Finance, prior to the grant of a mortgage, requisitioned an official search against 'Erskine Owen Alleyne', the name used on the conveyancing documents. The official search protected Diligent Finance against Mrs Alleyne's Class F land charge. Conversely, an official search against an incorrect name would offer no protection against a properly registered land charge: the certificate of an official search is only conclusive in relation to the names searched. In rare cases, errors occur at both stages of registration and search.

Oak Co-operative Building Society v Blackburn
[1968] Ch 730, CA

Facts: Mr Blackburn granted an estate contract over his house to B. The estate contract was registered as a Class C(iv) land charge under the name 'Frank David Blackburn', Frank being the name by which Mr Blackburn was known. In fact, however, his correct name (used on the title deeds) was 'Francis David Blackburn'. Subsequently, Mr Blackburn used his house as security for a mortgage from the building society. An official search was requisitioned against the name 'Francis Davis Blackburn'; the building society's solicitor, a 'Mr Davis', apparently transposing his own name onto the search request. The certificate of official search showed a nil return and the mortgage was granted.

Russell LJ

We have come to the conclusion that the registration on this occasion ought not to be regarded as a nullity simply because the formal name of Blackburn was Francis and not Frank, and notwithstanding that Frank as a name is not merely an abbreviation or version of Francis but also a name in its own right, as are also for example Harry and Willie. We are not led to this conclusion by the fact that initials would seem to suffice for registration of a lis pendens: see Dunn v. Chapman—at least under the then legislation and rules: for presumably a request for search under a full name having the same initials should throw up all entries under those initials. We take a broader view that so far as possible the system should be made to work in favour of those who seek to make use of it in a sensible and practical way. If a proposing purchaser here had requested a search in the correct full names he would have got a clean certificate and a clear title under section 17 (3) of the Land Charges Act, 1925, and would have suffered no harm from the fact that the registration was not in such names: and a person registering who is not in a position to satisfy himself what are the correct full names runs that risk. But if there be registration in what may be fairly described as a version of the full names of the vendor, albeit not a version which is bound to be discovered on a search in the correct full names, we would not hold it a nullity against someone who does not search at all, or who (as here) searches in the wrong name.

[38] (1972) 23 P & CR 346.

Section 17 of the LCA 1925 is now replaced by the provisions for official searches in s 10 of the LCA 1972. The outcome of the case would have been the same if the building society had undertaken a personal search against the correct name. Russell LJ commented, obiter, that the courts would not protect a personal searcher 'from his folly'.[39]

It is apparent from the decisions in Oak Co-Operative Building Society v Blackburn and Diligent Finance Co Ltd v Alleyne that registration of a land charge against an incorrect version of a name is not wholly ineffective. The land charge will still be enforceable against a purchaser who does not search, who searches personally, or who requisitions an official search against an incorrect name. A defence against the enforcement of an incorrectly registered land charge is available only to a purchaser who requisitions an official search against the correct name.

5.5.2 Registered charges hidden behind good root of title

As we have noted, good root of title is established by investigating title back to the first conveyance that is at least fifteen years old. The purchaser therefore receives title deeds relating to that period, from which he or she should requisition an official search against the names of the holders of legal estates. This will not reveal land charges registered against the names of those who held legal title at an earlier time: such land charges are hidden behind the good root of title. Notwithstanding, by the force of s 198 of the LPA 1925, a purchaser has no defence against the enforcement of the land charge.

This problem was inherent in the provision for land charges to be registered against the name of the holder of the legal estate. It was bound to arise as soon as the register had subsisted for a period longer than that constituted by good root of title. The matter was investigated by the Roxburgh Committee, which conceded that the problem was insoluble.

Report of the Committee on Land Charges (Cmd 9825, 1956, [22])

> We are the inheritors of a transitory system which was bound to disclose this defect after 30 years of transition [the period of good root of title at the time of the LCA 1925] and it seems too late to disclaim our inheritance. [. . .] The only policy which we can recommend is to press on as quickly as may be with the extension of the system of compulsory registration of title.

The creation of such an inherently flawed system undoubtedly gives cause for concern.

Wade, 'Land Charges Registration Reviewed' [1956] CLJ 216, 216

> If the inventions of one generation of legislators fail to justify themselves, the next generation should be able to amend them, at any rate where the difficulties are purely technical and there are no questions of policy. But Lord Birkenhead and Sir Benjamin Cherry appear to have succeeded in creating the conveyancing equivalent of a Frankenstein's monster, which with the passing years would become not only more dangerous but also more difficult to kill.

A pragmatic solution is provided by s 25 of the LPA 1969, which provides for financial compensation for the purchaser.

[39] [1968] Ch 730, 744.

5.6 LAND CHARGES REGISTRATION AND THE DOCTRINE OF NOTICE

The statutory protection against unregistered land charges afforded to a purchaser leaves no room for the operation of the doctrine of notice. If A sells land to C, who has actual notice of B's registrable, but unregistered land charge, then B's property right is void against C as long as C meets the criteria of purchaser within s 4 of the LCA 1972. C's statutory protection confers an absolute defence against B.

This prompted the following criticism.

Wade, 'Land Charge Registration Reviewed' [1956] CLJ 216, 227

> The policy of 1925 was to abandon the equitable principle of notice in favour of a mechanical principle of registration. This was a shift from a moral to an a-moral basis. Its justification was that the doctrines of constructive and imputed notice had been over-refined "to such an extent that it had become dangerous to employ in a purchase a solicitor of good practice and reputation." But those difficulties could be avoided without the defiance of ethics which occurs when a purchaser with actual notice is allowed to disregard a third party's rights.

The matter was put to the test in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green,[40] a case that we discussed in Chapter 12, which concerned an option to purchase (a Class C(iv) land charge) granted to Geoffrey Green by his father, Walter. Geoffrey did not register his option as a land charge and, aware of this fact, Walter colluded with his wife, Evelyne, to defeat Geoffrey's option. In order to do so, Walter conveyed the land, which had a market value of £40,000, to Evelyne for £500. Despite Evelyne's actual notice of Geoffrey's option, the House of Lords held that she had a defence against its enforcement because of Geoffrey's non-registration. Against this conclusion, it was argued that Evelyne could not benefit from the statutory protection against unregistered land charges, because she was not a purchaser in good faith.

As we have noted above, the House of Lords acknowledged notice of a right precluded a purchaser from acting in good faith. But the definition of purchaser provided in the LCA 1925 (and the LCA 1972) excludes a requirement of good faith. This is in contrast to the definitions given in the other statutes in the 1925 property legislation.

Was this omission deliberate?

Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green
[1981] AC 513, HL

>
> My Lords, I recognise that the inquiring mind may put the question: why should there be an omission of the requirement of good faith in this particular context? I do not think there should be much doubt about the answer. Addition of a requirement that the purchaser should be in good faith would bring with it the necessity of inquiring into the purchaser's motives and state of mind. The present case is a good example of the difficulties which would exist. If the > position was simply that the purchaser had notice of the option, and decided nevertheless to buy the land, relying on the absence of notification, nobody could contend that she would be lacking in good faith. She would merely be taking advantage of a situation, which the law has provided, and the addition of a profit motive could not create an absence of good faith. But suppose, and this is the respondents' argument, the purchaser's motive is to defeat the option, does this make any difference? Any advantage to oneself seems necessarily to involve a disadvantage for another: to make the validity of the purchase depend upon which aspect of the transaction was prevalent in the purchaser's mind seems to create distinctions equally difficult to analyse in law as to establish in fact: avarice and malice may be distinct sins, but in human conduct they are liable to be intertwined. The problem becomes even more acute if one supposes a mixture of motives. Suppose—and this may not be far from the truth—that the purchaser's motives were in part to take the farm from Geoffrey, and in part to distribute it between Geoffrey and his brothers and sisters, but not at all to obtain any benefit for herself, is this acting in "good faith" or not? Should family feeling be denied a protection afforded to simple greed? To eliminate the necessity for inquiries of this kind may well have been part of the legislative intention. Certainly there is here no argument for departing—violently—from the wording of the Act.

In the judgment of the House of Lords, therefore, the omission of a requirement of good faith purchase was deliberate. The underlying fault lay in the failure to register Geoffrey's estate contract as a land charge. As may often be the case, the fault was that of the solicitor: Geoffrey's solicitor had already accepted liability pending the outcome of the case.[41] A separate action, for the tort of conspiracy, lay against Geoffrey's parents.[42] That action is discussed in Chapter 6, section 2.4.

Commenting on Green and, more generally, on the move away from the doctrine of notice, Megarry and Wade echo Wade's earlier criticism.[43]

Megarry and Wade's The Law of Real Property (6th edn, ed Harpum, 2000, [5–120])

> For centuries the courts had developed a policy based upon good faith and fair dealing under the doctrine of notice, the reasons for which were primarily ethical. Its refinements having grown too great for practical convenience, they were largely swept away [by the legislation in 1925 and since then] in favour of a mechanical system from which the ethical element was eliminated. Convenience was bought at the price of injustice in cases where the owners of registrable interests did not realise that they should register them (their solicitors usually making the omission) and so suffered loss. To allow the defeat of a prior interest by a later transaction is a failure on the part of the law, and a natural reluctance to enforce it has sometimes tempted judges to resist the policy of the legislation, clear-cut though it is. [...] The House of Lords [in Green] has now reasserted the stark policy of 1925, unethical and uncompromising but clear and simple, at least for those who are aware of it.

It seems open to question whether the disparity between the doctrine of notice and land charges registration is as clear-cut as these authors suggest. Lord Wilberforce's discussion of the possible mixed motives at play in Green give at least some cause for caution in classifying the outcome dictated by the land charges mechanism as amoral or unethical. It is far from apparent that Lord Wilberforce viewed the outcome to which he was led in this way.

Gray and Gray suggest that the House of Lords' decision reflects a particular view of the function of property law.[44]

Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (4th edn, 2004)

At [12.116]

[. . .] The dominant ideology of modern property law places a clear emphasis upon the simple mechanics of contract and transfer, leaving the morality of exchange largely unquestioned. On this view, the principal purpose of the law of property is to provide clarity and procedural efficiency in the combined operation of bargain and disposition. In many ways the law of property implicitly assumes a world of assertive individualism in which all are presumed to be equal, self-determining and competent to protect their own self-interest. Land transactions therefore have no particularly significant moral dimension. There is, however, another perspective according to which the ultimate business of the law of property is, quite inescapably, the administration of distributive justice. In this context there is no such thing as moral neutrality. The priorities which we allow to govern the law of property simply reflect the moral sensitivity of an entire legal culture [. . .]

At [12.296]

The decision of the House of Lords in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green is entirely consistent with the amoral approach to economic relations which infuses the market concept of property. The ruling confirmed the traditional inclination of the property lawyer to trade off justice in return for enhanced security and stability in commercial transactions. [. . .]

The simple mechanisms favoured by property law extend beyond the LCA 1972 to the operation of overreaching as a means of protecting purchasers against the enforcement of beneficial interests under a trust. However desirable the ethical underpinnings of the bona fide purchaser defence are, it is too uncertain a means of resolving the question of priorities. The common theme underlying criticisms of the decision in Green by Megarry and Wade, and Gray and Gray, is their perception of the relationship between certainty and justice. The authors do not see these as diametrically opposed, but certainty is seen as necessarily detracting from justice. The relationship between these concepts is undoubtedly complex and the extent to which the case law reflects those authors' views remains open to debate.

5.7 FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS

In Green, the House of Lords considered that Evelyn Green did not act fraudulently by seeking to rely on her statutory rights.[45] The decision leaves open the position where there is, in fact, fraud in the transaction.[46] Where a purchaser seeks to invoke a statutory defence against the enforcement of a pre-existing property right in circumstances amounting to fraud or other wrongdoing, two courses of action may be taken: firstly, the purchaser may be denied the statutory defence; or secondly, fresh obligations may arise under the general law. These fresh obligations may involve the imposition of personal liability on C towards B, or the creation of new direct rights in B's favour.

The appropriate response to fraud and other wrongdoing is of equal significance where the statutory defence concerns an unregistered land charge under the LCA 1972, or one of the defences provided in registered land by the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002). The issue is therefore discussed in Chapter 14.

5.8 CLAIMS TO ALTERNATIVE PROPERTY RIGHTS

In two notable cases, claimants whose land charges have been void against a purchaser for non-registration have sought to establish the existence of other property rights that, not being registrable, bind the purchaser as a purchaser with notice. The defence of lack of registration provides the purchaser with protection only against B's unregistered land charges; it does not protect a purchaser against two categories of rights: firstly, B's pre-existing rights that are not registrable as land charges and therefore remain governed by the doctrine of notice; secondly, new direct rights claimed by B.

As a matter of general law, where alternative claims are available, the claimant is entitled to choose the cause of action that is most favourable to him or herself. Complex questions may, however, arise as regards the relationship between the different property rights concerned.

In Lloyds Bank v Carrick,[47] B entered a specifically enforceable contract to buy a home from her brother-in-law (A). B moved into the home, but, unknown to her, A subsequently used the property as security for a loan obtained from C. B had not registered her contract as a Class C(iv) land charge and therefore it was void against C. The Court of Appeal held that the existence of the estate contract precluded B from claiming other property interests under a trust or estoppel, which may have been binding on C, as purchasers with notice, because B was in occupation. The objection to these alternative claims lay in the fact that their source and origin was the contract that was void for non-registration.

In ER Ives Investment Ltd v High,[48] A assured B of a right of way across A's land, in return for which B did not object to a trespass caused by the foundations of flats constructed by A. B did not register a land charge and A subsequently sold the land to C. Danckwerts and Winn LLJ accepted that B had an equitable easement that was registrable as a land charge and which was void for non-registration. But they held that B had also acquired rights through estoppel that were not registrable and bound C as purchasers with notice.[49]

In light of Carrick, the decision is open to the criticism that the source and origin of B's claim lay in the same facts that had generated the equitable easement. Lord Denning MR considered that B's equitable easement fell outside the classes of registrable land charge and itself bound C as purchasers with notice—but to reach this conclusion requires an artificially restrictive interpretation of the scope of registrable land charges.[50] It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the Court of Appeal in Ives v High (unlike the Court of Appeal in Carrick and the House of Lords in Green) was not prepared to accept the outcome in a hard case to uphold the policy of land charges registration. Lord Denning noted that a decision against B would perpetrate the 'grossest injustice'.[51]

6 CONCLUSION

Where A transfers unregistered land to C, or creates a mortgage in C's favour, pre-existing property rights held by B will bind C unless C has a defence against the enforcement of those rights. The key distinction is between legal and equitable rights held by B: C generally has no defence against the enforcement of legal rights held by B.

One exception to this rule arises in relation to the puisne mortgage, which is registrable as a Class C(i) land charge. C has the defence of lack of registration against the enforcement of a puisne mortgage in the following circumstances:[52]

- the mortgage has not been registered as a land charge;
- the mortgage has been registered against an incorrect name and C has requisitioned an official search against the correct name.

C has a defence against the enforcement of equitable rights held by B in the following circumstances.

- B's equitable right is registrable as a land charge and either:
  - has not been registered; or
  - has been registered against an incorrect name and C has requisitioned an official search against the correct name;[53]
- B's equitable right remains governed by the doctrine of notice and C is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Equitable rights within this category include, in particular:
  - beneficial interests under a trust—the defence of bona fide purchaser need be invoked only in relation to trusts with one trustee; where there are two or more trustees, the beneficial interests will be overreached on a sale under the mechanism discussed in Chapter 19;
  - an inchoate equity arising under a claim to proprietary estoppel;[54]
  - equitable easements and restrictive covenants created prior to 1 January 1926 and therefore falling outside the application of the LCA 1972.

50 Compare the discussion of the scope of Class C(iv) and D(iii) at section 5.1 above. The equitable easement in the case in fact appears to be registrable as a Class C(iv) or D(iii) land charge. See further Battersby (1995).

QUESTIONS

1. What do you understand by the defence of 'bona fide purchaser'? In what circumstances is this defence relevant to determining priority questions in unregistered land?
2. What difficulties arise from the use of a names-based register for the registration of land charges under the Land Charges Act 1972?
3. What do you consider to be the advantages and disadvantages of the 1972 Act as a means of determining priority questions compared with the defence of bona fide purchaser?
4. In what circumstances will the following pre-existing property rights held by C bind B, a purchaser of unregistered land?
   (a) A beneficial interest, assuming that B purchased the land from a single trustee.
   (b) A beneficial interest, assuming that B purchased the land from two trustees.
   (c) A legal mortgage.
   (d) An equitable easement created in 1930.
   (e) A restrictive covenant created in 1900.

REGISTERED LAND AND PRIORITIES

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Where A transfers land to C, priority questions arise as to whether B, who has pre-existing property rights, can enforce those rights against C. Property rights are capable of binding all third parties who acquire a right from A, therefore this issue is conceptualized as the defences question: does C have a defence against the enforcement of B's pre-existing property rights?
2. Priority rules differ between unregistered and registered land. The overreaching mechanism (discussed in Chapter 19) is the only rule that is common to both systems. This chapter considers the priority rules of registered land.
3. The Land Registration Act 2002 provides a distinct set of priority rules for one category of transaction: a registrable disposition of a registered estate for valuable consideration. This category incorporates the most common dealings with land, including an ordinary sale or mortgage.
4. In this category of transactions, C is provided with a defence against B's rights where: the disposition complies with limitations on A's owner's powers, which are entered on the register; and B's interest is not entered on the register; and B's interest is not within a category of overriding interests. These are interests that do not appear on the register, but which are, notwithstanding, enforceable against C.
5. The category of overriding interests includes property rights held by persons in actual occupation of the land at the time of the disposition. The meaning of 'occupation' for this purpose has been the subject of debate and the 2002 Act introduced a reasonable inspection qualification to the operation of this category.
6. Where the disposition to C involves fraud or other wrongdoing (but not such as to invalidate the transaction), the policy of the 2002 Act is to enable C still to invoke defences against B's property rights, but to rely on the general law to create new direct rights that are enforceable against C. This may involve C being held personally liable to B or the creation of new property rights in B's favour.

1 INTRODUCTION

In this chapter, we are concerned with how questions of priorities are answered in registered land. The priority triangle was introduced in Chapter 12 and, in Chapter 13, we considered the priority rules applied in unregistered land. It is useful, however, to recap the basic issue with which we are concerned.

Where A transfers land to C, or creates a mortgage in favour of C, the priority question asks whether C is bound by property rights held by a third party, B. This is illustrated in Figure 8.

It is important to emphasize that we are concerned with pre-existing rights held by B at the time of the transfer, and only with B's property rights. Because property rights are prima facie enforceable against all third parties who later acquire a right from A, we have conceptualized this as the defences question: on a transfer of land from A to C, does C have a defence against the enforcement of pre-existing property rights held by B?

The rules by which this question is answered differ between unregistered and registered land. The only priority rule common to both systems is overreaching. That mechanism, which is discussed in Chapter 19, enables C to take the land free from beneficial interests under a trust as long as certain conditions are fulfilled: in particular, C must pay any purchase money to two trustees or a trust corporation. If the conditions for overreaching are met, then C has a defence against the enforcement of beneficial interests held by B. As we will see in Chapter 19, B's interests are removed from the land and attach to the proceeds of sale held by the trustees (A).

2 AN OVERVIEW: PRIORITIES AND PRINCIPLES OF REGISTRATION OF TITLE

The starting point in understanding the approach of registered land to priorities is s 28 of the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002).

Land Registration Act 2002, s 28

(1) Except as provided by sections 29 and 30, the priority of an interest affecting a registered estate or charge is not affected by a disposition of the estate or charge.

(2) It makes no difference for the purposes of this section whether the interest or disposition is registered.

The starting point therefore is that the 2002 Act does not alter how questions of priority are determined under the general law. The exception contained in ss 29 and 30 is, however, highly significant. Those sections (s 29 is extracted at section 2.2 below) refer to a category of transactions that are elevated out of the general law and provided with distinct priority rules.

It is important to note at the outset that the category of transactions concerned is an important one, including within its scope the most common transactions undertaken in relation to land. Sections 29 and 30 of the LRA 2002 apply to 'registrable dispositions' of registered estates (and registered charges)[1] made for 'valuable consideration'. Registered estates are legal freehold estates and legal leases created[2] for a term of more than seven years. These are the estates that, as we have seen in Chapter 7, are registered with a unique title number. A 'registrable disposition' of a registered estate includes the transfer of a registered estate, the creation out of a registered estate of a new lease of more than seven years' duration, and the creation of a legal mortgage. The creation of a lease of seven years or less is not a registrable disposition, but it is placed in the same position as a registrable disposition for the purposes of the application of priority rules.[3]

The requirement of 'valuable consideration' excludes from this scheme of priorities transfers by gift, for nominal consideration,[4] or through adverse possession.[5] The type of transactions to which the distinct scheme of priorities contained in ss 29 and 30 of the LRA 2002 applies therefore includes the ordinary sale or mortgage of registered land.[6]

To understand how questions of priority are answered in relation to registrable dispositions, it is necessary to understand two particular aspects of the operation of the 2002 Act: firstly, the powers of disposition conferred on A; secondly, the effect of a registered disposition to C. These aspects of the operation of registered land should be understood in light of two underlying principles: the mirror principle and the curtain principle.[7] The mirror principle is the proposition that the register constitutes an accurate reflection of facts material to the title; the curtain principle provides that a curtain is drawn across the register against any trusts.[8]

2 Or with more than seven years remaining at the time of the transfer of an existing lease that triggers compulsory first registration.

3 Land Registration Act 2002, s 29(4), extracted below.

4 Valuable consideration is defined in s 132(1) of the 2002 Act.

5 The scheme of priorities for registration following a successful application based on adverse possession is provided in the 2002 Act, Sch 6, para 9.

6 The approach adopted by the 2002 Act to priorities is not intended to make major changes to the position under the Land Registration Act 1925, but to place prevailing rules on a statutory footing. A full explanation is provided in Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001), Pt V.

7 These principles are explained in Chapter 7, section 5.2.

8 Ruoff, An Englishman Looks at the Torrens System (1957) pp 7–14, extracted in Chapter 7, section 5.2.

Cooke explains the combined effect of these principles.

Cooke, The New Law of Land Registration (2003, p 53)

[...] the mirror reveals, the curtain hides. The strange thing about this mirror is that it is an active one; what it reveals has been made true, at least to some extent, by the register itself. And just as domestic mirrors are designed to assist a specific type of viewer (humanoids with heads about 1.8 metres from the floor), so is the land register: it is designed to assist purchasers. It is designed so as to fashion and display that particular facet of truth which most tends to make a purchaser secure, although what it shows is also informative and useful to others. What the register hides are things that the purchaser does not need to know, because the law of registration has ensured that they cannot affect him, although they may be of first importance to others. [...]

These principles continue to influence the development of registered land. In particular, the desire for the register to provide 'a complete and accurate reflection of the state of the title at any given time' was fundamental to the Law Commission's work[9] that led to the LRA 2002.

2.1 OWNER'S POWERS

Section 23 of the LRA 2002 confers on A, as a registered proprietor (or a person entitled to be registered as the proprietor),[10] 'owner's powers'.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 23(1) and (2)

(1) Owner's powers in relation to a registered estate consist of—

- (a) power to make a disposition of any kind permitted by the general law in relation to an interest of that description, other than a mortgage by demise or sub-demise, and
- (b) power to charge the estate at law with the payment of money.

(2) Owner's powers in relation to a registered charge consist of—

- (a) power to make a disposition of any kind permitted by the general law in relation to an interest of that description, other than a legal sub-mortgage, and
- (b) power to charge at law with the payment of money indebtedness secured by the registered charge.

Section 26 of the 2002 Act enables C to assume that A's owner's powers are free from any limitations, except those reflected by an entry on the register. It ensures that C's title is unaffected by any limitation on A's powers that do not appear on the register. The means of registering a limitation is through entry of a restriction.[11] As we will see, entry of a restriction is of particular relevance to priorities where B holds a beneficial interest under a trust.

2.2 THE EFFECT OF A REGISTERED DISPOSITION

The effect of a registered disposition is explained in s 29 of the LRA 2002.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 29

(1) If a registrable disposition of a registered estate is made for valuable consideration, completion of the disposition by registration has the effect of postponing to the interest under the disposition any interest affecting the estate immediately before the disposition whose priority is not protected at the time of registration.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), the priority of an interest is protected—

(a) in any case, if the interest—

(i) is a registered charge or the subject of a notice in the register,

(ii) falls within any of the paragraphs of Schedule 3, or

(iii) appears from the register to be excepted from the effect of registration, and

(b) in the case of a disposition of a leasehold estate, if the burden of the interest is incident to the estate.

(3) Subsection (2)(a)(ii) does not apply to an interest which has been the subject of a notice in the register at any time since the coming into force of this section.

(4) Where the grant of a leasehold estate in land out of a registered estate does not involve a registrable disposition, this section has effect as if—

(a) the grant involved such a disposition, and

(b) the disposition were registered at the time of the grant.

Section 30 makes equivalent provision to s 29 in relation to the disposition of a registered charge. Section 29(4) is notable, because it means that where C is granted a lease of seven years or less in duration (a grant that does not constitute a registrable disposition), C is, notwithstanding, able to invoke the protection afforded by s 29.

The effect of s 29 is that, on a registrable disposition, C has a defence against the enforcement of pre-existing property rights held by B except in two situations: firstly, where B's right is protected by entry on the register; secondly, where B's interest is an overriding interest within Sch 3 of the LRA 2002. The means by which B protects his or her right by entry on the register is the entry of a 'notice'.[12] The effect the operation of the defence provided by s 29 has on B's property right is not without doubt. In Halifax plc v Curry Popeck (a firm), Norris J endorsed the view advanced in argument that s 29 operates to 'destroy the subsistence of those interests as interests in land, leaving them capable of enforcement as personal rights'.[13] As such, B is confined to personal remedies that may be available against A. Whilst advocating this approach, Dixon has highlighted that s 29 is open to an alternative analysis.[14] As the section explicitly merely 'postpones' B's interest, it may remain as an interest in land and able to take priority against any rights that are not derived under the disposition to C.

[12] Ibid, ss 32–9. [13] [2008] EWHC 1692 (Ch), [49]. See generally the discussion at [48]–[53].
[14] Dixon, 'Priorities Under the Land Registration Act 2002' (2009) 125 LQR 401.

The defence afforded to C under s 29 applies 'at the time of registration'[15] against pre-existing rights held by B 'immediately before the disposition' (completion of the sale or mortgage).[16] That is the time at which C will accept A's title. C is not afforded protection against property rights arising in favour of B in the gap between disposition and registration. We have explored this 'registration gap' in Chapter 7. C's vulnerability in this period will be cured only by the introduction of e-conveyancing; a development which we have seen in Chapter 7, section 6 is currently on hold.

In relation to the two exceptions where s 29 does not confer C a defence against B's pre-existing property rights, provision for entry on the register accords with the mirror principle: it enables C to discover the material facts about the title. In contrast, the category of overriding interests provides 'a very significant impediment' to the accuracy of the register.[17] By definition, these are interests that do not appear on the register, but which are immune from the defence of lack of registration. In the report that led to the enactment of the LRA 2002, the Law Commission sought to advance the mirror principle further, both by simplifying the mechanisms available to B to protect his or her property rights, and by restricting the number of overriding interests.[18] The Law Commission expressed the expectation that the introduction of e-conveyancing[19] will further enhance the accuracy of the register.[20]

The cumulative effect of the provisions of the LRA 2002 governing owner's powers and the effect of a registered disposition can be summarized as follows. C has a defence against B's pre-existing legal rights where C has provided valuable consideration and:

- the disposition complies with any limitations on A's owner's powers entered on the register as a restriction; and
- B's interest is not protected on the register by entry of a notice; and
- B's interest is not within the category of overriding interests.

Hence, to understand the scheme of priorities provided for registrable dispositions, it is necessary to consider these three topics. Before embarking on that analysis, a specific point of interpretation that arises under s 29 must be discussed.

2.3 THE INTERPRETATION OF 'IMMEDIATELY BEFORE THE DISPOSITION'

Whether B has property rights 'immediately before the disposition' for the purposes of s 29 can be particularly difficult to ascertain where there is a sequence of transactions involving a disposition from A to C and the creation of property rights against A in favour of B. Priority rules do not allow for a 'dead heat'.[21] Conveyancing logic may suggest that B's interest arises before the disposition from A to C, but courts have shown a willingness to 'have regard to the substance, rather than the form, of the transaction or transactions which give rise to the competing interests; and in particular that conveyancing technicalities must give way to considerations of commercial and practical reality'.[22] The classic case is where A buys property using funds provided by a mortgagee C and B has equitable property rights in the property. Do B's property rights exist immediately prior to the disposition (the mortgage) from A to C? The analysis to adopt for this sequence of events was explained by the House of Lords in the following case.

[15] B will be registered as the proprietor of the estate transferred or, where B is a mortgagee, as proprietor of the charge. The creation of mortgages in registered land is discussed in Chapter 28.

Abbey National Building Society v Cann
[1991] 1 AC 56

Lord Oliver

At 89 and 92–3

It is argued, however, that because the creation of a charge on property in favour of the society necessarily posits that the chargor has acquired an interest out of which the charge can be created, there must notionally be a point of time at which the estate vested in him free from the charge and in which the estoppel affecting him could be "fed" by the acquisition of the legal estate so as to become binding on and take priority over the interest of the chargee. This is a puzzling problem upon which it is not easy to reconcile the authorities.

Of course, as a matter of legal theory, a person cannot charge a legal estate that he does not have, so that there is an attractive legal logic in the ratio in Piskor's case. Nevertheless, I cannot help feeling that it flies in the face of reality. The reality is that, in the vast majority of cases, the acquisition of the legal estate and the charge are not only precisely simultaneous but indissolubly bound together. The acquisition of the legal estate is entirely dependent upon the provision of funds which will have been provided before the conveyance can take effect and which are provided only against an agreement that the estate will be charged to secure them. [. . .] The reality is that the purchaser of land who relies upon a building society or bank loan for the completion of his purchase never in fact acquires anything but an equity of redemption, for the land is, from the very inception, charged with the amount of the loan without which it could never have been transferred at all and it was never intended that it should be otherwise.

Hence, as A receives only the legal title encumbered with the mortgage, B's equitable interest does not exist immediately prior to the disposition (the grant of the mortgage) and cannot, therefore, have priority over C. As Cann demonstrates, the analysis adopted of events has considerable practical significance. The decision in that case prevented third-party interests having any effect against a mortgagee who provides funds used to purchase the property. It would be unrealistic to see the courts' interpretation of the timing of events independently from the commercial and practical reality that appeared to dictate a result that favoured and protected mortgage lenders. The House of Lords could have reached a decision that reflected conveyancing technicality, but chose instead the result that accorded with commercial and practical reality.

More recently, the question of whether interests exist immediately prior to disposition arose in Re North East Property Buyers' Litigation.[23] As with Cann, the determination of the question carried significant practical consequences. On this occasion, the operation of sale and lease-back arrangements fell under scrutiny. These arrangements acquired some popularity as offering an apparent 'quick fix' for home-owners faced with the potential loss of their home as a result of financial difficulties in the wake of the global recession. The litigation involved nine test cases in which the question of priorities had arisen between mortgagees and occupiers of properties who had owned their homes before entering a sale and lease back agreement with North East Property Buyers (NEPB). The outcome of the case was likely to affect around 100 others involving NEPB alone plus a substantial number of other cases that did not involve NEPB.[24] Under the scheme in issue, the occupiers (B) sold their home to a nominee of NEPB (A) who funded the purchase through a mortgage. In return, NEPB promised to grant the occupiers a tenancy, so that they would be able to remain in their home.[25] The mortgagees (C) sought possession of the homes following default on the mortgages granted by NEPB's nominees to purchase the properties. In a preliminary hearing, the court was asked whether the occupiers had a property interest 'immediately before the disposition' under s 29. The sale of the property from the occupiers to NEPB's nominee and the mortgage taken out by the nominee with C (the disposition) all took place on the same day.[26] Judge Behrens considered the case to be analogous with Cann.[27] On his view, NEPB's nominees obtained legal title encumbered with the mortgage. The promise of a tenancy to the occupiers took effect against this interest held by the nominee. Therefore, the occupiers did not have a property right immediately before the disposition to C. While expressing sympathy for the occupiers, Judge Behrens was concerned that a contrary decision 'would add significantly to the obligations on the mortgagees in investigating title to have to make specific inquiries of the [occupiers]'.[28] But he acknowledged that the point was arguable.[29] Indeed, a different conclusion had been reached in a previous case, Redstone Mortgages plc v Welch & Jackson,[30] which he declined to follow.[31] There, the court considered that where A buys property from B on a sale and leaseback agreement the title received by A is encumbered by the promise to grant the lease. If A funds the purchase by the grant of a mortgage to C, then the mortgage takes affect against an already encumbered title. On this analysis B has a property right prior to the disposition to C for the purposes of s 29. Hence, C will not have a defence against B's property right if B falls within one of the two exceptions provided by that provision.

[22] Whale v Viasystems [2002] EWCA Civ 480, [72], per Jonathan Parker LJ.
[23] [2010] EWHC 2991 (Ch).

3 RESTRICTIONS ON OWNER'S POWERS

A 'restriction' is the means by which limitations on A's owner's powers are recorded on the register. A restriction may be entered by or with the consent of A, as registered proprietor

[24] Ibid, [7].

[25] NEPB had subsequently purported to grant tenancies to the occupiers, but the tenancies themselves post-dated the disposition in question. Hence, the interest the occupiers claimed to have immediately before the disposition related to the promise of a tenancy.

(or a person entitled to be registered as proprietor),[32] by B, as a person with an interest or a claim to an interest in the land,[33] or by the Registrar.[34]

The nature and scope of restrictions is explained in s 40 of the LRA 2002.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 40

(1) A restriction is an entry in the register regulating the circumstances in which a disposition of a registered estate or charge may be the subject of an entry in the register.

(2) A restriction may, in particular—

(a) prohibit the making of an entry in respect of any disposition, or a disposition of a kind specified in the restriction;

(b) prohibit the making of an entry—

(i) indefinitely,

(ii) for a period specified in the restriction, or

(iii) until the occurrence of an event so specified.

(3) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2)(b)(iii), the events which may be specified include—

(a) the giving of notice,

(b) the obtaining of consent, and

(c) the making of an order by the court or registrar.

(4) The entry of a restriction is to be made in relation to the registered estate or charge to which it relates.

In relation to priorities, the most significant use of a restriction is in relation to beneficial interests. As we have noted, on a transfer of land, the overreaching mechanism enables C to take the land free from B's beneficial interest, but only where C pays any purchase money to a minimum of two trustees or a trust corporation. Where land is held on trust, a restriction may be entered on the register to ensure that overreaching occurs on a disposition. Where there are two or more registered proprietors, the Registrar is obliged to enter a restriction to this effect.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 44(1)

If the registrar enters two or more persons in the register as the proprietor of a registered estate in land, he must also enter in the register such restrictions as rules may provide for the purpose of securing that interests which are capable of being overreached on a disposition of the estate are overreached.

32 Land Registration Act 2002, s 43(1)(a) and (b).

33 Ibid, s 43(1)(c). See further Land Registrtion Rules, r. 93 and Republic of Croatia v Republic of Serbia [2010] Ch 200.

34 Ibid, s 42.

The entry of this restriction ensures that overreaching takes place and therefore facilitates the operation of the curtain principle.

The effect of a restriction is explained in s 41 of the LRA 2002.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 41

(1) Where a restriction is entered in the register, no entry in respect of a disposition to which the restriction applies may be made in the register otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the restriction, subject to any order under subsection (2).

(2) The registrar may by order—

(a) disapply a restriction in relation to a disposition specified in the order or dispositions of a kind so specified, or

(b) provide that a restriction has effect, in relation to a disposition specified in the order or dispositions of a kind so specified, with modifications so specified.

(3) The power under subsection (2) is exercisable only on the application of a person who appears to the registrar to have a sufficient interest in the restriction.

It is important to note that the effect of a restriction is therefore confined to preventing registration of the disposition. On an ordinary sale or mortgage of registered land, where an application for registration proceeds from disposition (completion of the transfer), the restriction takes effect only at that final stage. Notwithstanding, as Cooke explains, failure to comply is disastrous for the purchaser or mortgagee.

Cooke, The New Law of Land Registration (2003, p 53)

It [a restriction] is a trip-wire to prevent the making of an entry of a disposition; it does not actually prevent the making of the disposition itself. Thus it does not prevent a transfer of a registered estate in contravention of the terms of the restriction; but the transfer could not then be registered, and so could not actually transfer the legal estate, would not—overreach anything, and would not confer any protection on the purchaser pursuant to section 29. Contravention of a restriction does not prevent a disposition but makes the disposition disastrous for the purchaser.

In essence, failure to comply therefore has a twofold effect: firstly, it prevents legal title passing to C; secondly, it removes C from the protection afforded by the overreaching mechanism[35] and from the distinct priority rules applied to registrable dispositions. C would be left with an equitable title and, under the general law, bound by all pre-existing property rights held by B.[36] Given these consequences, a purchaser would not proceed with completion without ensuring compliance with restrictions: for example, ensuring purchase money is paid to two trustees.

35 The relevance of the entry of a restriction to the operation of the overreaching mechanism is considered in Chapter 19.

36 Under the general rule for competing equitable interests that priority is determined according to the order of creation.

4 ENTRY OF A NOTICE

A notice plays a distinct role from a restriction. As we have seen, entry of a restriction tells C something about A's owner's powers: specifically, it informs C of limitations on those powers. In contrast, entry of a notice tells C about property rights claimed by B. It informs C of rights that—if, in fact, they exist—will be enforceable against him or her.

Entry of a notice in registered land must not be confused with the doctrine of notice in unregistered land. As we have seen in Chapter 13, the doctrine of notice (or the defence of bona fide purchaser) governs the enforceability of certain equitable property rights against a purchaser of unregistered land. It is concerned with the whole process of the investigation of an unregistered title. Entry of a notice in registered land is used to secure the enforcement of legal and equitable property rights against C. It relates solely to the entry of a notice on the register. Sparkes avoids terminological confusion by referring to entry of a notice in registered land as a 'Land Registry notice'.[37]

4.1 NATURE AND EFFECT

The nature and effect of a notice is provided by s 32 of the LRA 2002.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 32

(1) A notice is an entry in the register in respect of the burden of an interest affecting a registered estate or charge.

(2) The entry of a notice is to be made in relation to the registered estate or charge affected by the interest concerned.

(3) The fact that an interest is the subject of a notice does not necessarily mean that the interest is valid, but does mean that the priority of the interest, if valid, is protected for the purposes of sections 29 and 30.

Two points are notable in relation to this provision. Firstly, the description of a notice as entry of a 'burden' encapsulates the idea that the entry informs C of a third party's property right, subject to which he or she will take title to the land. This has a direct impact on the types of right in respect of which it is appropriate to enter a notice. Entry of a notice is confined to property rights that it is anticipated will bind C.[38]

Secondly, entry of a notice does not guarantee the validity of the property right claimed. This is in contrast to the effect of registration of title. Registration of A as proprietor of a legal estate operates to vest A with legal title. Entry of a notice by B to the effect (for example) that B has a restrictive covenant over A's land does not vest B with a restrictive covenant; instead, it ensures only that if B in fact has a restrictive covenant, that restrictive covenant will be enforceable against C.

Cooke suggests terminology to reflect this difference. She describes the entry of a notice as 'recording' an interest, in contradistinction to 'registration' of title.[39]

4.2 SCOPE

As has been noted above, the entry of a notice is confined to property rights held by B that are intended to bind C. The LRA 2002 does not attempt to provide an exhaustive list of property interests in respect of which entry of a notice is possible; instead, the Act defines interests that cannot be protected by the entry of a notice.

The most important of these are contained in s 33(a)–(c) of the 2002 Act.[40]

Land Registration Act 2002, s 33

No notice may be entered in the register in respect of any of the following—

(a) an interest under—
   (i) a trust of land, or
   (ii) a settlement under the Settled Land Act 1925 (c. 18),
(b) a leasehold estate in land which—
   (i) is granted for a term of years of three years or less from the date of the grant, and
   (ii) is not required to be registered,
(c) a restrictive covenant made between a lessor and lessee, so far as relating to the demised premises,

The rationale for each of these exclusions is different. Entry of a notice in respect of a trust is prohibited, because beneficial interests under a trust are not intended to bind C. The overreaching mechanism (supported by entry of a restriction) should ensure that C takes free from beneficial interests. Preventing entry of a notice in relation to a trust is therefore consistent with the curtain principle. Short leases, excluded from entry as a notice, are enforceable against C as overriding interests.[41] Leasehold covenants are excluded, because their enforcement is subject to a separate statutory scheme.[42]

With these exclusions in mind, the category of interests in respect of which notice may be entered is broad. It is an appropriate means of protection for any property right that is not specifically excluded. This includes, for example, equitable mortgages, restrictive covenants, legal and equitable easements, legal leases of more than three years (to a maximum of seven years),[43] estate contracts, rights to occupy conferred by the Family Law Act 1996 (FLA 1996),[44] and an inchoate equity arising from a claim to proprietary estoppel.

4.3 APPLICATION FOR ENTRY OF A NOTICE

As with a restriction, an application for entry of a notice may be made by the registered proprietor or a person claiming an interest in the land.[45] The Registrar may also enter a notice.[46] Notices are subdivided into 'agreed' and 'unilateral'. Each type of notice serves the same function: each ensures that B's property right binds C on a registrable disposition. A unilateral notice is entered where the registered proprietor has not given consent and the Registrar is not satisfied as to the validity of B's claim.[47] The Registrar will then notify the registered proprietor of the entry.[48] The registered proprietor may apply to have a unilateral notice cancelled.[49] The person whose interest is protected by the notice is informed of the application and given a limited timeframe in which to respond.[50] If no response is received, then the notice is cancelled.[51] If notice is received and agreement cannot be reached, the matter is referred to the adjudicator.[52] If the claim to a property right is made out, then an appropriate entry will be made.[53] A unilateral notice may also be cancelled by the beneficiary.[54]

The Registrar has the power to enter a notice in respect of a number of interests that would be enforceable against the transferee as overriding interests on first registration of title.[55] This power brings those property rights (against which C has no defence) onto the register. The Registrar has a duty to enter a notice on the estate that has the burden of an interest created by various dispositions.[56] For example, on the registration of a legal lease, the Registrar enters a notice of the lease on the freehold title out of which the lease has been created;[57] on the registration of a legal easement, the Registrar will enter a notice on the estate with the burden of the easement.[58]

5 OVERRIDING INTERESTS

As we have noted, overriding interests[59] constitutes a category of property rights that do not appear on the register, but which are immune from the defence of lack of registration. They have been described as the 'crack in the mirror' of title[60] and as making the idea of a perfect register a 'myth'.[61] The Law Commission's rationale for their continued existence is simple: the category acknowledges that there are circumstances in which it is unreasonable to expect B to register his or her property right to secure its enforcement.[62] The necessary breadth of the category in light of this rationale is more contentious. The LRA 2002 has reduced the number of overriding interests from the previous legislation. The policy adopted by the Act (as explained by the Law Commission) is that 'interests should only have overriding status where protection against buyers was needed, but where it was neither reasonable to expect nor sensible to require any entry on the register'.[63]

The 2002 Act provides two distinct lists of overriding interests: those overriding at first registration (listed in Sch 1); and those overriding on a disposition of a registered estate (listed in Sch 3). First registration is treated separately, because the intention is to reflect the state of the title at that time. Whether C is bound by any overriding interests will have been determined prior to registration.[64] Our discussion focuses on interests overriding on a disposition of a registered estate—that is, those transfers that are subject to the distinct priority rules contained in ss 29 and 30 of the LRA 2002.

The full list of these overriding interests is contained in Sch 3 of the 2002 Act. Our discussion is confined to those contained in paras 1–3 of the Schedule, short leases, property rights held by those in actual occupation, and legal easements and profits à prendre.

We begin with the most important and notorious[65] category.

5.1 PROPERTY RIGHTS HELD BY PERSONS IN OCCUPATION

Property rights held by persons in actual occupation are given the status of overriding interests in Sch 3, para 2. This category is different in its scope from all other categories. Those categories confer the status of overriding interest on a particular property right. This paragraph, instead, confers the status of overriding interest on any property right held by a person in occupation. Its focus is therefore on the factual position of the holder of the right, not the type of property right held.[66]

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 3, para 2

An interest belonging at the time of the disposition to a person in actual occupation, so far as relating to land of which he is in actual occupation, except for—

(a) an interest under a settlement under the Settled Land Act 1925 (c. 18);

(b) an interest of a person of whom inquiry was made before the disposition and who failed to disclose the right when he could reasonably have been expected to do so;

(c) an interest—

  (i) which belongs to a person whose occupation would not have been obvious on a reasonably careful inspection of the land at the time of the disposition, and

  (ii) of which the person to whom the disposition is made does not have actual knowledge at that time;

(d) a leasehold estate in land granted to take effect in possession after the end of the period of three months beginning with the date of the grant and which has not taken effect in possession at the time of the disposition.

It should be noted that occupation is the trigger for protection, but not the subject of protection. The subject of protection is B's property rights. In most cases, B's property rights will have some connection to his or her occupation, but this not necessary.[67] Further, and importantly, if B is in occupation, but is not entitled to any property rights (for example, where B is a licensee), then B has nothing capable of binding C under Sch 3, para 2. The time of disposition (completion of the sale) is key: only those property rights held by B at the time of the disposition are protected.[68] As B's occupation is the trigger for protection it is equally clear that B must be in occupation at the time of disposition.[69] We have noted, however, that under s 29, C has a defence at the time of registration against interests belonging to B at the time of disposition that are not otherwise protected. In Thompson v Foy, the juxtaposition between s 29 and Sch 3, para 2 led Lewison J to suggest that B must be in occupation at the time of registration as well as the time of disposition.[70] He suggested that if B must only be in occupation at the time of registration, then the opening phrase of Sch 3, para 2 should read 'An interest belonging to a person in actual occupation at the time of the disposition'.[71] Lewison J's comments are obiter and, he acknowledged, against the prevailing commentary.[72] The matter must be considered to remain open until either it arises for decision or is rendered otiose when, as a result of e-conveyancing, disposition and registration occur simultaneously.

[64] For further discussion, see Law Commission Report No 271 (2001), [8.3]–[8.5]; Harpum. and Bignell, Registered Land: The New Law (2002), [2.47].

Protection is confined to the geographical extent of B's occupation. This reverses the decision under the Land Registration Act 1925 (LRA 1925) in Ferrishurst Ltd v Wallcite Ltd,[73] in which a property right (an option to purchase) extending over offices and a garage was protected even though B was in occupation of the offices only.

This category of overriding interest (and its predecessor in the 1925 Act) has provided a key role in enforcing beneficial interests against purchasers and, particularly, mortgagees, where the beneficial interests have not been overreached because there has been one trustee of the trust. In the typical case, this has arisen where one partner is the sole registered proprietor of the family home but his or her spouse, or cohabitee, has acquired a beneficial interest through a resulting or constructive trust (the operation of which in the context of the home is considered in Chapter 16). The immunity from the defence of lack of registration afforded to the property rights of occupiers is considered to be consistent with the policy underlying the recognition of these and other informal rights.[74] A person who has obtained their rights informally is unlikely to seek to protect those rights by entry on the register. The provision also accords with the expectations of those in occupation.[75]

Fundamentally its object is to protect a person in actual occupation of land from having his rights lost in the welter of registration. He can stay there and do nothing. Yet he will be protected. No one can buy the land over his head and thereby take away or diminish his rights. It > is up to every purchaser before he buys to make inquiry on the premises. If he fails to do so, it is at his own risk. He must take subject to whatever rights the occupier may have.

68 Contrast the position under the Land Registration Act 1925. In Abbey National Building Society v Cann [1991] 1 AC 56, the House of Lords held that C's interests at the time of registration were protected as long as C was in occupation at the time of the disposition.

69 In this respect, the LRA 2002 is consistent with the date of occupation required under the LRA 1925 identified in Abbey National v Cann ibid.

Prior to the LRA 2002, the property rights of occupiers were protected as overriding interests in s 70(1)(g) of the LRA 1925. Decisions made under that legislation remain of interest, although caution must be exercised, because the current provision has made substantive differences to the scope of the provision.

5.1.1 Actual occupation

The requirement of actual occupation was contained in s 70(1)(g) of the 1925 Act. The general principles developed in case law under that earlier provision remain authoritative.[76]—but this is subject to the qualification (considered below) that Sch 3, para 2, has introduced a defence based on reasonable inspection.

Hayton identified two approaches to the interpretation of actual occupation.

Hayton, Registered Land (3rd edn, 1981, p 87)

> On the absolutist view [...] a person is absolutely bound by the rights of every person in actual occupation of the land [...] It matters not that it is unreasonably difficult to ascertain the actual occupier [...]; it matters not that it is unreasonable to expect someone to discover certain unusual rights of the occupier [...] Any traditional doctrine of notice is excluded from the self-contained paragraph.
> The constitutionalist view of those accustomed to traditional conveyancing is that a person is only bound by the rights of every person in actual occupation [...] so far as such rights are binding according to traditional conveyancing principles (concerned with legal interests, equitable interests and the doctrine of notice, express, constructive and imputed) except as expressly limited or extended by statute.

In the following case, the House of Lords signalled the adoption of the absolutist approach.

Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland
[1981] AC 487, HL

Facts: Mr Boland was the sole registered proprietor of the home in which he lived together with his wife. He used the home as security for a loan from the bank and subsequently defaulted on the payments. Mrs Boland, in fact, had a beneficial interest in the home as a result of contributions that she had made to its purchase. She argued that, because she was in occupation of the home, her interest bound the bank as an overriding interest. The first question that arose was whether she was in actual occupation. (The case was a consolidated action arising from claims by the bank against Mrs Boland and, in the other case, a Mrs Brown.)

Lord Wilberforce

Were the wives here in "actual occupation"? These words are ordinary words of plain English, and should, in my opinion, be interpreted as such. [. . .]

Then, were the wives in actual occupation? I ask: why not? There was physical presence, with all the rights that occupiers have, including the right to exclude all others except those having similar rights. The house was a matrimonial home, intended to be occupied, and in fact occupied by both spouses, both of whom have an interest in it: it would require some special doctrine of law to avoid the result that each is in occupation. Three arguments were used for a contrary conclusion. First, it was said that if the vendor (I use this word to include a mortgagor) is in occupation, that is enough to prevent the application of the paragraph. This seems to be a proposition of general application, not limited to the case of husbands, and no doubt, if correct, would be very convenient for purchasers and intending mortgagees. But the presence of the vendor, with occupation, does not exclude the possibility of occupation of others. There are observations which suggest the contrary in the unregistered land case of Caunce v. Caunce [1969] 1 W.L.R. 286, but I agree with the disapproval of these, and with the assertion of the proposition I have just stated by Russell L.J. in Hodgson v. Marks [1971] Ch. 892, 934. Then it was suggested that the wife's occupation was nothing but the shadow of the husband's—a version I suppose of the doctrine of unity of husband and wife. This expression and the argument flowing from it was used by Templeman J. in Bird v. Syme-Thomson [1979] 1 W.L.R. 440, 444, a decision preceding and which he followed in the present case. The argument was also inherent in the judgment in Caunce v. Caunce [1969] 1 W.L.R. 286 which influenced the decisions of Templeman J. It somewhat faded from the arguments in the present case and appears to me to be heavily obsolete. The appellant's main and final position became in the end this: that, to come within the paragraph, the occupation in question must be apparently inconsistent with the title of the vendor. This, it was suggested, would exclude the wife of a husband-vendor because her apparent occupation would be satisfactorily accounted for by his. But, apart from the rewriting of the paragraph which this would involve, the suggestion is unacceptable. Consistency, or inconsistency, involves the absence, or presence, of an independent right to occupy, though I must observe that "inconsistency" in this context is an inappropriate word. But how can either quality be predicated of a wife, simply qua wife? A wife may, and everyone knows this, have rights of her own, particularly, many wives have a share in a matrimonial home. How can it be said that the presence of a wife in the house, as occupier, is consistent or inconsistent with the husband's rights until one knows what rights she has? and if she has rights, why, just because she is a wife (or in the converse case, just because an occupier is the husband), should these rights be denied protection under the paragraph? If one looks beyond the case or husband and wife, the difficulty of all these arguments stands out if one considers the case of a man living with a mistress, or of a man and a woman—or for that matter two persons of the same sex—living in a house in separate or partially shared rooms. Are these cases of apparently consistent occupation, so that the rights of the other person (other than the vendor) can be disregarded? The only solution which is consistent with the Act (section 70 (1) (g)) and with common sense is to read the paragraph for what it says. Occupation, existing as a fact, may protect rights if the person in occupation has rights. On this part of the case I have no difficulty in concluding that a spouse, living in a house, has an actual occupation capable of conferring protection, as an overriding interest, upon rights of that spouse.

The House of Lords held that Mrs Boland's beneficial interest was therefore enforceable against the bank as an overriding interest. The decision was controversial at the time, because it brought to light the previously unanticipated vulnerability of purchasers and mortgagees to beneficial interests being enforceable as overriding interests.

The adoption of the absolutist approach to defining occupation was only one step in the decision that led to the enforcement of Mrs Boland's interest. While other aspects of the case have provided the focus of much subsequent discussion,[77] the approach to occupation was significant.

Tee, 'The Rights of Every Person in Actual Occupation: An Enquiry into Section 70(1)(g) of the Land Registration Act 1925' (1998) 57 CLJ 328, 345

> The Boland judgments were uncompromising, and suggested that it would no longer be necessary or relevant to consider concepts of notice when assessing occupation [...]. However, such a radical departure from previously held assumptions is not generally successfully achieved by one case alone, even if that case emanates from the House of Lords.

Despite the decision in Boland, the constitutionalist view of occupation garnered support at Court of Appeal level.

Lloyds Bank plc v Rosset
[1989] Ch 350, CA

Facts: Mr Rosset was the sole registered proprietor of a semi-derelict house that he and his wife were renovating and into which they were to move as their home. Builders were undertaking work on the house and Mrs Rosset was there almost daily, assisting in the decorating. Mr Rosset mortgaged the house and defaulted on the repayments. Mrs Rosset argued that she had a beneficial interest in the house that was enforceable against the bank as an overriding interest. In the Court of Appeal, Mrs Rosset's claim to a beneficial interest under a constructive trust was successful. The Court therefore considered whether she was in actual occupation.

Purchas LJ

At 403–4

> The application of the words "in actual occupation" in section 70(1)(g) is the aspect of this appeal that has given me the most concern. The provisions of the section clearly were intended to import into the law relating to registered land the equitable concept of constructive notice. Thus, a purchaser or a chargee acquiring the title to or an interest in the land where the vendor was not in actual possession in order to protect his interest had to make appropriate inquiries if he found someone else in occupation of the property. [...]
> In order for the wife's interest in the property to qualify as an overriding interest under section 70(1)(g) two things must be established: (a) was she in actual occupation? and (b) would appropriate inquiries made by the bank have elicited the fact of her interest?

[77] In particular, the relationship between overreaching and overriding interests (discussed in Chapter 19), and the treatment of a beneficial interest under a trust for sale as an interest in land, contrary to the doctrine of conversion (discussed in Chapter 17, section 5.3).

The majority of the Court of Appeal held that Mrs Rosset was in occupation and had a beneficial interest enforceable against the bank. The case went on appeal to the House of Lords, where it was held that Mrs Rosset did not, in fact, have a beneficial interest.[78] She therefore did not have any property right capable of protection as an overriding interest and the issue of occupation did not arise for decision.

The difference between the absolutist and constitutionalist approach is of practical significance in marginal cases of occupation. The danger of the Boland approach is that it appeared to leave purchasers and mortgagees vulnerable to beneficial interests claimed by those whose occupation was not discoverable.

Sparkes suggested that the approaches to occupation in Boland and Rosset may have separate fields of application.

Sparkes, 'The Discoverability of Occupiers of Registered Land' [1989] Conv 342, 346–7

> It remains to be seen how this notice-orientated test to the finding of actual occupation [in Rosset] is to be reconciled with the plain English test proposed by Lord Wilberforce in Boland. Lord Wilberforce was concerned with a person who clearly was in physical occupation albeit sharing with the mortgagor, and not a person whose occupation was marginal. It is tentatively submitted that his dictum should not be viewed as having binding force in these different circumstances.
> The classic illustration of marginal occupation is undiscoverable occupation. The denial by Lord Wilberforce in Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd. v. Boland of a link between overriding interests and notice occurred in a case in which occupation was obvious. It was left to academics to formulate hypothetical cases in which the issue would precisely arise for decision. Situations which five years ago had seemed fanciful products of the need for academic novelty have now emerged from the examination room to become the concern of practising conveyancers and the courts. A choice between absolutism or constitutionalism is likely to form the ratio of a decision very shortly, probably in relation to undiscoverable occupiers.

No such decision was forthcoming at the time of the LRA 2002. That Act has introduced, in Sch 3, para 2(c)(i) (extracted above), a qualification to the scope of protection afforded to occupiers based on reasonable inspection.

5.1.2 The reasonable inspection qualification

Schedule 3, para 2(c)(i), of the LRA 2002 protects C against overriding interests claimed by B, by virtue of actual occupation, where two conditions are met: firstly, that B's occupation is not obvious on a reasonably careful inspection; secondly, that C did not actually know of the existence of B's property right at the time of the disposition.

This provision steers a careful course between Boland and Rosset, and between the absolutist and constitutionalist views. The absolutist view is rejected, in so far as the rights of those in occupation do not necessarily bind a purchaser or mortgagee. But in mapping the scope of the exception, the Law Commission disavows the relevance of concepts derived from the doctrine of notice.

[78] This aspect of the case is considered in Chapter 16.

Law Commission Report No 254, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Consultative Document (1998, [5.71]–[5.72])

> [. . .] Any requirement that [occupation should have to be apparent] it was said, would introduce into land registration the doctrine of notice. [. . .] While we entirely agree that the doctrine of notice should not be introduced into registered land, we do not agree that limiting actual occupation to cases where it is apparent would have that effect.
> [. . .] The test is whether the right is apparent on a reasonable inspection of the land, not whether the right would have been discovered if the purchaser had made all the enquiries which ought reasonably to have been made.

While it is no doubt anticipated that an actual inspection will take place, in Thompson v Foy Lewison J noted that the paragraph 'does not require an actual inspection'.[79] Where C conducts a reasonable inspection and this does not reveal B's occupation, it may be expected that the inspection will be considered conclusive in terms of the operation of the qualification in Sch 3, para 2(c)(i) on B's ability to claim an overriding interest. Where C does not inspect, or C's inspection falls short of being reasonable, then the court may address the qualification by asking a hypothetical question, 'whether [B's] occupation would have been obvious on a reasonably careful inspection'.[80] If not, then C's failure to inspect will not deprive C of invoking the qualification in Sch 3, para 2(c)(i). Jackson argues that the reasonable inspection qualification is misconceived.

Jackson, 'Title by Registration and Concealed Overriding Interests: The Cause and Effect of Antipathy to Documentary Proof' (2003) 119 LQR 660, 665–7

> Contrary to the reasoning of the Law Commission, it is submitted that a reasonable inspection defence will not limit the impact of occupational overriding interests upon the purchaser's registered estate. There are two arguments that support this view. First, there are other important observations that may be drawn from the differences in method of proof of title. A reasonable inspection requirement has no normative content. [. . .] the resurrection of the reasonable inspection defence provides no meaningful guidance to purchasers as to the fact or extent of the inspection required of them. In effect, such a defence will not preclude the concealed overriding interest. Although the Law Commission indicates the type of conduct that may amount to "actual occupation", in order to discover an adverse occupational right, a purchaser would require a type of knowledge that was neither based in law nor in fact. The normative guidance of the 2002 Act emphasises the conclusiveness of the register and online inspections. Thus, a purchaser may end up by being bound by an interest that was objectively apparent to the legally minded officious bystander but which was undiscoverable to the purchaser if only because he did not know what he was looking for.
> Secondly, there is an implied premise behind the methodology employed by the 2002 Act to reduce the circumstances in which occupational interests will take effect as overriding the estate of a registered proprietor. This premise is the connection of ideas that a purchaser, under s.70(1)(g), risked taking his title subject to a concealed overriding interest because there was no reasonable inspection defence. This is a logically flawed connection. The Law Commission assumes that the absence of an apparency requirement within [79] Thompson v Foy [2010] 1 P&CR 16, [132].

[80] Ibid, per Lewison J.

s.70(1) (g) resulted in the extension of overriding protection to the interests of undiscoverable occupants. It is undeniable that some constructions of the paragraph impose onerous duties of inspection on purchasers. However, these duties resulted from wide interpretations of the type of occupation that could be considered to be apparent and were not the consequence of the absence of such a requirement. This mistaken orthodoxy exists in both registered and unregistered conveyancing.

The underlying issue in debate as to the correct scope of protection afforded to occupiers lies in the tension between the desire for a conclusive register and the acknowledgment that there are circumstances in which a requirement of registration would be unreasonable. As Jackson explains, the reasonable inspection qualification does not make the register any more conclusive.[81]

5.1.3 Assessing occupation

In Link Lending v Bustard, Mummery LJ noted, '[t]he trend of the cases shows that the courts are reluctant to lay down, or even suggest, a single test for determining whether a person is in actual occupation'.[82] In assessing whether B is in actual occupation, the courts have taken into account not only physical evidence of B's occupation but also—and increasingly—B's intentions; particularly where the physical evidence is equivocal. Taking into account B's intent as well as their physical acts has resonance with how 'possession' is understood—for example, in a claim to adverse possession discussed in Chapter 8. The analogy is not, however, a perfect one: occupation and possession are not synonyms. Notwithstanding, reference to B's intent is problematic in this context as it is not something that C can discover through an inspection of the land.

In Abbey National Building Society v Cann, Lord Oliver considered that occupation requires 'some degree of permanence and continuity which would rule out mere fleeting presence'.[83] Hence, on the facts of that case preparatory acts of moving furniture into a home minutes before completion of the sale took place were not considered to establish occupation at the required time of disposition. In Lloyds Bank v Rosset,[84] the Court of Appeal acknowledged that occupation should be assessed by reference to the state of the property. Mrs Rosset's daily visits were sufficient to show occupation of a semi-derelict house. Rosset was applied in Thomas v Clydesdale Bank where, on a preliminary application, the court considered there was an arguable case that Ms Thomas' occupation was established by her almost daily presence while the property was being renovated. There, Ramsey J also noted 'the intention and wishes' of Ms Thomas and her partner that they would both reside in the property once the renovations were complete.[85]

The need for permanence and continuity does not create difficulties where B is temporarily absent. In Chhokar v Chhokar,[86] a wife in hospital to have a baby was considered to remain in actual occupation of the home despite her physical absence. Her possessions evidenced her occupation. However, longer absences present a greater challenge for demonstrating that occupation has been maintained. In Stockholm Finance Ltd v Garden Holdings Inc the court was asked whether a Saudi princess had remained in actual occupation of her London home, in which she had not 'set foot' for a year. Robert Walker J (as he then was) answered in the negative:[87]

> Whether a person's intermittent presence at a house which is fully furnished, and ready for almost immediate use, should be seen as continuous occupation marked (but not interrupted) by occasional absences, or whether it should be seen as a pattern of alternating periods of presence and absence, is a matter of perception which defies deep analysis. Not only the length of any absence, but also the reason for it, may be material (a holiday or a business trip may be easier to reconcile with continuing and unbroken occupation than a move to a second home, even though the duration is the same in each case). But there must come a point at which a person's absence from his house is so prolonged that the notion of his continuing to be in actual occupation of it becomes insupportable; and in my judgment that point must have been reached in this case, long before Mr Dawkins visited the house on 4 January 1990 (and still more so, long before 20 February 1990). By then Princess Madawi had not set foot in the property for over a year: she had for over a year been living with her mother in the Islamic household at Riyadh.

A different conclusion was reached in the following case which also involved a long absence.

Link Lending v Bustard
[2010] EWCA Civ 423

Facts: Ms Bustard had been the sole registered proprietor of her home. She suffered from severe mental illness which was compounded by alcohol abuse. She was swindled into transferring the property to Mrs Hussein who then used the property as security for a loan from Link Lending. Ms Bustard had an equity to set aside the transaction against Mrs Hussein based on her lack of capacity. The question arose whether Ms Bustard was in actual occupation of the property so that the equity was also binding against Link Lending. At the date of the disposition, Ms Bustard had been absent from the property for over a year having been sectioned under the Mental Health Act and admitted to hospital. Her furniture and personal possessions remained at the property and she made brief but regular supervised visits. She had continued to discharge the outgoings and always intended to return home. The judge at first instance had held that Ms Bustard had remained in actual occupation; a finding from which Link Lending appealed.

> Whether Ms Bustard was in "actual occupation" of the Property at the relevant date was an issue on which the trial judge had to make an evaluation based on his findings of primary fact. As for the law he considered the relevant authorities on the concept of a "person in actual occupation" of land in the earlier Land Registration legislation and now found in the 2002 Act. The construction of the earlier equivalent provisions by the House of Lords is binding on this court. The trend of the cases shows that the courts are reluctant to lay down, or even suggest, a single legal test for determining whether a person is in actual occupation.

The decisions on statutory construction identify the factors that have to be weighed by the judge on this issue. The degree of permanence and continuity of presence of the person concerned, the intentions and wishes of that person, the length of absence from the property and the reason for it and the nature of the property and personal circumstances of the person are among the relevant factors.

The assistance given in the authorities is in clarifying the legal principles, exploring the range of decisions available to the court and identifying the factors to which weight should be given. It is clear from the citations that Ms Bustard's is not a case of a "mere fleeting presence", or a case, like Cann, of acts preparatory to the assumption of actual occupation. It is also distinguishable from Stockholm, which involved the domestic living arrangements of a Saudi princess living with her mother in Saudi Arabia and owning a house in London, where there was furniture and clothing and caretaking arrangements in place, but where she had not lived for more than a year. In this case the new and special feature is in the psychiatric problems of the person claiming actual occupation. The judge was, in my view, justified in ruling, at the conclusion of a careful and detailed judgment, that Ms Bustard was a person in actual occupation of the Property. His conclusion was supported by evidence of a sufficient degree of continuity and permanence of occupation, of involuntary residence elsewhere, which was satisfactorily explained by objective reasons, and of a persistent intention to return home when possible, as manifested by her regular visits to the Property.

In the following extract, Bogusz considers the approach of the courts to assessing actual occupation as well as other aspects of Sch 3, para 2. She puts the approach in the context of the balancing act the courts must undertake in priority disputes between purchasers and those with pre-existing property rights.

Bogusz 'Defining the Scope of Actual Occupation under the Land Registration Act 2002: Some Recent Judicial Clarification' [2011] Conv 268, pp.274–5

Frustrating as it may seem for lawyers, the lack of a "single legal test" provides for a degree of much needed flexibility and latitude for the judicial interpretation of not only "actual occupation" but also of reasonable disclosure and a "reasonably careful inspection".

By their nature these terms provide the judiciary with the necessary tools to consider the relevant facts and circumstances to determine an outcome of a case. This leads to a number of consequences. First, the judicial use of a reflexive factual and contextual analysis serves as a potential antidote to alleviate the harshness of the rule where the actual occupier's undiscoverable rights are not protected. Secondly, this flexibility acts as a means of redressing the policy bias towards the protection of disponee from undiscoverable rights.

The policy bias which is clearly evident in the Law Commission's Reports Nos 271 and 254, is partly a symptom of what Dixon suggests is:

> "[...] something in the psyche of property lawyers that rebels against a purchaser being bound by rights whose existence they could not possibly discover".

This is possibly due to a perception that out of all the stakeholders the disponee is the most vulnerable and has more to lose in the transaction. That is not say the actual occupier is not vulnerable at all, there are a plethora of cases which would illustrate their vulnerability, however, their protection under LRA 2002 is based upon automatic protection unless the exceptions apply, thereby potentially losing their protected status. In this context of potential winners and losers, the judiciary are tasked with balancing the competing interests. The policy bias embedded in the Law Commission's reports can be justified on the basis that if the aim of making electronic conveyancing is to become a reality "so that it is possible to investigate title to land online, with the absolute minimum of additional enquiries and inspections", this may only be feasible in practice if there are limitations placed on the creation of overriding interests. This is not a perfect solution, but the policy underpinning the statute indicates an attempt to strike an appropriate balance between the competing interests of multiple stakeholders in the transaction.

Thirdly, the degree of flexibility afforded to the judiciary in their interpretation of actual occupation enables the court to endeavour to find a solution which reflects more accurately the state of affairs in the case. In this regard, this is evident from the facts of Link Lending where the case involved a vulnerable person who had an undiscovered right. The right was undiscovered as a consequence of an imprecise form of "inspection" used by the disponee and not because the right was deliberately hidden.

5.1.4 Occupation by proxy

In Lloyds Bank plc v Rosset,[88] the Court of Appeal accepted that builders were in actual occupation on behalf of Mrs Rosset. Nicholls LJ suggested that whether occupation by an employee or agent sufficed depended on the 'function which the employee or agent is discharging'. The difficulty with this test is that it shifts focus away from the nature of the occupation: B's resident housekeeper occupies on B's behalf, while B's licensee does not,[89] although the evidence of occupation in each case may be indistinguishable. In Lloyd v Dugdale,[90] Mr Dugdale used business premises in his capacity as managing director of a company in which he was also the majority shareholder. He was considered to be in occupation solely on behalf of the company and therefore a property right that he acquired in his personal capacity was not binding as an overriding interest when the premises were sold. But that case raises a separate issue, because courts do not generally look behind the corporate veil

It is unclear what impact the reasonable inspection qualification may have on cases involving occupation by proxy. Is it necessary to consider, in each case, whether occupation by B is reasonably obvious on an inspection of the land that reveals the physical presence of an agent or employee, or is it sufficient that the presence of the agent or employee is reasonably obvious? The former interpretation may produce a result analogous to that suggested by Rosset, while the latter has the advantage of focusing solely on the nature of the occupation. Thomas v Clydesdale Bank plc may suggest that the latter is sufficient,[91] but the case concerned a preliminary application and the specific interpretation of the reasonable inspection qualification in the context of proxies is not considered.

5.1.5 Occupation by children

In Boland, in the passage of his judgment extracted above, Lord Wilberforce rejected the shadow doctrine as a means of denying Mrs Boland's occupation. The doctrine has its origins in unregistered land, but had been applied in registered land to deny a claim to an overriding interest by a spouse. Its effect can be shortly stated.

In my judgment, when a mortgagor is in actual occupation of the matrimonial home, it cannot be said that his wife also is in actual occupation. I hasten to add that, equally, if the mortgagor is the wife and the house is occupied as the matrimonial home, then it is the wife who is in actual occupation and not the husband.

A spouse in occupation with a sole legal owner was therefore not considered to occupy in his or her own right, but merely as the shadow of the owner.

Despite its rejection in Boland in relation to a spouse, the shadow doctrine was applied in relation to minor children in Hypo Mortgage Services Ltd v Robinson.[92] Nourse LJ considered it 'axiomatic' that such children are not in actual occupation for the purposes of statutory provisions governing overriding interests, but are present 'as shadows of occupation of their parent'.[93] Nourse LJ justified the application of the doctrine by difficulties of making inquiries of children. It has been argued that other means of circumventing this difficulty are available.[94] Ultimately, however, the likelihood of children having property rights is arguably too slim to justify changes in conveyancing practice.

5.1.6 The relevance of inquiry

Non-disclosure by B of his or her property rights prevents reliance on Sch 3, para 2 of the LRA 2002. The need for inquiries to be made directly of B replicates the position under the LRA 1925.[95] Hence, the provision has no application where inquiries have not in fact been made of B, regardless of whether such inquiries would have revealed the existence of B's interest.[96] But the 2002 Act introduced a new limitation to the exception: where inquiries are made, B is only denied protection if disclosure could reasonably have been expected. The practical impact of this limitation is yet to become apparent. As we have noted, protecting the rights of occupiers as overriding interests is considered consistent with the policy underlying the recognition of informal rights. These rights are particularly significant in the context of the home, and often arise on the basis of the parties' intention and conduct during the course of their relationship. B may be unaware of the existence of a claim until the relationship is subjected to legal analysis at a time of crisis—including a priority dispute with C. If B does not know that he or she has a property right, then will non-disclosure prevent reliance on Sch 3, para 2?

The answer is not apparent on the face of the provision. On the one hand, by making inquiries, C has done all that the provision requires and B should be estopped[97] from asserting an undisclosed claim; on the other hand, it is inherent in the provision that making inquiries will not necessarily protect C against B's property rights.

95 Hodgson v Marks [1971] Ch 892.
96 Thompson v Foy [2010] 1 P&CR 16, [132].
97 This is the basis on which then operation of the provision is explained in Law Commission Report No 271 (2001), [8.60].

Dixon suggests that, in some circumstances, ignorance may excuse non-disclosure, but acknowledges that the criterion is a source of uncertainty.

Dixon, 'The Reform of Property Law and the Land Registration Act 2002: A Risk Assessment' [2003] Conv 136, 146–7

> Thus, the right holder loses overriding status (after failure to disclose) only if disclosure could reasonably be expected to be made. Such disclosure might not be reasonably expected where, say, the right holder did not know, and could not reasonably be expected to know, that they actually had a right (e.g. in cases of uncrystallised estoppel). While this is a welcome reform, there are uncertainties. For example, is it "reasonable" to expect disclosure when the right holder knows that the consequences of disclosure will be the loss of the family home because the purchaser will take steps to acquire the property free from the right? Presumably it is, because otherwise it will always be permitted to withhold disclosure if that would result in the loss of a property right and that would defeat the point of the provision. However, the circumstances in which a person may be asked about their rights are many and varied, and the introduction of a reasonableness criterion must introduce uncertainty that can only be settled by litigation.

There is some cause to question whether the provision was actually intended by the Law Commission. The Law Commission did not describe the effect of inquiries as limited to B's reasonable disclosure, but instead referred to limiting C's obligation to that of making reasonable inquiries.[98] The Law Commission may have intended the latter,[99] but the former has been enacted. A limitation based on reasonable disclosure by B is substantively different from one based on reasonable inquiries by C.

5.2 SHORT LEASES

With some exceptions,[100] legal leases created for seven years or less are overriding interests within Sch 3, para 1, of the LRA 2002. This provision therefore covers legal leases that fall below the duration at which a lease becomes a registered estate. The combined effect of this paragraph and s 33 of the Act (concerned with entry of a notice) is to give a dual means of protection to legal leases of more than three years, but not greater than seven years. These leases may be protected by entry of a notice and are overriding interests in the absence of such an entry. Legal leases of three years' duration or less are protected only as overriding interests. Equitable leases fall outside the scope of Sch 3, para 1 (which is confined to 'leases granted'). An equitable lease that is not protected by entry of notice may be an overriding interest under Sch 3, para 2, where the tenant is in actual occupation.

[98] Law Commission No 254 (1998), [5.69]; Law Commission No 271 (2001), [8.60]. The latter is equivocal. The paragraph is headed 'Rights not disclosed on reasonable inquiry', although the text refers to a failure to disclose a right 'when [C] could reasonably have been expected to do so'. The wording of the provision is unchanged to that contained in the Bill annexed to the report.

[99] The Law Commission did not intend to change the law, but to reflect an assumption underlying the requirement of inquiries in the Land Registration Act 1925: Law Commission No 254 (1998), [5.69]. A requirement of reasonable inquiries is consistent with this intent.

[100] Listed in the 2002 Act, Sch 3, para 1(a) and (b).

5.3 EASEMENTS AND PROFITS À PRENDRE

Legal easements and profits are overriding interests under Sch 3, para 3, of the LRA 2002.

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 3, para 3

(1) A legal easement or profit a prendre, except for an easement, or a profit a prendre which is not registered under the Commons Registration Act 1965 (c. 64), which at the time of the disposition—

(a) is not within the actual knowledge of the person to whom the disposition is made, and

(b) would not have been obvious on a reasonably careful inspection of the land over which the easement or profit is exercisable.

(2) The exception in sub-paragraph (1) does not apply if the person entitled to the easement or profit proves that it has been exercised in the period of one year ending with the day of the disposition.

The scope of this paragraph needs to be understood in light of the general treatment of easements within the 2002 Act. The express grant of a legal easement is a registered disposition and such easements necessarily appear on the register.[101] Paragraph 3 is therefore directed at legal easements that arise from an implied grant.[102] The limitation of the provision to legal easements is significant: the equivalent provision in the LRA 1925 had controversially been interpreted as including some equitable easements.[103] Equitable easements will now bind B only if protected by entry on the register.

The scope of the paragraph appears abstruse, but, unpackaged, it provides as follows: a legal easement arising from an implied grant is overriding if C has actual knowledge of its existence, or it is obvious on a reasonably careful inspection of the land, or it has been exercised in the year preceding the disposition. The latter is designed to ensure the protection of practically important, but 'invisible', easements, including drainage in an underground pipe.[104]

The provision has been tightly drawn and is intended to dovetail with inquiries made by C. The underlying goal is that C should become aware of binding easements prior to completion of the disposition.

Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001, [8.71])

What we wish to encourage is the creation of a straightforward system of standard inquiries as to easements and profits which will prompt sellers to disclose what they can reasonably be expected to know. This in turn will ensure that such rights are then registered. We anticipate that, prior to contract, a seller would be expected to disclose any unregistered easements or profits affecting his or her property of which he or she was aware, at least to the extent that they were not obvious on a reasonably careful inspection of the land. In particular, he or she would be asked to disclose any easements or profits that had been exercised in the year preceding the inquiry. The result of such inquiries is likely to be that the buyer will have actual knowledge of any unregistered legal easements and profits long before the transaction is completed.

6 INVESTIGATION OF REGISTERED TITLE AND SEARCH OF THE REGISTER

The investigation of title to registered land, like its unregistered counterpart, requires both a search of the register and a physical inspection of the land. Physical inspection is directed at discovering the existence of overriding interests. A search of the register will reveal entries both of restrictions, informing the purchaser of limitations on A's owner's powers, which must be complied with to benefit from ss 29 and 30 of the LRA 2002, and of notices, informing B of pre-existing property rights that will be enforceable against him or her.

The defence against the enforcement of B's pre-existing rights (other than those entered on the register or binding as overriding interests) provided by ss 29 and 30 of the 2002 Act applies at the time of registration against interests held by B at the time of the disposition. C will search the register between contract and the completion of the disposition. There is a risk of property rights arising after the search has been made and before the disposition is completed. To offset this risk, provision is made for C to obtain an official search with priority protection. This prevents new entries being made on the register for thirty working days.[105]

7 REGISTRATION, FRAUD, AND LIABILITY

Sections 29 and 30 of the LRA 2002 place in a privileged position, as far as priorities are concerned, registrable dispositions of a registered estate made for valuable consideration. C is provided with a defence against the enforcement of B's pre-existing property rights that are not entered on the register or protected as overriding interests. Should C be able to utilize this protection if the transaction is tainted by fraud or other wrongdoing? Where fraud affects the validity of the transaction between A and C, the issue is one of indefeasibility of title. The rules governing the circumstances in which an alteration of the register is possible have been discussed in Chapter 7. In this chapter, we are concerned with fraud or other wrongdoing that does not affect the transaction between A and C, but which, if C can invoke ss 29 or 30, would confer on him or her a defence against a pre-existing property right held by B.[106] Few would argue that C's conduct should be left unchecked in such circumstances, but the appropriate response is more contentious.

105 Land Registration Act 2002, ss 70 and 72, and Land Registration Rules 2003 (SI 2003/1417), rr 147–54.

106 The distinction between these two issues is highlighted by Cooke and O'Connor, 'Purchaser Liability to Third Parties in the English Land Registration System: A Comparative Perspective' (2004) 120 LQR 640, 640–3.

Torrens systems of registration of title have a two-pronged response to transactions involving fraud and wrongdoing that would enable C to invoke a defence against pre-existing property rights.[107] Where the transaction is considered to constitute fraud (a term defined specifically for this purpose), C is denied statutory protection and is bound by B's pre-existing property rights. Where wrongdoing falls short of fraud, in personam liability is imposed. A new direct right is created between C and B, which may either involve C being held personally liable to B, or the creation of property rights in favour of B. Hence, the label in personam is misleading in so far as it appears to be a synonym for personal liability: in fact, the liability may be either personal or proprietary. The difference between these solutions is illustrated in Figure 9.

Figure 9 Torrens fraud and in personam liability

While English law has eschewed the explicit adoption of the same scheme of liability, the same choices arise: C can either be held bound by B's pre-existing property right, or a new direct right may be imposed. Where the latter is the case, that right may be personal or proprietary. Under the LRA 1925, a controversial decision in Peffer v Rigg[108] adopted the former solution. As we will see, however, the court's reasoning was erroneous and would not be possible under the LRA 2002. Instead, focus has been shifted to the imposition of new direct rights under the general law.

7.1 THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT 1925 AND THE DECISION IN PEFFER V RIGG

To understand the decision, it is necessary to explain briefly some of the provisions of the LRA 1925. Section 20 of the 1925 Act performed the function now found in s 29 of the LRA 2002. Section 59 of the 1925 Act, with exceptions, provided that purchasers were not concerned with matters not entered on the register, 'whether he has or has not notice thereof, express, implied or constructive'. Section 74 of the 1925 Act provided that parties dealing with a registered estate were not 'affected with notice of a trust express, implied or [107] This summary of the Torrens approach is based on the account provided ibid.

constructive'. Section 3 of the LRA 1925 defined a purchaser as 'a purchaser in good faith for valuable consideration'.

Peffer v Rigg
[1977] 1 WLR 285, HC

Facts: Mr Peffer and Mr Rigg had married two sisters, and therefore had a common relative in their mother-in-law. Mr Peffer and Mr Rigg jointly bought a house that was a home for their mother-in-law. The house was purchased in Mr Rigg's sole name, although he held on trust for himself and Mr Peffer. Following the breakdown of the Rigg's marriage, Mr Rigg transferred the house to his wife for £1 as part of their divorce settlement. Mrs Rigg knew of Mr Peffer's beneficial interest, but argued notwithstanding that it was unenforceable against her under the terms of the Act.

Graham J

This argument would be convincing if it were not for my finding that the second defendant at the time knew perfectly well that the first defendant could not transfer to her more than a half share of the property. It is this knowledge which seems to me to cause great difficulty to her and prevents her argument succeeding for a number of different reasons put forward by Mr. Poulton for the plaintiff at the second hearing. [. . .]

By definition, however (see section 3 (xxi), "purchaser" means a purchaser in good faith for valuable consideration. It seems clear therefore that as a matter of construction a purchaser who is not in fact one "in good faith" will be concerned with matters not protected by a caution or other entry on the register, at any rate, as I hold, if he has notice thereof. If these sections 20 and 59 are read together in the context of the Act they can be reconciled by holding that if the "transferee" spoken of in section 20 is in fact a "purchaser" he will only be protected if he has given valuable consideration and is in good faith. He cannot in my judgment be in good faith if he has in fact notice of something which affects his title as in the present case. Of course if he and, a fortiori, if a purchaser from him has given valuable consideration and in fact has no notice he is under no obligation to go behind the register, and will in such a case be fully protected. This view of the matter seems to me to enable the two sections to be construed consistently together without producing the unreasonable result of permitting a transferee purchaser to take advantage of the Act, and divest himself of knowledge of defects in his own title, and secure to himself a flawless title which he ought not in justice to be allowed to obtain.

The principal difficulty with this judgment is that, in defining Mrs Rigg's actual knowledge as constituting bad faith, the decision apparently ignores provisions in the LRA 1925 that provided for notice to be irrelevant. Essential to the decision was the existence of a definition of purchaser as acting 'in good faith'.

In the subsequent unregistered land decision in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green[109] (which is discussed fully in Chapter 13), a purchaser with actual notice of an unregistered land charge was held to be able to rely on a defence provided in the Land Charges Act 1925

[109] [1981] AC 513.

(LCA 1925), now the Land Charges Act 1972 (LCA 1972) against the enforcement of unregistered land charges. In holding that the purchaser's notice was irrelevant, the House of Lords relied on the absence of a requirement of good faith purchase in the LCA 1925.

Cooke and O'Connor suggest that, while the basis of the decision in Peffer v Rigg is wrong, the right result was achieved.

Cooke and O'Connor, 'Purchaser Liability to Third Parties in the English Land Registration System: A Comparative Perspective' (2004) 120 LQR 640, 653–4

> The reasoning was wrong, while the result was right. The ratio, revealed in the words quoted above, was: this purchaser has notice, therefore she is not in good faith. This nullifies one of the main benefits of a title registration system, taking away from a purchaser with notice all the protection of a registered disposition and moving back to the position that obtained under the early English deeds registration statutes. Yet simply to condemn the decision as incorrect is unhelpful, for clearly this is not the sort of arms' length purchaser for whom the protection of the old s.20 was intended. It is unsatisfactory for Mrs Rigg to take free of Mr Peffer's interest.

There are two alternative bases on which the same outcome could have been achieved. Firstly, Graham J held that Mrs Rigg was not a purchaser for valuable consideration.[110] This, in itself, provided a means for precluding her from relying on the statutory protection.

Secondly, as we will see, Graham J considered, obiter, that a new direct right arose on the transfer to Mrs Rigg. Hence if she had not been bound by Mr Rigg's pre-existing property right, an alternative route to liability was available.

The enforcement of C's pre-existing property rights where C has actual notice has attracted some academic support as introducing an ethical element into registration.[111] But the Law Commission considered it to run counter to the policy of registration of title and doubted the weight of ethical concerns.[112]

Law Commission Report No 254, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Consultative Document (1998, [3.46])

> [. . .] We have concluded—as the Law Commission has done on two previous occasions—that there should in general be no place for concepts of knowledge or notice in registered land. We have reached this conclusion for the following reasons—
> 1. It was intended that the system of registration under the Land Registration Act 1925 should displace the doctrine of notice.
> 2. There is little evidence of which we are aware that the absence of the doctrine of notice in dealings with registered land has been a cause of injustice in the seventy-two years in which the present system has been operative.

111 Battersby, 'Informal Transactions in Land, Estoppel and Registration' (1995) 58 MLR 637, 655–6. The issue is discussed in Law Commission No 254 (1998), [3.44]–[3.46].

112 The recommendation endorsed in the paragraph extracted here was adopted in Law Commission No 271 (2001), [5.16].

3. The ethical argument is weaker than at first sight it appears to be if the issue is considered in relation to those principles which should in our view, guide the development of land registration. Registration should be regarded as an integral part of the process of creating or transferring interests in registered land, closely akin to the formal requirement of using a deed (or in some cases, writing) in unregistered conveyancing. Just as a deed is required to convey or create a legal estate or interest in unregistered conveyancing, a disposition of registered land must be completed by registration if it is to confer a legal estate or interest. When electronic registration is introduced, it seems probable that many rights will be incapable of being created except by registering them.
4. In practice, if it were provided that unregistered rights in or over registered land were binding because a purchaser had actual knowledge of them, it would be very difficult to prevent the introduction by judicial interpretation of doctrines of constructive notice. If actual knowledge sufficed, the question would inevitably be asked: why not wilful blindness as well? In reality the boundary between actual knowledge and constructive notice is unclear and is, in our view, incapable of precise definition.
5. The mere fact that a purchaser could be bound if he or she had actual knowledge of an unregistered right or interest would inevitably weaken the security of title that registered land at present provides. Disappointed third parties, who found their rights apparently defeated by a purchaser, would threaten litigation. Because of the nuisance value of such threats, purchasers would often settle out of court.

Cooke and O'Connor argue that in focusing on notice-based liability the Law Commission lost sight of the possible role that could be played by a requirement of good faith, where a finding of bad faith requires something more than mere notice.

Cooke and O'Connor, 'Purchaser Liability to Third Parties in the English Land Registration System: A Comparative Perspective' (2004) 120 LQR 640, 657–8

Thus, a useful baby (purchaser-liability for Torrens fraud because of the absence of good faith) has been thrown out with the bathwater (purchaser-liability for notice). And all the argument is directed at the bathwater; arguments against imposing liability on the purchaser for Torrens fraud, or against requiring good faith on the purchaser's part, are simply not given. Peffer v Rigg has caused such a backlash that potentially good law has been rejected, because of the overwhelming need to reject the reasoning in Peffer.

It is clear that the reasoning adopted in Peffer v Rigg could not be followed under the LRA 2002. Central to that decision was the definition of purchaser in the LRA 1925 as a purchaser in good faith, and ss 29 and 30 of the 2002 Act require only that the disposition is for valuable consideration.

7.2 THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT 2002: A FOCUS ON NEW DIRECT RIGHTS

In rejecting the enforcement of B's pre-existing property rights against C on the basis that C has notice, the Law Commission emphasized the possibility of new direct rights arising on appropriate facts.

Law Commission Report No 254, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Consultative Document (1998, [3.48]–[3.49])

> Furthermore, [...] the law provides a wide range of personal remedies against those who in some way behave improperly. The operation of these personal remedies can be demonstrated by four examples.
> 1. If A transfers trust property to [C] in breach of trust and [C] knows or (perhaps) has notice of this, [C] is liable as constructive trustee for "knowing receipt" of trust property. Liability is personal and not proprietary and the obligation is to make restitution for the loss suffered by the trust. It has been assumed that this form of liability may apply where the trust property transferred is registered land and the rights of the beneficiaries have not been protected, so that as a matter of property law, the transferee takes the land free of the trust
> 2. If property is transferred by A to [C] expressly subject to some right of [B's] which will not in fact bind [C], a constructive trust may be imposed upon [C] if he refuses to give effect to [B's] right in circumstances in which that refusal is unconscionable. [C] can in this way be compelled to give effect to [B's] rights. [...]
> 3. There may be circumstances where tortious liability is imposed because A conspires with [C] to defeat [B's] proprietary rights.
> 4. If [C] induces A by misrepresentation or undue influence to charge his or her property to [B] to secure [C's] debts, A will be able to set the charge aside if [B] has notice of [C's] misconduct.
> In each of these cases, a purchaser may acquire the registered land free from the rights of the third party, yet find himself personally liable for the loss suffered by that third party or subject to some personal equity, which enables the transaction to be set aside. [...]

Although described by the Law Commission as 'personal remedies', this is a misnomer. It is apparent from the examples given that the Law Commission, in fact, is referring to new direct rights that may either be personal (1, 3, and 4) or proprietary (2).

The creation of new direct rights has been discussed in Chapter 6. Land law does not exist in a vacuum and the possibility of such rights arising on a transfer is beyond doubt—but reliance on other principles is not without controversy or difficulty. The scope of liability is no longer dependent on the land law statutes and tension may arise where liability is imposed in circumstances that run contrary to land law principles: for example, if a new direct right were to arise on the basis of notice. The objection may be acute where the new liability was proprietary, although Thompson has argued further that purchasers should also be protected against personal liability in such circumstances.[113]

Reliance on the imposition of new direct rights causes difficulty simply because the application of these principles is not generally well developed in the land law context. This is particularly the case as regards personal liability, outside of undue influence (4), which has its own developed jurisprudence in relation to mortgages. The possibility of personal liability based on knowing receipt of trust property (1) was suggested, obiter, as an alternative basis for the decision in Peffer v Rigg.[114] Graham J considered that Mrs Rigg's knowledge of the trust was sufficient to render her personally liable to Mr Peffer even if his pre-existing interest did not bind her through lack of good faith.

113 Thompson, 'Registration, Fraud and Notice' (1985) 44 CLJ 280.

114 [1977] 1 WLR 285, 294.

The creation of new direct rights on a 'subject to' transfer is considered in Chapter 21 and is drawn from the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead,[115] which has been discussed in Chapter 11. Under the LRA 2002, the development of these principles may become more significant.

8 CONCLUSION

The LRA 2002 provides a distinct scheme of priority rules for a category of transactions (registrable dispositions of registered estates for valuable consideration) that incorporates the most common dealings with land. C has a defence against the enforcement of B's pre-existing property rights, except those that are entered on the register by a notice (the defence of lack of registration) or binding as an overriding interest. The disposition must also comply with any limitations on A's owner's powers recorded on the register by entry of a restriction.

There is a need to find a satisfactory reconciliation between the operation of these statutory defences, and ensuring that fraud and wrongful conduct by C does not go unchecked. The policy of the 2002 Act is to rely on the creation of new direct rights arising under the general law. This may involve the imposition on C of personal liability to B, or the creation of new direct rights. But the scope of principles governing the imposition of new direct rights is largely undeveloped in the land law context.

QUESTIONS

1. What do you understand to be meant by a 'registrable disposition of a registered estate for valuable consideration'? What is the significance of this category of transaction for determining questions of priority in registered land?
2. To what extent do the priority rules in registered land implement the 'mirror' and 'curtain' principles?
3. Compare and contrast the scope and effect of entry of a restriction and entry of a notice.
4. How useful are the constitutionalist and absolutist views of the meaning of 'actual occupation' in determining the scope of Sch 3, para 2, of the Land Registration Act 2002?
5. Assess the advantages and disadvantages of responding to fraud or other wrongdoing in a disposition of land to B by: (i) preventing B from invoking statutory defences against C's property rights; and (ii) relying on the creation of new direct rights.
6. What action should the holder of the following property rights in registered land take? In what circumstances will a purchaser of the land have a defence against the enforcement of these rights?
   (a) A beneficial interest under a trust.
   (b) A legal lease created for five years.
   (c) A legal easement arising from an implied grant.
   (d) A restrictive covenant.

EVALUATING THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT 2002

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. The provisions of the Land Registration Act 2002 have a profound effect in land law. We have seen in previous chapters that those provisions affect the acquisition of legal estates and interests in land (see especially Chapters 7 and 8), as well as the defences available to a pre-existing legal or equitable property right in land (see Chapter 14).
2. This chapter gives us a chance to stand back and examine the impact of the 2002 Act. Firstly, we will consider the possible purposes of a registration system and then the specific aims of the Act itself. Secondly, we will bring together some of the material covered in previous chapters in order to summarize the effect of the Act. Thirdly, we will evaluate the Act, by asking both whether the Act has achieved its stated purpose and whether that purpose is, in any case, worthwhile. In doing so, we will consider some important recent developments concerning the circumstances in which it is possible to rectify the register.
3. In considering the effect of the 2002 Act, it is useful to look at the three questions that we considered in Chapter 1, section 3—that is, the content, acquisition, and defences questions. As we will see, the chief impact of the Act is on the second and third of those questions.
4. In analysing the 2002 Act, we have to be careful to separate out its current and future effects. The Act was designed to facilitate a general system of e-conveyancing. As we saw in Chapter 7, section 6, that system is not yet in place. So we need to distinguish the current effect of the 2002 Act from the effect that it may have in the future, if and when a general system of e-conveyancing has been established and consequential changes have been made to the registration rules.
5. In evaluating the 2002 Act, we need to ask if we approve of the answers that it provides to the acquisition and defences questions. This is not simply a matter of comparing the provisions of the Act to its predecessor, the Land Registration Act 1925; rather, to evaluate the 2002 Act, we have to compare the results that it produces in particular situations with what we would regard as the best results in those cases. This, of course, raises the very difficult question of how we are to decide, in the abstract, what is the 'best possible result' in any particular case.

1 INTRODUCTION: THE AIMS OF THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT 2002

1.1 THE GENERAL AIMS OF REGISTRATION

When considering the possible aims of a registration system, it is important to bear in mind that the usefulness of registration is not confined to land law. The following extract refers to two examples in which rights unrelated to land may be registered. The first concerns the registration of company shares; the second, the registration of security interests over company assets.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 82–3)

The central purpose of any register is to provide publicity. For example, a register of births, marriages and deaths gives interested parties the opportunity to discover important information about a community. The publicity provided by a register of rights may be useful to a number of different groups: for example, it may provide the State with information it can use when making tax assessments [...]

Registration can thus be particularly useful to C [a party acquiring a right from A], both in disputes about the use of a thing and in disputes about the use of a right. A registration system can protect C against the two chief risks he faces when attempting to acquire a right:

1. A, the party C deals with, may in fact lack the power to give C the right. This is the risk from which a register of rights, such as a register of company share-holders, aims to protect C.
2. Even if A does have the power to give C the right, B may have a pre-existing right that he can assert against C and that will thus reduce the value of C's right. This is the risk from which a register of pre-existing powers or rights, such as a register of floating charges against a company's rights,[1] aims to protect C.

[...] The publicity provided by a register of rights can never provide C with full protection: in practice, no such register can ever be completely accurate. In Example 1, a register may record A as the holder of some shares, but can C be sure that the register is correct? In Example 2, a register may make no mention of a pre-existing floating charge but, again, can C be sure that the register is correct? Of course, if the register is not complete, C may have to make his own enquiries as to whether A is indeed a holder of the shares; or whether there is a floating charge against A Co's assets. The usefulness of having a register will then be reduced: C will have to spend time and money on his own investigations; as a result the possible deal between A and C will be delayed, or perhaps even called off.

Ideally, C would like to have a guarantee. In Example 1, he wants a guarantee that: (i) if A is recorded as the holder of the shares, then (ii) A does indeed hold those shares. In Example 2, he wants a guarantee that: (i) if there is no floating charge recorded on the register; then (ii) no-one will be able to assert such a power against him. Such a guarantee can only be provided if legal consequences are attached to the fact that a right is, or is not, recorded on a register. Once those legal consequences exist, registration no longer operates neutrally, as a simple record. Rather, registration begins to operate as a legal concept. This introduction of legal consequences allows registration systems to affect the basic structure of property law and hence to have a greater impact on resolving the basic tension [i.e. the tension between the wishes of B, on the one hand, and of C, on the other].

[1] [As we will see in Chapter 28, section 3.4, a floating charge is a particular form of security interest: e.g. it can be used by a company to give a lender security over that company's current and future assets.]

1.2 THE PROMINENCE OF REGISTRATION IN LAND LAW

If a party (A) has a legal freehold of land in England or Wales, or a legal lease of such land with more than seven years to run, A can[2] register with the Land Registry[3] as the holder of that legal estate. Indeed, the overwhelming majority of such freeholds and leases are now registered. This means that the rules imposed by the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002) will apply to regulate A's dealings with his or her registered estate. For example, as we saw in Chapter 7, section 5.3, a transfer of A's registered legal estate to C will only be complete once C is registered as the new holder of that legal estate. And, if C has provided something of value in return for that registered estate (e.g. if C has bought it from A), C may then gain protection against a pre-existing property right of B that has not been noted on the register. That protection comes from the lack of registration defence provided by the LRA 2002, which we considered in Chapter 12, section 3.2 and Chapter 14, section 2.2.

In Chapter 12, section 3.2, as well as in Chapter 13,[4] we also noted that a form of registration scheme applies even if A's legal freehold or lease is not registered at the Land Registry. In relation to such unregistered land, the Land Charges Act 1972 (LCA 1972) may function to give C (a party acquiring a right from A) a defence against a pre-existing property right of B: the case of Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green,[5] which we examined in Chapter 12, section 3.1, provides a memorable example.

It is therefore clear that registration is a particularly important concept in land law. As the following extract suggests, the prominence of registration can perhaps be explained by the special features of land (as examined in the extract from the same author set out in Chapter 1, section 4).

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 86–7)

Registration is particularly prominent in land law. We can explain this by looking at the special features of land [. . .]

1. Due to its fixed location, each piece of land is easy to identify. As a result, if a register exists, it is easy to look up a particular piece of land in that register.
2. Due to its capacity for multiple, simultaneous use, as well as its social importance, the list of [legal and equitable property rights in land] is longer than the list of such rights in things other than land. So, if C acquires a right in land from A, there is an increased risk to C of being bound by a pre-existing right of B.

[2] As we saw in Chapter 7, section 5.3, if A seeks to transfer to C an unregistered freehold or lease with more than seven years to run, then C will have to register in order to acquire a legal estate; it is not, however, compulsory for A, an unregistered holder of such a freehold or lease, to register that right.

[3] Formally titled Her Majesty's Land Registry, the organization now brands and refers to itself without a definite article—that is, as 'Land Registry' rather than 'the Land Registry'. In this book, however, we have used the more conventional appellation.

[4] See Chapter 13, section 5.8.

[5] [1981] AC 513.

3. Due to its permanence, there is an increased risk of a pre-existing [legal or equitable property right] existing in relation to a particular piece of land. So, if C acquires a right in land from A, there is an increased risk to C of being bound by a pre-existing right of B.
4. Due to its limited availability, land is already very expensive. As a result, there is a particularly strong desire to limit the time and cost C must expend in acquiring a right in land. The more expensive the process of buying land becomes, the more difficult it becomes for those of even average wealth to acquire the land they need to set up a home or run a business.

So, the special features of land both: (i) make a registration system possible; and (ii) justify the extra protection such a system can provide to C. However, this leaves open the question of how a land registration system should operate. The basic tension [between B and C] will govern not only whether the concept of registration applies, but also how it applies.

From one perspective, then, we can understand how a registration system can help to protect a party attempting to acquire a right in land (C) from both: (i) the risk that the party with whom he or she deals (A) may not have the power to give C such a right; and (ii) the risk that, even if A does have that power, another party (B) may have a pre-existing legal or equitable interest in land that binds C.

As we saw in Chapter 7, section 5.1, these advantages are best secured by a system based on registration of title. Where such a system is in place, C can check the register to establish that A does indeed have 'title': in other words, C can check that A does indeed have the power to give C a right in the land. Where such a registration system exists, it is also likely to require that (at least some) pre-existing legal or equitable interests are noted on the register, thus giving C some protection against the risk of being bound by a pre-existing right of B. As the following extract notes, this 'conveyancing' perspective, focusing on the specific transaction between A and C, can be complemented, and broadened, by a consideration of the possible economic advantages of a registration of title scheme.

O'Connor, 'Registration of Title in England and Australia' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 2 (ed Cooke, 2003, pp 84–5)

While lawyers tend to view registration of title as a law reform project to overcome problems in common law conveyancing, governments and economists regard it as a market-supporting mechanism operated as a government program. The system is, as Mapp said, 'overwhelmingly administrative in operation',[6] with economic objects, namely, to improve security of title and to facilitate the transfer of interests in land. These two objects are found in the preamble to the very first English registration of title statute, the Land Registry Act 1862, which began: 'Whereas it is expedient to give certainty to the title to real estates and to facilitate the proof thereof and also to render the dealing with land more simple and economical'.

Economists have long recognised that secure property rights are a precondition for investment and economic growth. Puzzled by the difficulty of replicating the economic success of Western capitalism in the Third World, economists have in the past decade turned their attention to examining the nature of the legal institutions and property laws that underpin capitalism in developed countries. The new 'institutional economics' has rediscovered a long-overlooked connection between property laws and prosperity. Laws that ensure the security and transferability of property establish the framework of incentives that enable the creation of new wealth from existing assets.

Secure titles have been found to contribute to economic growth in a multiplicity of ways. They provide owners with an incentive to invest in improving and developing their land, for they are assured of reaping the benefits for themselves. Owners who wish to invest are better able to obtain the development capital they need on favourable terms if they can offer a good title as collateral for a loan. If purchasers can easily satisfy themselves that the title they are acquiring is clear, the costs of transacting in land will fall. Lower transaction costs assist the market to allocate land assets to their most productive uses, by allowing them to pass to those who value them most highly.

1.3 THE AIMS OF A PARTICULAR LAND REGISTRATION SYSTEM

It is not enough simply to state that having a registration of title system can be useful in land law; we also have to ask what sort of registration of title system should apply. Certainly, it would be a mistake to think that all land registration systems are the same: even in the common law world,[7] the detail of the registration rules varies if we move from England and Wales to, for example, Australian or Canadian jurisdictions.

In particular, as the following extract explores, we need to ask how our registration of title system should balance the needs of a prior user of land (such as A or B) with those of a party later acquiring a right in relation to the land (such as C).

O'Connor, 'Registration of Title in England and Australia' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 2 (ed Cooke, 2003, pp 85–6)

A title to land is secure if it is at no risk, or no significant risk, of being found to be defective or subordinate to another interest. While economists assume that security of title is a good that property laws can bestow, it is, as Mapp said 'an elusive ideal',[8] for it incorporates contradictory elements. There are two competing aspects of security of title, that Demogue called 'static' and 'dynamic' security.[9]

Static security

The law of private conveyancing was based on the principle of static security, which protects the rights of existing owners at the expense, if necessary, of purchasers. This was achieved through rules such as nemo dat quod non habet,[10] the preference of both law and equity for the interest first in time when adjudicating the priority of competing interests, and the [7] Of course, given that the special features of land are the same the world over, many civil law jurisdictions also have registration systems: for a useful survey of the position in other European jurisdictions, see Cooke, The New Law of Land Registration (2003), ch 9. In ch 1, Cooke notes, at p 2, that 'the ancient Egyptians, for example, kept a record of ownership in documentary form, so that land could be allocated accurately when it became accessible following the annual flooding of the Nile'. She also notes that images of such papyrus can be seen online, via the Duke (University) Papyrus Library: see http://library.duke.edu/rubenstein/scriptorium/papyrus/records/276r.html (accessed 19 October 2011).

[10] One many not grant a better title than one has.

doctrines of notice and equitable fraud. Equity's preference for the 'bona fide purchaser for value without notice' was an attempt to balance static security against the reasonable expectations of purchasers in good faith, but the standard of inquiry required of purchasers under the extended doctrine was onerous.

Conveyancing rules based on static security suited a society emerging from feudalism, where land ownership was confined to the privileged few, and was rarely traded. By the mid nineteenth century, England and Australia were developing market economies, in which value is captured through exchange. The old conveyancing rules inhibited exchange of land by imposing high transaction costs upon purchasers, and exposing them to the risk of acquiring defective or subordinate titles.

Dynamic security

The enactment of registration of title legislation in mid-nineteenth century England and Australia decisively shifted the conveyancing law towards the opposing principle of dynamic security. Dynamic security is provided by legal rules that protect the reasonable expectations of those who purchase in good faith. It facilitates exchange by reducing or eliminating the risk that the purchaser's title will be subject to unknown prior claims and title defects. This lowers transaction costs by limiting the inquiries that purchasers need to make. By relieving against risk, it also restores value to clouded titles [. . .]

The shift to dynamic security in the law of real and personal transactions was an essential condition for the operation of market capitalism. De Soto explains that, while the law in Western countries seeks to promote both types of security, dynamic security is favoured because of its greater economic importance:

> 'Although they are established to protect both the security of ownership and that of transactions, it is obvious that Western systems emphasize the latter. Security is principally focussed on producing trust in transactions so that people can more easily make their assets lead a parallel life as capital.'[11]

It is natural to equate dynamic security with protection for purchasers, but this is too simple. While dynamic security reduces purchasers' costs and risks in transactions, it also benefits owners. Without it, owners' titles can be disturbed years after purchase if a defect in their title or a prior interest comes to light within the relevant limitation period.

The 'security of title' object of registration refers to both static and dynamic security. The dilemma for the law is that the two stand in an inverse relationship. Measures that improve dynamic security tend to diminish static security to some extent, and vice versa. The law must determine how to balance dynamic and static security in the formulation of the rules, taking into account a range of policy considerations. Different evaluation of the considerations accounts for much of the variation and instability in the rules of registration of title systems.

It is clear that we have a number of choices to make when designing a registration of title system. Consider a case in which A is registered as holding a freehold of particular land. A then goes away for six months. X takes advantage of this by forging A's signature and claiming that A has transferred his registered freehold to X. X is registered as the new holder of A's freehold and then borrows £1m from C, giving C a legal charge over the land as security. C then registers that charge. When A returns and seeks possession of the land, A will ask for the register to be changed: first, to remove X from the proprietorship register and to reinstate [11] De Soto, The Mystery of Capital (2000), p 61.

A as registered proprietor; second, to remove C's charge from the charges register. This is an important example and we will refer to it a number of times in this chapter: as we will see in section 3.1.1 below, the question of whether A can remove C's charge from the register has recently been considered by both judges and commentators, and a number of different answers and approaches have been suggested. The example is important as it raises the vital question of 'indefeasibility': how secure should C's position as registered proprietor be?

As we saw in Chapter 7, section 5.6, there are a number of possible approaches that a registration of title system can take to this question. Protecting A would uphold the demands of static security; protecting C would advance the cause of dynamic security. As we will see in section 3.1.1 below, the 2002 Act itself does not give a clear answer as to whether the needs of A or C should be preferred. The impact of the Act depends, in large part, on whether C's registration can be said to be a 'mistake'; but that term is not defined in the Act, and so there is room for disagreement amongst judges and commentators as to how the crucial notion of 'mistake' should be interpreted.

1.4 THE AIMS OF THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT 2002

So far, we have seen that: (i) there are good reasons why registration is particularly important in land law; (ii) those advantages of registration are maximized if registration of title is required; but (iii) nonetheless, a question remains as to precisely how a land registration system should operate. We can now focus on the LRA 2002 and its specific aims.

The 2002 Act resulted from the Law Commission's work: in the following extract, the Law Commission sets out its aims in producing the draft Bill that led to the Act. We considered parts of the following extract in Chapter 7, section 5.1, but given its importance in setting out the chief aim of the LRA 2002, it is worth seeing again—and in full.

Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001, [1.5]–[1.10])

The fundamental objective of the Bill is that, under the system of electronic dealing with land that it seeks to create, the register should be a complete and accurate reflection of the state of the title of the land at any given time, so that it is possible to investigate title to land on line, with the absolute minimum of additional enquiries and inspections.

Although that ultimate objective may seem an obvious one, its implications are considerable, and virtually all the changes that the Bill makes to the present law flow directly from it. The Bill is necessarily limited in its scope to registered land or to dealings with unregistered land in England and Wales that will trigger first registration. Although the great majority of titles are in fact now registered, there are still substantial amounts of land (particularly in rural areas) that are unregistered. However, as we explain in Part II, unregistered land has had its day. In the comparatively near future, it will be necessary to take steps to bring what is left of it on to the register.

The process of registration of title is conducted by the State through the agency of HM Land Registry. Indeed, the State guarantees the title to registered land. If, therefore, any person suffers loss as a result of some mistake or omission in the register of title, he or she is entitled to be indemnified for that loss. At present, there is no requirement that a disposition of registered land has to be entered in the register if it is to be effective. Even without registration, dispositions are valid not only between the parties to them, but as against many but not necessarily all third parties who subsequently acquire an interest in the same registered land. This is a necessity under the present law because there is a hiatus—called the "registration gap"[12]—between the making of any disposition and its subsequent registration. The transfer or grant has to be submitted to the Land Registry for registration, which inevitably takes some time. It would be wholly unacceptable for the transfer or grant to have no legal effect in that interim period. It should be noted that there are some interests in registered land, presently known as overriding interests, which are not protected in the register at all but which nonetheless bind any person who subsequently acquires an interest in the land affected. This is so whether or not that person knew of, or could readily have discovered, the existence of these interests.

If it is to be possible to achieve the fundamental objective of the Bill mentioned [above]—

1. all express dispositions of registered land will have to be appropriately protected on the register unless there are very good reasons for not doing so;
2. the categories of overriding interests will have to be very significantly reduced in scope; and
3. dispositions of registered land will have to be registered simultaneously, so that it becomes impossible to make most dispositions of registered land except by registering them.

The aim stated in (3) will be possible only if conveyancing practitioners are authorised to initiate the process of registration when dispositions of registered land are made by their clients. This is a very significant departure from present practice.

To achieve the goals stated [above] will also require a change in attitude.

There is a widely-held perception that it is unreasonable to expect people to register their rights over land. We find this puzzling given the overwhelming prevalence of registered title. Furthermore, the law has long required compliance with certain formal requirements for the transfer of interests in land and for contracts to sell or dispose of such interests. The wisdom of these requirements is not seriously questioned. We cannot see why the further step of registration should be regarded as so onerous. In any event, under the system of electronic conveyancing that we envisage (and for which the Bill makes provision), not only will the process of registration become very much easier, but the execution of the transaction in electronic form and its simultaneous registration will be inextricably linked.

These changes will necessarily alter the perception of title to land. It will be the fact of registration and registration alone that confers title. This is entirely in accordance with the fundamental principle of a conclusive register which underpins the Bill.

In order to understand the LRA 2002, it is crucial to understand its basic aims, as stated by the Law Commission in the extract above. Firstly, the Act clearly aims to prioritize dynamic security: to protect a third party (C) attempting to acquire a legal property right in land from the risk of being bound by a pre-existing, but hidden, legal or equitable property right. So, in the example given in section 1.3 above (where X fraudulently registers as the new holder of A's freehold and then grants a charge to C), we might expect the Act to protect C rather than A. Indeed, if it is truly 'the fact of registration and registration alone that confers title', we might expect C to win even if C knew about X's fraud.

12 [The concept of the 'registration gap' was discussed in Chapter 7, section 5.4.]

Secondly, it is clear that the standard use of e-conveyancing (and hence electronic registration) is a fundamental part of the scheme of the LRA 2002. Certainly, it is viewed as providing an important justification for protecting C against pre-existing, but unregistered, rights: the logic is that, because e-conveyancing makes it simpler for B to register a right, it becomes harder for B to excuse a failure to register, and thus fairer to protect C against any unregistered right of B. As we noted in Chapter 7, section 6.1, e-conveyancing can also lead to the closing of the 'registration gap' referred to in the extract above: one depression of a key by A or C's solicitor or conveyancer can simultaneously finalize A's grant of a legal property right to C and C's registration as holder of that right.

Thirdly, and linked to the previous two points, is the fundamental idea that the registration system exists not to set out rights already acquired by parties such as A, B, and C, but, instead, to create those rights. In such a world, the register will necessarily be a 'complete and accurate reflection of the state of the title of the land at any given time'. Indeed, there will be no external standard by which to check the accuracy of the register: anything on the register will be correct, simply because it is on the register.

Finally, it is important to remember that the Law Commission described its fundamental objective of a 'complete and accurate register' as an 'ultimate' objective. Certainly, the LRA 2002 did not aim to achieve its intended effects overnight. The most important outstanding step was, and remains, the standard use of e-conveyancing. This means that, when evaluating the Act, we need to be aware that its full impact cannot be determined unless and until that e-conveyancing system is fully operational. Nonetheless, the 2002 Act did make a number of very significant, immediate changes, taking effect independently of e-conveyancing. Those changes will be summarized in the next section and we will evaluate them in section 3.

Before discussing those changes, it is worth noting an important tension in the fundamental objective of the 2002 Act, as described by the Law Commission in the extract above. That tension stems from the notion that: (i) the register should be 'complete and accurate'; so that (ii) C can 'investigate title to land on line, with the absolute minimum of additional enquiries and inspections'. Of course, if the register really were complete and accurate, there would be no need for any further investigation of title: such enquiries would be eliminated, rather than minimized. This tension suggests that the aim of making the register complete and accurate may not only be very difficult to achieve in practice, but may also be of dubious merit. Certainly, as we will see in the next section, it would be dangerous for C to think that he or she can rely on the register with complete confidence and will always be fully protected from an unregistered, but pre-existing, property right of A or B.

2 THE IMPACT OF THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT 2002: A SUMMARY

In summarizing the impact of the LRA 2002, we need to distinguish between: (i) its immediate impact; and (ii) its possible future impact once the e-conveyancing system is fully operational. At each stage, a useful way to analyse the Act is to examine its effect on the ways in which B, a prior user of land, may attempt to assert a right against C, a party later acquiring a legal estate or interest in that land. Firstly, it is important to note that, as we saw in Chapter 6, section 4, the 2002 Act has no impact on the question of whether B can assert a new, direct right against C, arising as a result of C's conduct. This point is made clear in the Law Commission reports that led to the Act.[13] As a result, as we noted in Chapter 14, section 7.2, the possible means by which B can acquire a direct right against C (discussed in Chapter 6) are unaffected by the 2002 Act.

The focus of the LRA 2002 is therefore on the different question of whether B can assert a pre-existing legal or equitable property right against C. As we saw in Chapter 1, section 3, we can break that key question down into three specific questions.

1. The content question: does the right claimed by B count as a property right?
2. The acquisition question: has B, in fact, acquired the right that he or she claims?
3. The defences question: if B does have a property right, does C have a defence to it?

In considering the immediate impact and future effect of the 2002 Act, we can focus on those three questions.

Before doing so, it is useful to remember an important effect of the LRA 2002, discussed in Chapter 8, section 5.3. There, we saw that the rules introduced by the Act make it impossible for an adverse possessor to claim that the lapse of time, by itself, has extinguished the legal estate of a registered proprietor. As a result, a registered proprietor is given far more effective protection against an adverse possessor than an unregistered holder of a legal estate. In evaluating the 2002 Act as a whole, it is important to take a view as to whether that particular change was desirable. To a large extent, that depends on a consideration of the merits of the claim of an adverse possessor—a question that we examined in Chapter 8, section 2. It is worth noting that the extra protection given to a registered proprietor against an adverse possessor may promote the Law Commission's goal of extending the number of registered titles: an unregistered holder of a freehold or long lease, even if he or she does not plan to deal with the land in the near future, may consider registering his or her legal estate so as to reduce the (admittedly small) risk of losing that estate due to another's adverse possession.

2.1 THE IMMEDIATE IMPACT OF THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT 2002

2.1.1 The content question

Dixon has pointed out that, in theory, we could have a registration system that simply ignores the fundamental divide between property rights and personal rights: it could, for example, stipulate that C can be bound by registered rights that are otherwise regarded as personal rights (e.g. contractual licences).[14] The LRA 2002 does not set out to do this: after all, given its chief aim is to give extra protection to C, it would be very surprising if it were systematically to allow personal rights to have an effect on C. But it is worth noting that, with the aim of promoting clarity, the Law Commission took a position on whether particular types of rights, the proprietary status of which is uncertain at best, would be capable of binding C.

[13] See Law Commission Report No 254, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Consultative Document (1998), [3.38]–[4.9] and Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001), [4.11] and [7.7].

[14] Dixon, 'Proprietary and Non-Proprietary Rights in Modern Land Law' in Land Law: Issues, Debates and Policy (ed Tee, 2002), pp 26–8. Parliament's response to the House of Lords decision in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth [1965] AC 1175, discussed in Chapter 1, section 5.7, provides a specific example of this type of approach: under what is now s 31(10) of the Family Law Act 1996, a partner's statutory right of occupation is allowed to bind a third party if, and only if, it is noted on the register.

And, thanks to what are now ss 115 and 116 of the 2002 Act, those rights (such as rights of pre-emption,[15] 'mere equities',[16] and 'equities by estoppel')[17] are now prima facie binding on C.

Of course, even if B has such a right, it may still be possible for C to have a defence against it. Nonetheless, it is perhaps surprising that the Act has resolved these doubts in favour of B, rather than C. The Law Commission's position was not based on a particular policy, but rather on its view as to whether such rights were already recognized as equitable interests in land. As we saw in Chapter 10, section 4.3, however, when considering 'equities by estoppel', it may be that—in some cases, at least—the Law Commission's interpretation of the pre-existing law was overly generous to B.

2.1.2 The acquisition question: legal estates and interests

As we saw in Chapter 7, if a party (B or C) claims that A (a party with a registered freehold or lease) has granted B or C a legal estate or interest, the provisions of the LRA 2002 may be crucial. As we saw in Chapter 7, section 5.3.3, s 27 of the 2002 Act creates a category of 'registrable dispositions'—that is, certain dealings with A's registered estate that are not complete unless and until they are registered: for example, a transfer of A's registered estate is only complete if and when the transferee registers as the new holder of A's estate. And if A attempts to grant a legal lease of more than seven years,[18] the recipient of that lease again needs to register in order to acquire that legal estate. In addition, even if A's legal estate is not registered, certain dealings with that estate have to be registered before the other party can acquire a legal estate from A: for example, a transfer of an unregistered freehold is not complete until the transferee has registered that freehold. In this way, progress can be made to the Law Commission's goal of reducing the number of unregistered titles to land.

In those cases, registration can be seen to operate in a negative sense: if B or C fails to register a claimed legal estate, he or she fails to acquire that right. In some cases, this can, of course, assist C. For example, in a case where C is registered as the new holder of A's freehold, B may claim that he or she has a pre-existing legal estate in the land, because A earlier transferred that freehold to B. But because B failed to register as the new holder of A's freehold, B's claim must fail: B's failure to register means that B failed to acquire A's freehold.

In addition, in these cases, registration can also operate in a positive sense: if a party does register his or her legal estate, then that right is guaranteed—the fact of registration operates positively to mean that he or she has acquired that right. This result is produced by s 58 of the LRA 2002.

[15] Such as a right of B to enter a contract with A if A chooses to sell his legal estate in land. For discussion of whether such a right counts as an equitable interest, see Pritchard v Briggs [1980] Ch 338. For the Law Commission's discussion of whether such a right should be capable of binding C, see Law Commission Report No 271 (2001), [5.26]–[5.28].

[16] Such as a power of B to rescind a transfer of a legal estate to A, where that transfer was procured by an innocent misrepresentation of A. For the Law Commission's discussion of whether such a right should be capable of binding C, see Law Commission Report No 271 (2001), [5.32]–[5.36].

[17] For discussion of the impact of s 116 of the LRA 2002 on 'equities by estoppel' see Chapter 10, section 5.3.

[18] In addition, registration is also necessary in relation to certain exceptional forms of shorter lease: see Land Registration Act 2002, s 4(1)(b), (d), and (e) (cases of first registration) and s 27(2)(b)(ii)–(v) (where a lease is granted by a registered proprietor). See further Chapter 22, section 3.1.2.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 58

Conclusiveness

(1) If, on the entry of a person in the register as the proprietor of a legal estate, the legal estate would not otherwise be vested in him, it shall be deemed to be vested in him as a result of the registration.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply where the entry is made in pursuance of a registrable disposition in relation to which some other registration requirement remains to be met.

Section 58(1) thus has an important effect in the example discussed in section 1.3 above. If X manages to have herself registered as the new holder of A's freehold (even if that registration is fraudulent), then s 58 means that X is 'deemed' to have acquired a legal estate, simply as a result of her registration. This means that, as s 23 of the Act confirms, X does have the power, for example, to grant C a charge over the land. Conversely, of course, because A is no longer registered as the holder of that freehold, A has lost his legal estate. This result seems very harsh on A: surely he does not deserve to have his land subjected to a charge simply because X managed to trick the Land Registry by forging A's signature on the transfer documents?

As we saw in Chapter 7, section 5.6.1, the response of a given registration system to such a case depends on its approach to the question of indefeasibility of title. The logic of dynamic security favours protecting C, who acquired its charge from X, the party who was then the registered proprietor. The logic of static security, in contrast, favours the reinstatement of A as registered proprietor and the removal of C's charge. What solution does the Land Registration Act 2002 adopt? As we saw in Chapter 7, section 5.6.1, this is where Sch 4 of the Act comes into play. It is possible for the register to be changed: for example, a court (under Sch 4, para 2(1)(a)) or the Registrar (under Sch 4, para (5)(a)), can alter the register for the purpose of 'correcting a mistake'. It is true that Sch 4, para 6(2), sets out the basic position that a change affecting 'the title of the proprietor of a registered estate in land' cannot be made without the consent of that proprietor (in our case, X) if that proprietor is in possession of the land. But Sch 4, para 6(2)(a), states that the basic position does not apply where the registered proprietor—like X in our example—'has by fraud or lack of proper care caused or substantially contributed to the mistake'.

It is therefore clear that if A had discovered X's fraud before X gave any rights to a third party, A's position would have been secure: as we saw in Chapter 7, section 5.6.2, A can apply for rectification and will be reinstated as registered proprietor[19] and X, given his own fraud, cannot complain about the loss of his registered title. But what if, as in our example, A discovers X's fraud only after X has granted C a legal charge? The problem for A in such a case is that, under s 24 of the LRA 2002, X, whilst proprietor of the registered freehold, is able to 'exercise owner's powers' in relation to that legal estate. Those 'owner's powers' are set out by s 23 of the 2002 Act and include, for example, the power to burden the land with a charge. In such a case, we have a classic clash between 'static' and 'dynamic' security: A will argue that C's charge should be removed; C will argue that, because it dealt with the registered [19] Note that, either before applying for rectification or alongside such an application, A should also apply for a restriction to be entered on the register, limiting X's power to deal with X's registered estate. A can also lodge a unilateral notice on the register, to alert any potential third parties to his claim: see per Lloyd LJ in Barclays Bank v Guy [2008] EWCA Civ 452, [19].

proprietor and because the register should be regarded as conclusive, there are no grounds for the removal of the charge.

In such a case, if A's call for a change to the register succeeds, then, assuming C had no knowledge of X's forgery, C will be entitled to an indemnity (see Chapter 7, section 5.6.1)—that is, a payment from the Registrar to compensate C for the loss that it will suffer as a result of the rectification of the register. A's claim for rectification can only succeed, however, if it is shown that C's registration is a 'mistake'. Unfortunately, as we will see in detail in section 3.1.1 below, the meaning of that term is not clearly defined by the LRA 2002.

2.1.3 The acquisition question: equitable interests

As it stands, the LRA 2002 does not affect the acquisition of equitable interests. This means that registration does not operate negatively: if B claims to have acquired an equitable interest from A, it is never necessary for B to show that his or her right has been recorded on the register. It also means that registration does not operate positively: B can never claim that he or she has acquired an equitable interest simply by virtue of having entered that right on the register. It does not, however, mean that registration is irrelevant when considering equitable interests: as we will see in section 2.1.4 below, if B fails to enter a notice on the register protecting his or her equitable interest, there is a risk that C, when later acquiring a right from A, will have a defence to B's right.

2.1.4 The defences question: legal estates and interests

As we noted in Chapter 12, section 3.2, and Chapter 14, section 2.2, the LRA 2002 provides a very important defence: the lack of registration defence. If C acquires a legal estate or interest from A and if C provides something in return for that right, C may be able to use that defence against a pre-existing right of B. But it is only in the rarest cases that C can use the defence against a pre-existing legal estate or interest of B. Firstly, as we saw in section 2.1.2 above, B generally needs to register in order to acquire such a legal property right: in such cases, C clearly cannot use the lack of registration defence, because B's right, by definition, will be recorded on the register. For example, if B has acquired a legal ten-year lease from A, B must necessarily have registered that right. This means that, as far as legal property rights are concerned, the lack of registration defence is only relevant where B has managed to acquire such a right without registering it.

There are two principal situations in which this can occur: firstly, where B acquires a legal lease with a maximum period of seven years or less; secondly, where B acquires an easement that has not been expressly granted to him by A—it being possible for B to acquire a legal easement by means of an implied grant from A (see Chapter 25, section 3.2) or through the doctrine of prescription (see Chapter 25, section 3.3).

In the first case, in which B acquires a legal lease, B's right counts as an overriding interest under Sch 3, para 1, of the LRA 2002. It is therefore impossible for C to rely on the lack of registration defence against such a right.

In the second case, in which B acquires a legal easement, B's right will almost always count as such an overriding interest under Sch 3, para 3, of the 2002 Act.[20] In this way, the Act essentially preserves the position applying in unregistered land:[21] if B has a pre-existing legal property right, it is almost impossible for C to have a defence against that right.

[20] Sch 3, para 3 is set out in Chapter 25, section 4.1. The very rare case in which B's legal easement is not overriding occurs only where that legal easement fails to satisfy any of the three criteria set out in para 3.

2.1.5 The defences question: equitable interests

Where B has a pre-existing equitable interest, the lack of registration defence comes to the fore: for example, whilst a legal lease will count as an overriding interest, an equitable lease, in itself, does not; whilst a legal easement will almost always count as an overriding interest, an equitable easement, in itself, does not. As we saw in Chapter 14, section 5, an equitable interest of B, in itself, can never count as an overriding interest: it will only qualify if it is accompanied by B's actual occupation of the registered land.

2.2 THE FUTURE IMPACT OF THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT 2002: THE EFFECT OF E-CONVEYANCING

In Chapter 7, section 6, we examined the reasons why the brave new world of e-conveyancing, the arrival of which the 2002 Act was supposed to herald, has not yet materialized. Nonetheless, in evaluating that Act, and in considering its broader aims, it is important to consider the planned changes that depend on the introduction of e-conveyancing.

2.2.1 The content question

There is no suggestion that the introduction of e-conveyancing will lead to the introduction of registration rules that affect the fundamental question of whether or not B's pre-existing right counts as a personal right, on the one hand, or as a legal or equitable property right, on the other.

2.2.2 The acquisition question: legal estates and interests

The introduction of e-conveyancing will make a difference to the acquisition of legal estates and interests, but not a dramatic one. As we saw in section 2.1.2 above, it is already often the case that, to acquire a legal property right from A, a party (B or C) needs to register that right. In such cases, as we saw in Chapter 7, section 6.1, e-conveyancing will have the useful effect of removing the 'registration gap' that occurs between: (i) A's granting of a right to B or C; and (ii) B or C registering, and thus acquiring, that right. As we noted in Chapter 7, section 5.4, that gap can cause particular problems for C. For example, imagine that A transfers her registered freehold to C. If A then grants B a legal lease of seven years or less after the transfer to C, but before C has registered as the new holder of the freehold, B's legal lease will bind C: it is an overriding interest in existence at the moment of C's acquisition of the freehold. Under e-conveyancing, the transfer and registration of A's freehold will occur simultaneously, and C will no longer face that risk.

In addition, the introduction of e-conveyancing is likely to see an increase in the category of 'registrable dispositions'—that is, those dealings with a registered estate that, under s 27 of the LRA 2002, need to be completed by registration. For example, we have seen that, in general, B can currently acquire a legal lease of seven years or less without needing to register.

[21] See Chapter 13, section 3.

The Law Commission, however, envisages that, when e-conveyancing makes it simpler for B to register, the registration requirement will be extended to any lease of more than three years.[22] This will assist in reaching the 'fundamental objective' of a 'complete and accurate' register. The likelihood is that leases of three years or less will remain outside the scope of compulsory registration. This is no surprise: as we noted in Chapter 7, section 4, s 54(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925) permits such leases to be created without any formality at all, if certain further conditions are met (see further Chapter 22, section 3.1.2).

2.2.3 The acquisition question: equitable interests

As we noted in Chapter 7, section 6.1, the introduction of e-conveyancing is likely to make a dramatic difference to the acquisition of equitable interests in land. The crucial point is that, under s 93(2) of the LRA 2002, rules can be introduced requiring the electronic registration not only of registrable dispositions, but also of contracts to make such dispositions. As we saw in Chapter 9, when examining cases such as Walsh v Lonsdale,[23] B can acquire an immediate equitable interest if A is under a contractual duty to give B a legal or equitable property right in land. This particular means by which B can acquire an equitable interest is already regulated by a formality rule: as we noted in Chapter 7, section 3, s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989) already requires a contract for the 'sale or other disposition of an interest in land' to be made in writing, signed by all of the contracting parties. This means that rules passed under s 93(2) of the LRA 2002 would not be the first to apply formal requirements to contracts to transfer or create interests in land—but such rules would be the first to make the existence of such a contract depend on its registration.

The potential significance of rules passed under s 93(2) can be seen in a case in which B plans to buy A's freehold, and, as a result, A and B enter a contract, made in writing and signed by both parties, under which A is under a duty to transfer her freehold to B. B pays A the purchase price and takes up occupation of the land—but B neglects to have himself registered as the new holder of A's freehold. A, who remains as registered proprietor, takes advantage of her position by selling her registered estate to C, who does have himself registered as the new holder of A's freehold. Under the current law, B can assert a pre-existing equitable interest against C because: (i) as soon as A came under a contractual duty to transfer her freehold to B, B acquired an equitable interest (see Chapter 9); and (ii) because B was in actual occupation of the land at the relevant time, B has an overriding interest. C therefore cannot use the lack of registration defence against B (see Chapter 14, section 5). So, whilst B's failure to register as the new holder of A's freehold prevents him from acquiring a legal estate, it does not prevent him from asserting a right against C.

Now consider the same situation after the introduction of e-conveyancing rules. B's failure to have his contract with A electronically registered will mean that there is no contract between A and B. So, unless B can rely on some other means of showing that A is under a duty to transfer her freehold to him, B will have no equitable interest. This means that, despite B's actual occupation of the land, B will have no pre-existing right to assert against C. B will thus be in the same position as Mrs Ainsworth in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth[24] (see the discussion in Chapter 1, section 5, and Chapter 4, section 5.4): in the absence of a new, direct right arising as a result of C's conduct, B will have no right to remain in occupation. In such a case, as noted in Chapter 7, sections 3.7 and 6.1, B could try to rely on the doctrine of proprietary estoppel to show that, despite the absence of a contract, A was under a duty to transfer her freehold to B.[25]

2.2.4 The defences question: legal estates and interests

We saw in section 2.1.4 above that the lack of registration defence provided by the LRA 2002 very rarely protects C against the risk of being bound by a pre-existing legal property right of B. That position will be unchanged by the introduction of e-conveyancing.

2.2.5 The defences question: equitable interests

The introduction of e-conveyancing rules will not directly affect the application of the lack of registration defence to pre-existing equitable interests. The importance of those rules, as we saw in section 2.2.3 above, will instead lie in their effect on the acquisition of equitable interests. As a result, there will be cases (such as in the example given in section 2.2.3 above) in which B's actual occupation of registered land will be of no use to him, as his failure to have his contract with A electronically registered will mean that he has no underlying equitable interest that can be protected by that occupation.

3 EVALUATING THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT 2002

In this section, we will evaluate the immediate impact of the LRA 2002, as summarized in section 2.1 above, as well as considering the future effect of the Act, following the possible introduction of the e-conveyancing rules summarized in section 2.2 above.

3.1 A COMPLETE AND ACCURATE REGISTER?

The first question to consider is whether the LRA 2002 has lived up to the Law Commission's 'fundamental objective' of creating a 'complete and accurate' register.[26] In considering this aim, we do need to be aware, as discussed in section 1.4 above, that the 2002 Act was not intended to achieve that aim overnight. Nonetheless, it is interesting to note that we have seen a number of situations in which the provisions of the Act diverge from this ultimate objective of a complete and accurate register.

3.1.1 Rectification

The possibility of rectification, defined by Sch 4, para 1, of the LRA 2002 as a change to the register that corrects a mistake and prejudicially affects the title of a registered proprietor, demonstrates that the register is never wholly 'complete and accurate'. This is not to suggest that rectification could ever be entirely eliminated: as we have seen, it would be very strange if, following X's fraudulent registration, it was impossible for X to be removed and for A to be [25] See Chapter 7, section 3.7 and Chapter 10, sections 2.1.4 and 2.4 for a discussion of the possible use of proprietary estoppel in cases in which a formality rule has not been satisfied.

reinstated as registered proprietor. The crucial question is not as to the existence of rectification, but rather as to its scope. In particular, if A's claim to rectification depends on showing that a 'mistake' has been made, how we are to judge what counts as a mistake?

Baxter v Mannion

[2011] EWCA Civ 120, [2011] 2 All ER 574

Facts: Mr Mannion was the registered proprietor of a field in Chatteris, a small village near Ely in Cambridgeshire. In 2005, Mr Baxter claimed that he had been in adverse possession of the field since 1985, and he applied under para 1(1) of Sch 6 of the Land Registration Act 2002 to be registered in place of Mr Mannion. The Land Registry duly sent a notice to Mr Mannion, warning him that, if he objected to Mr Baxter's application, he had to reply to the Registry within 65 working days. Mr Mannion made no such reply and so Mr Baxter was registered as the new proprietor. The scheme of adverse possession set out by the 2002 Act, discussed in Chapter 8, section 5.3.1, was thus followed. Mr Mannion then asked for an extension of time to reply to the Registry's notice. There is no provision in the 2002 Act for such an extension, and so the Registry advised Mr Mannion that his only option was to apply for rectification of the register. Mr Mannion made such an application, claiming that Mr Baxter had not in fact been in adverse possession of the land, and so a change to the register was necessary 'for the purpose of correcting a mistake' and was thus permitted under para 5(a) of Sch 4 of the 2002 Act.

The application was first heard by a deputy adjudicator who, having considered the evidence, found that Mr Baxter had not been in adverse possession of the land during the relevant period, and ordered rectification of the register.[27] Mr Baxter appealed to a High Court judge, arguing that, even if he had not been in adverse possession of the land, there should be no rectification as the Land Registry had correctly followed the new scheme for adverse possession set out in the 2002 Act. The High Court judge rejected Mr Baxter's appeal, and so Mr Baxter appealed again, this time to the Court of Appeal.

(a) The Meaning Of "Correcting A Mistake"

Ms Galley [counsel for Mr Baxter] submits that correcting a mistake has limited ambit. She did not put it quite as it had been put by leading counsel below, namely that the ambit was limited to procedural mistake. She submitted that the whole purpose of the new procedure was to do away with the previous law under which difficult questions of fact could arise where a squatter claimed the benefit of the Limitation Act. Whether the squatter had been in exclusive possession for 12 or more years was a notoriously difficult question to try and created uncertainty in dealings in land which might be subject to "squatter's rights". The inquiry of the deputy Adjudicator in this case was just the sort of dispute the Act was intended to do away with.

[27] For consideration of the powers of the Adjudicator to the Land Registry, an office established by s 107 of the Land Registration Act 2002, see Dixon, 'At the Sharper End: Adverse Possession before the Adjudicator' [2011] Conv 335.

She submitted that the essence of the new scheme was simplicity so as to give certainty in dealing with ownership of land. The principle is notice after an initial factual examination of the application by the Registrar. There is a limited time period to challenge. (She described it as "generous" but it should be borne in mind that the 65 day period is only provided by the rules—which cannot be used to construe the statute). Failing such challenge title would be registered and everyone would know where they were.

Ms Galley supported her contentions by reference to a number of passages in both the consultative and final reports of the Commission and HM Land Registry. I go only to her best ones, to a passage in the consultative document and the two passages in the final report:

> 10.2 (of the consultative document) If a system of registered title is to be effective, those who register their titles should be able to rely upon the fact of registration to protect their ownership except where there are compelling reasons to the contrary. All that should be required of them is to keep the Registry informed of their address for service. As we explain below, the land registration system enables registered proprietors to be protected against adverse possession in ways that would be very much harder to achieve where title is unregistered.
> 2.74 (of the final report) The essence of the new scheme in the Bill is that it gives a registered proprietor one chance, but only one chance, to terminate a squatter's adverse possession. In summary, a squatter will be able to apply to be registered as proprietor after ten years' adverse possession. The registered proprietor and certain other persons (such as a chargee) who are interested in the property will be notified of the application. If any of them object, the squatter's application will be rejected, unless he or she can establish one of the very limited exceptional grounds which will entitle him or her to be registered anyway.
> 14.34 (of the final report). Where a notice is served by the registrar (as explained in paragraph 14.32) and no counter-notice is served on him within the time prescribed, the registrar must approve the squatter's application to be registered as proprietor of the land in place of the existing proprietor. We explain the effect of such registration below, at paragraph 14.71.

She submitted that the intention was clear: a once and for all system by way of notice to be followed by a counternotice, failing the latter, registration. That produced the intended clarity, certainty and simplicity [...]

I am unable to accept these submissions for a variety of reasons which I think are compelling.

I start with the language of the Act. Sch 6(1) says that a person may apply to the registrar to be registered [...] if he has been in adverse possession of an estate. That surely indicates that a person who has not in fact been in adverse possession is simply not entitled to apply. Parliament cannot have intended that such a person could get registered title. A registration obtained by a person not entitled to apply for it would be mistaken. So, putting the register back in the condition it was prior to the application would be correction of a mistake within the meaning of Sch 4(1) and (5)

I can see no reason for limiting correction of a mistake to a mistake through some official error in the course of examination of the application, as Ms Galley in part contended for.

Secondly, like the Judge, I think the proposed construction would be an invitation to fraud. A dishonest Applicant (perhaps knowing the registered proprietor would be away or otherwise unable or unlikely to [reply to the Land Registry's notice] form in time or at all) could falsely claim he had been in adverse possession for ten years. His application would succeed because on its face it looked in order and the true owner would lose his land. The fact that there is no possibility of extending the prescribed time means that Parliament either intended that the rectification power could cover such a case or that the true owner could lose his land for want of a form in time. The latter is wholly improbable.

Ms Galley felt the force of that. She first suggested the difficulty could be overcome because a fraudulent Applicant would be met by a counternotice. But that will not cover the case where the counternotice is not sent back in time—which could include the case where the fraudster knew the Registrar's letter would not be received or, if received, would not be dealt with in time.

Her second submission on this point involved a concession: that a registration pursuant to a fraudulent application could amount to a mistake, whereas a registration pursuant to an innocent but mistaken application could not. Thus she accepted that a registration obtained by the use of a forged conveyance could be rectified as correcting a mistake. And, when she was pressed by the case of an application made when the Applicant knew that the landowner would not respond in time, eg because he or she would be away or for some other reason other than mental incapacity—specifically provided for in para 8 of Sch 6—she accepted that that too would be a mistake within the meaning of Sch 4. Her concession was made by a general appeal to the old adage "fraud unravels everything."

The insuperable difficulty with this submission is that it is impossible to draw any rational distinction between a mistake induced by fraud and a mistake induced by a wrong application. The reason for the mistake—that the Registrar was given false information—is the same in both cases.

Thirdly her submission goes against the policy of the Act as regards obtaining land by adverse possession. That policy was to make it more difficult to do that . . . As the Judge observed, "it would be very strange if a registered proprietor could be at risk of losing his land to a squatter who had never been in adverse possession."

Fourthly her reliance on Ruoff and Roper [a major practitioner work on registered conveyancing] is misplaced. Their suggestion that there is a distinction to be drawn between a void and a voidable transaction, interesting though it is, sheds no light on an application made by someone not entitled to apply. I would add that I would reserve my position as to whether the authors are right in their proposed distinction: it is difficult to see why, for instance, a transaction induced by a fraudulent misrepresentation (which would only be voidable) could not be corrected once the victim had elected to treat it as void.

Fifthly I am not persuaded by her references to passages in the consultation and final reports. True it is that they refer to the need for certainty and simplicity. The normal operation of the provisions will indeed lead to that—a 10 or more year squatter who wants to claim title can invoke the Sch 6 procedure and the landowner will generally respond. If he objects to registration upon receipt of the notice it will be refused. But if he then does nothing about it the squatter can come back after two years and get title. The normal procedure brings things to a head one way or another.

What the passages do not do is say anything about what happens when the application is made by someone who has not been in adverse possession. Nor is there anything in either report suggesting a special, limited, meaning, should be given to correction of a mistake. Indeed, if anything, to the contrary. The discussion of the Bill's provisions which became Sch 4 says this:

> 10.61 [. . .] Rectification is confined to cases where a mistake is to be corrected. This will not include every case which is at present treated as rectification. It will not therefore cover cases where the register is altered to give effect to rights that have been acquired over the land since it was registered, or where the register was originally correct, but subsequent events have made it incorrect.

This is far from suggesting any special meaning of mistake to be corrected.

> Nor can I see any answer to the point accepted by the Judge, that if land could be lost in this way the landowner would have lost it without compensation with a consequential breach of art 1 to the first Protocol of the Convention on Human Rights [...]
> (c) The "Unjust Point"
>
> It is common ground that the Adjudicator overlooked the fact that Mr Baxter had, by the time of the application, assumed possession of the land. So Sch 4(6)(2) applied. Putting aside sub-para (a), the question which the Judge assessed for himself was this: would it be unjust not to put Mr Mannion back as registered title holder. He held it would be, saying that it was a matter of "simple justice." And so it was. Mr Baxter had made an unjustified attempt to get himself title. Mr Mannion would otherwise lose his property.
>
> The only factor to which Ms Galley could point to suggest that it would be unjust to alter the register now was that Mr Mannion had failed to return the form when he could have done. Mere failure to operate bureaucratic machinery is as thistledown to Mr Mannion losing his land and Mr Baxter getting it when he had never been in adverse possession. There is nothing in this point.
> So I would dismiss this appeal.

The decision in Baxter provides a useful example of the fact that the 2002 Act does not give a registered proprietor, such as Mr Baxter, a complete guarantee of title: as we saw in Chapter 7, section 5.6.2, the Act offers only qualified indefeasibility. The critical question, of course, is the following: just how qualified is the supposed indefeasibility of registered title? As Baxter demonstrates, the answer to this question depends, to a large extent, on the meaning given to the concept of a 'mistake'. For example, Mr Baxter's counsel argued that he had not been registered as proprietor by mistake: after all, the Land Registry had waited the full 65 days for a response from Mr Mannion and, when such response was not received, the scheme laid down by the 2002 Act allowed for Mr Baxter's application as the new registered proprietor. This 'procedural' argument was rejected by the Court of Appeal: it was held that Mr Baxter's entitlement to be registered depended not only on the lack of response from Mr Mannion, but also on Mr Baxter's actually having been in adverse possession of the land for the relevant period.

Baxter may, therefore, suggest that, in deciding if there is a mistake in the register which needs correction, we need to ask if the current registered party had an entitlement to be registered. As the next extracts show, however, this merely shifts the difficulty to deciding when such an entitlement exists. Before considering those cases, it is worth noting that, whilst Mr Mannion's application for rectification depended on showing that there had been a mistake, the mere presence of a mistake does not guarantee rectification.[28] Firstly, there may be 'exceptional circumstances' that justify the court or the registrar in not rectifying the register. Secondly, and more importantly, rectification cannot be ordered against a registered proprietor in possession of the land, unless: (i) that current registered proprietor has, by fraud or lack of proper care, caused or substantially contributed to the mistake; or (ii) it would for any other reason be unjust not to change the register. It is, therefore, important to remember that, whilst the debate about the meaning of 'mistake' is crucial to understanding the nature of the indefeseability of title given by the 2002 Act, the presence of a mistake does not guarantee rectification.[29]

Baxter v Mannion is a relatively simple case as it concerned only two parties. Things are more complicated when we return to our example, first discussed in section 1.3 above, in which X forges a transfer of registered title from A and then grants a legal charge in favour of C. In such a case, it is clear that X's registration is a mistake: X had no entitlement to be registered as A did not consent to the purported transfer to X. The position in relation to C is less clear: C did have an entitlement to be registered, as C's charge was created with the authority of someone who was, at the time, the registered proprietor. The following extract is from a case in which the Court of Appeal considered exactly the same situation as our example.

Barclays Bank plc v Guy [2008] EWCA Civ 452

Facts: Trevor Guy was the registered proprietor of 19 hectares of land, with development potential, in Manchester. In 2004, his registered titles were transferred to Ten Acre Ltd (TAL). TAL was registered as proprietor of the land, and granted a charge over the land to Barclays Bank, to secure all moneys owed to Barclays by Lexi Holdings plc. Barclays registered its charge in March 2005. In 2006, Lexi Holdings went into administration, apparently owing Barclays over £100m. Barclays wished to sell the land and use the proceeds towards meeting this debt. Mr Guy objected, claiming that the transfer of the land to TAL had taken place without his authority, and so was void. He argued that he should be reinstated as the registered proprietor of the land, and that Barclays' charge should be removed from the register. Barclays applied for summary judgment, arguing that even if the registration of TAL had occurred without Mr Guy's authority, it still held a valid charge over the land and was, therefore, free to sell the land.

As the case involved an application for summary judgment, it had to be assumed that the facts alleged by Mr Guy were correct. On that basis, the case is identical to the example we discussed in section 1.3 above, where X acquires A's registered title without A's authority, and then grants a charge to C. At first instance, the judge accepted the bank's argument and granted summary judgment in its favour. Mr Guy then sought permission to appeal. This application was heard by Carnwath and Lloyd LJJ, and permission to appeal was refused. Lloyd LJ set out the reasons for denying permission to appeal.

Lloyd LJ

At [8]–[9]

[...] For my part, I am prepared to proceed on the footing that Mr Guy has shown a good arguable case for saying that the transfer was a forgery and may have also been procured by fraud, and if it was a forgery, it would be a void document. It would be a piece of paper of no value or dispositive effect. That would be all very well as between Mr Guy and Ten Acre Ltd, but by virtue of section 58 of the Land Registration Act 2002 (the 2002 Act) and the other provisions of that Act the register is conclusive, subject only to its rectification pursuant to the provisions of the Act. Ten Acre Ltd was the registered proprietor in March 2005 and it was therefore able to charge the property to Barclays to secure indebtedness. Accordingly, what matters for Mr Guy is not merely being able to, in effect, set aside the transfer to Ten Acre Ltd, he also has to be able to set aside the effect of the charge. In legal terms, that would require him to obtain the rectification of the register so as to remove the charge from it.

[29] Indeed, it can be argued that, in Baxter v Mannion, the Court of Appeal erred in using the fact of the mistake, by itself, as proof that it would be unjust not to rectify the register: see Dixon, 'HM Adjudicator to the Land Registry and Questions of Rectification' [2010] Conv 207.

At [19]–[23]

Coming back, however, to the question of rectification, what Mr Guy would have to show is that the order for the removal of the charge from the register could be made for the purposes of correcting a mistake. He therefore has to show that the registration of the charge was a mistake. I can see that he could well arguably show that the registration of the original transfer was a mistake, especially if the transfer were the product of a forgery, because the registration of something that was not properly executed on the part of the registered proprietor must be a mistake. There is no question of that kind with regard to the charge. It was properly executed by Ten Acre Ltd. It is in proper form and there is nothing intrinsically wrong with it. What is wrong with it, according to Mr Guy, is that Ten Acre Ltd did not have a good title to the land. Its title was subject to rectification on the part of Mr Guy. Mr Guy acknowledges that, if his solicitor had acted with sufficient diligence and promptness, he could have entered or lodged at the registry a unilateral notice, the equivalent to what used to be called a caution, which would have protected him. In fact, he did instruct a solicitor to do that, but it got there only the day after the registration of the Barclays charge. So, he lost any priority in that respect. No doubt other proceedings may arise from that, but that is not the concern of these proceedings.

What Mr Guy said, in support of a contention that the registration of the chargee, the mortgagee, Barclays, is a mistake, is that it must be a mistake for a charge to be registered if the mortgagee knows that the borrower, the mortgagor, does not have a good title to the land. If, therefore, the chargee has actual notice of the defect in the mortgagor's title, he would say, the registration of the charge is a mistake [. . .]

[. . .] it seems to me that it is necessary to grasp the nettle of what is meant by 'mistake'. In that respect, while the scope of the phrase 'correcting a mistake' is no doubt something that requires to be explored and discussed and developed in the course of future litigation, which will be decided upon the facts and upon the merits of each case, I cannot see that it is arguable that the registration of the charge can be said to have been a mistake, or the result of a mistake, unless, at the least, Mr Guy can go so far as to show that the bank, the mortgagee, had either actual notice, or what amounts to the same, what is referred to as 'Nelsonian' or 'blind eye notice', of the defect in the title of the mortgagor, Ten Acre Ltd in the present case. I simply cannot see how it could be argued that if the purchaser or chargee knows nothing of the problem underlying the intermediate owner's title, that the registration of the charge or sale to the ultimate purchaser or chargee can be said to be a mistake. That seems to me inconsistent with the structure and terms of the 2002 Act. So, the question is whether Mr Guy can show an arguable case, on the evidence, for saying that Barclays had actual notice or was turning a blind eye to matters that it knew, which would if it addressed them properly, have shown it that Ten Acre Ltd did not have a good title to the property.

Lloyd LJ then found that, on the facts of the case, there was no evidence that could support a contention that the bank knew that there were doubts about the circumstances in which TAL had acquired its registered title. As a result, Mr Guy was not given permission to appeal—although, as we will see below, the case did later return to the Court of Appeal.

In Barclays Bank v Guy, Lloyd LJ adopted what might be called a 'narrow' approach to the interpretation of the word 'mistake' in Sch 4 of the 2002 Act. Applied to the facts of Guy, the strongest version of this narrow approach is as follows: even if TAL's registration was the result of a fraud or a forgery, ss 23 and 58 of the 2002 Act nonetheless make clear that, for as long as TAL is so registered, it has owner's powers, including the power to grant a charge over the land. So whilst TAL's registration counts as a mistake, as it occurred without the consent of the then registered proprietor (Mr Guy), Barclays' registration of its charge cannot be a mistake, as the granting of the charge did occur with the consent of the then registered proprietor (TAL). This is essentially the view taken by Lloyd LJ, but with one twist: he did entertain the argument that, if it can be said that Barclays had sufficient knowledge of the original mistake (that is, of TAL's assumed fraud or forgery) then it can be said that Barclays' registration, like that of TAL, is also a mistake. Lloyds LJ's consideration of this notice-based point is obiter, as no such notice was present on the facts of the case, and it seems likely that it was only mentioned so as to show that, even if notice could be used as part of the definition of a mistake, there was no such notice on the facts of the case. After all, there is no indication in the 2002 Act that notice may be relevant to the definition of 'mistake' and the Law Commission was very clear, when considering other important parts of the Act, that a general notion of notice is not to be used to reduce the protection available to a party acquiring a right in registered land.[30]

Despite Lloyds LJ's intention to 'grasp the nettle' of defining mistake, Barclays Bank v Guy does not form the last word on the matter, as the two following cases make clear.

Odogwu v Vastguide Ltd
[2009] EWHC 3565 (Ch)

Facts: In 1986, Dr Odogwu, who lived in Nigeria, purchased a property ('Victoria Rise') in North West London as an investment, and was registered as proprietor. In 2006, a fraudster impersonated Dr Odogwu and purported to grant a charge over the land to Credit & Mercantile, to secure a loan of £750,000. Credit & Mercantile registered as proprietor of the charge. The loan was not repaid and Credit & Mercantile wished to sell the land to recoup some of its losses. In 2007, the sale went ahead and Vastguide plc was registered as proprietor in place of Dr Odogwu. Dr Odogwu then claimed that the register should be rectified, and that he should be reinstated as registered proprietor.

It is important to note that Dr Odogwu's solicitor first discovered the fraud, and alerted the police, in early 2007. The solicitor attempted to lodge a unilateral notice with the Land Registry to prevent dealings with the land, but his application was not accepted by the Land Registry. The solicitor did, however, discover that two parties (Gromore Ltd and Vastguide) were interested in purchasing the land, and so informed those companies directly of the fraud perpetrated on Dr Odogwu. As a result, Gromore Ltd decided not to buy the land. Vastguide considered its position, but received legal advice that, even if there had been such a fraud, it would not be possible for Dr Odogwu to seek rectification against Vastguide. Vastguide, therefore, went ahead with its purchase of the land. Vastguide subsequently gave a legal charge over the land to the second defendant.

Dr Odogwu then applied to the court for rectification of the register: he wanted to be reinstated as registered proprietor, with the later charge granted by Vastguide also

For a different analysis, in which C's knowledge may have a role to play in deciding upon rectification, see Nair, 'Morality and the Mirror: The Normative Limits of the "Principles of Land Registration"' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 6 (ed Bright, 2011).

removed from the register. Vastguide and the second defendant opposed the application. The Chief Land Registrar wished to be joined in the proceedings, and so was added as the third defendant. Judgment was given by Sir Donald Rattee.

Sir Donald Rattee

At [14]–[16]

[. . .] It is the Claimant's case that the registration of Vastguide as proprietor of Victoria Rise is a mistake that can and should be corrected by rectification of the register under the provisions of Sch 4 to the Act. The registration of Vastguide as proprietor is, according to the Claimant, a mistake within the meaning of para 1(a) of Sch 4, because it is an entry which would not have been made on the register were it not for the forgery committed by the fraudster. The Claimant accepts, as he has to, that Victoria Rise is in the possession of Vastguide, and that therefore he cannot obtain an order for the rectification he seeks unless he can show that one of the conditions set out in para 3(2)(a) and (b) of Sch 4 is satisfied, but he submits that one or other condition is satisfied on the facts as I should find them.

Vastguide accepts that the court has jurisdiction to order the rectification sought by the Claimant, but submits that that jurisdiction can only be exercised if the court is satisfied that the condition in para 3(2)(b) is satisfied, namely that it would for some reason be unjust for rectification to be refused. This submission is based on the submission by Vastguide that the relevant mistake for the purpose of Sch 4 is not the registration of it as proprietor, but the registration (deleted on the registration of the purchase of Victoria Rise by Vastguide) of Credit & Mercantile as chargee of Victoria Rise. It is impossible, submits Vastguide, for the court to find that condition (a) in para 3(2) of Sch 4 is satisfied in relation to this latter mistake, because it cannot possibly be said that Vastguide "caused or substantially contributed" to the mistake consisting of the registration of the fraudulent charge, in which Vastguide had no involvement. Vastguide denies that there would be anything unjust about refusing rectification, leaving the Claimant to seek indemnity from the Land Registrar under s 103 of and Sch 8 to the Act.

According to Vastguide's submission, the registration of it as proprietor of Victoria Rise cannot be said to be a mistake in the register, because it correctly recognised the effect of s 58(1) of the Act that, despite the fact that the charge of Victoria Rise to Credit & Mercantile was a forgery, the registration of that company as proprietor of the charge gave it all the powers of such a proprietor, including the power to sell to Vastguide. Therefore the transfer to Vastguide is to be deemed to be valid, and its registration no mistake.

I must now go back a little in time to explain the facts relevant to an argument on estoppel which has featured largely in submissions before me. By its Claim Form issued on 9 May 2007 the Claimant sought an order for rectification of the register by removing the name of Vastguide and restoring the name of the Claimant as proprietor [. . .]

Vastguide's solicitors indicated that they did not accept the proposition that the registration of Vastguide as proprietor could be a 'mistake' within the meaning of Sch 4 to the Act, because, by virtue of the effect of s 58 of the Act to deem the charge effective once registered, Credit & Mercantile was deemed to have power to pass title to Vastguide, and the Land Registry had accordingly been bound to register Vastguide as proprietor. This objection to the claim for rectification was in line with advice which had been received from counsel on 22 March 2007—before Vastguide's purchase. It was also in line with the view of the law that was apparently taken by the Land Registry at the time, though no longer. Before me counsel for the Chief Land Registrar said that, obviously subject to any contrary decision of the court, he now takes the view that in the circumstances of the present case the registration of Vastguide was itself a mistake rectifiable by an order under Sch 4 to the Act [. . .]

In view of Vastguide's contention that the court had no jurisdiction to rectify the register so as to remove the registration of Vastguide as proprietor, because that registration was not a mistake within the meaning of Sch 4 to the Act, the Claimant proposed and Vastguide agreed that the court should be asked to determine as a preliminary issue the question whether the court did have jurisdiction to remove the registration of Vastguide on the assumption that the charge to Credit & Mercantile was a forgery [. . .]

On 2 November 2007 the Chief Land Registrar filed a defence to the Claimant's claim in which he conceded that, 'if the Claimant establishes the fact and matters relied on,' the court would have jurisdiction to rectify the register as against both Vastguide and the Second Defendant [. . .]

[As a result of the concession by the Chief Land Registrar, the parties agreed to a consent order, which settled the preliminary issue in the Claimant's favour, through an agreement that the court did have jurisdiction to rectify the register. As a result of signing this consent order, Vastguide was now estopped from denying that the court had jurisdiction to order rectification.]

[. . .] However, counsel [for Vastguide] submitted that [the court] has that jurisdiction, not because the entry on the register of Vastguide is a mistake, but because the entry of the Credit & Mercantile charge was a mistake (because it was a forgery), and the court's jurisdiction under para 2 of Sch 4 to the Act to make an order for alteration of the register for the purpose of correcting a mistake includes jurisdiction to make an order for such alternation for the purpose of correcting, not only a mistake on the register, but the consequences of such a mistake. This, submits Vastguide, would include jurisdiction in the present case to remove its entry as proprietor as being a consequence of the mistaken entry of the Credit & Mercantile charge, even though (according to Vastguide's argument) its own entry as proprietor was not itself a mistake.

The motive of Vastguide in now raising this argument is clearly that it prefers the relevant mistake for the purposes of Sch 4 to the Act to be the entry of the charge to Credit & Mercantile rather than its own entry as proprietor, because it can scarcely be said that Vastguide caused or substantially contributed to the entry of the Credit & Mercantile charge within para 3(2)(a) of Sch 4, whereas it is the Claimant's case that Vastguide did cause or substantially contribute to its own entry as proprietor.

Counsel for Vastguide submits that its concession recorded in the consent order that the court has jurisdiction to grant the rectification sought by the Claimant therefore did not amount to a concession that the entry of Vastguide as proprietor was a mistake. For the court's admitted jurisdiction is based not on the premise that that entry is itself a mistake, but on the premise that it is a consequence of another mistake, namely the entry of the Credit & Mercantile charge.

I find this argument unattractive and unconvincing. As I have already said, I am quite satisfied that when Vastguide made its concession recorded in the consent order, it did so, and was inevitably understood by the Claimant as doing so, on the basis that it conceded that it was abandoning the only argument it had previously put against the court's jurisdiction, namely that its entry on the register as proprietor was not a mistake for the purposes of Sch 4 to the Act [. . .]

In my judgment, Vastguide made its concession intending it to be understood as an abandonment of the only argument it had raised against jurisdiction, namely that its entry on the register was not a mistake within the meaning of Sch 4 to the Act. The Claimant entirely reasonably understood it as such. In those circumstances it is an abuse of the process of the court for Vastguide now to seek to resurrect that argument. In my judgment it is estopped by its own concession from doing so [. . .]

However, in case I am wrong in this conclusion, I will proceed to consider Vastguide's new argument, namely that the court has jurisdiction to remove the entry of Vastguide on the register on the ground that such removal would constitute the correction of the consequences of the previous mistake consisting of the registration of the Credit & Mercantile charge.

The relevant jurisdiction of the court is that conferred by para 2(1)(a) of Sch 4 to the Act, namely "to make an order for alteration of the register for the purpose of correcting a mistake". In my judgment the reference in that quotation from para 2(1) to a mistake must be to a mistake on the register, so that it can be corrected by an alteration of the register. I accept the submission of counsel for the Claimant that a fundamental objection to Vastguide's argument is that the Credit & Mercantile charge, which Vastguide argues is the relevant mistake, is no longer on the register. It was deleted on completion of the sale to Vastguide when Credit & Mercantile was paid its debt.

Counsel for Vastguide sought to overcome this initial obstacle by submitting that, for this purpose, the register is not limited to the current edition of the register showing currently effective entries, which admittedly does not show the charge, but extends to the records still held by the Land Registry showing all previous entries, including those since deleted. I find this argument misconceived. In my judgment the reference in para 2 of Sch 4 to the Act to a mistake is to a mistake appearing on the current edition of the register which shows subsisting entries. Only such a conclusion makes sense in the context of the jurisdiction in para 2 to alter of register for the purpose of correcting a mistake. I cannot see what purpose would be served by making an alteration to a previous edition of the register to remove an entry such as the Credit & Mercantile charge which has already been deleted.

In my judgment Vastguide's new argument is bad for this reason alone. However, quite apart from this point it does not seem to me obvious that the reference to "correcting a mistake" in para 2(1)(a) of Sch 4 to the Act can properly be construed as including a reference to correcting the consequences of the mistake, which is the next step in Vastguide's argument. However, counsel for Vastguide relied in this context on a recent decision of a Land Registry Adjudicator in Ajibade v Bank of Scotland plc in the course of which the Adjudicator seems to have taken the view that the correction of a mistake by rectification of the register could extend beyond the correction of an entry on the register to include the correction of the consequences of such a mistake. As it is not necessary for me to decide this point in this case in the light of my rejection of Vastguide's argument on the ground that the Credit & Mercantile charge has already been deleted from the register (a point that did not arise in the Ajibade case) I do not think it appropriate that I express any conclusion on it.

Thus, even if I had not concluded that Vastguide is estopped from relying on the argument I have just been considering, I would have rejected the argument as misconceived. Counsel for Vastguide accepted that, if he failed on that argument, Vastguide would be estopped by the concession recited in the consent order from denying that the entry in the register of Vastguide as proprietor was a mistake within the meaning of Sch 4 to the Act, since that would then be the only ground on which the court would have the jurisdiction which Vastguide had accepted by its concession. It is accordingly unnecessary, and therefore inappropriate, for me to express any conclusion on the question whether, as a matter of law, the entry of Vastguide as proprietor is capable of being such a mistake. I proceed to consider the parties' cases on the footing that it is such a mistake which the court has jurisdiction in these proceedings to rectify by removing that entry from the register, subject to the provisions of para 3 of Sch 4.

Since such alteration of the register would affect the title of the proprietor of a registered estate in land who is in possession of the land, by virtue of para 3(2) of Sch 4 I may not make an order for such alteration unless I am satisfied that one or other of the conditions specified in para 3(2)(a) and (b) is satisfied. Thus I have to be satisfied either (a) that Vastguide has by fraud or lack of proper care caused or substantially contributed to the mistake, ie the registration of itself as proprietor, or (b) that it would for any other reason be unjust for the alteration not to be made.

The Claimant submits that I should find that condition (a) is satisfied, in that Vastguide clearly caused or substantially contributed to the registration of itself as proprietor by making the application for such registration without which it would not have been made, and that it did so by failing to exercise proper care to prevent the true owner of Victoria Rise being deprived of his property as a result of fraud. It failed to exercise proper such proper care in that it took a transfer of Victoria Rise from Credit & Mercantile and applied for that transfer to be registered with knowledge that Credit & Mercantile only obtained power to transfer the property as a result of a forgery.

It is, in my judgment, clear from the facts that I have recited that, when it completed its purchase from Credit & Mercantile, Vastguide did know that Credit & Mercantile had only acquired its power to sell by reason of a forgery by an unknown third party. It had been told that by the Claimant's solicitor and knew that the police had confirmed that the passport in the name of the Claimant used by the third party to impersonate the Claimant in relation to the borrowing from, and charge to, Credit & Mercantile was a forgery.

Counsel for Vastguide submitted that this did not show that Vastguide caused or substantially contributed to the mistake—ie the registration of itself as proprietor—by any lack of proper care. It had only completed the purchase from Credit & Mercantile after giving the Claimant, by his solicitor, repeated opportunities to prevent such completion by making an application to the court, which the Claimant never did. Vastguide had taken counsel's opinion and had been advised that, if it completed its purchase, there would be only a small chance of the Claimant succeeding in obtaining rectification of the register to remove the entry of Vastguide as proprietor. On the other hand, submitted counsel for Vastguide, the Claimant (at least by his solicitor) was fully aware of the facts of the forgery and the proposed sale by Credit & Mercantile to Vastguide, and must—or at least should have appreciated that his property was at risk if he took no steps to protect it by obtaining an order of the court to prevent the transfer to Vastguide. On this basis counsel for Vastguide submitted that what caused or substantially contributed to the registration of Vastguide as proprietor was not any lack of proper care by Vastguide, but the lack of proper care by the Claimant in failing to protect his property.

I entirely accept that it is extraordinary that the Claimant did not make any attempt to obtain an order of the court to prevent completion of the sale to Vastguide, and did not make any earlier application for rectification of the register once he knew of the forgery. I can find no excuse for his idleness in this respect. However this does not, in my judgment, alter the fact that Vastguide did take its transfer and apply for its registration with actual knowledge that its ability to do so depended on the perpetration of a fraud on the Claimant by use of a forged passport. In my judgment it did not take proper care to minimise the consequences of such fraud. Vastguide relied on the fact that, by the time it had confirmation from the police that the passport used by the fraudster was a forgery, it was contractually bound to complete its purchase. However it apparently did not think fit to ask Credit & Mercantile to release it from its contract, as its predecessor as a possible purchaser from Credit & Mercantile, namely Gromore Ltd, successfully did, once it had knowledge of the fraud. Moreover, even before entering into the contract to purchase Victoria Rise from Credit & Mercantile, Vastguide knew from [Dr Odoguw's solicitor's] letter of 16 February 2007 that > the police had confirmed that a forged passport had been used to enable a fraudulent person to grant the Credit & Mercantile charge.

> I consider Vastguide's reliance on this point on its having taken advice from counsel is misconceived. Vastguide's only purpose in doing so was, for its own protection, to see whether its title would be liable to be upset by rectification of the register after completion. Neither do I see any merit in Vastguide's counsel's argument that Vastguide cannot be said to have caused or contributed to its registration as proprietor by lack of proper care because the provisions of the Act entitled it to apply for such registration.
>
> In my judgment Vastguide did, by a lack of proper care within the meaning of 3(2)(a) of Sch 4 to the Act, cause or substantially contribute to the admitted mistake on the register consisting of its registration as proprietor despite the fact that its title was the consequence of fraud by a third party on the true owner. This means that I have power to order alteration of the register to substitute the Claimant for Vastguide as the proprietor of Victoria Rise.
>
> I am also of opinion that, even if I were wrong in finding the condition in para 3(2)(a) of Sch 4 satisfied, I would have power to make the order sought by the Claimant, because condition (b) in para 3(2) is satisfied. In my judgment in all the circumstances that I have described, it would be unjust not to make such an order. Counsel for Vastguide relied in this context on the Claimant's own failure to take steps open to him to protect his own property and title to it, and the fact that, if I refuse to order rectification, the Claimant would prima facie be entitled to compensation from the Chief Land Registrar for the loss of his property, which was of no interest to him except as an investment.
> I take those points into account, as I do also the facts that Victoria Rise is of interest to Vastguide only as an investment and that Vastguide has a claim against the Chief Land Registrar for compensation in the event that I do order rectification of the register. In my judgment, however, it would be unjust not to order rectification as sought by the Claimant in the present circumstances when I am satisfied that the Claimant has been deprived of his property by means of the fraud of an unknown third party and that Vastguide chose to compound the effect of that fraud by entering into and completing a purchase of the property with knowledge that it was able to do so only because of that fraud.
> The remaining question is whether I should exercise that power. Paragraph 3(3) of Sch 4 to the Act requires me to exercise it unless there are exceptional circumstances which justify my not doing so. In his closing submissions counsel for Vastguide accepted (rightly in any judgment) that, if he failed in his arguments on para 3(2) of Sch 4, he could not point to any other exceptional circumstances within para 3(3). In my judgment there are none.
> Accordingly I will make the order for alteration of the register sought by the Claimant.

The chief importance of Odogwu v Vastguide Ltd lies in the point conceded by the Chief Land Registrar and, as a result, by the other defendants in the case: if X, without A's authority, is registered as proprietor in place of A and then grants a legal charge to C, the registration of C, as well as of X, counts as a 'mistake'. As a result, A has a good chance of having the register rectified not only against X, but also against C. As noted by Sir Donald Rattee in Odogwu, this concession represented a change in approach by the Chief Land Registrar. The previously prevailing view, adopted, for example, in Ruoff and Roper on Registered Conveyancing, a leading practitioner work, was the one for which Vastguide initially argued in Odogwu: even if X is registered as proprietor without A's authority, the fact of X's registration gives X the legal power to grant C a valid charge. The Chief Land's Registrar change of opinion is important as it involved a rejection of such a 'narrow' approach to the interpretation of 'mistake'. Its influence can be seen in Ruoff and Roper itself: the editors now adopt a broader approach to the definition of mistake, as can be seen in the following extract. The extract considers an example in which R1 is initially the registered proprietor. R2 then forges R1's signature on a transfer form and is registered in R1's place. R2 then grants a legal charge in favour of M1. The example is, thus, identical to the one set out in section 1.3 above, with R1 in place of A, R2 in place of X, and M1 in place of C.

Ruoff and Roper on Registered Conveyancing (ed Cavill et al, April 2011 release, paras 46-028–46-029)

> The Registrar will rectify the proprietorship register against R2 [. . .] In addition, it is the current view of the Registrar that it will also be possible, for the reasons explained below, to rectify the charges register against M1 even though the registration of M1's charge was not in itself a 'mistake' in the narrow sense of the term.
> The legal estate is deemed to be vested in R2 when he was registered as its proprietor, even though it would not otherwise have vested in him owing to the invalidity of the purported disposition from R1 to R2 [. . .] The consequence is that R2 had full owner's powers of disposition over the estate, including the power to grant the legal charge to M1, since he was at that point the registered proprietor. His powers of disposition subsisted for so long as his registration as proprietor remained effective. It cannot be said therefore that the disposition by way of legal charge to M1 was in itself invalid, nor that the registration of the charge was a mistake in the narrow sense.
> However, the Registrar will accept an application to rectify the register against M1 on the basis of a broader interpretation of the term "correction of a mistake" within this context. That is, on the basis that either (a) the registration of M1's charge forms part of the original mistake, in that it directly flows from it, i.e. from the registration of R2 as proprietor, and the removal of M1's charge necessarily forms part of the correction of the mistake; or (b) although not in itself a mistake, the registration of M1's charge is a consequence of the mistake, ie the registration of R2 as proprietor, and that in order to fully correct that mistake—pursuant to the Registrar's power to alter the register to correct a mistake—it will be necessary to remove M1's charge as well as to restore R1 as proprietor of the registered estate [. . .] R2 would not be entitled to indemnity. However, M1 would be entitled to indemnity from the Registrar in consequence of the rectification [. . .]

There is a tension here between the analysis of Ruoff and Roper and the concession of the Chief Land Registrar in Odogwu v Vastguide Ltd. In that case, the concession was that the relevant mistake was Vastguide's registration as proprietor. This was important: because Vastguide was in possession of the land, Dr Odogwu's application for rectification could only succeed if Vastguide had, by fraud or lack of proper care, caused or substantially contributed to the mistake; or if it was, for any other reason, unjust not to rectify the register. If the relevant mistake was Vastguide's registration, it was easy to show that it had caused or contributed to that mistake, as it had proceeded to buy the land despite warnings from Dr Odogwu's solicitor. In contrast, on the analysis set out in Ruoff and Roper, Vastguide's registration was not a mistake: like C in our example, or M1 in Ruoff and Roper's example, Vastguide had acquired its right with the authority of the then registered party. On this analysis, then, the only mistake is the initial registration of Credit & Mercantile, procured as it was by forgery. According to Ruoff and Roper, it can be said that correcting that mistake may necessitate removing not only Credit & Mercantile's charge, but also Vastguide's registered title. As noted by Sir Donald Rattee, there is a difficulty in applying this analysis to the facts of Odogwu v Vastguide: Credit & Mercantile's registered charge no longer existed when Dr Odogwu applied for rectification, so it may seem strange to see that application as based on the need to correct Credit & Mercantile's registration. Further, if the Ruoff and Roper analysis is correct, it would be impossible for a party such as Dr Odogwu to show that Vastguide's fraud or lack of proper care contributed to the mistake, as the relevant mistake would be the registration of Credit & Mercantile, which occurred before Vastguide's involvement in the case. This means that, in a case where a third party such as Vastguide is in possession of the registered land, rectification in favour of an initial registered proprietor such as Dr Odogwu will only be possible if it is 'for any other reason unjust' not to rectify the register.

It does seem, however, that the Ruoff and Roper analysis may be the prevailing one, as can be seen by the analysis of Lord Neuberger MR in the extract below. The extract is taken from what was the next step in the Barclays Bank v Guy litigation. As one might expect, the Chief Land Registrar's change of approach, evidenced by his concession in Odogwu v Vastguide Ltd, was a matter of some interest to Mr Guy. After all, the approach of Lloyd LJ in Barclays Bank v Guy, set out in the extract above, was influenced by the former 'narrow' approach to the interpretation of mistake. In fact, following Odogwu, Mr Guy asked the Court of Appeal to reconsider its initial refusal to grant him permission to appeal against the summary judgment given in favour of Barclays. The difficulty faced by Mr Guy was that, as a matter of procedure, it is very difficult to reopen a decision not to allow permission to appeal. As a result, the Court of Appeal dismissed his further attempt to win permission to appeal. As the following brief extract shows, Lord Neuberger MR, however, did suggest that Mr Guy might have had more success in his initial application if his case had been presented differently.

Barclays Bank v Guy
[2010] EWCA Civ 1396

Lord Neuberger MR

At [35]

It also seems clear that Lloyd LJ's analysis proceeded on the basis that the alleged 'mistake' for the purposes of para 2(1) of schedule 4 to the 2002 Act was the registration of the Charge in the charges register. However, there are other ways of putting Mr Guy's case, namely (a) that the removal of his name from the proprietorship register was a mistake, and, in order to correct that mistake, the Charge would have to be removed from the charges register, or (b) that the registration of the Charge flowed from the mistake of registering the Transfer, and therefore should be treated as part and parcel of that mistake.

In a case where X is fraudulently registered in A's place, and X then grants a charge to C, the analysis suggested by Lord Neuberger MR, like that now put forward in Ruoff and Roper, does not depend on showing that C's registration is itself a 'mistake'. Rather, it makes use of the undoubted point that X's registration is a mistake, and then argues that the powers of the Registrar or court to correct that mistake extend to allowing the removal of C's charge, as well as the removal of X. Despite the difficulties noted above, it does seem that this analysis, when contrasted to the 'narrow' interpretation of mistake that would deny A any chance of removing C's charge, may provide a fairer balance between the demands of static security (the protection of A as previous registered proprietor) and the demands of dynamic security

(the protection of C as having newly acquired a registered right). Certainly, the possibility of rectification does show that the scheme of the 2002 Act does not provide complete protection to C: the register is not, in the Law Commission's phrase, 'complete and accurate'. As the author of the following extract suggests, it may be no bad thing that, in this way, the reality of the Act does not match up to the rhetoric that lay behind its introduction.

Nair, 'The Normative Limits of the "Principles of Land Registration"' in Modern Studies in Property Law, vol 6 (ed Bright, 2011, p 282)

In my view [. . .] the [narrow] interpretation of the 'mistake' provision of the schedule [formerly] put forward in Ruoff is misguided [. . .] [T]he conclusiveness and accuracy of the register are competing policy goals. Although the conclusiveness of the register is an important ideal, the underlying normative principle that it represents is protection of the reliance of a purchaser who has fulfilled the obligations imposed upon him by the registration rules. This reliance is protected even where the LRA 2002 schedule 4 is engaged and it is acknowledged that a 'mistake' has been made, due to the scope of the discretion exercisable by the court or the registrar when it comes to applying the schedule, as well as the stronger protection that will be offered to a purchaser who is a registered proprietor in possession. If Vastguide Ltd had not been aware of that it was relying on a forgery to acquire rights, rectification would not have been ordered against them. Further, if the courts took the view that they had no jurisdiction to rectify or alter the register in this situation, the underlying policy objective contained in the ideal of the accuracy of the register would not be protected: the failure to rectify or alter would mean that the register did not reflect the position as it would have been if all parties had fulfilled their duties to deal honestly with the Land Registry.

3.1.2 Overriding interests

If the possibility of rectification is one dent in the idea of a 'complete and accurate' register, the concept of an overriding interest is another. The Law Commission's view of such interests is clear, as the following extract shows.

Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001, [8.6])

It is the fact that overriding interests do not appear on the register, yet bind any person who acquires any interest in registered land, that makes them such an unsatisfactory feature of the system of registered conveyancing. The existence of such rights means that inquiries as to title cannot be confined to a search of the register. We devoted a substantial part of the Consultative Document to a discussion of overriding interests and how their impact might be reduced without causing any disadvantage to those who have the benefit of them. Our conclusion was that interests should only have overriding status where protection against buyers was needed, but where it was neither reasonable to expect nor sensible to require any entry on the register. We suggested a number of strategies to ensure that the only overriding interests were those which met these criteria. As we have explained above, the introduction of electronic conveyancing will, of itself, substantially reduce the circumstances in which those criteria are met. As might be anticipated, our proposals attracted a good deal of interest and the responses were lively. However, for the most part they were supported. Where this was not so, or where better solutions were proposed, those contrary or better views have been adopted.

Has the LRA 2002 achieved this aim of limiting overriding interests to situations in which B (a party with a pre-existing legal or equitable property right) cannot reasonably be expected to register that right? Clearly, it has not. For example, under Sch 3, para 2, any equitable interest of a party in actual occupation counts as an overriding interest (see Chapter 14, section 5.1). And, as McFarlane has pointed out,[31] 'the presence or absence of actual occupation is irrelevant to the question of whether B can be expected to register his right'. So, as noted above, the 2002 Act currently allows B to have an overriding interest if: (i) he has bought land from A, and has failed to register as the new holder of A's legal estate; as long as (ii) B is in actual occupation of that land. In such a case, it is usually perfectly reasonable to expect B to register (he may well have been instructed by his solicitor or conveyancer to do so)—yet this does not prevent B from acquiring an overriding interest.

Of course, as noted in section 2.2.3 above, the result in our example may well change when e-conveyancing is operational: B's failure to register his contract with A may then deny him an equitable interest in the land. As we saw in Chapter 7, sections 3.7 and 6.1, however, even then, the courts will have to grapple with the question of whether B can acquire an equitable interest through the doctrines of proprietary estoppel or constructive trust. Again, this shows that the attitude of the judges will be decisive to the success, or otherwise, of the LRA 2002 in progressing towards a 'complete and accurate' register.

It is worth noting that the Law Commission attempted to limit the scope of 'actual occupation' overriding interests. For example, Sch 3, para 2(c), means that even if B is in actual occupation, his right will not be overriding if his 'occupation would not have been obvious on a reasonably careful inspection of the land at the time of the disposition', unless C, in any case, had 'actual knowledge' of B's right. As we noted in Chapter 14, section 5.1.2, this qualification aims to give extra protection to C—but the extent of that protection again rests with the judges who will have to give meaning to the term 'reasonably careful inspection'. And, as suggested by Jackson (see the extract in Chapter 14, section 5.1.2), it may well be the case that the width of the concept of 'actual occupation' under the LRA 1925 came not from any absence of such a qualification, but rather from the judges' willingness to protect important rights of B, even if those rights had not been noted on the register.

It is important to remember that the property rights of those in actual occupation of registered land are not the only form of overriding interest. For example, as we saw in Chapter 14, sections 5.2 and 5.3, Sch 3, para 1, gives overriding status to all non-exceptional legal leases of seven years or less, and Sch 3, para 3, does the same for almost all legal easements. In contrast, as we noted in section 2.1.5 above, an equitable lease or equitable easement can only be overriding if accompanied by actual occupation of the land that it burdens. Again, it is very hard to see how this can be reconciled to the Law Commission's view that B's right should be overriding only where it is unreasonable to expect B to register that right. For example, compare: (i) a case in which A, using a deed, grants B a seven-year lease of business premises; and (ii) a case in which A orally promises B that B already has a seven-year lease of residential property. In each case, B relies on this promise by incurring expenses in modifying the land: in which case is it more reasonable to expect B to register? The answer is clear—but it is only in the first case, not the second, that B's right is necessarily overriding.

As noted in section 2.2.2 above, the position is likely to change when e-conveyancing rules are introduced: it may well be the case that any lease of more than three years will have to be registered in order to count as a legal lease. There will thus be a reduction in the number of overriding interests that it is reasonable to expect B to register. Yet the point remains that many interests will still fail to be overriding, even though it is not necessarily reasonable to expect B to register. For example, no equitable interest acquired by B under the doctrine of proprietary estoppel (see Chapter 10, section 5.3) will be overriding in its own right: it can only count as an overriding interest if B is in actual occupation of the registered land at the relevant time.

3.2 EVALUATING THE LAW COMMISSION'S AIM

One way in which to evaluate the LRA 2002 is to see how close it comes to achieving the Law Commission's aim of a 'complete and accurate' register; we have considered this in section 3.1 above. It is also important to evaluate that aim itself: for example, if the introduction of e-conveyancing rules assists in making it harder and harder for an unregistered right of B to bind C, is that necessarily a good thing? Further, even if the aim is a good one, are the means employed to achieve it proportionate? After all, it should be remembered that the registration system has to be paid for and that C, when registering as the new holder of A's registered estate, must pay a fee to the Land Registry.

It is clear from the Law Commission reports leading to the 2002 Act that the basic aim of the new system is to strengthen the protection of C, a party who acquires for value, and registers as the holder of, a legal estate in land. It is in the light of this aim, for example, that overriding interests are regarded as 'unsatisfactory'.

In the following extract, Dixon considers the possible justifications for the Law Commission's desire, given effect to in the 2002 Act, to limit the scope of overriding interests as formerly permitted by the LRA 1925.

Dixon, 'The Reform of Property Law and the Land Registration Act 2002: A Risk Assessment' [2002] Conv 136, 137–9

There is, perhaps, no other creation of the Land Registration Act 1925 that has aroused as much fierce comment as the infamous s.70(1) and its list of overriding interests. The fact that there is a category of property right that can bind a purchaser of a registered title without either that interest appearing on the register or necessarily being discoverable is thought by many to be anathema to the very idea of a registration system. To others, among which the present author can be counted, there is nothing inherently wrong with a category of non-registrable binding right, even in a system of land registration, provided that the category is well-bounded, well known and can be justified by reference to some stronger legal, social or economic need. Indeed, policy might well dictate that there should be a class of right that binds a registered title irrespective of registration. Obligations of general public utility, such as the burden of maintaining sea walls and public rights of way, are an obvious example. But, "policy" can mean more than this and it could be thought socially and economically politic to ensure that the property rights of those who do not have the protection of a formal acknowledgement of their rights, but who nevertheless occupy land as their home, should be protected without the need to register. For, theory aside, the act of registration "against" another's land, even when it is not the land of one's emotional partner, is readily seen as an hostile act.

Of course, it is unarguable that changes to land law and land use have turned s.70(1) of the LRA 1925 into a different creature from that envisaged by the drafters of 1925 Act. The development of principles permitting (some might say encouraging) the informal acquisition of interests in land—such as resulting and constructive trusts and proprietary estoppel—have dramatically increased both the chance that an adverse right might exist and that it might be undiscoverable, being neither materially recorded nor necessarily obvious to the prudent purchaser. Likewise, the rise of a different kind of "purchaser", the institutional mortgagee, and the importance of such lending to the domestic economy has both exposed the latent power of s.70(1) and released a tidal wave of litigation. So, despite the fact that the case against overriding interests is not watertight, there are powerful arguments in favour of reform even without the imperative of e-conveyancing. When that imperative is taken into account, with its goal of making the register both the evidence and the origin of a person's title achieved on-line with the absolute minimum of additional enquiries, it is clear that reform cannot be put off. The very point of e-conveyancing where the act of electronic registration is to be the act of creation or transfer of a property right would be undone if it were possible to claim protection for rights created off-register through a substantial category of overriding interests. Thus, it is with some justification that the Law Commission saw the existence of overriding interests as the "major obstacle" to its reforms and although there was a brief flirtation with the idea of abolishing the concept altogether, in the result the 2002 Act lays the axe to the tree with some vigour by both minimising the occasions on which an "interest that overrides" can affect a registered title and by encouraging the registration of interests that might otherwise take effect as such. Conversely, if these reforms are not effective, then the dream of e-conveyancing as it is currently set out in the Act will be unattainable.

Dixon identifies the tension between: (i) the importance to the overall scheme of the 2002 Act of limiting overriding interests; and (ii) opposing policy needs that may justify the protection of pre-existing, but unregistered, property rights.

In the following extract, it is argued that the Law Commission—at least in the rhetoric used when describing overriding interests—may have underestimated those opposing policy needs.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, p 487)

The purpose of a registration system is not simply to provide security for C, but is rather to balance the interests of C with those of B. Overriding interests form a vital part of that balance [. . .] [N]o registration system would go so far as to say that B, a party with a pre-existing but unregistered property right or persistent right,[32] should never be able to assert that right against C. As a result, it is possible to take the opposite view to that of the Law Commission. The very fact that overriding interests give B the chance, in some circumstances, to assert his unregistered right against C, makes these interests a crucial part of the system of registered conveyancing.

32 [In this extract, 'property rights' refers to legal estates or interests in land; 'persistent rights' refers to equitable interests in land. See further Chapter 5, section 7.]

The real question, therefore, is not whether the general concept of overriding interests is appropriate in a registration system. Rather, the question is whether each particular type of overriding interest ought to be capable, even though unregistered, of binding C. One point worth noting is that if C is bound by an overriding interest, no indemnity is payable to C. That is because any change to the register made as a result of B's overriding interest does not "prejudicially affect" C's right: C was already bound by B's right, even before the change to the register was made. We saw when considering rectification—the second gap in C's protection—that, in many situations, C will at least receive some compensation in return for being bound by B's right. However, the same is not true of where C is bound by an overriding interest. Similarly, if C can use the lack of registration defence against a pre-existing property right or persistent right of B, no indemnity is payable to B.

The extract raises a further means of resolving the tension, identified by Dixon, between, on the one hand, making the register 'complete and accurate' and, on the other, giving effect to policy concerns in favour of protecting an unregistered property right of B. That means would be to allow B to have an overriding interest, but, at the same time—in some cases, at least—to provide C with an indemnity.

The Law Commission briefly considered this possibility.[33] Of course, no indemnity would be payable in a case in which C could reasonably have discovered B's overriding interest (e.g. where B was in actual occupation of the land at the relevant time). But an indemnity could be justified if, for example, C is bound by an oral legal lease of B: a right that counts as an overriding interest even if B is not in actual occupation. The Law Commission quickly dismissed this possibility, however, in the consultative document preceding the full report and draft Bill that, in turn, led to the LRA 2002.[34]

Nonetheless, Roger Smith has canvassed it more seriously, as shown by the following extract.

Smith, 'The Role of Registration in Modern Land Law' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, 2002, p 52)

Indemnity

The third and final aspect of guaranteeing titles concerns the financial guarantee if loss is caused to the registered proprietor. However well structured the system, it is inevitable that rectification will sometimes deny or damage a registered title [. . .] There is no financial guarantee of titles in unregistered land, so indemnity is potentially a very significant benefit for purchasers of registered land. When I reviewed the position in the mid 1980s, I concluded that just 0.18% of fee income [i.e. registration fees received by the Land Registry] went on indemnity claims, though I thought that a truer figure to take account of inflation and growth in the system would be 0.44%. How do those figures look 15 years on, when inflation is low and the system closer to a steady-state position?

Taking the last five years, the figure has increased to 0.61% of fee income [. . .] However the precise figures are viewed, it is clear that a minute part of the resources of registration is devoted to indemnity: its value to the average purchaser, in financial terms, is minimal. This may demonstrate that the Land Registry makes commendably few errors, but it also defeats > any idea that indemnity can be seen as insurance for defects in title. A brave attempt was made by the Law Commission in the 1980s to extend indemnity to purchasers bound by overriding interests. Because of the impossibility of quantifying likely claims, that approach is now regarded as foolhardy and has been dropped by the Law Commission. It may well be that this was essential in order to advance more general reforms of land registration, but it severely limits the extent to which imaginative use is made of registration to guarantee a proprietor's title.

The point raised by Smith is a very important one. Given that such a small proportion of the income generated by land registration is currently paid out by way of indemnity, there is room to consider changes that allow such payments to be claimed more frequently. Certainly, the most recent figures published by the Land Registry show that the general financial position has not changed since Smith's survey. The Land Registry enjoyed a healthy operating surplus of £65.4m in 2010–11, with only £9.14m paid out by way of indemnity.[35] It is true that the Land Registry, like all government-funded bodies, is under financial pressure: a number of its offices have recently closed,[36] its historic headquarters in Lincoln's Inn Fields in London has been sold, and it is expected to make significant further savings in the next ten years. Nonetheless, it remains possible to dispute the Law Commission's suggestion, referred to by Smith in the extract above, that allowing indemnity payments to C in some overriding interest cases would 'undoubtedly increase registration fees'.[37] The crucial point in favour of the reform is that the registration system would be able to take advantage—in some cases, at least—of a further way of resolving the tension between B and C. Indeed, it is even possible to argue that there could be cases (e.g. where it is unreasonable for B to register his right, but B is not in actual occupation) in which C should be able to use the lack of registration defence and B should receive an indemnity.[38]

This consideration of finance brings us to the question of proportionality. It is clear that, even though the register is not yet 'complete and accurate', the registration system does provide legally significant protection to C against the risk of being bound by a hidden, but pre-existing, property right. But that protection is bought at a cost: not just the loss suffered by B when he or she is unable to assert a pre-existing right against C, but also the general cost of maintaining a registration system, and the individual cost to C when he or she pays to register the legal estate acquired from A. For example, if A sells a registered freehold worth £215,000 to C, it will cost C £280 to register as the holder of that freehold.[39] So is the protection given to C worth the money: is it practically significant?

Smith considers this point in the following extract.

35 Land Registry, Annual Report and Accounts 2010–11, pp 40 and 42. Over the past five years, the average annual sum of indemnity payments is £8.3m, and the average annual operating surplus (after indemnity payments are taken into account) is £24.4m. This average is affected by an exceptional loss of £129.9m in 2008/9 due to the costs of voluntary redundancies and early retirements of Land Registry Staff.

39 The fee is the same if A's freehold was unregistered so that C is applying for first registration. If A gives her registered freehold, worth £215,000, to C for free (e.g. by leaving it to C in her will), then C must pay a registration fee of £90. These figures were taken from the Land Registry website in October 2011.

Smith, 'The Role of Registration in Modern Land Law' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, 2002, pp 31–2)

The conveyancing dimension

This is, perhaps, the most obvious role of land registration: the principal reasons underpinning its introduction and extension have been to make conveyancing simpler, quicker and cheaper. We are not here concerned with issues of security of title or protection of interest holders, but rather the nuts and bolts of buying and selling land. Three sub-issues emerge: the ease of conveying registered land, its cost and the potential for future improvements.

Ease and cost

These issues will be dealt with together, as they are so closely linked in practice. I considered them some 15 years ago[40] and concluded that registration offered relatively minor benefits. The core point is that registration is all about the quality of the seller's title. In favour of registration, it is plainly easier to see all the relevant information from a copy of the register than to investigate complex deeds stretching over many years (and to make the necessary land charges searches). Yet two factors have combined to diminish the significance of this. First, unregistered conveyancing is much more straightforward than it used to be. Title has to be searched for a minimum period of 15 years, and this relatively short period ensures that few conveyances are likely to be involved. Indeed, the title may well consist of a single conveyance. Not only this, but the style of modern conveyances is simpler than in the past: reading the operative parts of a small number of modern conveyances is scarcely taxing [. . .] Perhaps the best conclusion is that for the average transaction the benefits of registration are decidedly minor, though on occasion they may be significant, especially where title is unusually complex or the boundaries unusually uncertain. The second factor that has to be considered in assessing the benefits of registration is that the title questions form a relatively small part of the work of a lawyer acting for the seller or purchaser of land. Questions relating to local authority searches, inquiries before contract (dealing with many non-title related issues), mortgage finance and the tying together of sales in a chain all take significant amounts of time. When one recalls that lawyers charge around 0.5% of the land value for average house values, it is easy to see that title issues account for (let us say) 0.1% of the land value. Even significant benefits in the title areas (and one may doubt whether these are achieved in practice) are going to have little impact in terms of pounds and pence. Registration has the potential for greater speed, but it is unclear that title questions contribute to the two or three months' delay often experienced between acceptance of an offer and completion. Online access to the land register may save a couple of days in obtaining vital information. This would be terribly important if other factors in the conveyancing process enabled it to be completed virtually instantaneously. As is known only too well, this is not the case. Perhaps the most obvious reasons for the present delays lie in the need to organise a chain of conveyances (as well as mortgage finance) and the obtaining of information from sources such as local authorities [. . .]

What about the cost of registration? In the mid-1980s, I concluded that registered conveyancing is more expensive because fees have to be paid to the Land Registry, whilst legal costs are virtually identical for registered and unregistered land. At that time, the Land Registry fee might be close to half the fees charged by the purchaser's legal advisers, so the extra amount was by no means trivial. Have things changed since then? [. . .] Sharp increases in housing costs bring additional revenue to the Land Registry, as the fees increase according to the value of the land [. . .]

Accordingly, we can say that the 1980s conclusion still stands: registration of title cannot be defended as a system that is more efficient, fast and inexpensive. This does not mean it does not possess advantages but rather that the inherent bureaucracy is bought at a not insignificant expense.

Smith goes on to point out that the widespread use of e-conveyancing could lead to some reduction in costs. Yet it is worth bearing in mind, as noted above, the operating surplus of over £65m made by the Land Registry in 2010/11, even after the payment of indemnities. The presence of this surplus makes clear that the registration system is not cost-neutral: fees paid by its users certainly generate a profit for the government.

Smith also makes the vital point that, whilst delays in the process of buying a house are well known and a constant source of frustration, those delays, even in an unregistered system, are not based on the need to check the seller's title; nor are they chiefly caused by the need to see whether any third parties have pre-existing legal or equitable property rights in relation to the seller's land. Rather, the most obvious causes of delay are: (i) the need for the purchaser to investigate the physical condition of the seller's land; (ii) the practice of offers to buy being accepted 'subject to contract', which gives both seller and purchaser the space to pull out of the planned transaction, or to insist on new contractual terms; (iii) the need for a purchaser to arrange mortgage finance; and (iv) in particular, the need for one sale in a chain to be completed before another can proceed.

As Smith goes on to note, the LRA 2002 does attempt to address the last of those problems. The Law Commission planned that, under the e-conveyancing system, a 'chain manager' could be appointed to monitor and manage the various links in a conveyancing chain: under Sch 5, para 9, of the 2002 Act, the Registrar (or a delegate) is given those powers to monitor and manage. But as the next extract suggests, it is not obvious how simply changing the rules of the registration system can reduce the other causes of delay.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 496–7)

The basic aim of the [LRA 2002] is to simplify conveyancing; its chief tool for achieving this is the introduction of an electronic system. This means that the Act can only be fully evaluated by an empirical study, carried out once electronic conveyancing is fully operational, assessing the efficiency of the system. However, it is overwhelmingly likely that the Act will not succeed in silencing those who complain about the time and cost involved in buying a house. The chief cause of annoyance to purchasers does not come from the risk of being bound by a pre-existing right of B. Rather, it is the process of buying a house that causes problems. First, there is the problem that, before committing to a contract, a buyer needs to pay for a survey to check the condition of the vendor's land: that is the case even if another potential buyer has already paid for such a survey. The survey may be expensive and may in fact deter the buyer from proceeding with the sale. One solution to this would be to place responsibility on the vendor to carry out a survey and to include it in a "Home Information Pack"; however, that idea has now been rejected. Second, there is the practice of offers to buy being accepted "subject to contract". This means that, whilst the potential buyer may feel reasonably secure once his offered price has been accepted, no binding agreement has been concluded and the vendor is free to impose further conditions or to pull out of the sale entirely. Unless some > mechanism is introduced to deal with this uncertain period between acceptance of an offer and conclusion of a binding contract such as, perhaps, a deposit system,[41] buying a house in England and Wales[42] will continue, for those who can afford it, to be a fraught process.

This is not a direct criticism of the 2002 Act; rather, it suggests that changing the legal rules of the registration system can have only a limited practical effect. So, whilst the Law Commission heralded the reforms made by the LRA 2002 as a 'conveyancing revolution',[43] it is clear that further changes to conveyancing practice are needed in order to tackle the perennial frustration experienced by potential homebuyers.

QUESTIONS

1. What were the aims of the Land Registration Act 2002?
2. Following the enactment of the 2002 Act, is it true to say that the register is now 'complete and accurate'? If not, will it be so once e-conveyancing rules have been introduced?
3. Do you agree with the Law Commission that overriding interests are an inherently 'unsatisfactory' aspect of a registration system?
4. What different approaches can be taken to interpreting the term 'mistake' in Sch 4 of the 2002 Act?
5. Does the success or failure of the 2002 Act lie in the hands of the judges who will interpret it?
6. Is it possible or desirable for the principles of a land registration system to be wholly separate from the general principles of land law?

[41] In 1987, the Conveyancing Standing Committee issued a Practice Direction on pre-contract deposits. As discussed in [1988] Conv 80, the plan was that, on acceptance of an offer to purchase, both vendor and purchaser should pay a deposit equal to half of 1 per cent of the purchase price to a neutral third party. If the parties proceeded to reach a binding contract within four weeks, the deposits would be repaid; if one party withdrew for a reason not permitted by the deposit agreement, the other party would receive both deposits.

[42] The system is different in Scotland, as in most other European jurisdictions. In Scotland, sales are often conducted through a sealed bid system. Once a bid is accepted, then both vendor and purchaser are bound: see the Scottish Executive's Guide to House Purchase, available from its website.

INTERESTS IN THE HOME: THE ACQUISITION QUESTION

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. In most situations, ownership of the home falls to be determined by the application of property law principles, particularly the doctrines of resulting and constructive trusts. These trusts differ in relation to how they are created and the means by which the parties' beneficial interests are quantified.
2. Where there is sole legal ownership of the home, the initial presumption is of sole beneficial ownership. A claimant may use a resulting or constructive trust both to establish the existence of a beneficial interest (the primary question) and to quantify his or her share (the secondary question).
3. Where there is joint legal ownership of the home, but no express declaration of the parties' respective beneficial shares, the initial presumption is of joint and equal beneficial ownership. Where the property is a home purchased 'in joint names for joint occupation by a married or unmarried couple, where both are responsible for any mortgage' this presumption will be rebutted only exceptionally and through the common intention constructive trust. In this instance the constructive trust is used only to quantify the parties' beneficial shares.
4. In other joint names cases, the presumption of joint and equal beneficial ownership is replaced with a presumption of resulting trust where the parties contributed unequally to the purchase so that the beneficiaries receive a share proportionate to their contribution. A constructive trust may, however, be claimed by a party who wishes to establish a disproportionate share.
5. Both the primary question of the creation of a common intention constructive trust and the secondary question of the quantification of shares are determined on the basis of the 'common intention' of the parties. In relation to the primary question the parties' common intention may be express or inferred. In respect of the secondary question the common intention may also, in limited circumstances, be imputed. The difference between an inferred and imputed intent is that the former is one actually held by the parties, while the latter is one attributed to the parties that they did not in fact hold.

6. Reliance on property law principles to determine rights in the home has been criticized, particularly in the context of relationship breakdown between cohabitants. Law Commission recommendations, if enacted, will replace the application of the constructive trust (and other property principles) in this narrow category of case with a more flexible regime, where certain eligibility criteria are met.

1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter is concerned with ownership of the home. We consider how a person who does not have property rights in his or her home—for example, as owner of the legal title or a beneficiary under an expressly created trust of land—may acquire rights through the doctrines of resulting and constructive trusts. While our principal concern is with ownership of the home, we also consider the statutory routes through which a person may claim a right to occupy his or her home, whether or not he or she has a property right in the home.

We have considered the general operation of resulting and constructive trusts in Chapter 11. Our discussion of these doctrines in this chapter is confined to their use in the context of the home. It is useful at the outset to state the key features of these doctrines, as are relevant for our discussion in this chapter.

- The purchase money resulting trust arises where the claimant to the trust pays or contributes to the purchase of property in another's name. The rationale for the trust is a presumed intent that the contributor did not intend a gift.
- Constructive trusts arise where, through the existence of defined elements, it is considered unconscionable for the legal owner of land to assert his or her own beneficial interest and deny the beneficial interest of the claimant. As a general doctrine, constructive trusts are considered to be imposed by operation of law, rather than through the express or presumed intention of the owner.

In addition to the doctrines of trust discussed in this chapter, interests in a home may also be obtained through a claim to proprietary estoppel, the scope and nature of which was considered in Chapter 10.

There are a number of circumstances under which it becomes necessary to determine ownership of the home. The Law Commission identified four key circumstances in which the issue may arise.

Law Commission Report No 278, Sharing Homes: A Discussion Paper (2002, [1.11])

1. The persons (two or more) who share a home cease to do so. Typically, one leaves. It may be that this follows the breakdown of a relationship between the sharers. It may be that the living arrangement is no longer convenient to the person who leaves, as they have obtained employment elsewhere. The question arises of whether the person who leaves is entitled to receive payment of a capital sum representing their share of the property, or indeed, in the event of no satisfaction being obtained, whether that person can force a sale thereof.

2. One of the persons who has been sharing the home dies. The question arises whether that person had an interest in the property, and, if so, what therefore is now to happen to it.
3. The home is subject to a mortgage securing a loan negotiated by its owner or owners to facilitate the acquisition of the property or to provide funds for other purposes. The borrower defaults on the mortgage, and the mortgagee seeks possession in order to realise its security by sale of the property. The question arises whether any of those living in the home can assert an interest in that property against the mortgagee, and whether they can successfully defend the proceedings for repossession.
4. A creditor whose debt is not secured over the property by way of mortgage seeks to have the property sold so that the demand can be satisfied. The question arises whether any person who has been sharing with the debtor can successfully hold out against the creditor's claim.

In most circumstances in which the issue of ownership arises, it falls to be determined by the application of the property rules discussed in this chapter. The principal exception is the breakdown of a marriage by divorce, or the dissolution of a civil partnership, in which statutory schemes enable the courts to make property adjustment orders between the parties.[1] Significantly, however, no equivalent legislation applies on the breakdown of a relationship between cohabitants who live together without having married or (as regards same-sex partners) entering a civil partnership. Even in the case of marriage and civil partnerships, the statutory schemes are confined in their application to determining the parties' rights on a relationship breakdown. They do not apply, for example, where the parties' rights fall to be determined in a dispute between a mortgagor or creditor within the third or fourth situations, where property rules must be invoked.[2]

Where the issue of ownership arises as a matter of property law, the question for the court is what each party actually owns, not what they ought to own. As Dillon LJ commented:[3] 'The court does not as yet sit, as under a palm tree, to exercise a general discretion to do what the man in the street, on a general overview of the case, might regard as fair.' Equally, English law does not have a special regime for determining rights to family property.[4] There has been increasing dissatisfaction with the operation of property rules to determine parties' rights in their home. This is particularly the case where the matter arises following the breakdown of a relationship between cohabitants, in which case the strict application of property

[2] In most of the case law discussed in this chapter, the issue of ownership has, in fact, arisen in the context of relationship breakdown (the first situation).The third situation is exemplified by Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland [1981] AC 487, HL, and subsequent case law, which is examined in Chapter 14. The fourth situation would arise on an application for sale under s 14 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, the operation of which is considered in Chapter 18.

[4] Compare Law Commission Report No 278, Sharing Homes: A Discussion Paper (2002), [1.18], in which the Law Commission noted that English law does not have a special property regime even in relation to married couples. The major distinction between married couples (and couples with a civil partnership) and others is the applicable regime on the breakdown of the parties' relationship.

rules stands in stark contrast to the property adjustment orders available on a divorce or the dissolution of a civil partnership. The Law Commission has noted[5] that the current law is generally accepted as being 'unduly complex, arbitrary and uncertain in its application. It is ill-suited to determining the property rights of those who, because of the informal nature of their relationship, may not have considered their respective entitlements'. In response, the Law Commission has recommended a scheme that, if enacted, will replace the determination of the parties' property rights with a more flexible scheme to provide financial relief on the breakdown of a relationship between cohabitants who fulfil certain eligibility criteria. However, as we will see in section 4 of this chapter, there are no plans to implement the proposals at this stage.

2 TRUSTS AND THE HOME

In Chapter 11, the basic rules for the acquisition of rights under a trust of land were outlined. As we saw, an express trust must be evidence by signed writing within s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925). But s 53(2) exempts from this requirement 'implied, resulting and constructive trusts'.

Where an express trust exists, it is generally considered to be conclusive.[6] There is no room for the operation of resulting or constructive trusts. The preponderance of claims to these trusts thus arises through the failure of parties to determine expressly the ownership of their home, despite repeated pleas from the judiciary to legal advisers to encourage parties to do so.

I ask in despair how often this court has to remind conveyancers that they would save their clients a great deal of later difficulty if only they would sit the purchasers down, explain the difference between a joint tenancy and a tenancy in common, ascertain what they want and then expressly declare in the conveyance or transfer how the beneficial interest is to be held because that will be conclusive and save all argument. When are conveyancers going to do this as a matter of invariable standard practice? This court has urged that time after time. Perhaps conveyancers do not read the law reports. I will try one more time: ALWAYS TRY TO AGREE ON AND THEN RECORD HOW THE BENEFICIAL INTEREST IS TO BE HELD. It is not very difficult to do.

The application of resulting and constructive trusts in the context of the home must now be understood in light of two recent significant decisions of the highest appellate court in England and Wales: the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden[7] and the Supreme Court in 5 Law Commission Report No 274, Eighth Programme of Law Reform (2001), p 7.

Jones v Kernott.[8] In both cases, the question in issue was the quantification of shares in a property that had been purchased in the joint names of a cohabiting couple with no express declaration of their respective beneficial interest. The issue of quantification of shares is secondary to that of the existence or creation of a trust; that primary question had already been considered by the House of Lords in three previous cases.[9] However, the significance of Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott extends beyond the matter of quantification. In Stack v Dowden the majority made a policy decision to treat the home differently to other property when determining ownership.[10] The decision of the majority, led by Baroness Hale, is underpinned with the ethos that 'in law "context is everything" and the domestic context is very different from the commercial world'.[11] The focus on context provided the key point of departure for Lord Neuberger. He delivered a minority judgment in which he reached the same outcome as the majority on the facts but through different reasoning. Lord Neuberger was unconvinced that the domestic context requires 'a different approach in principle'.[12] On his view: 'In the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, the same principles should apply to assess the apportionment of the beneficial interest as between legal co-owners, whether in a sexual, platonic, familial, amicable or commercial relationship.'[13]

In Jones v Kernott the Supreme Court offered clarification of key aspects of the decision in Stack v Dowden. The focus of the case is the meaning of 'common intention', which had been adopted in Stack v Dowden as the criteria for determining the quantification of the parties shares (the secondary question) and is also the basis of a claim to the existence or creation of a trust (the primary question). However, the Supreme Court also clarified the scope of Stack v Dowden through a clear definition of the type of home to which the decision applies.[14] The application of Stack v Dowden is confined to homes purchased 'in joint names for joint occupation by a married or unmarried couple, where both are responsible for any mortgage'.[15] This is the only type of home in respect of which the Supreme Court expressly removes the operation of the presumption of resulting trust (discussed further in section 2.1.1 below). This leaves outside the scope of Stack v Dowden other homes, including those bought by parties who are not in an intimate relationship: for example, those bought by parents and children, siblings or friends.

In Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott the courts kept distinct two circumstances in which resulting and constructive trusts may be claimed. The first situation comprises cases of sole legal ownership, in which legal title is conveyed to one person alone. The second situation concerns joint legal ownership, in which legal title is conveyed to the claimant and another person (or persons), but there is no declaration as regards the parties' respective beneficial shares. These situations are kept separate by the courts as the starting point for legal analysis in each is different, as are the issues that must be addressed.

Following the maxim that equity follows the law, in the case of sole legal ownership the starting point is that the sole legal owner is also the sole beneficial owner. A claimant may use resulting or constructive trusts to establish that he or she is also beneficially entitled. If the trust is successfully established, the claimant's beneficial share must then be quantified.

11 [2007] 2 AC 432, [69], per Baroness Hale. 12 Ibid, [107]. 13 Ibid.

14 Uncertainty as to the scope of Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432 through the dichotomy drawn between the domestic and commercial contexts had been a key source of criticism of the decision. See, Hopkins, 'The Relevance of Context in Property Law: A Case for Judicial Restraint?' (2011) 31 LS 175, 189–91.

15 Jones v Kernott [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [25] per Lord Walker and Baroness Hale.

Hence, in sole legal ownership cases, the trust is used both to determine whether the claimant has a beneficial interest, and, if so, to quantify the extent of his or her share.

In the case of joint legal ownership the starting point is joint and equal beneficial ownership, this again reflects the maxim that equity follows the law.[16] The conveyance into joint names is conclusive as to the existence of a trust, but a resulting or constructive trust may be claimed to show that the beneficial interest is held in unequal shares. Hence, in joint legal ownership cases, the application of the trust is concerned only with the matter of quantification of the parties' shares. The circumstances in which this initial presumption is displaced, and whether this is through a resulting or constructive trust, lies at the heart of the decisions in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott and is addressed in section 2.2 below.

The division between sole and joint legal ownership provides the basis of the structure of this section of the chapter.

2.1 SOLE LEGAL OWNER

As has been noted, where there is sole legal ownership, the claimant may use the resulting or constructive trust to establish that he or she also has a beneficial interest. If the claim to a trust is successful, then the claimant's beneficial interest must be quantified.

2.1.1 Resulting trust

Where the claimant has made a direct financial contribution to the purchase of property in another person's sole name, a purchase money resulting trust may be imposed. The rationale for the trust is a presumption that the claimant did not intend to make a gift of his or her contribution. This rationale is reflected in the division of the beneficial interest in proportion to each party's contribution. The presumption of resulting trust is discussed further in Chapter 11, section 3.

The majority of the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden and the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott doubted the utility of the resulting trust in the context of determining proprietary rights in the home.[17] In Stack v Dowden Lord Walker suggested that it should not generally be used to determine ownership of the home, even in cases of sole legal ownership.[18] Its focus on the parties' financial contributions is considered to be more apt in a commercial context, with the constructive trust preferred in relation to domestic property. As regards domestic property, Lord Walker suggested that the resulting trust 'may still have a useful function in cases where two people have lived and worked together in what has amounted to both an [16] This starting point is unanimously agreed by the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432. There at [109]–[110] Lord Neuberger treats the presumption of resulting trust, when it is applied, as rebutting an initial presumption of joint and equal beneficial ownership. In Jones v Kernott [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [23] Lord Walker and Baroness Hale go further and treat the presumption of joint and equal benefit ownership in the context of the home as an alternative to the presumption of resulting trust and offer a different rationale than the maxim that equity follows the law: see further at [19]–[22]. The approach adopted in this text is preferred as being consistent with general principle and with the tenor of Jones v Kernott. For example, in providing a summary of the principles applicable in joint names cases, Lord Walker and Baroness Hale note, [51] '[t]he starting point is that equity follows the law and they are joint tenants both in law and in equity'.

[17] For criticism of Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432 in this respect see Swadling, 'The Common Intention Constructive Trust in the House of Lords: An Opportunity Missed' (2007) 123 LQR 511 and Sparkes, 'How Beneficial Interests Stack Up' [2011] Conv 156.

emotional and a commercial relationship';[19] a comment echoed in Jones v Kernott.[20] In his minority judgment in Stack v Dowden, Lord Neuberger supported the application of the resulting trust in joint and sole ownership cases. On his view, the starting point for a claimant who has made a direct financial contribution to the purchase of property in another's name is that the claimant has a beneficial interest in proportion to his or her contribution through a resulting trust. The operation of the presumption of resulting trust has not been removed in the case of sole legal ownership of the home. In view of this the better view, it is suggested, is that the resulting trust will operate to rebut an initial presumption of sole legal ownership and confer on the beneficiary a share in proportion to their direct financial contribution. However, if the beneficiary wishes to claim a disproportionate share, then they will use their financial contribution as evidence of a common intention for the purposes of a claim to a constructive trust.

Where a resulting trust is imposed, two issues may arise: firstly, the scope of direct financial contributions on which the trust is based—is the trust confined to cash contributions, or does it also take into account contributions to a mortgage? Secondly, how to quantify the claimant's beneficial share where each party's contribution cannot accurately be ascertained. In Stack v Dowden Lord Neuberger discussed these matters.

Lord Neuberger

There are two other aspects of the resulting trust analysis which I should like to mention. First, there is the effect of liability under a mortgage. This will normally be a relevant, often a very important, factor, because, as Lord Walker points out, the overwhelming majority of houses and flats are acquired with the assistance of secured borrowing. There is attraction in the notion that liability under a mortgage should be equivalent to a cash contribution. On that basis, if a property is acquired for £300,000, which is made up of one party's contribution of £100,000, and both parties taking on joint liability for a £200,000 mortgage, the beneficial interest would be two-thirds owned by the party who made the contribution, and one-third by the other. If one party then repays more of the mortgage advance, equitable accounting might be invoked to adjust the beneficial ownerships at least in a suitable case. Such an adjustment would be consistent with the resulting trust analysis, as repayments of mortgage capital may be seen as retrospective contributions towards the cost of acquisition, or as payments which increase the value of the equity of redemption.

However, there is an argument that taking on liability under a mortgage should not be equivalent to a cash payment. The cash contribution is effectively equity, whereas the mortgage liability arises in relation to a secured loan. If the value of the property in the example just given had fallen by 25% when it came to be sold, the party who made the cash contribution would lose £75,000 of his £100,000, whereas the other party would lose nothing (unless he would be liable to pay £25,000 to the former, which seems intuitively improbable).

In Ulrich v Ulrich and Felton [1968] 1 WLR 180, an engaged couple (who subsequently married) had bought a house, she paying one-sixth of the acquisition cost in cash, and he raising the balance by a mortgage in his name. In passages at pp 186 and 189 (approved in Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777, 816 A), Lord Denning MR and Diplock LJ held it was wrong to treat a mortgage contribution as equivalent to a cash contribution.

Desirable though it is to give as much guidance as possible, this is not an appropriate case in which to express a view as to whether liability under a mortgage should be treated as the equivalent of a cash contribution for the purpose of assessing the shares in which the beneficial interest is held. Certainty, simplicity and first impression suggest a positive answer, perhaps particularly where a home is bought almost exclusively by means of a mortgage. More sophisticated economic and legal analysis may suggest otherwise, especially where the cash contributions are very different and, at least in the case of one party, substantial. The point has not been fully canvassed here, because, however one treats the mortgage, the outcome of the appeal is the same.

The final aspect I wish to deal with in relation to the resulting trust analysis is where the evidence is so unsatisfactory that it is impossible to reach a clear conclusion as to the parties' respective contributions to the purchase price. In many such cases, the evidence may be so hopeless or may suggest contributions of the same sort of order, and equality would be the appropriate outcome (as in Rimmer v Rimmer [1953] 1 QB 63, 72, approved in Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777, 804 A–B, 810 H, 815 H). However, in other cases (as here, in my opinion), the court may conclude that, while it is impossible to be precise as to the relative contributions, one party cannot have contributed more (or less) than Y%. In such cases, where Y is clearly below (or above) 50, to decide that the party concerned had more (or less) than Y% of the beneficial interest would be wrong.

As we will see in section 2.1.2 below, a direct financial contribution provides evidence of an inferred common intention to share beneficial ownership for the purposes of a claim to a constructive trust. As a result, an overlap exists between the resulting trust and inferred agreement constructive trust because both may arise on the basis of a direct financial contribution to the purchase of land. These two trusts are, however, also mutually exclusive, because the basis upon which the claimant's beneficial interest is quantified is different under each: in a resulting trust, the claimant obtains an interest in proportion to his or her contribution; in the constructive trust, the claimant's interest is quantified by reference to the common intention of the parties.

This difference in the method of quantifying the claimant's share reflects a conceptual difference in how the claimant's contribution is analysed under each doctrine. A resulting trust is imposed on the negative basis that the claimant did not intend (or is presumed not to have intended) to make a gift of his or her contribution to the legal owner. A constructive trust is imposed on the basis that the claimant's contribution infers a positive agreement between the parties to share the beneficial interest. The trust arises because it would be unconscionable for the legal owner to deny the claimant a share.

There are two possible bases for distinguishing the respective scope of operation of the resulting trust and inferred agreement constructive trust. The first, reflected in Lord Neuberger's analysis in Stack v Dowden, is to rely on the doctrinal differences between the trusts as a means of distinguishing their scope of application. On this basis, direct financial contributions lead to a constructive trust where a common intention to share beneficial ownership can be inferred between the parties. This leaves the resulting trust to apply where a direct financial contribution has been made but no common intention to share beneficial ownership can be inferred. An alternative approach is to rely on the context of the claim so that a direct financial contribution made in respect of the home is used to infer a common intention for a constructive trust, leaving the resulting trust to apply outside of the home. This approach reflects the view of the majority of the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden and the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott doubting the utility of the resulting trust in relation to the home. The difficulty with this solution is a definitional one in understanding what constitutes the home for these purposes: for example, whether it is confined, reflecting the decision in Jones v Kernott on the scope of Stack v Dowden in joint legal ownership cases, to homes purchased for joint occupation by those in an intimate relationship, or whether it is afforded a broader definition. Ultimately, these two bases for distinguishing the respective scope of the trusts may not be far apart. A common intention to share beneficial ownership other than in proportion to direct financial contributions is more likely to be inferred in relation to a home, and (though more arguably) is perhaps more likely to arise between parties in an intimate relationship than in respect of other co-owned homes.

2.1.2 Constructive trust

The specific type of constructive trust used to determine ownership of the home is the common intention constructive trust. The trust has its origins in the House of Lords' decisions in Pettitt v Pettitt[21] and Gissing v Gissing,[22] although the leading case on the elements of a claim to the trust is now Lloyds Bank plc v Rosset.[23] In that case, Lord Bridge drew a clear distinction between two distinct forms of the common intention constructive trust.

Lloyds Bank plc v Rosset
[1991] 1 AC 107, HL

Facts: The claimant, Mrs Rosset, sought to establish a beneficial interest in the matrimonial home, which was solely owned by her husband. The house had been purchased in a semi-derelict condition with money from Mr Rosset's family trust and the trustees had insisted on his sole ownership. Mr Rosset had also funded the cost of the renovations. Mrs Rosset had made no financial contribution to the acquisition, or the cost of renovations, but she had assisted in the building works in various respects.

Lord Bridge

At 132–3

The first and fundamental question which must always be resolved is whether, independently of any inference to be drawn from the conduct of the parties in the course of sharing the house as their home and managing their joint affairs, there has at any time prior to acquisition, or exceptionally at some later date, been any agreement, arrangement or understanding reached between them that the property is to be shared beneficially. The finding of an agreement or arrangement to share in this sense can only, I think, be based on evidence of express discussions between the partners, however imperfectly remembered and however imprecise their terms may have been. Once a finding to this effect is made it will only be necessary for the partner asserting a claim to a beneficial interest against the partner entitled to the legal estate to show that he or she has acted to his or her detriment or significantly altered his or her position in reliance on the agreement in order to give rise to a constructive trust or a proprietary estoppel.

[21] [1971] AC 886. [22] [1970] AC 777. [23] [1991] 1 AC 107.

> In sharp contrast with this situation is the very different one where there is no evidence to support a finding of an agreement or arrangement to share, however reasonable it might have been for the parties to reach such an arrangement if they had applied their minds to the question, and where the court must rely entirely on the conduct of the parties both as the basis from which to infer a common intention to share the property beneficially and as the conduct relied on to give rise to a constructive trust. In this situation direct contributions to the purchase price by the partner who is not the legal owner, whether initially or by payment of mortgage instalments, will readily justify the inference necessary to the creation of a constructive trust. But, as I read the authorities, it is at least extremely doubtful whether anything less will do.

Hence, the common intention constructive trust is divided into those founded on an express agreement and those in which the agreement between the parties is inferred. Where there is an express agreement, the claimant must also show detrimental reliance on the agreement, while in inferred agreement cases, the claimant's contribution serves the dual purpose of providing evidence of the agreement and of detrimental reliance. On the facts of the case, Mrs Rosset's claim failed: there was no express agreement between the parties and Mrs Rosset had not made any direct contribution to the purchase, which Lord Bridge considered necessary for an agreement to be inferred.

Each type of common intention constructive trust will now be considered. Where a constructive trust is successfully claimed, the next question for the court is the quantification of the claimant's share. This issue also arises in joint legal ownership cases in which a constructive trust is invoked to displace the presumption of equal beneficial ownership. Therefore, the basis on which the courts quantify interests under a constructive trust is discussed in relation to both situations below. As will be seen, in Stack v Dowden, the House of Lords held that, in a constructive trust, the quantification of shares is determined by the common intention of the parties.

Inferred agreement constructive trust

An inferred agreement constructive trust arises where an agreement to share beneficial ownership is derived from what the parties have done, rather than what they have said. The courts' focus is on the conduct of the parties at the time of acquisition. While an agreement can be inferred from post-acquisition conduct, the courts have indicated that they will be 'slow' to do so.[24]

In Rosset, Lord Bridge suggested that an agreement would only be inferred on the basis of a direct cash contribution, either initially or by contributions to a mortgage. In Stack v Dowden, in the context of a general discussion of the development of the constructive trust, Lord Walker doubted that this aspect of Lord Bridge's judgment took full account of conflicting views in Gissing v Gissing[25] and noted that it had attracted 'trenchant criticism' from academic commentators. He suggested that 'the law has moved on'[26]—a comment that appeared to be endorsed by Baroness Hale.[27]

The extent to which the courts would, or should, move beyond direct financial contributions as the basis for an inferred agreement constructive trust is unclear. Lord Walker's reference to conflicting views in Gissing v Gissing relates specifically to the issue of indirect cash contributions. These arise where, through paying household bills and other expenses, the claimant enables the legal owner to discharge the mortgage. But the academic commentary to which Lord Walker refers goes far beyond this. In particular, Lord Walker cites Gray and Gray,[28] who criticize generally the courts' 'denigration' of conduct other than direct financial contributions, which has denied beneficial entitlement to 'long-serving mothers and homemakers'.[29]

As regards indirect financial contributions, the opposing views are aptly reflected in the judgments of Lord Reid and Lord Diplock in Gissing v Gissing.

Gissing v Gissing
[1971] AC 886, HL

Lord Reid

At 896

As I understand it, the competing view is that, when the wife makes direct contributions to the purchase by paying something either to the vendor or to the building society which is financing the purchase, she gets a beneficial interest in the house although nothing was ever said or agreed about this at the time: but that, when her contributions are only indirect by way of paying sums which the husband would otherwise have had to pay, she gets nothing unless at the time of the acquisition there was some agreement that she should get a share. I can see no good reason for this distinction and I think that in many cases it would be unworkable. Suppose the spouses have a joint bank account. In accordance with their arrangement she pays in enough money to meet the household bills and so there is enough to pay the purchase price instalments and their bills as well as their personal expenses. They never discuss whose money is to go to pay for the house and whose is to go to pay for other things. How can anyone tell whether she has made a direct or only an indirect contribution to paying for the house? It cannot surely depend on who signs which cheques. Is she to be deprived of a share if she says 'I can pay in enough to pay for the household bills,' but given a share if she says 'I can pay in £10 per week regularly.'

Lord Diplock

At 909

Where the wife has made no initial contribution to the cash deposit and legal charges and no direct contribution to the mortgage instalments nor any adjustment to her contribution to other expenses of the household which it can be inferred was referable to the acquisition of the house, there is in the absence of evidence of an express agreement between the parties no material to justify the court in inferring that it was the common intention of the parties that she should have any beneficial interest in a matrimonial home conveyed into the sole name of the husband, merely because she continued to contribute out of her own earnings or private income to other expenses of the household. For such conduct is no less consistent with a common intention to share the day-to-day expenses of the household, while each spouse retains a separate interest in capital assets acquired with their own moneys or obtained by inheritance or gift. There is nothing here to rebut the prima facie inference that a purchaser of land who pays the purchase price and takes a conveyance and grants a mortgage in his own name intends to acquire the sole beneficial interest as well as the legal estate [. . .]

[29] Ibid, [10.133] and [10.136].

It is suggested that, as regards indirect financial contributions, it is difficult to disagree with the tenor of Lord Reid's judgment that the determination of rights in the home should not be dependent on the happenstance of how a family's finances are arranged. In light of the divergence in authorities on this point prior to Lloyds Bank plc v Rosset (as acknowledged in Stack v Dowden), such an extension of the inferred agreement constructive trust would be a modest development.

The argument for inferring an agreement from conduct beyond direct or indirect cash contributions is far more contentious. Prior to Stack v Dowden, it had been accepted that there is a difference between contributions that may be taken into account in relation to the issue of quantification of a beneficial interest and those relevant to the creation of a trust.[30] As will be seen below, in Stack v Dowden, the House of Lords held that the issue of quantification is to be determined on the basis of the common intention of the parties. As a result, both the creation of a trust (in sole legal ownership cases) and the quantification of beneficial interests (in sole and joint legal ownership cases) are now based on the same criterion of common intent. It will be difficult to maintain that the same conduct (for example, the contribution of 'long-serving mothers and homemakers') can be used to infer an agreement for one purpose (quantification), but not for another (to create a trust). The consequences of inferring an agreement to create a trust from such conduct are far-reaching for the scope of constructive trust doctrine. It is certainly inconceivable that such a step could be taken on the basis of Stack v Dowden where the creation of a trust was not in issue. But such a step also has the potential to provide a welcome rationalization and simplification of the constructive trust. These consequences need to be explored in light of a full understanding of the current operation of the constructive trust and, therefore, we return to them below in section 2.5.

A key issue in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott is when it may be appropriate for the courts to impute a common intention rather than infer one. The difference between inferring and imputing is discussed below in section 2.3.2 of this chapter. At this stage it is sufficient to note that an inferred intent is one actually held by the parties, while an imputed intent is one attributed to the parties that they did not in fact hold. In those cases the issue of imputed intent arose in respect of the secondary question of quantification of shares. In Stack v Dowden, Lord Walker suggested that the courts had already implicitly endorsed an imputed intent in the context of the primary question of the creation of a trust.[31] In Jones v Kernott, as we will see below in section 2.3.2, the Supreme Court accepted that an intention can be imputed in limited circumstances in relation to the quantification of beneficial shares. The judgment in the case is closely confined to the question of quantification.[32] At the present stage, the better view is that there is no basis for suggesting that a common intention can be imputed in relation to the primary question of the creation of a trust. Such a development would require the matter to be considered by the courts at appellate level with the benefit of the analysis of inferred and imputed intent contained in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott.

30 See, in particular, Oxley v Hiscock [2004] EWCA Civ 546; Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638, 646.

31 [2007] 2 AC 432, [25]. Referring to a passage in Lord Bridge's judgment on the inferred agreement constructive trust, Lord Walker suggested that '[i]n concurring in this passage the House was unanimously, if unostentiously, agreeing that a "common intention" could be inferred even where there was no evidence of an actual agreement'. But to do so would appear to constitute imputing rather than inferring an intent.

32 See Jones v Kernott [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [78]–[84] where Lord Wilson carefully limits the operation of imputed intent to quantification. See further Lord Collins at [66].

Express agreement constructive trust

An express agreement constructive trust will be imposed where there is an agreement to share the beneficial interest, in reliance on which the claimant has acted to his or her detriment. In Rosset, Lord Bridge held that the agreement must be based on 'evidence of express discussions between the partners, however imperfectly remembered and however imprecise their terms may have been'. Further, he suggested that the agreement must be reached prior to acquisition, or only exceptionally at a later date. Applied strictly, this latter requirement would preclude the trust arising where the claimant moves into a home already purchased by the legal owner. In practice, post-acquisition express agreements have been accepted, without reference to a requirement that the case must be 'exceptional'.[33]

The requirement of 'express discussions' appears to be unrealistic in the domestic context. In Pettitt v Pettitt, Lord Hodson noted:[34] 'The conception of a normal married couple spending the long winter evenings hammering out agreements about their possessions appears grotesque.' As the following extract illustrates, there is a sense of artificiality in the courts' detailed examination of the parties' relationship in the search for evidence of an agreement.

Hammond v Mitchell
[1991] 1 WLR 1127, HC

Waite J

At 1139

[The] tenderest exchanges of a common law courtship may assume an unforeseen significance many years later when they are brought under equity's microscope and subjected to an analysis under which many thousands of pounds of value may be liable to turn on fine questions as to whether the relevant words were spoken in earnest or in dalliance and with or without representational intent.

The artificiality of the search for an agreement is highlighted by Lord Bridge's acceptance in Rosset of Eves v Eves[35] and Grant v Edwards[36] as 'outstanding examples' of agreements.[37] In these cases, an agreement was found in the fact that the legal owner had given the claimant an 'excuse' for not placing the property in the parties' joint names: in Eves v Eves, the claimant had been told that, but for the fact she was under the age of 21 (the age of majority at the time), the house would have been placed in the parties' joint names; in Grant v Edwards, the claimant was told that the house was not put in joint names because this could prejudice her own divorce proceedings. Lord Bridge suggested that such excuses provide evidence of an agreement, because the claimant 'had been clearly led by the [legal owner] to believe, when they set up home together, that the property would belong to them jointly'.[38]

Gardner casts doubt on this interpretation of an excuse.

Gardner, 'Rethinking Family Property' (1993) 109 LQR 263, 265

But the fact that the men's statements were excuses (i.e. neither objectively valid nor even sincerely uttered) does not mean that the men were thereby acknowledging an agreement whereby the woman should have a share. If I give an excuse for rejecting an invitation to what I expect to be a dull party, it does not mean that I thereby agree to come: on the contrary, it means that I do not agree to come, but for one reason or another find it hard to say so outright. The fallacious quality of the reasoning in Eves v. Eves and Grant v. Edwards is thus clear. It is hard to think that the judges concerned really believed in it. One can only conclude that they too were engaged in the business of inventing agreements on women's behalf [...]

Gardner's analysis is, however, doubted by Glover and Todd, on the one hand, and Mee, on the other.

Glover and Todd suggest that there is a fallacy in Gardner's analysis. In the following extract, they refer to the sole legal owner as 'A' and the claimant to a beneficial interest as 'B'.

Glover and Todd, 'The Myth of Common Intention' (1996) 16 LS 325, 331

Once it is appreciated that the test for intention is objective, then we can see the fallacy of Gardner's argument that A did not really intend to declare himself a trustee in favour of B, in Eves v Eves and Grant v Edwards. It is not necessary for A to intend subjectively, merely that a reasonable person would assume that A was declaring himself trustee. In both cases the property was identified, and the statements could be taken as statements of immediate and irrevocable intention to hold the property for both of them. In both cases, B might reasonably have thought that A intended to hold the land on trust for himself and herself, but was prevented from doing so merely because of some formality. In neither case was there any reason for the declaration not to take immediate and irrevocable effect.

This criticism is made in the context of an argument that the express agreement cases should be classified as express trusts, which, as a matter of general trust law, arise on the basis of an objective declaration by the settler (the legal owner). The basis of Glover and Todd's argument is therefore removed if it is accepted (as the case law currently indicates) that the constructive trust is a discrete type of trust based on the common intention of the parties, not on a declaration of trust by one of them.

Mee suggests that, while the judges in Eves and Grant may have been generous in their view of the facts, Gardner goes too far in describing their reasoning as fallacious.

Mee, The Property Rights of Cohabitees (1999, p 123)

The answer to Gardner's argument (which emerges clearly from the relevant passages in Grant and Eves) lies in the difference between legal and equitable ownership. Gardner does not appear to advert to the possibility that the woman in each case reasonably understood from her partner's representation that, while it was agreed between the parties that (beneficial) ownership was to be shared, there was some technical obstacle which prevented her being given legal ownership of the property. This, after all, is the nature of any "common intention" within the terms of the doctrine under discussion; it is understood between the parties that beneficial ownership is (or will be) shared, notwithstanding the fact that this is not reflected in the legal title. To put the point in Gardner's terms: naturally, the guest's excuse will not make the dull hostess believe that he is really coming to the party; however, depending on the nature of the excuse and the manner in which it is made, she might be led to believe other things about her relationship with the guest, for example, that he finds her company delightful.

Ultimately, as Mee suggests, the appropriate interpretation of an excuse seems to be dependent on the facts of the case and the circumstances in which it is made.

Once an express agreement has been found, it is necessary to consider whether the claimant has relied on the agreement to his or her detriment.

Detriment

The requirement of detriment is concerned with what acts the claimant has done. It is assessed objectively.[39] The most authoritative judicial discussion of what acts constitute sufficient detriment is contained in Grant v Edwards. Nourse LJ gave the leading judgment in the case. While Mustill LJ and Browne-Wilkinson VC indicated their agreement, in fact, there are some differences in each judge's approach to detriment.

Grant v Edwards

Facts: Mrs Grant and Mr Edwards were cohabitants. As we have noted above, Mr Edwards had given Mrs Grant an excuse for not conveying their home into their joint names and this constituted an express agreement for the purposes of a constructive trust. Mr Edwards had paid a deposit and the mortgage instalments for the house, while Mrs Grant had made substantial contributions to the general household expenses and to bringing up the parties' children. It was clear from the evidence that Mr Edwards would have been unable to maintain payments on two mortgages secured over the home without Mrs Grant's contributions. The Court of Appeal held that Mrs Grant had acted sufficiently to her detriment (and had done so in reliance on the agreement) for her claim to a constructive trust to succeed.

It seems therefore, on the authorities as they stand, that a distinction is to be made between conduct from which the common intention can be inferred on the one hand and conduct which amounts to an acting upon it on the other. There remains this difficult question: what is the quality of conduct required for the latter purpose? The difficulty is caused, I think because although the common intention has been made plain, everything else remains a matter of inference. Let me illustrate it in this way. It would be possible to take the view that the mere moving into the house by the woman amounted to an acting upon the common intention. But that was evidently not the view of the majority in Eves v. Eves [1975] 1 W.L.R.

[39] Lawson, 'The Things We Do for Love: Detrimental Reliance in the Family Home' [1996] LS 218, 219.

1338. and the reason for that may be that, in the absence of evidence, the law is not so cynical as to infer that a woman will only go to live with a man to whom she is not married if she understands that she is to have an interest in their home. So what sort of conduct is required? In my judgment it must be conduct on which the woman could not reasonably have been expected to embark unless she was to have an interest in the house. If she was not to have such an interest, she could reasonably be expected to go and live with her lover, but not, for example, to wield a 14-lb. sledge hammer in the front garden. In adopting the latter kind of conduct she is seen to act to her detriment on the faith of the common intention. [. . .]

In the circumstances, it seems that it may properly be inferred that the plaintiff did make substantial indirect contributions to the instalments payable under both mortgages. This is a point which seems to have escaped the judge, but I think that there is an explanation for that. He was concentrating, as no doubt were counsel, on the plaintiff's claim that she herself had paid all the instalments under the second mortgage. It seems very likely that the indirect consequences of her very substantial contribution to the other expenses were not fully explored.

Was the conduct of the plaintiff in making substantial indirect contributions to the instalments payable under both mortgages conduct upon which she could not reasonably have been expected to embark unless she was to have an interest in the house? I answer that question in the affirmative. I cannot see upon what other basis she could reasonably have been expected to give the defendant such substantial assistance in paying off mortgages on his house. I therefore conclude that the plaintiff did act to her detriment on the faith of the common intention between her and the defendant that she was to have some sort of proprietary interest in the house.

(4) For present purposes, the event happening on acquisition may take one of the following shapes. (a) An express bargain whereby the proprietor promises the claimant an interest in the property, in return for an explicit undertaking by the claimant to act in a certain way. (b) An express but incomplete bargain whereby the proprietor promises the claimant an interest in the property, on the basis that the claimant will do something in return. The parties do not themselves make explicit what the claimant is to do. The court therefore has to complete the bargain for them by means of implication, when it comes to decide whether the proprietor's promise has been matched by conduct falling within whatever undertaking the claimant must be taken to have given sub silentio. (c) An explicit promise by the proprietor that the claimant will have an interest in the property, unaccompanied by any express or tacit agreement as to a quid pro quo. (d) A common intention, not made explicit, to the effect that the claimant will have an interest in the property, if she subsequently acts in a particular way. [. . .]

The propositions do not touch two questions of general importance. [. . .] The second question is closer to the present case: namely, whether a promise by the proprietor to confer an interest, but with no element of mutuality (i.e. situation (c) above) can effectively confer an interest if the claimant relies upon it by acting to her detriment. This question was not directly addressed in Gissing v. Gissing [1971] A.C. 886, although the speech of Lord Diplock, at p. 905, supports an affirmative answer. The plaintiff's case was not argued on this footing in the present appeal, and since the appeal can be decided on other grounds, I prefer not to express an opinion on this important point.

There is little guidance in the authorities on constructive trusts as to what is necessary to prove that the claimant so acted to her detriment. What "link" has to be shown between the common intention and the actions relied on? Does there have to be positive evidence that the claimant did the acts in conscious reliance on the common intention? Does the court have to be satisfied that she would not have done the acts relied on but for the common intention, e.g. would not the claimant have contributed to household expenses out of affection for the legal owner and as part of their joint life together even if she had no interest in the house? Do the acts relied on as a detriment have to be inherently referable to the house, e.g. contribution to the purchase or physical labour on the house?

I do not think it is necessary to express any concluded view on these questions in order to decide this case. [. . .]

As at present advised, once it has been shown that there was a common intention that the claimant should have an interest in the house, any act done by her to her detriment relating to the joint lives of the parties is, in my judgment, sufficient detriment to qualify. The acts do not have to be inherently referable to the house.

Mustill LJ's approach is notable as looking for a quid pro quo between the parties. This reflects the basis of the trust in the parties' common intention. While a clear bargain may be unusual, where one exists, it seems legitimate for the court to treat the bargained-for acts as sufficient detriment.[40]

There is a significant difference, however, between the approaches adopted by Nourse LJ and Browne-Wilkinson VC. On Nourse LJ's test, detriment requires conduct on the part of the claimant that he or she could not reasonably be expected to do unless he or she was to have an interest in the house. In contrast, Browne-Wilkinson VC's accepts as detriment all acts done by the claimant as part of the parties' joint lives. Subsequent decisions have favoured Nourse LJ's test, which has required courts to reject conduct that the court considers it 'reasonable' for the claimant to have undertaken by reason of the parties' relationship (unless explicitly done as part of a quid pro quo).

The assumption underlying this test is highlighted by Lawson.

Lawson, 'The Things We Do for Love: Detrimental Reliance in the Family Home' (1996) LS 218, 219–20

Nourse LJ's test rests on the assumption that certain types of behaviour can reasonably be expected of people who believe that they have an interest in their home, but not of people who have no such belief. If the behaviour is of a type that can reasonably be expected of people acting purely out of love and affection or the desire to live in pleasant, comfortable surroundings, it will not normally be considered detrimental. It may be so regarded, however, if it was actually requested by the legal owner as the quid pro quo for the beneficial interest. If conduct of a type judges might ordinarily expect of a claimant motivated by love and affection has been requested by the legal owner, judges will be prepared to assume that, had it not been for the promise of the beneficial interest, the claimant would not have performed the conduct.

[40] Compare Jennings v Rice [2002] EWCA Civ 159, [45], in which, in the context of exercising remedial discretion in proprietary estoppel, Robert Walker LJ indicated that where the claimant's expectations and detriment have been defined with reasonable clarity, the consensual character of the case would justify the award of expectations.

Direct contributions to the purchase of property, which would be sufficient for the courts to infer an agreement to share, would necessarily be sufficient to constitute detriment where there is an express agreement between the parties. Indirect financial contributions, as illustrated in Grant v Edwards, are also accepted as detriment, regardless of the debate as to whether such contributions should also be a sufficient basis for the courts to infer an agreement. Substantial improvements to property will also suffice,[41] but not redecoration of a more 'ephemeral'[42] nature. Beyond such clear examples, it has been difficult for the courts to assess what conduct the claimant could not reasonably be expected to perform unless he or she was to obtain an interest in the home.

Unfortunately, in making such assessments, courts have tended to draw on outdated stereotypes of what conduct it is reasonable to expect of a man or woman. Because most claimants have been women, the most significant effect of this approach has been the rejection of domestic work and childcare as constituting acts of detriment.

A powerful feminist critique of the courts' approach is reflected in the comments of Flynn and Lawson. The examples to which they refer in the following extract draw on case law covering both constructive trusts and proprietary estoppel, which shares the requirements of reliance and detriment.[43]

Flynn and Lawson, 'Gender, Sexuality and the Doctrine of Detrimental Reliance'
[1995] Fem Leg Stud 105, 106, 117–18

The status of women in Western, market-economy societies is intimately dependent on their position in the public world of the market and in the private domestic sphere, and on the relationship between those arenas as constructed in opposition to one another. Feminist lawyers now possess a coherent, (almost) canonical account of the relationship between 'separate spheres' ideology and the legitimation of inequality for women in our society. This model sees the legal system participating in the active segregation of the domestic world of the household from the public space of the market and gendering the qualities of each, notwithstanding women's on-going presence in and contributions to both. The domestic arena is anointed as fit and proper for women to occupy, and its defining qualities of care, intimacy and selflessness held out as the binary opposite of the market characterised by self-centred, arms-length bargaining. The household and the feminine qualities which are associated with it in this schema are simultaneously exalted and demeaned. In this ideological framework, the qualities of the domestic sphere are represented as a justification of appropriate female behaviour and treatment and as an explanation of its consequences. [. . .]

If a claimant's behaviour is taken by the court to consist of nothing more than normal, everyday actions, then her claim will not succeed because she will not have acted to her detriment. In their construction of normality, the decision of the courts display the tenacious

42 Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777, 796, per Lord Reid.

43 Although the point is not without controversy, there seems little, if any, distinction between how these requirements are met under the constructive trust and proprietary estoppel. For consideration of this point, see Ferguson, 'Constructive Trusts: A Note of Caution' (1993) 109 LQR 114, 115–20.

hold of 'separate spheres' ideology. All the behaviour which is placed in the realm of the domestic, no matter how arduous, will not amount to detriment because it can be expected of any woman in an intimate relationship with a man. Behaviour which takes the claimant outside the domestic realm is categorised as abnormal, and, in order to explain it, it must be placed in the context of a market-like transaction giving rise to a property interest. According to the authorities one cannot expect women, out of the love they have for their partners or of the desire to live in a comfortable place, to pay towards mortgage instalments. Nor is it reasonable to expect them to spend small sums on improvements, at least when those small sums represent a quarter or all their worldly wealth and their partner is a relatively rich man. A woman cannot be reasonably expected to wield 14-lb sledge-hammers or work cement mixers out of love or the desire for more pleasant surroundings. Prompted by such motives, however, it is reasonable to expect women to leave their husbands, move in with their lovers, bear their babies, refrain from seeking employment, wallpaper, paint, and generally decorate and design their lovers' houses, and to organize builders working on those same houses, even when this includes the purchase and delivery of the building materials. In order to succeed, female claimants must show that they "did much more than most women would do", or rather that they did more than the judges would expect most women to do. If a claimant's conduct [is] of a type regarded by judges as "the most natural thing in the world for a wife" to have done, she will not succeed. The use of the stereotype as a norm, from which deviation has to be established, is an almost inevitable consequence of the adoption of Nourse L.J.'s test.

The effect of the courts' approach is illustrated by comparing the claims to detriment in two cases: Wayling v Jones[44] and Hammond v Mitchell.[45] In Wayling v Jones, the issue of detriment was discussed in the context of proprietary estoppel. The claim arose from a homosexual relationship throughout which Mr Wayling had acted as 'companion and chauffeur' to his partner, in addition to assisting in business ventures for which he was paid 'pocket money' rather than a full wage. His acts were accepted as sufficient detriment.

Flynn and Lawson highlight the disparity between the court's treatment of Mr Wayling's conduct as detriment and the general attitude of the courts towards domestic activities undertaken by women.

Flynn and Lawson, 'Gender, Sexuality and the Doctrine of Detrimental Reliance'
[1995] Fem Leg Stud 105, 118–19

[When] the normalcy-dependent test of detriment is applied to male-male relationships the unnatural qualities of these relations between men can operate in favour of the cohabiting claimant. In the separate spheres ideology which resurfaces in this field, it is not normal for a man to undertake caring, domestic duties. As a result, it is necessary for Balcombe L.J. to explain (and to elevate) Wayling's domestic behaviour in the description of him acting as companion and chauffeur in exchange for monetary support. Wayling's activities have a visibility here which no woman's would possess. However, the Court of Appeal does not dwell on this aspect of the case because it can turn to a more conventional pattern of behaviour. Wayling has also engaged in non-domestic activity with Jones, and his work in the various hotels and restaurants which they ran is deemed to constitute detrimental behaviour. Wayling, a man who lives with another gay man, who works inside and outside the domestic sphere, > is visible in a way in which a woman living with Jones would not have been. All of his private behaviour is unnatural and so could amount to detriment in the eyes of a court. All of his public behaviour in the market is conventional and familiar; he does the type of things which men do which are the foundation of contracts and property transactions.

In Hammond v Mitchell, the sole form of detriment identified by the Court of Appeal was that Miss Mitchell had participated wholeheartedly in speculative business ventures, which, had they gone badly, would have resulted in the loss of the home that she shared with Mr Mitchell, who was the sole legal owner. Her support had included subordinating any interest she may have in the property to mortgagees, to enable finance for the business ventures to be secured over the home.

As O'Hagan notes, there is an underlying difficulty in accepting as detriment Miss Mitchell's willingness to risk losing the home. (In the following extract, O'Hagan refers to Miss Mitchell as 'F' and to Mr Mitchell as 'M'.)

O'Hagan, 'Indirect Contributions to the Purchase of Property'
(1993) 56 MLR 224, 226

> It seems that the court felt that F's agreement to postpone any interest in the property, followed by her agreement to subject the property to risk, constituted an act of detriment which was referable to the property. Until she had agreed to postpone any rights she may have had in the property to those of the bank, and proceeded to support M's entrepreneurial activities, she was a bare licensee. However, by agreeing to risk a bare licence, F obtained a proprietary interest. It is suggested, with respect, that the better view is that a party can only suffer detriment if he or she has something to lose. When F supported M in his business venture she had no interest in land to put at risk. Certainly F would have suffered had the bank sought to enforce its security, but she would not have lost any rights in the property because she had none to lose.

It may be argued that Miss Mitchell's commercial endeavours, like Mr Wayling's domestic work, had an increased visibility because each claimant was operating outside of his or her 'expected' sphere. As Flynn and Lawson highlight in the extract above, Mr Wayling's domestic activities were visible because he was a man acting in the domestic sphere. Equally, Miss Mitchell's shared enjoyment of the masculine-based commercial sphere, and her willingness to risk loss of her home for commercial success, runs counter to the ideological norm of a woman's attachment to her home.[46]

It is not suggested that all domestic conduct by a male claimant and all commercial activities by a female claimant are given an undue emphasis by the courts in assessing detriment. A male claimant who has stayed at home caring for the parties' children would not be considered to have acted to his detriment any more than would a female claimant who undertakes the role of homemaker. On the current test, the actions of the claimants would be considered no more than is reasonable in light of their relationship. Wayling v Jones and Hammond v Mitchell suggest, however, that, in marginal or atypical cases, undue emphasis may be placed on conduct that falls outside gender stereotypes.

[46] Hopkins (2000), p 113.

Reliance

While detriment focuses objectively on what acts the claimant has done, the element of reliance focuses subjectively on the claimant's motive in doing those acts.[47] For a constructive trust to arise, there must be a causative link between the common intention and the detriment. The leading authority on how this requirement is fulfilled is the proprietary estoppel case of Wayling v Jones, in which Balcombe LJ drew jointly on constructive trust and estoppel cases to summarize how the requirement of reliance is fulfilled.[48]

1. There must be a sufficient link between the promises relied upon and the conduct which constitutes the detriment—see Eves v. Eves, in particular per Brightman J. Grant v. Edwards, per Nourse L.J. and per Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. and in particular the passage where he equates the principles applicable in cases of constructive trust to those of proprietary estoppel.
2. The promises relied upon do not have to be the sole inducement for the conduct: it is sufficient if they are an inducement—Amalgamated Property Co. v. Texas Bank.
3. Once it has been established that promises were made, and that there has been conduct by the plaintiff of such a nature that inducement may be inferred then the burden of proof shifts to the defendants to establish that he did not rely on the promises—Greasley v. Cooke; Grant v. Edwards.

The question that arises from Balcombe LJ's third point is this: once the burden of proof has shifted to the defendant, how can reliance be disproved?

As we have seen, in Wayling v Jones, Mr Wayling was held to have acted to his detriment by acting as 'companion and chauffeur' to his partner, and working without full remuneration within his partner's businesses. In his evidence, he acknowledged that he would have acted the same way if no promise of a property right had been made. At first instance, the judge considered this to be fatal to his claim, as demonstrating that he had not acted in reliance on the promise. This decision was overruled on appeal. The Court of Appeal held that it was not sufficient to show that Mr Wayling would have acted the same way if no promise had been made. To discharge the burden of proof, the defendant must show that Mr Wayling would have acted the same way if the promise, once made, had been revoked. Mr Wayling had stated in his evidence that, in such circumstances, he would have left Mr Jones and therefore the burden of disproving reliance had not been discharged.

The test of reliance has not been specifically discussed in the context of a constructive trust claim subsequent to the decision in Wayling v Jones. Some restatement is required to apply the test to a constructive trust to reflect the existence of a common intention, rather than a promise. It is suggested that, in a claim to a constructive trust, once the burden shifts to the defendant in order to disprove reliance, he or she would have to demonstrate that the claimant would have acted the same way even if informed that the defendant would not comply with the parties' initial common intention.

2.2 JOINT LEGAL OWNERS

Where legal title to a home is conveyed into the joint names of the parties, the conveyance is conclusive as to the existence of a trust. If the conveyance identifies the parties' respective shares, then it is generally conclusive as to those shares[49]—though with some qualification. In Stack v Dowden Baroness Hale explained that the declaration is 'conclusive unless varied by subsequent agreement or affected by proprietary estoppel'.[50] This leaves the exceptional case of joint ownership in which, as in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott a conveyance into joint names is silent as to the parties' respective shares.[51]

As we have seen in section 2 of this chapter, the starting point in case of joint legal ownership is joint and equal beneficial ownership. The question that arises is when and how this presumption may be displaced. The answer depends on whether the property constitutes a home in the narrow sense defined in Jones v Kernott as a property purchased 'in joint names for joint occupation by a married or unmarried couple, where both are responsible for any mortgage'.[52] Where this is the case, the presumption of resulting trust no longer applies and the presumption of joint and equal beneficial ownership can be rebutted only through a constructive trust founded on the common intention of the parties. Where the constructive trust is invoked to rebut the presumption of joint and equal beneficial ownership, it is used solely to quantify the claimant's share. The existence of the trust is established by the fact of conveyance into joint names. In other instances of joint legal ownership, the presumption of resulting trust has not been removed. In these cases, therefore, the presumption of joint and equal beneficial ownership will be rebutted by a presumption of resulting trust where the parties have not contributed equally. Through a resulting trust, the parties will obtain beneficial shares in proportion to their contributions. As in the case of sole legal ownership discussed in section 2.1 of this chapter, however, a beneficiary who wishes to establish a share other than in proportion to their direct financial contribution, may do so though a constructive trust.

In Jones v Kernott, the majority accepted that the common intention to depart from joint and equal beneficial ownership can be imputed as well as inferred (the difference between these is discussed in section 2.3.2 below).[53] Lord Wilson disagreed on this matter. He noted that the point did not arise on the facts (where the judge had found that the parties' intentions had in fact changed)[54] and that the question 'will merit careful thought'.[55] In Stack v [49] Goodman v Gallant [1986] Fam 106. [50] [2007] 2 AC 432, [49].

[51] In Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432, [52], Baroness Hale noted that the incidence of such transfers should be reduced, because the standard form completed by joint transferees of registered land (form TR1) provides them with the opportunity to specify their respective shares. Land Registry rejected a proposal to make completion mandatory: Cooke, 'In the Wake of Stack v Dowden: The Tale of TR1' [2011] Fam Law 1142.

Dowden Baroness Hale warned that the task of rebutting the initial presumption is not one that should be undertaken lightly by the claimant.

Stack v Dowden
[2007] 2 AC 432, HL

Facts: Mr Stack and Ms Dowden had cohabited for nearly 20 years and had four children. Their home was registered in their joint names but with no express declaration as to their respective beneficial shares. The purchase had been funded from the proceeds of sale of a previous home (held in Ms Dowden's sole name), money from her bank account, and a joint loan. While both parties contributed to the discharge of the loan, Ms Dowden's contributions were higher. Throughout their relationship they had kept their financial affairs separate. On the breakdown of their relationship, Ms Dowden claimed to be entitled to 65 per cent of the beneficial share.

In family disputes, strong feelings are aroused when couples split up. These often lead the parties, honestly but mistakenly, to reinterpret the past in self-exculpatory or vengeful terms. They also lead people to spend far more on the legal battle than is warranted by the sums actually at stake. A full examination of the facts is likely to involve disproportionate costs. In joint names cases it is also unlikely to lead to a different result unless the facts are very unusual.

At present, there is little guidance on the types of factor that would make a case 'unusual' enough to justify a departure from the presumption of joint and equal beneficial ownership. In Stack v Dowden, Baroness Hale was satisfied that the facts of the case were sufficiently unusual to depart from the presumption and in doing so she emphasized the fact that throughout their long relationship the couple had kept their financial affairs rigidly separate.[56]

In contrast, in Fowler v Barron,[57] the Court of Appeal rejected Mr Barron's claim to depart from the presumption of equal beneficial ownership. In that case, the parties' home had been placed in their joint names, although Mr Barron alone provided the deposit and paid the mortgage instalments. Miss Fowler's income was used to meet day-to-day expenses, and additional expenditure towards such matters as school trips, holidays, and special occasions. Arden LJ considered that this was tantamount to the parties treating their income as 'one pool from which household expenses will be paid'. There was nothing unusual to justify departing from the presumption.

The presumption of joint and equal beneficial ownership may be rebutted not only at the time of acquisition of the property, but also at a later stage. This feature of the constructive trust led Lord Hoffmann in argument in Stack v Dowden to describe the trust as 'ambulatory'.[58] Jones v Kernott involved a post-acquisition alteration of the parties' intention. There, the common intention of the parties was considered to have changed sometime after the breakdown of their relationship when a life insurance policy was cashed in to enable Mr Kernott, who had moved out of the home the parties had shared, to buy a home for himself.[59] In Stack v Dowden, Baroness Hale gave as an example a situation where, 'one party has financed (or constructed himself) an extension or substantial improvement to the property, so that what they have now is significantly different from what they had [at the time of acquisition]'.[60]

2.3 QUANTIFICATION OF BENEFICIAL INTERESTS UNDER A CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST

The issue of quantification of a beneficial interest under a constructive trust may arise in three circumstances:

- First, in cases of sole legal ownership where a constructive trust has been established.
- Second, in cases of joint legal ownership within Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott (those involving property purchased 'in joint names for joint occupation by a married or unmarried couple, where both are responsible for any mortgage') where the presumption of joint and equal beneficial ownership has been rebutted by a claimant who seeks to obtain an unequal share.
- Third, in other cases of joint legal ownership where a constructive trust has been established by a claimant who seeks to obtain a share otherwise than in proportion to their direct financial contribution.

The approach to take to the quantification of shares under a constructive trust in the second situation was the central question in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott. In Abbott v Abbott the same approach to quantification was applied by the Pricy Council in the first situation (sole legal ownership). This position was confirmed by the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott whilst emphasizing the different starting point in cases of sole legal ownership.[61] It may be assumed that the same approach to quantification will be applied in the third situation as there is no basis to treat the first and third situations differently. Even though the quantification of shares is, therefore, determined by the same rules in all cases, the fact the starting point is different may still affect the outcome of the application of those rules.[62]

2.3.1 Quantification and Stack v Dowden: the shift to common intention

In Stack v Dowden the House of Lords noted a curious (and perhaps unintended) distinction that had emerged in previous case law. In sole ownership cases, a flexible approach to quantification of beneficial shares had developed through the application of the constructive trust.[63] In joint ownership cases, the courts had appeared to prefer basing decisions on the resulting trust, with its rigid approach to quantification as a proportion of each party's [59] [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [48]. [60] [2007] 2 AC 432, [70]. [61] [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [52].

[62] This is acknowledged in Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432 at [69] where Baroness Hale explains '[w]here a couple are joint owners of the home and jointly liable for the mortgage, the inferences to be drawn from who pays for what may be very different from the inferences to be drawn when only one is owner of the home'. The paragraph is extracted in full below.

[63] See, in particular, Stokes v Anderson [1991] 1 FLR 391; Midland Bank plc v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562; Drake v Whipp [1996] 1 FLR 826; Oxley v Hiscock [2005] Fam 211.

contribution.[64] Baroness Hale noted:[65] 'The approach to quantification in cases where the home is conveyed into joint names should certainly be no stricter than the approach to quantification in cases where it has been conveyed into the name of one only.' The House of Lords then proceeded to state and develop the basis on which quantification is determined.

Prior to Stack v Dowden, the Court of Appeal had comprehensively addressed the issue of quantification in the following case, involving a sole legal owner.

Oxley v Hiscock
[2005] Fam 211, CA

Facts: The parties were cohabitants whose home was in the sole legal ownership of Mr Hiscock. Both parties had provided a cash contribution to the purchase (approximately 28 per cent by Mrs Oxley and 48 per cent by Mr Hiscock), with the remainder raised by a mortgage. Throughout the parties' relationship, they had both contributed to the household expenditure, including the discharge of the mortgage, and to improvements and maintenance. On the breakdown of the relationship, Mrs Oxley claimed 50 per cent of the proceeds of sale. Following a review of the authorities, Chadwick LJ summarized the principles governing quantification. Chadwick LJ referred to this as the 'second question'—arising once the existence of a constructive trust (the first question) has been established.

Chadwick LJ

In those circumstances, the second question to be answered in cases of this nature is 'what is the extent of the parties' respective beneficial interests in the property?'. Again, in many such cases, the answer will be provided by evidence of what they said and did at the time of the acquisition. But, in a case where there is no evidence of any discussion between them as to the amount of the share which each was to have—and even in a case where the evidence is that there was no discussion on that point—the question still requires an answer. It must now be accepted that (at least in this court and below) the answer is that each is entitled to that share which the court considers fair having regard to the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property. And, in that context, 'the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property' includes the arrangements which they make from time to time in order to meet the outgoings (for example, mortgage contributions, council tax and utilities, repairs, insurance and housekeeping) which have to be met if they are to live in the property as their home.

On the facts of the case, the Court of Appeal held that Mrs Oxley was entitled to a 40 per cent beneficial share. An equal share was considered disproportionate in light of the difference in the parties' initial cash contributions.

64 In this respect, Baroness Hale highlighted the decisions in Walker v Hall [1984] 1 FLR 126, Springette v Defoe [1992] 2 FLR 388, and Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736. She held that, to the extent that these decisions hold that a stricter approach to quantification applies in joint ownership cases, they should not be followed: Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432, [65].

65 Ibid.

In Stack v Dowden, Baroness Hale referred to Chadwick LJ's formula before shifting the emphasis away from 'fairness' towards the parties' common intention.

[. . .] Oxley v Hiscock has been hailed by Gray and Gray as 'An important breakthrough' (see p 931 (para 10.138)). The passage quoted is very similar to the view of the Law Commission in Sharing Homes: A Discussion Paper (Law Com no 278) p 69 (para 4.27) on the quantification of beneficial entitlement:

> 'If the question really is one of the parties' "common intention", we believe that there is much to be said for adopting what has been called a "holistic approach" to quantification, undertaking a survey of the whole course of dealing between the parties and taking account of all conduct which throws light on the question what shares were intended.'

That may be the preferable way of expressing what is essentially the same thought, for two reasons. First, it emphasises that the search is still for the result which reflects what the parties must, in the light of their conduct, be taken to have intended. Second, therefore, it does not enable the court to abandon that search in favour of the result which the court itself considers fair. For the court to impose its own view of what is fair upon the situation in which the parties find themselves would be to return to the days before Pettitt v Pettitt [1969] 2 All ER 385, [1970] AC 777 without even the fig leaf of s 17 of the 1882 Act. [. . .]

At [69]–[70]

In law, 'context is everything' and the domestic context is very different from the commercial world. Each case will turn on its own facts. Many more factors than financial contributions may be relevant to divining the parties' true intentions. These include: any advice or discussions at the time of the transfer which cast light upon their intentions then; the reasons why the home was acquired in their joint names; the reasons why (if it be the case) the survivor was authorised to give a receipt for the capital moneys; the purpose for which the home was acquired; the nature of the parties' relationship; whether they had children for whom they both had responsibility to provide a home; how the purchase was financed, both initially and subsequently; how the parties arranged their finances, whether separately or together or a bit of both; how they discharged the outgoings on the property and their other household expenses. When a couple are joint owners of the home and jointly liable for the mortgage, the inferences to be drawn from who pays for what may be very different from the inferences to be drawn when only one is owner of the home. The arithmetical calculation of how much was paid by each is also likely to be less important. It will be easier to draw the inference that they intended that each should contribute as much to the household as they reasonably could and that they would share the eventual benefit or burden equally. The parties' individual characters and personalities may also be a factor in deciding where their true intentions lay. In the cohabitation context, mercenary considerations may be more to the fore than they would be in marriage, but it should not be assumed that they always take pride of place over natural love and affection. At the end of the day, having taken all this into account, cases in which the joint legal owners are to be taken to have intended that their beneficial interests should be different from their legal interests will be very unusual.

This is not, of course, an exhaustive list. There may also be reason to conclude that, whatever the parties' intentions at the outset, these have now changed. An example might be where one party has financed (or constructed himself) an extension or substantial improvement to the property, so that what they have now is significantly different from what they had then.

Baroness Hale's formula represents the view of the majority of the House of Lords.[66] The proposition that emerges from the case is that the issue of quantification is addressed by reference to the 'whole course of dealings between the parties' (as stated in Oxley v Hiscock), but with a view to establishing the common intention of the parties, rather than determining what would constitute a 'fair' share. On the facts of the case, the House of Lords unanimously agreed that Ms Dowden was entitled to the 65 per cent share that she claimed. In Fowler v Barron,[67] the Court of Appeal emphasized that the parties' common intention alone is relevant. Mr Barron argued that the parties' home had been placed in their joint names to ensure that Miss Fowler (who was considerably younger than him) would benefit on his death, on the assumption that the couple were still together at that time. He had not appreciated that the effect of joint ownership was to confer an immediate beneficial interest on Miss Fowler. This 'secret intention',[68] which was not communicated to Miss Fowler, had no effect on the initial presumption of equal beneficial ownership.

2.3.2 Quantification and Jones v Kernott: common intention clarified

The crucial issue that was left unclear in Stack v Dowden is whether the common intention that provides the basis for the quantification of the parties' shares can be imputed as well as inferred. This in turn raised a question as to the interpretation of Baroness Hale's judgment in Stack v Dowden; particularly in respect of her comments in paragraph 61 (extracted above) relating to Oxley v Hiscock and the relevance of 'fairness'.[69]

The definition of inferred and imputed intent was considered in Stack v Dowden by Lord Neuberger.

Stack v Dowden
[2007] 2 AC 432, HL

Lord Neuberger

At [125]–[127]

While an intention may be inferred as well as express, it may not, at least in my opinion, be imputed. That appears to me to be consistent both with normal principles and with the majority view of this House in Pettitt v Pettitt, as accepted by all but Lord Reid in Gissing v Gissing (see [1970] 2 All ER 780 at 783, 783–784, 786, 789, [1971] AC 886 at 897, 898, 900, 901, 904), and reiterated by the Court of Appeal in Grant v Edwards [1986] 2 All ER 426 at 66 While Lord Neuberger also considered quantification under the constructive trust to be based on the parties' common intention, his approach to quantification otherwise differs in key respects.

67 [2008] EWCA 377.

68 Ibid, [36].

69 On this issue, see Lord Wilson's analysis of Baroness Hale's judgment [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [85]–[87] with which Lord Walker and Baroness Hale express their disagreement at [13]. These paragraphs are extracted below.

434–435, [1986] Ch 638 at 651–653. The distinction between inference and imputation may appear a fine one (and in Gissing v Gissing [1970] 2 All ER 780 at 787–788, [1971] AC 886 at 902, Lord Pearson, who, on a fair reading I think rejected imputation, seems to have equated it with inference), but it is important.

An inferred intention is one which is objectively deduced to be the subjective actual intention of the parties, in the light of their actions and statements. An imputed intention is one which is attributed to the parties, even though no such actual intention can be deduced from their actions and statements, and even though they had no such intention. Imputation involves concluding what the parties would have intended, whereas inference involves concluding what they did intend.

To impute an intention would not only be wrong in principle and a departure from two decisions of your Lordships' House in this very area, but it also would involve a judge in an exercise which was difficult, subjective and uncertain. (Hence the advantage of the resulting trust presumption.) It would be difficult because the judge would be constructing an intention where none existed at the time, and where the parties may well not have been able to agree. It would be subjective for obvious reasons. It would be uncertain because it is unclear whether one considers a hypothetical negotiation between the actual parties, or what reasonable parties would have agreed. The former is more logical, but would redound to the advantage of an unreasonable party. The latter is more attractive, but is inconsistent with the principle, identified by Baroness Hale (at [61], above), that the court's view of fairness is not the correct yardstick for determining the parties' shares (and see Pettitt v Pettitt [1969] 2 All ER 385 at 395, 402, 416, [1970] AC 777 at 801, 809, 826).

This view was not endorsed by the majority of the House of Lords. Although she did not directly address the distinction between inferred and imputed intent, Baroness Hale emphasized the need to determine the parties' shared intentions 'actual, inferred or imputed'.[70]

As Piska notes in the following extract, it is practically difficult to distinguish between fairness—the criteria adopted in Oxley v Hiscock but apparently rejected by the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden—and an imputed intent.

Piska, 'Intention, Fairness and the Presumption of Resulting Trust after Stack v Dowden' (2008) 71 MLR 120, 128

The search is for the parties' intentions but, as these are only discoverable through words and conduct, and conduct cannot provide arithmetical answers to quantification, the parties' intentions are determined according to what is fair. That this is what Baroness Hale contemplated is indicated by her statement that the search is for 'the result which reflects what the parties must, in the light of their conduct, be taken to have intended'. The importance of this is that whilst the substance of the fairness approach in Oxley v Hiscock is in effect affirmed, Chadwick LJ's view of the reasoning that underpins the principle (fairness) is abandoned in favour of the artificial fiction that he rejected in that case—that the result is what the parties must be taken to have intended. Consequently the majority clothe fairness in the language of intention without providing explicit guidance for determining the content of either.

70 Ibid, [60] (emphasis added).

The meaning of common intention, and in particular the role of imputed intent, was addressed by the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott in a clarification of Stack v Dowden. As the extracts that follow show, the Supreme Court unanimously accepted that the parties' common intention can be imputed in limited circumstances in relation to the quantification of beneficial shares. On the facts, the Supreme Court was divided three to two as to whether it was necessary to impute an intention and, indeed, on whether the analysis of particular facts carried practical significance once the legitimacy of imputing an intent was accepted.

It is important to emphasize that the Supreme Court's unanimous acceptance of the role of imputed intent is confined to the issue of quantification of shares. As we have noted in section 2.2 above, Lord Wilson disagrees with the other justices on the separate point of whether the common intention to depart from the presumption of joint and equal beneficial ownership can be imputed. We have further seen, in section 2.1.2, that the better view is that a common intention cannot be imputed in respect of the primary question of the creation of a trust.

Jones v Kernott
[2011] 3 WLR 1121

Facts: Ms Jones and Mr Kernott were an unmarried couple who had cohabited for a period of ten years. They had initially lived in a property that Ms Jones had bought in her sole name, but they had then acquired the property in question, 39 Badger Hall Avenue, in their joint names and lived there for eight years until the breakdown of their relationship. At that stage, Mr Kernott had left the property while Ms Jones remained with the couple's two children. A deposit for the purchase had been provided by the proceeds of sale of Ms Jones' previous home, while the household expenses had been shared. Once Mr Kernott had moved out, Ms Jones took sole responsibility for the household expenses and had now done so for over 14 years. Shortly after the relationship had broken down, an unsuccessful attempt was made to sell the property. Following this, an endowment policy had been surrendered and the proceeds had been used as a deposit on a home for Mr Kernott, 114 Stanley Road, which was bought in his sole name. The proceedings had been commenced by Mr Kernott to establish his beneficial share in 39 Badger Hall Avenue. At first instance, the judge awarded Ms Jones 90 per cent and Mr Kernott 10 per cent. The Court of Appeal, by a two to one majority allowed an appeal by Mr Kernott and declared that the parties were entitled to equal shares. Ms Jones appealed to the Supreme Court.

Inference or imputation?

In Stack v Dowden Lord Neuberger observed (paras 125–126):

"While an intention may be inferred as well as express, it may not, at least in my opinion, be imputed. That appears to me to be consistent both with normal principles and with the majority view of this House in Pettitt [1970] AC 777, as accepted by all but Lord Reid in Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886, 897H, 898B-D, 900E-G, 901B-D, 904E-F, and reiterated by the Court of Appeal in Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638 at 651F-653A. The distinction between inference and imputation may appear a fine one (and in Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886, at 902G-H, Lord Pearson, > who, on a fair reading I think rejected imputation, seems to have equated it with inference), but it is important.

> An inferred intention is one which is objectively deduced to be the subjective actual intention of the parties, in the light of their actions and statements. An imputed intention is one which is attributed to the parties, even though no such actual intention can be deduced from their actions and statements, and even though they had no such intention. Imputation involves concluding what the parties would have intended, whereas inference involves concluding what they did intend."

Rimer LJ made some similar observations in the Court of Appeal in this case [2010] EWCA Civ 578, [2010] 1 WLR 2401, paras 76–77.

Both observations had been to some extent anticipated as long ago as 1970 by Lord Reid in his speech in Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886, 897:

> "Returning to the crucial question there is a wide gulf between inferring from the whole conduct of the parties that there probably was an agreement, and imputing to the parties an intention to agree to share even where the evidence gives no ground for such an inference. If the evidence shows that there was no agreement in fact then that excludes any inference that there was an agreement. But it does not exclude an imputation of a deemed intention if the law permits such an imputation. If the law is to be that the court has power to impute such an intention in proper cases then I am content, although I would prefer to reach the same result in a rather different way. But if it were to be held to be the law that it must at least be possible to infer a contemporary agreement in the sense of holding that it is more probable than not there was in fact some such agreement then I could not contemplate the future results of such a decision with equanimity."

The decision of the House of Lords in Gissing v Gissing has been so fully analysed and discussed that it is almost impossible to say anything new about it. However it may be worth pointing out that their Lordships' speeches were singularly unresponsive to each other. The only reference to another speech is by Viscount Dilhorne (at p 900) where he agreed with Lord Diplock on a very general proposition as to the law of trusts. The law reporter has managed to find a ratio for the headnote (at p 886) only by putting these two propositions together with some remarks by Lord Reid (at p 896) which have a quite different flavour. We can only guess at the order in which the speeches were composed, but the third and fourth sentences of the passage from Lord Reid's speech, set out in the preceding paragraph, suggest that Lord Reid had read Lord Diplock's speech in draft, and thought that it was about "an imputation of a deemed intention."

This sort of constructive intention (or any other constructive state of mind), and the difficulties that they raise, are familiar in many branches of the law. Whenever a judge concludes that an individual "intended, or must be taken to have intended," or "knew, or must be taken to have known," there is an elision between what the judge can find as a fact (usually by inference) on consideration of the admissible evidence, and what the law may supply (to fill the evidential gap) by way of a presumption. The presumption of a resulting trust is a clear example of a rule by which the law does impute an intention, the rule being based on a very broad generalisation about human motivation, as Lord Diplock noted in Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777, 824:

> "It would, in my view, be an abuse of the legal technique for ascertaining or imputing intention to apply to transactions between the post-war generation of married couples 'presumptions' which are based upon inferences of fact which an earlier generation of judges drew as to the most likely intentions of earlier generations of spouses belonging to the propertied classes of a different social era."

That was 40 years ago and we are now another generation on.

The decision in Stack v Dowden produced a division of the net proceeds of sale of the house in shares roughly corresponding to the parties' financial contributions over the years. The majority reached that conclusion by inferring a common intention (see Lady Hale's opinion at para 92, following her detailed analysis of the facts starting at para 86). Only Lord Neuberger reached the same result by applying the classic resulting trust doctrine (which involved, it is to be noted, imputing an intention to the parties).

In deference to the comments of Lord Neuberger and Rimer LJ, we accept that the search is primarily to ascertain the parties' actual shared intentions, whether expressed or to be inferred from their conduct. However, there are at least two exceptions. The first, which is not this case, is where the classic resulting trust presumption applies. Indeed, this would be rare in a domestic context, but might perhaps arise where domestic partners were also business partners: see Stack v Dowden, para 32. The second, which for reasons which will appear later is in our view also not this case but will arise much more frequently, is where it is clear that the beneficial interests are to be shared, but it is impossible to divine a common intention as to the proportions in which they are to be shared. In those two situations, the court is driven to impute an intention to the parties which they may never have had.

Lord Diplock, in Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886, 909, pointed out that, once the court was satisfied that it was the parties' common intention that the beneficial interest was to be shared in some proportion or other, the court might have to give effect to that common intention by determining what in all the circumstances was a fair share. And it is that thought which is picked up in the subsequent cases, culminating in the judgment of Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock [2005] Fam 211, paras 65, 66 and 69, and in particular the passage in para 69 which was given qualified approval in Stack v Dowden:

> "the answer is that each is entitled to that share which the court considers fair having regard to the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property."

Chadwick LJ was not there saying that fairness was the criterion for determining whether or not the property should be shared, but he was saying that the court might have to impute an intention to the parties as to the proportions in which the property would be shared. In deducing what the parties, as reasonable people, would have thought at the relevant time, regard would obviously be had to their whole course of dealing in relation to the property.

However, while the conceptual difference between inferring and imputing is clear, the difference in practice may not be so great. In this area, as in many others, the scope for inference is wide. The law recognizes that a legitimate inference may not correspond to an individual's subjective state of mind. As Lord Diplock also put it in Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886, 906:

> "As in so many branches of English law in which legal rights and obligations depend upon the intentions of the parties to a transaction, the relevant intention of each party is the intention which was reasonably understood by the other party to be manifested by that party's words or conduct notwithstanding that he did not consciously formulate that intention in his own mind or even acted with some different intention which he did not communicate to the other party."

This point has been developed by Nick Piska, "Intention, Fairness and the Presumption of Resulting Trust after Stack v Dowden" (2008) 71 MLR 120. He observes at pp 127–128:

> "Subjective intentions can never be accessed directly, so the court must always direct itself to a consideration of the parties' objective intentions through a careful consideration of the relevant facts. The point is that the imputation/inference distinction may well be a distinction without a difference with regard to the process of determining parties' intentions. It is not that the parties' subjective intentions are irrelevant but rather that a finding as to subjective intention can only be made on an objective basis."

In several parts of the British Commonwealth federal or provincial legislation has given the court a limited jurisdiction to vary or adjust proprietary rights in the home when an unmarried couple split up. Most require a minimum period of two years' cohabitation (or less if there are children) before the jurisdiction is exercisable. In England the Law Commission has made recommendations on similar lines (Law Com No 307, Cohabitation: The Financial Consequences of Relationship Breakdown, 2007), but there are no plans to implement them in the near future.

In the meantime there will continue to be many difficult cases in which the court has to reach a conclusion on sparse and conflicting evidence. It is the court's duty to reach a decision on even the most difficult case. As the deputy judge (Mr Nicholas Strauss QC) said in his admirable judgment [2009] EWHC 1713 (Ch), [2010] 1 WLR 2401, para 33 (in the context of a discussion of fairness) "that is what courts are for." That was an echo (conscious or unconscious) of what Sir Thomas Bingham MR said, in a different family law context, in Re Z (A Minor) (Identification: Restrictions on Publication) [1997] Fam 1, 33. The trial judge has the onerous task of finding the primary facts and drawing the necessary inferences and conclusions, and appellate courts will be slow to overturn the trial judge's findings.

Lord Collins

I agree, therefore, that authority justifies the conceptual approach of Lord Walker and Lady Hale that, in joint names cases, the common intention to displace the presumption of equality can, in the absence of express agreement, be inferred (rather than imputed: see para 31 of the joint judgment) from their conduct, and where, in such a case, it is not possible to ascertain or infer what share was intended, each will be entitled to a fair share in the light of the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property.

That said, it is my view that in the present context the difference between inference and imputation will hardly ever matter (as Lord Walker and Lady Hale recognise at para 34), and that what is one person's inference will be another person's imputation. A similar point has arisen in many other contexts, for example, the difference between implied terms which depend on the parties' actual intention, terms based on a rule of law, and implied terms based on an intention imputed to the parties from their actual circumstances: Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd v Cooper [1941] AC 108, 137, per Lord Wright. Or the point under the law prior to the Contracts (Applicable Law) Act 1990 as to whether (in the absence of an express choice) the proper law of the contract depended on an intention to be inferred from the circumstances or on the law which had the closest connection with the contract.

Lord Kerr

It is hardly controversial to suggest that the parties' intention should be given effect to where it can be ascertained and that, although discussions between them will always be the most reliable basis on which to draw an inference as to that intention, these are not the only circumstances in which that exercise will be possible. There is a natural inclination to prefer inferring an intention to imputing one. If the parties' intention can be inferred, the court is not imposing a solution. It is, instead, deciding what the parties must be taken to have intended and where that is possible it is obviously preferable to the court's enforcing a resolution. But the conscientious quest to discover the parties' actual intention should cease when it becomes clear either that this is simply not deducible from the evidence or that no common intention exists. It would be unfortunate if the concept of inferring were to be strained so as to avoid the less immediately attractive option of imputation. In summary, therefore, I believe that the court should anxiously examine the circumstances in order, where possible, to ascertain the parties' intention but it should not be reluctant to recognise, when it is appropriate to do so, that inference of an intention is not possible and that imputation of an intention is the only course to follow.

In this context, it is important to understand what is meant by "imputing an intention". There are reasons to question the appropriateness of the notion of imputation in this area but, if it is correct to use this as a concept, I strongly favour the way in which it was described by Lord Neuberger in Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432 para 126, where he said that an imputed intention was one which was attributed to the parties, even though no such actual intention could be deduced from their actions and statements, and even though they had no such intention. This exposition draws the necessary strong demarcation line between attributing an intention to the parties and inferring what their intention was in fact.

The reason that I question the aptness of the notion of imputing an intention is that, in the final analysis, the exercise is wholly unrelated to ascertainment of the parties' views. It involves the court deciding what is fair in light of the whole course of dealing with the property. That decision has nothing to do with what the parties intended, or what might be supposed would have been their intention had they addressed that question. In many ways, it would be preferable to have a stark choice between deciding whether it is possible to deduce what their intention was and, where it is not, deciding what is fair, without elliptical references to what their intention might have—or should have—been. But imputing intention has entered the lexicon of this area of law and it is probably impossible to discard it now.

While the dichotomy between inferring and imputing an intention remains, however, it seems to me that it is necessary that there be a well marked dividing line between the two. As soon as it is clear that inferring an intention is not possible, the focus of the court's attention should be squarely on what is fair and, as I have said, that is an obviously different examination than is involved in deciding what the parties actually intended.

Lord Wilson

In para 61 of her ground-breaking speech in Stack v Dowden Lady Hale quoted, with emphasis, the words of Chadwick LJ in para 69 of Oxley v Hiscock, which I have quoted in para 71 above. Then she quoted a passage from a Discussion Paper published by the Law Commission in July 2002 and entitled "Sharing Homes" about the proper approach to identifying the proportions which "were intended". Finally she added four sentences to each of which, in quoting them as follows, I take the liberty of attributing a number:

> "[1.] That may be the preferable way of expressing what is essentially the same thought, for two reasons. [2.] First, it emphasises that the search is still for the result which reflects what the parties must, in the light of their conduct, be taken to have intended. [3.] Second, therefore, it does not enable the court to abandon that search in favour of the result which the court itself considers fair. [4.] For the court to impose its own view of what is fair upon the situation in which the parties find themselves would be to return to the days before Pettitt v Pettitt... without even the fig leaf of section 17 of the 1882 Act."

I leave on one side Lady Hale's first sentence although, whereas Chadwick LJ was identifying the criterion for imputing the common intention, the context of the passage in the Discussion Paper suggests that the Law Commission was postulating a criterion for inferring it. On any view Lady Hale's second sentence is helpful; and, by her reference to what the parties must, in the light of their conduct, be taken to have intended (as opposed to what they did intend), Lady Hale made clear that, by then, she was addressing the power to resort to imputation. Lady Hale's fourth sentence has been neatly explained—by Mr Nicholas Strauss QC, deputy judge of the Chancery Division, who determined the first appeal in these proceedings, at para 30—as being that, in the event that the evidence were to suggest that, whether by expression or by inference, the parties intended that the beneficial interests in the home should be held in certain proportions, equity would not "impose" different proportions upon them; and, at para 47 above, Lord Walker and Lady Hale endorse Mr Strauss's explanation.

The problem has lain in Lady Hale's third sentence. Where equity is driven to impute the common intention, how can it do so other than by search for the result which the court itself considers fair? The sentence was not obiter dictum so rightly, under our system, judges below the level of this court have been unable to ignore it. Even in these proceedings judges in the courts below have wrestled with it. Mr Strauss observed, at para 31, that it was difficult to see how—at that final stage of the inquiry—the process could work without the court's supply of what it considered to be fair. In his judgment on the second appeal Lord Justice Rimer went so far as to suggest, at para 77, that Lady Hale's third sentence must have meant that, contrary to appearances, she had not intended to recognise a power to impute a common intention at all.

I respectfully disagree with Lady Hale's third sentence.

Lord Walker and Lady Hale observe, at para 34 above, that in practice the difference between inferring and imputing a common intention to the parties may not be great. I consider that, as a generalisation, their observation goes too far—at least if the court is to take (as in my view it should) an ordinarily rigorous approach to the task of inference. Indeed in the present case they conclude, at paras 48 and 49, that, in relation to Chadwick LJ's second question the proper inference from the evidence, which, if he did not draw, the trial judge should have drawn, was that the parties came to intend that the proportions of the beneficial interests in the home should be held on a basis which in effect equates to 90% to Ms Jones and to 10% to Mr Kernott (being the proportions in favour of which the judge ruled). As it happens, reflective perhaps of the more rigorous approach to the task of inference which I prefer, I regard it, as did Mr Strauss at [48] and [49] of his judgment, as more realistic, in the light of the evidence before the judge, to conclude that inference is impossible but to proceed to impute to the parties the intention that it should be held on a basis which equates to those proportions. At all events I readily concur in the result which Lord Walker and Lady Hale propose.

The Supreme Court reinstated an order made by the judge at first instance (that had been overturned on appeal) granting Ms Jones a 90 per cent beneficial interest. Lord Walker and Baroness Hale consider the 'logical inference' of the parties conduct was that Mr Kernott's interest in the parties' shared home crystallized at the point at which an endowment policy was surrendered to enable him to buy his own home and, therefore, that a common intention could be inferred.[71] Lord Collins agreed with this analysis.[72] Lord Kerr and Lord Wilson preferred to base the decision on an imputed intent.[73]

The approach to quantification of beneficial shares in a constructive trust following Jones v Kernott is summarized in the following extract.

In summary, therefore, the following are the principles applicable in a case such as this, where a family home is bought in the joint names of a cohabiting couple who are both responsible for any mortgage, but without any express declaration of their beneficial interests.

(1) The starting point is that equity follows the law and they are joint tenants both in law and in equity. (2) That presumption can be displaced by showing (a) that the parties had a different common intention at the time when they acquired the home, or (b) that they later formed the common intention that their respective shares would change. (3) Their common intention is to be deduced objectively from their conduct: "the relevant intention of each party is the intention which was reasonably understood by the other party to be manifested by that party's words and conduct notwithstanding that he did not consciously formulate that intention in his own mind or even acted with some different intention which he did not communicate to the other party" (Lord Diplock in Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886, 906). Examples of the sort of evidence which might be relevant to drawing such inferences are given in Stack v Dowden, at para 69. (4) In those cases where it is clear either (a) that the parties did not intend joint tenancy at the outset, or (b) had changed their original intention, but it is not possible to ascertain by direct evidence or by inference what their actual intention was as to the shares in which they would own the property, "the answer is that each is entitled to that share which the court considers fair having regard to the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property": Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock [2005] Fam 211, para 69. In our judgment, "the whole course of dealing [. . .] in relation to the property" should be given a broad meaning, enabling a similar range of factors to be taken into account as may be relevant to ascertaining the parties' actual intentions. (5) Each case will turn on its own facts. Financial contributions are relevant but there are many other factors which may enable the court to decide what shares were either intended (as in case (3)) or fair (as in case (4)).

This case is not concerned with a family home that is put into the name of one party only. The starting point is different. The first issue is whether it was intended that the other party have any beneficial interest in the property at all. If he does, the second issue is what that interest is. There is no presumption of joint beneficial ownership. But their common intention has once again to be deduced objectively from their conduct. If the evidence shows a common intention to share beneficial ownership but does not show what shares were intended, the court will have to proceed as at para 51(4) and (5) above.

2.4 A CRITIQUE OF THE COMMON INTENTION

Following Stack v Dowden, the parties' common intention now provides the basis of both the creation of a constructive trust and the quantification of shares under the trust. Academic opinion has been divided on whether the parties' common intention provides an appropriate rationale for the constructive trust.[74] The common intention has been variously described as a myth[75] and a phantom.[76] The endorsement of imputed intent by the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott, albeit currently confined to the issue of quantification, further confirms the fallacy of the common intent. An imputed intent, as has been seen, is one acknowledged not to have been held by the parties. In endorsing imputed intent, the Supreme Court acknowledges the close link between this concept and fairness. In this respect, Piska's analysis (extracted above) appears to have been prophetic. There are, however, differences in emphasis between the justices of the Supreme Court. In the judgment of Lord Walker and Baroness Hale, Chadwick LJ's comment in Oxley v Hiscock that 'each is entitled to that share which the court considers fair having regard to the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property' is conflated with imputed intent.[77] Lord Wilson asks the rhetorical question '[w]here equity is driven to impute the common intention, how can it do so other than by search for the result which the court itself considers fair?'[78] Lord Kerr appears prepared to go further and favours a 'stark choice' between an inferred intent (actually held) and fairness, but accepts that the language of imputation is now embedded.[79] The question raised by these views is why, despite recognizing the link with fairness, the Supreme Court still clothes the exercise being undertaken with common intent? It seems that the concept has a power or legitimizing effect, at least as a justificatory tool for intervention, that remains compelling to the court.

[74] See the contrasting views on Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638 by Montgomery, 'A Question of Intention' [1987] Conv 16 (supporting common intention) and Eekelaar, 'A Woman's Place: A Conflict between Law and Social Values' [1987] Conv 93 (against common intention).

While academic commentators have suggested alternative bases for intervention no clear consensus has developed.[80] Alternative schemes may simply raise different concerns. The Law Commission abandoned its own attempt to replace the parties' common intention as the basis of determining property rights in the home,[81] noting that its 'uncompromising rejection of intention was ultimately impossible to justify' and could prejudice many of those who would obtain an interest under the current law.[82]

Bottomley, who had previously argued that the requirement of a common intention led to discrimination against female claimants,[83] became an unlikely proponent for this approach. This support comes from a specific understanding of what is involved in finding a common intention.

> The value of intention returns us to the value of 'intended meaning'. It focuses on a need to try and attribute to actors a purpose to their actions which was within their own foresight. As policy in law, this gives credence to individuals and also, as a broader statement, encourages in individuals the need to take responsibility for their actions. [. . .]

> The importance of holding to the idea of 'intended meaning' seems, to me, to be crucial both for women and for feminists when faced with the alternatives of being rewarded (protected) on the basis of status or arguments based on economic exchange or presumed mutuality. It ascribes to us the freedom we seek to make our own decisions; what the law must act to mitigate are those situations which circumscribe our freedom through the power relations emanating from, and creating, economic or emotional dependency.

Much, therefore, may lie on how the requirement of common intention is understood. The acceptance of imputed intent means that a common intention can now be found even where there is no suggestion of an actual agreement between the parties (and therefore, no need artificially to construct one). This chimes with the understanding of an intention on which Bottomley's conversion is based.

2.5 TOWARDS A RATIONALIZATION OF TRUSTS OF THE HOME

The decisions in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott concern only the quantification of beneficial interests; the secondary question. We have noted that the influence of the decisions extends, to some extent, to the primary question of the creation of a trust. We have seen, for example, in section 2.1.2 above that Stack v Dowden supports an expansion of the conduct that may be used to infer an agreement to share beneficial ownership. We have also noted that Stack v Dowden represents a policy decision to treat ownership of the home differently to other property. This ethos underling the judgment has the potential to change the way in which the primary question of the creation of a trust is answered more radically. In a discussion of the Court of Appeal's decision in Jones v Kernott, Gardner and Davidson commented, 'i[t] is to be hoped, incidentally, that the Supreme Court will also make clear that constructive trusts of family homes are governed by a single regime, dispelling any impression that different rules apply to "joint names" and "single name" cases, and to the "establishment" and the "quantum" of the constructive trust'.[85] The Supreme Court did not go that far. As the question of quantification was the only one to arise on the facts, any attempt to go further would have been obiter. Whilst the views of the court would undoubtedly have commanded respect, given the significance of the issue to have done as Gardner and Davidson had hoped without full argument would have been open to criticism as an exercise in unjustified judicial activism. In response to Gardner and Davidson, Lord Walker and Baroness Hale emphasized the different starting points in joint and sole name cases while noting that '[a]t a high level of generality, there is of course a single regime: the law of trusts'.[86]

85 Gardner and Davidson, 'The Future of Stack v Dowden' (2011) 127 LQR 13, 15.

86 [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [16].

Following Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott, both the creation of a constructive trust and the quantification of shares under the trust are based on the common intention of the parties. However, the creation of a trust is confined to express and inferred intentions, with inferred intent based solely on financial contributions. Two distinct questions arise. The first is whether the type of conduct through which the parties' common intention can be inferred will extend beyond financial contributions—potentially so that the same conduct can be taken into account to infer intent in relation to the primary and secondary questions. In essence, this requires paragraph 69 of Baroness Hale's judgment in Stack v Dowden (extracted above) to apply to the primary question. The argument for doing so may be compelling: it appears illogical to suggest that conduct other than financial contributions can be used to infer the parties' common intention for the purposes of quantifying shares in a trust that already exists, but not to infer their intent to create a trust. The second question is whether, in making such an extension, the concept of an imputed intent is extended to the primary question of creation of a trust. In practice these questions may be inseparable. The wider the range of conduct taken into account, the more strained the notion of an inferred intent may become.

The most radical result of an extension of the reasoning in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott to the creation of the trust is that domestic conduct that is not currently considered sufficient detriment in reliance on an express agreement would become relevant to determining the existence of an inferred or imputed common intention to create a trust. As we have seen, however, the current approach to detriment has been criticized for its denigration of domestic activities. That appears to be the consequence of adopting Nourse LJ's 'reasonable expectations' test of detriment in Grant v Edwards, rather than Browne-Wilkinson VC's broader acceptance of acts done for the parties' joint lives.[87] Further, it would not necessarily be the case that domestic conduct alone would be considered a sufficient basis on which to ascertain a common intention to share the beneficial interest: such conduct would be taken into account only as part of the whole course of dealings between the parties.

Adoption of a broad approach to the constructive trust would bring one further welcome rationale: it would reduce the need for the courts to search for evidence of express discussions for an express agreement constructive trust, and hence remove criticism of the artificiality of this exercise that we have seen in the 'excuses' cases. The broader the range of conduct from which a common intention can be inferred or imputed, the less need there is to search for an express agreement.[88]

On the current state of the authorities there is little evidence to suggest any expansion of the criteria for establishing the parties' common intention in connection with the creation of a trust beyond those provided in Lloyds Bank v Rosset. Shortly after the House of Lords' decision in Stack v Dowden, in Abbott v Abbott[89] the Privy Council considered disputed ownership of a home in the context of sole legal ownership. The parties in the case were married, but, in the jurisdiction from which the case was referred (Antigua and Barbuda), entitlement fell to be determined as a matter of property law. Three members of the Board (Lords Walker and Neuberger, and Baroness Hale) had also decided Stack v Dowden and the Opinion of the Board was delivered by Baroness Hale, who noted that 'the law has indeed moved on' since Lloyds Bank v Rosset.[90] As regards determining ownership of the home, Baroness Hale explained:[91] 'The parties' whole course of conduct in relation to the property must be taken into account in determining their shared intentions as to its ownership.' To the extent this may be seen as foreshadowing the reasoning in Stack v Dowden being carried over to the creation of a trust, caution must be advised.

As a decision of the Privy Council it is not binding on English law. Further, on the facts of the case, Mr Abbott did not dispute that Mrs Abbott should obtain a share of the beneficial interest; the dispute concerned the extent of her share.[92]

In Holman v Howes,[93] the Court of Appeal suggested that there is not necessarily any difference between cases of joint legal ownership and those of sole legal ownership in which it is not disputed that the claimant is entitled to some share of the beneficial interest. In both cases, the only issue for determination is the quantification of the parties' shares. The application of Stack v Dowden to determine the existence of a constructive trust will be tested only where the claimant's argument for a beneficial interest is disputed by the sole legal owner.

In James v Thomas,[94] a claim to a beneficial interest failed. Miss James had worked in her cohabitee's business and had become a partner in the business. The Court of Appeal held that this did not give rise to a common intention to share the beneficial interest in the parties' home. Miss James's assistance was considered to be explicable on the basis that the couple were dependent on the success of the business to meet their outgoings. In that context, it was 'not at all surprising' that she did what she could to make the business prosper.[95]

3 OCCUPATION RIGHTS

A right to occupy a home may be claimed in two ways. Firstly, it may be claimed by virtue of holding a property right of a type that confers a right to occupy. In this respect, where the home is held on trust (whether an express trust or a trust arising under the principles discussed in this chapter), the trust will be a trust of land within the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 (TOLATA 1996). Section 12 of that Act confers a right to occupy on beneficiaries as long as specified preconditions are met. The scope of this right to occupy is considered in Chapter 17. The trustees regulate exercise of the right, in the first instance, with an application to the court under ss 14–15 of that Act in the event of any dispute.

Secondly, a statutory right to occupy is conferred on certain categories of person under the Family Law Act 1996 (FLA 1996), irrespective of holding a property right. In some instances, the right arises automatically; in others, it is dependent on an application to the court. Rights to occupy derived from the FLA 1996 are regulated by applications to the court under that Act.

The FLA 1996 confers an automatic right to occupy (referred to as 'home rights') on a spouse or civil partner in circumstances outlined in s 30. No equivalent rights are conferred on cohabitants.

Family Law Act 1996, s 30(1) and (9)

(1) This section applies if—

(a) one spouse or civil partner ("A") is entitled to occupy a dwelling-house by virtue of—

(i) a beneficial estate or interest or contract; or

(ii) any enactment giving A the right to remain in occupation; and

(b) the other spouse or civil partner ("B") is not so entitled.

[. . .]

(9) It is hereby declared that [a person]—

(a) who has an equitable interest in a dwelling-house or in its proceeds of sale, but

(b) is not [a person] in whom there is vested (whether solely or as joint tenant) a legal estate in fee simple or a legal term of years absolute in the dwelling-house, is to be treated, only for the purpose of determining whether he has home rights, as not being entitled to occupy the dwelling-house by virtue of that interest.

Hence, B obtains a right to occupy in two circumstances: firstly, where B has no proprietary, statutory, or contractual right to occupy outside of the Act (and B's spouse or civil partner does enjoy such rights); secondly, where B's only proprietary right is as a beneficiary and B does not also hold legal title. In this instance, B may also have a right to occupy under the TOLATA 1996 by virtue of holding a beneficial interest. The scope of the rights conferred by each statute is, however, different. The 'home rights' conferred by the FLA 1996 are confined to the right, if in occupation, not be evicted by his or her spouse or civil partner and, if not in occupation, to enter and occupy with the leave of the court.[96] They are generally limited in duration to the subsistence of the marriage or civil partnership and the continuance of A's own right to occupy.[97]

A right to occupy may be obtained on application to the court by a former spouse or civil partner (s 35) or a former cohabitant (s 36). As with the automatic home rights conferred on spouses and civil partners, applications are confined to parties who cannot claim a right to occupy outside of the Act, or whose only claim is as a beneficiary.[98] The rights are further limited to houses that were occupied, or intended by the parties to be occupied, as their home.[99] Any right to occupy obtained by an application under ss 35 or 36 is temporary, with an absolute maximum duration of one year.[100]

4 RECOMMENDATIONS FOR REFORM

The decisions in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott were prompted by the absence of legislative intervention determining the property rights of cohabitees.[101] As Baroness Hale explained in Stack v Dowden, this is an area in which law reform has not kept pace with social and economic developments.[102] She highlighted the social significance of rules applicable on the breakdown of a relationship between cohabitants, and the clear divergence between how property rights are actually resolved and how many people believe that such issues are resolved.

At [41]–[42]

[. . .] The first development is, of course, the huge expansion in home ownership which has taken place since the Second World War and was given a further boost by the 'right to buy' legislation of the 1980s. Coupled with this has been continuing house price inflation, albeit with occasional interruptions such as occurred at the end of the 1980s. This has meant that it is almost always more advantageous for someone who has contributed to the acquisition of the home to claim a share in its ownership rather than the return of the money contributed, even with interest.

Another development has been the recognition in the courts that, to put it at its lowest, the interpretation to be put on the behaviour of people living together in an intimate relationship may be different from the interpretation to be put upon similar behaviour between commercial men. To put it at its highest, an outcome which might seem just in a purely commercial transaction may appear highly unjust in a transaction between husband and wife or cohabitant and cohabitant [. . .]

At [44]–[45]

Inter vivos disputes between unmarried cohabiting couples are still governed by the ordinary law. These disputes have become increasingly visible in recent years as more and more couples live together without marrying. The full picture has recently been painted by the Law Commission in Cohabitation: The Financial Consequences of Relationship Breakdown—A Consultation Paper (Law Com Consultation Paper no 179) (2006) Pt 2, and its Overview paper, paras 2.3 to 2.11. For example, the 2001 census recorded over 10 million married couples in England and Wales, with over 7 5 million dependent children; but it also recorded over two million cohabiting couples, with over one-and-a-quarter million children dependent upon them. This was a 67% increase in cohabitation over the previous ten years and a doubling of the numbers of such households with dependent children. The Government Actuaries Department predicts that the proportion of couples cohabiting will continue to grow, from the present one in six of all couples to one in four by 2031.

Cohabitation comes in many different shapes and sizes. People embarking on their first serious relationship more commonly cohabit than marry. Many of these relationships may be quite short lived and childless. But most people these days cohabit before marriage—in 2003, 78.7% of spouses gave identical addresses before marriage, and the figures are even higher for second marriages. So many couples are cohabiting with a view to marriage at some later date—as long ago as 1998 the British Household Panel Survey found that 75% of current cohabitants expected to marry, although only a third had firm plans (see J Ermisch 'Personal Relationships and Marriage Expectations: Evidence from the 1998 British Household Panel' (2000) Working Papers of the Institute of Social and Economic Research: Paper 2000–27). Cohabitation is much more likely to end in separation than is marriage, and cohabitations which end in separation tend to last for a shorter time than marriages which end in divorce. But increasing numbers of couples cohabit for long periods without marrying and their reasons for doing so vary from conscious rejection of marriage as a legal institution to regarding themselves 'as good as married' anyway (see Law Com Consultation Paper no 179, Pt 2, p 39 (para 2.45)). There is evidence of a wide-spread myth of the 'common law marriage' in which unmarried couples acquire the same rights as married after a period of cohabitation (see A Barlow et al 'Just a Piece of Paper? Marriage and Cohabitation', in A Park et al British Social Attitudes: Public policy, social ties. The 18th Report (2001), pp 29–57). There is also evidence that 'the legal implications of marriage are a long way down the list of most couples' considerations when deciding whether to marry' (see Law Com Consultation Paper no 179, Pt 5, p 96 (para 5.10)).

In the absence of legislative reform, the onus has fallen on the courts to expand and develop equity's principles. Whilst acknowledging the need for an active role on the part of the courts, Hopkins has questioned whether in Stack v Dowden the House of Lords provided sufficient justification for a policy decision to treat the home differently. Drawing an analogy with the debate in public law on judicial deference, he notes that whether specific rules should be provided in respect of the home 'raises questions of social policy that have not received a consistent approach in those areas where legislation has been enacted. The issue may be described as polycentric[103] given that the ramifications of the decision reach far beyond the resolution of the dispute before the court'.[104] Reporting on the results of empirical research, Douglas, Pearce, and Woodward have suggested that the need for reform extends beyond a legislative scheme for determining the property rights of cohabitees and requires 'a reappraisal of the law and practice of homebuying'.[105]

The Law Commission first indicated that it was considering the property rights of home sharers in 1995.[106] The intervening period has seen a significant shift in the focus of the Law Commission's work. Its initial aim was to provide a scheme to determine the property rights of all those who share their home, including married and unmarried couples, and others who share homes as friends, relatives, or for companionship or support.[107] The Law Commission explored the possibility of developing a single scheme to determine ownership of the home in all circumstances in which the issue arose[108] (except cases of relationship breakdown covered by existing statutory schemes), and to the exclusion of claims based on the doctrines of trust (discussed in this chapter) and estoppel (examined in Chapter 10). The Law Commission published its conclusions on this work in Sharing Homes: A Discussion Paper.[109] The Law Commission concluded that such a scheme simply is not possible:[110] the diversity of situations in which people share homes precludes a uniform approach to determining their property rights.

Subsequently, the focus of the Law Commission's work shifted. It narrowed the scope of its work to consider only the position of cohabitants 'living as a couple in a joint household'[111] (who have not married or entered a civil partnership) and principally in the context of relationship breakdown.[112] Within this narrow context, however, the Law Commission's work has moved outside the confines of determining property ownership to consider more broadly the financial consequences of relationship breakdown. Its recommendations were published in the report Cohabitation: The Financial Consequences of Relationship Breakdown.[113] On 6 September 2011, the government announced that it does not intend to implement these recommendations during the current Parliamentary term.[114] However, the need for reform remains. In response to the government's announcement the Law Commission expressed a hope that implementation 'will not be delayed beyond the early days of the next Parliament, in view of the hardship and injustice caused by the current law'.[115]

The application of the current property rules on the breakdown of a relationship has long provided the focus of criticism—in part, due to the contrast from the statutory scheme applicable to married couples who divorce. The disparity in treatment received further attention during the passage through Parliament of the Civil Partnership Act 2004, which contains its own scheme for property adjustment orders on the dissolution of a civil partnership.[116]

In developing proposals for reform, an underlying issue has been the extent to which any new scheme applicable to cohabitants should mirror the statutory schemes applicable on divorce and on the dissolution of a civil partnership. Those schemes reflect a different ethos to the application of the property rules discussed in this chapter.

Miles highlights the essence of this difference.[117]

117 See also Hammond v Mitchell [1991] 1 WLR 1127, in which, Waite J compared the 'forward-looking' approach of family law to the 'painfully detailed retrospect' required to ascertain the parties' property rights.

approach to the acquisition of property rights might be said to be 'what do I have to do?' to get them. [...]

Family law, by contrast, is very much concerned with the status of the parties, in particular the relationship between them, and the economic and other consequences of that relationship. Indeed, it is the existence of a prescribed type of relationship that gives family law its jurisdiction over the issue. A key initial question is not 'what do I have to do?' but 'who do I have to be?' Moreover, unlike property law's backward-looking focus—seeking evidence of past conduct which has automatically generated property rights—family law tends to be forward-looking and discretion-based, typically primarily concerned to cater for future needs created by the relationship between the parties, and is prepared by way of court order to adjust patterns of ownership formally determined by the law of property in relation to assets owned by the parties in order to cater for those needs.

In its report on cohabitation, the Law Commission has recommended a scheme to provide financial relief to cohabitants on the breakdown of their relationship. The proposed scheme will provide a more flexible approach than the property rules discussed in this chapter, but is intentionally not modelled on existing schemes applicable to divorce or the dissolution of a civil partnership.[118] The scheme will apply where cohabitants meet specified eligibility criteria. These are that either the cohabitants have a child together, or they have cohabited for a minimum duration, which the Law Commission recommends is set between two and five years. It will be possible for cohabitants to opt out of the scheme.[119] This must be achieved through a signed agreement between the parties, which 'makes clear the parties' intention to disapply the statute'.[120] Notably, an express declaration of trust will not, without more, constitute such an opt-out. The proposed scheme will still apply unless the parties have also made it clear that they intend to disapply the new scheme.[121]

The Law Commission explains, in the following extract, the basis on which relief is determined and the form that the relief may take.

Law Commission Report No 307, Cohabitation: The Financial Consequences of Relationship Breakdown (2007, [4.32]–[4.41])

We recommend that financial relief on separation should be granted in accordance with a statutory scheme based upon the economic impact of cohabitation, to the following effect.

An eligible cohabitant applying for relief following separation ("the applicant") must prove that:

1. the respondent has a retained benefit; or
2. the applicant has an economic disadvantage;

as a result of qualifying contributions the applicant has made.

A qualifying contribution is any contribution arising from the cohabiting relationship which is made to the parties' shared lives or to the welfare of members of their families. Contributions are not limited to financial contributions, and include future contributions, in particular to the care of the parties' children following separation.

118 Law Commission Report No 307 (2007), [1.2].
119 Ibid, Pt 5.
120 Ibid, [5.56].
121 Ibid, [5.64].

A retained benefit may take the form of capital, income or earning capacity that has been acquired, retained or enhanced.

An economic disadvantage is a present or future loss. It may include a diminution in current savings as a result of expenditure or of earnings lost during the relationship, lost future earnings, or the future cost of paid childcare.

The court may make an order to adjust the retained benefit, if any, by reversing it in so far as that is reasonable and practicable having regard to the discretionary factors listed below. If, after the reversal of any retained benefit, the applicant would still bear an economic disadvantage, the court may make an order sharing that loss equally between the parties, in so far as it is reasonable and practicable to do so, having regard to the discretionary factors.

The discretionary factors are:

1. the welfare while a minor of any child of both parties who has not attained the age of eighteen;
2. the financial needs and obligations of both parties;
3. the extent and nature of the financial resources which each party has or is likely to have in the foreseeable future;
4. the welfare of any children who live with, or might reasonably be expected to live with, either party; and
5. the conduct of each party, defined restrictively but so as to include cases where a qualifying contribution can be shown to have been made despite the express disagreement of the other party.

Of these discretionary factors, item (1) above shall be the court's first consideration.

In making an order to share economic disadvantage, the court shall not place the applicant, for the foreseeable future, in a stronger economic position than the respondent.

The following range of orders should be available to the court:

1. lump sums, including payment by instalment, secured lump sums, lump sums paid by way of pensions attachment, and interim payments;
2. property transfers;
3. property settlements;
4. orders for sale; and
5. pension sharing.

Unlike on divorce, periodical payments should not generally be available.

In so far as the scheme is engaged, it should apply between the parties to the exclusion of the general law of implied trusts, estoppel and contract.

It should be emphasized that the proposed scheme moves the enquiry away from determining the parties' ownership of property. Where the scheme applies, issues of ownership become otiose. It is consistent with this that the scheme will operate to the exclusion of claims based on the property principles discussed in this chapter. If adopted, there will be a clear demarcation between circumstances in which the scheme applies and circumstances in which parties' ownership of their home will need to be determined under the property rules discussed in this chapter.

QUESTIONS

1. Compare and contrast resulting and constructive trusts. Why do you think constructive trusts are preferred as a means of determining rights in the home?
2. Are the problems of gender stereotypes that have been encountered in ascertaining the existence of detriment inherent in the adoption of the test provided by Nourse LJ in Grant v Edwards? Is Browne-Wilkinson VC's test (in the same case) preferable?
3. Compare and contrast an inferred and an imputed intent. What role does each currently play as regards (a) the creation of a constructive trust and (b) the quantification of beneficial shares under a constructive trust?
4. Following Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott what reforms (if any) do you consider desirable to the current law concerning the creation of a common intention constructive trust?
5. What are the advantages and disadvantages of determining ownership of the home through the application of property law principles? Is the Law Commission justified in singling out relationship breakdown between cohabitants as a situation to be dealt with outside property law principles?

REGULATING CO-OWNERSHIP: THE CONTENT QUESTION

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Through the existence of express and implied trusts (particularly constructive trusts arising under the principles discussed in Chapter 16), it is common for the home to be co-owned.
2. English law has two forms of co-ownership: the joint tenancy and the tenancy in common. The legal position of the co-owners as between themselves differs under each form.
3. The distinguishing feature of the joint tenancy is the operation of survivorship on the death of a joint tenant.
4. A joint tenant can become a tenant in common through severance of the joint tenancy. This may occur unilaterally, by the individual act of one or more joint tenants, or mutually, by all of the joint tenants.
5. In both forms of co-ownership, the rights and duties of the co-owners are regulated through the imposition of a trust of land, governed by the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996.
6. The 1996 Act confers powers on the trustees in relation to the management of the land and rights on the beneficiaries. In particular, it confers on certain beneficiaries a right to occupy the land.
7. The 1996 Act provides a procedure through which disputes between the co-owners are resolved by an application to court.

1 INTRODUCTION

Co-ownership describes the situation in which two or more people are concurrently entitled to legal and/or beneficial title to an estate in land. Co-ownership may arise either in relation to a freehold or leasehold estate, and is of particular relevance in understanding the legal regulation of the home. The home may be co-owned either through the existence of an express trust, or through a successful claim to ownership of the home being made under the constructive or resulting trust discussed in Chapter 16. The defining characteristic of co-ownership is that the parties have 'unity of possession'—that is, they are each entitled to possession of the whole of the land. It is unity of possession that distinguishes co-ownership from successive ownership (which is considered in Chapter 20), in which possession is enjoyed consecutively, and separate from ownership of neighbouring plots of land.

The presence of co-ownership gives rise both to internal issues, in relation to the relationship between the co-owners themselves, and external issues, as regards the relationship between the co-owners and third parties. The purpose of this chapter is to consider the internal regulation of co-ownership. It is concerned with the content question: the relationship between the co-owners themselves, including their rights and duties in relation to each other, and whether one co-owner can insist on a sale of the land against the wishes of another. Chapters 18 and 19 consider external issues of applications for sale of the land by third parties and priority between the co-owners and third-party purchasers of the land.

The internal regulation of co-ownership is dominated by two features of English law: firstly, the recognition of two distinct types of co-ownership—the joint tenancy and the tenancy in common; and secondly, the imposition of a trust in all cases of co-ownership. When considering the internal regulation of co-ownership, the trust is best seen as a device through which the powers of management and disposition of the land are separated from the enjoyment of the land, whether 'enjoyment' takes the form of occupation, or receipt of profits and the proceeds of sale. Through the imposition of the trust, the powers of management and disposition are vested in the legal owner or co-owners as trustee(s), while enjoyment of the land vests in the beneficial or equitable owners. Even when the same people are both trustees and beneficiaries, it is important to differentiate the capacity in which a person is exercising his or her rights and duties in relation to the land.

2 JOINT TENANTS AND TENANTS IN COMMON

Co-ownership may take the form of a joint tenancy or a tenancy in common. The essence of a joint tenancy is that each joint tenant is wholly entitled to the land when acting collectively, but that, individually, no single joint tenant has any 'share' in the land with which he or she can separately deal. This is reflected in Coke's[1] description of the joint tenancy: '[E]ach joint tenant holds the whole and holds nothing, that is, he holds the whole jointly and nothing separately.' The practical consequence of each joint tenant holding 'the whole' is that, when one dies, there is no 'share' to pass by will or intestacy. Title simply 'survives' in the remaining joint tenants through the process of survivorship: there is no passing or vesting of title in the remaining joint tenants, because they were already 'wholly entitled' themselves. The operation of survivorship is the key practical difference between the joint tenancy and the tenancy in common.

Tenants in common hold what are described as 'undivided shares' in the land. Lawson and Rudden explain this concept using the analogy of a company.

Lawson and Rudden, The Law of Property (3rd edn, 2002, p 93)

> The simplest way to grasp the idea [of tenants in common] is to think of shares in a company. The shareholders each have a separate thing which they can alienate or leave to pass on their > death, but none of them can go to the company's head office, point at a particular room and say 'I claim my share'. So if there are two owners in common of a house each has a separate, though intangible, asset: it is the house which is not divided into distinct 'shares'.

Each tenant in common may deal with his or her share individually during his or her lifetime (for example, by selling the share to another co-owner, or to a third party). On the death of a tenant in common, his or her share passes through his or her will or under the rules of intestacy. In sum, it may be said that while joint tenants can act only collectively and their acts necessarily affect the whole of the co-owned estate, tenants in common can also act individually in relation to their own undivided shares in the estate.

Where co-owners start out as joint tenants, one or more of the co-owners may subsequently become a tenant in common through the process of severance. Co-ownership of a legal estate is, however, subject to a particular statutory framework that, through a series of provisions, confines the creation of legal co-ownership to a joint tenancy, precludes any subsequent severance of that joint tenancy, and imposes a maximum number of four joint legal owners.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 1(6)

> (6) A legal estate is not capable of subsisting or of being created in an undivided share in land [. . .]

Law of Property Act 1925, s 36(2)

> (2) No severance of a joint tenancy of a legal estate, so as to create a tenancy in common in land, shall be permissible, whether by operation of law or otherwise, but this subsection does not affect the right of a joint tenant to release his interest to the other joint tenants, or the right to server a joint tenancy in an equitable interest whether or not the legal estate is vested in the joint tenants [. . .]

Trustee Act 1925, s 34(2)

> (2) In the case of settlements and dispositions [creating trusts of land] made or coming into operation after the commencement of this Act—
> (a) the number of trustees thereof shall not in any case exceed four, and where more than four persons are named as such trustees, the four first named (who are able and willing to act) shall alone be the trustees, and the other persons named shall not be trustees unless appointed on the occurrence of a vacancy;
> (b) the number of the trustees shall not be increased beyond four.

Hence, s 1(6) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925) prohibits legal tenancies in common ('undivided shares'), while s 34(2) of the Trustee Act 1925 imposes a limit of four trustees or owners of the legal title. The effect of these provisions is to create a single and indivisible legal title, held by (and registered in the names of) a maximum of four co-owners. The prohibition of severance—a logical consequence of s 1(6) of the LPA 1925—is put beyond doubt by s 36(2) of that Act. Because legal title cannot be fragmented through severance, purchasers can deal confidently with the legal owners as collective managers of the sole legal title. The certainty provided to purchasers does not come at the expense of flexibility for the co-owners: flexibility is ensured through the fact that co-ownership necessarily arises under a trust.

These provisions affect only the legal title held by the trustees. Beneficial co-owners remain free to choose between the joint tenancy and tenancy in common, with no limitation on their number.

So what happens if, contrary to these provisions, land is purported to be transferred as a legal tenancy in common? This possibility is dealt with by s 34(2) of the LPA 1925.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 34(2)

(2) Where, after the commencement of this Act, land is expressed to be conveyed to any persons in undivided shares and those persons are of full age, the conveyance shall (notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Act) operate as if the land had been expressed to be conveyed to the grantees, or, if there are more than four grantees, to the four first named in the conveyance, as joint tenants in trust for the persons interested in the land [. . .]

2.1 IDENTIFYING JOINT TENANTS AND TENANTS IN COMMON

While legal title must be held as a joint tenancy, in equity, the beneficiaries may be either joint tenants or tenants in common. So how do we know whether co-owners are joint tenants or tenants in common?

Three factors may determine this. Firstly, the joint tenancy is characterized by four 'unities', which must be present for the beneficiaries to be joint tenants. In addition to unity of possession, these are unity of interest (the joint tenants have the same interest in the land), unity of title (the joint tenants must derive their title from the same act, for example, of adverse possession, or document), and unity of time (joint tenants derive their title at the same time). But while the presence of all four unities is a prerequisite for a joint tenancy, it is not determinative. A tenancy in common may still be found where the unities are present.[2]

Secondly, in an express trust, the parties may declare the capacity in which beneficial entitlement is held. In Goodman v Gallant,[3] the court held that such a declaration is conclusive. In Cowcher v Cowcher,[4] Bagnell J considered that 'A trust for A and B without further definition creates an equitable joint interest'. In registered land, joint transferees have the opportunity to indicate on the transfer form TR1 whether equitable title is to be held as a joint tenancy—but completion of that part of the form is not mandatory and therefore issues of interpretation will continue to arise as to whether the terms of a trust are sufficient to declare a joint tenancy.[5] In Robertson v Fraser,[6] Lord Hatherley LC noted: 'I cannot doubt, having regard to the authorities respecting the effect of such words as amongst and respectively that anything which in the slightest degree indicates an intention to divide the property must be held to abrogate the idea of a joint tenancy, and to create a tenancy in common.' A declaration that a survivor can give a valid receipt for capital moneys has been held insufficient to establish an express joint tenancy.[7]

Thirdly, in the absence of an express declaration by the parties, the status of co-owners is determined by the application of legal presumptions. The starting point is the general presumption that equity follows the law. As the parties are necessarily joint tenants in law, they will be joint tenants in equity. Prior to Stack v Dowden[8] the initial presumption of a joint tenancy was considered to be readily rebutted where parties contributed to the purchase of land in unequal shares. In such circumstances it was considered that equity favoured the tenancy in common as crediting parties with a share reflecting their actual contribution and avoiding the capricious effect of survivorship that the longest survivor gains all. This approach was preferred by Lord Neuberger in his minority judgment in the case.[9] The majority considered that in the 'domestic consumer context' the presumption of joint tenancy will only be rebutted where the contrary is proved through a common intention constructive trust (in the manner discussed in Chapter 16). Further, it was considered that cases in which the presumption would be rebutted in this way would be 'very unusual'.[10]

This approach was endorsed by the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott,[11] but with significant clarification as to the type of case to which Stack v Dowden applies and as to the reasons underpinning the presumption in those cases. In respect of the scope of Stack v Dowden, in their joint judgment in Jones v Kernott Lord Walker and Baroness Hale referred to the presumption of joint tenancy as operating in respect of properties bought 'in joint names for joint occupation by a married or unmarried couple, where both are responsible for any mortgage'.[12] In the following extract, they explain the reasoning for the operation of the presumption in these cases.

Jones v Kernott
[2011] 3 WLR 1121

Lord Walker and Baroness Hale

At [19]–[22]

The presumption of a beneficial joint tenancy is not based on a mantra as to "equity following the law" (though many non-lawyers would find it hard to understand the notion that equity might do anything else). There are two much more substantial reasons (which overlap) why a challenge to the presumption of beneficial joint tenancy is not to be lightly embarked on. The first is implicit in the nature of the enterprise. If a couple in an intimate relationship (whether married or unmarried) decide to buy a house or flat in which to live together, almost always with the help of a mortgage for which they are jointly and severally liable, that is on the face of things a strong indication of emotional and economic commitment to a joint enterprise. That is so even if the parties, for whatever reason, fail to make that clear by any overt declaration or agreement. The court has often drawn attention to this. Jacob LJ did so in his dissenting judgment in this case: [2010] EWCA Civ 578, [2010] 1 WLR 2401, para 90.

[7] Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432, [51], approving the Court of Appeal decisions in this respect in Harwood v Harwood [1991] 2 FLR 274 and Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736.

[8] [2007] 2 AC 432, [58] per Baroness Hale.

[9] Ibid, [109]–[110]. The presumption of a tenancy in common where parties contribute unequally remains intact in commercial cases. See, e.g., Malayan Credit v Jack Chia [1986] AC 549, PC.

[10] [2007] 2 AC 432, [68], per Baroness Hale.

[11] [2011] UKSC 53, [25] and [68].

[12] Ibid, [25].

One of the most striking expressions of this approach is in the judgment of Waite LJ in Midland Bank plc v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562, 575. It is worth quoting it at some length, even though the case was a single-name case and the couple were married (the husband was 19, and the wife a little older, at the time of the marriage):

> Equity has traditionally been a system which matches established principle to the demands of social change. The mass diffusion of home ownership has been one of the most striking social changes of our own time. The present case is typical of hundreds, perhaps even thousands, of others. When people, especially young people, agree to share their lives in joint homes they do so on a basis of mutual trust and in the expectation that their relationship will endure. Despite the efforts that have been made by many responsible bodies to counsel prospective cohabitants as to the risks of taking shared interests in property without legal advice, it is unrealistic to expect that advice to be followed on a universal scale. For a couple embarking on a serious relationship, discussion of the terms to apply at parting is almost a contradiction of the shared hopes that have brought them together. There will inevitably be numerous couples, married or unmarried, who have no discussion about ownership and who, perhaps advisedly, make no agreement about it. It would be anomalous, against that background, to create a range of home-buyers who were beyond the pale of equity's assistance in formulating a fair presumed basis for the sharing of beneficial title, simply because they had been honest enough to admit that they never gave ownership a thought or reached any agreement about it.

Gardner and Davidson make the same point at (2011) 127 LQR 13, 15–16:

> The context under discussion is one in which people will not normally formulate agreements, but (this is crucial) the very reason for this—the parties' familial trust in one another—also warrants the law's intervention nonetheless. Unless the law reacts to such trust as much as to more individualistic forms of interaction, those who put their faith in the former rather than the latter will find their interests thereby exposed.

Gardner has termed this "a materially communal relationship: ie one in which, in practical terms, they pool their material resources (including money, other assets, and labour)": An Introduction to Land Law, 2nd ed (2009) para 8.3.7.)

The notion that in a trusting personal relationship the parties do not hold each other to account financially is underpinned by the practical difficulty, in many cases, of taking any such account, perhaps after 20 years or more of the ups and downs of living together as an unmarried couple. That is the second reason for caution before going to law in order to displace the presumption of beneficial joint tenancy. Lady Hale pointed this out in Stack v Dowden at para 68 (see para 12 above), as did Lord Walker at para 33:

> In the ordinary domestic case where there are joint legal owners there will be a heavy burden in establishing to the court's satisfaction that an intention to keep a sort of balance-sheet of contributions actually existed, or should be inferred, or imputed to the parties. The presumption will be that equity follows the law. In such cases the court should not readily embark on the sort of detailed examination of the parties' relationship and finances that was attempted (with limited success) in this case.

In respect of homes bought in joint names by parties who are not in an intimate relationship (for example, those bought jointly by parents and children, siblings, or friends) there will still be an initial presumption of joint tenancy based on the 'mantra' that equity follows the law. However, that initial presumption will be replaced with a presumption of resulting trust where the parties contributed unequally so that the beneficial shares reflect their contributions. Where the parties' shares are unequal they will necessarily be tenants in common.

In Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott the status of the co-owners as joint tenants or tenants in common was addressed only in relation to cases of joint legal ownership. The decisions do not indicate the status of parties in a case of sole legal ownership where another party (or parties) establish a beneficial interest through a resulting or constructive trust. Prior to Stack v Dowden, as with cases of joint legal ownership, the status of the parties would be dependent on whether they contributed equally or unequally: equal contributions were considered to be consistent with a joint tenancy; unequal contributions with a tenancy in common. In cases of sole legal ownership, there is no initial presumption of co-ownership; the initial presumption is of sole beneficial ownership. This may be sufficient to differentiate such cases and leave the existing presumptions intact. But Stack v Dowden moves the ethos in determining rights in homes acquired by married and unmarried cohabitees away from contributions (and the resulting trust) to the parties' common intention through the constructive trust. It is consistent with this to suggest that, in sole legal ownership cases, parties should be joint tenants despite contributing unequally to the purchase where, on a constructive trust analysis, there is a common intention to share beneficial ownership equally.

2.2 SURVIVORSHIP

As has been noted, survivorship operates in a joint tenancy, with the effect that, on the death of one co-owner, title simply remains in the survivors. Through this process, the longest surviving co-owner becomes the sole owner. Practical difficulties that would arise where the co-owners die jointly are precluded by an arbitrary rule in s 184 of the LPA 1925.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 184

> In all cases where, after the commencement of this Act, two or more persons have died in circumstances rendering it uncertain which of them survived the other or others, such deaths shall (subject to any order of the court), for all purposes affecting the title to property, be presumed to have occurred in order of seniority, and accordingly the younger shall be deemed to have survived the elder.

The effect of this provision is that, in the event of simultaneous deaths of joint tenants, the land passes wholly under the terms of the will (or rules of intestacy) of the youngest co-owner.

2.3 SEVERANCE

Severance is the process through which a beneficial joint tenant may become a tenant in common. By doing so, the severing joint tenant obtains an undivided share in the land that can be separately dealt with and which, on his or her death, will pass under the terms of their will or through statutory rules applicable to intestacy. The severing joint tenant is no longer affected by survivorship, which continues to operate as between any remaining joint tenants. Severance is irreversible. Because survivorship operates immediately upon the joint tenants' death, severance must take place during their lifetime. In particular, this carries the consequence that severance cannot take place by will. The severing joint tenant is invariably credited with an equal share.[13]

[13] Goodman v Gallant [1986] Fam 106.

Four methods of severance exist. One is provided by statute in s 36(2) of the LPA 1925. That subsection also preserves the operation of other methods of severance. Three other methods have developed through case law and were summarized in the following case.

Williams v Hensman

(1861) 1 J&H 546

Page-Wood VC

A joint-tenancy may be severed in three ways: in the first place, an act of any one of the persons interested operating upon his own share may create a severance as to that share. The right of each joint-tenant is a right by survivorship only in the event of no severance having taken place of the share which is claimed under the jus accrescendi. Each one is at liberty to dispose of his own interest in such manner as to sever it from the joint fund—losing, of course, at the same time, his own right of survivorship. Secondly, a joint-tenancy may be severed by mutual agreement. And, in the third pace, there may be a severance by any course of dealing sufficient to intimate that the interests of all were mutually treated as constituting a tenancy in common. When the severance depends on an inference of this kind without any express act of severance, it will not suffice to rely on an intention, with respect to the particular share, declared only behind the backs of the other persons interested. You must find in this class of cases a course of dealing by which the shares of all the parties to the context have been effected [. . .]

The methods identified by Page-Wood VC may be referred to, respectively, as an act of a joint tenant operating on his or her share, mutual agreement, and severance by a course of dealing. Of these four methods, a joint tenant may use the first two (statutory severance and an act operating on a share) unilaterally. For so long as there are two or more joint tenants, their joint tenancy remains intact between them and exists side by side with the severed tenant in common. The effect of such unilateral severance is illustrated in Figure 10.

The other two methods (mutual agreement and course of dealing) necessarily involve the participation of all of the joint tenants and, if applied, bring the joint tenancy to an end by turning all of the beneficiaries into tenants in common. These methods of severance cannot be used, for example, by two of four joint tenants to sever their joint tenancy, but leave the joint tenancy intact as between the others.

In addition to these methods, severance may also arise as a consequence of the unlawful killing of one joint tenant by another.

2.3.1 Statutory severance

The statutory method of severance is found in the proviso to s 36(2) of the LPA 1925.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 36(2)

(2) Provided that, where a legal estate (not being settled land) is vested in joint tenants beneficially, and any tenant desires to sever the joint tenancy in equity, he shall give to the other joint tenants a notice in writing of such desire or do such other acts or things as would, in the case of personal estate, have been effectual to sever the tenancy in equity, and thereupon [the land shall be held in trust on terms] which would have been requisite for giving effect to the beneficial interests if there had been an actual severance.

It is important to note that, to be effective, written notice must be served on all of the joint tenants. Written notice that is not served on all of the joint tenants will not constitute severance under this provision.

Two key issues have arisen in the application of s 36(2): firstly, what constitutes written notice; and secondly, how to identify the point in time at which notice is validly served.

What constitutes written notice?

While there is no particular form that the notice must take,[14] it must express an immediate severance and must relate to the ownership of the land or proceeds of sale in a manner inconsistent with a joint tenancy. In this respect it is important to bear in mind that a joint tenancy continues to subsist as the property held on trust is exchanged: for example, a joint tenancy of a house continues into the proceeds of sale. The need for a notice to relate to ownership is highlighted by Nielson-Jones v Fedden.[15] In that case, severance was held not to have taken place, because the written notice dealt with use, rather than ownership, of the proceeds of sale. The notice, which took the form of a memorandum agreed between the parties, directed the husband to 'use his entire discretion and free will' to decide whether to sell the parties' former matrimonial home in order to purchase a home for himself. Walton J noted that the memorandum was 'wholly ambiguous' as to ownership of the proceeds of sale.[16] It gave the husband use of the whole of the proceeds of sale, but this did not imply that he was entitled to half absolutely. It is entirely consistent with the unity of possession that is characteristic of co-ownership for one joint tenant to have use of the whole property.

In Burgess v Rawnsley,[17] Lord Denning MR suggested that the decision in Nielson-Jones v Fedden was wrong. He did not, however, discuss the specific issue regarding a declaration of use.

The need for the notice to express an immediate severance is illustrated by contrasting the two following cases.

[14] There is no requirement that the notice is signed: Re Draper's Conveyance [1969] 1 Ch 486, 492.

Re Draper's Conveyance

[1969] 1 Ch 486, HC

Facts: A husband and wife were joint tenants of their matrimonial home. Following their divorce, the wife issued a summons under s 17 of the Married Woman's Property Act 1882 for an order that the house be sold, and the proceeds distributed equally between her and her husband—a request reflected in an affidavit sworn by her in support of her application. An order for possession and sale, and equal division of the proceeds, was made, but the husband remained in possession until his death. The question then arose as to whether severance had occurred.

Plowman J

The summons, coupled with the affidavit in support of it, clearly evinced an intention on the part of the plaintiff that she wished the property to be sold and the proceeds distributed, a half to her and a half to the deceased. It seems to me that that is wholly inconsistent with the notion that a beneficial joint tenancy in that property is to continue, and therefore, apart from these objections to which I will refer in a moment, I feel little doubt that in one way or the other this joint tenancy was severed in equity before the end of February, 1966, as a result of the summons which was served on the plaintiff's then husband and as a result of what the plaintiff stated in her affidavit in support of the summons of Feb. 11, 1966 [...]

Counsel for the plaintiff took another point. Counsel for the defendants, in argument, having indicated that he relied not only on the summons as operating to sever the joint tenancy but on the orders as well, counsel for the plaintiff submitted on the authority of Bedson v. Bedson that there was no power in the court by an order made under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, to sever a beneficial joint tenancy. He submitted that the power of the court was to declare what the rights of the parties were and not to alter those rights. That may well be so—for the purposes of my judgment I am prepared to assume that counsel for the plaintiff is right about that—but the view which I take is that the question does not arise here. The severance, in my judgment, is effected by the summons and the affidavit, not by any order that was made. Accordingly, in my judgment, the beneficial joint tenancy was severed by the plaintiff in the lifetime of the deceased husband, and I propose to declare that on the true construction of the above-mentioned conveyance and s. 36 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and in the events which have happened, the plaintiff, as trustee, holds the beneficial interest in any proceeds of sale of the property after discharge of incumbrances and costs for herself and the estate of the deceased as tenants in common in equal shares.

Harris v Goddard

[1983] 3 All ER 242, CA

Facts: As in Re Draper's Conveyance, a husband and wife were joint tenants of their matrimonial home. Following the breakdown of the relationship, the wife petitioned for divorce and requested, under the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, 'That such order may be made by way of transfer of property and/or settlement in respect of the former matrimonial home [...] and otherwise as may be just'. The husband was subsequently killed in an accident and the question arose whether this petition had acted to sever the joint tenancy.

When a notice in writing of a desire to sever is served pursuant to s. 36(2) it takes effect forthwith. It follows that a desire to sever must evince an intention to bring about the wanted result immediately. A notice in writing which expresses a desire to bring about the wanted result as some time in the future is not, in my judgment, a notice in writing within s. 36(2). Further, the notice must be one which shows an intent to bring about the consequences set out in s. 36(2), namely that the net proceeds of the statutory trust for sale "[...] shall be held upon the trust which would have been requisite for giving effect to the beneficial interests if there had been an actual severance". I am unable to accept Mr Berry's submission that a notice in writing which shows no more than a desire to bring the existing interest to an end is a good notice. It must be a desire to sever which is intended to have the statutory consequences. Paragraph 3 of the prayer to the petition does no more than invite the court to consider at some future time whether to exercise its jurisdiction under s. 24 of the 1973 Act or, if it does, to do so in one or more of three different ways. Orders under s. 24(1)(a) and (b) could bring co-ownership to an end by ways other than by severance. It follows, in my judgment, that para. 3 of the prayer of the petition did not operate as a notice in writing to sever the joint tenancy in equity. This tenancy had not been severed when Mr Harris died with the consequence that Mrs Harris is entitled to the whole of the fund held by the first and second defendants as trustees. I wish to stress that all I am saying is that para. 3 in the petition under consideration in this case did not operate as a notice of severance.

The key difference between the cases is that that the petition in Harris v Goddard did not evince an immediate desire to sever. It should be emphasized that, in Re Draper's Conveyance, the court acknowledged that severance was caused by the summons and affidavit, not the order of the court. Hence, where the application constitutes written notice, severance occurs regardless of whether the application is heard or, if it is, regardless of the outcome. The courts' reliance on the summons and affidavit in Re Draper's Conveyance caused doubt to be cast on the decision. In Nielson-Jones v Fedden,[18] Walton J noted that, until a court order is made, proceedings can be withdrawn. He considered that notice under s 36(2) of the LPA 1925 must be irrevocable, and therefore doubted that a summons and affidavit could suffice. This doubt was cast aside in Harris v Goddard.[19] Lawton LJ noted that the revocable nature of court proceedings is simply a factor for the court to consider in all of the circumstances when determining whether, on the facts of the case, notice has been served within s 36(2).

Whether it is necessary for the notice to be irrevocable appears to remain unsettled. Notably, in responding to Walton J's judgment, Lawton LJ does not explicitly reject such a requirement. But Smith suggests that the endorsement of Re Draper's Conveyance by the Court of Appeal, both in Harris v Goddard and in a further decision,[20] suffices to dispel the need to show that notice is irrevocable.[21]

Re Draper's Conveyance was applied in the context of different judicial proceedings in Quigley v Masterson.[22] There, the judge was satisfied that an application to the Court of Protection in which one joint tenant sought authority to sell a house and divide the proceeds between herself and the other joint tenant, her former partner, constituted notice.

When is notice of severance validly served?

Whether notice of severance has been validly served is a matter of importance, as it is from that moment that the joint tenancy is irreversibly severed, the severing joint tenant becomes a tenant in common and, as such, is no longer subject to survivorship. In most cases, this issue does not cause difficulties: written notice is sent and received, and the matter is beyond doubt. Where the notice is connected to judicial proceedings it will be served in the context of those proceedings.[23] But understanding when notice is validly served may be crucial where a death occurs in close proximity of time or a joint tenant, having issued notice, seeks to intercept it following a change of mind.

The requirement in s 36(2) of the LPA 1925 is that the notice is given to the joint tenants. General guidelines on service of a notice are provided in s 196 of the Act. These have been applied to s 36(2), 'given' and 'served' being considered in this context to be synonymous.[24]

Law of Property Act 1925, s 196(3) and (4)

(3) Any notice required or authorised by this Act to be served shall be sufficiently served if it is left at the last-known place of abode or business in the United Kingdom of the lessee, lessor, mortgagee, mortgagor, or other person to be served, or, in case of a notice required or authorised to be served on a lessee or mortgagor, is affixed or left for him on the land or any house or building comprised in the lease or mortgage, or, in case of a mining lease, is left for the lessee at the office or counting-house of the mine.

(4) Any notice required or authorised by this Act to be served shall also be sufficiently served, if it is sent by post in a registered letter addressed to the lessee, lessor, mortgagee, mortgagor, or other person to be served, by name, at the aforesaid place of abode or business, office, or counting-house, and if that letter is not returned [by the postal operator (within the meaning of the Postal Services Act 2000) concerned] undelivered; and that service shall be deemed to be made at the time at which the registered letter would in the ordinary course be delivered.

It should be noted that there is no requirement that the notice is actually received or seen by the intended recipient. It is sufficient that it reaches (or is deemed to have reached) the joint tenant's last known address. Where notice is sent by ordinary post, it is served within s 196(3) when the postman delivers the letter, because this constitutes leaving the notice at the 'last known place of abode'.

This was held in the following case, which contains the most thorough judicial analysis of when written notice is served. As Neuberger J highlights, the seemingly unending possible factual permutations justify a clear rule.

[23] Cf: Quigley v Masterson [2011] EWHC 2529 (Ch). There, the joint tenant on whom notice needed to be served was not a party to proceedings which related to an application to the Court of Protection to appoint a Deputy to act on his behalf. The notice was treated as having been served on his Deputy from the time that she was appointed by the court to act on his behalf.

Kinch v Bullard
[1999] 1 WLR 423, HC

Facts: Mr and Mrs Johnson were beneficial joint tenants of their matrimonial home. The parties were divorcing and Mrs Johnson, who was terminally ill, sent a notice of severance to Mr Johnson by ordinary first-class post. The letter was duly delivered, but, before seeing it, Mr Johnson suffered a serious heart attack. Realizing that she was now likely to outlive her husband, Mrs Johnson destroyed the letter. Mr Johnson died a couple of weeks later, followed, in a matter of months, by Mrs Johnson. An action was brought by the parties' respective executors to determine whether the notice—delivered, but then destroyed—had operated to sever the joint tenancy. If it had, then each party had a 50 per cent share to pass under the terms of their respective wills; if not, survivorship would have operated on Mr Johnson's death, leaving the entire property to pass under Mrs Johnson's will.

Section 196(4) deems service on the premises to have taken place if the requirements of sending by registered post and non-return by the Post Office are satisfied, even if it can be shown that physical service did not in fact take place on those premises. Section 196(3), on the other hand, requires it to be established that physical service did in fact take place on the appropriate premises, before any deemed service can arise. It appears to me that the natural meaning of s 196(3) is that if a notice can be shown to have been left at the last known abode or place of business of the addressee, then that constitutes good service, even if the addressee does not actually receive it. [. . .]

Thirdly, it was contended on behalf of the defendants that the fact that Mrs Johnson changed her mind and no longer '(desired) to sever the joint tenancy' by the time that the notice might otherwise have been said to have been 'given' (ie by the time that the notice arrived at the property) meant that the notice was ineffective to effect such severance. This argument is based on the language of s 36(2). Assuming that the notice was validly 'given' pursuant to s 196(3), the giving of the notice only occurred when it was actually delivered to the property, and at that time Mrs Johnson no longer 'desire[d] to sever the joint tenancy'. Accordingly, it is said that the statutory precondition for the giving of a valid notice was not, at the date it was given, satisfied, because at that date Mrs Johnson did not have the necessary 'desire'.

In my judgment, this argument is not correct. The function of the relevant part of s 36(2) is to instruct any joint tenant who desires to sever the joint tenancy how to do it: he is to give the appropriate notice (or do such other things as are prescribed by the section). Clear words would be required, in my judgment, before a provision such as s 36(2) could be construed as requiring the court to inquire into the state of mind of the sender of the notice. Once the sender has served the requisite notice, the deed is done and cannot be undone. The position is the same as with a contractual right to determine a lease, which normally entitles either or both parties to serve notice to determine the lease if it desires to put an end to the term. Once the procedure has been set in train, and the relevant notice has been served, it is not open to the giver of the notice to withdraw the notice, and I have never heard it suggested that a change of mind before the notice is given would render it ineffective.

I reach this conclusion based on the proper construction of s 36(2). However, it appears to me that it is also correct as a matter of policy. If it were possible for a notice of severance or any other notice to be ineffective because, between the sender putting it in the post and the addressee receiving it, the sender changed his mind, it would be inconvenient and potentially unfair. The addressee would not be able to rely confidently upon a notice after it had been received, because he might subsequently be faced with the argument that the sender had changed his mind after sending it and before its receipt. Further, as I have already mentioned, it is scarcely realistic to think that the legislature intended that the court could be required to inquire into the state of mind of the sender of the notice in order to decide whether the notice was valid.

I am inclined to think that the position would be different if, before the notice was 'given', the sender had informed the addressee that he wished to revoke it. In such a case, it appears to me that the notice would have been withdrawn before it had been 'given'. After all, as is clear from the reasoning at first instance and in the Court of Appeal in Holwell Securities Ltd v Hughes [1973] 2 All ER 476 at 481, [1973] 1 WLR 757 at 761–762; [1974] 1 All ER 161 at 164, 166–167, [1974] 1 WLR 155 at 158–159, 160–162, a notice sent by post is not 'served' in accordance with s 196(3) until it arrives at the premises to which it has been addressed. Accordingly, it seems to me that, while the notice is still in the post, it has not been given, and, until it is given, the sender has in effect a locus poenitentiae whereby he can withdraw the notice, but only provided his withdrawal is communicated to the addressee before the notice is given to, or served on, the addressee. I should emphasise, however, that this is no more than a tentative view.
